First, as to the entry made by Piaggio, without taking the requisite oath. Piaggio took the oath prescribed by the act of 1823, and not the oath prescribed by the act of 1823, so modified as to conform to the provisions of the act of 1863. Without such conformity, the invoice or entry made would, in some important particulars, have no verification other than the declaration signed abroad. The taking of the oath prescribed by the act of 1823, not so modified as to conform to the provisions of the act of 1863, was an entry, or an attempt to make an entry by means of a "fraudulent document or paper," or by means of a "false or fraudulent practice or appliance" under the statute, and is punished with a forfeiture of the goods so entered, or attempted to be entered.

Second, as to the undervaluation. The value invoiced was five francs the case. The weight of testimony shows that the actual value of the red wines was eight and one-half francs the case. The cost of box, bottles, corks, capsules, labels, and other requisites of preparation for shipment is shown to be four francs sixteen centimes the case; leaving, according to the invoice valuation, but eighty-four centimes, or about sixteen cents, as the value of the contents of the twelve bottles; being one and one-third of a cent per bottle. I cannot come to the conclusion that such a valuation carries with it the truth. The invoices of subsequent importations, introduced on the part of the government, and wherein wine of the same quality, as that libelled in this case, is valued as high as seven and a half francs, while the testimony shows little or no intermediate variation in price, weigh heavily with the court. Therefore, after a full review and careful consideration of the evidence adduced on both sides, I am satisfied that the undervaluation is made out.

Third, as to the false and fraudulent statements touching the character of the merchandise imported. That the wine was falsely described in the invoice is admitted, nay, urged by the claimant. This admission is conclusive against him; for the invoice is not "in all respects true," and the false description or naming of the wine, was a "false, fraudulent practice," under the statute [U. S. v. One Hundred and Twenty-Five Baskets of Champagne] 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 560, 564. Moreover, the act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 202], subjects imitations to the highest rate of duty imposed upon the "article imitated." This wine, the red wine, is labeled "Blaye Superieur," and is so called in the invoice. If it is "Blaye Superieur," then it should have paid duty at the rate of eighteen francs the case, such having been shown to be the value of the best qualities of "Blaye." If it is an imitation, then again it should have paid a duty at the rate of eighteen francs the case, that being the value of the wine imitated; thus in either case there was a palpable fraud upon the revenue attempted.

I find as the facts of the case that the allegations contained in the first article of the original libel of information, and in the first, second and third articles of the amended libel of information have been proved. My judgment, therefore, is that the property libeled in this suit be condemned and forfeited to the government of the United States.

DUELING—INDICTMENT FOR CARRYING CHALLENGE.

Upon an indictment for unlawfully carrying a challenge to fight a duel, a scienter must be proved.

Indictment for unlawfully carrying a challenge to fight a duel.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, contended that it was necessary for the United States to prove that the defendant knew it to be a challenge. It could not be "unlawfully" carried if he was ignorant that it was a challenge.

Mr. Swann, for United States, contended that the defendant was bound to know; and that he carried it at his peril.

THE COURT decided, nem. con., that the scienter must be proved; and the circumstances that the letter was not sealed, and that the defendant declared that he thought it was a legal notice, were for the consideration of the jury in deciding whether the defendant knew it was a challenge.

INDICTMENT FOR MISDEMEANORS — PROSECUTOR'S NAME.

The name of a prosecutor must be written at the foot of every indictment for a misdemeanor, in Alexandria county, before it is sent to the grand jury, unless it be founded upon a presentment made upon the knowledge of two of the grand jurors, or upon the testimony of a witness called upon by the court or the grand jury.

Indictment for assault and battery upon Jacob Millan. The indictment had been sent to the grand jury by Mr. Swann, attorney of the United States, in consequence of a presentment of the grand jury at November term, 1827, which stated that evidence had been heard before them whereby it appeared that Richard Shackelford, one of the constables of the county of Alexandria, was guilty of an assault on the body of Jacob Millan, but that the time limited by law for the prosecution of misdemeanors had passed.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, moved to quash the indictment because the name of a prosecutor was not written at the foot of it, according to the law of Virginia (page 105, § 24); and cited the case of U. S. v. Helriggle [Case No. 15,344], at the last term.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) quashed the indictment, and said they would hear a motion to order the witness to be sent to the grand jury.

SHIPPING—NON-DELIVERY OF REGISTER—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

To affect the master of a vessel with the penalty provided for his non-delivery of a temporary register, granted under the 3d section of the coasting act of 1793, c. 52 [1 Story's Laws 286; 1 Stat. 306, c. 8], there must not only be an arrival at the port, to which the vessel belongs, but it must be an arrival there, not by accident, or from necessity, but intentionally, as one of the termini of the voyage.

Debt for the penalty of one hundred dollars, against the defendant [Jacob Shackford], as master of the schooner Sarah, of Eastport, for not delivering up a temporary register, obtained in the district of New York, within ten days after the arrival of the vessel at Eastport, where she belonged, according to the provisions of the 3d section of the coasting act of 1793, c. 52. The case came before the district court upon an agreed statement of facts, as follows: "In this case it is agreed, that the schooner Sarah, of which the defendant was master, belonged to Eastport, and was there duly enrolled and licensed; and thence she proceeded to New York, where she took a temporary register and sailed on a voyage to St. Johns, New Brunswick; landed her cargo there, and took a return cargo and passengers for New York. On her way to the latter place, she stopped at Eastport, in the American waters, and within the district of Passamaquoddy, and anchored off the town, and waited about two hours for the tide; during which period, she landed some passengers and their baggage, having permit from the custom-house for that purpose; took on board some other passengers and small stores, and sailed under the same temporary register to New York, and did not deliver up her temporary register to the collector of Passamaquoddy within ten days. Upon this evidence, the cause is submitted to the decision of the judge, reserving the right of appeal, as from a judgment rendered on verdict."

The district court pronounced a judgment in favour of the defendant [Case No. 16,263], upon which a writ of error was brought to the circuit court.

Mr. Shepley, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Mr. Greenleaf, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The third section of the coasting act of 1793, c. 52 [1 Story's Laws, 286; 1 Stat. 306, c. 8], provides, that the collectors of the several districts may enroll and license any ship or vessel, that may be registered, upon such registry being given up, or register any ship or vessel that may be enrolled, upon such enrolment and license being given up. And when any ship or vessel shall be in any other district than the one to which she belongs, the collector of such district, &c., shall make the exchanges aforesaid. But in every such case, the collector to whom the register or enrolment and license may be given up, shall transmit the same to the register of the treasury; "and the register or enrolment and license granted in lieu thereof, shall, within ten days after the arrival of such ship or vessel within the district, to which she belongs, be delivered to the collector of the said district, and be by him cancelled. And if the said master or commander shall neglect to deliver the said register, or enrolment and license, within the time aforesaid, he shall forfeit one hundred dollars."

The question upon the facts is, whether in this case there was an arrival of this vessel within the district of Eastport, to which she belongs, in the sense of the act, so that the penalty of one hundred dollars was incurred by the neglect of the master to deliver up the temporary register to the collector of the district within the ten days prescribed by the act. The argument of the district attorney is, that every coming into the district is an arrival, in the sense of the act, although it may not be in the course of the voyage on which the vessel is bound, nor within the original contemplation of the parties when it was undertaken. It goes then to this extent, although not so stated in terms, that if the vessel come in from necessity, or be driven in by stress of weather, or seek the port to avoid capture by an enemy, it falls within the reach of the act, as much as if it was a voluntary arrival, however short may be the stay, or fugitive the purpose of it. The argument on the other side is, that the arrival must be within the district as a port or place of destination on the business of the voyage, and so contemplated by the parties, as one of the termini, if not the sole terminus of it.

It is doubtless true, that the term "arrival" is susceptible of either interpretation, according to the language of the context, and the objects of the legislature. It may be used in the most general sense, as importing a mere entry within the local limits of the district; or it may be restrained to such an entry as is purely voluntary, for objects connected with the voyage, and a part of the enterprise. Whether the one sense or the other is to be adopted, depends upon a just survey of the language, and the policy of the statute. There are many instances in our revenue laws, where the word is used in the more limited as well as in the larger sense. In the 22d section of this very act, there is a provision applicable to coasting vessels putting into a port, other than that to which they are destined, where the master is required to make a report to the custom-house within twenty-four hours after his arrival, if he continues so long in port. The word "arrival" is here manifestly used in its most general sense, as a mere putting or coming into port, for any purpose whatsoever. On the other hand, there seems little doubt, that the arrival, spoken of in the sixth section of the act, refers to an arrival at the port of destination, as the arrival spoken of in the 15th and 17th sections certainly does.

The question then resolves itself into a question of the true construction of the terms of the act, with reference to the context and policy of the act. Now, we are to recollect, that this is a penal clause, and if either of the two constructions may be adopted, and each tallies with the language, and interferes with no known policy of the act, that ought to be adopted which is most liberal to the citizen, and burthens him with the least restraints. But if one construction be exceedingly inconvenient, and the other safe and convenient, a fortiori ought the latter to be deemed the true exposition of the legislative intention; for it can never be presumed that the government means to impose irksome regulations, unless for some known object, or from some express declaration.

Now, the plain object of the legislature is, generally, to have vessels registered, enrolled, and licensed, in the ports or districts to which they belong. But it is not required if a change from a registry to an enrolment, or è contra, is desirable to the owner, with a view to his own accommodation or business, when the vessel is absent from her home-port, that she should be compelled to return to the home-port directly, without embarking in any intermediate voyage. The language of the act justifies a totally different construction. If a vessel is enrolled, and is in a distant port, the owner may surrender her enrolment, and have her registered so as to embark on a foreign voyage; and it is no violation of the policy of the act, that she should perform several foreign voyages under such temporary register before her return to the home-port. All that is required is, that when she does return, the temporary register shall, within ten days after her arrival there, be surrendered. No period is provided, after which the temporary register shall cease to have a valid operation, unless there be such an arrival at the home-port. No known policy of the act is broken in upon by any delay to return, however long. The object of the legislature is, to promote the interests of the ship-owner, and the encouragement of trade. The natural presumption is, that the vessel will return home, that she has, so to say, the animus revertendi, as soon as the interests of the owner require it; and as the ship in the mean time carries in all her papers, complete proofs of her domicil and her ownership, there is no danger of loss to the revenue of the government, or of mistake of her real character and trade.

If the district attorney is right in his argument, then, in all cases of a change of the ship's papers, the vessel may be materially retarded in her commercial operations from unforeseen casualties. Suppose a vessel, engaged in a foreign voyage, is driven by storm or other necessity into her home-port, it will then become the duty of the master, even if his stay might not otherwise be intended for an hour, or a day, to wait until he can communicate with the custom-house, and surrender his papers and procure new ones. Now, in the home-port, in order to procure a new register or enrolment, the owner is required to take an oath of ownership, and the master, if present, an oath of his citizenship. The owner may be temporarily absent on a journey; the vessel may arrive in the night, or in hours when the custom-house is closed; she may arrive on a Sunday, or at an out-port at a great distance from the collector's residence; she may arrive in an inclement season, when access to him is difficult; her voyage may be vitally affected by the retardation of a few hours or days. In cases of this sort, (and many such may be imagined,) it is easy to see, if a rigid construction be adopted, that great embarrassments, if not material injuries, may arise to merchants and owners, from causes wholly beyond their control. Could the legislature have intended to impose restraints upon trade, unless for some great and obvious benefit? Ought not maritime laws, affecting employments so liable to accidents and disasters, and unforeseen emergencies as navigation and trade, to be liberally construed in doubtful cases, so as to ward off, rather than to add weight to, the pressure of uncontrollable misfortunes? My opinion is that they ought, and that it would be highly inconvenient, not to say unjust, to make every doubtful phrase a drag-net for penalties.

It appears to me that the true interpretation of the section under consideration is, that the arrival of the vessel pointed at, is an arrival within the scope of the voyage; an arrival in the district, not only voluntarily, but as a port of destination, or terminus of the voyage. I do not say the sole or the ultimate port of destination, for I readily admit, that if the home-port constitutes one of the places within the contemplation of the parties, where the vessel is to stop for the trade or business of the voyage, that would bring the case within the act, notwithstanding any ulterior destination. But a mere arrival in the district in the transit from one port to another, either accidentally or voluntarily, but for no purpose originally connected with the employment or objects of the voyage, and as a mere emergent incident, or fortuitous occurrence, is not within the purview or policy of the act. The act contemplates an intention to abide in the port, or at least it indulges a supposition that the vessel may, in some cases, remain there ten days; for it inflicts no forfeiture for a non-delivery within that period. It looks, therefore, to some intentional arrival, which may last for such a period by design; and this may well be deemed a provision unlocking its real meaning.

Upon the whole, I entirely concur in the opinion of the district judge, and think that an arrival within the purview of the section must be an arrival with an intention to return to the home-port, as one of the termini of the voyage, and in the course of prosecuting it. It must not be a mere touch or stay for accidental and transitory purposes, having nothing to do with the original enterprise.

The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

Case No. 16,263.

UNITED STATES v. SHACKFORD.

District Court, D. Maine. Feb. Term, 1830.[2]

SHIPPING—NON-DELIVERY OF REGISTER—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

By the arrival of a vessel, sailing under a temporary register, at her home port within the meaning of the third section of the coasting act (Acts 1793, c. 52, § 3 [1 Story's Laws, 286; 1 Stat. 306, c. 8]), is meant an arrival in the regular course of her employment as to one of the termini of her voyage, or for an object connected with and making part of the business in which she was engaged. The master is not rendered liable for the penalty for the non-delivery of his register, by merely touching at the port to land passengers, when on his way to another port.

This was an action of debt, brought to recover a penalty of one hundred dollars, against the master of the schooner Sarah, of Eastport, under the act of congress of 1793, c. 52, § 3 [1 Story's Laws, 286; 1 Stat. 306, c. 8]. This section provides that any enrolled and licensed vessel, being in any district other than that to which she belongs, may surrender her enrolment and license, and take out a register, which register, "within ten days after the arrival of such vessel within the district to which she belongs, shall be delivered to the collector of said district, to be by him cancelled;" and if the master neglects to deliver the register he is liable to a penalty of one hundred dollars.

The case was submitted on the following agreed statement of facts: "In this case it was agreed that the schooner Sarah, of which the defendant [Jacob Shackford] was master, belonged to Eastport, and was there duly enrolled and licensed; and thence she proceeded to New York, where she took a temporary register, and sailed on a voyage to St. John, New Brunswick, landed her cargo there, and took in a return cargo and passengers for New York. On her way to the latter place she stopped at Eastport, in American waters, and within the district of Passamaquoddy, and anchored off the town, and waited about two hours for the tide, during which period she landed some passengers and their baggage, having a permit from the custom-house for that purpose, took on board some other passengers and small stores, and sailed, under the same temporary register, to New York, and did not deliver up her temporary register to the collector of Passamaquoddy within ten days. On this evidence the cause is submitted to the decision of the judge, reserving the right of appeal as on a judgment rendered on a verdict."

Mr. Shepley, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Greenleaf, for defendant.

WARE, District Judge. The decision of this case, which is submitted to the court on an agreed statement of facts, turns wholly on the construction of the third section of the act of February 18, 1793, for enrolling and licensing vessels for the coasting trade and fisheries, commonly called the coasting act. Acts 1793, c. 52, § 3 [1 Story's Laws, 286; 1 Stat. 306, c. 8]. This section authorizes the collectors of the customs to give to any enrolled and licensed vessel a register, or to any registered vessel, an enrolment and license, on the surrender of the old enrolment and license or register. But when this change of papers is made in any other district than that to which the vessel belongs, the collector who gives the new papers is directed to transmit those which are surrendered to the register of the treasury, and the master is required, within ten days after the vessel's arrival within the district to which she belongs, to deliver to the collector the new temporary papers, to be by him cancelled; and in case of neglect to comply with this requirement, the master incurs the penalty of one hundred dollars. It is this provision of the law which is alleged to be violated, and the present suit is brought to recover the penalty. The only question which the case presents, is, whether, in the present instance, there was such an arrival as is contemplated by the law. The strict and etymological meaning of the word arrival is to come to the shore, ad ripam; and in the French language, through which the word comes to us from the Latin, this meaning is preserved. In our language, the etymological meaning has not been so closely adhered to; but the radical signification of the word is to come to some place by water. The word implies a transitus and a terminus, a voyage made and a point at which it terminates. In the revenue laws of the United States the word is sometimes used in a sense somewhat loose and indeterminate, as to the term or end of the voyage, and a vessel is said to arrive within a collection district, and to arrive within four leagues of the coast. Laws U. S. 1799, c. 128, §§ 25, 26 [1 Story's Laws, 595; 1 Stat. 646, c. 22].

But the ordinary meaning of the word in the revenue laws is the coming of a vessel to some place of her destination in the course of a voyage—some terminus embraced within the range of her employment, or of the expedition or enterprise in which she is engaged. In this way it is used as contradistinguished from the phrase touching at a port, though in a more loose sense a vessel is said to arrive at a port at which she touches. And this is a distinction which is made in other parts of the statute on which this action is founded. By the 21st section of this act, a vessel licensed for carrying on the fisheries, on obtaining a permission from the collector, is allowed to touch and trade at a foreign port. The touching and trading here is not supposed to be a primary object of her destination; not a terminus coming necessarily within the range of her employment. In the 22d section, the distinction is more clearly marked. It provides that if a vessel employed in the transportation of merchandise from district to district, shall put into a port, other than that for which she is destined, the master shall, within twenty-four hours after his arrival, if there be an officer residing at such port, and she continues there so long, make report, &c. Here the going into a port for which she was not destined, is described by the words "put into," and in the language of the law it only becomes an arrival when she has remained there long enough for the fiscal laws of the country to operate upon her. Before the twenty-four hours have expired, she is, within the words of the act, permitted to depart without making a report.

It appears to me that the spirit and intention of the third section of the act, are answered by giving to the word its most usual signification, that of coming to her home port in the regular course of her employment, as one of the termini of a voyage, or for an object connected with and making a part of the trade or business in which she is engaged. In the present case, the vessel was bound to New York, where she had taken out her temporary papers, with a return cargo, and she touched or put into Eastport merely to land some passengers. This was not part of her principal employment, nor incidental to the primary object of her voyage, but merely casual, and, so to say, fortuitous. It was an act which, in the ordinary use of language, would be described by the expression, to touch, or to put into the port.

That this touching at her home port is not such an arrival as is contemplated by this section, may be argued from the terms of the whole section. The master is allowed ten days after his arrival to make the change of papers which is required. The natural inference is, that the law was not intended to operate, unless she makes a stay of some time at the place; that it was not designed to attach to the case of a mere casual or fortuitous touching. I do not mean to be understood that if a vessel come to her home port in the ordinary course of her employment, and engage there in business, as in the delivery or taking in of a cargo, that she would be authorized to depart at any time within ten days without delivering up her temporary papers. In such a case, it would seem that her papers ought to be surrendered, although her stay at the port is less than ten days. This construction seems to me to satisfy the policy of the law, which requires all vessels to be enrolled or registered in the port to which they belong, and it is not inconsistent with its words. Judgment must therefore be rendered for the defendant. But as the true construction of the statute certainly admits of considerable doubt, a certificate of reasonable cause of prosecution will be given to the collector.

[Subsequently a writ of error was sued out from the circuit court, where the judgment of this court was affirmed. Case No. 16,262.]

9. One who joins in the general conspiracy, and by his presence countenances acts of violence, but who does not individually use force or threats, to compel the master to resign the command of his vessel; is guilty of the offence of confining the master.

10. A master of a vessel may so conduct himself, as to justify the officers and crew in placing restraints upon him, to prevent his committing acts, which might endanger the lives of all the persons on board; but an excuse of this kind must be listened to with great caution, and such measures should cease, the moment the occasion for them ceases.

This was an indictment [against Sharp, Steward, Anderson, Macky, Smith, Williams, and Johnson] for making a revolt, endeavouring to make a revolt, and for confining the master. The prisoners upon their arraignment, severally pleaded, not guilty. The counsel for the three first, moved that they might be tried by one jury, distinct from the other four; as their defence was not only different in some respects, but at variance with that of the other four. The difficulty of making their challenges, where some of the prisoners might approve of the men challenged by the others, was stated as a reason, why they had a right to claim separate trials. The court granted the motion.

In justification of the conduct of the prisoners, in confining the captain, and transferring the command to Sharp, the mate, they gave evidence, tending to prove mental derangement in the captain. To disprove this charge, the district attorney offered the journal kept by the master, (in which, the master swore he made the entries every night,) from the style of which, the jury would be able to judge of the state of the master's mind, during the period in which he was charged with insanity. This evidence was objected to, but THE COURT allowed the journal to be read, for the purpose for which it was offered; but not as evidence of any fact stated in it.

THE COURT overruled the motion of the district attorney, to read the log book kept by the mate. A protest made at Bordeaux, was also offered in evidence by the district attorney, and rejected by the court; as it was not to be used for the purpose of discrediting any one who had signed it, and who had given evidence in the cause.

The facts proved in the cause, and upon which the points of law arose, were, that the four prisoners then on trial, were distressed seamen, taken on board by Risborough, master of the letter of marque, the Vixen, at Bordeaux, upon the request of the American consul there; who paid ten dollars for each of them, being the sum to which the master was entitled, under the act of the 28th February, 1803 (3 Bior. & D. Laws, 527 [2 Stat. 203]); for transporting distressed seamen, from foreign ports to the United States, upon request of the consuls of the United States. That during the voyage, the crew getting dissatisfied with the master, compelled him by threats of personal injury, to confine himself to her cabin, and to resign the command of the vessel; which they, by vote, transferred to Sharp, the next officer on board, who assumed and retained it for more than a fortnight; when he left the Vixen, in order to conduct a prize into the United States; and the command was, by a plurality of votes of the crew, restored to Captain Risborough.

Upon these facts, it was contended by the counsel for the prisoners; that they were not such seamen, as are intended by the act of congress, constituting the offences with which the prisoners are charged (2 Bior. & D. Laws, 93, 94, §§ 8, 12 [1 Stat. 112]); as they are not seamen of the vessel, bound by any contract with the master, entitled to any compensation or owing him obedience.

Secondly. It was contended, that the word revolt, is not defined by any act of congress; nor is it defined by the common or civil law, nor by any judicial decision to be met with in any reporter, or in any elementary writer upon law. That if the philological meaning be sought for, it is so various, so diffusive, as to furnish no safe definition for a crime; particularly for one so highly penal, as this is made, by the act of congress. The statute of 11 & 12 Wm. III. c. 7, made it a capital offence to make, or endeavour to make a revolt, or to confine the master; but yet it does not appear, that from that time to this, any decision has been made, by which a definition of the word revolt, has been given. The case which comes the nearest to it, is to be found in East, Crown Law, 796. Both sides referred to Johnson's Dictionary, word "revolt." The French dictionaries and Barretti's Italian Dictionary, give the same word. They also referred to Shakespeare. The material facts in the case are stated in the charge.

C. J. Ingersoll, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Sergeant and J. R. Ingersoll, for defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Before the case is examined upon the evidence, it will be proper to settle the points of law which have been discussed. It is contended for the prisoners: First. That they are not such seamen, as are contemplated by act of congress creating the offences, with which they are charged; because they were not seamen of, or belonging to the vessel, not having been engaged as such by the master, and not having entered into a contract, to entitle them to wages, or the master to their services. The counsel was mistaken in supposing, that the 8th or 12th section of the law, speaks of seamen of, or belonging to the vessel, in reference to the offences charged in this indictment. That expression is used in one part of the 8th section, in relation to certain acts of piracy; but the clause which declares it to be piracy to make a revolt, and a misdemeanor to endeavor to make one, or to confine the master, speaks of seamen generally. But if the supposed expression had been used, it would have made no difference, in as much as the men received on board at Bordeaux by the master, upon the application of the American consul, were as much seamen of the vessel, and belonging to her, as those who had signed the shipping articles. By the 4th section of the act of congress, of the 28th February, 1803, the American consuls and vice consuls at foreign ports, are required to provide passages, for all destitute American seamen, within their districts, to some port of the United States; and to pay for the passage of each seaman, a sum, not exceeding ten dollars. The master of every American vessel is bound, upon the requisition of the consul, to receive such seamen, not exceeding two in number, for every ton of his vessel; and to transport them to the United States, under a penalty; and on the part of such seamen, they are bound, to do duty on board such vessel, according to their abilities. Here then is a contract created by the law, which, in consideration of support and transportation by the master, obliges the seaman to perform all the duties of one, and creates all the relative obligations and duties of master and servant, which exist in cases of articled seamen.

It is objected, that the offence of making a revolt, is not sufficiently defined by this law, or by any other standard, to which reference could be safely made; to warrant the court in passing a sentence upon the prisoners, in case of conviction.

I confess I have always considered, (although without having examined the matter with much attention,) to make a revolt, was to throw off all obedience to the master; to take possession by force of the vessel by the crew; to navigate her themselves, or to transfer the command to some other person on board. A revolution, going to such an extreme, appeared to me to bear a strict analogy to treason against the state; amounting to a falling off from the allegiance due from an inferior to a superior; and, which might be attended with consequences equally mischievous, to the owner, as preventing him from defending his vessel. I thought it applied as well to merchant vessels in time of peace, as in time of war; whereas the other clause was confined to hostile resistance, against a public enemy, or against a pirate. This was certainly the impression of the court, in the case of U. S. v. Smith [Case No. 16,318], upon an indictment for confining the master, and endeavouring to make a revolt. But although this is still my opinion, yet I am not able to support it, by any authority to be met with, either in the common, admiralty, or civil law. If we resort to definitions given by philologists, they are so multifarious, and so different, that I cannot avoid feeling a natural repugnance, to selecting from this mass of definitions, one, which may fix a crime upon these men, and that too of a capital nature; when, by making a different selection, it would be no crime at all, or certainly not the crime intended by the legislature. Laws which create crimes, ought to be so explicit in themselves, or by reference to some other standard, that all men, subject to their penalties, may know what acts it is their duty to avoid. For these reasons, the court will not recommend to the jury, to find the prisoners guilty of making, or endeavouring to make a revolt, however strong the evidence may be. But there is an offence laid in this indictment, the definition of which is perfectly clear. That is, confining the master; which is declared to be a misdemeanor, by the 12th section of this law. In the same case, of U. S. v. Smith, this court laid it down; that any confinement of the master, whether by depriving him of the use of his limbs, or by shutting him up in the cabin, or by intimidation, preventing him from the free use of every part of the vessel; amounts to a confinement, in contemplation of law.

The next enquiry is, whether according to this definition, Captain Risborough, the commander of this vessel, was confined by his crew. The evidence upon this point is clear. It appears, that about four o'clock in the afternoon, of the 28th February last, nearly three weeks after the vessel had commenced her voyage, the weather being squally, the captain went forward to the forecastle, and called the men upon deck to assist in taking in the sails; some of them replied, that the watch was on deck, and upon the order being repeated, two of them, Parker and Dougherty, (or probably only the latter,) answered that they did not come on board to work. The captain said he would see to that, and immediately returning to the cabin, came again upon deck with a pistol in his hand, where he found those two men standing; he reproached them (as he says) for their disobedience, and according to the testimony of some of the witnesses for the prisoners, added some abusive language. The captain states, that Parker bared his breast, and told him to fire: other witnesses do not mention this fact, and rather exculpate this man from the charge of insolence. The captain struck Parker with the pistol, and then snapped it at him. They immediately cried out, and the captain swears that the cry was general, to throw him overboard. There is no doubt but that there was immediately a tumultuous assemblage of the crew aft, accompanied by such circumstances of menace, as to induce Captain Stafford, a passenger, and the only friend Captain Risborough seems to have had on board, to advise him to retire to the cabin, as it was impossible for him to encounter the whole crew. He followed this advice, and was probably saved from the grasp of Smith, one of the prisoners who rushed after him, by the mate Mr. Sharp. It appears that after the captain had retired to the cabin, the tumult seemed to subside upon deck for a short time. About an hour afterwards, Captain Stafford overheard some of the crew, in the steerage, conversing upon the late occurrence, and declaring, that Captain Risborough was not fit to command the vessel; that they would throw him overboard, and give the command to Sharp. Upon communicating these threats to the captain, it was deemed necessary to provide immediately for his defence, and they accordingly loaded some of the muskets. In a short time after this, the crew again assembled, and cried out a sail. By some of the witnesses for the prisoners, it was stated that the cry was made only by the man at the helm. It was near dark, and one of the witnesses declares, that he thought he saw a sail, but it was a mistake. Captain Stafford, who was on deck at the time, believing that this was only a feint intended to draw the captain on deck, for the purpose of doing him some injury; went below and communicated this opinion to the captain. The captain, however, desirous of satisfying himself as to the fact, ascended the steps with caution, and had scarcely put his head above the companion way, when he was seized by one or more of the crew, and with great difficulty he was able to extricate himself from the hold they had taken of him. The tumult was now considerable, and Sharp being on deck, drew the slide over the companion, probably with a view to prevent the crew from descending into the cabin; there was then a general cry upon deck for an axe, to cut a hole in the trunk of the companion way, in order to get the captain out that way. One of the witnesses for the prisoners, has sworn that the axe was called for by Dougherty. Soon after this, the crew being generally assembled, a paper was presented to Mr. Sharp, signed by twenty-one of them, the purport of which, so far as we can ascertain it from the witnesses, was to require the captain to resign the command in favour of Sharp. Sharp declining to take the paper, it was delivered to Mr. Lloyd, the supercargo; who conveyed it to Captain Risborough. After consulting with Captain Stafford, they concluded that the captain's safety required his acquiescence; and he accordingly signified his assent to Mr. Lloyd, who communicated it to the crew. Risborough then sent for Sharp, and desired him to do his best to conduct the vessel to the first port in the United States. Every thing was now tranquil, and the captain went upon deck that night without further molestation.

The following night the crew again assembled aft, and sent to the cabin for Sharp, and soon after for Captain Stafford, to come to them. They said that the captain was mad, and they were afraid he might put fire to the magazine; they therefore desired, that a centinel might be placed over it, and that the muskets which had been loaded, should be discharged. Some of them proposed that the captain should be put in irons. At length it was determined to discharge the muskets and to guard the magazine by a centinel; which determinations were accordingly executed.

On the 2d of March an order was given by Mr. Sharp, to the centinel, not to permit Captain Risborough to come on deck at night, in consequence, as it is said, of a report made to him by Mr. Lloyd, that he had heard the captain say he would as leave throw himself overboard as not. This order was strictly executed until the 16th of March; when by a new election of the crew, Captain Risborough was restored to his command, in consequence of Sharp going on board of an English prize, in order to conduct her into port. About ten days prior to this capture, they had brought to a Portuguese vessel, and got from her some supplies; which on the part of the prosecution it is contended, were piratically taken, and on that of the prisoners, that they were freely gave. This transaction however forms no part of the question for the consideration of the jury. Upon this summary of the evidence, it cannot be denied; that Captain Risborough was compelled, by the threats and violent proceedings of his crew, to confine himself to his cabin, from about four o'clock of the afternoon of the 28th of February, until he consented to abdicate his command of the vessel, upon the requisition of his mutinous crew, and with a view to the preservation of his life. This state of confinement was removed for a day or two, and was then renewed and rigidly enforced, during the nights. The offence therefore, of confining the captain, by intimidation, is fully established, if the witnesses are believed by the jury.

Secondly. The remaining enquiry under this head is, whether the prisoners at the bar are implicated in the offence, proved against the crew generally. It is not necessary that they should be proved individually, to have used any force or threats to compel him to confine himself to his cabin or to resign his command. It is sufficient, if they joined in the general confederacy, and by their presence countenanced the acts of violence which produced these consequences. If a number of men associate themselves together, to commit a felony or trespass, and only one of them do the act in the presence of the others, all the confederates are guilty as principals. In this case it is proved, that the crew were all assembled, except a sick seaman and a degraded officer, at the different periods when the before mentioned acts of violence were committed and the prisoners are proved to have been present at some of them. Had they not joined in the conspiracy, they ought, and certainly would have separated themselves from the mutineers. Had they done so, it is not improbable, but they might have prevented the perpetration of the offence, which is so clearly proved; by holding themselves up to the rioters, as persons who might at least be dangerous witnesses against them, when called to answer for their conduct. Independent of this evidence against the crew generally, it is proved that Smith, one of the prisoners, pursued Captain Risborough, when he was returning to the cabin, and was arrested by the mate; that Macky was one of the signers of the paper, requiring the captain to resign; and that the whole of the prisoners, at different times, actually kept guard in the cabin over the magazine.

Thirdly. The prisoners, however, have attempted to excuse themselves, by alleging the violence of the captain against two of their comrades, and his threat, made at the same time, to throw a barrel of gunpowder into the forecastle, and blow them up, if they refused to obey his orders; which it is proved he did; and lastly, upon the plea of the captain's insanity. It cannot be doubted, but that the master of a vessel, may so conduct himself, as to justify his officers and crew placing restraints upon him, to prevent the commission of acts, which might endanger the lives of the whole. It is true, the law does not provide for such an emergency, nor was it necessary; the law of our nature, which is paramount to all human laws, would justify such conduct in such a case. But an excuse of this kind, should be listened to with great caution. Precarious indeed would be the interests of commercial men, if the occasional violence of the master they have selected, or the suspicions of the crew, that from any cause he is unfit to command; should be a sufficient justification to them, for removing him from the station to which he was appointed, and substituting one of their own choice, to fill his place. If he attempts to commit unjustifiable acts of violence against an individual, or individuals of the crew, he may be resisted. Parker and Dougherty, when he approached them with a loaded pistol, would have been justified in any act, necessary for their preservation. Had he been really deranged; or had he given such evidence of an intention to commit the desperate act, of which he was suspected; a restraint, accommodated to the emergency, might have been lawfully applied. But as to the rash attempt to take the life of Parker, which cannot be held in too great abhorrence, the danger had passed away, before the offence was committed with which the prisoners are charged. Even Parker and Dougherty could not justify themselves, (and much less could the rest of the crew,) for their subsequent acts, in confining the captain, and depriving him of the command. A man may, in self defence, even take the life of his opponent; but if the danger is at an end, he cannot justify himself for afterwards committing any act of violence whatever against him. In like manner, the threat of Captain Risborough, to throw a barrel of gunpowder into the forecastle, if the crew refused to obey his orders, was rash and foolish, but it was obviously the threat, as the former was the act, of a man, under the temporary influence of passion; from which no danger could be reasonably apprehended, nor does it appear that any was apprehended in consequence of it.

It is next said, that the captain was mentally deranged, and that fears were entertained by the crew, that he would blow up the magazine. The question is not, what were the apprehensions of the crew; but is their evidence to satisfy the jury, and such as ought to have satisfied a reasonable and firm man, that such was the state of the captain's mind, and such the danger of his going at large? What are the circumstances relied upon, to prove him a madman, and a mischievous one? They are, his snapping a pistol at one of the crew; his threat in relation to the barrel of gunpowder; his asking the steward, on the 1st of March, which way his pistol pointed; and his expression to Lloyd, on the 2d of March, that he would think very little of jumping overboard. This conduct, and these declarations, as proofs of derangement, are entirely equivocal. In connection with other circumstances, they might prove that fact; or they might be the effect of an irritable temper, and a wounded sensibility, brooding over the degraded state to which a mutinous crew and a cold hearted set of officers, had reduced him. In his apprehension of personal danger, he might well talk incoherently, in relation to his means of defence; and in the despondency of his heart, he might look with a desperate indifference at a criminal act of suicide. But let it always be remembered, that this state of his mind, might be the consequence of his disgrace, and not the cause of it. No witness pretends to say, that he was at any time unsound in mind, until after the crime imputed to the crew, was committed; and shall the prisoners be allowed to excuse their crime, upon the plea of derangement in the captain, which their conduct had occasioned? Certainly not.

But let the sincerity of those who make this plea, be tested by their own conduct. In the first place, it should be observed, that when the witnesses for the prisoners were asked, why they thought the captain mad, scarcely any of them agreed in assigning the same reason; but Captain Stafford, his only friend on board, and who was constantly with him, declares, that he saw no symptom of derangement, and that he did not consider him so at any moment of time. That the crew, for whom this plea is made, did so consider him, may well be suspected; from their sending to him a paper, requiring his acquiescence in the measures proposed, for deposing him from the command, and the appointment of a successor. It is the dictate of common sense, that a person of unsound mind, cannot bind himself or others by his consent; and they must have known, that a compulsory change in the government of the vessel, could not be legitimated, by the acquiescence of an insane commander. In the next place it appears, that Sharp, on some occasions occurring after his usurpation, consulted with Captain Risborough; which would have been very absurd, had he thought the captain insane. Another strong proof of the recollection and prudence of Captain Risborough, was his directing the supercargo, to read the consul's letter to the crew; with a view to prevent them from committing any act of hostility against the Portuguese vessel.

But, even suppose the transactions of the 28th, had so operated upon the mind of Captain Risborough, as to derange it; and that this, if made out, would excuse the act of confining him; still this violent measure of precaution, should not have extended a moment beyond the existence of the danger which occasioned it; and a continuation of the confinement, after the captain was restored to his senses, would, in the eye of the law, amount to the crime of confining the captain. Further, such conduct would afford strong evidence, that the excuse now set up was affected and not real; since, if the latter, upon the cause ceasing the effect would naturally cease. Now it is in evidence by the prisoners' witnesses, those who thought him insane; that they considered him to be of sound mind, some days before they overhauled the British vessel; upon which occasion, and in consequence of Sharp quitting the vessel to go on board the prize; the captain, instead of receiving back his authority as of right, was by a plurality of votes, elected master against Captain Stafford, who was set up as his competitor by some of the crew.

With these observations the case was left with the jury.

Verdict: Guilty of confining the captain, and not guilty as to the residue of the indictment.

Judgment was arrested, for the reasons on which the indictment was quashed upon the trial of the other prisoners, Sharp and others. See Case No. 16,265.

UNITED STATES v. SHARP et al.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1815.

INDICTMENT — JCINDER OF CAPITAL CRIME AND MISDEMEANOR.

An indictment, which charges in the same count, an offence made capital by one section of an act of congress [1 Stat. 112], and another offence, declared in another section of the same law, to be a misdemeanor, is bad.

[Cited in brief in State v. Cameron, 40 Vt. 560.]

Messrs. Binney and Chauncey, counsel for the prisoners [Sharp, Anderson, and Stewart], when their trial was called up, moved to quash the indictment, because there was no count in it, for an offence, as described in the statute. They stated that the first count, was for making a revolt, and confining the captain, which is not described as an offence in the 8th section; although making a revolt, is a capital offence, under the 8th section; and confining the captain, is a misdemeanor, under the 12th section. In like manner, the second count, is for confining the captain, and endeavouring to make a revolt; to which the same exceptions apply. It is essential to justice, that the grand jury should have it in their power, to ignoramus any offence in the indictment, which is not supported by evidence. But if two or more offences, are thus blended together, in one count, they must find the whole, or ignoramus the whole; whereas, if they are arranged in different counts, they may find one a true bill, and ignoramus as to the other. How are the petty jury, in a case of this kind, to find their verdict? If they say the prisoners are guilty of part of the offence described in one count, and not guilty as to the others; they do not find them guilty "in manner and form;" but where there are different counts, they are the same as different indictments. 4 Hawks, 2.

THE COURT decided that the indictment could not be supported.

The district attorney entered a nolle prosequi, as to the defendants.

UNITED STATES v. SHAW et al.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1859.

CONTRACTS BY UNITED STATES—RESCISSION—AUTHORITY OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICERS—CONTRACTS BY CORRESPONDENCE.

1. Contracts made by the United States, through the secretary of the navy, to furnish provisions for the naval service, cannot be rescinded by the chief of the bureau having charge of such contracts and supplies, without the sanction of the head of the department.

2. Evidence that the chief of such bureau informed a contractor that a written proposition to rescind such a contract, if forwarded to him, would be laid before the secretary, is no defence to an action to recover damages for the non-fulfilment of the same, although it appears that the proposition was duly made, and that it was retained six months, and not answered.

[1] [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

3. If a contract is to be sought in correspondence, or if the discharge of a right or obligation is to be deduced from it, then the court, and not the jury, must construe the correspondence, although it may extend over a considerable length of time, and embrace a great variety of circumstances.

Error to the United States district court of Massachusetts.

The action was upon a contract dated October, 1851, for the delivery, at his own risk and expense, free of charge, to the plaintiffs, at their navy yard in Brooklyn, between the 1st of January, 1852, and the 1st of May of the same year, of twelve hundred barrels of pork, of a specified quality, at a stipulated price, and in case of failure that the defendant and his sureties were to pay liquidated damages.

Among other defences, the defendants [James M. Shaw and others] pleaded as their fourth plea that, in April, 1852, they being willing to perform their contract, but plaintiffs not being ready to receive performance, the parties thereupon agreed to discharge each other. Issue was joined on this plea, and a verdict was rendered for defendants. The defendants exhibited a power of attorney from Shaw, their principal, dated May 12, 1852, to one Wilson, by which the latter was empowered to negotiate with the chief of the bureau of provisions and clothing in the navy department, concerning those contracts dated October, 1857, for the delivery, among other things, of pork at Brooklyn, and to renew contracts, or to annul entirely said contracts, or either of them, vary the terms of either of them, or to agree to any arrangement in his name with the chief of the bureau that he might deem expedient. The attorney had two interviews with Mr. Sinclair, the chief of the bureau. On the 18th of May, he advised his principal of the result by letter, from which the following is an extract:—"Mr. Sinclair says they have a good supply of pork, and should probably need no more for consumption before another summer; and if you wish to cancel that part of the contract, he should be happy to accommodate you. I told him you had begun to provide for the pork, and would be ready to deliver it at the prescribed time, but that you were dissatisfied with the treatment you had received from the inspectors, and I felt at liberty to say you would accept his proposition, and give up the contract entirely. He replied he did not need the pork, and would rather it would not be delivered, as he did not wish to keep over any more than he could help. He says you must make a written proposition to him to the effect that you are desirous to give up the contract for pork, and he will lay your communication before the secretary of the navy; and if you are not advised to the contrary, you may consider the pork contract at an end. I am also satisfied it is a good arrangement for you, especially when you take into consideration the trouble that always occurs in regard to the inspection of government merchandise. If you like my arrangements, just write to him to that effect, and also write to me at Newport, where I hope to be in the early part of next week. I shall leave here (Washington) to-morrow, for Baltimore," &c. In his testimony, the attorney affirmed the accuracy of this statement, and said in the second interview Mr. Sinclair stated that Shaw need not deliver the pork.

B. F. Hallett, for plaintiffs.

H. F. Durant, for defendants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Upon this testimony it is difficult to find support for the plea. The attorney does not assume to agree to a cancellation of the contract, but merely solicits information whether the officer would be willing to do it, in order to communicate that fact to his principal. If the contract had been dissolved, there is no reason why the papers should not have been drawn for that purpose at that time. But the attorney refers the whole subject to his principal, and another act on the part of the principal is required before the arrangement can be treated as complete. This interpretation of these conversations receives full confirmation from the subsequent interview between the department and the defendant. On the 24th of May, Mr. Sinclair writes to him as follows: "Respecting your contract for pork, if you will make a direct proposition to the bureau, the same shall be submitted to the secretary of the navy for his consideration and directions in the case." Here is explicit evidence that nothing conclusive had resulted from the interview between the chief of the bureau and Wilson, at least in the opinion of the former, and the reply of Shaw two days afterwards is equally explicit in evincing his understanding. He says: "Your letter of the 24th instant has been received and noticed. I am now making inquiries and arrangements for beef. In regard to my contract with your bureau for pork, I will suggest for your consideration, first, to extend the time of delivery; second, to relinquish the pork contracts altogether. Waiting your early reply, I am," &c., &c. There was no reply to this letter, and no further correspondence, until the 30th of November, 1852. On that day the chief of the bureau writes to the defendant: "You are required to deliver to the navy yard, Brooklyn, New York, the pork in accordance with the stipulations of your contract, and should you fail to do so by the 10th of December next, the bureau will direct a purchase of such quantity as may be required at your risk and cost." The question arises here, did the failure of the department to answer the letter of the 26th of May operate a rescission of the contract, whether considered alone or in connection with the testimony of Wilson? Two alternatives were presented by the letter for the consideration of the navy department, in respect to the terms of an existing contract, but it retains for the writer the power to accept or reject the offer which was anticipated as the result of that consideration. Neither alternative is proposed by the writer in such a manner as to conclude himself. He reserves the right to have the last word. Nor does the testimony of Wilson put a different face upon the matter. Wilson learned from the chief of the bureau of the willingness of the head of the department to accommodate the obligor by discharging the contract, and invited a proposition for that purpose. Subsequently, in a letter to the principal, he asks for a communication on the subject. That communication was made, but no action took place upon it, and it is equally clear that the remark of the chief of the bureau to Wilson, "that he would lay the communication of Shaw before the secretary of the navy, and if he (Shaw) was not advised to the contrary, he might consider the contract at an end," cannot properly be incorporated into the subsequent correspondence. Shaw's letter was not written as a sequel to the communication of Wilson, nor does it properly form a part of the negotiation commenced by him. It is an answer to a letter from Sinclair directly, and presents two distinct subjects for consideration merely, and the writer asks an early reply. Under these circumstances, it could not be maintained by the United States with any success that the omission of the chief of the bureau to examine or answer the overtures of the writer of the letter was an abrogation of the contract, either when considered singly or in connection with the testimony of Wilson; and, in the judgment of this court, the evidence does not show a rescission of the contract by mutual consent. The plaintiffs requested the court to instruct the jury that the testimony of Wilson and the correspondence did not in law amount to a cancelling or rescinding of the contract. But the court declined so to instruct the jury, but did instruct them that the question for them to decide was, whether the evidence shows only an extension of the time of delivery, or a giving up of the contract by mutual agreement, when said Shaw was ready and offering to fulfil it, and before the time had expired, and unless the contract was given up, the jury must find for the plaintiffs. It was for the defendants to make out that there was a valid and binding agreement for the cancellation of this contract. His evidence shows that a subordinate officer in the navy department intimated to the agent that this was feasible. But in this conversation, as well as in the subsequent correspondence, he declared that the head of the department must be consulted. In effect, the principal submitted two subjects for the consideration of the department, and asked for a reply. But the department retained the letter six months, and then demanded the fulfilment of the contract. There is nothing that can be drawn from these facts, except an acquiescence of the department in a delay for that period of time. It is the duty of the court to construe written instruments, and that principle is not affected by the fact that the instruments consist of written correspondence extending over a considerable length of time, or that it may embrace a great variety of circumstances. If a contract is to be sought in such a correspondence, or if the discharge of a right or obligation is to be deduced from it, the duty must be performed by the court, and not by the jury. Bliven v. New England Screw Co., 23 How. [64 U. S.] 420; Begg v. Forbes, 30 Eng. Law & Eq. 508; Hutchinson v. Bowker, 5 Mees. & W. 535. Decided cases undoubtedly may be found, in which it has been held, that where the effect of a written agreement collaterally introduced as evidence depends, not merely upon the construction and meaning of the instrument, but upon extrinsic facts and circumstances, the inferences of fact to be drawn from it must be left to the jury. It was so held by the supreme court in Eting v. Bank of U. S., 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 75; and in Barreda v. Silsbee, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 168. But the principle involved in those decisions has no application to the present case. As the decision of this question will probably be decisive of the case in another trial, I abstain from examining any other questions at the present time.

Judgment reversed.

UNITED STATES v. SHAW.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 593.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

ACTIONS ON ADMINISTRATION BONDS.

An action may be maintained upon an administration bond, by a creditor of the intestate, after a return of non est upon a capias ad respondendum against the administrator, although thirteen months have not elapsed since the granting of the letters of administration. The Maryland act of 1720 (chapter 24) is still in force in the county of Washington, D. C.

Debt on administration bond. Breach assigned in not paying a note due by the intestate to Keirle & Son, and averring a previous return of non est inventus upon a capias ad respondendum against the defendant, in this county, in which he resided. General demurrer.,

W. L. Brent, for defendant, contended that the Maryland act of 1720 (chapter 24) was repealed by the inconsistent provisions of the act of 1798 (chapter 101), as stated in the preceding case against Kenedy's administrator, and that no suit could be brought upon the bond before the expiration of thirteen months after administration granted, except in the particular cases specified in the act of 1798.

C. Cox, for plaintiff, contra, to show that the act of 1720 was still in force notwithstanding the act of 1798, and that a return of non est is sufficient to justify a suit on the administration bond, cited Dorsey's Case, 4 Gill. & J. 471, and the case of Laidler's Adm'r v. State, 2 Har. & G. 277, 281.

THE COURT, being of opinion, as in the preceding case, that the act of 1720 was not repealed by the act of 1798, and that an action may be brought against the administrator within the thirteen months allowed by the 14th section of the 8th sub-chapter, overruled the demurrer, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff (nem. con.).

UNITED STATES v. SHAW-MUX.

District Court, D. Oregon. March 27, 1873.

INTERCOURSE BETWEEN INDIANS — INDIAN GIVING LIQUOR TO INDIAN.

1. Congress has the power to regulate intercourse between Indian tribes and the members thereof, and may therefore prohibit the traffic in spirituous liquors between such tribes or members, within as well as without the limits of a state.

2. The word "person" in section 20 of the intercourse act of June 30, 1834 (4 Stat. 729), as amended by the act of March 15, 1864 (13 Stat. 29), includes an Indian, and under such section an Indian may be punished for disposing of spirituous liquors to another Indian.

[Cited in U. S. v. Winslow, Case No. 16,742.]

This indictment charges that the defendant, at Umatilla county, on November 24, 1872, did dispose of spirituous liquor to an Indian, one Moo-los-le-wick, who was then and there under the charge of an Indian agent of the United States. On the trial it appeared that the defendant was an Indian living on the Umatilla reservation, at the time of the commission of the alleged crime. The defendant being convicted, moved for a new trial, upon the ground that the court erred in charging the jury that an Indian was a "person" within the meaning of that term, as used in section twenty of the intercourse act of 1834, as amended by the act of March 15, 1864 (13 Stat. 29). The section in question provides: "That if any person shall * * * dispose of any spirituous liquor * * * to any Indian under the charge of any superintendent or agent appointed by the United States, * * * such person, on conviction thereof," shall be imprisoned, etc.

William B. Gilbert, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. The word "person" in its ordinary sense includes an Indian, whether he be uncivilized, under the charge of an Indian agent, in the Indian country, or otherwise. The burden then is upon the defendant to show that, although he is plainly within the letter of the statute, he is not within the true intent and meaning thereof.

The argument in his behalf is, that the principal power of congress in the premises does not extend to the regulation or control of conduct or intercourse between Indians, within the limits of a state, and therefore the statute should be construed so as to exclude this case, which is one of intercourse between Indians only.

The constitution gives congress power "to regulate commerce * * * with the Indian tribes," and this includes any member of such tribe within as well as without the limits of a state. U. S. v. Holliday, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 418

In U. S. v. Tom, 1 Or. 26, the defendant was an Indian, and was indicted and convicted under this section for selling liquor to Indians. The case was argued and considered at length, but this precise question does not appear to have been raised. But the fact could not have escaped the attention of the counsel and the court, and the inference is, that it was not deemed material.

Commerce, intercourse with an Indian tribe, or the individual members thereof, may be carried on with or by means of Indians as well as white men. The power of congress is not limited to the regulation of commerce between the Indian tribes and white people or any particular people or persons, but extends to commerce, with such tribes or any member thereof, however carried on.

Suppose it should be deemed necessary by congress to regulate the intercourse between two distinct Indian tribes, as, for instance, to prohibit the one from furnishing the other ammunition, would not this be a regulation of commerce with an Indian tribe? Because the regulation would necessarily affect both tribes, and therefore the commerce, in this respect, between them, it would be none the less a regulation of commerce with either of them.

In U. S. v. Holliday, supra, the court say, that "commerce with the Indian tribes means commerce with the individuals composing those tribes." This being so, it follows that, if congress can regulate the commerce between different tribes, it may also between individual Indians. Other considerations make it probable that this word person was used in this section with intent to include Indians. In other sections of the act (sections 7 and 8, 4 Stat. 729), the intention not to include Indians in the word person, is manifested as follows: "If any person other than an Indian shall," etc.

By section three of the act of March 27, 1854 (10 Stat. 270), it was enacted that nothing contained in this section (twenty), "which provides for the punishment of offenses therein specified, shall be construed to extend to any Indian committing said offenses in the Indian country."

What particular circumstance, if any, led to the enactment of this clause, does not appear, but it is probable that either the word "person" had been construed to include Indians, or in the nature of things would be, in the absence of any provision to the contrary.

But in the revision and re-enactment of the section in 1862 (12 Stat. 339), and 1864 (supra), its operation, so far as the disposition of liquor to Indians is concerned, was limited to Indians under charge of a superintendent or agent, whether within or without the Indian country, and the provision of the act of 1854, restraining the natural signification of the word "person" was not inserted; so that the section stands in this respect as it did prior to the passage of said act.

It being premised that congress has the power to regulate the disposition of spirituous liquors to an Indian by whomsoever such disposition is made, in considering the question of whether congress intended to include Indians in the word "person" as used in this section, weight ought to be given to the argument of convenience.

Upon all the Indian reservations in the country, Indians will be found, if permitted to do so with impunity, through whom white men will be able to introduce spirituous liquor among the Indians, with comparative security to themselves. The traffic can scarcely be prevented unless the Indians who are employed as go-betweens are held to be within the purview of the law prohibiting it.

The motion is denied.

UNITED STATES v. SHEA.

[5 Blatchf. 546;[1] 1 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 14; 6 Int. Rev. Rec. 198.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Nov., 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—NONPAYMENT OF SPECIAL TAX—INDICTMENT.

A person is not liable to indictment, under the 23d section of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 153), for carrying on the business of a distiller without having paid a special tax, where he has complied with the provisions of the 24th section of the act, as to giving a notice and a bond, &c., and a special tax has been assessed against him by the assessor and returned to the collector, but ten days have not elapsed since the receipt by the collector of the assessment list.

This case came before the court on a motion for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment, after the conviction of the defendant [Thomas J. Shea] on an indictment framed under the 23d section of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 153), and containing but a single charge, namely, carrying on the business of a distiller, without having paid a special tax. The evidence on the trial showed, that the defendant was found engaged in distilling on the 29th of December, 1866, and that he had not then paid his special tax. By way of defence, it appeared that he had, in the previous November, given due notice of his intention to engage in distilling, and had given a proper bond, and otherwise complied with the 24th section of the act; that, in pursuance of his notice, his special tax had been assessed against him by the assessor, and returned to the collector in the monthly list for December; and that such list was put into the hands of the collector on the 20th of December, less than ten days prior to the commission of the offence charged. [The question of law raised by this evidence was reserved, and the case went to the jury, who rendered a verdict of "guilty." [Case unreported.] The present action is to determine the question reserved on the trial.] [2]

Benjamin F. Tracy, U. S. Dist. Atty.

BENEDICT, District Judge. Upon consideration of the various provisions of the internal revenue law, I am of the opinion that the point raised on the evidence introduced in defence is well taken. The various provisions of the law in regard to special taxes, as set forth in sections 20, 28, and 73, as amended in the act of 1866, and elsewhere, and which seem to make no substantial difference, as regards the particular defence in question, between the business of distilling and other kinds of business subject to a special tax, must, when taken together, be considered to import, that a distiller is not in default for the mere non-payment of his special tax of one hundred dollars, until ten days after the receipt by the collector of the assessment list, in which the special tax is to be inserted, and that he cannot be held to be guilty of the offence created in the 23d section, unless it appears that he carries on the business after he is in default for non-payment of the tax. The words of the act are, "without having paid the special tax, as required by law;" and these words, "as required by law," must be considered to refer to the time and place of payment, as well as to the amount. Therefore, the distiller can not be said to carry on business without payment of the special tax, as required by law, so long as he has taken all necessary steps towards the ascertainment and payment of his special tax, and stands ready to pay it in the manner required by law, that is, within ten days after the assessor shall have returned to the collector the assessment list in which such tax is required to be inserted. This construction of the provisions of the act seems reasonable, and to be necessary to prevent infinite confusion and injustice in the collection of the taxes, as a consideration of the effect of similar provisions made applicable to various trades will show. Although it is true that, under this construction, a distiller may carry on his business a short time without having actually paid his special tax of one hundred dollars, as may persons in other kinds of business, yet he has given security for its payment when due, while the various other provisions in regard to his notice, his bond, his distillery, &c., all necessary to be complied with before commencing business, put the distillery fully within the observation of the government and enable it to enforce compliance with the law.

According to this view of the law, the facts proved by the defendant amount to a perfect defence to an indictment framed on this one section, and he is entitled to be discharged.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This case has been confirmed by the board and submitted to this court without argument or the production of additional testimony. There cannot, we think, be any doubt as to the genuineness of the grant; nor does such an idea seem to have been suggested. The temporary loss of the first expediente and its subsequent discovery among the archives, and the confusion and mistake which arose, of themselves afford strong evidence of the authenticity of the proceedings. The grantee appears to have resided on his land from 1844, a few months after he received his grant, until his death in 1851. We see no reason to reverse the decree of the board, and a decree affirming must therefore be entered.

UNITED STATES v. SHELLMIRE.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1831.

COUNTERFEITING—CHECKS ON BANK OF THE UNITED STATES—PRESUMPTIONS—PERJURY.

1. An order or check drawn by the president of a branch bank of the Bank of the United States, on the cashier of the bank at Philadelphia for the payment of money, is an "order or check" within the 18th section of the act chartering the bank. The bank is bound to pay such orders or checks, and the indictment may charge the passing such counterfeit order to be with the intent to defraud the bank, or the person to whom it is passed.

2. The law presumes the intention in passing counterfeit paper to be to defraud any person who may suffer a loss by receiving it as genuine.

[Cited in Com. v. Starr, 4 Allen, 305.]

3. Perjury consists in swearing falsely and corruptly, contrary to the belief of the witness, not in swearing rashly and inconsiderately, according to his belief.

[Cited in brief in Com. v. Brady, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 79.]

The defendant was indicted for uttering, passing and publishing as true a counterfeit order, purporting to be an order upon the cashier of the Bank of the United States in the words and figures following:

"(5) A. 10,363. A. 10,363. (5)
"Cashier of the Bank of the United States,
"Pay to Thomas Mather, or order, Five Dollars.
"Office of Discount and Deposit, Mobile, the 13th day of Oct. 1829.
"Geo. Poe, Cashier. Philip M'Closkey, President.
"Fairman, Draper, Underwood & Co."

Indorsed: "Pay the bearer, Thomas Mather."

—knowing the same to be false, forged and counterfeited with intent to defraud the Bank of the United States.

On the trial it was objected by Mr. Brashier and D. P. Brown, for defendants, that the order laid in the indictment was not within the law, and that the indictment could not be sustained, because the offence was not laid to be with the intent to defraud the person to whom the order was passed. Among other questions which arose on the evidence was this: several witnesses by the name of Burke testified to the presence of a person by the name of Rush at the time of passing the order in question, in which they are contradicted by a number of witnesses for the defendant. It was contended by the defendant's counsel that they were perjured if they swore rashly and inconsid-erately, though according to their belief, if their evidence was untrue in relation to the presence of Mr. Rush, they were not to be believed, and relied on the case of [Com. v.] Cornish, 6 Bin. 249.

Mr. Dallas, defendant's attorney, contended, that perjury consisted in swearing falsely and corruptly, contrary to the belief of the witness.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The counsel of the defendant has presented to the court the question, whether the orders or checks of a president of a branch Bank of the United States, drawn on the cashier of the mother bank, come within the meaning of the words "order or check," mentioned in the eighteenth section of the law incorporating the bank. The point has not been argued, but it has been made. It arises necessarily, is vital to the prosecution, and must be decided by the court. The words of the law are very plain, "or any false, forged or counterfeited order or check upon the said bank or corporation or any cashier thereof," broad enough to embrace this paper, which on its face purports to be such an order, and if genuine, would be one, or any order or check on the bank or any of its cashiers at the branches or here, or any draft or bill for the payment of money, which in law would be deemed an order or check. Is this comprehensive description narrowed by any other parts of the law? We find in it no prohibition direct or indirect against issuing this kind of paper either by the bank or any of its branches, or any word or expression by which congress has excluded it from the purview of the eighteenth section; neither can we perceive any thing in its nature which would justify such inference. The only restriction on the issuing of any paper, is in the proviso to the twelfth fundamental article in the eleventh section of the charter. The bank can make no bill obligatory or of credit under its seal for the payment of a less sum than 5,000 dollars; the bills or notes issued by order of the corporation, signed by the president and cashier, are made as binding and obligatory on the bank as those of private persons, but all their bills and notes must be payable on demand, unless of a sum not less than 100 dollars, and payable to order; none of these restraints apply to an order or check; the notes or bills alluded to are such as contain a promise to pay money, and the bills obligatory are such only as are under seal, and for sums not less than 5,000 dollars. The bank is left free to contract debts by any other mode than by their promissory note or an obligation under seal, with no other limitation than is contained in the eighth fundamental article, which is merely as to amount, the only effect of which, is not to exempt the bank from liability for the excess, but to make the directors, under whose administration it shall happen, personally liable. The words of this article are, in our mind, very conclusive on this point. "The total amount of debts which the said corporation shall at any time owe, whether by bond, bill, note, or other contract, over and above the debt or debts due for money deposited in the bank, shall not exceed the sum of 35,000,000 dollars," &c. This is an explicit declaration that the bank may make, and are bound by contracts other than those by bond, bill, note or deposit. These other contracts must be taken to mean and be coextensive with ordinary transactions of banks. We certainly cannot confine them to limits narrower than those subjects which the charter recognises as those on which the bank are to act. Deposits, discounts, drawing, indorsing, buying, selling bills of exchange, or taking them for collection, dealing in gold or silver bullion, paying for buildings, improvements, salaries and contingent expenses, are "other contracts," by which the bank may incur debts, and are bound to pay them to any amount to which they may be contracted by them or under their authority. In all these operations, checks or orders on the bank or its cashiers, are indispensable to conducting the business of the bank. They are peculiarly so when we consider the connection between the bank and the government and its branches. Being the depositories of the public money,—bound to transfer it without charge or commission from the place where it is received to the place where it is wanted or required to be deposited,—bound to distribute the money of the government among its creditors,—to pay the salaries of public officers,—to act as commissioner of loans in the different states, in the payment of the public debt and pensions,—there must of necessity be drafts, orders and checks by the bank on its branches, and by the branches on each other, and on the bank. The branches are offices of discount and deposit. Independently of the duties enjoined on them by the charter, for the convenience of the government, there were great and powerful reasons for the incorporation of the bank, and the establishment of its branches, to create and continue a sound, uniform currency, facilities for internal exchange and remittance. It cannot be contended that drafts, orders or checks, drawn by or on the bank, or any branch, are not legitimate means by which all these objects, both public and private, could be accomplished, or that they can be accomplished without them. There is no pretence that there is any express or implied prohibition making them unlawful, and no good reason can be assigned why the bank, individuals and the public should not have the same protection against any injury which might result from their being forged or circulated, as the promissory notes of the bank, or the drafts, orders, or checks of individuals upon a cashier of the bank. It is, in our opinion, no answer to these views, that the law has not expressly authorized the officers of the branches to draw on the bank: it is enough for this point that they are not prohibited from doing so: it is an act indispensable to the transaction of their ordinary business, in order to meet the wants of the public and others. The bank may contract otherwise than by bond, note, or bill. They may authorize the branches to draw orders, checks, or bills upon them, whether in funds or not, —but authorized or not, the paper has the same validity; if genuine, the drawer or drawee is bound for payment. It would be introducing a new principle into our code of criminal law, to say that the guilt or innocence of the accused would depend on the fact of the person in whose name a paper is forged having funds or authority on which he could draw his order or check. If a genuine bill is wanting in some requisite to give it currency, as the indorsement of the payee when payable to order—or if a positive law directs that besides the proper signatures, some other act should be done to give it any validity between the parties or to permit it to be read in evidence—as that it should be stamped—the crime of forgery is as complete by forging or knowingly passing it before indorsed or stamped, as after. Bailey, Bills, 442 (Am. Ed.) 382; U. S. v. Mitchell [Case No. 15,787].

To save the party from the penalty on account of the invalidity of the paper if genuine in fact, it must be shown to be wholly illegal and void in its operation, so that no one could be injured by its being forged or passed upon him. The genuine paper must be as worthless as its counterfeit. The law embracing then all orders or checks on the bank or any cashier thereof, with intent to defraud the bank or any other person, containing no exceptions, excluding no paper which comes within the definition or common acceptation of an order or check, or prohibiting the issuing or circulation of those drawn by the presidents of branches, we are bound to declare them to be within the words, spirit and meaning of the law, equally with the notes of the bank or the checks or orders of individuals. You will therefore understand us as distinctly laying down the law to be, that it is criminal to forge or pass paper of this description.

The next question of law which arises in the case is, whether that part of the indictment which charges that the accused passed the order or check in question, with intent to defraud the Bank of the United States, has been made out. On this part of the case the law is well settled; the indictment must allege the offence to have been committed with the intention of defrauding some person or corporation, and this allegation must be proved as laid. This is the general rule, but it must be taken with this qualification. If the person in whose name a forged note, bill, order or check is drawn, or the one on whom it is drawn, would, if genuine, be bound to pay it, the law infers and takes as proved the intention to defraud and injure such person, from the act of forging, or knowingly passing such paper. Bailey, Bills, 442 (Am. Ed.) 386; Russ. & R. 169, 291, 292; 2 Taunt. 333, 334. It is not necessary that there should be any actual injury sustained or fraud practised in fact, on the person who was the subject of the meditated fraud or injury; this part of the offence consists in mere intention, and if that intention can be consummated the offence is complete. It is enough that it may probably or possibly be done. 2 Strange, 749; 2 Law Rep. 1469; 2 W. Bl. 787; U. S. v. Moses [Case No. 15,825]; 2 Taunt. 333. The passing of this order or check is alleged to be done with intent to defraud the Bank of the United States; it therefore becomes necessary for us to inquire whether the bank might or could be defrauded or injured if the paper was genuine. By the fourteenth fundamental article of the charter of the bank, it is bound to establish branches in certain cases. It is authorized to establish them wheresoever they think fit, within the United States, and to commit the management and the business thereof to such persons and under such regulations as they may think proper, not being contrary to law or the constitution of the bank; or instead of establishing branches, they may employ other banks, with the approbation of the treasury, to manage the business proposed, other than for the purposes of discount, under such agreements and under such regulations as they may deem just and proper. It thus appears that the branches are legitimate emanations from the parent bank, who may commit their management to such persons, and subject to such regulations as they think proper, under no other limitations to their power than the laws of the land and their own charter. The operations of the branches are carried on with the funds of the corporation by officers of its appointment, and under its regulations; they are its agents, capable of binding it by their contracts; all their transactions are for the benefit of the bank, who cannot disavow them unless in a clear case of an excess or abuse of their powers, under such circumstances as would invalidate the contract of an agent of any other corporation or an individual. Any business may be done at the branches in relation to discounts and deposits which may be done at the parent bank; it is liable to depositors for all balances due at the branches, for all drafts, orders or checks drawn by its officers on their own cashier, by their own authority.

The act of establishing a branch, is, per se, the creation of an agency; it is an authority not only to the extent of the regulations under which their agent acts, but to the extent of all acts and transactions of the officers of the branches which the bank have been in the habit of adopting and confirming, on the same principle that individuals are liable on the contracts of their wives and servants, who have been permitted to deal on their credit, and in their names; or a merchant, whose clerk is in the habit of writing letters, signing notes, bills and checks in his name, though without any written or express authority, by the adoption and recognition of which he authorizes the public to consider his clerk as his agent, authorized to do in future what he has been in the habit of doing with his knowledge and assent. It would be strange indeed that the bank should not be liable for checks or orders drawn by its agents at their own branches, which not only form a very important item in the currency of the country and the operation of the branches, but which the bank have for years daily ratified and sanctioned by their payment; the uniform course of business transacted between the bank and its branches, furnishes such a strong legal inference and presumption of its being authorized by the regulations under which they have been established, that the burthen of proof to the contrary is clearly thrown on the bank or any other person who would attempt to show that the paper was not obligatory upon them. It would be a severe reflection on the bank to suppose that they would for a moment refuse payment of these checks and orders, and our system of jurisprudence would deserve little of public respect or confidence if the law would not coerce it. But the charter is not silent. The eighth fundamental article makes the bank liable for all debts, though they exceed the amount limited; the fourteenth makes the offices of discount and deposit its agents; the sixteenth section makes the bank the depository of the public money, and imposes on it the obligation of transferring, distributing and paying it under the directions of the treasury; and by the seventeenth article, the bank is bound to pay in gold and silver all its notes, bills and obligations, and all deposits in the bank or its offices; and the proviso enacts, that congress may enforce and regulate the payment of other debts under the same penalties as are prescribed for the refusal to pay its notes, bills, obligations and deposits. The mode in which the bank contracts a debt, the shape it assumes, or the places where contracted, is of no importance. The offices being its agents, the debts contracted by them become the debts of the corporation, imposing a duty to pay them, which may be done at or by the branches or the bank. If the payment is made in coin, the debt is extinguished; if made by a draft, order or check, the debt remains until they are actually paid. Unless the holder expressly takes them as payment, and at his own risk, they create a new duty or obligation, which the bank is as much bound to perform as the old one for which it is intended to make satisfaction. It is a matter of mutual convenience, whether the old debt or duty shall be extinguished by payment or taking paper, whether in the promissory notes of the bank, or orders or checks drawn upon it. They may be in large drafts or orders for remittance, or small ones for currency or circulation, and in any form, with or without ornaments, devices, or marks. Whether they resemble in these particulars the notes of the bank, is immaterial; their substance and legal effect are the same; they create a new debt or duty obligatory on the bank. It is bound to honour all the paper which it issues or gets into circulation by its authority or agents. Paper of the kind now under consideration, can be put into circulation in no other way than by being issued in payment of a debt or other equivalent. If, on the requisition of the treasury, an officer of the branch at a place in which public funds were deposited, should draw his order on the cashier of the bank or any branch at a place to which it was required to transfer them, or in distributing the public money among public creditors, and disbursing officers of the government, paying salaries, pensions, or the public debt, should as a matter of mutual convenience and consent, give drafts, orders, or checks, either for remittance or circulation, on the bank or another branch, the bank would be as much bound to pay them as they would to pay the same amount to an officer or creditor of the government, who would deposit to his own credit the amount thus received through the bank. The same rule would apply to an individual depositor, a creditor of the bank, or one who had an order or check on them, and would receive payment in the shape of branch orders; so, if a branch makes a contract of discount, and pays the proceeds by drafts on the bank, or any other kind of paper to suit their convenience, these obligations necessarily result from the contracts of deposit and discount. But there is another contract equally binding, that of purchase and exchange. An individual desirous of procuring a medium of remittance or circulation, exchanges with a branch his gold, silver, or any paper which they accept, as an equivalent for their drafts, orders or checks, large or small, as the case may be; stands in the same position to the bank as a previous creditor, depositor or holder of any demand upon them. He pays his money into the coffers of the bank, who receive it from their agents as the product of the contract made by their drafts and orders, all the profits of which go directly to the bank. To refuse payment in any of these cases, would be a fraud too palpable to be tolerated—wholly repugnant to every dictate of justice and rule of law.

The bank then being liable to pay paper of this description, if genuine, it follows that the forging or knowingly passing it, could and might be intended, and operate to defraud the bank. This raises the legal inference and presumption that such was the intention of the accused. When the law infers or presumes a fact, or an intention as resulting from the evidence, a jury may and ought to find it as if it was in direct proof before them; the inference and presumption of the payment of a bond after twenty years, without demand or payment of interest—the existence of a deed of land after thirty years' possession—the malicious intent which is implied from the act of speaking or publishing scandalous words in civil cases—the inference of malice aforethought which the law draws from the unlawful killing of another not explained—the inference of larceny from a man being found in the possession of stolen goods and not accounting for them; and what you have heard in this case, the legal presumption of the accused knowing the order in question to be forged, drawn from his having passed another forged order of the same description, are among the familiar cases where a jury ought to and will take legal inferences, when not rebutted by positive testimony. The jury will so view it in this case, and though they may think that there is direct evidence of the intention to defraud Burke, and that he was actually defrauded, and the indictment would be sustained if it was so laid, yet it does not follow that there was not also an intention to defraud the bank. In our opinion, the facts of the case amount to an intention to defraud both Burke and the bank; that the indictment would be good in law, and supported by the evidence, if the offence was said to have been done with the intent to defraud either or both, and therefore instruct you that the allegation of the indictment in this particular is sufficient in law, and made out by the evidence if you believe the witnesses.

An important question on the evidence has arisen in this case on which we deem it necessary to give you our opinion. It has been contended by the counsel for the prisoner, that if you shall believe that Mr. Rush was not present at the races, that Burke and others who have sworn to his being there, and to his identity, are perjured if they have done so rashly, without knowledge, or using proper means of obtaining it, though they may believe in the truth of what they attest. To this position we cannot assent; with all possible respect for the private and judicial character of the learned judge, who pronounced the opinion of the supreme court of this state in the case referred to, we feel bound to express our decided dissent to the decision given. The statute (5 Eliz. c. 9; 2 Ruff. 549; 3 Inst. 163) adopted in Pennsylvania in 1718 (1 Dall. St. Laws, 143) makes it of the essence of the offence of perjury, that it be committed "wilfully" and "corruptly." Such are the very words of the law, which in our minds are not and cannot be taken as synonymous with "rashly" and "inconsiderately" swearing as the belief of the witness prompts him. His negligence or carelessness in coming to that belief or conclusion of the mind, without taking proper pains to enable him to ascertain the truth of the facts to which he swears, does not make his oath corrupt, and perjury cannot be wilful where the oath is according to the belief and conviction of the witness as to its truth. It could not be asserted, consistently with any legal principle, that an indictment for wilful and corrupt perjury could be sustained, by proof of a witness having sworn rashly and inconsiderately to what he believed to be true. The case in 6 Bin. 249, is supported by only one decision, and that in the star chamber. 3 Inst. 166. We should be sorry to follow in this court the precedents of that in criminal prosecutions, and deem it unnecessary to apply to their proceedings, any other remarks than those which fell from the greatest common law lawyer in Westminster hall (Justice Yeates). "Next we are told of some proceedings in the star chamber, a court the very name whereof is sufficient to blast all precedents brought from it." 4 Burrows, 2373.

On this subject we therefore give you our most decided opinion, that you cannot be justified in imputing perjury to the witnesses, who have sworn to the presence of Mr. Rush on the race ground and to his identity in court, unless you shall believe, not only that Rush was not there, and that the fact is contrary to their oath, but that they swore wilfully and corruptly, contrary to their belief of the truth, whether they did so, is a matter for you to judge. It is in our opinion of infinite importance in this case for you to decide with the utmost deliberation on this point, as we think the prosecution mainly turns upon it. If in your opinion the Burkes have committed wilful and corrupt perjury, touching any thing in this case materially affecting the guilt or innocence of the accused, they are wholly unworthy of credit as to any other matter; a witness perjured as to one fact, ought not to be believed in any other. This we do not say to you as matter of law, for you may believe him in other respects if you will. But if we should in any such case, pass sentence on a prisoner convicted on such evidence, it would be with great reluctance, and little satisfaction with our administration of the penal justice of the union. On the other hand, if you should think these witnesses testified under a belief in the truth of their story as to Rush, you would probably not think it would be doing them or yourselves justice in disbelieving such facts of their evidence, as were not contradicted, disproved, or explained by the accused. If you should believe they swore rashly and inconsiderately as to one material fact, it might very properly give such a tinge to all they said, as to induce you to take their relation of other facts with great allowance, but would not justify you in wholly rejecting it. In making up your opinion on this part of the case, you must remember that an indictment is depending against Mr. Rush; we would recommend to you, not to examine very closely into the evidence which bears on his presence on the race ground; for the purposes of this trial, it is better to consider that in this respect, the witnesses on the part of the United States are at least mistaken, and decide on the case of the prisoner on that supposition. In making this suggestion, however, you will not consider us as expressing our opinion on the weight of evidence, so far as it applies to Mr. Rush, it is due to him and the United States to suspend any opinion.

Verdict, guilty.

UNITED STATES v. SHELTON et al.

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. May Term, 1821.

DEBTS DUE UNITED STATES—PRIORITY—INSOLVENCY OF PARTNERSHIP.

Where a partnership firm, being indebted to the United States for duties, makes an assignment of all their effects for the payment of their debts, for which the social fund is inadequate, this is an act of insolvency, quoad the social fund, under the act of congress, which gives the United States the preference to other creditors, "in all cases of insolvency:" and it seems, that such an assignment amounts to an act of general insolvency, and that the private property of the individual partners, will also be subjected to the payment, in the first instance, of the debt due to the United States, in the event of the inadequacy of the partnership fund.

[Cited in Morris v. Morris, 4 Grat. 313.]

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. In this case, P. T. Shelton & Co., consisting of P. T. Shelton, and Walter Shelton, being indebted to the United States for duties, made a voluntary assignment of all their effects for the payment of their debts. Walter Shelton, was in possession of some estate in his private character, which he afterwards conveyed for the payment of his private debts. The United States have filed their bill, claiming priority out of the social fund, and have also, in a supplemental bill, claimed priority out of the private fund. The controversy is, between the creditors under the first and last deed. Those under the first deed, contend that its execution was not an act of insolvency, inasmuch as one of the partners remained solvent. The creditors under the second deed insist, that the claim of the United States, if it can now be asserted, ought to be charged on the first deed. Some other questions have been made in the cause, but they are contingent questions, depending on the manner in which the first shall be decided.

The act of congress gives a preference to the United States, "in all cases of insolvency." And these "shall be deemed to extend, as well to cases in which a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all of his, or her debts, shall have made a voluntary assignment thereof, for the benefit of his, or her creditors," "as to cases in which an act of legal bankruptcy shall have been committed." 1 Story's Laws, c. 74, p. 465, § 5 [1 Stat. 515, c. 20]. P. T. Shelton & Co., executed their bond to the United States, as partners, for a partnership debt. In that character, they were the "debtor" of the United States. In that character, they had not "sufficient property to pay all their debts." In that character, they "made a voluntary assignment of all their property for the benefit of their creditors." This would, I think, have been "an act of legal bankruptcy," under the act of congress, passed afterwards on the subject, as well as under the bankrupt laws of England, and would, probably, have constituted an act of bankruptcy, under any state law, which might exist at the time. Of this, however, I am not certain. I cannot, therefore, say positively, that the question, whether this assignment is an act of insolvency, under the act of congress, derives any illustration from the reference it makes to "an act of legal bankruptcy;" though I am inclined to think it does. But be this as it may, I am disposed to think, that on the mere reason of the case, it is a fair exposition of the words of the act of congress, to consider it as an act of insolvency. It was an alienation of that whole fund, which was immediately, and in the first instance, chargeable with this debt. Had a commission of bankruptcy been sued out, the debt of the United States, being a partnership debt, would have been paid out of the social fund; and recourse would not have been allowed against the private fund, till the social fund was exhausted, or shown to be inadequate to the satisfaction of the debt. It seems to be the dictate of justice, that partnership transactions should be charged in the first instance, on the partnership fund, and private transactions on the private fund, when there is not enough for the payment of all.

I shall, therefore, direct the trustees, under the first deed, to pay the debt due to the United States, with liberty to apply to the court, should that fund prove insufficient.

ARREST OF OFFENDERS—EXAMINATION—REMOVAL TO OTHER DISTRICT—FEDERAL COURTS—CRIMINAL INFORMATIONS.

1. Where a motion to quash an indictment is founded upon the allegation that no evidence whatever of defendant's guilt was adduced in support of the application for a warrant for his arrest, the court may inquire into this allegation, and, if it is established, quash the indictment; though they cannot inquire into the sufficiency of such evidence, if any was produced.

2. A certified copy of an information filed for an offense against the laws of the United States, without copies of some oath or affirmation to facts showing probable cause to believe the defendant guilty, does not authorize issuing a warrant of arrest.

3. It is not lawful to arrest a person in one district, for an alleged offense against the laws of the United States, and remove him to another district for examination; nor can a district judge authorize such removal. The offender, upon being arrested, is entitled to be taken before the proper officer of the district in which the arrest is made, for examination; and if probable cause is not shown, or if (the case being bailable) he gives bail, he is entitled to be discharged. It is only after a commitment upon the results of such examination that an order can be made to remove him to the district in which the trial is to be had.

4. Criminal proceedings in the courts of the United States are according to the course of the common law; except so far as has been otherwise provided by the constitution or acts of congress. They are not affected by the laws of the several states.

5. Hence it is not necessary that the names of witnesses for the prosecution should be indorsed on the indictment or information preferred in one of those courts; although such indorsement may be required by statute of the state.

6. An offense against the laws of the United States, which is of a character not capital or infamous, may be prosecuted in the courts of the United States, by an information, according to the course of the common law.

7. The proper course of proceeding in issuing a criminal information explained.

Motion to quash an indictment. In September, 1869, the district-attorney filed an information in the district court for the Eastern district of Michigan, against G. Shepard. The offense with which the accused was charged was the knowingly and fraudulently bringing into the United States certain personal property in violation of section 4 of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 179); [and the punishment is by fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding two years. This may be in the penitentiary.][2]

The defendant having been arrested upon this charge, and having given bail, now moved to quash the indictment.

A. B. Maynard, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Alfred Russell, for defendant.

WITHEY, District Judge. The facts exhibited as the grounds of the motion are, that the information upon which the government seeks to hold the defendant to answer and trial, was filed by the district-attorney without oath or proof of probable cause, and without application to or leave of court. Before the information was filed, complaint was made before a commissioner at Detroit, and a warrant for the arrest of the accused was issued to the marshal of the Eastern district of Michigan. But the accused being absent from the city no arrest was made upon the warrant. The information was then filed by the district-attorney, as above stated. As no arrest could be or was made upon the warrant issued by the commissioner, the arrest and holding to bail rests solely on the information. A certified copy of the information was taken to Chicago, when the district judge of the Northern district of Illinois, on proof of the identity of the accused, but upon no other evidence of probable cause than such copy, indorsed thereon his warrant for the arrest of defendant, and for his removal to this district for trial.

Defendant was arrested and brought to this city; here he was taken before the United States commissioner, waived examination, and gave bail for his appearance to answer the charge contained in the information.

The court will consider three questions involved by the motion to quash: (1) Was the arrest lawful, and, if not, can the defendant be held to answer? (2) Is the information legally sufficient, the names of the witnesses for the prosecution not being indorsed thereon? (3) Can a person be held to answer for an offense, not capital or infamous, on an information filed by the law officer representing the government?

The first question is answered by the fourth constitutional amendment, which declares that "no warrant of arrest shall be issued but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation," &c. Had there been any showing for the arrest at Chicago, supported by oath or affirmation, this court could not inquire whether the showing was sufficient to justify the issuance of the warrant by the district judge of Illinois; but when it is alleged there was no showing supported by oath or affirmation, and the illegality of the warrant is made the basis for arresting all further proceedings in the cause, it is our duty to inquire whether the fact is as asserted.

We have already stated what is proved here,—namely, that the certified copy of the warrant was all that was shown to procure the order of arrest. The constitution declares that "no warrant of arrest shall issue but upon probable cause," &c.; the information is not supported by oath or affirmation; it follows, as a corollary, that the warrant was not authorized. There was no proof of probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation to justify it. Doubtless, the learned judge who issued the warrant, acted upon the presumption that the proceedings here had been such as to establish probable cause; treating the information as having been filed upon cause shown, and regarding the certified copy as affording the same evidence as a certified copy of an indictment would furnish, when the evidence of probable cause is presumed to have been given to the grand jury. It now turns out that the proceedings anterior to the issuance of the warrant, laid no foundation for the arrest, and all proceedings based upon such unlawful arrest must fail.

Under the question we have been considering, a point was made that the warrant to remove defendant from Chicago, in one district, to Detroit, in another district, was unauthorized under the facts exhibited. The only act of congress upon the subject of the arrest and removal of offenders against the laws of the United States, is that of September 24, 1789, § 33 (1 Stat. 91), in reference to removal of offenders in one district, to be tried in another. It is this: "If such commitment of the offender . . . shall be in a district other than that in which the offender is to be tried, it shall be the duty of the judge of that district where the delinquent is imprisoned seasonably to issue, and of the marshal of the same district to execute, a warrant for the removal of the offender . . . to the district in which the trial is had." By consulting the previous portions of this section, in connection with the clause I have read, it will appear that the warrant of removal is authorized only where the offender has been first arrested and committed for want of bail, in a bailable case. The statute does not seem to contemplate or warrant removing a person from one district to another in the summary way pursued in this case. He is first to be taken before the proper officer, who is to examine as to the crime alleged against the accused. If there be not probable cause of his guilt, he is entitled to be discharged; whereas, if there be found reasonable cause for holding the accused to answer, upon tendering sufficient bail, he is entitled to his discharge from arrest. Only on failure to give bail, in a bailable case, can he be committed.

Defendant was at liberty in the city of Chicago; was arrested and immediately removed to Detroit, without opportunity to confront the charge at the place of his arrest. We are at a loss to understand how the defendant could thus be dealt with under the statute. Suppose defendant had been a resident of Galveston, in Texas, or San Francisco, in California, instead of Chicago, and was thus arrested and summarily removed nearly across the continent, before having the opportunity of meeting the charge on which he was arrested. We will suppose, when examined here, before the proper officer upon the charge, it should turn out that the charge is not sustained. Does not this plainly illustrate the wrong and injury which may be done to a citizen under such forms of legal proceedings? We regard the removal as having been wholly without the authority of law.

In reference to the second question, we remark that state laws do not control in criminal proceedings in the United States courts, either in the mode or form of charging the offense, in the rules of evidence, or in the manner of conducting the trial. On the contrary, the proceedings throughout are according to the course of the common law, except so far as has been otherwise provided by the laws of congress or by constitutional provision. U. S. v. Reid, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 365. It was not required by the common law that the names of witnesses for the prosecution should be indorsed on the indictment or information, and there is no act of congress requiring it. In treason a list of the government witnesses is to be furnished to the accused. The Michigan statute does require the names to be indorsed on the indictment; but if the state statute governed our proceedings we should regard this provision as directory, and the omission as not affecting the validity of the indictment or information.

The other question to be considered presents an interesting inquiry. We have said the common law governs in criminal cases in the United States courts; hence the question whether the accused can be held to answer to a criminal information must be solved by determining, first, what is the common law on that subject; and second, what modifications have been effected through the laws of congress or the constitution. The English system of jurisprudence brought by our ancestors as the common law, and those statutes of parliament applicable to the situation of the colonies, which extended to them and were adopted by usage or acts of assembly, have been by the United States courts held to be the common law of this country. Patterson v. Winn, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 241; Bains v. The James and Catherine [Case No. 756].

At the time of the revolution and of the adoption of the constitution, it was the practice in the court of king's bench for the king's attorney-general to file informations in the name and behalf of the king, in a class of cases not above the grade of misdemeanors, without any previous showing to the court, but in the discretion of that officer. This discretion was not, however, exercised, except in cases where the offense tended to disturb or endanger the king's government, or to molest him in the regular discharge of his royal functions, and where delay would be dangerous.

There was another class of offenses of the same grade, which could be proceeded against by information filed by the master of the crown office—a person appointed as the king's attorney to prosecute in behalf of the public, on complaint made by a subject or by a common informer. This officer could not substitute an information for the indictment of a grand jury, unless upon a showing and leave of court. The practice was to present affidavits of the offense, and move the court for a rule on the accused to show cause, and if the affidavits were not sufficiently answered leave was granted to file a criminal information in cases below the degree of felony. 4 Bl. Comm. 308, 309, 311; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 845, 846, 849, 856.

Now what changes have been produced by the constitution or laws of the United States, affecting the practice in form or substance, so far as regards the question at bar? Congress has passed no law on the subject, and the only constitutional provision affecting the question is the fifth amendment, proposed the same year that the original instrument went into operation—1789. It declares: "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless upon a presentment or indictment of a grand jury," &c.

Congress by proposing, and the states by ratifying that amendment, left all offenses not capital or infamous to be prosecuted by information or by indictment, as the circumstances of each case should seem to require, and as the common law would sanction. Indeed, this constitutional provision produced no change in the practice or law, except, perhaps, as regards a class of misdemeanors regarded as infamous crimes, and which might, before the amendment, be prosecuted by information. The amendment, however, fixed the matter, beyond the power of congress or the courts to alter the course of proceeding in bringing forward a charge of crime, in the class of cases embraced by the provision.

We regard the converse of the fifth amendment to be that persons may be held to answer for crimes other than such as are capital or infamous, upon information or indictment, according to the course of the common law. We have examined all the cases referred to by counsel, and find no well considered decision which conflicts with the views we have expressed, and therefore we conclude that, so far as the question rests on the common law, it is the right of the government, by its proper law officer, the district-attorney, to charge offenses against individuals through the forms and mode of informations.

There are, however, two considerations growing out of this subject, to which we should allude to give a proper understanding of our full views. It was said on the argument that the usage since the organization of the United States courts, has been to present offenders, in all classes of criminal cases, only through the instrumentality of a grand jury by indictment. If the practice of prosecuting by criminal information has fallen into disuse for eighty years, it certainly presents a strong reason for urging that such proceeding has become obsolete. Our reply, however, is, that the fifth amendment, adopted almost at the start of the government under our present constitution, recognized the right to pursue the common law course by criminal information, in all but capital and infamous crimes. And if such rights existed then, not only at common law, but by clear implication in the fifth amendment, as we have shown, then, even though such right has been in abeyance for eighty years, there has been no abrogation of the power of the government to assert that right, particularly as the courts do not seem to have refused, by any well considered case, the exercise of such right, though we find some intimations by the courts adverse to its exercise.

The other consideration concerns the necessary preliminary steps before the right to file a criminal information can be asserted. We incline to the opinion and hold that there must first be a complaint, supported by oath or affirmation showing probable cause, followed by an arrest and examination, agreeably to section 33 of the act of September 24, 1789.

If the accused is held to bail or committed, the district-attorney, on filing the magistrate's or commissioner's return, with the proofs, will have leave to file a criminal information.

This course would seem as nearly adapted to the method of procedure in these courts, and to our laws, as any thing which suggests itself. It would certainly be quite foreign to any known practice in the United States courts to pursue the English practice of requiring a rule for the accused to show cause before the court, and there contest the question whether the evidence justified placing him upon trial.

The right of the accused to contest the probable cause shown by the prosecution is secured to him on his examination before the commissioner or magistrate, under the complaint on which he was arrested.

We ought, perhaps, to remark that the position assumed by the defendant's attorney, that the charge in this case involves a felony, is not sustained. The fact that the accused is liable on conviction to be imprisoned in the penitentiary does not determine the offense to be a felony. On the contrary, a felony at common law embraces only such crimes as are punished capitally. Nor is it an infamous crime; for if the defendant should be convicted on such charge it would not render him incompetent to testify as a witness, as would be the result if it were a crimen falsi. Neither does the charge necessarily involve perjury—which would be a crimen falsi, and infamous.

The information in this case, as we have shown, was filed without right or authority. The arrest and holding to bail were also unauthorized; and for both grounds the court must refuse to hold the accused to answer.

Motion granted.

Case No. 16,274.

UNITED STATES v. SHEPHERD.

[1 Hughes, 520.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. April 13, 1875.

CRIMES UNDER NATIONAL BANK LAWS—FELONIES —MISDEMEANORS—TRIAL IN ABSENCE OF ACCUSED.

1. Under the Revision of 1874, that clause of section 59, c. 106, of the act of congress of 3d June, 1864 [13 Stat. 117], relating to the national banks, which makes the offence it creates a felony, is repealed, and an indictment charging such an offence need not charge that it was feloniously committed.

2. There are no crimes against the United States which are felonies by virtue of the common law, except such as may be committed on the high seas, or in the places in the states which are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.

3. Except offences committed on the high seas or in such places, there are no felonies against the United States, cognizable by courts of the United States, except those which are expressly made such by act of congress.

[Cited in U. S. v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed. 205.]

4. Trials for misdemeanors may be had after service of summons upon the accused, without the actual presence of the accused in court, especially if he is represented by counsel, certainly in the state of Virginia.

5. The verdict of guilty upon an indictment for misdemeanor may be rendered by a jury in the absence of the accused, if his counsel be present; and when so rendered, judgment will not be arrested.

The indictment [G. A. Shepherd] was for attempting to pass a falsely altered note of the national currency, knowing it to be falsely altered, in violation of the 5145th section of the Revised Statutes, which declares, as to this offence, that "every person who attempts to pass any falsely altered circulating note purporting to have been issued by any banking association authorized under the laws of the United States, knowing the same to be falsely altered, shall be imprisoned at hard labor not less than five years nor more than fifteen years, and fined not more than one thousand dollars." The act of congress passed in 1864, from which this section is taken, contained a clause declaring that such a person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony and shall be imprisoned, etc., but this clause is omitted in the revision of 1874. The note was falsely raised from a one dollar to a ten dollar note. The case was tried on the 8th of April, and given to the jury, and on the 9th, the jury found a verdict of guilty, but brought in their verdict at a late hour of the day, after the prisoner had been taken to jail. And he was present only by counsel. Before finding the verdict, the jury had been in deliberation for thirty hours, and a few hours before rendering their verdict, had come into court and asked instructions on parts of the case which are adverted to in the opinion of the judge.

Immediately on the rendering of the verdict the prisoner's counsel moved in arrest of judgment, and for a new trial. The grounds of these motions were: 1st. That this was by law a felony and the indictment did not charge that the prisoner "feloniously" attempted to pass the falsely altered note, and should be quashed. 2d. That whether a felony, or a misdemeanor, punishable by an imprisonment, which the court might fix for fifteen years, the prisoner ought to have been allowed the privilege of being present when the verdict was rendered; and that, having been held in jail at the time by the United States, the verdict ought to be set aside. 3d. That the verdict ought also to be set aside because it was contrary to the law and the evidence.

HUGHES, District Judge. The court overrules the first objection. The repealing chapters at the end of the Revised Statutes of the United States of 1874, repeal all former acts of congress, "any portion of which is embraced in the revision." The revision therefore repeals that part of section 59 of chapter 106 of the act of 1864, relating to the national banks, which makes the offence named a "felony." Not being a felony, of course the offence should not have been charged as having been "feloniously" committed. Except those committed on the high seas and within the forts, arsenals, and other places exclusively within the jurisdiction of the United States, and except high treason, there are no common law offences against the United States; and all crimes are statutory. There are therefore no felonies against the United States except those expressly declared to be such by act of congress. It has not been the policy of congress to multiply felonies; comparatively few offences are declared to be felonies. As a general rule, offences against the United States are misdemeanors punishable by imprisonment, by fine and imprisonment, by fine or imprisonment, or by fine alone. If punishable by fine alone, the offenders may be proceeded against by indictment for the fine or by action of debt for the penalty. Therefore a very large number of offences against the United States may be tried in the absence of the accused, if his counsel be present.

The court also overrules the second objection. The cases cited by prisoner's counsel only go to the extent of ruling that verdicts in trials for felony must be rendered in the presence of the prisoner. They do not invalidate verdicts rendered in the absence of the accused in cases of misdemeanor. This exception in respect to misdemeanors has not been made merely because in misdemeanor trials the accused is usually on bail, and if absent, is voluntarily so. The cases make no distinction in such trials between those in which the accused is on bail, and those in which he is not. The Code of Virginia (page 1243, c. 201, § 25) allows the trial of misdemeanor to proceed, provided a summons has been served, whether a capias has been returned, executed, or not executed, and whether the accused be present in person or not. In such matters the practice in the courts of the state, furnishes the rule of practice in this court. The old formula of the common law practice, requiring the clerk when the jury appeared with their verdict, to say: "Gentlemen of the jury, look upon the prisoner and hearken unto your verdict," originated at a time when the penal code of England was a very bloody one, and denounced capital punishment for the most trivial offences; when the pleadings even in criminal prosecutions were written in a foreign language, and when prisoners were not allowed the advice and assistance of counsel. The barbarities of criminal justice were then so gross, that great and humane judges availed themselves of the most technical irregularities in the pleadings and proceedings as an excuse for discharging prisoners standing dumb and helpless before them, and threatened with the most awful punishment for the most venial offences. But the penal code has in modern times been stripped of its barbarities; penalties are apportioned in degree to the crimes which they are intended to prevent; prisoners enjoy the assistance of counsel, and are provided with opportunity and means of full and complete defence. All proceedings are conducted in the venacular of the country and of the accused, unless he be a foreigner, in which case they are humanely interpreted to him. The old technicalities of the criminal practice have been gradually discarded, as the necessity for them decreased, and finally ceased; and now, the rules of the criminal practice are as little arbitrary and technical, and as reasonable and just as they are in civil proceedings. The prisoner at bar was ably defended at every stage of the trial, and though he was not personally present when the verdict was rendered, both of his counsel were. They did not ask that he should be brought in; they moved instanter for an arrest of judgment and a new trial, and did all that the prisoner could have done or demanded if he had been present in person. The second objection is therefore overruled.

3d. The prisoner's counsel also make several objections to the verdict, as contrary to the law and evidence of the case: (1st.) One is, that it was not proved beyond doubt that the accused knew that the note was falsely altered when he attempted to pass it. (2d.) Another is, that a confession made to the arresting officers at a considerable interval of time after the arrest, was given in evidence, so as to have an effect upon the views of the jury, in spite of the instructions of the court, that they should not be regarded. (3d.) Still another objection is, that the extraordinary length of time during which the jury were in deliberation, indicated that they were doubtful of the guilt of the prisoner.

(1) It is true that there was not much positive proof that the prisoner knew that the note was falsely altered. This knowledge on his part was inferred in part from circumstances; but these were such as could leave no doubt on the mind of the jury of the guilty knowledge. The alteration of the note, though skilfully enough done to escape notice in the hurry of business, was so perceptible when once suspected, that the prisoner could not but have known it when he attempted to pass it. The appearance of the note was of itself conclusive of the fact of guilty knowledge, in any attempt to pass it in broad daylight, after it had been examined by the holder.

(2) The court positively instructed the jury that confessions elicited by an officer from a prisoner while in duress and alarm, and without warning as to the use that would be made of them, were not evidence. I cannot infer in the present case, that the jury disregarded this instruction. A similar admission to that afterwards made to the officer was made by the prisoner when arrested in the presence of the person to whom he offered the note, and was evidence as a part of the res gestæ.

(3) My own understanding is that the jury were held a long time in doubt by the misapprehension that the attempt to pass the note was not an offence, and that the prisoner could only be convicted in the event that he actually passed it. After they were instructed by the court that the law made the attempt to pass, an offence, as well as the passing, and that the indictment charged the attempt, the jury were but a short time in deliberation.

I do not, therefore, think the case is one in which it would be proper to set aside the verdict and to award a new trial. It is, indeed, emphatically a case in which neither jury nor court can give relief. It is the case of a young man of good character, reputable connections, industriously engaged in making an honest livelihood, who is cheated on a railroad train, probably in the night-time, by some swindler, into receiving a spurious bank note, and who on discovering his misfortune, endeavors to get rid of the note the next morning in market by victimizing somebody else, who fails in the attempt, and is arrested and brought to trial for a first offence against the law, committed in an evil moment, without due reflection upon the nature and consequences of his act. It is a strong case for an appeal to executive clemency, but one in which neither the jury nor the court have a right or the power to exercise the high function of pardon.

The most that the court can do is, to suspend the sentence, so as to allow the friends of this young man to make appeal to the president for a pardon, which I hope will be granted him. Sentence will be suspended until the 20th instant.

Case No. 16,275.

UNITED STATES v. SHEREBECK.

District Court. N. D. California. Dec. 5, 1859.

CONSTRUCTION OF FOREIGN STATUTES — MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—PUEBLO LANDS—AUTHORITY OF PREFECT—EVIDENCE—RECITATION IN GRANT.

[1. In the absence of any judicial decision determining the construction and effect of a foreign statute, the practical interpretation given to it by those whose duty it was to apply and administer it affords the best means of ascertaining its true construction; and such construction will be followed, unless it be clear that such officers have misinterpreted it.]

[2. Mexican prefects in California had power, under the 77th article of the organic law of 1837, to grant the common lands of a pueblo.]

[3. In a grant of pueblo lands by the prefect, a mention of the land granted as "within the demarkation" of the pueblo affords presumptive proof, in the absence of opposing evidence, that the land was so situated, and that the officer acted within the limits of his authority.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case is for 800 varas of land on Rincon Point, in this city, alleged to have been granted to the claimant by Manuel Castro, prefect of the Second district of California. It was rejected by the board for want of evidence that the land was part of the common lands of the pueblo of Yerba Buena. The same tribunal, in the subsequent case of City of San Francisco v. U. S., confirmed the claim of the city to certain lands within boundaries mentioned in their decree. In this decision the United States have acquiesced by dismissing the appeal that had been taken to this court. [Unreported.]

It is not disputed that the land claimed in this case is within the demarkation of the pueblo of Yerba Buena, as ascertained by the decision in question. But as that case was between other parties, the point cannot be considered as res adjudicata in this; nor can the evidence on which that decision was based be regarded, for it has not been, by stipulation or otherwise, introduced in this cause.

The case now before the court must be determined on the evidence contained in the record above. No additional testimony has been taken in this court by either party. No argument has been made or brief filed on the part of the United States, and the case is submitted without the statement of any objection as to its validity, except that contained in the brief opinion of the board, and which relates solely to the defect of proof on a point which has since been thoroughly investigated and determined. It is to be regretted that in a case of so great importance the court is left to determine questions of law without argument from both sides, and to decide questions of fact which it would seem could be ascertained with entire certainty merely by a preponderance of testimony. The cause was submitted to the court on the 26th of August, 1857, on briefs to be filed. The claimants have frequently called the attention of the court to the case, and they have a right to insist that a decision be rendered. I, therefore, proceed to decide it on the evidence before me.

The claimant has produced the grant made to him by the prefect, and an expediente containing the petition of Sherrebeck, dated November 24, 1845, the marginal order of reference of the prefect, and the "informe" of the local authority; also a letter signed "Pedorena," addressed to the prefect, and inclosing a sketch, and giving other information as to the place where Sherrebeck was soliciting. This letter is dated November 20, 1845, and the reply of the prefect, dated November 21, addressed to Sherrebeck, is also produced, in which he tells him that he can make his petition in conformity with this letter and diseño, as he, the prefect, could not properly draw up the petition as requested by Pedorena. The petition seems accordingly to have been drawn up three days afterwards, and the grant issued on the 5th December of the same year. The genuineness of the signatures to all these documents is proved by the testimony of the prefect himself and other witnesses. It does not appear from the transcript of the evidence before the board that any attempt to impeach their authenticity was made by the United States, nor is there any doubt on the subject any where suggested. The title papers must therefore be considered as gained.

Assuming them to be so, two questions are presented: (1) Had the prefect authority to grant the common lands of a pueblo? (2) Were these lands part of the common lands of the pueblo of Yerba Buena? The power of the prefect to grant the common lands of the towns is claimed to be derived from the 77th article of the organic law of 1837. This article is as follows: "They (the prefects) shall regulate (arreglaran) and conformably to the laws, the distribution (separtimiento) of the common lands (terrenos communes) in the towns (pueblos) of the district where there is no litigation pending in the tribunals respecting them, reserving to the parties their right of appeal to the governor, who, without further recourse, will decide the matter as may be proper, with the concurrence of the departmental junta." In the case of Lanos v. U. S., the construction of this article was considered by the board of commissioners, and it was decided that it conferred upon the prefects the power of granting the common lands. In the opinion delivered by Mr. Commissioner Thompson, the objections to this construction, and the reasons for adopting it, are stated with his usual force and perspicuity. It was contended that the authority to "regulate" ("arreglar") did not impart an authority to grant, but merely a right to prescribe rules by which the distribution should be governed. This objection Mr. Commissioner Thompson admits would undoubtedly be correct if the word stood alone in the sentence, but he considers that the context indicates that the word was used in its technical sense, and that it means "to adjust the administration of provinces,—to enact laws for them." The subject which the prefect is empowered to regulate (arreglar) is the distribution ("separtimiento") of the common lands, which, he observes, is the word generally used to signify the granting of such lands. The prefect is further empowered to regulate this distribution executively ("gubain ativamente"). It appears from the provision of the organic law of March, 1830, that almost the same powers, functions, and duties were attributed to the governors and the prefects within their respective spheres, and the latter officers seem to have possessed, within their districts and over the matters committed to them, an authority nearly identical with that of the governor within his own department. They were, of course, subordinate to and under the control of the governor, but the nature of their functions was similar. When, therefore, the power to regulate the distribution of lands in the towns "gubernatively" is given to the prefect, it may justly be presumed that it is intended to confer on him the same authority with regard to those lands which the governor exercised over the department at large.

It was for these reasons that the board adopted the construction of the article which has been mentioned. I am much impressed with their force. They do not seem to me, however, entirely conclusive. It will be observed that the power of the prefects to regulate the distribution of lands, is limited to cases "where there is no litigation pending in the tribunals respecting them." This limitation or exception would seem to indicate rather an authority to settle disputes between the vecinos of the pueblo as to their occupation, than a power to grant them as property. To enable the inhabitants of a pueblo to avail themselves of the common lands of the pueblo in any other way than by pasturing cattle upon them in common, and procuring wood, etc., from them, it would obviously be necessary that an allotment of portions of them for the temporary but exclusive use of individuals should be made, for the purposes of cultivation. Unless such a distribution were made, it is not to be supposed that the necessary labor would be undergone by a few for the benefit of all. It was necessary, then, to secure to him who sowed the right of reaping; and in this way various allotments would be made, and lands distributed among the vecinos.

It may, therefore, have been intended by the law to give the prefects the power of regulating this distribution, and for this purpose the exception of cases pending before the tribunals is natural and proper. The succeeding clause reserves to the parties their right of appeal to the governor, etc. It will be noticed that this right is not reserved to the "party interested," the usual phrase applied to a person soliciting a grant, but to the "parties," indicating, it would seem, two disputants; and the right reserved is not the right of presenting petitions for land to the governor, but the right of appeal to him; seeming to indicate that the matter appealed from was to be a quasi judicial determination. On this appeal the law directs that the governor "shall decide the matter as may be proper, with the concurrence of the departmental junta." The law does not direct him "to accede or not to the petition," or to "determine upon the solicitation," or use, with regard to his action, the phraseology employed with reference to an application for a grant, but it directs him to "decide the matter with the concurrence of the junta"; thus again seeming to indicate a proceeding, like an appeal to the king in council for the determination of a dispute, rather than an application for a gratuitous concession of land. If, then, this were a solitary instance of the assumption of the granting power by a prefect, I should be inclined to hold, notwithstanding my great respect for the opinion of the board on the subject, that the law of 1837 did not confer the power claimed. But it appears that the authority in question has been exercised by the prefects on various occasions. Nor have the rights attempted to be conferred by them even, so far as we can ascertain, been disputed. They appear to have been generally acquiesced in by adjoining proprietors, and even expressly recognized by the departmental authorities. In the absence of any judicial decisions which determine the construction and effect of a foreign law, the practical interpretation given to it by those whose duty it was to apply and administer it affords the best means of ascertaining its true meaning. Unless, therefore, it be clear that the officers charged with its administration have misconstrued it, a foreign court, with necessarily an imperfect acquaintance with the subject, ought to be slow to substitute its own construction of the law for that of the government which established it, or to declare that powers frequently exercised and generally acquiesced in were usurped. No objection on this point has been made by the United States, and in the face of the opinion of the board, and the practice of the former government, I do not feel that certainty that the construction I feel inclined to adopt is the correct one, which would justify me in deciding that the prefect was mistaken as to the nature and extent of his powers.

2. The evidence that the land granted in this case was part of the common lands of Yerba Buena is contained in the two depositions of Castro, the prefect, and in the expediente. Manuel Castro swears that the lands granted by him to Sherreback, as also those granted to Presentacion Miranda de Ridley, were within the demarkation of Yerba Buena; that he was informed that the limit of Yerba to the south was a line drawn to the south of Rincon Point, across the estero and cienga or swamp, in a westerly direction to the Mission road; that all the citizens recognized the lands lying to the north of this line as belonging to Yerba Buena; that the judges reported to the same effect, and the line was established by custom. By the expediente it appears that the petition of Sherrebeck was referred to the "chief local authority" of Yerba Buena for the usual "informe." This official reported that "in the opinion of this juzgade, only land upon which to build a house and corral, and to plant, should be granted to him." The prefect accordingly grants him el Rincon, embraced within the demarkation of Yerba Buena to the extent of 800 varas square, and subjected him to the payment of the tax which might be assessed to him by the most excellent departmental assembly. In the grant the prefect recites that it is made in virtue of the power vested in him by the law of the 20th March, 1837, the provisions of which have been considered in a former part of this opinion. The provisions of that law give, as we have seen, authority to the prefect to regulate the distribution of the common lands of the pueblos, and the reference to it in the grant, and the mention of the land granted as "within the demarkation of Yerba Buena," afford, in the absence of opposing testimony, presumptive proof that the land was so situated, and that the officer acted within the limits of his authority.

In the case of U. S. v. Reading [18 How. (59 U. S.) 1], the supreme court held the recital in the grant, that the grantee was a citizen by naturalization, to be satisfactory evidence of the fact. So in this case the recital that the land is within the demarkation of Yerba Buena, and a reference to a law giving power to the prefect to regulate the distribution of the common lands of pueblos, as the source of his authority to make the grant in question, ought to be received as evidence of the fact. Castro himself testifies to the same effect, and states positively that the land granted to Sherrebeck was within the demarkation of Yerba Buena. Upon the whole, I think that, without reference to the evidence of the decision of the case of City of San Francisco v. U. S. [unreported], and looking alone to the evidence in this record, I am compelled to presume that the land granted was within the limits of the pueblo of San Francisco.

With respect to the occupation and cultivation of the land there is some conflict of testimony. On the part of the United States two witnesses have testified that they never saw any occupation or cultivation. On the part of the claimants several witnesses testify that a house was built, and a considerable part of the land cultivated, in 1845 or 1846. Obliged, as I am, to decide the case upon the evidence submitted, I have no alternative but to determine that the preponderance of testimony is on the side of the claimant. If the fact be otherwise than as testified to by them, it would have been easy for the United States to have established it. The condition of Rincon Point, and the existence of a house, with a considerable cultivation around it, on that point, at so recent a period as the years 1845 and 1846, could have been shown, it would seem, beyond all room for doubt. But, as before observed, no testimony whatever has been taken by the United States since January, 1846, when the transcript was filed in this court. No objection to the claim, for want of occupation and cultivation, is noticed in the opinion of the board, nor is any objection, whatsoever, to its validity, taken by the United States in this court. Under the evidence before me, I do not feel warranted to declare that the claim in this case has been forfeited by abandonment.

With respect to the location of the land, the testimony shows that in 1846, the alcalde of Yerba Buena pointed out to Sherrebeck, on the place called "El Rincon," the boundaries of the tract. He directed him to measure 400 varas in four different ways from an oak tree in the centre of the land, and the situation of which is identified by the witnesses. It was at the foot, or near this oak tree, that, as testified by the witnesses, the house of Sherrebeck was placed. Sanchez testifies that when he pointed out this tree as the place from which to begin the measurement, there was a brush house there, and that afterwards Sherrebeck built a log house, into which he was putting the windows, when the witness was on the point in 1846. There can be no doubt, therefore, if this testimony is to be believed, as to the precise location of the 800 varas granted to Sherrebeck, or, rather, of the land which he was authorized to occupy and cultivate under his grant.

Since the above was written, the testimony in the case of City of San Francisco v. U. S. [Case No. 12,316], has been filed by consent in this cause. I do not understand it to be disputed that that testimony establishes the existence of the pueblo of San Francisco, at the date of the grant in this case, or that the land granted was within the demarkation of the pueblo.

Case No. 16,276.

UNITED STATES v. SHERIFF OF CHARLESTON.

District Court, D. South Carolina. March 23, 1803.

REVENUE LAWS — INSOLVENCY — PRIORITY OF UNITED STATES.

The revenue laws of the U. States give a preference over other creditors in several cases; but must not be so construed as to destroy a prior legal lien.

[Cited in Re Hambright, Case No. 5,973.]

The United States have obtained judgment and execution against the late collector of this port, for a debt incurred after the passing of the act of congress of 3d March, 1797 (3 Folwell's Laws, 423 [1 Stat. 515]).

It appears that a citizen of this state has a previous lien by judgment and execution in the state court. The sheriff has proceeded by virtue of that execution, to levy on the property so bound; and this suit is brought to stop the sale: to this a demurrer is filed.

BEE, District Judge. The single question is, whether, under the 5th section of the above mentioned act of congress, the United States have a preference or not.

The cases in which that preference is established are: 1st. Property in the hands of executors. 2d. Where assignments of property are made. 3d. In cases of attachment. 4th. In cases of bankruptcy.

The first act that contemplates any preference in favour of the United States was passed 4th August, 1790 [1 Stat. 145]. The 45th section provides that in cases of insolvency, or where an estate in the hands of executors or administrators is insufficient to pay all the debts of the deceased, bonds to the United States for securing payment of duties shall be first satisfied. The next law on the subject was passed 2d May, 1792 [1 Stat. 263], and provides in section 18, that where sureties pay such bonds, they shall be entitled to the same preference that the United States would have had. The act of 3d March, 1797, provides that no voluntary assignment of his property by a debtor of the United States, nor any attachment of said property nor act of bankruptcy, shall prevent the United States from being first paid what may be due to them. The same provision is contained in the last revenue act,—4 Folwell's Laws, 387 [1 Stat. 627]. I cannot find that these acts do in any manner comprehend the present case. There is not a syllable in either of them that can be fairly construed to divest a prior legal lien. I am, therefore, of opinion, that this demurrer must be sustained, and the suit dismissed.

UNITED STATES v. SHERLOCK et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1873.

SURVEYORS OF CUSTOMS—COMMISSIONS ON MONEYS.

[A surveyor of customs is entitled to commissions on moneys paid to him for the treasury department, but not on moneys, already in the treasury, which are transferred to him from other places of deposit.]

This was an action brought upon the bond of T. Jefferson Sherlock, as surveyor of customs, and designated depositary at Cincinnati, Ohio, for the amount of a balance stated against him by the treasury department. He claimed in defence that he was entitled to an additional allowance for commissions upon deposits to the credit of pension agents and other disbursing officers.

Warner M. Bateman, U. S. Atty.
Stanley Matthews, for defendants.

Before SWAYNE, Circuit Justice, and EMMONS, Circuit Judge, and SWING, District Judge.

SWAYNE, Circuit Justice. The court held that he was entitled to commissions only upon moneys paid to him for the use of the treasury department, and was not entitled to commissions upon funds already in the treasury, although transferred to him from other places of deposit, as was the case with funds held by him to the credit of disbursing officers.

UNITED STATES v. SHIVE.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1832.

CONTINUANCE — FORGERY — PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF LAWS—PROVINCE OF JURY.

1. It is no cause for a continuance that defendant has not been furnished with a copy of the indictment, and a list of the jurors, if he has not applied for them.

2. In an indictment for forgery, defendant has no right to peremptory challenges.

3. The constitutionality of the charter of the Bank of the United States is not a proper subject for the consideration of the jury.

[Disapproved in U. S. v. Morris, Case No. 15,815. Cited in Sparf v. U. S., 156 U. S. 73, 15 Sup. Ct. 282.]

4. The construction of the constitution of the United States by the supreme court is binding on a jury as well as the court.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry Baldwin, Circuit Justice.]

This was an indictment [against David Shive] for passing a counterfeit note of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. Phillips, for defendant, moved for a continuance of the case on the ground that the defendant had not been furnished with a copy of the indictment and a list of the jurors. But inasmuch as it appeared that they had not been applied for, the motion was overruled.

When the case was ordered on, Mr. Phillips claimed the right of peremptory challenges.

Before BALDWIN, Circuit Justice, and HOPKINSON, District Judge.

BY THE COURT. The state law giving the defendant a right to challenge peremptorily, does not apply to proceedings in this court; forgery is not a felony at common law, and though the act of congress declares the offence laid in the indictment to be a felony, that does not carry with it a right of peremptory challenge as an incident, and it has never been allowed in this court in a case like the present.

The jury were sworn and the trial had. Among other grounds of defence taken by the counsel of the defendant, he contended that the act of congress chartering the bank which created the offence, was unconstitutional, and that therefore the jury ought to acquit the defendant.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice, after charging the jury on the law and evidence in the case, proceeded to the objection to the constitutionality of the law.

We could have wished that these would have been the only considerations, which it was our duty to submit to you, but one of the counsel for the defendant has raised another question, on which it is necessary for us to give you our opinion, and that is, whether the act of congress on which this prosecution is founded, is valid or void.

That it has passed through all the forms and branches of legislation, that it has been sanctioned and declared to be the law of the land, by the highest branch of the judicial power; that it is clothed with every sanction and carries with it every obligation known to the constitution, has not been and cannot be denied. If there is law in the land, if there is a rule by which courts and juries are bound to administer the criminal justice of the country, it is that which, having been enacted by the legislative authority of the nation, has been solemnly pronounced by the supreme judicial power, to be within the constitutional province of the legislature. Beyond that tribunal, there is no other revision of the acts of congress, that will not end in the prostration of all law and all legitimate government, unless by an amendment to the constitution.

In courts of justice, the law of the land is the law of every case, criminal as well as civil, the safety of the public, the rights of individuals do not depend on their opinion of what the law ought to be, but on what it is. The ministers of justice are not the makers of the laws, judges and jurors are, in the words of the defendant's counsel, magistrates to enforce and execute the laws; they are as much bound by them as the criminal they condemn. We sit here by the authority of the law, our duty is prescribed and defined by law, and if we wilfully violate or disregard it, if we sentence a prisoner without a previous law prescribing a punishment, or acquit in opposition to the enacted and established law of the country, we should be the greatest criminals in the nation. We are judges of law, but what is law? Not the opinions of judges and jurors merely, it is the will of the people, expressed through that department of the government, to whom they have confided the law-making power. An act of congress is the exercise of that power conferred by the nation; a judgment of the supreme court affirming its validity and decreeing its binding force, is the constitutional exercise of the judicial power of the nation, confided to that high tribunal. And when a law thus carries with it the imposing authority of the people, the states of this union, and of every department of the government created by the constitution, shall the ministers of justice, its sworn administrators, be the first to trample under their feet the supreme law of the land? Shall we, the creatures of the law, the servants of the constitution, dare to assume the power of abrogating its provisions, disobeying its injunctions, and dispensing with its penalties? The sixth article of the constitution, declares itself and all laws and treaties made pursuant thereto, to be the supreme law of the land, and that all judges shall be bound thereby, notwithstanding any thing in the law or constitution of any state to the contrary.

When the most solemn acts of a sovereign state, in opposition to an act of congress, are thus declared nullities, will a jury assume no moral responsibility by substituting their opinion for the supreme law of the land? If the defendant has violated an act of congress, though not sworn to make it his rule of action, the supreme law declares him a felon. What are you or we if we put ourselves above it? The power to judge of the law as well as the fact in a criminal case, is to ascertain the existence of a law; if you see it in the statute book, you cannot on your oaths say there is no such law, or exercise a power denied to the people of a state by the most solemn constitutional provision, declare the supreme law to be void, because it does not comport with your opinion. Should you assume and exercise this power, your opinion does not become a supreme law, no one is bound by it, other juries will decide for themselves, and you could not expect that courts would look to your verdict for the construction of the constitution, as to the powers of the legislative or judicial departments of the government; nor that you have the power of declaring what the law is, what acts are criminal, what are innocent, as a rule of action for your fellow citizens or for the court. If juries once exercise this power, we are without a constitution or laws, one jury has the same power as another, you cannot bind those who may take your places, what you declare constitutional to-day, another jury may declare unconstitutional to-morrow. We shall cease to have a government of law, when what is the law, depends on the arbitrary and fluctuating opinions of judges and jurors, instead of the standard of the constitution, expounded by the tribunal to which has been referred all cases arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States.

The counsel of the defendant has referred you to the message of the president, as the true exposition of the constitution in relation to the power of congress to charter the bank. We have no jurisdiction to judge of the propriety of the course of the executive; in the exercise of his constitutional power to prevent the passage of a law, he acts on his responsibility; but the judicial power cannot be exercised on the reasons which have governed the exercise of the veto power. We therefore forbear all remarks upon it. For a similar reason we cannot look to the construction given to the constitution by the executive department as a guide to our judgment; for no appellate or supervisory power over our proceedings, has been confided to that department. We must follow the rule prescribed by the tribunal to whom has been confided the power of expounding the constitution and laws, and of directing our judgment. That tribunal has adjudged this law to be valid, we cannot, and think you will not declare it void.

The jury found the defendant guilty.

OPINION OF THE COURT. At the last term the defendant [Andrew Shoemaker] was indicted for feloniously taking letters from the mail, he having possession of it as carrier, which contained bank notes, &c. The jury were impanneled, and witnesses sworn, when the prosecuting attorney abandoned the prosecution, and entered a nolle prosequi on the indictment.

Two points are raised for consideration and decision in this case: First. Had the prosecuting attorney a right to enter a nolle prosequi in this case? Second. Does such an abandonment amount to an acquittal of the defendant? There can be no doubt that, before the trial is gone into, the prosecuting attorney has a right, under leave of the court, to enter a nolle prosequi on an indictment, and such entry is no bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offence. But, in the case under consideration, the defendant having pleaded not guilty, a jury were sworn to try the issue. That a court may discharge a jury, in a criminal case under peculiar circumstances, after they are sworn and have heard all the evidence, is well settled in the courts of the United States. In the case of U. S. v. Coolidge [Case No. 14,858], the court decided, that they had power to discharge the jury impanneled to try the issue in a criminal cause, whenever it is necessary for the purposes of justice; and that there was no exception of capital cases. And in the case of U. S. v. Perez, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 579, the supreme court say "that courts of justice have the authority to discharge the jury from giving any verdict, whenever, in their opinion, taking all the circumstances into consideration, there is a manifest necessity for the act, or the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated; and that such a discharge constitutes no bar to further proceedings, and gives no right of exemption to the prisoner from being again put upon his trial." But there was no discharge of the jury by the court in this case. Nor does it appear, from the record, that the prosecution was abandoned on account of any defect in the indictment. The usual mode of taking advantage of such defect is, either by a motion to quash, or, in arrest of judgment; but the supreme court have said [U. S. v. Gooding] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 460, that the sufficiency of the indictment, in the discretion of the court, may be discussed and decided during the trial before the jury. In 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 631, it is said that it would be absurd to suppose that after evidence given, the prosecutor might be allowed to withdraw a juror merely because the proof would not amount to conviction. And it would seem to be equally unreasonable to allow a nolle prosequi to be entered, because the proof was not sufficient to convict. In the case of Com. v. Wade, 17 Pick. 395, the court say—"There are some stages of a trial in which the right to enter a nolle prosequi clearly ceases; as after a verdict of manslaughter on an indictment for murder; in others, a question might be made, as after the evidence is closed, or after it is summed up to the jury. In some cases, it would seem, the cause must be taken from the jury of necessity; as if the jury cannot agree, or, if one of them be taken ill," &c. And they say the case under consideration was one where there was no necessity, no unforeseen cause of delay, no accident, no mistake, no extraordinary exigence. It was an ordinary case of a good indictment in point of form, but a failure in the proof. And they decided that the prisoner was entitled to a verdict of acquittal. In the case of State v. Davis, 4 Blackf. 345, the court held that it was not error in the circuit court to refuse permission to the prosecuting attorney to enter a nolle prosequi after evidence had been heard in the cause. The fifth article of the amendments to the constitution of the United States declares, that no person shall be subject, for the same offence, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb. Under this provision it has been held, in the case of U. S. v. Gibert [Case No. 15,204], by the circuit judge, that, in a capital case, a new trial is prohibited where a verdict of guilty is rendered, as it would place the defendant a second time in jeopardy. With this view I do not concur, but it was taken by a most able and learned judge, and shows great strictness in criminal proceedings.

The offence charged against the defendant does not subject him, if convicted, to the loss of either life or limb, and it is not, therefore, within this provision of the constitution; but the rights of the defendant are equally guarded by established principles. Where the judgment is arrested for some defect in the indictment, it is admitted that the defendant may be prosecuted a second time for the same offence. And that a discharge of the jury by the court, under some sudden emergency, constitutes no bar to another trial. In the first case the defendant could not be said to have been in jeopardy, as the indictment was radically defective; and, in the second case, from the sudden indisposition of a witness, a juror, the court, or an irreconcilable difference of opinion among the jurors, having occurred, over which neither the court nor the parties could exercise any control, the discharge of the jury became indispensable. The trial could not proceed; no verdict could be rendered; and, for this reason, the defendant, in such a case, was not considered in jeopardy. The fault was not with the prosecuting attorney, nor with the defendant, and the circumstance was so imperious as to lead to a failure of public justice, unless the court should discharge the jury. Formerly it was held that this discharge of the jury might be entered with the consent of the defendant, but his consent is not now deemed necessary.

The jury were not discharged by the court in the case under consideration. No emergency occurred which called for, or authorized, such discharge. The prosecution was abandoned by the United States, which left the jury nothing to try, and they were, consequently, dismissed. The ground on which the prosecution was abandoned does not appear on the record. The jury were regularly impaneled and sworn to try the issue; witnesses were sworn, and then a nolle prosequi was entered. From the record it would seem probable that the prosecution was abandoned, because of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain it. But whether this or some other was the true ground, the question arises as to the right of the prosecutor, under the circumstances, to enter a nolle prosequi. If the prosecutor have this right, at what stage of the trial must it be exercised? May he abandon the prosecution after the jury shall have returned into court prepared to render their verdict, or on the close of the evidence on both sides, or on its close by the United States; or must the entry be made before any evidence is heard, and immediately after the jury are sworn? If the right to abandon the prosecution be in the prosecuting attorney, with the view of commencing it de novo, it is not perceived on what principle its exercise can be limited. If it exist it would seem to follow that it may be exercised at the discretion of the attorney who represents the government. This would lead to endless vexations in the prosecution of criminal cases.

The first trial might be considered an experiment to draw forth the evidence in the case, and ascertain if it be insufficient, whether, on another trial, it might not be made strong enough to convict. Such a course would not be tolerated in a civil cause, much less in a criminal one. Nor could this right be safely exercised under the discretion of the court. What shall govern this discretion? Shall the court determine, on hearing a part of the evidence, whether or not the defendant is guilty, and permit the prosecuting attorney to enter a nolle prosequi or not, as they shall think the ends of justice require. The discharge of a jury in a criminal case, on the ground of a necessity which could neither be foreseen nor controlled, imposes no hardship on the defendant of which he has a right to complain. He, alike with the government, must submit to the law of necessity, which, of all other laws, is the most inexorable. But the entry of a nolle prosequi is imposed by no necessity. It may be a matter of discretion, or, of policy; a discretion founded upon no fixed principle, or guided by no known rule; or a policy which may have for its object the oppression and conviction of the defendant.

An abandonment of the prosecution, before the defendant is put upon his trial, is the undoubted right of the prosecuting attorney; but after the trial has been commenced the relation of the defendant to the case is materially changed, and this must, to some extent, control the power of the prosecutor. He, it is true, may, in effect, abandon the prosecution by failing to call witnesses, but, it would seem that, he can not do so to the prejudice of the defendant. He can not abandon it in form, and afterwards renew the same charge. The prisoner stands charged as a culprit, but the law is jealous of his rights, and shields him from oppression. However guilty he may be, he can be convicted only according to law. And a jury having been sworn to try his case, he has a right to their verdict, unless some inevitable occurrence shall interpose and prevent the rendition of a verdict. Before he goes in to trial the prosecutor should see that his witnesses are in attendance, and that he is prepared to try the issue. If, then, the prosecuting attorney had no right to enter a nolle prosequi after the jury were sworn, how does such an entry affect the defendant? If the defendant had a right to claim a verdict, and did not receive a verdict of acquittal on account of the abandonment of the prosecution by the United States, it is contended that such abandonment should not operate to his prejudice. The plea of auterfois acquit consists of matter of record, and matter of fact. Of record, the indictment and acquittal of fact, that the defendant is the same person, and that the offence is the same. To sustain this plea the first indictment must have described the offence with legal certainty. If, in this respect, the indictment be essentially defective, it can constitute no bar. The indictment, in this case, appears to be technical, and, on its face, is subject to no fatal exception. And, it is admitted, that the defendant in the second indictment is the same person named in the first, and that the offence is the same. This admission renders an inquisition to ascertain the facts unnecessary. If a defendant be acquitted on the misdirection of the judge, still his acquittal may be pleaded. 2 Co. Inst. 318. To sustain a plea of a former acquittal there must be a judgment on the verdict of not guilty. 2 Hale, P. C. 243, 246; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 35, § 6; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 457; 4 Coke, 44, 45.

The record introduced to support the plea in this case, after stating the appearance of the prosecuting attorney, and the defendant, in proper person, stated that "jury were called, who were elected, tried, and sworn, to try the issue joined between the United States and the defendant, and true deliverance make according to law, and evidence. Whereupon, the said plaintiffs, by their said attorney, say, that they will no further prosecute their said indictment against the said defendant. It is, therefore, considered by the court that the defendant go hence without day." Here is no verdict of acquittal, and, consequently, no judgment on the verdict. The plea of a former acquittal is not, therefore, technically sustained. But there is a judgment in favor of the defendant, that he go without day; and this necessarily followed the abandonment of the prosecution. Can this judgment be considered as substantially sustaining the plea? On this point I confess that I entertain strong doubts. From the limited access to books, which I have had at this place, I can find no case in point. In the cases referred to in 17 Pick. and 4 Blackf. the court decided that, where the jury were sworn, and some evidence heard, the prosecuting attorney had no right to enter a nolle prosequi, and that the defendant was entitled to a verdict. It is not said, however, in either of these cases, what the effect to the defendant would have been, had the nolle prosequi been entered. In Com. v. Cook, 6 Serg. & R. 577, the court decided that a discharge of the jury once sworn, in a criminal case, was an acquittal of the defendant. The case must be considered on principle, if the point has not been decided. It is a rule in criminal proceedings that nothing shall be done, within the discretion of the court, to the prejudice of the defendant. And, hence, in some instances, where his interests may, possibly, be injuriously affected by an order, his consent is necessary. So regardful of his rights are the court, that they will not encourage, or, indeed, suffer him to assent to that which is manifestly to his prejudice. In some respects the court are said to be the counsel of the prisoner. If the court instruct the jury that it is essential to prove the offence was committed on the day laid in the indictment, and on this ground the defendant be acquitted, the acquittal may be pleaded. 2 Hale, P. C. 247.

In the case under consideration the prosecuting attorney had no right to enter a formal abandonment of the prosecution; and, from this, it follows that the defendant had a right to a verdict. There is no defect apparent on the face of the indictment. But the prosecution was formally abandoned, which left the jury nothing to try. And if this proceeding shall not be regarded as a verdict of acquittal, is not the defendant manifestly prejudiced? Was he not in peril? The nolle prosequi was entered without the consent of the defendant, and against his remonstrance; and it was entered against his rights, and without power, or right, by the prosecutor. On principle, therefore, we feel bound to say, that the proceeding must be considered equivalent to a verdict of acquittal, and, as such, with the judgment of the court thereon, is a bar to the present indictment.

Case No. 16,280.

UNITED STATES v. SHOREY.

[9 Int. Rev. Rec. 201.]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May, 1869.

CRIMINAL LAW—DOUBLE PLEAS—DEMURRER.

S. was indicted for an offense against the tariff act of August 30, 1842 [5 Stat. 548], and pleaded the general issue, and also pleaded specially the statute of limitations, in the crimes act of April 30, 1790 [1 Stat. 112], in bar. Held, that double pleading was inadmissible, and the special plea would be stricken out. The defendant might withdraw his plea of not guilty, and demur to the indictment, with leave to plead over should the demurrer be overruled.

The indictment against the defendant [Alanson J. Shorey] is founded upon the 19th section of the act of the 30th of August, 1842, which provides that if any person shall * * * smuggle or clandestinely introduce into the United States any goods, wares or merchandise subject to duty by law, and which should have been invoiced, without paying or accounting for the duty, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. Defendant appeared and pleaded the general issue that he was not guilty, and also pleaded especially that he was not guilty at any time within two years next before the finding or institution of the indictment. Allegation of the indictment is that the offence was committed on the 10th of October, 1865, more than two years before the indictment was found and filed in court. The district attorney demurred to the special plea, and the defendant joined in demurrer. Treason and certain other capital offences are defined by the crimes act of the 30th of April, 1790, and the 32d section of that act provides that no person or persons shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for treason or other capital offence aforesaid, wilful murder or forgery excepted, unless the indictment for the same be found by a grand jury, within three years next after the treason or capital offence aforesaid shall be done or committed. Evidently that provision is limited to the crimes defined in that act, but the section further provides that no person shall "be prosecuted, tried or punished for any offence not capital, nor for any fine or forfeiture under any penal statute, unless the indictment or information shall be found or instituted within two years from the time of committing the offence, or incurring the fine or forfeiture aforesaid."

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and CLARK, District Judge.

BY THE COURT. Argument for the defendant is that the indictment is barred by that provision, but there is a preliminary question to be decided before that proposition can be considered. Two pleas are pleaded by the defendant, and the first question is whether double pleading is allowable in criminal cases. No such objection was taken by the district attorney, but the question is one affecting the regularity of the proceedings in criminal cases in the federal courts, and cannot be allowed to pass without notice. Special matter which is in law a bar to an indictment, may in certain cases be so pleaded in misdemeanors, but the rule is well settled that the defendant cannot plead specially in bar of the indictment if he pleads the general issue, as double pleading is unknown in criminal procedure. 1 Starkie, Cr. Pl. 335; Heyrick v. Foster, 4 Term R. 701. Double pleading is not allowable, and if autrefois acquit be pleaded with not guilty, one of the pleas will be struck off. Reg. v. Strahan, 7 Cox, Cr. Cas. 85; 1 Am. Cr. Law (4th Ed.) § 530; State v. Copeland, 2 Swan, 626; Morgan v. Luckup, 2 Strange, 1044. At common law there was but one rule which applied alike to civil and criminal proceedings that the defendant must rely upon one ground of defence, and that double pleading was never to be admitted. 4 Bl. Comm. 332; 2 Hale, P. C. 236; Hawk. P. C. 32. Inconvenience, however, resulted from such strictness, and the rule was relaxed by St. 4 Anne, c. 16, §§ 4, 5, which enabled the defendant by leave of the court, to plead as many matters as he saw fit, but the statute contained a proviso that nothing contained therein should extend to any indictment or presentment of treason, felony, or murder, or any other matter, or to any action upon a penal statute. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 434.

Injustice might be done to the defendant if the court should strike out the first plea, and decide the case upon the second, and in view of the circumstances the court decides to strike out the second plea, and allow the case to stand for trial, but the defendant, if he sees fit, may withdraw his plea of not guilty, and demur to the indictment, with leave to plead over if the demurrer is overruled.

Case No. 16,281.

UNITED STATES v. SHOREY (two cases).

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. 1869.

COUNTERFEITING—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

S. was indicted for having counterfeit United States notes in his possession and attempting to pass the same at divers times, and pleaded that the indictment had not been found within two years subsequent to the commission of the acts charged. Held, that the indictments were barred by the statute of limitations.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. The first indictment charges that the defendant [Alanson J. Shorey] at Portsmouth, on the fifteenth day of September, 1865, attempted to pass counterfeit United States fractional currency treasury notes, and that he had similar notes in his possession with intent to pass the same, and the other charges similar offences, alleged to have been committed on the 20th of September, 1865, under 12 Stat. 712, 713; Id. 347; 13 Stat. 221, § 10. Counterfeiting is a crime recognized in the constitution of the United States, and has been defined as such in the laws of congress since the first crimes act was passed. It was known as such at common law, and is punished as such by the laws of every state in the Union. Regarding the proposition as self-evident, we do not think it necessary to attempt to fortify it by argument. Laws defining such offence, and providing for the punishment of the offenders, are as distinct from crimes arising under the revenue laws of the United States as any two offences can be which are defined by acts of congress, and within the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Persons found guilty of the offence are declared to be guilty of felony, and may be punished by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment to hard labor not exceeding fifteen years according to the aggravation of the offence. 12 Stat. 347; 13 Stat. 221.

In one of the indictments the offence is alleged to have been committed on the fifteenth of September, 1865, and on the other on the twentieth of September in the same year, and in each more than two years before the indictment was found. Demurrers are filed in each case by the defendant, because the respective offences were committed more than two years before the indictments were filed by the grand jury. Beyond controversy the case falls within the two years' limitation as provided in the thirty-second section of the act of the thirtieth of April, 1790 [1 Stat. 119], and the conclusion accordingly is that the demurrers must be sustained. Judgment that the respective indictments are barred by the statute of limitations, and that the defendant be discharged.

UNITED STATES v. SHOREY.

[9 Int. Rev. Rec. 202.]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May, 1869.

VIOLATION OF TARIFF LAWS—INDICTMENT—LIMITATION.

S. demurred to an indictment for an offence against the tariff act of August 30, 1842 [5 Stat. 548], that the same had not been found within two years subsequent to the commission of the act charged Held, that the indictment, having been found within five years subsequent to the act charged, was within the terms of the act of March 26, 1804 [2 Stat. 290], and was good.

[This was an indictment against Alanson J. Shorey for smuggling. Defendant was heretofore allowed to withdraw his plea of not guilty, and demur to the indictment. Case No. 16,280. The case is now heard on a demurrer, which was accordingly filed.]

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Persons who knowingly and wilfully, with intent to defraud the United States, smuggle or clandestinely introduce into the United States any goods, wares, or merchandise subject to duty by law, and which should have been invoiced, without paying or accounting for the duty, are declared by the nineteenth section of the act of the 30th of August, 1842, to be guilty of a misdemeanor. 5 Stat. 565. Charge against the defendant is founded upon that provision, and the indictment is in the usual form.

The defendant demurred to the indictment, and the district attorney joined in demurrer. Leave being granted to the defendant to plead to the merits in case, the indictment is adjudged sufficient. Cause of demurrer is, that the offence, as alleged in the indictment, was not committed within two years next before the time when the indictment was found. As alleged, the offence was committed on the 10th of October, 1865, but the indictment was not found till the May term, 1868, more than two years after the offence was committed. Limitation of the crimes act of the 30th of April, 1790, is that no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offence not capital, nor for any fine or forfeiture under any penal statute, unless the indictment or information for the same shall be found or instituted within two years from the time of committing the offence or incurring the fine or forfeiture aforesaid. Tested by that provision, the decision of the court would necessarily be in favor of the defendant, but it is quite certain that the provision relied on by the defendant, as applied to the case at bar, has been repealed by the third section of the act of the 26th of March, 1804, as contended by the district attorney. 2 Stat. 290. By that section it is provided that any person or persons guilty of any crime arising under the revenue law of the United States, or incurring any fine or forfeiture by breaches of the said laws, may be prosecuted, tried, and punished, provided the indictment or information be found at any time within five years after committing the offence, or incurring the fine or forfeiture, any law or provision to the contrary notwithstanding. Argument is not necessary to show that the offence of smuggling, as defined in the 19th section of the act of the 30th of August, 1842, is a "crime arising under the revenue laws of the United States"; and, as such, the provision is express that it may be prosecuted, tried and punished, provided the indictment or information, as the case may be, is found at any time within five years after committing the offence or incurring the fine or forfeiture. Beyond question that provision applies to offences against the revenue laws passed subsequently to that date, as well as to those defined under laws existing at the time the limitation was enacted; and, if so, then it is clear that the question before the court is controlled by that provision. Adams

v. Woods, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 336; U. S. v. Mayo [Case No. 15,755]; Johnson v. U. S. [Id. 7,418]; U. S. v. Ballard [Id. 14,507].

Comment upon the 4th section of the act of the 28th of February, 1839, need not be made as it is obvious that it refers only to penal actions, and to proceedings in rem to enforce a forfeiture, and not to crimes. Simpson v. Pond [Case No. 13,455].

But notice must also be taken of the 14th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1863 [12 Stat. 741], not referred to by the counsel on either side. Express provision is there made for the repeal of so much of the 3d section of the act entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," approved March 26, 1804, as imposes any limitation upon the commencement of any action or proceeding for the recovery of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred by reason of the violation of any law of the United States relating to the importation or entry of goods, wares or merchandise. 12 Stat. 741. Viewed in any light, however, it is clear that that provision cannot benefit the defendant, as it does not purport to repeal that part of section 3 of that act which authorizes indictments for crimes to be found at any time within five years after the offence was committed. Smuggling is a crime, and by the 4th section of the act of the 18th of July, 1866, may be punished by fine or imprisonment, or by both, in the discretion of the court. 14 Stat. 179.

Demurrer overruled. Leave granted to plead over.

Mr. Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Carrington & Haber, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment against the defendant [Nicholas Shults], charging him, while employed in carrying the mail of the United States, on a horse route, with the abstraction of certain letters, which contained bank notes and other articles of value. Plea not guilty—jury sworn.

John Keller, who is post master at Mount Ephraim post office, Noble county, in Ohio, states that defendant carried the mail from Sarahsville, in Noble county, to Washington in Guernsey county, a distance of twenty miles. In June, latter part, or first of July, witness mailed two letters for California, which were forwarded to the distributing office at Wheeling or Cleveland, directed to Nicewall. The envelope was returned to witness as being found in the road more than a month after it was mailed. The second letter was reported to have been found on defendant's route. Another letter was found on the same route, which had been mailed on the 6th or 7th of June. Mr. Chance says, there must have been two violations of the mail while defendant carried it, which was about a week. Witness found a letter on the route on Friday after defendant commenced carrying the mail on the route. Another letter was found on the route which must have passed through the office of witness. Mr. Forman is post master at Senecaville. He designates a letter picked up on the route; another letter found on the road must have been a letter forwarded in the mail. Other witnesses proved that other letters were found on the route, which had been mailed by the post masters on the route, and which from their face purported to have contained money. William Young, saw defendant first of June, and received from him a debt of sixty or seventy dollars. He had a watch, and witness asked him how he got so much money; he replied that he had sold a colt for sixty dollars. Witness exchanged with him ten dollars, giving silver for paper; next day he came and bought thirty dollars in gold from witness. Mr. Renderneck, arrested the defendant near Marietta, in a wood boat, at which time he admitted that he had taken from the mail seventy-six dollars. Several witnesses were examined to show mental imbecility in the defendant, so as to be incapable of committing a crime; and his defense rested on this ground. Several medical gentlemen were examined, who differed somewhat in their opinions, some of them stating that in their view he was not a proper subject of punishment.

In the charge to the jury, the court said, there seems to be no doubt that during the short time the defendant carried the mail, he repeatedly violated it by abstracting letters from it. This is established by the numerous letters picked up on or near the route, which had been mailed at one of the post offices on the route, or were carried on it; and by the confession of the defendant that he had taken from the mail seventy-six dollars. He was destitute of money before he was employed as carrier, after which it appears he had money to a considerable amount. All this evidence is uncontradicted, and the only ground of defense is, mental imbecility.

This defense has often been made, and much has been said and written upon the subject. Nothing is more common than for medical men to differ as to the fact of insanity, which should exculpate an individual from punishment. Where the insanity is in a degree which destroys the reasoning faculty, there can be no difference of opinion amongst professional men or jurors. But where the individual is subject to occasional aberrations of mind, or where the mind seems to be under peculiar excitement and error on a particular subject, as is often the case, and rational on other subjects, or where the individual reasons illogically and strangely, which brings him to results in action which violate the laws; in all these cases, and others which might be enumerated, a close investigation is required, and a wise discrimination should be exercised. In such cases, the important fact to be ascertained is, whether the person charged can discriminate between right and wrong. If he be unable to do this, he is not a proper subject of punishment. And this fact can be best ascertained, not by any medical theory, but by the acts of the individual himself. Every person who commits a crime reasons badly. The propensity to steal in some persons is hard to resist. Where the moral development is weak and the passion of acquisitiveness strong, it will often prevail. This, in one sense, may be evidence of a partial insanity, but still the person is a proper subject of punishment. And there is no other test on this point, except the knowledge of the individual between right and wrong. And this knowledge is best ascertained by the acts of the individual in the commission of the offense, and subsequently.

Does the individual commit the offense by embracing the most favorable opportunity, in the absence of witnesses, and under circumstances likely to avoid detection. And if he steal money does he account for the possession of it in an honest way. And does he, under an apprehension of an arrest, endeavor to elude the officers of the law. All this conduces to show a knowledge that he had not only done wrong, but that he was liable to punishment.

The defendant in this case accounted for the amount of money he had in possession by saying, he received it as the price of a colt. He changed the notes he had for gold and silver, knowing that the notes might not be current at the places to which he might go. Or he might fear that the notes might be identified, by those who forwarded them in the mail. On either supposition it showed a sound reflection on the consequence of his acts should he be arrested. He absconded, and was arrested several miles from home, on his way to the West. He was found in a close room of a boat, the door of which was locked; and it is proved that when he came to the boat the previous evening, he engaged the room and requested that the door should not be opened to any one. This shows an apprehension that he would be pursued, and a desire to escape the pursuit. These acts would seem to be unmistakable evidence of a sense of guilt, and a desire to escape punishment. He acted under a motive which usually influences culprits. When carrying the mail, on a suggestion being made to him that he might steal from the mail, the penitentiary immediately occurred to his mind. He bought and sold articles, and evidenced in such matters, no deficiency of mind. He knew the value of money and understood the matter of exchange, and the uncurrency in remote parts of bank notes.

Upon the whole, gentlemen, if you think from the evidence in the case, that the defendant in violating the mail knew he was doing wrong, and that he was liable to be punished for the act, he is a proper subject for punishment. It is true he did not conceal the letters he took from the mail, but left many of them scattered along the road he traveled, which shows a great want of caution, still, if the other qualities of his mind were in such rational exercise as to enable him to discriminate right from wrong, you will find him guilty.

The jury found the defendant guilty, and the court sentenced him to ten years in the penitentiary.

Case No. 16,287a.

UNITED STATES v. SICKLES.

Criminal Court, District of Columbia. April 20, 1859.

MURDER—PRESUMPTION OF MALICE—INSANITY AS DEFENSE—PROVINCE OF JURY—REASONABLE DOUBT OF SANITY.

1. The burden of rebutting the presumption of malice by showing circumstances of alleviation, excuse, or justification rests on the prisoner, and it is incumbent on him to make out such circumstances to the satisfaction of the jury, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him.

2. The law does not require that the insanity which absolves from the crime should exist for any definite period, but only that it exists at the moment when the act occurred with which the accused stands charged. The time when the insanity is to operate is the moment when the crime charged upon the party was committed, if committed at all.

3. Every one is presumed to be sane who is charged with a crime, but when evidence is adduced that a prisoner is insane, conflicting testimony makes it a question for the jury, and raises a reasonable doubt which should avail a prisoner on a defence of insanity as to any other matter of fact.

The following indictment was read to the jury by Mr. Ould: "District of Columbia, County of Washington, to wit: The jurors of the United States, for the county aforesaid, upon their oaths, do present that Daniel E. Sickles, late of the county of Washington aforesaid, gentleman, not having the fear of God before his eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, on the 27th day of February, A. D. 1859, with force and arms, at the county aforesaid, in and upon the body of one Philip Barton Key, in the peace of God and of the United States, then and there being feloniously and willfully, and of his malicious aforethought, did make an assault; and that the said Daniel E. Sickles, a certain pistol of the value of two dollars, then and there charged with gunpowder and one leaden bullet, which said pistol he, the said Daniel E. Sickles, in his right hand then and there had and held, then and there feloniously, willfully and of his malice aforethought, did discharge and shoot off, to, against and upon the said Philip Barton Key; and that the said Daniel E. Sickles, with the leaden bullet aforesaid, out of the pistol aforesaid, then and there, by force of the gunpowder aforesaid, by the said Daniel E. Sickles, discharged and shot off as aforesaid, then and there feloniously, willfully and of his malice aforethought, did strike and penetrate and wound him, the said Philip Barton Key, in and upon the left side of him, the said Philip Barton Key, a little below the tenth rib of him, the said Philip Barton Key, giving to him, the said Philip Barton Key, then and there, with the leaden bullet aforesaid, so as aforesaid discharged and shot out of the said pistol as aforesaid by the said Daniel E. Sickles, in and upon the left side of him, the said Philip Barton Key, a little below the tenth rib of him, the said Philip Barton Key, one mortal wound of the depth of ten inches and of the breadth of half an inch; of which said mortal wound he, the said Philip Barton Key, then and there instantly died. And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do say that the said Daniel E. Sickles, him, the said Philip Barton Key, in manner and form and by the means aforesaid, then and there feloniously, willfully and of his malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and government of the United States. Robert Ould, Attorney for United States."

The indictment having been read, the prosecution opened the case for the United States. After the opening by Mr. Ould, the judge stated that it had been the practice in this court for the defence to follow the prosecution in opening, prior to entering upon the testimony. If the defence, however, preferred to reserve their opening, they were entitled to do so.

Mr. Brady, for the defence, stated that they preferred to open to the jury after the evidence for the United States should be given.

The witnesses for the prosecution were then called by the clerk.

On the close of the testimony on the part of the prosecution the jury was addressed by John Graham, Esq., for the defence. On his completion the witnesses on the part of the defence were examined.

After the testimony on both sides was given, the prosecuting attorney, Mr. Carlisle, proceeded to read the instructions, which, as prepared by the district attorney and copied from the instructions given by the court in the Case of Day were: (1) If the jury believe from the evidence that the deceased was killed by the prisoner by means of a leaden bullet discharged from a pistol, such killing implies malice in law, and is murder. (2) That the burden of rebutting the presumption of malice by showing circumstances of alleviation, excuse or justification rests on the prisoner. (3) And it is incumbent on him to make out such circumstances to the satisfaction of the jury, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him. (4) That every person is presumed to be of sound mind until the contrary is proved, and the burden of rebutting this presumption rests on the prisoner, with the addition of the following: (5) If the jury believe from the evidence that the deceased, previous to the day of his death, had adulterous intercourse with the wife of the prisoner, and further that the deceased on the day of his death, shortly before the prisoner left his house, made signals, inviting to a further act or acts of adultery, which said signals, or a portion of them, were seen by the prisoner; and that influenced by such provocation, the prisoner took the life of the deceased, such provocation does not justify the act or reduce such killing from murder to manslaughter.

Mr. Brady then proceeded to read the instructions asked by the defence: (1) There is no presumption of malice in this case, if any proof of "alleviation, excuse or justification" arises out of the evidence for the prosecution. State v. Johnson, 3 Jones [N. C.] 266; McDaniel v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 401; Day's Case [unreported]. (2) The existence of malice is not presumable in this case, if on any rational theory, consistent with all the evidence, the homicide was either justifiable or excusable, or an act of manslaughter. State v. Johnson, 3 Jones [N. C.] 266; McDaniel v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 401; U. S. v. Mingo [Case No. 15,781]; Com. v. York, 2 Benn. & H. Cr. Cas. 505. (3) If on the whole evidence presented by the prosecution there is any rational hypothesis, consistent with the conclusion that the homicide was justifiable or excusable, the defendant cannot be convicted. (4) If the jury believe that Mr. Sickles, when the homicide occurred, intended to kill Mr. Key, he cannot be convicted of manslaughter. (5) It is for the jury to determine, under all the circumstances of the case, whether the act charged upon Mr. Sickles is murder or justifiable homicide. People v. Ryan, 2 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 47. (6) If the jury find that Mr. Sickles killed Mr. Key while the latter was in criminal intercourse with the wife of the former, Mr. Sickles cannot be convicted of either murder or manslaughter. (7) If from the whole evidence the jury believe that Mr. Sickles committed the act, but at the time of doing so was under the influence of a diseased mind, and was really unconscious that he was committing a crime, he is not in law guilty of murder. Day's Case [unreported]. (8) If the jury believe from any pre-disposed cause the prisoner's mind was impaired, and at the time of killing Mr. Key he became, or was mentally incapable of governing himself in reference to Mr. Key as the debauchee of his wife, and at the time of committing said act by reason of such cause, unconscious that he was committing a crime as to said Mr. Key, he is not guilty of any offence whatever. Day's Case [unreported]. (9) It is for the jury to say what was the state of the prisoner's mind as to the capacity to decide upon the criminality of the particular act in question—the homicide—at the moment it occurred, and what was the condition of the parties respectively, as to being armed or not at the same moment. These are open questions for the jury, as are any other questions which may arise upon the consideration of the evidence, the whole of which is to be taken into view by the jury. Jarboe's Case [unreported]. (10) The law does not require that the insanity, which absolves from crime, should exist for any definite period, but only that it exists at the moment when the act occurred with which the accused stands charged. (11) If the jury have any doubt as to the case, either in reference to the homicide or the question of sanity, Mr. Sickles should be acquitted.

Mr. Carlisle stated the grounds on what he thought the instructions asked by the prosecution should be granted; and those asked by the defence, or some of them, should be rejected.

After summing up of the case on the part of the defence by Mr. Stanton, Mr. Brady proceeded to argue the instruction on behalf of the defence.

Mr. Ould, the district attorney, made the closing argument on the evidence, and the instructions prayed for by the prosecution and the defence.

Robert Ould, U. S. Dist. Atty., and J. M. Carlisle, for the United States.

James J. Brady, John Graham, E. N. Stanton, Ratcliffe, Clinton & Magruder, and Mr. Philips, for the prisoner.

CRAWFORD, J. (charging jury). The court is asked to give to the jury certain instructions, whether on the part of the United States or on the part of the defence. The first instruction asked for by the United States embodies the law of the case on the particular branch of it to which it relates, and is granted with some explanation as to insanity, with a reference to which the prayer closes. A great English judge has said on the trial of Oxford (who shot at the queen of England), 9 Car. & P. 525, "that if the prisoner was laboring under some controlling disease, which was in truth the acting power within him which he could not resist, then he will not be responsible." And again: "The question is whether he was laboring under that species of insanity which satisfies you that he was quite unaware of the nature, character and consequence of the act he was committing; or in other words, whether he was under the influence of a diseased mind and was really unconscious at the time he was committing the act that that was a crime. A man is not to be excused from responsibility if he has capacity and reason sufficient to enable him to distinguish between right and wrong as to the particular act he is doing, a knowledge and consciousness that the act he is doing is wrong and criminal and will subject him to punishment. In order to be responsible he must have sufficient power of memory to recollect the relation to which he stands to others, and in which others stand to him; that the act he is doing is contrary to the plain dictates of justice and right, injurious to others, and a violation of the dictates of duty. On the contrary, although he may be laboring under a partial insanity, if he still understands the nature and character of his act and its consequences; if he has knowledge that it is wrong and criminal, and a mental power sufficient to apply that knowledge to his own case, and to know if he does the act he will do wrong and receive the punishment, such partial insanity is not sufficient to exempt him from responsibility for criminal acts." See Com. v. Rogers, 7 Metc. [Mass.] 500, 501, 503.

The second and third instructions asked for by the United States are granted.

The fourth instruction is answered by prayer eleven of the defence.

The fifth instruction asked for by the United States the court thinks is the law, and grants the instruction.

Now we come to those asked on the part of the defence, the first of which is in these words: "There is no presumption of malice in this case if any proof of alleviation, excuse or justification arise out of the evidence for the prosecution.' There is, gentlemen, a legal presumption of malice in every deliberate killing, and the burden of repelling it is on the slayer, unless evidence of alleviation, mitigation, excuse or justification arise out of the evidence adduced against him. The alleviation, mitigation, excuse or justification must be such as the law prescribes, and within the limits already laid down in the instructions given to you.

In regard to the second instruction asked for by the defence, I would say: The answer to the first prayer will be taken in connection with my response to prayer number two: "If upon any course of reasoning consistent with all the evidence" and the law as laid down to you by the court, and the rules by which it is ascertained what is legal provocation, what is justification or excuse, you should come to the conclusion that there was such justification or excuse, or that the homicide was manslaughter, then the presumption of malice which the very killing of a human being involves, is met. You recollect that manslaughter is the killing of a man without malice.

The third prayer on the part of the defence is answered in the same manner as prayer number two.

The fourth prayer the court declines to grant; manslaughter may exist, and most frequently does, where the slayer intended to destroy life, but under circumstances which reduce the offence.

The fifth prayer cannot be granted, as to the jury belongs the decision of matters of fact, and to the court the decision of matters of law, which it is the duty of the jury to receive from the court; and from the evidence and the law applied to the facts it is the province and legal right of the jury to return a guilty or not guilty of murder or manslaughter.

In regard to the sixth instruction for the defence I would remark: If this prayer refers to actual (existing at the moment) adulterous intercourse with the wife of the prisoner, the slaying of the deceased would be manslaughter; and by existing adultery I do not mean that the prisoner stood by and witnessed the act of adultery progressing, for it is easy to suppose the actual fact to be established simultaneously with the killing by other evidence, in perfect consistence with the law; if, for instance, the husband saw the adulterer leave the bed of the wife, or shot him while trying to escape from the chamber. If, however, a day or half a day intervened between the conviction of the husband of the guilt of his wife and the deceased, and after the lapse of such time the husband take the life of the deceased, the law considers that it was done deliberately, and declares that it is murder.

The seventh and eighth instructions can be answered together. They are granted.

In reply to the ninth instruction the court responds thus: "It is for the jury to say what was the state of Mr. Sickle's mind as to his capacity to decide upon the criminality of the homicide, receiving the law as given to them in relation to the degree of insanity, whether it will, or not, excuse they (the jury) finding the fact of the existence or non-existence of such degree of insanity." The gist of this prayer is "what was the condition of the parties respectively as to being armed or not at the same moment"? So much of the instruction as I have now read I grant without qualification.

The tenth prayer reads thus: "The law does not require that the insanity, which absolves from crime should exist for any definite period, but only that it exists at the moment when the act occurred, with which the accused stands charged." That instruction is granted. The time when the insanity is to operate is the moment when the crime charged upon the party was committed, if committed at all.

The eleventh and last instruction asked reads this way: "If the jury have any doubt as to the case either in reference to the homicide or the question of insanity, Mr. Sickles should be acquitted." This instruction, as I mentioned in referring to prayer four of the United States will be answered in conjunction with it. It does not appear to be questioned that if a doubt is entertained by the jury, the prisoner is to have the benefit of it. As to the sanity or insanity of the prisoner at the moment when he committed the act charged, it is argued by the United States that every man being presumed to be sane, the presumption must be overcome by evidence satisfactory to the jury that he was insane when the deed was done. This is not the first time this inquiry has engaged my attention. The point was made and decided at the June term, 1858, in the case of U. S. v. Divilins [unreported], when the court gave the following opinion, which I read from my notes of the trial: "The prayer is based on the idea that the jury must be satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt of the insanity of the party for whom the defence is set up, precisely as the United States is bound to prove the guilt of a defendant to warrant a conviction. I am well aware, and it has appeared on this argument, that it has been held by a court of high rank and reputation, that there must be a preponderance of evidence in favor of the defence of insanity to overcome the presumption of law that every killing is murder; and that the same court has said that if there is an equilibrium, including, I suppose, the presumption mentioned of evidence, the presumption of the defendant's innocence makes the preponderance in his favor. Whether a man is insane or not is a matter of fact. What degree of insanity will relieve him from responsibility is a matter of law, the jury finding the fact of the degree too. Under the instructions of the court murder can be only committed by a sane man. Everybody is presumed to be sane who is charged with a crime, but when evidence is adduced that a prisoner is insane, and conflicting testimony makes a question for the jury, they are to decide it like any other matter of fact; and if they should say or conclude that there is uncertainty, that they cannot determine whether the defendant was or is not so insane, as to protect him, how can they render a verdict that a sane man perpetrated the crime and that no other can?"

Nor is this plain view of the question unsupported by authority. In the case of Reg. v. Ley, in 1828, Lewin, Crown Cas. 239, on a preliminary trial to ascertain whether a defendant was sufficiently sane to go before a petit jury on an indictment, Hullock, B., said to the jury: "If there be a doubt as to the prisoner's sanity, and the surgeon says it is doubtful, you cannot say he is in a fit state to be put on trial." This opinion was approved in Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9. This is a strong case, for the witness did not say the prisoner was insane, but only that it was doubtful whether it was so or not. The humane, and I will add, just doctrine, that a reasonable doubt should avail a prisoner, belongs to a defence of insanity, as much, in my opinion, as to any other matter of fact.

I believe, gentlemen, that that answers all the questions.

On the completion of the judge's charge the indictment was handed to the jury. The jury retired, and after an absence of a little over an hour they entered the court, and their finding as stated by their foreman was "not guilty," whereupon the court ordered the prisoner discharged from custody.

Case No. 16,288.

UNITED STATES ex rel. HEWETT et al. v. SILVERMAN.

Circuit Court, E. D. Arkansas. 1878.

MANDAMUS TO LEVY TAXES — JUDGMENTS AGAINST MUNICIPALITIES — INTERFERENCE BY STATE COURTS—CONTEMPTS.

1. The execution of writs of mandamus issued by the circuit court of the United States cannot be interfered with by the process or judgments of the courts of the state, and such interference is illegal and void.

[Cited in U. S. v. Jefferson Co., Case No. 15,472; Hill v. Scotland Co. Ct., 32 Fed. 717.]

2. The relators obtained in this court a judgment against a county, and a peremptory writ of mandamus issued commanding the respondent, as county judge, to levy a tax to pay such judgment. He obeyed. Subsequently the state court, in a proceeding to which the relators were not parties, set aside the order for the tax levied by the respondent in obedience to the mandamus, and directed the respondent to enter an order on his records annulling the levy of the tax. The respondent obeyed. At the relator's instance a rule issued against the respondent to show cause why he should not be attached for contempt: Held, that he was in contempt, and liable to be punished therefor.

3. The order made in the case is given at the end of the opinion.

A rule was issued against the respondent [Frank Silverman], the county judge of Jefferson county, Arkansas, at the instance of the relators [Hewett and Cooper], to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. Shortly, the facts are these: Hewett recovered judgment in this court against Jefferson county. The county did not appeal from that judgment. Hewett assigned part of the judgment to Cooper. This court awarded a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the county authorities to levy a tax to pay the judgment. The tax was levied and afterward set aside, under the circumstances hereinafter stated. On a showing that the peremptory writ had not been obeyed, a rule was issued by this court against the county judge of Jefferson county, the Hon. Frank Silverman, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt in not obeying the writ of mandamus directed to him by this court. He set up in his defence that he obeyed certain orders of the state court hereinafter referred to, and disclaimed any intention to disobey the mandates of this court. The respondent, after the service of the rule upon him, entered an order setting aside the order vacating the levy, and restoring the levy made under the writ of mandamus.

The following opinion, orally given, accompanied the order of the court made in the premises.

Mr. Brown, for relators.
Mr. Yonley, for respondent.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and CALDWELL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge (orally). The county officers, on the alternative writ which issued, had full opportunity to be heard against the demands that were made against them. No sufficient reason was shown by the county or its officers why the peremptory writ of mandamus should not issue, and the court adjudged that it ought to be awarded. If the court erred in originally rendering the judgment, the county had a remedy on writ of error in the supreme court of the United States. So, if this court erred in the proceedings had on the alternative writ, or in granting the peremptory writ, the county had its remedy by taking a writ of error to the supreme court of the United States; but its officers pursued no such course, and therefore they should have rendered obedience to the peremptory writ.

The peremptory writ was directed to Frank Silverman, county judge, and Craig and others, justices of the peace, composing the county court of Jefferson county. It commanded them "to meet and convene together at the court-house in the town of Pine Bluff, in said county, upon the day fixed by law for levying taxes for county purposes for the year 1877, then and there to organize, open, and hold a county court of said county, and to levy the tax of five mills on the dollar of all the taxable property of said county, provided for by the constitution of the state of Arkansas, for the payment of indebtedness contracted and created before and existing at the time of the ratification of this constitution, payable only in United States currency, and cause the same to be collected at the same time and in the same manner that other county taxes are directed by law to be collected, and to cause the proceeds of the said tax, as soon as collected, to be paid into the registry of our said circuit court, for the payment and satisfaction of the said judgment, interest, and costs."

It appears that this writ was duly served, and that, in pursuance of this command, they did meet and levy the tax which the writ commanded them to cause to be levied. Afterwards, at the instance of certain taxpayers of that county, a proceeding upon certiorari was instituted to have the order of the county court made in obedience to this writ reviewed by the circuit court of the county; and that proceeding was begun and carried on in the local court without any notice being given to the relators or parties interested in the judgment, and in that proceeding the state circuit court undertook to annul the order of the county court made in obedience to the command of this court, and certified its action to the county court in that regard. When that action was certified to the county court, commanding that court to enter an order annulling its prior levy of taxes, the county court obeyed and caused that order to be made. The tax had been extended on the tax books of the county, and the warrant for collection was in the hands of the sheriff, who, by the statutes of this state, is ex-officio collector. When it was known in the community that the circuit court of the county had made such order, the collector makes return (in obedience to a rule issued upon him) that, although he demanded the tax, he was unable to collect it; that the tax-payers refused to pay it, and so, practically, the command contained in the writ we issued has been of no avail.

In the state of Iowa, some years since, we had a conflict between the state and federal judicial tribunals concerning the validity of bonds issued by municipalities to aid in the construction of railroads. The supreme court of that state held that those bonds were unconstitutional, having, however, previously decided otherwise; and under the first decision a large number of such bonds had been issued. The state supreme court afterwards changed their judgment, and held the bonds to be invalid, and proceedings were begun by tax-payers in the courts of that state to enjoin the counties from levying any tax to pay judgments rendered in the federal courts on municipal bonds.

The leading case in the supreme court of the United States upon this subject, which is well known to the profession, is the case of Riggs v. Johnson Co., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 166. The case is not so strong for the relators as the one now at the bar, because in that case the injunction from the state court against the officers of Johnson county was issued before the writ of mandamus was issued by the federal court. The following is a correct synopsis of the point ruled in that case: "After a return unsatisfied of an execution on a judgment in a circuit court of the United States against a county for interest on railroad bonds, issued under a state statute in force prior to the issue of the bonds, and which made the levy of a tax to pay such interest obligatory on the county, a mandamus from the circuit court of the United States will lie against the county officers to levy a tax, even although prior to the application for the mandamus a state court has perpetually enjoined the same officers against making such levy; the mandamus, when so issued, being regarded as a writ necessary to the jurisdiction of the federal court which had previously attached, and to enforce its judgments, and the state court, therefore, not being regarded as in prior possession of the case."

Now, the state officers in the state of Iowa supposed they were between two fires. First, the state court enjoined them from levying the tax, and a subsequent mandamus from the federal court commanded them to levy precisely the same tax which the writ of the state court forbade. If they obeyed the mandamus of the federal court, and levied the tax, the state court would, they said, arrest them for contempt of its writ and punish them. If they disregarded the command of the writ of mandamus, the federal court would attach them for contempt and punish them. Now, what was to be done?

It was this dilemma the county judge, in the case at bar, said he supposed he was in: "I am subject to two commands; the federal court commands the levying of this tax, and the circuit court for the county has commanded me to annul the levy." He obeyed the orders of the local court, and in so doing he simply obeyed the wrong tribunal.

The subject is very fully considered by the supreme court of the United States in the above mentioned case of Riggs v. Johnson Co. It would consume too much time to refer to it at length; but the effect of it is, that in judgments rendered in this class of cases the writ of mandamus is a writ necessary to enforce the judgment, and that judgment can no more be interfered with by the state courts than they can undertake to interfere with an ordinary writ of execution in the hands of the marshal of this court, nor can the state court any more interfere than the federal court could interfere with their judgments or process. It is a rule that one court shall not interfere with the processes of the other, and when this rule is observed harmony exists in both, and there can be no conflict.

Such is the law of the land, as declared by the highest tribunal of the country, and all courts, federal and state, must accept it and yield obedience to it. It is so understood in this state, for I have before me an opinion of the supreme court of Arkansas, delivered by the present distinguished chief justice, in which he considers this subject. Vance v. City of Little Rock, 30 Ark. 435, 452. Speaking on this point, Chief Justice English says: "We cannot undertake to say that the circuit court of the United States had not jurisdiction to award the mandamus, nor that in exercising its jurisdiction it committed an error, for this court has no appellate jurisdiction over that court. The city had the right to appeal from its judgment awarding the mandamus to the supreme court of the United States, and failing to do this, no complaint it can make to us of the effect of the judgment awarding the writ can be made of any avail."

That is the true doctrine, and it is the one recognized alike by the supreme court of the state and the supreme court of the United States. The effect of this is, that the action of the circuit court of Jefferson county, and the action of the county court in pursuance thereof, were nullities. The county judge has been examined on oath, and he disclaims any intention to disregard the mandate of this court, but he has made a mistake which may result to the prejudice of the relator's interests. We will reserve any further action against the county judge, in order to see whether his action shall in the end result injuriously to the parties.

CALDWELL, District Judge, concurs in the foregoing views, and in the following order:

"It is now ordered that the said rule against said Silverman be reserved for the further action of the court, and that John M. Clayton, sheriff and ex-officio collector of said county, do proceed to collect the taxes levied to pay the relator's judgment the same as if the said certiorari proceedings had not been had, and the judgment and orders of the circuit court, and of the county court setting aside said levy, had not been made. The said collector will collect the said tax as other delinquent taxes are collected, but without penalty upon all such taxes which may be paid before the day when, by law, he is required to advertise real estate for sale for such delinquent tax. It is further ordered that a duly certified copy of this order shall forthwith be served by the marshal on said collector."

NEW TRIAL—DELAY OF APPLICATION.

After the conviction of a defendant, he moved in arrest of judgment, and the case went to the supreme court on a certificate of a division of opinion. After a decision by that court, the defendant moved in this court for a new trial: Held, that it was too late to make such a motion.

[This was an indictment against Stephen J. Simmons charging the violation of certain provisions of an act of congress relating to distilled spirits. Heard on a motion for a new trial.]

Asa W. Tenney, U. S. Dist. Atty.

John J. Allen, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The defendant was tried and convicted in May, 1875. There is no minute of any motion for a new trial having been then entered. A motion in arrest of judgment was made, which was argued and re-argued, and, a difference of opinion having arisen, the case went to the supreme court of the United States, upon a certificate of division. The decision of the appellate court having been made during the present month [96 U. S. 360], the defendant now applies to have a day fixed for the hearing of a motion for a new trial. The application comes too late. If any objection was intended to be made to the verdict, a motion for a new trial should have been promptly made. No reason for the delay has been suggested, and, to permit such a motion to be now made, after the lapse of three years, and where, as may well be supposed, the witnesses are scattered, would be highly improper. Ordinarily, it is too late, after a motion in arrest of judgment has been made, to apply for a new trial; and, although, when a motion for a new trial and a motion in arrest of judgment have been entered simultaneously, and the latter is first argued, by direction of the court, the former may be thereafter argued, yet, in a case like this, when the question of a new trial is, for the first time, raised after the decision upon the motion in arrest, it cannot be entertained. The motion is, therefore, denied.

INTERNAL REVENUE—"PRODUCE BROKER."

One whose occupation is to sell agricultural produce in public market, is not exempted from the tax imposed by the internal revenue law of 1866 [14 Stat. 98], upon "produce brokers," by the fact that the produce sold is not purchased by him for sale, nor sold as agent for another, but is raised by himself upon his farm.

Trial of an indictment. The defendant, Charles Simons, was indicted for carrying on business as a produce broker, without paying the special tax required by the internal revenue laws. The evidence upon the trial showed that the defendant owned a piece of land in the vicinity of the city of Williamsport, on which he raised vegetables; and he was accustomed to dispose of these vegetables on the regular market days, in the markets of the city.

[2] [Reported by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 5 Am. Law Rev. 187, contains only a partial report.]

H. B. Swope, Dist. Atty., for the government, contended that there were only two ways in which the defendant could dispose of his produce without paying tax—one by selling it at the place of production, and the other by hawking it in the manner of a pedlar; and that when he entered the market place regularly and competed with other dealers who were compelled to pay tax, he made himself equally liable.

Allen & Bartles, for defendant, contended that the defendant had the right to dispose of produce raised by himself, on his own land, without payment of any tax.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. The courts of the United States are tribunals which were created by the constitution to stand between the government and the people. Whilst we see that the laws are enforced, we must take care that the citizen is not oppressed. The decisions of the several departments at Washington are entitled to great respect, but they can not and do not control the judgment of our courts. Otherwise we would not be, as we are designed to be, an independent branch of the government, wholly irresponsible for the soundness of our decrees, to either congress or the executive. In this matter of taxation, which has annoyed the world from the days of the tribute to, and the image and superscription of Cæsar, and which is always a source of discontent, in protecting the people we must preserve the faith of the nation. To re-establish the Union and place it upon a permanent basis, we have contracted a large public debt, the principal and interest of which must be paid to the uttermost farthing. Anything else would be derogatory to our personal integrity, and disgrace us in the face of all nations. Every citizen, therefore, is bound to contribute to the common fund, and his omission or refusal to do so inflicts an injury upon his fellow citizens, and upon the government to which he is indebted for the protection of his life, liberty, and property.

Before announcing the conclusion at which I have arrived, I have thought it proper to make these preliminary observations, because there is a large class of people who think they are or should be exempt from the onerous burden which is laid upon us all.

Simons is indicted for carrying on the business of a produce broker without having paid the special tax. Nothing criminal, in the ordinary sense of the term, is attributed to him. The proceeding against him is designed as a test case to ascertain whether, in the exercise of his occupation as a market gardener, he is liable to its payment.

We think he is. The evidence shows that he is the owner of forty acres of ground on Lycoming creek, in the vicinity of this city, which he cultivates in raising vegetables; that, except in December and January, he attends the market of Williamsport with his horses and wagon, backs up at the curbstone at different points on Market and Third streets, erects a temporary stand at the tail of his wagon, and there, twice a week, on the days fixed by an ordinance of the city as market days, sells the products of his garden.

It has been contended, with much ability, that he does not come within the category of produce broker. At one time in the consideration of this case I was inclined to concur with the learned counsel for the defense, and designed to request a further argument from the able district-attorney, but am now clear that the defense is not tenable.

If the question depended upon the common acceptation of the word "broker," the argument for the defendant would be sound, for a broker is a middle man, an intervenor between the buyer and seller, a factor or agent who contracts for the one or the other.

We have exchange brokers, stock brokers, pawnbrokers, and insurance brokers, who negotiate between vendor and vendee; and as Simons sells his own products, he could not very well be called a broker. But congress has not left it to the courts to define what the word "broker" means. They have given us a legislative definition by which we are bound.

In section 79 of the act of 1866, they say that a "produce broker" is a person "whose occupation it is to buy or sell agricultural or farm products." If he buys or sells, whether he does it for himself or for another, he is to be "regarded," in the language of the act, as a "produce broker." Congress might have used a better term, but all refinement upon the words is at an end in the face of this definition. It was doubtless the design to exempt, as far as practicable, the agricultural portion of the community from burdensome taxation; but as almost every person and everything is necessarily subject to taxation, there was no good reason why the producer, who brings his articles to market and comes in competition with merchants, or those who only buy and sell, should be so highly favored. If he sells from his farm or his garden he pays nothing, but if he acts in the capacity of a merchant or dealer, he must pay a tax upon that occupation. That is but just to his fellow tax-payers, and he ought not to complain of the government which exacts it.

But there is still another reason why I consider this the true construction of the statute. Farmers and gardeners are exempt from taxation as pedlars; that is, they may go from house to house in town or country and sell their produce without paying a special tax. They are also exempt as "manufacturers or producers." Here the maxim "expressio unius est exclusio alterius" applies. If congress intended that they should not be included in the class of produce brokers they would have said so. If they pursue any other occupation than that of tilling the soil, and selling directly from their farms or gardens, they incur the liability of the additional employment, and I think properly so.

All this is a case of the first impression, no published opinion of my brethren of the bench having yet appeared; as it involves large interests to both the government and the people, I have given to it careful consideration, and the more I reflect upon it the better I am satisfied the decision is right.

Your verdict should be against the defendant.

The jury immediately returned a verdict of "guilty in manner and form, &c. &c.," whereupon the defendant was sentenced to pay a fine of ten dollars, the special tax for two years, twenty dollars, and the costs.

UNITED STATES v. SINGER et al.

[2 Biss. 226;[1] 18 Pittsb. Leg. J. 5; 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 98, 209; 3 Chi. Leg. News, 81.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan., 1870.[2]

BONDS AND TAXES OF DISTILLERS — RETURNS OF PRODUCTION—LIABILITY OF SURETIES.

1. The 20th section of the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 133], cannot be construed as authorizing the collection of a tax on spirits which have never been actually produced.

2. A distiller is not bound to return more spirits than he has produced. If his return is less than eighty per cent. of the producing capacity of the distillery, the assessor should assess him for the deficiency, but to the claim for a tax on such alleged deficiency, the fact that such deficiency does not exist is a sufficient answer.

[Cited in U. S. v. Bicket, Case No. 14,590.]

3. The sureties on distillers' bonds, executed previous to the act of March 29, 1869 [16 Stat. 52], are not liable to reimburse to the United States the expenses and salaries charged against distillers in said act.

4. Sureties are not liable for the performance by their principal of duties not within the scope of the particular office, and which they cannot be supposed to have contemplated at the time they executed the bond.

This was a demurrer to pleas filed by the defendants [Jacob Singer and others] in an action by the United States on a distiller's bond, and also a demurrer to one of the breaches alleged in the declaration.

J. O. Glover, U. S. Dist. Atty.

George A. Meech, for defendants.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. In this case the facts are, that Singer & Bickerdike as principals, and the other defendants as sureties, gave a bond on the 18th of January, 1869, to the United States in the penal sum of ninety-two thousand dollars, with the condition that as Singer & Bickerdike on and after that day intended to be engaged in the business of distillers, they should in all respects faithfully comply with all the provisions of law in relation to the duties and business of distillers, and pay all penalties incurred or fines imposed on them for a violation of any of the said provisions.

The declaration alleges several breaches on this bond. The first is that Singer & Bickerdike made return of the amount of spirits that they had manufactured during the month of November, 1868, and that the quantity was less than eighty per cent. of the producing capacity of their distillery as estimated under the provisions of the internal revenue law, and that on the 10th of February, 1869, the assessor made an assessment against them for the deficiency, viz. $26,089.60, which they have not paid.

To this breach the defendants have pleaded what is termed the third amended plea, and which declares that Singer & Bickerdike made return to the assessor of all the highwines and spirits produced at their distillery during the month of November, 1868, and that an assessment was made against them for the full amount of tax on the same, and that the amount so assessed has been paid, and that no other highwines or spirits were produced at their distillery during the month of November, 1868, than what were so returned.

To this plea there is a demurrer by the plaintiffs. The declaration also contains an additional breach or count, to the effect that one Davis, an internal revenue storekeeper, was appointed by the secretary of the treasury and assigned to the distillery of Singer & Bickerdike at a salary of five dollars a day from March 4 to March 25, 1869, inclusive, thereby becoming entitled to $110 as such storekeeper, and which amount has been paid by the plaintiffs, and thereupon it became the duty of Singer & Bickerdike to reimburse to the plaintiffs this amount, but to do this they have failed.

To this breach there is a demurrer by the defendants. The first question turns upon the validity of the plea, and consequently upon the true construction of the 20th section of the act of congress of July 20, 1868. That section declares that the assessor, in order to determine whether all the spirits produced in a distillery have been returned, shall ascertain the whole quantity of materials used for the production—"and forty-five gallons of mash or beer brewed or fermented from grain, shall represent not less that one bushel of grain, and seven gallons of mash or beer brewed or fermented from molasses, shall represent not less than one gallon of molasses. If the return is less than the quantity thus ascertained, the distiller or other person shall be assessed for the deficiency, * * * and the collector shall proceed to collect the same as in cases of other assessments for deficiencies." Now, it will be observed that the language of the section as referred to above seems to proceed on the basis that it has given a mode of ascertaining the quantity of spirits produced, by declaring that forty-five gallons of mash shall represent one bushel of grain, under the implication that when the number of bushels of grain is known, the quantity of spirits produced is exactly ascertained, an implication contrary to the fact, as is well understood by all practical distillers. If the section had arbitrarily declared how much spirits one bushel of grain should represent, then this part of the difficulty would be removed. The section concludes with this provision: "But in no case shall the quantity of spirits returned by the distiller, together with the quantity so assessed, be for a less quantity of spirits than eighty per centum of the producing capacity of the distillery as estimated under the provisions of this act."

This 20th section appears to have been framed for the purpose of prescribing a method of ascertaining the product of the distillery, or to impose a tax on its capacity as such, or to unite both, and thus if the distiller should in fact produce eighty per cent., then it was to be a tax on the product; and if less, on the capacity.

In order to determine which of these is the true meaning of this section, the facts of this case should not be forgotten. It has been conceded in the argument by the district attorney that, so far as is known and believed by the officers of the government, the distillers in this case returned all the spirits they manufactured in the month of November, 1868, and that the assessment in controversy was made upon a quantity of spirits that never existed.

In examining the act of July 20, 1868, the inquiry naturally arises—what was its object as to distilled spirits. It is entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes." The first section declares what tax shall be levied and collected on distilled spirits, and the following sections contain various provisions for ascertaining and securing the payment of the tax. The tenth section designates in what manner the true producing capacity of each distillery shall be determined, and how errors in such estimate shall be corrected. The thirteenth section imposes a daily tax upon the distiller in proportion to the capacity of his distillery for mashing and fermenting grain, etc.

The 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th and 19th sections contain various and minute directions as to the construction of buildings and machinery, and the mode of manufacture, in addition to those previously prescribed, and the main object of which appears to be to guard against dishonest practices by the distiller. Besides all this, the distiller or principal manager is to make his return three times a month, under oath, stating the quantity and kind of materials used for the production of spirits each day, and the number of wine gallons and of proof gallons of spirits produced, and he is bound to include all, because he must asseverate there was no more used or produced. After this follows the 20th section, the substance of which has been already stated, and numerous others, all of the same general purport up to the 59th, which imposes an annual special tax upon distillers in proportion, not to the capacity, but to the actual product of the distillery.

If it were the purpose of the law to assess also a tax upon the capacity alone of a distillery as representing its actual product, and in this way tax the supposed product itself, and if it be true that such a tax is something else than an assessment upon the distillery and machinery, merely because they possess a certain property or quality, then it is singular that such multifarious and complicated provisions were considered necessary to ascertain and collect the amount. If the producing capacity of a distillery is known—as so many gallons a day—then it is a simple thing to say it shall pay fifty cents as a tax on every gallon it is capable of producing; and the complex and expensive arrangements and safeguards to prevent fraud, thrown around the manufacture of distilled spirits, could be dispensed with at once. The object of so much legislation must have been to ascertain the product, and thus compel the payment of a tax on the whole of the article manufactured. Such a tax may be said to be just, as having something on which to operate, whereas a tax on the producing capacity of a distillery, if it be not a tax on the distillery itself, is often on a mere imaginary thing. It is like the attempt to tax an income where there is none.

If we examine the language of the 20th section in connection with that part of the 19th section already referred to, this view of the law will be strengthened. The distiller must return the whole of the spirits manufactured, under oath, but in no case shall the quantity returned be less than eighty per cent. of the producing capacity of the distillery, so that literally, if the distillery has produced less than eighty per cent., which is alleged to be the fact in this case, then the distiller is required to make a false return and swear to it. This certainly cannot be the meaning of this section, because a previous part of the section, after assuming—contrary to the fact—that a test of quantity had been given, directs an assessment to be made if the quantity returned shall be less than that thus ascertained.

The only construction that can be given to this section, consistent with reason and the general scope and purpose of the law, in my opinion, is. if the return is not equal to eighty per cent. of the producing capacity of the distillery, the assessor shall assume that it ought to have been, and the distiller shall then be assessed on that basis, as a method of discovering the actual product. It could not have been intended the distiller should return what he had not produced, nor that he should pay a tax on nothing. My conclusion is that the object of this section of the law is accomplished when the distiller has paid the proper tax on all the spirits he has manufactured. The letter of the section seems to be framed on a certain theory, but it is not possible, even for an act of congress, to make a bushel of grain produce more spirits than nature has supplied and science and skill can extract. One bushel of grain is not always precisely like another, nor is distilling always carried on under precisely the same circumstances, nor with precisely similar machinery and appliances of manufacture. And if a distillery has run part of a month and it is accidentally destroyed by fire or otherwise, is the letter of the statute still to be followed and an assessment of eighty per cent. made and enforced for the whole month, when the product may have become impossible? And if not, why not? Such is a case in actual controversy in this court.

Admitting then it may have the effect of compelling the distiller to establish, when he has not returned eighty per cent. of the producing capacity of his distillery, that it was because the distillery did not produce it, I must hold, when that is done, it is an answer to the claim set up under this section for an alleged deficiency—the fact then being the deficiency does not exist. My attention has been called to the Case of Dutcher [Case No. 15,014], in this court as having some bearing on this case; but the point decided there was different from that which the government seeks to establish here against the distiller. That was where a bond had been given under the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 98], on the removal of certain highwines from one bonded warehouse to another, and where the quantity of wines was ascertained by government inspection, when delivered at the one warehouse to the owner, and received at the other from him. The highwines were delivered to the owner on condition that he would agree to pay the tax on the difference between the number of gallons as delivered and as received, less certain allowances. In that case the government held the highwines for the tax. It parted with them on a particular guaranty voluntarily entered into by the owner. The court held that he was bound by the terms of his contract, though it operated with some hardship in that instance. If it were clear that the intent of this 20th section of the act of 1868 was that the distiller should pay a tax on what his distillery did not manufacture, then, however unjust or oppressive such a provision might be, it could not be disregarded by the courts unless, indeed, on the ground that congress could not impose such a tax, which point need not now be considered. In conclusion, on this part of the case, it must be said once more that if the position of the government is correct, that the law intended to levy and collect a tax of fifty cents on every gallon of distilled spirits that a distillery was capable of producing, without regard to the fact that it was ever actually manufactured, it is to be regretted the meaning was not more clearly expressed. It was only necessary to determine the producing capacity of the distillery, and the beginning and end of its operations, and the thing was done. Instead of which we have a series of restrictions and impositions, and a system of inquisition and espionage upon distilling—admitted by the act to be a lawful occupation—which if extended to all other kinds of business, would make the collection of taxes odious and oppressive and indeed well nigh intolerable.

Nothing has been said, because the question was not made in the argument, of the application of this bond to an alleged omission of duty on the part of the principals at a time prior to the execution of the bond, a point perhaps by no means free from difficulty as affecting the sureties, whatever may be its bearing on the principals.

Neither has any stress been placed on what is said to be true, that the commissioner of internal revenue, on being satisfied in some other cases that all the spirits manufactured were returned and the tax paid thereon, directed that the assessments should not be enforced, because the question really is whether it is a matter of discretion with the commissioner or of right upon the part of the distiller The demurrer to the third amended plea will therefore be overruled.

The second question arises on the demurrer of the defendants to the second breach in the declaration. The law in force at the time this bond was executed (section 52, Act July 20, 1868) required that the United States should pay the internal revenue storekeeper, and in conformity therewith, Davis, the storekeeper in this case, was paid by the government the sum of $110, being at the rate of five dollars a day while employed and assigned to the warehouse of Singer & Bickerdike, and all of which was after the execution of the bond in this case. On the 29th of March, 1869, congress passed a joint resolution directing that certain items omitted in the enrollment of the appropriation act of March 3d, 1869 [15 Stat. 301], were to be added as amendments thereto, among which was this proviso: "That after the passage of this act the proprietors of all internal revenue bonded warehouses, shall reimburse to the United States the expenses and salary of all storekeepers or other officers in charge of such warehouses, and the same shall be paid into the treasury and be accounted for like other public moneys."

It will be seen, therefore, that Singer & Bickerdike by this were required to repay to the United States what the latter had paid to Davis, and the question is—to say nothing about its effect on the principals—whether the sureties are liable by such an ex post facto resolution of congress operating upon the condition of this bond, executed the 18th of January previous, in such a way as to give it validity against them. I think they are not. It is a matter of grave doubt whether this bond stands on the same footing as an official bond; but conceding that to be so, what is the true rule on the subject?

One of the best considered cases to which the attention of the court has been directed, is that of Governor of Illinois v. Ridgway, 12 Ill. 14, where the supreme court of Illinois discusses and decides upon the effect of subsequent legislation on the liability of sureties to official bonds, and where this rule is stated. The sureties of an officer on his official bond are liable for the faithful performance of all duties imposed on him, whether by laws previous or subsequent to the execution of the bond, if they properly belong to and are within the scope of the particular office, and not for those unconnected with it and which cannot be supposed to have been contemplated by the parties at the time they executed the bond.

Some such principle as this must be adopted or the contract of a surety, instead of being construed strictly, as confessedly it should be, is extended so as to include obligations that he never assumed. Can it be fairly said to have been within the contemplation of the sureties in this case, that their principals would be required to refund money which the government by existing law, if a storekeeper was employed and assigned, was obliged to pay, and that thus they were to be held accountable for such an act done and default made after they signed the bond?

If this be so, where is the limit to the responsibility which may in this manner be cast upon a surety to an official bond? The contract of a surety is secondary. He is bound for the acts of his principal and not his own, and if it be true, that for what is fairly within the contemplation of the parties, though ex post facto, he is bound, yet if we go beyond that, it would seem to violate the fundamental principles of the contract of the surety.

If the rule insisted on by the government in this case is maintainable, it is difficult to see why the sureties to this bond could not in the same manner and by equivalent legislation be made to reimburse the United States for the whole expense of collecting every dollar of tax paid on distilled spirits by their principals.

The decisions of the courts of the United States, which are collected and cited by Mr. Brightly in his "Federal Digest," 822, upon the contracts of sureties, are in conformity with the opinion here given.

The demurrer to the second breach will therefore be sustained.

[Judgment having been given for defendants, a writ of error was sued out from the supreme court. The judgment of this court was reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, with leave to the defendants to plead anew to the first count of the declaration. 15 Wall. (82 U. S.) 111.]

This was a libel of information, filed against certain distilled spirits as forfeited, under the 45th section of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 163), which provides, that "all distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law on the same not having been paid, shall be forfeited; * * * and the burden of proof shall be upon the claimant of said spirits, to show that the requirements of law in regard to the same have been complied with." The evidence, about which there was no controversy, showed, that the spirits in question were found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, being, at the time of seizure, in process of delivery by a rectifier in New York to a buyer in Brooklyn. The rectifier was called as a witness, and testified that the spirits were rectified by him; that he bought two barrels of raw spirits from a broker, which purported to have been distilled in Brooklyn and to have paid the tax; that he mingled with these two, four other barrels, which he had bought of other rectifiers as rectified spirits, and re-rectified the whole; and that he was selling the product at a price less than the cost of manufacture with the tax. No offer was made to show that the tax on any of the spirits had been paid, nor was any effort made to explain how any of it had been removed from the bonded warehouse. The barrels were all marked "Rectified," with the name and place of business of the rectifier, as required by section 26 of the act, and were marked "Inspected by F. A. Stevens, Government Inspector, May, 1867." At the trial, upon the close of the testimony, the court was asked to direct a verdict in favor of the claimant, upon two grounds—First, that no probable cause of seizure was shown by the government, other than the fact that the spirits were found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, and that, in the absence of other proof, the claimant was not called on to prove anything; second, that, assuming that the burden of proof was upon the claimant, he was entitled to judgment, having shown that the spirits, being rectified spirits, were marked and branded as required by sections 26 and 43. On the other hand, it was asked that a verdict be entered for the government, under the construction given to the 45th section by Mr. Justice Nelson, in the case of U. S. v. 508 Barrels of Distilled Spirits [Case No. 15,113], inasmuch as no evidence was offered to show that the spirits had been removed from the bonded warehouse according to law, upon payment of the tax.

Benjamin F. Tracy, U. S. Dist. Atty.

William H. Hollis, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. I consider the various propositions of law involved in this case to have been disposed of by the decision in the case of U. S. v. 508 Barrels of Distilled Spirits [Case No. 15,113]. Under the law, all distilled spirits must go into a bonded warehouse, whence they can be withdrawn only for certain purposes and in certain specified ways. They can be withdrawn for export, upon certain bonds; for transportation to another collection district, upon being duly gauged, inspected and marked, and a bond given for their transportation; for re-distillation or rectification, when they must be restored to the same warehouse from which they were taken; and, lastly, upon payment of the tax. The Case of the 508 Barrels was a case of spirits purporting to have been removed for transportation from Illinois to the Third district of New York, which were found in the Third district of New York; out of a bonded warehouse; and, on that evidence, it was held, that the burden was upon the claimant to show that the requirements of the law, to enable spirits to be removed from the bonded warehouse for transportation, had been complied with, and proof that the barrels had upon them brands purporting to be the inspector's brands, and the possession of a permit from the collector, were held insufficient. The present case is one of rectified spirits, found in the street, in process of sale by a rectifier as free of tax. They cannot legally be in that position without having been removed from the bonded warehouse upon the payment of the tax. It differs from the Case of the 508 Barrels only in that the spirits purport to be rectified spirits, removed from a bonded warehouse upon the payment of the tax, instead of being spirits removed for transportation upon bonds. It is conceded by the claimant, that the 45th section applies to both rectified and raw spirits; and as, in the Case of the 508 Barrels, which purported to have been removed on bonds, proof from the claimant of the giving of the bonds was required, so, in the case of spirits purporting to have been removed on payment of the tax, proof must be given that the tax was paid. The words, "requirements of law in regard to the same," as used in the 45th section, refer to the particulars specified previously in the section, as entailing a forfeiture, that is, removal from the bonded warehouse according to law and payment of the tax, where that is necessary to a removal in the manner in which these spirits purport to have been removed. It was earnestly contended, that such a construction of the law would require an impossibility and cause a total cessation of trade. The law so construed, if enforced with reasonable diligence, will undoubtedly hamper the trade in fraudulent spirits; but it is not seen that it will require impossibilities of persons who desire to obey the law. Care and caution will undoubtedly be required of rectifiers and of dealers, and trade in the article will not be wholly free from embarrassment. But such is the necessary effect of every revenue law.

This case being in the circuit court, and the question of law involved an important one,

I have thought it proper to submit this opinion to Mr. Justice NELSON, and am authorized to say that he concurs in the views here expressed. A verdict in favor of the government must, accordingly, be entered, condemning the goods.

Case No. 16,295.

UNITED STATES v. SIX BOXES OF ARMS.

[1 Bond, 446.] [1]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. June Term, 1861.

REBELLION — SUSPENSION OF COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE—CONTRABAND GOODS—ARMS AND MUNITIONS.

1. By the law of nations where a war exists between two distinct and independent powers, there must be a suspension of all commercial intercourse between their citizens; but this principle has not been applied to the states which joined the so-called "Southern Confederacy."

2. The destination of arms and munitions of war, and the use intended to be made thereof, at the time of seizure, must furnish a test of their status as contraband or otherwise.

Flamen Ball, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Lincoln, Smith & Warnock, for claimants.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). This is an information filed by the district attorney in behalf of the United States, praying for the condemnation and forfeiture of certain property as contraband of war. The information avers, in substance, that six boxes containing guns and other munitions of war, were shipped from the port of Baltimore on May 10, 1861, to Little Rock, in the state of Arkansas; that on the 27th of April last, and ever since, that state, with others, was, and has been, in a state of insurrection, rebellion, and war; and that the ports and places within the same have been declared by the proclamations of the president of the United States under blockade; and that the property specified in the libel was shipped to the state of Arkansas in violation of the blockade and the laws of the United States, and is legally subject to forfeiture as contraband of war. The property has been seized by and is now in the custody of the marshal, under the process of this court. William J. Syms and Samuel R. Syms, doing business in, and being citizens of the city of New York, under the name of W. J. Syms & Brother, have intervened in the case, and have filed their answer, verified by oath, in which they allege in substance, that on the 15th day of February last, at the city of New York, they entered into a written contract with two individuals, as commissioners of the state of Arkansas, by which they agreed to furnish the articles named in the information at the prices stipulated, together with others not now in controversy of the same character; that pursuant to said agreement, the property was shipped, a part on the 3d and a part on the 9th of April last, from the port of New York, directed to their agent at Little Rock, in Arkansas, by way of Baltimore, and thence westward by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad; and that the articles now in question were taken on the 17th of April, without legal warranty or authority, by a number of citizens at Cincinnati, and a day or two afterwards were delivered to the chief of police of said city for safe-keeping, until the circumstances of the shipment could be legally investigated, and were retained by him until seized by the marshal. The claimants allege that they are loyal citizens of the United States, and that at the date of said shipment there was no blockade of the ports or places within the state of Arkansas, and that none has yet been formally proclaimed, and they deny that the property, either when shipped or seized, was liable to condemnation as contraband of war. They also aver that on the 15th of February, the date of the contract, and for two months subsequently, the state of Arkansas was reputed and believed to be in favor of the Union, and that a convention of the state had voted against secession. They further allege that it was not until about the 25th of April that there were any marked indications of the purpose of the state to secede, and that the act of secession did not pass until the 7th of May, and that about the 25th of April their agent in Arkansas repaired to Cincinnati, countermanded the order for shipment to that state, and ordered all the property not delivered to be returned to New York; and that the claimants thereupon made a contract with the Union defense committee of that city for the sale to them of such of the property as should be returned to that place.

The evidence offered by the claimants sustains the allegations of their answer, as to the sale and shipment of this property and its seizure and detention at Cincinnati. The testimony of George P. Williams, in behalf of the claimants, is before the court. He was the clerk of Lyons & Brother at the time of the contract made with the Arkansas commissioners, and identifies the property libeled as a part of that furnished by the claimants, and shipped by them from New York on the 3d and 9th of April. He proceeded to Arkansas in the early part of that month, to receive and deliver the property as the agent of the claimants. He traveled a good deal through the state, and swears that while the sentiment of the people in the southern part of the state was favorable to secession, in other parts they were for the Union; and that assurances were made to him that the state would not secede. He also states that it was not until after the information was received of the proclamations of the president, of the 15th and 19th of April, that there were any decisive indications of the purpose of seceding; and that on the 25th of April he left Arkansas, and proceeded to Cincinnati for the purpose of stopping all further shipments to Arkansas, and that such an order was given, and no further shipments were made. He also states that the claimants agreed to sell the property to the Union defense committee of New York, when it should be returned to that place. The testimony of the witnesses to the state of things in Arkansas, prior to the 25th of April, is sustained by other witnesses offered by the claimants.

On these facts, it is insisted by the district attorney that the articles seized are liable to forfeiture: first, as having been shipped in violation of the president's proclamation of blockade; and second, that the state of Arkansas was at war with the United States, and the property was, therefore, when seized, contraband of war.

The first of these positions is clearly not sustained. The state of Arkansas was not embraced in the proclamations of the president of the 19th and 27th of April [12 Stat. 1259, 1260], declaring the ports of the seceded states under blockade. The formal act of secession by the state of Arkansas, as before stated, did not take place until the 7th of May. Until after that date the president could not properly declare the blockade of her ports; and trade with her was not, therefore, interdicted on that ground. But the question still remains whether this property was subject to condemnation as contraband of war on general principles of national law. The affirmative of this principle is strenuously urged by the attorney for the government. Without attempting an extended investigation of this subject, I propose to state some of the reasons which lead me to the opposite conclusion. And in the first place I may remark that there is no question that, by the well-settled rule of the law of nations, where a war exists between two distinct and independent powers, there must necessarily be a suspension of all commercial intercourse between them. When two nations are arrayed in war against each other, every subject and citizen of the one is regarded and treated as the enemy of the other. But does this principle apply strictly to the so-called "Southern Confederacy," or to any of the individual states which have joined it? The president of the United States, in all his proclamations and public acts, has cautiously avoided the recognition of the Southern Confederacy, as an independent sovereignty, and has properly proceeded on the doctrine that the right of secession has no warrant in the constitution, and that the exercise of the right is simply a nullity; and when attempted to be sustained by arms, it places all who give aid or countenance to the movement in the attitude of rebels against the government. It results from this view, that every citizen of a seceding state is not necessarily to be regarded as an enemy, with whom all commercial intercourse is to be prohibited. The government of the United States has acted on the principle, in the case of western Virginia and eastern Tennessee, that the people of these sections, though within the geographical limits of seceded states, are to be viewed as loyal, and entitled to the sympathy and protection of the government.

But this view of the subject seems to have no practical application to the case before the court. At the time of the shipment of the property described in the libel, and at the time of its stoppage at Cincinnati, Arkansas had not seceded from the Union; nor does the evidence warrant the conclusion, that the state of things there was such as to render it probable she would take this course. In fact there were no indications of this until the assault upon and surrender of Fort Sumter had rendered it a political necessity, that the president should call on the states for a force sufficient to subdue the rebellion then palpably existing. This requisition was made on the 15th of April, and included Arkansas as a loyal state, and was followed on the 19th of that month, by a proclamation declaring the seceded states in a state of blockade These acts, in Arkansas as in other states, excited all the slumbering elements of secession, which in the case of that state culminated in the passage of the ordinance of the 7th of May.

There is, however, a view of the case before the court, which seems clearly to warrant the conclusion, that this property was in no sense contraband of war, when seized as such at Cincinnati. The destination and the use intended to be made of the property at the time of its seizure, must furnish the tests of its status, as contraband or otherwise. If there were grounds for the presumption of a disloyal motive in the sale and shipment of the property, no such presumption is warranted in regard to it, when taken by the marshal on the 23d of May. The evidence already referred to clearly establishes the fact, that the agent of the claimants, upon the first intimation of a probability that Arkansas might adopt the ordinance of secession, repaired to Cincinnati, and promptly directed that the property should not be sent according to its original destination, but should be forwarded to New York. It was not then in transitu to Arkansas, nor could it by possibility ever reach that state, as it was under an order for shipment for New York, to be there used in defense of the Union. In the light, then, of this fact, negativing, as it does, every presumption of a disloyal or unpatriotic purpose on the part of the claimants, I do not feel that I am justified in a decree, which not only forfeits the property in question, but would place a stigma on their reputation, which their conduct has not merited. And the view here stated is corroborated by the circulars of the secretary of the treasury of the 2d of May and the 12th of June. In both these papers, the secretary enjoins great vigilance on the part of collectors in preventing the shipment of contraband goods to seceded states, or where there is just reason to suppose they will be used by persons in rebellion against the government. If satisfied that the property is not intended to be used for any unlawful purpose, they are merely to notify the shipper or his agent of the fact and the cause of the detention. In the order of the 12th of June, this clause occurs: "If any such shipment, personally or by agent, shall satisfy you that the merchandise so arrested will not be sent to any place under insurrectionary control, but will be either returned whence it came, or be disposed of in good faith for consumption within loyal states, you will restore possession of the same, and allow such disposition to be made thereof, as the parties in interest may desire." Under this instruction, with the knowledge that the property of the claimants had been ordered to New York, the officer of the customs would have been fully justified in restoring it, without any further investigation.

The case, then, before the court is that of a loyal citizen of a loyal state, whose property has been libeled for condemnation, and who has availed himself of his legal right to assert his claim, and to show that there is nothing in the facts to warrant a decree of forfeiture. In making this remark, I am not to be understood as intimating that the public officer at whose instance the seizure was made, is in any decree censurable. So far from this, it is probable that under the circumstances supposed to exist, the institution of this proceeding was a proper act of official duty. And I do not see any ground on which a certificate of probable cause of seizure, if applied for, could be refused by the court. But this is a wholly different question from that involving the legal right to the property, and its liability to condemnation and forfeiture. There may be good reasons for the seizure of property; and yet upon a full investigation of the facts, no sufficient ground for holding that the owner has forfeited his right to it.

With these views, I can do no otherwise than decree in favor of the claimants, and order the restoration of the property to them.

Case No. 16,296.

UNITED STATES v. SIX FERMENTING TUBS.

[1 Abb. U. S. 268;[1] 8 Int. Rev. Rec. 9; 1 Am. L. T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 126; 7 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 751.]

District Court, D. Wisconsin. April Term, 1868.

PROSECUTIONS FOR FORFEITURES—LIMITATIONS OF TIME—INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS.

1. The defendant, in an information to enforce a forfeiture under the internal revenue laws, may take advantage of the fact that the prosecution was not instituted within the time limited by law for commencing it, under the general issue. He is not required to plead specially.

[See U. S. v. Twenty-Five Barrels of Alcohol, Case No. 16,562.]

2. In general, where an action for the recovery of a penalty or a proceeding to enforce a forfeiture is pending at the time of the repeal of the statute imposing such penalty or forfeiture, or is instituted afterwards, the repeal is a bar to the action or proceeding, unless the repealing act contains a saving clause.

3. The internal revenue act of 1866 [14 Stat. 98], in repealing the act of 1864 [13 Stat. 233], contains a saving clause (section 70) which operates to preserve and continue demands which vested, and proceedings which were commenced under the act of 1864.

Motion to set aside a verdict against the defendant in an information for a breach of the revenue laws. The information in this case was filed against certain apparatus used in the distillation of spirits, in violation of the internal revenue law. It charged that the violations of law relied upon as a ground of forfeiture took place between September 3, 1864, and March 1, 1866. [Claimant sold, and removed from his distillery for consumption and use, fifty thousand gallons of spirits by him manufactured and distilled, without first paying the duties required by law, and without having the spirits gauged and inspected, or the casks branded.][2] The claimant answered generally "that the said several articles and property seized did not, nor did any part thereof, become forfeited in the manner and form in the said information in that behalf alleged." Upon the trial of the issue, after evidence upon the question of forfeiture had been produced, the counsel for the claimant offered to prove that the facts relied upon to support the information were substantially brought to the knowledge of the collector and deputy collector of the district in the month of September, 1866, and a seizure of the same property in the distillery was then made, but was not prosecuted. The proof was offered for the purpose of taking advantage of the limitation prescribed in section 68 of the act of June 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 248), authorizing seizures. It provides "that such seizures shall be made within thirty days after the cause for the same shall have come to the knowledge of the collector, or deputy collector, and that proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall have been commenced by such collector within twenty days after the seizure thereof." The evidence was objected to on the part of the prosecution, as not responsive to the information, and not evidence under the answer. The objection was overruled, and evidence admitted. The evidence showed an investigation of the affairs of the claimant, by the collector of his district, and a seizure of the distillery in September, 1866;. a subsequent abandonment of that seizure; a further investigation by the collector, and a second seizure made in September, 1867, upon which the present information was filed within the twenty days allowed by law.

[A letter from the collector of the district to the commissioner of internal revenue, dated November 10, 1866, was read in evidence. It contained these statements: "The following facts have recently come to my knowledge in relation to the distillery of William Hodson, at Turtleville, in this district. From September, 1864, to February, 1866, Hodson made report of 25,200 gallons of spirits as having been manufactured and sold by him, upon which tax has been paid by him. It was suspected that his reports were not entirely reliable, and in May last Inspector Burpee commenced looking up facts, and as I believe has continued his investigation with diligence up to the present time. He ascertained that Hodson, by himself, or his sons, had made sales of distilled spirits at Janesville and Chicago to an amount considerably exceeding his report, and he thereupon wrote to United States Inspector H. F. Hopkins, of Illinois, to assist him in the matter and ascertain the amount of sales made by or through John H. Hodson, at Chicago. An examination showed that the amount of sales so made, between September, 1864, and February, 1866, was 96,000 gallons, being in excess of the amount 70,100 gallons. He ascertained further, that the distilled spirits were being or had been sent across the country from the distillery to Janesville at night fourteen miles, and that large quantities of spirits had been shipped from Janesville to Chicago by Charles W. Hodson, a son, to John R. Hodson, another son, under the head of sundries. Upon the above information Deputy Collector Capron accompanied by Inspector Burpee, and pretended revenue agent by the name of C. C. Cogswell, went to Turtleville on the 21st day of September last, and seized upon the distillery and its contents and surroundings, consisting of steam engines, boilers, &c. Ira P. Nye, special assistant assessor, being in charge of the same, was placed in charge of the property seized as keeper. Since then, Burpee has continued his investigations and reports to me that he has discovered the following facts in relation to the management of said distillery, which he says can be fully sustained by proof: 1,445 highwine casks have been ascertained to have been sent into the distillery, between the 3d day of September, '64 and the 27th of January, '66—1,345 were shipped by rail from Chicago, and 100 were manufactured for Hodson by Samuel Miller of Shopiere. Of those from Chicago, 598 were sent to Shopiere, in care of John R. Hodson, 100 were sent to Janesville to Wm. Hodson, and the balance to same place to Charles H. Hodson, and all of them were delivered to Hodson's teamsters and hauled away by him. 56,100 pounds of malt, sufficient to make 98,000 gallons of high wines have been shipped from Chicago to Shopiere, the station nearest the distillery, to John R. Hodson during the time above stated. I have no personal knowledge of the foregoing facts, but report them to you as I received them from Inspector Burpee. It seems that something should be done in the matter." The commissioner replied under date of November 16, 1866, acknowledging the receipt of the letter of the collector, "relating to the case of William Hodson, charged with making false returns of spirits distilled, whose distillery and property therewith were seized in September last by Deputy Collector Capron." The commissioner then instructs as to further proceedings. That seizure was abandoned, and in pursuance of instructions from the commissioner, the assessor of the district, with the aid of Inspector Burpee, made enquiry into the returns of Hodson; between the times mentioned in the information, and after examination of witnesses and claimant, an assessment was made against him to a large amount. The affidavits taken before the assessor and the testimony at the trial correspond in substance with the contents of the above letter of the collector. The seizure on which this information is founded was made a day or two after the assessor concluded the inquiry, and this information was brought on the 14th of October, 1867, within twenty days after the seizure.] [3]

The jury found a verdict for the United States, which the claimant now moved to set aside, upon the ground that it was against the law and the evidence.

Smith & Carpenter, for the motion.
Lakin & Palmer, opposed.

MILLER, District Judge. The inquiry is in regard to the knowledge of the collector and deputy collector of the cause for seizure more than thirty days before this seizure was made. Knowledge of the cause for seizure means knowledge on the part of the officer of facts tending to establish a cause for seizure prescribed in the statute. Mere vague rumor or suspicion, or loose assertions of irresponsible persons, are not sufficient. It must consist of, or be founded upon, such facts communicated to or ascertained by the officer from reliable sources, as prima facie to establish a fraud upon the law.

The facts relied on in support of this information, and substantially upon which the verdict was rendered, were known to the collector and deputy collector, and to Inspector Burpee, who is the informer, in the fall of the year 1866, a year before this seizure was made. The evidence upon the subject of the statute limitation was submitted to the jury, together with all the evidence in the cause, with instructions upon the law of the case. The jury were charged that claimant can take advantage of the statute of limitation; and that the law requires prompt action on the part of revenue officers. [Claimant moved the court, to set aside the verdict against him, and for a new trial, upon the ground that it is against the law and the evidence.][4]

After much reflection I should not feel justified in disturbing the verdict upon the merits. Finding the verdict upon the evidence, mostly circumstantial, was no abuse of the prerogative of the jury. The evidence was sufficient to bring the mind to the conclusion that the alleged cause of forfeiture was well founded. The impeached witnesses were sufficiently sustained and corroborated to authorize the jury in finding the verdict in part on their testimony. The means taken by claimant to procure counter-affidavits from those witnesses no doubt prejudiced his case with the jury.

I will confine this investigation to the subject of limitation allowed to be raised at the trial upon the pleadings. The answer is in the nature of a plea of the general issue. It is a general denial of the facts alleged in the information. In cases of seizure this mode of pleading is allowable. Conk. Prac. 590.[5] Special pleadings in actions for penalties and forfeitures, or in criminal prosecutions, are almost entirely disused. A demurrer to an indictment is occasionally interposed. The general practice is either a motion to quash, or a motion in arrest, after a verdict of guilty. In criminal prosecutions, although a defendant may plead to the jurisdiction of the court, there are but few instances in which he is obliged to have recourse to such a plea. He may take advantage of the matter under the general issue. Archb. Cr. Pl. 80. In a case under the statute of 31 Eliz., which provides that all actions for any forfeiture upon any penal statute shall be brought within two years, the court held that the defendant may take advantage of the statute on the general issue, and need not plead it. Bull. N. P. 195. In Johnson v. U. S. [Case No. 7,418], the court did not permit the party indicted to take advantage upon habeas corpus of the limitation of indictments, where the objection had not been made of record by plea. In U. S. v. Ballard [Id. 14,507], the question of limitation was raised upon the date mentioned in the indictment, upon which the alleged perjury had been committed, and the act was held to bar the prosecution. In U. S. v. Mayo [Id. 15,755], there was a plea of the statute of limitation. But in Parsons v. Hunter [Id. 10,778], the same court declares in the opinion, that in suits on penal statutes, the statute of limitation need not be pleaded; but may be taken advantage of under the general issue. By section 32 of the crimes act of 1790 (1 Stat. 119) it is enacted, "that no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for treason or other capital offense, willful murder and forgery excepted, unless the indictment for the same shall be found by a grand jury within three years next after the treason or capital offense shall be committed; nor shall any person be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense not capital, unless the indictment for the same shall be found within two years from time of committing the offense; provided, that nothing herein contained shall extend to any person or persons fleeing from justice." By acts of congress, the period of limitation for the prosecution of any crime arising under the revenue law, and suits for fines and forfeitures, is five years.

Cases arising under the act limiting prosecutions have been presented to the consideration of courts under different forms of pleading. In U. S. v. Slacum [Case No. 16,311], the limitation was specially pleaded. In U. S. v. Porter [Id. 16,072], the limitation was not pleaded. In U. S. v. Watkins [Id. 16,649], the question was raised by demurrer. In U. S. v. White [Id. 16,676], it is decided that limitation may be given in evidence by the defendant under the general issue in a criminal cause, and the United States may give in evidence the fact that defendant fled from justice, and therefore was not entitled to the benefit of the limitation. In the opinion on page 82, the court remarks: "The court is bound to take notice that the defendant, upon the plea of not guilty, had a right to avail himself of the limitation of time, if he was entitled to it; and that the United States had a right to show that he was not entitled to its benefits. If, from accident or ignorance of his rights, the defendant should have been prevented from asserting or using his right, it might be ground of a motion for a new trial." In the case of Lee v. Clarke, 2 East, 333, 336, an action of debt for a penalty given by the game laws, upon the plea of nil debet, the verdict was for the plaintiff. Lord Ellenborough, during the argument, said: "That notwithstanding the allegation that the offense was committed within six calendar months, yet if it were not computed within the time prescribed by the statute, the plaintiff must have been nonsuited." Lawrence, J., remarked: "The time having elapsed would have been evidence for the defendant on the plea of nil debet." See, also, 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 471, 475, 626; Esp. Pen. St. 78.

The statute limitation seems to require that evidence of the time the officer obtained knowledge of the cause of forfeiture should be received under the general issue. It is an appropriate inquiry upon the trial of the cause. Proof on the subject might involve a more extended range than if the seizure were prohibited after or between certain dates. Seizure is an open and notorious act on the part of the officer, known to the party in possession; but on what day or time the cause of seizure came to the knowledge of the officer may have to be ascertained from proof of several facts.

From this examination of the subject I am satisfied that the evidence was properly admitted, and that the verdict, under the instructions of the court upon this subject, should have been for claimant.

A question arises,—What effect the repeal of section 68 has on this case, if any? The information charges the offenses against the act to have been committed between September 3, 1864, and March 1, 1866. And the seizure is alleged to have been made on October 11, 1867, under and in pursuance of the act of June 30, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

It is an established rule, that where an action for the recovery of a penalty, or a proceeding to enforce a forfeiture prescribed in a legislative act, is pending at the time of the repeal of the act, or instituted after the repeal, such repeal is a bar to the action or proceeding, in the absence of a saving clause in the repealing act. A clause of the repealing act provides that the repeal shall take effect on September 1, 1866. The act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 472), continues in force section 68 of the act of 1864. These two last acts were in force at the time of claimant's operations in the distillery, and for six months thereafter. The act of July, 1866, repealing section 68, provides, in section 70, "that all the provisions of former acts repealed shall be in force for collecting all taxes, duties and licenses properly assessed, or liable to be assessed, or accruing under the provisions of acts, the right to which has already accrued, or which may hereafter accrue under said acts, and for maintaining and continuing liens, fines, penalties and forfeitures incurred under and by virtue thereof, and for carrying out and completing all proceedings which have been already commenced, or that may be commenced to enforce such fines, penalties, and forfeitures under said acts." It is, therefore, apparent that section 68 of the act of 1864 remains in force as to this case, including the proviso of limitation, notwithstanding the repeal. The distillery apparatus was subject to seizure as forfeited for offenses propounded in the information before the repeal affected the section in any manner; and the above provision of the repealing act reserves to the government the right to institute and prosecute these proceedings to enforce the forfeiture.

The court being satisfied that the seizure upon which this information is founded was not made within thirty days after the cause for the same had come to the knowledge of the collector and deputy collector, it is therefore ordered that the verdict be set aside and the information dismissed.

UNITED STATES v. SIX HUNDRED AND SIXTY-ONE BALES OF TOBACCO.

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 21, 1878.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FRAUDULENT ENTRIES — FORFEITURE—FALSE AFFIDAVIT OF DAMAGE—EVIDENCE OF INTENT—PRESUMPTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

[1. In a proceeding to enforce a forfeiture under the 12th section of the act of June 22, 1874 (18 Stat. 188), for making, or attempting to make, an entry by means of any false or fraudulent invoice, affidavit, etc., it is immaterial whether the purpose to make a fraudulent entry is carried out or not. An attempt by the means stated, with intent to defraud, completes the ground of forfeiture.]

[2. The making of an affidavit of damage is a part of the entry, so that if such affidavit be false, and be made with intent to defraud the revenue, it is within the provision of the above section, and is sufficient to incur a forfeiture.]

[3. An affidavit of damage, untrue in fact, and made without such personal inspection and examination as to warrant the affiant in saying that he had personally inspected and examined the whole of the merchandise, or to warrant him in saying that it had sustained damage on the voyage of importation, is a false affidavit, in the meaning of the statute.]

[4. If an affidavit of damage is in fact false, the jury are authorized to presume an intent to defraud the revenue, and the burden is on the claimant to satisfy them, by a fair preponderance of evidence, that he had no such intent.]

[5. If it be shown that an affidavit made in course of entering merchandise was in fact false, then evidence of other fraudulent transactions, in connection with other entries of goods by the same claimants, may be considered, not for the purpose of proving the body of the offence, but for the purpose of characterizing the intent with which the act was committed.]

[6. In order to incur a forfeiture of goods imported by a partnership, it is not necessary to show that both partners participated in the illegal act or acts charged. It is sufficient to show that one of them was guilty thereof.]

[7. It is not necessary, in order to obtain an allowance for damage to part of a consignment of merchandise, that the claimant should make an affidavit that the entire importation was damaged.]

[8. Where probable cause of seizure is shown, the burden is on the claimants to show, by a fair preponderance of evidence, that the illegal acts charged were not committed.]

[9. Cited in U. S. v. Nine Trunks, Case No. 15,886, to the point that in proceedings to forfeit goods for fraudulent importation, the goods themselves, and not the importer, are regarded as the offender, and that the claimant is a mere voluntary intervenor.]

[This was an information of forfeiture against 661 bales of tobacco, of which Weil & Co. were claimants, charging a violation of the laws in relation to fraudulent entries at the customhouse.]

Roger M. Sherman, Asst. U. S. Atty.
Ethan Allen, for claimants.

THE COURT (charging jury). We have been engaged, gentlemen, now for eleven days, in the investigation of this important cause—important to the government, important to the claimants, and involving as important questions respecting the transactions of these merchants with the government on the other side, as can be involved in any suit coming before a court and a jury in this court. Nearly eleven years ago, when I commenced my judicial labors in this court, the first case that I tried was a case of seizure of merchandise for alleged frauds in the entry of it at the custom house, and during my judicial labors in this court I have tried a very large number of such cases; and this case, to all appearances the last jury cause connected with the revenue of the government which I shall try in this court, is a case of the same character. I allude to this only to show that these cases are cases which have received, in the principles which govern them, and in the application of those principles to the circumstances of a given case, a great deal of consideration in this court. The principles which govern a case like this are well settled in the jurisprudence of the United States, not only in this court but by the adjudications of the supreme court of the United States in review of such questions. And in laying this case before you, I have to say, first, that I recognize in you, and in the attention you have given to this cause, an understanding and an appreciation of the questions of law and of fact involved in this case which will enable you without difficulty to possess your minds of the points to which you will have to address your attention. I shall not comment upon the evidence in the case. You have listened to it, it has been laid before you slowly, carefully, patiently, and thoroughly by the eminent and assiduous counsel on both sides of this case, and it has been spread before you in a compact manner in their addresses to the jury. I shall content myself with putting before you the legal principles which govern such cases generally, and the legal principles which govern this case in particular, and in such order as I hope will enable you to apply the evidence to the case as I go along, without any difficulty. In the first place, gentlemen, I shall bring to your attention the statute under which this forfeiture of these 661 bales of tobacco is claimed by the government; and I shall refer you only to the 12th section of the act of June 22, 1874 (18 Stat. 188). That section is a re-enactment, to all substantial intent, so far as this case is concerned, of a previous statute, the first section of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 737), and is to this effect—That "if any owner, importer, consignee, agent or other person"—any person—"shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make or attempt to make any entry of imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter or paper, or by means of any false statement written or verbal," or "shall be guilty of any wilful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper or statement, or affected by such act or omission," he may be indicted and punished criminally, and "in addition" "such merchandise shall be forfeited." You will perceive that this penalty is imposed not only for the making of an entry by means of any fraudulent or false affidavit or paper, but for an attempt to make it. So, likewise, if the entry be made by means of the fraudulent or false affidavit or paper or false written or verbal statement, and the intent to defraud the revenue exists, it is immaterial whether the party is successful or not in what he thus undertook. If he makes the entry, or attempts to make it, by those means and has that intent, then, though his plan may be nipped in the bud, the forfeiture takes place. This statute, which is but a re-enactment of provisions of law which have been in force on the statute book of the United States from the earliest revenue act that was enacted in the year 1789 (1 Stat. 42, § 22), is a part of a fixed policy of the government, thought to be necessary by the wise framers of the first series of revenue statutes that were enacted by congress, and since maintained by the judgment and wisdom of congress, as the exponent of the judgment and will of the people of the United States. Provisions of this kind are found necessary, absolutely necessary, and they are enforced by the courts for the protection of you, gentlemen, as honest merchants, in your business; and without such provisions you could not do business in your callings, so far as you have anything to do with the importation of merchandise, and, in other respects, even though not directly connected with the importation of merchandise, in so far as your business may be affected by such transactions, you could not do an honest business unless there were these stringent rules to compel people to observe the law.

It is alleged in this case that this house of Weil and Company, acting through one or the other of the gentlemen composing it—Mr. Baer and Mr. Aron—has been guilty of what is denounced in this statute which I have read to you, in such wise as to warrant and call for a forfeiture of these 661 bales of tobacco. It is claimed by the government that Mr. Baer, as a part of this entry—and the court charges you, as matter of law, that the acts or omissions relied upon by the government in this case are a part of the entry of the merchandise, a part of the passage of the merchandise through the custom house, a part of the passage of the merchandise through the hands of the officers of the government, until it reaches the body of merchandise for consumption in the country, a part of the machinery for the ascertainment of the proper duties to be paid upon the merchandise, whether it should pay on the full weight of the bales of tobacco, so many pounds, at 35 cents a pound, or whether it should pay on a less number of pounds, because of damage on the voyage, all that is a part of the entry of the merchandise—it is claimed by the government that this house, with intent to defraud the revenue, made this entry, or a part of this entry, a step in this entry, by means of a fraudulent or false affidavit of damage. It is also claimed that this house has been guilty of a wilful omission after the allowance of damage, knowing that the allowance was a false and fraudulent one, a wilful omission to inform the government, and that by means of that omission the government has been defrauded of a part of the lawful duties accruing upon the merchandise in question. In the oath which he took on the back of the original entry, Mr. Aron, one of the claimants, swore as follows: "I solemnly and truly swear that this entry, now delivered by me to the collector, contains a just and true account of all the merchandise embraced in the invoice; and I further swear that I have not in the said entry or invoice concealed or suppressed anything whereby the United States may be defrauded of any part of the duty lawfully due on said goods, wares and merchandise; and that if at any time hereafter I discover any error in the said invoice or in the account now rendered of the said goods, wares and merchandise, or receive any other invoice of the same, I will immediately make the same known to the collector of this district." This oath was taken on the 6th of June, 1876. The affidavit of Mr. Baer for the damage allowance was made on the 13th of June, 1876. The oath of Mr. Aron refers to the entry and invoice which he then was presenting at the custom house. It refers to the entry, upon the back of which it is endorsed. It refers to the invoice annexed; and the oath is to the effect that that entry and that invoice are true, and that he has not in them suppressed or concealed anything whereby the United States may be defrauded of any part of the duties lawfully due on the goods; and that if at any time thereafter he shall discover any error in the said invoice or in the account then produced of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, or receive any other invoice of the same, he will immediately make the same known to the collector of this district. The act of 1874 says that if any one shall attempt to make an entry by means of any false affidavit or statement, or shall be guilty of any wilful act or omission, by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties on the goods, they shall be forfeited. I do not hold, as a proposition of law, that if this was a fraudulent claim, the omission, after the damage allowance, to make the fraud known to the government, was an omission of what Mr. Aron was required by this oath of his to do; but I charge you that, irrespective of that oath, irrespective of any obligation taken by Mr. Aron in that oath, casting that aside entirely, if this was a false damage allowance, a fraudulent damage allowance, then the affidavit taken by Mr. Baer was false. But if you shall be of opinion, upon the evidence, that Mr. Baer was warranted, from the examination which he made, in saying, and that he did say, in good faith, believing it to be true, that the whole of the merchandise had sustained damage on the voyage of importation, then it was not a false affidavit. And, if you shall believe, from all the evidence in the case, that Mr. Baer had not given to the merchandise such a personal inspection and examination as to warrant him in saying that he had personally inspected and examined the whole of it, or to warrant him in saying that the whole of it had sustained damage on the voyage of importation, and that he did not and could not have made this affidavit in good faith, having reasonable cause to believe that its contents were true, then it was a false affidavit. If you shall come to the conclusion that it was false, then you have a right to presume that it was made with an intent to defraud the revenue of the United States, because, tobacco being subject to so many cents duty upon the pound, if the number of pounds to be multiplied by the rate of duty were to be fraudulently diminished by the proceedings based on this affidavit, if there was no damage when Mr. Baer asserted that there was, you are authorized to infer, and the legal presumption is, that he had an intention to accomplish the result which the affidavit tended to accomplish, of getting in the whole of the tobacco, it being sound, at a less number of pounds than it actually weighed, and thus depriving the government of the duty on the difference. In such case you are authorized to presume that there was an intent to defraud the revenue; and it will be for the claimants to satisfy you, by a fair preponderance of evidence, that they had no intent to defraud the United States. If, under the observations which I have already laid before you, you shall come to the conclusion that there ought to be a verdict for the plaintiffs, it is not necessary, in order to give that verdict, that you should believe that Mr. Kelly and Mr. Hamilton were corrupted, or that there was any unlawful intimacy or collusion between them and any member of the house of Weil and Company. If, upon the evidence, you find such guilty intent on the part of Mr. Baer or Mr. Aron, it is no matter in what way they calculated or expected that that intent might be accomplished—whether they relied upon direct communication, collusion, or intimacy with, or corruption or bribery of, Mr. Kelly or Mr. Hamilton, or any one else, or whether they relied upon anything that they may have been acquainted with in the movements inside of the custom house, ignorance, inattention, incapacity, negligence, non-observance of rules—it is immaterial, as long as such intent existed, how they expected or calculated that that intent should be carried out. So, also, the fact that, for the purpose of getting these goods into the warehouse, these claimants had to give a bond for the duties, is wholly irrelevant to any question in this case. It is not a matter for consideration on the one side or on the other. Moreover, any comments which have been made in regard to the policies of insurance, are out of this case, and are not to be taken into consideration by you. And, so, in regard to any claim, under the bill of lading, against Alexander and Company, that is not a circumstance to be taken into consideration by you. You will throw out entirely the policies of insurance, the bill of lading, the claim against Alexander and the bond.

There has been introduced into this case, as bearing upon this question of intent on the part of the claimants, and with a view of enabling you to judge of what intent they had in this transaction, some evidence as to their transactions in other matters—the suit here, the judgment record in which was read to you; the suit in San Francisco; and the evidence of Mr. Covert as to his conversations with Mr. Baer about merchandise on storage, on a previous occasion. Such evidence is evidence, under the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, not for the purpose of proving the body of the offence, the corpus delicti, the guilty act, in the case on trial before you, but for the purpose of characterizing the intent with which a given act may have been done. In other words, it is evidence not for the purpose of showing the falsity of the damage allowance in this case, not for the purpose of showing the falsity of the oath taken by Mr. Baer; but, if you find that the damage allowance was false, if you find that such oath was false, such evidence is evidence for the purpose of enabling you to arrive at a conclusion upon the other branch of the question, as to the intent with which the oath was made, or the damage allowance was procured, upon the oath. In regard to the judgment record in New York, in regard to the suit in San Francisco, in regard to any testimony of Mr. Covert or any other person bearing upon any question of the transactions in other cases by Weil and Company alleged to have been fraudulent, you are to take into consideration, if you should reach the question, all the evidence on both sides in regard to them, the explanations made to you by Mr. Baer and the testimony of Mr. Aron, in so far as they gave any, in regard to the New York transaction, and the San Francisco transaction, and in regard to any conversation with Mr. Covert. You are to take all the testimony as you understand it, and the explanations made, as to whether they are or are not satisfactory to you, and give to the transactions in New York and San Francisco, and the other matters, such weight as, on the whole evidence, affirmative and explanatory, you shall think they are entitled to, in applying them to the question both of the credibility of Mr. Baer and Mr. Aron, and the question of the intent of Mr. Baer and Mr. Aron in the transactions in regard to the 661 bales of tobacco. So, also, it is not necessary, in order to enable you to find for the government that you should find that both of the claimants participated in the illegal acts charged. If any person does so and so, in regard to goods, the goods are forfeited. In all these statutes the merchandise is personated, the merchandise is called the offender; and, if any person does, in regard to that merchandise—and, for the purposes of this case, I will limit it to any person lawfully connected with the merchandise—if any person does the forbidden acts, the merchandise is forfeited. It is not like an indictment in a criminal case, where personal guilt must be brought home to the individual, and where he is not responsible criminally for the acts of another; but, in this case and in all cases of this kind, the merchandise is responsible for the forbidden act of any person connected with it. In the same view, it is not necessary to find that both of the claimants had an actual intent to defraud the United States, if one of them had such intent—if either of them had it. It has been very properly asserted to you by the counsel for the defence, that he does not question the proposition on the part of the government, that the oath taken by Mr. Baer on the damage application is an oath of equal dignity, and imposes an obligation of equal gravity, with any other oath, lawfully taken, with the oath which each of you has taken in this case, and that there is to be no distinction drawn between this oath, as a custom house oath, and any other oath lawfully taken in the course of a lawful proceeding. I am requested to charge you, and I do charge you, that the law did not make it necessary, in order to enable Weil and Co. to obtain a lawful allowance for damage as to some of their merchandise, if some only were damaged on the voyage of importation, that Mr. Baer should subscribe an oath that the entire 661 bales were damaged on the voyage of importation; because, the statute and regulations provide for the means of designating and individualizing by numbers the particular bales in regard to which an application for damage allowance is made.

I believe, gentlemen, that I have called your attention to all the principles of law which you are to apply to the evidence in this case; and that I have covered in my charge, either affirmatively or negatively, all the propositions laid before me by the counsel on either side, which are material to this case, or which are raised by the evidence; and I am to be considered as declining to charge in regard to the requests on both sides otherwise than as I have charged in regard to them in what I have said to you.

There is but one other point which it is my duty to lay before you, and that is this: I am required to submit to you, as a distinct and separate proposition, whether the alleged acts charged to have been done in this case—if you shall find that they were done—if you shall find that the affidavit of Mr. Baer was false, in the sense in which I have explained the word "false" to you, in connection with such affidavit—if you shall find that the damage allowance was false, then I am required to submit to you whether these alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States; and I am directed by the statute to require from you, upon that proposition, a special finding. Whichever way you find, whether you find for the United States or for the claimants, you are also to find either that the acts alleged in the information were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, or that they were not done with an actual intention to defraud the United States. Of course, you are only to render such a verdict in case you find that the alleged acts were done. If you find that they were not done, there is nothing for you to find on the question of intent. The statute goes on to say, that, unless the jury shall find an intent to defraud, the court has no authority to impose a forfeiture. Hence this proposition on the part of the claimants is a correct proposition—that, if you shall find any act or acts on the part of the claimants, or either of them, to have been done, tending in their results to defraud the United States, you must find that such act or acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, and, unless you find such actual intention to defraud the United States, your verdict will be for the claimants. But, in considering the questions in this case, you are to bear in mind that there is probable cause for the prosecution, and that the burden of proof is on the claimants, to satisfy you by a fair preponderance of evidence, that this entry was not made or attempted to be made by a false affidavit, and that there was no wilful omission by means of which the United States has been deprived of any lawful duty on any of this merchandise.

I understand the position of the district attorney in regard to this whole question to be, upon the evidence, that there was no damage to this tobacco on the voyage of importation; that whatever damage there was, whatever damaged tobacco may have been picked out or culled out in the warehouse of Mr. Foster, and whatever the damage was that any witnesses have testified they saw in it, was not damage that occurred on the voyage of importation; that there was not a particle of damage sustained by this tobacco on the voyage of importation, no matter what damaged state it may have been in, in point of fact, when it was landed here; and that the damage occurred at another time and at another place than on the voyage and on the vessel. The opposite of that contention is claimed on the part of Weil and Company. In considering this entire question you will bear in mind the law upon the burden of proof; and you will bear in mind also that the damage spoken of throughout, in the statute, in the application, in the affidavit of Mr. Baer, and in the appraisement, is damage on the voyage of importation and damage no where else.

The report of the appraisers in this case is dated the 8th of July, 1876. "Appraiser's office, 8th July, 1876: To the collector of customs: In pursuance of your order we have examined the following described merchandise, and do certify that the same has sustained damage on the voyage of importation" —not that the same is damaged, but that the damage visible, the damage found, is damage sustained on the voyage of importation—"as follows, to wit: W. and C. 35 bales of tobacco rate of damage, 50 per cent.; 60 bales of tobacco, 40 per cent.; 75 bales of tobacco, 30 per cent.; 130 bales of tobacco, 20 per cent.; 170 bales of tobacco, 15 per cent.; 191 bales, including P. S." (public store) "bales, no damage allowed. Cause: sea water and heat of vessel. Effect: mouldy, musty, sweated, loss of strength, and flavor destroyed. Satisfactory evidence of sound shipment stencilled 7-8. Theodore P. Kelly, Geo. W. Hamilton. W. Allen, Assistant Appraiser. Approved, S. B. French, Appraiser." That is all the contents of that paper which were on it when it left the appraiser's office. The figures in red ink are figures put on afterwards in applying the percentage of damage reported, to the bales, to arrive at the number of pounds of sound tobacco on which to impose the duty. I believe that these are all the observations which it is incumbent upon me or proper for me to make in this very important cause. You will have before you these two papers, the application and affidavit for damage allowance and the appraiser's report. You will give a careful consideration to all the evidence, under the rules of law which I have laid down, and as you shall find in accordance with those rules, such will be your verdict. I commit the case now into your charge.

A juror.—There is one point on which I did not clearly understand your honor. In case this tobacco was damaged partially before it left Havana, do I understand that a further damage on the voyage of importation is to be considered, under the law, as damage on the voyage of importation.

THE COURT.—I do not think, gentlemen, that there is any evidence in the case upon which any such question as that put by the juror legitimately arises in the case. The district attorney claims that there was not a particle of damage on the voyage of importation, while the claimants insist that the whole damage which they have proved, if they have proved it, occurred on the voyage of importation.

The jury did not agree on a verdict.

UNITED STATES v. SIX LOTS OF GROUND.

[1 Woods, 234.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1872.

EVIDENCE — CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS — WRITS OF ERROR—CLERICAL MISTAKE—DECREE OF CONFISCATION—EFFECT OF PARDON—CONDITIONAL AMNESTY.

1. The correspondence between a district attorney, representing the United States, and the attorney general, is confidential in its nature and cannot be cited by third persons.

2. If in the copy of a writ of error, lodged with the clerk of the court for the defendant in error, the return day of the writ is correctly stated, and the record be actually returned and filed in due time, a mere clerical error in the return day, in the original writ, is immaterial and is cured.

3. A district court of the United States cannot, three years after rendering a decree in a confiscation case, sit as a court of error upon its own decree and reverse it.

4. It is a general rule, that a judicial sale made by virtue of a judgment which the court had jurisdiction to render will stand, though the judgment itself be afterwards reversed for error.

5. Pardon and amnesty do not annul past transactions so far as to invalidate a previous judicial confiscation and sale of a claimant's property.

6. A pardon containing a condition, that the person to whom it was granted should not claim any of his property or the proceeds thereof, that had been sold by the order, judgment or decree of a court, under the confiscation laws of the United States, is a bar to his claim.

7. A pardon may be partial or subject to conditions, but the conditions must be lawful ones.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.]

At chambers.

J. R. Beckmith, U. S. Atty.

T. J. Semmes and Robert Mott, for claimant.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. This is a writ sued out by the United States to reverse a judgment of the district court, rendered June 27, 1868, dismissing the libel of information, and restoring to the claimant the property seized, which had been sold under a decree of confiscation rendered in the case in April, 1865.

A preliminary motion is made to dismiss the writ of error. This must be denied: (1) The first ground assigned is, that the district attorney had been instructed by the attorney general to dismiss it. This, if proved, is no reason for dismissing the writ. The district attorney represents the United States, and the correspondence between him and the attorney general is confidential in its nature and cannot be cited by third persons. But I see no proof of the fact. (2) The second ground is, that a writ of error does not lie in the case. This has been settled to the contrary by the supreme court. (3) The third ground is, that the writ of error, being sued out in July, 1868, was made returnable on the first Monday of December then next; whereas, the next term of the court was to commence on the first Monday of November, and the citation was returnable generally to the next term. The error in the writ seems to have originated from using a blank printed writ intended for removing judgments to the supreme court, and is evidently a mere clerical oversight. A recent statute authorizes an amendment of the test and return of writs of error, and would probably authorize the amendment of this. But the copy of the writ, lodged with the clerk of the district court for the defendant in error, is correct, having the return day on the first Monday of November; and the record was actually returned and filed in this court before the first Monday in November. I think, therefore, that the defect is immaterial, and is cured.

The error relied on by the government for a reversal of the judgment is this: that a regular default was made in the case, and entered on the 8th of September, 1863, and a decree of confiscation made, upon due proof, on the 5th of April, 1865; and that, upon this decree, a venditioni exponas issued on the 11th of April, 1865, under which the marshal regularly sold the property at auction on the 13th of June, 1865, and one Edward W. Burbank became the purchaser; and that the marshal executed a deed to said Burbank for the property; that the claimant did not apply to have the judgment opened and the sale set aside until March 4, 1868, nearly three years after the rendition of the judgment; that, nevertheless, the default was opened and the claimant was allowed to file a claim and answer on the 15th of April, 1868; and that, upon his pleading a pardon granted in October, 1865, and the proclamation of amnesty of September 7, 1867, and showing that he had taken the requisite oaths and performed the conditions required by the pardon and amnesty, the district court adjudged that the libel of information be dismissed, and the libelled property restored to the claimant upon the payment of all costs.

It is contended, on behalf of the government, that this last proceeding, in 1868, is entirely erroneous and without authority.

The counsel for the defendant in error attaches some importance to the fact that the decree of confiscation had, by consent, been partially opened before and set aside as to one of the lots seized. This took place before the sale by the marshal, on the application of a man by the name of Blum, who showed that he had long before purchased that lot from claimant. But I do not regard this transaction as having the slightest effect on the decree further than as it related to the lot claimed by Blum. The opening of the decree and the dismissal of the libel were expressly confined to that particular lot; and the decree remained in full force with regard to all the residue of the property. And I do not perceive any error in the proceedings up to and including the decree of condemnation and sale. And, if there had been error, I do not think that the district court, three years after the rendering of the decree, could sit as a court of error upon its own decree, and reverse it.

But the court has done more. It has not only reversed its decree, but has made a decree to restore the property to the claimant after its sale under and by virtue of the decree. It is a general rule that a judicial sale, made by virtue of a judgment which the court had jurisdiction to render, will stand though the judgment itself be afterwards reversed for error. In my judgment the district court had no general authority, as at common law, thus to set aside its judgment regularly rendered and the judicial sale made by virtue thereof. If it had authority so to do, it must have been derived from the particular circumstances of the case as affected by the pardon and amnesty pleaded by the defendant.

Do such pardon and amnesty annul past transactions so far as to invalidate the previous judicial confiscation and sale of the claimant's property? Such a proposition seems to me utterly untenable on general principles. And, besides, the pardon itself, which was pleaded in this case, contained an express condition that the defendant should not claim any property or proceeds of any property that had been sold by the order, judgment or decree of a court under the confiscation laws of the United States. This condition is a bar to the defendant's claim. It has been repeatedly held that a pardon may be partial, or subject to conditions. Of course the condition must be a lawful one. As far as I can see, the condition in question is entirely free from any taint of illegality. Whether it would have been binding on the defendant if he could have shown that the confiscation proceedings were illegal and void, it is not necessary to decide. They were legal and valid when they were taken.

The order of the district court opening the default and the decree dismissing the information and restoring to the defendant in error the property sold, must be reversed [case unreported], and the original decree of confiscation and the proceedings thereon must stand confirmed.

Case No. 16,300.

UNITED STATES v. SIXTEEN BARRELS OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

[10 Ben. 484.] [1]

INTERNAL REVENUE LAW — FORFEITURE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY UNDER REV. ST. § 3453.

Upon an information under Rev. St. § 3453, charging that certain distilled spirits seized, were found in a place mentioned and in the possession of persons unknown, for the purpose of being sold and removed in fraud of the internal revenue laws, and with design to avoid payment of taxes thereon, and claiming the forfeiture of a large number of other articles of personal property found in the same place: Held, that under that section it is not necessary, in order that such other personal property be forfeited, that raw materials intended to be used in the manufacture of articles subject to tax should be found in the same place.

The case of U. S. v. 33 Bbls., etc. [Case No. 16,470], disapproved.

[This was an information of forfeiture against sixteen barrels of distilled spirits, seized at No. 340 Delancey street, New York City. Heard on a motion for a new trial.]

E. B. Hill, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

E. T. Wood, for claimant.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a motion for a new trial after verdict for the plaintiffs. The information was under Rev. St. § 3453. It charges that the 16 barrels of distilled spirits seized were articles upon which taxes were imposed, and were found in the place mentioned, in the possession of persons unknown, for the purpose of being sold and removed in fraud of the internal revenue laws, and with design to avoid payment of taxes thereon. It claims the forfeiture of said spirits and a large number of other articles of personal property found in the same place. A claim was interposed for the personal property other than the spirits, and upon the trial it was insisted, and now upon this motion it is insisted, that under that section of the Revised Statutes there can be no forfeiture of this personal property because it was not alleged or proved that any "raw materials" intended to be used in the manufacture of articles subject to tax were found in the place. The argument of the claimant is that the words "articles or raw materials" do not refer to the words "all goods, wares, merchandize, articles or objects," but only to the words "all raw materials found in the possession of any person intending to manufacture the same into articles." But the proper antecedent of the words "such articles" is the words "all goods, wares, merchandize, articles and objects." These things before enumerated are here described under the general term "articles." There is no other sensible construction of the language nor anything else to which the term "such articles" can be held to refer with any regard to the grammatical meaning of the words. The words refer to something before mentioned in the section and are called articles as being "found" in the place. They cannot refer, therefore, to "articles" which might be in the future manufactured out of the raw materials found in the place, but which are not now found there. "Such articles" cannot, therefore, mean the articles which it is intended to manufacture out of the raw materials. The construction given to the section in this respect is that which it has uniformly received in this court and in the circuit court in this circuit. Quantity of Distilled Spirits [Case No. 11,494]; U. S. v. Quantity of Tobacco [Id. 16,105]; U. S. v. Distillery at Spring Valley [Id. 14,963]. The construction is perhaps obscured by a change in punctuation made in the reenactment of the law in the Revised Statutes, but it is evident that there was no change of meaning intended. In the original statute there is no full stop after the words "shall be forfeited to the United States," as there is in this section of the Revised Statutes. 13 Stat. 240.

It is further objected that the personal property subject to forfeiture under this section is only such personal property other than "tools, implements and instruments" as are in some way connected with the intended illegal sale or removal of the taxable articles or with the intended illegal manufacture of such articles from the raw materials; and the case of U. S. v. 33 Barrels of Spirits [Case No. 16,470], is relied upon as authority for this limitation of the words "other personal property whatsoever." While that decision sustains the point taken by the counsel for the claimant, I think it is in conflict with the views expressed in this district and circuit in the cases cited above. It seems to me, also, that the possible consequences of great hardship and injustice that might result from giving the words "other personal property whatsoever" their full and proper meaning, upon which the restrictive construction adopted by Judge Lowell is at least to a considerable extent based, namely, that in the case of a building occupied by many different and independent occupants personal property of enormous value in the possession of persons having no connection whatever with the proscribed articles or raw materials might become forfeited without any fault on their part, do not necessarily result from the construction giving the words "other personal property whatsoever" their full meaning. To be forfeited they must be in the "building or place" where the proscribed articles or raw materials are found. The word "place" seems here to refer to a place less than a building or to a part of a building, as well as to a place other than a building or part of a building. There appears to be a reference to the "place" where the person who has in his possession the guilty articles has also other personal property. Therefore, the statute may be read as providing that all other personal property in the same building or the same place other than a building, occupied by the person or persons having the possession in such building or other place of the prohibited articles, shall be forfeited. It seems to me that this limitation of the language is much more in accordance with the spirit of the statute than that suggested by Judge Lowell, and that it avoids all forfeitures which are not clearly within the purpose of the internal revenue laws. Those laws are very severe in declaring forfeitures as against violators of the law, and it is entirely consistent with their spirit and provisions in other respects that all the personal property found in the same occupation with the proscribed objects should be forfeited, subject, of course, to the power of remission vested in the secretary of the treasury in case the property of innocent persons should, by some mischance, be included in the forfeiture.

The case of U. S. v. Locomotive Boiler [Case No. 15,621], decided in the Eastern district, has no bearing on this case. The demurrer to the information in that case was properly sustained because it did not allege the finding either of articles on which taxes were imposed, etc., or raw materials.

Motion denied.

Case No. 16,301.

UNITED STATES v. SIXTEEN CASES OF SILK RIBBONS.

District Court, S. D. New York. 1870.

VIOLATION OF CUSTOMS LAWS — FORFEITURE FOR UNDERVALUATION — IMPORTS BY MANUFACTURERS—EVIDENCE OF MARKET VALUE—ESTOPPEL.

[1. In cases of importation of goods by the manufacturer thereof, the value at which he is required, by the act of March 3, 1863, to invoice them, is the actual market value at the time and place of manufacture.]

[2. By "market value" is meant the price at which the manufacturer holds them for sale, the price at which he freely offers them in market, the price which he is willing to receive, and purchasers are willing to pay, in the ordinary course of trade. Following Clicquot's Champagne, 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 114.]

[3. The law presumes that there was at the time and place of manufacture an actual market value for the goods, and no evidence can be received to show that there was not in fact such an actual market value.]

[4. Among the best evidences of market value would be a series of sales, general in their character, not accompanied by any exceptional circumstances tending to make one or more of such sales higher or lower than it would otherwise be; also a single sale, if made in the ordinary course of trade. Other evidence would be offers by merchants or manufacturers to sell to persons supposed by them to come in good faith as buyers, such offers being made in the usual course of trade, and under such circumstances as generally attend the sale of merchandise.]

[5. It is only in cases where such evidence as the foregoing is wanting that it becomes proper to resort to such inferior evidence as the actual cost of the raw materials to the manufacturer, with the addition of a manufacturer's profit. Even in such cases this cost is not to be received as a substitute for market value, but only as evidence tending to show market value.]

[6. In cases where such inferior evidence is resorted to, the cost of the raw materials is not to be based upon the actual price paid for them by the manufacturer, if he purchased them long prior to making them up, and at a time of depression in the market, but rather upon the actual price of raw material at the time when the manufacture of the goods was completed.]

[7. The fact that the United States consul at the place of exportation has, in compliance with his duties, certified that the invoice is correct, and the fact that the goods have been appraised, entered, and delivered to the consignee by the officers of the customhouse, on the theory that the invoice stated the true value, are not conclusive upon the question of a fraudulent undervaluation in a proceeding to forfeit the goods. The offence, if any, is complete when the entry is made, and it is immaterial that the invoice was used in the estimation of the duties; for the government is not bound, in respect to the question of forfeiture, by the acts of its officers based upon false and fraudulent statements.]

[8. Evidence of the value of goods in New York cannot be received, in a suit to forfeit them on the grounds of an entry by means of a false invoice, except as evidence of value at the place of exportation, and to contradict other evidence given in regard to the value there.]

[9. Evidence of prior undervaluations by the same importers is admissible only for the purpose of showing the intent with which the present undervaluation was made, and can only be considered by the jury in case they find that there is in fact an undervaluation in the present case. Nor can alleged prior undervaluations be considered for this purpose, unless the jury are satisfied that such prior undervaluations were knowingly made.]

[10. The rule prescribed by Act 1799, § 71 (1 Stat. 678), that, where probable cause of seizure is shown, the burden of proof is cast upon the claimants, is in force under the act of 1863, though the latter act is silent on this subject. Whether probable cause is shown is a question for the court.]

[This was a proceeding to forfeit sixteen cases of silk ribbons, on the ground that the same were entered by means of a false invoice.]

Edwards Pierrepont, Dist. Atty., and William G. Choate, for the United States.

Edwin W. Stoughton, Sidney Webster, James B. Craig, and C. Bainbridge Smith, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge (charging jury). The prosecution in this case is instituted on the seizure of the goods, and a suit in rem against the goods seized is promoted for their condemnation and forfeiture under two statutes of the United States which apply to the subject. The first one is the fourth section of the act of May 28, 1830 (4 Stat. 410), and the second is the first section of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 737). The substance of the act of 1830 is, that if any invoice on which foreign goods are entered at any customhouse is made up with an intent, by a false valuation to evade or defraud the revenue, all the goods embraced in the entry made on such invoice are forfeited. If any article inserted in the invoice has a false valuation put upon it, with an intent to evade or defraud the revenue, then not only that article, but all other goods embraced in the same invoice, are forfeited to the United States. It will not be necessary to call your attention any further to the act of 1830.

The questions which arise in this case under the act of 1863 are substantially the same, but there are certain provisions of the act of 1863 to which it is necessary I should call your attention. The first section of that act provides that all invoices of goods imported from any foreign country into the United States shall be made in triplicate,—that is, there shall be three sets of invoices signed by the person owning or shipping the goods, if the same have actually been purchased, or by their manufacturer or owner, if the same have been procured otherwise than by purchase, or by the duly authorized agent of such purchaser, manufacturer, or owner. The invoice so signed must, at or before the shipment of the goods, be produced to a consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent of the United States nearest the place of shipment, and must have endorsed thereon, when so produced, a declaration signed by such purchaser, manufacturer, owner, or agent, setting forth that such invoice is in all respects true. That is to be a declaration not on oath, and is to state what the invoice contains, if the goods were obtained by purchase, and are subject to ad valorem duty,—a duty by a percentage on the valuation,—a true and full statement of the time when and place where the same were purchased, and the actual cost thereof, and of all charges thereon, and that no discounts, bounties, or drawbacks are contained in the invoice but such as have actually been allowed thereon. When the goods are obtained in any other manner than by purchase —as when they are sent by their manufacturer, or when they are presented to the individual as a gift—then this declaration is to state that the invoice contains the actual market value thereof at the time and place when and where the same were procured or manufactured, and that no different invoice has been produced or will be furnished to any one. The person producing this invoice to the consul must, at the same time, declare to the consul at what port it is intended to make entry of the goods. This presentation to the consul of the invoice, accompanied by the declaration, is the second stage of the proceeding. The third stage is this: The consul must endorse upon each one of the three invoices a certificate, under his hand and seal, stating that the invoice has been produced to him, with the date of its production, the name of the person by whom produced, and the port in the United States at which it shall be the declared intention to make entry of the goods. Thereupon, the consul must hand back to the person producing the three invoices, one of them, to be used in making entry of the goods; he must file the second one in his own office, to be there carefully preserved; and he must transmit the third one to the collector of the port where it is intended to make entry of the goods. Such is the disposition to be made of the three sets of invoices, with the three declarations, and the three certificates of the consul. The statute then provides that no goods imported into the United States after the first day of July, 1863, shall be admitted to entry, unless the invoice shall in all respects conform to the requirements above mentioned, and shall have such certificate of the consul. Therefore the invoice must come from the foreign country, containing, in the case of the manufacturer, the actual market value, accompanied by the declaration, not on oath, and a certificate of the consul, to the effect that the invoice has been produced to him, and that the goods are to be entered at a specified port. The statute goes on to say that no goods shall be admitted to entry unless the invoice be verified—now is the first time an oath appears in the matter—unless the invoice be verified, at the time of making the entry, by the oath or affirmation of the owner or consignee, or the authorized agent of the owner or consignee of the goods, certifying that the invoice and the declaration are in all respects true, and were made by the person by whom the same purport to have been made, nor, except as thereinafter provided, unless the triplicate invoice transmitted to the collector shall have been received by him. You thus see the machinery provided—the invoice made up abroad, in a certain way, the declaration accompanying it, and the certificate of the consul, the appearance of those three papers at the customhouse, and the addition to them, at the customhouse, of the oath or affirmation that the invoice and declaration are in all respects true.

The act of 1863 then goes on to make this provision, under which this prosecution is brought: "If any such owner, consignee or agent"—that is, if the consignor abroad, or the consignee here, or the agent of either of them—"of any goods, wares or merchandise shall knowingly make, or attempt to make, an entry thereof by means of any false invoice or false certificate of a consul, vice-consul or commercial agent, or of any invoice which shall not contain a true statement of all the particulars hereinbefore required, or by means of any other false or fraudulent document or paper, or of any other false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatsoever, said goods, wares, and merchandise, or their value, shall be forfeited and disposed of as other forfeitures for violation of the revenue laws." Any infraction of this provision forfeits all the goods embraced in the entry. * * * All the papers correspond with the machinery provided by law; and the question raised in this case is whether this entry was made by means of a false paper, and, if so, whether the paper was false to the knowledge either of these parties in Switzerland or of their agent or consignee here, who made the entry. Knowingly making an entry by means of a false paper, such as a false invoice or a false oath, where the fact that it was false was known to the agent or consignee here, forfeits the goods just as much as if the knowledge was possessed by the consignor abroad.

There have been heretofore before this court cases in regard to various descriptions of merchandise, involving the same questions that are now before you; and I have had occasion to charge juries heretofore on these subjects. I shall, therefore, in what I have to say to you, draw somewhat at large upon what I have heretofore said on like questions in some other cases. You have seen that the language of the act of 1830 is, that if the invoice is made up with an intent, by a false valuation, to evade or defraud the revenue, the goods shall be forfeited. The language of the act of 1863 is that if the entry, or the attempt to make the entry, is by means of a false invoice, and is done knowingly, the goods shall be forfeited. The only material and substantial apparent difference between the two statutes is that the one speaks of making up an invoice with intent to evade or defraud the revenue, and the other speaks of knowingly making an entry by means of a false invoice. "Intent to evade or defraud," is the wording in the one case; "knowingly," in the other. * * * In the case of a purchaser of goods, the cost to him to buy the goods abroad is assumed, as a general rule, by the law, to indicate the actual market value of what he buys, it being presumed that he buys at the ordinary actual market value; and, to put the purchaser upon the same footing with the manufacturer, to make no unjust discrimination against the purchaser, and in favor of the manufacturer, and to enable the government to collect substantially the same amount of duty, at the same ad valorem rate, on the same quantity of the same description of merchandise, whether shipped here for account of the purchaser of it, or for account of its manufacturer, the law requires the manufacturer, to invoice his goods, when he imports them, and enters them here as his own, at their actual market value in the principal markets of the country where they were manufactured, no matter what their cost to him, no matter whether they cost more or less than such actual market value. The whole thing comes to this, in substance and effect—that the manufacturer is required to invoice them in this way, at what the purchaser is also required to invoice them at, for the purpose of producing uniformity. That is the theory and the object of the law; and its language endeavors to carry out that theory and object, as far as it is possible for human legislation to carry out a principle. * * * "Actual market value" has been decided by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Clicquot's Champagne, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 114, to mean the actual market value of the goods at Basle, in Switzerland, at the time of their manufacture, the price at which the manufacturer holds them for sale, the price at which he freely offers them in the market, the price which he is willing to receive for them if they are sold in the ordinary course of trade. That is a definition which commends itself to the good sense of every man. A manufacturer who sends his goods to this country under the circumstances under which the goods in this case were sent has no right to substitute, in his invoice, anything else for the actual market value. He has declared, in the first place, that the invoice contains the actual market value. In addition to that, there is the oath of his agent at the customhouse that the invoice contains the actual market value. Therefore, the first question for consideration will be, whether the invoices contain the actual market value of the goods at the time and place when and where they were manufactured; and, in the next place, if they do not, whether they were made up by the manufacturers with the intent to evade and defraud the revenue of the United States, or with a knowledge, either on their part or on the part of their consignee or agent here, who entered them at the customhouse, that the invoices did not contain such actual market value. * * *

It is quite apparent, in this case, that the cost of the raw silk used in making these ribbons enters into the expense of making them to the extent of from seventy to eighty per cent. of the entire cost of manufacturing them; and, of course, the variation in the cost of making them must depend a great deal on the price of raw silk. It is also in evidence, both by Viollier and by the depositions on the part of the claimants, that there was a time, during the year 1866, when, in consequence of the apprehension of war, and of the existence of war between Austria and Prussia, there was an interruption of trade, the demand for ribbons lessened, and there was a fall in the price of raw silk; and that, after the war closed, raw silk advanced in price. As to when these things happened, I shall speak hereafter. I refer to the subject now, for the purpose of saying, that, if the claimants in this case purchased raw silk at low prices, and manufactured ribbons out of that silk, but did not have them completed and ready for market until raw silk had advanced considerably, and if they afterwards made out their invoices of such ribbons on the basis of the cost of raw silk bought at those low prices, it is manifest that the cost of the goods so arrived at would not represent their actual market value at the time when they became a completed manufacture, which is what the law of the United States requires. It would undoubtedly represent the cost of the goods to the manufacturer, because he procured his raw silk at a low price, and he had, or was entitled to, a market for his manufactured goods afterwards, at a price for those goods based upon an increased price of raw silk—a price to the benefit of which, as against him, the United States were entitled. This case furnishes an illustration of why the United States can never admit that a manufacturer shall invoice his goods at their cost to him, with a profit added, unless such cost, with the profit added, is in fact the actual market value of the goods when their manufacture is completed. He cannot invoice them at the price he paid for the raw silk which he put into the particular goods, with the other expenses of manufacture, and a profit added, unless the result is in fact the actual market value of the goods. If any such principle of valuation were to be admitted by the United States as cost with the profit added, the cost which, in reference to raw silk, the United States would have a right to insist upon in a case like the present would be a cost based upon a price for raw silk at the advanced rate at which it stood when the goods were completely manufactured ready for market; otherwise the United States would be defrauded of that to which they are entitled by law. Therefore it is that no individual has any right whatever under any circumstances to substitute in his invoice for the actual market value cost. with a manufacturer's profit added. He must put in the actual market value. The manner in which he arrives at it is of no consequence. * * * The entries in this case show, there being three separate entries—one on the first invoice and two on the second invoice—that is, in each of the three entries, one case was designated and sent in the usual course of business to be appraised: and all of the invoices show that the invoices were accepted by the authorities at the customhouse as correct; that the duties were computed at the rate of 60 per cent. on the face of the invoices; that the government delivered the goods on the payment of that duty to the parties claiming them; and that afterwards the goods were seized. * * * The claimants state that not only in reference to the goods in question, but in reference to like goods which they had been in the habit of sending for a long time before to the United States, they made up their invoices on the principle of arriving at the cost and adding 5 per cent. thereto, and calling that the market value. * * *

It is quite apparent, on the evidence, that the cessation of the war between Prussia and Austria sent up the price of raw silk. It is for you, in view of all the evidence on the subject, to determine when it was at its lowest point, and when it began to advance after the cessation of the war, with reference to the time of the completed manufacture of the ribbons under seizure. This is to be done, bearing in mind the principle of law I have laid down, that, if the cost of the goods, with the manufacturer's profit added, is the only means to which resort can be had to fix the market value of the goods, the government is entitled to the price of raw silk in the market, as entering into the goods, at the time of their completed manufacture. * * * On the subject of what resort you shall make to the different classes of evidence, the law is this: If these claimants, when Viollier and Farwell came there, believed that they came as customers, in good faith, intending to purchase ribbons, and if you shall believe that the offer to sell made by the claimants was a bona fide offer to sell on the terms named, uninfluenced by any considerations which would modify the apparent effect of the terms, you have a right to regard that offer as evidence to be taken into consideration in determining the question of the actual market value of the goods under seizure at the time and place of their manufacture; but if, on the evidence, you shall think that the prices given in the letter were influenced by the considerations I have mentioned in regard to smuggling, you will allow those considerations the weight to which they are entitled, and give to the letter, under those circumstances, the weight to which you shall think it is entitled on the question of actual market value, and also on the question of intent. The law, in all departments of its administration in courts of justice, always requires the best evidence to be produced of any fact. In regard to the actual market value of merchandise abroad, a series of sales, general in their character, not accompanied by any exceptional circumstances tending to make any one or more of such sales higher or lower than it would be but for such exceptional circumstances, or even a single sale, in the ordinary course of trade, is one of the best evidences of market value. This rule will apply to the Bachofen sale, taking into consideration the date of it, the 28th of June, and all the circumstances surrounding it. So, also, offers by merchants or manufacturers to sell their goods to persons who are supposed by them to come as buyers, in good faith, such offers being made in the usual course of trade, under such circumstances as generally attend the sale of merchandise, are among the best evidences of the actual market value of the goods in respect to which the transactions take place. It is only when such evidence is wanting, in a case of this kind—it is only when you are unable to arrive at the market value of the goods from actual sales of similar goods about the same time, or from offers to sell, made under the circumstances which I have specified as necessary, in respect to the same goods, or goods of the same quality—that you have a right to resort to an inferior class of evidence, as evidence of market value, that is, to the cost, with a manufacturer's profit added. But, as I said before, if, in this case, you shall consider that there is no evidence of actual sales at Basle of goods like those under seizure, and no evidence of offers by claimants to sell at Basle similar goods, from either of which you can arrive at a conclusion as to the actual market value at Basle of the goods in the invoices in question, and if you shall then have to resort to the cost of the goods with a manufacturer's profit added, you will not be authorized to compute such cost on the basis of the cost of the raw silk to the claimants, if you shall find that the claimants were paying for raw silk a higher price, at the time of the completion of the manufacture of the goods, than the actual cost to them of the same quality of raw silk as that which went into the manufacture of such goods. The government is not bound to accept such low cost of the raw material. It is entitled to the benefit of the price of the raw material at the time when the goods were completed in their manufacture. * * * Evidence is introduced by the government on the question of intent, it being claimed that the invoices of 1866, and particularly the invoice of the 8th of January, 1866, were undervalued knowingly by the claimants; and that, therefore, in case you shall find that the invoices in suit were undervalued, you must find that such undervaluation could not have been an accidental undervaluation, but that there was a design running all through, and a knowledge on the part of the claimants. * * *

In determining the question of knowledge or intent on the part of the claimants, in the undervaluation of their goods in the invoices, if you shall find that such undervaluation was made, the question for consideration will be, whether such undervaluation was made knowingly, that is, with a knowledge, on the part of the claimants, that the value stated ought to have been higher, in order to be the actual market value, or designedly; or whether it was the result of honest mistake or an accident. If you shall find that it was made knowingly or designedly, your verdict must be for the United States; otherwise, for the claimants. So, also, if you shall find that the claimants knowingly or designedly stated, in any invoice, a value less than the actual market value, knowing what that actual market value was, and that it was greater than the value stated in the invoice, it makes no difference as to what was the motive, or the reason, or the process of reasoning, on the part of the claimants, upon or by which they arrived at the value stated in the invoice.

The question as to the meaning of the word "knowingly," in the act of 1863, has been before the supreme court of the United States. The difference in language between the act of 1830 and the act of 1863, the former requiring an intent to evade or defraud the revenue, and the other requiring that the party shall knowingly make or attempt to make an entry by means of a false invoice, has been called to your attention; but there is no real difference in the meaning of the two expressions, as was decided by the supreme court in the Case of Clicquot's Champagne, before referred to. In that case, the district court in California was requested to charge the jury "that the word 'knowingly,' in the first section of the act of March 3, 1863, means, in connection with the language which accompanies and surrounds it, 'fraudulently.'" The district judge refused to give that instruction, and held that such was not the law, and his charge on that subject was approved by the supreme court, to which the case went, and which affirmed the judgment, in these words: "The court below was pressed to instruct the jury that 'knowingly' is used in the statute as the synonym of 'fraudulently.' The instruction given was eminently just, and we have nothing to add to it." The instruction given by the district court was this: "With regard to the question of intent, I am asked to charge you, that you should be convinced that these goods, if invoiced below their market value, were invoiced fraudulently below their market value. The previous statutes passed by congress had introduced, in many instances, the word 'fraudulently,' had defined the offence to be, making a false invoice 'with intent to defraud' the revenue, or evade the payment of duties." The learned judge here refers to the language of the act of 1830. He proceeds: "This statute," the statute of 1863, "apparently, ex industria, omits these expressions, and substitutes the words 'if the owner,' etc., 'shall knowingly make an entry by means of any false invoice,' etc. I do not feel at liberty, when the legislature had left out the word 'fraudulently,' and inserted the word 'knowingly,' to reinstate the word 'fraudulently.' At the same time, I am bound to say, that I cannot conceive any case where an entry could be knowingly made by means of a false invoice, unless it were fraudulently made. I do not tell you, in terms, that you are obliged to find that the entry was made fraudulently, but you are obliged to find that it was made knowingly, by means of a false invoice; and, for myself, I cannot imagine any case where it could be knowingly done, without being fraudulently done. What, then, shall we understand by this word, 'knowingly,' as here employed? It is, that, in making out this invoice, and in swearing before the consul that such was the actual market value of the goods, the claimant knew better, and that he was swearing falsely." So, also, in regard to Thomass, in making the entry. If, when he swore on that entry, that the invoice and the declaration were true, and that the invoice contained the actual market value of the goods, he knew better, and knew that he was swearing falsely, he did it knowingly. In all the cases that have come before the courts of the United States, on this subject, a distinction is drawn between an undervaluation that takes place by mistake or accident and one that does not take place by mistake or accident. Where the undervaluation is shown to have occurred by mistake or accident of course it is excused; but where it is not shown to have occurred by mistake or accident it necessarily follows that it must have been made, in the sense of the statute, knowingly or with an intent to defraud the revenue. On that subject I cannot do better than to read to you a few words from the judgment of an eminent judge in a similar case—Judge Hopkinson, of Pennsylvania. The case is that of U. S. v. Twenty-Five Cases of Cloths [Case No. 16,563]. The judge says: "Supposing that you shall find that these goods are undervalued in the invoices, how are you to decide upon the fraudulent intent or design? In doing this, you will be influenced by the extent of the undervaluation. Is it enough to have been a temptation to fraud? Could it, on a large business, afford a great profit? Does it run, generally, through all the invoices? or is it only an occasional undervaluation that might have happened by accident, by mistake, without any design?" That shows the view of this learned judge as to the true test of this question of intent. Was it by accident or mistake on the one hand, or by design on the other? If it was by design or intent, then it was not by accident or mistake. If it was by accident or mistake, then it was not with intent or design. * * * The law presumes that there was at the time and place of the manufacture of the goods seized an actual market value thereof, and no evidence can be received or considered, under the law and under the oaths to the invoices, to show that there was not in fact such actual market value thereof. The cost of the goods will come under consideration, if at all, not as a substitute for market value, but merely as an item of evidence on the question as to what was the actual market value. Therefore, you must assume in this case that there was an actual market value for these goods at the time and place of their manufacture, the only question being to ascertain what such actual market value was. The claimants had no right to adopt any other standard of value than such actual market value; nor do I understand them as claiming that they had such right. They have stated in their declarations, and their agent has sworn in their oath on such entry, that such invoice contains the actual market value; and their claim is not that they had a right to set forth anything except the actual market value, but that the actual market value was the cost with the manufacturer's profit added at the per centage named in the testimony, and that such actual market value was no greater, according to their idea of actual market value. So, also, the claimants were required to state in their invoices the actual market value of their goods at the time and place of their manufacture, not only without regard to the cost thereof, but without regard to the profit or loss which might result from their consignment thereof, or any loss which may be shown in the end to have resulted therefrom. If they chose to take the cost and add a profit, and made up the actual market value in that way, and it turns out in the end that that is the actual market value, very well; but if it turns out in the end that that is less than the actual market value, the claimants cannot maintain under the law that they had a right to put in place of the actual market value the cost with the manufacturer's profit added. Nor is the manufacturer relieved or excused from stating in his invoice such actual market value, or justified in adopting any other standard of value, because he may not himself make sales at home of similar goods, but may consign all such goods for sale to foreign markets. Although he may adopt such course of trade, he is nevertheless required to state in his invoice the actual market value of such goods at the time and place of their completed manufacture.

Very many remarks were made to you in the course of the trial and summing up upon the subject of informers, the seizure of books and papers, the seizure of goods, and other subjects of a like character, which are entirely foreign from this case, and upon which I shall spend no time, except to say they have nothing to do with any question on which you are to pass.

I have been requested by the counsel for the claimants to give you seventeen instructions which have been presented to me. Most of them are covered by what I have already said, but there are some things in them to which it is my duty to refer in order that nothing material may be omitted.

The first proposition is a correct one, and I charge you accordingly: "There are two questions of fact to be considered and determined by the jury: (1) Were the ribbons under seizure invoiced by Frey, Thurneyson & Christ at the actual market value thereof at the time when and in the country where the same were manufactured? (2) If they were not so invoiced was the false valuation made knowingly, or with intent to evade the payment of duty legally chargeable thereon? Before the jury can return a verdict for the United States in this case, they must answer both of these questions in the affirmative."

The second, third, fourth, and fifth requests relate to matters that are kindred to each other. I do not charge in accordance with those requests, except to the extent that I shall hereafter indicate. The substance of the second request is, that, inasmuch as the invoice is required to be produced to a consul abroad, accompanied by a declaration endorsed thereon, and inasmuch as the consul is required to place upon it a certificate of a certain character, and inasmuch as the law requires that no invoice shall be admitted to entry unless it has this certificate, and inasmuch as it also requires that no consular officer shall certify any invoice unless he shall be satisfied that the statements made in it by the manufacturer are true, and inasmuch as a punishment is imposed upon the consul if he knowingly and falsely certifies to any invoice, and inasmuch as all consular officers are to be governed by regulations and instructions to be given by the secretary of state, in respect to certifying invoices under the provisions of the first section of the act of March 3, 1863, and inasmuch as the secretary of state of the United States, by circular No. 59, dated April 20, 1866, officially instructed all consular officers that they will be held responsible for any want of truth and correctness in invoices certified by them, and will be expected to keep themselves informed as to the kinds, qualities, and market value of the merchandise exported from their respective districts to the United States, and to see that each invoice exhibits a fair and true description of the merchandise to which it relates, and contains a true statement of the price and value thereof, the jury are at liberty to presume that the consul did his duty as to investigating and certifying the correctness of the value of the ribbons stated in the invoices under seizure. I do not charge that.

I am also requested to charge the third proposition, which I do not charge. The substance of it is, that the law made it the duty of the collector here to cause the actual market value of the goods at Basle to be appraised by officers appointed for that purpose, and that, if the jury shall find that the collector failed to cause such appraisement to be made according to law, but seized the goods for undervaluation in the invoices, without any such appraisement, and delivered them to the importers on the payment of duty computed on the values contained in the invoices and stated in the entry, then they are permitted to take into consideration, as a part of the evidence in this case, such failure of the collector to submit the goods under seizure to the judgment of the appraisers, to ascertain their true market value in Switzerland at the time of their exportation therefrom, and also to take into consideration, as a fact in this cause, that if the importers or their consignee had been dissatisfied with the value of the ribbons fixed by the local appraisers, the former would have been entitled to a reappraisement made by an official appraiser familiar with the character, quality, and value of the goods.

I am also requested to charge the fourth proposition, which I do not charge. The substance of it is, that the jury are entitled to take into consideration, as facts in this cause, that if the ribbons under seizure had been appraised by the official appraisers of the government, as the law requires, and the appraised value had exceeded by the amount of as much as ten per cent. the value thus declared on entry, then, in addition to the regular duty of sixty per cent. on the appraised value, the law required the collector to levy an additional duty of twenty per cent. on such appraised value; and, also, that there is no evidence that the government ever levied or exacted duty on the theory of valuation set up by it in this suit, but, having all the property in its hands, delivered it to the importers without any such exaction, and on the theory that the invoice valuation was correct.

I am also requested to charge you the fifth proposition, which I do not charge. The substance of it is that, as all the invoices produced by the government, from Frey, Thurneyson & Christ, of importations made prior to the goods under seizure, were reported by the official appraiser at the customhouse to the collector to be correct, the jury are entitled, and it is their duty, to take that fact into consideration, especially if they shall find that the collector refused or failed to submit the sixteen cases of ribbons under seizure to the judgment of the appraisers as to the foreign market value thereof.

What I have to say on the subject of the second, third, fourth, and fifth requests is this: You have a right to take into consideration, as part of the evidence in this case on the subject of market value, the declaration before the consul, the certificate of the consul, everything that appears on the invoices and the entries, all the evidence that has been given in explanation of what appears on the faces of the invoices and entries, the fact that the duty was paid at the invoice valuations, and the fact that there appears to have been no raising by appraisement of any of the invoice valuations,—all these facts in reference not only to the invoices of the goods in suit, but to all the invoices put in evidence. But, upon that subject, I must give you some further instructions, in order to show you precisely the effect of these declarations, certificates of consuls, entries at the customhouse, and raising or not raising of invoice valuations on appraisement in a case of seizure of goods for fraud. The appraisement and reappraisement of goods is for the purpose of getting at the duty, and for no other object. It is a mode of litigation between the parties,—the government, on the one side, and the importer, on the other,—to find out how much duty is to be paid on the goods; and, when that machinery is gone through with, by appraisement and reappraisement, and the duties are paid, and the merchandise is delivered, that transaction is settled, so far as the duties are concerned, and the government afterwards, even though it finds that there has been a mistake, cannot recover from any one, by a lien on the goods or by a suit against the individual, any more duty. It is conclusive upon that subject, but only upon that subject. It is not conclusive if a fraud has been committed. It does not condone or pardon any fraud that has been committed by any false invoice, or any knowing, intentional, wilful undervaluation. A forfeiture for fraud can be enforced after appraisement, reappraisement, payment of duty, and delivery of the goods. The appraisement system is for all cases, and ordinarily presupposes an honest invoice, but a mistaken one, and a payment of too little duty.

This subject came up before the same learned judge (Judge Hopkinson) in the case to which I have already referred (U. S. v. Twenty-Five Cases of Cloths), on a seizure of twenty-five cases of cloths. His remarks on it were these, and I give them to you as part of my instructions: "To invoice the goods below their actual value and cost, and to enter them by that invoice, with design to evade the duties, is, per se, an offence which forfeits them, whether the invoice was afterward instrumental in the estimation of the duties for that purpose or not." So, in this case, the offence was completed, if there was any offence, when the entry was made, because the offence consisted in making the entry; and whether the invoice, if it was a false one, was used as an instrument to estimate the duties, is of no consequence with reference to the offence, because the offence was completed before any such use was made of the invoice. "The evidence must follow the issue, and must depend upon the facts to be proved. When the question is, whether an importer has paid the duties legally chargeable upon his goods"—and that is not the question in a case of seizure—"it may be enough for him to say, 'I have paid all that the officers of the government appointed to ascertain them declared to be due,' and the question should rest. But when the inquiry is, whether he has been guilty of a specific fraud or not, it would be extraordinary if the acts or opinions of men in reference to another subject should be conclusive, either for his condemnation or acquittal." In that case it was pressed upon the court that the goods had been appraised at the invoice prices. Such fact amounted to no more than the utmost effect that can be given to what appears, in this case, on the face of the invoices, because nothing more can be inferred in this case than that there was in fact an appraisement at the invoice prices. The judge says: "It is contended that, as these goods were appraised at the customhouse in New York at the invoice prices, that, as they were passed through that customhouse on that appraisement, paid the duties according to that appraisement, and were thereupon delivered to the importers, they are now exempted from all further inquiry into their cost or value, not only in relation to the amount of duties legally chargeable on them, but on a prosecution for fraud in making up those invoices, and on any or every other account, that the very fraud by which it is alleged, in this prosecution, the passing of the goods through the customhouse was obtained,—that is, the false invoices,—cannot now be inquired into. I can by no means assent to this doctrine, which, in my judgment, would be to offer a premium for successful fraud, and punishment only to the unskilful. I adhere, on reflection, to the opinion I gave on the trial. I will add but a remark. It is said these officers are the appointed agents of the government, and that the government is bound by their acts. The answer is plain. The government does not claim any right or privilege for itself that every citizen does not possess. Suppose one of you should appoint an agent to sell your house or goods, with even more clear and full powers than those given to the appraiser by the acts of congress. Your agent makes a sale, but it is afterward proved that he has been grossly defrauded by the purchaser, by false representation, by the suppression of the truth, by that which constitutes fraud in the law. Would you suppose you are bound by such a transaction—that the cheat is safe, and may retain your property only by saying that it was delivered to him by your agent?"

It has not been contended by the counsel for the claimants in this case, who have had too much experience in this class of cases to advance any such proposition, that the doctrine thus contended for before Judge Hopkinson, and which he declared not to be the law, is the law; and I have made these remarks on the subject only in order that you may see clearly the distinction between the questions involved in the mode of arriving at the duty, and the questions that arise on the seizure of goods.

I charge you in accordance with the sixth proposition: "The actual market value which the law required to be inserted in the invoices in suit was the fair and real worth in money of the ribbons described therein, at the time and in the country of manufacture, which was Switzerland, or, in other words, the sum which the manufacturer would have been willing to receive therefor, and persons familiar with the character and quality of the merchandise, and the condition of the market, and desiring to purchase, would have been willing to pay." That is what I have already charged.

I decline to charge the seventh proposition: "The government assails the correctness of the valuation of the ribbons in the given invoices under seizure, and asserts that such invoices are false in respect to market value. It is, therefore, necessary for the government to satisfy the jury, beyond reasonable doubt, that there was an ascertainable market value of these identical ribbons, within the meaning of the law, and what that value was. The government must establish a standard of value in centimes or francs to which the invoices ought to have been conformed, before it can ask the jury to say that the inculpated invoices are false; and, if the government fails to establish such standard to the satisfaction of the jury, their verdict must be for the claimants."

Then comes the eighth proposition, in reference to which I shall be obliged to make some remarks: "The market value to which the law required Messrs. Frey, Thurneyson & Christ to conform the invoices now on trial is to be predicated of the markets in Switzerland, not in the United States. Prices anywhere except in Switzerland are to be disregarded by the jury; and, therefore, prices which the consignors in Basle either urged or directed their consignees to realize in New York, with or without deducting all expenses, are as irrelevant and impertinent to the issue the jury are to try as would be prices for which the seized ribbons actually sold in this city. It is not the price at which these manufacturers held their ribbons for sale in New York, the prices at which, taking into consideration all the incidents and risks of the adventure, the ribbons stood them in New York, the prices at which they freely offered them in the market of New York, the prices they were willing to receive for them if sold in the ordinary course of trade in New York, but it is to Switzerland alone the law looks in respect to all these things, and, therefore, such valuations put upon their property when in New York are utterly foreign to the issue now to be submitted to the jury." These propositions are true to a certain extent. Undoubtedly, the selling price in New York, the value in New York, has nothing to do with this question, as you have seen in the course of the trial; and the evidence derived from the letters of Frey, Thurneyson & Christ, as to what they said the goods cost them, laid down in New York, is of no value or weight in this case, except so far as it is evidence of cost in Basle, to contradict other evidence given in regard to cost in Basle. The government has produced the letters as the statements of Frey, Thurneyson & Christ, as to what certain goods cost them delivered in New York; and you have heard the testimony of Viollier, whereby, after making certain deductions from such cost, he arrives at what the government claims was the cost in Switzerland, and a cost higher than that contained in invoices made up on the basis of cost, with five per cent. addition, and which the manufacturers stated to be the true market value at the time. It is only in that aspect that such evidence is of any value whatever, and it is only of consequence upon the question of intent, because it has no bearing except upon the valuations contained in in-voices that were made long prior to the invoices in suit. Prices in New York are of no consequence whatever as evidence of market value in Basle, except in reference to that particular branch of the case of which I have just spoken.

I charge you in accordance with the ninth proposition: "The government does not claim that the invoices of the ribbons under seizure are false in any other respect than their value in Switzerland, and, therefore, the provision of the act of March 3, 1863, which forfeits merchandise entered at the customhouse by a consignee, on an invoice which he thinks false in that particular, does not relieve the government from the obligation of establishing, to the satisfaction of the jury, what was the real worth of the property, in the sense of a fair buying and selling value, at the time and place of its production. The intelligent or unintelligent, the honest or dishonest, opinion which a consignee may entertain of the real foreign value of the property he enters at the customhouse in behalf of its foreign owner, cannot work a forfeiture thereof, in the face of countervailing evidence as to its value abroad."

The tenth proposition is correct: "If the jury find the market value of the ribbons under seizure to be set forth in the invoice, then it is of no consequence what prices were given by Messrs. Frey, Thurneyson & Christ to Viollier, or, twenty days after, to Jones. The law of the United States, in this particular, takes no cognizance of fictitious prices, which, in the opinion of the jury, are different from the fair market value, as determined by real transactions of trade and business. A foreign manufacturer, sending his merchandise to the United States, is entitled to give to strangers or other persons whatever prices therefor he pleases, provided he places in his customhouse invoices its value in the actual markets of the country of production."

I charge you in accordance with the eleventh proposition: "If the jury shall find that the invoice prices of the ribbons under seizure are as much as they were worth or would have brought if offered for sale in the markets of Switzerland, at the time of the manufacture of the ribbons was complete, then it is of no consequence what was the actual cost of manufacturing the merchandise, or what Messrs. Frey, Thurneyson & Christ may have told Thomass or his firm was its cost, or how the manufacturers arrived at the prices stated in the invoices."

I charge you in accordance with the twelfth proposition: "The invoices and entries of ribbons imported by Messrs. Frey, Thurneyson & Christ, prior to the sixteen cases under seizure, are not admitted in evidence as showing or tending to show the market value of the said sixteen cases, but are permitted to go to the jury solely in relation to the intent with which the seized ribbons, now proceeded against, were undervalued, provided the jury shall come to the conclusion that such undervaluation exists. The jury must find undervaluation of the sixteen cases before they can take said prior importations into consideration." That is true, and I have already so charged you.

The thirteenth proposition is correct: "The invoices and entries of importations prior to those of the ribbons now proceeded against are not entitled to consideration by the jury in respect to the intent with which the invoices under seizure were made up, until the jury are satisfied, by evidence in the cause, of the actual market value of the ribbons contained in the first-named invoices and entries, at the time and place of their manufacture, and that such invoice valuations were knowingly or fraudulently made by Messrs. Frey, Thurneyson & Christ at less than said fair market value. To entitle the prior invoices to consideration on the question of intent, as before mentioned, the jury must be as well satisfied that such invoices were knowingly undervalued as they must be that the invoices now proceeded against were knowingly undervalued before they can find a verdict for the United States." That is true, and I have already so stated.

I charge you in accordance with the fourteenth proposition: "Among the methods of ascertaining the true interpretation to be put on the letter of Messrs. Frey, Thurneyson & Christ to Messrs Lefman, Kiefer & Thomass, dated Basle, July 1, 1862, in respect to the following prices named therein, to wit:

No.	1	1¼	2	3	4	6	9	12	16
	12½	17½	25½	30½	40	67	98	1.16	1.56

the description of currency referred to in such figures, and the general character and purpose of the valuations therein, the jury are entitled to take into consideration the price at which the ribbons contained in the invoice, dated July 11, 1862, and in the accounts sales of June 30, and July 8, 1862, were sold in currency or greenbacks, in New York, as follows, to wit:

No.	1	1¼	2	3	4	6	9	12
	11½	16½	21½	27½	37½	57½	87½	1.05

—with sales at auction at very much less prices."

I also charge in accordance with the fifteenth proposition: "In determining the actual market value of the ribbons under seizure at the time and place of their manufacture, or of the ribbons of prior importations, given in evidence in this cause, the jury are not entitled to take into consideration the price at which their owner held or holds them for sale, or freely offers them for sale, or which he is willing to receive for them, if they are sold in the market of New York."

I charge you in accordance with the sixteenth proposition: "The witness Thomass having sworn on the trial that, for a series of years prior to and including the early part of the year 1866, he had repeatedly committed the offence of perjury under the law of the United States (Act March 3, 1825, § 13, 4 Stat. 118), by swearing falsely to the truth of invoices produced by him at the customhouse, and, having also sworn on behalf of the government, on this trial, that the said invoices so produced were false as to the market value therein, and that he then knew them to be thus false, and the last-named testimony of the witness Thomass being in direct contradiction in relation to the same transaction to the oaths made by him at the customhouse, it is not entitled to credit, and ought not to be regarded by the jury unless supported by other evidence to the same point."

The seventeenth proposition I decline to charge: "In respect to the contents of letters asserted by the witness Thomass to have been destroyed, his evidence is unsupported by any other testimony, and, therefore, ought to be and must be disregarded by the jury." That proposition I refuse to charge, because it is a matter of fact, and one for your consideration solely.

There is but one other point to which it is necessary I should call your attention, and that relates to the burden of proof. The law on that subject has been the law since the year 1799, and was affirmed by the supreme court no longer ago than in December, 1865, in the Case of Clicquot's Champagne, to which I have already referred, where the court say: "It is argued that the rule relating to probable cause and the onus probandi, prescribed in the seventy-first section of the act of 1799, is confined to prosecutions under that act, and has no application to those under the act of 1863, which is silent upon the subject. It would be a singular result, if in a prosecution upon an information containing counts upon this and later statutes in pari materia, the rule should apply to a part of the counts and not to others. The seventieth and seventy-first sections must be construed together. They both look to future and further legislation. In all the changes which the revenue laws have undergone, neither has been repealed. The authority to seize out of the district of the seizing officer, and this rule of onus probandi, have always been regarded as permanent features of the revenue system of the country." And they affirm the charge of the district judge, and his refusal to charge as requested by the claimants in that case, that the burden of proof was not upon the claimants, but was upon the prosecution. Now, the law upon that subject is this—that where probable cause is shown for the prosecution—and in this case, and in all cases, it is for the court to decide whether probable cause is shown for the prosecution, and the court decides that there is such probable cause by throwing the claimants upon their defence, as it did in this case—where probable cause is shown for the prosecution, the burden of proof is thrown upon the claimants to dispel the suspicion, and to explain the circumstances which seem to render it probable there has been a knowing undervaluation. The government in this case, having established probable cause, it is for the claimants to show their innocence, and dispel and clear up the suspicion which the government in the beginning raised against them. Under this rule it is for you to say whether the claimants have made out their defence, and have shown that these ribbons were invoiced at a value as high as their actual market value in Basle, at the time they were manufactured, or that the failure so to invoice them was the result of accident or mistake, and not of knowledge or intent. The actual undervaluation must be found by you as a matter of fact in this case, in order to warrant a verdict for the United States. If there was no undervaluation, your verdict will be for the claimants. If there was an undervaluation, you will then proceed to the next question which is whether there was any knowledge on the part either of the manufacturers and consignors in Switzerland, or of their agent here, who entered the goods at the customhouse, that there was such undervaluation. You must find that fact also in favor of the United States, in order to find a verdict for the United States; because, it may happen in some cases, that there may be an undervaluation and yet not a knowing undervaluation. You must find that there was not only an undervaluation, but a knowing undervaluation, on the part of the consignors or the consignees, before you can find in favor of the government; and, if you find either that there was not an undervaluation, or, if there was, that there was no knowledge of it, but it was made by accident or mistake, and not by design, on the part either of the senders of the goods or of their consignees here, you will find for the claimants.

This case being one of so great importance to the parties interested, and to the public, no apology is needed for the time I have occupied in presenting it to you. I have desired that you should have a full and clear view of every question connected with it which could possibly come up in the course of your discussions, and of the application of the evidence to the law, and I now commit it to you, satisfied that you will bestow upon its decision the same attention and patience which you have manifested throughout the trial.

The jury found a verdict for the claimants.

Case No. 16,302.

UNITED STATES v. SIXTEEN HOGSHEADS OF TOBACCO.

[2 Bond, 137.] [1]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1867.

FORFEITURES UNDER INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—SEIZURE OF TOBACCO—TOOLS, IMPLEMENTS, ETC.—FRAUD—PLEADING.

1. Under section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 101], in a proceeding against a manufacturer of tobacco, alleging frauds under said section, the raw material found, if intended to be used for a fraudulent purpose, may be seized, and is subject to forfeiture, without reference to the place where it is found.

2. It is not necessary to set forth the facts from which the fraudulent intention alleged is inferred. It is sufficient that the charge of fraud is made in the words of the statute.

3. But in reference to tools, implements, and other personal property, the statute makes it necessary, as a ground of forfeiture, that they should be found in the place or building, or within the yard or inclosure, where they were intended to be used; and an article in an information, claiming a forfeiture of such property, is defective without such averment.

4. As there is no such averment in this information, the exception to that part of the fifth article, claiming the forfeiture of tools, implements, etc., is sustained.

5. The district attorney is, however, allowed to amend said article; but, if not amended, the court will order this part of the property seized to be restored to the claimants.

Information of forfeiture.

R. M. Corwine, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Stallo & Kittredge, for claimants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This is an information, filed by the district attorney, claiming the forfeiture of sixteen hogsheads of tobacco and other property, on five different allegations of fraud set forth in separate articles in the information. The claimants of the property proceeded against are Meyerman & Kenneweg, extensive dealers in and manufacturers of tobacco, in the city of Cincinnati. They have appeared by counsel, and have filed exceptions to the information, which present the first question for the consideration of the court.

The exceptions are to the fifth article in the information, and are based upon the ground that the property specified in that article was not subject to seizure, and is not liable to forfeiture under this information. The claimants ask, therefore, that this property may be released from seizure and restored to their possession. The decision of this question does not require a special notice of the other articles in the information. All the articles are based on section 9 of the revenue statute of July 13, 1866. They allege several distinct acts of fraud, on the part of the claimants, in conducting their establishment as manufacturers of tobacco. It is claimed by the district attorney, that under the sweeping operation of the section referred to, not only the manufactured tobacco, found in the possession of the claimants, or within their custody or control, but also all raw material, and all the tools, implements, furniture, and other personal property pertaining to the manufactory, were infected with fraud and subject to seizure and forfeiture. Section 9 is very comprehensive in its language. It authorizes the seizure and provides for the forfeiture of all articles or property, subject to taxation, in the possession or custody of the manufacturer, for the purpose of being removed or sold, with intent to evade the payment of the tax imposed on them, and the collector has reason to believe fraud is intended. The section also provides, that all raw material on hand, intended to be used for a fraudulent purpose, shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture. And then follows a clause, declaring that "all tools, implements, instruments, and personal property whatever, in the place or building, or within any yard or inclosure where such articles on which duties are imposed as aforesaid, and intended to be used in the fraudulent manufacture of such raw material, shall be found," shall be forfeited.

As stated before, the exception is to the fifth article of the information, so far as it claims the forfeiture of the raw material, and the tools, implements, and other personal property of the claimants. The counsel for the claimants insist that this article is defective, and does not come within the terms of section 9 of the statute, in not averring that the raw material, tools, etc., were found "within any yard or inclosure," as provided for in that section. In other words, it is claimed that this property, under the allegations of the fifth article, was not liable to seizure, and no judgment of forfeiture can pass against it. As to the raw material seized, it is clear the exception can not be sustained. It is immaterial where it was found, or in whose possession, if it be alleged it was intended to be fraudulently used or disposed of. This is distinctly averred in the fifth article in the information, and is within the words of the statute referred to. It is not necessary to set forth the facts from which the fraudulent intention alleged is inferred. It is sufficient that the charge of fraud is made in the words of the statute. The fact of the fraudulent intent will be a matter of inquiry and proof on the hearing. But the fifth article, in relation to the tools, implements, etc., is clearly defective, in not alleging they were found in the place or building, or within the yard or inclosure where they were intended to be fraudulently used. The object of this provision obviously was, to prevent the future use of the tools and implements for a fraudulent purpose. And the statute makes it material, as a ground of forfeiture, that they should be found on or about the manufactory in reference to which the charges of fraud are made.

They may, by a fair sale, have passed into the possession of a bona fide holder, and may be found at a place and under circumstances negativing any presumption of their use for any fraudulent purpose. It is, therefore, a just and reasonable requirement of the statute, that to subject them to forfeiture the property should have been found on the premises of the manufactory. And if this, under the statute, is a necessary basis of forfeiture, it must be set forth in the information. This exception to the information must therefore be sustained.

But leave will be given to the district attorney to amend the information, by adding to the fifth article the necessary averment, if it can be so amended, in reference to the facts of the case. If not so amended, the court has clearly the power to order the restoration of the property in question to the claimant; and such an order will be made on application for that purpose.

Case No. 16,303.

UNITED STATES v. SIXTEEN PACKAGES.

[2 Mason, 48.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1819.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURES FOR UNDERVALUATION—"ACTUAL COST."

The 66th section of the revenue act of 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 631; 1 Stat. 677, c. 22], by the terms "actual cost," means the true and real price paid for the goods in case of a bona fide sale, and the forfeiture is not inflicted by that section, when the goods are invoiced according to such price, on a real bona fide sale, although the purchase be below the ordinary market price. But the terms "actual cost" do not apply to the case of a voluntary gift or conveyance, where the substantial consideration is not money, or its equivalent estimated at a money price. Nor do they apply to a case where the consideration is partly money and partly love and affection.

Information on the 66th section of the collection act of 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 631; 1 Stat. 677, c. 22], for a forfeiture of the goods in question. Upon the issues joined in the district court, the jury found a verdict for the claimant, on which judgment was rendered in that court. [Case unreported.] A bill of exceptions was taken to the charge of the judge, and the present writ of error was brought to reverse that judgment.

The facts of the case were as follows: In the month of August, 1817, the merchandise in question was duly entered at the custom house in Boston, by Messrs. Whitwell, Bond and Company, on behalf of Thomas Winterbottam, a British subject, to whom the said merchandise belonged at the time of its importation into the United States. At the time of the entry of the said merchandise, an invoice of the same, bearing date at Huddersfield, in England, July 5th, 1817, was exhibited to the collector, by the said Whitwell, Bond and Company, as the true and original invoice, by which it appeared that the actual cost of the said merchandise, after a deduction of certain allowances therein specified as having been made to the said Thomas Winterbottam, was the sum of £2,293 7s. and no more. The said Thomas Winterbottam was the son of Benjamin Winterbottam, an extensive cloth manufacturer of Huddersfield, in England, and it appeared that he had purchased these goods of his father, sometime in June, 1817. These goods were appraised by order of the collector, and in conformity with the provisions of the 66th and 67th sections of the act of congress, of March 2, 1799, regulating the collection of duties, in consequence of the collector's suspicions that they were not invoiced at their true value. Upon this appraisement the value of said merchandise was estimated at £2,830 2s. 8d. sterling, after a deduction of all such charges thereon as in the opinion of the appraisers ought to have been deducted. The testimony of respectable merchants residing in Boston, who were importers and extensive dealers in cloths of every description manufactured in England, was produced, showing that the prices of some of the cloths, as estimated in the said invoice, were from twelve and a half to twenty-five per cent. lower than cloths of the same description and quality purchased by them, at about the same time, although they purchased under great advantages; and that the cloths in the said invoice were estimated at a lower rate than the market price at that time, and in that country. It was also testified by the same witnesses that the allowance of five per cent. for measures on some of the articles as mentioned in the said invoice, or any allowance whatever for measure on articles of that description was a circumstance which they had never before heard of, and was altogether unusual. It was also given in evidence, on the part of the United States, that the customary allowance at the manufactories in England, for prompt pay, on the purchase of goods of the description here alluded to, was at the time of this purchase, from five to seven and a half per cent. And none of the witnesses had ever known an instance of so large a discount as ten per cent.

The deposition of Benjamin Winterbottam, the father of the importer, was produced, stating that the said Benjamin, being a manufacturer of cloths residing at Saddleworth, sold to his son, the claimant, the goods mentioned in the said invoice, in the month of

June, 1817, and that the prices stated in the said invoice thereof, before mentioned, were the fair and true prices at which the goods were sold by him, and that the several discounts therein stated to have been made by the deponent were correct and true, and that the prices at which he sold the goods in question were higher than he could have obtained for them at that time in any market in England. It was also stated in the deposition of one John Kilner, a woollen merchant of the said Huddersfield, that he was called upon by the claimant and his father to make out the said invoice of goods for a foreign market, that he did make out the same, and at the time he so made it, he was of opinion that the prices of some of the goods were charged too high, and that he then so stated his opinion. The district judge charged the jury, that by the words actual cost and real cost, as they are employed in the first paragraphs of the 66th section of the act of congress before mentioned, was to be understood merely the price or sum of money which should appear to have been actually paid by the importer for the merchandise therein referred to at the place of exportation, and that though such price should be in any case at the place of exportation below the ordinary current value, still that the goods so purchased and so imported, could not be considered liable to the forfeiture provided in that section, in case it should appear, that the original invoice and entry at the custom house here were in conformity with the price thus actually paid by the purchaser, and the purchase was real and genuine. And the judge furthermore delivered his opinion to the jury, that in case a father, being a manufacturer of cloths in England, should make a sale of merchandise to his son, and being disposed to shew him some indulgence in the bargain, should fix the price of the goods so sold at a sum below their common and ordinary value, and the invoice thereof should be made out and delivered accordingly, and the son should afterwards bring such goods to the United States, and cause their entry with the collector to be made in conformity with such invoice without apprising the collector of the indulgence so given in the purchase, this circumstance alone would not subject such goods to forfeiture under the provisions of the 66th section of the act before mentioned: provided the jury should be of opinion that such sale was real and genuine, and that the deduction from the usual price was not for the purpose of giving an advantage in the estimation of duties. The said judge further gave it as his opinion to the jury, that if an importer of merchandise into the United States from a foreign port should happen to have purchased such merchandise at the place of exportation, at auction or otherwise, at a price below their ordinary value at such place, and receive his invoice accordingly, the entry of such merchandise with the collector of a port in the United States, in conformity with such invoice, would not subject the merchandise to forfeiture, under the provisions of the section of the act above mentioned, unless from the great difference of price, or some other circumstance proved, the jury should infer an intent to evade the duties; and that in case they should be satisfied, from the evidence in the case, that the said Thomas Winterbottam did in reality purchase the goods in question of his father Benjamin, at the prices mentioned in the invoice; and if the jury should be of opinion that the sale was true and bona fide, although these prices might be below the rate at which the said Benjamin would have been willing to sell them to a third person, not thus connected with him, and also below the ordinary value at the place of exportation; yet, that the subsequent entry of said goods at the custom house in Boston, by the said Thomas, in conformity with said invoice, would not subject said goods to the forfeiture provided in the before mentioned section of the act of congress, unless the jury should believe, from the circumstances proved in the case, that there was a design to evade the duties on the goods.

G. Blake, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Hubbard & Webster, for claimant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. It is unnecessary to give any opinion as to the exactness or regularity of the pleadings in this case, because the only errors relied on by the district attorney, are, if at all, to be found in the charge of the learned judge of the district court, as it stands in the bill of exceptions.

The count in the information, which alone is material in the present inquiry, is founded on the 66th section of the revenue act of 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 631; 1 Stat. 677, c. 22], which enacts "that if any goods, &c. of which entry shall have been made in the office of a collector, shall not be invoiced according to the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation, with design to evade the duties thereupon, or any part thereof, all such goods, &c. or the value thereof, to be recovered of the person making the entry, shall be forfeited." The section then proceeds to provide for a valuation to be made of any goods, which the collector shall suspect not to be invoiced at a sum equal to that for which they have been usually sold in the place or country from which they were imported, according to which valuation the duties are to be paid or secured; with a proviso that such valuation shall not, in case of a prosecution for the forfeiture under the first clause, exclude at the trial other proof of the actual and real cost of the goods at the place of exportation.

The 36th section of the same act requires the owners and consignees of imported goods to make an entry thereof at the custom house, specifying, among other things, the prime cost and charges thereof; and at the same time to produce the original invoices of the same goods; and further to make oath that the entry contains a just and true account of the cost of the goods, including all charges, and that the invoices are true and genuine. The 61st section of the same act declares that the ad valorem rates of duties on imported goods shall be estimated by adding twenty per cent. to the actual cost, if imported from the Cape of Good Hope, or any place beyond the same; and by adding ten per cent. to the actual cost, if imported from any other place, including all charges; commissions, outside packages and insurance only excepted.

It is apparent that the terms "actual cost," "real cost," and "prime cost," used in these sections, are phrases of equivalent import, and mean the true and real price paid for the goods upon a genuine bona fide purchase. The language is wholly inapplicable to any case of a gift or voluntary conveyance, or where any thing but money, or its equivalent, mingles substantially in the consideration. In such cases there is no pretence to say that any specific price is paid as the whole estimated value or actual cost of the goods; and the sections apply, in terms only, to sales where there is a real invoice price charged and accounted for between the parties. For a like reason cases of barter of goods for goods, or goods for services, or goods for lands, where no specific value in money is fixed in the purchase, are without the purview of these sections, and are to be regulated by the other provisions of the act. But if in point of fact the sale be real and genuine, and the invoice exhibit what was the true and entire consideration, which passed between the parties on such sale, it is immaterial, so far as respects the forfeiture inflicted by the 66th section, whether the purchase be at a public or private sale, or whether the price fall below the ordinary current value or not. All that this section requires is that the invoice should contain a true statement of the actual cost of the goods in a case of a bona fide purchase; and the forfeiture does not and cannot attach, unless the goods are not invoiced according to that actual cost, with design to evade the payment of the proper duties. The forfeiture therefore stands upon the ground of meditated fraud; and was not meant to be applied to cases of innocent mistake, or unintentional error. If indeed the goods be invoiced greatly below the ordinary price, it affords a very strong presumption, that the sale is not genuine, but is infected with fraud in its very concoction; and cases may easily be imagined in which this presumption would be so very urgent that it would justly outweigh all positive testimony and be conclusive on the party. Between such cases however and slight deductions from the ordinary price there are many shades of distinction, which would cast more or less darkness on the presumption, and it is not difficult to reach a point at which it would wholly vanish. The presumption in all these cases is but a presumption of fact, of which the jury are to judge and to give their verdict accordingly.

And there is the soundest reason and justice in the law as thus interpreted; for it requires the party to swear to the actual cost; and if he has purchased somewhat below the ordinary price, he cannot, in foro conscientiæ, be justified in making oath to a higher invoice. It would not be the true original price and invoice. The law demands of him entire good faith, and does not mean to ensnare him to his ruin by disclosing the real bargain. If the price however be below the usual price, the collector has a right to have the goods appraised; and the duties paid according to such appraisement. But it is not a necessary consequence, if such appraisement exceed the invoice price, that the goods are forfeited. The act expressly provides otherwise; and if it did not, the same must have been the correct judicial interpretation. Two facts must concur to produce a forfeiture; first that the goods are not invoiced according to the actual cost: secondly, that this is done with a design to evade the payment of the regular duties.

If with these principles in view we examine the charge of the learned judge of the district court, it will not be found difficult to vindicate its entire correctness. The first point in that charge, containing an exposition of the words "actual cost" and "real cost," in the 66th section, has been already sufficiently considered. The next clause puts the case of a sale by a manufacturer to his son, as to which the learned judge declares that if the sale be real and genuine, and the father, on such sale, with a view to a parental indulgence to his son in the bargain, sell to him at a price below the ordinary value of the goods, and such deduction in price is not with intent to evade the payment of duties, and the goods are invoiced at the price, and entered according to the invoice at the custom house, the circumstance of such a sale would not alone subject the goods to forfeiture. In order to bring this declaration to a legal test, we must examine it with all its limitations. In the first place there must be a real and genuine sale between the father and the son. This of course excludes the case, where the consideration is substantially in part money, and in part love and affection; or where the case is in whole or in part a gift. As for instance where the father transfers goods to the son for fifty per cent. below their ordinary market value, with the intent of making a present of the other half price. There is no pretence to say that this is a genuine sale, or that an invoice at such a diminished price could be the "actual cost," in the proper sense of those terms as used in the act. It would seem hardly possible, if such an invoice were produced at the custom house, and the goods entered thereby, that a jury should hesitate to pronounce that it was a fraud upon the law. But there is a wide distinction between such a case, and the case, where a father, with a view to favor his son, and not to drive a hard bargain with him, makes a small deduction from his ordinary prices, for in such a case the transaction is in substance a sale. It will not do to say that all the motives which lead to a sale at a diminished price are to be nicely weighed, and that if other considerations than money or its equivalent, in however minute a degree, mingle in these motives, the case is to be stripped of its character as a sale; we must look to the substance of the transaction and see, not whether favor, friendship or kindness, in small portions, mingled in it, but whether there was in fact in the contemplation of the parties, a gift, or a sale, or a mixture of both, resulting from considerations partly pecuniary and partly of love and affection. In the next place, the learned judge limits his remarks by adding that the diminution in price (and of course the statement of it in the invoice) must not be "for the purpose of giving an advantage in the estimation of duties;" that is, in the language of the 66th section, not with a design to evade the payment of the duties. And certainly if there be not such a design, the forfeiture cannot arise under the terms of the act. There is therefore no error in law in this part of the charge. Without doubt a transaction of this kind between father and son, where the invoice prices are below the ordinary prices, is open to suspicion; and if the reduction from the ordinary prices be very considerable, the suspicion must necessarily be inflamed to a high degree. And a jury would be well justified, under such circumstances, in requiring the most plenary proof of the purest evidence, before they should place confidence in the transaction as a real sale, or acquit the party of an intent to evade the law. But after all it is but a question of fact, and no court can pronounce what deduction per se is, of itself, conclusive evidence of fraud.

The next case, put by the learned judge, of a purchase at auction, is certainly far less strong than that already considered; and I am yet to learn how in the case of a real purchase at auction, where a genuine correspondent invoice is used without any intent to evade the payment of duties, it is possible to contend with success for a forfeiture under the act. If it be, then it must be upon the ground that sales at auction are ipso facto fraudulent; or that the disclosure of the truth and innocence of a bona fide purchase is forbidden by the law. Consequences so absurd cannot be justly deduced from any fair construction of the statute.

The next and last point stated by the district judge in his charge is merely an application to the present case of the principles which he had already illustrated. If those principles were correct, then there is no error in the application; and after what has been said, it is scarcely necessary to add, that in the judgment of this court, there is nothing in this charge on which to hang a reasonable doubt. Whether, under the circumstances of this case, the jury might not have been well warranted in coming to a different verdict, is no part of our duty to consider. Let the judgment be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

District Court, D. Louisiana. 1869.

FORFEITURES UNDER INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—PAYMENTS TO INFORMERS.

In this, a case of seizure under the internal revenue, the judge ordered the property to be condemned. Harroll Wright intervened, claiming, as informer, one-half of the proceeds of forfeiture under the laws of congress. It appearing by the testimony of Collector Stockdale that the informer's claim was just, he was granted the fraction asked for.

UNITED STATES v. SIXTY 5-8 CARATS BRILLIANTS.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 25, 1872.

ERROR TO DISTRICT COURT — QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—DECISIONS OF FACT AND LAW.

1. After the condemnation of property, in the district court, as forfeited to the United States, for a violation of the customs laws, W. and E. each claimed a share as informer. That court adjudged that neither was informer, but awarded a share to W., as seizing officer, under section 1 of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 546). E. then sued out a writ of error from this court. Held that, on such writ, the decision of the district court that, as matter of fact, E. was not the first informer, could not be reviewed.

2. It was not an error in law for the district court to so decide, although the commissioner who, by order of that court, took the proofs, reported them with his opinion in favor of E.

3. A writ of error to the district court brings to the consideration of this court questions of law only.

officers of the United States, and, on information filed, was condemned, in the district court, as forfeited, because it was introduced into this country without the payment of duty. [Case unreported.] After condemnation, H. C. Whitely and F. S. Esmond each applied to the district court for an order adjudging him to be the informer entitled to share in the proceeds of the condemnation. Act March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 546, § 1. The district court, on a contest between the two claimants, decided and adjudged that neither of them was the first informer, nor entitled, as such, to share in the proceeds, and, there being no other claimant, the court decided that H. C. Whitely, as seizing officer, was entitled to share in the proceeds. Thereupon, a writ of error was procured and allowed, for the purpose of correcting what the said Esmond alleges to be error in the said order, to his prejudice.

Without considering the objection that no writ of error will lie for the correction of a proceeding of this kind, or the objection that, if it will lie, it is not in proper form, it must suffice to say, that a writ of error brings to the consideration of this court questions of law only. The complaint here is, that, upon questions of fact, strenuously contested, and in relation to which there was conflict of testimony, the district court came to an erroneous conclusion. It is quite immaterial to this party alleging error, whether the decision that Whitely was not the first informer was correct or not; and, if Esmond was not the first informer, then it is immaterial to him whether Whitely was or was not entitled as seizing officer. Esmond, in either case, is not aggrieved by the decision or adjudication. If he was not the first informer, he has no possible interest in the matter, and is not aggrieved. The district court found, as a fact, upon the evidence, that Esmond was not the first informer. That finding of fact is not the subject of review by writ of error, when the record does not show that any rules of law were violated, or any erroneous construction of the statute was applied to the facts proved.

The circumstance, that the proofs were, by order of the court, taken before a commissioner, and were reported with his opinion in favor of Esmond, does not affect this question. The district court was not bound, by law, to adopt the opinion of the commissioner as conclusive. It had power to, and did, look into the conflicting proofs reported by the commissioner, and, on finding, as a fact, that Esmond was not the first informer, made an adjudication, which, upon that finding, was a necessary legal result, namely, that he was not entitled to share in the proceeds of the forfeited property. I find no error of law which calls for any reversal of the order. Let it be affirmed.

Case No. 16,305a.

UNITED STATES v. SIXTY-FIVE PACKAGES OF GLASS.

[Betts, Scr. Bk. 23.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1838.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURE OF GOODS FOR FALSE ENTRY—BURDEN OF PROOF—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

[1. In a proceeding to forfeit goods because of fraudulent undervaluation, the fact that they were invoiced and entered at only about one-half the invoice price of like goods purchased by other importers at the same time and imported by the same vessel, justifies the customs officials in making the seizure, and puts the burden on the claimants to substantiate the invoice by clear proofs, admissible under the ordinary rules of evidence.]

[2. Where an importer purchases goods through an agent in Europe, and the agent, though having a lien for advances, surrenders the goods to the importer for much less than the purchase price, because the latter is unable to pay more, the sum for which they are thus surrendered is not the proper invoice price, but the invoice should be at the original price at which the agent purchased the goods.]

[3. But, if the agent violated his authority in purchasing the goods, and thereby made them his own, the importer would have a right to purchase them from the agent as owner; and, if he obtained them at a reduced price, this would be the price at which they should be invoiced and entered, although much below the prevailing price of like goods.]

This was a suit for the forfeiture of 65 packages of glass, imported by the claimants in October, 1838, and alleged to have been entered at the custom house below their cost, in order to defraud the revenue.

In opening the case to the jury, the district attorney, Mr. Butler, said: It is supposed by some of those persons who take it upon themselves to enlighten public courts and juries, that cases of this kind are to be regarded as mere controversies between the custom house and the importer, and that if the latter can prove he committed no fraud, and the jury find for him, it seems some persons think that the custom house officer is subject to reproach. This is inconsistent with the very first principles of public liberty. An act of congress has imposed certain duties and established various regulations for the protection not only of the manufacturer, but also of the honest merchant. And when these regulations are carried into effect, in good faith, by public officers, and that they, acting on their oaths, consider that goods have been entered far below the cost at which they could be imported, and far below the ordinary cost of articles of that description, in such case, the collector, as a faithful public officer, has no more right to let those goods pass, without a judicial procedure, than he would have to remit one-half the duty to any person he chose, at the expense of the government and the honest merchant. The goods were entered at 8,665 francs, and entered by the claimants as owners, in which case they were bound to enter the goods at the price they cost where they were purchased. On being examined at the custom house, the articles appeared to have been entered so much below the ordinary price of such goods, so much lower than goods which were imported in the same vessel, that the collector seized them and had them appraised, and several dealers in the article appraised these goods at 16,753 francs, being nearly 100 per cent. more than the price at which they were entered. This was the case for the United States.

Mr. Cutting opened the case for the claimants, and said: The district attorney has made observations of rather a singular character for the opening of such a case as this, in relation to which I shall make one or two remarks. The learned gentleman wishes you to believe that a great deal of odium or reproach has been cast on the custom house officers, and that you ought not, by your verdict, make that odium greater than it is. I came not here to cast odium on any person, but I came here to protect the character of respectable men, and I ask you, gentlemen of the jury, if you are bound to protect the custom house officers, are you not at least equally bound to protect an honest merchant from the imputation of perjury? Whether odium exists in relation to the custom house, I will not say, but I will say that when the whole public once form an opinion, such opinion is generally correct, and, if odium does exist, I must necessarily come to the conclusion that there was good cause for it. Mr. Hoyt may rest assured that if he acts fairly and correctly he will be fully sustained by the public, but if he prosecutes merchants, locks up their goods, puts them to unnecessary cost, trouble, and inconvenience, and drags them before a court and jury, and does it too often, public odium will most certainly and deservedly attach to him.

Mr. Cutting then stated that, notwithstanding the goods had been invoiced and entered at a price so much below the ordinary cost of such goods, it was nevertheless the actual price which the claimants paid for them. And in order to account for the articles having been purchased so low, it was stated that in the spring of 1837 the claimants sent an order to the house of Allamand, Freres & Herseut, of Paris, with whom the claimants had considerable dealings, to procure the articles in question, and forward them to this city, and that Allamand & Co. so far acted on this order as to procure the articles from Launay, Hauton & Co., glass manufacturers at Paris, who agreed to execute the order for 14,238 francs. In consequence of the then commercial embarrassments in this city, and also a considerable debt being due them by Morlot & Co., Allamand & Co. did not forward the goods, and retained them in their own possession. In September, 1838, R. Morlot was in Paris to settle the affairs of his house with Allamand & Co., who had the glass then in their possession, and who sold it to Morlot for 8,565 francs. Of the reduction thus made by Allamand & Co. from what the goods cost them they were allowed ten per cent. by the manufacturers, who deducted so much from the price, because they had not delivered the goods to Allamand & Co. in due time, and the remaining loss of 4 and 5,000 francs Allamand & Co. thought proper to submit to, in order not to have the goods lying on their hands, and therefore sold it to Morlot & Co. for 8,655 francs, being the price at which it was entered at this custom house.

In support of these allegations, the deposition of Allamand, taken at Paris, was read, and in this deposition he swore that his house sold Morlot the glass in question at the price at which it was entered at the custom house in New York, and that they did so as they had a large quantity of glass on hand. A deposition made by one of the firm of Launay & Co., the persons who manufactured the glass, was also read, which stated they were to have been paid 14,236 francs for the glass, but owing to peculiar circumstances they had taken 12,865 francs for it from Allamand & Co.

This was the case for the defendant. There was no evidence to show the exact time when Morlot & Co. ordered the glass from Allamand & Co., but the latter did not receive the glass now in question from the manufacturer until August, 1838, only a few weeks before they sold it to Morlot & Co.

BETTS, District Judge (charging jury). The issues upon the information are: (1) Whether the packages were made up with intent by a false valuation to evade and defraud the revenue, in this: that the goods, &c., cost the importer thereof a higher price than the prices set forth in the entry thereof at the custom house. (2) Whether the invoice was made up with intent, by a false valuation to evade and defraud the revenue, in this: that the goods, &c., were charged at a less price than they actually cost the importer thereof. (3) Whether the entry was made up with intent by a false valuation to evade and defraud the revenue, in this: that the goods were charged in the entry at a less price than they actually cost the importer.

The United States having given proof sufficient in the first instance to show that the invoice in this case was made up at a great undervaluation of the goods, and that undervaluation being so great as to well justify the jury in inferring that it was made with intent to evade the payment of duties which would have been chargeable on the market value, the claimants are put in a situation where they are required by the law to prove that they purchased the goods at the prices charged. The law subjects articles of this description to an impost calculated upon their market value at the place where purchased; but the cost on a bona fide purchase is regarded as the true market value, and if the claimants establish by satisfactory evidence that the goods are invoiced at the actual purchase price, they will rescue them from seizure, however much such price paid may be below the current or standard value of the commodity in the foreign market. The reasonableness of the rule calling from the importer proofs to support his invoice is clearly illustrated by the evidence in this cause; for other goods of the same description purchased for cash by merchants here of the same house in Paris, and imported in the same vessel with those now under seizure, cost nearly 100 per cent. more than these are charged. The government, by permitting an invoice so circumstanced to pass unquestioned, would not merely accept of half less duties from one merchant than is exacted from another under precisely like circumstances, and thus give one an unreasonable advantage over the other in the home market, but would also promote endeavors in others to escape burdens which should be fair and equal to all. When claimants are put to proof on a charge like the present, the law gives this attitude to the case, that they are to substantiate the variety of the invoice by affirmed and clear proofs, admissible under the ordinary rules of evidence.

In this point of view, the affidavit of the claimants, attached to the entry, is of no avail and cannot be regarded as making evidence either directly or indirectly. It has no relevancy to the issue on trial, further than as a declaration of theirs which may be used as evidence against them, and was thus introduced by the United States to show that they imported and entered the goods as purchasers. The argument, that the jury must find that Mr. Morlot committed perjury, if they decide against his claim as purchaser of Allamand, is aside of the point on trial. The jury can have only regard to and weigh the legal evidence the claimants produce to support their claim, and their affidavit can have no more influence in considering this question than their mere assertions, without oath, could. It is not, therefore, in any sense, a question now to be investigated and decided, whether this oath is wilfully false or not.

The allegation on the part of the claimants is, that the goods were bought of the house of Allamand & Co., and the testimony of persons connected with the house is offered to establish the allegation. If there was nothing more in the case than the single transaction between the claimants and that house, of September 6th, upon which the goods were transferred to them, the jury would probably feel no hesitation in declaring it an actual purchase, and upon the terms stated; that is, if they give full credit to the testimony of Mr. Allamand. But proofs have been offered by the United States with a view to show that the goods at the time were really the property of the claimants, and had become such on the antecedent purchase of them made by Allamand & Co. This branch of the case is the only one giving complexity or difficulty to the subject.

It is for the jury to ascertain the facts upon a careful survey of the whole testimony. The court is only to state the law as applicable to the facts. The proposition of facts advanced by the respective parties are these: The United States insist that Allamand & Co. made the purchase of these goods of Launay & Co. in the character of factors or agents of the claimants, and that the price paid by the factors was the actual cost at which the goods should have been invoiced. The claimants insist that Allamand & Co. did not pursue the authority given them in making the purchase, and that therefore the goods became their own property; that, Allamand & Co. holding the goods as their own, the claimants had a right to deal with them for the purchase, and that the sum actually paid on such transaction was the cost price to the claimants, at a bona fide purchase, and that such price was the sum stated in the invoice. If the jury find that Allamand & Co. acted within their authority in making the purchase in behalf of the claimants, then, as between them, that was the purchase of the claimants; the goods became theirs, and their factors could compel them to pay the price agreed. The property was theirs in law, but still the factors might have the right to detain the goods until their advances or liabilities in the purchase were discharged. Still, though subject to a lien in this behalf, the goods could be regarded in law as purchased by the claimants and their property. If the jury further find that the property being so situated, was delivered over to the claimants upon a composition of the debt, the factors to receive so much as the principals were able to pay, this new arrangement as to payment would not vary the relationship of the parties, in respect to the property; it would be no new sale, the actual price, in contemplation of the law, being that agreed to by the factors on the original purchase, although the sum they ultimately collected and consented to receive of their principals in discharge of the debt was greatly less. In such case the goods ought to have been invoiced at that purchase price, and putting them down at the composition sum would be a false valuation, which may subject them to forfeiture. If the jury find that Allamand & Co. did not pursue the authority given them by the claimants in making the purchase of Launay & Co. by an unreasonable delay or postponement of it or otherwise, or if it be found that upon any facts subsequently occurring, the house of Allamand & Co. made this property their own, and had no legal right to compel the claimants to receive it, then, in law, the claimants could deal with them for a purchase on the same footing as with any other strangers, and buying of them under such circumstances may be regarded an original purchase. In such case, the sum paid by the claimants would be the actual cost price; the sum so paid must be distinctly priced by the clerk. Numerous facts and circumstances resulting from the testimony at large have been adduced by the counsel for the respective parties, conducing to support the one or the other of these propositions of fact, all of which are entitled to the careful consideration of the jury. These goods are subject to forfeiture if the purchase from Launay & Co. was the true cost price, in respect to the claimants (although in the end they actually paid much less for them), and the invoice was made up at the lower price with a view to the rate of duties which goods should pay here. They are entitled to acquittal, if the transaction of September 6th with Allamand & Co. was the original purchase of the goods. Allamand & Co. selling as absolute owners, and the claimants buying, as having a free election to take the goods or not, without respect to their ability to fulfil any legal obligations subsisting between them and Allamand & Co. in regard to the goods.

Case No. 16,306.

UNITED STATES v. SIXTY-FOUR BARRELS DISTILLED SPIRITS.

[3 Cliff. 308.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1870.

FORFEITURES UNDER INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—INNOCENT PURCHASERS — DISTILLED SPIRITS — DIVESTITURE OF TITLE—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

1. A purchaser of distilled spirits, ignorant at the time of the purchase that the spirits had been fraudulently removed from a bonded warehouse, or that the tax imposed thereon had not been paid, acquires his title only by such purchase, and if the property in the spirits claimed by the vendor had been absolutely forfeited to the United States before the sale, then the vendee can acquire no title; but where the verdict of the jury had established the fact of the innocence of the purchaser and claimant, the question is whether the goods had been forfeited to the United States before the contract of sale. The liability of the goods to forfeiture in such case must be deduced from the acts of the first owner and seller alone.

2. Forfeitures made absolute by statute relate back to the time of the commission of the wrongful acts prohibited by statute, and the title vests immediately in the government on the commission of the wrongful acts.

3. But where there is more than one remedy provided by statute, and the government has an election to proceed for the forfeiture or in some other way not involving a forfeiture, the title to the property does not vest in the United States prior to the seizure or performance of some act which amounts to such election.

4. Congress has the power to decide in what event a divestiture of title shall take place, and where the act declares without any election of remedies that forfeiture shall take place upon the commission of the wrongful act, the court must carry the provision into effect, even against innocent purchasers, where the title is consummated by seizure, suit, judgment, and condemnation.

5. Where the language is doubtful, resort must be had to the ordinary rules of construction, and the rules of the common law applicable to the subject of forfeiture.

6. The title of the wrong-doer remains unaffected by his wrongful acts until suit, seizure, and judgment or decree, but where the act of congress so provides, and there is no election of remedies, the judgment or decree divests his title from the date of the wrongful acts.

7. Section 45 of the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 163], provides that "all distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law on the same not having been paid, shall be forfeited to the United States, or may immediately upon discovery be seized, and after the assessment of the tax thereon be sold by the collector for the tax and expenses of seizure and sale." Held, that under this statute the judgment or decree only relates back to the date of the seizure, and does not overreach the title of an innocent purchaser acquired subsequent to the date of the wrongful acts and before the seizure.

Provision is made by section 45 of the act of July 13, 1866, that "all distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law on the same not having been paid, shall be forfeited to the United States, or may immediately upon discovery be seized, and after the assessment of the tax thereon be sold by the collector for the tax and expenses of seizure and sale." 14 Stat. 163. Pursuant to that enactment, the libellant alleged, in the first count of the information, that the internal-revenue collector for the third collection district in this state on April 26, 1867, did, at Boston, in this judicial district, seize on land, as forfeited to the United States, sixty-four barrels of distilled spirits found on the 28th of April in the same year in a certain store and building therein described. And the libellant further alleged that the goods so seized were distilled spirits; that they had been manufactured in the United States since January 1, 1865; that an internal-revenue tax was, and since the goods were so manufactured had been, by law imposed on the same; that the goods so seized in the store and building aforesaid were found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse; that they had not been removed from any bonded warehouse according to law; and that the tax so imposed by law on the same had not been paid, nor any part of the same, when the goods were so found and seized.

Two other counts were also contained in the information, founded on another provision enacted by congress (14 Stat. 111; 13 Stat. 240). This provision reads as follows:

That goods on which taxes are imposed by law if "found in the possession or custody or within the control of any person or persons for the purpose of being sold or removed by such person or persons in fraud of the internal-revenue laws, or with (the) design to avoid (the) payment of said taxes, may be seized by the collector, . . . and the same shall be forfeited to the United States." When the information was filed it contained four counts, but the fourth was discontinued, and a new one was filed in its place by leave of court, which was the fourth count in the series as at present numbered.

Omitting unimportant words, the last three counts alleged in substance and effect, that the goods in question were distilled spirits manufactured in the United States; that on the day and year aforesaid they were found by the said collector in the store and building aforesaid; that the goods were then and there within the control of the claimant [John E. Cassidy] for the purpose then and there entertained by him, of being sold and removed in fraud of the internal-revenue laws of the United States, and with the design of avoiding the payment of the taxes imposed on the same, which then and there remained due and wholly unpaid.

Monition was duly issued and served, and the claimant appeared, and alleged, in due form, that he, at the time of the seizure, was and still was the lawful and sole owner and proprietor of the goods seized, of which he offered due proof. Two pleas were subsequently pleaded by the claimant: (1) That the goods in question did not, nor did any part thereof, become forfeited to the United States in manner and form as in said information was alleged. (2) That the sixty-four barrels of distilled spirits did not become forfeited, as alleged, because the same after their manufacture had been in a bonded warehouse, and that the same had been removed from that depository in due form of law; that after the same were so removed from the bonded warehouse, they were rectified and inspected by a government inspector, and were duly marked as required by law; and that the same were subsequently offered for sale in open market; and that he, without any knowledge, information, or belief that the same were not properly and rightfully so offered for sale, or that there was any tax due and unpaid to the United States upon the same, bought the said sixty-four barrels of distilled spirits and paid for the same their full, just, and marketable value; all of which, as he alleged, he was ready to verify. Issue was joined upon the first plea, and to the second the libellant filed a general replication, affirming that all the allegations of the information were true, and tendering an issue which was duly joined by the claimant. Both pleas therefore terminated in issues of fact, and the jury under the instruction of the court returned a verdict for the claimant. [Case unreported.] Exceptions were tendered by the district attorney, and the same were duly allowed and sealed, and the questions examined and decided were those saved in the bill of exceptions, and brought into the court by the writ of error sued out by the United States.

Evidence was introduced tending to show that several hundred barrels of distilled spirits manufactured within the United States were deposited in certain bonded warehouses in the third internal-revenue collection district in this state; that a tax was imposed on the same under the internal-revenue laws of the United States which had not been paid; that the same were withdrawn from that depository upon application made in due form to the collector of that collection district, the applicants giving bonds in due form for the alleged purpose, in certain cases that the spirits were withdrawn for rectification, and in other cases that the spirits were withdrawn for the purpose of transportation to some port or place in another state, and for exportation from thence to some foreign country. None of the applications, however, were made by the claimant, nor did he execute any of the bonds or cause them to be executed, but the bonds were accepted by the collector, and he granted permits in due form, as in case of withdrawal for rectification or for transportation to another state. All of the bonds were false and fraudulent, and none of the spirits were ever returned as stipulated, nor were the same or any part thereof ever transported to another state or to any foreign country. On the contrary, the spirits were removed and sold for consumption within the United States, and barrels filled with water were attempted to be transported in their place, and all the spirits were consumed in this country without paying the taxes, in violation of the internal-revenue laws passed by congress. Such of the spirits as were in controversy in this case were found by the collector in the store and building described in the information. They were in the actual possession of other parties, but the bill of exceptions showed that they had been placed there by the direction of the claimant, were under his control, and were intended to be sold and removed, and that the building was neither a bonded warehouse nor a distillery. Some evidence was also introduced tending to show that the spirits in question were a portion of the spirits fraudulently withdrawn from the bonded warehouses as aforesaid, and that the claimant received the same from one of the persons who executed the false and fraudulent bonds, or procured them to be executed, and that the claimant not only knew that the spirits had been thus fraudulently removed from the public depositories, and that the taxes had not been paid thereon, but that he participated in the fraudulent acts by which the removal was effected, and also in the fraudulent attempt to transport water instead of the spirits to another state, and that he held the spirits in possession for the purpose of removal and sale. All such participation and knowledge were denied by the claimant, and he introduced evidence tending to show that he purchased the spirits innocently, and for value and in good faith, at their full market value, that he had no knowledge that the spirits had been fraudulently withdrawn from the bonded warehouses, or that the taxes had not been paid. Rebutting evidence was introduced by the libellant as to the market value of the spirits, and the bill of exceptions shows that the claimant admited that the price paid, the spirits being greatly above proof, was less per gallon than the tax imposed and unpaid.

Two instructions were given by the court to the jury at the request of the claimant, to which the district attorney excepted:—That if the spirits were removed from a bonded warehouse upon bonds in the form prescribed by law, then the facts that such bonds were signed by irresponsible parties, and that the same was known by the party who withdrew the spirits and intended to commit the fraud, do not render the spirits liable to forfeiture in the hands of an innocent purchaser. That if the spirits were fraudulently withdrawn as aforesaid, but in the form prescribed by law, and the claimant was not a participant in the fraud, and purchased the spirits in good faith without knowledge of the fraud, then he acquired a good title, and the spirits cannot be forfeited. Prayers for instructions were also presented by the district attorney in substance and effect as follows: That if the spirits were found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, and not in a distillery, and had been removed from such a depository upon permits authorizing the removal for rectification or for transportation, issued upon the execution of false and fraudulent bonds, in form such as were required by law, and if the tax imposed on the spirits had not been paid, then the spirits are subject to forfeiture under the first count, even though the claimant may have purchased the same innocently and without any participation or guilty knowledge of the fraudulent removal or that the tax had not been paid. That the spirits having been found as shown in the evidence, the burden is upon the claimant to satisfy the jury that the tax imposed by law on the same had been paid, and that if he fails so to do, the verdict on the first count must be for the United States. That if the claimant purchased the spirits at a less price than the tax as imposed by law, and if the spirits had actually been fraudulently removed from a bonded warehouse as aforesaid, and if the tax imposed by law thereon had not been paid, then the said spirits were subject to forfeiture under the first count in the information. That if the claimant purchased the spirits at less price than the tax imposed by law thereon, the fact of such purchase under such circumstances "must be in law taken" as notice that the spirits had not been removed from a bonded warehouse according to law, and that the tax imposed thereon had not been paid, if in fact the spirits had been fraudulently removed from such a depository as aforesaid, and if in fact the tax imposed by law on said spirits had not been paid.

The court refused to give the instructions as requested, and instructed the jury, among other things, in substance and effect as follows: That if the spirits were fraudulently removed from the bonded warehouse, as aforesaid, for the alleged purposes aforesaid, but were really withdrawn for sale and consumption, and if the tax imposed by law on such spirits had not been paid, the spirits would be liable to forfeiture under the first count in the hands of the person who committed the fraud, or of any person who aided in committing it or connived at it, or of any purchaser who held the spirits for sale and consumption, and who bought the same with actual knowledge of the fraud. Just exception, it was conceded, could not be taken to that part of the charge, but the court in the same connection instructed the jury that the spirits under the circumstances therein assumed would not be liable to forfeiture if in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value without notice. Certain instructions were also given by the court as to the burden of proof, but as those rulings were not the subject of complaint, the instructions are omitted. That the purchase of the spirits at a less price per gallon than the amount of the tax was not in itself a ground of forfeiture, nor was it in law to be taken absolutely as notice to the purchaser that the spirits had been illegally removed, and that the tax on them had not been paid; that the purchase in that state of the case was a circumstance of suspicion, and that such a circumstance was to be considered by the jury in connection with the other evidence in determining whether or not the claimant, as such purchaser, had actual knowledge of the fraud at the time he bought the spirits. Reference need not be made to the single instruction reported as given, applicable to the other counts, as it was conceded by the district attorney that the point intended to be raised by the exception was not open, as the jury found that the claimant purchased the spirits without knowledge of the fraud or that the tax imposed thereon had not been paid.

W. A. Field, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

J. W. Richardson and M. W. Paine, for claimant.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Viewed as an innocent purchaser for value without notice that the spirits had been fraudulently removed from the bonded warehouse, or that the tax imposed thereon had not been paid, as the claimant must be in this investigation, the single question presented for examination and decision is, whether the spirits under the circumstances disclosed in the bill of exceptions were liable to forfeiture at the time the same were seized by the internal-revenue collector for the third collection district. Whatever title to the spirits in controversy the claimant had at the time the same were seized, he acquired by purchase, and if the property in the spirits claimed by his vendor was absolutely forfeited to the United States before he purchased the same, then he acquired nothing by his bargain; but if the title of his vendor was valid at the time of the sale, then the spirits were not liable to forfeiture at the time of the seizure, as the verdict of the jury establishes the fact that the claimant is an innocent purchaser for value, without notice that the spirits had been fraudulently removed from the bonded warehouse, or that the tax imposed thereon had not been paid, as alleged in the information.

Examined in that point of view, as the case must be, it is apparent that the liability of the spirits to forfeiture in this case must be deduced, if at all, from the acts of the former owner and not from the acts of the claimant, as every charge against him is negatived by the verdict of the jury. "Distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law on the same not having been paid, shall be forfeited." 14 Stat. 163. Had the provision stopped there, it is quite clear that the forfeiture would have been absolute, and that the spirits might be subsequently seized for that purpose, as well after the same had passed into the hands of an innocent purchaser as while the spirits remained in the hands of the perpetrator of the fraud. Forfeitures made absolute by statute relate back to the time of the commission of the wrongful acts which the statute prohibits. Where the forfeiture is absolute the title to the thing forfeited vests immediately in the government, but where more than one remedy is given, and the government has an election to proceed for the forfeiture or in some other way not involving a forfeiture, the title of the property does not vest in the United States prior to the seizure or the performance of some other equivalent act which amounts to such an election. U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 338; Roberts v. Wetherall, 1 Salk. 223; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246. Differences of opinion existed at one time among the justices of the supreme court, whether a forfeiture for the violation of the revenue laws ever gave such a title to the United States as to overreach a bona fide sale to an innocent purchaser when made before seizure and suit for condemnation, but the majority of the court adopted the affirmative of that proposition. U. S. v. Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 404; The Mars, Id. 417; Confiscation Cases, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 460. Congress possesses the power to decide in what event a divestiture of title in such a case shall take place, whether on the commission of the offence, the seizure, or the condemnation; and where the act of congress declares in terms without any qualification or election of remedies that that forfeiture shall take place upon the commission of the offence, it becomes the duty of the court to carry the provision into effect even as against innocent purchasers, in cases where the title is consummated by seizure, suit, and judgment, or decree of condemnation. Such is the settled rule of law where the forfeiture is made absolute upon the commission of the offence; but in all cases where the language employed by congress is doubtful, it is manifestly proper to resort to the ordinary rules of construction and to the rules of the common law applicable to the subject of forfeiture to assist the mind in coming to a conclusion. Forfeiture, it is said, in the former case, is absolute; but the remark should be received with some qualification, as the title only vests in the United States by relation back to the criminal offence in case where it is consummated by seizure, suit, and judgment or decree. Unless the matter is prosecuted and the title consummated, the act of congress becomes imperative, as the title of the wrong-doer remains unaffected by his wrongful acts until seizure, suit, and judgment or decree, but the effect of the judgment or decree is to divest his title from the date of the wrongful acts. U. S. v. Fifty-Six Barrels Whiskey [Case No. 15,095]; The Florenzo [Id. 4,886].

Grant all that as applied to the clause of the section declaring the forfeiture if it stood alone and without any qualification, but the same section contains an alternative clause, as appears by the next sentence, which provides as follows: "Or (such distilled spirits) may immediately upon discovery be seized, and after the assessment of the tax thereon may be sold by the collector for the tax and expenses of seizure and sale." Read together, as the two clauses must be, their true construction is as obvious as any enactment well can be which is expressed in clear and unambiguous language. Such spirits when found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, if the same have been illegally removed from such a public depository without the payment of the tax imposed by law on the same, may be seized as forfeited to the United States, or the proper officer of the revenue may seize the same under the immediately succeeding clause of the section, and in that event it becomes the duty of the assessor to assess the tax on the same imposed by law, and of the collector to sell the spirits for the tax and expenses of seizure and sale, as expressly provided by the closing paragraph of the sentence. Where the forfeiture is absolute, the entire title of the wrong-doer, when the judgment or decree is rendered, vests in the United States from the date of the wrongful act; but if the forfeiture is made conditional, as, for example, if the United States may elect to proceed by information for a forfeiture or for some other redress not amounting to an absolute forfeiture of the spirits, then the judgment or decree only relates back to the date of the seizure, and does not overreach the title of an innocent purchaser acquired subsequent to the wrongful act of the seller and before the seizure of the spirits, if the purchase was bona fide for value and without notice of the wrongful acts of his vendor. Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366; Confiscation Cases, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 460; U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 352; U. S. v. Morris, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 290. Extended remarks to show that the United States in cases arising under the section on which the information in this case is founded, are quite unnecessary, as the express words of the second clause referred to are, that as an alternative remedy the spirits may immediately upon discovery be seized, and after assessment of the tax thereon may be sold, by the collector for the tax and the expenses of the seizure and sale.

Proceedings under that clause are instituted and prosecuted to enforce a lien created by an act of congress, and the very nature of the proceeding concedes that the title to the spirits seized is still in the wrong-doer, and it is as clear as anything well can be that he is entitled to what remains of the proceeds of the sale after deducting the tax, interest, and expenses, as there is no authority to sell the property for any other purpose. Evidently these considerations dispose of all the exceptions exhibited in the record except the one in the instruction given, which is applicable to the other counts, and in respect to that no further remarks are required, as it is conceded that the point is not open under the finding of the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

Case No. 16,307.

UNITED STATES v. SIXTY-NINE BARRELS OF RUM.

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 1, 1865.

INTERNAL REVENUE—SEIZURES FOR FORFEITURE—RELEASE ON STIPULATION.

[The courts have no power, under the act of 1864 (13 Stat. 223), to release on bond or stipulation goods seized for forfeiture under sections 48 and 68. The power of granting relief in such cases is conferred by the act upon other officers than the judges of the courts.]

[This was an information of forfeiture against sixty-nine barrels of rum, and certain spirits, materials, and articles seized by the revenue officers.]

Proceedings having been instituted in May last, to forfeit the rum, etc., above mentioned, under sections 48 and 68 of the internal revenue act of 1864, the application referred to in the following decision was made, on the ground that the mode of bonding goods provided in section 88 of the collection act of 1799 [1 Stat. 695], as well as the other proceedings provided for in that section, was a part of the practice of this court in internal revenue cases.

THE COURT was moved on the part of the claimant by counsel on the 29th of July last, for an order that the claimant have restored to him the property above mentioned, seized and described in the information filed in this court in the above entitled cause, upon filing stipulations for the value of the same, with sufficient sureties, etc.

The United States attorney opposes the motion on the ground that the act of congress, approved June 30, 1864, "To provide internal revenue to support the government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes" (13 Stat. 240, § 48), has conferred upon other officers than the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States jurisdiction over the relief applied for to this court by this motion.

That objection appears to THE COURT well founded. The present application must accordingly be denied, with costs.

F. Byrne, for the motion.

Case No. 16,308.

UNITED STATES v. SKAM.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 367.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1837.

PENSIONS — RIGHTS OF ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN — MARRIAGE OF PARENTS—PERJURY.

1. An adopted child is not entitled to a pension. But an illegitimate female child, if her parents afterwards intermarry, and the husband acknowledge the child, becomes legitimated by the law of Maryland of 1786 (chapter 45, § 7) and entitled to a pension under the laws of the United States, if her father dies in the naval marine service of the United States, and the mother marries again.

2. The intermarriage, and the acknowledgment of the child by the husband, are prima facie evidence that he was the actual father of the child; and if he begot the child, it was not perjury in the witness to swear that the child was the legitimate heir and only child left by the deceased husband.

Indictment for perjury. The perjury was assigned in a joint affidavit made by the defendant and one Jane Berkemer, who, in order to obtain from the United States a pension for one Mary Ann Thomas, as the child of one Orral T. Thomas, (a marine who died in the service of the United States,) made oath before a justice of the peace in Washington that they are well acquainted with Mary Ann Thomas, and know her to be the legitimate heir and only child left by the said Thomas, whereas the defendant then and there knew and believed that the said Mary Ann Thomas was not the child of the said Orral T. Thomas.

By the Maryland law of 1786 (chapter 45, § 7), "if any man shall have one or more children by any woman whom he shall afterwards marry, such child or children, if acknowledged by the man, shall, in virtue of such marriage and acknowledgment, be hereby legitimated, and capable in law to inherit and transmit inheritance, as if born in wedlock."

Evidence was produced by the defendant that the said Orral T. Thomas married the mother about a year after the birth of the child, and received and maintained the child, and called her his child, and suffered her to call him father, and to be called by his name, namely, Mary Ann Thomas.

THE COURT, upon the trial, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) at the motion of Mr. Key, the district attorney, instructed the jury: "That if they believe from the evidence, that Mary Ann Thomas, mentioned in the affidavit, was the child of Ann Alford, (the wife of the said Orral T. Thomas, and who after his death intermarried with one Alford); that said child was born about twelve months before her marriage with the said Orral T. Thomas; that the said Thomas was not the father of the said child; but that after the marriage he adopted the said child, and allowed it to take his name,—then such child, under the circumstances proved in this case, would not be entitled to claim a pension under the act of congress." Act March 4, 1814 (3 Stat. 103). But THE COURT also instructed the jury, "that the facts, that the said Orral T. Thomas married the mother of the said Mary Ann after her birth, and received and maintained the child as his own, and called her his child, and suffered her to call him father, and to be called by his name, if believed by the jury, were evidence, from which, if not contradicted by other evidence, the jury may infer that she was begotten by the said Orral T. Thomas."

Mr. Key then prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that if the prisoners" (both affiants being upon their trial) "knew, or believed that the said Mary Ann Thomas was not begotten by the said Orral T. Thomas, then their affidavit is false; and if they made the oath knowingly, and the affidavit was correctly read over to them, then such taking such oath is perjury."

But THE COURT refused to give the instruction.

Verdict, not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. SKINNER et al.

Circuit Court, D. New York. 1818.

CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS — AUTHORITY FOR COMMENCEMENT—INTERNATIONAL LAW—PRIVILEGES OF FOREIGN MINISTER—NEUTRALITY LAWS.

1. No instruction or official authorization is required for the institution of a criminal prosecution; any citizen may complain of an infraction of the law, and it is the duty of the judge to issue a warrant.

2. The privileges of a foreign minister are not extended to a person having a commission from a revolutionary government not acknowledged by the United States.

3. The fitting out or arming of a vessel with illegal intent, though that intent appear to have been defeated after the vessel sailed, will constitute a breach of the neutrality laws. It is not necessary that the vessel illegally fitted out should be armed, or in condition to commit hostilities on leaving the United States.

The facts of this case appeared as follows: Judge Livingston issued warrants against Captain Skinner, Don Manuel H. Aguirre, and Mr. Delano, for "knowingly being concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming, in the port of New York, two ships, called the Curiazo and Horatio, with the intent that they should be employed in the service of some foreign prince or people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects of some other foreign prince or state, with whom the United States are at peace." These warrants were issued under the third section of the act passed at the last session of congress, "for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," and which is in the words following:—"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, that if any person shall, within the limits of the United States, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming, of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property, of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, or shall issue or deliver a commission within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, for any ship or vessel, to the intent that she may be employed as aforesaid, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than ten thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than three years; and every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with all materials, arms, ammunition, and stores, which may have been procured for the building and equipment thereof, shall be forfeited; one half to the use of the informer, and the other half to the use of the United States." 2 Bior. & D. Laws, 426 [1 Stat. 383].

The counsel for the defendants moved to have their clients discharged altogether; or, if held to bail, they insisted that they should, under all the circumstances of the case, be recognized to appear at the next term of the circuit court, in a very small sum. This motion was made on three grounds:—(1) That as the prosecution had been commenced without any directions on the part of the government, or application by the district attorney, it was irregular in its inception, and ought to be immediately discontinued. (2) That Mr. Aguirre (to whose case alone this ground applied) was a minister from the government of Buenos Ayres to that of the United States, and could not, therefore, be proceeded against in this way. (3) That to constitute an offense against the third section of this act, the vessels must not only have been fitted out with intent to be thus employed, but actually armed for that purpose; and many depositions were produced, proving that neither of the vessels were or ever had been armed.

Emmett, Wells & Soughton, for prosecution.

Mr. Hoffman, D. B. Ogden, Mr. Burr, and Mr. Palmer, for defendants.

After an argument of these points by the respective counsel, LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, decided:

First. That no instructions were necessary on the part of the president, or any other officer of government, to justify the issuing a warrant for the violation of this or any other law; nor had the president any right to interfere with the proceedings which had been commenced in this case, by giving any instructions to him on the subject. Nor was it necessary that the application for a warrant should be made by the district attorney, as any individual might complain of the infraction of a law, and he considered it his duty to award a warrant whenever complaint was made to him on oath of a crime's being committed, whether such warrant were applied for by the district attorney or any other person.

Second. As to any privilege which Mr. Aguirre's commission conferred on him, the judge was of opinion that this gentleman, not being accredited by the president, and the independence of Buenos Ayres not being acknowledged by the government of the United States, he was liable to be proceeded against for any offense which he might commit against our laws, in the same way as any other individual.

On the third point, the judge thought no offense could be committed against the third section of the act, unless the vessel was armed, as well as fitted out with intent to be employed, etc. That it does not appear by any part of the act that congress intended to prohibit the citizens of the United States from building vessels and selling them to either of the belligerents, so long as they were not armed. In the case of a principal, it was clearly necessary, by the very terms of the law, to render him criminal, that the vessel should be fitted out and armed. Those, therefore, who were knowingly concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of such ship or vessel, must also be considered as innocent, until an actual armament took place, or this absurdity would result, that one man might have a vessel built and fitted out for this purpose without being guilty of any offense, while the whole penalty of the law might be incurred by a person who should furnish her with a single suit of sails, or a cable. As it respected the evidence of an armament, the depositions on which the warrants had issued were not only either altogether silent, or quite insufficient to prove the fact; but those on the part of the defendants established, beyond controversy, that neither of the vessels, although no doubt built for warlike purpose, had ever been armed.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, was therefore of opinion, that neither of the parties arrested had committed any offense, and ordered them all to be discharged.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1808.

CRIMINAL LAW — STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — ASSAULT AND BATTERY.

1. The act of congress of April 30, 1790, § 32 [1 Stat. 112], which limits the prosecution of offences not capital to two years, applies to cases of assault and battery at common law in the District of Columbia.

[Cited in U. S. v. Six Fermenting Tubs, Case No. 16,296.]

2. The finding of an informal presentment is not the finding or instituting of the indictment, so as to take the case out of the statute.

Indictment for assault and battery. The defendant pleaded the act of congress of April, 1790 (1 Stat. 112), by which prosecutions are limited to two years, after the offence committed. Replication that a presentment was found for the offence within the two years. General demurrer.

Mr. Swann, for defendant. The words of the act are: "Nor shall any person be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offence not capital, nor for any fine or forfeiture under any penal statute, unless the indictment or information for the same shall be found or instituted within two years from the time of committing the offence, or incurring the fine or forfeiture aforesaid." The supreme court of the United States, in the case of Adams v. Wood, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 336, decided that the statute was a bar to all kinds of prosecution and for offences created by acts of congress since 1790.

Mr. Jones, U. S. Atty. for the District of Columbia, contended that the act of congress applies only to offences created by acts of congress, not to cases of assault and battery at common law. At the time of passing the act of limitation, there were no crimes against the United States, but statutory crimes. "Instituting" an indictment, is as appropriate as "finding" an indictment. The presentment was the institution of the indictment. A presentment is tantamount to an indictment. An indictment is only a specification of a presentment. "Instituted" is a broader term than "found."

Mr. Swann, in reply. The general acts of congress apply to this district, unless repugnant to the adopted laws of Virginia. Assault and battery is included in the act of congress, and is within the reason of the cases mentioned in the act. If an informal presentment of a grand jury may be said to be the institution of an indictment, the act might be completely evaded.

THE COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that the act of congress applied to cases of assault and battery; that the finding of a previous presentment was not the finding nor institution of the indictment; that the act of congress was a good bar to the prosecution; and that therefore the replication was bad.

UNITED STATES v. SLADE.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1820.

EXECUTION—EXTENT UNDER MASSACHUSETTS STATUTE—APPRAISEMENT—RETURN.

1. An extent under the statute of Massachusetts of 1784, upon real estate is not good, unless it appear by the return that all the appraisers are sworn—nor unless all the appraisers concur in the appraisement.

[Cited in Wilcox v. Emerson, 10 R. I. 276.]

2. But it is not necessary to the validity of the levy, as between the parties and their privies, that they should be recorded within the three months prescribed by the statute; nor that a certificate of the appraisement should be made and signed by the appraisers. It is sufficient that the officer's return contains all the facts necessary to make the levy valid.

[Cited in Howard v. North, 5 Tex. 290.]

Writ of entry counting on the seisin of the United States within twenty years, and a disseisin by the tenant [William Slade]. Plea, nul disseisin. At the trial, the title of the United States appeared to be under an execution dated the 10th of April, 1805, and issued on a judgment recovered by the United States against one John Bowers, the owner of the land, at the March term of the district court of Massachusetts district, A. D. 1805. The levy was made by the marshal of the district, on the 13th day of May, 1805, and was duly returned into the clerk's office, but was not recorded in Bristol county, where the land lies, until the 29th day of September, 1818. The marshal's return stated in substance that he had levied the execution on the land, the reversion of which was the property of Bowers, describing its boundaries; that he caused three discreet and disinterested men, freeholders of the said county, one chosen by the United States, (the creditor,) one chosen by Bowers, (the debtor,) and one by the marshal, to be sworn before one of the justices of the peace for the same county, faithfully and impartially to appraise such real estate as should be shewn to them, as by the justice's certificate on the same execution appeared; who appraised the land at $1582 45, to satisfy the execution and all fees; and that he delivered seisin and possession of said estate to H. B. in behalf of the United States. There was no certificate by the appraisers that they were freeholders, or of their appraisement, or of their doings on the premises. It was further proved that Bowers was entitled to the reversion in the land subject to an estate in dower, which had now expired.

William Sullivan, for the tenant, contended that the execution was not well levied on the demanded premises: (1) Because there was no return or certificate by the appraisers, the return of the officer not being sufficient for that purpose. (2) Because the execution was not recorded in the county where the land lies, within three months after the levy. But the court overruled both objections, reserving the points for further consideration, if the verdict should be against the tenant, and suffered the papers to go to the jury. The tenant then claimed title to the demanded premises on a judgment recovered by himself against Bowers, at the October term of the court of common pleas, of Bristol county, 1809, and a levy on the execution, issued thereon on the 9th of the ensuing November, which was duly recorded within three months. The return was signed by two of the appraisers only, and no reason was assigned on the return for this omission. But by a deposition of the third appraiser, offered in evidence by the tenant, it appeared that he refused to join in the appraisement, thinking it too low. It further appeared on the return, that but two of the appraisers were sworn, and the third was affirmed.

Mr. Blake, U. S. Dist. Atty., objected to the tenant's title for both reasons, viz.: (1) That all the appraisers were not sworn. (2) That the return was not signed by all of them, or some reason assigned for the omission. The objections were sustained by the court; and a verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court upon the points made at the trial.

And now W. Sullivan, having previously moved for a new trial, and the case coming on for argument, admitted that upon examination of the authorities he could not sustain his objections to the plaintiffs' levy; but he endeavoured to maintain the sufficiency of the tenant's levy, supposing that a record within three months was indispensable to the title of the plaintiffs, as against other purchasers. He cited on the subject, Norcross v. Widgery, 2 Mass. 506; Pidge v. Tyler, 4 Mass. 541; Farnsworth v. Childs, Id. 637; Williams v. Amory, 14 Mass. 20.

Mr. Blake cited the following additional authorities: Eddy v. Knap, 2 Mass. 154; Ladd v. Blunt, 4 Mass. 402; Tate v. Anderson, 9 Mass. 92; Whitman v. Tyler, 8 Mass. 284; McLellan v. Whitney, 15 Mass. 137.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The statute of Massachusetts of the 17th of March, 1784, enacts, that when any judgment creditor shall think proper to levy his execution on his debtor's real estate, the officer to whom it is directed shall cause three disinterested and discreet freeholders in the county where the land lies, one to be chosen by the creditor, one by the debtor, and a third by the officer; and in case the debtor shall neglect or refuse to choose, the officer shall appoint one for the debtor, to be sworn before a justice of the peace for the county, faithfully and impartially to appraise such real estate as shall be shewn to them, to satisfy the execution, and shall set out such estate by metes and bounds, and the officer shall deliver seisin and possession to the creditor. And the statute then declares: "Which execution being returned with the doings thereon into the clerk's office, and before such return into the clerk's office or afterwards, and within three months, the same shall be recorded in the registry of deeds in the county where the land lies, shall make as good a title to such creditor or creditors, his or their heirs and assigns, as the debtor had therein."

In questions of local law, and in the interpretation of state statutes, it is a great relief to my mind, when I am able to resort to decisions already made by state tribunals, instead of being myself compelled to give a construction to them for the first time. The courts of the United States in cases of this sort, have invariably adhered to the state decisions, without entertaining any question as to their original propriety, whenever there has appeared a fixed and unequivocal rule for their guidance. And this has been done not only from a spirit of comity; but also from considerations of public policy, and public interest. If it be of importance that there should be an end of litigation, it is not of less importance, that the rules by which private rights are to be ascertained, should be uniform and consistent; and that our citizens should not be delivered over to endless doubts from conflicting jurisdictions.

When this case was first opened, impressed as I was with the uniformity of the practice in the county where I was bred, to include in the return of every levy of real estate, a certificate by the appraisers, of their doings, it struck me that there was a good deal of weight in the objection urged at the bar on this point against the title of the United States. It was then suggested, that the objection had been expressly overruled in the state courts. The case alluded to is Williams v. Amory, 14 Mass. 20, where the point was directly decided; and I am entirely satisfied with the reasons, upon which the decision is founded. The first objection, therefore, to the title of the United States, is untenable. And the second objection, that the levy was not recorded in the registry of deeds within the time prescribed by the statute, must in like manner be abandoned, for as between the parties to the execution it has been settled to be immaterial (McLellan v. Whitney, 15 Mass. 137; Ladd v. Blunt, 4 Mass. 402), and unless the tenant can shew a good title in himself, he cannot contest that of the United States.

We are driven therefore to consider the sufficiency of the title of the tenant as an execution creditor. And it appears to me, that both of the objections taken to that title by the counsel for the United States, are fatal. The general rule is, that where the party takes by a statute extent, or title on record, every thing essential to that title must be apparent upon the record. The statute expressly requires that the appraisers shall be sworn, and here one of them was merely affirmed. No such substitution is authorised by the terms of the act; and it is not for courts of justice to supply the defect.[2] In the next place, two only of the appraisers concurred in the appraisement, and no reason is assigned for the nonconcurrence of the third. The act requires the appraisement to be made by all the appraisers; and I am not aware that it has ever been held that an appraisement by two only, is under any circumstances valid. If the appraisement be made by all, though the certificate thereof be signed only by two, it may be good, if a good reason be stated for the omission, such as the death of the third appraiser. I mean to confine this language to cases where the certificate forms a part of the return, and may be referred to to correct any ambiguity in the return; for as it is now settled that the certificate of the appraisers is unnecessary; if the return of the officer be otherwise sufficient, the terms and signing of the certificate become altogether immaterial. It is in this way that I understand the doctrine laid down in Whitman v. Tyler, 8 Mass. 284; otherwise it would be inconsistent with that held in Williams v. Amory, 14 Mass. 20. Parol proof cannot be admitted to show that the third appraiser did concur, for it must appear by the return of the officer. And if it could be admitted, his own deposition, now in court, would prove that he never did concur in the appraisement, (as indeed is necessarily to be inferred from the return itself) but dissented for a sufficient cause, viz. that the appraisement, was too low in value, a cause however which destroys the levy; for an appraisement by two appraisers only is, as I conceive, a mere nullity. For both causes, therefore, the extent of the tenant conveyed no title to him in the land in question, it being in substance defective.

[2] The statute of February 28, 1811 (chapter 127), has authorized an affirmation instead of an oath to be made by Quakers, before they enter on the discharge of any office, place or business, or on any other lawful occasion, where an oath is required. The levy in this case was before that statute.

UNITED STATES v. SLAYMAKER.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct., 1821.

EJECTMENT—WRIT OF POSSESSION—ALIAS WRIT—RESISTANCE TO EXECUTION.

1. The defendant cannot rule the marshal to return a habere facias possessionem, although the plaintiff may do so.

2. If after plaintiff is put into possession under a habere facias possessionem, he is turned out by the defendant, he may, upon suggesting vice comitatus non misit breve, obtain an attachment, or an alias habere facias. Aliter, if he is turned out by a stranger.

3. If the first writ be returned executed, plaintiff cannot issue out an alias. If the writ, though executed, has not been returned, and an alias issues on the suggestion of the plaintiff, resistance to such writ is an offence. Aliter, if the first writ had been returned.

4. The habere facias possessionem cannot be executed after the return day, and if it be attempted, resistance to it is no offence against the act of congress.

Indictment for resisting the execution of a habere facias possessionem issued from this court, returnable to the 11th of April, 1821. The writ is set out in the indictment in hæc verba. It appeared in evidence, that an alias habere facias possessionem issued on the 4th of May last, returnable to the first day of the present term, upon a suggestion of the plaintiff, "vice-comes non misit breve." The deputy marshal, to whom the writ was delivered to be executed, proved, that he was prevented by threats and demonstrations of violence from executing the writ; but he stated that the writ under which he acted was endorsed "alias;" nevertheless he believed that the writ, which was returnable to April court last, was, from its appearance, the one which he was directed to execute. He further stated, that, under the first writ, the possession had been taken peaceably by another of the deputy marshals, and delivered to the plaintiff in the ejectment, who placed a tenant upon the land, but that the possession was afterwards abandoned.

Upon this evidence, and before the case of the defendants was fully opened, the district attorney, with great candour, submitted to the court, whether the prosecution could be supported, expressing his unwillingness unnecessarily to consume the time of the court, if the opinion should be in the negative. He cited the following: Adams, Ej. 301, 360; [Wheaton v. Sexton] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 505.

Peters & Chauncey, for defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. It was decided at the last session of this court, that the defendant could not rule the marshal to return the writ of habere facias possessionem, although the plaintiff may. The reason of the rule is, that it affords the plaintiff the best security for obtaining the full benefit of his judgment, by enabling him to renew the execution at his pleasure, until he has the full enjoyment of the possession. For if after he is put into possession, and the officer has departed, he is again turned out by the defendant, he may, upon a suggestion, "vice-comes non misit breve," obtain an attachment, or sue out a new habere facias possessionem, so as to regain the possession. If he is turned out by a stranger, the rule is otherwise, for he is then put to his ejectment, or to his writ of forcible entry and detainer; because, in this latter case, the title never was tried in respect to the stranger. But if the first writ be returned executed, the plaintiff can never obtain a new writ, although he should afterwards be turned out even by the defendant; because it then appears on record, that the plaintiff has had the full benefit of his suit, and the new execution would be superfluous.

It is no objection therefore to the new writ, that in point of fact, the first writ has been fully executed, if the evidence is merely in pais, and not of record; and resistance to such new writ by the defendant and his agents, would be as much an offence against the law, as if the resistance had been to the original writ. 2 Keb. 245; 1 Keb. 779, 785; Style, 318, 408; 6 Mod. 27; 2 Brownl. & G. 216, 253; Palm. 289; 1 Rolle, 353; Salk. 321. It is true that there is a late English case to be met with in 1 Taunt. 55, in which it is decided that if the habere facias possessionem be executed, it ought to be returned, and that if the plaintiff be turned out by the defendant, a new writ cannot issue. But considering the old cases as authority binding upon us, which the case above referred to is not, and that the former are bottomed upon the soundest reason; we shall adhere to the rule which they have sanctioned.

In this case, we can feel no doubt but that the alias habere facias possessionem was in reality the writ which the deputy had to execute; and if so, the variance between the evidence and the indictment is fatal. If, on the other hand, there be no such variance, then the original writ could not be legally executed after the day to which it was returned. It was then functus officio. In this case the indictment cannot be supported. The district attorney entered a nolle prosequi.

Case No. 16,314.

UNITED STATES v. SMALL.

[2 Curt. 241.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May, 1855.

SEAMEN—STOWAWAY—ASSAULT WITH DANGEROUS WEAPON—PROVINCE OF JURY.

1. One who secretes himself on board a vessel before sailing and discovers himself after the vessel is at sea, is not one of the crew, though the master requires him to work, as a condition for his having food, and he does work.

2. Whether an assault was with a dangerous weapon, or not, may depend upon matter of fact, as upon the manner of the assault; and in such case, the court cannot declare, as matter of law, that the assault, if committed with a belaying pin, was with a dangerous weapon. The question must be left to the jury.

[Cited in U. S. v. Williams, 2 Fed. 64.]

[Cited in State v. Collyer (Nev.) 30 Pac. 896; State v. Lang, 65 N. H. 286, 23 Atl. 433. Cited in brief in U. S. v. Green, 6 Mackey, 566.]

3. The danger referred to is danger to life.

This was an indictment against [Sanford Small] the mate of the ship Tigress for beating and wounding James Sweeney, one of the crew. There was also a count for an assault with a dangerous weapon. It appeared that Sweeney went on board the Tigress while lying at New Orleans, without the knowledge of the master, or either of the officers; and there concealed himself until after the ship was at sea, bound for Boston. He then discovered himself, and the master ordered the mate to set him to work in tarring some of the rigging. While so employed, he neglected his work, and was insolent to the mate, who took up a belaying pin and struck at him and hit him on the arm. The blow did not appear to have been heavy, and no serious injury was inflicted.

Mr. Hallett, U. S. Dist. Atty.

J. H. Prince, for defendant.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. To sustain the first count under the third section of the act of congress of March 3, 1835, (4 Stat. 776), it is necessary for the government to prove that Sweeney was one of the crew of the Tigris. Upon the facts, which are admitted, my opinion is, he was not one of the crew. He was not on board under any contract to serve as a seaman, nor was he in fact a seaman. His presence there was a fraud, and if the master, from motives of humanity, chose to feed him, and at the same time, as a condition for his having food, required him to do such work as he was capable of doing, and he chose to work in order to get food, this did not amount to a contract of hiring him as one of the crew. This count in the indictment, therefore, is not supported.

But whether one of the crew or not, if the mate assaulted him with a dangerous weapon, he is guilty of an offence under another act of congress of March 3, 1825, § 22 (4 Stat. 121). It is of the substance of this offence, that the assault be with a dangerous weapon. I am not aware that the words "dangerous weapon" in this act of congress, have received an interpretation. I think the damage referred to is danger to life. The offence intended to be described, appears from the punishment prescribed, to be a very serious one. The punishment is of the same duration, as for manslaughter. Act April 30, 1790, § 12 (1 Stat. 115). And the fact that the assault is with a dangerous weapon, is classed by the law, with an assault with an intent to kill; for an assault with a dangerous weapon, and an assault with an intent to kill, each amounts to the offence punished by this act. You will consider that, to support this count, the assault must be with a weapon dangerous to life. I think, also, that as actually used, the weapon must have been dangerous to life. Thus a small pistol, when loaded, is undoubtedly a dangerous weapon; and if pointed towards a person within striking distance, with a present intention of discharging it, an assault with a dangerous weapon is committed. But if not loaded, and used only to push, or strike with, a small pistol could not be considered a weapon dangerous to life. So the thing said to be used by the defendant may, in the hand of a strong man, be capable of endangering life by a blow on the head; but not dangerous to life, if the arm or leg be struck with it. And if it be so, then an assault on a person, by striking at, or attempting to strike at his head with this instrument, being within striking distance, would be an assault with a dangerous weapon; while an attempt to strike his arm with it, would not be such an assault. In many cases it is practicable for the court to declare, that a particular weapon was, or was not, a dangerous weapon, within the meaning of the law. And when it is practicable, it is matter of law, and the court must take the responsibility of so declaring.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

U. S. v. Wilson [Case No. 16,730]. But where the question is whether an assault with a dangerous weapon has been proved, and the weapon might be dangerous to life, or not, according to the manner in which it was used, or according to the part of the body attempted to be struck, I think a more general direction must be given to the jury; and it must be left for them to decide whether the assault, if committed, was with a dangerous weapon. Rex v. Noakes, 5 Car. & P. 326. My instruction to you is this,—if the blow, as struck, or as intended to be struck by the defendant, with this weapon, could put the life of the prosecutor in danger, then it was an assault with a dangerous weapon. It was such an assault, if a blow with it on the head would be dangerous to life, and the prisoner being within striking distance attempted to, or did strike at the head of the prosecutor. But if a blow, with this weapon, upon the arm, could not endanger life, and the prisoner's only purpose and act was to strike the prosecutor's arm, then it was not an assault with a dangerous weapon.

Verdict, not guilty.

District Court, D. Louisiana. July, 1869.

POST OFFICE—PUBLICATION OF LIST OF LETTERS—MANDAMUS—WHEN MAY ISSUE FROM UNITED STATES COURT—JURISDICTION.

1. The Times, being the newspaper of the largest circulation in New Orleans, has a right to the printing, under government contract, of the weekly list of letters uncalled for at the New Orleans post office, and that it was the duty of the acting postmaster to send such list to that paper for publication.

2. Outside of the District of Columbia, the circuit courts of the United States cannot issue a writ of mandamus in the exercise of original jurisdiction, and such writs can be issued only as necessary to the jurisdiction of the court, and to enforce a judgment rendered.

[Cited in U. S. v. Pearson, 32 Fed. 310.]

3. In this case the court had not jurisdiction in the first instance by mandamus to compel the postmaster to furnish the letter list to The Times newspaper.

A. Walker, for plaintiff.

Semmes & Mott, for defendant.

DURELL, District Judge. The 18th section of the act of March 3, 1845 (5 Stat. 738), provides: "That all advertisements made under the orders of the postmaster general, in a newspaper or newspapers, of letters uncalled for in any post office, shall be inserted in the paper or papers of the town or place where the office advertising may be situated having the largest circulation: provided, the editor or editors of such paper or papers shall agree to insert the same for a price not greater than that now fixed by law; and in case of question or dispute as to the amount of circulation of any papers, the editors of which may desire this advertising, it shall be the duty of the postmaster to receive evidence and decide upon the fact." Prior to this enactment the patronage of the government, as far as the advertising of uncalled-for letters was concerned, was given to party papers, in many instances to papers which had not a tenth of the circulation secured to other papers published in the same town or city. The postal provision of section 18 of the act of 1845 was made to take this matter wholly out of the influence of politics; it was made looking solely to the public good. The act of 1863, § 7 (12 Stat. 702), provides: "That the postmaster general is hereby authorized to regulate the periods during which undelivered letters shall remain in any post office, and the times such letters shall be returned to the dead-letter office, and to make regulations for their return to the writers from the dead-letter office when he is satisfied they cannot be delivered to the parties addressed. He is authorized, also, to order the publication of the list of non-delivered letters at any post office, in his discretion, by writing, posted in any public place or places, or in any daily or weekly newspaper regularly published within the post office delivery; such list may be published in any daily newspaper of an adjoining delivery having the largest circulation within the delivery of the post office publishing the list, but in no case shall compensation for such publication be allowed at a rate exceeding one cent for each letter so advertised; and no such publication shall be required when the postmaster general shall decide that the public interest requires it: provided, that letters addressed to parties foreign born may be published in a journal of the language most used by the parties addressed, if such be published in the same or an adjoining delivery."

It will be seen that this act authorizes the postmaster general to order the publication of the list of non-delivered letters by writing, posted in a public place, or by print in the columns of a regularly published newspaper—in his discretion. But when the discretion is exercised, it must be a wise discretion; and, if publication through the columns of a newspaper be selected, the act of 1863 reiterates the provisions of the act of 1845, and enjoins that the non-delivered letters be published in a newspaper having the largest circulation within the delivery of the post office publishing the list. Undoubtedly the newspaper represented by C. A. Weed, being the paper of the largest circulation in the city of New Orleans, has a right to the printing under government contract of the weekly list of letters uncalled for at the New Orleans post office, and it is the duty of Mr. Smallwood, acting postmaster, to send said list to that paper for publication. Smallwood, it appears, very well knows his duty under the law, for it is in evidence that in January last, he, acting for the government, awarded to The Times newspaper the making of the publication under consideration, for and during the time of one year. This publication he now hinders by withholding the weekly list of letters uncalled for, and Weed, representing the Times, applies for a writ of mandamus commanding Smallwood to do that which the law requires of him as an officer of the government to do. Can this court issue the writ in the exercise of an original jurisdiction? This question has been much mooted, both before the supreme and the circuit courts of the United States, and the decisions given thereupon are by no means harmonious. But the authority of Riggs v. Johnson Co., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 166, 1 L. T. Cts. Rep., where there was an application for the writ to the United States circuit court, sitting in Iowa, to compel certain county officers to levy a tax for the payment of the interest of certain railroad bonds issued by the county, is adverse to the exercise of any such power.

The decision given in the case of Riggs v. Johnson Co. [supra] is the last in point of time, rendered by the supreme court, touching the question under consideration, and with this court it is the law. The opinion was read by Mr. Justice Clifford as the organ of the court, and in the course of said opinion it is said: "The second proposition of the defendants is that the fourteenth section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 81], does not confer the power upon the federal courts to issue the writ to a state officer in any case. They argue that it does not authorize those courts to issue it at all, as it is not one of the writs named in the section, and is specially provided for, as appears in the preceding section. Nothing, however, is better settled than the rule that the circuit courts in the several states may issue the writ in all cases where it may be necessary, agreeably to the principles and usages of law, to the exercise of their respective jurisdictions. Such was the construction given to the fourteenth section of the judiciary act at the same time that the last clause of the preceding section, except as applied to judiciary officers, was held to be unconstitutional and void, and that construction has been followed to the present time. The authority of the circuit courts to issue process of any kind which is necessary to the exercise of jurisdiction and agreeable to the principles and usages of law is beyond question, and the power so conferred cannot be controlled either by the process of the state courts or by any act of the state legislature. Such an attempt was made in the early history of federal jurisprudence, but it was wholly unsuccessful. Suit in that case was ejectment, and the verdict was for the plaintiff. Defeated in the circuit court, the defendant went into the state court and obtained an injunction staying all proceedings. Plaintiff applied for a writ of habere facias possessionem, but the judges of the circuit court being opposed in opinion whether the writ ought to issue, the point was certified to this court, and the decision was that the state court had no jurisdiction to enjoin a judgment of the circuit court, and the directions were that the writ of possession should issue. Prior decisions of the court had determined that a circuit court could not enjoin the proceedings in a state court, and any attempt of the kind is forbidden by an act of congress. The argument for the defendant is, that the rule established in those and kindred cases controls the present controversy, but the court is of a different opinion, for various reasons, in addition to those already mentioned. Unless it be held that the application of the plaintiff for the writ is a new suit, it is quite clear that the proposition is wholly untenable. Theory of the plaintiff is that the writ of mandamus, in a case like the present, is a writ in aid of jurisdiction which has previously attached, and that, in such cases, it is a process auxiliary to the judgment, and is the proper substitute for the ordinary process of execution, to enforce the payment of the same, as provided in the contract. Grant that such is the nature and character of the writ as applied in such a case, and it is clear that the proposition of the defendants must utterly fail, as in that view there can be no conflict of jurisdiction, because it has already appeared that a state court cannot enjoin the process or proceedings of a circuit court. Complete jurisdiction of the case, which resulted in the judgment, is conceded: and if it be true that the writ of mandamus is a remedy auxiliary to the judgment, and is the proper process to enforce the payment of the same, then there is an end of the argument. as it cannot be contended that a state court can enjoin any such process of a federal court. When issued by a federal court, the writ of mandamus is never a prerogative writ. Outside of this district no circuit court can issue it at all in the exercise of original jurisdiction. Power of the circuit courts in the several states to issue the writ of mandamus is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction. Express determination of this court is, that it can only be issued by these courts in cases where the jurisdiction already exists, and not where it is to be acquired by means of the writ."

Thus it is decided by the supreme court that outside of the District of Columbia no circuit court can issue a writ of mandamus in the exercise of original jurisdiction. That such writs can be issued only as accessory to the jurisdiction of the court and to enforce a judgment rendered. Such being the law, and the writ demanded being, in fact, a new suit, and not accessory to the jurisdiction of the court acquired in a previous suit, the motion is dismissed. The only remedy is an action at law for damages.

UNITED STATES v. SMIDTH.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1855.

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—SURPRISE.

[Where a criminal trial is conducted on both sides upon the assumption that a certain material fact, though not admitted, is to be taken as true, but the court in its charge expressly leaves the question of the existence of that fact to the jury, this is sufficient ground for granting a new trial, where the attorney for the defence claims that the court's action was a surprise to him, and that he would have offered evidence on the point in question had he known that the matter was to be considered as open to the jury.]

Capt. Smidth was convicted at the last term of this court of being employed in the African slave trade, on board the slave brig Julia Moulton. Heard on motion for a new trial.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The prisoner is indicted under the act of congress passed May 15, 1820 [3 Stat. 600], upon a charge of having been engaged in the slave trade, in violation of the provisions of that act. By its provisions, any citizen of the United States, being of the crew, or ship's company of any foreign ship engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship, owned in whole or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States, who shall be engaged in the slave trade in the manner and with the intent specified in the fourth and fifth sections of the act, shall be adjudged a pirate, and, on conviction of the offence, shall suffer death.

The indictment charged the offence under both branches of the act—(1) That the prisoner being one of the ship's company of the brig Julia Moulton, owned in whole or in part by a citizen or citizens of the United States, did piratically, etc., confine and detain 500 negroes on board said vessel, etc., with intent, etc., contrary to the statutes. (2) That the prisoner, being a citizen of the United States, and one of the ship's company of the brig Julia Moulton—the said brig being a foreign vessel engaged in the slave trade—did piratically, etc., detain, etc., 500 negroes on board said vessel, with intent, etc.

On the trial evidence was given on behalf of the government of the purchase of the brig Julia Moulton by the prisoner at Boston, from the American owners, previous to the equipment and fitting out at the port of New York for the voyage to the coast of Africa; also that the ship's papers were taken out at the custom-house at Boston, and afterwards at New York, by him, or at his instance, and in his own name. The evidence was not entirely clear that the purchase of vessel was made for himself, or that he had furnished the money that was paid for her. In the ship's papers, which had been produced by the government, the prisoner was described as a citizen of the United States, and he had taken the usual custom-house oath that he was such citizen. The evidence was full that the prisoner, as master of the vessel, sailed from the port of New York to the coast of Africa, took in a cargo of negroes, and from thence sailed to the Island of Cuba, where the cargo was landed, and the ship burned by his orders. Considerable evidence was given on the part of the prisoner tending to show that he was a subject of the kingdom of Hanover, in which he was born, and not a citizen of the United States.

In submitting the case to the jury the court stated that the government must prove either that the prisoner, at the time he was engaged in the illegal traffic, was a citizen of the United States, or that the vessel which he commanded was owned, in whole or in part, by a citizen or citizens of the United States, in order to justify them in finding him guilty. And these two questions were accordingly left to the jury, for their finding, after calling their attention to the evidence that had been given bearing upon them. The jury found a general verdict of guilty.

The prisoner's counsel now moves for a new trial, among others, upon the ground that he was taken by surprise in the direction given to the case by the charge of the court in submitting to the jury the question as to the national character of the vessel, or, to be more particular, the question whether the interest of the American owners in the vessel had passed to the prisoner by the purchase of her at Boston.

The argument of the counsel is, that the purchase of the vessel by the prisoner has been proved on behalf of the government; and assuming, therefore, that it was not to be made a matter of controversy in the progress of the trial, but not to be taken as an admitted fact, he had omitted to examine witnesses and to produce evidence, which, if his attention had been turned to the point, or he had deemed it material, would have placed the fact beyond all reasonable doubt; that having taken it for granted, from the course of the trial, that the purchase and transfer of the vessel from the American owners passed from them, and vested in the prisoner a complete title, the only question in controversy left in this part of the case, as the counsel supposed, was the question of citizenship.

We are satisfied, on a review of the case, that those considerations, suggested by the counsel for the prisoner, are entitled to weight, and that the course of the trial may very well have misled him in respect to the point mentioned, in conducting the defence.

The government having begun the trial by giving evidence tending to prove the purchase of the vessel by the prisoner from the American owners, and thus making that fact a part of its case, whether material or not, so far as the prosecution was concerned, it was natural for the counsel for the prisoner to infer that, unless he himself chose to controvert it, it would be regarded as admitted, or, at least, not a matter of controversy to the future progress of the trial. The somewhat imperfect state of the evidence in respect to this purchase, as given on the trial, led to the impression at the time, that whatever might be our opinion as to the fact, the question was one that belonged to the jury, and it was submitted accordingly. We are satisfied, from the view already presented, that in this respect we are mistaken; and that instead of submitting the fact to the jury, as the government had made it a part of its case, and the fact not being controverted by the prisoner, the court should have regarded it as undisputed, and confined the question at issue to the citizenship of the prisoner. The contrary view taken by the court was not only calculated to mislead the counsel for the defence, but, we think, from the course of the trial, and the evidence given on the part of the government, that there was error in submitting the question of the national character of the vessel to the jury at all, as open for their consideration.

The finding of guilty was general, and as the national character of the vessel was submitted to the jury, the verdict may have been influenced by the consideration of that question. There must, therefore, be a new trial.

Case No. 16,317.

UNITED STATES v. SMILEY et al.

[6 Sawy. 640.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. California. Sept. 5, 1864.

THEFT OF ABANDONED PROPERTY — EXTRATERRITORIAL CRIMINAL JURISDICTION—PROPERTY BURIED IN SEA.

1. The ninth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1825 [4 Stat. 116], against plundering or stealing money, goods, merchandise or other effects from or belonging to any ship or vessel, in distress or wrecked, lost or stranded, does not apply to property which has been abandoned by its owners. Property thus abandoned may be acquired by any one who has the energy and enterprise to seek its recovery, without violating the statute.

2. The criminal jurisdiction of the United States may, in some instances, extend to their citizens beyond their territory, as, for instance, for violation of treaty stipulations by them abroad; for offenses committed in foreign countries where jurisdiction is by treaty conceded for that purpose, as in some cases in China and the Barbary States; for offenses committed on deserted islands or uninhabited coasts, by officers and seamen of vessels sailing under their flag; and for derelictions of duty by their ministers, consuls and other representatives abroad. But except in cases like these (and their extraterritorial character is generally indicated in the law designating the act for which punishment is prescribed), the criminal jurisdiction of the United States is limited to their own territory, actual or constructive. Their actual territory is co-extensive with their possessions, including a marine league from their shores on the sea. Their constructive territory embraces vessels sailing under their flag. Wherever they go they carry the laws of their country, and for a violation of them their officers and seamen may be subjected to punishment.

3. In this case the vessel, which carried the money recovered by the accused, was at the time of its recovery broken up, without a vestige of it remaining. The money was buried in the sand several feet under the water of the sea and was within one hundred and fifty feet of the Mexican shore. Held, that there was no jurisdiction of the United States over the place or property; and that the jurisdiction of Mexico over all offenses committed within a marine league of its shores, not on a vessel of another nation, was complete and exclusive.

[This was an indictment against Thomas J. L. Smiley and others for plundering and stealing property from a wreck, under the act of congress of May 3, 1825. Heard on demurrer.]

The case was as follows: The steamer Golden Gate, belonging to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, left San Francisco for Panama on the twenty-first of July, 1862, with two hundred and forty-two passengers and a crew of ninety-six persons. At about five o'clock on the afternoon of Sunday, July 27th, while running within three and a half miles of the Mexican coast, she was discovered to be on fire. An examination disclosed that the fire had originated between one of the galleys and the smokestack, and it soon became apparent that it was impossible to save her. She was then immediately headed for the shore, and half an hour later struck on a shelving beach of sand about two hundred and fifty feet from the shore, at a point fifteen miles north of the port of Manzanillo. The surf, which was breaking heavily, soon swung her stern around so that she lay nearly parallel with the beach when she went to pieces. At eight o'clock of that evening all that remained visible were her engines, boilers, and wheel frames. Of the three hundred and thirty-eight souls on board, only one hundred and forty were saved. The treasure which she carried, amounting to one million four hundred and fifty thousand dollars, was sunk about forty feet inside of the wreck, where in a space of sixty feet square upwards of one million two hundred thousand dollars were subsequently recovered.

Soon after the loss of the steamer was known, a vessel was fitted out by the underwriters to proceed to the scene of disaster and recover whatever was possible of the treasure. The parties employed soon returned and abandoned the idea of finding it. Immediately another vessel, the Active, was sent by a party of capitalists on the same errand, but she returned likewise unsuccessful. In December, 1862, another party of capitalists started another vessel, the schooner William Ireland, fitted with pumps and wrecking appliances and accompanied by submarine divers, under the command of Ireland, one of the projectors of the enterprise. The men in this expedition succeeded in recovering eight hundred thousand dollars. In August, 1863, they again returned to the wreck and were successful in recovering seventy-six thousand dollars more, when it was believed that any further efforts to secure any additional amount would be unsuccessful. Afterwards, in September, 1863, Thomas J. L. Smiley and others fitted out another expedition with a party of divers and a more complete equipment of diving and wrecking apparatus, and returned in January following, having succeeded in recovering three hundred and three thousand dollars. On a second trip they found thirty-three thousand dollars more; and with that voyage all efforts in that direction were closed. The treasure recovered by Smiley and others was carried in wooden boxes, each containing from five hundred dollars to forty-four thousand dollars, and was stowed in a room near the stern of the ship. The locality where the greater part was found was about one hundred and fifty feet from the shore of Mexico, and in from six to nine feet of water. Beneath the water was an equal depth of sand, under which was a hard clay stratum. On this hardpan beneath the water and the sand, the treasure boxes lay.

Before commencing his operations, Smiley had obtained from the Mexican government a license to explore for the treasure lost. On his return to San Francisco, claim was made by shippers for the specie recovered, but it was not given up, as the parties could not agree as to the amount which the recovering party should retain as compensation for the recovery. The result was that a complaint was made against Smiley and others of his company, and in March, 1864, they were indicted in the circuit court of the United States for plundering and stealing the treasure from the Golden Gate, under the ninth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1825, which provides "that, if any person or persons shall plunder, steal, or destroy any money, goods, merchandise or other effects, from or belonging to any ship, or vessel, or boat or raft, which shall be in distress, or which shall be wrecked, lost, stranded, or cast away upon the sea, or upon any reef, shoal, bank, or rocks of the sea, or in any other place within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States," he "shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine, not exceeding five thousand dollars, and imprisonment and confinement to hard labor not exceeding ten years, according to the aggravation of the offense." 4 Stat. 116.

To the indictment a demurrer was interposed on various technical grounds. As the expedition conducted by Smiley was an open one, after all other efforts for the recovery of the treasure had been abandoned, and Smiley was a man of previously good character and standing in the community, the indictment was generally regarded as persecution,—as an attempt to coerce the treasure from him without allowing proper compensation to him and his associates for its recovery. The counsel engaged in the case appeared to recognize this. It was therefore agreed that the facts stated above should be deemed admitted, and that upon them the following questions should be presented to the court for determination: First, whether the act of congress applied to a case where the taking of the property, of which larceny was alleged, was after the vessel had gone to pieces and disappeared; and, second, whether, if the act covered such a case, the circuit court had jurisdiction to try the offense charged, it having been committed within a marine league of the shores of Mexico; with a stipulation that if the court should be of opinion that the act did not apply to the case, or that it had not jurisdiction to try the offense charged, the demurrer should be sustained. Upon this stipulation the questions were argued.

William Barber, for the prosecution.

John B. Felton and Delos Lake, for defendants.

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and HOFFMAN, District Judge.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. We are not prepared to decide that the statute does not apply to a case where the vessel has gone to pieces, to which the goods belonged, of which larceny is alleged. It would fail of one of its objects if it did not extend to goods which the officers and men of a stranded or wrecked vessel had succeeded in getting ashore, so long as a claim is made by them to the property, though before its removal the vessel may have been broken up. We are inclined to the conclusion that, until the goods are removed from the place where landed, or thrown ashore, from the stranded or wrecked vessel, or cease to be under the charge of the officers or other parties interested, the act would apply if a larceny of them were committed, even though the vessel may in the meantime have gone entirely to pieces and disappeared from the sea. But in this case the treasure taken had ceased to be under the charge of the officers of the Golden Gate, or of its underwriters, when the expedition of Smiley was fitted out, and all efforts to recover the property had been given up by them. The treasure was then in the situation of derelict or abandoned property, which could be acquired by any one who might have the energy and enterprise to seek its recovery. In our judgment the act was no more intended to reach cases where property thus abandoned is recovered, than to reach property voluntarily thrown into the sea, and afterwards fished from its depths.

But if the act covered a case where the property was recovered after its abandonment by the officers of the vessel and others interested in it, we are clear that the circuit court has not jurisdiction of the offense here charged. The treasure recovered was buried in the sand, several feet under the water, and was within one hundred and fifty feet from the shore of Mexico. The jurisdiction of that country over all offences committed within a marine league of its shore, not on a vessel of another nation, was complete and exclusive.

Wheaton, in his treatise on International Law, after observing that "the maritime territory of every state extends to the ports, harbors, bays, and mouths of rivers and adjacent parts of the sea inclosed by headlands, belonging to the same state," says: "The general usage of nations superadds to this extent of territorial jurisdiction a distance of a marine league, or as far as a cannon-shot will reach from the shore, along all the coasts of the state. Within these limits its rights of property and territorial jurisdiction are absolute, and exclude those of every other nation." Part 2, c. 4, § 6.

The criminal jurisdiction of the government of the United States—that is, its jurisdiction to try parties for offenses committed against its laws—may in some instances extend to its citizens everywhere. Thus, it may punish for violation of treaty stipulations by its citizens abroad, for offenses committed in foreign countries where, by treaty, jurisdiction is conceded for that purpose, as in some cases in China and in the Barbary States; it may provide for offences committed on deserted islands, and on an uninhabited coast, by the officers and seamen of vessels sailing under its flag. It may also punish derelictions of duty by its ministers or consuls, and other representatives abroad. But in all such cases it will be found that the law of congress indicates clearly the extraterritorial character of the act at which punishment is aimed. Except in cases like these, the criminal jurisdiction of the United States is necessarily limited to their own territory, actual or constructive. Their actual territory is co-extensive with their possessions, including a marine league from their shores into the sea.

This limitation of a marine league was adopted because it was formerly supposed that a cannon-shot would only reach to that extent. It is essential that the absolute domain of a country should extend into the sea so far as necessary for the protection of its inhabitants against injury from combating belligerents while the country itself is neutral. Since the great improvement of modern times in ordnance, the distance of a marine league, which is a little short of three English miles, may, perhaps, have to be extended so as to equal the reach of the projecting power of modern artillery. The constructive territory of the United States embraces vessels sailing under their flag; wherever they go they carry the laws of their country, and for a violation of them their officers and men may be subjected to punishment. But when a vessel is destroyed, and goes to the bottom, the jurisdiction of the country over it necessarily ends, as much so as it would over an island which should sink into the sea.

In this case it appears that the Golden Gate was broken up; not a vestige of the vessel remained. Whatever was afterwards done with reference to property once on board of her, which had disappeared under the sea, was done out of the jurisdiction of the United States, as completely as though the steamer had never existed.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the circuit court has no jurisdiction to try the offense charged, even if, under the facts admitted by the parties, any offense was committed. According to the stipulation, judgment sustaining the demurrer will be, therefore, entered, and the defendants discharged.

Case No. 16,318.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.[1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 25, 1861.

INTERNATIONAL LAW—CIVIL WAR—RIGHTS OF INSURGENTS—PIRACY.

[1. A combination of citizens or subjects for the purpose of overturning a government does not become entitled to the privileges of national sovereignty until a revolution is actually accomplished.]

[1] [Not previously reported.]

[2. The fact that the number of insurgents in a state is so great that they carry on a civil war against its government does not entitle the government set up by such insurgents to the privileges of sovereignty.]

[3. The United States courts will treat as pirates all persons engaged in plundering vessels of United States citizens under authority of a government set up by insurgents against whom a civil war is being waged.]

Geo. A. Coffey, U. S. Atty.

Furman Sheppard, for prisoner.

Before GRIER, Circuit Justice, and CADWALADER, District Judge.

GRIER, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The defendant, William Smith, whom you have in charge, is indicted for the crime of piracy. It is proper that the court should give you a definition of it, so that you may apply the testimony to the case. It is briefly defined as "robbery on the high seas." [U. S. v. Smith] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 153, Append. As the sea belongs to no nation, but to all nations, and as the offense is usually committed without the particular municipal jurisdiction of any nation, it is an offense against the law of nations, and may be punished by any nation, whether committed by natives or foreigners. Pirates or robbers on the ocean are called "hostes humani generis." But every nation has the offense and punishment defined by its own municipal laws. Of the several acts of congress on this subject we need only refer to the third section of the act of 15th May, 1820 [3 Stat. 600], as the one which defines the offense as charged in the indictment. It is as follows: "Sec. 3. That, if any person shall, upon the high seas, or in any open roadstead, or in any haven, basin, or bay, or in any river where the sea ebbs and flows, commit the crime of robbery, in or upon any ship or vessel, or upon any of the ship's company of any ship or vessel, or the lading thereof, such person shall be adjudged to be a pirate: and, being thereof convicted before the circuit court of the United States for the district into which he shall be brought, or in which he shall be found, shall suffer death. And if any person engaged in any piratical cruise or enterprise, or being of the crew or ship's company of any piratical ship or vessel, shall land from such ship or vessel, and, on shore, shall commit robbery, such person shall be adjudged a pirate: and on conviction thereof before the circuit court of the United States for the district into which he shall be brought, or in which he shall be found, shall suffer death: Provided, that nothing in this section contained shall be construed to deprive any particular state of its jurisdiction over such offences, when committed within the body of a county, or authorize the courts of the United States to try any such offenders, after conviction or acquittance, for the same offence, in a state court."

First the offense is robbery, a crime defined by the common law as "the feloneous and violent taking of any money or goods from the person of another, putting him in fear." The epithet "feloneous" has reference to the intention, which must be "animo furandi" for the purpose of stealing or appropriating the thing taken. There need be no absolute personal violence used, if there be threats and the person robbed submits peaceably through fear of violence. When the robbery is committed by several acting together, all are equally guilty. Nor need the money or goods taken be on the person, provided they be in the possession of the owner, such as household goods, or cattle in the field, or, as in this case, "upon a vessel, and in lading" as defined in the act. Third. The robbery must be committed on the "high seas," &c.

If you believe the testimony (which I need not repeat to you), the charge thus defined appears to be fully established. In fact, if the case rested here, the learned counsel for the defendant seem to admit that they could not avoid a conviction. But it is contended that, though property may be taken "by violence on the high seas," yet if it be done by authority of a state in prosecution of a war against another state, the persons acting under such an authority are not guilty of piracy, and cannot be punished as such. Of this there is no doubt; for piracy has been defined as "depredation on or near the sea without authority from any prince or state." 6 Bac. Abr. 163. Those having such authority are treated as enemies, or as having the privileges of enemies in open war. Thus Turks and Algerines, though acting as free-booters on the ocean (according to Sir Lionel Jenkins), could not be treated as pirates, because they acted under a commission from states with whom the government had treaties, and had acknowledged to be states, in the great family of nations. But it does not follow that every band of conspirators who may combine together for the purpose of rebellion or revolution or overturning the government of which they are citizens or subjects, become ipso facto a separate and independent member of the great family of sovereign states. A successful rebellion may be termed a revolution; but until it becomes such it has no claim to be recognized as a member of the family, or exercise the rights or enjoy the privileges consequent on sovereignty. "When a civil war rages in a foreign nation, or in our own, and one part separates from the old established government, and erects itself into a distinct government, the courts of the United States must view such contested government as it is viewed by the legislative and executive departments of the government of the United States." Every government is bound, by the law of self-preservation, to suppress insurrections; and the fact that the number and power of the insurgents may be so great as to carry on a civil war against their legitimate sovereign will not entitle them to be considered a state. The fact that a civil war exists for the purpose of suppressing a rebellion is conclusive evidence that the government of the United States refuses to acknowledge their right to be considered as such. Consequently this court, sitting here to execute the laws of the United States, can view those in rebellion against them in no other light than as traitors to their country, and those who assume by their authority a right to plunder the property of our citizens on the high seas as pirates and robbers.

I do not think it necessary, on the present occasion, to follow the wide range of questions which have been drawn into discussion. Of the plea of duress I need only say that I am sorry indeed that there is not some evidence to support it. But the dispensation of mercy is not with us. Your duty is to render a true verdict, and that of the court to pronounce the sentence of law thereon. Whether, under all the circumstances of the case, a proper policy might not suspend its execution, is a question for the executive to decide.

Case No. 16,319.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[2 Blatchf. 127.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. 7, 1850.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — COLLECTION LAWS — NONDELIVERY OF MANIFEST—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

1. The 1st section of the act of March 2d, 1821 (3 Stat. 616), as re-enacted by the act of March 3d, 1823 (3 Stat. 781), which imposes a penalty for bringing into the United States from adjacent territory goods subject to duty, and not delivering a manifest thereof at the nearest collector's office, is not repealed by section 19 of the act of August 30th, 1842 (5 Stat. 565).

[Cited in U. S. v. Nolton, Case No. 15,897; U. S. v. The Cuba, Id. 14,898; The Coquitlam, 57 Fed. 718.]

2. The first two acts and the last act provide for a very different class of offences. The former attach the penalty to the mere neglect to deliver a manifest, no matter what the intent. In the latter, there must be an intent to defraud the revenue, and either smuggling or an attempt to pass a fraudulent invoice.

[Cited in U. S. v. Batchelder, Case No. 14,540.]

3. The act of 1821 does not require either a formal entry at the collector's office or an invoice, and the system established by it is a distinct one, applicable to the frontiers adjacent to foreign territories.

4. The act of 1842 is aimed at frauds on the revenue, in cases where an entry of goods and an invoice are required, as prescribed by the act of March 1st, 1823 (3 Stat. 729).

This was a writ of error to the district court [of the United States for the Northern district of New York].

The action was debt, brought by the United States against [Abel B.] Smith, to recover a penalty under the acts of congress passed March 2d, 1821, and March 3d, 1823 (3 Stat. 616, 781). The declaration set forth, in substance, that the defendant brought from Canada into the United States, in the collection district of Cape Vincent, certain goods and merchandise subject to duty, and neglected and refused to deliver a manifest thereof at the nearest collector's or deputy-collector's office, and passed by and avoided such office, contrary to the provisions of the acts of congress above referred to; and claimed the penalty of four times the value of said merchandize. The defendant pleaded nil debet. On the trial, the counsel for the defendant admitted that a cause of action had been made out, and that the United States were entitled to recover according to the case as presented by the declaration; but insisted that the penalty imposed under the acts of 1821 and 1823 had been abrogated by the 19th section of the act of congress of the 30th of August, 1842 (5 Stat. 565). The court so ruled, to which ruling the plaintiffs excepted, and, after verdict and judgment for the defendant [case unreported], they brought a writ of error.

James R. Lawrence, Dist. Atty., for plaintiffs in error.

Bernard Bagley, for defendant in error.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. By the 1st section of the act of March 2d, 1821, it is made the duty of the masters of vessels, except registered vessels, and of every person having charge of any boat, &c., and of the conductor or driver of any carriage or sleigh, and of every other person coming from any foreign territory adjacent to the United States, into the United States, with merchandize subject to duty, to deliver, immediately on his arrival within the United States, a manifest of the cargo or loading of such vessel, boat or carriage, or of the merchandize so brought from the foreign territory, at the office of any collector or deputy-collector which shall be nearest the boundary line, &c.; and every such manifest shall be verified by the oath of the person delivering the same, which shall state that such manifest contains a full, just and true account of the kinds, quantities and values of all the merchandise so brought from the foreign territory; and it is provided that, in case of neglect or refusal, or of passing by or avoiding the office, the said merchandise, together with the vessel, boat or carriage, shall be forfeited to the United States, and the person offending shall be subject to a penalty of $400.

The act of March 3d, 1823, substantially reenacts this provision, changing the penalty of $400 to a penalty of four times the value of the merchandise.

The 19th section of the act of August 30th, 1842, provides, that if any person shall knowingly and wilfully, with intent to defraud the revenue of the United States, smuggle or clandestinely introduce into the United States any goods, wares or merchandise subject to duty, and which should have been invoiced, without paying or accounting for the duty, or shall make out, or pass or attempt to pass through the custom-house, any false, forged or fraudulent invoice, every such person, &c., shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, or imprisoned for a term not exceeding two years, or both.

The question presented is, whether this section has the effect necessarily to repeal the aforesaid provisions of the acts of 1821 and 1823. If it has, it must be by implication, on account of the repugnancy and inconsistency of the two provisions, as there is no repeal in express terms; and, in order to ascertain this, it will be material to compare the two acts, and ascertain with care their import and effect.

The offence, in the acts of 1821 and 1823, consists in the neglect or refusal to deliver at the office of the collector, or of his deputy, nearest the boundary line, or nearest the road or waters by which the goods are brought, the manifest prescribed in the act, of merchandise subject to duty brought into the United States from an adjacent foreign territory; or, the passing by and avoiding such office. The simple neglect or refusal to deliver the manifest, under the circumstances stated, or the passing by and avoiding the office, constitutes the offence, and subjects the party to the penalty. The intent which accompanies the neglect or refusal, or the passing by and avoiding the office, is not made an element of the offence, or the subject of inquiry on the trial. If the fact of neglect or refusal appears, the penalty follows.

The offence, in the act of 1842, consists in knowingly and wilfully, and with an intent to defraud the revenue, smuggling or clandestinely introducing into the United States merchandize subject to duty, and which should have been invoiced, without paying or accounting for the duty; or, the making or passing, or attempting to pass, at the custom-house, a false, forged or fraudulent invoice. The act must be smuggling or clandestinely bringing into the United States merchandize subject to duty; and it must be done with a wilful intent to defraud the revenue. These are essential elements to constitute the offence, and must be established on the trial, to warrant a conviction.

Now, it seems to me that this analysis and comparison of the two acts show that they provide for an entirely distinct and different class of offences, depending upon a totally different state of facts and circumstances, and are to be regarded as separate and distinct parts of the system of the government to prevent evasion and fraud in collecting the revenue. Their only identity consists in their object and purpose, to wit, to guard the customs. But, in this there is no repugnancy; as penal acts for this purpose in the statute book are numerous and constantly enforced. The repeal of a statute by implication is not favored by the courts, and is never allowed unless the repugnancy is plain and unavoidable, so that the two acts are incapable of being reconciled. Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342. Here, both statutes may well stand together, as the acts constituting the offence in the former are not covered by the latter. The former prescribes particular regulations to be observed on the frontiers by the importers of foreign merchandize, with a view to guard the revenue, annexing a penalty in case of a non-observance. The violation of these comes far short of making out the offence under the latter. Both are directed against the importation of foreign merchandise without payment of the duty, but under a different state of facts and circumstances, and prescribing a punishment according to the aggravation of each case respectively. Hence, where the act is done knowingly and wilfully, and with an intent to defraud, fine and imprisonment are annexed.

It is not necessary to say that the latter act is cumulative; indeed, it cannot be properly so regarded, because it is not for the same offence. Neither is it necessary to say that the party could be punished under each statute for the same importation of merchandise. That is a very different question from the one presented, and which I have been considering. The same act, committed under different circumstances, may be the subject of different degrees of punishment, as an assault, and an assault with intent to kill; but, it by no means follows that the party is punishable by the infliction of each penalty.

But, independently of the above views, there is also another upon which I am of opinion that the judgment below must be reversed.

By the 19th section of the act of 1842, the punishment is inflicted for smuggling goods subject to duty, and which should have been invoiced; and for making, or passing or attempting to pass at the custom-house, false, forged or fraudulent invoices.

The act of congress of the 1st of March, 1823 (3 Stat. 729), requires that an invoice shall be delivered to the collector when an entry of goods is made at the custom-house, giving to him, in certain cases, a limited discretion as to the time when it is to be produced; and it is against the smuggling of goods which, if regularly imported, should have been accompanied with this invoice, and against the fabrication of fraudulent invoices, that the 19th section of the act of 1842 is directed.

Now, the act of 1821 refers to a different class of importations. No formal entry by the importer need be made at the office, nor need the goods be accompanied with an invoice. All that is necessary is the delivery of the manifest prescribed by the act, at the office of the collector, or of his deputy, nearest the boundary line, or nearest the road or waters by which the goods have been brought, together with the verification of the same. Upon this being done, the duties are paid or secured. The act dispenses with the invoice.

If, in view of the act of March 1st, 1823, which requires that an invoice should accompany the entry of goods at the custom-house, there could be any doubt that the construction I have put upon the act of 1821 is correct, all doubt is removed by the act of March 3d, 1823, which, though passed after the act of March 1st, 1823, yet substantially re-enacts the first section of the act of 1821, and changes the penalty, thereby re-affirming that act, which dispenses with the invoice.

It is apparent that an essential element to constitute the offence under the 19th section of the act of 1842 is wanting, in the importation of goods provided for in the act of 1821. There is nothing in the latter act requiring that they should be invoiced. The system is a distinct one, applicable to the frontiers adjacent to foreign territories. I am constrained, therefore, to differ from the court below, and to reverse the judgment there rendered. Judgment reversed, and venire de novo.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

Circuit Court, S D. New York. Feb. 24, 1855.

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—NEW TRIAL—SLAVE TRADE.

Where, on the trial of an indictment, founded on the slave-trade act of May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 600), which charged the prisoner with being one of the ship's company of a vessel owned in whole or in part by a citizen or citizens of the United States, and also with being a citizen of the United States and one of the ship's company of a foreign vessel, the government began the trial by giving evidence tending to prove the purchase of the vessel by the prisoner from American owners of her, and the prisoner did not controvert that fact, or put in any evidence on that subject, but confined himself to proving that he was not a citizen of the United States: Held, that it was error in the court to submit to the jury the question as to whether the interest of such American owners in the vessel had passed to the prisoner by such purchase, but that the only question submitted to them should have been as to the citizenship of the prisoner; and that, as they found a general verdict of guilty, there must be a new trial.

This was an indictment against the defendant [James Smith], under the act of congress passed May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 600), upon a charge of having been engaged in the slave trade, in violation of the provisions of that act. It provides, that any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship owned in whole or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States, who shall be engaged in the slave trade, in the manner and with the intent specified in the fourth and fifth sections of the act, shall be adjudged a pirate, and, on conviction of the offence, shall suffer death. The indictment charged the offence under both branches of the act: (1) That the prisoner, being one of the ship's company of the brig Julia Moulton, owned in whole or in part by a citizen or citizens of the United States, did piratically, &c., confine and detain five hundred negroes on board said vessel, &c., with intent, &c., contrary to the statute. (2) That the prisoner, being a citizen of the United States, and one of the ship's company of the brig Julia Moulton, the said brig being a foreign vessel engaged in the slave trade, did piratically, &c., detain, &c., five hundred negroes on board said vessel, with intent, &c. After conviction, the defendant moved for a new trial.

John McKeon, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Charles O'Conor, for defendant.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. On the trial, evidence was given, on behalf of the government, of the purchase of the brig Julia Moulton by the prisoner, at Boston, from her American owners, previous to her equipment and fitting out at the port of New York for the voyage to the coast of Africa; also, that the ship's papers were taken out at the custom-house at Boston, and afterwards at New York, by him, or at his instance, and in his own name. The evidence was not entirely clear that the purchase of the vessel was made for himself, or that he had furnished the money that was paid for her. In the ship's papers, which were produced by the government, the prisoner was described as a citizen of the United States; and he took the usual custom-house oath that he was such citizen. The evidence was full, that the prisoner, as master of the vessel, sailed from the port of New York to the coast of Africa, took in a cargo of negroes, and thence sailed to the island of Cuba, where the cargo was landed and the ship burned by his orders. Considerable evidence was given on the part of the prisoner tending to show that he was a subject of the kingdom of Hanover, in which he was born, and not a citizen of the United States.

In submitting the case to the jury, the court stated, that the government must prove, cither that the prisoner, at the time he was engaged in the illegal traffic, was a citizen of the United States, or that the vessel which he commanded was owned, in whole or in part, by a citizen or citizens of the United States, in order to justify them in finding him guilty. And these two questions were accordingly left to the jury for their finding, after their attention was called to the evidence that had been given bearing upon them. The jury found a general verdict of guilty.

The prisoner's counsel now moves for a new trial, upon the ground, among others, that he was taken by surprise in the direction given to the case by the charge of the court, in submitting to the jury the question as to the national character of the vessel; or, to be more particular, the question whether the interest of the American owners in the vessel had passed to the prisoner by the purchase of her at Boston.

The argument of the counsel is, that the purchase of the vessel by the prisoner had been proved on behalf of the government; that, assuming, therefore, that it was not to be made a matter of controversy in the progress of the trial, but was to be taken as an admitted fact, he had omitted to examine witnesses and to produce evidence, which, if his attention had been turned to the point, or he had deemed it material, would have placed the fact beyond all reasonable doubt; and that, having taken it for granted, from the course of the trial, that the purchase and transfer of the vessel from the American owners passed from them and vested in the prisoner a complete title to the vessel, the counsel supposed that the only question in controversy, left in this part of the case, was the question of citizenship.

We are satisfied, on a review of the case, that these considerations, suggested by the counsel for the prisoner, are entitled to weight, and that the course of the trial may very well have misled him in respect to the point mentioned, in conducting the defence. The government, having begun the trial by giving evidence tending to prove the purchase of the vessel by the prisoner from her American owners, and having thus made that fact, whether material or not, a part of its case, so far as the prosecution was concerned, it was natural for the counsel for the prisoner to infer, that unless he himself chose to controvert it, it would be regarded as admitted, or, at least, not be a matter of controversy in the future progress of the trial. The somewhat imperfect state of the evidence in respect to this purchase, as given on the trial, led to the impression, at the time, that whatever might be our opinion as to the fact, the question was one that belonged to the jury, and it was submitted accordingly. We are satisfied, from the view already presented, that in this respect we were mistaken; and that, instead of submitting the fact to the jury, as the government had made it a part of its case, and as the fact was not controverted by the prisoner, the court should have regarded it as undisputed, and have confined the question at issue to the citizenship of the prisoner. Not only was the view taken by the court calculated to mislead the counsel for the defence, but, we think, from the course of the trial, and from the evidence given on the part of the government, that there was error in submitting the question of the national character of the vessel to the jury at all, as a question open for their consideration.

The finding of guilty was general, and, as the national character of the vessel was submitted to the jury, their verdict may have been influenced by the consideration of that question. There must, therefore, be a new trial.

Case No. 16,321.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[1 Bond, 68;[1] 5 Am. Law Reg. 268.]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1856.

OFFICES OF UNITED STATES—COMPENSATION—SET-OFF—ACCOUNTING OFFICERS—DOUBLE SALARIES—TERRITORIAL SECRETARY—COMMISSIONS.

1. In a suit by the United States to recover a balance due on the books of the treasury department, the defendant can not give in evidence, as a set-off, a claim against the government, which has not previously been presented to, and disallowed by, the proper accounting officer, without proving that it was not before in his power to produce the voucher for such claim, and that he was prevented from exhibiting it, "by absence from the United States, or some unavoidable accident."

2. The rejection of an account or claim against the United States, by an accounting officer of the government, authorized by a special act of congress to adjust the same on equitable principles, does not preclude the defendant, when sued, from setting up such rejected claim or account as a set-off.

3. There is no authority, either in the executive or judicial department of the government, to allow a claim against the United States, which is prohibited by law.

4. The legislation of congress prohibits any extra compensation to an officer for services performed, properly pertaining by law to his office.

5. The defendant, as secretary of Minnesota territory, having a fixed salary as such, was not entitled to claim, in addition thereto, the salary of governor, during the absence of that officer; as the act organizing the territory made it the duty of the secretary, "in case of the death, removal, resignation, or necessary absence of the governor," to discharge the duties of that office, without any provision for an increase of compensation to the secretary.

6. The proviso in the second section of the act of September 30, 1850, expressly prohibits the allowance of double salaries in all cases.

7. The act organizing the territory of Minnesota, made the secretary the disbursing officer of the territorial government, and he can not claim a commission on such disbursements.

8. Where an officer, with a salary payable quarterly, is appointed for four years, "unless sooner removed by the president," and a removal is made during a current quarter, he is not entitled to his salary to the end of the quarter.

9. By the organic act of Minnesota territory, the general government became pledged to defray "the expenses of the legislative assembly, the printing of the laws, and other incidental expenses;" and the defendant is entitled to a credit for services rendered, or expenditures made, within the fair scope and meaning of these terms, so far as they did not pertain to the office of secretary of the territory; but the words "other incidental expenses" must be restricted to such expenses as were incidental to the legislative assembly and the printing of the laws.

10. The second section of the act of August 29, 1842 [5 Stat. 541], which applies to territories, then or afterward to be organized, provides that no act of the legislature of a territory shall be deemed of sufficient authority for a payment by the national treasury, and requires proper vouchers and proof of the same to be exhibited to the accounting officers of the proper department.

11. In a judicial case involving the accounts of a former secretary of a territory, in which credits are claimed which have been rejected by the treasury department, the fact that such credits have not been embraced in the estimate required by the organic act of the territory, to be previously made by the secretary of the treasury does not preclude their allowance by a jury, if not objectionable on other grounds.

D. O. Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Corwin & Probasco, Judge Johnson, and Mr. Spooner, for defendant.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). This suit is brought on the official bond of the defendant [Charles K. Smith], as late secretary of the territory of Minnesota, dated March 31, 1849. A balance of $4,078.41 is claimed as due to the United States; and treasury statements are in evidence, showing such balance against the defendant. The defendant exhibits claims against the government exceeding the amount of such balance, and insists on a judgment in his favor for the sum alleged to be due him. The larger portions of the items of claims exhibited in the defendant's account have been passed upon and disallowed by the treasury department, under the provisions of a special act of congress authorizing their adjustment on equitable principles. The defendant also claims an allowance of about one thousand dollars, embracing items of charge against the United States, which have not been presented for payment or allowance at the treasury department, and, consequently, have not been rejected by it. This latter class of vouchers was permitted to go in evidence to the jury, upon a suggestion that the defendant would be able to show reasons for their non-presentation which would render them admissible, and with the understanding that otherwise they were to be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury. The fourth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1797 (1 Stat. 515), provides "that in suits between the United States and individuals, no claim for a credit shall be admitted upon trial but such as shall appear to have been presented to the accounting officers of the treasury for their examination and by them disallowed, in whole or in part, unless it should be proved to the satisfaction of the court that the defendant is, at the time of the trial, in possession of vouchers not before in his power to procure, and that he was prevented from exhibiting a claim for such credit at the treasury by absence from the United States, or some unavoidable accident." No proof has been exhibited by the defendant which brings the items referred to within either of the exceptions stated in the foregoing provision of the act of congress, and they must, therefore, be entirely excluded from the consideration of the jury. The law is imperative on this subject, and vests no discretion in the court. There may be cases in which its operation may savor of harshness, or even of injustice, but there can be no doubt that such a provision is necessary to prevent the presentation of fraudulent or fictitious claims upon the government.

The other items of charge in the defendant's account having been presented to, and disallowed by, the proper accounting officer, under an act of congress authorizing their settlement upon principles of equity, are properly in controversy in this suit. Such rejection of these items, by the treasury department, is not decisive of the rights of the claimant. The constitution of the United States vests all the judicial power of the government in the courts of the Union; and it is the unquestionable right of the citizen, in a suit brought by the United States for the recovery of a balance claimed, if his credits have been disallowed by the accounting officer, to present them for the decision of a court and jury. There is an obvious necessity that the government should hold its subordinate agents to great strictness, and the most rigid accountability in all transactions involving official liability; and in discharging this duty, the highest executive officers must be guided by law, and are not at liberty to adopt their own views of right and justice as the basis of their action. Even in cases of reference to them by act of congress, with a power to adjust and settle accounts on principles of equity, no authority is thereby implied to allow a claim against the government which is expressly, or by clear implication, prohibited by law. And the same principle of action applies to and must govern the court of the United States in adjudicating between the government and a citizen, as to matters of account. If the allowance of a claim is forbidden by law, a court and jury can not give it legal validity; but if not thus prohibited, and it is in its character just and equitable, though it may have been rejected by the proper officer, it may be allowed in a judicial tribunal, if properly authenticated by evidence. When the government comes before such a tribunal as a litigant party, its position is that of equality with the citizen; and it is entitled to no special immunities, unless expressly conferred by law. If it shall happen that even the application of these liberal principles, in such a controversy, shall fail to secure to the individual citizen the full measure of justice, his only remedy is an application to the legislative department of the government; the powers of which are ample to administer aright on the most comprehensive principles of equity, with no limitations except those imposed by the constitution.

The items of the account exhibited by the defendant, and on which the jury are to pass, are numerous, and include claims for various services and expenditures, as secretary of the territory of Minnesota, embracing a period between March 31, 1849—the date of his appointment to office—and November 14, 1851, when he was superseded by the appointment of another person. I will not detain the jury by a special reference to all the credits claimed by the defendant in his account now exhibited, but having noticed a few of them, in respect to which the construction of the court has been called for, will state some general principles of law applicable to the whole account, which may afford a satisfactory guide to the jury, in their considerations as to its proper adjustment.

I may remark here, that it is insisted, by the counsel for the government, that all the items of charge in the defendant's account are liable to the objection, either that they involve claims for services rendered by him as secretary of the territory, legally pertaining to the office, and for which he is entitled to no compensation beyond the salary given him by law—or, if not included in this class, the services rendered and expenditures made were in virtue of laws or resolutions passed by the territorial legislature, for which there is no legal claim on the treasury of the United States. It may now be regarded as a principle which admits of no question, that no officer of the United States, having a fixed salary, is entitled to any extra compensation for the performance of services or duties which pertain to his office by law. It is wholly unnecessary to refer to the legislation of congress, or the decisions of the courts of the Union on this subject. The incumbent of an office is bound to perform all the duties belonging to it, without extra compensation. No man is under any necessity to accept an office, but having accepted it, the obligation rests upon him to discharge its duties for the remuneration which the law provides. He accepts it with a knowledge of the pay or salary attached to it, and, though its duties may be onerous, and the compensation inadequate, if he chooses to retain the office he must be content with what the law gives.

Some of the charges in the defendant's account are clearly within the objections just stated, and can not, therefore, be allowed by the jury. I will notice, very briefly, some of the principal items which, in the judgment of the court, must be rejected on this ground. The charge of $1,004 for salary as acting governor of the territory during the absence of the governor, is clearly within the prohibition adverted to. There are two distinct periods of service charged by the defendant, for which he claims the salary of the governor, in addition to that of secretary of the territory. The first is, from November 8, 1849, to February 12, 1850, amounting to $645—the second, from April 10, 1851, to the 2d of June following, amounting to $358.83. The charge for the latter period is within the operation of the proviso of the second section of the act of September 30, 1850, and its allowance is expressly forbidden by it. This proviso is in these words: "That hereafter the proper accounting officers of the treasury, or other pay officers of the United States, shall in no case allow any pay to one individual for the salaries of two different offices, on account of having performed the duties thereof, at the same time." But, without reference to this act of congress, the whole of this charge is liable to the objections, that the service was one which he was bound to perform as secretary of the territory, and for which no extra compensation can be allowed. The third section of the act for the organization of Minnesota territory authorizes and requires the secretary to discharge the duties of the executive, "in case of the death, removal, resignation, or necessary absence of the governor from the territory." The defendant took the office of secretary knowing that, in any of the emergencies specified, the duties of the governor would devolve on him. And the law made no provision for any additional compensation in that event. In assuming the office of secretary of the territory the defendant became bound to act as governor, if necessary under the law, as fully as he was obliged to discharge any other duty as secretary. It pertained to the office of secretary, though not strictly within the ligitimate range of its duties. The salary certainly was less than the labor and responsibility required, but this is an evil which this court and jury can not remedy without usurping legislative power.

There is another item, $557, charged in the defendant's account as a commission of one per cent. on funds disbursed by him as secretary. This is liable to the objection stated in the foregoing item. By the eleventh section of the organic act of the territory, the secretary is expressly made the disbursing officer of the territory, and is required to account to the secretary of the treasury of the United States for the manner in which the funds have been expended. This was, therefore, one of the duties required of him by law, as secretary, for which he is not entitled to any extra allowance.

I will here notice briefly another charge in the defendant's account that must be rejected. I refer to his claim for salary as secretary for the whole of the quarter ending December 31, 1851. It seems he entered on his duties as secretary in March, 1849, was removed by the president the latter part of October, 1851, but continued in the actual performance of his duties till the 14th of November in the last-named year. The defendant has been allowed his salary by the treasury department to the date of his removal, but it has been rejected for the balance of the quarter. No doubt can exist to his right to it to the 14th of November, when he was in fact superseded by his successor. It is insisted, however, that he is entitled to pay for the whole quarter. The argument is, that, where an officer whose salary is payable quarterly is removed, by the act of the president, before the expiration of a current quarter, he is entitled to his pay to the end of it. This is believed to be in opposition to the uniform practice of the government in such cases I do not propose to discuss the constitutional question of the power of the president to remove from office, at his own will, without presenting to the senate the grounds of the removal and obtaining its approval of the act. The defendant, conformably to the act organizing Minnesota territory, was appointed to the office of secretary for four years, "unless sooner removed by the president of the United States." For many years past this has been the usual mode of commissioning executive and ministerial officers; and the power of removal, with or without cause, has been freely exercised by those who have held the presidential office for the last thirty years. True, there were those at an early period of our national government who contended that the spirit, if not the letter of the constitution, required the president to submit the causes of removal from office to the senate; and that, as it was only by and with the advice and consent of that body that an appointment could be made, the same formality was required in removing from office. Although there may be some, at this day, who maintain this view, the current of opinion seems to set strongly in the opposite direction. The practice of the government has been so long settled, and is so generally acquiesced in, that there is little probability of a change. And if conceded that the power of removal, without restriction or limitation, belongs to the president, the official duties of the incumbent, and with it, his right to salary or compensation cease when the successor assumes the office. The defendant's claim for salary, from the 14th of November to the 31st of December, will therefore be rejected by the jury.

Before passing to the consideration of the other part of the defendant's account, I will notice an item of $116, charged as the expenses of a visit to Washington, to procure the funds appropriated by congress for the support of the territorial government for the year 1850. From some cause, great delay had occurred in remitting the funds appropriated, to the seat of government of the territory. To hasten this remittance, the defendant made the journey to Washington. Its necessity is not very obvious, so far as there is any evidence on the subject. But if the jury believe the public interests of the territory required the journey, there is no reason why the defendant should not be reimbursed to the amount of his actual expenses.

It would detain the jury unreasonably, and, as I think, unnecessarily, to notice in detail the remaining items of charge in the defendant's account. In their retirement they will have the opportunity of giving to the account, and the vouchers which sustain it, a critical inspection. So far as any of these may be for services or duties performed, belonging to the office of the defendant, as secretary of the territory, they will be disallowed, on the grounds already fully stated. There are others, however, which stand on another basis, and which present a different question for the consideration of the court and jury. Their allowance or disallowance will depend mainly upon the provisions of the act of congress for the organization of the territory of Minnesota. To such of them as bear upon the items in controversy, I will now briefly ask the attention of the jury. This organic act was approved and took effect March 3, 1849. Section 4 vests the legislative power of the territory in the governor and a legislative assembly. Section 6 provides that the legislative power shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the constitution of the United States, and the provisions of said act; and requires that all the acts of the governor and legislative council shall be submitted to the congress of the United States; and if disapproved, shall be null and void. By section 12, the laws in force in the territory of Wisconsin, at the date of her admission into the Union, are declared to be in force in Minnesota, so far as they were compatible with the act organizing the last named territory, subject to amendments and repeal by the legislature. By the same section, the laws of the United States were extended over, and declared to be in force in, Minnesota, so far as they were applicable. Among the provisions of section 11 is one declaring that there shall be an annual appropriation by congress of one thousand dollars, to be expended by the governor to defray the contingent expenses of the territory, and also, annually, a sufficient sum "to defray the expenses of the legislative assembly, the printing of the laws, and other incidental expenses." This appropriation is to be made upon the estimate of the secretary of the treasury, and to be expended by the secretary of the territory. Section 17 appropriates five thousand dollars for the purchase of a library for the benefit of the territory.

These are all the provisions of the organic act which it is material to notice. The act, as is obvious, is based on the admitted doctrine that a territory is, in some sense, a ward of the general government, and that while in its state of pupilage, the primary and paramount power of legislation over it is vested in congress. The act of congress, however, granted to the people of Minnesota territory the right to elect a local legislature, in which was vested the ordinary powers of legislation, subject to the restrictions and limitations specified. Among the powers thus conferred on the legislative body, was the power of taxation for legitimate territorial purposes. But the obligation was assumed by the general government to provide for the payment of the salaries and compensation of all the officers, whose appointments were authorized by the act. It was also pledged to defray the contingent expenses of the territory, to an amount not exceeding one thousand dollars, and also "the expenses of the legislative assembly, the printing of the laws, and other incidental expenses."

One of the important questions presented in this case is, whether the charges contained in the defendant's account, which have not before been brought specially to the notice of the jury, and upon which the views of the court have been stated, are fairly within the scope and range of the words just quoted from the organic act. The jury will observe, from an inspection of the vouchers for that part of the account referred to, that they embrace charges for services rendered, and expenditures made, by the defendant alleged to be necessarily connected with, or incidental to, the administration of the territorial government. Without referring specifically to these items, I may remark here that so far as these claims are for services outside of the defendant's official duties, and secretary, and may come within the designation of "expenses of the legislative assembly, the printing of the laws, or other incidental expenses," I see no objection to their allowance, if sustained by proof to the satisfaction of the jury. The act of congress sanctions the payment of expenses, which may be classified under these heads, from the national treasury; and within the limitations already indicated, they would seem to be proper items of charge against the United States. But it is clear congress did not intend to impose an obligation on the general government to meet every expenditure which might be authorized by the territorial legislature. That body was vested with a discretionary power of legislation, in regard to the local or internal interests of the territory; but any expenditure authorized for such purposes was to be paid out of the territorial treasury. And it is obvious, that an unlimited power, in the legislature of a territory to authorize expenditures, which were to be paid by the general government, would lead to great abuses, and impose a grievous burden on the national treasury. There is not only no such power in the territorial government, but congress has expressly provided, that in reference to the appropriation of money for expenditures in a territory, to be paid by the general government, the acts of a territorial legislature are not conclusive. By section 2 of the act of August 29, 2842 (5 Stat. 541), it is expressly required, as to all territories, then or afterward to be organized, that the accounts for such expenditures shall be settled and adjusted at the treasury department; and it is provided, "that no act, resolution, or order of the legislature of any territory, directing the expenditure of the sum, shall be deemed a sufficient authority for such disbursement, but sufficient vouchers and proof for the same shall be required by said accounting officers."

It shall be the duty of the jury, in reference to the class of charges now referred to, to determine from an examination of the vouchers, and other evidence adduced by the defendant, whether they are fairly comprehended under the heads of "expenses of the legislative assembly, the printing of the laws, and other incidental expenses." It is difficult, if not impossible, to define with certainty what may be rightfully included in these terms. I should not probably render the jury any essential aid, if I were to attempt to prescribe a rule for their action in this regard. I may remark, generally, that it is evidently within the spirit of the language used in the act of congress, that the expenses incurred under any of the heads stated, should be necessary and proper, and the sums reasonable. This would necessarily lead to the rejection of any vouchers for expenditures for purposes not required in the proper discharge of the duties of the legislature of the territory, and not in promotion of the public interests. So, in relation to the printing of the laws passed by the legislature. The expenses incurred must have reference and be limited to the object stated. The words, "other incidental expenses," are of comprehensive import, and were, without doubt, adopted by congress, to provide for any necessary expenses which could not be foreseen, and specifically pointed out. The fair construction of these words, in the connection in which they are used, would seem not to justify the conclusion that they were intended to include all expenditures which might be deemed incidental to the administration of the government of the territory. They must be limited in their import to the necessary incidental expenses of the legislative assembly and the printing of the laws. Within the limits thus indicated, if the evidence of the expenditures and services is satisfactory to the jury, and the charges are not within any of the prohibitions previously stated, they would seem to have the sanction of law, and may properly be allowed as credits to the defendant.

It is proper that I should here briefly notice an objection urged to the defendant's account, by the counsel of the United States, founded on the position that they have not been included in any estimate made by the secretary of the treasury, and can not, therefore, be viewed as legal setoffs to the claim presented by the government. It is true the act organizing the territory of Minnesota requires the secretary of the treasury to make an estimate, in advance of the appropriation by congress, of the expenses of the territorial government. Without discussing this subject, it may be sufficient to state that the duty enjoined on the secretary of the treasury is directly to, and obligatory on him. But if he omits to make an estimate, or if that estimate proves insufficient to meet the just expenditures contemplated by the act of congress, it affords no reason why the claims of an individual, coming fairly within the scope and intention of the act, should not be allowed. The question now presented, arises in a judicial case, and the true inquiry is not whether there has been a previous estimate, embracing the charges claimed, but whether they are just, and not within any express prohibition of law.

I may also refer to the letters from the comptroller of the treasury, addressed to the defendant, while he held the office of secretary of the territory, which are in evidence. These, it is insisted, authorize a part of the expenditures charged in the defendant's account. I shall not notice, in detail, the contents of these letters. It will be proper for the jury to refer to them, in their retirement, as a part of the evidence in this case. Whatever may be their purport, it can not be claimed for them, that they invalidate the positive provisions of law. So far, however, as they may be viewed as authorizing any of the charges or expenditures of the defendant, they may properly be considered by the jury; and as to items concerning which they might otherwise be in doubt, may exercise an influence in their decision.

With these views, the case is submitted to the jury. They will apply the law, as I have attempted to state it, to the evidence before them, and decide what portion of the credits claimed by the defendant shall be allowed, and what shall be rejected.

The jury returned a verdict for the United States for $1,536.

Case No. 16,322.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1869.

CONSPIRACY TO DEFRAUD UNITED STATES—INDICTMENT—VARIANCE—INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—BONDED WAREHOUSES—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICES—EVIDENCE OF GOOD CHARACTER.

1. In an indictment for a conspiracy to defraud the United States under section 30 of the act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 484], there must be satisfactory evidence, not only of the conspiracy charged, but of the overt act averred, to carry into effect the objects of the conspiracy.

2. A conspiracy is where two or more persons confederate or combine to do an unlawful act, and may be proved by direct and positive evidence, or by facts showing that there was concert of action and a unity of purpose in effecting an unlawful object.

3. In such an indictment, alleging the conspiracy to have been entered into in the county of Champaign, within the Southern district of Ohio, if the proof shows that if there was a conspiracy, it was entered into in the county of Montgomery, it is not a fatal variance between the allegation of the indictment and the proof, the act charged being averred to have been committed within the territorial limits of the Southern district of Ohio, and therefore within the jurisdiction of the court.

4. It was not necessary to set forth the county in which the alleged conspiracy was formed, and it may be rejected as surplusage.

5. A distiller's bonded warehouse, which the law requires him to provide, is a part of the distiller's premises; and proof of the unlawful removal of the spirits from such a warehouse sustains the averment of the indictment, that the removal was from the distillery with which it was connected.

6. The government, in an indictment under section 30 of the act of March 2, 1867, is not bound to strict proof of the ownership of the rectifying distillery to which it is alleged the spirits were unlawfully removed.

7. The evidence of an accomplice, in the crime charged, is to be received with great caution, and, as a general rule, will be rejected unless corroborated, as to the material facts stated by him, by credible witnesses.

8. Proof of the good character of the party charged with crime, if there is doubt of his guilt upon the evidence, may afford good ground for a presumption of innocence, but will not be available to overcome or set aside satisfactory proof of criminality.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). This case, after a long and tedious investigation, is now to be committed to the jury for their action. It has been most strenuously contested by counsel, and you are entitled to the thanks of the court for the patient attention you have given to it during its progress. It is the purpose of the court to state, as briefly as possible, the legal points arising in the case and the views of the court upon them, leaving it exclusively for the jury to pass upon the facts. The defendants are on trial for a criminal act, specially set forth in the indictment, in which there are three distinct counts. The first and third counts are substantially alike in their structure, and do not require a separate consideration. The first count alleges a conspiracy by the defendants, in concert with others, entered into in the county of Champaign, in the Southern district of Ohio, in November, 1867, to defraud the United States of the legal tax or duty imposed upon a large quantity of distilled spirits. The overt act of the conspiracy charged is the unlawful removal of fifty barrels of spirits from the distillery of one A. C. Campbell, where it was manufactured, to the rectifying establishment of the defendants, not being a bonded warehouse, with a criminal intent. The third count varies the charge by averring the unlawful conspiracy to have been entered into on March 15, 1868, in the county of Montgomery, in said district, and charges, as the overt act, the removal of the spirits to the rectifying establishment owned by the defendants and other persons. The second count alleges a conspiracy for the fraudulent removal of fifty barrels of distilled spirits from the distillery to the rectifier by night—that is, after sunset and before daylight—in violation of the statute and with a criminal intent. The indictment is framed under section 30 of the act of congress of March 2, 1867, which provides that if two or more persons shall conspire to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner whatever, and one or more of said parties to the conspiracy shall do any act to effect the offense, such person shall be deemed guilty, and shall be liable to punishment. The jury will observe that the statute is as broad and comprehensive as language can make it. It includes any conspiracy to violate a law of, or to defraud the United States, in any manner whatever. But to consummate the offense contemplated by the statute, there must be, what the law terms, an overt act done, to effect the object of the unlawful conspiracy. Such an overt act, namely, the unlawful removal of the spirits, is averred in all the counts in this indictment. To justify a verdict of guilty under this indictment, there must be proof satisfactory to the jury, first, that there was a conspiracy, to which the defendants were parties, substantially as alleged; and second, that the overt acts averred are proved by the evidence. And here it is proper to direct the minds of the jury to some legal propositions submitted by the counsel for the defendants, and state the views of the court upon them for the guidance of the jury in their action in the case. I regret that the infirm state of my health will not permit me to do this as fully, or perhaps as satisfactorily, as I could desire.

It is insisted, in the first place, that under the first count of the indictment, in which it is alleged, inadvertently no doubt, that the unlawful conspiracy was entered into in Champaign county, whereas the proof shows the entire transaction took place in Montgomery county, there can be no conviction. The claim is, that in this particular the evidence does not sustain the first count, and that the jury must return a verdict of not guilty on it. In other words, that there is a fatal variance between the first count and the evidence offered to sustain it. I have not had the opportunity of investigating this point as fully as I could have desired. From the reflection I have bestowed upon it, I can not concur with the counsel for the defense on the point. The discrepancy between the averment as to the county in which the conspiracy was formed and the evidence is not material. This court has jurisdiction in crimes throughout the territory and counties included in the Southern district of Ohio. And the general averment in the indictment, that the offense charged was committed within the district, without designating any particular county, would have been sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction of the court. And the United States, in this case, is not bound to prove that the offense was committed in the county alleged, and the allegation may be rejected as surplusage, as in that case the averment would be that the offense charged was committed within the judicial district, and within the jurisdiction of the court.

It is also strenuously urged by defendants' counsel, that there is a fatal variance between the averments in the several counts and the proof in this, that the removal of the spirits is alleged in the indictment to have been from the distillery of A. C. Campbell, whereas the proof shows the removal was from the bonded warehouse connected with the distillery. This objection is exceedingly technical in its character, and if sustained, the court would be compelled to withdraw the case from the consideration of the jury, and instruct them, without regard to the merits of the case, that they must return a verdict of not guilty. I am reluctant to do this in any case, unless the law requires it as an imperative duty. In a case like this, which has been so fully presented to the jury on the facts, and which has occupied so much time in its investigation, I prefer submitting it to them for their action. And, in my view, the point submitted does not require me to withdraw the case from the jury. While it is true, the removal of the spirits was directly from the bonded warehouse, and not from the part of the building used as the distillery, I am quite clear that the bonded warehouse may be legally held to be a part of the distillery premises; and that the proof sustains substantially the averment that the removal was from the distillery. The law in force at the time made it the duty of every distiller to provide a bonded warehouse in immediate connection with the distillery, in which the spirits, when manufactured, were to be deposited, and which may be held to be a part of the distillery. In point of fact, if I rightly remember the evidence, this place of deposit was under the roof of, and a part of the building in which the distillation was carried on.

There is still another technical legal point urged as a ground for the acquittal of these defendants. It is insisted the evidence does not sustain the averment in the indictment as to the ownership of the rectifying distillery. The evidence as to the parties interested in the rectifying seems not to be satisfactory. I do not propose to refer specially to it, as it is doubtless in the memory of the jury. It may be well doubted whether this question of ownership is material in the case. The criminal overt act charged is the removal of the spirits to a place other than a bonded warehouse, and the proof of such removal constitutes the gist of the offense. It was not necessary to allege in the indictment the ownership of the rectifying establishment; and such averment may be stricken out as not a necessary element of the offense charged. But, if I am correct in my understanding of the averments of the indictment, the objection on the ground of variance in proof and the allegations as to ownership does not lie. In the first count, the ownership of the rectifier is stated to be in these defendants alone, and in the third count, to be in them and other persons. So that whether they were the sole owners, or whether there were other persons interested with them, the evidence sustains one or the other of these counts. And a verdict may be returned on either, according to the effect to be given to the evidence by the jury.

If it shall be necessary hereafter to consider these several legal points, and give to them a fuller examination, the opportunity will be afforded for that purpose. For the present the jury will receive the views stated by the court as the law upon these points. And in this aspect of the case, it will be the duty of the jury to consider it on its merits, with reference to the evidence before them. The first inquiry for the jury will be, whether the conspiracy charged in the indictment is proved to their satisfaction. A conspiracy within the meaning of the statute is, where two or more persons combine, confederate, or agree to do any unlawful act, or to commit a fraud against the United States. And the proof of such conspiracy may be, first, by direct proof by witnesses having positive knowledge of its existence; or, second, it may be legally presumed from facts and circumstances leading with reasonable certainty to that conclusion. It will be obvious to the jury that it will rarely happen that a conspiracy can be established by direct and positive proof. Persons acting together for an unlawful end pursue their plans in secrecy, studiously avoiding all means by which their guilty purpose may be known to others. In the present case, there is no direct evidence that these defendants entered into a deliberate agreement between themselves, or others, to defraud the United States of the tax imposed on the spirits in question; and the inquiry for the jury will be, whether from all the facts in evidence they can fairly infer there was such a conspiracy. In other words, are the jury satisfied that the defendants between themselves, or in combination with others, were actuated by a fixed purpose of committing a fraud upon the United States, and whether, in accomplishing that object, there was a oneness of purpose, and a unity of action, evidencing their guilty intent to effect their object. This is an inquiry exclusively for the jury, as it involves merely the force and effect to be given to the evidence. The claim of the counsel for the United States is, that the proof shows, not only that these defendants had knowledge of the fraud intended by the unlawful removal of the spirits specified in the indictment, but that they participated and aided in such removal. On the other hand, the defendants' counsel most strenuously contend there is nothing in the evidence which in any way implicates them in the charge of a conspiracy to defraud the government, or in any overt act to effect the unlawful purpose of such a conspiracy, if one existed, in law or in fact.

As remarked before, if the jury find the fact of the existence of the conspiracy charged, they will inquire whether these defendants were so connected with, or aiding and assisting in, the unlawful removal of the spirits, charged as the overt act of the conspiracy. There is certainly some conflict and contradiction in the testimony. But one fact is beyond controversy, and is not denied, namely, that frauds of the most deliberate and repulsive character were committed in numerous instances in reference to the spirits manufactured at the distillery of A. C. Campbell, now deceased. One of the methods by which these frauds were perpetrated was by the fraudulent removal of the spirits to the rectifying establishment of these defendants, situated near the distillery. Without payment of the tax, they passed through the process of rectification, and then were sent to market and sold as tax-paid spirits. And the fact in relation to these frauds, and which renders them all the more odious, is, that government officers, in gross violation of their oaths, were participants and aiders in their commission. It will be for the jury to say, whether from all the circumstances proved, these defendants are implicated in the frauds charged. And it may be proper to remark here, that though it is clearly proved that others were perhaps more flagrantly guilty of these frauds than these defendants, it is no justification for them if they too were guilty participants in them. The jury will doubtless have noticed that the government in this case has introduced a witness—Huffman—whose testimony, if credible, most clearly implicates these defendants in the frauds charged. This witness, it is not denied, was a prominent actor in the frauds. He does not deny his guilty agency in them. The defendants' counsel insist that his position before the jury as an accomplice in the crime charged renders his testimony utterly worthless, and that it should be wholly rejected by the jury. Without discussing the law as to the credit due to an accomplice, I may briefly state that, on the soundest principles of reason, it does affect the credibility of a witness occupying that position. And, as a general rule, his testimony must be received with great caution, and unless sustained and corroborated, in the material facts stated by him, by credible witnesses, his testimony should be wholly rejected. It is also insisted that the veracity of this witness is seriously impeached by other witnesses, who positively contradict him as to material parts of his testimony. And there seems to be no doubt as to the fact that these contradictions do appear. But, without further notice of this witness, I will remark that it is the exclusive province of the jury to pass on the question of the credit due to witnesses, and to them in this case it is referred.

In conclusion, I may report to the jury that they are to direct their inquiries (1) to the proof as to the existence of the conspiracy charged; and (2) to the question of the guilt of defendants in effecting the objects of the conspiracy, by the unlawful removal of the spirits charged as the overt act. As to the first of these inquiries—the existence of the conspiracy—the jury must be satisfied of the fact, having reference to the legal principles applicable to it, as before laid down by the court, to justify a verdict of guilty. And as to the other inquiry, the connection of the defendants with the overt acts, the jury must be satisfied that the averments of the indictment are substantially sustained by the evidence. As to dates and the quantity of spirits removed, the government is not bound to make the proof in exact correspondence with the statements in the indictment. The gist of the question is, whether spirits, in a larger or less quantity than is named in the indictment, were unlawfully removed, with the guilty participation and aid of the defendants in the act. And I may here remark, that whatever doubts the jury may entertain as to the criminal complicity of the defendants, they can have none as to other parties not now on trial. If they were before the jury to answer for the crime with which these defendants are charged, there could not be a shade of doubt as to the result.

In my remarks I have made no special reference to the second count, charging a violation of the statute in the removal of the spirits after sunset and before sunrise. I do not suppose it is necessary for the jury to consider this count. If the defendants, in the judgment of the jury, are guilty under the first and third counts, it is not material to inquire as to the second. And if the jury find they are not guilty under the first and third counts, they would probably not be prepared to return a verdict of guilty under the second. The mere fact of a removal of the spirits at a time forbidden by the statute, in the absence of a fraudulent or criminal intent, would not, in a criminal prosecution, be regarded as a sufficient basis for a verdict of guilty.

I am requested by counsel to remind the jury that the defendants have produced very satisfactory evidence of their previous good characters for integrity and good citizenship. Such proof they have undoubtedly given, and they are entitled to all the benefits the law secures to them from it. But, in its legal effect, it can not be held to negative or set aside clear proof of guilt. Its chief value is in cases where a well-founded doubt may exist in the minds of a jury, from the evidence adduced, of the guilt of a defendant charged with crime. In such a case, the law benignantly holds that good character may be taken into consideration by a jury as affording a presumption in favor of the innocence of the accused party.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty against the defendants. They were sentenced to a short period of imprisonment and a fine of $2,000.

CRIMINAL CASES—COMMON-LAW JURISDICTION OF.

The federal courts have common-law jurisdiction of criminal cases, and may punish a crime though there be no express statute for that purpose.

In these cases there were four indictments at common law against the defendants, for counterfeiting bank bills of the Bank of the United States, passing them, and having tools to counterfeit, etc. Smith was found guilty of passing bank bills of the said bank, counterfeited.

Parsons moved in arrest of judgment because there was no federal statute on the subject; hence only an offense of common law; and the state courts exclusively have jurisdiction of these offenses.

THE COURT held the act incorporating the Bank of the United States was a constitutional act, and that by the constitution of the United States the federal courts had jurisdiction of all causes or cases in law or equity arising under the said constitution and the laws of the United States; that this was a case arising under those laws, for those bills were made in virtue thereof, though there was no statute describing or punishing the offense of counterfeiting them; and therefore to counterfeit them was a contempt of and misdemeanor against the United States, and punishable by them as such; and that the same offense might be punished as a common-law cheat in the state court. Judgment was fine and imprisonment and pillory, the common-law punishment; but not to pay costs, paying costs being no part of the common-law punishment.

JURORS—FINES FOR DELINQUENCY—EXCUSES.

If a juror be fined, and at the same term come in and offer a sufficient excuse, and the court thereupon order the fine to be struck out, but the clerk neglect to enter such order, the court will at the next term, on proper affidavits of the fact, order the fine to be struck out.

[Cited in Blagden v. Broadrup, Append. Fed. Cas.; U. S. v. Walsh, 22 Fed. 648.]

Smith had been summoned as a petit juror, at June term, 1802, and failing to attend, was fined eight dollars. At the same term he came in, and offering a sufficient excuse, his fine was ordered to be struck out; but the clerk omitted to enter it, by mistake.

These facts appearing now by affidavit, THE COURT at this term, June, 1803, ordered the fine to be struck out.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1807.

LARCENY—LOGS IN FENCE.

Logs in a fence are not the subject of larceny, the fence being in law annexed to the freehold.

Indictment [against W. Smith] for stealing fence-logs, the property of John Orr, from a worm fence. The fence consisted of ten logs, two supporting a rider.

Mr. Morsell and Mr. Caldwell, for the defendant, contended that it was not larceny, but trespass. The fence is part of the freehold, and would have gone to the heir, and not to the executor. It could not be taken in execution. Orr was the tenant of W. Brent. Mr. Caldwell contended, the fence was the property of W. Brent (which Orr admitted in his testimony), and not of Orr.

THE COURT instructed the jury that it was a felony; but having doubts, said they would hear a motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, if a verdict of guilty should be found—which was found accordingly.

And on consideration, THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that it was no felony; that the fence was to be considered as annexed to the freehold, and would descend with the land to the heir, and would not go to the executors.

Judgment arrested.

1. A note of an unincorporated bank, "payable out of the joint funds thereof and no other," is a promissory note within the meaning of the Maryland statute of 1799, c. 75, § 1.

2. The note must be precisely and accurately set forth in the indictment.

3. If the defendant be acquitted upon a flaw in the indictment, he will be remanded for trial at the next term.

Indictment [against Bennet Smith] for forging a promissory note of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank (not incorporated).

Mr. Lear and Mr. Law, for prisoner, objected to the admission of the note in evidence, because it was "payable out of the joint funds thereof, and no other," and therefore not such a promissory note as was intended by the act of Maryland of 1799, c. 75, § 1, upon which the indictment was founded; it not being, as they said, a negotiable promissory note; and they said it was not a bank-note within the meaning of the Maryland act of 1793, c. 35, § 2; and therefore could not be given in evidence to support the averment that it purported to be a promissory note of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank.

But THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, not sitting) overruled the objection.

The prisoner's counsel then objected that in setting forth the note in the indictment, the signature was written "W. Marbury," but the signature to the note was "Wm. Marbury," and for that variance the court refused to suffer the note to be given in evidence.

Verdict, "Not guilty." Prisoner remanded to be tried at the next term on a new indictment.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 66.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1826.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT—DISCHARGE—PAYMENT OF POUNDAGE—AGREEMENT WITH MARSHAL.

A debtor of the United States had been discharged from custody by order of the president of the United States under the act of the 3d of March, 1817, and had entered into an agreement with the marshal for payment of his poundage fees by instalments, with a proviso that if any instalment should not be paid when due, the marshal should take out a new ca. sa. for his fees. Held that he could not be detained upon the new ca. sa.; and the court refused to order him to be committed.

The defendant [John K. Smith], upon being ordered by the president of the United States to be discharged from a ca. sa. issued for a debt due to the United States, and being still holden in custody by the marshal for his poundage fees, which amounted to more than $4000, agreed with the marshal to pay those fees by instalments, and that if he should make default, the marshal should obtain a new ca. sa. and arrest him again. He made default and the marshal took out a new ca. sa. in the name of the United States for his fees. Upon this new ca. sa. he was arrested and brought into court, and prayed to be committed.

Mr. Key, for defendant, objected, that the defendant having been discharged by order of the president of the United States under the act of March 3, 1817, 3 Stat. 399, entitled "An act supplementary to an act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debts due the United States," could not be arrested again for the same cause. The marshal having relinquished the hold he had upon the person of the defendant, could only resort to his action upon the new agreement. After the principal debt has been paid this court has decided, in the case of Causin v. Chubb [Case No. 2,527], at December term, 1805, that the marshal cannot detain the defendant for his poundage fees.

Mr. Lear, for the marshal, contended that that was the case of a ca. sa. under the Maryland law, entered "Not called by consent," in which case the plaintiff may always have a new ca. sa.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to order the defendant to be committed.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 629.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

GAMING—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

The first and twelfth sections of the penitentiary act of the District of Columbia, so far as they relate to the offence of keeping a faro-bank, or other common gaming-table, are to be construed together; and, when so construed, they contain a complete description of the offence and its punishment.

This was an indictment [against Henry Smith] under the act of congress of March 2, 1831 (4 Stat. 448), entitled, "An act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia," commonly called the "Penitentiary Act." The offence charged was the keeping "a common gaming-table, called a 'sweat-cloth.'"

The defendant having been convicted, his counsel, Mr. Dandridge, moved, in arrest of judgment, contending that the term "gaming-table," in the twelfth section of the act, was too vague and indefinite to support an indictment, and must be confined to the single offence of keeping a "faro-bank;" as the English statute against stealing "sheep or other cattle," was confined to the stealing of sheep; and the statute against stealing horses did not include a man who stole only one horse. 1 Bl. Comm. 88; 6 Bac. Abr. tit. "Statute"; Plow. 465. It was also contended, that, in the twelfth section, the words "faro-bank or gaming-table," mean nothing more than faro-bank; the words "or gaming-table" being only expletive of the term "faro-bank."

Mr. Key and Mr. Carlisle, contrà, contended, that, in considering a statute, the intention of the legislature is the only sure guide to its construction, and that the first and the twelfth sections are to be construed together, so as to read, "a faro-bank or other common gaming-table."

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contrà) refused to arrest the judgment.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the majority of the judges, as follows: This is an indictment for keeping "a certain common gaming-table, called a 'sweat-cloth,' against the form of the statute in such case provided, and against the peace and government of the United States."

The jury having found the defendant guilty, his counsel has moved, in arrest of judgment, and contends that this indictment is under the twelfth section of the penitentiary act of March 2, 1831, by which it is enacted "that every person duly convicted of keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table, shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment and labor for a period not less than one year, nor more than five years." That the words "gaming-table" are too general, and will not maintain an indictment; and that, if any offence can be punished under that branch of the statute, it is only the offence of keeping a faro-bank. That there is no punishment, provided by the statute, for the offence of keeping a common gaming-table; and that the words "or gaming-table" are intended to be used as synonymous with "faro-bank," and are merely expletive, not cumulative. That the statute ought to be construed strictly, like the statute against stealing "sheep or other cattle," which, it was supposed, was, by construction, confined to the stealing of sheep; and the statute against stealing horses, which, it was supposed, had been construed not to extend to a person who stole one horse only. But this indictment was not framed upon the twelfth section alone. It is founded on the first and twelfth sections. By the first section it is enacted that every person who shall be convicted, in any court in the District of Columbia, of any of the offences therein enumerated, and among others, "of keeping a faro-bank or other common gaming-table," "shall be sentenced to suffer punishment by imprisonment and labor for the time and times hereinafter prescribed, in the penitentiary for the District of Columbia." And by the twelfth section it is enacted "that every person duly convicted" of "keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table," shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment and labor, for a period not less than one year, nor more than five years. The first section is complete in itself in regard to the description of the offence, the place where committed, the court in which the conviction must be, the nature of the punishment, the place of imprisonment, and the tribunal to pass the sentence. It does not fix the term or period of the imprisonment and labor by express words; but it does so by reference to a subsequent part of the act, where the offence was to be again brought into view, and the period of imprisonment and labor limited. This is done in the twelfth section, where the sentence for keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table is to be for a period of not less than one nor more than five years. The first and twelfth sections, construed together, as they ought to be, complete the legislation upon that subject, and leave no doubt as to the designation of the offence, the tribunal and place in which the conviction is to be had, and the sentence passed, and the nature, extent, and place of punishment.

It has, however, been suggested that the twelfth section can derive no aid from the first; because the first is to be considered merely as a preamble enumerating the offences which the legislature intended to subject to penitentiary punishment; and that the twelfth section is a substantive and independent enactment, and the only one which subjects the offence of "keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table," to punishment in the penitentiary. But any one who reads the first section, must see at once, that it is not a mere preamble, but is as substantial an enacting clause as any other in the whole act. It is indeed the most substantial enacting clause in the act; for there is no other section of the act, except the fourteenth (and that applies only to capital cases other than murder, treason, and piracy), which informs us where the crime must be committed, or by what tribunal, or in what place the sentence is to be passed, or whether the imprisonment and labor are to be in the penitentiary of the District of Columbia, or in any other penitentiary.

Let us, for a moment, consider the twelfth section as standing alone, and deriving no aid in its construction from any other part of the act. The words are: "Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, that every person duly convicted of obtaining by false pretences any goods or chattels, money," &c., "or of keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table, shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment and labor for a period not less than one year nor more than five years." (1) "That every person duly convicted"; where? In Maryland? or Virginia? or the District of Columbia? or before what tribunal? The section is silent on these points. (2) "Of keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table"; where? The section is silent. (3) "Shall be sentenced"; where, and by what tribunal? The section is silent. (4) "To suffer imprisonment and labor"; where? In the penitentiary of the District of Columbia? or in any other penitentiary? or in any common gaol? Upon all these questions the section is silent. It is an act of the congress of the United States, and there is nothing in the twelfth section to confine its operation to this district, or its tribunals; or to acts done within the district.

Now consider the first section. "Section 1. Be it enacted," &c., "that from and after the passage of this act, every person who shall be convicted in any court in the District of Columbia, of the following offences, namely, manslaughter," &c., enumerating several offences; and among the rest, "obtaining by false pretences any goods or chattels, money," &c., "or of keeping a faro-bank, or other common gaming-table," &c., "shall be sentenced to suffer punishment by imprisonment and labor, for the time and times hereinafter prescribed, in the penitentiary for the District of Columbia." (1) "Every person who shall be convicted in any court in the District of Columbia." This answers the first question which arose in considering the twelfth section; namely, where must the conviction be? The first section says in some court in the District of Columbia; and this answers also the second question which arose upon the twelfth section, namely, where must the offence be committed? For if the conviction is to be in a court in the district, the offence must have been committed in the district or the court could not have had jurisdiction, and the offender could not have been convicted. It also answers the third question raised upon the twelfth section, namely, where and by what tribunal must the sentence be passed? For if the conviction must be in a court in the district the sentence must be also; for one court cannot pass sentence upon an offender upon a conviction in another court. (2) Again, the first section says that the offender "shall be sentenced to suffer punishment by imprisonment and labor for the time and times hereinafter prescribed, in the penitentiary for the District of Columbia."

This answers the fourth and last question which arose upon considering the twelfth section, namely, where is the offender to suffer imprisonment and labor? So far, then, is the first section from being a mere preamble, that it is the only effectual enacting clause. Without it, the twelfth section, and all the other sections limiting the period of imprisonment and labor, would be of no avail. It is evident that their only purpose and office is to fix and limit the time of imprisonment, and apportion it to the respective offences enumerated in the first section; that they ought to be considered as having no other use; and that the first section ought to be construed as if the several limitations of the time of imprisonment and labor had been immediately applied to the respective offences as they were enumerated in that section. The first section, so far as it relates to this subject, would then read thus: Every person who shall be convicted in any court in the District of Columbia, of keeping a faro-bank, or other common gaming-table, shall be sentenced to suffer punishment by imprisonment and labor, for a period not less than one year nor more than five years, in the penitentiary for the District of Columbia. This we think is the true construction of the act.

But it has been said that the twelfth section does not fix or limit the degree of punishment for keeping a common gaming-table. The answer to this suggestion is that the twelfth section has fixed and limited the degree of punishment for keeping all sorts of gaming-tables, which, of course, includes common gaming-tables. But to this it is objected that the word "gaming-table," is too general and vague to be the subject of a penal enactment. That it cannot be supposed that congress meant to make it a penitentiary offence if a gentleman should play a game of whist with his guests in his own house; and that as they could not have meant that, they meant nothing; and that therefore the twelfth section is to be confined to the punishment of the faro-bank only. Here, then, we are obliged to resort to construction; for the plain words of the section are that "every person duly convicted of keeping a faro-bank, or gaming-table, shall be sentenced," &c. By these words, he, who keeps a gaming-table, is equally guilty with him who keeps a faro-bank; and therefore, in order to get rid of these words of the section we must resort to construction. But when we resort to construction we are bound by the rules which the law has laid down for the construction of statutes. The first and great rule of construction is to ascertain and carry into effect the will and intention of the legislators; and the second is that in order to learn that will and intention, not only every part of the statute, but every other statute in pari materiâ, and even the preambles of statutes, are to be considered. A third rule is that although penal statutes are to be construed strictly, yet even in these the intention of the legislature is to be regarded. Heydon's Case, 3 Coke, 7. By these rules of construction, then, in order to ascertain the extent of the term "gaming-table," as used in the twelfth section, we must compare that section with the first; and there we find that it was the intention of the legislature to punish the keeping of common gaming-tables only; and that for the degree of punishment they refer to a subsequent section; which, it is evident can only be the twelfth, because that is the only subsequent section in pari materiâ. The rule that penal statutes are to be construed strictly, then comes in and says that the general and comprehensive term, "gaming-table," must be limited to common gaming-tables. Thus the two sections will be perfectly reconciled, and the intention of the legislature carried into effect. To say that the word "gaming-table," in the twelfth section, has no meaning, or is to be disregarded because it is too general; or is merely a synonyme with the word "faro-bank," is to violate that rule which requires a statute to be so construed "that if it can be prevented, no clause, sentence, or word shall be superfluous, void, or insignificant." Bac. Abr. tit. "Statute" 1, 2; Rex v. Berchet, 1 Show. 108. It would also leave the case, of keeping a common gaming-table, unpunished; contrary to the clearly-expressed intention of the legislature in the first section; unless, indeed, the common-law discretion of the court, in punishing misdemeanors by fine and imprisonment, should be considered as applicable to a misdemeanor which the legislature has enacted shall be punished by imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary without limiting the time of such imprisonment, considering labor and imprisonment as only a substitute for fine and imprisonment. But upon this it is unnecessary to express any opinion. A construction which would defeat the plain intention of the legislature, ought, if possible, to be avoided; and especially when a reasonable construction can be given which will carry that intention into effect. A majority of the judges are quite satisfied that the construction which we have before intimated is the true construction of the statute, and that the motion in arrest of judgment must be overruled.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge. This is a prosecution, under the penitentiary law, for keeping a gaming-table, and the motion is in arrest of judgment. The matter of law for the consideration of the court, on this motion, is, whether an indictment, charging the keeping a (common) gaming-table called a "sweat-cloth," can be sustained under the said law. I should have not much doubt, from the liberal construction given to penal statutes in modern decisions of the courts, that if the description of the offence contained in the first section of the penitentiary act, had been followed out in the twelfth section which annexes the punishment, that the indictment might be sustained; but there is a material, and, in my view, fatal variance. The first section contemplates the prohibition of, and the punishment for, keeping a faro-bank or other common gaming-table; and had any subsequent section pursued this description, and followed it with a specific punishment for the offence, the case might have been sufficiently clear, and the offence sufficiently set out to sustain the present indictment; but what is the offence set out in the twelfth section? It is the keeping a faro-bank, or gaming-table; now here is a material and most important distinction. If the words, "or gaming-table," can, by any reasonable interpretation and rules of construction, admit of an intention in congress to have made penal the keeping any kind of gaming-table, other than a faro-bank, which I cannot admit however; then we see an utter want of harmony between the offence set out in the twelfth section, and the one contemplated as a subject of subsequent specific legislation in the first section. They (congress) omitted, in the twelfth section to make provision for the offence as set out in the first section; it is a casus omissus, and must be supplied, if deemed proper or necessary, by future legislation. The act is carelessly drawn, which is manifest in another instance; the first section, in enumerating the offences to be provided for in the subsequent sections, mentions, among them, "petty larceny"; if this means any thing, it must mean petty larceny as a description of offence then well known and settled. Still you find nothing of petty larceny in the subsequent provisions; the law makes, or creates a new constructive petty larceny, extending the sum necessary to constitute it far above the amount necessary to constitute petty larceny at the time of the passage of the act; it is true they have fixed a sum, the stealing under or over which makes the punishment penitentiary confinement, or only fine and imprisonment in the common jail; here is another casus omissus, for the crime or offence called "petty larceny," although enumerated in the first section as one of the offences to be specifically punished, is not afterwards mentioned throughout the law.

But to return: for what offence of gaming is punishment actually (not contemplatively) provided for? Why the keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table; and what is the difference, it may be asked? I answer substantial, essential, and most important; that characteristic word "common" is wanted; a word which alone gives existence, I may say vitality to the offence; in which alone lurks the poison baneful to society, which is an essential and indispensable element of every nuisance; without which the same act is no nuisance. "Common," means, in the sense in which it is used in the first section, "public," and "common" sense too; and so it will be found in the best expounders of the meaning of words. There is another important word also, in setting out the offence intended, or rather contemplated to be specifically animadverted on, in the subsequent section; namely, the word "other." Now this word, "other," so separates and disunites the subsequent words, "common gaming-table," from the preceding words, "faro-bank," as to leave no doubt that other common gaming-tables than faro-banks, were in the contemplation of congress to be prohibited, and the keeping of them punished; but there is no punishment provided for them: had the twelfth section gone to the extent of the first, no doubt could exist, I should think, as at present advised, that they would have embraced sweat-cloths or tables, among the prohibited games. But I give no opinion as to this because there is enough to arrest the judgment without considering particularly the result of an accordance between the crimes contemplated to be punished and those actually punished.

Again, shall it be said (as I think I heard intimated) that the first and twelfth sections may be taken together, and the defects in the twelfth may be supplied, and the meaning and intention of the legislature gathered therefrom. How is this? because in the first section they denounce the keeping of a common gaming-table, and neglect afterwards to provide any punishment for it, shall we be bold enough to send any one to the penitentiary for keeping a common gaming-table? I have read of preambles affording a clue to unravel a doubtful meaning as to the sense of subsequent enactments in the same statute, by affording a view of the policy of the statute, and the public evil intended to be remedied by it; but I never heard of their being actual enactments, or as supplying the place of them. If a statute were to propose to punish any offence, and to denounce it with all the terms of reprobation which ingenuity could invent, or the enormity of the offence about to be punished could justify, still if the legislature omitted to carry its denunciations into effect, the law would be of no avail. But can you, from the preamble, supply, in the prohibitory and actual penal enactment, the very gist and essence of the crime? Can the words in the twelfth section "faro-bank or gaming-table," be made, with the help of the first section, to be equivalent with "faro-bank or other common gaming-table?" The first section declares that the keeper of a faro-bank or other common gaming-table, "shall be sentenced to suffer punishment by imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary," &c., "for the time and times hereinafter prescribed." Well, through the whole law you find this crime not noticed; but in the twelfth section it is true that there is a definition of crime something like it; something akin to it, but falling far short of it in essential characteristics, which is punished by confinement, &c., and these important characteristics may be supplied, we are told, from the first section. What! supply the only word which is essential? which is the soul of the crime; in which alone the public weal could be concerned, namely, "publicity"? Who will say, that when the law is advanced as far as the twelfth section, the framers of it might not have changed their intention, and softened the severity of the contemplated provision in the first section? All that the first section shows is, that they did intend to punish a certain crime, but this intention is not carried into effect; but the only offence like this one actually provided for, is a different one in substance and essence. To say the best of it, perhaps, is to say that the legislature overlooked it; it is a casus omissus. Let us now come to the twelfth section as it stands in its crippled condition, not propped up by the first section. What do the words "keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table," mean. In my opinion they mean only a gaming-table called a "faro-bank," and no other kind of gaming-table. Now let it be considered that "faro-bank" is no term known to our laws; there is no certain, legal, or established technical meaning attached to the term. Had the words "faro-bank" stood alone as designating the offence, it might be very equivocal, whether some other bank than a gaming-bank might not be intended. When a new offence is about to be punished, circumlocution is used to describe it; and as the words "faro-bank" were used as descriptive of the offence, it was reasonable to make it more certain by adding the words, after the disjunctive "or," "gaming-table," to put it beyond all uncertainty, and that a gaming-table, vulgarly denominated a "faro-bank," was intended to be the subject of animadversion. Now as to the denomination, the act of Maryland of 1797 (chapter 110) uses the word "faro-table," and declares it to be one of the devices used for gaming; and this term, and not "faro-bank," was known to the law as a "gaming-table," and had it been used instead of "faro-bank," there might have been less necessity for those explanatory words, "or gaming-table." If arson, rape, robbery, or perjury are the subjects of legislative prohibition or punishment, they per se ex vi terminorum, are descriptive of the offence, and sufficiently certain. They carry with them and in them a full and perfect exposition or definition of the offence; no explanatory words or circumlocution are necessary; but where shall we look for the meaning and technical offence inherent in the words "faro-bank"? Suppose a prosecution commenced for keeping a faro-bank: would it not be a preliminary question, what is a "faro-bank"? Neither the law, nor any judicial precedents, furnish an adequate or settled meaning of the term; you have to resort to evidence to ascertain what a faro-bank is, in which case there may be great diversity of opinion among the learned in the gambling republic, and thus great uncertainty as to the offence the law meant to punish. Would it not be curious to have witnesses before a jury to tell us what murder, arson, rape, or robbery is? We hear facts, and the law defines crimes; if the evidence prove facts amounting to the established and settled characteristics of the crime, the court are judges of the sufficiency of the evidence, and adjudge the party guilty of the crime charged. We look not to evidence, not to the opinion of witnesses, for what constitutes offences known and settled in the law; so that the legal denomination in one word comprises all the constituents of the crime. Not so with the term "faro-bank;" it is unknown to the law, and is no technical description per se of any offence. Therefore, when the legislature mean to punish any act not known and established as a crime by some legal and technical and certain characteristics, it resorts to descriptions and specifications of the facts and circumstances which are to constitute the prohibited act; they would not be satisfied, nor would there be any certainty in it, to prohibit and punish the act, merely by its vulgar, and popular name; and, therefore, it was proper to superadd the words, or "gaming-table," to illustrate more specifically the meaning of the words "faro-bank." But with the explanation it is still very loose; but if deemed sufficiently explanatory of the meaning attached to the words "faro-bank," it has nothing to do with a sweat-cloth, or sweat-cloth table. A faro-bank or gaming-table, is only an alternative expression of the same thing. It would be a forced construction to say that when one offence was mentioned, that using another more generic or explicit term, separated from the first by the disjunctive, "or," that all kinds of offences which might fall within the scope of this generic term were intended to be embraced in it. It is most consistent with the rules of construction, to consider the latter words as merely an alternative description of the offence not so clearly expressed or defined in the first term. But suppose they were meant as distinct and independent offences, let us see how the matter would then stand. To say nothing of the absence of any legal, known, technical meaning of the words, "faro-bank," and the necessity of resorting to the uncertainty of human testimony to ascertain what a "faro-bank" is, I would ask if the words have a known and definite meaning? Is not betting at a faro-bank essential to constitute the keeping it an offence? Then take away the explanatory words, "or gaming-table," or consider them as independent of the words, "faro-bank," and creating a distinct offence; then the keeping a faro-bank without any betting, or gaming, would fully come within the prohibition, and might be accordingly punishable; can this be the meaning of the legislature? Then take the latter branch of the alternative prohibition, and say that the words, "or gaming-table," mean to prohibit all sorts of gaming-tables, then private gaming-tables are prohibited, and a person having a party of friends at his house, keeping a whist, or loo-table (and nothing is more common), he comes within the prohibition, and is liable to the penalty. Could this have been the intention of the legislature? No. Gaming-tables must be common, or public, to make them nuisances, and, as such only, are punishable. Whatever rigid moralists may desire as to the correction of private as well as public morals, legislatures have never gone so far as to visit with vindictive penalties the pleasures or amusements of private families; these are left to the gradual influence of public opinion, or are proper subjects for the press, the pulpit, or writers and lecturers on moral duties.

The conclusions, therefore, to which the foregoing considerations lead my mind, are, that whatever the intention of the legislature might have been to provide, in the specific punishments for the crimes enumerated in the first section of the act, that if they have omitted to provide for any one of them, that one is not punishable. That there is no section of the law, subsequent to the first, that makes the keeping a faro-bank, or other common gaming-table, an offence, or provides any punishment for such offence, by such description of the offence, or other equivalent descriptive words. That the offence set out and punished in the twelfth section, is not the offence of keeping a faro-bank, or other common gaming-table, but only the keeping a faro-bank, or gaming-table; a distinct offence, and not identical in language, meaning, or substance, with those in the first section. That you cannot supply the defect of description, by any aid to be derived from the first section, because there is an important, substantial, and essential difference in the two descriptions of offences, to wit: the word "common" is wanting in the latter, which, being the very essence of the offence, can no more be intended, than you can intend, from the preamble of a statute, important words, essential to constitute the crime which the enacting clause professes to punish, because the offence is among those which the preamble contemplates to punish. For example: Suppose the penitentiary act, among the enumerated offences, contained that of murder, which it proposed to punish by penitentiary confinement, instead of capitally; when you come to the clause providing for the punishment of the offence, it is described thus: "Whoever shall kill another, shall be punished by confinement," so and so; could you, because the first section enumerated murder among the crimes to be punished, supply the material and characteristic words, "with malice prepense," from the preamble, or (what is tantamount to a preamble, or is, at least, in the same category) the first section of the act in question.

According to this view of the case, the description of the offence in the twelfth section must be taken alone, and independent of, and unaided by, the first section, whether they be taken together as descriptive of one offence, or separately, as descriptive of two offences. I have endeavored to show that the words are descriptive, and intend only one offence, and shall not repeat what I have said as to their being alternate descriptions of the same offence, but will only make one remark: Can I judicially know that a faro-bank is a gaming-table? In what book shall I look to know this? I do find a faro-table recognized in the Maryland act of 1797 (chapter 110), but no faro-bank. If, then, the expression, "keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table," means two distinct offences, then, by strong implication, a faro-bank is not a gaming-table, because a gaming-table, being a generic term, would necessarily include the species, faro-bank. But if you will place them in antithesis, and faro-bank is not a species of the genus gaming-table (and a very extensive genus it is), then faro-bank is a very innocent and harmless diversion, and never was intended to be, nor could be, without great absurdity being ascribed to the legislature, denounced as a crime. The only rational interpretation of the words describing the offence in the twelfth section, is, that the words, "or gaming-table," are but an alternate and more precise description of a faro-bank, and inform us that a faro-bank is a gaming-table, without which we could not judicially know it.

The result of the foregoing conclusions is, that a sweat-cloth, or rag-table, is not within the provisions or prohibitions of the twelfth section; and as, according to my view, it cannot be extended, even in these more philosophical days of liberal construction, by any aid or support drawn from the preamble, or first section, an indictment for such offence cannot be sustained.

I will add one more remark; all that I have said in the foregoing opinion is exclusively with reference to the case before us, namely, the keeping a sweat-table. It is probable, from what I have observed, that we may have motions in arrest of judgment for keeping faro-banks; therefore I do not mean that any thing in this opinion commits me, one way or the other, as to this latter offence; if a question on such indictment is made, I shall consider it with all the deliberation in my power. I believe, however, that this particular species of gaming was the one intended by the statute to be suppressed. There is another important word, used in the description of the offence, which deserves much consideration; and this is the word "keeping," both in the first and the twelfth sections. The meaning of this term, as I understand it, gives strength to the intimation, in the close of my argument, that no gaming-tables but faro were intended to be denounced and punished by the act; or, at most, none but such as were fixed, and permanently, or at least, for a considerable period, established; so as to be places of known and common resort. What is the true import of the verb, "to keep?" Does it not import something more than setting up a table for a day, or during the races, if the proof had so established the fact, which, however, it did not, because the testimony in all the cases tried this term, went to the extent only of a single exhibition of a gaming-table on one day only; or proved only one act of playing, or gaming, by the setter up. Now, can the term "keeping" embrace such a case as this? If I understand the meaning of the term, it implies some duration or permanency; and that the opening, or instituting, or setting up a gaming-table for one day, or a few days during a public race, if the evidence even went so far, is not keeping a gaming-table within the meaning of the statute. Let us endeavor to ascertain the true import of the term, by illustrations drawn from common usage, as well as from the best dictionaries. That it is never employed to signify any temporary business or employment or engagement, is evident from innumerable instances where this verb is used, as in the following instances. This is a rule, as far as I know, without exception. If there be one, I have not discovered it. We say he keeps an hotel, a store, a billiard-table, a register's office, a broker's office, a coach, a horse, a gig, an omnibus, carts for hire, a livery-stable, a school, a mistress, &c. Now, does not every instance in the examples above quoted show, that the word is only employed in cases of expressing the idea of some permanent and established business? That congress meant only to strike at those known and established gaming-tables, such as faro, I have no doubt, for the reasons hereinbefore given, but because those dangerous resorts were best known, were prominent in importance and danger, and, therefore, were the particular and exclusive subjects of legislation. They never meant to invade the precincts of the race-field, that annual jubilee of immemorial usage, where the species of petty gambling during the jubilee has been coeval with the festival itself; and tolerated by all the legislatures of the states where this species of annual amusement has been in use. They hardly meant to visit, with the enormous penalty of penitentiary confinement, the poor negroes who kept their fippenny-bit sweat-cloths or ragtables, during this period, and on this theatre of almost universal relaxation of discipline during this festival. I have no dictionary at home except Ainsworth's. The Latin word which seems to me to express, most nearly, the English word to "keep," is "sustentare," and this word, in that language, implies to maintain, support, &c., extending its operation and effect beyond the ephemeral existence of a day. I am unable to give any etymological history of the word, for the want of the proper books, but collect its true import, not only from the corresponding word in another language, from which many of our words are derived (though the verb, "to keep," is not, but is most probably of Saxon or Teutonic origin), but from the sense in which it is, without exception, used in common parlance, and usus est jus et norma loquendi.

[Subsequently the counsel for the defendant moved for a new trial, which was granted by the court, MORSELL, J., dissenting. Case No. 16,329.]

Case No. 16,329.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 659.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

GAMING—KEEPING COMMON GAMING TABLE.

Neither a single act of play at a gaming-table, called a sweat-cloth, at the races, nor even a single day's use of it on the race-field, is a keeping of a common gaming-table, within the penitentiary act for the District of Columbia [4 Stat. 448].

This was an indictment [against Henry Smith] for keeping a certain common gaming-table called a sweat-cloth, against the form of the penitentiary act for the District of Columbia, of the 2d of March, 1831, §§ 1, 12.

The motion in arrest of judgment having, on the 11th instant, been overruled [Case No. 16,328], the defendant's counsel moved for a new trial, on the ground that the exhibition and use of a gaming-table called a sweat-cloth, for a single day on the race-ground, during the races, was not such a keeping of a common gaming-table as was within the meaning of the penitentiary act; the word "keeping" not being satisfied by proof of a single act of play at the table, nor even by a single day's use of it.

After argument, THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) granted a new trial, on the ground suggested by the defendant's counsel.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The defendant has been found guilty of keeping a certain common gaming-table, called a sweat-cloth. A motion for a new trial is made by the counsel of the defendant, because the witnesses only proved that it was exhibited and used one day during the races; which they contend does not amount to the offence of keeping a gaming-table within the meaning of the statute. The word "keeping," certainly, when applied to time, implies duration. Standing alone without limitation, either by express words, or by the nature of the act or thing which it governs, it implies indefinite duration; as when I say, take this book and keep it; keep at work; keep the mill going. But the duration may be limited to a single day, or hour, or minute, and still it is "keeping." So it may be limited or extended by the nature of the subject to which it is applied. That subject may consist of a succession of acts. Thus we say, "he keeps a ferry;" but a single act of carrying a man across a river in a boat, is not keeping a ferry;—"keeps a tavern;" but a single act of lodging a traveller, is not keeping a tavern. So we say, "he keeps a disorderly house;" but a single instance of disorder in the house, is not the keeping of a disorderly house. Many other instances may be cited, in which the word keeping implies a repetition, or succession of similar acts. If the thing to be kept, is itself, temporary, the duration intended by the word "keeping," will be temporary, also. If, therefore, congress had prohibited the keeping of a sweat-cloth at the races, the word "keeping" might, perhaps, have been satisfied by one day's keeping. But if congress had been asked whether they intended to punish by imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary, any person who should exhibit and keep a sweat-cloth for a single day at the races, I think they would have said that they did not; that it was not the kind of keeping which they contemplated. I think, therefore, that a new trial should be granted.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge. This is an indictment for keeping a common gaming-table called a sweat-cloth. A motion is made for a new trial, grounded on the legal sense of the participle keeping, as intended in the law; and on the construction of which the motion must be allowed or not. Admitting the verb keep, as used in the law, or rather the participle of that verb, namely, keeping, can be strained to the sense contended for; that it may imply a momentary, or a few minutes', or an hour's, keeping a sweat-cloth, (though the testimony, as far as I recollect it, only proved upon the traverser one single instance of his playing at such table,) yet surely it does not become the court, nor is it consistent with the established principle of construction, nor the avowed humanity of the law, to be astute in searching for a meaning of the word to suit the occasion, against the undoubted sense in which the word is used in common parlance, as I have endeavored to show by numerous instances cited by me in my former remarks, which might be swelled to an indefinite extent, without a single example that could be adduced to the contrary; take yet another instance or two. We say, "this is a good keeping apple;" "will this meat keep?" yet everybody knows that neither the meat nor the apple will keep but a limited time, although they will keep for a time implying duration beyond a day, or week, or two weeks; the apple will only last sound for a few months, and the meat, (if not in a vessel hermetically sealed,) but a few years; but in both cases, considerable duration is implied, ex vi termini; where shall we look for authorities to settle the meaning of this most significant term, upon the true construction of which depends the fate of several unhappy beings now in jail? Shall we seek them in common usage? That is in favor of the meaning I contend for. Shall we go to dictionaries, to the best expositions of the term keeping, by the best lexicographers? They support my definition. Shall we seek for illustrations from parallel and corresponding words in other languages? They sanction the definition as I have given it, namely: take the Latin language, the verb "sustentare" is the nearest, nay, the true corresponding word in that language to the verb "keep." This word is translated by Ainsworth, the highest authority, by the words "to sustain" or "maintain"; and what English scholar will give a meaning to those words implying only a moment's, or even an hour's duration? Take an equivalent and corresponding French word, namely, "entretenir"; will any French scholar pretend that this word has so limited a meaning?

Let us then look into the policy of the law, as far as we can gather it from known facts within the knowledge of everybody; and as the statute has no preamble, I know not where else we can search for the intention of the legislature, except from considering the circumstances which it is probable led to its enactment. Who believes that congress either knew or thought of those petty ephemeral tables on race-grounds, which, at most, could only last during the races, and for aught that appeared in evidence on the trial, did not, in the case before us, continue to be played at beyond a few minutes? Congress has tolerated the principal vice, horse-racing. It is hardly presumable they would have left this higher quarry, and struck at the humbler sweat-cloth, a mere incident to the principal, and as certain to follow it as any incident to follow its principal. Had they designed to strike at them, they would have designated them by a more special description, and more congenial terms; they saw, under their very noses, the established and permanent faro-banks in this city, continuing during the session, and some of them, as I have heard, and believed, for years; the fixed, well-known, and dangerous places of resort, kept as permanently and notoriously as Gadsby's Hotel; established places of seduction to the young and the unwary, and productive of every evil; of loss of fortune, of the earnings of tradesmen, shopkeepers, and, perhaps, laborers, and driving on desperation to seek the means of indulging the most absorbing of all passions, gambling; by fraud, larceny, or robbery, and terminating an unsuccessful career by suicide. These are the formidable results of those great establishments, of those hells, as they are justly called; and which congress, by fearful penalties endeavored, and I believe designed to put down.

No such consequences can result from sweat-cloths; they are among those mushroom extravagancies of the race-field, springing up with the races and ending with them, and no more heard of till the return of that annual jubilee, which has been in use and practice, without let or molestation till now, for an indefinite period, so as to become almost sanctioned by immemorial usage, unnoticed by the laws of Maryland, whose numerous race-fields, dispersed through the country, with all their concomitants of sweat-cloths, and other similar irregularities, have been kept up, and annually, and even semiannually used and indulged in for a time, the commencement of which is at this day unknown,—beyond the memory of man. Do you believe that congress meant, under this short, but sure magic word "keeping," for magic it is indeed, if it has such wonderful efficacy to put down, so suddenly, this ancient usage, "more honored," it is true, "in the breach than the observance," this petty gambling, confined to the poor, the ignorant, during a few days, at most, of an annual celebration; when, from long habit, and the indulgence of the laws, until now, a general relaxation of manners have been permitted and tolerated during such celebrations; like the Saturnalia at Rome, where the laws were almost suspended, for, as well as I remember, three days in the year. To return to the word "keeping." If the word implies exclusively, when unattended with other restraining adjuncts or explanatory words, what I have stated above, if it was never known, in common use, to have any other meaning, nor, according to the expositions of the best dictionaries, illustrated by parallel and corresponding words in other languages, no other meaning can be ascribed to it, shall we strain and force it to a meaning thus denied it by common use, and such authorities, in order to convict the prisoner, and send him to the wretched confinement of the penitentiary, because, to our more cultivated minds and more improved moral sense, he has indulged in practices which shock our feelings? It is against every principle of construction to construe a criminal law not only liberally, but with unprecedented license against the accused; but, on the contrary, if the words, so far from having any force against him, are entirely in his favor, will even admit of a construction to save him, by any reasonable intendment, it is our duty, and comports with the known humanity of the law, to give them that construction. Shall we, I say, arbitrarily strain the word to a sense not justified by common use, nor the most authorized expositions of it by the best expounders, and illustrations drawn from other languages, in order to take in this case, because we think he deserves punishment? He is a profligate fellow, and therefore the word means so and so, and he deserves to be punished, although no instance of such meaning can be found, of the word, unless it be limited and restricted to such meaning, by other words or adjuncts, clearly abridging the known and acknowledged sense of it. For example, we say, "he kept his bed a whole day;" "will you keep my place for me until I return?" in the first case, limiting the duration of the keeping by express words, to a day; and in the latter, by like words or adjuncts, to the time of the return; but the law says, whoever shall "keep a faro-bank or gaming-table," without any words of limitation. Now why should we be thus astute in seeking to bring the traverser within the formidable penalty of the statute, by resorting to an unusual, forced, and unauthorized construction of a single term or expression, on the true import of which his fate hangs? Why should we do this thing? Is it because these poor creatures, born and raised in poverty, ignorance, and darkness, and without any chance or means of moral culture, have done what shocks our more cultivated minds, or our religious or moral sentiments? Are we reformers, or are we judges, to administer the law as it is, and not as we think it ought to be, to the poor and rich with equal hand, and leave reformation to be worked out where alone it can and ought to be, by the wisdom of the laws, or the spread of knowledge and diffusion of learning, or by the influence of moral and religious instruction, by the ministers of religion?

Case No. 16,330.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 727.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

BAIL—DISCRETION OF MAGISTRATE.

1. If the indictment does not describe an indictable offence, the magistrate, who takes the bail in the case, has a discretion as to the amount of the bail, and no corrupt motive can be imputed to him on account of the smallness of the amount in which the bail is taken.

[Cited in U. S. v. Ringgold, Case No. 16,167.]

2. The act not being illegal, the court will not permit evidence to be given of a corrupt motive.

Indictment [against Fleet Smith] for taking insufficient bail upon a bench-warrant against Miller for "keeping a certain gaming-table called a faro-bank."

Mr. Brent and Mr. Bradley, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury that the prosecution cannot be sustained, as this court has quashed the original indictment against Miller, on the ground that it did not describe an indictable offence. The bench-warrant which issued upon the presentment was "to answer to a certain misdemeanor, as it is presented," without further description of the offence; and upon reference to the presentment, it does not appear that any offence is charged.

Mr. Dunlop, for the United States, contrà, contended that the magistrate had no right to judge of the validity of the indictment, nor whether it was an indictable offence.

Mr. Bradley and Mr. Brent, in reply, cited Starkie, Ev. 168, and 2 Chit. Cr. Law, c. 8, pp. 144, 158.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) instructed the jury, that as the indictment did not describe an indictable offence, and the justice had discretion as to the amount, no corrupt motive can be imputed to him from the smallness of the bail taken. It was not an illegal act, and therefore the motive is immaterial.

And CRANCH, Chief Judge, added, that if any corrupt act was done to obstruct the due course of justice, it might be the ground of a separate count, or indictment; but upon this count the act of taking the bail in $20 only, not being illegal, the court will not admit evidence of a corrupt motive.

Case No. 16,331.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 484.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1838.

SPECIAL BAIL—EVIDENCE.

A certificate, in the usual form, by the officers of the treasury of the United States, that a certain balance is due by the defendant to the United States, is not sufficient cause for bail.

The United States had filed an account from the treasury, certified in the manner required by the statute, stating merely a balance of $11,000 due by the defendant [W. S. Smith].

W. L. Brent, for defendant, moved for leave to appear without special bail; and stated that this court had decided that a mere statement from the treasury, of a balance due, was not even prima facie evidence on the trial, and, therefore, is not sufficient to hold the defendant to bail.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, not sitting in the case) permitted the defendant to appear without special bail.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[Brun. Col. Cas. 82; 4 Day, 121; N. C. Cas. 81.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. 1809.

SLAVE TRADE — ACTION TO RECOVER PENALTY — ACCOMPLICE AS WITNESS—DEPOSITIONS —REDUCTION TO WRITING.

1. In an action of debt to recover the penalty given by the act of congress of May 10, 1800, for transporting slaves from one foreign port or place to another, a particeps criminis, after the expiration of two years from the commission of the offense, without any prosecution against him being commenced, may be compelled to testify against the defendant, though such witness has been out of the jurisdiction of the United States a considerable part of the two years. A fleeing from justice within the proviso to the United States statute of limitations for crimes does not necessarily import a fleeing from prosecution begun.

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. White, Case No. 16,677.]

2. The offense within the act of congress of May 10, 1800, consists in transporting persons from one foreign country to another, with a view to their being sold as slaves; and the offense is complete when the vessel arrives at the place of destination, whether the slaves are sold or not.

3. Where the certificate of a magistrate taking a deposition, stated it to have been written in his presence, without saying by whom, and it appeared also that the substance of it had been reduced to writing by the deponent ten days before at a different place when the magistrate was not present, it was held that such deposition was inadmissible in the United States courts.

This was an action of debt to recover double the value of the interest which the defendant [John Smith] had in certain slaves, transported in the brig Heroine, whereof the defendant was sole owner and master, from Africa to Havanna, and there sold by the direction of the defendant, and for his benefit, contrary to the provisions of the act of congress of May 10, 1800 (5 Stat. 167, 170). The first section of that act is as follows: "That it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or other person residing within the United States, directly or indirectly, to hold or have any right or property in any vessel employed or made use of in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another, and any right or property belonging, as aforesaid, shall be forfeited, and may be libelled and condemned for the use of the person who shall sue for the same; and such person transgressing the prohibition aforesaid shall also forfeit and pay a sum of money equal to double the value of the right or property in such vessel, which he held as aforesaid; and shall also forfeit a sum of money equal to double the value of the interest which he may have had in the slaves, which at any time have been transported or carried in such vessel, after the passing of this act, and against the form thereof."

The action was commenced March 31, 1808. The transportation and sale of the slaves were thus alleged in the declaration: "That while said vessel remained on said coast of Africa, to wit, after the first day of December, 1805, and before the first day of April then next following, by direction of said John Smith, and for his use, the crew of said vessel did forcibly seize, carry on board said vessel, and there confine more than one hundred of the natives of Africa, a foreign country, with intent them to transport, and sell and dispose of as slaves in some foreign country. And afterwards said vessel, pursuant to the previous advice and direction of said John Smith, did sail from said coast of Africa, having on board more than one hundred of the said inhabitants and natives of Africa, destined to the port of Havanna, a foreign port and place in the dominions of the king of Spain, at which port said vessel arrived before the 1st day of June, 1806. And the said United States further declare that after the 1st day of April, and before the 30th day of June in the year last mentioned, and within two years next before the date of this writ, by the previous advice and direction of said John Smith, and for his use and benefit, at Havanna aforesaid, one hundred of said inhabitants and natives of Africa, so as aforesaid, by said John Smith, caused to be taken and transported to the place last mentioned, were there sold and disposed of as slaves, and at a price not less than one hundred dollars for each of said Africans, amounting in the whole to ten thousand dollars, against the form, force, and effect of the several acts of the congress of the United States in such cases made, and then in force." The declaration then concluded thus: "By means whereof, and by force of the statutes aforesaid, the said John Smith hath forfeited and become liable to pay a sum of money equal to double the value of the interest which he then had in said slaves so transported in said brig Heroine, whereof said John Smith was sole owner, from Africa to Havanna aforesaid, and there sold as aforesaid, for the benefit of said John Smith, amounting to twenty thousand dollars." The defendant pleaded "Not guilty."

Mr. Huntington, Dist. Atty., and Mr. Peters, for the United States.

Goodrich, Daggett, Mosely & Dwight, for defendant.

On the trial the district attorney, Mr. Huntington, for the United States, offered William Mills, one of the crew of the brig Heroine, as a witness to prove that the defendant was owner of the slaves mentioned in the declaration.

Mr. Daggett, for defendant, objected to his being sworn, on the ground that his testimony would implicate himself, and subject him to fine and imprisonment. The second section of the act of May 10, 1800, declares "that it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or other person residing therein, to serve on board any vessel employed or made use of in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another"; and provides that "any such citizen or other person voluntarily serving as aforesaid, shall be liable to be indicted therefor, and on conviction thereof shall be liable to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding two years." 1 Stat. 168. A prosecution has already been commenced against the witness for serving on board the defendant's vessel during the voyage in question. Any facts within the knowledge of this witness which will subject the defendant will also show that the witness is guilty.

The district attorney replied that he had entered a nolle prosequi on the prosecution against the witness, and the time for instituting a new prosecution has elapsed, the offense having been committed more than two years ago. Further, the only point to which we propose to direct the testimony of the witness is, that John Smith was owner of certain slaves. To establish that point will not implicate the witness. Nothing is more common in criminal trials than to call upon a particeps criminis to testify.

EDWARDS, District Judge. That is where the witness does not object. But here the witness does object.

The district attorney observed further that the witness came here voluntarily, and agreed to testify. He ought not now to surprise us by refusing to testify. It would be hard on the part of the United States if he were permitted to conduct in this manner.

EDWARDS, District Judge. That is of no consequence. The only question is whether he can be compelled to testify to what may implicate himself, because two years have elapsed since the transaction.

The district attorney then insisted that the lapse of two years after the offense was committed without any prosecution is unquestionably a complete bar, and cited Adams v. Wood, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 336. The witness is now as secure from the penalties of the statute as though he had never committed the offense.

Mr. Daggett, for defendant. The United States statute of limitations has a proviso expressly excepting persons fleeing from justice from its operation. The latter clause of the thirty-second section of the act of congress of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 119), is as follows: "Nor shall any person be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense not capital, nor for any fine or forfeiture under any penal statute, unless the indictment or information for the same shall be found or instituted within two years from the time of committing the offense, or incurring the fine or forfeiture aforesaid." Then follows this proviso: "Provided that nothing herein contained shall extend to any person or persons fleeing from justice." It appears that this witness has been out of the United States a considerable part of the time since the transaction took place. (This had been previously stated, and admitted by the counsel for the United States.) Now, a fleeing from justice is nothing more than avoidance, a going out of the jurisdiction to avoid prosecution. So the construction has been as to fugitives from justice from one state into another. But at any rate the witness will be jeopardized by testifying, and this is sufficient to excuse him. If prosecuted for this offense he must plead the statute of limitations. The attorney for the United States may then reply over a fleeing from justice. This he will attempt to support by showing that the witness has actually been without the jurisdiction of the United States. Will not this jeopardize him? The statute of limitations never purges the offense. Nothing but a pardon will afford the offender complete security. The case of Bollman, in Burr's Trial [Case No. 14,693], was referred to. The question there was whether Bollman was bound to accept the pardon. But without the pardon it was admitted that he could not be called upon to testify.

Mr. Peters, for the United States, contended that a fleeing from justice within the proviso of the statute must be a fleeing from a prosecution begun.

EDWARDS, District Judge. That point was decided otherwise by Ch. J. Ellsworth in the Case of Williams [Case No. 17,708]. He said it made no difference whether a prosecution was commenced or not.

Mr. Goodrich stated that in Williams' Case [supra] the offender had simply been in a foreign country, and it was considered as a fleeing from justice.

EDWARDS, District Judge. I am prepared to give my opinion on the point, but if the jury should find a verdict against the defendant I will give him an opportunity to move for a new trial, and have the opinion of Judge LIVINGSTON. It appears to me that the witness is prima facie protected from prosecution by the statute of limitations. The answer comes from him. He says he is not protected because he has fled from justice. But he ought not to make his fleeing from justice (his own crime) a ground for withholding his testimony. At the same time the court will take care that the witness be not entrapped. The attorney will not be allowed to say now that the prosecution is barred, and thus obtain his testimony, and afterwards bring forward a prosecution, and say that it is not barred, because the witness has fled from justice. The witness must testify.

In the course of the trial the district attorney offered the deposition of Thaddeus R. Austin. It appeared that the substance of this deposition had been copied by the deponent from another paper which he had written at Suffield about ten days before. The certificate of the magistrate who took the deposition was as follows: "Personally appeared the above-named Thaddeus R. Austin of Suffield, in the state of Connecticut, and being duly cautioned, made oath to the truth of the above deposition by him subscribed, and written in my presence," etc.

Mr. Daggett objected to the admission of this deposition on the ground that it was not taken as the act of congress requires. The 30th section of the judiciary act (volume 1, p. 69) provides, that every person deposing shall be carefully examined, and cautioned, and sworn, or affirmed to testify the whole truth, and shall subscribe the testimony by him or her given, after the same shall be reduced to writing, which shall be done only by the magistrate taking the deposition, or by the deponent in his presence. This testimony was not reduced to writing by the magistrate taking the deposition, nor by the deponent in his presence.

Mr. Peters, contra.

EDWARDS, District Judge. The provisions of the act of congress relative to the taking of depositions are very important, and ought to be adhered to strictly. This deposition cannot be read. The question is not a new one. In England the lord chancellor has refused to admit depositions taken as this was. The transportation of the slaves from Africa to Havanna, as stated in the declaration, was clearly proved by the evidence adduced on the part of the United States. It appeared that the vessel arrived at Havanna more than two years before the commencement of the suit; but it did not appear that the slaves were actually sold until some time within the two years.

Messrs. Goodrich and Daggett contended that the offense charged in this declaration is complete when the vessel arrives; and her arrival takes place when she is moored. It is not necessary that the slaves should be landed or sold.

The district attorney and Mr. Peters, contra, insisted that in order to constitute the offense in question the persons transported must be sold as slaves; if they are transported for the purpose of colonization, or any other purpose than to be sold as slaves, it is no offense. But at any rate, they must be landed before the offense is complete. It does not appear that these slaves were landed more than two years before the commencement of the suit. If the defendant relies upon the statute of limitations for his protection it belongs to him to show this, which he has not done.

Mr. Goodrich, in reply, observed that it clearly belonged to the United States to prove the offense committed within two years from the commencement of the suit; otherwise there could be no recovery. There is a manifest distinction between this case and that where a debt is admitted by the defendant, and claimed to be barred by the statute of limitations.

EDWARDS, District Judge. That part of the case which rests upon the statute of limitations is extremely clear. My opinion is, and so I shall charge the jury, that the offense consists in transporting persons from one foreign country to another, with a view to their being sold as slaves; and as soon as the vessel arrives at the place of destination the offense is completed, whether the slaves are sold or not. It is incumbent on the attorney for the United States to show an offense committed within two years; and as this has not been done, there must be a verdict for the defendant.

The jury found accordingly.

District Court, D. New York. Aug., 1809.

EMBARGO ACT—BOND GIVEN BY VESSEL MASTER.

[The embargo act of December 22, 1807, required that no vessel should depart from one United States port to another unless the master gave bond "to the collector of the district" that the goods should be relanded "in some port of the United States." Held, that a bond given under the act was not invalid because made payable "to the United States," and not to the collector, and conditioned to reland the goods "at the said port of S., or at some other port of the United States."]

[This was an action by the United States against Hezekiah Smith, Stephen Griffith, and Nathaniel L. Griswold, upon a bond executed by the defendants. Heard on a demurrer.]

This action was upon a bond executed by the defendants to the United States and delivered to the collector of the port of New York, having annexed the following condition, viz. "Whereas the following goods, wares and merchandises, that is to say, 1,272 barrels flour, as per manifest now delivered to the collector of the customs of the port of New York and intended to be transported in the said vessel called the James Wells, burden 178 11-95 tons to the port of St. Mary's in the state of Georgia: Now, the condition of the above obligation is such that if the above-mentioned goods, wares and merchandises, shall be relanded in the United States, at the port aforesaid or at some other port of the United States the dangers of the sea excepted, the said obligation shall be void, otherwise, &c."

The bond was taken by the collector under authority of the second section of the embargo act of the 22d December, 1807, requiring that no vessel shall be allowed to depart from one port to another of the United States, unless the master, &c. shall first give bond with one or more sureties "to the collector of the district," that the goods, &c. shall be relanded "in some port of the United States."

It was argued, upon demurrer, by Riggs, Hoffman & Emmet for defendants, that a bond required and taken under colour of a statute is not valid unless the same is in strict conformity with the authority of the act; that the statute under colour of whose authority this bond is taken requires the security "to be given to the collector of the district," whereas it is made payable to the United States and is conditioned to reland the goods, &c. at the said port of St. Mary's or at some other port of the United States, which being a variance from the words and authority of the act the bond is against law, and void as well under the act as at common law.

Mr. Sandford for the United States.

TALLMADGE, District Judge, said that the authorities cited by the defendants' counsel were decisions upon the particular words of 23 Hen. VI., authorising and requiring bail bonds; which statute prescribes the form of the security and declares all others to be void, and hence it was very properly decided that the particular form marked out was alone decisive and all others void per force of the statute. That the purpose of that act was to correct abuses which had crept into a system of former practice. The purpose of the act in question is to create an entire new system. It prescribes no form of bond nor avoids any that shall be adopted. It merely authorizes the president to give such instructions as appear the best calculated to carry the act into effect. That he was satisfied, upon an attentive perusal of the act, it did not mean to confine the security to the person of the collector as the obligee, but merely through his agency to ensure by bond, a conformity to its restrictions, and that the bond as taken embraced the substance, and was within the spirit and authority of the act a voluntary bond and valid.

Judgment for the United States.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

TEN OTHER SIMILAR CASES.

[1 Hughes, 347.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. Aug. 2, 1877.

CIVIL WAR — RIGHTS OF CONQUEST — DEBTS DUE INSURGENT STATE — JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS.

1. Where a person was indebted, for money had and received, to one of the insurgent state governments which were overthrown by the United States in 1865, and was sued by the United States, after the return of peace, in an action of assumpsit, on demurrer, held, that the original assumpsit of the defendant to the insurgent state government was a debt at common law and not jure belli; and that, the United States having succeeded by right of conquest to the debt, the law, after peace, implies an assumpsit by the defendant to pay the debt to the United States, and will treat the latter assumpsit as a common law obligation and not as arising jure belli.

2. A circuit court of the United States has jurisdiction of an action of assumpsit brought upon such a debt, whether arising at common law or otherwise

The government of Virginia under the Confederacy, having borrowed a large amount of specie from one of the banks in Richmond, the then governor (William Smith), and other officers, withdrew it on or about the 2d day of April, 1865, which was the day preceding the occupation of Richmond by the Union army. Of the specie there were received in distribution by several officers respectively, the following sums, to be accounted for as advances of salary for the fiscal year, commencing April 1st, 1865, viz.: by

William Smith	$5000
George W. Mumford	2000
John O. Chiles	1000
Edward H. Fitzhugh	1000
P. F. Howard	500

At a later date, to wit, in August, 1865, further sums of this specie were distributed to officers of the government then expired, to wit: to

Henry W. Thomas	$500
Shelton C. Davis	300
John L. Shackleford	100
Daniel Denoon	100
S. L. Moncure	100
A. A. Lorentz	100

During the first session of the legislature of the Alexandria government (that of 1865–66), the committee of courts of justice of the house of delegates was charged with an inquiry into this matter. On December 20th, 1865, that committee reported, through William T. Joynes, one of its members, that in respect to this money, the then state government of Virginia did not succeed to the rights of the state government which was overthrown in April, 1865, and could not claim this money; and, that whatever rights of conquest accrued by the overthow of the late government belonged to the United States.

There was no demand or suit by the subsequent state government for these sums of money. Latterly, the United States have brought actions of assumpsit against each of the persons named after personal demand made. The amount received by E. H. Fitzhugh was some time ago paid by him into the treasury of Virginia. As but one of the suits (that against William Smith) involved a sum large enough to authorize it to be carried to the supreme court, that has been heard first, and the others will be stayed to await the result, in order that the principle which may be settled in it may govern the other cases.

The case was heard in June on the demurrer to the declaration; and the decision of the court on the points raised by the demurrer was rendered on the 2d day of August, 1877.

L. L. Lewis, Dist. Atty., for plaintiffs.

R. T. Daniel, Atty. Gen., W. B. Taliaferro, Robert H. Stiles, Bradley T. Johnson, and William L. Royal, for defendants.

HUGHES, District Judge. This case is before me not upon issues of fact, but upon facts admitted by demurrer, and upon the law as arising upon the facts so admitted. The allegations of the declaration are these: (1) That the defendant was indebted to the insurgent government of Virginia in the sum of $5000 on the 2d day of April, 1865; (2) that he promised the said government to pay the said indebtedness; (3) that the said insurgent government was, on the 9th April, 1865, overthrown by the United States by force of arms, and the lawful authority of the United States re-established, in the state; and, (4) that the defendant, after the said 9th day of April, 1865, in consideration of the premises, undertook and promised to pay to the United States the said sum of $5000. The demurrer admits these allegations to be true; yet denies that they constitute a case of indebtedness by the defendant to the United States, and prays judgment, etc.

In technical strictness, by admitting the truth of these several allegations, the demurrer admits the case of the plaintiffs to be sufficient to warrant a judgment for him. But let it be assumed that the fourth allegation, being an inference of law, is not admitted by the demurrer. Then, the question for decision is, whether the United States acquired by conquest of, and succession to, the insurgent government of Virginia, on the 9th April, 1865, such a right to the money which was then due from the defendant to the insurgent state government as was valid and sufficient to raise the assumpsit set forth in the fourth clause of the declaration. Stating the case differently, the question before me is, whether the United States succeeded by conquest and succession to the rights of action, as well as the property, of the insurgent state government, which was overthrown on the 9th April, 1865. If so, the law will adjudge that the defendant promised to pay to the United States the money which he thus owed to that government, and the court will render judgment against him accordingly. As a matter of history, it cannot be disputed that it was the power of the United States, and not of any state, or of what was called the Alexandria government of Virginia, which was brought to bear against the insurrectionary governments of the South; or, that the overthrow and conquest of the insurrectionary government of Virginia was in fact effected by the United States. Therefore, whatever rights of property or of action ordinarily result under the law of nations and of war from conquest, resulted to the United States, on the 9th April, 1865, and did not result to what was called the Alexandria government of Virginia. The very able committee of the general assembly of Virginia, Mr Marshall at its head, which had this matter in charge, in the winter of 1865, in the report submitted through one of its members, Judge Joynes, one of the ablest and most learned judges of the state, conceded this right to the United States in their report, in which they said: "It is very clear that the present government representing the state of Virginia cannot assert any claim to this money by right of conquest, for all the rights of conquest, whatever they be, belong to the United States."

And, therefore, the particular question for decision in this case is, whether the right of action, which the demurrer admits that the insurgent state government of Virginia had against the defendant on the 2d to the 8th April, 1865, for $5000, passed by conquest, and, after the peace following complete conquest, to the United States, on or after the 9th April, 1865. Does succession, after complete conquest and peace, give to the conquering power the right of enforcing, by civil action, the payment of debts due, at the date of conquest, to the conquered power? In this case it is to be observed that there was not merely a temporary conquest, and that condition of quasi belligerence attending such an event, but complete and final conquest producing absolute peace, and that undisputed succession of one power by the other resulting from such a conquest. It was a case of undisputed succession peacefully held after complete, final conquest. I will also premise that such suits as this can affect only such property or rights of action as belonged to the insurgent government of Virginia as such, and not property or rights which belonged or belong to the people of Virginia through their legal government. The former alone were the subjects of conquest; the latter were not. Speaking of what passes by conquest to the conquering power, the supreme court of the United States says, in U. S. v. Lyon, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 435, the conqueror's "rights are no longer limited to the mere occupation of what he has taken into his actual possession, but they extend to all the property and rights of a conquered state, including even debts as well as personal and real property." Mr. Justice Clifford, in delivering this opinion of the court, and using the language thus quoted, simply gives expression to the settled principle of the law of nations. In the case of Advocate General of Bombay v. Amerchund, cited at length in Elphinstone v. Bedreechund, 1 Knapp, 329, it was held that money in bank belonging to a conquered prince may be recovered in a suit against the banker by the conquering nation. In the case of U. S. v. McRae, 8 Eq. Cas. 72, it was said by the vice chancellor: "I apprehend it to be clear, public, universal law, that any government which de facto succeeds to any other government, whether by revolution or restoration, conquest or reconquest, succeeds to all the public property, to everything in the nature of public property, and to all rights in respect of the public property of the displaced power, whatever may be the nature or origin of the title of such displaced power. Any such public money in any treasury, any such public property found in any warehouse, fort, or arsenals, would, on the success of the new or restored power, vest ipso facto in such power, and it would have the right to call to account any fiscal or other agent, or any debtor or accountant to or of the persons who had exercised and had ceased to exercise the authority of a government, the agent, debtor, or accountant having been the agent, debtor, or accountant of such persons in their character or pretended character of a government. But this right is the right of succession, is the right of representation, is a right, not paramount, but derived, I will not say under, but through, the suppressed and displaced authority, and can only be enforced in the same way, and to the same extent, and subject to the same correlative obligations and rights, as if that authority had not been suppressed and displaced, and was itself seeking to enforce it." All the authorities have held the same doctrine, and, indeed, it has never been disputed. These authorities close the question in favor of the right of the United States to the property of the overthrown government of Virginia, as the insurgent government, and to the debts due, whether from citizens or from foreigners, to that government, at the time of its overthrow.

The objection of defendant's counsel, that assumpsit will not lie for an obligation arising by implication from a debtor of a conquered state to the conquering government after conquest, because promises do not arise from acts of violence, is not tenable. It is not denied, it is admitted by demurrer, that the defendant by receiving from the state government before its overthrow, $5,000 not due to him, became indebted to that government. It is settled law, as already shown, that a conquering power after the conquest, succeeds to the debts which were due to the conquered power. If, therefore, by the law of nations, which is part of the law of England and America, such a debt becomes due from a citizen to the conquering power, then the law of England and America, even the common law of the two countries, implies an assumpsit, a promise on the part of that citizen to pay the debt. The citizen owes the debt to some one. The money he owes does not belong to himself. He is bound in conscience to pay it to the rightful owner, who is entitled ex equo et bono to receive it. And the law of nations, as well as of England and America, declares that the conquering power is that rightful owner. There is no violence between the debtor, as such, and the conquering power. The violence was between the two governments. The debt, as a debt, becomes due to the conquering power, irrespective of the consideration whether the debtor was a combatant or a non-combatant. In his character of debtor, not in that of man or woman, combatant or non-combatant, native or foreigner, he became, qua debtor to the conquered power, the debtor of the conquering power. This is not a question between soldier and citizen, growing out of acts committed while war was flagrant, in the course of the soldier's service, as in Hughes v. Litsey, 5 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 148. Nor is it a question of prize or capture durante bello, concerning property taken or right acquired during the progress of war, as in Coolidge v. Guthrie [Case No. 3,185], and in Elphinstone v. Bedreechund, 1 Knapp, 316, where the court expressly says that the capture was made nondum cessante bello. The indebtedness of the defendant in this case to the insurgent government of Virginia, was not one arising jure belli between belligerents, but by contract between friends. It is true that the succession of the United States to the insurgent government was an event durante bello; but that event having been completed, the indebtedness of the defendant to the succeeding government arising after the close of the war, was not an indebtedness jure belli, but by contract. Being indebted, the implied assumpsit of the defendant to pay, his promise to pay, is a common law obligation. A debtor may be liable in assumpsit to a creditor, but if by violence the creditor is killed, the debtor then becomes liable in assumpsit to the creditor's administrator.

I do not think, therefore, with defendant's counsel, that this is a case of first impression. It is an action at common law, founded upon a contract arising of common law implication, and as such, is not new or unprecedented. Nor is the objection of defendant's counsel tenable, which they take on the score of the jurisdiction of the court. The circuit courts of the United States have original cognizance "of all suits at common law, etc., etc., where the United States is plaintiff" (see clause 3, § 629, Rev. St. U. S.), or in other words "of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, etc., etc., in which the United States is plaintiff, etc., etc." Jurisdiction Act March 3, 1875, § 1 [18 Stat. 470]. These definitions of jurisdiction do not refer to the claim sued upon, its character or its origin, but only to the nature and form of the action which may be made the instrument for establishing the demand. A citizen of the United States, indebted to a citizen of France by a contract made in Paris, may be sued in the circuit court of the United States for the district in which he resides in this country. His demand is not a common law demand, but if sued upon it, in an action at law, the suit is in form and character a suit at common law. He may be sued in assumpsit, if the demand be such as to make that form of action proper. So a demand arising durante bello, and not arising at common law, may be sued upon in an action at common law in this country, either in a state or federal court. Under whatever law, whether of peace or war, of the domicile or foreign jurisdiction, the obligation of the defendant arises, the suit proper to enforce it according to the forms of action employed in England or this country, whether it be at common law or in equity, may be brought in the federal courts, if the courts have jurisdiction of the parties to the suit.

As to the proposition of defendant's counsel, that this money is a trust fund, and the execution or abuse of the trust must be examined into by Virginia alone,—that is a question not yet arising in the cause, and it does not appear how it will arise. The state has, by adopting the report of the committee of 1865, and by long inaction, declined to look into or after the trust, if such it be. The defendant has put in no plea in the cause claiming that he has discharged his fiduciary obligations in respect to the debt as a trust fund. And it is not until all action of the sort has seemed to have become wholly improbable, that the United States have now moved in the matter. As a preliminary step to devoting the fund to its trust purposes, it would seem incumbent that the person charged with the legal title in the trust should proceed to collect it in, and as the legal title, by the law of nations and of the land, is in the United States, we have a right to presume that, if the fund bears the character of a trust, the United States will, after collecting it, give to it the direction required by the trust.

As to the proposition of defendant's counsel, that the war of the United States was not against the insurgent government of Virginia, and that the overthrow of that government was not a conquest, but only the setting aside of one government and the assumption of its functions by another, it can hardly find acceptance in view of the facts of history. The event happened at the close of a frightful war, and was directly produced by arms, and by armies in the field. The power of the United States was directed against the insurgent state governments, even more than against their confederated authorities. The war was conducted for the overthrow of those governments. When they were crushed, the war ceased, and the historical fact of conquest cannot be changed or obliterated by the employment of theoretic paraphrases in speaking of it. As to the insurgent state governments, it was a conquest, and was followed by the legal results of conquest. This debt is due. It is due to some rightful claimant, and I think the law makes it sufficiently apparent who that claimant is.

The demurrer must be overruled.

Case No. 16,336.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[19 Law Rep. 91.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1856.

PERJURY—FISHING BOUNTY LAWS.

To constitute the offence of false swearing under the act of 1813 [3 Stat. 51]. for the payment of fishing bounty, there must be a wilful and corrupt intent to swear falsely.

[Cited in U. S. v. Moore, Case No. 15,803.]

This was an indictment [against David A. Smith] for perjury in making a false declaration to obtain the bounty on a fishing schooner, called the East Wind, of Provincetown. The act of 1813 allows a bounty to vessels that have been employed in the cod fishery not less than four months at sea, provided they shall have been employed under an agreement with the fishermen on shares. The act declares that "any person who shall make any false declaration in any oath, or affirmation required by this act, being duly convicted thereof, shall be deemed guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury, and be punished accordingly."

In order to procure the bounty, the law requires that the owner of the fishing vessel, his agent or representative, shall produce to the collector the original agreement with the fishermen employed during the fishing season, which shall provide that the fish or their proceeds shall be divided among the fishermen, in proportion to the fish they may respectively have caught, and to the truth of which he shall swear or affirm.

It was proved at the trial, that Paul Atkins, the managing owner of the East Wind, which had been employed four months in the cod fishery, gave powers of attorney to the defendant, D. A. Smith, to procure the fishing bounty of the collector, S. B. Phinney, at Barnstable. The defendant at the same time took the papers and powers of attorney for other vessels, about thirty in number, belonging to Provincetown, for which he engaged to collect the bounty, and for each of which he was to be paid fifty cents. He was a county commissioner at the time, and was going from Provincetown to Barnstable on business. Mr. Smith produced to Collector Phinney, the fishing agreement of the owners and skipper of the East Wind, which was in legal form, signed by the master and crew, and purporting to be on shares, according to law. To the truth of this agreement he took and subscribed the following oath before Collector Phinney: "I solemnly swear that the paper now produced by me to the collector, is the original agreement between the owners, master and fishermen, of the schooner East Wind, for, and during the last fishing season." The oath was administered December 31, 1855, and thereupon the collector paid the bounty to Mr. Smith. The government produced three of the fishermen engaged in the vessel, two of whom testified that they were hired by the thousand, that is, so much for every thousand fish they caught, and the other that he was hired by the season, for $125. The agreement was made with the master. They were to have no part of the bounty, five-eighths of which by law belong to the fishermen, and three eighths to the vessel. They all signed the regular shipping paper, which was printed, to go on shares, but the actual agreement was as above stated. There was no evidence to contradict this, and it was admitted that the oath taken by the defendant, was not true in point of fact. But the counsel for the defendant argued to the jury that the defendant took the oath innocently and in good faith; that he had no personal knowledge whether the paper he swore to was true or false; that it was customary for persons who had no personal knowledge of the facts, but who had received the papers as genuine, and found them correct in form, to take such oaths at the request of the owners who sent their papers by them to obtain the bounty, and that as there was no wilful and corrupt intent on the part of the defendant to swear falsely, he was not guilty of "wilful and corrupt perjury."

The United States attorney argued that the perjury consisted in the false declaration, that the paper produced was the true agreement, when it was not the agreement, and also in the defendant's positively swearing that it was the true agreement, when he knew that he had no knowledge whatever of the fact he swore to. That by such swearing he induced the collector to pay the bounty, who had testified that he could not have paid the bounty under his instructions from the treasury department, and should not have paid it, if he had known that the fishermen were not employed on shares, and that he relied on the oath of the defendant for the truth of the agreement, to which he there positively swore. The attorney requested the court to instruct the jury that if the defendant, Smith, when he positively swore that the paper produced by him was the original agreement, had no knowledge that it was the agreement, and knew that he had no knowledge of the fact to which he made oath, then he knowingly and wilfully swore to a false declaration. And to this point, he cited 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 69, § 6; 2 Russ. Crimes; and 3 Greenl. Ev.—"that it is perjury if one wilfully swears that he knows a thing to be true, which at the same time he knows nothing of, and impudently endeavors to induce those before whom he swears, to proceed upon the credit of a deposition which any stranger might make as well as he."

B. F. Hallett, U. S. Dist. Atty.
T. K. Lothrop, for defendant.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, instructed the jury that the law did not allow the fishing bounty, unless by the agreement under which the voyage was performed, the fishermen were severally to share in the bounty and proceeds of the voyage. That engaging men for so much a thousand fish caught, or hiring them by the month or season, except the cook, was not a compliance with the requisitions of the law, and no vessel was entitled to bounty, where the fishermen did not have a share in the residue of the proceeds of the voyage, in proportion to the number of fish caught. The law made it necessary, in order to obtain the bounty, that, after certain deductions from the proceeds of the fish caught, the residue should be divided among the fishermen, according to the number of fish they caught, and that five-eighths of the bounty should be divided in the same proportion. And the owner, his agent, or representative, must swear that such was the agreement, in order to get the bounty. But in order to make the offence perjury, under the statute, the jury must be satisfied that the defendant swore to a declaration, which at the time he was aware was false. To constitute the offence, it must be proved, that, in taking the oath, the defendant knowingly swore to a declaration as a fact, which he was aware was untrue. And that might be either by swearing to a fact which he knew was not true, or by swearing to his knowledge of the fact, when he knew he had no such knowledge. Rash swearing was not necessarily perjury, and the jury would inquire whether it was honestly done, or to deceive the officer and get the bounty by making a false declaration. The jury would inquire what reason the defendant had for believing that the oath he took was true. He had no participation in the voyage, and no interest in swearing falsely to get the bounty. Was the paper put into his hands as an original document, and did he receive it as such? It is in the usual form, and purported to be a genuine document. It had the genuine signatures of the master and all the fishermen, and was countersigned by the owner of the vessel. It had also the certificate of the inspector, at Provincetown, who examined the vessel before she went on her voyage, and the oath of the master of the vessel before the deputy collector, on her return, that it was the actual agreement for the voyage. Taking the position in which the defendant stood, did he honestly and in good faith take the oath, or did he wilfully swear that he had knowledge of that which he was conscious at the time he had no knowledge of?

The jury retired, and after being out a few hours, came into court and requested instruction, whether the oath must be taken wilfully and with intent to defraud?

THE COURT said: "It is necessary for the jury to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, that the oath was taken wilfully and intentionally to deceive, or mislead, and that the defendant stated as true, what he knew to be false. If he had no intentions of stating a falsehood to mislead, it is not the offence charged in the indictment, there being no collusion with any officer. That it was not necessary that the defendant should have intended to defraud the government, by obtaining the bounty for a vessel which he did not think had earned it. He might believe that the vessel had been employed the full time, with the requisite crew under the proper agreement, and so was entitled to the bounty, and yet he might, under the statute, be guilty of the offence charged by swearing falsely, to induce the collector to pay the bounty."

Under this instruction the jury retired, and returned a verdict of "not guilty."

UNITED STATES v. SMITH et al.

[1 Mason, 147.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1816.

REVOLT OF SEAMEN—"HIGH SEAS"—VOYAGE WHERE ENDED.

1. An endeavour to make a revolt within the act of 30th of April, 1790, c. 9, § 12 [1 Stat. 115], is an endeavour to excite the crew to overthrow the lawful authority and command of the master and officers of the ship. It is in effect an endeavour to make a mutiny among the crew of the ship.

[Cited in U. S. v. Smith, Case No. 16,345; U. S. v. Hemmer, Id. 15,345; U. S. v. Haines, Id. 15,275; U. S. v. Seagrist, Id. 16,245.]

2. A vessel lying on the sea, outside of the bar of a harbour of the United States, within three miles of the shore, is on the high seas.

[Cited in U. S. v. New Bedford Bridge, Case No. 15,867; U. S. v. Plumer, Id. 16,056.]

3. A voyage in shipping articles from A to B, or some other port, for a cargo of salt, and return to the United States, is not ended on arrival at the first port of the United States, unless it be the port of discharge.

Indictment against the defendants [James Smith and others] for an endeavour to make a revolt in a ship on the high seas, contrary to the 12th section of the statute of 30th of April, 1790 (chapter 9).

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

George Blake, for the United States.
S. L. Knapp, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice, after summing up the facts, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:—

The language of the statute is not of very easy interpretation; and the word "revolt" has not acquired so definite a meaning, as to be free from all doubt. After the best consideration, which we can give the subject, we are of opinion, that an endeavour to make a revolt in a ship is an endeavour to excite the crew to overthrow the lawful authority and command of the master and officers of the ship. It is in effect an endeavour to make a mutiny among the crew of the ship, or to stir up a general disobedience or resistance to the authority of the officers of the ship. A mere act of disobedience to a lawful command of the officers, is not, of itself, an endeavour to make a revolt. But to amount to the offence, it must be combined with an attempt to excite others of the crew to a general resistance or disobedience of orders, or a general neglect and refusal of duty. So if there be an endeavour to usurp the command and government of the ship, by combining the crew in hostility against the master and officers, this is properly an endeavour to make a revolt. We do not mean to assert, that the offence cannot be committed, unless by an attempt to stir up a general resistance or usurpation of the authority of the officers in all cases. If the crew were to combine together to resist a single lawful order of the master, or to compel him by force to yield up his authority in a single case, and were to proceed in the execution of their purpose, all their acts, done towards its accomplishment, might perhaps be properly deemed endeavours to make a revolt. What we mean to assert is, that the endeavour to make a revolt necessarily implies an attempt to stir up others of the crew to a resistance or rebellion against the lawful authority of the master and officers; and that the offence is not committed, if the party does not attempt or endeavour to combine, or excite others of the crew, to aid in his unlawful purposes.

Another question has arisen, whether the offence if committed at all, was in this case committed on the high seas. It appears, that the vessel at the time of the supposed offence was lying outside the bar of Newburyport harbour, but within three miles of the shore. Under these circumstances we are clearly of opinion that the place, where she then lay, was on the high seas; for it never has been doubted that the waters of the ocean, on the sea-coast, without low-water mark, are the high seas.[2]

Another question is, whether the voyage was ended at the time of the supposed offence, so as to discharge the mariners from their service. The voyage by the shipping articles is, "from Newburyport to the Cape de Verd Islands, or some other port, for a cargo of salt, and return to the United States." The vessel on her return voyage anchored in the outward harbour of Boston, and was immediately ordered round to Newburyport, (the port to which she belonged,) to discharge her cargo. Upon the construction of the shipping articles we are of opinion, that the voyage did not end at the arrival at the first port in the United States, nor until an arrival at the port of discharge in the United States.

Verdict against the defendants.

[2] Quære if it be necessary to allege this offence to be committed on the high seas, as the statute does not seem to make it local? Vide the 12th section of the act of 1790, c. 9.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[2 Mason, 143.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1820.

SLAVE TRADE — INDICTMENT — SPECIFICATION OF TIME—SCIENTER—CONCLUSION.

1. In an indictment founded on the slave trade act of 20th of April, 1818, c. 86 [3 Story's Laws, 1698; 3 Stat. 451, c. 91] §§ 2, 3, for causing a vessel to sail from a port of the United States, to be employed in the trade, it is sufficient if the indictment alleges that the offence was committed after the passing of the act, at some time between certain specified days, though no day in certain, on which it was committed, is specified.

2. It is not necessary on an indictment on the same act to aver, that the defendant knowingly committed the offence.

[Cited in U. S v. Malone, 9 Fed. 900.]

3. A conclusion of an indictment founded on a statute "contrary to the true intent and meaning of the act of the congress of the United States, in such case made and provided," is good, and is equivalent to a conclusion "against the form of the statute in such case made and provided."

Indictment [against Joseph F. Smith] on the second and third sections of the act of 20th April, 1818, c. 86, against the slave trade. This case was similar in most material respects to the preceding case of U. S. v. La Coste [Case No. 15,548].

A verdict of guilty was brought in by the jury, and motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment on the same grounds as those in that case, were made by Hooper for the prisoner.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Many of the objections taken to this indictment, have been already considered in the case of U. S. v. La Coste [supra], and need not be here re-examined. Those only will be taken notice of, which apply to the second count of the indictment, (which charges in substance, that the defendant on the high seas caused a certain vessel, &c. to sail from the port of Baltimore, &c. for the purpose of being engaged in the slave trade,) and which were not discussed in the other cause.

The first exception is to a supposed repugnancy in that part of the count, which avers, that before the vessel was caused to sail, she had been fitted out, &c. for the slave trade. It is a sufficient answer, that whatever may be the force of the argument on this point, the whole averment in this part of the count is mere surplusage and unnecessary to the constitution of the offence, and therefore may be rejected as immaterial. "Utile per inutile non vitiatur."

A second objection is, that no definite time is stated in the second count, when the offence was committed, which is a fatal defect. The averment is, "that heretofore and after the 20th day of April, A. D. 1818, that is to say, at some time between the day of the month and year last mentioned, and the 12th day of February now last past," the defendant committed the offence. That the averment of a particular day, on which the offence was committed, would in this case be altogether formal cannot be doubted. It would be unnecessary to prove, that the offence was committed on that particular day, and if proved to have been committed on any other day after the passing of the statute and before the caption of the indictment, it would have justified a conviction. It is not then a case in which time is material to the constitution of the offence.

I am myself no friend to over curious and nice exceptions in mere matters of form, either in civil or criminal proceedings. They were introduced into the law in an age of subtilties and scholastic refinements; and I agree with Lord Hale and Lord Ellenborough, that they are grown to be a blemish and inconvenience in the law and the administration thereof, and that more offenders escape "by the over easy ear given to exceptions in indictments, than by their own innocence;" and that these unseemly niceties are "a reproach to the law," and have become "the disease of the law." 2 Hale, P. C. 193; The King v. Stevens, 5 East, 244, 260. Still the defendant is entitled to the benefit of these niceties, wherever the law is settled in favour of them; and it is our duty to allow them as far as they have clearly gone. But for one, I am not willing to extend them beyond the limits already assigned to them. This objection, then, is to be decided, not by the reason of the thing, (for that is against it) but by authorities. If they settle the point, we are bound by them; if they are silent, or are divided, we are at liberty to follow the dictates of common sense, and general legal reasoning.

It is a general rule, that it is necessary to allege in every indictment some time, when each fact happened, that constitutes the offence, or is material to the guilt of the party; and if no time be alleged, the indictment is bad for uncertainty; and as the statutes of jeofails do not extend to indictments, the defect cannot be amended, and is fatal. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 77; 1 Starkie, Cr. Pl. 50; 2 Hale, P. C. 177; The King v. Holland, 5 Term R. 607, 624. Hawkins says, that it is laid down as an undoubted principle in all the books, (and he refers principally to ancient authorities) that no indictment can be good without precisely shewing a certain year and day of the material facts. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 77. Staundford says, that to make a good indictment, it is necessary to put in the year, day, and place, when and where the felony was committed, and it ought to be such a day, which is not uncertain nor ambiguous. Staund. P. C. 95. Lord Hale says, touching the time, viz. the year and day, wherein the fact was committed, this is necessary to be contained in the indictment. 2 Hale, P. C. 177. If, by these expressions, it be meant, that a particular day must in all cases be alleged with certainty, the present indictment cannot be sustained, for it lays the offence only on some day between certain times. It is easy to see, why a day certain should be alleged in all cases, where it constitutes a part of the crime, or where a forfeiture of goods and chattels or lands takes effect from the time of its commission; for in such cases it is material to the party. But where the offence may be committed at any time, or, if laid on a particular day, may be proved without any substantial variance to have happened on any other day or between any given limits, it is not so easy to see the reason of such a rule. That there are exceptions to the rule, as laid down in Hawkins, and the other authorities above referred to, is unquestionable. As for instance, a negative, or omission of duty, may be set forth without alleging any time. Rex v. Holland, 5 Term R. 607, 616; Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 25, § 79. So upon informations and convictions before justices of the peace, and informations in the exchequer on penal statutes, it is held to be sufficient to allege the offence to be committed between such a day and such a day. Rex v. Chandler, 1 Ld. Raym. 581; Reg. v. Simpson, 10 Mod. 248; Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 82. What substantial difference there can be between an information on a penal statute in the exchequer, and in any other court, I profess not to know. This is certain, that in an information for any offence at common law, or upon a statute, the same certainty and precision are required as in an indictment. Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burrows, 2527, 2556; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 846; 2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 26, § 4. Mr. Starkie in his late valuable treatise on criminal pleadings asserts, that this mode of pleading has been long in use in informations upon penal statutes. And he adds, "there does not appear to be any reason, why the offence should not be so laid in indictments, where the day cannot in fact be ascertained; but it is safer to aver some day, though it cannot be proved." From these remarks, it may be inferred, that the point is not considered now to be settled in England against the same practice in indictments. There is a case in 1 Show. 389, Rex v. Roberts, which is cited by Hawkins (2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 25, § 82), where an information was for extortion by a ferry keeper, and the party was charged with having between a certain day and the day of exhibiting the information extorted of divers subjects divers sums of money exceeding the lawful rates. And it was held bad, because every several taking was a several offence; and the court said, suppose an indictment, that between such a day and such a day he beat divers of the king's subjects; this is not one complicated offence, consisting of several facts, but several offences jumbled together. Sir B. Shower, the reporter, argued the case for the defendant, and it does not appear from his report, that he took any exception to the manner of laying the time, but only to the joining of several offences in so uncertain a manner. The case is somewhat differently stated in 4 Mod. 101, for there an objection is made, that no time certain was laid, but nothing is said on it by the court. Carthew and Salkeld agree in substance with the report in Shower; and the former makes the court to say, "'tis true all informations in the exchequer are general, as this is; but the reason is, because they are for certain (meaning, I presume, several and distinct) penalties." This case, therefore, affords no authority against the sufficiency of an information laying a single offence between certain days. And if the case be supposed to decide any thing as to the allegation of time, it is directly contradictory to the authority of the case of Rex v. Lady Broughton, 2 Lev. 71, where laying the same crime at divers days and times, between such a day and such a day, was held upon motion in arrest of judgment to be sufficient. Lord Chief Baron Comyns (Com. Dig. "Indictment," G, 2) says, that on divers times between such a day and such a day is sufficient in an information, and cites this case in Levinz in proof; which shows, that he considered it good law.

The counsel for the defendant, in support of this objection as to time, cited 2 Co. Inst. 318, where it is said, that upon an appeal of murder the fact cannot be alleged to be done circa 10 diem Decembris, &c. or inter decimum et 11 diem Decembris, &c. But it is to be considered, that this doctrine is expressly applied to the case of an appeal, and upon the very terms and construction of the statute of Gloucester, which in appeals requires the day, the hour, the time of the king, and of the town, where the deed was done, to be set forth; and Lord Coke in his Commentary expressly admits, that there are diversities between appeals and indictments. See, also, 2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 23, §§ 86–88. The authority, therefore, does not come up to the point.

The case, then, now before us, does not appear ever to have been in terms decided. It is not a case, where the offence is laid on a day, which from its description is uncertain, so that it may mean either of two days, or on a future impossible day; or where one and the same offence is laid on two different days, or on days repugnant to each other. In all these cases it has been adjudged, that the defect cannot be helped by a verdict. 2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 25, § 77; 2 Hale, P. C. 178; 1 Starkie, Cr. Pl. 55, 56. Nor is it a case, where several offences have been generally laid at divers days and times, as to which there is a diversity in the authorities. The case now before us is, where a single offence is laid to have been committed between such a day and such a day, not alleging any day certain. Such an averment would be sufficiently certain in many criminal proceedings, on complaints and summary proceedings before justices, upon informations for penalties, and upon indictments for non-feasances. This is the case of a misdemeanor, as to which much less nicety in respect to time is required in the material allegations of fact, than in indictments for capital offences. 2 Hale, P. C. 178; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 221; 1 Starkie, Cr. Pl. 54; Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 25, § 77. It would seem strange, that the fact might not be laid, as it would be proved: that if the exact time were unknown, or could not be proved, it might not be so stated, or stated between such a day and such a day: that the day must be stated with certainty in the indictment, and yet a verdict finding it on another day would be good; or finding it on no day certain, as between two days, would be good. And this, though the time be admitted to be formal, and more certainty would not conduce to the relief of the defendant, or aid his defence, or narrow down the proof. In the Cases of Lowick (4 State Tr. 718) and Lord Wintoun (6 State Tr. 17, 53, 56, 57), where the subject was a good deal discussed, although the general doctrine as to certainty of time in all indictments was stated; yet the argument seemed mainly rested upon its materiality and importance in capital cases. If the present were a capital case, it would be our duty to adhere to the very letter of established doctrines in favorem vitæ. But in respect to misdemeanours, courts have relaxed much from their former strictness in construing indictments; and many exceptions, which were formerly holden fatal, would now be disregarded. 1 Starkie, Cr. Pl. 227, 228. There is no modern decision on this point. The case of Rex v. Broughton, already stated, (2 Lev. 71; Com. Dig. "Indictment," G, 2), which is recognized as law by Chief Baron Comyns, (and no better authority could be cited) has decided, that the offence of extortion laid on divers days and times between the 2d of May, 22 Car., and the exhibiting the information, was well laid, and the exception, though moved in arrest of judgment, was overruled. That case approaches nearer to this than any other case; and if sufficient in an information in the king's bench, it would be sufficient in an indictment. And the language of Mr. Starkie, already referred to, seems to justify the notion, that this exception would not now be held fatal in England, when the allegation conformed to the fact.

Upon the whole, after much deliberation, being willing to give the defendant the benefit of every legal objection; but willing also to subserve the purposes of public justice, I confess myself not satisfied, that this objection to an unexpected and unnecessary irregularity, in pleading, ought to be held or would now be held in any court of criminal jurisprudence, fatal.

Another exception is, that it is not alleged, that the defendant knowingly committed the offence stated in the second count. This is not required by the statute, and need not be averred. If he caused the vessel to sail for the purpose of being engaged in the slave trade, he must have known the act and the intent. But it is sufficient to say, that no such averment is necessary.

The last exception, which will be taken notice of, is, that the second count does not conclude against the form of the statute. The objection supposes, that these words are necessary in every indictment founded on a statute. But we understand the rule to be not exactly so. In every indictment founded on a statute. it is necessary to conclude against the statute; but though the technical words, "against the form of the statute in such case made and provided," are constantly used in all indictments, which consult accuracy and precision; yet equipollent expressions are just as sufficient in point of law. All that is required is, that some phrase should be used, which shows that the offence charged is founded on some statute. This is the doctrine heretofore asserted in this court (Smith v. U. S. [Case No. 13,122]); and it is recognized in the decisions of the supreme court of the state. The count in this case concludes, "contrary to the true intent and meaning of the act of the congress of the United States in such case made and provided." It is therefore clear, that it purports to be founded on a statute. The words, "act of the congress," are as strong and unequivocal as "statute" of the congress; and against the "true intent and meaning" of a statute, is in reality more forcible, direct and intense, than against the "form" of a statute. And this very count finally concludes after an averment, which is merely surplusage, "contrary to the form of the act of the congress of the United States in such case made and provided;" which conclusion might be applied to the whole count, if necessary, which we are decidedly of opinion it is not

The motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment is overruled.

Case No. 16,339.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[13 N. B. R. 61.] [1]

District Court, N. D. New York. 1874.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT DISPOSITION OF GOODS—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE.

1. It is not necessary that the goods which have been fraudulently disposed of shall have been obtained within three months prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, in order to convict a party of a fraudulent disposition thereof.

2. The intent of a party is ordinarily to be inferred from evidence which tends distinctly and directly to prove the intent.

3. In order to obtain a conviction for concealing assets from the assignee, it is not necessary to prove a demand on the part of the assignee.

During the months of September, October, and November, 1871, Jacob O. Smith, then doing business as a retail boot and shoe merchant at Rochester, New York, obtained upon credit about twenty-five thousand dollars worth of boots and shoes from various wholesale dealers in New York and the manufacturing towns of the East. The first notice that the creditors received of Smith's fraudulent operations was about the middle of December, 1871, when an attorney from Rochester came to New York City and endeavored to effect a compromise upon a low basis, making the usual plea of hard times and misfortune. Upon examination it was found from the books of the express and railroad companies that, during the months of October and November, Smith received a large quantity of boots and shoes from New York City and the East, and that during the time he was receiving these goods he was shipping large quantities of boots and shoes to the auction houses of George P. Gore & Co., of Chicago; Murdock & Dickson, of St. Louis; to his brother, F. H. Smith, at Chicago, to be sold at auction; to his father, I. Smith, at St. Louis, to be sold at auction; to J. O. Smith, at Lockport, N. Y., and to various auction houses in Louisville, Ky., and Cincinnati, O. It was further ascertained that the goods shipped to J. O. Smith, Lockport, were put into a store there, sold at retail for a few days, and the remainder, amounting in value to about eight thousand dollars, was sold by Smith to one A. W. Henderson on the 1st of December, 1871. For this sale Smith claimed he received from Henderson about two thousand dollars in money, and about six thousand dollars in Henderson's individual notes. It further appeared that on the 14th of December, 1871, one L. M. Farnham, of Chicago, filed a petition in bankruptcy against Smith. That Smith made the affidavit of bankruptcy admitting he was a bankrupt; and on the same day Smith's attorney consented to an immediate adjudication in bankruptcy. The proceedings in bankruptcy were probably collusive. The petition was verified by the attorney instead of the creditor; and as such a petition had then been held effective, it was doubtless a part of the plan to defeat any civil or criminal proceeding by setting up the defect in the petition. When the creditors determined to prosecute the case, they caused a new petition to be filed on behalf of James Griffin, of New York, and then had Smith indicted for disposing of his goods with intent to defraud, and for concealing his assets. The defect in the petition was the main reliance of Smith's counsel upon the trial, but the court held that Smith's admissions in the affidavit of bankruptcy, and a recent decision of the circuit court, were conclusive against the defendant.

Richard Crowley and Charles M. Dickinson, for the United States.

George Gorham and Mr. Tourtelotte, for defendant.

HALL, District Judge. Whatever may be your final verdict in this case, I am sure you will agree with me in the feeling, that it is a case which deserves your most careful and serious consideration. The charge against the defendant is one of a serious character, and the punishment, if he is convicted, will be of sufficient magnitude to deter others, to some extent, from the commission of similar offenses. It is important to him, therefore, that he should not be pronounced guilty, and it is the duty of the jury not so to pronounce him guilty, unless the evidence in the case justifies that verdict; but, on the other hand, if he is guilty of the offense charged upon him, it is certainly the duty of the jury, as it is for the interest of the public, that they should not hesitate, if they are entirely convinced of his guilt, to pronounce him guilty. The bankruptcy act passed by congress, has for its object not only the discharge of the unfortunate, but honest debtor, from his liabilities, but it has also for its object the security of the creditor against the fraud and dishonesty of his debtor; and in pursuance of the desire and object of congress to provide securities against fraud on the part of debtors, a section was introduced into the bankruptcy act upon which the indictment in this case is found. The section contains several provisions, making several different acts criminal, and among them are two which form the basis of this indictment. There are three counts in the indictment; the first and the last count are founded upon a provision of the statute which declares that if any bankrupt shall, with intent to defraud his creditor, within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, pawn, pledge, or dispose of, otherwise than by bona fide transactions, in the ordinary course of his business, any of his goods or chattels, which have been obtained upon credit, and which remain unpaid for; he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished as provided in this section.

You will see, gentlemen, the general object of this provision. Whenever a debtor, especially a trader, is clearly insolvent, it is the object of the bankrupt act to enable his creditors to take proceedings against him, and to secure a fair and equal division of his property among them, with such preference as the act itself provides for, with the exception of such property as the bankrupt is entitled to retain under the provisions of the act. The case proceeds upon the ground that each one of the creditors is entitled to share equally; and when it has been established that the act of bankruptcy has been committed, that the party is insolvent, and that he has done something which is in violation of the act, and in violation of the rights of the creditors, proceedings may be taken against him by his creditors, he may be forced into bankruptcy, and his property then be distributed under the provisions of this act. For the purpose of carrying out this object, securing this equality among creditors, securing the proper division of the property of the bankrupt, this section, as I have stated, provides that if he shall within three months next before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, dispose of his property except by bona fide transactions, that is, transactions in good faith, and in the ordinary way of his trade—that is, the ordinary, regular, and customary mode of proceedings in his trade or business, prior to the time when he became a bankrupt—now, if he shall do this, if he shall pawn, pledge, or dispose of, otherwise than in an honest manner, and in bona fide transactions, and in the ordinary ways of his trade, any goods or chattels which have been obtained on credit, and remain unpaid for, in this way, with intent to defraud his creditors, he is guilty under the provisions of this act. It is not necessary, as has been stated to you by the district attorney, that the goods which have been so disposed of shall have been obtained within the three months next prior to the time when the proceedings in bankruptcy shall have been filed against him. No matter when they were obtained, if they have been obtained upon credit, and have not been paid for, and have been so disposed of within the three months next prior to the petition in bankruptcy, with the intent to defraud, then the offense is completed, and the defendant must be found guilty of the offense charged against him.

Of course, gentlemen, in looking at this case, you will consider what is the ordinary way of trade with the defendant, and persons transacting business of a similar character, and you must determine from the evidence whether the transactions to which your attention has been called by the district attorney, were bona fide transactions, honest transactions, transactions made in good faith, without any intent to defraud his creditors, or whether they were of a different character, and made with intent to defraud.

You have heard, gentlemen, the evidence at length upon this question; you have heard very able and full arguments from the counsel of the accused, and from the public prosecutor, and I shall not attempt to give you any instructions in regard to the evidence which has been given here, and certainly not indicate to you any opinion in regard to your duty in respect to the question of fact which has been submitted to you. The intent of a party is ordinarily to be inferred from evidence which tends distinctly and directly to prove the intent, because it is impossible in ordinary cases to prove what the intent of a party is, except by what is called circumstantial evidence. Of course, jurors have no power to look into the mind of the party to determine precisely what his intent may be; but that intent is to be inferred from all the circumstances of the case, subject, however, to this theory and presumption of law, that a man intends when he commits an act, the ordinary and usual consequences of that act, or the inevitable consequences of that act. If a man commits an act, the natural consequences of which are to defraud his creditors, the law presumes that it is done with that intent, and that presumption must be acted upon, and must prevail, unless it is destroyed by the evidence produced upon the part of the party accused.

Now, in reference to the other count in the indictment; gentlemen, that count is founded upon a provision of this section, which also makes it a criminal offense for a bankrupt to conceal from his assignee, or omit from his schedule, any property or effects whatsoever. You are, probably, aware that it is the duty of the bankrupt, in every case, whether his condition is voluntary on his part, or whether he is declared a bankrupt upon the petition of his creditors, to make a schedule and inventory, in which this property is to be described. That inventory is to be verified by his oath, and this is the schedule which is referred to, undoubtedly, in this provision of the statute. In this particular case, although the order of adjudication, being in the form prescribed by statute, required the defendant to file such an inventory and schedule, the evidence in the case is, I believe, that no such inventory and schedule has been filed, and therefore the ground on which the defendant is to be convicted under the second count, if he is convicted at all, must be upon the ground that he fraudulently concealed from his assignee, or assignees, some property or effects which belonged to him, and which should have passed into the hands of his assignee. The evidence upon that question relates almost exclusively to money which he alleges he received from Henderson on the sale of the goods in the store in Lockport. It is insisted here, by the district attorney, that upon his testimony given before the register, he stated that he received two thousand dollars as a part of the consideration for the sale of goods in that store; and that this property, as is insisted here on the part of the public prosecutor, has been concealed from his assignees; has not been turned over to them, and has not been made available.

Something has been said here in reference to a demand being necessary in order to charge the defendant under the provision of this statute. Under the evidence in this case I am of the opinion that no demand is necessary as a matter of law, in reference to the questions arising under this count in the indictment. He was brought before the register, as appears by his own deposition, and examined in reference to his property; and upon that examination it was, undoubtedly, his duty, if he had property in his hands of this description and to this amount, to disclose that fact. It is evident from the examination which was made, that this examination was had for the purpose of discovering whatever should pass into the hands of the assignees for the benefit of his creditors; and if upon that examination he willfully omitted to account for that money, if he, in point of fact, received money to the extent of two thousand dollars, and withheld it from his creditors and from his assignee, then he is liable to be convicted under the second count of the indictment. If he paid it over to his creditors, to honest creditors, and stated the fact upon his examination, then he would not be liable, under this count in the indictment, for concealing from his assignee this amount of money. If he, having this money, thus concealed the knowledge of it from the assignee, he is liable to conviction, notwithstanding that there was no demand upon the part of the assignee or receiver, or any person authorized to receive it. These are, perhaps, gentlemen, all the remarks which it is necessary to submit to you in this case. You must examine it with care. Your verdict should be the result of your calm and deliberate judgment. You should be influenced by no passion or feeling, and by no sympathy. In a case of this character the interests of the public as well as the interests of the defendant require that your verdict should be the result of your deliberation and judgment, and in accordance with your sworn duty.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[19 Niles, Reg. 319.]

District Court, D. Georgia. Dec., 1820.

PIRACY — SEIZURES DURING WAR — CONTRABAND GOODS—COMMISSION FROM GOVERNOR OF ORIENTAL REPUBLIC.

[1. The seizure of a French vessel by an armed ship whose officers held commissions from the governor of the Oriental Republic held not an act of piracy on their part, where the vessel seized was carrying arms and munitions of war to a port of the enemy.]

[2. A subordinate officer of an armed ship, acting in good faith, under a commission from the governor of the Oriental Republic, held not guilty of an alleged act of piracy against a ship belonging to a neutral, where he entered a formal protest against the act.]

[3. One making seizures of Spanish and Portuguese vessels while in command of an armed ship in the patriot service held not guilty of piracy where he acted, in good faith, within the limits of a commission from the governor of the Oriental Republic, even though it turned out that such commission was forged.]

[4. In determining whether a person was guilty of piracy in making certain seizures while serving under a commission from a foreign government, the fact that he was an American citizen, and, as such, forbidden by the laws of the United States to serve against nations with whom they were at peace, can have no weight. His violation of the laws in question would subject him to the penalties prescribed thereby, but would have no tendency to make him guilty of piracy.]

Three several indictments for piracy, under the act of congress of 1819 [3 Stat. 510] were preferred against the defendant, John Smith, and returned by the grand jury. The first indictment charges that the defendant, on the high seas, sailing in a certain vessel, called the Columbia, or Arragonta, with force and arms did piratically and feloniously break and enter a certain schooner, name unknown, property of subjects of the king of France; that the said defendant did make an assault upon the mariners of the said schooner, put them in bodily fear, and did violently, feloniously, and piratically steal, take, and carry away one four inch hawser, value twenty dollars; and one deck awning, of the value of five dollars, of the goods and chattels of persons unknown. The second indictment is the same as the first; but the piracy charged is the taking of the brig Antelope or General Ramirez, and the apparel and tackle of the value of $3,000, alleged to be the property of certain subjects of the king of Spain, to the jurors unknown. The third indictment: The piracy charged is the taking of the ship or vessel, name unknown, being the property of subjects of the king of Portugal, to the jurors unknown, and her apparel of the value of $1,000.

It appeared in evidence that the defendant acted as first officer of the patriot armed vessel, the Columbia, or Arragonta, Don Simeon Metcalf, commander, sailing under the flag of the Artigan government. That he had in his possession a commission under the hand and seal of Jose Artigas, governor of the Oriental Republic, as a captain in the naval service of the said government. That there was a commission signed by Artigas on board the Arragonta. That, after the detention of the French schooner, the Arragonta was carried into Sierra Leone by the British squadron, and there discharged. That, after the capture of the Antelope, the Columbia was wrecked on the coast of Brazil, and her commission and papers lost. It further appeared in evidence that it was the practice of Artigas to furnish his commanders with copies of commissions and general instructions to govern their conduct. That these copies were generally furnished to prize masters, endorsed by the commander. Such a copy was found in the possession of the defendant, accompanied by the usual instructions of the Artigan government. That the French schooner, which was detained one night, was bound to a port of an enemy of the government of Artigas, having on board munitions of war. That upon the detention of the said schooner, the defendant, Smith, made a formal protest against the act of the commandant, Metcalf.

The evidence also ascertained that the defendant always acted within the limits and authority of the personal commission, and the copy of the commission of the Arragonta, which were found in his possession when he was taken. It also appeared that Smith was born in the United States, but had been for three or four years past an officer in the patriot service, appointed to different vessels sailing under the flag of Artigas. The Antelope, under the command of the defendant, was afterwards taken off the Florida coast by the United States cutter Dallas, and brought into the port of Savannah. The case of the defendant was considered as if all the indictments were before the jury.

The counsel for the defendant classed the cases under two heads: 1st, the detention of the French schooner; 2d, the capture of the Spanish and Portuguese vessels. Under the first class, it was urged: 1st. That the detention of the French vessel was authorized by the commission, as the evidence ascertained that this vessel was bound to an enemy's port, having on board munitions of war. That for any excess of this authority, the defendant is answerable to his own government, criminaliter, and to persons aggrieved, civiliter, in damages. That this act, being done under a commission, cannot be piracy. 2d. That admitting the act to have been unlawful and piratical, the defendant having made a formal protest against it, and thus disclaimed the act, cannot be made answerable. Under the second class: 1st. That the defendant, Smith, is a regular commissioned officer of an independent government, at war with Spain and Portugal, and therefore authorized to make captives. 2d. That the fact of his nativity cannot alter the rights derived under that commission, so far as they are essential to the defendant on these indictments; for (1) that expatriation is a natural right, which society cannot justly restrain, and which is not impaired by the failure on the part of this government to prescribe the mode in which it shall be exercised; that, in the absence of such regulations, a compliance with the municipal regulations of a foreign country, and the acquirement of the rights of citizenship there, are an expatriation as to this country; and (2) that if the defendant is still to be considered as a citizen of the United States, and that it was therefore unlawful for him to take a commission to war against a nation with whom the United States are at peace, still such an act does not amount to piracy, because the penalty of it is prescribed by the act which renders it unlawful. (3) That if all those points are against the defendant, still if he acted bona fide, that is, within the scope of his commission, the acts imputed to him cannot amount to piracy.

THE COURT, charging the jury, considered the several points argued by the defendant's counsel, and in relation to the first act, the detention of the French schooner, recognized the principle contended for, that this detention was authorized, as the vessel had on board munitions of war, and was bound to the port of an enemy. If the act were unlawful, THE COURT said, that the defendant, by his protest, had disclaimed that act, and relieved himself from any consequences which might ensue; that to every individual who was about to commit a crime there was a locus penitentiæ, and that when such a repentant disposition appeared, no punishment would be inflicted. In relation to the commission of the defendant, from the Artigan government, and the commission of the Columbia, or Arragonta, THE COURT said that so long as the defendant acted within the limits of these commissions, in good faith, even if the papers were not in fact genuine, he could not be found guilty of piracy. That the proof of their genuineness was, under the authority of adjudged cases, sufficient at least to repel the charges of felonious intent, which is indispensable to constitute piracy; that so long as the defendant kept these as the rule of his conduct, and did not transcend the authority given by them, he was not guilty of any piratical act. The fact of the nativity of the defendant does not alter the case, for if it be unlawful in a citizen of the United States to hold such a commission as that in the possession of the defendant, a commission to war against a nation at peace with the United States, the act which makes this unlawful, prescribes the particular penalty. It cannot be piracy.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

INTERNAL REVENUE—PAWNBROKER'S TICKETS.

The ticket given by a pawnbroker under the statute of California is "an agreement or contract" within the meaning of section 170 of the internal revenue act of 1864 [13 Stat. 297].

At law.

L. D. Latimer, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Shafter, Southard & Seawell, for defendant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The demurrer in this case raises the question, whether the check or ticket given by a pawnbroker in accordance with the statute of this state is "an agreement or contract" as described in Schedule B, section 170, of the internal revenue act of 1864. The language of the schedule is, "Agreement or contract other than domestic and inland bills of lading, and those specified in this schedule, * * * five cents." The check delivered to the pawnor in this case is headed "Pawnbroker." Then follow the street and number of his shop, and the date of the loan. It then describes the property pledged, the sum loaned, with the name and residence of the pledgor. To this succeeds a memorandum as follows: "Loan for one month at ten per cent. in advance; over time, same terms. P. Smith." It will be perceived that this receipt or memorandum contains all the particulars of the contract between the parties. It is signed by the party to be charged, and distinctly sets forth the terms and conditions of the bailment. On its face it is as much a contract as a bill of lading or a warehouseman's receipt.

It is urged that inasmuch as the statute requires the pawnbroker to enter in a register book the various particulars of loans made by him, and pledges deposited with him, and to "deliver at the same time a memorandum signed by him containing a copy of the said entry; that the memorandum so delivered is not a contract or agreement, but merely a copy of an entry made in obedience to the law." The terms, "contract or agreement," as used in the internal revenue law, of course, refer not to the convention or agreement made by the parties, but to the evidence of it contained in a writing. In this sense the pawnbroker's receipt and memorandum of the date, amount and terms of the loan, and a description of the property pledged, is a contract or agreement between the parties as much as any other written memorandum which embodies and states in writing the terms of an agreement to which the parties have assented. The statute does not require merely that a copy of the entry shall be delivered to the pledgor, but that "a memorandum be delivered to him, signed by the pledgee, containing a copy of said entry." As the previous clause required that every particular necessary for the pledgor's protection should be entered in the register book, it was unnecessary to re-enumerate those particulars in the subsequent clause which describes the ticket to be delivered to the pledgor. It was, therefore, provided merely, that the memorandum should contain a copy of the entry on the register, and should in addition be signed by the pawnbroker. It cannot be presumed that by adopting this mode of specifying the contents of the ticket to be delivered to the pledgor, the legislature meant in any way to impair its availability to him, or its obligation on the pawnbroker, as a contract or agreement between the parties.

It is suggested that pawnbrokers' tickets, being in common use, would have been specifically mentioned if intended to be subjected to the 5 cent tax. There may be some force in this suggestion, but it may be that congress regarded these instruments as so clearly "contracts," as not to require specific mention; and as the amounts to which they related is usually small, a uniform tax was imposed under a general description. Whereas, in other instruments and receipts, the tax being proportionate to the sums to which they related, they were necessarily mentioned specifically.

A far stronger argument in favor of the construction adopted is furnished by the fact that the tax of five cents has been collected on pawnbrokers' checks, under instructions of the commissioner of inland revenue, since the passage of the act, and no case is reported where the collection of the tax has been disputed or resisted.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the pawnbroker's check mentioned in the declaration is a contract or agreement, and that a stamp of five cents should have been affixed to it, as required by law. The demurrer is therefore overruled.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[1 Sawy. 277; [1] 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 135.]

District Court, D. Oregon. Aug. 22, 1870.

JURY—WAIVER OF CHALLENGES FOR CAUSE—NEW TRIAL—INCOME TAX—PROFITS ON STOCKS—EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY—PERJURY—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY.

1. Where a defendant is informed by the examination of a juror that he has had a conversation with a third person about the case, and makes no challenge on that ground, but accepts the juror, he cannot afterwards object to the verdict on that account.

2. Applications for new trials on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, are liable to great abuse, and are therefore regarded with jealousy and construed with great strictness.

3. To entitle a defendant to a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, it must appear (1) that the party has discovered the evidence, or that it has come to his knowledge since the last trial; and (2) that it is so material that it would probably produce a different verdict if the new trial were granted.

4. The successive acts of congress, from that of August 5, 1861 (12 Stat. 309), to that of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 479), upon the subject of taxing incomes, construed as being in pari materia, and requiring a return for taxation as income of all gains derived from the sale of corporation stocks in 1868, if purchased at any time after August 5, 1861.

5. A bona fide exchange of stocks for other property, however much to the apparent advantage of the owner of the stocks, is not a sale thereof, from which profits are derived liable to taxation as income.

6. A transfer of stocks for a promissory note, which is collectible, or an exchange thereof for land, followed by a sale of such land within the year, for collectible promissory notes, is to be considered a sale of such stock for so much cash.

7. Although the affidavit of a party to his income return be false, he cannot be convicted of perjury thereon, unless it was made with a corrupt intention, and therefore, if such party, as a matter of law or fact, honestly believed that he was not bound to return any profits from the sale of stocks, for taxation, then, although he was mistaken and his affidavit in this respect false, he cannot be convicted of perjury.

8. The tax upon incomes is both just and expedient, and the objection that it is inquisitorial applies with equal force to the state law which provides for imposing a direct tax upon all the articles of property of which a person is possessed.

9. Upon an indictment for perjury, whether the oath was knowingly and corruptly false, is a question for the jury, and the court will not set aside their verdict thereon, unless it is clearly against the weight of evidence.

10. Although the act imposing a tax upon incomes (14 Stat. 479) makes no provision for compelling a person to make oath to his return of income, yet it permits him to do so, and if he avails himself of the privilege, and intentionally swears falsely, he is guilty of perjury. 13 Stat. 239.

11. The profits made upon a sale of stocks in 1868 were taxable as income for that year, without reference to the year in which the increase in the value of the stocks occurred, so that it was subsequent to the act of August 5, 1861 (12 Stat. 309), imposing a tax on incomes.

12. Whether a false oath was taken under mistake as to the law or fact involved therein, is a question of fact for the jury.

13. A new trial will not be granted upon the ground that the evidence of a witness took the party by surprise, unless it appears that such surprise is in no degree attributable to the negligence of such party.

14. The circumstances under and for which perjury was committed, considered with reference to the punishment proper to impose upon a party convicted thereof.

On August 6, 1869, the defendant [William K. Smith] was indicted for the crime of perjury, in swearing to his income return. 4 Stat. 118; 12 Stat. 309. The indictment alleged in substance and effect that the defendant on March 22, 1869, made an affidavit before the assistant assessor of the Fourth division of the district aforesaid, that a certain statement then made by him contained a full, true, particular and correct account of defendant's income subject to income tax for the year 1868; and that he had not received, and was not entitled to receive from any and all sources of income together, any other sum for said year besides what was set forth in said statement in detail: whereas, in truth and in fact, said statement did not contain a full, true, particular and correct account of the defendant's income for 1868, subject to an income tax, and that defendant received and was entitled to receive from any and all sources together other sums and a greater sum for the year 1868, besides what was set forth in said statement in detail; and that the defendant at the time of making said affidavit and statement well knew that the same was false.

Upon arraignment, the defendant pleaded not guilty, and on August 24, and three days thereafter, the cause was tried before a jury, who being unable to agree, were discharged without giving a verdict. Thereupon, on application of the defendant, the cause was continued until the term of March, 1870, when it was again continued by consent of parties until July 12. On the last mentioned date it was tried before a jury who, on July 14, found the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and recommended him to the mercy of the court. On July 19, a motion for new trial was filed, and on the application of the defendant the hearing was continued until August 5, when it was argued by counsel and submitted.

J. C. Cartwright, for the United States.

Wm. Strong and David Logan, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. The motion for a new trial is based on the following grounds: (1) Misconduct of James Winston, one of the trial jurors. (2) Newly-discovered evidence. (3) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. (4) That the verdict is against law. (5) That the defendant was taken by surprise by the testimony of Mellen, the assistant assessor.

On the first trial, when the prosecution offered in evidence the defendant's statement of income for the year 1868, the defense objected to the proof because the assignment of perjury in the indictment was too general—merely negativing the words of the affidavit—while it should have been assigned specially upon some particular fact or matter sworn to by defendant. The court ruled that the objection should have been taken by motion or demurrer; and that after the plea of not guilty it came too late; but in order to apprise the defense of what particular fact or matter in the statement the prosecution relied upon to show the falsity of the affidavit, the court required the latter to elect and declare in what particular it expected to prove such statement false. The prosecution then elected to prove the statement false in subdivisions 5 and 13, relating respectively to income derived "from profits realized by sales of real estate purchased since December, 1868," and the "profits on the sales of gold or stocks, whenever purchased;" but in fact the evidence was confined to the matter of profits arising from the sale of stocks. On the second trial the same formal proceedings were not had upon this question, but the rule established on the first was followed without question, and the evidence of the prosecution upon this branch of the case was confined to the question of whether or not the defendant had made profits from the sale of stocks during 1868.

The statement of the defendant's income was in the usual form of blank 24, and purported to be a "detailed statement of the income, gains and profits of W. K. Smith, of Salem, Oregon, during the year 1868." The gross amount of income in currency contained in the statement was $7,617.14, which was stated in detail under the various subdivisions as follows: First—from profits in any trade, business or vocation, etc., $3,849. Third—from rents, $400. Eighth—from profits in corporation, not divided, $766.66. Tenth—from interest otherwise than on United States securities, $640. Eleventh—from salary other than as an officer of the United States, $1,861.48. The deductions amounted to $1,579.86, leaving the taxable income, returned by the defendant, to be $5,937.28. No income was returned by the defendant under the subdivisions 5 or 13.

As to the alleged misconduct of Winston, the facts appear to be as follows: Being returned on the venire to serve as a trial juror at the term at which the defendant was to be tried, he was drawn by the clerk in the formation of the jury in this case. Being sworn concerning his qualifications to sit on the jury, on examination by defendant's counsel, he stated that since he was summoned as a juror, and since his arrival in the city, he had a casual conversation with Dr. Cardwell about this case, but that he had no decided opinion as to the merits of it. The defense interposed no challenge, and after some deliberation, accepted the juror, and he was sworn. At the same time the court directed a rule to be entered and served upon the juror, requiring him to appear and show cause why he should not be punished as for contempt, on account of his engaging in conversation with third parties concerning cases pending in this court after he was summoned to serve therein as a juror. On July 16, two days after the jury had given their verdict, Winston showed cause, and answered that he had had a brief conversation with Dr. Cardwell concerning this case after he was summoned as a juror, which arose in this way: Winston stated to Cardwell that he was here as a juror and would consequently be in the city for some time, when Cardwell remarked that he supposed the Case of Smith would come up for trial. Winston replied, by asking what kind of a cause it was? Cardwell answered, that Smith was accused of making and swearing to two different income returns the same year. Winston replied that it must be some sharp practice to get rid of the income tax. Winston also stated that it was in nowise his intention to prejudice his mind in relation to this case or disqualify himself to sit therein as a juror. Upon reading the answer, the court discharged the rule on payment of the costs by Winston. If a challenge had been submitted to this juror for bias, it might have been allowed, yet it is not beyond question that it should have been. The conversation was casual, and was not introduced by the juror. He appears to be a stranger to the defendant, and an intelligent, fair man; nor is there any suspicion or suggestion that Cardwell was in any way inimical to the defendant, or that he desired to prejudice the juror against him. The information communicated by Cardwell to the juror, and upon which the latter made the remark that he did, was a very general allusion to the case, and not by any means a correct statement of the crime with which the defendant was charged, nor of the facts which constitute it. Swearing to two different income returns for the same year is not in itself a crime, though the fact may tend to convict the party of the crime of perjury in swearing to one or the other of them, if they be different in the sense of contradictory as well as distinct; nor does the remark of the juror about "sharp practice" necessarily indicate that the information then received made an impression upon his mind that the defendant was guilty or any crime—let alone that of perjury. Indeed, by the expression "sharp practice" men commonly designate acts or conduct which, although contrary to good morals or the golden rule, are not punishable as crimes by the law of the land.

But the decisive answer to the motion on this ground is, that the defendant accepted this juror with a full knowledge of the fact that he had conversed with Cardwell about the case, and had gotten some impression about it from such conversation. A party who knows of a ground of challenge, and does not seasonably take it, must be deemed to have waived it. 2 Grah. & W. New Trials, 247; Davis v. Allen, 11 Pick. 467. If the defense supposed that this impression was in their favor, as it is quite likely they did, and accepted the juror on account of it, they took their chance so far for a favorable verdict, and must abide by the result. But counsel for the defense say now, that if they had known the nature of this conversation, they would not have accepted the juror. But counsel are aware that, according to the practice of this court, the defendant was not entitled to know the particulars of this conversation nor the nature of the impression produced by it, if any. It was sufficient, if the juror disclosed the fact that he had had a conversation upon the subject, and with whom, and whether he had formed an opinion as to the guilt of the defendant from such conversation. But if this were otherwise, the defendant cannot now complain of the want of this information, because the juror was not interrogated on this point. He was only sworn to answer questions touching his qualifications, and he was not bound to volunteer information beyond the scope of the inquiries propounded to him. If the defense accepted this juror in ignorance of the nature of this conversation and the impression produced by it, this is no ground for a new trial. They were either not entitled to such information, or otherwise they neglected to ask for it when they knew of its existence. The defense, as must be presumed, supposing that Winston, notwithstanding the conversation or on account of it, was comparatively a safe juror for them, accepted him, cannot now be heard to object to the verdict on that account. In the statement of this matter in the motion, it is said that Winston swore on his voir dire, that he was an "impartial juror." This is a manifest mistake. Whether the person drawn as a juror is impartial between the parties or not, is a question to be tried and decided by the court, and not the witness. The juror was examined at some length, and the substance of his testimony was, that he had had the conversation as above stated, but had formed no decided opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant. He may have also stated that he thought he could try the case according to the evidence. Counsel sometimes ask such questions, and they are allowed to be answered because not objected to. In any event, I have no doubt that he told the truth, for he learned nothing in such conversation upon which to form any opinion as to whether the defendant was guilty of the crime of perjury. There is no reason to suspect that the juror acted from improper motives, or that any person ever sought to prejudice his mind against the defendant. It was admitted by counsel, on the argument, that the juror was otherwise an unobjectionable man, and I can see no reason to doubt that he formed and gave his verdict according to his oath, upon the testimony given him in court, and not otherwise.

Before considering specially the second and third grounds of the motion, it will be necessary to state the substance of the case as it appeared before the jury. During 1862 and 1865, and the years inclusive, the defendant became the owner of eleven shares of the Wallamet Woolen Manufacturing Company stock, at Salem, at a cost of $350 to $830 in coin per share, the aggregate cost being $7,480. Early in the year 1868, he disposed of this stock to Robert Kinney, for cash, notes and property, then valued by the parties to be worth in the aggregate $33,000 in coin; namely, cash $10,000; about ten acres of land, with grist-mill and four-mule team and wagon, at McMinville, valued at $10,500; 960 acres of land, with live stock, in Chehalem Valley, valued at $6,000; Kinney's notes, bearing interest and secured by a deposit of two shares of the stock, for $6,500. On July 10, 1868, the defendant sold and conveyed the McMinville property, except the mule team, to John Saxe for $9,500 in coin. Saxe paid $1,000 down and gave his three notes in equal sums for the remainder of the purchase money, payable in one, two and three years, with interest at one per centum per month, and secured by mortgage upon the premises. During the time the defendant owned these shares, the Wallamet Woolen Manufacturing Company paid no dividends, and the profits accruing on the stock were estimated and returned for taxation as undivided profits, as follows: For 1864 and 1866, by the company, at $2,475 and $6,238 88 respectively; and for 1865 and 1867, by the defendant, at $4,271 96 and $2,024 66 respectively. These profits are stated in currency, and aggregate $14,985 50. The statement of income for 1868 was made in currency at seventy-five cents on the dollar. Converting the first cost of the stock into currency, at this rate, gives $9,973 33. Add to this the aggregate of undivided profits which had paid taxes, gives a sum total of $24,958 83. Converting the cash, notes and property received by defendant from Kinney, at their estimated value, into currency at the above rate, gives $44,000 received for the stock. The difference between this sum and the cost of the stock and the profits which had paid taxes, is $19,041 17. This latter sum, the prosecution maintained, represented the profits which the defendant had made in 1868 by the sale of the stocks, upon which no taxes had been paid, and which he ought to have included in his return for that year.

The foregoing statements were not questioned on the trial, and I have stated them as facts established in the case. The evidence in support of them was ample and uncontradicted. The calculations were made by the district attorney and read to the jury without question on the argument, and therefore I have adopted them without verifying them.

W. A. K. Mellen, the assistant assessor for the Fourth division, including Salem, testified that the defendant, then living at Salem, on March 22, 1869, in pursuance of a notice and blank from his office, appeared before him at Salem to make his statement of income for 1868. Mellen had heard of the sale of stocks to Kinney, but was not aware of the details of the transaction, nor had he any knowledge of what the stocks cost the defendant. After the defendant had made the statement of income as above set forth, Mellen called his attention to this transfer of stocks, and told him that the law required him to make out an exhibit of the facts. Defendant said that he had returned all the income that he was entitled to, and refused to make any statement of income under subdivision 13. In the course of the conversation upon this subject, which lasted about fifteen minutes, defendant admitted to Mellen that he got $10,000 cash from Kinney, but did not inform him further as to the nature of the consideration which he received, and claimed that the transaction was a swap, and therefore no profits had arisen from it to be returned. Mellen replied, that he ought to return the shares represented by the $10,000 cash. The defendant refused to do so, and swore to the statement as above stated, without inserting any sum as profits derived from the sale of stocks.

Afterwards, Mellen gave defendant notice to appear and show cause why his statement of income should not be increased $20,000, on account of this stock transaction. In pursuance of this notice, and between April 1 and 4, the defendant appeared before Mellen, at Salem. Mellen then told the defendant that he had increased his return so as to get from him a statement of this stock transaction, and that if defendant would give witness the figures of the purchase and sale, and that made the profits less than the increase, he would reduce it. Defendant then contended that the profits on the stock had already been returned and paid tax as undivided profits of Wallamet Woolen Manufacturing Company; and said that he could not give a statement of the facts as to the cost and sale of shares, because his memorandum book was in Portland. Mellen then told him that he could appear before Mr. Frazar, the assessor at the Portland office, and attend to the matter there.

Thomas Frazar, the assessor for the district of Oregon, testified, that prior to April 10, 1869, defendant came to his office and said that he and Mellen had disagreed about his income return, and Mellen had sent him to witness' office to arrange the matter, and he wanted to make his return here, as he was coming here to live. Witness asked if defendant had any statement to make up income from? Defendant said, none. Witness asked defendant for memorandum book containing cost of stock. Defendant said he had lost it. Witness said he could not make up a return without some statement, and have to estimate return and assess penalty. Defendant said he had not a scratch of pen to tell what he gave for the stock or what he sold it for. About April 12, defendant returned and handed witness a statement in pencil writing, which was produced by the witness and read to the jury. It set forth, that defendant "sold, traded and transferred, on October 9, 1868, nine shares of Wallamet Woolen Manufacturing Company stock, the proceeds of trade used, as I remember, in payment of my liabilities in taking up a note held by Ladd & Tilton for between $4,000 and $5,000, including interest, and in paying for sawmill, etc., altogether amounting to, I think, $10,000, and real estate in Yamhill county." Then follows, to the effect, that John F. Miller had offered to trade defendant Portland property for four of his shares, and the most he could get offered for the property was $4,000. That subsequently, Miller offered to sell defendant his shares for $2,250 per share, and defendant would have taken much less for his in cash, but could get no offer. That defendant could only approximate to cost of shares: "Eight or ten shares were offered to the company before I went to California, at $1,000 per share, I think in the spring of 1863, and subsequently were purchased; and I had to take them, or a large portion of them, paying large interest until they were paid for. On the early purchases of the stock the rate of interest was high; I remember paying high interest on a large amount of money borrowed." After looking at this memorandum, witness asked defendant if he expected that witness could make up a return from that paper? Defendant said he had nothing else. Witness then told defendant that he would assist him, and asked him to state the facts from memory. Defendant then stated, that he and Miller and J. S. Smith had purchased stock whenever they could, to get control of the company, and paid from $500 to $1,250 per share. Defendant represented to witness, that while he had disposed of eleven shares to Kinney, that he considered he had only sold him nine shares, because he held the other two shares as collateral security for Kinney's note. He said these nine shares cost, in the aggregate, $8,010, or $890 apiece—and that he had borrowed money to purchase this stock and paid interest to the amount of $5,000. That he sold to Kinney, for $10,000 in cash, 960 acres of land in Yamhill county, and property in McMinnville; that the land was only worth $2.50 per acre, or $2,000 in round numbers; and the McMinnville property, $5,000—thus making the cost of the nine shares, including $5,000 interest, $13,010, and the proceeds of their sale $17,000—which left an apparent profit of $3,990 in coin. This being converted into currency at the above rate, gives $5,320. The witness made a memorandum of this statement at the time, which he produced in court and testified from. Witness testified, that at this time he was not aware that there was a mill upon the McMinnville property, but supposed, from defendant's conversation, that it was only ten acres of land; nor was he aware, nor did the defendant inform him, that it had been sold the July previous to Saxe for $9,500, as above stated. Witness then stated that he would take occasion to ascertain about the matter, and the defendant went away. Afterward, witness having ascertained that there was a mill on the McMinnville property, and also the sale of it to Saxe, and that defendant had received other property for his stocks which he had not mentioned to him, caused Assistant Mellen, on May 7, to issue and serve a notice on defendant, to appear at witness' office on May 24, and show cause why the penalties prescribed by law should not be assessed against him, for making a false and incorrect return of his gains and income for 1868.

On the same day the defendant came into the office and said: "What's the matter?" Witness said that defendant's statements were not satisfactory. Defendant said that he had made all the statements he could make. Witness then asked defendant if he was willing to make an amended return upon the basis of the statement and figures that he had given witness at last interview? Defendant said he was. Witness then took a blank and filled it up with the same sums as the first one made before Mellen, except that under subdivision 13 he inserted as profits on sales of stocks the sum of $5,320. The defendant then signed the return and swore to it; after which he said: "I suppose I may have my first return now." To which witness answered, "No—that's a record of the office." Witness then said to defendant: "What am I to think of a man who, while an officer was assisting him to make his return, would make such a false statement to him as defendant did to witness a few days before? That defendant had estimated the value of the McMinnville property to witness at $5,000, when he had sold it months before at $9,500." To this defendant made no particular reply, but left the office. Witness also stated, that in one of the conversations, and he thinks the first one, defendant claimed that the disposition of the stock was not a sale, but a trade. On the cross-examination, witness stated that he did not inform defendant at the last interview what he had learned of the sale of the McMinnville property; and that he did not do so, because he wanted to see if the defendant would swear to what he knew to be false; and also, that he had not said to Mellen that he would get defendant to sign the second return, and then prosecute him; but that he was very indignant at the time, and probably said defendant ought to be prosecuted.

Joseph S. Watt testified that he knew the 960-acre farm in Yamhill county, that defendant received from Kinney; that about two years ago, some time in 1868, the defendant wanted to sell it to him, and asked $10 per acre for it, and that at that time and since it was worth in cash $7 per acre.

William S. Ladd, called by the defendant, testified that on June 13, 1868, the defendant paid him a note of $4,000, with $104 interest upon it, and that the defendant did not pay him any other interest during that year.

John H. Hayden, called by the defendant, testified that on March 28, 1868, the defendant became an equal partner in a certain sawmill and business in the city with himself and Carter, and that the net profits of the mill for the year were $10,000 in coin, of which the defendant received about $2,500. This sum converted into currency at the above rate gives $3,333.

John F. Miller, called by the defendant, testified that in June, 1868, he offered seventeen shares of Wallamet Woolen Manufacturing Company stock to defendant for $2,250 in cash per share; that he was not able to state that there was any change in the value of shares between January and June, 1868, and that he thought the shares were worth more in 1867 than at any other time.

The newly-discovered evidence upon which the defendant asks for a new trial is set forth in the affidavit of the defendant, and the accompanying ones of S. A. Clarke, A. J. McEwan and J. S. Smith. By the affidavit of Clarke, it appears that on May 5, 1868, he was editor of the Daily Record, published in the town of Salem, and that on that day he published a paragraph concerning this sale of stock, to the effect that he had learned that the defendant had sold to Kinney eleven shares of Wallamet Woolen Manufacturing Company stock, and also six other shares to other members of the company, and that he had not got the exact terms of sale, but learned from Kinney that he had paid a little less than $3,000 per share, and that he remembered it once sold at one tenth the price it now goes. Clarke adds, that when he asked defendant about terms of sale, he confirmed what Kinney had said, and assented to the publication of the particulars by not objecting when informed of his intention to do so. By the affidavit of A. J. McEwan, it appears that on March 4, 1869, he was clerk in the sawmill of Hayden, Smith & Co., at Portland, and that on that day he wrote to defendant at Salem as follows: "Sir—The net profits of sales made from October 1, 1868, to February 27, 1869, $2,149.79. Business improves rapidly since March 1." The letter accompanies the affidavit, and the affidavit states that "it was intended by me at the time to contain a true statement of the net profits of the business of the firm" for the time specified. The affidavit of the defendant states, that until after May 7, 1869, he believed that Saxe was not personally bound to pay the notes given by him for the McMinnville property, and that he could only look to the property for payment, and that he did not believe that the property "was available" for the security of more than $5,000 or $6,000, and that he knew no better until informed by J. S. Smith, after May 7, aforesaid, that Saxe was personally liable upon the notes. The affidavit of J. S. Smith states, that he is an attorney and brother of the defendant, and that shortly after his return from Washington, in July, 1869, defendant expressed great anxiety for fear he would have to take back the McMinnville property at a loss, and evidently labored under the impression that the only security he had for the payment of the purchase money was the property itself, and feared that Saxe, after keeping it a year or two, would return it in such a condition that he could not realize the purchase money from it. That affiant then assured defendant that Saxe was liable, as well as the property, for the money; and from the surprise and gratification then manifested by defendant, he is well satisfied that up to that time defendant had been laboring under the impression that the property was all the security he had, and that he could not realize the balance of the purchase money from it. Defendant, in his affidavit, states, that he was not aware of the materiality of any of these facts until since the trial, when he communicated them to his counsel for the first time.

To be entitled to a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, the party must satisfy the court that the evidence has come to his knowledge since the trial—that he has discovered it. Grah. & W. New Trials, 1021. Now, it is manifest and practically admitted that these facts were within the knowledge of the defendant before the first trial—in fact, ever since they occurred. It matters not that the defendant did not communicate them to his counsel, because they must have been discovered since the trial by the party, and not his counsel. Id. 1093. If this were otherwise, a party might always secure to himself a new trial by withholding from his counsel some material fact until after a verdict had gone against him. Applications for new trials upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence are liable to great abuse, and are therefore regarded with jealousy and construed with great strictness. Id. 1021. Indeed, I cannot but express my surprise that counsel could consent to maintain before a court that this was newly-discovered evidence.

Again, if the evidence were newly discovered, the court must be satisfied, before granting a new trial, that it is so material that it would probably produce a different verdict if the new trial were granted. Id. 1021. Now, none of this evidence bears directly upon the main question tried by the jury—the willful falsity of the oath of March 22—upon the point, whether the defendant made any profits, or not, in 1868, from the sales of stock, whenever purchased. The evidence of Clarke upon this question amounts to nothing. If anything, it proves, that on May 7, 1868, both the defendant and Kinney admitted that there was a sale of eleven shares of this stock for nearly $3,000 per share, although on the trial there was a weak attempt to prove that it was an exchange of stock and property at fictitious values. The paragraph from the Daily Record discloses no details of the stock transactions of the defendant except the sale of eleven shares at $3,000 per share. Now, Mellen testified on both trials, that he had heard of the sale. But when defendant said it was a "swap," he wanted to know the details as to what property he got for the stock, and more than all, what he gave for it. It cannot be pretended that there is any information in the paragraph upon these subjects, and these are the details that Mellen professed to be ignorant of, and tried in vain to get the defendant to inform him concerning. Indeed, on the principal point—the cost of the stock—the defendant professed to be ignorant himself. And again, if Mellen knew all about the purchase and sale of the stock, I am at a loss to conceive how that excuses or justifies the defendant for committing a mistake or falsehood in stating his income.

Before noticing specially the evidence of McEwan, it must be stated, that Mellen testified that defendant, after returning or stating the items of salary, rent and undivided profits, proposed to return a gross sum under subdivision 14, of either $1,700 or $1,170, and that he objected, and said it must be "itemized," whereupon defendant said it was for interest received and the profits of a sawmill in Portland. Mellen then took a piece of paper down that had been sent him from the Portland office, showing the profits of that mill—the mill of Hayden, Smith & Co.—when defendant substituted that statement for his, and entered it in subdivision 1. It is probable that defendant had the letter from McEwan in his hand at the time. On the first trial, Mellen swore that defendant took a paper from his pocket on which he thought he had amount of profits of Portland mill. On the second trial, his attention was not called to it, and he omitted to mention it. The defense, with the consent of the prosecution, examined Hayden as above stated, to show the true profits of the mill, and that the defendant had returned more under that head than he was entitled to, and therefore it was not likely that he intended to defraud the government in the matter of the sale of the stock. But it appearing from the testimony of Mr. Hayden that the defendant's share of the profits of the mill was $3,333, in currency, a sum larger by nearly fifty per cent. than the largest sum which the defendant proposed to return as profits from mill and interest both—that is, $1,700 coin, or $2,226 currency, counsel for the prosecution argued to the jury, that upon the testimony introduced by the defendant, it appeared that he had attempted to return his mill profits much below the true figure, and therefore it was not unlikely that he would attempt to defraud the government out of the tax upon the profits on sale of stock. The evidence of McEwan is intended to show that the defendant, in offering to return $1,700 for mill profits, was acting upon information derived from the clerk, and therefore, that although the information proved incorrect, the defendant was not intending to make an incorrect return in this respect. This letter gives the profits of the mill for the last three months of the year for which defendant was making return, and the next two months of the following. The fact can hardly be overlooked by the court, on a motion for a new trial, that this is the season of the year when sales of lumber are smallest and monthly profits least. How did McEwan come to write this letter? At the request of the defendant most likely. Why did the defendant seek this partial and incomplete information, upon which to make his return of profits; or, if he came by it casually and for another purpose, why didn't he write to his clerk and get a complete statement of the profits for the nine months of the year during which he was a partner, and for which he was making a return? Men have no more right to guess under oath, when making a statement of income, than on the witness stand in court.

I see no reason to believe that if this letter had been before the jury, that it would have benefited the defendant. The facts contained in it, and the circumstances surrounding it, are ambiguous and as easily resolved against the defendant as for him. At that rate, his share of the profits for nine months was only $1,189.79, when in fact they were $2,500; and this fact had been ascertained and declared in the partnership, and Mr. Hayden had made his return for his portion accordingly to the Portland office. Is it likely that a jury would believe that a man of defendant's shrewdness and concern for his own affairs, was unaware of the real profits of the mill for 1868 at the time he made his return to Mellen? I think not. It must be admitted that the circumstances of the gross discrepancy between the sum proposed to be returned by defendant as mill profits and interest, and the true amount of mill profits, as shown by Mr. Hayden's testimony, may have had some weight with the jury, and helped their minds to the conclusion that the defendant was capable of deceit, and disposed to act disingenuously throughout the transaction. But it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to complain of this result. The question at issue was the truth of the return as to the profits on the sale of stock, and not as to the mill profits. But the defendant thinking to get some advantage before the jury, offered the testimony of Mr. Hayden upon the latter point. The prosecution consented to its introduction, and if the result has been to the prejudice rather than the benefit of the defendant, he must submit to it.

As to the evidence of Mr. Smith; what the defendant said the McMinnville property was worth, was not the question before the jury, but what did he realize from it? Yet, the defendant having deliberately stated to Mr. Frazar in May, 1869, that it was only worth $5,000, and at the same time having sworn to a statement of income based upon the same value, when the fact was, he had sold the property, without the four-mule team, ten months before, for $9,500, the impression made upon the jury by these facts must have been against the defendant's veracity and the integrity of his intention. Would Mr. Smith's testimony probably change that impression upon another trial? He may be well satisfied, as he says, that his brother was honestly of the opinion that this property was not worth more than $5,000, and that he had no security for the remainder of the purchase money except the property, and therefore his notes were of no greater value than that sum. But to say the least of it, it is a very improbable story, and one that it cannot be presumed would outweigh in the minds of an intelligent jury the well established facts to the contrary.

It seems very strange that any man in this country, of common sense and the most limited experience and observation, should not have known that the maker of a promissory note is personally liable for its payment, although it may be also secured by mortgage; particularly, when it is remembered that the statute of the state expressly provides that the maker of such note shall be so liable in case the proceeds of the mortgaged property is not sufficient to discharge the debt. Code Or. 251–253.

As to the value of the property, it is not pretended that any person can be found who will swear that it was worth materially less than the defendant sold it to Saxe for. Nothing of the kind was offered on the trial. The value of the property now and at the time the oath was taken is a subject upon which there is abundant testimony in the neighborhood of McMinnville. If the defendant had any good reason for believing or asserting that the property was only worth $5,000, other persons would have substantially coincided in that opinion and supported it by their testimony, if called upon. Mr. Saxe was upon the witness-stand and appeared to be a sensible, shrewd man. It is not likely that he would purchase a piece of property not worth more than $5,000 for $9,500, and pay $1,000 of that sum down. In corroboration of this opinion it may be observed he appears to have prospered by the purchase. He paid the first note when it became due on July 10, 1869, before the first trial, and probably before the conversation between Mr. Smith and defendant, in which the latter is alleged to have expressed his fears that the property was not sufficient security for the money due, and that he was afraid he would have to take it back. It is also fair to presume that the second note was paid before the second trial. Mr. Saxe did not so state, but he was not asked the question. The defendant knew whether he had or not, and if he had not, would have shown it. Indeed, taking everything into consideration, there is not a single reason to believe, or even suppose, that this property was not ample security for the sum of Saxe's notes—$8,500—when the defendant made this oath and since.

Although, as has been shown, the court is not authorized to grant a new trial on account of this evidence because it is not newly discovered, but was known to the party before the trial, yet if this were otherwise, this examination of it shows that it is not a sufficient ground for a new trial, because it does not appear to be so material that it would probably produce a different verdict if the new trial were granted. Indeed, I think that the impression of the defendant was almost, if not altogether, correct, that these matters were not material, and therefore he did not communicate them to his counsel before trial.

Before proceeding to consider whether the evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict, it will be proper to state the substance of the charge to the jury upon the questions of law involved in the verdict. The court instructed the jury in substance and effect:

I. That the acts and amendments thereto upon the subject of assessing and taxing incomes, namely, the act of August 5, 1861; July 1, 1862; June 30, 1864; March 3, 1865, and March 2, 1867, were acts in pari materia, or upon the same matter, and to be considered as one continuing and continuous act, and that therefore the defendant was bound to state and return for taxation as income all gains and profits derived from the sale of stocks in 1868, whenever purchased, so that they were purchased since August 5, 1861; and that by the terms of said acts and amendments thereto, a tax was imposed upon all gains, profits or income derived from any source whatever, unless specially excepted, and that therefore all gains and profits derived from the sale of stocks was taxable as income, whether such gains and profits were specially mentioned therein as being subject to taxation or not.

II. That the jury were first to inquire whether the affidavit of March 22, 1869, was false or not in the particular alleged; that is, had the defendant derived any gains or profits from the sale of stocks in 1868, which were taxable as income. That a mere exchange of property, as of the Wallamet Woolen Manufacturing Company stock for land or other property, was not a sale of stocks, from which profits were derived to be returned for taxation as income; because, although it might appear that one party or the other had gained by the exchange, that is, got property of greater value than what he gave cost him, yet this apparent gain might turn out otherwise, and is not realized until the property obtained is converted into cash or its equivalent. That these remarks must be understood as applying only to the case of an actual exchange of property in good faith. But where the parties to a transaction which is in fact a sale, attempt to clothe it with the forms and give it the appearance of an exchange, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of taxes on the profits derived therefrom by either party, the jury would be authorized to look through this disguise and deal with the matter according to the fact. That the estimated profits on the defendant's stocks for the years 1864–5–6–7, upon which the defendant, or the Wallamet Woolen Manufacturing Company for him, had paid income tax as undivided profits, was not liable to taxation again upon the sale of the stocks, and therefore the defendant was not bound to state the amount of such estimated profits in his return for 1868. But a transfer of stock, for which the seller takes a promissory note, is to be considered a sale for cash, provided the note is good and collectable, and an exchange of stocks for land, followed by a sale of the land within the year for cash or good and collectable notes, is to be considered as a sale of stocks for so much cash.

III. Apply these rules to this transaction. For instance, it appears that the defendant received from Kinney, for eleven shares of stock, property, notes and cash, valued by the parties at $33,000 in coin. Deduct from this, $6,000 for the 960-acre farm, which was only an exchange of property, and also $1,- 000 for the difference between the exchange price of the McMinville property and what it was sold for to Saxe, which will leave $26,000. This property being sold within the year for cash and notes, was a sale, so far as the cash is concerned, and the notes also, if you are satisfied, from the evidence, that they were good and collectable, and the defendant had good reason to believe so when he made his return. The same remark is applicable to the note of Kinney for $6,500. Assuming that these notes were good and collectable, the defendant received for his stock in cash $11,000 and its equivalent, in interest-bearing promissory notes, $15,000, in all $26,000. Convert this into currency at seventy-five cents on the dollar, gives $34,666. Deduct from this $24,958, the original cost of the stock and profits which have paid taxes as undivided profits, and the remainder, $9,708, is the least sum which the defendant was bound to have returned for taxation as profits derived from the sale of stocks within the year 1868, and not having returned any sum, his oath was false. On the other hand, if you should find that those notes were not good and collectable, or any portion of them equal to $9,708 in currency, then the defendant made no profits from the sale of stocks, and therefore his oath was not false.

IV. If you find that the oath of the defendant was false, the next and most serious question for you to determine is, whether it was knowingly, willfully and corruptly so. If the oath was intentionally taken by the defendant, knowing it to be false, or having no reason to believe it to be true, and for the purpose of gaining some advantage to himself, or defrauding or injuring any other, then he committed the crime of perjury. This is peculiarly a question for the jury to decide. In passing upon it, you should carefully consider the whole conduct of the defendant and the officers before whom the proceedings took place in which the oath was taken, and the attendant circumstances as they appear to you from the testimony. If the defendant, as a matter of law, honestly believed that he was not bound to return any profits from the sale of stocks for taxation, then, although he was mistaken and the oath be false, he did not commit the crime of perjury. In other words, a party cannot be convicted of perjury when the falsity of the oath is not attributable to a corrupt intention, but to an error of judgment or a mistake as to the law or facts. Therefore, if it appears probable from the testimony that the defendant took this oath, honestly believing that the law did not require him to return any profits on the transaction in question, you should find him not guilty. But if you should be satisfied that the defendant had no reason to believe that the law did not require him to return this sale of stocks for taxation, and that his refusal to do so for the reasons then given to the assessors was a mere quibble and pretense to avoid the payment of taxes which he justly owed the government under which he has lived and prospered, your conclusion should be otherwise.

Counsel for the defendant have taken occasion to speak before you of the law assessing and taxing incomes as an unjust, harsh and inquisitorial one. It is hardly necessary for me to remark that such assertions or considerations are not to influence your action one way or the other. Courts and juries are organized and maintained to administer and enforce laws, and not to question or pass upon the policy or propriety of them. The whole people of the United States, by their representatives in congress assembled, have determined that the law taxing incomes is needful and proper for the purpose of raising revenue. There being no question as to the constitutionality of the law, it must be enforced until the law-making power determines otherwise. Besides, in my judgment, there is no tax imposed in the United States which is generally more just and expedient than the one upon incomes. It is a tax not upon unproductive property or a venture or business which may yet prove profitless, but upon actual gains—upon prosperity—upon realized wealth. True, it is inquisitorial to some extent; but so are all laws providing for the collection of revenue. No tax can be fairly and intelligently imposed in any community without special inquiry in the affairs or condition of the party to be taxed. The state law imposing direct taxes requires the individual to make a sworn statement in writing of all the articles of property of which he is possessed, subject to taxation, including money, notes, etc. The law requiring deeds and mortgages to be registered exposes the private transactions of the parties thereto to the knowledge of the public; and upon its first introduction in England, was seriously objected to on that ground.

Again, if the incidental effect of the income act is, to give to each man some general knowledge of the pecuniary affairs of his neighbor, what harm is there in it? No honest man can be prejudiced in any community by a truthful statement of his income; and if dishonest ones or shams are thereby prevented from shirking their just share of the public burdens or imposing upon the community, so much the better. The only plausible objection that I ever heard to the law, is that it has not been generally enforced. That objection can be made to all laws imposing taxes; but if juries do their duty, this one will not be more liable to it than others.

Upon the first trial I was not satisfied whether an exchange of stocks for property should be held to be a sale or not, and therefore did not pass upon the question in my charge to the jury, but instructed them as upon the second trial, that however the law should be construed upon that subject, if the defendant took the oath honestly believing that the law did not require him to return the sale, he could not be convicted of perjury on that account.

The sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict will next be considered. In the motion it is stated that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict because it "did not show that the oath was false; or if false, that it was knowingly or corruptly taken." The falsity of the oath is a plain question of fact. It seems to me that there can be no two opinions about it, and that it was false beyond a doubt or peradventure. Notwithstanding this, the defendant may have taken the oath innocently and without committing the crime of perjury. That depends upon whether it was knowingly and corruptly taken. This is a question of intention, and belongs almost exclusively to the jury to determine. Its determination involves the questions of what facts and circumstances were proven in the case, and what were left doubtful, the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given to their testimony and the inferences to be drawn from particular facts, acts and omissions. A court is not justified in setting aside any verdict unless it be clearly against the weight of evidence, and upon such a question as this, it must be manifest from all the evidence that the verdict is not right, before it ought to be set aside. Grah. & W. New Trials, 1239. It is not necessary in passing upon this motion to express an absolute opinion upon the question of the defendant's intention in this matter. Suffice it to say upon this point that in my judgment the weight of evidence is with the verdict.

The conduct of the defendant in the transaction, in most particulars of importance, was disingenuous and does not indicate integrity of purpose. For instance, if he had honestly thought for any reason that he was not bound to return this sale of stocks in his statement of income, how easy and natural it would have been for him, when asked about it by the assessor, to have candidly stated all the facts and given the reason for his opinion, and adhered to it until he learned better. Instead of this, he refused to disclose almost everything about the transaction. He asserted, and continued to assert, that he did not know what his stock cost—a matter which it was his business to know, and which the prosecution had no difficulty in proving; and finally, when he gave Mr. Frazar the cost, as the testimony shows, he stated it far above the fact. At first, he gave as a reason for not stating the matter in his income return, that it was a "swap" or trade. At the next interview with Mellen, nothing is said about its being a "swap," but he asserted that the gains, if any, had already paid tax as undivided profits—an assertion which, as the testimnoy shows, was materially untrue. When driven by the fear of penalties and increased income to submit to make a statement of the transaction to Mr. Frazar, he deliberately asserted that the 960-acre farm was only worth $2.50 per acre, when it was valued in his trade with Kinney at $6,000; and when he had asked Mr. Watt $10 per acre for it, and when it appears from the uncontradicted and every way credible testimony of Mr. Watt, that in 1868, and since, the property was worth at least $7.00 per acre, or $6,720; also that the McMinnville property was worth only $5,000, not disclosing the fact that there was a valuable grist-mill upon the land, situated in one of the best and most convenient wheat regions in the country, and directly concealing the fact that in his trade with Kinney it and the mule team were valued at $10,500, and that he had sold it without the team ten months before to Saxe for $9,500—$1,000 of which was paid down; and last, but not least, to save the payment of penalities, without any apparent change of opinion in the premises, he consented to, and did, make oath to the second return of May 7, which was not only itself false as to the profits on the sale of stocks, but in direct contradiction of the oath to his first return upon this point.

There is nothing of importance in the evidence to counteract the force of these and other like circumstances which tend to show that the defendant was not very scrupulous about the truth, and that he intended to obtain some advantage to himself by avoiding the payment of taxes due the government. The weight of the evidence is with the verdict, it was technically sufficient, and as the court cannot say that it was wrong, it must not be set aside upon this ground.

In support of the fourth ground for new trial, the motion states: (1) That the law did not require the defendant to take the alleged oath, and that it was extra-judicial. This point was not raised on the trial, nor argued on the hearing of the motion, and I suppose counsel do not rely upon it. The answer to it is apparent. It is true that the law did not compel the defendant to take this oath. He might have allowed the assessor to make up his income from other information; but it permits the defendant to take the oath and be a witness in his own favor in the matter of ascertaining the amount of his income; but if he voluntarily avails himself of this privilege, he is bound to tell the truth—and the law declares that if he knowingly and willfully swears falsely, he shall be deemed guilty of perjury. 13 Stat. 239. (2) That the law did not require the defendant to return any income on account of the alleged sale of stocks. The questions made under this head were not argued by counsel for the motion, and I suppose were passed upon by the court in the progress of the trial and the instructions to the jury. In the argument of the motion, I understood the learned counsel to say that he regarded the instructions to the jury as correct, kind and considerate. On the trial the court ruled, as in the charge to the jury, that the acts relating to income must be considered as one act, and also that the annual gains upon the sale of stocks meant all gains realized in a given year, although they have been accumulating by the increase in the value of the stocks for many years—at least since 1861, while counsel for defendant maintained that the annual gains meant only the appreciation or increase in value for the year in which the sale occurred, and for which the income was returned. These and the foregoing are the principal rulings and instructions which may be said to constitute the law of the verdict, and I have heard nothing to make me doubt their correctness. All those which might be said to affect what is sometimes called "the justice of the case" were in favor of the defendant. (3) That it appeared from the testimony that the alleged offense was a mere misconstruction of the law. Whether it was a mere mistake or misconstruction of the law is a question of fact, and not of law. The court submitted the question to the jury, and instructed them that if they found the oath was false, but that the falsity was attributable to a mistake of law or fact and not to a corrupt intention, they should acquit the defendant. The jury having found the defendant guilty, by their verdict, in effect say that the testimony satisfied them that the offense was willful and corrupt perjury, and not a mere misconstruction of the law.

The fifth and last ground of the motion is the allegation of being taken by surprise in the testimony of Mellen, that he did not on March 22, 1869, know the details of the transfer of stocks by defendant to Kinney. Courts interfere with verdicts upon this ground with great reluctance. If the surprise was owing to the least want of diligence, the applicant will be without sufficient excuse, and his motion will be denied; and it has been held that a party moving for a new trial on the ground of surprise, must show that the contrary would be proved on another trial. Grah. & W. New Trials, 876, 963, 969.

Now, nearly a year elapsed between the first and second trials of the defendant, and the testimony of Mellen upon this point was substantially the same each time, so there could have been no surprise on this head at the second trial; and if the defendant was able to prove the contrary, it was his own fault that he did not do so at that time. Besides, it is difficult to perceive how the proof of Mellen's knowledge of these details would aid the defense. It is the defendant who is supposed to have concealed the facts of the transaction, and not Mellen. Again, the details that Mellen said he was ignorant of, and which he tried to obtain from the defendant, were principally the cost of these shares and what property or consideration the defendant got for them from Kinney. Now, the affidavit of Clarke does not disclose that any of these details were ever published in the Record; besides, there is no evidence that Mellen ever saw the Record, or read the paragraph.

The motion must be denied. In coming to this conclusion, I have not overlooked the fact that the defendant is a man of means and position in this community, and that he has been able to bring to his aid to assist him in his defense all that these advantages will command, including able and experienced counsel; that nearly a year elapsed between the first and second trial, which enabled the defendant to know and prepare to meet not only the accusation against him, but the particular testimony in support of it. It is not likely that any new fact that is material would be established on a third trial, or that another jury would come to a different conclusion from the last one upon the same testimony.

The district attorney then moved for judgment. The court pronounced sentence upon the defendant as follows:

Sentence of the defendant: "William K. Smith: You have been accused by the grand jury of this district of the crime of perjury, and after a fair and impartial trial, in which you had every facility to prepare your defense, and every assistance that could be rendered you by learned and able counsel, you have been found guilty by the trial jury. The question of your intention in taking what appears to have been a false oath, belonged to them to determine. Their verdict against you, although it is possible it may be incorrect, establishes your guilt before the law, and makes it the duty of this court to ascertain and impose upon you the punishment which your crime deserves 'according to the aggravation of the offense.' The act of congress declares that upon conviction of perjury, the person convicted shall 'be punished by fine not exceeding $2,000, and by imprisonment and confinement at hard labor not exceeding five years, according to the aggravation of the offense.' It will be seen in the matter of punishment that much is left to the discretion of the court; and this is so, because of the great difference in the circumstances and ultimate end under and for which perjury is and may be committed. The person who as a witness maliciously swears falsely, with the intention of convicting another of a capital offense, is the worst and most dangerous species of a murderer. Between this and the case of one who swears falsely to save or gain a few dollars in a legal controversy, so far at least as the welfare of society is concerned, there is a wide difference. Yours is a case, where so far as the court can know, the motive was to avoid the payment of $400 or $500 taxes to the national government. The lax state of morals in this and other American communities, which excuses, if not encourages, persons to avoid the payment of taxes justly due the national, state and municipal governments, by the use of means which would be considered dishonest between man and man, may have had much to do with the commission of this crime by you. For these reasons, and particularly on account of the recommendation of the jury, I shall make your punishment lighter than I otherwise would. I sentence you to pay a fine of $1,000, and to be imprisoned in the county jail of Multnomah county for the term of one day; and it is also ordered and adjudged that the United States have judgment for such fine, and costs taxed at $500, and that you stand committed to the jail aforesaid one day for every $2 of such fine and costs, or until the same are paid."

Case No. 16,341a.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

SAME v. OGDEN.

[3 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 100.]

Circuit Court, D. New York. April, 1806.

INDICTMENT—PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

[It cannot be pleaded in abatement to an indictment that it was founded on illegal testimony introduced before the grand jury.]

At law.

[Pleas in abatement to indictments of defendants, under Act June 5, 1794, § 5 (1 Stat. 384), for misdemeanors in beginning, setting on foot, and providing the means for, a military expedition against dominions of a foreign power, with which the United States were at peace. Preliminary to the finding of the indictment, Ogden's sureties surrendered him in court, and were discharged from their recognizance, and defendant was committed to the custody of the marshal of the district. Defendant's counsel prayed the allowance of a habeas corpus, which was granted instanter, and moved that defendant be discharged from the custody of the marshal, which motion being denied after full argument, it was ordered that defendant stand committed, and recognizance was entered into for his appearance in the sum of $10,000. A motion by defendants' counsel that certain examinations and depositions of Ogden and Smith, taken before Judge Tallmadge, be suppressed, and not permitted to go to the grand jury or otherwise used, on the ground of their having been improperly and illegally taken, was denied. Thereafter, and on April 7, 1806, the grand jury presented separate indictments against Ogden and Smith, in several counts, which charged them on January 10, 1806, with beginning, setting on foot, and providing the means for, a military expedition against the territory of the king of Spain, with whom the United States were then at peace. Defendant Smith being called on to appear and answer, his counsel produced a certificate from the sheriff of the county, stating that he was in his actual custody at the suit of John Donaldson on a ca. sa. for a certain sum, and at the suit of John Livingston on a cap. ad resp. for a certain other sum, and was released on a prison's bound bond. The sureties on his recognizance being discharged, the district attorney moved that a bench warrant be issued to the marshal to bring in the body of defendant instanter. The marshal returned to such warrant the certificate of the sheriff of the county, that defendant was a prisoner in his actual custody by virtue of a cap. ad sat., issued out of the state supreme court, and he certified to the same fact himself. Such return was not considered sufficient, and the marshal was ordered to bring in the body of defendant, as directed. The allowance of a habeas corpus ad testificandum was prayed by the district attorney, and defendant Smith was brought into court by the sheriff upon such writ, and the marshal made return that defendant was in his actual custody, being taken into court. Thereupon the district attorney moved that defendant Smith be arraigned on his indictment. This motion was opposed by defendant's counsel, on the ground that, being brought into court upon such habeas corpus to testify in behalf of the United States on the indictment against Ogden, and said Ogden not having pleaded to said indictment, such habeas corpus was an abuse of the process of the court, and that the arrest of the defendant by the marshal in the circumstances was illegal, and that defendant ought to be discharged therefrom. The court held that said Smith could not be arraigned on his indictment until he was disposed of as a witness, for which he was brought into court. The district attorney thereupon stated that he did not want said Smith's testimony at such time, and prayed that he be ordered to plead to his indictment. Defendant, being ordered to plead to such indictment, filed a plea in abatement, verified by affidavit. Defendant Ogden also filed a similar plea in abatement, such pleas being substantially as follows:]

That the grand jury by whom the bill of indictment was found, previously to the finding thereof, had before them illegal testimony, and such as, by the laws of the land, ought not to have been before the said grand jury previously to their finding the said bill of indictment; and that the said defendant, on the first day of March last past, was arrested by virtue of a warrant issued by the Honorable Matthias B. Tallmadge, Esq., district judge of the United States for the district of New York, and thereupon carried before the said judge, and was then and there sworn and examined by the said judge touching the supposed offences charged in the said indictment, and was then and there illegally, and against his will, forced and compelled by the said judge to answer certain questions touching the said supposed offences, in the said indictment contained, which said examination and deposition of the said defendant were reduced to writing by the said judge, and the said defendant was then and there by the said judge illegally, and against the will of him, the said defendant, compelled to sign the same, and to swear to the same as the same were so reduced to writing and signed, and that the deposition in writing of one (the defendant in the other cause) taken before the said Honorable Matthias B. Tallmadge, Esq., in the absence of the said defendant, together with the aforementioned illegal deposition and examination of him the said defendant, were, before the said indictment was found, illegally laid before, and were before the grand jury, who found the said bill of indictment, and this he is ready to verify, &c.

After these pleas had been filed, the district attorney prayed time until the next day to consider what measures he should adopt, which was immediately granted by the court, without any opposition on the part of the defendants. On the next day, the district attorney filed his demurrers to those pleas; and the counsel for the defendants prayed time to join in demurrer till the next day, in order that they might be prepared for the argument.

The discussion relative to postponement of the argument on the demurrer was then renewed. Mr. Emmet stated, that from the nature of the facts set forth in the pleas, he had rather expected the district attorney would have taken issue on them, than admitted them by demurrer; that therefore the whole of his attention, and he believed also of that of his associate counsel, had hitherto been directed to the best manner of supporting the plea before a jury; that therefore the demurrer was a surprise upon him, and he was not prepared to argue it, except on the general principles which first suggested to the defendants' counsel the propriety of the plea. He observed further, that no objection had been made to indulging the district attorney with time for consideration yesterday, because the pleas were probably not expected by him; and there was no wish on the part of the defendants' counsel to obtain an advantage by surprise.

THE COURT then observed, that if the defendants' counsel were really unprepared, they should be indulged with time till the afternoon, but no longer; and at half past twelve adjourned till three o'clock.

The sitting of the court being resumed, the district attorney began by stating some formal objections to the plea, which it is unnecessary to mention here, as the judgment of the court was founded exclusively on the general objection on the merits, that no such plea would lie. On this general question, he argued, in support of the demurrer, that this plea was a perfectly novel experiment, for which no precedent or authority could be found. This very novelty was conclusive evidence that it would not lie; for otherwise it is inconceivable that it should not have been made use of before now. It manifestly appears, from the silence of all the elementary writers, that there can be no such plea in abatement. Lord Hale (2 Hale, P. C. c. 30, p. 236) details all those pleas, among which such as this is not to be found. They are, according to him: 1st, such defects as arise upon the indictment itself, and the insufficiency of it; 2d, such defects as are in matters of fact, as misnomer or false addition of the prisoner; and 3d, by matter of record. The acts of grand juries are not to be brought into court, and questioned in this way; they are independent and irresponsible; they judge for themselves of the testimony upon which they ought to find indictments, and no one has a right to inquire; nor has he, without a violation of the grand juror's oath, the means of knowing what evidence they may have had before them. No injury can result from this; for it is the duty of the grand jury to decide on ex parte evidence; and if they decide wrong, or prefer a false charge, the natural and the only remedy is, that the accused will be acquitted on his trial before the petty jury. The object of the grand jury is only to judge whether there is probable cause for putting a party to answer a charge. and therefore it should not be bound down to the same strictness of investigation as the tribunal which is ultimately to decide upon the charge. The counsel for the defendant have probably been led to adopt this step by Dr. Dodd's Case, 1 Leach, 155: but in truth it is an argument against them, for it is no precedent of a plea in abatement. If such a plea would have lain, why was it not adopted in that case? On the contrary, the matter there submitted to the court was laid before it on a summary application; which clearly shows that the prisoner's counsel had no idea it could be taken advantage of in any other way.

The defendant's counsel replied as follows: Among the authorities cited on the opposite side is the arrangement in 2 Hale, P. C. c. 30, p. 236, of pleas in abatement of the indictment; and from the circumstance that a plea similar to that now under discussion is not found there, it is inferred, that no such plea can exist. But it appears that Lord Hale's arrangement has not been very accurately examined. He classes those pleas as follows: 1st, on such defects as arise upon the indictment itself and the insufficiency of it; 2d, such defects as are in matters of fact, as misnomer or false addition of the prisoner; and, 3d, by matters of record. Now, we do not see why our plea does not come under the second of those heads; for it is a mistake to confine that head merely to misnomer or false addition of the prisoner. The arrangement comprehends pleas from such defects as are on the face of the indictment itself, which perhaps more properly ought to be called demurrers; 2d, such as arise from matters dehors the indictment in pais; and, 3d, from matters dehors the indictment of record—comprehending every possible matter that can arise. Is not the circumstance alleged in our plea, that illegal evidence has been offered to the grand jury, if it be true, matter of fact, and dehors the indictment? And does it not exactly class itself under the second head of Lord Hale's arrangement? If it does not, and that head must be considered as comprehending only the two cases that appear to be mentioned, merely for the purpose of illustration, then his classification is insufficient; and in proof of that assertion we specify a plea in abatement unquestionably good, which is equally excluded from his arrangement. This is to be found in Browne, Abr. tit. "Indictment," 2: "Note, that where a man is indicted of felony by those, of whom part are indicted or outlawed of felony, and others acquitted by pardon, so that they are not 'probi nec legales homines,' there it was agreed, that the indictments by them presented shall be void, and the parties who are indicted shall not be arraigned on this; and note, that this matter ought to be pleaded by him who is arraigned on this indictment, before he pleads to the felony." On this quotation let it be observed for the present, that it furnishes proof of a plea in abatement arising from matter of fact, dehors the indictment, and not from misnomer or false addition of the prisoner, but from matter relative to the grand jury; and it is therefore so far precisely parallel to that before the court. Having thus endeavored to set aside the respectable authority of Hale, if it could be considered as furnishing any argument against us, let us proceed to consider the general principles on which our plea can be supported. It is a fundamental doctrine in the law, that there is no wrong without a remedy, and no right without the means of enforcing it. Apply that to the present case. Is it not a wrong to be accused and subjected to prosecution on illegal evidence; to be injured in character, in peace of mind, and in the trouble and expense of defending one's self against an indictment which by the rules of evidence and law ought not to have been found? If so, what is the remedy? Is it not the right of every man that he shall not be put to answer to an indictment, unless it shall have been found according to the rules of law? And if so, what are the means of enforcing that right? A grand jury, it is true, ought to listen only to ex parte evidence; but that should be of such a nature as would be received to support the prosecution before a petty jury, and such as, if uncontradicted and unexplained, would induce a conviction The rules of evidence, are the result of accurate reasoning, and of a strict regard to the rights of those, whose persons or property are to be affected. That reasoning is equally accurate, and those rights ought to be equally sacred, whether the investigation be before a grand or petty jury. Those rules of evidence are not the result of any statutory regulations, but are adopted on account of their wisdom, justice, and universal applicability. What is there in the nature of grand juries, in the purposes for which they were instituted, or the objects they are to attain, that ought to enfranchise them from those rules of wisdom and of justice which are also of universal applicability?

But the attorney general insists, that grand juries are independent, and irresponsible; judging for themselves as to the grounds on which they will prefer an accusation, and that no one has a right to investigate or to know what evidence they have had before them. This doctrine is broadly denied; and we do so from regard to an institution, which we have been habituated to love, and do not wish at this day to learn to detest. Grand juries are the offspring of free government; they are a protection against ill-founded accusations, and the necessity of their originating bills of indictment is supposed to be infinitely more friendly to liberty than the mode of proceeding by information; but if their powers were of such a nature as we have heard described, we should advise the friends of freedom and security to seek for the abolition of such an odious institution, and to throw themselves at once upon the mercy of the public prosecutor. What frightful privileges is it alleged to possess? Hearing only ex parte evidence, secret in its deliberations, irresponsible for its decisions, and bound in its investigatons by no rules of law! Does this fall short of what we have heard or read respecting the most despotic tribunals in the most enslaved countries? The powers which it in fact possesses, of deciding only on the evidence for the prosecution, and of keeping its deliberations secret, are in themselves sufficiently serious; but they are controlled and prevented from becoming dangerous by this, that it is bound to investigate according to the rules of law. It is at liberty to range through the wide extent of the community in pursuit of crime; but it is confined to travel in its pursuit only by the established paths of evidence. From whence too does the attorney general infer, that grand juries are irresponsible? Is it from the power anciently claimed by judges of fining them for misconduct? We do not pretend to say that such a power ought to be revised, but the frequent exercise of it in former times shows that their acts have always from the earliest periods, been considered as subject to investigation and punishment; and at this day it will not surely be questioned, that if a grand jury grossly misconducted itself from corrupt motives, the members so offending might be prosecuted by information or indictment. as is specified in 2 Hale, P. C. 159, 160; where he also mentions the 3 Hen. VII. c. 1, empowering justices of peace, oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, to impanel another inquest to inquire of the concealments of a former one, for the purpose of punishment. If they are not irresponsible, and that their acts may be inquired into, let us see whether there be any thing in the secrecy of the grand jury proceedings to prevent our being at liberty to allege that illegal evidence was offered to them. It might perhaps be advisable to ascertain with more precision than is already done in what the secrets should really consist; but without entering into any discussion of the kind, it may be sufficient to observe that although the sentiments expressed by jurors, and the facts disclosed by witnesses to them, are secrets, the names of those witnesses never can be. Those are facts which any man may learn, by placing himself at the door of the grand jury room, or by looking at the names indorsed on the bills after they are found. We may say, further, that no unlawful act done in the grand jury, is such a secret as jurors are bound by their oaths to keep. If a bill of indictment were found by less than twelve of the jury, surely no man is restrained from disclosing that. If a bill of indictment be found in another unlawful way, by the admission of illegal evidence, is that violation of law more protected by the obligation of secrecy? It would be competent to him against whom an indictment had been found by only eleven jurors, to avail himself of that fact, and to get rid of the accusation. Why is it not equally competent to the man, who is indicted on evidence which the grand jury ought not by law to have received, to insist for the same purpose on the illegality of this procedure?

We have established that grand juries are not independent of either the law or the court; let us now examine whether they are exclusively competent to judge for themselves as to the grounds on which they will prefer an accusation. To that doctrine may be opposed the well-known maxim "ad questiones legis respondeant judices, ad questiones facti, juratores." That maxim so accurately marks the distinct and constitutional provinces of judges and juries that we cannot hesitate to apply it equally to grand as to petty juries. They are each of them subordinate parts of the criminal system obviously instituted for the ascertainment of facts; and, as to matters of law, under the guidance and control of those with whom is deposited the interpretation of the law. If then it shall at any time in the course of the proceedings appear to the judges, that the grand jury are about to err, or have erred, in matter of law, in the first case the court will prevent their error, by giving them proper information; in the other case, where an error has been actually committed, the court will interfere, and prevent any injurious consequences from the mistake. Every day's experience shows us grand juries applying to the court for advice in matter of law, and the court directing them as of right, and as a part of its duty. There are two cases which immediately present themselves, and are illustrative of those two positions. In the one, the court prevented the error which the jury was about to commit; in the other, if the alleged error had been actually committed, the court manifestly would have interfered, and prevented any injurious consequences from the mistake. The first is Denby's Case, 2 Leach, 514; the other is Dr. Dodd's Case, 1 Leach, 155; and both prove that illegal evidence shall not be permitted to go before the grand jury. In Denby's Case, that body, suspecting Denby himself (who was examined as a witness before it against one Edwards) of prevaricating, applied to the court for his depositions taken before the magistrate, pursuant to the statutes of Philip and Mary. But the court refused, because while Denby could be had, they were only secondary evidence, and would be therefore illegal. The judges did not say to the jury, "You are independent and irresponsible, and you must decide for yourselves as to the grounds on which you will find indictments; therefore, as you ask for those depositions, take them, though they are not strictly legal evidence." No; their answer substantially establishes, that whatever is not legal evidence, shall not go before the grand jury, and that it is not that body, but the court, which is to decide on the legality of the evidence on which an indictment is to be found. In Dr. Dodd's Case, he stated to the court, when called upon to plead, that the indictment was found on the testimony of an incompetent witness. Did the court answer—"with that we have nothing to do; the grand jury only is competent to decide as to the evidence on which it will find indictments?" No; the judges instantly received the objection, and determined that if the grand jury had found a bill on illegal evidence, they would interfere and prevent any injurious consequences to the prisoner. The point was argued by some of the most able lawyers at the bar, and submitted to the twelve judges; and it was only because they decided that the witness was competent and the evidence legal, that the objection did not avail—from which it manifestly results, that where the evidence on which a bill of indictment has been found, is confessedly illegal, the court should interpose, and prevent the accused sustaining any injury from the error of the jury. But, says the attorney general, if a grand jury do wrong, and find an indictment on illegal evidence, the remedy and the only remedy is, that the accused will be acquitted on his trial, before the petty jury. That this is not the only remedy, is clearly established by the two cases last cited. Let us farther examine, whether it be any remedy for the wrong done to a citizen by being illegally indicted. Suppose a case of misery often witnessed; a wretch, after being indicted, unable to find bail—or a man indicted of a felony, in which bail would not be received; suppose farther, what not unfrequently happens, a court limited like this as to the duration of its sittings, and so pressed with business, that part must be postponed—would it be any remedy to a man illegally indicted, and obliged to remain in prison until September next, that in September next he would be acquitted and discharged? Is such an acquittal a remedy for a moment's imprisonment, for anxiety of mind, derangement of affairs, suspension or loss of character? If not, we revert to the established maxim, "there is no wrong without a remedy," and ask, in this case, what is the remedy? or, at least, what is the remedy exclusive of that which we have adopted?

But great stress is laid on the novelty of this plea, and on its being entirely without precedent. Whether it be so entirely without precedent, shall be examined presently; but let us now take for granted that it is so. This certainly imposes on us some difficulty; but it only imposes one which has been gotten over in a case very nearly similar. It has been already shown from Brooke, Abr. tit. "Indictment," § 2, that where some of the grand jury were indicted or outlawed of felony, it might be pleaded in abatement of the indictment. As far as we can find, there is but one instance of such a plea, and that in the reign of Charles I. Sir William Withipole's Case, reported Cro. Car. 134. That this was the first instance of such a plea, is manifest from the reporter's expression, that "because this was the first plea that had been upon that statute, and would be a precedent in crown matters, the court would advise." Here then is a plea, the like of which had never been produced before the time of Charles I., and yet its entire disuse and novelty formed no ground for its rejection. Since the days of Charles I., there has been no precedent of any thing like it. If, then, that solitary case had not accidentally happened to occur, the same objection of novelty would as strongly apply to that plea, which is unquestionably good, as it can to that which we have offered to the court. But novelty only imposes on us the necessity of more accurately investigating the principles of law, on which we rely; if our deductions from them be well founded (and we trust they are) the objection of novelty vanishes.

Along with this objection of novelty may be classed another; namely, that supposing the court will interfere in a case like this, we have mistaken our application; and to that was pointed the attorney general's expression, that Dr. Dodd's Case is no precedent for a plea in abatement. To that we answer: 1st, that there may be more ways than one of applying to rectify the same error; and, 2d, that emphatically the most correct and proper way of applying to rectify this error, is by a plea in abatement. The first position may be illustrated thus: It is laid down in 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 16, that any one who is under a prosecution for any crime whatsoever, may, by the common law, before he is indicted, challenge any of the persons returned on the grand jury, as being outlawed for felony, &c., or villeins, or returned at the instance of a prosecutor, or not returned by the proper officer, &c. Here then is a summary mode given to the accused of objecting to grand jurors, either by challenging the array, or challenging the polls, as the case may require; but has he no other mode? Sir William Withipole's Case, Cro. Car. 134, and Brooke, in the paragraph already cited from him, tells us that these objections may be pleaded in abatement; and Lord Coke (3 Inst. 34) says, "The safest way for the party indicted, is to plead, upon his arraignment, the special matter given unto him by the statute of 11 Hen. IV. for the overthrow of the indictments, with such averments as are by law required (agreeable to the opinion of Lord Brooke, ubi supra), and to plead over to the felony, and to require counsel learned for the pleading thereof, which ought to be granted, and also to require a copy of so much of the indictment as shall be necessary for the framing of his plea, which ought also to be granted, and these laws made for indifferency of indictors, ought to be construed favorably; for that the indictment is commonly found in the absence of the party, and yet it is the foundation of all the rest of the proceedings." Here, then, is a case where an objection to the grand jury may be taken advantage of either by a challenge to the jury, or by a plea in abatement, at the option of the defendant. Farther, cases frequently occur, in which an indictment is quashed, on motion for error on the face of it, which might have been the subject of demurrer, or of arrest of judgment; but was it ever said in any of these cases, that because you have the first remedy, you cannot have the last? On the contrary, summary applications, on motion, particularly in criminal cases, are comparatively of modern invention; for the most part introduced for the ease of the defendant, and to save him from the technical nicety of formal pleading; but they were never intended to deprive him of the benefit of such pleading, should he judge fit to resort to it.

Dr. Dodd's Case, however, can be considered in no other light than as furnishing a plea in abatement, pleaded ore tenus; he averred, that the indictment was found on illegal evidence, which he set forth, and submitted that he ought not to be compelled to plead the general issue. Have not this allegation and prayer all the substantial requisites of such a plea? But the fact which he averred, being admitted, there was no necessity for putting it into form, and the law arising from them was argued as on a demurrer. Had the facts, however, been disputed, and the law indisputable, what should he have done? The answer to this question leads to the discussion of our second position—that emphatically the most correct and proper way of applying to rectify this error, is by a plea in abatement.

Had the facts been disputed, should they have been ascertained by a war of affidavits submitted to the judges, who are not the competent organs for ascertaining facts? No, "ad quæstiones facti respondeant juratores." If the facts alleged would afford sufficient ground for quashing an indictment, but their truth be controverted, a jury must decide on their truth; a jury cannot decide on their truth without an issue joined; an issue cannot be joined without a plea put in; and no plea can be put in but a plea in abatement. It follows, therefore, that wherever the facts are capable of being traversed, the only correct way of bringing them forward is in the form of a plea tendering an issue—the ancient and strict rules, of which the defendants have not lost the benefit, know of no other way of bringing before the court facts that ought to prevent an accused person answering an indictment than by pleading them; that if denied, their truth may be tried by those who are to try the truth of facts; and if admitted or proved, they may appear upon the record, and bring it to a legal termination. Any other way is an innovation—useful in many cases, frequently an advantage to the accused—but one which he may waive, if he prefer the mode of pleading.

As to the formal objections which were taken, the counsel for defendants replied to them; but stated, that the facts contained in their pleas had come to their knowledge so very short a time before the defendants were called upon to plead, that they had no time to reperuse them; and were obliged to file the original draughts, without even taking copies; that, therefore, if the court should think any of the formal objections valid, they would pray for liberty to amend; which they had no doubt it would be ready to grant, under the circumstances of these being criminal cases, in which the defendants should not be entangled by niceties, and of there being no precedent to which the counsel could have had recourse for their guidance.

Pierpont Edwards replied, but confined himself entirely to the formal objections, and did not enter into the general question whether such a plea would lie. After he had concluded, the court adjourned till the next day.

The pleas in abatement were, on the following day, over-ruled on the merits, and judgments were given against defendants upon the demurrers. Defendants' motion for permission to amend their pleas in abatement was denied. A motion was made to quash the indictment upon the evidence before the court, which being over-ruled, and defendants ordered to plead in chief, they severally pleaded not guilty. Thereupon the district attorney moved for leave to proceed to trial on the indictments.

Defendants' counsel filed the several depositions of defendants, stating: That James Madison, of the city of Washington, William Duncanson, of the same place, and Doctor Thornton, of the same place, Thomas Lewis, now master of the ship Leander, and Jonathan S. Smith, supercargo of the ship Leander, will be material witnesses for the said defendants in the trial of the said several indictments, as they are advised and believe to be true, and that they cannot safely proceed to the trial thereof, without the testimony of them the said James Madison, William M. Duncanson, and Dr. Thornton, Thomas Lewis and Jonathan S. Smith; and further stating, that the distance of the place of residence of the said James Madison, William M. Duncanson, and Dr. Thornton, is so great, that their attendance could not have been procured at this city since the said indictments were found, and that they expect to be able to procure the presence of the said James Madison, William M. Duncanson, and Dr. Thornton, or the benefit of their testimony, by the next sitting of the circuit court of the United States for the district of New York; and that they have every reason to think, and do verily believe, that the said Jonathan S. Smith and Thomas Lewis, will return to the United States by the ninth of September next, and the defendants will be able to procure their attendance, or the benefit of their testimony, at the next circuit court of the United States for the district of New York.

Upon such affidavits, defendants' counsel asked that the trial of the indictments be put off until the next stated term of the court, to be held on the first day of September next. Such motion was not opposed by the district attorney. It was ordered by THE COURT, that trial be put off until July 14th next, at which time it was ordered that a special session of the court should be held for the trial of criminal causes at the city of New York.

Nathan Sanford, Dist. Atty., and Pierpont Edwards, for the United States.

Cadwallader D. Colden, Josiah Ogden Hoffman, and Thomas Addis Emmet, for defendants.

[NOTE. At the special July term, the district attorney moved to bring on the trial of William S. Smith, and defendants' counsel moved for an attachment against absent witnesses, and for a continuance until such witnesses could be produced. Defendants' motion was denied and it was ordered that the case proceed to trial. Case No. 16,342. The trial of Smith resulted in a verdict of acquittal. Case No. 16,342a. A similar verdict was also rendered on the trial of Ogden. Case No. 16,342b.]

Case No. 16,342.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[3 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 100.]

Circuit Court, D. New York. July 15, 1806.

CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—ABSENT WITNESS—ATTACHMENT — WAR — POWER OF PRESIDENT TO DECLARE—INVASION OF FRIENDLY TERRITORY.

[1. A motion to bring on a criminal trial will take precedence of a motion for an attachment against absent witnesses.]

[2. The power to issue an attachment to punish a person for failure to obey a subpœna is incident to courts of justice.]

[3. Persons who are material as witnesses for a party in a federal court may be compelled to appear notwithstanding they are members of the cabinet of the president of the United States.]

[4. Where the acts for which defendant was indicted were committed in the city of New York, defendant will not be granted a continuance because of the failure of persons at that time resident in the city of Washington to attend pursuant to subpœna on a general affidavit, but he should particularly set forth in what matters their testimony is material.]

[5. The court will not postpone a criminal trial on the ground of the absence of witnesses unless the evidence to be given by such witnesses is pertinent to the issue, and the witnesses are material.]

[6. The power of making war is exclusively vested in congress; but the president has power to repel invasions by hostile forces, even when congress has not declared war.]

[7. The president of the United States has no authority to set on foot a military expedition against a nation with which the United States are at peace; and it is no justification to a private individual who sets on foot such an expedition in violation of Act June 5, 1794, § 5 (1 Stat. 384), that he acted with the knowledge and approbation of the president.]

[8. The trial of an indictment for setting on foot a military expedition against a nation with which the United States are at peace, in violation of Act June 5, 1794, § 5, will not be postponed to enable defendant to produce testimony of the executive officers of the government that the expedition was with the knowledge and approval of the president, as such evidence is not a justification or excuse for the offence, and is not material.]

[9. A criminal trial will not be postponed to enable defendant to obtain evidence which would have an influence upon the mind of the court in mitigation of punishment, but which is not legally admissible before a jury.]

[10. Defendant, indicted for a violation of Act June 5, 1794, § 5, in setting on foot, a military expedition against a nation with which the United States were at peace, caused certain United States cabinet officers to be served with subpœnas, and, on their refusal to appear, asked a continuance, and moved for an attachment for contempt. The court held that their testimony was not pertinent, and denied a continuance, but was divided on the question as to whether an attachment should issue.]

[Indictment for misdemeanor under Act June 5, 1794, § 5. Motion to bring on the trial, and for an attachment against absent witnesses.]

Nathan Sanford and Pierpont Edwards, for prosecution.

Washington Morton, Cadwallader D. Colden, Josiah Ogden Hoffman, Thomas Addis Emmet, and Richard Harrison, for defendant.

Colden read a subpœna, directed to James Madison, Esq., whereby he was commanded to appear at the present circuit court, to testify in behalf of the defendant; also, the copy of the subpœna ticket, and read an affidavit in the words following:

"City and County of New York, ss: Charles Lindsay, attorney at law, being duly sworn, saith that on the twenty-eighth day of May last he served on James Madison the writ of subpœna hereunto annexed, and also at the same time delivered to said James Madison a ticket of subpœna, a true and perfect copy whereof it is also hereunto annexed; and this deponent farther saith, that at the time of showing the said writ and of leaving the said ticket, he offered to pay to the said James his reasonable expenses, and tendered to him twenty dollars, which the said James would not accept, saying 'that he would not take them now, and that it was unnecessary to say anything about them;' and this deponent farther saith, that the said James made no objection to the quantity or quality of the money so tendered as aforesaid to the said James, and farther this deponent saith not. Dated the 16th day of June, 1806. Charles Lindsay.

"Sworn the 17th day of June, 1806. Matthias B. Tallmadge."

Colden stated that he had in his hand subpœnas for the other witnesses who did not attend, with like proof of service on them. That the present application to the court, however, would only relate to Mr. Madison, Mr. Smith, Mr. Wagner, and Mr. Thornton. As to the three last, the documents he had to offer were mutatis mutandis, the same as those he had read relative to Mr. Madison; it would therefore be unnecessary to trouble the court with reading them; he should put them on file, and the decision of the court on the documents that had been read he presumed would be allowed should govern in the other cases. He trusted that the court would not order the trial to proceed until the defendant has had the compulsory process of the court, to bring up the witnesses who have disobeyed the subpœna. And that compulsory process, he presumed, must be an attachment for which, in behalf of the defendant, he now applied. He did not move for this process merely as a means of bringing in the witnesses to answer for their contempt in disobedience of the ordinary summons of the court; but he applied for it, as for that compulsory process which, by the constitution of the United States, every person accused was entitled to in order to bring in his witness to testify on his trial. (Here he read the 8th article of the amendments of the constitution of the United States.) He also read the 6th section of the act of congress of the 2d of March, 1793 [1 Stat. 335], by which it is provided, that "subpœnas for witnesses, who may be required to attend a circuit court of the United States, in any district hereof, may run into any other district."

Colden also read the 14th section, of the act of the 24th September, 1789 [1 Stat. 81], which enacts, "that the courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law." This present application, said he, is sanctioned by the constitution, and the laws of our country. There can be no doubt of the power of the court to award the process for which we apply, nor can there be any question of the justice or propriety of granting it. I will not suppose that there is any thing in the station of the gentlemen who are the subject of the present application, which exempts them from proceedings to which any other citizen would be liable. The court cannot, and I trust will not, recognize them in their official situations; but hear of them only as of men, who have disobeyed the process of the court, and whose attendance the defendant requires as witnesses. I shall not say more on this subject, because I cannot but persuade myself that the process we pray for will be granted as of course. But we have, in the behalf of the defendant a further petition to the court; which is that the process be made returnable at a short day, and that the court adjourn de die in diem until it may be served and returned. The defendant cannot go to trial till his witnesses be brought in, and yet he is very unwilling that there should be any postponement. The court cannot be ignorant that the defendant, by being removed from an office which was a support of a numerous family, and for which he had sacrificed all other business, has suffered, while his guilt is not yet proved, a punishment greater than any it is in the power of the court to inflict. The court must also know that while this prosecution is pending against him, it would be in vain for him to seek any new employment or means of life. The court will readily perceive that humanity, as well as justice, requires that the defendant should have not only the benefit of the testimony of his witnesses, but that he should have that benefit speedily. It is, therefore, our humble petition to the court, in behalf of our client, that the process to bring in the witnesses may be made returnable at some short day, and that the court adjourn from time to time, till the return be made. We shall forbear at present to urge any farther arguments in support of the motion now before the court. When we have heard the counsel for the prosecution, we may have more to offer.

Sanford. The first question is, whether the application of the counsel for the defendant, for an attachment against the absent witnesses subpœnaed in this cause on behalf of their client, is at this time regular? I contend it is not. We are not bound at this time to discuss the question whether the attachments ought to issue or not. When the proper time for the argument of that question shall arrive, we shall be prepared to meet them on that, as on every other question which may occur in the progress of the prosecution. The court must have observed the public prosecutor has, in the first instance, moved to bring on the trial of W. S. Smith. While this motion is depending before the court, nothing can be in order but a motion to postpone the trial. That question must precede the application for an attachment, the object of which is to punish the absent witnesses for contempt. It may happen, that the parties are prepared to go to trial with the witnesses present; we are prepared on the part of the prosecution, and it does not follow that because persons who may have been regularly summoned as witnesses by the defendant are absent, the trial must be delayed even for a day, and still less until the return of the attachments shall be made. I forebear to say a word at present on the application for an attachment, a regular or legal mode of bringing in witnesses to testify. When that point shall come before the court, we shall be ready to meet and discuss it. We object to the motion for an attachment at present, simply on the ground that it is irregularly made at this time; and we shall not advance farther in the argument, until the court shall have decided this point. As, therefore, the application is altogether out of order, I trust the court will refuse it, and will order on the trial.

Colden. I do not see the difference in point of time as a matter of much importance. Whether the court decide on the one motion or the other first or last would be of little consequence. If the court order on the trial, then we shall renew our motion, and the court will certainly hear our application, and decide upon it before they allow the trial to proceed.

Pierpont Edwards wished to be admitted to say a word in explanation. This prosecution must be at some time brought to trial, and why not now, after the delay already granted by the court? Certainly the defendant's counsel will not press a further delay, unless they show some good reason and legal grounds for what they ask. They say, that the witnesses subpœnaed by the defendant do not appear. Well, is this a ground of delay? Will they be in a better condition if their witnesses are attached and brought here to answer for a contempt of the process of this court? No such a thing. The attachment they solicit does not go to them testificando to bring them in to give testimony, but merely to receive punishment for an alleged contempt. The only motion they can make is to put off the trial for some sufficient and legal cause; if they make that point, we are prepared to meet them; but surely the court will not put off the cause, in order to wait the return of an attachment, to be issued against Mr. Madison and other gentlemen, who have been mentioned.

Hoffman. If the question is to take this shape, I am ready to meet it; but at present we hope the court will, at any rate, grant us a short delay for the absent witnesses to come in. It is the usual practice of the court, when the witnesses do not appear instanter, to postpone the trial for a day or more. This is what I should request, as it is probable that two of the witnesses may reach this city tomorrow. Far be it from me, to postpone this trial to a distant day: my only and sincere wish is, that it may come to issue before this court rises; but we anxiously hope that the court, from motives of justice and constitutional right, will grant us the compulsory process to bring in our witnesses, in the manner already requested. We do not dispute on matter of form. When our witnesses are here, the court will command their testimony, and it is with the court to enforce their attendance; but we shall certainly object to the trial proceeding at this moment.

Sanford. Do you mean to postpone the trial on account of the absence of the witnesses? If so, it might be cause of eternal delay.

Hoffman. Not so, I understand that two of the witnesses now absent will be here tomorrow, and mention it as a sufficient reason for a day's postponement. But I do not mean to commit myself on the question, whether we are bound to proceed to trial in the absence of our witnesses, when we can show we have used due diligence. When that question is raised, I shall be willing to meet it, and if the witness should now come into court, I would cheerfully and confidently go to trial.

Pierpont Edwards. The district attorney would repel with disdain the idea of sheltering himself under forms. No, please your honors, he has with great liberality met the opposite counsel, and I feel myself impressed with its propriety. The objection to the mode of proceeding, on the part of the defendant, is founded in great solidity; but it is not proper, at this stage of the business, to disclose to our antagonists the grounds of our opinions. When the proceedings take their proper shape, we shall have no objection to indulge them in any proper information; till then they will not be answered on irrelevant matter; at present they ought to confine themselves to a motion for postponement, if postponement is their object. When that is decided by the court, we will proceed with them to discuss the motion for an attachment against the secretary of state, and other officers of the executive government of the Union.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice, informed the bar, that the court had received a letter from Messrs. Madison, Dearborne and R. Smith, informing that they would not be able to attend. The letter was in these words: "To the Honorable the Judges of the Circuit Court of the District of New York: We have been summoned to appear, on the 14th day of this month, before a special circuit court of the United States for the district of New York, to testify on the part of William S. Smith and Samuel G. Ogden, severally, in certain issues of traverse between the United States and the said William S. Smith and Samuel G. Ogden. Sensible of all the attention due to the writs of subpœna issued in these cases, it is with regret we have to state to the court, that the president of the United States, taking into view the state of our public affairs, has specially signified to us that our official duties cannot, consistently therewith, be at this juncture dispensed with. The court, we trust, will be pleased to accept this as a satisfactory explanation of our failure to give the personal attendance required. And as it must be uncertain whether, at any subsequent period, the absence of heads of departments, at such a distance from the scene of their official duties, may not equally happen to interfere with them, we respectfully submit, whether the objects of the parties in this case may not be reconciled with public considerations by a commission issued, with the consent of their counsel and that of the district attorney of the United States, for the purpose of taking, in that mode, our respective testimonies. We have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your most obedient servants. James Madison. H. Dearborne. R. Smith. City of Washington, 8th of July, 1806."

THE COURT also mentioned that they had also received a letter from Mr. Jacob Wagner, and one from Mr. William Thornton, which stated that they could not attend. That the letter from Mr. Wagner covered copies of a correspondence between him and Mr. Colden, by which it appeared that Mr. Wagner had offered to give his deposition in writing, if it could be taken by consent on interrogatories.

Colden acknowledged that he had received letters from the above mentioned gentleman; and said that these letters had been submitted to the counsel concerned for the defendant, who have agreed in opinion, that they could not, consistently with the interest of their client, dispense with the attendance of these witnesses, or consent to receive their testimony in the way it had been offered. Nor did he think it possible that the court would suffer either the letter which had been read from Mr. Madison and others, or those referred to by the court, to have any influence in the decision of the question then before them. The letter from the heads of departments, written by order of the president, was an attempt of the executive to interfere with the judiciary, which no doubt the court would indignantly repel.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. The court mentioned these letters, to show that the gentlemen who had signed them would not be here upon the subpœnas, and were particularly called forth by what had fallen from one of the defendant's counsel, that two of the witnesses would probably be here to-morrow.

TALLMADGE, District Judge. Those letters are not to determine how the court shall act; their decisions must be formed upon other ground. They were mentioned, as I conceive, with the view of convincing the counsel that none of the gentlemen who have signed them will be here tomorrow.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice, said that was the idea he meant to express.

Colden. Our application to the court for an attachment, the district attorney says, is superseded by his motion to bring on the trial. I do not mean to enter on an argument on this point; but let me inform him that he misconceives us in this particular. We apply for the attachments not merely to bring in the witnesses to answer for their contempt, but that they may be brought here to testify. We have no partiality for this or that process, nor care whether the process the court grants to us be called an attachment or any thing else, so that it be that compulsory process which the constitution and laws give us a right to demand.

Sanford. The court will please to dispose of the questions as to a day's delay for the witnesses, whose attendance is expected to-morrow; but, as to the question of attachment, it is altogether different. We have moved to bring on the trial; to defeat this motion, the defendant must show that the absent witnesses are material for his defence in the present cause; and I would ask how can he possibly show this when the gentlemen, whose testimony is required, were all at Washington when the military expedition was set on foot, and preparing at New York? What possible knowledge of their own could they have of those transactions at the distance of 250 miles? No affidavit in common form, stating the materiality of the witnesses, can be admitted; they must show the special grounds on which their testimony can operate for the defendant; and when this shall be done, the court will judge whether the special matter which may be disclosed constitutes a sufficient reason for postponing the trial.

Pierpont Edwards concurred in the position of the district attorney, and required of the defendant to show the special ground for the application, wherein the testimony of the absent gentleman was material to his defence.

Colden. That is not the law, as we have hitherto understood it. If we are obliged to offer an affidavit, we conceive it to be sufficient, in the first instance, to declare generally, that the witnesses are material, without specifying the particular points to which they are to testify, and that without them our client cannot safely proceed to trial.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. You must offer an affidavit, and must show in what respect the witnesses are material. The facts charged in the indictment took place, and are laid, in New York; the witnesses are admitted to have been during that period at Washington. The presumption is, therefore, that they cannot be material, and this presumption must be removed by affidavit.

Colden, after a short silence, during which the counsel on both sides had conferred together, addressed the court. The counsel have agreed among themselves that the cause shall go off till to-morrow. To which the counsel for the prosecution having signified their assent, Colden then said, the trial being disposed of for the present, I now move on the documents which have been read, that an attachment be issued against Mr. Madison.

Sanford. We have by no means waived the priority of our motion that the trial may proceed, by consenting to postpone the cause till to-morrow. When the court shall have decided that, the motion for an attachment is in order, and we shall be ready to argue it; but the court will not permit our first question to be superseded by the deference we have paid to their request.

Washington Morton said the counsel for the defendant had no objection to this question also going off till to-morrow, and then arguing them together.

Colden: If the court would grant us the attachment to-day, it would be a gain of so much time, as the trial is postponed till to-morrow.

TALLMADGE, District Judge. The questions of bringing on the trial, and of the attachment, are certainly distinct, but setting the first aside for the moment does not authorize the other to assume its place. You cannot have your motion for the attachment argued before it is determined whether the trial shall now proceed.

Colden. It has been agreed to postpone the trial; the district attorney's motion then being disposed of, nothing now interferes with our motion for the attachment.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. The conversation is extremely desultory, but go on in your own way.

Colden. I am now ready to open the argument at large, on the motion for an attachment, if the court will please to hear me. But if we now agree to postpone this argument till to-morrow, as we have the preference now, we trust the court will grant it to us then, and hear us before the motion to bring on the trial is renewed.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. Certainly not.

Harrison. Then I presume we are to give up the idea of arguing the motion for the attachment at present, as the trial is postponed by accommodation.

TALLMADGE, District Judge. The accommodation has been granted, for the purpose of giving time for the arrival of some absent witnesses; this throws the trial off for a day, but it cannot give to the defendant's counsel the privilege of having the second motion argued until the first is determined; the first question still retains its priority.

Pierpont Edwards. When the attachment is argued, we shall not take the ground of privilege for the executive officers of the government. I know the district attorney would disdain to rest himself on such a pretext. We shall require of the defendant to show that they are material witnesses, by affidavit and proof; if they cannot make out this point, their application fails. We have suffered the trial to go off for to-day; perhaps the other motion ought likewise to be suspended, especially if the defendant has not prepared his affidavit on which the motion must be bottomed.

Emmet. Have the court decided that the motion for the attachment should be heard in preference to the question which has been postponed till to-morrow? If they have not, I would ask permission to suggest one circumstance why it should have the precedence. The right of the defendant to compulsory process to bring in his witnesses, is not only guaranteed by the constitution and the laws, but springs from the necessity of the furtherance and due administration of justice in all well regulated governments, and if we can obtain the attachment to-day it will certainly expedite the trial.

Pierpont Edwards, interrupting, said, the court, he presumed, intended to accommodate the counsel on both sides, with the postponement of both questions till to-morrow.

Sanford understood that the court had already decided on that point, by declaring that the public prosecutor should not lose the precedence of his motion, to bring on the trial by the delay which has been accommodated, and he insisted upon the point of order.

Emmet did not imagine the court had decided against hearing the argument in favor of the motion for an attachment. He understood the trial was not to be brought on instanter, but certainly that was not to postpone the right of the defendant, to have his motion allowed.

(At this moment the grand jury came into court, and the foreman informing the court they had found no bills, and the district attorney declaring he had nothing to lay before them, they were discharged for the present.)

Emmet consented to the accommodation on the condition that it do not operate to the injury of his client, and proposed to offer an affidavit, proving the absent witnesses to be material on the trial. He hoped it would be understood that the trial was to be put off from day to day, until the witnesses came in.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. The first motion will have the priority in the decision, but if the counsel agree they may argue the latter proposition first.

Sanford. We pray the decision of the court as to the mode of proceeding.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. I am willing to hear the arguments on both points, and I do not care which is argued first, but I do not mean to decide either until both are gone through.

TALLMADGE, District Judge. The first motion will have the first decision.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. You make all the difficulty out of a mere matter of form. If you argue the motion for an attachment to-day, no opinion will be given until the court have decided upon the motion for bringing on the trial. Let them go hand in hand, and the court will take care that neither party shall be caught or entangled in the net of form.

It was then agreed by the counsel on both sides, that the two questions should be argued together to-morrow.

Adjourned, till ten o'clock to-morrow.

Tuesday, July 15th, 1806.

Present PATERSON, Circuit Justice, and TALLMADGE, District Judge.

Colden made a brief recapitulation of the course of proceedings of yesterday, and then offered the following affidavit of Wm. S. Smith, viz.: "New York, ss.: William S. Smith, the defendant in the above cause, being duly sworn, says that James Madison, of the city of Washington, Robert Smith, of the same place, Jacob Wagner, of the same place, and William Thornton, of the same place, are material witnesses for him the deponent, on the trial of this indictment, as this deponent is advised by his counsel, and verily believes to be true, and that he cannot safely proceed to trial of the said indictment without the testimony of the said James Madison, Robert Smith, Jacob Wagner, and William Thornton, and that they have been regularly subpœnaed to attend at this court, on the fourteenth day of July instant, to testify in behalf of this deponent, on the said trial, and have not appeared in the said subpœnas, nor hath either of them appeared; and this deponent farther saith, that he hopes and expects to be able to prove by the testimony of the said witnesses that the expedition and enterprise to which the said indictment relates, was begun, prepared, and set on foot with the knowledge and approbation of the president of the United States, and with the knowledge and approbation of the secretary of state of the United States; and the deponent farther saith, that he hopes and expects to be able to prove by the testimony of the said witnesses, that if he had any concern in the said expedition and enterprise, it was with the approbation of the president of the United States, and the said secretary of state; and the deponent farther saith that he is informed and doth verily believe, and hopes, and expects to be able to prove by the testimony of the said witnesses, that the prosecution against him for the said offences, charged in the said indictment, was commenced and prosecuted by order of the president of the United States; and the deponent farther saith, that he has been informed, and doth verily believe, that the said James Madison and Robert Smith are prevented from attending by the orders or interpositions of the president of the United States; and farther this deponent saith not. (Signed) W. S. Smith."

Colden proceeded: The present application is to put off the cause on account of the absence of witnesses whose testimony the defendant alleges is material for his defense, and who have disobeyed the ordinary process of the court. In compliance with the intimation from the bench yesterday, the defendant has disclosed, by the affidavit which I have just read, the points to which he expects the witnesses who have been summoned will testify. If the court cannot or will not issue compulsory process to bring in the witnesses who are the objects of this application, then the cause will not be postponed. Or if it appears to the court that the matter disclosed by the affidavit might not be given in evidence if the witnesses were now here, then we cannot expect that our motion will be successful. For it would be absurd to suppose that the court will postpone the trial on account of the absence of witnesses whom they cannot compel to appear; and of whose voluntary attendance there is too much reason to despair; or on account of the absence of witnesses who, if they were before the court, could not be heard on the trial. It is therefore my business to show that the court can issue compulsory process against those persons who have disregarded the subpœnas. And secondly, that this process ought to issue, because their testimony, as it is disclosed by the affidavit, would be material. If the witnesses who have been summoned, stand on the same level with their fellow citizens; if there be not something in their high offices to raise them above those laws which are above the rest of the community; then there can be no doubt but that they are subject to that provision of the constitution, which in its terms seems to pay no respect to official dignity or station; but, as it appears to me, gives the accused a right to demand compulsory process against any man whose testimony he may deem necessary to make his innocence appear. I shall not, however, enlarge on the powers of the court in ordinary cases, to issue the process for which we now apply. I shall be content to repose on the articles of the constitution and the laws of the United States to which I referred yesterday. I proceed to inquire whether Mr. Madison and the other heads of departments have offered a sufficient excuse for their disobedience to the process of the court, by saying they are members of the executive government—whether these dignified sounds elevate them above the constitution and laws.

The general rule is that all persons are bound to give testimony. I have no book from which to read this rule; but I think it is written by the finger of God on the heart of every man. True it is that the necessities of society have introduced one exception, and but one: and that is where a person in the capacity of counsellor or attorney, represents another. This exception is most strictly confined to this relationship. No obligations of secrecy or confidence however sacred; no connections of blood or ties of friendship can interpose in the administration of justice. If they could, a Russel would not have perished by the hands of the executioner, or England have been indelibly stained with the blood of a Sidney. In the Case of the Duchess of Kingston, 11 State Tr. 246, for bigamy, Sir Cæsar Hawkins was called to prove that he had delivered the duchess of a child. He attempted to excuse himself from giving testimony on the ground of professional confidence; but the court wrung from him his secret. And in the same case Lord Barrington in vain implored to be excused from giving testimony against the accused, as all he knew had been imparted to him in the confidence of friendship. A Roman Catholic priest has been compelled to disclose the communications of his penitent in his religious capacity of confessor. 2 Atk. 524. I do not expect to hear the counsel for the prosecution contend, after this, that any obligations of confidence interpose to shield the defaulting witnesses from the process which in the name of the constitution we demand. Nor will I suppose that the learned counsel who are opposed to us mean to say that there is anything in the official dignity with which the witnesses are clothed which saves them from the operation of the laws. The peers of England have not thought that their titles or stations afforded them any such exemption. And even the king of that country, who claims his title by divine right, has yielded to the obvious moral obligation of giving his testimony when the administration of justice rendered it necessary. 1 Salk. 278; 2 Hawk. P. C. 152; Hob. 213. Indeed, if it were necessary to produce authorities on this point, we might go very far back, and show that the kings of Judea have witnessed and been witnessed against. Salk. (Wilk. Ed.) 1521, 1526.

But it may be said that there are certain political motives which should induce the court to excuse the secretary of state and other heads of departments from giving testimony. That were they to be examined as witnesses they might disclose state secrets! If I were to admit that there are certain secrets between the president and his secretaries which they would not wish to disclose, (and I have no doubt there are many such), or which ought not to be disclosed, still the witnesses who have been duly summoned owe obedience to the process of the court; they must appear and be sworn, and when on their oaths, they may avail themselves of this excuse if questions are put to them which they ought not to answer. But the court must judge, and not the witnesses, whether they shall or shall not answer. Much less shall the witnesses be allowed to determine for themselves whether they will be obedient to a mandate of the judicial authority. Such was the determination of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 137. But the dreadful inconvenience to the gentlemen themselves, and the injury to our national affairs, that may result from the court's exercising a power to call on our great men as witnesses, has been suggested. In the case I have mentioned of Marbury v. Madison, Mr. Lincoln took precisely these grounds. Yet in that case the court would not grant him a moment's time to consider whether he would or would not be sworn, although they had no objection that he should have time to consider what he would or ought to answer.

Before I quit this point, I will pray leave to refer the court to one other case which has occurred in our own courts. I mean the case of U. S. v. Cooper [Case No. 14,861]. And although I should be sorry to find that case received as law in all its points, because I think there are in it some determinations against the defendant too severe and rigorous, yet it will show that the question under consideration is not a novel one. Mr. Cooper calls as witnesses several members of the national legislature and officers of the executive government. Judge Chase permits subpœnas to issue against them. Judge Peters indeed objects to members of the legislature being subpœnaed, on account of a supposed privilege attached to them as members of the congress then in session, and therefore he thought the process could not be enforced, and that the court ought not to issue a process to which they could not compel obedience. But an objection on account of official station or dignity, or on account of executive confidence, is not even thought of. Such extraordinary objections are reserved for this very extraordinary prosecution. In the event, Mr. Cooper's witnesses appeared in court and offered to be examined.

If, however, the exemption in the present case should be supposed to extend to the heads of departments, I presume it will not be contended that it extends likewise to Messrs. Thornton and Wagner, who are admitted to be only clerks in the offices. If one clerk is entitled to this privilege, so is every other on the ground of being an executive agent. Suppose a case of treason or murder Would the court admit of such an apology for refusing to the person indicted compulsory process? It is monstrous to suppose that they would. Why, then, should it be refused to us in the present case; is the punishment to which the defendant is obnoxious of so trifling a nature, as to render his conviction or acquittal a matter of indifference? No, sir; the defendant is exposed to punishment extremely severe; he is subjected to a penalty of great amount, and to imprisonment in the common bridewell, among the vilest felons who are separated from the community. Shall he be exposed to all this, deprived of that shield which will cover him from this ungenerous attack? For the testimony we have sought, and which the court can furnish, will be to us that shield of defence. Will it be admitted as an excuse, that the gentlemen cannot attend at this time, because the affairs of the nation rest upon their shoulders? But it is intimated in their letter that their official employments will always interfere whenever the defendant may require them as witnesses. In that case we cannot issue an attachment either now or hereafter. Yet it is no uncommon thing to find these gentlemen absenting themselves from the seat of government for months at a time, for their own pleasure or business. It is hard indeed that they cannot devote a few days to the fate of a fellow citizen. I humbly hope that I have satisfied the court that they have power to issue the process we pray for, and that no sufficient excuse has been or can be offered for disobeying the subpœnas, and that therefore the attachment ought to be granted; if not for the purpose of bringing in the witnesses to testify, which is now our object, at least I think the court will be of opinion that they ought to compel the witnesses to appear and answer the contempt.

I now proceed to inquire whether the testimony which we expect to obtain from these witnesses may not be given in evidence, when the defendant is on his trial. And here we may say it may be given in evidence either in mitigation of the punishment, or as a justification. If not as a justification, certainly we shall be allowed to offer it in mitigation; and the proper time to offer it in mitigation is on the trial. There is no doubt but that circumstances in mitigation may be offered to the court after the verdict. If a defendent is so fortunate as to be able to obtain such testimony after he has been pronounced guilty by the jury, the court will undoubtedly listen to it. But the laws do not put it in the power of a defendant to compel a witness to appear and testify in his behalf, unless it be on the trial of the issue. It is as much the right of the accused to lay before the court testimony which may tend to lighten his punishment, as it is to offer testimony that will entirely exculpate him. Is it not as unjust and unreasonable that a defendant should be subject to three years' imprisonment when he can show that he ought not to suffer three days' confinement, as it is that he should be convicted when he is not guilty? If, therefore, there is no other mode of obtaining the mitigatory testimony but by the witness appearing upon the trial, the court will oblige him then to appear. Let us ask, has the law provided any means by which the defendant can compel a witness to give an extra judicial deposition in any criminal case; or is there any process by which the defendant can compel a witness to appear in court after the trial? We answer with confidence that there is none. Such a thing has never been heard of, and the counsel for the prosecution, we are certain, cannot point out to us any means by which we may oblige a witness to give the testimony we expect, if the court should say they would hear it after the trial. It is true, indeed, where witnesses have voluntarily made affidavits of this nature, the courts have received them after the issue has been decided. But can a matter of this importance to the accused depend on the mere will and pleasure of another? Every notion of justice is opposed to such an idea. And if there be no certain mode of obtaining this testimony but by examination of the witness on the trial, the court will oblige him to appear. We are, however, not without authority on this subject. In the Case of the Earl of Anglesea, indicted for a misdemeanor, reported in 9 State Tr. 305, it was expressly decided that circumstances in aggravation of the defendant's offence might be given in evidence on the trial. Now if circumstances in aggravation may be offered on the trial of the issue, a fortiori, it must be lawful to give in evidence circumstances of mitigation. For, as it is better that a guilty person should escape punishment rather than that an innocent one should suffer unmeritedly, so it is better that a guilty defendant should escape with too light a punishment rather than that he should suffer more than he deserves. This case of the Earl of Anglesea is a very strong one in our favor. The point now before the court was there debated, and received a decision which supports the principles for which we now contend. So in many instances have the courts allowed a defendant to give evidence of character, where the character of the defendant could have nothing to do with his guilt or innocence: McNal. Ev. 320, 323, etc. But we may appeal to universal practice on this subject. Is there a lawyer who hears me that will say he ever knew testimony of this kind refused by a court on a trial? And is it not admitted every day? I hope, therefore, the court will say that although we may only offer this testimony in mitigation, yet the witnesses must be compelled to come here, and give us the benefit of it.

We, however, go farther, and offer this testimony not merely as mitigatory, but as relevant to the issue, and as a complete justification of the acts with which the defendant is charged. We say by the affidavit that the witnesses will prove that what the defendant did he did with the knowledge, consent and approbation of the president of the United States; and if they do prove this, the defendant must be acquitted. Let us suppose that we could prove that the acts charged against the defendant were done by the express order of the president of the United States; would not such an order be a complete justification? That the president might have authority to give such an order cannot be questioned. Congress have the power of declaring war; and when that is done, the president is to act under it, and may authorize any military or hostile measure against the enemy. If it be said that there was no declaration by congress, it is sufficient for us to answer that there might have been. The constitution does not require that a declaration of war should be made public; it would be absurd to suppose that it did, and thereby the executive of this country was to be deprived of all chance of taking an enemy by surprise, or of the advantage of secret measures of defence or offence. It is well known, that at the time General Meranda's expedition was set on foot, congress was sitting with closed doors, and might have, nay, it was universally believed they had, declared war against Spain. If they had done so, the president would have had constitutional authority to sanction the acts for which the defendant is now to answer; and will it be said that the individual acting under the order or sanction of the chief magistrate of the country, who might have had authority to give that sanction, shall be answerable criminally for what he has done pursuant to that order? Must he inquire whether the chief magistrate was or was not authorized to give the order, and must the defendant be punished if it turns out that the president has acted illegally? No; it would be an oppressive and tyrannical doctrine to say the defendant may be charged with a crime under such circumstances. The defendant had only to inquire whether the president gave him an order which might be within the scope and limits of his constitutional functions, and if it was so, the defendant cannot be punished for his obedience. I will not take up the time of the court longer on this part of the subject, or detain it with any argument to show that when we have proved that the defendant acted with the knowledge, consent, and approbation of the president of the United States, it must be equivalent to proving that he acted under an express order.

But let us suppose that the testimony we offer would not make out a justification according to the strict legal acceptation of that term; still we say it would form such an excuse for the defendant as would entitle him to a verdict of acquittal. If the defendant can satisfy the jury by the testimony of the witnesses whom he now calls, that he had no intention to disobey the laws, but on the contrary that he thought, and had reason to think, that his conduct was sanctioned by their authority; and that he would merit the approbation of his government, and the applause of his countrymen, he will not, he ought not, to be convicted. Where there is no intent to do wrong, there can be no crime. This is a principle not derived to us from tradition or record; it is in the heart of every man, is imbibed with our reason, and cannot be obliterated while a sense of justice, or knowledge of right and wrong is retained.

I expect to hear it said, that if this principle be applicable to all cases, then an ignorance of the law will always be an excuse for an offence. Sir, I say it will be so whenever a defendant may have it in his power clearly to demonstrate that he was ignorant. As if a law should this day be passed at Washington against the exportation of arms, and a person to-morrow, before he could possibly have knowledge of the existence of such a law, should make a shipment contrary to the prohibition. I say no jury on earth would convict a defendant under such circumstances. No court on earth would tell a jury, that in such a case, they ought to convict. But as it may, in many cases, be impossible to prove on a defendant a knowledge of the law, he is very wisely charged with it. In the first instance, it is always to be presumed that every citizen is acquainted with the laws of his country, and that presumption must stand against him till it is destroyed by decisive and irrefragable proofs. And so it is also with respect to the intent. If an offence is committed against the laws, it is to be presumed that there was an intent to offend until the contrary appear. But when that does appear, the presumption is destroyed, and the accused is exculpated. The testimony we would offer may then be heard if only for this purpose, if only to take away that presumption of criminal intent, which the law very wisely and necessarily raises against the defendant.

But whether this testimony may be a justification or excuse, it ought to be submitted to the jury. They are the judges of the law, and the fact. And all the facts ought to be brought before them, that they may apply the law. I do not mean by this that a party is to be at liberty to offer any sort of testimony that he may please, but he has an unquestionable right to submit to the jury every fact that has any relation to the crime with which he is charged.

There is another ground, also, on which the jury ought to be permitted to hear this testimony. It has become a practice for jurors to recommend a convict to the mercy of the court where they think he deserves it. This practice is sanctioned by so many instances, and by such a length of time, that it may now be considered as a right; and if it be so, then certainly the jury ought to have every circumstance before them, which will assist them to determine whether they will recommend or not. It may be proper, in order that the court may see the full applicability of the testimony we expect from the witnesses who have been subpœnaed, that I should mention the other testimony that we expect to offer in connection with it. We shall show from the journals of congress when their secret session began, and how long it continued. We shall prove that it was universally believed that congress had secretly passed an act for going to war with Spain. We shall read the president's message at the opening of the last congress, and a variety of documents communicated by him, on the sixth of December. And we shall then, from proving the notoriety of the preparation for General Meranda's expedition as well here as at Washington, and by a variety of other circumstantial testimony, bring home to the president the knowledge we impute to him.

Thus, may it please the court, I have endeavored to establish the power of the court to issue the process for which we ask, and to show that the gentlemen who have been subpœnaed, are not exempt from the process on account of their official dignity, or excused from obeying the subpœnas, on the ground of their being confidential executive agents. I have attempted to show that the testimony which these witnesses would afford us would be material either in mitigation or exculpation, and that in either case it must be given in evidence on the trial. I too plainly perceive how much I have left undone. But it is my province only to open this argument. I am happy that I am to be followed by counsel who will not fail to supply my omissions.

Hoffman. If I am not precluded by the intimation of the court yesterday, that it was necessary to disclose, by affidavit, the facts intended to be established by the absent witnesses, I solicit permission to submit some remarks, tending to show that the general affidavit ought to be received as sufficient for the postponement of the trial. With all possible respect, I suggest, that the defendant's counsel were not heard on this question, and I hope I may consider the intimation not as a fixed or deliberate opinion of the court.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. You are too late, the question is already decided.

Hoffman. I proceed then to add to the opening argument, and shall limit my observations chiefly to the materiality of the testimony; for as it respects the right to an attachment, the principles on which we rely have been fully and ably stated. I, however, beg leave to read an additional authority, in support of the general scope of the argument used by my associate counsel. In 1 M'Nal. Ev. 255, it is decided, "that the claim of exemption from giving evidence, is scrutinized with a jealous eye, and the person relying on it, must establish his right by showing a positive law, or express authority." The master of the rolls, Sir Michael Smith adds: "It was the undoubted legal constitutional right of every subject of the realm, who has a cause depending, to call upon a fellow subject to testify what he may know of the matters in issue." And every man is bound to make the discovery, unless specially exempted and protected by law. The general proposition, which I shall endeavor to maintain, is, that the testimony of Mr. Madison and the other witnesses named in the affidavit, is material to Col. Smith in his defence of the present prosecution. It is material, as matter of excuse or justification; but if not strictly as matter of justification, then as evidence to inform the judgment of the court, in the exercise of its discretion, in inflicting the punishment. Before I enlarge on these points, I remark, that it is sufficient for our purpose, to suppose a state of things between this country and Spain, where the assent and approbation of the executive of the United States, would justify the expedition charged in the indictment; for if there can be such a case, the advice of the counsel, as stated in the affidavit, must be presumed to apply thereto; unless, therefore, it shall appear negatively to the court, that the prosecution or defence can assume no shape, where the testimony required will be important, they will not refuse to postpone the trial. It certainly is not necessary for the defendant to disclose by affidavit, the precise use intended to be made of the evidence. We are not bound to unfold our entire defence to the public prosecutor; we are only bound to lay enough before the court, from which the importance of the testimony may be inferred.

The offence charged in the indictment, is for beginning and setting on foot, preparing and providing the means for a military expedition against a nation with whom the United States are at peace. And it may be asked, can the United States be in a state of war with a foreign nation, until congress shall have formally declared war? Congress have alone the constitutional right to elect to go to war; but in case of an actual war declared or waged by a foreign power, there is no option, war does already exist; a defensive war, without the agency of congress; a war de facto, and which would take the case out of the statute. Put the case of actual war commenced by Spain, against the United States, when war has not been declared by congress, would it not be permitted to the president, to call out the military forces of the Union, to repel the aggression? Certainly it would. An attack may be made here at the city of New York; may not the president commence and execute offensive operations, to draw off the enemy from this port, and put them on their defence in Florida, or any other part of the Spanish dominions? Offensive war once begun, the nation attacked succeeds to all the rights of legitimate warfare. It may merely resist its enemy, or it may repel its aggressions by a stroke at the head, the heart, or the extremities. All are equally justifiable. Suppose, in the progress of this cause, we should be able to verify the language of the president in his message on the subject of a war with Spain, when he speaks of force being to be met by force; and that we should show the conflict had already commenced, in which we were trying "who could do the other most harm"; would not this be actual war?

I ask, whether a war has not existed between this country and other nations, without a declaration of war by congress? Whether it did not exist against Tripoli and other African states, without such a declaration? Do I mistake the fact when I say, that an expedition was fitted out against Tripoli? And will it be denied, that we were then in a state of actual war? Yet congress had declared no war. Was the president of the United States justifiable for this act of hostility, commenced without the authority of congress? Certainly he was. It can never be denied to the executive to resist an attack. He is constitutionally bound to defend the United States against all foreign attacks, as well as domestic insurrections, and in the way best calculated in his judgment to insure success. A law was afterwards passed by congress [2 Stat. 129], providing the ways and means of carrying on the war, then existing, and so existing; and let it be remarked, continuing to exist, without any positive or formal declaration by congress. If war then can exist between the United States and a foreign nation without a declaration of war by congress, it belongs to the executive of the Union to ascertain the fact, and to declare the condition of the nation,—to say if actual war exists or not. The constitution delegates to the executive the power to protect and preserve the peace of the United States,—to communicate with foreign nations; and he is the constitutional organ through which the people derive their knowledge of our political relations with foreign powers.

Mr. Hoffman then urged, that the assent and approbation of the president of the United States to the expedition charged in the indictment was strong evidence that Spain was not at peace with the United States; as it was not to be presumed, that the president would have violated his trust by authorizing the expedition. At any rate, that he was in the execution of a right constitutionally vested in him,—that he alone was responsible; and the individual who acted in conformity to his permission, had committed no offence.

(These topics were again argued by Mr. H. in his address to the jury; the reporter, therefore, omits to insert them in this part of the trial.)

Mr. Hoffman then proceeded to the second branch of his argument.

Waiving all farther discussion on the first point, I shall endeavor to fortify the argument, that the defendant is entitled to have the witnesses examined, and to submit his whole case to the court and jury, for the purpose of mitigating the punishment. The constitution of the United States secures to the accused the right to have compulsory process for his witnesses. This privilege is hardly worth the enjoyment, if it is to be confined to the case of a complete acquittal of the charges in an indictment. Col. Smith may be technically guilty, and yet his offence of so small a grade, as hardly to merit more than a nominal punishment. It is conceded, that after the trial, this court has no power to enforce the attendance of the witnesses, and the constitution does not extend its benevolent provisions to my client, unless he is permitted on the trial to prove the extent and nature of his offence. The correct principle is laid down in McNally's Evidence, already cited, "that wherever the punishment is discretionary, the testimony is to be received, although it only applies for the purposes of mitigation." I think I may, without fear of contradiction, assert that there is no authority to the contrary; and I speak with confidence that such has been the practice in the courts of this state. While I had the honor of holding the office of attorney-general, the objection was never made; and I understand, that the practice of my predecessors always corresponded with my own.

Let us examine the question upon the strength of authority. Besides the case already mentioned from McNally, there has been read to the court the Case of the Earl of Anglesea; to which, I presume, will be opposed the Case of the Chevalier D'Eon, in 3 Burrows, 1513. The case is shortly thus: An information was filed against the Chevalier D'Eon for a libel on the Count De Geurchy. M. D'Eon moved to postpone the trial on account of the absence of material witnesses. It appeared that the witnesses resided in France, and were there at the time of printing and publishing the libel, and that they were in the service of the crown of France; and that there was no probability of their being sent over, or even permitted to come over, to give evidence on behalf of D'Eon. It is to be observed, that their attendance could be never be enforced, nor could they be compelled to give evidence in any stage of the prosecution. Their attendance and their evidence would be altogether voluntary, and no possible injustice could be done to the defendant by refusing to postpone the trial; for it would be useless to delay it in expectation of obtaining the testimony. Lord Mansfield proceeds to say: "If their knowledge relates to any circumstance that may serve to mitigate the punishment, in case the defendant should be convicted, that sort of evidence will not come too late after conviction of the offence, and may be laid before the court by affidavits." Lord Mansfield by no means decides, that the evidence could not be received on the trial. He only says, it will not come too late after conviction. The Chevalier D'Eon was not deprived of any benefit by the course adopted by the court on that occasion, for as they could not aid him by any process that could be awarded, they leave him in the same situation as if the trial was not postponed,—to his ability to obtain voluntary affidavits. Not so here; this court can enforce the attendance of the witnesses at the trial, and at no other time. If the testimony is not then received, the defendant must forego it; for after trial no compulsory process can issue; and strange as it may seem, the defendant has a right secured to him by the constitution, which he cannot enjoy, if the court refuses to interpose its authority, and compel the attendance of the witnesses at the trial. The Case of D'Eon, therefore, fairly considered, is in principle with us.

The question appears to be reduced to the single point: The testimony we seek is material to the defendant in this cause. The court can now give him the benefit of it; if they do not, he may be presented for punishment as an offender whose guilt is of the deepest dye. And is it not material to the cause of the defendant, that the extent of his offence should be known? Is it not material to his personal liberty, to his interest and his character, that the punishment should bear a just proportion to the offence? The discretion granted to the court by the statute is useless, if the defendant is deprived of the means of showing circumstances evincive of his innocent intentions, and justly demanding the utmost lenity of the court. This subject is before the court in a way extremely inauspicious to the honor of the government of the United States; the president of the United States approving the act which he now seeks to punish. His approbation no doubt proceeded from honorable motives,—from enlarged views of the true policy and dignity of our country. It deserves praise. But if he did order this prosecution, it is not for me to justify or excuse the perfidy. Let it, too, be remembered, that in the Case of D'Eon, Lord Mansfield says: "If the witnesses had been sent away by the person on whose account the prosecution is carried on, that indeed would have been a sufficient ground for putting off the trial until they could be had. But here," says his lordship, "is no pretence for such an insinuation." Are we not expressly within this principle? The president of the United States ordering the prosecution, and the president of the United States restraining the witnesses from attending.

To conclude: The justice of our present application must be evident, and unless there exists some stubborn and unbending rule of law to the contrary, I indulge a strong hope, that the court will postpone the trial, compel obedience to its process, and thereby become possessed of the whole truth. If so, my client has no dread of punishment: It may be nominal; it cannot be severe.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice, expressed some regret that it was not in the power of the parties to carry the present motion up to the supreme court for its opinion, which could only be done in consequence of a difference in opinion between the two judges sitting in the circuit court as expressly declared by the law.

Mr. Sanford read an affidavit, as follows: "District of New York, to wit: Nathan Sanford, being duly sworn, deposes and says, that the offences laid in the indictments in these causes, took place in the city of New York between the twenty-fifth day of December last, and the first day of February last; that the facts which will be given in evidence on the part of the prosecution, upon the trial of the said indictments, took place in the state of New York, and principally in the city of New York, during that period; that during the whole of that period, James Madison, Robert Smith, Jacob Wagner, and William Thornton, were, as this deponent has been informed and really believes, at the city of Washington, and not in the state of New York; and that, as this deponent has been informed and really believes, the said James Madison, Robert Smith, Jacob Wagner, and William Thornton have not, nor has either of them, any personal knowledge of the offences charged in the said indictments, or of the facts which will be given in evidence upon the trial of the same on the part of the United States; and farther this deponent says not. Nathan Sanford." Mr. Sanford proceeded to say that the facts stated in this affidavit were not at variance with those stated in the affidavit offered by the defendant.

Sanford. If I understand the questions now before the court, they are these: First, whether the trial shall be postponed until the defendant's witnesses, who are now absent, shall come in; and second, whether attachments shall issue against the four witnesses who have not attended upon the subpœnas. It was decided by the court yesterday, that it was incumbent upon the defendant, in order to entitle himself to a postponement of the trial on account of the absence of these witnesses, to show in what respect they are material for his defence. It was the opinion of the court that the general affidavit in common form would not be sufficient for this purpose; but that the particular facts expected from the witnesses must be disclosed, in order that the court might, upon those facts, judge of the propriety of granting the postponement. In compliance with this decision the defendant has now made an affidavit, in which he has stated the particular facts which he expects to establish by those witnesses. The matters stated in this affidavit must at present be taken to be true, and for the purposes of this motion, it must be supposed that the witnesses are really able to prove the facts stated. The point of inquiry, therefore, is whether the matters stated in the affidavit of the defendant are material in point of law, to his defence, upon the trial of this indictment.

The principal allegation of the defendant in his affidavit is, that the military expedition against Carracas, and his agency in it, took place with the knowledge and approbation of the president and the secretary of state. It is said by his counsel, this amounts to a complete justification of the offence, or that, at least, it must operate in mitigation of punishment; and that in either view, they are entitled to the testimony. This we altogether deny It can neither operate in justification or in mitigation. The most superficial attention to our constitution and form of government will be sufficient to convince any one that this sort of defence is wholly inadmissible. It proceeds altogether upon the idea that the executive may dispense with the laws at pleasure; a supposition as false in theory as it would be dangerous and destructive to the constitution in practice. The defendant is indicted for a breach of a positive statute of the United States. Do his counsel seriously contend that the president dispensed with the law in this instance? Where will they find an authority of this nature vested in the president? For unless they show this, they gain nothing by their argument. Among the powers and duties of the president, declared by the constitution, he is expressly required "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed." They will not venture to contend that this clause gives the president the right of dispensing with the laws. Does the president derive such a power from his legislative character? Certainly not? He has a qualified veto, before the law passes. If he approves a bill, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, and the bill may be passed into a law, without his consent. When it has become a law, according to the forms of the constitution, it is his duty to take care that it be faithfully executed. He cannot suspend its operation, dispense with its application, or prevent its effect, otherwise than by the exercise of its constitutional power of pardoning, after conviction. If he could do so, he could repeal the law, and would thus invade the province assigned to the legislature, and become paramount to the other branches of the government. To repeal a law, is an exercise of the same legislative power as to make a law; and the legislative power, for whatever purpose exerted, can only be exercised by the whole legislature. The president has no legislative power whatever, except in approving or disapproving bills, which have been adopted by a majority of both houses of congress. These principles result from the constitution, or rather, they are found in the constitution itself. The constitution of the United States is a delegation of limited powers. The powers delegated are not only defined with accuracy, but are with equal caution allotted to different branches of the government. We observe throughout the separation of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers, a feature which renders it justly dear to the people. Hence it has become our boast that ours is a government of laws, and not of men. The judiciary surely will never give its sanction to so gross a violation of these principles, as would take place if the defence which is now attempted to be made were allowed to prevail. If, then, the president has no power to dispense with the law, it follows undeniably, that his knowledge and approbation of the offence, cannot be a justification to the offender. If the president has acted improperly, or failed in the execution of his duty, his conduct may be the subject of inquiry before another tribunal. If he has been guilty of crimes or misdemeanors, he is answerable upon an impeachment. The defendant is answerable for his conduct before this court, and a jury of his country.

It is said, however, by the adverse counsel, that if the defendant be not fully justified by the assent of the executive to his offence, yet that circumstance must operate materially to mitigate his punishment. If this idea be analyzed, it will appear to rest upon the fallacy, which, I trust, I have already sufficiently exposed. If the president has no power to dispense with the law, it must follow that an attempt to dispense with it would be altogether a void act, and could not afford any pretence of palliation or mitigation to the offender. But the counsel say that the defendant was, or might have been, ignorant of this, and might have supposed that the assent of the executive would shield him from the penalties of the law. This would be to allege ignorance of the law as a defence; and they might as well have urged that the defendant was ignorant of the statute prohibiting military expeditions, upon which he is indicted. Some of the counsel have indeed had the hardihood to assert in terms that ignorance of the law is an excuse. The maxim of law on this subject, undoubtedly is, that "ignorantia juris quod quisque tenetur scire neminem excusat." This rule must be as much applicable to matters which are urged for the purpose of palliation or extenuation as to those which are presented by way of justification or complete defence. Were it otherwise, the veriest villain in society might escape from justice, under the pretense that he was ignorant of the law, or that he thought the law was dispensed with in his favor, to enable him to perpetrate offences prohibited to every other person. Our law does not recognize such an absurdity. Every man is bound to know the public law of the land; and if he violates them, he does it at his peril. Upon these principles, how does the purposed vindication of the defendant appear? The counsel say that he had the countenance or the connivance of the executive in the unlawful expedition. What then? I answer he was bound to know, not only the public statute of the United States, but also that the president has no power to dispense with its provisions. The countenance, or connivance, or consent of the president, can, therefore, neither justify his conduct nor mitigate his punishment. An idea was thrown out by the last counsel, that we were in a state of war with Spain at the time the expedition was prepared, and that therefore the case does not come within the statute, which relates only to military expeditions set on foot against foreign states, with whom the United States are at peace. It would be a sufficient answer to this idea, at present, to say that this is not now a question before the court. The inquiry at present is simply whether the matters stated by Colonel Smith in his affidavit, as the testimony which the absent witnesses can give are material to his defence? It is upon this affidavit alone that the postponement is now asked for. Colonel Smith does not state that he expects to prove anything respecting the state of peace or war by the absent witnesses. On the contrary, he states that their testimony, will relate entirely to other objects. The affidavit states that the expedition was set on foot with the knowledge and approbation of the president; but contains not a word of a war with Spain. But this is not the only answer which may be given to this idea of war with Spain. It must appear affirmatively on our part at the trial, that the United States and Spain were at peace. How is this to appear? The constitution vests the power of declaring war in the legislature. It is a power given up by the states to the general government as an attribute of the national and supreme authority. It must, therefore, appear from the acts of the legislature, that the country is at war. But, the counsel say that an actual state of war may exist without the declaration of congress, and have attempted to cite instances of such wars. There is no instance in which the president has undertaken to make war, but in pursuance of the provisions of the constitution and laws passed under it. He certainly has power to repel invasions, and suppress insurrections; but even this is a power not vested in him by the constitution, but is expressly delegated to him by a statute. Act Feb. 28, 1795 [1 Stat. 424]. The counsel also speak of the late war with Tripoli. That war was also authorized by an act of the legislature.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice, desired Mr. Sanford to lay that law before the court; accordingly the law in volume 6, p. 8, was handed up.

Sanford. But the question of peace or war is to be determined by the court upon the laws themselves. The acts of the legislature when they make war, or cause it to be made by others, are like all their other acts; public statutes or general laws which the courts must recognize. So treaties of peace made by the president, with the consent of two-thirds of the senate, are the supreme laws of the land. The judges are bound to know judicially, and to conform to these as to all other laws. It follows then, that the question of peace or war, is a question of law, to be determined by the statute book, and not a question of fact, to be determined by the testimony of any man. The treaty between Spain and the United States, made in 1795, is still in force, and must remain so until it be abrogated by an act of the legislature; and as such is the law of the land while it remains in force, there is no power in this country that can authorize an individual to set on foot a military expedition against Spain, or any of her territories.

In the year 1798, when congress thought proper to enter into a partial war with France, they began by rescinding the treaties and conventions which then existed between France and the United States. The court will not listen to what has been said respecting the president's message to congress at their last session, and the measures which may have been projected or proposed in that body, without having been finally adopted. It is absurd to contend that an individual may infringe the laws at pleasure, because the legislature in their secret deliberations, may have repealed the law or may have declared war. I do not mean to occupy the attention of the court in combatting arguments or assertions like these. I have attempted to show that the testimony of the absent witnesses is not material either for the purpose of justification or mitigation. The Case of D'Eon has been cited on the other side. If that case be examined, it will be seen to be a strong authority in our favor. In that case, the court held that they ought to be satisfied that the witnesses were material; that there had been no neglect in the party applying for delay, in endeavoring to procure their attendance; and that there was a reasonable expectation of his being able to procure their attendance at some future time. In that case, as in this, it appeared negatively that the witnesses were not material; for they were not present when the criminal transaction was charged to have taken place. It is added, if their knowledge relates to any circumstances that may serve to mitigate the punishment, in case he should be convicted, that sort of evidence will not come too late after the conviction of the offence, and may be laid before the court by affidavit. Upon the whole, they were clearly of opinion that the putting off the trial could not tend to advance justice, but, on the contrary, would delay it. This case then is a decisive authority to show that a trial is not to be postponed on account of the absence of witnesses, who, if present, could only give evidence in mitigation of the punishment; such evidence would not be proper on the trial of the issue, and could only be received by the court in its discretion after conviction. The counsel who opened this argument threw out an idea that because the jury were judges of the law as well as of the fact, they were therefore entitled to hear all the testimony which the party might offer. He attempted indeed to modify his position, but did not divest it of its absurdity. The court are judges of what is proper evidence to go to a jury; and unless the counsel intend to deny this, and insist that the jury are judges of the testimony which it is proper for them to receive,—a position which would be equally contrary to the law and practice,—I do not perceive the point of this argument. The court, in the first place, judge of the testimony which is to go to the jury, and the jury then judge of the fact and the law upon that testimony, which the court suffer them to receive.

Having thus reviewed the ideas of others, and stated my own upon the question for a postponement, I now pass on to consider the motion for attachment. The adverse counsel suppose they are entitled to the attachment, as of course, and have cited some authorities to prove this point. This we deny. The proceeding by attachment against absent witnesses is undoubtedly known to the law; but such an attachment never issues of course. It is a summary and extraordinary proceeding, which is used by the court in its discretion, to vindicate its justice and punish contempts against its authority. The only rule which can be laid down on the subject, therefore, is that the court may or may not issue the attachment in its discretion, according to all the circumstances of the case. The party injured by the absence of the witness has his remedy against him by action, without this extraordinary process of the court. When the attachment is issued, it is issued not for the purpose of bringing in the witness to testify, but in order to punish him for contempt.

The counsel opposed to us have argued as if we meant to insist that the absent witnesses are entitled to some peculiar privilege or special exemption from giving testimony. We do not contend for any such exemption; we oppose the application for attachments on other grounds.

If I have succeeded, in any degree, in the preceding part of my argument, I have shown that the testimony of the absent witnesses is altogether immaterial, and could not be received if they were now present. If this be so, it would seem to be a strange absurdity, that the court should be bound of course to issue attachments against persons who are absent, who could not testify if they were present. And unless I deceive myself, it is now presented to the court as a naked question, whether the court shall issue the attachments of course against absent witnesses who have been summoned, merely because they have been summoned, when it appears to the court, from the statement of the party who calls for them, that they could not have testified in the cause if they had attended. If it be discretionary in the court, to grant or refuse the attachments, as we contend it is, this is surely a case in which they ought to be refused. It was an abuse of the process of the court, to summon persons who could not be witnesses. It would be intolerable to subject those persons to imprisonment, not for any purpose of justice, but merely because they were summoned by a process which issues of course at the pleasure of every party. I admit that the court have power to issue attachments, but they will undoubtedly exercise it in sound discretion, for fair purposes, and to promote justice. They will take care, on the other hand, to enforce obedience to their process, in all cases where the purposes of justice require it, and on the other, they will take equal care that this process shall never be turned to improper purposes, or employed to harass men who know nothing of the transaction about which they are summoned to testify. In addition to this, it appears that the absent witnesses have not failed to attend, from any contumacy or contemptuous disregard of the authority of the court. There are documents before the court, which exhibit the reasons of their absence, and show that they intended no contempt of the court, even if their testimony had been material.

Colden. If the letters in the possession of the court which have not been read are alluded to, and are to be made any use of in this argument, I shall pray that they may be read. There are some parts of them which we think material for us, particularly when one of the gentlemen who wrote these letters says he was present when the president of the United States ordered these prosecutions.

Sanford. I will read them.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. It is unnecessary. We have the papers before us.

Sanford. If the court then are satisfied that no contempt was intended; and that the testimony they could give, were they here, would be immaterial and inadmissible, this surely is not a fit case for attachments. Another objection to the application for attachment arises from the affidavit of the service of the subpœnas. It is stated that the deponent tendered the sum of twenty dollars to each of the witnesses for his expenses. This sum is insufficient, and the service of the subpœnas being therefore defective, that circumstance alone would exempt the witnesses from being liable to attachment. A witness is not bound to attend, unless the full amount of his expenses is tendered to him at the time of serving the subpœna.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. Is there any law of congress on that point?

Sanford. Yes, there is a law defining the amount of the witnesses' fees.

Colden. This does not apply to criminal prosecutions. We contend that it is not necessary to tender any thing to a witness in a criminal case.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. What! by the common law?

Emmet. Neither by common law nor by statute. The statute of Elizabeth was the first law that gave a witness a right to demand his expenses.

Sanford. The whole doctrine is laid down at length in Sell. Prac. p. 454.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. Is there any statute on this subject by the United States?

Sanford. The compensation allowed to witnesses by the law of the United States is ten cents per mile for going and returning. This, without any allowance for attendance, would amount to more than twenty dollars, in the case of the witnesses from Washington. In respect to the necessity of tendering the expenses at the time of serving the subpœnas, I conceive the law and practice of this state must govern. This must be a case in which the laws of the United States recognize the law of the state as a rule of decision. By the law and practice of this state it is unquestionably necessary to tender the expenses. Here I rest the argument in the hands of the able counsel who will succeed me.

Colden. The affidavit states more than the district attorney has attended to. The affidavit is that Mr. Madison found fault neither with the quantity nor quality of the money, adding it was unnecessary to say any thing more on the subject.

Edwards. The vast concourse of people who have constantly attended these trials in every stage of their progress must convince every intelligent observer that some motive other than their importance must have produced this effect. From the solicitude discoverable in their countenances, it is evident an importance has been attached to them which their intrinsic merits do not justify. But it is improper for me to be more explicit on this delicate point. The learned and independent court before whom I appear will not participate in that glowing sensibility which evidently warms this assembly; they are above the reach of party views, and will decide with wisdom and the purest integrity. On my part, it would be highly indecorous, as well as weak in the extreme, to attempt to influence its decisions on the points submitted, by calling to my aid any consideration which is not intimately connected with such a view of the subject, as must naturally lead to a result demanded by the strict principles of the laws of our country.

Had the present application been made simply for attachments against the non-attending witnesses, and exclusively for the purpose of punishing them for a contempt of the process of the court, the counsel for the United States would not, on this occasion, have troubled the court with any observation. In that case it would have been a matter between the United States and the witnesses. But the motion before the court has a double aspect: 1st. It is a motion for attachments, to the end, that the witnesses named may be brought into court and punished for contempt. 2nd. To bring them into court to testify in these causes. And if the motion can be sustained for these two purposes, the effect will necessarily be, that the trials must be postponed. It will be recollected by the court, that I yesterday stated, that an attachment against a witness for non-attendance, after having been duly served, with a subpœna, is never granted for the purpose of bringing in a witness ad testificandum, but exclusively for the purpose of punishing him for a contempt. At that time some of the learned counsel for the defendant treated this proposition as one wholly untenable. This circumstance led me to hope, that I should, on a discussion of the question now before the court, have heard from them some remarks intended to render my position questionable. But no observations of the kind which I had anticipated, have been made. I shall, however, not dismiss that point, until I shall have again stated, and attempted to support by authorities, the position which I then with confidence submitted to the court. I repeat then, that in no case do the courts of common law grant an attachment against a non-attending witness, who has been regularly subpœnaed, for the purpose of bringing such witnesses into court ad testificandum; but in such case the attachment is issued exclusively for the purpose of bringing him into court to answer for the contempt offered to the court, by disobeying its process. In criminal causes, I readily admit, that the practice of granting an attachment against a non-attending witness, subpœnaed on the part of the crown, is very ancient; but my researches have not yet brought to my view a single case, in which an attachment has been granted against a witness, subpœnaed by the defendant in a criminal prosecution. In point of principle, however, I do not hesitate to say, that it is as competent for the court to grant an attachment in the latter as in the former case.

But the question still recurs, is an attachment, in either civil or criminal causes, ever granted for the purpose of bringing in a witness ad testificandum? In the case of Bowles v. Johnson, 1 W. Bl. 36, on motion for attachment against one Yerbury for not giving evidence at the assizes, Lee, C. J., says: "This is a new case. Attachments are a new practice. I remember the first motion for them." This was in Michaelmas term, 22 Geo. II. 1748. A recurrence to the English reporters will enable us not only to date the birth of this practice, but to fix upon the very time when the first travail throes took place that eventually brought it into existence. In the case of Hammond v. Stewart, 1 Strange, 510, determined Hil. term, 8 Geo. I., cited also in Wyat v. Wingford, 2 Ld. Raym. 1528; and in the case of Daleson v. Aland, determined in the exchequer, Mich., 10 Geo. I., a rule to show cause had been granted; but in each of those cases, the rule was discharged by the court. In Wakefield's Case, Cas. t. Hardw. 313, determined Trin., 10 Geo. II., in B. R., Lord Hardwicke says: "The way of proceeding by attachment is a new method." In the common pleas, Trin., 13 Geo. II., in the case of Huffe v. Fowke, and in the case of Stephenson v. Brookes, reported in Barnes, Notes Cas. 33, the court, in the first case, refused to grant a rule to show cause; and in the second, after having granted a rule to discharged the rule, refused to grant an attachment, saying that "the party may have his action upon the statute of 5 Eliz. c. 9." In the case of Chapman v. Pointon, Easter term, 14 Geo. II., in B. R., the court say, "that this way of punishing as for a contempt, was new and practiced only in the court; the common pleas not doing it to this day, but leaving the party to his remedy on 5 Eliz. c. 9." 2 Strange, 1150. From what is said in the case of Stretch v. Wheeler (Easter term, 27 Geo. II.) Barnes, Notes Cas. 497, it may fairly be inferred, that at that time the common pleas had not gone into the practice adopted in the king's bench, long before, of granting attachments for a contempt against non-attending witnesses, who had been regularly subpœnaed. In the case of Wyat v. Wingford, the court made the rule absolute for granting an attachment. This happened July 2, 1728.

The origin of the practice of granting attachments against witnesses in civil causes having been thus clearly exhibited, I proceed to establish the proposition, that attachments are never granted for any other purpose than that of punishing the witness for a contempt. Lord Raymond, in giving the opinion of the court in the case of Wyat v. Wingford, says: "But the court in this case thought it was a good foundation for an attachment; the disobedience to the subpœna being a contempt to the court." Not a word is said in this case by the court, or the counsel, that intimates an idea that the attachment was moved for in order to bring the witnesses into court to testify. But there is a circumstance in this case which puts it beyond a doubt, that that could not have been the purpose for which the motion for an attachment was made. One Rolf Baily had been subpœnaed to attend the assizes in a cause in which Wyatt was plaintiff, and Wingford defendant; and there had been a tender to Baily of his charges; Baily did not attend, whereby the plaintiff was nonsuited. This is the state of the case as reported in 2 Strange, 810, by the name of Wyatt v. Winkworth, but confessedly the same case as that reported in Lord Raymond, by the name of Wyat v. Wingford. Surely after the cause was out of court, the plaintiff having been nonsuited, it must have been idle indeed to have moved for an attachment, if the object aimed at had been to bring in Baily ad testificandum. In the cases in Stephenson v. Brookes, before cited, and the case of Brodie v. Tickell, Barnes, Notes Cas.

35, which latter case was in the common pleas, Hil., 24 Geo. II., were also cases in which a motion for an attachment was made after nonsuit. To the same purpose is the case of Rex v. Ring, 8 Term R. 585. In this case an attachment was moved for, and granted against Ring for not appearing at the assizes to testify before the grand jury against Everland and Davis, committed to Salisbury jail on a charge of felony. Ring not appearing, the grand jury threw out the bill. Jekyll, on the part of the prosecution, moved for an attachment, and it was granted. The courts of Westminster always consider the proceeding by way of attachment as for a contempt, as a criminal proceeding. In the case of Smalt v. Whitmill, 2 Strange, 1050, the reporter says: "But it appearing not to be a personal service (that is, of the subpœna), the court held it not sufficient to warrant a proceeding criminally against him (that is, the witness)." In this case an attachment was moved for against a witness for not attending, being subpœnaed and having a shilling left. In the case of Chapman v. Pointon, already cited for another purpose, the court say "that this way of punishing as for a contempt was new," &c. And so strictly is this proceeding by way of attachment against a witness as for a contempt holden to be a criminal proceeding, that the affidavits and all the other papers in the cause must be entitled, "The King v. the Persons to be Attached." To this purpose is the case of Rex v. Sheriff of Middlesex, 3 Term R. 133. It is there said: "But as the affidavits on both sides were entitled Robins v. Hall, and as the rule was drawn up on the civil side of the court, a doubt arose whether the proceedings were properly entitled, and the court held them to be irregular, and that a motion for an attachment in the course of a civil suit ought to go on the crown side of the court, and the affidavits entitled 'The King against the Person to be Attached,' because it was not a motion in the cause, but arising out of it." Farther. it is laid down in all our law books which speak on this subject, the granting an attachment is in the discretion of the court; but if granting an attachment for the non-attendance of a witness be ex debito justitiæ, the court can exercise no discretion; they have in that case only the power to inquire whether the witness had been duly subpœnaed, and whether the non-attendance was through obstinacy or not? Chapman v. Pointon, 2 Strange, 1150.

From this review of the history of attachments, as relative to witnesses, we are authorized to say: 1st. That it never was considered, in the origin or progress of this practice, either by counsel or by the court, that an attachment was granted for the purpose of bringing in the witness ad testificandum. 2d. But that an attachment, if granted, was always granted exclusively for the purpose of punishing the witness for a contempt.

But there is another ground on which this motion for attachments may be successfully resisted. The court will never grant an attachment in the first instance. The first motion must be for a rule to show cause. This was the course pursued in the cases of Hammond v. Stewart (8 Geo. I., B. R.) 1 Strange, 510; Daleson v. Aland (10 Geo. I., in the exchequer); Stephenson v. Brookes, 13 & 14 Geo. II.; Chapman v. Pointon; Wyat v. Wingford (2 Geo. II., B. R.); Stretch v. Wheeler, Barnes, Notes Cas. 497; 27 Geo. II. I mention only the earliest cases. The case of Chaunt v. Smart, 1 Bos. & P. 477, in the common pleas, sets this point at rest. Here the court say, "that in future the practice of this court should be conformable to that of the king's bench, and the rule should be to show cause why the attachment should not issue in all cases, except of non-payment of costs on the prothonotary's allocatur."

The motion for an attachment in the first instance, is certainly irregular, and therefore the defendant can take nothing by his present motion. But it has been contended by the counsel for the defendant, that this question, viz. "Shall an attachment be granted to bring in a witness ad testificandum?" rests in the courts of the United States on the basis of the constitution. For by the 6th article of the amendments of the constitution, it is among other things provided, "That in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right, &c., to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." That, therefore, it is the constitutional right of the defendant to have an attachment to bring in his witnesses, and that nothing short of an attachment will be compulsory process according to the true spirit and meaning of this constitutional provision. The words relied on by the counsel for the defendant are, "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." If the meaning of the word "compulsory," here used, can be determined, we shall find no difficulty in ascertaining, with perfect precision, the degree of weight which ought to be attached to the argument urged by the defendant's counsel. Process to compel the attendance of witnesses in criminal and civil causes was a kind of process well known to the people of the United States, long before and at the time the articles of amendment to the constitution were adopted. They borrow their language, their laws, and of course their technical terms of them, from England.

The only process to compel (in the first instance) the attendance of witneses in criminal or civil causes known to the courts of common law in that country, and in this, is a subpœna. No other process is ever issued in England but a subpœna, even in criminal causes. When the parliament enacted the statute of 7 Wm. III. c. 3, pt. 7, the crown possessed no right to use any other process than a subpœna to compel the attendance of its witnesses. Until the making of that statute, the prisoner could by no process compel the attendance of his witnesses. By that statute it is enacted, "that every person who shall be indicted for high treason, whereby any corruption of blood may be made, shall have the like process of the court where he shall be tried to compel his witnesses to appear for him at such trial, as is usually granted to compel witnesses to appear against him." In England, then, a subpœna is compulsory process; it is the only compulsory process (unless entering into a recognizance to appear at the trial be called process) provided for the crown, or the prisoner, by the laws of that country. The article in the constitution of the United States, relied upon by the defendant's counsel, it is true, has no relative clause in it, as the statute of 7 Wm. III. has; for that says: "He shall have the like process of the court where he shall be tried to compel his witnesses to appear for him at such trial, as is usually granted to compel witnesses to attend against him." This, however, cannot help the argument of the defendant's counsel. The constitution has not told us what that process shall be, but has used the word "process" in reference to obtaining witnesses. The words "compulsory process" are used as being terms, the meaning of which was then well understood. It was to be process which would, according to the legal notions existing in the minds of the framers of the constitution, be adequate to compel the attendance of the witnesses of the accused. To the present moment the United States cannot use any other process to compel the attendance of witnesses on their behalf in criminal causes, than a subpœna; and no one has ever entertained an idea, but that a subpœna, when used in such cases, is compulsory process, or in other words, a process to compel the attendance of witnesses.

One of two things must have been in the intentions of the people of the United States when they adopted this amendment: First, that in all criminal prosecutions, the accused should have such compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor as was then known to our laws, and used for such a purpose; or, secondly, that a new kind of compulsory process, not hitherto in use in our courts, or known to our laws, for the purpose of compelling the attendance of witnesses in behalf of the accused, should be provided. If the former was the intention, then clearly the motion for attachment must be denied, or an attachment in our laws is not known as compulsory process for obtaining witnesses, but the process of subpœna is the only process recognized by our law for obtaining witnesses. If the latter was the intention of the people of the United States, the amendment relied upon has only provided that the accused shall have a right to compulsory process, for obtaining witnesses in his favor of a new kind not hitherto known to our laws. The amendment not having prescribed what that process shall be; not having said that it shall be an attachment, a warrant, a capias, or pointed out any of its attributes other than that it is to be "compulsory," they have, therefore, left the kind of process to be designated and prescribed by a law of congress; for courts of law cannot make a new process wholly unknown to the common law, and unauthorized by act of congress, and not prescribed by the constitution. So in article 3, § 1, of the constitution of the United States, it is declared, that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain or establish." But those courts must be created by act of congress before they can exercise any of the powers conferred on them by that article of the constitution. So in this case, if a process, not known to the existing laws, be directed in order to compel the attendance of the witnesses of the accused, that process must be provided and established by an act of congress. But the framers of the constitution never contemplated any other compulsory process than that already known to our laws, and constantly used, viz. a subpœna.

If by the expression in the amendment relied upon, "shall have a right to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor," the defendant has a right to an attachment, why was it not used in the first instance? Why was a subpœna the first process that he thought proper to use? There was no intimation in the article relied on, that the accused is first to use some other process than an attachment, but it is absolute, "a right to have compulsory process," and if it be the right of the accused to have any attachment at all for obtaining his witnesses, he has a right to have it in the onset. But if he had a right to have an attachment in the first instance, ex debito justitiæ, why did he not use it? He has been guilty of laches in not taking out an attachment instead of a subpœna. Had he taken his compulsory process in the first instance, he would on this day have had his witnesses in court. But he neglected to do this, and therefore he cannot now have the trial postponed for the purpose of taking out his attachment, that is, "compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor;" which process, according to the construction of the constitution contended for by his counsel, he had an undoubted right to have taken out in the first instance.

But we resist this motion on another ground. The motion is in effect, to postpone the trial of the cause for the reason stated in the affidavit. Before it will be granted, the defendant must satisfy the court that the gentlemen named in it are material witnesses; and that he has been guilty of no laches or neglect, in omitting to do all that he might have done to procure their attendance. These are principles laid down by the court in the case of Rex v. Le Chevalier D'Eon, 3 Burrows, 1513, and are founded in good sense.

The affidavit upon which the present motion is found appears to have been shaped with a view to these principles, for it states "that the defendant expects to be able to prove by Mr. Madison" and others "that the expedition and enterprise to which the said indictment relates was begun, prepared, and set on foot with the knowledge and approbation of the president of the United States;" and "that if he had any concern in the said expedition and enterprise, it was with the approbation of the president of the United States and the said James Madison;" and "that he expects to be able to prove by the said witnesses, that the prosecution against him for the said offence, charged in the said indictment, was so commenced and prosecuted by order of the president of the United States;" and "that he has been informed, and doth verily believe, that James Madison and Robert Smith are prevented from attending by the order or interposition of the president of the United States." Their testimony, it is urged, is material in two points of view: 1st. It will show that the United States were not, at the time when the enterprise is alleged to have been set on foot, "at peace with Spain." 2d. Should the court be of opinion that it is not material in that respect, it is material for the purpose of showing to the court the degree of criminality attached to the defendant by any agency which he may have had in beginning or "setting on foot the expedition" alleged, and thereby enabling the court to proportion the punishment of the defendant according to the degree of his guilt. That to enable the defendant to obtain the testimony of these witnesses for this purpose, it is necessary that he should now be furnished with compulsory process; for after a verdict of guilty, any testimony to this purpose must be laid before the court by affidavit, and the law knows of no process by which a witness can be compelled to make such an affidavit.

In support of the first proposition, it is urged, that the testimony expected from these witnesses, will establish this as a fact, and the United States were not, at the time when the alleged offence is supposed to have been committed at peace with Spain; for it will certainly evince that "the expedition and enterprise" referred to "were begun, prepared and set on foot with the knowledge and approbation of the president," and this "approbation" necessarily implies on the part of the president an acknowledgment that the United States were then at war with Spain; and, by the constitution of the United States, the president possesses the power of determining whether the United States were at war or not, in cases where any aggressions and acts of hostility have been committed by a foreign nation upon the territory, or citizens of the United States. If the constitutional principle which is assumed by the defendant's counsel cannot be maintained, the first ground, viz. the materiality of this testimony in point of justification, must be abandoned.

In support of this proposition, "that by the constitution of the United States, the president possesses the power contended for," much stress has been laid on the 3d section of the 2d article of the constitution. "He" (the president) "shall, from time to time give to the congress information of the state of the Union." These words, it has been insisted, give to the president the power of determining whether the United States are or are not in a state of war. This section, if susceptible of the construction contended for, must also, of necessity, give to the president the power of determining, after war shall have been declared by congress, that the United States are at peace; and, of course, of repealing the act of congress by which war may have been declared. The words are, "give to the congress information of the state of the Union." In the 8th section of the 1st article of the constitution, it is declared, "that the congress shall have power to declare war." Here this power is given in a most explicit manner. But, if the construction of the 3d section of the 2d article be as contended for, then the constitution, in point of effect, reads thus: "Congress shall have power to declare war, but the president shall have power to determine when the United States are at war, and when they are at peace," "notwithstanding congress shall have declared that the United States are at war." And I ask the learned counsel what will prevent the president from putting an end to a war declared by congress the very next moment after it shall have been declared by them, provided it be true that by stating to congress that the United States are not at war, he can change the state of the country from that of war to that of peace? Was it ever until the present pressing occasion imagined that by making it the duty of an agent to give information to his principal of his business, that thereby the agent was vested with the power of altering the condition of the principal?

It is undoubtedly made the duty of all the envoys of the United States in Europe, "from time to time, to give information of the state" of our affairs with the respective powers, at whose courts they represent the United States; but was it ever imagined that those envoys thereby became invested with a power to alter the state of our political relations? The president is obliged by the constitution to give to the congress information of the state of the Union; a power to give to the congress information of the state of the Union, and a power to declare to congress, what are our political relations as to other nations in point of war or peace, are very distinct powers. The one regards the statement of facts, affecting the United States, which have occurred and come to the knowledge of the president; the other regards the power of determining what shall be the legal effect of those facts, as to the political state of the nation, and its relation to other nations.

The framers of the constitution of the United States appear to have perfectly well understood and duly appreciated the principles expressed by Vattel, in book 3, c. 1, § 4. "As nature has given to men the right of using force only when it becomes necessary for their defence and the preservation of their rights, the inference is manifest, that since the establishment of political societies, a right so dangerous in its exercise no longer remains with private persons, except in those kinds of rencounters where society cannot protect or defend them." For in the congress of the United States, solely and exclusively, did they place the power of making war. As it is the people who are to endure the fatigues and calamities, and sustain the waste of blood and treasure inseparable from war, they have confided the power of making it to their immediate representatives. They have, therefore, declared that "the congress shall have power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water." But the wise men who framed the constitution did not stop here; lest the right of making war should be claimed by the several states, they cautiously inserted in the constitution a prohibitory clause; they declared that "no state shall without the consent of congress lay any duty of tonnage, &c., or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay." By the constitution, therefore, no state can engage in war, unless for the purpose of self-defence, and then only when actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay." But if the proposition contended for by the defendant's counsel be correct, then it follows that although the people of the United States have conferred on congress the power of declaring war, and have denied the power of engaging in war in any event whatever, but those specified in the 8th section of the third article of the constitution, to every state in the Union, yet that they have by declaring that the president "shall, from time to time, give to the congress information of the state of the Union," by necessary implication, given to him also the power of declaring that the United States are in a state of war, or, in other words, of declaring war. That is to say, because it was the duty of the president to give information to the congress, that some Spanish troops had come into the territory of the United States, and in a hostile manner carried off the Kempers, and the president, in fulfillment of his duty, had given to congress information of those facts; therefore, the president did declare the United States to be at war with Spain. To give such a course of reasoning the semblance of solidity, the gentlemen, to be consistent with themselves, must go farther; for the words relied upon are imperative: "He shall," &c. If, then, by giving to the congress information that acts of hostility have been committed against the United States by Spain (and this it was his duty to do), he necessarily declared war, it follows, that the constitution has imposed upon the president the duty of declaring war in all cases, when acts of hostility have been committed upon the territory or citizens of the United States. If giving information of the state of the Union, means stating to congress what is the existing political state of the United States as to war, then it follows that he possesses the power of determining that our treaty with the sovereign of any nation with which we may be thus declared to be at war, is at an end; for if the United States are at war, such treaty is no longer obligatory. If, however, I should yield to the gentlemen this strange, and until this argument, unheard-of, interpretation of the constitution, will it profit the defendant? Has the president given to congress information of the United States being in a state of war with Spain? Has he announced that our relation to that country has become that of war? I ask, what has he done? Why, it is alleged that he has approved of this expedition, therefore, the United States are at war! To those who are capable of being misled by such reasoning, any observations within the compass of my abilities to urge, would be urged in vain.

But it has been asked, what if Spain should declare war against the United States, are not the United States de facto at war with Spain? Would the United States, in such an event, be at peace with Spain? I answer, whenever such a case shall happen, it may then be proper to consider whether the United States are de facto at war with Spain; it is sufficient for us at present to say that no such case had happened when the offence charged in the indictment was committed. But should it be granted, that in such a case the United States must be considered as being at war with Spain; that state of war would be produced by the declaration of war on the part of Spain, and not by the act of the president in giving information to congress of the existence of that fact. But the principle contended for is as novel as it is strange.

If we turn our attention to the practical interpretation of our constitution given by congress under the two former administrations, we shall find nothing to countenance the construction contended for, but much to convince us that it is wholly untenable. On the 27th of March, 1794, congress passed an act entitled "An act to provide a naval armament."

The preamble is in these words: "Whereas the depredations committed by the Algerine corsairs on the commerce of the United States, render it necessary that a naval force should be provided for its protection." 3 Folwell's Laws, 24 [1 Stat. 350].

It is here admitted by congress that such depredations had been committed by the Algerine corsairs as render it necessary that a naval force should be provided for the protection of its commerce. And in section 9 of the same act, it is enacted "that if peace shall take place between the United States and the regency of Algiers, that no farther proceedings be had under this act." President Washington had given to congress information of the state of the Union in relation to depredations committed by the Algerines, but it was not considered that his having given this information, de facto placed the United States in a state of war with those barbarians; but congress, this notwithstanding, not only declare that such have been the depredations committed by the Algerines, but, in the 9th section, declare that the United States are not at peace with the regency of Algiers.

On the first of July, 1797 [1 Stat. 523], a time when our affairs with France wore an aspect very much like war, her cruisers and national ships having committed most unjustifiable depredations on our commerce, congress passed another act, entitled an "Act to provide a naval armament," and by the 12th section authorized the president to increase the strength of the revenue cutters, and to cause them to be employed in defending the sea coast of the United States, and to repel any hostility to their vessels committed within their jurisdiction. It is in the recollection of the court that outrages on the part of France, unparalleled by anything yet done by them towards the United States, had been offered. These were stated by the president in the most explicit manner; a special congress convened for the purpose of taking these outrages into consideration. But this congress did not deem it their duty to declare that those outrages amounted to war. The president did not imagine that he possessed the power to produce that state of things called war; and congress did nothing more than to provide for the defence of the commerce of the United States, within its jurisdiction.

The discontents between this country and France still wearing the appearance of an approaching war, on the 28th May, 1798 [1 Stat. 558], it was enacted by congress "that the president of the United States be authorized, in the event of a declaration of war against the United States, or of actual invasion of their territory by a foreign power, or of imminent danger of such an invasion discovered in his opinion to exist, before the next session of congress," to cause to be enlisted, &c. From this it is manifest that even at this time congress does not admit that we were at war with any foreign power. On the same day [1 Stat. 561], congress passed an act entitled "An act more effectually to protect the commerce of the United States," the preamble to which is in the words following, viz.: "Whereas armed vessels sailing under authority, or pretence of authority, from the republic of France, have committed depredations on the commerce of the United States, and have recently captured the vessels and property of citizens thereof, on and near the coasts, in violation of the law of nations, and treaties between the United States and the French nation, therefore," &c. Here is an admission by congress, that armed vessels sailing under authority, or pretence of authority, from the republic of France, had committed depredations on our commerce, and captured our vessels in or near our coast, in violation of the laws of nations and of treaties between the United States and the French nation. But what did they do? "Authorize the president to instruct and direct the commanders of the armed vessels belonging to the United States to take, seize, and bring into any port of the United States to be proceeded against according to the laws of nations, any such armed vessel which shall have committed, or which shall be found hovering on the coasts of the United States for the purpose of committing depredations on vessels belonging to the citizens thereof; and also to retake any ship or vessel of any citizen of the United States which may have been captured by any such armed vessel." 4 Folwell's Laws, 120 [1 Stat. 561]. Defence only is what they authorized; but congress did not even then declare that we were in a state of war. Sixteen days after this, congress passed another act, entitled "An act to suspend the commercial intercourses between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof." 4 Folwell's Laws, 129 [1 Stat. 565[. This act is what its title bespeaks it to be. By its 5th section it is provided "that if, before the next session of congress, the government of France, and all persons acting by or under their authority, shall clearly disavow, and shall be found to refrain from the aggressions, depredations, and hostilities, which have been, and are by them encouraged and maintained against the vessels and other property of the citizens of the United States and against their national rights and sovereignty, in violation of the faith of treaties and the laws of nations, and shall thereby," &c. Congress in this section have put it on record, that the government of France had been hostile, and at the time of making this act, were committing depredations upon the vessels and other property of the citizens of the United States and against their national rights and sovereignty, in violation of the faith of treaties and the laws of nations; but still congress does not declare war, nor admit that United States are in a state of war.

On the 22d of June, 1798 [1 Stat. 569], an act was passed authorizing the president to increase the strength of the revenue cutters, "for the purpose of defence against hostilities near the sea coast;" and on the 25th of the same month, congress passed an act authorizing "the commanders and crews of any merchant vessel owned wholly by a citizen thereof, to oppose and defend against searches and restraints by the commanders and crews of any armed vessel sailing under French colors, and to repel force by force." 4 Folwell's Laws, 148 [1 Stat. 572]. Here, again, is a congressional declaration, that "lawless depredations and outrages," had been "hitherto encouraged and authorized by the government of France," that that government had not caused "the laws of nations to be observed by armed French vessels;" but no declaration of war, or admission of its existence.

On the 7th July, 1798, an act passed entitled "An act to declare the treaties heretofore concluded with France, no longer obligatory on the United States." On the 9th of that month, "An act farther to protect the commerce of the United States" was passed, giving to the president the power of "instructing the commanders of the public armed vessels employed in the service of the United States to subdue, seize, and take any armed French vessels," "and providing for their condemnation and other purposes." In addition to those, other acts were passed, to some of which I shall refer. 4 Folwell's Laws, 264, 271 [1 Stat. 578].

But I will now close my remarks upon acts of congress, by reading the first section of an act passed the 2d of March, 1799, entitled "An act giving eventual authority to the president of the United States to augment the army," &c. (4 Folwell's Laws, 489 [1 Stat. 725]), by which it is enacted "that it shall be lawful for the president of the United States in case war should break out between the United States and a foreign European power, or in case of imminent danger of invasion of their territory by any such power shall, in his opinion, be discovered to exist," &c. Here we have a declaration made by congress, and by the president of the United States, that notwithstanding all that had hitherto happened, no war had as yet "broken out between the United States and France."

What are the plain, obvious inferences which press themselves upon us from all these acts of congress? (1) That acts of hostility committed by a foreign power against the United States or their citizens do not necessarily place the country in a state of war. (2) That acts of hostility, though "outrageous, in violation of the laws of nations, and in contravention of existing treaties," had been committed upon the United States by a foreign nation, yet presidents Washington and Adams never entertained an opinion, that by declaring to congress the existence of these facts, they thereby placed this country in a state of war. (3) That congress have always considered the power of declaring war to be invested exclusively in them. (4) And that such has always been the understanding of the nation.

But a principle still more dangerous has been advocated. "That whether the United States be at war or at peace is a question of fact to be determined by the jury, from facts which may be proved to exist in pais independent of any act of congress." That is, that a jury of twelve men are the proper constitutional judges to decide whether our nation is at war or at peace, though congress shall not have declared war, though the president shall not have said that we are in a state of war, and though war may not have been declared against us. To all this, I answer, in a few words, that to very little purpose indeed have we cautiously and expressly confided by our constitution, to the representatives of the nation, the power of declaring war, if the peace of the nation may be compromitted by a jury, however honest and well intentioned. Wretched, supremely wretched, is the condition of the people of the United States if such a power be in the hands of every jury which may be impannelled to try a criminal. All other civilized nations have entrusted that power to the sovereign of the state; but here a jury of twelve men, whether congress has declared it or not, whether the president has announced it or not, is competent to place upon the records of our courts, that we are at war. To say to Spain, "the United States are at war with you." What will not Spain be justified in doing, if this be a constitutional mode of settling the question, and a jury by their verdict shall say that the United States are at war? May she not say and act accordingly: "Your nation is at war with ours; this has been declared, as appears by the records of your country, by its constituted authorities. We, therefore, will capture your vessels, enslave your citizens, bombard and sack your towns, and slaughter your inhabitants." Thus she will have a right to say to us, and thus may she lawfully treat us.

Nor can the admission of this testimony be sustained on the second ground. What have the jury to do with the question,—"What is the degree of the defendant's criminality?" They are to determine whether he is guilty of the crime charged, but they are not to decide whether there are any mitigating circumstances which ought to lessen the punishment. The court exclusively must settle this question. The authorities cited by the counsel for the defendant do not at all support the admission of the ground which is here contended. In the case of Rex v. Lord Anglesea, the court permitted the counsel for the crown to go into evidence calculated to show that Lord Anglesea sought after an opportunity, and persisted in the pursuit of the purpose eventually accomplished; and it certainly was very proper, when attempting to show the nature of the crime charged upon the prisoner, to adopt such a course of proceeding, when the precise nature of the crime committed could not otherwise be ascertained to the jury. The cases from 1 McNul. Ev. 320, 321, 322, 323, by no means favored the gentleman opposed to me. They only establish this rational principle, that the prisoner may call witnesses to his good character, and that the witnesses so called, may, in such cases, relate particular facts within their knowledge, which have induced the good opinion entertained by them. Thus Lord Kenyon expressed himself in the case of Rex v. Thelwal, at a special commission of oyer and terminer, in 1793, at the Old Bailey, as follows: "An affectionate and warm evidence of the character, when collected together, should make a strong impression in favor of the prisoner, and when those who give such character in evidence are entitled to credit, their testimony should have great weight with the jury;" and such evidence is in the very nature of things relevant. If the character of the prisoner has always been fair, it is certainly less probable that he should have committed the crime charged, than if his character had been notoriously bad. As to the solitary remark of Judge Down, in the case of Rex v. Mockler, it stands alone, unsupported by any authority, or even the dictum of a single advocate or elementary writer. The testimony offered, then, if there be any weight in this reasoning, is wholly irrelevant. If Mr. Madison and the other witnesses were now here, and sworn in this cause, they would not be permitted to give in evidence, to the jury any of the facts alleged in Col. Smith's affidavit, because they would not tend to show that the defendant was not guilty. The president of the United States possesses no power to dispense with the laws, but, on the other hand, is bound by his official oath to preserve them inviolate, and to defend the constitution of the United States.

But it is incumbent on the defendant to show that he has been guilty of no laches or neglect in his endeavors to procure the attendance of the witnesses. Has the defendant done his duty in this particular? He has served subpœnas on his witnesses; he has tendered to them twenty dollars. The distance from the city of Washington to this place is 240 miles. By the 6th section of the act, passed 28 February, 1799 [1 Stat. 626], it is enacted "that the compensation to jurors and witnesses, in the courts of the United States, shall be as follows, to wit, to each grand and other juror, for each day he shall attend in court, one dollar and twenty-five cents; and for traveling expenses, at the rate of five cents per mile from their respective places of abode to the place where the court is holden, and the like allowance for returning." This compensation, we contend, the witnesses were entitled to receive before they started from Washington The law imposes no obligation upon a witness to give a credit to the defendant. A witness, by the subpœna, is called upon to leave his business, to travel to the place of holding the court, and to remain there until the cause is decided or he is dismissed. But is the witness compellable to do this until he receives his compensation? The words are "the compensation to witnesses in the courts of the United States shall be," &c. In England, since the statute of 5 Eliz. c. 9, no witness, until his reasonable expenses are tendered to him, is bound to appear at all; nor, if he appears, is he bound to give evidence till such charges are actually paid. 3 Bl. Comm. 369. Congress, however, has not left this question, "What are reasonable expenses?" open for discussion, but has declared that five cents a mile for going to, and the same for returning from, court, shall be the compensation to which he shall be entitled. But if the witnesses are holden by law to attend without this compensation being first paid, how are they ever to obtain it? How, but by suit? And if the witness, through poverty, is unable to attend, is he notwithstanding to be adjudged guilty of a contempt?

The question as to the construction of the statute of 5 Eliz. c. 9, in this regard, came before the court of common pleas, in the case of Fuller v. Prentice, 1 H. Bl. 49, on a motion for an attachment. But the court refused the attachment, saying "that it might afford a dangerous precedent, by which witnesses coming from their places of abode to attend at trials, might be deprived of the repayment of their necessary expenses; the whole of which, as well of their going to the place of trial, as of their return from it, and also during their necessary stay there, ought to be tendered to them at the time of serving the subpœna, otherwise an attachment would not lie." And yet in that case 2s. 6d. had been given to the witness, and a promise made to bear all her expenses, and a place was taken for her in the stage, and she had promised that she would go, but when the stage called, she refused to go, and confined herself in her house. The statute of Eliz. is substantially the same as the act of congress. By the former it is enacted "that if any person upon whom process shall be served to testify or depose, and having tendered to him such reasonable sum of money for his or their costs and charges." Suppose the words in the act had been "tendered and paid to him ten cents per mile for his costs and charges," &c.; would not that statute, if thus expressed, have, in effect, declared that ten cents per mile should be the compensation to the witnesses? What are the words of the act of congress? "The compensation to jurors and witnesses in the courts of the United States, shall be," &c. Compensation necessarily implies satisfaction or payment for something done, or to be done, by the witnesses. Before the statute of Eliz., no law existed by which witnesses could insist on payment of their reasonable costs and charges. Congress, by this act, have provided that they shall be compensated for their costs and charges, and, to put to sleep all controversy about what should be considered as reasonable costs and charges, have said, it shall be ten cents per mile, &c. The right of a witness to compensation and the amount of compensation are both settled by the act of congress, and by necessary implication. The duty of the party who serves process on the witness is also settled, for the act says what the compensation shall be, but it is no compensation if it is not paid. Was it not, therefore, the duty of the person on whose behalf the witness was served with process, to have tendered or paid the ten cents per mile, if he intended, in case the witness did not appear, to proceed against him for a contempt? But the compensation has not been paid or tendered to the witnesses, nor does the affidavit of the person who served the subpœna help the gentleman over this difficulty. He says that he offered Mr. Madison more, but that he observed that it would be to no purpose. In the case of Fuller v. Prentice, 2s. 6d. was tendered to the witness, a promise was made to bear her expenses, a place was taken for her in the stage-coach, she promised to go, and more money was offered, and yet an attachment was refused. On no principle, therefore, can an attachment be issued against Mr. Madison.

An attachment for the purpose of bringing in a witness ad testificandum is never granted. The article of amendment to the constitution has instituted no new compulsory process. The testimony which the witnesses named could give, if present, as stated in the defendant's affidavit, is wholly irrelevant, and the motion for an attachment is premature.

Wednesday, July 16. 1806.

Some desultory conversation arose at the bar, when the argument proceeded:

Emmet. The counsel for the prosecution, who last addressed the court, adverted to the interest and anxiety which, from the number and respectability of the audience, it is manifest that this cause has excited in the public mind; and he was pleased to intimate that he had it in his power to assign a motive for this general solicitude, totally different from the actual importance of the prosecution. To me, I confess, it appears, that the novelty and nature of the questions heretofore agitated, and those likely hereafter to arise in the course of these trials, are fully sufficient to fix the public attention upon the proceedings of this court. You are making precedents in criminal jurisprudence, the influence of which may hereafter be very great and extensive; and you are doing so under the judiciary system of the United States, where precedents of that nature are by no means common. Besides, the enterprize with which the defendant is supposed to be connected is in itself calculated to awaken in his favor the most general sympathy and interest. It was therefore hardly worth the learned counsel's while to hint, with some appearance of severity and censure, at any extrinsic inducements for the portion of attention, that the public may bestow upon our proceedings. But if in doing so, and if by the motive which he did not think proper to assign or specify, he intended to allude to any thing in the conduct of the defendant's counsel, as one of them, standing in a very extraordinary and delicate situation, I entreat the indulgence of the court, while I say a few words about myself.

Attached as I am by the strongest connection to those principles, which placed the present administration in power; feeling for the members who compose it the sincerest esteem; and wishing to see them exalted on the highest pinnacle of respect, it will be with extreme reluctance and personal pain, that I shall, perhaps, in the course of these proceedings, press inferences of facts, somewhat derogatory to that dignified and honorable reputation, which they have most deservedly acquired. In the present cause, however, no sentiment of private respect or public feeling can be permitted to interfere with the discharge of my professional duty. Colonel Smith has done me the honor of thinking that my exertions may be useful to him in the conduct of his defence; and surely there is nothing in the character of that gentleman, nor even in the fact with which he is charged, that could justify my withholding those exertions; more especially, since (if those things which he has stated to me in private, and sworn to me in court, shall be proved on his trial) I cannot but consider him as "a man more sinned against than sinning." The learned counsel, however, may rest assured, that although I shall earnestly urge whatever I conceive pertinent and necessary to my client's defence, I shall not be induced by any wish of exalting my own character, or acquiring the favor of any party or description of men, to wound the feelings of those whom I respect, or to urge what may be unpleasant to them, farther than is indispensably necessary. I have no wish through this trial to excite unfavorable impression against any one; on the contrary, most gladly would I erase all memorials of it from the records of this court, and blot out from the public mind all remembrance of it, and of the transactions to which it has given rise. What irresistible motives caused it to be commenced, I cannot presume to divine; but it is the only error that I feel inclined to impute to the administration; for as to the part they took, according to my client's statement, in the enterprize, for assisting which he stands indicted, I trust, before I conclude, I shall evince myself to be not only the defender of Col. Smith, but of the government itself. The court will pardon my having spoken thus much of myself; but I conceived this explanation due to the peculiarity of my situation, and to the extent of my obligations to those whose friendship has contributed to place me in a situation so peculiar. I shall now proceed to the matter before the court.

The affidavits on which these motions must be decided are, I apprehended, perfectly consistent with each other. Col. Smith considers the gentlemen at Washington as material witnesses for his defence, and assigns his reasons for that opinion, by specifying the facts which he expects to prove from their testimony. These reasons are not removed by Mr. Sanford's affidavit, which does not controvert or doubt any of the facts specified; but merely says, in general terms, that he does not conceive the witnesses to be material. I trust, I shall be able, when we shall have come to the discussion of that question, to convince the court of their materiality. I purpose, with its permission, to argue, first, the motion for the attachment, and, secondly, that for putting off the trial.

The counsel for the prosecution have displayed very considerable learning and research in tracing the history and progress of attachments against witnesses in England; but they will allow me to say, that their learning and research have no application to the law on that subject, as it exists in America. The counsel who spoke last, professed to detail what he called the "travail throes" of the measure; but as far as relates to the judiciary of the United States, it had, in this country, no travail throes; it is derived from the constitution, the head of our laws; and like the celebrated offspring of the head, it was consummate at its birth. We claim the process of attachment to compel the attendance of witnesses, as a matter of right, by virtue of the sixth article in addition to, and amendment of, the constitution (Graydon's Dig. 17, printed as article 8), which says, that in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor. By the fourteenth section of the general judiciary act, passed September 24th, 1789 (Graydon's Dig. 243 [1 Stat. 81]), which gives to the courts of the United States the power "to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law;" and lastly by the sixth section of the act of 2d March, 1793 (Graydon's Dig. p. 256 [1 Stat. 335]), which provides that subpœnas for witnesses who may be required to attend a court of the United States in any district thereof may run into any other district." These provisions form a striking difference between the English and American law. It may be, as the learned counsel contends, that in England the granting of an attachment is discretionary with the court, which may refuse it, or issue it for the purpose of vindicating its own dignity. In that country the party accused was for a long time wholly unprotected; he could not examine his witnesses on oath, and had no means for compelling their attendance. It was not before the 7 Wm. III. c. 3, that any compulsory process for witnesses was given to the accused; that act was expressly confined to cases where the judgment would work corruption of blood; and that is the only law, even to this day, which gives such process in any criminal case whatever. The 1 Anne, c. 9, enacts that witnesses for the prisoner shall be sworn, and under the equity of that statute, if I may say so, the courts have, in other criminal cases, awarded compulsory process; but they have considered themselves entitled to exercise their discretion as to granting attachments. I therefore broadly contend, that although in England the subject, when accused, may not have a right to compulsory process, yet in America the citizen has it secured to him by the highest authorities, the constitution and laws of congress: and I here claim the attachment as the right of my client.

The opposite counsel have endeavored to entangle us by raising a distinction that we are not entitled to an attachment on a general affidavit. In answer to that objection, it may be observed, that our affidavit is special, and states sufficient to show the importance of the testimony expected from those gentlemen. That topic I shall discuss at large, in arguing the motion for putting off the trial; but, postponing it until then, I shall here insist that we are entitled to have this motion granted, even on a general affidavit, and that it is not necessary to state any thing respecting the nature of the evidence they may give. An attachment is our right. The ordering of it must therefore be as much a matter of course as the issuing of a subpœna. Were I to apply to the officer of the court for a subpœna, should I be stopped by an inquiry on his part, how far the witness was material? Certainly not. When I come then into this court, and ask for what is equally my right, and ought to be as much a matter of course, shall I be stopped by interrogatories, which it could be necessary to answer, only if I were applying for a writ, that the court might, in its discretion, either grant or refuse? We have shown that the witnesses have disobeyed the process of the court by non-attendance. With regard to them, subpœna is not a compulsory process, and we therefore ask, under the sixth article of the amendment of the constitution, and the fourteenth section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 81], for a process that will compel their attendance. This process, "agreeable to the principles and usages of law," is an attachment; and an affidavit of the service of the subpœna, with the absence of the witness, without a sufficient excuse, is all that can be requisite for the success of our application.

The counsel on the other side have told us, that we are only entitled to a conditional rule in the first instance. If that should be the opinion of the court, it will only influence the manner of making out the order, and cause us to accept of a rule to show cause; it would make no difference to us, except so far, as it might delay our trial; but from the probability of that delay arises an irresistible objection to a conditional order, that it would prevent a speedy trial. By the sixth article of the amendments to the constitution already quoted, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy trial; for the purpose of which he shall have compulsory process to obtain the attendance of his witnesses. That process, then, ought to be modified, so as to be consistent with, and to procure a speedy trial. Here, also, the authorities from the English law books become inapplicable, if the counsel for the prosecution are right in the position for which they have principally contended; because the granting of the attachment in that country is, as they say, a matter of discretion; in America it is a matter of right; and surely those authorities that refer only to questions of discretion, can have no bearing on a question of constitutional right. If the process were only issued to vindicate the dignity of the court, it might proceed by slow degrees, and begin with a conditional rule; but there are not the same motives, nor is there the same power to interpose that delay between the right of the accused to a speedy trial, and his right to compel the attendance of his witnesses. That dilatory rule is only authorized, or required, where the matter to be ultimately decided upon rests in the discretion of the court.

But it is said that we did not tender to the witnesses the necessary expenses; that we were five dollars short of the precise sum. Is this Mr. Madison's objection, or will he feel grateful to those who urge it on his behalf? I presume not, for he has expressly disclaimed it. The tender was twenty dollars in the first instance, and a farther offer to pay all his expenses; and the affidavit of service states, that on this offer being made, he secretary of state replied, it was unnecessary saying anything more on that subject; thereby undoubtedly waiving the benefit of an insufficiency in the tender, if under any circumstances advantage could be taken of it. The truth, however, is that the objection would not avail them even in England. The cases cited by the opposite counsel are all in civil actions, and the necessity of tendering to witnesses their expenses, at the time of serving the subpœna, was created by 5 Eliz. c. 9, § 12, which relates only to such suits. In criminal cases no tender was ever held to be necessary.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. Is there not good reason for that, when the defendant would not be entitled to any process at all?

Emmet. The observation is certainly correct. The statute was passed when persons accused were in no case entitled to such process; and it could not be within the purview of the law, to make them tender money on service of a process, to which they were in no respect entitled. In criminal cases it is perfectly settled that witnesses are bound to attend. Hawk. P. C. b. 2, c. 46, § 50, is explicit on this point. "It seems that in civil proceedings a witness is not obliged to attend, unless his expenses are tendered to him, pursuant to 5 Eliz. c. 9, and if after such tender he neglect to appear, he may be fined according to the directions of that statute, or punished by attachment for a contempt of the court, as the circumstances of the case shall appear to be. But in criminal proceedings, the demands of public justice supersede every consideration of private inconvenience; and witnesses are bound unconditionally, to attend the trial upon which they may be summoned, and be bound over to give their evidence."

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. You say that the defendant is entitled to compulsory process, as of right. Is there any statute of the United States which makes the tender of expenses to the witness on the service of the subpœna necessary?

Emmet. I apprehend not; and in that respect there is a very manifest difference between the English and the United States law. By the statute of Eliz. a tender is necessary from the express words of the act; and those words have regulated the decisions of the English courts. By the United States act of the 28th February, 1799, § 6 (Graydon's Dig. 260 [1 Stat. 626]), a compensation to witnesses is regulated at the rate of five cents a mile for traveling, and $1.25 for every day's attendance in court. It struck me on reading that law, that those sums of money were to be paid to witnesses, as to jurors, by the United States, and not by the defendants; and, on inquiring as to the practice, I find that the officers of the court are not agreed. On this point, therefore, the court must form its own conclusion. But from whatever quarter the compensation should come, jurors and witnesses are by the law put upon the same footing. Would a juror, when summoned, be permitted to say, "I will not obey the process of the court because I have no tender of my expenses"? Certainly not. By what construction of the act, then, can that objection lie in the mouth of a witness?

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. Has there been any decision under this statute on the ground of tender?

Emmet. I answer, perhaps without sufficient information, not; at least, not to my knowledge. But when I couple this law with the article of the amendment to the constitution which says a witness must attend, I think he can claim no right to a previous tender of his expenses; but must perform the service of attending; and in case of nonpayment, he becomes entitled to his action for the compensation.

Another question has been raised. It has been insinuated rather than explicitly expressed, by one of the counsel for the prosecution, that those witnesses could not be coerced to appear. If hereby is meant to be asserted any peculiar privilege of office, certainly such claim cannot be made by Doctor Thornton or Mr. Wagner. Nor is there such a privilege attached to any of the offices held by the other witnesses. It is a strange doctrine in this free country, where the constitution and laws have accurately marked out the rights and privileges belonging to every office. Privileges of exemption from those duties to which every citizen is liable as such, must be clearly shown, and the law by which they are authorized must be produced.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. You may save yourself the trouble of arguing that point; the witnesses may undoubtedly be compelled to appear.

Emmet. Another question has been stated: Can the witnesses be compelled, or would they be authorized to disclose the secrets of state? No law book that I have ever read or heard of mentions such a privilege as belonging to public officers, though it is uniformly allowed to lawyers and attorneys. But in this case another answer is also obvious. If the concurrence of the president in those matters with which Col. Smith stands charged be a secret of state, for the keeping of which there is a lawful privilege, it must be because such concurrence was within the legal sphere of the president's duties. If that be the case, let it be remembered, when I shall argue that the concurrence of the president would form a justification for my client; at present I shall urge it thus: If the concurrence of the president was within the legal sphere of his duties, the legality of his conduct will justify those who acted by his concurrence; of course, the court will help us to the utmost in availing ourselves of the legal and adequate defence; and will, at least, bring the witnesses into court, to try whether they will decline answering what, if they do answer, must acquit us. On the other hand, if such concurrence be not within the legal sphere of the president's duty, then, as to that, neither he nor the witnesses can have any legal privilege in right of his or their offices. Supposing the witnesses are not bound to divulge the secrets of government, let them, at least, declare whether there be any secrets of government connected with the measure for which Col. Smith stands indicted.

But it is also urged that the witnesses could not be forced to answer questions that might criminate themselves. No; but there is nothing in that argument that should prevent their being brought into court, to see whether they will make an objection which they certainly may waive. In truth, however, Col. Smith's affidavit does not lay us open to that argument; for it does not charge anyone with approving of that expedition, but the president and secretary of state. Now, Mr. Madison may be called to prove the conduct of the president, and the other witnesses to prove the conduct of Mr. Madison.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. Would Mr. Madison be liable to a prosecution if he answered that the conduct of Col. Smith was with his knowledge, or knowledge and consent of the president?

Emmet. If the view I shall hereafter take of the statute be correct, he certainly would not.

Another circumstance has been mentioned; that those gentlemen have offered to be examined under a commission, and the court was pleased to express some surprise that such an arrangement had not been before thought of. With the utmost deference, I beg leave to answer, that the circumstance was adverted to; but neither the defendant nor his counsel are willing to accede to that arrangement. For my own part, I declare, that except upon some very extraordinary occasion, which I cannot now foresee, I never will consent to examine a witness under a commission in a criminal case, if his attendance on the trial can be forced. Even in civil causes, I have more than once had occasion to lament the inroads that are made upon oral testimony, by the increased use of written depositions; and I am convinced that the latter frequently prevent the discovery of truth. Every one knows that when a witness is examined in open court, the manner in which he answers, and the manner in which he declines to answer, are matters of public observation; and that cross-examination may draw out more than could be obtained by studied and written answers to written interrogatories. It is the wish of my client that this case shall be made as clear as possible; that the truth shall be eviscerated and brought into public view; that the allegations of the defendant and the testimony of the witnesses may be compared and judged of by the jury and the public. The advantages of oral testimony over written depositions are so strikingly set forth by Sir Matthew Hale in his History of the Common Law (volume 2, c. 12, p. 145), that I shall beg leave to read a short extract from it; as, perhaps, if the same reasons were assigned by myself, they might be supposed to have some personal allusions. "The excellency of this open course of evidence to the jury, in presence of the judge, jury, parties and counsel, and even of the adverse witnesses, appears in these particulars: 1st. That it is openly, and not in private, before a commissioner or two, and a couple of clerks; where oftentimes witnesses will deliver that which they will be ashamed to testify publicly. 2dly. That it is ore tenus, personally, and not in writing; wherein oftentimes, yea too often, a crafty clerk, commissioner or examiner will make a witness speak what he truly never meant, by dressing of it up in his own terms, phrases and expressions. Whereas, on the other hand, many times the very manner of delivering testimony will give a probable indication whether the witness speaks truly or falsely. And by this means, also, he has an opportunity to correct, amend, or explain his testimony, upon further questioning with him; which he can never have after a deposition is set down in writing. 3dly. That by this course of personal and open examination, there is opportunity for all persons concerned, viz. the judge, or any of the jury or parties, or their counsel or attorneys, to propound occasional questions, which beats and boults out the truth much better than when the witness only delivers a formal series of his knowledge without being interrogated. And on the other side, preparatory, limited, and formal interrogatories in writing, preclude this way of occasional interrogations; and the best method of searching and sifting out the truth is choaked and suppressed. 4thly. Also by this personal appearance and testimony of witnesses, there is opportunity of confronting the adverse witnesses; of observing the contradiction of witnesses, sometimes of the same side; and by this means great opportunities are gained for the true and clear discovery of the truth. 5thly. And farther, the very great quality, carriage, age, condition, and place of commorance of the witnesses, are, by this means, plainly and evidently set forth by the court and the jury; whereby the judge and jurors may have full information of them; and the jurors, as they see cause, may give the more or less credit to their testimony." There is another objection to taking the depositions of the witnesses, by commission in criminal cases, which I think irresistible; if the witnesses swear falsely, how are they to be indicted for perjury? In urging this argument, I can have no allusion to the witnesses who have offered to be thus examined; but this case is so conspicuous and important, that every part of its proceedings may hereafter become a precedent; and in this case the precedent might give rise to a very dangerous practice. I therefore feel that I should not only be doing injustice to my client, but also injury to the general administration of justice, if I consented to any other mode of taking the testimony of those gentlemen, than viva voce before the jury.

We come now to the most important question; the materiality of the testimony expected from those witnesses. So far as relates to the attachment, I trust I have already convinced the court that it ought to be laid out of consideration; that process being a matter of right. The witnesses are in contempt; when they come forward to purge themselves of that contempt, then, and not before, ought the nature of their evidence to be taken into consideration. I deem it, however, to be the most important of all questions raised in this cause; since the counsel for the prosecution resist our application to put off the trial, on their allegation that the testimony is immaterial. The remainder of my observations shall, therefore, be directed to the support of that application. The facts which we hope to prove by those witnesses are very material, either for a complete defence or for mitigation of punishment; and in either case we have a right to ask for compulsory process to bring them into court, and for the postponement of the trial till they do come. It cannot be expected of us that we should, in this stage of proceedings, disclose our defence, and give the opposite side advantage of a detailed argument upon the application of our evidence. We shall do enough if we show by a general view of the subject, that those facts may be applicable to our case either in justification or in mitigation of punishment.

First, as to justification: The purport of a constitution is to define the duties of the constituted authorities, to prevent their usurpations or collisions, and to limit the powers of public officers, in order to protect the people from their encroachments. It seems to me, therefore, that the fair construction of our constitution, as to the right of declaring war, is that the executive shall be controlled, and deprived of that baneful prerogative which is exercised by the chief magistrate of England. If the president undertake to declare war, he becomes undoubtedly and justly liable to impeachment; but it is too harsh a construction of the constitution to say that it has any reference to the conduct of an individual acting bona fide under the president, and by his authority, in times and circumstances such as those when General Miranda's expedition was set on foot. No subordinate officer or private person acting by the president's authority, falls within the purview of the constitution, or becomes criminal, unless by knowingly and intentionally assisting to violate its provisions, he should involve himself in the guilt of his principal. Where, therefore, the situation of the country affords a reasonable ground for supposing that a war with some foreign power, may speedily break out, I submit that the subordinate agent who, with the knowledge and under the direction of the president, provides or prepares the means for a military enterprise against that power, stands acquitted, and that if there has been any misconduct, it must be answered for by the superior officer alone. Who is to be the organ of congress if secret preparations for war shall have been decided upon? Undoubtedly, the executive. Suppose then the head of the war department, by the desire of the president, should write to any contractor or subordinate officer to provide a million of cannon balls, or any of the other things necessary for a military expedition, while congress were sitting with closed doors, deliberating upon an avowedly hostile message sent them by the president; would the contractor come under the penalties of the law, if he accepted and executed the contract, and thereby provided and prepared the means for a military expedition? Or should he say, I will not execute the contract, or the inferior officer, I will not obey your orders; for I do not know that you have the sanction of congress, as they are still sitting in secret deliberation? I venture to assert that a more unwise or injudicious construction could not be given to the constitution, than to say that it prohibits a subordinate officer from paying obedience to the orders of his superior, or that the commands of the president would not be to him a sufficient justification of his conduct under all the circumstances of the case.

Spain had committed depredations on our territory; the message of the president details the particulars, and recommends a hostile attitude; congress sit with closed doors to discuss the question. To whom, then, should the people at large look for information or guidance, but to the president? Is it not competent to congress to decide secretly on the propriety of anticipating an enemy before he has matured his strength? If they should so determine to declare war, would they not naturally authorize the president to take all necessary steps for attack or defence, unknown to Spain? A citizen residing distant from the seat of government can only know such facts as are public; he is not likely to have direct communications as to the secret objects of the cabinet or congress. But when he sees that Spain has commenced hostilities against us, and finds that the president has recommended war, on which the two houses are deliberating in secret; when at the same time he receives satisfactory assurances that he has the approbation of the executive, shall he be culpable if he acts on those views and on that authority?

Here I am met by an objection, that Col. Smith does not lay any foundation for supposing this to be the state of the country; nor does he swear that he expects to prove those facts by these witnesses. To that I answer, that perhaps we may question them as to those facts; but we do not complain of want of testimony on that subject; we may prove it by other means; I see a very venerable[1] witness in court, by whom we can certainly prove the state of the country. It is not necessary to specify in the affidavit more than we expect and want from those witnesses; it never yet was required of an accused that he should disclose, on a motion of this kind, all the particulars of his defence, and how each fact is to be proved. In this state of the cause, we may well assume circumstances of public notoriety, and couple them with those we wish to prove by the witnesses, in order to see whether the whole together will not make a justification.

The argument which I have hitherto urged from the state of the country acquires infinitely more force when you consider the precise charge in the indictment, which is framed pursuant to the statute for setting on foot, providing and preparing the means for a military expedition or enterprize.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. What are the words of the statute?

Emmet read from Graydon's Dig. p. 70, the fifth section of the act of 5th June, 1794 [1 Stat. 384]: "If any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprize to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state with whom the United States are at peace, every such person so offending shall," &c. It appears then, that the indictment and statute are only pointed against preparatory acts for carrying on an enterprize against a power at peace. Will the counsel for the prosecution offer evidence of the sailing of the Leander, or of any act of hostility? If they do, it must be in order to lay matter of aggravation before the jury, and let them consider how far that is consistent with their denial of our right to prove matter of mitigation in the same way. But as to the acts charged in the indictment, they are only preparatory, and independent of any actual hostility. As to them, the state of the country forms an irresistible justification both of Colonel Smith and of the president. The constitution indeed does not allow the latter to declare war, but does it forbid his providing and preparing the means of carrying it on, while congress are in actual and secret deliberation whether they shall declare war against a nation that is committing and provoking hostilities? Spain, indeed, was technically at peace by the treaty of San Lorenzo, but she was actually at war by the law of nations; she had broken that treaty, plundered our ships, invaded our territories, and carried our citizens from thence as prisoners by military force. Such a nation is not entitled, if I may say so, to the benefits of this act, the object of which is, that so long as any prince or potentate shall act towards us with perfect amity, and not by equivocal or unfriendly conduct, render preparatory measures for war advisable, so long as it shall be forbidden under the penalties of this law, to any individuals to break that amity, and by unauthorized acts to endanger the peace of the two countries. But if the foreign power shall itself have broken that amity, and shall have given just grounds of war, no government ought to omit "providing and preparing the means" for military enterprizes; nor could any law have intended to prevent the preparatory efforts of individuals for subduing the public enemy. The memorable congress that commenced your revolution, did not hesitate to provide and prepare the means of meeting the English before the actual war was declared; nor did it censure or discountenance those patriots, who, unauthorized by any orders, and before the formal declarations of war, possessed themselves of Ticonderoga and Crown Point.

The circumstances of the times, we have shown, justified the president in giving his approbation, and my client, under that approbation, in providing and preparing the means of a military enterprize against Spain. And surely no enterprize could be more useful or effectual for drawing the enemy from our southern and western frontiers; none more worthy of the exalted and philosophic mind of our chief magistrate; none more consonant to the enlightened and philosophic views of society and politics, which he has exhibited to the world, than an expedition to liberate South America; to destroy at once Spanish tyranny and power on our own continent; to enfranchise, by one effort, millions of our fellow creatures from the most frightful bondage; and to lay the foundations, in so large a portion of the globe, for the freedom and the happiness of man!

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. You state in the affidavit that it was done with the knowledge and approbation of the president, but is it stated in the affidavit that he authorized the fitting out of the expedition?

Emmet. I conceive it was not necessary; for though I have argued upon the effects of an authorization, it was only to show that the argument of the adverse counsel went much too far, when they contended that the president could not authorize any such measure. For our defence, it will be only necessary to show that the president was, under the circumstances of the times, warranted to provide and prepare the means for a military expedition; and that, in what he might do, we acted with his knowledge and approbation. "Qui prohibere potest et non prohibet, jubet." The knowledge and approbation of the chief magistrate and heads of departments, if we shall prove them to have been sufficiently express and positive, will amount to justification; but even if we shall fail in establishing them to that extent, they will still afford very powerful inducements for mitigating the punishment. This is denied on the other side; but I would ask, if it could be proved that this enterprize was carried on against the president's express order, would not that be matter of aggravation? If it would, surely the reverse must be matter of mitigation. The mistake into which a defendant may have been led by the approbation of the government, and the innocence of his motives, must surely mitigate a discretionary punishment. In this case we do not rely upon a mere general and vague approbation of the measure; we will show that approbation was given to this very defendant's being concerned in it.

We are told, however, that no evidence which only goes in mitigation of punishment should be laid before a jury; but that it is only cognizable by the judge who is to apportion the punishment, and that, therefore, the want of it forms no ground for putting off the trial. This doctrine, permit me to say, is contrary to every day's experience; for who that has attended the commonest trials for assault and battery does not know that all matters connected with the crime, though not making any part of the issue, whether they preceded, accompanied or followed the fact charged, are given in evidence on the trial; and that the judge, after hearing those matters, varies his sentence according to the case, from perhaps one cent to a very exemplary fine and imprisonment? But what reporters can we quote on this subject? I verily believe that no lawyer who ever undertook to report a case thought this a matter of sufficient difficulty or importance to be worth noting. It happens, however, that we can cite a printed case in which the point has been decided, and that only, because the trial having been taken verbatim, the most insignificant circumstances attending it have been preserved. The case I allude to is that of the Earl of Anglesea, in 9 State Tr. p. 335. There, although it was resisted by the defendant's counsel, the counsel for the prosecution stated and proved matter of aggravation, entirely distinct from the assault on which the indictment was framed; and the court considered his right of doing so as unquestionable. It has been asserted, on the other side, that the facts stated, accompanied the assault, and therefore were necessarily admitted; but if so, how came the defendant's counsel to resist their introduction? On looking into the case, the court will find those facts which were introduced for the purpose of aggravation happened the two days preceding the assault. A distinction is also taken, that what was there stated, was in aggravation, and that what we wish to introduce before the jury, is in mitigation of punishment. What principle of law sanctions this distinction? Those who have a right to hear the one surely have right to hear the other. Unfortunately, also, it seems contrary to the case of Rex v. Mockler, 1 McNal. Ev. p. 320, where Downes, justice, admitted evidence of character on the trial for uttering counterfeit coin; as the punishment was not certain, but discretionary in the court.

But the counsel on the other side maintained that such evidence must have been received to meet the issue of not guilty; it being very unlikely that a person of good character would be guilty of such a crime. To this surmise, the answer is obvious; that was not the reason assigned by the court. It happens, also, that I was concerned in that cause for the defendant, and have such a recollection of it as enables me to show the learned counsel's supposition to be groundless. The fact was clearly proved, and indeed admitted; but the defence was, that the defendant was a silver-smith, and made out of pure metal shillings which were rather more valuable than the current coin, which, by being worn down, was not worth more than nine pence, and of which there was an actual scarcity. This certainly formed no legal defence; but, on its being proved that the counterfeit was as good as the current coin, the judge admitted evidence of character, not to controvert the guilt, which was unquestionable; but that it might be considered in mitigation of punishment.

The Chevalier D'Eon's Case, 3 Burrows, 1513, is very much relied on by the opposite side, as proving that evidence in mitigation should not be received on the trial; but that it should be laid before the judge after verdict, by affidavit; and that the want of it forms no ground for putting off the trial. Let us, therefore, shortly examine that case. The first position is supported, as the counsel think, by this expression of Lord Mansfield: "If their knowledge relates to any circumstances that may serve to mitigate the punishment, in case he should be convicted, that sort of evidence will not come too late after conviction of the offence, and may be laid before the court by affidavits." True, it will not come too late after conviction; but has his lordship said that it would come too soon before verdict? True, it may be laid before the court by affidavits; but has his lordship said that it ought not to be laid before the court viva voce, on the trial? That sentence, however, has been misconceived by the learned counsel; it only refers to the peculiar circumstances of D'Eon's Case, and does not purport to lay down any general principle whatsoever. This will instantly appear by comparing the report of the same case, in 1 W. Bl., 510, with that in Burrows. The motion was made in Trinity term; the trial could not take place till after that term; and, as it was an information, judgment could not be given till the November or Michaelmas term; and Mr. Morton and Mr. Ashhurst argued, I confess, I think unanswerably, for puttting off the trial, that it could not, at the utmost, cause above eight day's delay, as to the sentence, if the defendant should be ultimately convicted. Lord Mansfield, however, said, in substance: Your witnesses are out of our jurisdiction in France; and it is not either in your power or ours to compel their attendance; but you expect them here, you say, next term; they will therefore come, if at all, before sentence; and as they can be only in mitigation (this being an information for a libel, which admits of no justification) you can still have the benefit of their testimony; though they should not be present on the trial their evidence will not come too late next term (when you expect them) after your conviction, and you can lay it before the court by affidavit. This is the true explanation of that sentence on which the opposite counsel so much rely; and permit me to observe upon that case, even were it more favorable for them than in reality it is, that, since truth is settled to be an inadmissible justification on an indictment for a libel, it is manifest the exclusion of those witnesses on the trial of the issue worked an injustice to the defendant. Indeed, any one who now examines that decision with impartiality, will, I think, be convinced that the defendant was very hardly dealt with; and, what surely will not recommend the precedent to this court, it appears from 1 W. Bl., 517, as if this hard treatment sprung from a spirit of complaisance to certain foreign ministers.

This case, however, affords no ground for arguing that matter in mitigation of punishment should not be given in evidence on the trial—and every day's experience shows that it may. Even for the information of the judge, if he alone is to take cognizance of the testimony, it is advisable that he should be informed by viva voce examination, which is superior to written affidavits, and which affords the advantage of sifting out the truth by pointed and cross-examination. Besides, if we are not allowed compulsory process for enforcing the attendance of those witnesses before the jury, and a postponement of the trial till they can be brought into court; by what process or authority of law are we to obtain their affidavits in mitigation of punishment? I know of no process by which you can compel any man to swear an affidavit: and here let me observe, that in the Chevalier D'Eon's Case, his witnesses he admitted were friendly, and were willing to be examined—there was therefore no danger but that he could procure their affidavits after conviction. Col. Smith does not pretend that his witnesses are friendly, or willing to be examined. How then, I again ask, if this trial should not be postponed until the attendance of the witnesses can be enforced and their evidence obtained under a compulsory process, is the defendant to procure those affidavits, which might be laid before the court, and ought to diminish the punishment? Besides, it is the right of the jury to recommend to mercy; and how can they do so, if no extenuating circumstances are permitted to reach their ears? The president's approbation and knowledge are facts, which, like most other facts, may be contested, and upon which, therefore, the court entertain some doubts. Would not the recommendation of the jury, finding those facts and grounded on their declared belief of them, have infinite weight in removing the doubts of the court and influencing its conduct? Indeed, from every view I can take of the subject, I am convinced that the original and correct mode of receiving any testimony, whether to the issue, or in aggravation or mitigation of punishment, was viva voce on the trial; and that the introduction of affidavits after conviction is a modern and irregular invention, tolerated for the convenience of the defendant, to whose benefit it has hitherto been most frequently applied: but I confess I am surprised to hear it argued, that the innovation should totally supersede the ancient, and I think the wisest practice.

Another reason for putting off the trial presents itself from an examination of D'Eon's Case coupled with Col. Smith's affidavit. In that case, the defendant gave some reason to believe that the witnesses were prevented from attending by the interference of the prosecutor; and Mr. Justice Wilmot declared (1 W. Bl. 516) that if that were clearly established, he should be for putting off the trial for ever. In this case, Col. Smith swears that he believes those witnesses are prevented from attending by the interference of the president, who has directed this prosecution. The fact is not denied, and what might be a justification of the fact is not sworn to. Upon that ground, which is admitted to exist with us, and which Lord Mansfield said in D'Eon's Case, 3 Burrows, 1515, would be sufficient for putting off the trial, till the witnesses could be had, we ask, even if you should be against us on the other points, that the trial may be postponed.

I have trespassed so long on the time of the court, and on the debilitated health of one of its members, that I know not what apology to offer. I shall not increase my offence by any longer intrusion, except to return my thanks for your very patient and favorable attention.

Harison. I am now to close the argument on the part of the defendant, and to offer my sentiments upon a subject that is nearly exhausted. A sense of the duty I owe to my client, and a regard to public justice, are the motives by which I am influenced, and which I hope will apologize for observations that may appear to be superfluous, and perhaps have been already offered.

Before, however, I proceed to the main questions that have arisen, I beg leave to advert to an observation which fell from the counsel for the prosecution. He indeed declared our form of government to be the best in the universe; in the preservation of which every citizen was of course deeply interested. And yet, he expressed great surprise that a prosecution such as this, which he considered as of a very ordinary nature, should bring together so numerous an assembly, and excite such universal interest and attention. Perhaps this observation might have been spared; for without adverting to the previous proceedings in this case, the nature of the prosecution, and the high authority by which it was instituted, would sufficiently account for the effects it has produced. For my own part, believing the criminal system of the United States to be the most pure and chaste and mild and perfect that the world ever beheld; in fact, I consider it as a most valuable inheritance belonging to the citizen. It has, therefore, called forth the public attention; and the numerous audience that is assembled upon this occasion, must be considered as an expression of its sentiment. The remarks which I have made upon the criminal institutions of the United States, and to which I shall hereafter allude, will, I trust, be found not wholly inapplicable to the cause before the court. I proceed to discuss the questions in the order that they have been stated. The first is, whether an attachment should issue for the non-attendance of the witnesses. Here I observe that according to the mild system of our laws, the innocence of the defendant is always to be presumed until the contrary appears. The public has an interest in guarding the innocent, at least equal to that of punishing the guilty. It is, indeed, our first duty to protect innocence; and hence, the very constitution of this country has provided that the accused shall have the necessary means of defence; among which compulsory process for his witnesses is expressly included. This is a provision of great importance, and distinguishes our criminal code from that of other nations. In the origin of the English law, no witness was to be examined for the prisoner, at least not upon oath; though, by a modern statute, a different regulation has been introduced; and by a favorable construction of that statute, the prisoner has been held entitled to process against his witnesses. In our country, however, this matter has not been left to construction; nor does it depend upon legislative pleasure. It is a fundamental article of the constitution, which imparts a right to the accused, that he cannot be deprived of, and which courts of justice are bound to protect.

It is not pretended that the peculiar character and situation of the witnesses exempt them in this case from the duty of attendance. Public officers, however dignified, are not excused from appearing to vindicate innocence. Our law contains no dispensation from this duty. The defendant has a right to the benefit of their evidence; and the court is bound to secure a right so essential to the complete protection of life, liberty and property. If, therefore, this right exists in the defendant to prove his innocence, there must exist a power to compel the attendance of reluctant witnesses; otherwise, the right would be nugatory, and it would be in the option of the witnesses to defeat the provisions of the constitution.

It is always to be remembered that at the last term affidavits were produced to show that the witnesses were necessary to our defence. The court then directed subpœnas to be issued, and the trial to be deferred. The due service of the subpœnas has been fully proved, and the defendant has complied with everything that was requisite on his part. Why then shall the attendance of the witnesses not be procured? It is said that they have written a letter to the court, stating their excuse. But I may ask whether such a letter can be considered as a legal apology? If the witnesses had any excuse to offer, it should have been presented in another shape. The court certainly can pay no attention to this document; for though in one instance the rescript or letter of a British king was received as evidence, yet this was always considered as an improper proceeding, and not as a legal precedent. Even in England, therefore, a mere letter would not be thought worthy of notice; and in this country neither the president nor any other officer can be heard in a court of justice to exculpate himself from a contempt, unless upon oath.

I go on to remark that whatever might be the practice of English courts as to enforcing the attendance of witnesses, the power and the duty of the American courts would not be affected by it. I might therefore be silent as to this head of the argument; but lest the court should think it of importance, I shall bestow some few minutes to its consideration. The counsel for the prosecution have supposed that attachments against witnesses for contempt in non-attendance, owed their origin to the statute of Elizabeth, and that they did not exist at common law. On the contrary, the passage from Blackstone which has been quoted shows that, from the earliest ages of the law, the superior courts of justice have used the method of punishing contempts by attachment. Contempts committed by witnesses "by making default when summoned, refusing to be sworn, or examined, or prevaricating in their evidence when sworn," have, according to the learned commentator, always been punished in this manner. Attachments in such cases are therefore as ancient as the laws themselves; and did not, as the counsel for the prosecution contend, grow out of the statute of Elizabeth. If so, all the fabric which those gentlemen have endeavored to raise upon this foundation, must inevitably fall to the ground. It is true, as they have stated, that Lord Chief Justice Lee is made in one case to say that "attachments are a new practice; that he remembered the first motion for them." But there must be some mistake in this reporter; for it is laid down in a case mentioned in Lil. Reg., that an attachment may be granted against witnesses for their non-attendance, and this is said in a case which took place long before the period to which the memory of Lord Chief Justice Lee could have extended.[2] Besides, the authority of Lord Mansfield, in the case cited from Douglas, is at variance with the assertions of the learned counsel. His lordship says: "The courts of Westminster Hall most clearly now (and they also did so before the statute) proceed against witnesses who wilfully absent themselves, as for a contempt." Thus, therefore, Lord Mansfield, according to Douglas, one of the most eminent reporters of the English bar, is at variance with the counsel for the prosecution. The court must determine as to which it is probable should be mistaken.

But the gentlemen for the prosecution say, that if we are entitled to any thing, it would be only to a rule against the witnesses to show cause; and if this was all the dispute between us, it would be of little consequence whether in the first instance the attachment should be granted, or a rule to show cause why it should not be issued. The cases, however, which they have quoted respecting this matter are, except one, in civil causes. The only one of a criminal kind, in which the question arose, and which is in 7 Term R., is a case where the court doubted their authority to have originally issued the subpœna. They therefore granted a rule to show cause in the first instance, that the parties might argue that point if they thought proper; and being satisfied upon it, the attachment was finally issued, the rule being made absolute, and Lord Kenyon saying that the application was warranted by precedent. It will be seen, too, that in the cause cited in the notes to that case, the court of king's bench had, without any question, issued an attachment in a criminal case in the first instance. So that from authority, and from reason, upon the principles of the common law, and on precedents from time immemorial, it appears that courts possess a right to enforce obedience to their precepts by process of attachment.

Here PATERSON, Circuit Justice, asked whether this power of punishing contempts was not incident to courts of justice? And upon the counsel's replying that it certainly was, according to the scope of his argument, the judge observed that he had always considered it so.

Mr. Harison then proceeded in the following manner:

Taking it then for granted (which perhaps no man of legal information could have doubted) that the power to punish contempts is, by the principles of the common law, inherent in every superior court, and that process of attachment is to be resorted to for that purpose, it will follow that unless the witnesses are entitled to exemption from the general rule on account of their official characters, attachments ought to be granted. But any objection on that ground is disclaimed, and would not be tenable.

It is, nevertheless, objected that the attendance of these witnesses ought not to be enforced, because the nature of the evidence expected from them is such as would criminate themselves. I shall certainly not attempt to invalidate the maxim, "that no one is bound to inculpate himself." It is too well established, and too sacred in its nature, to admit of a dispute. The court will, in every instance, secure to the witnesses the benefit of the rule; and for that purpose will examine the interrogatories that may be put to them, and even have the questions reduced to writing for the sake of precision. But then the court will never prejudge the question in this state of the business, when it cannot appear that the testimony of the witnesses will of necessity inculpate themselves. For, granting that the participation of the president and great officers of state in Miranda's enterprise is to be established by the evidence, still no man need be called upon as a witness to accuse himself. Mr. Madison might speak only as to what relates to the president, and other members of the administration; and they again might be examined with the like qualification of not being called upon to accuse themselves. At present, the court cannot determine for the witnesses, whether they will or will not insist upon the privilege of not answering to those things which would involve their own crimination. It is a privilege which the law has conferred for their benefit; and which, in the course of examination, they might think proper to renounce; since, according to the legal maxim, "Quisquis renuntiare potest juri pro se introducto." At any rate, they are not for themselves to judge that they can give no evidence which the court would receive or compel; but they must come in person, and submit themselves to the judgment of the court upon the questions as they arise.

[2] [The case in 1 Lil. Reg. 162, is said to have taken place in 1655. The dictum of Lord Chief Justice Lee was in 1748; but perhaps he spoke of an attachment in civil causes. It is most probable they had in such cases fallen into disuse after the statute, when the remedy by action may have been preferred, at least for some time.]

One other objection has been taken to the issuing of an attachment in this case, flowing from the supposed deficiency of the tender made to Mr. Madison for his expences. But it is obvious that he had waived the objection, and he would, probably, have disdained as a subterfuge, what the legal ingenuity of learned counsel has pleaded in his excuse. Indeed, the constitution has directed that the accused shall in all cases have compulsory process for his witnesses, and it is silent with regard to defraying their expences. If this should be deemed necessary to secure their attendance, the poor (though innocent) might lose the benefit of this provision. Such a construction of the constitution certainly will not be adopted; and, if I am not misinformed, a contrary doctrine has received the sanction of the judges in one of the courts of the United States. It should also be considered that in civil cases a party injured by the nonattendance of witnesses may have some reparation from the recovery of damages. But in criminal cases such remedy would be wholly inadequate, even if it could be obtained by any legal proceeding. We trust, therefore, that the court will grant our motion for an attachment.

I now proceed to the second, and perhaps more important, question, whether the trial should be deferred until the attendance of the witnesses can be enforced. If the principles which I have alluded to, as to the rights of the accused, are correct, and that the most dignified characters in the Union are obliged to attend for the protection of innocence, then even the president himself, who sustains the most exalted character upon earth, that of the chief magistrate of a free people, clothed as he is with great constitutional privileges, and bound to the most important duties, vested with the whole executive power, and considered as the common parent of the American people, might probably be required to attend the trial, if his evidence was requisite for our defence. But it is not necessary for us at present to insist upon this position; we ask only for the attendance of his ministers; and though perhaps it may not be reasonable that they should be dragged from one end of the continent to another upon light and trivial occasions, yet, if affairs of state and their important avocations are at all times to shield them from attendance, our best and dearest interests may be put in jeopardy, and the means of protecting innocence totally fail. In all these cases, I take it, the court will inquire into the nature of the evidence, and see whether it is relevant to the cause to be tried. We contend that the evidence is relevant, whether it goes in justification of the defendant, or in mitigation of the crime. If in justification of the defendant, then it is admitted that it would be proper to defer the trial. This, therefore, is the first subject for our consideration; and it will depend upon the question whether the defendant will be justified in a participation in Miranda's enterprize, by the president and chief officers of the administration having known and approved of the plan.

The gentlemen concerned for the prosecution tell us that the constitution has invested congress alone with the power of declaring war; and that even the positive orders of the president (much less his knowledge or approbation) would be no justification for the defendant. We admit, indeed, this constitutional provision; but on our part, we contend that actual war may exist without any declaration. The necessity of a declaration to the existence of a public war has, indeed, sometimes been insisted upon; but is contrary to the doctrine of Grotius, Bynkershoek, and other approved writers. Hostilities committed by the public authority of one government against another must certainly create a state of war, independent of any declaration; and a state of actual war subsisting between Spain and the United States would be a justification to the defendant upon this indictment. Besides, by the constitution of the United States, the supreme executive power is vested in the president; and it is the presumption of law that this high and responsible officer will perform his duty. The citizen, therefore, when he acts with the knowledge and approbation of the president, must stand justified, unless the case is such as could not, upon any construction, fall within his legal powers. Confidence is to be reposed in the magistrate at the head of public affairs, and though the president might be punishable by impeachment or otherwise, for his misconduct, the private citizen should be safe when acting under the authority of the executive. If actual war, therefore, may exist without a declaration, and without the concurrence of congress, then I would ask whether the supreme executive power would not be justified in directing hostilities against the enemy? Suppose, for instance, that the British government should commence an actual warfare against us, and meditate aggressions from the province of Lower Canada, would not the president be justified in making an immediate diversion in another quarter, though no actual invasion had taken place, if he could thus defeat the design of the enemy? Or would it in such case be necessary for him to convene congress and obtain a declaration of war, when in the interim our territories might be invaded, and irreparable mischief done to our citizens and their possessions? Suppose, again, that a military expedition against the more distant territories of Spain should be found necessary, to prevent an attack by them upon our south-western frontier, would it not be competent for the president to direct such an expedition in a case that would not admit of delay? The authority of the president in such circumstances may not, indeed, be given by the express terms of the constitution; but it is virtually implied and contained in the supreme executive power with which he is invested,—a power which, in all governments of every form, must sometimes act upon its responsibility for the protection of the public, even where no express power is delegated. When it neglects this high duty, it becomes an object of scorn; and for the performance of it, if the president should even exceed the bounds of express constitutional power, he would rise to a fault which his country would applaud, and which the rest of the world could not censure.

If there are cases, then, in which actual war may exist without a declaration of it by congress, (and unless I have been misinformed, the case of Tripoli was originally such,) then there may be cases in which the president may lawfully order or approve of military enterprizes without the sanction of congress. Now, if such cases can exist, the present is, perhaps, a case containing all the circumstances which would justify the president in the exertion of extraordinary powers. The situation of the two countries was in reality a state of war, as we expect to show from the message of the president and the proceedings of congress. It was right in the president to attack the enemy in his most vulnerable part; and the fitting out of the expedition under Miranda, if done with the knowledge and approbation of the president, was highly meritorious. For as the indictment charges the defendant with preparing the means for a military expedition, and as the military enterprizes are within the proper province of the president's authority, if he approved of the expedition, (as we say he did,) then the defendant stands justified. A private citizen, acting with the approbation of the executive, in a military expedition against the enemy, wants no other justification. He is not presumed to know the secrets of state, which belong to the president and his ministers. When they approve of the expedition, as Col. Smith says they did in this instance, it must be presumed legal; and all military enterprizes would be delayed and rendered precarious, if the officer was to wait for legal explanations, or acts of congress, before he complied with the wishes of the executive power. I have already said that the president is to be considered as the parent of the American family. As such, he was bound to warn them against the commission of any criminal proceedings that came to his knowledge, and he could not neglect to do so without a violation of his duty. Even if this was doubtful upon general principles, the act of congress, upon which the indictment is framed, enjoins him to prevent the commission of the offences therein mentioned. Consequently, the presumption of the legality of those expeditions which he approved would be strengthened by the consideration that it was expressly made his duty to prevent them, when they came to his knowledge, unless they were against an enemy. The private citizen, therefore, must be justified under the circumstances stated, when he undertakes to forward an expedition which has been approved by the president.

I proceed now to the next branch of the argument. If the evidence required will not justify the defendant, does it go in mitigation of his offence, and ought the trial to be deferred upon this account? Here, if we suppose that every citizen undertakes a military expedition upon his own risk, and that he cannot be justified by the mere approbation which the president may have bestowed upon the enterprize, still, as the punishment is discretionary, the motives of the defendant should be inquired into, and all the circumstances which tend to show that he acted from no improper or wicked design should be admitted to alleviate the offence. One of the greatest orators and lawyers of the present age, when speaking of the English criminal law, says that it is "the purest, the noblest, the chastest system of distributive justice, that was ever venerated by the wise, or perverted by the foolish, or that the children of men in any age or clime of the world ever yet beheld." This is, indeed, a very great and striking eulogium; but, perhaps, more applicable to our criminal system, than to that of England. We have moderated the unreasonable severity of their code, and made the protection of the accused more peculiarly our care, at the same time that we have preserved everything that was good and valuable in their system. Thinking, therefore, as I do, of the criminal system of this country, and supposing it entitled to all the praise which Mr. Curran has given to that of England, I cannot believe that it can be so defective as to trust a discretionary punishment of offences to the court, according to the circumstances of the case; and yet not supply the means to the accused of manifesting those circumstances upon the trial. If our system is perfect, it must proportion punishments to the offences, and will not consider the stain to be equal when the whole body is clothed with corruption, and when the spot is so small that the microscopic eye can scarcely discover it. The differences of offence must necessarily imply a difference of punishment, and this again implies an examination of all circumstances, which must be had according to the language of the poet. "Ne scutica dignum, horribili sectere flagello." But this examination can never take place if the evidence which goes in mitigation, the evidence which shows the real motives of the defendant, and the circumstances of the case, is excluded from the trial. The defendant, if he has a right to justice, has a right to acquittal if innocent, and if guilty, to show what the precise extent of his offence, that he may be punished accordingly. It is in vain to say that evidence in mitigation may be received by affidavit after the trial. For this is a novel practice permitted by the indulgence of the courts, where the regular time for offering the evidence has elapsed. There is no compulsory method to oblige witnesses to make these affidavits. If they are so disposed, they may indeed do it; but they may also refuse if they think proper; and thus, if the doctrine contended for on the part of the prosecution is to prevail, there will arise this legal solecism, that the defendant shall have a right to be judged according to the degree of his guilt, and yet shall possess no legal means to ascertain that degree, by an explanation of his motives or other circumstances, which, though not amounting to a justification, may fix the relative malignity of the crime.

It is said, indeed, that this kind of evidence can only serve to mislead the jury; but I ask, by what kind of logic is it permitted to the public accuser to produce all the evidence that will go in aggravation of the crime, (whatever may be its effect upon the mind of the jury,) and to exclude all that would tend to mitigate the offence, even where there is no other certain way of bringing it before the court, except upon the trial? If this is really to be considered as the law of our country, then is our boasted system of criminal law miserably defective in a most important point. We have shown to the court by the Case of Lord Anglesea, 9 State Tr. 335, that the public prosecutor was suffered to give evidence in aggravation, because "the fine which the court was to impose was discretionary, and would be greater or less in proportion to the nature of the offence; and, therefore, everything was proper to be laid before the court that might be an ingredient in their consideration for the imposing that fine." And, surely, if this was a reason for giving evidence in aggravation, the same reason would legalize evidence in mitigation of the offence.

The counsel for the prosecution, upon this part of the argument, seem to rely upon the Case of the Chevalier D'Eon as reported by Burrows (volume 3, p. 1513),—first, to show that evidence in mitigation comes properly after the trial; and, secondly, that the want of it is no reason for postponement. On our part it is admitted that the case in Burrows is law, and whenever a case similar to it shall arise, it ought to govern. But it was a case the circumstances of which were extraordinary, and from which no conclusion can be drawn to affect the present. In the first place, no process whatever could there reach the witnesses, and if they gave evidence at all, it must be because they were well affected towards the defendant, and willing to testify on his behalf. If, therefore, they were expected to come voluntarily as witnesses to the trial, they would also voluntarily make affidavits in mitigation of the offence, if they could do so with propriety. In both cases they could not be affected by the process of the court; and their conduct depended upon their volition. So that the defendant lost nothing by their non-attendance upon the trial. Again, it is observable, that Lord Mansfield says their evidence, if in mitigation, may be received after the trial. But his lordship does not say that evidence in mitigation could not be received upon the trial. And if it could not why enter into all the other reasoning, when this at once would have been a conclusive argument?

Granting, therefore, that where the witnesses are beyond the reach of process from the court, where their evidence will be merely in mitigation; and where, if they attend at all, it must proceed from their own good will, that the trial ought not to be deferred for their nonattendance, (which is all that the case from Burrows establishes,) we cannot draw the consequence either that evidence in mitigation could not be heard upon the trial, or that, if the witnesses were under the control of the court, and ill affected towards the defendant, the court would not defer the trial to procure their testimony. On our part, besides the Case of Lord Anglesea from the State Trials, we have also upon this subject produced to the court the cases from McNally's Evidence to show that where the punishment is discretionary, evidence of character may be produced upon the trial, to inform the mind of the court as to the fine to be imposed. One of the counsel associated with me appears to have been concerned in one of those cases, and has stated the circumstances of it to the court. The counsel for the prosecution contend, that these cases only show that character may be given in evidence upon a criminal prosecution; and they contend that the only reason why such evidence is ever admitted, is because it demonstrates the improbability that a man of such a character would be guilty of such a crime. We admit that this kind of proof may, in some cases, be properly given for the purpose stated by our opponents; for the evidence may be so equally poised, that even the circumstance of character may turn the balance. But the cases in McNally's Evidence do not go upon this principle. They admit the offences to have been fully proved, and state the evidence of character to have been received merely to guide the discretion of the court as to the extent of the punishment. Either, therefore, these cases must not be law, or they show that evidence in mitigation, where the punishment is discretionary, is proper upon the trial.

I have now gone through the argument which I proposed to lay before the court. If we are right, then the beauty or harmony of our criminal system is preserved throughout all its parts; the right of the accused to have compulsory process for his witnesses is maintained; and he is enabled, not only to manifest his innocence, if the evidence will support it, but, if he is not perfectly innocent, to show the shade and color of his offence, that the punishment may, by the court, be proportioned to it.

I conclude with observing, that the interest which the public has taken in this cause has perhaps been sufficiently accounted for. It is a state prosecution, instituted by the president's orders, for acts done with the president's knowledge and approbation. It is, therefore, highly important; and the sense of its importance may perhaps have been heightened in the public mind, by seeing the learned judge of another district called upon to assist the public prosecution, and to lend his exertions and talents in support of the prosecution.

Thursday, July 17th, 1806.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. It appears to the court, that James Madison, secretary of state, Robert Smith, secretary of the navy, and Jacob Wagner and William Thornton, who are officers under the department of the secretary of state, have been duly served with subpœnas to attend as witnesses on the part of the defendant, and that they do not attend pursuant to the process of the court. As the facts charged in this indictment, if committed at all, were committed at the city of New York, the court could not perceive how the above-named persons, who reside at the city of Washington, and were there during the transaction, could be material witnesses on the trial of the indictment; and were of opinion that, under such circumstances. an affidavit in common form was not sufficient to put off the trial. The consequence is, that the court would inquire into the grounds of the general allegation set forth in the common affidavit, and insist upon the defendant's stating the point of materiality, which he expected to prove by these witnesses. Perhaps the defendant, by stating particulars in his affidavit, and the material facts which he intended to prove by their testimony, might remove this doubt, and induce the court to grant his application. This was the substance of the opinion delivered by the court on Monday, and which, on a review, are considered to be correct, and perfectly consistent with the principles and usages of law. The result of this opinion has been, that the defendant has come forward with an affidavit stating the material facts, which he conceives he will be able to prove by the evidence of Mr. Madison, Mr. Smith, Mr. Wagner and Mr. Thornton. This part of the affidavit runs in the following words: "And this deponent farther saith, that he hopes and expects to be able to prove by the testimony of the said witnesses, that the expedition and enterprise, to which the said indictment relates, was begun, prepared and set on foot with the knowledge and approbation of the president of the United States, and with the knowledge and approbation of the secretary of state of the United States. And the deponent farther saith, that he hopes and expects to be able to prove, by the testimony of the said witnesses, that if he had any concern in the said expedition and enterprise, it was with the approbation of the president of the United States, and the said secretary of state. And the deponent farther saith, that he is informed, and doth verily believe, and hopes and expects to be able to prove, by the testimony of the said witnesses, that the prosecution against him for the said offence charged in the said indictment is commenced and prosecuted by order of the president of the United States. And the deponent farther saith, that he has been informed and doth verily believe, that the said James Madison and Robert Smith are prevented from attending by order or interposition of the president of the United States."

In consequence of the foregoing statement, the defendant has moved the court (1) to postpone the trial; (2) for an attachment against those absent witnesses. These questions have been ably and elaborately argued by the counsel on both sides. They are important both as to their general nature and as to their immediate pressure and bearing on the cause now at issue; and I have given them all the consideration that my feeble habit of body would permit.

The first question is, whether the facts stated in the defendant's affidavit be material, or ought to be given in evidence, if the witnesses were now in court, and ready to testify to their truth? Does the affidavit disclose sufficient matter to induce the court to put off the trial? As judges, it is our duty to administer justice according to law. We ought to have no will, no mind, but a legal will and mind. The law, like the beneficent author of our existence, is no respecter of persons; it is inflexible and even-handed, and should not be subservient to any improper considerations or views. This ought to be the case particularly in the United States, which we have been always led to consider as a government not of men, but of laws, of which the constitution is the basis.

The evidence which is offered to a court must be pertinent to the issue, or in some proper manner connected with it. It must relate and be applied to the particular fact or charge in controversy, so as to constitute a legal ground to support, or a legal ground to resist the prosecution. For it would be an endless task, and create inextricable confusion, if parties were suffered to give in evidence to the jury whatever self-love, or prejudice, or whim, or a wild imagination might suggest. This is an idea too extravagant to be entertained by reflecting and candid men; as it would, if carried into practice, quickly prostrate property, civil liberty, and good government. Law would become a labyrinth—a bottomless pit; and courts would be perverted from their original design, and turned into instruments of injustice and oppression. A line must be drawn—a line has been drawn—on such occasions, which it becomes the duty of judges to pursue. If there be no line, anything and everything may be given in evidence. Where shall we stop? What is the rule which we find to be laid down for our guidance? The evidence must be pertinent to the issue. The witnesses must be material. If the evidence be not pertinent, nor the witnesses material, the court ought not to receive either. Let us test the affidavit of the defendant by this principle or rule. The defendant is indicted for providing the means, to wit, men and money, for a military enterprise against the dominions of the king of Spain, with whom the United States are at peace, against the form of a statute in such case made and provided. He has pleaded not guilty; and to evince his innocence, to justify his infraction of the act of congress, or to purge his guilt, he offers evidence to prove, that this military enterprise was begun, prepared, and set on foot with the knowledge and approbation of the executive department of our government. Sitting here in our judicial capacities, we should listen with caution to a suggestion of this kind, because the president of the United States is bound by the constitution to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." These are the words of the instrument; and, therefore, it is to be presumed that he would not countenance the violation of any statute, and particularly if such violation consisted in expeditions of a warlike nature against friendly powers. The law, indeed, presumes, that every officer faithfully executes his duties, until the contrary be proved. And, besides the constitutional provision just mentioned, the seventh section of the act under consideration expressly declares, that it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as shall be judged necessary for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories of the United States against the territories or dominions of a foreign prince or state with whom the United States are at peace. 3 Swift's Laws, 91, 92 [1 Stat. 384].

The facts, however, which are disclosed in the defendant's affidavit, we must, in the discussion of the present question, take to be true in the manner therein set forth; and the objection goes to the invalidity, the inoperative virtue, and the unavailing nature of the facts themselves. Are the contents of the affidavit pertinent—are they material—are they relevant? The fifth section of the statute, on which the indictment is founded, is expressed in general, unqualified terms; it contains no condition, no exception; it invests no dispensing power in any officer or person whatever. Thus it reads: "And be it further enacted and declared, that if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for, any military expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince or state with whom the United States are at peace, every such person so offending shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall suffer fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court, in which the conviction shall be had, so as that such fine shall not exceed three thousand dollars, nor the term of imprisonment be more than three years." The section which I have read is declaratory of the law of nations; and, besides, every species of private and unauthorized hostilities is inconsistent with the principles of the social compact, and the very nature, scope, and end of civil government. The statute, which is the basis of the present indictment, was passed the 5th of June, 1794, and was temporary; but congress found it expedient, and, perhaps, necessary, to continue it in force, without limitation of time, which was done on the 24th of April, 1800 [2 Stat. 54]. This fifth section, which prohibits military enterprises against nations with which the United States are at peace, imparts no dispensing power to the president. Does the constitution give it? Far from it, for it explicitly directs that he shall "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." This instrument, which measures out the powers and defines the duties of the president, does not vest in him any authority to set on foot a military expedition against a nation with which the United States are at peace. And if a private individual, even with the knowledge and approbation of this high and pre-eminent officer of our government, should set on foot such a military expedition, how can he expect to be exonerated from the obligation of the law? Who holds the power of dispensation? True, a nolle prosequi may be entered, a pardon may be granted; but these presume criminality, presume guilt, presume amenability to judicial investigation and punishment, which are very different from a power to dispense with the law.

Supposing then that every syllable of the affidavit is true, of what avail can it be on the present occasion? Of what use or benefit can it be to the defendant in a court of law? Does it speak by way of justification? The president of the United States cannot control the statute, nor dispense with its execution, and still less can he authorize a person to do what the law forbids. If he could, it would render the execution of the laws dependent on his will and pleasure; which is a doctrine that has not been set up, and will not meet with any supporters in our government. In this particular, the law is paramount. Who has dominion over it? None but the legislature; and even they are not without their limitation in our republic. Will it be pretended that the president could rightfully grant a dispensation and license to any of our citizens to carry on a war against a nation with whom the United States are at peace? Ingenious and learned counsel may imagine, and put a number of cases in the wide field of conjecture; but we are to take facts as we find them, and to argue from the existing state of things at the time. If we were at war with Spain, there is an end to the indictment; but, if at peace, what individual could lawfully make war or carry on a military expedition against the dominions of his Catholic majesty? The indictment is founded on a state of peace, and such state is presumed to continue until the contrary appears. A state of war is not set up in the affidavit. If, then, the president knew and approved of the military expedition set forth in the indictment against a prince with whom we are at peace, it would not justify the defendant in a court of law, nor discharge him from the binding force of the act of congress; because the president does not possess a dispensing power. Does he possess the power of making war? That power is exclusively vested in congress; for, by the eighth section of the 1st article of the constitution, it is ordained, that congress shall have power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, raise and support armies, provide and maintain a navy, and to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. And we accordingly find, that congress have been so circumspect and provident in regard to the last three particulars, that they have from time to time vested the president of the United States with ample powers.

Thus, by the act of the 28th of February, 1795 (3 Swift's Laws, 188 [1 Stat. 424]), it is made lawful for the president to call forth the militia to repel invasions, suppress insurrections, and execute the laws of the Union. Abstractedly from this constitutional and legal provision, the right to repel invasions arises from self-preservation and defence, which is a primary law of nature, and constitutes part of the law of nations. It therefore becomes the duty of a people, and particularly of the executive magistrate, who is at their head, and commander-in-chief of the forces by sea and land, to repel an invading foe. But to repel aggressions and invasions is one thing, and to commit them against a friendly power is another. It is obvious, that if the United States were at war with Spain at the time that the defendant is charged with the offence in the indictment, then he does not come within the purview of the statute, which makes the basis of the offence to consist in beginning or preparing the means to carry on a military expedition or enterprise against a nation with which the United States are at peace. If, indeed, a foreign nation should invade the territories of the United States, it would I apprehend, be not only lawful for the president to resist such invasion, but also to carry hostilities into the enemy's own country; and for this plain reason, that a state of complete and absolute war actually exists between the two nations. In the case of invasive hostilities, there cannot be war on the one side and peace on the other. What! in the storm of battle, and, perhaps, in the full tide of victory, must we stop short at the boundary between the two nations, and give over the conflict and pursuit? Will it be an offence to pass the line of partition, and smite the invading foe on his own ground? No; surely no. To do so would be a duty, and cannot be perverted into a crime. There is a manifest distinction between our going to war with a nation at peace, and a war being made against us by an actual invasion, or a formal declaration. In the former case, it is the exclusive province of congress to change a state of peace into a state of war. A nation, however, may be in such a situation as to render it more prudent to submit to certain acts of a hostile nature, and to trust to negotiations for redress, than to make an immediate appeal to arms. Various considerations may induce to a measure of this kind; such as motives of policy, calculations of interest, the nature of the injury and provocation, the relative resources, means and strength of the two nations, &c. and, therefore, the organ intrusted with the power to declare war, should first decide whether it is expedient to go to war, or to continue in peace; and until such a decision be made, no individual ought to assume an hostile attitude; and to pronounce, contrary to the constitutional will, that the nation is at war, and that he will shape his conduct and act according to such a state of things. This conduct is clearly indefensible, and may involve the nation, of which he is a member, in all the calamities of a long and expensive war. It is a matter worthy of notice on the present occasion, that when the offence laid in the indictment is stated to have been committed, congress were in session; and if, in their estimation, war measures were prudent or necessary to be adopted, they would, no doubt, have expressed their sentiments on the subject, either by a public declaration of their will, or by authorizing the executive authority to proceed hostilely against the king of Spain. But nothing of this kind has been done, or at least appears to have been done. Congress does not choose to go to war; and where is the individual among us who could legally do so without their permission? Whoever violates the law becomes liable to its penalties; nor can the observance of the law be dispensed with, unless it contains a clause authorizing certain persons to dispense with it under specified circumstances, or whenever they may think it expedient. In the present case, if war had occurred between the United States and Spain at the time the facts stated in the indictment were committed, they would not amount to an offence within the statute, which relates to a time of tranquillity and peace. The defendant in his case would have been out of the statute. War is not pretended; and the law under consideration is absolute, requires universal obedience, and does not vest any officer with a dispensing power, or the extraordinary privilege of authorizing a person to do what it expressly prohibits. It appearing, then, that the testimony of Mr. Madison, Mr. Smith, Mr. Wagner, and Mr. Thornton, as stated in the defendant's affidavit, is not pertinent to the issue, nor material by way of justification or defence against the facts charged in the indictment, their absence cannot operate as a legal excuse to put off the trial.

But it has been contended, that if the testimony offered should not amount to a justification, it will to a mitigation of the punishment, and ought to pass to the jury for the sake of reaching the ears of the judges. I take this to be incorrect in principle, so far as it regards criminal prosecutions. Why suffer evidence to go to the jury, that is not pertinent to the issue; that will not justify the defendant, nor prove his innocence, nor purge his guilt? Is it that the court may instruct the jury that they must not regard such evidence, because it is irrelevant? This would be a work of supererogation and inutility. Nor is this all; the evidence may warp their opinion, may mislead their judgment, and induce them to find an erroneous verdict. If they acquit in consequence of this improper testimony, would a new trial be granted? Evidence, which operates merely in mitigation of the punishment, is fit for the court only. If the defendant be convicted, then the question of mitigation arises, and will come properly before the judges. I have always taken the distinction to be between criminal and civil cases. On an indictment for a misdemeanor, where the punishment is discretionary, the jury are to determine whether the defendant be guilty or not of the charge exhibited against him; and it is the peculiar and exclusive province of the court to ascertain the punishment. The jury have no voice in fixing the punishment; and why should they hear evidence respecting it? In civil prosecutions, instituted to recover damages, as in an action for assault and battery, false imprisonment, evidence in mitigation should be addressed to the jury, because they are the legally constituted assessors of the quantum of damages. It is of the utmost importance to the due administration of justice, that the boundary between the province of the judges and the province of the jury, which is accurately marked by the law, should be inviolably preserved; it ought not to be broken in upon, as it would lead to confusion, and render our civil rights precarious.

The Case of Anglesea, 9 State Tr. 335, has been cited to prove, that the vindictive temper and conduct of Anglesea a day or two preceding the assault were given in evidence, though strongly resisted by his counsel. This may have been proper in two points of view: (1) Because, according to the practice of Westminster Hall, matter in aggravation, previously to the commission of the offence and conviction of the offender, are not usually laid before the court after conviction, in order to increase the punishment. This is a humane practice, and in favor of the offender. I say usually, because there may be some exceptions, or some anomalous cases to the contrary. (2) Because the previous conduct, and malicious spirit of Anglesea naturally led to the assault, were connected with it, and constituted one offence. It is usual to relate the circumstances attending the fact, which form no inconsiderable ingredient in the transaction, and are perfectly consistent with the nature of the case, and the issue.—What is it, but to set forth the special manner of the fact or offence? In the case cited, it was the same person, it was the same offence. This case, therefore, is not applicable to the present, and cannot be assimilated to it.

Several passages were read in McNal. Ev., which went to show in what case the character of the prisoner may be given in evidence on his trial. Great relaxation of the old rule has of late years obtained, at least in the Irish courts of judicature; for in a certain class of cases, the character of the defendant, when it bears on the issue, and goes to show the improbability of his having committed the fact laid in the indictment, is permitted to be given in evidence; as on indictment for seditious libels, for riots and assaults, for forgeries, &c. Let us hear the opinions of Lord Carlton, Lord Kilwarden, Baron Smith, and Lord Kenyon, 1 McNal. Ev. 321–323.

In Rex v. Brown, commission of oyer and terminer, Dublin, Dec., 1798, before Lords Kilwarden and Carlton, Chief Justices, the prisoner was indicted, at common law, for uttering a forged instrument, purporting to be a promissory note for money of Sir Thomas Lighton & Co. The prisoner offered evidence of character; which was objected to on the old rule, that evidence of character was only admissible in favorem vitæ, on capital charges, but the indictment here was not capital, but merely a misdemeanor. Lord Carlton, C. J. Com. Pl., said, he had conversed with many of the judges on the subject now before the court, who thought, as he did, that in cases where character was put in issue, evidence of such a nature might be very material: for example, suppose a man of very great property was indicted for perjury, when the object to be obtained by the perjury was a mere trifle, for instance a shilling; or suppose a man to be charged with a riot or assault, who was known to be of a peaceable and quiet disposition; evidence of character in such cases, directly encountering the nature of the charge in the indictment, must be of the last importance. His lordship then cited Rex v. Carr, Guildhall, London, 32 Car. 2, on an information for a libel against the government. Sir William Scroggs, who was the judge, and who was not likely to grant a prisoner, in such a case, any privilege that he was not entitled to, admitted the defendant to give evidence of his character and deportment. Lord Chief Justice Holt, his lordship observed, also admitted this species of evidence; and all the judges in Ireland, upon the late circuits, uniformly received the evidence of loyalty in cases where the charge was of a seditious nature, though amounting only in point of law to a misdemeanor. Lord Kilwarden, C. J. Ban. Reg., agreed with Lord Carlton, and observed, that the reason generally assigned for the admission of such evidence in capital cases, and in capital cases only, was altogether unsatisfactory to his mind. It was said to be in favorem vitæ; but he had no conception, according to the principle of sound sense and right reason, that character could be evidence in a case affecting the life of a man, and yet not evidence in a case affecting his freedom, his property, and his reputation. In Rex v. Crawley, commission of oyer and terminer, Dublin, February, 1802, W. Smith, B., in his charge to the jury, adverted to the evidence of good character, which had been given for the prisoner. Character, he said, is of great weight in every case, and requires particular attention when the charge is grounded on circumstantial evidence; for it then creates a greater degree of doubt than where the prosecution is supported by direct evidence. In the former case, evidence of character ought to be particularly attended to, because the jury is more or less embarrassed, and called upon to weigh the case with more scruple and doubt, from the very nature of the testimony. Lord Kenyon's sentiment, though promulgated in a capital charge of the first magnitude, may be well applied to all cases, where the character of the defendant comes in issue. An affectionate and warm evidence of character, when collected together, should make a strong impression in favor of the prisoner, and when those who give such character in evidence are entitled to credit, their testimony should have great weight with the jury. The reason assigned by the Irish judges, in favor of giving character in evidence on indictments for misdemeanors, when it bears on the issue, possesses great weight, and perhaps, irrefragable. I feel no disposition to controvert them, nor is it necessary to do so on the present occasion. Character had, in the cases cited, an immediate and powerful bearing on the facts in issue, and did not go merely in mitigation of the punishment. Downe, J. (1 McNal. Ev. 320), admitted the prisoner to give evidence of character, as a fraud was charged, and the punishment was not certain, but discretionary. The first reason given by Judge Downe is solid, because character bears on the point of fraud; but the second reason I do not consider in the same light, for it appears to me to be unsound and incompatible with legal principles.

The suggestion, that the evidence should be permitted to pass to the jury, that they may determine whether the offender ought to be recommended for mercy, is utterly destitute of foundation. It does not merit a serious thought. The jurors are to hear such evidence as the court think pertinent and material, and nothing more. But if matters, which may induce the jury to recommend the offender to the pardoning power, should be received in evidence, I do not know where we are to stop, or how to draw a line between the admission and the non-admission of testimony. We should be without landmarks; and afloat on the ocean without any compass to direct our course.

2. The Attachment. On this subject the judges disagree, or, as the statute expresses it, their opinions are opposed. When this happens, the judges do not assign any reason in favor of their respective opinions, but merely state the point of disagreement, that either party may carry it to the supreme court for ultimate decision, according to the 6th section of the act to amend the judicial system of the United States, passed the 29th of April, 1802 [2 Stat. 159]. One of the judges is of the opinion, that the absent witnesses should be laid under a rule to show cause why an attachment should not be issued against them. The other judge is of the opinion, that neither an attachment in the first instance, nor a rule to show cause, ought to be granted.

Immediately after the opinion of the court had been given, Sanford moved to bring on the trial.

Hoffman requested permission for the counsel of the defendant to confer a few minutes together.

Morton requested a few days' delay, or to the next term; he did it with great deference to the court, and should submit with silent respect to their decision. The ground on which this question had been argued by the gentlemen with whom he was joined had great force on his mind, and he hoped the court would admit of a short delay. He farther requested that Mr. Smith's affidavit might be filed

PATERSON, Circuit Justice. The court have considered this point also, and determined that the trial should proceed. His own infirm state of health had for a moment inclined him to agree to a few days' delay, with the hope that he might then be able to sit on the trial; but he was convinced that he should not in that time be sufficiently recovered. He therefore relinquishes the idea of delay on his own account; and he did not perceive any benefit which could result to the defendant by granting the application.[3]

The district attorney renewed his motion to bring on the trial. But the counsel for the defendant expressing a wish that it might be postponed till to-morrow morning, the court, with the assent of the counsel for the prosecution, granted the postponement, on condition that the defendant's counsel would make no other attempt to create delay. And the defendant's counsel having assented to this, the court adjourned till to-morrow morning.

[3] The offence of conspiracy is more difficult to be ascertained precisely than any other for which an indictment lies. It is, indeed, rather to be considered as governed by positive decision than by any consistent and intelligible principles of law. It consists, according to all the authorities, not in the accomplishment of any unlawful or injurious purpose, nor in any one act moving to that purpose; but in the actual concert and agreement of two or more persons to effect something, which being so concerted and agreed, the law regards as the object of an indictable conspiracy. There are two classes of cases in which the criminality of such agreement is perfectly intelligible and obvious: (1) where the object proposed would, if accomplished, be a criminal offence in the parties acting in it; (2) where though the ultimate object may be lawful, the means by which the parties conspirators propose to effect that purpose necessarily involve in them indictable offence. The gist of conspiracy is the unlawful confederation to do an unlawful act.

Case No. 16,342a.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[MS.]

Circuit Court, D. New York. July, 1806.

CRIMINAL LAW—ACT JUNE 5, 1794—MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS.

[1. On the trial of an indictment for a misdemeanor in beginning, setting on foot, and providing the means for a military expedition against a nation with which the United States are at peace, the president's message to congress, and other documents transmitted therewith, are inadmissible to show the existence of a war at the time the acts were charged to have been committed.]

[2. An expedition, to be within the act, need not have been consummated without deviation of course. It is sufficient if it was begun, and the means prepared to be carried on from the United States, though the vessel at the identical time of sailing was not in complete readiness for hostile engagements.]

[3. Confessions of defendant, whether in crimination or justification, are to be taken together.]

[Trial of William S. Smith, indicted under the act of congress of June 5, 1794, § 5 [1 Stat. 384], for a misdemeanor in beginning, setting on foot, and providing the means for a military expedition to be carried on from the city of New York against the dominions of Spain in South America, the United States and Spain being at peace. Proceedings on the plea in abatement to the indictment are reported in Case No. 16,341a. Proceedings on a motion for an attachment against absent witnesses and for a continuance will be found reported in Case No. 16,342.

[After the close of the evidence for the prosecution, Mr. Colden, of counsel for defendant, asked permission to read to the jury the message of the president of the United States to congress at the opening of the last session, with a variety of other documents which were transmitted by him to congress at the time, to show that the United States were then at war with Spain.]

Mr. Sanford. We object to their being read, if the court please. The message of the president might be evidence to congress of the situation of our country, but it is not addressed to a court and jury. Every question of this kind should receive the decision of its proper tribunal; the questions involved in the president's message have received such a decision, and therefore must be at rest. We found ourselves in this objection upon the decision of the court, before whom it was fully discussed. But the counsel has not told us how he means to apply the message and documents. Is it for the purpose of setting up a justification? The court has determined that they are inapplicable for that purpose; therefore they cannot go as evidence to the jury. They first attempted to maintain that the government sanctioned this expedition; that not being permitted, they now mean to show that they had a right to decide upon the president's message, whether we were at peace or at war; a question which is the exclusive province of congress to determine.

Mr. Colden. There is nothing in the decision which the court has made which precludes the testimony we offer. If there be, I have totally misunderstood the honourable judge who delivered the opinion of the court. We offered as a justification or excuse, to prove by the testimony of the witnesses whom we have subpœnaed, that the president of the United States sanctioned and approved the acts for which the defendant is now to answer. The court decided, as I understood, that although the witness should be able to make this proof, yet, as the sanction or approbation of the president would be no justification or excuse, the court refused to grant compulsory process to bring up witnesses, whose testimony, in the opinion of the court, would be irrelevant. But the question now before the court, is totally distinct from any that has been agitated, and has received no decision. We acknowledge, that the purpose for which we would introduce these documents, is to show, that at the time the expedition mentioned in the indictment was set on foot, this country was not at peace with Spain, or, which is the same thing, that Spain was not at peace with us. The court observed that we had not stated in our affidavit that we expected to prove by the witnesses we have subpœnaed that we were at war with Spain; and therefore, the court thought we could not say that their attendance was material on that ground. But, if I am not mistaken, it was to be inferred from the argument of the judge, who delivered the opinion of the court, that if we had stated in the affidavit that we expected to prove this fact, viz. that there was war with Spain, by the witnesses we have summoned, then their testimony would have appeared material, and the compulsory process we applied for would have been granted. It is true, it was the opinion of the court, that the power of declaring war vested entirely with congress. And that the president's declaration could not place us in a state of war. But this is very far short of saying, that we may not show, by any competent testimony, that there was an actual state of hostility between this country and Spain, or rather that Spain had committed aggressions and hostilities against our territory, commerce and citizens, which amounted to actual hostilities, or a state of war on her side at least.

TALLMADGE, District Judge. The court made observations but on the materiality of the witnesses; they did not go to this point, but that you were not entitled to parol evidence to prove that the country was at war.

Mr. Colden. I understand the decision of the court as I have stated it. And cannot presume that we shall not be allowed to show, that the United States were not at peace with Spain. And if we can prove that at the time that this expedition was fitted out, Spain was in open and violent hostility against this country, whatever may have been the disposition of this country to remain at peace, however reluctant she may have been to make a declaration of war, however patiently we may have been inclined to bear the wrongs and violence that were offered to us; yet without our will, and against our consent, there was an end to our peace with Spain. For we could not have been at peace with Spain, when Spain chose to be at war with us. We shall read these documents, then, to show what was the actual state of things between this country and Spain; and shall rely on these official communications of the executive, as the highest evidence of the facts which they state. For as they are made to congress by the president, in obedience to that part of the constitution which directs, that he shall, from time to time, give to the congress information of the state of the Union. There can be no higher evidence. Nor can there be an objection to our reading these documents from the newspaper which we have in court; which must derive some authenticity from its being the newspaper of the government, so far, at least, as being selected for the publication of its laws. In England the Gazette is received as evidence of the public acts of the government. Rex v. Holt, 5 Term R. 442. In the Case of Thomas Cooper, in the Pennsylvania circuit court, this kind of testimony was allowed; and in 8 State Trials, 212, the Case of John Quelch, paragraphs from the London Gazette were read, to show that there was peace between Portugal and England. Though I do not much rely on this last authority, because, although the Gazette was read, yet when an objection was afterwards raised to the testimony, the court seem to have thought it unnecessary to decide whether it was proper or not. As we offer this testimony merely to show acts of hostility against this country, on the part of Spain, it will be obvious that it does not raise the question, whether the president can put the country in a state of war, without the assent of congress. We mean to prove, that without the will, or approbation, or act of the president, or of congress, there was a war de facto with Spain. And if so, then the defendant was not guilty of fitting out an expedition against a power, with which the United States were at peace.

Mr. Hoffman. I did not expect any objections would be made to the proof now offered. I understood the opinion of the court on the motion to postpone the trial, as effectually deciding on the competency of the proposed testimony. The judge, who delivered that opinion, stated, as a reason why the trial should not be put off, that the affidavit did not allege that the witnesses could prove the existence of war between Spain and the United States. The statement of this fact was unimportant, if war could only have existed by an act of congress; for, in that case the court must have taken judicial notice of such act. The remark, therefore, could only have applied to a war, whose existence was to be proved by circumstances and facts, independent of any legislative act; by circumstances and facts, proper for the consideration of a jury, and which, like all other matters in pais, should be submitted to them, under the charge of the court. It certainly was said by the judge, and in express terms, "that Spain could not be at war with the United States, and they at peace with Spain." But, notwithstanding the reasoning adopted on that occasion, and the conclusive opinion of the judge, which I have just mentioned, it seems we are again to discuss the question, whether the United States can be at war, without a declaration of war by congress. The objection now made, goes to exclude all testimony of the fact, excepting such a declaration. It must be granted, that Spain would not be prevented by our constitution from committing aggressions; nor would her monarch trouble himself even to read that instrument when inclined to commence hostilities with the United States; and, profoundly as I respect the talents and ingenuity of our learned opponents, I apprehend it would be difficult even for them, to persuade any person of common understanding, that Spain would wait for an act of congress to authorize her to make war on the United States. We have only then to alter the manner of stating the question, and all difficulties vanish—Could Spain be at war with us, and we at peace with Spain? The answer is self-evident, and testimony ascertaining that Spain was at war with the United States, is all that is necessary to establish the fact of absolute warfare between both nations, and ought unquestionably to be received. The message of the president, with the documents officially submitted by him, tend directly to establish, that Spain had commenced hostilities against the United States; not merely acts of violence and predatory aggressions by her subjects, but open and avowed warfare, permitted and authorised by her government. In that message and its accompanying documents, therefore, we offer the best and highest proof of the fact. By the third section of the second article of the constitution, it is made the duty of the president, "from time to time, to give congress information of the state of the Union." This provision embraces equally the external and internal situation of our country: the president therefore discharges an official duty in communicating to congress our relative situation with foreign powers; and his communications form the highest evidence of facts, of a public or political nature. They must be received as such, when necessary for the purposes of defence in a criminal prosecution. Unfortunate indeed, would otherwise be the situation of an accused individual, who, having acted under their authority, is refused their production, as exculpating testimony, and is punished for a laudable confidence in the declarations of the first magistrate of the Union. Again. The constitution declares that "the executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America." Is it not a branch of the executive power to declare the condition of the nation, particularly as it regards foreign governments? If not, to which department of our government is this power intrusted? Not to the legislative department, for it holds no intercourse with foreign nations, the president being the sole organ of such intercourse—to him, likewise, belongs the right of interpreting all treaties between foreign governments and our own —of deciding upon the relative duties of one to another—and of enforcing their performance. The executive department alone, therefore, can declare, in the first instance, the political state of our nation; whether it be hostile or pacific. Such was likewise the opinion of our Washington, and he acted upon this principle in his proclamation of neutrality, issued during the early stages of the French revolution; wherein he declared the condition of the nation, as it regarded France. By some it was pretended, that he had exercised an unconstitutional power; but the measure received the applause of every true friend of his country, and the approbation of its constituted authorities. But, it is said, that the duties of the executive are distinctly marked out in the constitution, and that no powers devolve on him, but those specifically enumerated, in the second and third sections of the second article. If so, I ask, from whence does the president derive his right to remove from office? A right of late not unfrequently exercised. The counsel for the prosecution, I am confident, are not disposed to question the exercise of this very important function; but, I will thank them to show, where it is included under any presidential powers, which are specially defined in the constitution. They cannot. It is a right springing only from the general grant of executive power —a power, which remains in all other cases equally unimpaired; unless when controuled in its exercise, by the qualifications contained in the second and third sections. This is not a novel doctrine. It was the doctrine of the first congress, as the debates of that day will manifest; and, I am greatly misinformed, if the present secretary of state, one of the most distinguished members of that honourable body, did not take a decided part in advocating the same principles of construction, which I support at present. Sure I am, they are the only rational and sound ones, that can be used, in giving a just interpretation to the constitution. The constitution provides, "that congress shall have the power to declare war," and until they do declare it, cry our opponents, the nation is at peace! I shall offer at present, a very few remarks, in reply to this assertion War is either offensive or defensive. This distinction is used, only for the purpose of distinguishing the nation, which offends, or which commences the war, from that which defends itself against the attack. The war is offensive by the party which commences it; on the opposite side, it is defensive. The rights of both nations, as to the extent and nature of hostilities are equal. The defending nation is not confined in her resistance, to the mere point of attack. She can at once remove the seat of war, from her own territories, to the dominions of her enemy, and in prosecuting her defence, injure the aggressive power by direct and absolute attacks. May not therefore a defensive war exist, and all its rights attach, without a formal declaration by congress? If not, a singular paradox has grown out of the constitution. Between two nations, there may exist a state of complete war on the one side, and of peace, or at least, a species of qualified war, on the other. Our constitution, which it has been said, and with justice, was the work of the wisest men, and most enlightened patriots of the nation, cannot be charged with a doctrine so inimical to our safety and our honour. It is a doctrine originating in this prosecution, and as novel as many others by which it is distinguished. The plain and obvious meaning of the constitution, is, that it is the province of congress, when the nation is at peace, to translate it into a state of war. When an option exists, the choice is with them. But, when a foreign power attacks and makes war on the United States, they are then, by the very fact, already at war, and any declaration by congress, would be idle and nugatory.

I conclude by insisting, that a congressional declaration of war is not the sole evidence of war, actually existing between Spain and the United States. The official communications of the president, made to congress, ought to be received, as evidence of the facts, which they contain, and from them the jury have a right to decide, whether Spain and the United States were at peace at the time of the offence charged in the indictment.

Mr. Emmet. I did not intend to trouble the court on this question; but to reserve my exertions, and whatever talents and arguments I may possess, until I have the honour of addressing the jury on all the matters connected with my client's defence. I am induced, however, by the solicitations of my friends near me to alter a resolution, which was not suggested by indolence, but by attentive observation of the whole course of this prosecution; and not to abandon the last effort, which it will probably be necessary to make, exclusively with the court, for bringing forward the defendant's case to the best advantage. Our object is to give evidence as to the state of the country, with respect to its relation with Spain; for that purpose we offer the president's message to congress, and the other documents to which it refers, and with which it was originally accompanied. It is the president's duty, under the third section of the second article of the constitution, to lay before the congress information of the state of the Union, and of course, of our relations with foreign powers. This message was delivered in performance of that duty; and is therefore, at least, prima facie evidence of the facts which it contains. If it and the other accompanying public documents shall be rejected as inadmissible evidence, I confess I do not know where the defendant is to look for any better testimony as to this part of his defence. But it is stated that the decision of the court, on the motion for putting off the trial, has precluded us from giving evidence as to this point. If so, I think, with the utmost deference, that the court travelled out of the subject-matter before it. I pay profound and willing respect to its decisions, when they relate to the matters submitted to it by the parties; but when they pronounce without necessity upon irrelevant topics, they become extrajudicial, and cannot lay claim to the same authority. Did the court say we were precluded from examining the question whether this country and Spain were at peace? That was never presented to it as the question for its consideration. Our application for putting off the trial was grounded on the absence of witnesses, who could prove, not the state of peace or war, but the president's knowledge and approbation of the defendant's conduct. Why should we be precluded from examining the question whether this country and Spain are at peace? In the indictment it is averred that Spain was at peace with the United States. It is therefore a fact comprehended in the general issue joined in this prosecution; and we are surely entitled, under all the rules of law, to show that it is false. I request the attention of the court to this point. The adverse counsel admit they are bound to prove the fact; but they refuse to us the privilege of disproving it, of counteracting their proofs, and of showing that they are mistaken. Was there, or not, war de facto, is emphatically a question of fact, and as such ought to be submitted to the jury: if they should be of opinion that there was such war, the whole of the indictment is not proved. It seems, however, to be argued, that a war de facto is not sufficient to disprove the indictment, because it is founded on a statute which is declaratory of the law of nations; and that the words of the statute are to be construed with reference to that law.

It would be a sufficient answer to that argument to say, that a war de facto is recognised by the law of nations; but further, I beg leave to dissent from the opinion that this statute is declaratory of that law, although the assertion has proceeded from an authority which I highly respect. By looking at the statute, it will be found to have been originally enacted for only two years; the limitation of its duration shows that it was not intended to be declaratory of the law of nations; for that law is perpetual, and does not require to have its meaning declared every second year. The object of the act is not declaratory, but to create and describe a crime and to annex a penalty to its commission. The argument drawn from that assertion, I think, therefore, fails on every ground, and that we ought to be permitted to give the president's message in evidence of outrages committed by Spain on our frontiers, and her depredations on our commerce; whether they amount to war de facto will be matter of consideration for the jury; but we have a right to show, if we can, that the relation of peace was broken by Spain; that she carried on hostilities, violated our territories, and waged war upon our trade. Permit this to be shown, and she will not appear to be a nation at peace with us; nor will the absurdity be maintained, that we were at peace with her, when she was at war with us.

Mr. Harison. I presume that if there is any principle in our law, certain and incontrovertible, it is that in all criminal cases the jury are the judges of the law, as well as of the fact. And from this principle it follows, that no question purely of law can arise, connected with the guilt or innocence of the defendant, which is to be considered as exclusively belonging to the court, and not within the cognizance of the jury. For if, as to certain propositions so connected, the court can pronounce that by law either the affirmative or the negative is to be considered as existing, and exclude the evidence relative to that proposition, it will result, as an inevitable consequence, that they can limit and confine the province of the jury within such bounds as they themselves shall deem proper. They can assume the several propositions and controul the verdict according to their pleasure. In the determination of this cause, the question of peace or war is of primary importance; because, to establish the guilt of the defendant, it must appear that the expedition was against a nation with whom the United States was at peace. Such is the express declaration of the statute. It is therefore "a turning point," to be determined by the jury whether we were at peace with Spain when the offence is supposed to have been committed; and if the jury are to determine it, they must have every species of evidence that is fit to demonstrate the actual situation of affairs between the two countries. In opening this cause to the jury, the district attorney seems to have been fully convinced of the doctrine for which I am now contending. He then informed the jury, that the fourth point which he should establish would be that this country was at peace with Spain, when the offence was committed, which is charged in the indictment. At this time, however, he insists that this is a mere point of law, about which the court only is to judge; without reflecting that the great maxim I have already noticed would be violated by his doctrine; and without considering, that in relation to this point, legal inferences can only be deduced from facts antecedently appearing. In criminal cases, it cannot be proper for the court to assume the fact, and determine the law. They cannot tell the jury, this country was at peace. Such is the law; and you are to determine the guilt or innocence of the defendant upon that supposition. If the court could do this, the power of the jury in criminal cases would indeed be feeble, and very different from what we have supposed. But, admitting that the question of peace or war may be proper for a jury, we are told that no war can exist without a declaration by congress. Consequently, that no evidence but the act of congress can be received, to demonstrate the existence of a war between this and any other country. The federal constitution has, indeed, provided that "the congress shall have power to declare war;" and thence it is inferred that war cannot exist without such declaration. But surely, this provision of the constitution can only relate to cases where there is an option to embrace the alternative of peace or war; and it by no means implies that a formal declaration is essential to the existence of actual warfare. If the enemy commences the attack, we may appeal to arms immediately, and without any ceremony. The state of peace is no longer in being; and from the very instant that the aggression takes place, the two contending powers, by the law of nations, which is founded upon the law of nature, are to be considered as enemies. Even allowing then, that as to offensive war on the part of this country, the doctrine of our opponents would be correct; yet it should be remembered that there is a defensive, as well as an offensive war; and that the state of peace or war between two countries implies reciprocity. Both must be at peace, or both will be at war. So that, if a foreign country should declare war against the United States, or attack their territories, or commit acts of open hostility and aggression, this country would be in a state of actual warfare, without a declaration of congress upon the subject. If any doubt could be entertained whether to constitute a war in such cases, it is necessary that there should be a precedent declaration, I could refer the court to the most approved writers upon the law of nations; to Grotius, Puffendorf, Barbeyrac, Vattel, and others; all of whom (whatever may be the discordance of their opinions as to the necessity of declaring war when it is in its nature offensive) agree in the sentiment that under such circumstances as I have already stated, no rule of the law of nations would be violated, if war should be carried on without being declared.[1] I might add that the constitution itself has contemplated a case in which war may exist without any declaration of congress; where a state may engage in it, though not invaded, if in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay. The question, then, as to the state of our peace, must depend upon a variety of circumstances, and may be made evident to the jury by a variety of proofs. In the case of offensive war, the declaration of congress could be resorted to; and where the war commenced by the acts of aggression of the enemy, the acts might be proved in the same manner as every other fact of great notoriety. If then this country might have been actually at war with Spain, without any declaration of congress, it will only remain to show that the president's message is proper evidence to establish the fact. Here I must observe to the court that, by a particular provision of the constitution of the United States, it is made the duty of the president, to give congress information, "from time to time, of the state of the Union." Hence, his official communications to the legislature, must be considered as stamped with the character of truth, and carrying in themselves the most irrefragable evidence of those facts which they relate. The state of the Union depends, not only upon its internal circumstances but also upon its situation with respect to foreign powers; and when the chief magistrate of the Union exhibits to the congress a state of facts, there can be no higher evidence to establish their existence, and the consequences that result from them.

The court will no doubt recognize the presumption of law that all magistrates execute their duty with fidelity; and this presumption shall prevail until the contrary is shown. But if such a presumption exists as to the ministers of justice and subordinate magistrates of the country, it must apply, with much more force, to him who is invested with the highest dignity, and most important trust. It would be indelicate to suppose that he had deviated from the truth, and it would require the most convincing proofs to establish the fact. We hope, therefore, that the president's message will be admitted in evidence for the consideration of the jury; and we trust it will convince them that the United States were not at peace with Spain, as is alleged in the indictment.

One objection, however, still remains to be noticed. It is said the present questions have been determined by the decision of the court, upon our application to compel the attendance of witnesses. But I do not think this is the case. If I am not mistaken, the court mentioned that if the United States were not at peace with Spain, the defendant could not be guilty; and that the affidavits produced by the defendant, did neither allege the existence of a war on the part of the United States, or that the witnesses could prove it. As far as the language of the court then went, according to this statement, it seems to imply that the question of peace or war was open for discussion; but as we did not allege the materiality of the witnesses to prove the state of warfare, the court could not defer the trial on account of their absence. We were certainly under no necessity at that period of the cause to allege the state of warfare, for any other purpose but to obtain the attendance of those witnesses. If we did not judge it proper to make the allegation for that purpose, still we have a right upon the trial, to avail ourselves of the defence, and if permitted to do so, it will be a complete justification.

Mr. Sanford. I shall be extremely brief in reply to the arguments of the gentlemen who have dilated so much upon the point now before the court. The authority cited to show that the gazette is proper evidence to go to a jury, is inapplicable until a previous question shall have been decided. The question immediately before the court, and which I apprehend must be first decided, is whether the defendant can be allowed to offer any evidence whatever to the jury, to show that the United States were at war with Spain. If it shall be decided, that the defendant is entitled to give evidence to the jury, to show a state of actual war, an ulterior question may then arise, whether the gazette, or whatever else may be offered is proper evidence for that purpose. I shall, therefore, entirely abstain from a discussion of the latter question, and shall return to our former proposition on this subject, which is, that the question of peace or war under this statute, is a question of law to be decided by the court, and not a question of fact to be decided by the jury. If then, this be the point which is now presented to the court, I conceive that it has already been very fully discussed, and has already received the decision of this court. The adverse counsel are pleased to say, that they did not understand that this point was before decided. They surely have not so soon forgotten that this very argument was discussed upon the argument of the motion for a postponement, and for attachments. Did they not there urge, that the testimony of their absent witnesses was wanted for the purpose of establishing a state of actual war? And was not their whole train of reasoning upon this subject the same that has now been urged? The opinion of the two judges, as I understood it, was, if not in terms, at least by necessary consequence, that the question of war or peace under this statute, is a question of law exclusively for the decision of the court. (Here he recited some parts of the opinion, for which vide ante pages.) This opinion, however, is not now before the court, and I can only cite it from memory. I will, therefore, rapidly recapitulate the reasons upon which we contend that the question of war or peace is in this case exclusively a question of law. The high power of making war, is vested by the constitution, in the legislature alone. This provision of our constitution, is evidently the result of that jealous spirit of liberty, which pervades the people of this country. The power of making war, so important to their interests, and if abused, so dangerous to their liberties, could not, consistently with that spirit, be vested elsewhere than in the whole legislature. It follows, that under our constitution, the only evidence of a state of war which can be recognized by the courts, is the act of the legislature declaring it; for until the legislature has declared war, the nation is constitutionally and legally at peace. This consequence seems plain and undeniable. But the adverse counsel say, that war may exist in fact, though not declared by congress; that war may exist by the actual commission of hostilities, or may take place by the actual invasion of our country. They then ask, is not this war? And may not individuals, in such a state of things, undertake military enterprises against the offending nation without incurring the penalties of this statute? I answer, certainly not. I concede that the state of things which exists when the country is invaded, or actual hostilities take place, may in a certain sense of the term, be denominated war, and the counsel opposed to us, concede that war may exist by the declaration of congress, though no invasion or hostilities should have taken place. We find then, that we are here using the words "war" and "peace" in different senses. Our opponents talk of actual war, and we speak of war declared by congress. The question between us then, comes to this inquiry; in which of these senses have the legislature used the word "war," or its correlative "peace" in this statute? Without urging other topics in support of our construction, a very slight attention to the consequences of the opposite doctrine, will be sufficient to show that the word "peace" is used to indicate that state of things which exists when the nation has not declared war. Actual hostilities may take place by the irregularities or violence of individuals, or if the counsel please, the United States may be invaded, and yet the legislature may suppose that the best interests of the country require it not to declare war, but to attempt to obtain redress by negotiation. It cannot be denied that they are the constitutional judges of this question. If they have the constitutional right of deciding whether the nation shall make war or not, it follows that all the individuals of the community must submit to their decision. But the doctrine set up on the other side, is the very reverse of this. It is now contended, that if actual hostilities have happened in any extent whatever, all the people of the community are absolved from their obligation to remain at peace, and may set on foot military expeditions, and make any sort of offensive war, though the government of the country should not have declared war, and should wish to remain at peace. According to this doctrine, any individual may, at any time, declare, that in his judgment, war has taken place, because some act of irregularity or violence has happened, and may take steps, the certain tendency of which, will be to precipitate the nation into a serious conflict. When Great Britain shall capture our vessels, or impress our seamen, or commit any other act of violence, which by itself may be denominated "war," it is then the right of every citizen, according to this doctrine, to fit out an armament to invade the territories of Great Britain, and make war upon her subjects.—When disputes are subsisting between the United States and Spain respecting territorial bounds and Spanish troops occupy a part of the disputed territory, claiming it as their own, this is called an invasion of our territory, and is denominated "war"; and Colonel Smith, and every other citizen of the United States, is therefore at liberty to undertake hostile enterprises against the dominions and people of Spain, though the government of the country, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, has decided that it will still remain at peace.

These are the consequences of the doctrine now urged on the other side, and however absurd are not exaggerated. It never can be seriously imagined, that the legislature used words in a sense which must lead to such absurd consequences. The plain and obvious meaning of this statute is, that while the government of the country are at peace, all the citizens should be bound to observe the duties of that situation, and the very object of the statute is to prevent individuals from plunging the nation into war, by their own unauthorised acts of violence. The peace, mentioned in the fifth section, is described to be peace between the United States, and the foreign prince or state, thereby indicating that state of things which exists while the nations, and their governments are at peace. Any other construction would lead to the solecism, so well described by the presiding judge of this court, who is now absent, in his late charge to the grand jury, of a nation at peace, and its citizens at war.

But the adverse counsel still ask, have not our citizens a right to defend themselves when the country is invaded? Certainly they may, but this does not in any degree prove, that they have a right, in such circumstances, to invade a foreign country in turn. Defensive war is a branch of the natural right of self defence, which is enjoyed by communities and individuals in all circumstances whatever. The right of making offensive war, belongs solely to the sovereign power of the community, and can only be lawfully exercised by its authority. The rights of defensive warfare are not in question in this case, but the inquiry is, in what circumstances the citizens of this country, may invade the territories of another. Our position is, that according to the constitution of the United States, and the true meaning of this statute, no citizen can set on foot military expeditions, or make war against the dominions of a foreign state, until the relations of peace shall have been dissolved by an act of congress. In this case, no law has passed declaring war, or authorising hostilities against Spain. Our treaty with Spain is still in force, and is therefore the supreme law of the land. It results that in these circumstances, the court is judicially bound to consider the two nations at peace, and that the proposed inquiry is improper.

Mr. Hoffman. The counsel for the prosecution have the right of closing this argument; but, as the decision of the present question involves very important principles; and is intimately connected with the defence of my client, I ask permission to follow my learned opponent (Mr. Edwards) who has just spoken. I am greatly mistaken if I shall not refute his reasoning, and establish our own arguments, by the very authorities which he has produced. It has been asked, with a degree of triumph, if a private citizen can capture the property of an enemy, or commit depredations on his commerce, without regular commission or authority. Now it so happens, that we have never contended for a principle so illegal, nor evinced such ignorance of the law of nations. The question and answer were equally the offspring of the counsel's own fertile imagination; and could only have been introduced to divert the attention of the court from the true point in discussion, or to afford himself an opportunity of displaying his ingenuity in refuting arguments which we should have been ashamed to advance. We fully admit, that an individual acting offensively against a common enemy, must be regularly authorised by his own government, otherwise his aggressions might be deemed piratical, and himself rendered liable to punishment, as well by the foreign nation as by our own tribunals. The court surely understands that Col. Smith is not charged with an offence of this nature; that the indictment is founded on a particular statute; and that to bring him within its penalty, Spain must have been at peace with the United States. But we offer to prove her at war, and the sole question is on the admissibility of the evidence, necessary to establish that fact. Our opponents contend, that a declaration of war by congress is the only legal evidence of the fact. This we deny. And it must be granted, if we are right, that the evidence we offer is of the highest nature, and must be received. I certainly feel much indebted to the learned counsel for his research into the laws of the United States; and thank him for their production, which occurs so opportunely for the support of my argument. They were not within my recollection, or I should have read them, as furnishing a practical construction of the constitution. They have been rightly considered as a legislative interpretation of that instrument. Before I advert to these acts, I will notice the 12th article of the amendments to the constitution, which says: "The powers not delegated to the United States, by the constitution, nor prohibited to it by the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people." This amendment was pressed into the argument with all the zeal of sincerity; yet I am at a loss to comprehend its connexion with the present discussion. We are agitating, whether the United States were at war, or in peace? The right to determine on the one or preserve the other, is expressly delegated to the United States: neither the states respectively, nor the people at large, can exercise any constitutional power over this question; its decision exclusively belongs to the general government; and the present inquiry is, to which department thereof does it belong? Further—The object of this amendment, was to prevent the United States (not particular departments of its government) from assuming the exercise of powers by implication; tending to infringe the sovereignty of the states, or to violate the rights of the people. The nature of our federal government, excited a vigilant and cautious jealousy on this subject; and the amendment was made to insure the jurisdiction, and local sovereignty of the states over all matters, not peculiarly of national interest or concern. A chapter of the alcoran would have elucidated the gentleman's argument as clearly as the amendment.

Let us see whether he has been more fortunate in his reliance on acts of congress. The first quoted is the act of the 27th of March, 1794, entitled "An act to provide a naval armament." [1 Stat. 350.] It recites that "the depredations which had been committed by the Algerine corsairs on the commerce of the United States, rendered it necessary that a naval force should be provided for its protection;" and it authorises "the president to provide six frigates," and makes the necessary provision for officering and manning them. This act provides the ways and means for a naval force, but contains no direction for its employment or destination. The framers of the law knew the full extent of their constitutional powers. They knew, that it was the duty of congress to provide the ways and means for carrying on war, but that it belonged to the executive of the union to direct the public force.—The last section, is important, as it plainly indicates, we were then at war with Algiers: "If a peace shall take place between the United States and the regency of Algiers, no farther proceedings are to be had under the act." What! were we then at war with Algiers, and without any declaration of war by congress? Yes; and congress, without whose declaration, the gentleman would have us believe, that the United States must always enjoy the tranquillity of peace, do not, by this or any prior act, declare war against Algiers; they find it already commenced without their concurrence. The choice of decreeing the fact is superseded by the fact itself. They increase our naval forces, and forbid their reduction "until peace shall take place." Again—I ask how congress became informed, that Algiers was at war with us? They are not charged by the constitution with the intercourse between us and foreign powers, for that is an executive function. I apprehend a little more research would have produced a message from the president, wherein he judges of the fact himself, and recommends a more effective force to be provided. What is this, but his declaring the situation or state of the nation, as it respects Algiers? To comment on each of the laws cited by the counsel, would be an unpardonable waste of time; I shall only notice some of them, and that in a very cursory manner. The next in order is an act passed April 20, 1796 [1 Stat. 453], and being merely supplementary to the law first read, cannot invite a single additional observation. We have next "an act for providing a naval armament," passed July 1, 1797, which makes provision for the officering and manning of two frigates. I remark, that the act of March, 1794, was no longer in force, peace having taken place with Algiers; and the statute of 1796, provided for the building of frigates, but not for their equipment, or the subsistence of their officers and crew. It would lengthen out my reply unprofitably to mention, even by name, the numerous statutes which have been read. They are generally of the same import—one authorises the president to build or purchase twelve ships—another adds some revenue cutters—a third allows our merchantmen to protect themselves, and, by a fourth our intercourse with France is prohibited. Why they have indiscriminately been forced into this day's service, I am at a loss to comprehend; nor have I been able to learn, from the arguments of the counsel, the application of any, excepting the first and the last, to the present question. These I gladly present to the consideration of the court; they bear strongly on the present question; and, in my judgment, place our doctrine beyond a doubt. Before I consider them, I repeat one general observation, "that war can exist between the United States and a foreign power, without a declaration of war by congress."

Now for the acts: The first is the act of May 28, 1798, entitled "An act authorising the president to raise a provisional army." [1 Stat. 558.] This act called forth many strong remarks from the gentleman; and from his language, I am to conclude that he spoke the genuine convictions of his judgment; his inferences and my own, from the same source, are very different, and the court will decide between us. This law declares, "that the president of the United States be, and he hereby is authorised, in the event of a declaration of war against the United States, or of actual invasion of their territory, by a foreign power; or of imminent danger of such invasion, discovered in his opinion to exist; before the next session of congress, to cause to be enlisted and to call into actual service a number of troops," &c. Do not congress here, by express terms, contemplate the fact of the United States being at war, by the sole act of a foreign power? An army is to be raised and to be called into actual service, not in consequence of a declaration of war by congress, but in the event of war declared against the United States. And let it always be remembered, that the nature and the place of this actual service are left to the judgment of him, in whom the constitution has wisely confided the direction of the national forces. It must be admitted, that this act is no declaration of war; it is prescriptive, and it supposes a war may prevail between the United States and a foreign power, before the next session of congress.—Prevail—how? The reply is obvious; congress would be out of session. The war could not proceed from their act; yet it might take place by a declaration of war against the United States, and in that case, congress considers us, in every sense of the term, a nation at war. Our nation would be stamped with the character of belligerent, and its warlike operations would assume an offensive or defensive course, as circumstances might demand. This act is wholly inconsistent with the assertion, that the nation must always be at peace, until congress shall declare it at war. I come now to the last act, passed March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 725], entitled "An act giving eventual authority to the president to augment the army." This act differs from the preceding one, as far as I can at this moment discover, only in its phraseology. Instead of providing for a case where war shall be declared against the United States, congress, knowing that a foreign nation might make war, without any formal declaration to that effect, vary the terms before used, and provide "in case war shall break out between the United States and a foreign European power" for the augmentation of the army. The inference is too plain and too strong to be resisted. Can the court believe, that congress ever indulged so illusive an opinion, as that war or peace depended on their will or pleasure? "If war breaks out," (says the act) not by the choice of the United States, for then we admit that congress alone has the election, but, breaks out, by the acts of a foreign power, over whose decision and conduct congress could have no controul. The case here contemplated is altogether analogous with that, which we hope to prove existed at the time of the offence, charged in the indictment; for we offer expressly to show, that war had broken out between Spain and the United States; by Spain having, without any formal declaration, actually made war on the United States. If our testimony does not establish this fact, it cannot serve us.

Unfortunately for the gentleman, his inferences from the last statute, and the principle, for which he has so warmly contended, are directly at variance. "Congress alone," says he, have the only "power of declaring the nation at war." If this power is conferred exclusively on them, they cannot delegate it to any other branch of the government; for each department must execute its prescribed constitutional trust. We might as well say congress could devolve the whole duty of legislation on the president. I demand then, who was to judge the fact, whether or no, in the language of the last statute, "war breaks out?" The president. And his opinion would fix our nation exactly in that condition, where it is pretended congress alone could place it. What is this, but admitting the right of the president to pronounce, in the given case, the condition of the nation, by declaring that war did exist. Our reasoning is perfectly consistent; there is no incongruity in the exercise of the power, which we ascribe to the executive, and of the right vested in congress. When the United States are at peace, congress alone can elect to go to war; they cannot commit this choice to the president; but when war shall break out, or in other words, when a foreign power shall declare or make war against the United States, it is with the president to declare the fact, and with congress to provide the ways and means for defence.

I have thus endeavoured to confine my remarks strictly within the limits of reply. This argument was unexpected; but, feeble as it has been on my part, I cannot but hope it will prove satisfactory. I repeat my sense of obligations to the counsel, for the strength his better acquaintance with our statute laws, has afforded to our general proposition; for, if legislative sense and practice on an article of the constitution, can be deduced in aid of its true interpretation, we feel, that we stand upon sure and strong grounds.

I conclude with entreating the court always to distinguish, that we are not indicted for any offence against the law of nations; but charged with infracting a particular statute, of which there could be no breach, if Spain was at war with us. The public prosecutor has so shaped his indictment, and by it he must abide.

The argument on this point being closed, the judge, in a few words, decided that neither the president's message, or any of the documents that were offered, should be read.

Mr. Colden. We now offer testimony to show that the government had knowledge of the whole transaction.

TALLMADGE, District Judge. That has been decided as not being material to the issue. That question was deliberately settled in a full bench. I cannot attempt to alter it myself.

Mr. Colden. We do not ask to prove it by the gentlemen who are at Washington. We offer Mr. King as a witness, who is now here, to prove that the expedition was made with the knowledge and approbation of government.

TALLMADGE, District Judge. It cannot be received, as it is wholly immaterial.

TALLMADGE, District Judge (charging jury). Gentlemen, the trial upon this indictment has already occupied several days of your time. It is now drawing to a close. You have listened to the testimony of the witnesses and have attended to the argument of counsel. If in some instances the latter has been more at length than clear and illustrative, in others it has been ingenious and eloquent. This is a cause of considerable expectation and importance, both as it regards the individual accused, and as it relates to that system of neutral policy which hitherto our government have invariably pursued, and from which the United States, in a great measure derived, and are to expect, prosperity and happiness.—Conviction may not only subject the defendant to fine, but the loss of personal liberty; and should our government permit offences of this nature by passing them over with impunity, war and a participation in the quarrels and bloodshed of Europe must necessarily ensue. Need I say that such consequences ought especially to induce a jury to the most careful and dispassionate consideration of the evidence, and bear them superior to any prejudice which idle report, or out-door observation, may have excited. You will now give your attention to a review of this subject. It shall be my endeavour to present it in its native state stripped of embellishment. It is my duty to state to you the law, the substance of the accusation, and the defence.

You have heard much said upon the right of a jury to judge of the law as well as the fact. Be assured, that on this occasion there is not the least desire to abridge those rights. I am an advocate for the independence of the jury. It is the basis of civil liberty, and in this country I trust will ever be a sacred bulwark against oppression and encroachment upon political freedom. The law is now settled that this right appertains to a jury in all criminal cases. They unquestionably may determine upon all the circumstances if they will take the responsibility and hazard of judging incorrectly upon questions of mere law. But the jury is not therefore above the law. In exercising this right they attach to themselves the character of judges, and as such are as much bound by the rules of legal decision as those who preside upon the bench. It was delivered as the opinion of this court by the judge who presided at the commencement of the term, and it is still my opinion that the United States were at peace with Spain at the time the defendant is charged with the offence in the indictment. It was also the opinion of the court, and no subsequent argument has changed my view of the subject, that the previous knowledge or approbation of the president to the illegal acts of a citizen can afford him no justification for the breach of a constitutional law.—The president's duty is faithfully to execute the laws, and he has no such dispensing power. These points have received the decision of the court seriatim, and I trust a jury will not set up a contrary opinion but with great circumspection and deference to the learned judge who delivered them, the necessity of whose absence is a subject of regret, and whose opportunity for correct legal decision is obviously so far superior to what falls to the common lot of jurors.—Should you however choose not to confide in the correctness of the court in this respect, the data exhibited, and which will lead to your determination of these points, are a view of the constitution and laws of congress giving and defining the power of making war; the powers and duty of the executive branch of the government—the statute upon which the indictment is preferred, and the treaty of San Lorenzo, 1795, which stipulates "that there shall be a firm and inviolate peace and sincere friendship between his Catholic Majesty and the United States." You have no document, nor any proof before you, establishing a state of things contrary to the stipulations of the treaty I have now read.—Certain papers have been offered in evidence, which, it is said, acknowledge aggressions by Spanish subjects, and evince a state of war in fact between the United States and the king of Spain.—By authority of the former decisions, those were decided irrelevant and rejected as improper evidence. The United States cannot be constitutionally at war, but when war is authorised by congress, or is rendered an act of necessity by the invasion of a foreign enemy. Principles of self defence in such case point it out as the duty of the chief magistrate of the nation in the interim of congress to repel force by force. The greatest scope of the jury is to determine upon points arising upon the pleadings and such evidence as is permitted to come before them. It is the exclusive province of the court to determine upon the admissibility of evidence. That which their judgment rejects as improper, the jury have no right to presume. The contents of those papers is unknown, and conjecture can never afford safe ground for the decision of a jury, sworn to determine truly. Our living at peace is what constitutes the offence. For although the defendant was concerned in setting on foot, or preparing the means for a military expedition against the Spanish dominions, if the United States were at that time at war with Spain, he would be innocent, and should you so determine, you will acquit the defendant upon his indictment.

The indictment against William S. Smith, contains counts, charging him with offences prohibited by an act of congress of June, 1794. The fifth section of that act reads as follows: "That if any person shall, within the territory or jurisprudence of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide, or prepare the means of any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence, against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince or state, with whom the United States are at peace, every such person, so offending, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged of a high misdemeanour," &c. It is the peculiar province of the jury to inquire, whether the evidence adduced maintains the charges in the indictment. If it fully supports any one of them, it will be your duty to find him guilty. The proofs in relation to the matters of fact, charged in the indictment, have very properly been divided, into that which regards the setting on foot, providing or preparing the means within the United States. for an expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence—that which regards the object, and that which manifests the defendant's participation and agency in setting on foot and preparing the means for such expedition or enterprise.

A summary of the testimony of the many witnesses who have been examined to prove the first point is, that the Leander, a merchant vessel, owned by Samuel G. Ogden of this city, and for some time previously used in the St. Domingo trade, had just returned from a voyage from that island, when she was chartered to take out Gen. Miranda and such persons as should choose to go along with him. The vessel immediately underwent repair and alteration suitable to the particular purpose; having a new lower deck built in her hold. She cleared out at the custom-house on the 23d January, and sailed from this port on the 2d February last—had a very crowded cargo, and was laden almost entirely with articles of warlike preparation. From 180 to 200 men were here engaged in the enterprise, several of them immediately after took military title and rank, and all were submitting to subordination and discipline. Eleven or twelve hundred suits of soldiers' uniform—about 600 swords and cutlasses, and a great number of belts, pouches and cartridge boxes—about 4,500 pikes—a number of muskets, horsemen's pistols and blunderbusses, all of which were principally in boxes or casks. Exclusive of her complement of 17 guns, the Leander had on board about 34 cannon, with several field carriages—150 casks of gun powder, and a quantity of ball suited to cannon and muskets of different caliber. These articles were chiefly purchased by the captain of the vessel, Armstrong, upon the credit of Mr. Ogden, and sent on board with a view to the enterprise. The object was either military or commercial. Miranda was at the head of the expedition, who for 20 years has made no secret that his wishes and intentions were inimical to the duration of the Spanish government in South America. His declarations to Mr. Ripley, to Col. Platt and Swartwout, avow his design of returning to his native country, the province of Caraccas; to revolutionize it, and to free his countrymen from what he terms the yoke of Spanish oppression. Allurements, military honours and rapid fortune, were held in view to induce men to enter upon an enterprise, secret and unexplained, while written assurances were given that the service should neither be against the French nor English. The testimony of Mr. Rose, who went out in the Leander from this city, and remained on board until the capture of the two schooners, and Miranda's return with the Leander to Barbadoes, will more clearly than that of any of the other witnesses, enable you to determine whether the original intention of the preparation and outfit of the Leander was for a military expedition, or mere commercial enterprise. The witness swears that soon after the vessel left the Hook, he with several others were industriously employed in making handles to the pikes, and putting the arms on board into complete readiness for actual service. That the vessel first touched at Jacquemel, but did not there unload any of her cargo, or transact business of a commercial nature, and only remained to recruit a few men and equip the two schooners, to accompany and support the Leander in the enterprise, out of the supplies she brought from New-York. While at Jacquemel Miranda issued commissions to those who took military rank and office, before the Leander left this city. From St. Domingo this squadron proceeded to Aruba on the road to the Caraccas, when the men were all landed and underwent military parade and inspection, and here first were made acquainted with the particular destination. The hostile landing of a military force, and the distribution upon the main, of proclamations in the Spanish language, headed by Miranda's name, as general and commander in chief, next are attempted off Porto Cabello by the very men who were engaged in this city, armed and equipped with the very preparations provided and carried from here. These attempts are opposed by Spanish government vessels; an engagement ensues; the invaders are beaten off, with the loss of the two schooners and many of the men.—The Leander returns alone, taking the course to Trinidad, but falling in with an English sloop of war the Lilly, with her went into Barbadoes. The counsel for the defendant urge this to be a mere commercial enterprise, from the facts, that the vessel had been previously occupied in the West-India trade; that the articles composing her cargo, were those of ordinary commerce, the open manner they were purchased and put on board, and that the Leander was not in complete condition and readiness to carry on a military enterprise at any time, while she remained within the United States. I think there is some reason to doubt the correctness of this position, and to suspect that the 1,200 suits of soldiers' uniform, the regimental coats, the cannon drills, the chest of armourer's tools, and the case of surgeon's instruments, not to be paid for unless the expedition should be successful, were not intended as articles of commerce.

It is not necessary that the expedition should be consummated without deviation of course. Was it begun, and were the means prepared to be carried on from the United States? The words of the statute are, "If any person within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, shall provide or prepare the means of a military expedition, to be carried on from thence;" therefore, it matters not whether or no, the vessel, at the identical time of sailing, is in complete readiness for hostile engagement. You are not to inquire of her capacity to achieve the object. If, in fact, the Leander sailed with the intent, and means to carry on such an enterprise, I conceive the transaction comes within the prohibition of the act. But the facts in evidence is the proper business for your determination. In the case I mentioned yesterday, under this very act, for a similar offence, tried April, 1795, Paterson, Justice, charged the jury, "that converting a merchantship into a vessel of war, must be deemed an original outfit;" for the act would otherwise become nugatory and inoperative.—It is the conversion from the peaceable use to a warlike purpose, that constitutes the offence. The vessel in question, arrived in this port with a cargo of coffee and sugar from the West-Indies, and appears to have been employed by her owner with a view to merchandize, and not with a view to war. The inquiry is, therefore, united to this consideration, whether, after her arrival, she was fitted out in order to cruise against a foreign nation, being at peace with the United States. It is true, she left the wharf with only four guns, but it is equally true, that when she dropped to some distance below, she took on board three or four guns more, a number of muskets, water-casks, &c. and it is manifest other guns were ready to be sent to her by the pilot-boat. These circumstances clearly prove a conversion from the original commercial design of the vessel, to a design of cruising against the enemies of France, and of course against a nation at peace with the United States, since the United States are at peace with all the world. Nor can it be reasonably contended, that the articles thus put on board were articles of merchandize, for if that had been the case, they would have been mentioned in the manifest, on clearing out of the port, whereas it is expressly stated that she sailed in ballast.

If they were not to be used for merchandize, the inference is inevitable, that they were to be used for war. No man would proclaim on the house top that he intended to fit a privateer.—The intention must be collected from all the circumstances of the transaction.

It now only remains to consider how far the defendant was concerned in beginning, providing and preparing the means of the expedition. Col. Smith mentioned to Doctor Douglass, before Miranda arrived in the United States from England, that he had expected that a grand expedition was on foot and that his son was going. After Miranda did arrive the defendant introduced him, first to Mr. Lewis, one of Ogden's captains, then to Mr. Ogden, as persons likely to aid him with a vessel proper for his purpose. He employed the witness, Fink, to engage a sergeant, corporal, and twelve men for military service. The testimony of Mr. Fink appears to be candid and I think entitled to belief; but he is an old inhabitant of the city and you know his character. He swears he saw Col. Smith write the papers which contain the terms of the enlistment and promise of bounty lands. The defendant paid a month's wages to the witness to be advanced to each of the men so engaged, tied up and marked with the name of each man; and although there appears to have been among them some hesitancy about the propriety of their engagement, the men afterwards all declared themselves satisfied, and finally went upon this very advance of bounty. The verbal declarations and assurances of the defendant to the witness may be considered delusory and purposely intended to misguide and cover from the men the real object of their engagement, yet those clearly manifest the agency and participation of the defendant in providing the means for the enterprise. That these means were so provided and prepared by the knowledge and approbation of the president and secretary, you have already the opinion of the court, can afford the defendant no justification in the breach of positive law, however far the fact, if so, may operate to produce a pardon from the executive. But the testimony relied upon as establishing this fact is by no means positive or entitled to implicit confidence. It is the declaration of Miranda alone which charges the administration with previous information of the expedition; whose scanty means afforded him abundant reason to mask his real feebleness with any pretensions, the best calculated to facilitate the accomplishment of his views. The deliberate declarations of a party are indeed the strongest evidence against him. In the present instance these may induce a belief that the defendant was deceived in this respect by the equivocal or false representations of Miranda, but never can justify him in the illegal act charged in the indictment.

This is the state of the case before you. It is not a question of party politics. The people of the United States of all denominations are equally interested; and I have too much respect for the character of an American jury to anticipate a determination upon such grounds. The undertaking may of itself be a great and glorious one, worthy the breast of a good man, glowing with desire for the universal emancipation of those oppressed by the weight of monarchical power; nevertheless, an upright and dignified course of conduct, a harmonious intercourse with foreign nations is worthy the attention, is the duty of our government to cultivate and maintain. The laws must be observed and enforced. Sympathy ought not to cloud the conception nor warp the judgment of a jury whose duty simply is to pronounce truly upon the facts in evidence. The attribute of mercy is in other hands, and no doubt will be discreetly exercised.

Mr. Harison: I wish to correct a mistake which I think the court have fallen into, who has said to the jury that the confessions of the party are not to go in justification. His confessions, whether in crimination or justification, are to be taken together. The law is laid down in Trials per Pais, 298.

TALLMADGE, District Judge. I mean to be understood that the confessions of the party must be viewed entire, not in detached parts; the purport and meaning of the declaration must be collected from a view of the whole conversation at the time. You will not convict the defendant but upon clear and satisfactory evidence of his guilt, nor acquit him against evidence, because he has declared himself innocent.

Mr. Colden. I humbly conceive that the confessions of a party, made at one and the same time, are not to be taken, stronger as they are against him, than as they are for him. The counsel for the prosecution having thought proper to examine as to the confessions of the defendant, they must take them as they are given. They cannot reject a part and use the residue.

The jury retired, and after an absence of two hours, they returned a verdict of not guilty. Whereupon W. S. Smith is discharged from his recognisance, and his securities exonerated.

CRIMINAL LAW—ACT JUNE 5, 1794—MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE—JURY.

[2. A juror who has sat on the trial of a person indicted for the same offence as defendant is not competent.]

[Trial of Samuel G. Ogden on indictment for a misdemeanor in beginning, setting on foot, and providing the means for a military expedition in the city of New York, to be carried on from thence against the territory of Spain in South America, at a time when the United States and Spain were at peace. A plea to the indictment on the ground that it was founded on illegal evidence was overruled (see Case No. 16,341a), and a motion for attachments against absent witnesses and for a continuance was also denied (see Case No. 16,342). On the drawing of the jury, one juror asked to be excused, on the ground that he had been a juror on the trial of William S. Smith, indicted for the same offence, whereupon the court excused him as not being a competent juror, notwithstanding the objections of defendant's counsel. Substantially the same evidence was introduced and offered in this case as in the case of U. S. v. Smith, Case No. 16,342a.]

Nathan Sandford, Dist. Atty., and Pierpont Edwards, for the United States.

Washington Morton, Cadwallader D. Colden, Josiah Ogden Hoffman, Thomas Addis Emmett, and Richard Harison, for defendant.

TALLMADGE, District Judge, proceeded to charge the jury. The points of law that arose in the progress of this trial, being precisely the same as those raised and determined on the trial of Col. Smith (Case No. 16,342a), the judge's charge was the same in substance, as reported in that trial; and after a careful collation of the testimony, which his honour told the jury was, in his mind, clear and decisive against Mr. Ogden, as having provided and prepared the means within the United States of a military expedition, to be carried on from thence against the dominions of some foreign power, he closed his charge by observing, that the defendant's agency in preparing the means, the nature of the expedition, and its destiny, were facts of which the jury were the proper and only judges. That whether the United States, at the time the offence is charged, were at peace or in war, is matter of law, and as such ought to be decided by the court. The jury might conscientiously rely upon its correctness, and were under no necessity to assume a responsibility beyond a determination of matters properly within their decision.

The jury retired, and, after a short absence, returned a verdict of not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[2 Wash. C. C. 310.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1808.

SMUGGLING—EVIDENCE.

1. The defendant was indicted for unlading from a vessel in the port of Philadelphia, three bags of coffee, without authority from the proper officer of the customs. The coffee was taken at night in a boat from the vessel, and part put on the wharf, the rest being in the boat; but on discovery, it was returned to the vessel. The court decided that this was not a landing within the act of congress, of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 627].

[Cited in U. S. v. The Express, Case No. 15,066.]

2. The twenty-seventh section of the act applies only to the captain or mate of the vessel.

The defendant was indicted for unlading from a vessel, which had arrived at the port of Philadelphia, three bags of coffee, without being duly authorized by the proper officer of customs to unlade the same, &c. It was proved, that the defendant was seen to bring from the vessel in a boat, in the night time, three bags of coffee, which he had got only in part on the wharf, the other half of the bags lying on the gunwales of the boat, when the witness discovered himself. The defendant then took back the bags, and returned them to the vessel.

THE COURT informed Mr. Dallas, that this was not a landing of the coffee, so as to constitute an offense under the fiftieth section of the law; nor is the defendant charged with landing it. The twenty-seventh section, which makes the unlading an offence, applies only to the captain and mate.

THE COURT directed the jury to acquit the defendant, which they accordingly did.

SEAMEN—ENDEAVOR TO MAKE REVOLT—CONFINEMENT OF MASTER—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

1. Indictment against the defendants, part of the crew of the vessel. First count, for confining the master; and the second count, for endeavouring to make a revolt in the ship; both charged to have been committed on the high seas.

2. It seems, that to constitute the offence of endeavouring to make a revolt, the attack on the master should be accompanied by some evidence, indicating, on the part of the assailants, an intention to take possession of the vessel.

3. Any confinement of the master, whether by depriving him of the use of his limbs, or by shutting him in the cabin, or, by intimidation, preventing him from the free use of every part of the vessel, amounts to a confinement in contemplation of law.

[Cited in U. S. v. Smith, Case No. 16,345; U. S. v. Peterson, Id. 16,037; U. S. v. Huff, 13 Fed. 640.]

4. The offences charged against the defendants, were committed whilst the vessel was lying in the river, about one and a half miles below St. Ubes, and within the bar, the river being about one mile and a half wide at the mouth; and the court were of opinion, that they had jurisdiction of the case.

[See note at end of case.]

The indictment is founded on the 12th section of the act of congress, for the punishment of certain crimes, passed April 30, 1790 [1 Stat. 112], and contains two counts; the first for confining the master, and the second for endeavouring to make a revolt in the ship; both of which are charged to have been committed on the high seas. The evidence in support of the indictment, was, that whilst this vessel was lying in the river, about one and a half miles below St. Ubes, and within the bar, the river being about a mile and a half wide at the mouth, the defendant, Smith, who in the course of the day had been struck by the captain, laid hold of him, and cursing him, observed, "Now we are ready for you." The captain pushed him away, and ordered him forward; upon which Smith struck the captain, and they immediately closed with each other, when Smith cried out to the hands who were below to come up, for that now was their time. Upon which, the other two defendants ran forward to his assistance, one of them armed with an iron shovel, and the other with a piece of wood, and the one with the shovel struck the captain; after struggling for some time, the captain got clear from them, and got on the other side of the cabin, and ordered the men to go on the quarter deck, which they did, but still continued to abuse him, and threatened, if he came on the main deck, they would massacre him. After keeping the quarter deck for some time, and fearing to risk himself on the main deck in order to get into the boat, he got over the railing of the quarter deck, jumped into the boat, in which he went on shore, and having got a guard of soldiers, he returned to the vessel, where the defendants were armed and prepared to receive them; having during his absence declared, that they would resist the captain if he brought other masters of vessels to assist him, but that they would yield to soldiers, should they come with him; and that should he bring sailors with him, they expected that they would join them. They were, however, quelled and disarmed by the soldiers.

The counsel for the defendants, requested that the point, whether this indictment could be supported, the offence having been committed in a river, and not on the high seas, might be reserved. THE COURT directed the jury, if they should think the defendants guilty, to find them so, subject to the opinion of the court on a point reserved.

The evidence on the part of the defendants, was, to a great degree, contradictory to that given in support of the indictment, giving it rather the appearance of a battery by Smith alone, in return for a stroke first given by the captain. As to the threat to the captain, if he came on the main deck, the testimony was equally at variance with that given against the defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). As to the second count, for endeavouring to make a revolt, the court feels some difficulty; but are inclined to think, that the attack upon the master, should be accompanied by some evidence, indicating, on the part of the assailants, an intention to take possession of the vessel. There is less doubt as to the law upon the first count. Any confinement, whether by depriving the master of the use of his limbs, or by shutting him up in the cabin, or by intimidation, preventing him from the free use of every part of the vessel, amounts to a confinement in contemplation of law. In this case, the master, as he states, was prevented, by an apprehension that the defendants would execute their threats, in case he went on the main deck, from getting into the boat from thence, and thought it necessary for his personal safety, to endeavour to get away from the vessel; and in order to do so, was compelled to get over the railing of the quarter deck, and thence into the boat. If this evidence is believed by the jury, the defendants are clearly guilty under the first count. If the evidence on the other side is believed, they cannot be convicted upon either count of this indictment.

The jury found the defendants guilty—subject to the opinion of the court, on the point reserved.

NOTE. Upon the point reserved, the court was of opinion, that the case is within the jurisdiction of the court. For, if rivers, havens, &c., be not parts of the high seas, still, the 12th section, where it speaks of the high sea, is confined to manslaughter, and does not extend to this offence. Sentence passed on the defendants.

SEAMEN—CORRECTION BY MASTER—RIGHT OF RESISTANCE—CONFINEMENT OF MASTER—REVOLT.

1. The master of a vessel has an absolute authority on board the vessel under his command, and his lawful orders must be obeyed. He may inflict moderate correction for disobedience, and impertinent language or behaviour. The seaman may endeavour to escape from it; and if he is pursued, and is otherwise exposed to a repetition of such treatment, he may resist for the mere purpose of protecting himself from injury.

[Cited in Fuller v. Colby, Case No. 5,149.]

[Cited in Buddington v. Smith, 13 Conn. 336; Thompson v. Hermann, 47 Wis. 607, 3 N. W. 579.]

2. If the master use an unlawful weapon, or the seaman is exposed to danger of his life, or limbs, he may resort to any necessary species of defence to avoid this danger.

[Cited in Fuller v. Colby, Case No. 5,149.]

3. If the master strikes the seaman, and is seized by him, and is so firmly held, as that he cannot extricate himself, the seaman is guilty of confining the captain.

4. Quere, what is making a revolt on board a ship?

Indictment [against Smith and Coombs]. The first count was for confining the captain. 2. For endeavouring to make a revolt.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). As something has been said, by the counsel on each side, respecting the authority of the master of a vessel to correct his seamen, and the duty of submission by the latter, it may not, perhaps, be time misemployed, to make some observations upon these subjects, although not necessarily involved in the questions which arise under the present prosecution. The master has an absolute authority on board of his ship; and his orders, if not unlawful, are, and must be, imperative. Submission is amongst the first duties of the seamen; and their deportment to the master ought to be respectful. He is justified in inflicting moderate correction on the mariners, for disobedience of orders, and for impertinent language and behaviour. Although it would be, in general, more dignified and more prudent, to avoid inflicting personal chastisement on a seaman for offensive language, yet the law does not condemn him for doing so; it is an indulgence to human infirmity, rather than a justification. The seaman, in such a predicament, may endeavour to escape from it; and if pursued, or if he is otherwise exposed to a repetition of such treatment, he may lawfully resist, in such manner as to protect himself against injury. If the master make use of an unlawful weapon, or the seaman is otherwise exposed to apparent danger of life or limb, he may lawfully resort to any species of defence necessary to avert the danger. In the case of U. S. v. Sharp [Case No. 16,264], this doctrine was fully explained.

Having made these general observations, we proceed to the consideration of the first count in the indictment; which is, for confining the master. The evidence on the part of the prosecution is, that after the master had struck at Smith, with a rope of dangerous size, which Smith laid hold of in order to escape the blow, the master struck him with his fist, which Smith returned; and having seized each other, they fell on the deck; and the master, having the ascendency, placed his knee on the breast of Smith; and, in that situation, mutual blows were exchanged, (Smith having hold of the master's collar,) until Boyd, another of the seamen, desired the master not to strike Smith again; upon which he quitted Smith, and ordered all the seamen, who, to the number of eight or ten, had come aft on the quarter deck, to go forward. The witnesses further prove, that, whilst Smith was down, he called to his comrades more than once, and asked if they would see him so treated; that they were ordered by the master to go forward, which they refused to do, until the master had called for his cutlass, and was in a situation to enforce his order. The defendants' witnesses deny that Smith struck the master, or laid hold of him, so as to confine him; some of them deny, also, that Smith called for the aid of his comrades, or that they were ordered by the master to go forward, until he had risen from the deck and called for his cutlass; when they obeyed.

Upon this evidence, it is for you to say, whether the captain was at any time confined by Smith. That Smith, after he was seized by the master, and until he was released, was himself confined, is certain. Nevertheless, if the captain's situation was forced upon him by Smith, if he was so firmly held by Smith that he could not extricate himself, then the defendant is guilty under this count; because, it has repeatedly been decided in this court, that if the master be placed under restraint by his seamen, or by any one of them, for any space of time, however short, whether it be by manual force, or by menace and intimidation, this is, in construction of law, a confinement. U. S. v. Sharp [supra]; U. S. v. Bladen [Case No. 14,606]; U. S. v. Smith [Id. 16,337]. If, on the other hand, the master was not so restrained, the insolence of Smith, his return of the captain's blows, however culpable such conduct would render him, and his resistance of the blows he received, would not amount to this offence. One of the witnesses stated, that he and the captain thought it prudent, for some nights after this affray, to keep watch in the cabin, and to be armed. If this was so, and you should be of opinion, that the conduct of the defendants and their associates rendered that measure prudent; and if also, the captain, in consequence of any threatened danger from the seamen, was prevented from the free exercise of all his privileges in every part of the ship, then these circumstances would amount to a constructive confinement; otherwise not. But unless this, in your opinion, was the fact, there is no evidence whatever to convict Coombs upon this count, as he had no personal conflict with the master, which can be construed into a confinement of him.

As to the other count, for endeavouring to make a revolt: What constitutes a revolt, has never been decided by this court. On the contrary, we have always recommended it to the jury, to acquit the accused on counts for making, or endeavouring to make, a revolt. But a most respectable and learned judge of the supreme court (U. S. v. Smith [supra]) has defined it to be an endeavour to excite the crew to overthrow the lawful authority of the master and officers of the ship. Wishing to have this point decided by the supreme court, we shall request the jury, in case they should be of opinion that the defendants are guilty of endeavouring to make a revolt, according to this definition, to find them guilty, subject to the opinion of the court upon the facts of the case.

The jury found the defendants not guilty.

5. Nor is a marshal the keeper or inspector of the state jails, or to be allowed for services in either of those capacities, unless in a case where he is specially directed by the court to examine some of them to see if they are suitable for the keeping and security of prisoners of the United States.

6. Where a marshal extends an execution on real estate for the government, he is entitled to his fees from the latter, though the land be not yet sold or redeemed or in any way converted into money.

7. A marshal is not entitled to commissions on money paid to his deputies for taking the census, it being a part of his official duty, and not a separate and independent service performed for the United States.

8. He is entitled to interest on sums due to him and not paid after demand, but on the same principle must pay interest on what is due from himself after demand.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.]

This was a writ of error, sued out September 10, 1844, on a judgment rendered the 3d of that month, in the district court on the following case. [Case unreported.] An action of debt was brought in that court by the United States, against the defendants [Albert Smith and others] on an official bond, and the case was as the counsel agreed in the statement annexed:

Agreed statement: The writ is dated June 5, 1841. The pleadings were (1) The general issue of non est factum. (2) Omnia performavit, by way of brief statement. The plaintiff claims to recover $1,312.20, the balance alleged to have been collected by the said Albert Smith, as late marshal of said district, for the plaintiffs, on their execution against Ezekiel Foster, and which it is alleged he has never paid over to the plaintiffs. They also claim interest on that sum. See specification of claim filed. Upon the trial of the case at this term, it is agreed that the facts appear as follows: (1) The said Albert Smith (with the other defendants as his sureties), duly executed the bond declared on, dated May 1, 1834, it being an official bond, in the common form, for the faithful performance of his duties as late marshal of Maine. (2) That said Smith, in his said capacity, collected the money, mentioned in the plaintiff's specification of claim, one execution in favor of the plaintiffs and against Ezekiel Foster, and that he has retained that amount, and declined paying it over, upon the ground that he had legal and equitable claims against the plaintiffs for more than that amount, which he claimed to have allowed him in set-off to the plaintiffs' demand. In defence, the facts proved were as follows: (1) That the claims of the said Smith, as specified in his account filed in set-off No. 1, were all duly substantiated by competent testimony, and that they were presented to, and rejected by, the proper officers of the treasury department. The items for services of venires from the district and circuit courts, as specified in vouchers A and B, and those items for levy of an execution in behalf of the plaintiffs as specified in voucher C, had been presented to, and allowed and certified by, the courts aforesaid. (2) That the items of claim in the supplemental account of the said Smith, filed in set-off No. 2, were reasonable, provided they were by law admissible.

Upon request of the defendants' counsel, the district judge ruled pro forma, and instructed the jury, that if proved to their satisfaction, the defendants were entitled by law to the allowance in set-off in the plaintiff's claim, of the following claims: (1) Of the said Smith's claim for the services of venires from the district and circuit courts. (2) The claim for levying an execution on property of Joseph F. Wingate as charged. (3) The claim for commissions as charged on $9,287.53, paid out in taking the census of 1830; and the judge further ruled that interest ought to be allowed on each of these sums. (4) The claim for superintending and visiting the several persons in said district from April, 1829, to April, 1838, as specified in the supplemental account, No. 2. And the judge further instructed the jury, that the item of $26.50, as specified in the plaintiff's account in set-off No. 1, for serving a subpœna returnable to the circuit court of the Southern district of New York, was not admissible, and could not be allowed. Whereupon the jury returned a verdict for the defendants.

Howard & Shepley, for defendant.

Judgment was rendered upon that verdict, and a writ of error was brought on it, which was argued at this term by Mr. Haynes, U. S. Dist. Atty., and by Mr. Howard, for defendant.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. Letters have been read in this case from my distinguished predecessor, stating as his opinion, and that of the other justices of the supreme court, that the certificates of the district or circuit judges in favor of a marshal's account is conclusive on the treasury department, and is not open to re-examination or disallowance. His letter is dated November 5, 1837, and is in reply to one from Mr. Sibley, marshal of Massachusetts. The provision of law on this subject is in the 4th section of the act of congress, passed May 8, 1792 (chapter 36), and is in these words. After reciting several fees and items, which shall be included in the "account of the marshal," it proceeds to say: "And the same having been examined and certified by the court or one of the judges of it, in which the service shall have been rendered, shall be passed in the usual manner at, and the amount paid out of, the treasury of the United States to the marshal, and by him shall be paid over to the persons entitled to the same," &c. 1 Stat. 277. It is manifest, that if the true construction of this clause is, as contended by the defendants, the re-examination and rejection of any of the items by the treasury department, which has been certified by a judge, was unwarranted, and that it is also my duty to decide in favor of them all, without re-examination. For if such a certificate is conclusive upon the treasury, no question can be agitated here on its propriety, any more than by the accounting officers, and it should be sent back there for the account to be registered up without inquiry. But notwithstanding the high respect which is due to the opinion of Judge Story, and to his statement of the opinions of his brethren, it is to be recollected, that his views on this matter were not given, nor theirs, in a judicial case, but ex parte, or extra judicially. Nor are the reasons in their favor stated. It is to be remembered, also, that the usages of the treasury department have been different for half a century, as well as those of the circuit and supreme courts. Judge Story himself, as well as other judges, when these questions as to disallowances by the accounting officers have come before the courts in actions at law, have uniformly considered them as open to examination, and have never felt bound conclusively by the certificate of a judge on them in favor of the marshal's account. See U. S. v. Cogswell [Case No. 14,825], and the other reports on like cases elsewhere. Nor does the language or reason of the act seem to require a different construction. It does not say the certificate of a judge shall be final or conclusive; but that, after it, the account shall be passed "in the usual manner," which manner is, to have the vouchers accompany it, and be examined so far as is deemed necessary to satisfy the accounting officer of the legality and propriety of the various items. The marshal himself being a responsible officer under oath, and the judge, and likewise the district attorney, whose opinion is usually taken (and often his certificate to allowances is asked by the judge, when they are new or unusual), it is certainly to be presumed, that the claims are legal. And a prima facie case in their favor is thus made out, which is all, probably, that Judge Story, or the other judges, under such circumstances, could have intended to mean. These may, properly, be enough to ensure the passage and payment of the account, unless something novel or extraordinary appears in respect to parts of it which may seem to require fuller explanation. In such last case, it has always been the practice of the treasury department to ask for such explanation, and if not receiving it, and the item appears not to be warranted by law or sound reason and analogy, they do and they ought to suspend or reject it.

The department has a duty to perform under oath of office. I have ever considered that oath required them to conduct in that way, if serious doubts remained as to the legality or proper amount of the claim, and not to yield those doubts till a court, having jurisdiction of the subject, or the attorney-general of the United States, on a suitable application to him, gave an official opinion in favor of the claim, or congress by a special law authorized its payment. My own opinion corresponds with this practice; under a different station at the head of the treasury department, it had my sanction and concurrence for several years. The decision of a court where proper parties, as now, are before it, and contest an item of charge, is a different matter. It is then a judgment, which, in the views of most persons, is entitled to the respect and assent of the departments so far as to pay the item thus allowed, if any suitable appropriation exist therefor. But a certificate of a judge, ex parte, in the hurry at the conclusion of a term, to an item, that has never been litigated nor argued by any opposing counsel, surely can make claim to no such binding and decisive weight. If the item, however, is one on which judgment has been formally passed in an action only as a portion of a bill of cost, and it has become a part of that judgment, it would be a new and different question to be settled when it arises, whether the accounting officers could go back or behind such a judgment, if the United States was one of the parties. And if Judge Story meant any thing more than to give a prima facie force to the certificates in favor of marshals' accounts by one of the court, he probably intended to confine it, or was considering, at the time, only such items as had thus been passed upon in formal judgments as to bills of cost in actions where the United States was one of the parties. See The Apollon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 362. In such a case, I might feel justified in thinking with him, that the accounting officers ought to conform to the certificate. But that is not this case, nor resting on a like principle. Because there, if judgment could be properly rendered against the United States as against an individual for costs, when the failing party in an action, it would be. Yet as that is not done by the courts of the United States, the certificate of the judge is only the evidence that the costs are due rather than the judgment.

Entering then into the inquiry as to the lawfulness of the several claims here offered in set-off by the marshal, and not feeling bound by the certificate of the district judge ex parte in their favor, though, like all his opinions, entitled to much respect, I will first consider the claim for services of the venires. The provision of law on this claim is to be found in the 1st section of the act of February 28, 1799, c. 19 (1 Stat. 624). That allows to the marshal "for summoning each grand and other jury, four dollars, provided that in no case shall the fees for summoning jurors to any one court exceed fifty dollars; and in those states where jurors, by the laws of the state, are drawn by constables, or other officers of corporate towns or places by lots, the marshal shall receive for the use of the officers employed in summoning the jurors and returning the venire, the sum of two dollars; and for his own trouble in distributing the venire, the sum of two dollars." In Maine, the marshals do not summon the juries, but distribute venires to the town-clerks, and the summoning is done by them or constables. It has already been decided by this court, that the marshal is entitled to two dollars for distributing each venire, as they are distributed in the state of Maine, though formerly the usual charges of allowance were, like the words of the act, singular, and only two dollars for distributing the whole; treating it as the service of only one venire, called the "grand venire," and which is directed to him. U. S. v. Cogswell [Case No. 14,825]. If he summoned a jury, as is the practice in some states, he received four dollars for each jury or panel, but not to exceed fifty dollars, however many panels were summoned at any one term. But if he did not summon the jury, and constables did it, on such venires issued to them, he holding and executing only the grand venire, the fees were divided, assigning two dollars to him and two to the constable. It is now argued, that the marshal should be allowed not only two dollars for distributing each sub-venire, but travel; because, by the same section, he is allowed, beside two dollars "for the service of any writ, warrant, attachment or process," five cents per mile "for his travel out in serving each writ, warrant, attachment or process aforesaid." But it is to be remembered, that this last provision precedes that for summoning jurors, and hence does not relate to them under the general expression of serving "process" or travel to serve process. Otherwise, no special provision for summoning jurors would have been necessary, being embraced already in the former one for serving a process. Again, it is not usual nor necessary for marshals to incur any travel in distributing venires, but it has in most cases been done through the postoffice, and two dollars for merely thus distributing each, is a liberal compensation. Nor does the limit of all the fees for summoning juries to any one court, to fifty dollars, imply that travel is to be allowed; because, if allowed, it would usually increase the aggregate to more than fifty dollars. For with a grand jury of twenty-three, and two petit juries of twenty-four, or only one of twelve, the aggregate for service alone would, by this construction, often exceed fifty dollars a term. In fine, distributing the venires is contemplated by the act to be a different duty from serving them, as the former is called by a different name, and done by a different officer, in cases like this, that is, by the marshal; while the service is usually by a constable. Only two dollars, then, can be allowed to the marshal in this case for distributing each venire; and where the aggregate exceeds fifty dollars at any one term of the court, it is to be reduced and limited to that amount.

2. The claim for serving an execution on the property of Wingate, is usual in amount, and the only objection to its payment, the service having been performed by the United States, is, that the property has not yet been redeemed by the debtor, or sold by the United States, so as to realize or collect the costs. But that seems a poor apology on the part of a creditor for not paying others, who have performed useful services for hire, and where, as in this case, perhaps, certainly in one of a like kind in this state, the government is occupying the property extended on for a custom-house, and does not contemplate selling it at all. In some cases, also, the government does not sell the property during a third of a century, and one is fresh in my recollection of an extent on lands of Edward Randolph, attorney-general under Washington, which never were redeemed or sold till the speculating era of 1834 and 1835, when the expectation of gold mines upon them, induced some one to buy at a high price. Could it be reasonable, or just, or legal, for the marshal or his heirs to wait so long for his fees in serving that extent? The whole difficulty on this point has arisen from an old form in the treasury, not crediting the debtor himself in cases of extents on land until it was sold by the government, and thus continuing him on the books nominally a debtor or defaulter for years after the whole claim has been thus satisfied. But the practice has been altered, or was directed to be; and there is no more excuse for the government not paying the fees after it has received them in land, than after they are received in money, provided an appropriation exists applicable to it. Let this item, then, be allowed.

3. The charge for superintending prisons in Maine is not taxable. There is no act authorizing it, and no order of the court shown, requiring such an examination by the marshal. Again, there is little foundation for any claim on this account in the general relation and duties of the marshal as to the jails of the states. He is not the keeper of them. He has no control over them. He neither repairs the jails, nor feeds the prisoners, nor regulates their police. Congress, September 23, 1789 (1 Stat. 96), recommended to the several states to pass laws to receive prisoners for the United States, for a reasonable compensation. And in 1791 and 1821, congress authorized the marshal to keep his prisoners elsewhere in safety, if the states withheld the use of their prisons. 1 Stat. 225; 3 Stat. 646. So as to the state prisons; we can use them for punishment, paying the expense, and letting our prisoners be employed and treated as the state convicts are. In point of fact, also, it is stated there is no evidence of actual examination having been made in that instance, justifying in any view so extraordinary and large a claim. This was properly rejected by the district court, and also the amount claimed for service of a writ from New York, and which is now abandoned by the defendants.

4. The only remaining claim is for commissions on fees, paid to the deputy marshals or assistants in taking the census. It is not pretended that there is any clause in the act for taking the census, which expressly authorizes this claim, but it rests on the hypothesis of being an act, not enjoined by law, and for doing which when requested, the marshal should be paid a reasonable commission. The commissions of the marshal, by the act of 1792, on payments over to others there designated, is two and a half per cent., and that rate has frequently been deemed proper in cases where any commissions for like services are allowable. But, in my view, these payments to the assistants were made by him officially and as a service properly belonging to his official station. He selected them—he employed and regulated them—he received, therefore, the money for them, and had general compensation for his duties in respect to the census, fully sufficient to indemnify him for such an incidental labor. It has been adjudicated in various cases, such as U. S. v. Wilkins, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 135; U. S. v. McDaniel, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 1; U. S. v. Ripley, Id. 18; U. S. v. Fillebrown, Id. 28; U. S. v. Mann [Case No. 15,716]; Gratiot v. U. S., 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 336; and in U. S. v. Gratiot, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 80,—that a reasonable compensation is proper to be made to officers for services clearly unofficial, clearly disconnected and exterior to their duties under their commissioners as officers. And though, in my view, some of these cases have gone too far on the facts, holding services to be unofficial which seem to me not entirely dehors from their duties as officers, yet I do not feel justified in departing from the decisions of the supreme court on this subject, till altered by that tribunal itself, or till new legislation occurs by congress applicable to new cases.

I do not rest this conclusion on the argument in this case by the United States, that the $200 salary given to marshals, "as a full compensation for all extra services," should be construed to embrace all labor and services of all kinds not specified nor specifically paid. On the contrary, I think that relates to extra services or duties, which are by law devolved on him as marshal. And I decide this point exclusively on the ground, that the paying over this money to his assistants was an incident to his official station and duties, and not a service entirely foreign or disconnected with it; and consequently, that commissions for doing it, not being given by any law, are not allowable. Gratiot v. U. S., 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 336, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 80.

There is, likewise, a claim of interest set up by the defendants. I am willing to allow it on the item improperly rejected at the treasury department, beginning at the date of the rejection, and I do it on the precedent of the case of U. S. v. Cogswell [supra]. But if allowed to the defendants on the principles that they have been kept out of the money illegally since that rejection, the same principle renders it proper to allow interest to the United States, since the demand of the balance due them, and of which they have since been illegally deprived by the defendants. Making the computations, then, between the parties, on the principles I have explained, the United States is entitled to judgment for the balance.

Under these views, the judgment below, being in some respects erroneous, must be reversed, and the verdict be set aside, and a venire de novo ordered.

Case No. 16,348.

UNITED STATES v. SMOCK.

[4 Int. Rev. Rec. 202.]

District Court, D. Kentucky. Oct., 1866.

INTERNAL REVENUE ACT—NON-PAYMENT OF DUTIES—PENALTY.

[The internal revenue act of 1864, § 48, provided that one having in his custody goods, merchandise, or articles for the purpose of sale, with the design of avoiding the payment of duties, should be "liable to a penalty of $500, or not less than double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded." Held, that the penalty imposed must at least equal double the amount of duties sought to be evaded, and that it could in no case be less than $500.]

A clear case of fraud was proved against the defendant in this case, and judgment was duly rendered, but it is only recently that a written opinion was filed by the honorable judge. Obligation is due to Assessor Needham of Louisville, for transmitting copy for publication after revision by Judge BALLARD. [Thomas] Smock is stated to be still in jail, unwilling or unable to pay the fine. The case involved the construction of the 48th section of the excise act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 241].

BALLARD, District Judge. The defendant having been tried and found guilty of the offence denounced by the 48th section of the internal revenue act of 1864, the question arises: what is the proper judgment to be rendered against him?

The provision of the section, under which the conviction has been had, is as follows: "Any person who shall have in his custody or possession, * * * goods, wares, merchandise, articles or objects subject to duty * * * for the purpose of selling the same with the design of avoiding the payment of the duties thereon, shall be liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars, or not less than double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded," &c.

It appeared on the trial, that the goods which the defendant had in his possession for the alleged unlawful purpose, consisted of about two thousand nine hundred and four gallons of spirits on all of which the duty was two dollars per gallon. On behalf of the convict it is contended that the court may, in its discretion, render judgment for either five hundred dollars or for a sum not less than double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded, and that, under the circumstances of this case, the lesser penalty should be inflicted. The language of the statute is not well chosen. Its meaning is certainly not so obvious that it may not be misapprehended. Doubtless, the construction which suggests itself to many, perhaps to most persons of the first reading, is that adopted by the learned counsel of the convict, but, I am persuaded, that few if any will adhere to this conclusion after having bestowed on the provisions of the section and of the statute an ordinary amount of study. Having given the statute and the arguments of counsel the fullest consideration, I am satisfied that, although the language of section 48, above quoted apparently confers a discretion on the court to adjudge one penalty or another, it does not really do so. I think the court has no discretion whatever, and that it must always impose on the convict, under this section, a penalty at least equal to double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded. The penalty, in my opinion, can in no case be less than five hundred dollars; but it may and must exceed this sum when double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded exceeds it. Any other construction of the statute leads to unreasonable if not absurd consequences. If the court has the discretion claimed, then, in this case, judgment may be rendered for five hundred dollars, or for eleven thousand six hundred and sixteen dollars, or for any sum still larger, but not for any sum between five hundred and eleven thousand six hundred and sixteen dollars. Such a discretion is, I think, wholly without a parallel—nay, more, it is unreasonable. It assumes—first, that the court may render judgment for any amount no matter how large provided it be not less than eleven thousand six hundred and sixteen dollars, and it assumes—secondly, that, whilst by one alternative the judgment cannot be for less than eleven thousand six hundred and sixteen dollars, it may, by the other alternative, be actually for a less sum, provided it be for the precise sum of five hundred dollars. Upon the first assumption a power is confided to the court such as is without precedent in the legislation of congress, and such as is hardly within constitutional limits. The constitution declares that excessive fines shall not be imposed. It may be that this injunction is addressed to the judicial as well as to the legislative department of the government, and it may be, therefore, that no court can impose an excessive fine, even when authorized to do so by the terms of an act of congress; but surely no court will assume that it was the intention of congress to confer such a power unless it were expressed in such clear language as not to admit of doubt. By the second assumption a discretion is confined to the court which is manifestly contradictory, and which, therefore, destroys itself.

Usually, if not invariably, where discretion is given in a matter of this nature, it is to inflict one kind of punishment or another—as death or imprisonment, fine or imprisonment, or to limit the imprisonment between certain periods, or the fine between certain amounts, according to the nature and aggravation of the offense. But the discretion here claimed is not of the nature of any of these. True, it assumes different degrees of guilt in offenders, but it does not allow a gradation of punishment according to the degree of guilt, for it imperatively requires that if one fine be not imposed another shall be, and thus excludes all authority to impose a fine for any intermediate sum. I can conceive of no reason for giving a discretion and limiting it in this manner. If I may impose on the defendant a fine of five hundred dollars, or of eleven thousand six hundred and sixteen dollars, why deny me the right to impose a fine for some intermediate sum? If congress supposed that some persons, convicted of fraudulently attempting to evade the payment of duties, might not deserve to be fined double the amount of duties so attempted to be evaded, how could they suppose that all such persons alike would deserve to be fined only five hundred dollars? There is manifest propriety in punishing one who has attempted fraudulently to evade the payment of duties by a fine which, in amount, has due relation to the amount of duties so attempted to be evaded. One who has attempted to cheat the government out of five dollars deserves punishment, and, indeed, severe punishment, because his offense is grave; but he hardly merits as severe punishment as he whose cheat extends to thousands. Such is the moral turpitude involved in every cheat that he who is guilty of one, no matter how small, well merits a fine of five hundred dollars; and no matter how large, he is not punished excessively if he is fined an amount only double the amount of the fraud. This would be a gradation of punishment with proper respect to the degree of guilt, and, it seems to me, that this is the only gradation contemplated by the statute we have been considering. That this is the meaning of the statute would be still more obvious, if the disjunctive "but" had been used instead of the disjunctive "or." And, it is quite the practice of the courts to change the phraseology of statutes to a greater extent than this; and even to impart into them words to express more clearly the apparent or assumed intention of the legislature. I confess I do not approve of this practice. If it is ever allowable it is only when the intention is plain without the change, and then resorted to only to express clearly what was before expressed obscurely. Obviously, courts have no authority to alter or add words with the view of expressing an intention which the legislature has not. If they have, nothing would be easier than to make a statute express anything. But if it is only when the meaning of a statute is already plain that its words can be changed or added to, of what use is any change or addition at all? The longer I sit here the more I feel the importance of seeking the meaning of a statute by a fair interpretation of its words and resting upon that. I think that when a judge is considering a statute, an agreement, or other written instrument with a view to its interpretation, what he is to seek is the thought it expresses. To ascertain this his first resort, in all cases, is to the natural signification of the words employed, taking them in the very order and grammatical arrangement in which the framers of the instrument placed them, nothing adding thereto, nothing diminishing. It is only when the words thus regarded fail to express any idea clearly, or involve an absurdity, or a contradiction to some other part of the same instrument, that there is any room for construction. As the legislature cannot intend an absurdity, or to require two contradictory things, such construction is not to be adopted as would suppose either the one or the other. And when, taking the words just as they are written, doubt remains respecting their meaning, that meaning must be adopted which the words most obviously express and best comports with the nature of the subject and right reason.

Now let us examine more closely the words of the statute exactly as they are therein written and arranged. "Any person whose * * * * shall be liable to a fine of five hundred dollars, or not less than double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded." I observe first: That no one thought is so clearly expressed as to exclude all supposition that some other thought may have been intended. Second. That "five hundred dollars" must be either the lowest or the highest penalty which can be inflicted in any case. No other conceivable motive for the introduction of these words seems assignable. Third. If "five hundred dollars" is the highest penalty, then there is not full scope for the operation of the other penalty plainly denounced, to wit: of "not less than double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded;" for undoubtedly, double the amount of duties attempted to be evaded may, and actually does, in this case, exceed five hundred dollars, and if the court may impose a fine of only five hundred dollars, it will adjudge actually less than double the amount of duties. But to assume that the court is required to impose a fine of not less than a given sum, and that it may at the same time, impose a fine less than the given sum, is to assume that the court has an authority or discretion which is, in a certain sense contradictory. Fourth. The words seem to require that the penalty denounced by them shall contain two elements: 1st, that it be "five hundred dollars;" 2d, that it be "not less than double," &c. It would seem therefore, that the penalty can in no case be less than "five hundred dollars," for it would in that case lack one of the elements required. The only method of satisfying both apparent requisitions is to impose the penalty of "five hundred dollars" when double the amount of duties is less or is just equal to that sum, and when the amount of duties is greater than to adjudge the penalty for such amount of duties, that is, "not less" than that amount, and it will always be for five hundred dollars, that is, not less than that sum. Fifth. The words "not less" it seems to me, are not used to authorize the court to impose a higher penalty than double the amount of duties, but to prevent any penalty less than this from being inflicted.

I have thus endeavored to set forth my reasons for that construction of the statute which is here adopted. I am conscious that the task has been performed very imperfectly. Possibly the argument might be strengthened by a reference to the sixty-eighth and other sections of the statute, which peremptorily require the infliction of penalties, certainly not less than five hundred dollars for offenses involving far less moral guilt and far less danger of loss to the United States than the crime denounced by the forty-eighth section. And, possibly a reference to the forty-first section, which gives to the informer one-half of every penalty recovered, would not be unavailing, for it would seem that, if the informer is to get one-half, it is not only proper that the penalty should in all cases equal at least double the amount of duties attempted to be evaded, but that in this way only can the government escape loss, when the evasion has succeeded. But I do not care to pursue the discussion further. No amount of reasoning, I am conscious, can possibly make that plain which is intrinsically obscure. I do not say that the construction which I have adopted is the true one beyond all question; I only say it is the construction which seems to me to comport best with the language of the statute, and the only one which involves no apparent absurdity or contradiction. I drop the discussion all the more willingly, because, if it be admitted that I have all the discretion claimed by the counsel of the accused, I see no apology for the exercise of it, in this case, to his advantage. The accusee seems to be a man of at least ordinary intelligence. He certainly well understood the law which he violated. He laid and executed his plans with much deliberation and some cunning. All the barrels which contained the spirits found in his possession were marked with a false and counterfeit brand of a United States inspector, and not an inconsiderable number of them was, for a time, concealed in the forest, remote from any habitation, and from any road or highway. I am satisfied he was engaged in the business of cheating and defrauding the government by concealing and selling spirits, marked with a counterfeit brand, and on which no duty had been paid; and the evidence leaves hardly room to doubt that he was confederated, in his fraudulent scheme, with distillers residing in his neighborhood whose names have not been disclosed, and that the whiskey, which it was proven on the trial he had in possession, for the alleged fraudulent purpose, is only a portion of what he so had. I repeat, then, that I see nothing in the circumstances of the case which should induce me, had I a discretion, to inflict on the accused a small penalty. On the contrary, I see much which impels me to impose the highest penalty the law will allow. If the highest penalty is not to be inflicted in such a case, it would be impossible to say in what case it should be imposed. Let judgment be rendered against the defendant for eleven thousand six hundred and sixteen dollars and the costs of this prosecution.

FEES IN PENSION CASES.

To an indictment for retaining a greater sum than the statutory allowance for collecting a widow's pension, it is a good plea that the husband of the applicant, for whose services the pension was sought, was charged on the rolls of the war department as a deserter, and that it was agreed between defendant and the applicant that he should receive one-half of the first payment on account of the pension, less costs and expenses, for his services in causing such charge to be removed.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 15 Alb. Law J. 219, contains only a partial report.]

To an indictment for a violation of Rev. St. § 5485, in retaining a greater compensation than allowed by law for prosecuting a claim for a widow's pension, defendant [Alexander L. Snow] pleaded that the husband of the applicant for whose service the pension was sought, was charged on the rolls of the war department as a deserter; that no pension could be allowed till such charge was removed; that it was accordingly agreed between him and the widow that he should receive one-half of the first payment on account of the pension; (such payment being about $1,200,) less his costs and expenses, for services in causing such charge to be removed, and the further sum of $10 for prosecuting her claim for the pension, all of which was done, etc.

To this plea the district attorney demurred.

George Andrews, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

W. O. Henderson, for defendant.

BROWN, District Judge. By Rev. St. § 5485, it is provided that "any agent or attorney, or any other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension or bounty land, who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand or receive, or retain a greater compensation for his services" than is elsewhere provided, "shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor."

This compensation is "such as the commissioner of pensions shall direct to be paid to him, not exceeding $25." Section 4785. And in case no agreement is made with the applicant, and filed with, and approved by, the commissioner, the fee shall be $10, and no more. Section 4786.

The section first above quoted being not only penal in its character, but in derogation of the common law right of every person to make his own bargain, should receive a strict construction. The design of the act was to prevent exorbitant charges being extorted by pension solicitors from a class of persons who are usually illy able to pay them, or to assert their rights against parties who hold the money in their hands. It was intended to fix a fair compensation for the labor usually and ordinarily necessary in obtaining a pension, but not for extraordinary services performed in a different department for a different purpose, although the ultimate object of those services may be the obtaining of a pension. The labor involved in procuring a widow's pension is ordinarily very slight, consisting merely in filling out a blank petition and affidavits showing the enlistment and death of the soldier, his marriage to the petitioner, and the number and ages of her minor children. The records of the war department are then referred to to confirm the fact of enlistment and death. For these services $10 was regarded as a fair compensation, although the parties may contract for the payment of $25, provided a prior agreement be made to that effect, and filed with, and approved by the commissioner. Clearly the statute covers only services, and the attorney would still be entitled to charge for expenses incurred in procuring testimony.

But in the case under consideration, defendant was called upon to perform a service entirely distinct from that usually required in such cases. The soldier was registered as a deserter on the rolls of the war department, and until that charge was disproved his widow could not recover her pension. Sections 2438, 4749.

Although in the particular case the service was performed in aid of the pension, it was essentially a distinct service and might have been required for another and different purpose. A deserter loses his right of citizenship. Section 1996. He cannot enlist in the army or navy of the United States. Sections 1118, 1420. And an officer mustering him in would be subject to punishment. Section 1342, art. 3. The records of the war department will only be corrected by plenary proof of mistake, and when a claim for a pension has once been advanced it must be prosecuted to completion in five years. Section 4717. It will be readily perceived that it may become an object of the utmost importance, to have a charge of desertion stricken out for other purposes than obtaining a pension. The difficulty of securing the requisite evidence is frequently very great, and in this case, it was admitted that an expense of over $300 had been incurred by the defendant for that purpose. To limit his compensation in such a case to $10 would be an adherence to the letter of the statute which congress could not have contemplated.

It is believed no authority can be found exactly in point; but a class of cases arising under the usury laws announce the principle here involved, viz.: that when a lender has made unusual effort or incurred extraordinary expense in connection with the loan, an agreement to repay his charges for services and disbursements, if made in good faith and not merely as an evasion, will not be deemed usurious. In the early case of Auriol v. Thomas, 2 Term R. 52, it was held that where a bill endorsed over is not duly paid, the indorsee may charge the indorser with exchange, and other incidental expenses beyond the amount of legal interest, if such charges be reasonably warranted by custom and not made a color for usury. This authority was followed in Palmer v. Baker, 1 Maule & S. 56; and in Baynes v. Fry, 15 Ves. 120. In Harger v. McCullough, 2 Denio, 119, it was held that where a creditor at the request of the debtor, and upon his express promise to pay the expenses, took a journey to the residence of the latter with a view to settling the demand, and afterwards included such expenses in a security taken for the debt; the security was not usurious. This case was approved in Thurston v. Cornell, 38 N. Y. 281, in which it was held that where a party solicited to make a loan, and to procure the means of doing so, must spend time, and incur trouble and expense in collecting the same from others, and does this at the request of the borrower, and upon his agreement to pay for such services and expenses, the transaction is not usurious. Whether the payment upon a loan of more than the legal rate of interest is usurious, depends upon the particular facts of the case and the intention of the parties, and these are questions for the jury. If paid for the loan or forbearance of money it is usury, but if the excess is for other good and valuable considerations, not interposed as a device to cover usury, the transaction is not usurious. The same principle was stated in Eaton v. Alger, 2 Keys [*41 N. Y.] 41, in which the court observe: "Even where the lender, without any special agreement with the borrower, in addition to lawful interest, takes a commission, by way of compensation for trouble and expense necessarily incurred in and about the business of the loan, the transaction would be supported, provided such commission was not intended as a device to cover a usurious loan."

See, also, to the same effect, Eldridge v. Reed, 2 Sweeny, 155; Beadle v. Munson, 30 Conn. 175; Gambril v. Doe, 8 Blackf. 140; Smith v. Silvers, 32 Ind. 321; Smith v. Muncie Nat. Bank, 29 Ind. 158; Tyler, Usury, 130.

In the case under consideration, if the agreement set up in the plea were made in good faith, for services actually performed as therein stated, and not as a mere pretext for charging more than the statute allowed for obtaining a pension, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal.

I am not called upon to determine whether his charge be reasonable or not; that must be litigated in another forum; the question of good faith only is here involved and that must be submitted to a jury.

An order will be entered overruling the demurrer.

Case No. 16,351.

UNITED STATES v. SNYDER.

[4 Wash. C. C. 559.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct., 1825.

INTERNAL REVENUE COLLECTORS—OFFICIAL BONDS.

How far a collector of internal taxes and duties is liable upon his official bond, for bonds for internal duties not collected; and how far he is bound by the treasury statement which charges him with those bonds.

[Cited in Lee v. Fontaine, 10 Ala. 755; Hancock v. Hazzard, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 113.]

This was an action of debt brought in the district court, upon the official bond given by the defendant, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, as collector of the internal taxes and duties, in the Twelfth district of Pennsylvania, and for collecting and paying over the said taxes and duties. The demand was founded on a statement from the treasury department, of certain uncollected bonds and duties due within this district. These bonds, or most of them, had been placed in the hands of an attorney for collection and suit, by a preceding collector, with the approbation of the commissioner of the revenue, by whom his compensation was fixed. Whether the collection of any of the uncollected bonds and duties, and if any, to what amount, was entrusted to that attorney by the defendant, does not distinctly appear. By the instructions of the commissioner of the revenue to the different collectors, bearing date the —— day of June, 1814, they are directed to commence prosecutions in the state courts, where the district court of the United States is beyond a certain distance, and if the attorney of the district be too remote, and has appointed no deputy to act for him, then, and then only, the collectors are authorised to employ any other respectable attorney, who is to receive a reasonable compensation for his professional services. It is then added, "It may be advisable to employ an attorney, with the understanding that he shall have all the business of the collector." The subsequent instructions of the 8th of April, 1815, after referring to the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1815 [3 Stat. 231], say, that this act will, after the district attorney has appointed his deputies, supersede the employment of other counsel, except where they may be specially employed by the treasury department. "In pending suits," they add, "it will be proper not to disturb the course that may have been pursued."

C. J. Ingersoll, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Kittera, for defendant.

BY THE COURT. The judge of the district court, in his charge to the jury, stated, that the collector, by his bond, and the duties it guarantied, was not charged with the uncollected bonds and duties as a debtor, but merely with the collection of them, upon the same principles as other agents, acting with ordinary care and diligence. That the collecting officers were put under the superintendence of the commissioners of the revenue, who had power to make suitable regulations; as they did make. That the defendant, when he went into office, found that his predecessor had employed an attorney to sue the uncollected bonds, and this by the direction of the commissioner of the revenue. He then concludes by saying, that if the jury were satisfied of the facts, and that a special agent or attorney was employed by direction of the treasury officer, the defendant was not responsible for more than ordinary care and diligence in superintending the collection of the debts, and urging on such attorney; and that under any circumstances, he was not to be debited with the debts at all events, except such as were received by him; and that upon the facts above stated, if found by the jury, the verdict ought to be for the defendant.

The first point of law decided in this charge was, that the bonds debited by the treasury department to the defendant, did not thereby constitute the latter a debtor, at all events, to the United States to their amount, but that he was placed thereby, and by his own bond, and the duties of his office in the predicament of an agent, who is bound to use ordinary care and diligence in collecting their amount, and, when collected, to pay them over. In this decision, I entirely concur. The practice of charging the collectors of these taxes and duties, with the whole amount due by their respective districts, is, I presume, a mere treasury arrangement, as I understand the twenty-seventh section of the act of the 22d of July, 1813 [3 Stat. 33], to be confined to the internal taxes; and I can find no similar provision in any other act of congress, in relation to the collectors of the internal duties. or to those officers generally. If that section applied to the collection of the tax on stills, the subject of the present controversy, it would support the principle of law laid down by the district judge, but then the relief provided by it for the collector, could only be afforded by the comptroller. The principle then, being a reasonable and just one, and consistent with the general rules of law in relation to agents, and the above section not applying to the internal duties, I can perceive no objection to this part of the opinion of the district court.

But be this as it may, the material part of the charge was, that, if the jury were satisfied, that when the defendant went into office, he found that a certain attorney had been employed by his predecessor, to put in suit these bonds, (meaning the bonds for the amount of which the suit was brought) by direction of the commissioner of revenue; then the defendant was not responsible for more than ordinary care and diligence, in superintending the collection; and I think it must be agreed by all, that to make the collector responsible, in such a case, for the amount of those bonds, would be to outrage every principle of justice, which no court could sanction, unless compelled to do so by some positive statute. By the act of July, 1813, it is declared that there shall be an officer in the treasury department, to be denominated "commissioner of the revenue," for superintending the collection of the direct tax and internal duties, who shall be charged, under the direction of the head of that department, with certain specific duties, and amongst them, with that of superintending generally all the officers employed in assessing and collecting the said taxes and duties. In the execution of the powers thus conferred on that officer, he issued to all the collectors under his control the instructions, which have before been adverted to; whereby they were authorised, in case the district attorney resided too remotely from their respective collection districts, and had appointed no deputy to act for him, to employ any other attorney to sue for the taxes and duties which have become due; and to do this, with an understanding, that he should have all the business of such collector. It is admitted, in this case, that the district attorney lived too remote from the Twelfth collection district to attend to the business of the collection of it, and that he had appointed no deputy to represent him. In consequence of these circumstances, the predecessor of the present collector employed an attorney to sue the bonds which had been taken, which attorney was approved of, and his compensation fixed upon, by the commissoner of the revenue. That this officer had a power to give these instructions and to authorise the acts done by the collector alluded to, is unquestionable; and if this be so, upon what principle is it that the present collector can be made responsible for the amount of the bonds which, with the approbation of an authorised officer of the government, had been placed in the hands of an attorney for suit and collection, previous to his coming into the office. He could not withdraw the bonds from the hands of the attorney without a violation of the engagement made with him, "that he should have all the business of the collector." And, if they were in suit, which is highly probable, he would by doing so, have acted in opposition to that part of the instructions of the 8th of April, 1815, which states, that "in pending suits, it will be proper, not to disturb the course that may have been pursued." The creation of a commissioner of the revenue, for the purpose of superintending the collection of those portions of the public revenue, and of the officers employed in their collection, was no doubt done for wise and useful purposes; and in obeying his instructions, the collectors acted as duty required, and can upon no just or legal principle, be responsible for the consequences of those acts.

The judgment must be affirmed.

Case No. 16,352.

UNITED STATES v. SONACHALL.

[4 Biss. 425.] [1]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. Dec. 1864.

PERJURY — AFFIDAVITS OF DRAFTED SOLDIERS — NOTARY PUBLIC.

1. Under the act of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 73], the secretary of war has authority to prescribe what facts shall be stated in affidavits by drafted men claiming exemption from military service; and false swearing in reference to facts so required is perjury.

2. A notary public is an officer authorized to administer oaths in such cases.

[This was an indictment against Joseph Sonachall upon the charge of perjury. Motion to quash the indictment.]

DRUMMOND, District Judge. I am inclined to think this indictment can be sustained, though the question is not free from difficulty, but as after trial the defendant can move in arrest of judgment, I am disposed to overrule the motion to quash. It is an indictment against the defendant for having stated as a fact that which was untrue, in an affidavit made by him and presented to the board of enrollment for the Fifth enrollment district, in pursuance, as is alleged, of the order of the board, under the regulations of the war department. He asserted in an affidavit made before a notary public, with a view of obtaining an exemption from the military service of the United States, that he had never voted at any election in the United States.

I concede that under the law of March 3d, 1863 (12 Stat. 73), the fact that he had voted at an election did not estop him from claiming exemption from the performance of military duty; in other words, if he were a foreigner, and had never declared on oath his intention to become a citizen in pursuance of the laws of the United States, he was exempt from military service, whether he had ever voted or not; but still the board of enrollment had a right to know, in pursuing the inquiry, whether he was a citizen or had ever made an oath of his intention to apply for citizenship, whether he had voted or not. The act already referred to in the 5th section provided for the appointment of a provost marshal. The 6th section declared that it should be the duty of the provost marshal general, with the approval of the secretary of war, to make rules and regulations for the government of his subordinates. The 8th section provided that there should be in each district a board of enrollment, composed of a provost marshal as president, and two other persons to be appointed by the president of the United States. The 14th section provided that drafted persons should be carefully inspected by the surgeon of the board, who should truly report to the board the physical condition of all persons. The section proceeds to state: "Persons drafted and claiming exemption from military duty on account of disability or any other cause shall present their claims to be exempted to the board, whose decision shall be final."

The averment in the indictment is that this defendant, in order to comply with the requisition of the board, in pursuance of instructions from the war department, and with a view of claiming his exemption from military service, made an affidavit before a notary public that he was a foreigner by birth and that he had never voted at any election, which last statement the indictment alleges to be untrue.

The 13th section of the act of March 3d, 1825 (4 Stat. 118), declares that if any person in any case, matter, hearing or other proceeding where an oath or affirmation shall be required to be taken or administered under or by any law of the United States, shall upon the taking of such oath or affirmation knowingly and willfully swear or affirm falsely, every person so found shall be deemed guilty of perjury, etc.

The first question to be determined is whether this was an oath under a law of the United States. I think this point is decided by the case of U. S. v. Bailey, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 238. That case decides in effect that where the secretary of the treasury had authority to liquidate and pay certain claims to be presented to the government, he had a right to prescribe that an affidavit should be made of the claims, and that where one was made in pursuance of the instructions thus given and there was an untrue statement in the affidavit, that the party might be indicted, although there was no statute of the United States which expressly authorized the officer before whom the affidavit was made to administer the oath in support of the claim, and although there was no law of the United States which expressly authorized the secretary of the treasury to prescribe the particular regulation referred to. It seems that the rule laid down by the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Bailey [supra] substantially controls this case.

The act of 1863 authorized the secretary of war to make these rules and regulations for the subordinates. The provost marshals and boards of enrollment were the subordinates. The indictment avers that he required affidavit to be made in relation to the particular fact, to wit: when a party claimed exemption on the ground that he was a foreigner, whether he had ever voted or not at an election. There can be no doubt under this act, if this case in 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 238, is law, that the secretary of war had the right to prescribe this form to the board, and that it was a material fact which he had a right to know. The subject of investigation before the board was to be whether the party was entitled to exemption. If he was a foreigner, it was a pertinent inquiry whether he had ever voted at any election.

It may be true that the fact that he had voted did not estop him from claiming the exemption; still, it was a proper inquiry before the board, and it had a right to know whether he had voted or not. I think the illustration given by the district attorney was an appropriate one. If a party went before the board, claiming that he was exempt on the ground that he was a foreigner, they had a right to know where he was born. The secretary had a right to prescribe that he should state under oath where he was born. If he knowingly stated a falsehood in relation to that, it was a matter material to the inquiry, although the fact that he was born in Great Britain, France, Greece, or elsewhere, would not be material as affecting his right to exemption. That is to say, he would be exempt whether he was born in one country or the other and had never made an oath of his intention to claim citizenship; but still the board had a right to know what the fact was, so far as it was within his knowledge. So in relation to many other facts which might be deemed pertinent to the question, Is this man exempt from military duty?

It will be observed that the act of 1825 does not in terms repeat the ordinary definition of perjury at common law, that it must be material to the point in issue, but the language of the act is, that if he shall "knowingly and willingly swear or affirm falsely" "in any case, matter, hearing or other proceeding when an oath or affirmation shall be required to be taken or administered," "he shall be deemed guilty of perjury."

The case referred to, decided by Judge Sprague, in one form went up to the supreme court of the United States; that is to say, after the party had been indicted in the district court he was indicted in the circuit court, and the case is reported in 17 How. [58 U. S.] 204 [U. S. v. Nickerson]. The principle decided by Judge Sprague was, that when the act of congress declared that a certain form should be complied with, in order that the party should be entitled to the payment of money, that the secretary of the treasury had no right to enlarge that form, and go beyond its terms, and I have no disposition to object to his ruling upon that point. I am inclined to think that if a law of congress does prescribe the form and manner in which a thing is to be done in order to accomplish a particular object, that neither president nor secretary has any right to go beyond that form or manner. And if the act of 1863 had prescribed what facts should be stated to the board of enrollment by the party in order to exempt him from military duty, the secretary of war would have had no right to enlarge that statement or go beyond it. It will be seen, therefore, that I hold that there was an affidavit made in pursuance of law, as it was made by the authority of the secretary of war touching a question that was to come before the board of enrollment, in relation to which he was authorized to act, and that in prescribing that a foreigner, when he came before the board and claimed exemption from the performance of military service, should state whether or not he had voted at any election in the United States, was a pertinent subject of inquiry, and, having sworn untruly upon that point, it was a false statement within the language of the act of 1825, and that an indictment will lie.

As to the other point, whether the officer had authority to administer the oath, I have no doubt whatever. This Case of Bailey, already referred to, expressly decides that point in all substantial respects. There, there was no law of the United States, as the court has already stated, which authorized the oath to be taken before a justice of the peace—he was a state officer; but the oath having been taken before him, in pursuance of the regulations adopted by the treasury department, the court held that it was an oath under the law, and that an indictment could be founded upon it if the statement were false. Here the indictment alleges it to have been an oath taken before a notary public. He is a state officer. By the laws of the state and of the United States he has a right to administer an oath. The indictment alleges that he had authority to administer the oath, under the act of 1790 [1 Stat. 112]. This is all that is required. For these reasons I think the indictment must be sustained.

UNITED STATES v. SOPER et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 623.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

INDICTMENT—CONSPIRACY.

The time and place of conspiracy must be alleged in the indictment.

This was an indictment for conspiracy to extort money from one William Hickey, by seizing two of his slaves, and confining them in Maryland, as runaways, so that the defendants [Soper and Webster] might claim the reward allowed by the laws of Maryland for taking up runaway slaves.

After a verdict for the United States, THE COURT, upon motion of the defendants' counsel, arrested the judgment, because there was no time nor place of conspiracy alleged in the indictment.

UNITED STATES v. SOTO.

[1 Cal. Law J. 328.]

District Court, N. D. California. 1863.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — LOCATION OF BOUNDARIES.

[A junior grantee has no right to insist that his land shall be surveyed so as to overlap an older grant for which a patent has been issued by the United States where the land patented lies within the exterior boundaries of the senior grant as shown by the diseño thereof; and especially where the junior grantee, without such overlapping, will obtain the full quantity granted by the former government.]

[Claim of Barbara Soto for the Rancho San Lorenzo, in Alameda county. The decision of the board of land commissioners confirming the claim was affirmed at the December term, 1856. See Case No. 16,357. The cause is now heard on objections to the survey.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. The principal objections now made by the United States to the official survey were urged on a former occasion to this court, when the cause was before it on appeal from the board of land commissioners. They were then elaborately argued and fully considered, and a decree was entered declaring the boundaries of the tract confirmed, as seemed to the court to be just. The exceptions filed by the United States seek to reopen the controversy thus settled and determined. It is enough to say that, independently of the fact that the matter may well be deemed "res adjudicata," I have seen no reason to doubt the entire correctness of the opinion heretofore delivered by this court. The location of the eastern line of the official survey is also objected to; but the location of this line was in like manner discussed in the opinion heretofore delivered, and fixed by the decree. Even if the question were still open, I confess myself unable to discover even plausibility in the objection taken by the United States. The grant and diseño of Soto appear to have embraced a tract extending from the San Lorenzo to the Alto creeks, and from the beach to the cuchilla, or crest of the hills, "excepting the number of varas granted to Castro in said lands." The grant to Castro for his rancho of six leagues was subsequently issued. His land is described as bounded "by the rancho of Soto on the side next the main road from the Arroyo del Alto to that of San Lorenzo, the said Soto having been considered the owner of that part next the beach." The main road referred to runs from one brook to the other across the plain from north to south, and at no great distance from the base of the hills. From the language of Castro's grant he might well have contended that his western line was to run along the road, and that Soto's land was to lie to the west, and between the road and the beach. But Soto's grant, which was prior in date, embraced the land from the beach to the cuchilla, or crest of the hills, excepting a few hundred varas already granted to Castro. A dispute, therefore, naturally arose, which, on the complaint of Soto that Castro was encroaching on the plain, was settled by the parties in the presence of and with the sanction of the governor. The boundary thus settled is thus described: "Commencing at the sanjon, or rivulet, where it is parallel with the southern side of Castro's house, measuring 600 varas towards the main road and from their point of termination, taking a straight line to the Arroyo de San Lorenzo, and recognizing, for the boundaries on the other side of the rivulet, the margin, or base, (orilla) of the hills; measuring ten varas up on the hills." The rivulet referred to is a small stream from the hills and flowing in a westerly direction into the plain. On its northerly side is the house of Castro, and on the southerly that of Soto. These houses are nearly in the same straight line. The rivulet is about midway between the Alto and the San Lorenzo. As a line run along the base of the hills would barely include Soto's house within his grant, and barely exclude that of Castro, it seems to have been agreed that from the rivulet, where it is parallel with the southern side of Castro's house, a line 600 varas long, towards the west, or in the direction of the road, should be run, and thence to the San Lorenzo. The house of Castro would thus be left more than 600 varas within, or to the east of, his boundary. The remaining or southern portion of the line, namely, that "on the other side of the rivulet," was to be run near the base of the hills, but 10 varas up on their side, in order that the house of Soto might be at least that distance within his boundary.

Such seems to me the clear and unmistakable meaning of the agreement made by the parties; and on no other supposition could it have effected its object, viz. the adjustment of a dispute between the parties as to the line constituting the eastern boundary of one and the western boundary of the other. The testimony of the neighbors, particularly that of Guillermo Castro, "shows," as observed in the former opinion of this court, "that the location as determined from the description in this agreement in no respect differs from the line as understood and recognized by the parties themselves and their neighbors." The official survey has followed this line, and, in my opinion, should not be disturbed. It is objected on the part of the claimant that the southern line, as surveyed, does not conform to the line passing from the Alto through the rodeo to the beach, as described in the grant and decree. The line of the official survey has followed the boundary of the rancho of Vallejo, the claimant's colindante on the south, as established by an official survey which has been finally approved, and which has been embodied in a patent. The grant to Vallejo is the elder. His northern line as laid down on the diseño is indicated by an inscription on it of its magnetic course. This line has been followed in the survey, and patent issued to him. It is unnecessary to consider how far the patent thus issued to his neighbor would be conclusive on the claimant, if the grant to the latter were the elder of the two, and if the location of Vallejo were evidently beyond the limits of his grant. For in this case the grant to Vallejo is the elder, and the land patented to him is evidently within his exterior boundaries, as shown by his diseño.

I think, therefore, that the younger grantee has no right to insist that his land shall be surveyed so as to overlap his neighbor, and that the location of the dividing line between by the proper authorities of the United States is final and conclusive on both parties; more especially as there is already included in the lands surveyed to Soto the full quantity of one league and a half, granted to him by the former government. By a stipulation filed in this case, and signed by the claimants and intervenors herein, and by Guillermo Castro, it is agreed that a slight modification of the dividing line between the ranchos, as established by the official survey, shall be made. The United States have no interest in the question. A decree will therefore be entered, approving the official survey, with the modification thus assented to by the parties.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—CONFIRMATION—BREACH OF CONDITION.

[Where all the papers necessary to a perfect title are found complete in the archives, and the genuineness of the signatures is proved, the mere fact that a condition in the grant requiring a house to be built on the land within one year, was not strictly complied with, in regard to time, will not prevent confirmation, where the grant was not denounced by the former government, but was confirmed by the departmental assembly, notwithstanding the omission. William H. McKee, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This cause has been submitted without argument, and no reason for reversing the decision of the board has been suggested to us. The expediente, containing the petition, the order of the governor thereon, the grant, and the subsequent approval of the departmental assembly, is found among the archives of the former government, and the genuineness of the signatures to the title issued to the party and the record of the proceedings of the assembly is also established. The authenticity of these documents is not questioned in this court, nor does it seem to have been in any way impugned before the board of commissioners. The grant bears date the twenty-first of May, 1844. The approval of the assembly is dated the twenty-second of April, 1846. The condition of the grant, requiring the grantee to build a house within a year from its date, does not appear to have been strictly complied with. But there was no denouncement of the land under the former government, and the grant was confirmed by the assembly, notwithstanding the omission to comply with the condition. A house seems to have been built, and the land stocked with cattle, horses, etc., in the year 1846, or perhaps in the beginning of 1847, and from that time to the present the land has been in the peaceable possession of the appellee and those claiming under him. In accordance with the principles laid down by the supreme court, and applied by us in recent cases, we think this claim should be confirmed.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—EVIDENCE OF ISSUE.

[May 8, 1842, on a petition by the claimant for certain land, the governor ordered a provisional grant to issue to her, "while she presents a plat of the lands petitioned for, subject to the usual reports." This land had then been occupied by her husband for two years, and by her for four years. In 1844 the prefect was ordered by the governor to report whether the land was vacant, and he reported that she was occupying it, and the governor, according to his own testimony, issued a grant for the land, and three persons, of whom two were interested as purchasers from the claimant of parts of the land, testified as to having seen the grant, and as to its loss. The expediente contained the order of concession on which a grant would issue as of course. The claimant continued to remain in possession of the land from the time of the alleged grant, and to claim the same, making considerable improvements thereon. Held, that a confirmation of the claim was justified.]

[Claim of Teodora Soto for the Rancho Cañada del Hambre, comprising three leagues of land in Contra Costa county; confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.]

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.

Crockett & Page, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The documentary evidence produced from the archives in this case shows that in May, 1842, Teodora Soto petitioned the governor for a place called "La Cañada del Hambre." She represented that her deceased husband, Francisco Barcenas, had obtained a provisional grant of the land and had occupied it with his cattle. That shortly afterwards he was obliged to leave it in consequence of a fire which destroyed the pasture, and had since accidentally been killed. She therefore solicited the governor to grant her the land, though only provisionally, and until she could present a new sketch, and reminded him of the services of her late husband in the army for more than ten years, and that on his discharge more than half his pay was due him. The prefect Guillermo Castro, to whom the governor referred for information, reported that Barcenas had occupied the land provisionally until he should obtain the grant; that he built a corral, but that it was burnt, and Barcenas was obliged to withdraw from the premises, and soon after met his death. It appears, also, from the report of Estrada, that the expediente of the grant obtained by Barcenas could not be found in the archives; but José Castro certified that Barcenas, in 1839, had solicited the land, and it was granted to him provisionally. On the eighth of May, 1842, the governor ordered a provisional grant to be issued to Teodora Soto "while she presents a plat of the land petitioned for, subject to the usual reports." By the depositions taken in the case it appears that Barcenas moved to the Rancho of Cañada del Hambre in the year 1836; that he built a house and corral upon it, and cultivated a part of it in corn and vegetables. He remained there about two years, and after his removal and subsequent death his widow returned to it, built a large house, inclosed and cultivated a portion of the land, and has continued to live upon it ever since. She has, however, been driven from her house, and now resides in a small hut built of hides and tule and poles, which she has constructed for a shelter. The fact of her occupation of the land is also proved by Castro, who testifies that, in 1843 or 1844, he was ordered by the governor to report whether the land was vacant, and that he cited Teodora Soto to appear. She claimed to own the land, but did not produce her papers. She was, however, in the actual occupation of it, and Castro so reported to the governor. The grant alleged to have been issued by the governor in pursuance of the order above recited is not produced. Governor Alvarado testifies that a grant was issued in 1841 or 1842, in pursuance of the decree of concession contained in the expediente. Francisco Pereyra testifies that he saw in the possession of the claimant, in 1849, documents relative to the title of the Cañada del Hambre; that he read them several times; that he saw a document issued to Teodora Soto by Alvarado, and that he was present in March or April of 1850 when these documents were delivered by Teodora Soto to General Vallejo, and that she said at the time that they were the title to the rancho. On cross examination the witness stated that the document stated the name of Teodora's husband; that the grant was made in consideration of his having been a soldier; that he did not remember whether it required any conditions, nor whether it was in the usual form; that Teodora Soto had sold a piece of the land to Vallejo in 1849, and that he received the title papers about eight months after the sale—at the time they were delivered to Vallejo he was called upon by Teodora to witness the fact. M. G. Vallejo testified that he had the title papers in his possession some years, but that about 1850, when he and his son-in-law Frisbie came to look for them, they could not be found. In 1850, however, when Major Cooper wished to secure a preëmption in the vicinity of this land, he requested the witness to have the grant translated, and that he accordingly procured a translation to be made by Frederick Rejedor, then public translator, but since deceased. The witness then identified the translation as a correct translation of the original grant which he had seen and knew to be genuine. The original, he says, he delivered to Capt. Frisbie to be placed in his safe, and he has never since been able to find it. Capt. Frisbie testifies that he had the original grant in his possession in 1849 or 1850; that he sent it to Sonoma, and it was returned to him, as he thinks, with the translation on file in the case. The paper when returned to him, if returned at all, was tied up in a handkerchief and thrown into an iron safe either by him or some of his clerks; that some time after the claimant applied to him for her papers, to be used in a law suit—on opening the handkerchief he found the translation, but not the original document; that he searched for it diligently, and wrote to General Vallejo at Sonoma for it, but could not find it. General Vallejo, he says, insisted that he had sent it back in the handkerchief, but the witness could never ascertain what had become of it. The witness further states that he read the translation soon after having the original in his possession; that he then thought and now thinks the translation was correct. He identifies the handwriting of the translation as that of Rejedor, a teacher in Sonoma and a public translator in that district.

The grant, as appears by the translation, is of three sitios "of that which shall remain over from the ranchos of the Pinole and Mr. Welsh, after they shall have been duly measured." By evidence taken in this court on appeal it appears that both Vallejo and Frisbie were, at the time of giving their testimony, interested in maintaining the grant—having purchased a portion of the land from the claimant. The objection was not, however taken at the time their testimony was given, nor has any motion been made to suppress their depositions. It however affects their credibility, and if the proof of the existence of the original grant rested on their testimony alone, it might well be regarded as unsatisfactory. But Alvarado, the governor, and Francisco Pereyra both swear, the one that he issued the grant, the other that he saw it in the possession of the claimant. The expediente contains the order of concession upon which a grant would issue as of course; and Castro testifies that in 1842 or 1843 the claimant was in actual occupation of the land, claiming it as her own. The date of the grant in the translation is 1841; while the order of concession is 1842. This discrepancy was noticed by the board; but though calculated to excite suspicion, it was considered that it might with greater probability be attributed to a mistake of the translator than received as evidence that no such grant was ever issued. The United States have also produced in evidence a communication of José R. Estrada to the justice of the peace of Contra Costa. In this communication Estrada states that he was directed by the governor to inform the judge that there had been dispatched to Don Ignacio Martinez the title of the tract called the "Pinole"; and that Doña Teodora Soto should be informed that the pretension she has to occupy the tract called the Cañada del Hambre has no foundation, for that it belongs to the mentioned tract of El Pinole. This communication is dated June 2d, 1842. The order of concession in the expediente bears date May 8th, of the same year. Alvarado, though he recognizes the handwriting of Estrada, is unable to remember that he directed the communication to be made; and all that can be inferred from the document, assuming that it was written in pursuance of the orders of the governor, is, that the claim of Teodora Soto to any part of the Pinole rancho was disallowed by the government. But this would rather seem to confirm and strengthen the evidence in favor of the grant; for in that instrument the land granted is expressly limited to "three sitios of that which shall be left over from the ranchos of the Pinole and Mr. Welsh." If, then, after the issuing of this grant the Pinole rancho had been found to embrace any portion of the land claimed by Teodora Soto to have been granted to her, the communication of Estrada would naturally have been made, and would have been entirely consistent with the rights really acquired by Teodora Soto.

Obliged as we are in these cases to found our judgment upon testimony not in all respects reliable, it is impossible to affirm with certainty that the grant issued. I think, however, that the proofs preponderate in favor of that supposition. There seems no good reason to suppose that the governor withheld the grant which he himself ordered to be issued. The destitute condition of the applicant, and the services and misfortunes of her husband, must have commended her application to his favor; and we find her occupying and claiming the land from about the date of the alleged grant to the present time. The nature and extent of the improvements made by her would seem to indicate that she then considered herself as owning the land, and even the fact that in 1849 Vallejo purchased a portion of it from her might, perhaps, be considered a corroborating circumstance, for it implies a recognition on his part of her rights at an early day, and before the rise in value of the land presented temptations to manufacture spurious titles. The board, notwithstanding some suspicions which attend the case, confirmed the claim, and we have not discovered sufficient reasons for reversing their decision. The claim, however, must be strictly limited to the land granted; and it can only embrace such portion of the Cañada del Hambre, not exceeding three leagues, as is not included within the limits of the ranchos of El Pinole and Mr. Welsh, when the same shall have been duly ascertained.

UNITED STATES v. SOTO et al.

[1 Hoff. Land Cas. 182.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT — LOCATION OF BOUNDARY — EQUITABLE RIGHTS.

[1. The description in a grant called for "a straight line drawn to the beach, and from that point" another line. Held, that the word "point" did not mean a mathematical point, but that, in view of the character and circumstances of the grant, it must refer to the beach as being one of the boundaries.]

[2. Where it appears that the governor intended to accede to the petition, and the land has been long occupied and enjoyed under the grant or promise to grant, and by everybody recognized as belonging to the grantee, the latter has an equitable title which the United States should respect.]

Claim [of Barbara Soto] for one league and a half of land [constituting the Rancho San Lorenzo] in Contra Costa (now Alameda) county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.
Thornton & Williams, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case is founded on two grants,—one by Alvarado dated October 10, 1842, and the other by Micheltorena dated January 20, 1844, for the sobrante of half a league contained within the boundaries of the first. The land was described in the first grant as follows: "One league, a little more or less, in the tract called 'San Lorenzo,' the limits of which are from the creek of that name to that called 'El Alto,' pertaining to Don Jesus Vallejo, and from this creek, drawing a right line to pass by the rodeo, to the beach, and from this point to the first ridge which the hills form, excepting the number of varas which have been conceded in said tract to Don Guillermo Castro, which shall be determined at the time of the possession."

At the time the grant issued, Castro was owner of a tract of six hundred varas square, upon which he resided. He, in October, 1843, obtained a concession of a larger tract, which was described as bounded by the rancho of [Barbara] Soto on the side next the main road, it being considered that there has already been made a concession to the said Soto on the side towards the beach. The main road alluded to crosses the tract from creek to creek, and it was contended by Castro that the main road was the western boundary of his land, and that the grant to him was a virtual settlement of the line between him and Soto, which in the grant to the latter had been left for subsequent adjustment. Proceedings were instituted to settle this dispute, and it was finally determined by a compromise made with the approval of the governor. The line as thus settled was described in a document drawn up for the purpose, which appears in the archives, and a copy of which is endorsed on both expedientes. The boundary of Castro as thus settled is as follows: "Commencing on the sanjon (or ditch) where it is parallel with the southern side of Castro's house, and down the sanjon towards the main road six hundred varas, from which point, where they conclude, by a straight line to the San Lorenzo creek. The boundary on the other side of the sanjon is the margin (orilla) of the hills towards the plain, measuring ten varas up on the hills."

These proceedings must be taken as a final and definite settlement of the eastern line of Soto's ranch, and as such it was acquiesced in and recognized by the parties. The line thus designated can, as appears from the proofs, be readily located, and the testimony of the neighbors, particularly that of Guillermo Castro, shows that the location as determined from the description in the agreement in no respect differs from the line as understood and recognized by the parties themselves and neighboring rancheros. On the 20th of January, 1844, Soto addressed a petition to the governor, setting forth that the concession of the tract which he occupies, called "San Lorenzo," expresses to have an extension of one sitio (square league) a little more or less; that the overplus which it may have towards the beach may be half a sitio, which he begs may be conceded to him, as united with the other it would be of much benefit to him. On this petition the secretary reports that there is no objection to granting it, but that the petitioner must subject himself to the limits which his first title calls for, and to the agreement celebrated with Don Carlos Castro. On receiving this report the governor acceded to the petition in the following words: "In conformity with the foregoing, Micheltorena."

It is objected that this was not a valid grant of the sobrante or overplus. But in the first place, it appears from the archives that the same formalities were rarely if ever observed in relinquishing a sobrante to the grantee, within the general limits of whose grant it was found, as were deemed necessary in making an original concession, or a grant of a sobrante to a stranger. The grant of the sobrante to him within whose limits it was found, was little more than a waiver or release of the condition of the original grant, which restricted him to a specific quantity, and the original grant (that condition being struck out) would by its terms convey the whole land within the limits designated. At all events, there can be no doubt in this case that the governor intended to accede to the petition, and the land having under this grant, or promise to grant, been long occupied and enjoyed, and on all hands recognized as belonging to the grantee, the latter has in any view an equitable right which the United States are bound to respect.

The important question, however, in the case, is as to the location of the southern boundary. The tract included within the original limits is claimed by the appellees to be in the form of a square or parallelogram, and bounded on the east by the line between Castro and Soto as it was fixed by the agreement heretofore alluded to, on the south by the Alto and a line through the rodeo to the beach, on the west by the beach, and on the north by the San Lorenzo. It is contended on the part of the United States, that neither the San Lorenzo nor the beach is a boundary of the tract, but that the southern line must be run from the point where the rodeo line or northern boundary strikes the beach, to the first ridge which the hills form. If such a line be drawn, it would form a diagonal to the square claimed by the appellees, and the tract would have a triangular shape, with the agreed line between Soto and Castro as its base on the east, and with its apex touching the beach at a mathematical point.

The language of the grant has already been quoted. The words which it is contended call for this location, are as follows: "And from this creek (El Alto) drawing a right line to pass by the rodeo to the beach, and from this point to the first ridge which the hills form, excepting," etc. It is claimed, and with much apparent reason, that the last line must be drawn from the "point" where the rodeo here strikes the beach to the first cuchilla or ridge. If the word "punta" had precisely the signification of the English word "point," as used in surveying, or if the grant had specified the "point" where the rodeo line strikes the beach as the point from which a straight line was to be drawn to the cuchilla for the southern boundary, the construction contended for would be unavoidable. But the language is "a straight line drawn to the beach, and from that point," etc. It does not in terms say "and from the point where said line strikes the beach;" it merely says "from that point," namely, from the beach. A reference to the beach generally by the term "punta," is certainly not in accordance with our use of language; but so far as I have been able to discover, such a construction of the term is not inadmissible in Spanish. If, however, there were no other guide to the intentions of the grantor, this construction might probably be deemed forced and unnatural. There are other considerations, however, which I think remove any reasonable doubt as to its propriety.

In fixing the limits of land to be granted, both the law and usage of the Californians require them to adopt as nearly as possible a rectangular or square figure. This was not in all cases practicable, but in a country used almost exclusively for grazing, and where no fences were built, it became necessary to designate great natural objects as the boundaries of the tracts conceded. It seems therefore extremely improbable that in this instance the natural and obvious boundary afforded by the shore of a great estuary should be wholly neglected, and the land should assume the form of a triangle, having only a mathematical point at its apex resting on the beach, while one of the sides should diagonally cross the center of a large plain with no visible object throughout its length, except at its extremities, to determine its location. This is the more improbable as the whole of the neighboring land had been before, or was subsequently, granted, and the piece of land excluded by the diagonal line alluded to, if not embraced within the grant to Soto, has remained from some unexplained reason the only piece of ungranted land in the vicinity. The original grant to Soto was for one league within the limits specified. He subsequently, as we have seen, obtained the sobrante of about half a league more. This was after the boundary between him and Castro had been fixed.

Taking, then, that boundary as determined, there is found within the limits as claimed by him about one square league and a half, precisely the quantity granted to him in the two grants. But if the diagonal line be drawn as proposed, he would have but about two-thirds of a league in all, leaving his sobrante grant wholly inoperative, for even his first grant of one league could not be satisfied out of the tract so limited. It is to be borne in mind that Soto did not petition for an augmentation or extension, but for a sobrante or overplus—the excess within the original boundaries over and above the quantity to which he was restricted. This excess he states to be about half a league, while he also mentions that his first grant was for one league. If then the limits of the land as designated in his grant, after the Castro line was fixed, included less than a league as is now contended, the petition for a sobrante of half a league more within those limits was absurd. Had he or the governor supposed that the quantity already granted could not be found within the limits of the tract, it is not to be supposed that one would have asked for and the other conceded half a league more within those limits. In such case he would have asked for, not a sobrante, but an augmentation, and would have obtained his additional quantity outside of and beyond his original boundaries. The fact that the land, according to the boundaries he contends for, is nearly exactly the quantity (one league and a half) granted to him, seems to me almost conclusive as to what he intended to ask for and the governor to give.

The value of land to the former inhabitants of this country in a great degree depended upon the existence of abundant supplies of fresh water, or "agua dolce," for cattle. The line proposed would not only form an acute angle at the beach, but would touch the San Lorenzo creek only at a single mathematical point, thus cutting off all access to that stream, and either depriving the rancho altogether of fresh water, or else affording it at the El Alto alone for a short distance. The adjoining rancho at the south is bounded by the San Lorenzo, and it is improbable that in fixing the limits of a cattle rancho access to that stream should have been denied to Soto, when the land between his rancho and it was unoccupied and ungranted, and the governor was willing on his mere suggestion to increase the quantity given him by an additional half league. If with these considerations in our mind we recur to the grant, its intention seems obvious. It does not profess to give the boundary lines except on one side of the tract, but "its limits." Its longitudinal limits are declared to be from the San Lorenzo to the Alto, and the rodeo line to the beach. Having thus determined its length, the grantor indicates its breadth, viz. from the beach to the first crest of the hills.

He does not mention any point in the crest of the hills, which would have been natural if he had intended to fix as a southern boundary an imaginary straight line drawn from the point where the rodeo line struck the beach to the crest; and the indefiniteness of this description, referring as it does to a line on the summit of a range of hills, rather than to a point on those hills, seems to show that the intention of the grantor was merely to fix the latitudinal limits of the tract, viz: the beach and the crest; rather than to describe a line as a precise boundary. But all doubt on this subject is removed, if the diseño produced be received as the original on which the grant was made. It is shown beyond any reasonable doubt, that it was with the other title papers placed in the hands of eminent counsel in this city, in whose custody it has ever since remained.

By some oversight it was not put in evidence before the board, but A. M. Pico, Francisco Arce and G. Castro testify that it is either the identical map, or one exactly resembling that, which was handed to Pico when about to give judicial possession to Soto. This map is unusually rude, but the form of the tract is sufficiently indicated to show it to be a square or parallelogram, with the beach as its western boundary.

A further confirmation of these views is found in the report of Jimeno at the time of the dispute between the governor and Castro. "It appears to him," he says "convenient to measure to Soto the league, more or less, which has been granted him from the beach to the 'lomas,' or hills, but always on the side of the Arroyo del Alto, because those are the limits which have been marked out, and from these limits he should follow those of Don G. Castro." He was thus, according to Jimeno, to have a league on the side of the Alto, from the beach to the hill and from the Alto to the San Lorenzo, following Castro's boundary. The sobrante, after measuring the league, would have lain between the beach and the San Lorenzo, and would have been, as the testimony shows, about half a league in extent if measured after the Castro line was determined, and it was precisely this sobrante of half a league which Soto asked for and obtained.

If to all this be added the fact that Soto himself always claimed, and was regarded by his neighbors as owning, the whole tract between the beach and the Castro line, and between the Alto and rodeo line and the San Lorenzo, the conclusion is irresistible that such are the true boundaries of the grant. The board confirmed the claim to the land within these boundaries, and I see no reason to reverse their decree.

District Court, D. New Jersey. April Term, 1871.

ELECTIONS—PREVENTING VOTING—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—ELECTION RETURNS, HOW CERTIFIED.

1. On indictment, under section 19 of the act to enforce the right of citizens to vote, &c., approved May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 144), for "unlawfully preventing certain qualified voters from freely exercising the right of suffrage;" where the proof was, that the defendant, with others, attacked a number of voters, waiting in line for their turn to cast their ballots, and expelled them from the room; and that said voters afterwards returned and voted: Held, that the defendant committed the offense which congress meant to define and punish in the clause of the section under which the indictment was drawn.

2. The prevention took place, and the offense was complete, by the expulsion of the voters from the polls, although the prosecutors afterwards voted.

3. The words "exercising the right of suffrage" in section 19 of the act of May 31, 1870, may be held to mean "voting," without bringing that section in conflict with the provisions of section 4 of the act,—provided that the penalties prescribed in section 19 be understood to apply to offenses committed at elections for members of congress, and those in section 4 to state, county, and municipal elections.

4. Query, whether under the fifteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, congress has power to pass any law to operate upon private individuals?

5. A copy of a return of an election in a township, filed with the clerk of the county, accompanied by the certificate of the clerk of the county, that it was a full and correct return of such election, as filed in his office,—sent to the office of the secretary of state, is not made and certified in the manner, and does not come from the source required by the election law of New Jersey, to constitute it an official paper.

Motion for new trial, after conviction on an indictment.

A. Browning and B. Williamson, for the motion.

A. Q. Keasbey, Dist. Atty., in opposition.

NIXON, District Judge. The defendant in this case has been indicted, and upon trial convicted, of "unlawfully preventing certain legal voters from freely exercising the right of suffrage" at an election for a member of congress, held on the eighth day of November last, in the township of Newton and county of Camden. [Case unreported.] The indictment was framed under section 19 of the act, entitled "An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states and for other purposes," approved May 31, 1870.

It may be assumed, in view of the verdict of the jury, that the government proved, at the trial, that on that day,—fixed by law for the election of a representative in congress, and the several state and county officers,—the polls were regularly opened at seven o'clock, a. m.; that the election was conducted by certain officers, claiming to act under the authority of the township; that during the progress of the election, at about half-past ten o'clock in the morning, whilst the room in which the election was held was well filled with colored voters, waiting for the opportunity of casting their ballots, a violent attack was made upon them by a company of white men, driving them forcibly from the room into the street, and closing, or attempting to close the door against them; that amongst the legal voters thus rejected, were John Ray, Henry W. Sizer, Lorenzo Wilson, Wm. H. Newsome, and Moses Wilcox; that these men, with others driven out, almost immediately rallied, and with the aid of their friends, regained admittance to the room, and, in turn, drove out the white men; and that all of them subsequently voted. The jury has also found, as a question of fact, that the defendant, Francis Souders, was engaged in this outrage of expelling the colored voters from the room, and thus preventing them from freely exercising the right of suffrage.

It further appears, that after the morning disturbance was quelled, the voting was resumed and continued without any serious interruption, until about six o'clock in the afternoon; that eight hundred and sixteen ballots were deposited; and that then another crowd of white men took possession of the polls, seized the ballot box, broke it in pieces, and scattered the ballots upon the floor and in the street.

Upon submitting this case to the jury, at the trial, I reserved two legal questions for consideration afterwards,—more in deference to the strongly expressed convictions of the able counsel for the defense, than because I entertained any serious doubt as to their correct import and meaning. Since then I have examined the briefs submitted by the counsel for the government and of the defendant, elaborately discussing these questions, and have given to them that careful attention which their importance, as bearing upon the conviction of the defendant, seemed to require.

The first question involves the true construction of the clause of section 19 of the act entitled "An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states of this Union, and for other purposes," under which the indictment against this defendant was drawn; and the second, the legal effect upon this case of the certificate of election, filed in the office of the secretary of state, by certain persons, claiming to make the return of the election in the township of Newton, in the county of Camden, on November 8, 1870.

I. The charge against the defendant in substance is, that at an election for a representative in the congress of the United States, held as aforesaid, he unlawfully prevented certain qualified voters from freely exercising the right of suffrage, by force, threats, menaces, and intimidation. The proof is, that at said election, the defendant, in company with others, in the room where the polls were opened, made an attack upon a line of voters, waiting for the opportunity of casting their ballots for a member of congress, and drove them from the room with violence, under the pretext that certain other voters not in the line were excluded from the polls, and attempted to fasten the doors against their re-admission.

It is insisted, on the part of the defendant, that this is not the offense which congress meant to define in the clause of section 19, under which the indictment was framed; that preventing a voter from freely exercising the right of suffrage is not preventing him from voting; that the one is a mental restraint, and the other a direct physical interference; and that the design of congress, in using these words in this section, was to protect men in voting as they wished to vote, rather than to secure to them the opportunity of voting. It is further maintained, that, even if it be conceded that one of the meanings of the expression, "preventing a voter from freely exercising the right of suffrage," is "preventing him from voting;" yet the facts of the case do not prove a prevention, but a hindrance; that to prevent, is altogether to deprive him of the opportunity to vote, while to hinder is only to delay him temporarily in the exercise of the privilege; and that, as all the prosecutors afterwards voted, the offense defined in section 19 of the statute was not committed.

The argument is, that in the first place, the proper definition of the words used will not admit of the construction claimed by the government; and that, in the next place, all the sections of the statute must be so construed, as to render them operative, consistent, and harmonious with each other; that the construction given to section 19 by the government brings it in direct conflict with the provisions of section 4 of the act; that one penalty is described in section 4 for "preventing, hindering, or obstructing a qualified voter in voting;" and that a different and more severe penalty is affixed in section 19, for "unlawfully preventing him from freely exercising the right of suffrage;" and hence, that it is necessary to assume, in order to harmonize the provisions of these two sections, that different offenses were in the mind of congress when the law, as a whole, was enacted.

1. Our first inquiry will be, whether a proper definition of the words used in the section fairly admits of the meaning insisted upon by the counsel for the government?

There are well settled rules in the construction of statutes. The object of all inquiry is to get at the intention of the legislature in passing the law; and the sole duty of the court is to grant to that intention, when ascertained, its full force and effect. We first consider the language employed, giving to words and sentences their obvious import and signification; having regard more to their general and popular use than to etymological or grammatical refinements. If any doubt remains, we then look at the context; at the subject matter; look to the effects and consequences of this or that interpretation; to the reason and spirit of the law itself; expounding it in the light of the mischief of the old law, or want of law; and the remedy which the legislature has attempted to provide.

Where the statute is penal it must have a strict construction; for the law is tender as to the rights of individuals, and courts wisely shrink from the exercise of the power of punishment, except upon conviction in those cases where the legislature has clearly defined the offense and imposed the duty. But we must not err in a too liberal application of the rule. As was well said by Chief Justice Marshall, in U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 95: "Though penal laws are to be construed strictly, they are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. The maxim is not to be so applied as to narrow the words of the statute to the exclusion of cases which those words, in their ordinary acceptation, or in that sense in which the legislature has obviously used them, would comprehend. The intention of the legislature is to be collected from the words they employ. Where there is no ambiguity in the words, there is no room for construction. The case must be a strong one, indeed, which would justify a court in departing from the plain meaning of words, especially in a penal act, in search of an intention which the words themselves did not suggest."

Holding these familiar principles in mind, let us consider the clause of the section the meaning of which we are trying to ascertain. The words are, "that if at any election for representative, &c., any person shall by force, threat, menace, intimidation, or otherwise, unlawfully prevent any qualified voter from freely exercising the right of suffrage," &c.

What do these words mean? It would seem that there ought not to be any difficulty in arriving at their signification, if we give to them their obvious and usual import. When a man is spoken of as exercising a right, it is commonly understood that he is doing something. When a voter casts his ballot into the box, do we not say that he is exercising the right of suffrage? Can any words be used that better define the act of voting? And when he exercises this right freely, does he not do it according to his pleasure, without any constraint either upon his mind or his body? His will must be uncontrolled, and his physical opportunity for doing the act must not be interfered with. Any control over the one, or interference with the other, encroaches upon his freedom of action, and produces the mischief which the words of the statute were designed to guard against and cure. And what is it to prevent a voter from exercising this right?

It is to put such a restraint upon his volition, or his body, that he cannot perform the act; producing, by threats or otherwise, such apprehension of personal loss or injury, as to induce him not to vote, or to vote contrary to his wishes, being a restraint upon his will; and intervening between him and the ballot box, so as to render it physically impossible for him to cast his vote, being the restraint upon his body. If this was what the statute forbid, the words used might afford some color for the construction asked for by the counsel for the defendant. But it forbids more than this. It prescribes penalties against those who unlawfully prevent voters from freely exercising the right of suffrage. It not only guards the voter against being stopped in the act, but it shields him against all sorts of duress, mental or bodily, while in the performance of the act. Even if it be true that a man is only prevented from voting when he is hindered altogether from exercising the right of suffrage, it is also true that he is prevented from freely exercising such right, when, in its exercise, any kind of constraint is placed upon him by force, threat, intimidation, or otherwise.

I am of opinion, therefore, that, looking at the words of the section in their obvious usual signification, and without any reference to the influence and control which other sections of the statute ought to have in the consideration of its construction, the indictment properly describes the offense which congress meant to define and punish, and the proof of the facts in the case sustains all the material allegations of the first and third counts of the indictment.

2. But it is insisted that such a construction of section 19 will bring it in conflict with section 4; that if we hold that the identical offense is described in these two sections, we subject congress to the imputation of passing an act prescribing different penalties in different sections, for the same misdemeanor; and that it is the duty of the court, under such circumstances, to find some other interpretation of the clause in section 9, which will bring the two into harmony, and cause them both to stand.

The court recognizes this authority and duty when the occasion arises for its exercise, but finds no occasion here. To create this antagonism it is necessary to assume that the phraseology of section 4 is broad enough to include congressional elections as well as state, county, and municipal. It does not do so in terms; and I am not willing to assert that if that section stood alone, the language used is not capable of such construction. But it does not stand alone, and it must be construed in connection with other sections of the act; and if the absurd consequences suggested by the counsel for the defendant are to follow the assumption that section 4, as well as section 19, was designed to apply to federal elections, is it not more consonant to reason and the principles of right interpretation, that we should limit the provisions of the one to state, county, and municipal elections, and of the other to the election of members of congress, than to wrest the words from their natural and obvious meaning, in order to create different and distinct offenses?

And this brings us to the inquiry, what offenses did congress mean to guard against and punish in these two sections of the act? I must acknowledge that the question is not free from embarrassment, if we consider the words only which they have used to express their object. The whole law indicates a want of precision and harmony in the use of terms that suggests either haste, or the work of more than one mind, in its preparation.

In construing a statute, it is one of the fundamental rules to ascertain the intention of the law maker. Where the words used do not clearly disclose this intention, it is proper to consider what was said or done by the law-making power, while the subject matter was under discussion, in order to arrive at their meaning. Looking carefully into the mischief avowedly intended to be remedied by law, and into the history of the legislation preceding and accompanying its enactment, can there be any doubt but that its different sections were the work of many minds; that the law gradually grew from a single proposition, including only one object, into a complex one, embracing several; that the first thirteen sections were prepared to enforce the fifteenth amendment; that the next five sections were inserted to more effectually provide for carrying out the fourteenth amendment, and that the nineteenth and subsequent sections were afterwards added to accomplish another object, to wit: to preserve the purity and freedom of elections for members of congress?

Bills were pending and under discussion at the same time in the senate and house of representatives, with different provisions, but relating to the same subject matter, and having the same end in view. The title of these bills and the provisions of the several sections show that the primary design in each case was simply to provide the appropriate legislation deemed necessary to enforce the fifteenth amendment. The house bill, as passed on May 16 and sent to the senate on the 17th, was confined to this object. When it reached that body the senate bill No. 810, entitled "An act to enforce the fifteenth amendment of the constitution" was under discussion. This, substantially, consisted of the first thirteen sections of the law, as subsequently passed, and a motion had just been made to enlarge the purposes of the bill by adding to it two other bills, then pending in the senate, to enforce the fourteenth amendment, and which embraced the sections from the fourteenth to the eighteenth inclusive of the present law. The senate amended the house bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and substituting their original bill with the proposed amendments; and after a few days' discussion the object and scope of the act were still further enlarged by annexing the 19th and 20th sections, for the expressed purpose of punishing frauds committed in the election of members of congress. These subsequent sections had been embodied in house bill No. 477, entitled "An act to prevent and punish election frauds," and which had been reported to the house from the committee on elections, and was then pending before that body as an entirely distinct measure. The bill thus amended passed the senate, and the remaining sections were added to it by the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses.

Not much homogeneousness of language or expression should be looked for in an act thus made up, and little force can be given to the argument, that because different words and forms of expression have been used in different sections, it should be assumed that there was a design in the mind of the law-making power to express and define different offenses.

This reference to the origin of the law reveals the fact that the manifest object, in section 14, was to enforce the provisions of article 15 of the amendment to the constitution, and in section 19 to conserve the freedom and purity of elections for members of the house of representatives.

In legislating to enforce the provisions of the fifteenth amendment, it was conceded that congress might prescribe penalties against national or state officers, for interfering with the free exercise of the right of suffrage, and against all persons claiming to act under color of some state law or constitution; and the question at once arose, whether the constitutional power existed in congress to pass any law which acted upon private individuals. That amendment, it was alleged, related only to acts done by the United States or any state, to abridge or deny the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It had no reference to individuals acting as such, except so far as they pretended to be acting under the authority of existing law, state or national. It is not necessary for me to express any opinion upon that question here and now; but I allude to it in order to say that, in the debate upon section 4, it seemed to be admitted, both by the friends and opponents of the measure, that no indictment could be sustained under that section, against any one, unless the prevention of voting, or the denial of the right to vote, was done under the color or pretense of some state law or regulation. The act was amended by adding sections 19 and 20, expressly to cover the case of private individuals, who were corrupting the fountain of political life and social order by fraud, bribery, intimidation, force, or other unlawful means, and, anticipating the objection raised by others against the powers of congress to legislate in the matter of state elections, these sections were limited to offenses committed at an election for members of congress.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the words "unlawfully preventing a voter from freely exercising the right of suffrage," may be construed to mean "to unlawfully prevent him from voting," without bringing section 19 in conflict with section 4, and that it is not necessary to find some other interpretation to harmonize the provisions of these sections of the act.

It is further insisted, that to constitute the offense created by the clause of section 19 under consideration, the voter must be altogether frustrated in his efforts to cast his ballot; that the whole day is covered, so far as the meaning of the word prevention is concerned; and that, as these prosecutors found the opportunity to vote after their ejection, although for a time hindered, the offense was not committed.

It seems to me, as I have already intimated, that such a construction of the statute is too narrow, and that it defeats the purpose which congress had in view in enacting it. This purpose was to protect men in the discharge of their most sacred political privilege. That would be a slight protection, indeed, which allows bullies and rowdies to surround the ballot box from the opening to the close of the polls, keeping off all legal voters by threats, intimidation, or force; and then to hold that the offense is not committed, if by chance the hindered voters should avail themselves of a casual opportunity to slip in their ballots when the backs of these vigilant sentinels were turned. And yet this result follows the interpretation asked for.

But the argument here, of the counsel of the defendant, loses all its force when we call to mind that "exercising the right of suffrage," in the statute, is qualified by the word "freely," which, in his reasoning, he seems to have overlooked.

The proposition is, that we shall not prevent a voter from freely exercising the right of suffrage.

It may be admitted that prevention, in its strict signification, includes more than hindrance, and that it involves the idea of total exclusion from the right of voting. But is no force to be given to the word "freely?"

In view of the fact that these five men afterward voted, the counsel for the defendant asked whether they could truthfully answer "yes" to the inquiry, "Were you prevented from voting on the 8th of November last?" and insisted that their correct response would be, "No; we were hindered—not prevented."

But suppose the inquiry had been, "Were you prevented from freely exercising the right of suffrage?" they would answer, "Yes, we were hindered from voting by being knocked down, shot, forced out of doors, and having the doors closed against us. We were prevented from voting freely. We voted under great difficulties."

It is hardly necessary to multiply words upon this point. It is in proof that these five men stood waiting in line before the ballot box with ballots in their hands, intending to vote for certain individuals upon a certain ticket, which they wished to deposit; that while thus standing prepared to exercise and intent upon exercising their right of suffrage, Francis Souder, with others, drove them from the room and shut the doors against them. How can it be said that they were not prevented from exercising their right freely?

II. The only remaining question which we have to consider, is the legal effect upon this case of a paper produced by the government from the office of the secretary of state, and purporting to be a certificate of election filed by certain persons claiming to make the return of the election held in the township of Newton on November 8, last.

The reasoning of the counsel for the defendant upon this point, as it appears to the court, is founded upon a misapprehension of the allegations of the indictment.

The argument is, that the indictment charges that the offense was committed at an election held in the township of Newton, on November 8 last, by Alexander B. Mahan, Samuel P. Atkinson, and Herman Klusterman, judges; that the statute requires the judges holding the election to file a certificate of the results, in the office of the secretary of state, certifying the number of votes polled and received by each candidate, and the names of the persons voted for, and that such paper shall be an official paper; that to sustain the allegation in the indictment, the prosecution produced this certificate, which is in fact signed by other parties, and therefore does not prove, but directly contradicts the allegation.

The reply we have to make to the argument is, that there is no such allegation in the indictment, nor was any such material or proper.

The charge was, that a stated election for a representative in the congress of the United States, and for certain state officers, was duly held on that day at the township of Newton, in the county of Camden.

The facts, therefore, to be proved were, not that Alexander B. Mahan, Samuel P. Atkinson, and Herman Klusterman, were the judges who conducted the election,—but that a stated election was then and there held; that it was conducted by persons claiming to act under the authority of public law, and that it was held for the purpose of electing a member of congress.

And were not these facts proven? A large number of witnesses testified to them. No one raised a doubt by questioning them. The defense fully showed them by producing the poll book required to be kept by section 40 of the state election law (Nix. Dig. 263), having the proper heading, and containing a record of the names of the persons whose votes were received, and the order of their reception, and offering the clerk and two of the judges of election as witnesses, by whom the facts of election and the correctness of the poll book were established.

But it seems to be admitted that these material facts were proved. It is insisted, however, that a copy of a certificate was produced from the office of the secretary of state, which is invested by the statute with the character of an official paper, and which contradicted, and therefore invalidated or nullified the verbal proof.

There are short and conclusive answers to this:

1. The paper thus produced was not made or certified in the manner, and did not come from the source required by the statute to constitute it an official paper. It appears, upon inspection, to have been the copy of a return filed with the clerk of the county of Camden, with the certificate of that clerk appended that it was a full and correct return of the election in the township of Newton, as filed in his office. It did not come to the secretary of state, either from the board of election of the township, or from the board of county canvassers.

2. But admit that it has the prerequisites necessary to make it an official paper. Then it is a record, or it is not. If a record, and incapable of contradiction by verbal evidence, as claimed by defendant's counsel, all the facts which it contains must be accepted as true. It shows that there was an election in the township of Newton, in the county of Camden, on November 8 last, and that such election was for a representative in the congress of the United States, which are the material facts to be established; and all the verbal testimony in the cause, to the effect that some other judges held the election, must be regarded as untrue; exhibiting the depravity of the character of the witnesses, or the fallibility of their memory. But if it is not a record, and may be contradicted by other proof, then the verbal evidence offered is abundant to prove these necessary facts in the case, and the verdict was right.

Thus, after a careful survey of the law and the evidence, the court finds no sufficient reason to be dissatisfied with the result at which a patient and intelligent jury arrived, and the motion for a new trial is denied.

Motion denied.

Case No. 16,359.

UNITED STATES v. SOUTH BRANCH DISTILLING CO. et al.

[8 Biss. 162.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Feb., 1878.

INTERNAL REVENUE—DISTILLER'S WAREHOUSE BOND.

1. The fact that distilled spirits are seized, condemned and sold for violation of the internal revenue law [14 Stat. 98], while bonded, does not release the obligors on the warehouse bond.

2. The fact that the purchaser at the sale paid the tax is immaterial.

Debt on bond, dated November, 1875, in penal sum of $7,000, given by South Branch Distilling Company, as principal, and H. J. Pahlman and Joseph Haas as sureties, conditioned that, if the said principal should well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, to the collector of internal revenue for the First district of Illinois the amount of taxes due and owing on a certain eighty-seven barrels of distilled spirits, particularly described in said bond, which were entered for deposit in the distillery warehouse, No. 1, of the said South Branch Distilling Company, in said district, during the month of October, 1875, before such spirits shall be removed from such warehouse, and within one year from the date of said bond, then said obligation should be void, otherwise to remain in full force.

Defendants, the South Branch Distilling Company and Joseph Haas, interpose as defense a special plea that, after said bond was given, to wit, on the 29th day of December, 1875, the United States, by its duly authorized collector of internal revenue for said district, seized the spirits in said bond mentioned, as forfeited to the United States for alleged violation of internal revenue law, heretofore committed by the said distilling company. That an information was duly filed on behalf of the United States in the United States district court of this district, praying for a condemnation of said spirits; and that on the 5th of April, 1876, such proceedings were had on said information, that by the judgment and order of said court said distilled spirits were declared condemned and forfeited to the United States, and ordered to be sold; and that afterwards, and before this suit, in pursuance of said judgment, said spirits were duly sold by the marshal of said district, in the manner prescribed by law, to one Isaac Waixel, who duly paid to the collector of internal revenue for said district the taxes due and owing on said spirits.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred generally.

Mark Bangs, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Stanford & Kohlsatt, for defendants.

BLODGETT, District Judge. It is claimed on the part of defendants that as this bond is conditioned for the payment of the tax on the spirits in question within one year, or when removed from the warehouse, and as the plea shows that the tax was paid by the purchaser at the condemnation sale under a seizure made by the government, therefore, the condition has been substantially performed; that is, the government has received the tax due on the spirits, while it is insisted on the part of the government that this plea is no answer to the bond.

Section 3271, Rev. St., requires "every distiller to provide, at his own expense, a warehouse, to be situated on and constitute a part of his distillery premises, and to be used only for the storage of distilled spirits of his own manufacture until the tax thereon shall have been paid."

Section 3293, Rev. St., requires the distiller, on the first of each month, or within five days thereafter, to give bond conditioned for the payment of all taxes on all spirits deposited in said distillery warehouse during the preceding month; said bond to be signed by one or more sureties, and conditioned for the payment of the tax on such spirits before removal from such warehouse, and within one year from the date of such bond.

By section 3334, Rev. St., it is provided that: "All distilled spirits forfeited to the United States, sold by order of court, or under process of distraint, shall be sold subject to tax; and the purchaser shall immediately, and before he takes possession of said spirits, pay the tax thereon. And any distilled spirits heretofore condemned, and now in the possession of the United States, shall be sold as herein provided. If any tax-paid stamps are affixed to any cask or package so condemned, such stamps shall be obliterated and destroyed by the collector and marshal after forfeiture, and before such sale."

Now, does the fact that spirits are seized, condemned and sold for violation of the internal revenue law while so bonded release the obligors on the warehouse bond from their undertaking?

The contract is, in effect, that the distiller will pay the tax on the removal of the spirits from the warehouse, and within one year; and can the distiller and his sureties be heard to allege his own violations of the law as a reason for failing to keep their bond?

It seems to me the undertaking is absolute that the distiller will within one year from the date of the bond pay the tax; that the bond is taken for the express purpose of securing the payment of the "tax due and owing" on the spirits as a guaranty and security to the government against any fraudulent or unlawful acts of the distiller. The bond is, so to speak, for the distiller's good behavior—at least in respect to the spirits so bonded. And it is no answer to the bond to say that by reason of the misconduct of the principal, the spirits have been forfeited and sold subject to tax, and that another person has paid the tax. The condition of the bond is, that the distiller, his heirs, executors or administrators shall pay the tax, and if he or they fail to pay, the condition is broken.

Section 3334 requires all forfeited and condemned spirits to be sold subject to tax; and when the taxes have actually been paid, the collector is required to destroy the stamps on the packages. The manifest intention of congress was, that all forfeited spirits should be sold subject to tax, and that the purchaser should pay the tax before he was allowed to remove them. And if such is the rule in regard to tax-paid spirits, it would seem to me to apply with equal force to bonded spirits.

As soon as distilled spirits are produced, the tax is payable, and the distiller may properly be said to owe the government the tax imposed by the law. The warehouse bond only gives him time on his liability, but does not in any degree release him from it.

No authorities bearing directly upon the question raised by these pleadings have been cited, and I am compelled to give my own construction to the contract and the law governing it. I may be wrong, but if I am the amount involved is sufficient to test the question in the supreme court.

Demurrer sustained.

Case No. 16,360.

UNITED STATES v. The SOUTH CAROLINA.

[Fish. Pr. Cas. 63.]

District Court, D. Pennsylvania. Feb. 26, 1813.

CONDEMNATION OF PRIZE—LICENSE FROM ENEMY.

[1. Where no prevarication or other improper conduct on the part of the captured vessel is shown, the question of condemnation of the vessel is to be determined from the papers found on board.]

[2. A United States vessel is not subject to condemnation because it carries a special pass or license from the enemy or the enemy's agent.]

In admiralty.

PETERS, District Judge. This vessel is, indisputably, an American ship, belonging, bona fide to a native citizen of the United States, John C. Stocker, Jr., who has interposed his claim. There is not among the papers found on board, nor according to the deposition of the master, Gaul, on his examination in preparatorio, was there at any time, any paper or document, evidencing any cause of suspicion that this vessel had been, or at the time of her capture, on the 9th November last, was, in the prosecution of any unlawful trade. The master, Gaul, swears that all the papers were delivered up, none having been burnt, destroyed, or concealed. The claimant, in his affidavit annexed to his claim, swears that the vessel was chartered to Willing & Francis, known to be native citizens of the United States, for a voyage from Philadelphia to Lisbon, where she arrived with a cargo of flour, corn, &c. wholly the property of American citizens, or of Portuguese subjects, as he believed, at the time of its shipment, and still doth believe. He states that he had no participation in any application for a passport or license from the British government; but believes there was put on board by the shippers, a letter of request, given by Mr. Foster, the late British minister, that she might be permitted to pass unmolested, but which he, the claimaint, never saw. He swears that no enemies of the United States, their agents, &c. ever had, nor have now, any right, or property, in the vessel; and adds his belief, that the cargo was the property of Willing & Francis, or of Portuguese subjects.

The outward cargo was, as the master swears, delivered at Lisbon to a Mr. Sampayo, a Portuguese subject. The vessel was on her return from Lisbon to Philadelphia, in ballast, when captured.

Among the papers found on board, and delivered into the custody of the clerk of this court, by the captor, was a pass, commonly called a "Foster," in the following words, &c.: "126. By Augustus John Foster, Esq. his Britannic majesty's envoy extraordinary, and minister plenipotentiary to the United States of America. These are to request and require all whom it may concern, to allow the brig South Carolina, of register $193^{30}/_{95}$ tons burthen, or thereabouts, laden with flour and corn, commanded by Richard Gaul, and bound to Lisbon from Philadelphia, and to return ballasted with sand, or salt, into a port of the United States—to pass unmolested. Given at New York, under my hand and seal this eighth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twelve. (Signed) Aug. J. Foster. (Seal.)"

There does not appear to me, on account of this pass, or on any other consideration, any cause for the capture of this vessel. Farther proof is not necessary; as the whole case, on the face of it, is fair, and bona fide. If there were grounds of suspicion, of any decided nature as to the cause on the outward voyage, because it appears by the examination of Captain Gaul, that it was consigned to a house in Lisbon, or person of a name, said to be connected with the enemy; nothing appeared at the time of capture, or doth now appear, to warrant the court in the exercise of its discretion in requiring farther proof. The owner of the vessel had no knowledge of or concern with, the character of the consignee, nor any interest in the cargo. Nor am I to presume any fraudulent transaction, even if it were proved that the consignee was, in other matters, connected in dealings in enemy supplies. The cargo in this case, is alleged (and nothing appears to the contrary) to have been the property of citizens of the United States, or of Portuguese subjects, in amity; and its destination fair and lawful. It is only from the papers found on board, where no prevarication, or other improper conduct, on the part of the captured, is evidenced, that I am to form an opinion. No false or colourable papers, nor any misconduct in the officers or crew of the South Carolina, at the time of capture or since, are shown. A captor is not justifiable in sending in the vessel of a fellow-citizen, or a friend, under bare suspicions, whereof no proofs appear at the time. Nor is he entitled to farther or any proof, when all the papers, and the whole conduct of the captured are fair; and give no ground for warrantable suspicion of fraud. It cannot therefore, be on account of the circumstances mentioned, that this vessel is brought under the cognizance of the court.

It is entirely unnecessary for me to repeat my opinion as to Mr. Foster's pass; or, as it is called, "letter of request." On the policy of permitting, or forbidding, such, or any other passes, or licenses of any kind (other than such inhibited by our laws) I have no judicial opinion to give. The state of the world has rendered them common and familiar. Whatsoever articles, the indispensable demands of nations, though enemies, as the greatest number now are, require, they will obtain from each other in some way. If special passes or licenses are frowned on, they may promulgate general permissions to trade to places accessible to them, in designated articles necessary to them, free of capture from their cruisers. But these are considerations most proper for other departments of the government. I have only to decide on the lawfulness of their use by our ships. I have given, on former occasions, and repeat in this, my opinion, that our vessels are not subject to capture and confiscation by us, on account of the pass in question, or others similar thereto. Such passes are granted, it is true, for causes indirectly serviceable to the enemy, but under them, our ships may proceed innocently, as they do safely, to and from ports or places lawful to us.

It must have been generally known, and could not have been concealed from our cruisers, that enemy passes, to protect from capture our vessels sailing on lawful voyages, with cargoes belonging to our citizens, or neutrals, were allowed by the laws of nations, and are not contrary to our own municipal laws. It is alleged to have been an opinion entertained by the commanders of our cruisers, both public and private, that all licenses or passes, from the enemy or its agents, were unlawful; and on this account this vessel was sent in for adjudication. The worthy and respectable officer, who sent this vessel in, most undoubtedly pursued a conduct the least embarrassing and vexatious, when he ordered her into the port of her destination. It is therefore difficult for me to prevail on myself to give damages; as in cases in which they are not only retributive, but exemplary. Still however, the duty of courts is rigid and imperative. If the owner has suffered by the mistaken opinion of the captor, he ought to be retributed; at least so far, as to replace, or compensate any damage or loss, his vessel has sustained, by the capture and detention. Whether farther retribution shall be made, I shall leave to the judgment of the superior court; as I am given to understand an appeal will be entered; it having been, with no small reason, surmised, that I should decree restitution.

I decree restitution of the vessel, her tackle, apparel and furniture, with damages, to the extent I have stated, and costs. I cannot allow the captor his expenses, consistently with my view of the justice of the court.

UNITED STATES v. SOUTHMAYD.

[6 Biss. 321; 1 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 155; 8 Chi. Leg. News, 1; 21 Int. Rev. Rec. 164; 22 Pittsb. Leg. J. 150; 7 Leg. Gaz. 316.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. March 18, 1875.

CRIMINAL LAW—LIST OF WITNESSES FOR ACCUSED—MINUTES OF GRAND JURY.

1. In all criminal cases in which there has been no preliminary examination, it is within the discretion of the court to order a list of the witnesses sworn before the grand jury, to be furnished to the accused.

[Cited in Parks v. State, 20 Neb. 515, 31 N. W. 5.]

2. He is not, however, entitled to the minutes of the proceedings before the grand jury, nor, in the absence of strong reasons to the contrary, should they be furnished him.

The defendant [Ld. Southmayd] was indicted for the alleged forgery of a postal money order, and for passing such order. There was no preliminary examination previous to the finding of the indictment. The defendant's counsel moves for an order requiring the district attorney to furnish him with a list of the witnesses sworn before the grand jury and with the minutes of their testimony, basing his application upon the fact that there was no preliminary examination, and claiming that he is entitled to know who the witnesses were who appeared before the grand jury and what their testimony was, in order to prepare for trial. The application, so far as it relates to the production of a list of the witnesses, is not resisted, but opposition was made to disclosure of their testimony.

Levi Hubbell, U. S. Dist. Atty.
J. G. Jenkins, for defendant.

DYER, District Judge. There are cases reported in the books in which the courts, in the exercise of a proper discretion, have ordered a list of the witnesses to be furnished to the accused where he has had no preliminary examination before a magistrate. The statutes of the United States provide that when any person is indicted of treason, or of any other capital offense, he shall be furnished with a copy of the indictment and a list of the witnesses to be produced at the trial. Rev. St. U. S. 1874, tit. 13, c. 18, § 1033. I find no similar provision in relation to other offenses. I have no doubt, however, that in all cases in which there has been no preliminary examination, it is within the discretion of the court to order a list of the witnesses sworn before the grand jury to be furnished to the accused. People v. Naughton, 7 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 421, is relied upon by counsel for defendant as an authority in support of his motion, not only as to furnishing a list of witnesses, but as bearing upon his right to the minutes of their testimony. In that case the defendants were indicted for alleged frauds in the conduct of certain elections. The motion papers set forth that the accused were indicted without preliminary examination; that they had no means of knowing the particular time, place or circumstances relied on by the people; that, at different times during the day on which the charges were laid, a large number of persons were present at the voting place, and, unless the accused could ascertain the precise time at which they were charged to have committed the offenses, it was impossible for them to determine what witnesses to summon, or in any manner to prepare for trial; and that important irregularities occurred in the proceedings of the grand jury, fatal to the validity of the indictment, which the minutes of testimony would disclose. Most of the discussion, in the opinion of the court in that case, is addressed to the question of the right of the accused to a list of the witnesses. The case discloses that it had been customary in many of the counties of the state of New York, before the passage of any statute on the subject, for the district attorney to indorse the names of witnesses on an indictment, and then send the same to the grand jury to be investigated. The names of the witnesses came, therefore, to be regarded as much an indorsement as the words, "True bill," and, consequently, the statute subsequently passed provided that the accused should be entitled "to a copy of the indictment and of all indorsements thereon." We have the same provision in the statutes of this state. Upon the practice as it had grown up in New York, and upon the statutes, there can be no doubt of the correctness of the decision of the court in People v. Naughton, supra, requiring a list of witnesses to be furnished.

The case of Com. v. Knapp, 9 Pick. 496, so far as it is applicable here, presented only the question of the right of the accused in a capital case to a list of the witnesses for the state. Although it was urged that this was not a matter of right, except under the statute of treason, Wilde, J., says, "a list of the witnesses has never been refused, in a case of this kind."

If the determination of the question, now presented, depended upon authority, I do not regard the case of People v. Naughton, supra, as settling the point. It is not asserted here that any irregularities occurred in the proceedings before the grand jury, involving the validity of the indictment. In that case, the application for the minutes of testimony was based principally upon such alleged irregularities, claimed to be fatal to the indictment, and which the minutes would disclose, and this branch of the motion was denied, for the reasons that the motion papers did not state wherein the proceedings of the grand jury were irregular, or wherein an inspection was essential to protect the rights of the defendant, or that he could not more properly derive the information sought from other sources. The strictness of the rule on the subject was rigidly enforced, and the court say (page 432), that "it is only within certain restrictions that any inspection of the minutes can be allowed."

In Earl of Strafford's Case, 3 Howell, State Tr. 1382, the court, on application, ordered the witnesses before the grand jury examined in open court. But that was a case where an attempt was made to procure an indictment for high treason against the earl.

It is the general rule that the proceedings before a grand jury are privileged from disclosure. The cases are exceptional in which the rule is not adhered to. In an action for maliciously indicting the plaintiff, Lord Kenyon allowed a grand juryman to be asked whether the defendant was the prosecutor of the indictment; and thought the disclosure did not infringe upon the juryman's oath. Rosc. Cr. Ev. 150. In that case the alleged cause of action itself sprung from the act of the party in procuring the indictment.

Following the general rule, it is held that the clerk of the grand jury cannot be compelled to disclose the proceedings before them, nor can the county attorney. McLellan v. Richardson, 13 Me. 82. In Massachusetts it has been held, that the attorney for the commonwealth cannot be called to disclose what passed in the grand jury room. Com. v. Tilden, 2 Starkie, Ev. 324, note.

In the absence of strong reasons to the contrary, the rule ought not to be departed from. I think it should be adhered to in this case, to the extent of denying the application for the minutes of testimony. A list of the witnesses sworn before the grand jury should be furnished to the defendant.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — RATE OF DUTY — COLLECTOR'S DECISION—APPEAL TO SECRETARY.

1. Section 2931, Rev. St., makes the decision of the collector of the port respecting "the rate and amount of duties" on merchandise final and conclusive unless the owner shall within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation appeal therefrom to the secretary of the treasury.

2. The entire question of rate and amount, and as to whether or not it was legally assessed and found, must be submitted to and passed on by the secretary of the treasury in the first instance.

3. This appeal cannot be neglected and the courts applied to for relief. In its absence the decision of the collector is final.

[This was an action against William H. Sowers and others, executors of the will of William Chamberlain, deceased, to recover duties claimed to be due the United States.]

John K. Valentine, Dist. Atty.

W. Wynne Wister, Jr., for defendants.

BUTLER, District Judge. On the 5th of January, 1870, William H. Sowers (principal in the bond sued upon) entered at the port of Philadelphia certain merchandise, imported from Liverpool. On the same day the collector of the port estimated the duties chargeable thereon at $901.74, and designated packages to be opened. The estimated duties were paid, and the merchandise (other than that set aside for examination) withdrawn. An appraisement was subsequently made, exceeding the invoiced value, and the duties liquidated at $1402.93. On the 25th of October, 1873, fourteen days subsequent to the liquidation, notice was given Mr. Sowers of the amount remaining due, and payment demanded. No response being made, suit was brought against the defendant (surety in the bond).

On the trial defendant's counsel requested the court to charge: 1st. That no notice having been given Mr. Sowers of the advance made by the appraisers, as is required by the treasury regulations on the subject, the plaintiff cannot recover. 2d. That no demand having been made on the principal, or notice given, such as is required by the condition of the bond, the plaintiff cannot recover. These points were reserved by the court; and a verdict was rendered by the jury in favor of the plaintiff for $591.19.

A rule being taken to show cause why judgment should not be entered for the defendant, notwithstanding the verdict, the points must now be answered. In the judgment of the court, neither of them is well founded. As respects the first: The statute does not provide for notice, either of the appraisement, or the liquidation. Congress contemplated that the importer should take notice of these steps in levying the duty. Westray v. U. S., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 322. The secretary of the treasury, however (recognizing the justice of notifying the importer of the appraisement), in pursuance of the 251st section of the Revised Statutes, has provided (by rule 324 of the department) that the collector shall give notice to the importer of any addition made by the appraisers to the estimated value of his goods. Whether this rule has the force of law, and, therefore, entitles the importer to such notice as a legal right, need not be decided here. If it has, the further question is involved, whether the government is affected by a failure to give the notice. That it is not affected by the laches of its agents, generally, is well settled, as appears by the following cases: Postmaster General v. Reeder [Case No. 11,311]; U. S. v. Vanzandt, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 184; Dox v. Postmaster General, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 318. But whether such a failure as is here contemplated, falls within the rule, may be doubted. As before suggested, however, these questions need not be considered; for the 2931st section of the Revised Statutes makes the decision of the collector, respecting "the rate and amount of duties on * * merchandise * * final and conclusive * * unless the owner shall, within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation * * appeal therefrom to the secretary of the treasury." This language is unambiguous, and conclusive as respects the case before the court. If any omissions or irregularities occur in the proceeding to levy the duty, the owner must make his appeal to the secretary for redress; or thereafter be silent respecting them. The suggestion of the defendant's counsel that such appeal will not reach the appraisement, finds no support, either in the terms or the spirit of the statute. It is the "amount of duty * * to be paid on the merchandise" that the statute submits to the collector's decision; and it is this the appeal involves. If the appraisement is not made in pursuance of law, it is, in effect, no appraisement; if the duty is not "ascertained and liquidated," in pursuance of law, the merchandise is not subject to its payment. These questions, (and the latter involves the entire proceeding—every material step in it,) necessarily, arise on the appeal. By his bond the defendant bound himself for the payment of "whatever excess of duties or charges may be assessed or ascertained and found to be due upon the final liquidation." The amount claimed was so assessed and found to be due. The defendant, however, asserts that it was not legally assessed and found. As before stated, the statute has referred this question to the secretary of the treasury, by whom it must be passed upon before it can reach the court. The entire subject is submitted to him, in the first instance. This appeal cannot be neglected, and the courts applied to for relief. In its absence, as we have seen, the decision of the collector is final. Rankin v. Hog, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 335; Tappan v. U. S. [Case No. 13,749]; Bartell v. Kane, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 273,—and other cases cited by the defendant's counsel, are not applicable to the facts here involved. The second point was not understood to be pressed on the argument. The notice proved was all that the condition of the bond required. The rule for judgment in favor of the defendant, as also that for new trial, must be dismissed.

Case No. 16,364.

UNITED STATES v. SPALDING et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 616.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

CONSPIRACY—SELLING FREE NEGRO.

The court will not quash an indictment for a conspiracy to cheat by selling a free negro as a slave.

Indictment for a conspiracy to cheat one Washington Roby by selling him a free negro as a slave for life. The first count charged that the defendants [Richard Spalding and Ellen Dwyer] conspired to cheat him by selling to him a certain negro boy as a slave for life, (and as the property of the said Ellen,) whom they then and there offered to sell to the said Roby, and who was then and there a free boy; and who was not their property; they, the said Richard and Ellen, then and there well knowing that the said boy was free, and was not their property; and that in pursuance of and according to their said confederacy, they fraudulently attempted and offered to sell, to the said Roby, the said boy, as a slave for life, and as the property of the said Ellen, well knowing that the said boy was not a slave, and was not their property, to the great damage of the said Roby, and against the form of the statute, &c. The second count charged that the defendants conspired "to sell a free boy" under the false and fraudulent pretence that he was the slave of the said Ellen, and thereby falsely and dishonestly to obtain money by cheating and defrauding the person or persons to whom they might so sell the said boy; and in pursuance of the said conspiracy "did attempt and offer to sell the said boy as a slave and as the property of the said Ellen to divers persons, namely, to W. R., G. G., and J. D.; the said defendants well knowing that the said boy was not a slave and was not the property of the said Ellen, to the great damage, &c. and against the form of the statute, &c.

W. L. Brent, for defendants, moved the court to quash the indictment because the conspiracy charged was not to do an act indictable at common law; cheating by a simple false assertion not being indictable. He cited 2 Russ. Crimes, 293, 297, 697; 4 Starkie, 403; and Chitty, 904.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, doubting,) refused to quash the indictment.

The cause was afterwards tried, and the defendants were acquitted.

UNITED STATES v. SPALDING.

[2 Mason, 478.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1822.

ACTION ON BOND — PLEADING — PROFERT — JURISDICTION AT LAW.

1. If an obligee tear off the seal, or cancel a bond in consequence of fraud and imposition practiced by the obligor, he may declare on such mutilated bond as the deed of the party, and set forth the special facts in the profert.

[Cited in Cutts v. U. S., Case No. 3,522; U. S. v. Williams, Id. 16,724; Smith v. U. S., 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 232; Girard Ins. Co. v. Guerard, Case No. 5,461.]

[Cited in brief in Draper v. Wood, 112 Mass. 318; Bird v. Bird, 40 Me. 401; Brown v. Cousins, 51 Me. 302. Cited in Medlin v. Platte Co., 8 Mo. 239. Cited (Per Long, C. J.) in Ruby v. Talbott (N. M.) 21 Pac. 77.]

2. A court of law has concurrent jurisdiction with a court of equity, to sustain a suit to enforce such a bond.

3. Where a profert is made of a bond, and the declaration goes on to state the condition, and to assign a breach, it is not necessary to make a separate profert of the condition, for the whole bond is already before the court.

4. The condition of a bond among other things, was, that the party should produce the certificates and other proofs required by law, of the landing of the merchandise at some foreign port, &c., within two years, &c.; held, that a breach, negativing in the terms of the condition the production of such certificates and other proofs, was good.

Debt on five obligations, executed by Joseph Hubbard as principal, and the defendant [Edward Spalding] as surety, for certain sums of money, set forth in the declaration. The first count alleged that the defendant "on the 7th of August, 1819, at Bristol, by his certain writing obligatory, sealed with his seal, and which said writing obligatory the plaintiffs produce to the court here, in a mutilated state, and cannot otherwise produce the same, by reason that a part of the condition there underwritten, and the signature and seal of the said Spalding, have been torn from the same and destroyed by the collector of the port of said Bristol, occasioned by the production to him of a false and fraudulent certificate, then supposed by him to be true, purporting that the merchandise specified in the said condition had been delivered at a port or place without the limits of the United States at the island of St. Thomas, acknowledging himself to be held and firmly bound to the United States, in the sum of $207.18, to be paid to the said United States on demand; which said writing obligatory is subject to a certain condition, there underwritten, whereby, after reciting to the effect following, to wit, that whereas the following merchandise had been duly imported into the United States, by S. Cabot and J. & T. H. Perkins, in the ship Essex Junior, Hinman, master, from Calcutta, into the district of New York, the 3d of July, 1819, two bales of India cotton, which said merchandise had been reshipped by Joseph Hubbard, in order to export the same in the schooner Cintra, of Porto Praya, Juan Dupony, master, then in the port of Bristol, and bound for Cape de Verds, the condition of the said obligation, therefore, was such, that if the aforesaid recited merchandise, or any part thereof, should not be relanded in any port or place within the limits of the United States; and if the certificates and other proofs required by law of the delivery of the same at the aforesaid Cape de Verds, or at any other port or place without the limits of the United States, should be produced at the office of the collector of the said port of Bristol within two years from the date thereof, then the said obligation shall be null and void, but otherwise to remain in full force and virtue. And the said United States in fact say, that the certificates and other proofs required by law of the delivery of said merchandise at the aforesaid Cape de Verds, or at any other port or place without the limits of the United States, as aforesaid, have not been produced at the office of the collector of the said port of Bristol, within two years from the date of the said writing obligatory, to wit, at said Bristol; whereby an action hath accrued," &c. &c. in common form. There were four other counts on other bonds, to the same purport, and with the same averments; and a sixth count for $1500, money had and received to the use of the United States.

To this declaration, after oyer of the bonds, there was a demurrer assigning as special causes. 1. That the pretended writings obligatory given on oyer had no seals affixed. 2. That the plaintiffs had set forth a pretended condition to each of the writings obligatory, without making any profert of such conditions. 3. That the plaintiffs have not set forth by whom such certificate was signed, nor in what particular the same was false and fraudulent. 4. That the declaration contains allegations improper and impertinent, and too defective and imperfect to enable the defendant to traverse or take issue thereon. 5. That the declaration is defective and insufficient, and wants form and substance. The plaintiffs joined in demurrer.

Mr. Pitman, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Mr. Searle, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. It has been intimated at the bar, that the demurrer by mistake extends to the sixth count, and therefore I pass over all observations as to that count, for it is clear that so far the demurrer cannot be sustained. And before proceeding to the principal point in controversy, it may be well to dispose of some other objections spread upon the record, as causes of special demurrer. One of these is, that there is no profert of the condition of the writing obligatory, although it is set forth in the declaration. To this it is a sufficient answer, that when a profert is made of any such instrument, the whole is before the court, and it is unnecessary to make a separate profert of the condition. If the defendant wishes oyer of the whole instrument, he may pray it; but oyer of the obligatory part is not oyer of the condition; each must be prayed for, if each is wanted. Another objection is to the want of particularity in the statement of the certificate, and in what respects it is false and fraudulent. It appears to me, that it would have been more correct to have stated, generally, that the mutilation of the instrument was occasioned by fraud and imposition practised upon the collector of Bristol, leaving the special facts to be made out in evidence. And it may be, that the averment is not sufficiently pointed and exact in its present terms, at least in not stating the party, by whom the false certificate was produced. But this is the less necessary to be considered, because, if upon the merits of the more general question, the United States are entitled to relief, the court would not find any difficulty in granting leave to amend. The question therefore, to which the opinion of the court will address itself, is, whether any suit can be maintained at law upon an instrument mutilated like the present, where that mutilation has been produced by fraud and imposition, practised upon a public officer in the discharge of a public duty by a party bound by the instrument.

The bonds given in the present case are the customary bonds required by law (Act March 2, 1799, c. 128, § 75 [1 Story's Laws, 636; 1 Stat. 680, c. 22], et seq., and particularly section 81) to be given upon the exportation of merchandise, entitled to drawback, in order to enable the party to obtain the common debenture. Certain proofs are required to be produced to the collector of the port of the fact of relanding the merchandise in a foreign country, upon the production of which the bonds may be cancelled. The law, of course, supposes the certificates and proofs to be genuine, and not fraudulent, and upon this presumption, and this only, authorises a cancellation of the bonds. If the cancellation be by mistake or fraud, the collector is acting beyond the authority confided to him by law, and his act cannot bind the government. But I should be sorry, that it should be supposed, that there is any principle applicable to this case, which would not equally apply to suits between private citizens. Nothing is more clear than that deeds procured by fraud are void, and may be set aside on non est factum pleaded, upon due proof of the fraud (Thompson v. Rock, 4 Maule & S. 338; Skip v. Huey, 3 Atk. 91, 93; Com. Dig. "Fait," B, 2; Shep. Touch. 60); and grants of the government are not, in this respect, distinguishable from those of individuals (Com. Dig. "Grant," G, 8, 9). It would seem to follow as a natural conclusion from this doctrine, that deeds cancelled by fraud and imposition are to be considered as still existing and in full force. If a deed be avoided by fraud in its concoction, it would seem almost absurd to say, that after its legal execution it should be destroyed by fraud practised upon the obligee.

The old cases proceeded upon a very narrow ground. It seems to have been held, that a material alteration of a deed by a stranger, without the privity of either obligor or obligee, avoided the deed; and by parity of reasoning the destruction or tearing off the seal either by a stranger or by accident. Pigot's Case, 11 Coke, 27; 1 Rolle, 39; 1 Rolle, Abr. "Fait," X, 1–3; Perk. §§ 135, 136; and cases cited in Cutts v. U. S. [Case No. 3,522]; Com. Dig. "Fait," F, 2; Mathewson's Case, 5 Coke, 23; Dyer, 59, and note 12; Shep. Touch. 67. A doctrine so repugnant to common sense and justice, which inflicts on an innocent party all the losses occasioned by mistake, by accident, by the wrongful acts of third persons, or by the providence of Heaven, ought to have the unequivocal support of unbroken authority, before a court of law is bound to surrender its judgment to what deserves no better name than a technical quibble. It appears to me to be shaken to its very foundation in modern times; and every case, which upholds a remedy at law, where the deed is lost by time and accident is decisive against it. The case of Read v. Brookman, 3 Term R. 151 (and see Bolton v. Bishop of Carlisle, 2 H. Bl. 259), is directly in point, and is reasoned out by Lord Kenyon with vast force and ability, upon principles of eternal justice. Mr. Justice Buller, in Master v. Miller, 4 Term R. 320, 339 (and see Waugh v. Bussell, 5 Taunt. 707; Totty v. Nesbitt; and Matison v. Atkinson, cited in 3 Term R. 153, note c; Henfree v. Bromley, 6 East, 309), said, and he is a great authority, "It is not universally true, that a deed is destroyed by an alteration, or by the tearing off the seal. In Palmer, 403, a deed which had erasures in it, and from which the seal was torn, was held good, it appearing, that the seal was torn off by a little boy. So in any case, where the seal is torn off by accident, after plea pleaded, as appears by the cases quoted by the plaintiff's counsel. And in these days I think, even if the seal were torn off before the action brought, there would be no difficulty in framing a declaration, which would obviate every doubt upon that point by stating the truth of the case. The difficulty, which arose in the old cases, depended very much on the technical forms of pleading, applicable to deeds alone. The plaintiff made a profert of the deed under seal, which he still must do, unless he can allege a sufficient ground for excusing it. When that is done, the deed or the profert must agree with that stated in the declaration, or the plaintiff fails. But the profert of a deed without a seal will not support an allegation of a deed with a seal." There is so much sound sense and legal propriety in this doctrine, that one is persuasively urged to adopt it, and it stands supported by the authority of other cases. But however this may be, it is clear that a divulsion of the seal by the obligor himself, or by his connivance, without the assent of the obligee, does not avoid the deed. Totty v. Nesbitt, 3 Term R. 153, note c; Shep. Touch. 67. And it has been so decided by this court. Cutts v. U. S. [supra]. And I have no hesitation in declaring, that if the seal is torn off with the assent of the obligee, either by mistake, or by fraud and imposition practised by the obligor, it may still be declared on as a deed, making the proper averment of the facts upon the profert, and the party will be entitled to a recovery. The case of Matison v. Atkinson, cited in a note in 3 Term R. 153, fully supports this doctrine; and if it were of the first impression, I should not hesitate to adopt it. Dealing with this case, therefore, as I am bound to do according to the admitted facts, I must take it to be a case, where the obligors to the bonds have procured the destruction of the seals by the obligee, not merely by a mistake of the facts, but by gross fraud and imposition. See, also, Perrott v. Perrott, 14 East, 423. We may readily see, how this doctrine stands in equity, from what fell from Lord Hardwicke in Skip v. Huey, 3 Atk. 91, 93, whose language meets the present case in its material features. "There are many cases," says his lordship, "where equity will set up debts extinguished at law against a surety, as well as against a principal; as where a bond is burnt or cancelled by accident or mistake, and much stronger, if a principal procure the bond to be delivered up by fraud, in such a case the court would certainly set it up, because he shall not avail himself of the fraud of any of the debtors." Now it appears to me clear, that the doctrine is the same at law as in equity in this respect, whenever, from the nature of its proceedings, a court of law can administer relief.

And this leads me, to what has been the principal objection urged at the bar, viz. that the proper remedy in this case is in equity, and not at law. That effectual relief might be administered, in a case like the present, in equity cannot be doubted (1 Ves. 387, 392, 393. See Atkins v. Farr, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 247, 1 Atk. 287, pl. 155; Anon., 2 Atk. 61; Ex parte Greenway, 6 Ves. 812); and it is as certain, that until a comparatively recent period it was supposed that the remedy was exclusively in equity. Such was certainly the supposition of Lord Hardwicke, as appears in Whitfield v. Fausset, 1 Madd. Ch. Prac. 22, 23 [1 Ves. Sr. 387]; East India Co. v. Donald, 9 Ves. 275; and something of the same lurking doubt of the jurisdiction at law yet lingers in the court of chancery. Ex parte Greenway, 6 Ves. 812; East India Co. v. Boddam, 9 Ves. 464. But whatever difficulties there may have been in the original question, it is now so firmly established, that a remedy exists at law on a bond lost by time and accident, and by parity of reasoning, on a bond destroyed or cancelled by fraud, that it is too late to disturb it. It must be admitted, that the jurisdiction in equity is in general more salutary and less liable to abuse; but the reasoning, that endeavours to establish a concurrent jurisdiction at law, is extremely cogent, and impressive. Read v. Brookman, 3 Term R. 151. I content myself therefore with holding the law on this subject, as I find it, not meaning to doubt, that it would have been equally competent for this court to have sustained a suit for relief on the equity side of its jurisdiction.

A suggestion has been thown out at the bar of the insufficiency of the breach assigned in the declaration. But it appears to me, that this objection is unfounded, for the breach is a direct negative in the very words of the condition. It is certainly good, according to the current of authorities. Leave is given to the plaintiff to amend, and to the defendant to withdraw his demurrer, as it is now too broad.

GAMING.

The game called "Equality," is a "device" prohibited by Act Md. 1797, c. 110. The words "or other device," are not so loose and vague as to be rejected.

Indictment [against Robert Speeden] for keeping a gambling-device called "Equality," under the Maryland law of 1797, c. 110.

Mr. Law, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the defendant was not liable for the penalty under the act. The words "or other device," being too loose and vague, are to be rejected.

But THE COURT refused; it not being a capital case, and the intention of the law being very clear and plain.

OFFICIAL BONDS—RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEY—LIABILITY OF SURETIES.

[The sureties on the bond of a receiver of public moneys are only liable for money which came into his hands during his term of office, and a declaration for money received on the day after the expiration of his term is bad on demurrer.]

At law.

Mr. Pettit, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Messrs. Cooper, Butler, and O. H. Smith, for defendants.

HOLMAN, District Judge. Declaration, on a receivers' bond, against the principal and his sureties. Breach assigned: That Spencer was appointed receiver of public moneys, for the term of four years, commencing on the 1st of January, 1835, and ending the 31st of December, 1839; and that divers large sums of money, arising from the sale of lands, came into, and were in, his possession, during his continuance in office—to wit: on the first day of January, 1840—which he failed and refused to pay, &c. General demurrer, by the sureties. The breach is insufficient, as respects the sureties. They are bound for the payment of all sums of money that come into the receiver's hands during his term of office, and no longer; and, as his office expired on the 31st of December, 1839, they are not bound for moneys that came into his hands on the 1st day of January, 1840, the day after his term of office expired. If the day alledged is material, and I am inclined to think it is, it can not be rejected as surplusage, and, therefore, the declaration is insufficient.

Plaintiff had leave to amend, and the cause was continued. [See Case No. 16,368.]

[2 McLean, 405.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1841.

ACTIONS ON BONDS — PLEADING AND PRACTICE — RECEIVER'S BOND—LIABILITY OF SURETIES.

1. Nil debet, when pleaded to a declaration on a penal bond, where breaches are assigned, will not be set aside, on motion, but must be demurred to.

2. Where a plea sets up no new matter of defence it may be set aside on motion.

3. The sureties, in a receiver's bond, can only be made liable for moneys received by the receiver subsequently to the date of the bond. And if the bond bears date some months after the official term of the receiver commenced, the declaration is defective, if it do not show the receipt of the money after the date of the bond, and before the expiration of the official term of the receiver.

4. A demurrer, filed by the plaintiff, to a plea of defendant, will test the goodness of the declaration.

Mr. Petitt, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Fletcher & Butler, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought on a bond, in the penalty of $200,000, given by Spencer as receiver of public moneys, and his sureties. The declaration states that Spencer was appointed receiver of public moneys the 1st January, 1835, for the term of four years, ending the 31st December, 1839; and that divers large sums of money, arising from the sale of lands, came into and were in his possession during his term in office, &c., which he failed to pay over, &c. In the first count the defalcation is alleged to be the sum of thirty three thousand three hundred thirty nine dollars and sixty eight cents; and in the second, forty thousand dollars. The bond bears date some three or four months subsequently to the date of the appointment, and the condition is that the said Spencer shall faithfully execute and discharge the duties of his office, then the obligation to be void, &c. The time of appointment is stated in the bond.

The defendant filed the following pleas: (1) The plea of nil debet. (2) That Spencer has well and truly discharged the duties of receiver. (3) That he has paid over the sum of $33,339.65, the defalcation alleged in the first count of the declaration. (4) That defendants have paid over to the government $40,000, the defalcation alleged in the second count. (5) That defendants have paid over to the government the debt in the declaration mentioned, to wit, $200,000.

The district attorney moved the court to set aside the first, second and fifth pleas. The plea of nil debet has been abolished in England (Reg. Gen. Hil. Term, 4 Wm. IV.), but it remains in this country subject to the same rules by which it was formerly regulated in England. And Mr. Chitty says, in his Pleading (volume 1 [Ed. 1837] 552), "that where the plea, though informal, goes to the substance of the action, on nil debet to debt on bond, the plaintiff should demur and not sign judgment; and, in general, where the defendants file an improper plea, the safer course is to demur or move the court to set it aside." And again, in page 518, "when the deed is the foundation of the action, although extrinsic facts are mixed with it, the defendant, if he deny his execution of the deed set forth in the declaration, should plead non est factum, and nil debet is not a sufficient plea. 1 Saund. 38, note 3; Id. 187a, note 2. But in debt for a penalty on articles of agreement, or on a bail bond, or on a bond setting out the condition and breach, if nil debet be pleaded the plaintiff ought to demur." The motion to set aside this plea is, therefore, overruled. If the plaintiff wish to raise the question whether it is a proper plea in this case he must raise it by demurrer.

The court, also, overrule the motion as to the second plea but they sustain is as to the fifth. The fifth plea sets up that the defendants have paid the debt in the declaration named, to wit, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars. Now the third and fourth pleas allege the payment of the defalcations averred in the first and second counts, and either of these pleas, especially the latter, if sustained, is a full discharge from the bond. Why then can it be necessary, or even proper, to add the fifth plea, as to the payment of the penalty? The breaches are specially assigned in the declaration, and the plaintiffs, in the recovery of damages, are limited to the breaches assigned. They cannot go beyond them. If the action were brought for the penalty, the fifth plea would undoubtedly be proper, as it contains a full answer to such a demand. But the plaintiffs go for the amount of the defalcations and nothing more; and as the third and fourth pleas contain full answers to these, and no other or different effect can be given to the defence set up in the fifth plea, we think it may be set aside. It sets up no new matter of defence, and it unnecessarily, therefore, encumbers the record.

The plaintiffs having filed a demurrer to the first plea, the defendants' counsel ask the attention of the court to the form and substance of the declaration. The breaches are the nonpayment, by Spencer, of certain sums of money received by him during his official term, and it appears the bond was not executed until some months after the commencement of his official term. And it is insisted that the sureties are not responsible for any moneys received by Spencer before the date of the bond. That the sureties are only liable for moneys received by the receiver subsequently to the date of the bond, and before the expiration of his term, is clear; and it is equally clear that this liability must be shown, by proper averments, in the declaration. In this respect, the declaration is fatally defective. It does not show that the sureties are bound to pay any part of the defalcations charged. U. S. v. Boyd, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 206.

On motion leave is given to amend the declaration. The demurrer is sustained to the plea of nil debet.

UNITED STATES v. SPERRY et al.

[10 Int. Rev. Rec. 205.]

District Court, E. D. Missouri. 1869.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—REMOVING WHISKEY WITHOUT PAYMENT OF TAX — JURISDICTION OF COURT.

[Upon an indictment for removing whiskey from a distillery in Pekin, Illinois, and sending it to St. Louis, under a false inspector's brand, and without paying the tax, defendant contended that the whiskey was taken from Illinois to St. Louis by government officials after seizing it, and that the district court for the Eastern district of Missouri therefore had no jurisdiction of the offence. Held, that if the whiskey was not taken from the possession of the railroad company by which it was shipped, before it arrived in St. Louis, the court had jurisdiction.]

H. T. Sperry was a distiller, and B. S. Prettyman a dealer in whiskey, and an attorney at Pekin, Ill. The government charged that the two defendants conspired together; that Prettyman furnished the money to run the distillery; that they manufactured 3 times as much as they reported and sent barrels with duplicate serial numbers, to Chicago and St. Louis. On the 19th of October, 1867, a lot of 150 barrels were seized at the depot of the Chicago R. R. Company, St. Louis, and a suit for their forfeiture was commenced on the ground that they had false inspector's brands upon them, and that they had been removed without the tax having been paid. The jury before which the suit was tried found that 102 of the barrels were fraudulent. Afterwards this criminal action was commenced against Sperry and Prettyman.

One of the principal points in the present case was in relation to the jurisdiction of the court, the defence contending that they did not bring the whiskey into this state, and that it was brought from Illinois to Missouri by the government, and that therefore this court had no jurisdiction.

On the opening of the court General Noble, U. S. Dist. Atty., proceeded to address the jury on behalf of the government. In the course of his address he said it was a remarkable fact that the defendants commenced business at the same time, and when no one could go into the business, pay taxes and make money, because the markets were flooded with whiskey, which was being sold below the tax. He reviewed at length the evidence which had been adduced and stated that the defendants manufactured two hundred barrels of whiskey, upon which the tax was paid. He charged that Prettyman entered in his book another lot with duplicate numbers as if bought of "John Jones," and that this whiskey was sent to Chicago. Another lot, fraudulent, was sent to St. Louis and found at McCartney's, Derby & Day's, and Hoffheimer's, and another lot was the one of 150 barrels seized by the government on the 19th of October, 1867. Prettyman's book showed that he purchased of Sperry 8,565 57-100 gallons of whiskey while there was another entry of a purchase from "John Jones" of exactly the same quantity. This was the total of the last three lots bought of the former. Duplicates of 50 of the 150 barrels seized at St. Louis were found at Chicago on the 18th of September, 1867, and he ridiculed what the defence had undertaken to show—that they had brought these from Chicago to St. Louis, because at that time they were shipping 1,500 barrels to that market.

He said that Prettyman sent to Chicago in three months whiskey which, if the tax had been paid, would have amounted to $140,000. The defence contended that because they did not come across the river with the whiskey they were not guilty in this district, but Hunicke & West, their commission merchants, paid the cost of its being brought over. The prosecution had been conducted in the fairest manner, and the government had been stabbed in the back at every step. Barrel heads used in the last trial had been stolen from his office, the brands on the barrels in court altered. Prettyman's book which had been used for three days in the trial, had disappeared, and the court deciding that it was in the custody of the court, Prettyman pulled it out of his pocket and it was thrown on the table. Was there nothing clandestine in that? After presenting the facts brought out by the prosecution in an able and lucid manner, the district attorney closed by making an earnest appeal for the vindication of law.

Col. Broadhead, for defendants, asked the court to give the following instructions to the jury: (1) That to complete the offence charged in any one count of the indictment, it must appear from the evidence, to the satisfaction of the jury, that the spirits manufactured by Sperry, or some portion of it, was brought into the state of Missouri by one or the other of the defendants, or by some one under their direction or authority. (2) No facts communicated to the jury in reference to the case on trial, otherwise than by the sworn testimony of witnesses, or by exhibits or papers produced before the jury under the direction and in the presence of the court, can be permitted to influence the minds of the jury in making up their verdict. (3) To constitute a conspiracy it must appear that there was some agreement or understanding between the parties to commit the offence charged in the indictment. But this agreement or understanding must be proved either by direct evidence, or circumstances tending to show that such agreement or understanding existed. The offence, however, under the first count of the indictment, is not complete without the proof of the overt act, and that either the conspiracy was formed, or the first overt act charged must appear to have been committed, in Missouri.

TREAT, District Judge, gave his instructions to the jury. With reference to the question of jurisdiction, he said that if the whiskey was not taken from the possession of the railroad company before it was brought into this city, the court had jurisdiction of the offence. He stated the matters the jury had to inquire into, and instructed them on the several counts of the indictment, making no comments on the testimony.

The jury retired, and, after deliberating about three hours, brought in a verdict of guilty against Prettyman on the second count, removing whiskey into this district without the tax on the same having been paid, and not guilty on the first and third counts of the indictment. They found Sperry not guilty on all the counts, and he was acquitted.

SHIPPING—CONCEALMENT OF GOODS—ACT OF MARCH 2, 1799.

Goods were brought on board a foreign vessel and concealed by the steward. Held, that the master was not liable under the act of March 2, 1799, for not entering them on the manifest.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania.]

In admiralty.

Aubrey H. Smith, for United States.

Henry R. Edmunds and Henry Flanders, for respondents.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. By the twenty-third section of the act of congress of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 644), all masters of vessels, owned in whole or in part in the United States, carrying goods from a foreign port into the United States, are required to have a manifest or manifests of their cargo; and, by the twenty-fourth section of the same act, a forfeiture equal to the value of the goods not included in the manifests, is imposed, "and all such merchandise, not included in the manifest, belonging or consigned to the master, mate, officers or crew of such ship or vessel, shall be forfeited." These provisions are applied also to foreign vessels by the twenty-fifth section of the act of July 18, 1866 [14 Stat. 184], and, by the eighth section, the vessel may be holden for the penalty thus imposed.

The object of these laws is to protect the public revenue. Hence it is required of the chief officer of the vessel, that he shall keep a manifest of his whole cargo in the form prescribed, to facilitate and assure the collection of the duties imposed upon it; and the observance of this requirement is enforced by a penalty. It is the act or neglect of the master for which the penalty is imposed; for while the goods not on the manifest, belonging or consigned to any of the officers or crew, are forfeited, the master alone is condemned to the payment of a sum in money equal to the value of such goods. The personal forfeiture is the prescribed punishment of his personal delinquency. The unexplained finding of goods on board, not embraced in the manifest, is sufficient primary evidence of his liability to the penalty, but, by the express enactment of the proviso to the twenty-fourth section above referred to, this may be averted by proof, that no part of the cargo had been unshipped, except as reported by the master, and that the manifest had been lost or mislaid, without fraud or collusion, or that they were defaced by accident or incorrect by mistake.

The motive of the omission is thus made the ultimate test of culpability. It is, therefore, a superficial, as well as harsh, interpretation, which applies to the proofs of the master's faultlessness a standard of literal conformity to the mode of exculpation, which the act indicates, but does not prescribe exclusively, as effectual. If the apparent offence is expurgated, the spirit and object of the law are effectually subserved. An omission then to perform the duty imposed upon the master, which proof of an honest mistake or an unavoidable accident will excuse, will be condemned also by proof, which, in like manner, relieves him from all suspicion of corrupt or conscious wrong.

The respondent here is the master of the ship Stadacona, of Londonderry, Ireland. The night before she sailed from her home port, while the officers of the vessel were on shore, the steward carried on board nineteen bundles of silk, and concealed them in a space between the bread locker and the stairs leading from the cabin to the upper deck. This space was boarded up and covered with tin. In reference to it, the master, in his deposition, says: "This place had never been opened to my knowledge. I never imagined it could be opened, and never paid any attention to it." When the vessel was searched by the custom house officers at Philadelphia, this place was discovered and broken open, and the silks were found secreted therein.

There is no contention as to this state of facts, or as to the fair inference from them, that the shipment and concealment of the goods were the act of the steward alone, without the participation or knowledge of the master. It is not to be gainsayed, under such circumstances, that the master could not make an entry of the concealed goods on the manifest, and that his inability to make it did not result from any fault of his. No personal delinquency is imputable to him. While the smuggled goods then were properly condemned and forfeited, they are not to be treated as any part of the cargo, within the meaning of the act of congress, for the non-entry of which upon the manifest a penalty is imposed upon the master. He cannot be subjected to a personal forfeiture, when he has not done, or omitted to do, anything inconsistent with an honest purpose to discharge his duty. The district court rightly so adjudged, and its decree is affirmed.

Case No. 16,372.

UNITED STATES v. STAFFORD et al.

[2 Paine, 525.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York.[2]

ACTION ON BOND—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

Where, in an action of debt on a bond, the defendant was described in the bond and declaration, as "principal paymaster of the militia of the state of New York, which have been, or may be ordered into the service of the state of New York," and the evidence was an account against him as paymaster-general of the New York militia; it was held, that the court could not, as matter of law, decide that these different descriptions applied to the same officer, and that, therefore, the variance was fatal.

Error to the district court of the United States for the Northern district of New York.

This was an action on a bond. The bond was dated 1st September, 1813. The declaration was in debt, with the condition of the bond set out, which recited that by general orders of the commander-in-chief of the state of New York, certain militia of the state of New York had been organized and ordered into the service of the United States; and that Samuel Edmonds had been duly assigned and appointed principal paymaster of all the militia of said state which had been or might be ordered into the service of the United States, and with a condition that if the said Edmonds shall keep and render just and true accounts and vouchers of all his receipts and expenditures in said office, and account for, and deliver and pay over to some proper officer or department of the United States, all moneys and public property of the United States which may be in his custody, possession or control; and shall, in all things, honestly, faithfully and truly demean himself in the said office of principal paymaster, then the obligation to be void. The breaches were, substantially, that after the date of the said bond, the said Edmonds, as principal paymaster as aforesaid, received of the United States divers large sums of money, viz., $50,000, which he, as such paymaster, was bound to pay over to the militia of the state of New York which had been ordered into the service of the United States, which he neglected and refused to do. The seventh and last breach set out a final settlement of the accounts of Edmonds as such paymaster, and a balance of $20,000 found due from him as such paymaster, which he was required to account for, and also to account for the whole $50,000 advanced to him; and that he neglected and refused so to do.

To this declaration the defendant pleaded: (1) That the bond was not the deed of him, Stafford, and issue. (2) That it was not the deed of Edmonds & Worth, and issue. (3) That the state of New York was a member of the United States, and that by the constitution of the state of New York, a council of appointment was constituted, and all military officers required to be appointed by such council; and that Edmonds was not so appointed—nor was he commissioned by the governor—nor did he hold any such office; and concluded with a verification. (4) That at the time of executing said bond, there was not according to the constitution and laws of the United States, or of the state of New York, any such office as in the condition of the bond was expressed or meant and intended, and prayed judgment if plaintiff ought to have and maintain their action. (5) That at the time of executing such bond, there was not any person authorized or empowered, under the constitution of the United States, to accept the delivery of said bond. And so the said Stafford says that the said bond is not his deed; and puts himself on the country. (6) That at the time of executing said bond, there was not any authority of law, either of the United States or of the state of New York, under and according to which the said bond could be taken; and concluding with a verification. (7) That at the time the bond was executed, there was not any authority of law, either of the United States or of the state of New York, under or according to which the said bond was or could be taken. And so the said Stafford says the bond is not his deed; and puts himself on the country. To the third plea the plaintiffs reply, that the said Edmonds did, at the date of the bond, hold such office as in the said bond and condition is meant and intended; and issue to the country. As to the fourth plea, the United States say, that at the time of executing said bond there was such an office as in and by the condition of said bond is expressed or meant and intended; and issue to the country. As to the fifth plea, the United States say, that at the time of executing said bond there was authority of law under and according to which the aforesaid bond was taken; and issue to the country. As to the sixth plea, the United States say, that at the time of executing said bond there was a person authorized and empowered by, and under the laws and constitution of the United States, to accept the delivery of the aforesaid bond on account of the United States; and issue to the country. As to the seventh plea, the United States say, that at the time of the sealing and delivery of said bond there was authority of law under and according to which the aforesaid bond was taken and made; and issue to the country. Thereupon, the third plea tendered three distinct matters of fact: (1) That Edmonds was not appointed by the council of appointment of the state of New York. (2) That he was not commissioned by the governor of the state as principal paymaster. (3) That he did not hold any such office as by the said bond or the condition was meant and intended. The replication only took issue on the third fact alleged in the plea, viz.: that at the time of executing said bond the said Edmonds did hold such office as in the said bond and condition was meant and intended. Under the fourth plea issue was taken, as a matter of fact, whether under the laws of the United States, or of the state of New York, there was any such office as in the condition of the bond is expressed or meant and intended. This was clearly a question of law, whether there was any such office. It would be matter of fact whether such office was filled by any person. Under the fifth plea issue was taken, as matter of fact, whether there was authority of law under and according to which the bond was taken. Here was, also, an issue joined upon a question of law, and to be tried as matter of fact. Under the sixth plea the issue was, whether at the time the bond was executed, there was any person authorized under the laws and constitution of the United States, to accept the delivery of the said bond on account of the United States. This was a question of law, but issue was taken upon it as matter of fact. The seventh plea alleged that there was no authority of law, either of the United States or state of New York, under which the bond was or could be taken. The replication to this plea took issue upon the allegation, whether there was authority of law to take such bond.

Upon the trial, the plaintiffs offered in evidence a transcript from the treasury department, which was objected to on two grounds: (1) That it purported to be a statement of an account between the United States and Samuel Edmonds, paymaster general and not principal paymaster, as described in the bond. (2) Because it did not contain the items of the account.

The defendants' counsel, under the shape of a motion for a nonsuit, made the following objections: (1) That the evidence produced did not support the breaches. (2) That it did not correspond with the bill of particulars delivered in the cause. (3) That the sureties were only liable for money received by Edmonds by virtue of the office of principal paymaster; and that there was no such office created or known in the law, and that the sureties, therefore, incurred no liability. These objections were overruled. A bill of particulars was introduced on the part of the defendant, which purported to be a statement of moneys received by Samuel Edmonds, as principal paymaster, and stating from whom received, and when received. The defendants then called Archibald Campbell, deputy secretary of state, and who swore that he had examined the minutes of the council of appointment, and found no entry of the appointment of Samuel Edmonds to the office of principal paymaster or paymaster-general. The counsel for the defendant then offered, in evidence, a letter from Peter Wagner, purporting to be an official letter, dated 26th April, 1825, addressed to Jacob Lansing, Esq., relative to the settlement of this account, and stating certain sums of money advanced to Edmonds by Charles B. Tallmadge, late assistant district paymaster, after 31st December, 1816. This was objected to and rejected by the court The counsel for the defendant prayed the court to allow and admit the matter so produced and given in evidence, on his part, to be conclusive, and to entitle him to a verdict; and that he should so instruct the jury, as to all or any one of the issues, as the proof would warrant.

The judge charged the jury, that the bond had been duly proved; that the transcripts from the treasury were admissible in evidence, although open to objections as to their sufficiency; that the bond admitted the appointment of Edmonds to the office or employment therein described; that the transcripts were not inadmissible, because they described Edmonds as paymaster-general, and stated balances only, and submitted it to the jury to decide whether the descriptions paymaster-general and principal paymaster were to be understood as meaning the same thing; that the variance between the bill of particulars and the accounts was not to be regarded by the jury; that, as to the issues joined on the special pleas, the questions involved in them were partly questions of law, and partly questions of fact; that, as to the questions of law, he had expressed his opinion in favor of the plaintiffs, and, so far as they involved questions of fact, the jury would be warranted, by the recitals in the bond, in finding against the defendant.

The jury found for the plaintiffs, and assessed the damages at $3,821.94.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This case comes before the court on a writ of error to the Northern district of this state. A bill of exceptions was taken at the trial, and the argument here has been brought under considerations growing out of the pleadings, as well as the exceptions at the trial. The pleadings are extremely loose and inaccurate, and seem to have been more calculated to entangle the case in the net of form, than to have it tried upon its merits; and it would have been a discreet exercise of the powers of the court below to have corrected this by ordering a repleader. That, however, is beyond the reach of this court in the present stage of the cause; and I shall only notice the objections arising upon the bill of exceptions. The action is in debt on a bond, bearing date the 1st September, 1813, in the penalty of $20,000, with a condition reciting, that by general orders of the commander-in-chief of the state of New York, certain militia of the state of New York had been organized and ordered into the service of the United States; and that Samuel Edmonds had been duly assigned and appointed principal paymaster of all the militia of said state which had been or might be ordered into the service of the United States, conditioned that if the said Edmonds shall keep and render just and true accounts and vouchers of all his receipts and expenditures in said office, and account for, and deliver and pay over to some proper officer or department of the United States, all moneys and public property of the United States which may be in his custody, possession or control, and shall in all things honestly, faithfully and truly demean himself in the said office of principal paymaster, then the obligation to be void. Upon the trial, the plaintiffs produce in evidence a transcript from the treasury department, duly authenticated, stating the balance only of account between the United States and Samuel Edmonds, late paymaster-general of the New York militia.

Two objections were taken to the admission of this evidence: (1) That it did not purport to be an account against Samuel Edmonds, in his character or capacity as charged in the bond, and alleged in the declaration. (2) That it stated only the balance, and did not state the items. Although the exception, with respect to the form in which the account was presented, may be a mistake as to the capacity in which Edmonds stands charged at the treasury, and which probably might be explained, under proper averments in the declaration; yet, as the case stood upon the pleadings and evidence before the court, the transcripts did not correspond with the allegations in the declaration. In the bond and declaration, Edmonds is described as principal paymaster of the militia of the state of New York, which have been or may be ordered into the service of the state of New York; and the evidence was an account against him as paymaster-general of the New York militia. The court could not, as matter of law, decide that these different descriptions applied to the same officer. In the account, he is not only described as paymaster-general, instead of principal paymaster, but he is called paymaster-general of the New York militia, which may include all the militia of New York; whereas, the bond is as principal paymaster of the militia of New York, which has been or may be ordered into the service of the United States. The latter capacity is more limited than the former; and it is in the more limited capacity that the sureties have bound themselves; and they have a right to confine their responsibility to their undertaking by their bond. Both Edmonds and his sureties may be estopped, by their bond, from denying that he acted in the character of principal paymaster of the militia of the state of New York, ordered into the service of the United States, and might be held accountable for money paid over to him, and to be disbursed in that character; but it must be shown that money was advanced to him in that character, in order to make his sureties responsible. The suggestion that there may be some mistake in the statement of the account from the treasury, is founded upon the circumstance that in the bill of particulars furnished under the order of the district judge, it purports to be a statement of moneys received by Samuel Edmonds, principal paymaster, corresponding with his character, as described in the bond; but the court cannot judicially know that Edmonds did not undertake to discharge duties also, under the character of paymaster-general of the militia of New York, and moneys received by him as such would not be covered by the bond. This supersedes the necessity of examining the other objections arising upon the bill of exceptions.

The judgment must be reversed without costs, and a venire de novo awarded, returnable in this court.

NOTE. In an action on a bond for the payment of a sum of money by instalments, it is not necessary to assign breaches in the declaration according to the requirement of the statute. Spaulding v. Millard, 17 Wend. 331. In declaring on a justice's judgment, rendered in this state, it is sufficient, besides stating the amount of the judgment, the time and place of its rendition, and the name of the magistrate, to allege that the judgment was rendered in a justice's court in a county of this state, in an action of which justices of the peace have civil jurisdiction. Stiles v. Stewart, 12 Wend. 473. In declaring on a justice's judgment of a sister state, the statute giving jurisdiction to the justice must be pleaded. Sheldon v. Hopkins, 7 Wend. 435. In a suit on a bond given by a deputy sheriff for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, the plaintiff must assign breaches, and cannot, without such assignment, take a verdict for even nominal damages. Barnard v. Darling, 11 Wend. 30. Where, in an action of debt, two several sums are demanded as due and owing in two separate counts, the declaration should, in the commencement, demand the aggregate amount, the first count should describe the sum demanded in it as parcel, &c., and the second count the sum demanded in it as the residue, &c. People v. Van Eps, 4 Wend. 387. The assignee of a lease, who enters upon and occupies the demised premises, is liable for the rent in like manner with the assignor. In declaring against him, he may be described as assignee in general terms; and the manner in which the assignment was made need not be set forth. But the assignee cannot be made answerable, by the action of debt, for the rent of any part of the premises demised, except that which has been possessed and enjoyed by himself; and the rent in such cases may be apportioned, the action being founded on the privity of estate merely, and not on the privity of contract. Norton v. Vultee, 1 Hall, 384. The plaintiffs demised certain premises, for a term of years, to one F. L. Vultee. The lessee, a short time before the expiration of the term, died, and the defendant (his widow) took out letters of administration upon his estate, and continued in possession of a part of the premises until the lease expired. An action of debt being brought against her for all the rent which was in arrear at the time of the expiration of the lease, it was held, that she was only liable in this action for the rent of such parts of the premises as had been occupied by her after her husband's death. Id. By the second section of the act (1 Rev. Laws, 222), any person, losing at any game any sum above twenty-five dollars, and paying the same, may, at any time within three months, recover it back of the winner by an action of debt, founded on the act. As the remedy afforded to the loser is provided by statute, in pursuing that remedy the forms and limitations prescribed must be observed; and a general action of assumpsit will not lie. Id. Though the legal effects of altering, by consent of parties, the time limited to do an act, e. g. to make an award, in the condition of a bond, leaving the original date to stand, is to destroy the bond as a pre-existing one, and to give it effect only from the time of the alteration; yet the bond may be declared on as bearing its original date, with or without an averment that it was delivered afterwards. Tompkins v. Corwin, 9 Cow. 255. A bond for performing an award was dated the 19th of September, 1825, and conditioned that the award should be made, &c., on or before the 31st of December then next; and afterward the parties extended the time for the award twice by erasure and interlineations: and the last time to the 19th of January, 1826. Held, that the plaintiff might either declare on the bond simply, as both dated and made on the 19th of September, or as dated that day and made afterward. Id. Where the merits of the case are affected by the time when a deed becomes valid, the time of delivery should be stated and shown; for the delivery gives it effect as a deed; otherwise, where time is immaterial. Id. A contract may be set forth in pleading according to its legal effect, though this vary from the precise words. Id. A deed executed on a particular day may, in general, be pleaded as made on any other day. Id. The supreme court have often held that, in pleading time, the words "next," or "then next," may be considered as referring to the day of the month, and not to the month itself. Id. Precedent of a declaration in debt on a judgment in a justice's court. Smith v. Mumford, 9 Cow. 26. It is sufficient to say the party recovered so much (a sum within the justice's jurisdiction) for such a cause, (being a matter within his jurisdiction,) without setting forth any of the previous proceedings. Id. The declaration on a justice's judgment averred a recovery for a debt, and also ninety-three cents for the party's damages, as well by reason of detaining the debts as for his costs, &c. Proof of $50 debt, and ninety-three cents costs. Held, no variance. Id. The term used in the declaration imported costs only. Id. Form of declaration in debt against the sheriff for suffering an escape from execution, on a surrogate's decree for distribution. Dakin v. Hudson, 6 Cow. 221. Such a declaration must aver that the surrogate's court, which made the decree, granted the administration. Id. For, otherwise it has no jurisdiction to decree distribution. Id. In a declaration against the sheriff, for suffering an escape from execution, it is not good cause of demurrer that the judgment appears to be against A. and his wife, and the execution against A. only; nor that the execution appears to have been endorsed with a direction to receive interest, when no interest runs on the judgment; nor that the judgment and execution appear to be in favor of D. and others, without saying what others. Id. Any or all of these defects in the proceedings are no excuse to the sheriff who suffers the escape. Id. Such a declaration must describe the record and proceedings correctly; and if, when produced on the trial, they do not correspond, the objection may then be made on the ground of variance. Id. Such a declaration set out, in the first count, a surrogate's decree, execution to the sheriff, and a voluntary escape. The second count set out a similar decree, execution, &c., and an involuntary escape. In setting out the decree, this second count said a certain other judgment or decree, but then dropped the word "other," and referred to the judgment, &c., by the word "said." It set forth the execution as issued on the last-mentioned judgment, &c., but afterward referred to this execution by the word "said." On general demurrer to the whole declaration, held well, and that there was no repugnancy between the two counts. Id. In declaring on a bond, conditioned to pay a judgment in three months, or surrender the body of the defendant in execution, at the suit of the plaintiff, in thirty days thereafter, the taking out execution by the plaintiff within the thirty days is a condition precedent, and must be shown in the declaration. Whitney v. Spencer, 4 Cow. 39. In a declaration upon a bond, conditioned to pay the taxable costs of a suit, licet sæpius requisitus is good on general demurrer. Bacon v. Wilber, 1 Cow. 117. It is not necessary for the plaintiff, in declaring the debt on a recognizance of bail, to allege that a fi. fa. had been issued against the principal previous to the return of the ca. sa. Gillespie v. White, 16 Johns. 117. A declaration on a bond conditioned for the performance of covenants, commencing in debt, after setting forth the condition, and assigning breaches, and concluding in covenant, and demanding damages, is good, it seems, on special demurrer. Gale v. O'Brian, 13 Johns. 189. It is certainly good on general demurrer. Id. Same case, 12 Johns. 216. A breach of the condition of a bond "to free the land from all legal incumbrances, either by deed or mortgage, now in existence, and binding on the premises by the 20th of February," is not well assigned by following and negativing the words of the condition, as such assignment does not necessarily amount to a breach, and the plaintiff ought to have shown some existing incumbrance on the 20th of February, or at the commencement of the suit. Julliand v. Burgott, 11 Johns. 6. If, in a declaration on a bond conditioned to pay several sums of money, at several days, the plaintiff assigns two several breaches for the non-payment of two several sums, it will be bad on special demurrer, for duplicity. Taft v. Brewster, 9 Johns. 334.

UNITED STATES v. STAHL.

[1 Woolw. 192;[1] McCahon, 206; 1 Kan. 606.]

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. May Term, 1868.

FEDERAL JURISDICTION IN KANSAS — ESTABLISHMENT OF FORT ON GOVERNMENT LAND—WITHDRAWAL OF JURISDICTION FROM STATE.

1. The United States, when it admitted Kansas into the Union, although retaining the title to the land which it then owned within the state, parted with the jurisdiction over it, so far as the general purposes of government are concerned, with certain reservations and exceptions.

[Cited in Marion v. State, 16 Neb. 358, 20 N. W. 293; County of Cherry v. Thacher, 32 Neb. 353, 49 N. W. 352; State v. Doxtater, 47 Wis. 294, 2 N. W. 449.]

2. These reservations and exceptions were (1) Lands of Indian tribes having treaties with the United States, which exempt them from state jurisdiction. (2) The right to tax lands of the United States, and of Indians.

3. Forts of the United States might have been, but were not excepted.

4. In respect of jurisdiction within forts, Kansas is on the same footing as the original states. Her consent is necessary to the exercise by the United States of jurisdiction within them.

[Cited in Ex parte Hebard, Case No. 6,312; Langford v. Monteith, 102 U. S. 146.]

[Cited in State v. McKenney, 18 Nev. 182, 2 Pac. 172.]

5. Whether the constitution requires the consent of the state in which it is located, as a condition precedent to the establishment and use as a fort of a place already belonging to the United States, may be doubted.

6. In order to withdraw from a state a jurisdiction which it has once exercised, and confer it on the general government, the consent of the former is a pre-requisite. This is the material point aimed at in the constitution.

[Cited in U. S. v. Sa-coo-da-cot, Case No. 16,212.]

7. Fort Harker was, in 1863, established as a military post on government land in Kansas, and the United States has always retained the fee. In 1861, Kansas was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original states, with boundaries which included the lands on which the fort was established. Held, that the fort is not within the jurisdiction of the federal courts, to punish the crime of murder committed therein.

[Cited in Nebraska v. Pollock, Case No. 10,077.]

[Cited in Burgess v. Territory, 8 Mont. 57, 19 Pac. 562.]

This was a demurrer to a plea to the jurisdiction of the court.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. In this case the defendant is indicted for murder, alleged in the bill to have been committed in the district of Kansas, at a place under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States of America; to wit. at Fort Harker, on land occupied by the United States for a military post, and purposes connected therewith. To this indictment, the defendant pleads to the jurisdiction of the court, alleging that Fort Harker was first established as a military post in the year 1863, under the authority of the war department; that no purchase of the land on which it was established had ever been made by the government of the United States with the assent of the state of Kansas; and that the consent of that state had never been given in any other mode to the exercise by the federal government of an exclusive jurisdiction over the land included within the post. To this plea there is a demurrer, which we are now to decide.

The state of Kansas was admitted into the

Union by an act of congress, approved January 29, 1861 (12 Stat. 126), which declared that she was thereby placed on an "equal footing with the original states in all respects." This act, after describing the boundaries of the new state, excepts from its jurisdiction any territory which, by treaty with Indian tribes, is not, without the consent of such tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any state or territory, and declares that it shall not be included within said state. In the case of U. S. v. Ward [Case No. 16,639], decided at the May term, A. D. 1863, this court held that the jurisdiction of the state over the crime of murder was exclusive of that of the federal government, although the offence was committed on soil to which the Indian title had not been extinguished, unless it was soil occupied by one of the tribes which had treaties with the United States of the character above described. We held that the state had no jurisdiction in such territory, because it was no part of the state. It is not claimed that Fort Harker is included within territory of the character last mentioned. Here it is insisted that because the fee of the soil was in the United States when the fort was established, and because the federal government continued in the use and occupation of such soil as a fort, therefore the right to exercise jurisdiction in case of murder committed there vests in the United States.

It needs no argument to show that the jurisdiction of the crime of murder, or of any other offence, committed within the limits of her territory, must belong to the state of Kansas, except in some special cases, which, by a positive rule of law, are constituted exceptions to the general principle. In this case the exception is claimed to rest on that provision of the federal constitution which empowers congress "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by session of particular states and the acceptance of congress, become the seat of government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

It is very obvious that the situs of Fort Harker does not come within the literal sense of this provision; for it was not purchased by the United States at all, and no consent was ever given by the state legislature to its use as a fort. As the United States was already the owner of the land before the establishment of the fort upon it, and before Kansas was organized into a territory or admitted as a state, it was impossible to comply with these literal terms of the constitution, so far as the purchase was concerned. But as no purchase could be made, so none was necessary. The only object of a purchase, namely, the acquisition of a title, was already accomplished. The government of the United States, when it admitted Kansas into the Union upon the same footing as the original states, retained the legal title to all the lands which it then owned in the state of Kansas. So far as general purposes of government were concerned, however, with certain reservations and exceptions, it parted with jurisdiction over it.

The first exception reserved the lands of Indian tribes which had treaties exempting them from state jurisdiction; the second, the power to tax the lands of the United States and of the Indians. It was competent to the federal government, and it would have been appropriate at that time, to have also excepted out of this grant of jurisdiction, places for forts, arsenals, &c., if such had been the policy of congress. But it was not done. So far as the consent of Kansas to the exercise of this exclusive jurisdiction by congress is concerned, that state stands on the same footing as the original thirteen.

The question then is, when congress purchases the fee simple of a portion of territory included within one of the original states, for the purpose of erecting a fort thereon, what kind of consent is necessary to be obtained from the state legislature in order to vest jurisdiction in the federal government? It is not material now to inquire whether the United States could erect and occupy a fort without the consent of the legislature. The language is, that congress shall exercise exclusive legislation over all places purchased with that consent. But whether the constitution requires that consent as a condition precedent to the establishment and use of the place as a fort, may well be doubted. It does not seem probable that the framers of the constitution, who conferred on congress full powers of making war, raising armies, and suppressing insurrections, and also declared that the federal government was established for the express purpose of providing for the common defence, would have left its power of erecting forts, so important to the execution of that purpose, subject to the volition of state legislatures. However this may be, it is clear that in order to withdraw from a state a jurisdiction which it had possessed and exercised, and confer it on the general government, the consent of the former was made a prerequisite. This is the material point aimed at by the provision of the constitution.

All the important uses of a fort, arsenal, or magazine could be secured without the exercise of exclusive legislation within their walls; and there was manifest propriety in requiring the assent of the state to the exercise of this important and delicate power, which of right belonged to the local authority, and which could be needed by or useful to the general government only in special cases. This jurisdiction having been vested in the state of Kansas by the act admitting her into the Union, and never divested, it cannot now belong to the United States. The power provided for in the constitution is one of exclusive legislation. The act under which the defendant is indicted applies, in exact terms, to places only in which the United States is empowered with exclusive legislation. Moreover, the indictment describes the place as being within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government. The question of concurrent jurisdiction, therefore, does not, and cannot arise in this case.

[These views find support in the following adjudged cases: People v. Godfrey, 17 Johns. 225; Com. v. Clary, 8 Mass. 75; U. S. v. Bereau, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 388; Clay v. State, 4 Kan. 49; Dunn v. Games [Case No. 4,176]; Story, Const. §§ 1224–1227; 1 Kent, Comm. 482.] [2]

The demurrer to the defendant's plea to jurisdiction is overruled.

Case No. 16,374.

UNITED STATES v. STALY et al.

[1 Woodb. & M. 338.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1846.

SEAMEN—SHIPPING ARTICLES—REFUSAL TO SERVE—REVOLT—UNSEAWORTHINESS OF VESSEL—AUTHORITY OF MASTER.

1. Shipping articles, signed by seamen, to a port A. and a market, are definite enough to be binding.

2. If the vessel has not cleared, but is lying at anchor in a navigable stream, where the tide ebbs and flows, the seamen on board are bound to obedience: and this court, probably, has jurisdiction over a revolt there, and will exercise it, if no evidence be offered as to the limits of the jurisdiction of the state, and any exception on this account is apparently waived. Whether the vessel be seaworthy or not, is a fact to be settled by the jury. But if she was not in truth seaworthy, and the seamen, on going on board and examining her, objected to serving on that account, it must be considered a refusal to enter upon the discharge of their contract, and not a violation of duty after their service has commenced under it.

3. In such case the remedy against them, if any, is a civil one for not beginning to serve under the articles, and not a criminal one for breaches of duty, after having entered upon duty.

4. If subsequent to the shipment and commencement of service, the vessel is believed not to be seaworthy, the seamen cannot refuse obedience, but may ask a survey if in port, and if not, but within sight of land, request the master to return and have the survey.

[Cited in U. S. v. Nye, Case No. 15,906.]

5. Should he then conduct himself unreasonably, or in any way treat them with unnecessary severity, their remedy is at law after their return, and not a resort to violence, unless in danger of the actual loss of life, and then at their peril as the result may turn out.

This was an indictment in several counts, [against Ephraim Staly and others,] for a revolt on board the barque John Brown, in Providence river, on the 23d of May, 1846. The respondents pleaded not guilty. It appeared in evidence, that the defendants and four others shipped on a voyage to Apalachicola, or elsewhere, for a market, and were taken on board the barque the evening previous to the transaction complained of. The vessel lay at anchor in the stream, and in the morning, on unfurling the sails, the mainsail was asserted by the men to be in such a dilapidated condition, and some of the rigging so much out of order, that they objected to going to sea in the vessel, as not seaworthy, and made offers to rescind their contract, and pay back the advance which they had received in money. The officers denied that she was unseaworthy, and undertook to enforce duties under the contract, which led to the collision and resistance complained of. Some objections were made to the form of the contract, and it was further insisted in their behalf, if the vessel was in fact not in a suitable condition for the voyage contemplated, the men were not bound to serve in her at all.

W. Burgess, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Mr. Rivers, for defendants.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice, charged the jury, that the contract, though in form to a port designated, or elsewhere for a market, was definite enough and binding. If as certain as a policy of insurance, which was sometimes in such a form, it was as certain as was necessary in respect to the service, wages and obedience of seamen. The vessel had not yet cleared, and it is objected, that evidence of her clearance should be adduced from the collector's office, before the indictment can be sustained. But it strikes me, that being in a navigable stream, where the tide ebbs and flows, and nothing proved or shown as to the jurisdiction of the state over the place where she was at anchor, the indictment can be sustained, under the act of congress, as to offences of this kind in vessels, whether she had cleared or not. But I give only my first impressions, and shall see, if necessary hereafter, that the defendants have the benefit of any exceptions to this ruling, if erroneous. If obedience can be required in a vessel on the high seas, at a distance from the river, it should be in the river, or at anchor and before the clearance is obtained as well as after, or all order will be frustrated, and the due navigation and safety of the vessel rendered impossible. U. S. v. Hamilton [Case No. 15,291]; U. S. v. Stevens [Id. 16,394]. If there be any thing in the objection, it applies to the jurisdiction of this court to try the offence, when committed within the stream and port, and not on the high seas, rather than to the offence itself not having being committed at all. Under the act of congress of 1835 [4 Stat. 775], if the place where a revolt happened was clearly within the jurisdiction of a state, it might be doubtful whether this act reaches it, though that of A. D. 1790 [1 Stat. 112] has been construed to do it, some different terms being used there. Undoubtedly congress can, if it pleases, punish such offence in vessels, under its power to regulate commerce, though in places not on the high seas, or not within mere admiralty jurisdiction. But as the facts here are not sufficiently full to raise the question under the present act of congress, I shall, for the present, give no opinion on it, but consider it for the present waived, and the power to try this offence conceded to this court. See U. S. v. New Bedford Bridge [Case No. 15,867].

[2] [From 1 Kan. 606.]

In respect to the question of the vessel being seaworthy or not, that is one of fact, to be settled by the jury. But I give it to them in charge, that if the seamen, as soon as they could examine the vessel and her sails after coming on board, and decide on her seaworthiness, did so, and then reasonably objected to enter on their contract, they were not punishable as criminals for refusing merely to begin to serve at all under their contract. Because it was the duty of the owners to have the ship seaworthy, and if she was not, they could not legally exact the proceeding to a fulfilment of the shipping articles by the men. It would then become a mere controversy as to the obligation to begin their service, and not to complete it faithfully after begun, with full knowledge of the real condition of the vessel. It would be a case for civil redress for damages for not entering on the contract, if the vessel was seaworthy. On the contrary, if the seamen had enjoyed full opportunities to examine the condition of the vessel, and had then begun their service, under their contract, they were bound to go on and yield obedience to all lawful commands; and if they became satisfied afterwards, that the vessel was not seaworthy, they should ask a survey, if in port, and if out of it, but not out of sight of land, should ask the mates to unite with them in obtaining it, under the provisions of the act of congress. They would still be bound to obey orders, and would not be justified for conduct otherwise mutinous, unless perhaps in immediate peril of life, and so found as a fact by a jury, after the crew come on shore, and are arraigned for disobedience. The duty of the seamen, after they have once entered fully on their service under their contract, is obedience; that of the officers is protection, and lenity, and kindness, so far as consistent with the preservation of order, and the safety of property and life. Officers are presumed to have superior intelligence and skill, and must be held answerable for the use of them; and in case of unseaworthiness, their lives are at risk as much as those of the seamen, and in real doubt they are as likely to wish a survey. Seamen are presumed to have bodily vigor, a knowledge of duty, and a willingness to obey orders. Let both classes conform to these presumptions, and the law will equally protect both. But let wanton cruelty appear in the officers, or a reckless disregard of the rights of the seamen, and they are to be punished no less severely than the latter, when instead of patience and obedience, and a reliance on the laws of their country for redress, they take the sword of justice into their own hands, and act as executioners of their own wills, as well as judges and parties.

The jury not agreeing, the respondents were discharged on their own recognizances.

Case No. 16,375.

UNITED STATES v. STANGE.

[6 Int. Rev. Rec. 5.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. 1867.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—LOTTERY TICKET DEALERS—SPECIAL TAX.

[Defendant gave to customers, on payment of a small sum, combinations of numbers, specifying them as being in the Delaware or Kentucky lotteries. He then entered the numbers in his policy book, and, if they came out in the drawings, paid to the customer the required amount of money. He gave no certificate or ticket to the customer, and the latter kept the numbers in any way he chose. Held, that defendant was a policy dealer, within the meaning of the statute, and was subject to indictment for not paying the special tax.]

The defendant in this case was indicted for carrying on the business of dealing in lottery tickets without paying the special tax provided by law.

There was no question that he had not paid the special tax required by the internal revenue law [14 Stat. 116]. The question was whether he was a lottery ticket dealer within the words of that section of the law which provides that "every person, association, firm, or corporation who shall make, sell, or offer to sell lottery tickets, or fractional parts thereof, or any token, certificate, or device, representing or intending to represent a lottery ticket or any fractional part thereof, or any policy of numbers in any lottery * * * shall be deemed a lottery ticket dealer."

It appeared that the defendant kept a tobacco store on Pacific street, and that he also "sold policies," as it is called. A customer would come to him, and, paying him a small sum, would give him a combination of numbers specifying them as being in the Delaware or Kentucky lotteries. The defendant would enter them in his policy book, and, if they came out in the drawing of the lottery, he would pay various sums, according to the way they came out; but he gave the customer no certificate or ticket of any kind. He kept the numbers in his policy book and the customer kept them as he pleased. The question was whether this was making or selling any "policy of numbers."

The judge charged the jury that, for the purposes of this trial, he should hold that it was, that if they had found that he had so sold policies of numbers, they must find him guilty.

The jury accordingly found him guilty.

His counsel made a motion for a new trial, on which the question of this construction of the law is to be more fully discussed.

Mr. Tracy, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Whiting, for defendant.

5. Where perjury is charged on a written affidavit, and it appears clearly from several witnesses that the affiant stated the facts truly, and was advised that they were substantially the same as stated in the writing, by a lawyer in whom the affiant confided, and he yielded to such an influence in taking the oath, it is not perjury, the guilty motive being wanting.

[This was an indictment against Solomon Stanley for perjury.]

The U. S. Dist. Atty., for plaintiff.

Messrs. Walpole, for defendant.

THE COURT (charging jury). This is an indictment for perjury, under the 13th section of the act of congress of the 4th September, 1841 [5 Stat. 453], for swearing falsely to establish a pre-emption right, which, by that act, is made perjury. The act of the 3d of August, 1846 [9 Stat. 50], provides "that every actual settler, being the head of a family, or widow, or single man over the age of twenty-one years, who is now in possession, by actual residence as a housekeeper, of any tract of public land within the limits of the several cessions by the Miami Indians, in Indiana, which have not yet been proclaimed for sale by the president, or any such person who shall hereafter erect a dwelling house and become a housekeeper upon any such tract of land, shall be entitled to the same benefits and privileges with respect to said land, as were granted to settlers on other lands by the act approved 22d June, 1838 [5 Stat. 251], entitled 'An act to grant pre-emption rights,' and the several amendatory provisions of said act," &c. And in the 2d section of said act, it was provided "that in every case, the affidavit of the claimant under that act should be like unto that prescribed by the act of the 22d June, 1838, and the same shall be filed, and proof and payment made for the land claimed, at any time before the day fixed by the president's proclamation for the public sale of said land." The written affidavit was read on which the perjury was assigned, and which was made and filed by the defendant, at the time of application to the register of the land office for the pre-emption. A pre-emptive right to a quarter section was claimed on the ground that John Stanley had built a dwelling house on the same, which he with his family occupied, within the above cession of the Miami Indians. This affidavit was made the 23d March, 1854.

It appears from the testimony that a man by the name of Majors, and hands employed by him, entered upon the land in controversy, on the 13th March, 1854, cut logs for a cabin, and the next day it was built up to the roof. Finding the building in this condition, John Stanley, the brother of defendant, came to the cabin with his loaded wagon and entered into it, by cutting a door, and had it covered with materials which had been prepared by Majors. When Majors returned to finish the house, he found the defendant in possession of it, who said that his brother had gone to the land office to enter the land, and he remained to protect the possession. Majors entered into the house and his trunk was handed in. His entry was resisted by defendant, and finding that he could not stay there, Majors took possession of another quarter section. The affidavit of defendant stated that "he knows from personal observation, that the said John Stanley did, on the 14th day of March, 1854, enter into a dwelling house with his family, consisting of himself and wife and two children, which the said John Stanley previously caused to be erected on the above described quarter section of land, and that he, the said Stanley, continues to make said house his only home." After the affidavit was drawn up, the defendant stated that he did not feel free to swear to it. And he then observed that when he first saw the house, it was a pen, there being no roof on it; that his brother cut out the door and covered the house on the 14th, but he did not say who built the pen. After the statement of the above facts, the defendant was induced to make the affidavit on the advice of a connection of his who was present, and who was a lawyer, believing that it contained the facts substantially as stated by him. Some nine or ten persons proved the good character of the defendant, and that his standing was as fair and unexceptionable, as any other person of his age in that part of the county where he lived.

THE COURT, in their charge to the jury, said there could be no doubt that John Stanley was guilty of a trespass in entering into the partly built cabin, and that he could not have procured the pre-emptive right to the quarter section, had Majors claimed it, and had all the facts been represented to the register and receiver of the land office. Majors was entitled to the possession of the improvement, so far as it was made by him. But he relinquished his right, as appears from the testimony, and settled upon another quarter in the neighborhood. This abandonment left John Stanley in possession of the improvement, and he made the house habitable by cutting out the door and putting a roof on it.

But the inquiry for the jury is not as to this particular matter, but whether the defendant was guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury. It does not appear that he had any knowledge who had constructed the pen of the cabin, but he knew that his brother had cut out the door and put on the roof. And he objected to swearing to the written affidavit, it appears, until his friends, and especially the lawyer, who was a connection of his, advised him to swear to it, as it embraced only the facts substantially as stated by him. If you believe, gentlemen, that he yielded to this influence in swearing to the paper, and that in his repeated relations he gave a true statement of the facts as they transpired, according to his knowledge of them, he is not guilty of perjury. To constitute perjury there must be a wilful and corrupt statement of a falsehood, material to the matter in hand. You are to determine the facts in the case, and judge of the guilt of the defendant. He has shown an excellent character, and this, under the circumstances, and indeed under all circumstances where the evidence of guilt is not clear, will receive due consideration by a jury.

Verdict of not guilty.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — IMPORTATIONS AT PORTS CONTROLLED BY INSURGENTS—LIABILITY TO DUTIES.

[1. Neither the fact that a port of the United States is under the control of an insurgent body, such as the co-called Confederate States, nor the fact that the government of the United States had conceded belligerent rights to the insurgents, will operate to suspend the revenue laws so as to relieve goods there imported from the payment of duties to the United States. Distinguishing U. S. v. Hayward, Case No. 15,336, and U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 247.]

[2. Nor was any such effect produced by the president's proclamation of April 19, 1861 (12 Stat. 1258), declaring a blockade of certain ports in the rebellious states; and any cargoes which managed to evade the blockade were still subject to the duties prescribed by law.]

This action was brought to recover of defendants [William H. Stark and others] the sum of $959.04, the duties on two hundred and sixty-six hogsheads and forty-one barrels of molasses, valued at $3,996, imported by the defendants into the port of Savannah on the 7th day of May, 1861. The defendants pleaded the general issue, and payment of the duties. The case was submitted to the jury on the following agreed facts: The goods were imported into the port of Savannah by the defendants at the time named in the declaration, and the amount of duties was as stated in the declaration, and they had never been paid to the United States. John Boston, United States collector of customs at the port of Savannah, resigned his said office on the 31st day of January, 1861, and he was collector of customs for the Confederate States at the port of Savannah at the time of the importation of the goods mentioned in the declaration. At that time the port of Savannah was in the paramount forcible military possession of the Confederate authorities, and by such paramount military authority the United States government, both civil and military, was excluded. The duties on said goods were paid to the collector of customs of the Confederate government.

John D. Pope, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Law, Lovell & Falligant, for defendants.

Before WOODS, Circuit Judge, and ERSKINE, District Judge.

WOODS, Circuit Judge (charging jury). The facts in this case are all agreed upon, so that there is nothing for you to do but to return a verdict as instructed by the court. By the act of congress of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 42), § 1, it is provided that there shall be levied, collected, and paid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States from a foreign country, the duties prescribed by the act. The United States is therefore entitled to recover in this action, unless the defendants present some valid reason why they should be relieved from the payment of the duties on the goods imported by them.

Defendants insist that the agreed facts and public history, of which the court takes judicial notice, shows such a state of affairs, that at the time of the importation they were under no obligation to pay duties to the United States. They say that the Confederate States, being a belligerent power at war with the United States, and holding by military force territory captured from the United States, acquired a sovereignty over such territory and during such occupancy. Allegiance within such territory was due to the Confederate States, and they only were entitled to receive duties on imports, and that in effect the port of Savannah was not a port of the United States but was a port of the Confederate States. In support of this view the cases of U. S. v. Hayward [Case No. 15,336], and U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 247, are cited. Both these cases were actions for the recovery of duties on goods imported into Castine, during the war of 1812, with Great Britain, and after that place had been captured by and surrendered to the British forces. The circuit court of the United States in the first case, and the supreme court of the United States in the other held that the goods imported were not liable to pay duties to the United States. The ground upon which these decisions were based is stated by the court in the case of U. S. v. Hayward in these words: "By the conquest and occupation of Castine, that territory passed under the allegiance and sovereignty of the enemy. The sovereignty of the United States over the territory was of course suspended, and the laws of the United States could no longer be rightfully enforced or be obligatory upon the inhabitants who remained and submitted to the conquerors. Castine, therefore, could not strictly be deemed a port of the United States, for its sovereignty no longer extended over the place." So in U. S. v. Rice [supra], the supreme court of the United States says: "Under the circumstances we are all of opinion that the claim for duties cannot be sustained. By the conquest and military occupation, the enemy acquired that firm possession which enabled him to exercise the fullest rights of sovereignty over that place. The sovereignty of the United States over the territory was of course suspended, and the laws of the United States could no longer be rightfully enforced there, or be obligatory upon the inhabitants who remained and submitted to the conquerors. By the surrender, the inhabitants passed under a temporary allegiance to the British government, and were bound by such laws, and such only as it chose to recognize and impose. From the nature of the case no other laws could be obligatory upon them, for where there is no protection or allegiance or sovereignty, there can be no claim to obedience. Castine was, therefore, during this period so far as respected our revenue laws to be deemed a foreign port." It is clear from the extract just quoted that the decision in those cases was placed on the ground that Great Britain had acquired the sovereignty of Castine, and that the inhabitants owed the British government allegiance. If the Confederate States was a sovereignty, and was entitled as against the United States to the allegiance of the people living within the territory held by them, then these cases are directly in point as supporting the defendant's views. But the Confederate States as a sovereign power never had an existence. It was never recognized as such by any department of the government of the United States, or by any other nation on the globe. There was never a moment when any human being owed it allegiance; on the contrary, allegiance was due the United States and to their laws from all the inhabitants of the territory held by the military power of the Confederate States, and any violation of the laws of the United States was punishable by the authority of the United States. The government of the United States might prosecute for violation of its laws during the Rebellion. It has assumed to pardon those guilty of offences against its statutes, and a large number of prominent citizens of the late insurgent states now hold the pardon of the president for offences against the laws of the country, committed during the Rebellion, within the territory held by the military power of the Confederate States. Can we say then that a rebellion which never had a government which was recognized as such, was a sovereign, that it acquired sovereignty over territory held by force of its arms, and that the people of the territory controlled by it owed allegiance to a government which never had an existence? Clearly not.

That these views are the views of the supreme court of the United States will appear from the adjudicated cases. In Hickman v. Jones, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 200, Mr. Justice Swayne, speaking for the court, says: "The rebellion out of which the war grew was without any legal sanction. In the eye of the law it had the same properties as if it had been the insurrection of a county or smaller municipal territory against the state to which it belonged. The proportions and duration of the struggle did not affect its character, nor was there a rebel government de facto in such a sense as to give any legal efficacy to its acts. It was not recognized by the national or any foreign government. It did not for a moment displace the rightful government. That government was always in existence in the regular discharge of its functions, and constantly exercising all its military power to put down the resistance to its authority in the insurrectionary states. The union of the states for all the purposes of the constitution is as perfect and indissoluble as the union of the integral parts of the states themselves." Again, in the case of U. S. v. Keehler, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 86, Mr. Justice Miller, as the organ of the court, says: "It certainly cannot be admitted for a moment that a statute of the Confederate States or the order of its postmaster-general could have any legal effect in making the payment to Clements valid. The whole Confederate power must be regarded as a usurpation of unlawful authority, incapable of passing any valid laws, and certainly incapable of divesting, by an act of its congress or an order of one of its departments, any right of property of the United States." In Shortridge v. Macon [Case No. 12,812], tried by Mr. Chief Justice Chase in the circuit court of the district of North Carolina, he says: "War levied against the United States by citizens of the republic under the pretended authority of the new state government of North Carolina or the new central government which assumed the title of Confederate States, was treason against the United States. * * * On no occasion and by no act have the United States ever renounced their constitutional jurisdiction over the whole territory or over all the citizens of the republic, or conceded to citizens in arms against their country the character of alien enemies, or to their pretended country the character generally of a de facto government. There is nothing in the Prize Cases which gives countenance to the doctrine which counsel endeavors to deduce from it, that the insurgent states, by the act of rebellion, and by levying war against the nation, became foreign states, and their inhabitants alien enemies."

These cases show how broadly the case at bar differs from the case of U. S. v. Hayward, and U. S. v. Rice, relied on by counsel for defendants. Those cases were placed on the ground that the inhabitants of Castine owed allegiance to the sovereignty of Great Britain and obedience to her laws. The Confederate States were not a sovereignty; its inhabitants did not owe it allegiance, were not bound by its laws. On the contrary, the authority of the United States extended over them at all times. Their duty of allegiance and obedience to its laws was continuous and unbroken. All the laws of the United States, the act levying duties on imports included, were in force at all times and in all places within the territory of the United States, as much in Savannah as in New York; and all the citizens of the United States, whether within or without the insurrectionary districts, owed them obedience. If, as held by Mr. Chief Justice Chase, the laws of the United States against treason were in force over the inhabitants of the insurgent states, clearly the revenue laws were also in force.

But it is claimed for defendants that the Confederate States were belligerents, and that belligerent occupation gave them the right to revenues of the port or country occupied. We cannot concur in this view. It is difficult to conceive of a more dangerous and pernicious doctrine. It would place in the hands of insurgents, to whom, out of humane motives belligerent rights had been conceded, those rights which are only accorded to a sovereign power, and hold out the hope of plunder as a motive and incentive to rebellion. The concession of belligerent rights to insurgents does not render them any less insurgents. It clothes them with no attributes of sovereignty, among the highest of which is the right to levy taxes and impost. It gave the insurgents no more right to collect duties than the granting of belligerent rights to the insurgent inhabitants of a county in the state of Georgia would confer upon them the right to enforce the collection of the taxes due the state. This precise point was decided by Mr. Chief Justice Chase in Shortridge v. Macon, already cited. He says: "There is nothing in that opinion (the Prize Cases) which gives countenance to the doctrine that the insurgent states, by the act of rebellion, and by levying war against the nation, became foreign states, and their inhabitants alien enemies. This proposition being denied, it must result that in compelling debtors to pay receivers for the support of the Rebellion debts due to any city of the United States, the insurgent authorities committed illegal violence by which no obligation of debtors to creditors could be conceded or in any way respect affected."

We cannot admit for a moment the claim which appears to be set up by counsel for defendants, that by the concession of belligerent rights to the insurgents the United States agreed to remit the duties on goods imported into the insurgent territory, because such goods were necessary for the support of the insurgents. In other words, the right to import goods free of duty is not a belligerent right. It is also claimed for defendants that a blockade of the ports of the insurgent districts having been declared by the president of the United States in his proclamation of April 19, 1861, the laws for collection of duties were suspended by the law of the blockade. We do not understand that the president has authority to suspend the laws of the United States, nor can we suppose that this was the purpose of the proclamation of the blockade. The preamble recites as one of the reasons for the blockade the fact that by reason of the insurrection the laws of the United States for the collection of the revenue could not be effectually executed in the states named conformably to that provision of the constitution which requires duties to be uniform throughout the United States. One purpose of the blockade was, therefore, to secure the uniform collection of duties. The way not to accomplish this would be to allow all vessels which might succeed in eluding the blockade to discharge their cargoes duty free. If we adopt the view of defendants, one great purpose for which the blockade was established would be defeated. The laws of the United States required all goods imported from a foreign country to pay duties. The president's proclamation closed certain ports. Can it be claimed, with any fair show of reason, that because a vessel had defied the proclamation and entered a blockaded port, that that fact relieves her cargo from the payment of duties?

Our view, then, of this case is this: The law of congress gives the national government a right to collect duties on all foreign goods imported into any port of the United States. Notwithstanding the Rebellion, the authority and laws of the United States extend over the insurgent territory. The port of Savannah was at all times a port of the United States. The Confederate States was not a sovereignty. The laws of its congress were absolute nullities. They had no right to collect duties, to levy taxes, or in any way to exercise the functions of a government. The people of the insurgent states were not bound to obey their laws, so far as they attempted to interfere with the rights of the United States, but, on the contrary, owed allegiance to the United States and obedience to their laws. And it follows that the United States are entitled to the duties on goods imported into the insurgent districts during the Rebellion. Your duty will therefore be discharged by returning a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $959.04 in gold, with interest from the 7th day of May, 1861.

UNITED STATES v. STARR.

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. July, 1846.

OFFENCES COMMITTED IN INDIAN COUNTRY—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS — CONSTRUCTION OF CRIMINAL LAWS.

1. Until the act of 17th of June, 1844 (4 Stat. 733), was passed by congress, the courts of the United States had no jurisdiction to hear, try, and punish offences committed in the Indian country west of Arkansas.

[Followed in U. S. v. Ivy, Case No. 15,451. Cited in Ex parte Kang-gi-shun-ca, 3 Sup. Ct. 396, 109 U. S. 560.]

2. That act was prospective, and did not operate on the past.

3. Laws are generally made to operate upon the future, not the past, transactions of men, and courts will not give them a retroactive effect unless that intention is clearly expressed.

[Cited in Brooke v. McCraken, Case No. 1,932; Tinker v. Van Dyke, Id. 14,058.]

4. Penal laws must be construed strictly.

5. If there is no tribunal competent at the time to punish an offence, the jurisdiction cannot afterwards be conferred.

JOHNSON, District Judge. By act of congress, passed the 30th of June, 1834, so much of the laws of the United States as provides for the punishment of crimes committed within any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, are declared to be in force in the Indian country west of Arkansas; but not to extend to crimes committed by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian. And for the sole purpose of giving jurisdiction to the territorial court, that part of the Indian country was annexed to the territory of Arkansas. 4 Stat. 729; 4 Story's Laws U. S. 2399; 9 Story's Laws U. S. 128. On the 15th of June, 1836, the territory of Arkansas became one of the United States, by the name of the state of Arkansas, (5 Stat. 50), and on the 3d of March, 1837, this court was created, and invested with like jurisdiction as other circuit courts of the United States (5 Stat. 176.)

At a previous term, in the case of U. S. v. Alberty [Case No. 14,426], we held that this court possessed no jurisdiction beyond the limits of the state of Arkansas, and, consequently, had no power or authority to hear, try, and punish offences committed in the Indian country. Subsequent to that decision, and to remedy that defect, congress, on the 17th of June, 1844, passed the act entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers,'" passed 30th of June, 1834, and thereby provided "that the courts of the United States in and for the district of Arkansas be and they hereby are vested with the same power and jurisdiction to hear, try, determine, and punish all crimes committed within that Indian country designated in the twenty-fourth section of the act to which this is a supplement, and therein and thereby annexed to the territory of Arkansas as were vested in the courts of the United States for said territory before the same became a state. And for the sole purpose of carrying this act into effect, all that Indian country heretofore annexed by the twenty-fourth section of the act aforesaid to the territory of Arkansas, be and the same hereby is annexed to the state of Arkansas." 5 Stat. 680. It will be seen by this act that anterior to the 17th of June, 1844, this court had no jurisdiction of crimes committed in the Indian country, and on that day acquired such jurisdiction.

In the case now before the court, it is agreed and admitted by the parties to this proceeding, and is evident from the proof, that Ellis Starr is charged with the commission of the crime of murder in the Indian country annexed to the state of Arkansas by the act of 1844, on a day anterior to its annexation, that is to say, before the 17th of June, 1844, and the question made and argued by the counsel is, whether this court has jurisdiction of the crime. It seems to me plain that at the time the offence charged was committed, neither this court, nor any other court of the United States, had power and jurisdiction to hear, try, and punish it. Indeed, it is manifest that from the time this court was created, on the 3d of March, 1837, up to the 17th of June, 1844, there existed no judicial tribunal of the United States competent to try and punish offences committed in this Indian country, and so this court decided in the case cited when its presiding judge (Hon. Peter V. Daniel) was present. And to give that jurisdiction was the sole object of the act of the 17th of June, 1844.

It is, however, insisted that this act confers upon this court jurisdiction to punish all offences against the laws of the United States committed in the Indian country,—those before as well as those after its enactment. The argument is that the crime was committed against an existing law, and within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, although this court could not then, yet may now punish it; and in carrying out this idea, it is said by the district attorney to get clear of a difficulty which lies in his path, that it is not a case where there was no law anterior to the 17th of June, 1844, creating the offence, and then doing it for the first time, for that, he concedes, would be an ex post facto law within the rule laid down in Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 386; but he insists that without creating any new offence, the law merely designates a tribunal to punish one already committed against an existing law of the United States forbidding it. If this be a sound position, then it is manifest that the act must have a retrospective operation; because, otherwise, it could not affect transactions which took place before its passage. The crime charged against the prisoner, as stated, was committed when neither this nor any other court of the United States was clothed with jurisdiction and power to try and punish it, and to proceed to do so now would be to give the act in question a retroactive effect.

Now in the construction of a statute it is a cardinal and well established principle, that the court will never give to it a retrospective operation, unless it clearly appears from the language used, that its makers intended it to have that effect; because laws are generally made to operate upon the future, not the past, transactions of men. 9 Bac. Abr. tit. "Statute," C. Legislatures seldom, if ever, especially in the enactment of criminal laws, intend them to have a retroactive effect, and certainly courts will never give them that operation, even if it can be done at all, unless the intention is clearly expressed. Prince v. U. S. [Case No. 11,425]. Penal laws must be construed strictly.

The inquiry then is, has congress, by the terms used in the act of the 17th of June, 1844, giving this court jurisdiction, clearly expressed the intention, that it shall take cognizance of past as well as future crimes? Let us examine the words of the statute itself. It provides that the court shall have the same power and jurisdiction of these offences that were vested in the courts of the United States for the territory of Arkansas before the same became a state. And for the sole purpose of carrying the act into effect, all that Indian country heretofore annexed to the territory of Arkansas is thereby annexed to the state of Arkansas. By this act nothing beyond jurisdiction of crimes committed in the Indian country is conferred on this court, and in order to make the grant effectual, the Indian country is attached to this judicial district and constitutes a part of it. This is all. There is nothing from which an inference can be drawn that it was intended by its makers to have a retrospective operation. They have neither said so expressly nor have they intimated that it shall have that effect. In the absence of any express intention to the contrary, the court is bound to presume that the makers of the law intended it to operate upon the future and not upon the past. If congress had made it retrospective, a nice question would then have been presented, upon which I give no positive opinion, although my mind inclines to the belief, for reasons that need not now be stated, that if there is no tribunal competent at the time to punish an offence, the jurisdiction cannot be afterwards conferred. For these reasons the prisoner must be discharged.

Discharged accordingly.

Case No. 16,380.

UNITED STATES v. STATE NAT. BANK OF MINNEAPOLIS.

[2 Cent. Law J. 107.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. Dec. Term, 1874.

FEDERAL TAXATION — ACTION AGAINST BANK FOR PENALTY—NECESSARY ALLEGATIONS.

1. In an action by the United States against a bank, for the penalty of one thousand dollars, for failing to make return of its net earnings, income, or gains, as required by the 120th section of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 223], as amended by the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 98], which was re-enacted July 14, 1870 [16 Stat. 274], the complaint must allege that the sum therein mentioned as net earnings, income, and gains, was dividends, or excess of profits over such dividends, added during the year to its surplus or contingent fund. The complaint should specifically state the character of the earnings, income, and gains which were liable to the tax, and that a list and return thereof has not been made as required in this section.

2. If the penalty is claimed under the 120th section of the act of 1864 the complaint should charge that the defendant has neglected or omitted to make dividends or additions to its surplus or contingent fund, within the period of time mentioned therein, and that it had failed to make the return required by that section.

The United States bring this suit to recover a penalty of one thousand dollars against the defendant, for not making or rendering a list or return to the assessor, of its net earnings, income or gains for the period of time embraced between January 1, 1870, and June 30, 1870. A demurrer is interposed by the defendant. The penalty is claimed by virtue of the act of congress, entitled "An act to reduce internal revenue taxes and for other purposes." Approved July 30, 1870 (16 Stat. 261). The 17th section of this act enacts: "That sections 120, 121, etc., * * * of the act of June 30th, 1864, * * * as amended by the act of July 13th, 1866, * * * shall be construed to impose the taxes therein mentioned, to the first day of August, 1870, but after that date no further taxes shall be levied or assessed under said sections, and all acts or parts of acts relating to the taxes herein repealed, and all the provisions of said acts shall continue in full force * * * for maintaining and continuing * * * penalties incurred under and by virtue thereof, etc." The ninth section of the internal revenue act of July 16, 1866 (14 Stat. 138), amended the 120th section of the act of June 30, 1864, by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following: "That there shall be levied and collected a tax of five per centum on all dividends in scrip or money thereafter declared due, wherever and whenever the same shall be payable to stockholders, policyholders or depositors or parties whatsoever, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, income, or gains of any bank, trust company, saving institution, and of any fire, marine, life, inland insurance company, either stock or mutual, under whatever name or style known or called, in the United States, or territories, whether specially incorporated or existing under general laws, and on all undistributed sums, or sums made or added during the year to their surplus or contingent funds, and said banks, trust companies, saving institutions, and insurance companies shall pay the said tax, and are hereby authorized to deduct and withhold from all payments made on account of any dividends or sums of money that may be due and payable as aforesaid, the said tax of five per centum, and a list or return shall be made and rendered to the assessor or assistant assessor, on or before the tenth day of the month following that in which any dividends or sums of money become due or payable as aforesaid; and said list or return shall contain a true and faithful account of the amount of the taxes as aforesaid; and there shall be annexed thereto a declaration of the president, cashier, or treasurer of the bank, trust company, savings institution, or insurance company, under oath or affirmation, in form or manner as may be prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue, that the same contains a true and faithful account of the taxes as aforesaid. And for any default in the making or rendering of such list or return, with such declaration annexed, the bank, trust company, savings institution or insurance company making such default, shall forfeit as a penalty the sum of one thousand dollars; and in case of any default in making or rendering said list or returns, or of any default in the payment of the tax as required, or any part thereof, the assessment and collection of the tax and penalty shall be in accordance with the general provisions of law in other cases of neglect and refusal; provided, that the tax upon the dividends of life insurance companies shall not be deemed due until dividends are payable; nor shall the portions of premiums returned by mutual life insurance companies to their policy-holders, nor the annual or semi-annual interest, allowed or paid to the depositors in savings institutions, be considered as dividends." The 121st section of the act of June 30th, 1864, referred to in the 17th section of the act of July 11, 1870 (13 Stat. 284), enacts: "That any bank legally authorized to issue notes as circulation, which shall neglect or omit to make dividends or additions to its surplus or contingent fund as often as once in six months, shall make a list or return in duplicate, under oath or affirmation of the president or cashier, to the assessor or assistant assessor of the district in which it is located, on the first day of January and July in each year, or within thirty days thereafter, of the amount of profits which have accrued or been earned or received by said bank, during the six months next preceding said first days of January and July, and shall present one of said lists or returns, and pay the collector of said district a duty of five per centum on such profits; and in case of default to make such list or return and payment within the thirty days as aforesaid, shall be subject to the provisions of the foregoing section of this act. Provided, that when any dividend is made which includes any part of the surplus or contingent fund of any bank, trust company, savings institution, insurance or railroad company, which has been assessed and the duty paid thereon, the amount of duty so paid on that portion of the surplus or contingent fund may be deducted from the duty on such dividend."

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and NELSON, District Judge.

NELSON, District Judge. The demurrer must be sustained. If the penalty is claimed for a failure to make a return in accordance with the 120th section of the internal revenue act of June 30th, 1864 (as amended by the act of July 13th, 1866), which was re-enacted July 14th, 1870, the complaint should have alleged that the sum therein mentioned as net earnings, income and gains was dividends declared or excess of profits over such dividends added during the year to their surplus or contingent fund. This is manifest, for the section imposes a tax upon two subjects: First, dividends due and payable; second, undistributed sums or excess over dividends which had been carried to a surplus fund. See Savings Bank v. U. S., 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 235. The complaint should, therefore, specifically state the character of the earnings, income and gains which were liable to a tax, and that a list and return thereof had not been made as provided in this section. If the penalty is claimed under the 121st section of the act, the complaint should have charged that the defendant had neglected or omitted to make dividends or additions to its surplus or contingent fund within the period of time therein mentioned, and had failed to make the return required by this section. Only the earnings, income and profits of the defendant, not thus disposed of, were subject to a tax, and the penalty could only be maintained in case of a default of the president or cashier of the bank to make a list or return of such profits and payment of the tax imposed, on the first day of July, or within thirty days thereafter. The act of congress of July 14, 1870, not only imposed the tax mentioned in the 120th and 121st sections above referred to, but also continued in force all the provisions of said acts for maintaining and continuing the penalties incurred under and by virtue thereof. This act virtually re-enacted the 120th and 121st sections, and the right of congress to pass such a statute, retroactive in its effect, was declared by the supreme court, in the case of Stockdale v. Insurance Co. [20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 323]. An order will be entered sustaining the demurrer, with leave to the plaintiff to amend the complaint within twenty days after service of the same upon the district attorney.

Case No. 16,381.

UNITED STATES v. STATE NAT. BANK OF MINNEAPOLIS.

[1 McCrary, 183.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. 1874.

INTERNAL REVENUE TAX ON BANK DIVIDENDS—ACT OF CONGRESS CONSTRUED.

1. Under the legislation of congress (16 Stat. 260), national banks are liable to a penalty for failing to make a return of dividends declared, etc., during the period between July 1 and December 30, 1870.

2. Said dividends, etc., are subject to a tax of two and one-half per centum during said period.

This suit is brought against the defendant to enforce a penalty of one thousand dollars, for failure to make a return of the dividends declared, additions to its surplus fund, and profit and loss accounts. The dividends and additions to the several funds are alleged to be from earnings, income, and gains, made during the period of time between July 1, 1870, and December 30, 1870. Repeated demands by the assessor for a list and return thereof, and refusal by the president and cashier of the bank, are alleged. The defendant interposes a demurrer. The penalty is claimed under the sixteenth section of the act of congress of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to reduce internal revenue taxes, and for other purposes" (16 Stat. 260, 261), for a failure to make the return of earnings, income and gains, and payment of the taxes imposed thereon by the fifteenth section of the same act. Section 15 enacts: "That there shall be levied and collected for and during the year eighteen hundred and seventy-one, a tax of two and one-half per centum upon the amount of all interest or coupons paid on bonds or other evidences of debt issued and payable in one or more years after date, by any of the corporations in this section hereinafter enumerated, and on the amount of all dividends of earnings, income or gains hereafter declared, by any bank, trust company, savings institution, insurance company, railroad company, canal company, turnpike company, canal navigation company, and stock-water company, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable, and to whatsoever person the same may be due, including nonresidents, whether citizens or aliens, and on all undivided profits of any such corporation which have accrued and been earned and added to any surplus, contingent, or other funds; and every such corporation having paid the tax as aforesaid, is hereby authorized to deduct and withhold from any payment on account of interest, coupons and dividends, an amount equal to the tax of two and one-half per centum on the same; and the payment to the United States, as provided by law, of the amount of tax so deducted from the interest, coupons and dividends aforesaid, shall discharge the corporation from any liability for that amount of said interest, coupons or dividends, claimed as due to any person, except in cases where said corporations have provided otherwise by an express contract: provided that the tax upon dividends of insurance companies shall not be deemed due until such dividends are payable either in money or otherwise; and that the money returned by mutual insurance companies to their policy holders, and the annual or semi-annual interest allowed or paid to the depositors in savings banks or savings institutions, shall not be considered as dividends; and that when any dividend is made, or interest as aforesaid is paid, which includes any part of the surplus or contingent fund of any corporation which has been assessed and the tax paid thereon, or which includes any part of the dividends, interest or coupons received from other corporations whose officers are authorized by law to withhold a per centum on the same, the amount of tax so paid on that portion of the surplus or contingent fund, and the amount of tax which has been withheld and paid on dividends, interest, or coupons, so received, may be deducted from the tax on such dividend or interest." Section 16 enacts: "That every person having the care or management of any corporation liable to be taxed under the last preceding section, shall make and render to the assessor or assistant assessor of the district in which such person has his office for conducting the business of such corporation, on or before the tenth day of the month following that in which any dividends or sums of money become due or payable as aforesaid, a true and complete return, in such form as the commissioner of internal revenue may prescribe, of the amount of income and profits and of taxes aforesaid; and there shall be annexed thereto a declaration of the president, cashier, or treasurer of the corporation, under oath, that the same contains a true and complete account of the income and profits and of the taxes as aforesaid. And for any default in the making or rendering of such return, with such declaration annexed, the corporation so in default shall forfeit, as a penalty, the sum of $1,000; and in case of any default in making or rendering said return, or of any default in the payment of the tax as required, or of any part thereof, the assessment and collection of the tax and penalty shall be in accordance with the general provisions of law in other cases of neglect and refusal."

Lochran, McNair & Gilfillan, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and NELSON, District Judge.

NELSON, District Judge. The seventeenth section of the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 261), provided for the tax upon the earnings, income and profits of the defendant during the month of July, 1870, at the rate of five per centum; and the fifteenth section of the same act reduced this tax to two and one-half per centum, and limited its continuance during the remaining portion of the year 1870 and the year 1871. There can be no doubt in our opinion in regard to the effect of the fifteenth section. The language is plain and unmistakable. The defendant's counsel admit that this section imposed the tax at two and one-half per centum for the year 1871, but deny that the language used imposing the tax "on the amount of all dividends of earnings, income, or gains hereafter declared by any bank," etc., has the effect of imposing this two and one-half per centum tax upon the dividends declared, or undivided profits added to any funds, after August 1, 1870, and before the expiration of the year. In our opinion this view is not correct. The word "hereafter" refers to a time after the passage of the act; any other limitation or qualification would render this word, according to the context, meaningless.

The defendant's counsel urge that, inasmuch as the first clause of the section enacts "that there shall be levied and collected for the year 1871, a tax," etc., it excludes the idea that any tax could be levied and collected in the year 1870. Admit that such is the case, and still there is no inconsistency in the subsequent phraseology of the section. A tax could certainly be levied and collected in 1871, upon the earnings, income, etc., of 1870. This section fixed the period when the tax ceased, and imposed it upon the earnings, income and profits of certain institutions during the years 1870 and 1871.

In the language of Mr. Justice Miller in Stockdale v. Insurance Co. [20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 323], when considering the act of 1870: "It repealed several sections of the internal revenue law absolutely. It fixed a period in the future for the cessation of others, and it reduced the income tax in a certain class of cases from five to two and one-half per centum, and provided for its continuance through the years 1870 and 1871, at the end of which all income tax was to cease." If there was any ambiguity of language used in this section, and we should examine it in the light of all the surrounding legislation upon the subject of taxation of the earnings, income and gains of banks, and other institutions therein named, there could be no satisfactory reason assigned, or explanation given, why congress, having imposed the taxes up to August 1, 1870, should rescind them for the remaining portion of the year 1870, and renew them during the year 1871. The complaint states facts sufficient to show a failure to make a list or return, which, if true, would entitle the government to recover the penalty denounced by the act.

The demurrer is overruled with leave to answer in twenty days after notice of this decision or judgment. Ordered accordingly.

Case No. 16,382.

UNITED STATES v. STATON.

[2 Flip. 319; 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 10; 11 Chi. Leg. News, 191; 3 Cin. Law Bul. 1126.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. Dec. 23, 1878.

CRIMINAL LAW — DISTILLING — ATTEMPT TO DEFRAUD—INDICTMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. An indictment under section 3257 of the Revised Statutes of the United States does not in itself so describe the offense charged, as to give a defendant notice of the nature and cause of the accusation, while, under section 3281, to charge the violation of the law in the language of the statute is sufficient, because it describes the offense as an intent to defraud the United States of the tax on spirits distilled, by the act of engaging in and carrying on the business of a distiller.

2. If the statute itself so defines the act or acts constituting an offense as to give to the offender information of the nature and cause of the accusation, the indictment need go no further than the statute; but if it does not, of itself, do this, averments looking to the security of the constitutional right to such information, must be added. The constitution, in all criminal prosecutions, secures to the defendant the right of being informed of the nature and cause of the accusation.

John B. Clough, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

[2] [The indictment contains two counts. The first count, drawn under section 3257 of the Revised Statutes charges, that defendant, being a distiller, did, at a certain time and place, defraud and attempt to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him The second count, drawn under section 3281 of the Revised Statutes, charges that the defendant at a certain time and place was engaged in the business of a distiller with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him as such distiller. The offences charged in both counts are misdemeanors simply, and not felonies. The indictment in both its counts describes the offence in the words of the statutes under which they are respectively drawn. It is, in general, sufficient to describe a statutory offence in an indictment in the words of the statute itself without further particularity. U. S. v. Mills, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 138; U. S. v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 460; U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542; U. S. v. Lancaster [Case No. 15,556]; People v. Stockham, 1 Park. Cr. R. 424; 1 Bish. Cr. Prec. Simmons, 96 U. S. 360. But few exceptions to this rule are recognized, and if, in any case, the defendant insists upon greater particularity, it is for him to show that from the obvious intention of the legislature, or the known principles of law, the case falls within some exception to the general rule. 1 Whart. Cr. Law (5th Ed.) § 611, and cases; U. S. v. Pond [Case No. 16,067]; U. S. v. Henry [Id. 15,350]. La Coste [Id. 15,548]; U. S. v. Gooding, supra; U. S. v. Mills, supra; U. S. v. Lancaster [supra]; U. S. v. Martin [Case No. 15,731]. W. M. McCall, for defendant.

[2] [From 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 10.]

HAMMOND, Judge. This is a motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. The defendant stands convicted upon two counts of an indictment which are as follows: 1. "The grand jurors represent, that William Staton, etc., on, to-wit, the first day of March, 1877, * * * in the district aforesaid, was a distiller, and was then and there engaged in carrying on the business of a distiller, by then and there producing distilled spirits, and by then and there brewing, and by then and there making mash, wort and wash fit for a distillation and for the production of spirits, and by then and there making and keeping mash, wort and wash, having also then and there in his possession and use a still; and, that being so then and there engaged in carrying on the business of a distiller as aforesaid, he, the said William Staton, did then and there unlawfully, with force and arms, defraud and attempt to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits so then and there distilled by him, the said William Staton, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States.

2. "The grand jurors aforesaid, etc., do further present, that said William Staton, etc., on, to-wit, the day and year aforesaid, in the district aforesaid, etc., unlawfully, with force and arms, was carrying on the business of a distiller by then and there producing distilled spirits, and by then and there brewing, and by then and there making mash, wort and wash fit for distillation and for the production of spirits, and by then and there making and keeping mash, wort and wash, and having also then and there in his possession and use a still, then and there with intent of him, the said William Staton, to defraud the United States of the tax on spirits, so then and there distilled by him, the said William Staton, as such distiller, as aforesaid, contrary to the form," etc.

The proof shows that the defendant gave bond and otherwise complied with the law regulating distillation of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, or grapes, known as a fruit distillery, then being in possession of about two hundred and seventy gallons of spirits distilled by him; the casks containing it were gauged by the proper officer, and the spirits were subsequently sold by the defendant without paying the tax upon them required by law.

A new trial is asked on the ground that the defendant objects to and moved to exclude all testimony showing more than one sale, and because the government was not confined in its proof to the first unlawful transaction it undertook to prove. This objection proceeds on the idea that each separate sale was a separate offense and that the government must elect on which one it will try the defendant. The defendant was not indicted for unlawfully selling the spirits without paying a special tax therefor, but under one count for defrauding the government of the tax on spirits distilled by him, and under the other count for engaging in the business of a distiller with the unlawful intent to defraud the government of the tax on such spirits. Any acts, no matter how numerous, which would show, either that he defrauded the government of the tax, or carried on the business with that intent, were admissible. These were the circumstances which evinced the design with which the act was done and demonstrated the intent, and were the acts by which the fraud on the revenue was committed. The motion for a new trial should therefore be overruled.

The motion in arrest of judgment is based on the alleged insufficiency of the indictment, in not describing the offense charged so as to give the defendant notice of the violations of the law he is required to meet and defend.

The first count is drawn under section 3257, and the second under section 3281 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Section 3257 enacts that, "whenever any person engaged in carrying on the business of a distiller, defrauds, or attempts to defraud, the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or of any part thereof, he shall forfeit the distillery, etc., and shall be fined not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years."

This section does not in itself so describe the offense as to give the defendant notice of the nature and cause of the accusation. It was held in the case of U. S. v. Simmons, 96 U. S. 360, that it is sufficient, under section 3281 of the Revised Statutes, to charge the violation of the law in the very language of the statute, because it describes the offense as an intent to defraud the United States of the tax on spirits distilled, by the act of engaging in and carrying on the business of a distiller. This accusation in itself apprises the accused of the act for which he is arraigned, namely, carrying on the business of a distiller with the unlawful intent. The facts and circumstances by which the intent is demonstrated need not be alleged in the indictment and are only matters of proof. But suppose that, disconnected with this act of carrying on the business of a distiller, it were simply charged that the defendant had defrauded, or attempted to defraud, the United States of the tax on certain spirits; is it not plain that the defendant would have no notice of the act for which he is called to account? Now, this is the distinction between the two sections 3257 and 3281: The first makes all acts of a distiller, whereby he defrauds, or attempts to defraud, the United States of the tax on spirits distilled by him, offenses, but does not attempt to designate any of them, while the second describes and defines one particular act as an offense, namely, engaging in the business of a distiller with a particularly described intent.

And I think, after a careful consideration of the cases on the subject, that this will be found to be the true test between those where it is sufficient to allege the offense in the language of the statute, and those where it is not. If the statute itself so defines the act or acts constituting the offense as to give to the offender information of the nature and cause of the accusation, the indictment need go no further than the statute; but if it does not of itself do this, the averments necessary to secure the constitutional right to such information must be added. It makes no difference whether the crime be a felony or a misdemeanor, the constitution secures to the defendant, "in all criminal prosecutions," the right "to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation." Const. U. S. Amend. 6; U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 557, 558; U. S. v. Simmons, 96 U. S. 360; State v. Kilgore, 6 Humph. 44; State v. McElroy, 3 Heisk. 69.

In all the cases cited by the learned counsel for the government it will be found either that the statute gave sufficient information, or that the averments themselves did so. In U. S. v. Henry [Case No. 15,350], the fraudulent bond was pointed out. In U. S. v. Ballard [Id. 14,506], the particular entry of "one brown horse" was designated. In U. S. v. Fox [Id. 15,156], as under section 3281, in U. S. v. Simmons, 96 U. S. 360, the statute described the act denounced as that of carrying on the business of a distiller without having paid the special tax therefor, and it was held that by analogy to common law indictments for being a common barrator, scold, etc., it was sufficient to allege a general carrying on of a certain trade, where that was the crime charged. But even in that case, the allegation was, that the business was carried on between two designated dates, which was held sufficiently to describe the act to give the defendant notice. In U. S. v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 460, the particular ship and time and place were given, so that the defendant knew what he was called to answer.

In the case now under consideration, by the first count of the indictment, the defendant is left without any circumstance of time, place, or occasion, to indicate to him the act he is called to defend. The particular spirits or packages are not described, the place where found, or where distilled by him; and no clue is given to the particular act of his which is alleged to have been either a fraud or an attempt at a fraud upon the revenue. He cannot read this count of the indictment and say from it what act of his is called in question. It is clearly too indefinite and vague to apprise him of the cause of the accusation. The judgment upon this count will be arrested.

The second count, for reasons already stated, is sufficient, and the case of U. S. v. Simmons, supra, directly sustains it. The motion in arrest as to that count is, therefore, denied.

Case No. 16,383.

UNITED STATES v. STEEN & CWERGIUS' FACTORY.

[6 Ben. 172.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. July, 1872.

FORFEITURE—DISTILLING SPIRITS—VINEGAR FACTORY.

Under the forty-fourth section of the internal revenue act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 142), and the joint resolution of the same date, if a person, having a wash and also a still on his premises, capable of distilling, does there distill fermented liquors, his premises not being an authorized distillery, all the personal property found in the premises is forfeited, notwithstanding that the product of the establishment be not distilled spirits, but vinegar.

[This was an information of forfeiture against Steen & Cwergius' Factory for keeping an unauthorized distillery.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. By section 44 of the internal revenue act of July 20, 1868, any person (described by section 59) who produces distilled spirits, or who brews or makes mash, wort, or wash fit for distillation or for the production of spirits, or who, by any process of vaporization, separates alcoholic spirits from any fermented substance, or who makes or keeps mash, wort, or wash, and has in his possession a still, not having paid special tax, or given bond, forfeits all the personal property found in the distillery. The joint resolution of July 20, 1868, has no effect to authorize the distillation, by any person, of fermented liquor, except in an authorized distillery. And as the uncontradicted evidence showed that the claimant did have a wash and also a still, on his premises, capable of distilling, and did there distill fermented liquors, the same not being an authorized distillery, the property proceeded against became forfeited, notwithstanding the fact that the product of his establishment was not distilled spirits, but only vinegar.

There must, therefore, be judgment on the verdict.

UNITED STATES v. STEFFENS.

[24 Int. Rev. Rec. 14.]

District Court, N. D. New York. Dec. 14, 1877.

TRADE-MARK—WHAT MAY BE REGISTERED—NATIONAL EMBLEM—COUNTERFEITING TRADE-MARKS—EVIDENCE—COMMITTING MAGISTRATES.

[1. The fact that the eagle is the national emblem of the United States does not prevent its appropriation by private parties for use as a trade-mark, especially when there is but slight resemblance in the figure of the eagle so used to that of the national emblem.]

[2. Trade-marks consisting of the representation (1) of an eagle with head erect and wings extended, perched upon the representation of a branch in leaf, the whole being surrounded with the name of the makers of the article; and (2) of the words and letters "G. H. Mumm & Co., Rheims," accompanied by the same circular design,—held to possess all the requisites of lawful trade-marks, and to have been properly registered under the act of August 14, 1876 (19 Stat. 141).]

[3. The certificate of the commissioner of patents, under seal, stating that certain trade-marks were deposited for registration, that with each mark was deposited a statement (annexed to the certificate), that declarations under oath were filed by a member of the firm filing the trade-mark, and that the statements contained in these declarations were almost word for word in the language of the statutes, is not admissible under Rev. St. § 882, as an authenticated copy, but is made admissible by section 4940, as evidence of all statements of fact therein contained. When so admitted, the certificate must be considered as prima facie evidence of the proper registration of the trade-mark.]

[4. In order to justify a committing magistrate in holding the accused for trial, it is only necessary that the evidence should show probable cause to believe that the prisoner committed the offence charged.]

[Preliminary examination of Emil Steffens on a charge of dealing in counterfeit trade-marks with intent to defraud.]

Rowland Cox, for the United States.
Hall & Blandy, for defendant.

Mr. Commissioner DEUEL'S opinion:

This is an arrest under the 5th section of the act of congress, approved August 14th, 1876, entitled "An act to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods, and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods." The defendant is charged with having on or about the 15th day of August, 1877, at the Southern district of New York, dealt in and sold certain counterfeits of the trade-mark of G. H. Mumm and Co., with intent to defraud. To support the complaint, the prosecution offered three certificates of the commissioner of patents, under the seal of the patent office, to show that the trade-mark had been registered pursuant to law, and three witnesses were sworn—two to sustain the accusation, and one the agent of complainants, touching their mode of doing business. At the close of the case of the prosecution, the defendant's counsel moved for dismissal on the following grounds: I. That the devices of complainants are not the proper subjects for trade-marks. II. That there is no evidence of proper registration. III. That there is no evidence to warrant holding the defendant.

The first proposition, as stated by counsel in his oral argument, is that, even if the complainants had complied with all the requirements of the statute respecting the registration of the marks in question, their devices were not such as could lawfully become trade-marks, and therefore the protection intended by the statute in question could not in their case be invoked. The trade-marks in question, as shown in the certificates of the commissioner of patents and the fac simile annexed thereto, are substantially as follows: The representation of an eagle, with head erect and wings extended, having as a perch the representation of a branch in leaf; the whole encircled by the words and letters, "G. H. Mumm and Co.," "G. De Bary." Another consists of the words and letters, "G. H. Mumm and Co., Rheims," accompanied by the circular design above described. If neither of these can lawfully become a trade-mark, the position of the counsel is well taken, and the prisoner must be discharged. The counterfeit in question embracing all of the above devices, if either one of them is sustained the motion falls. The act concerning trade-marks says: "The commissioner of patents shall not receive and record any proposed trade-mark which is not and cannot become a lawful trade-mark, or which is merely the name of a person, firm, or corporation, unaccompanied by a mark sufficient to distinguish it from the same name when used by other persons." Rev. St. U. S. § 4939. It is clearly apparent from this enactment that congress intended that the name of a person, or firm, or corporation, when accompanied by a mark sufficient to distinguish the name from that of any other person, firm, or corporation entitled to use such name, could become a lawful trade-mark. The device which accompanies the name of "G. H. Mumm and Co., Rheims," is clear, distinct, and well defined. It could not mislead any one. It is a distinguishing mark clearly within the provisions of the statute, and as such must be sustained.

The oral argument of the counsel, that the eagle, being the national emblem of the United States, cannot be appropriated by private parties as a mark for trade, is unsupported by the citation of any adjudicated cases that shed any light upon the subject. Counsel makes the statement, and then leaves it. If there is any thing at all in the position, it might have been strengthened by the further statement that it was adopted as one of the emblems, and was borne on the legionary standard of ancient Rome; that in one form or another, single or double headed, it has figured as the national emblem of other governments, such as Russia, Prussia, and Austria. There is, however, but slight resemblance between the national emblem and the eagle constituting a part of the trade-mark in question. It has been decided in the courts of France that national arms can concur with other distinctive signs—for example, the name of the merchant—to constitute an industrial mark. Browne, Trade-Marks, p. 181, § 261, and the case there cited. If national arms can thus be appropriated, it seems to me that there can be no question as to the right of complainants to appropriate a portion of the national emblem. I am clearly of the opinion that the commissioner of patents was right in registering the mark; that it possesses all the requisites of a lawful trade-mark, and, therefore, the first motion must be denied.

The certificates of the commissioner of patents, under seal, presented in evidence, show the 2d day of September, 1876, the trade-marks in question were deposited in the patent office, for registration, by G. H. Mumm and Co., of Rheims, France; that with each mark they deposited a statement, a copy thereof being annexed to each certificate; said certificates further state that "a declaration under the oath of Peter Hermann Mumm, a member of said firm," was also deposited; it is further certified that the statements under oath contained certain declarations which are almost word for word the language of the statutes. It is, however, contended by counsel that these certificates are not sufficient proofs of the proper registration; that they cannot become evidence of the filing of the statement under oath required by the statute. These certificates are clearly not admissible under section 882 of the Revised Statutes, because they are not copies authenticated by the seal of the department. They are not certified copies, but certify that a certain paper had been deposited containing certain declarations.

In the case of Smith v. Reynolds [Case No. 13,097] the judge, commenting on a similar question, used this language: "A certified copy of the trade-mark, of the date of its receipt, and of the statements filed therewith, that is, a copy of everything filed and recorded, and of the memorandum of the date of the receipt thereof is made evidence. But such copy is made evidence only that what is shown by it to have been filed was filed." From this language it would be inferred that such certificate was evidence of all it contained, except, perhaps, conclusions of law. It would be evidence of all questions of fact. The case of Smith v. Reynolds differed from the present case. In that case the certificate did not set forth the filing of the statement under oath, and its contents. In the present case it does. In the absence of this certification, and in the absence of proof of the filing of the required statement under oath, the judge refused to grant an injunction. Congress gave to this certificate the character of evidence in section 4940, Rev. St.; when admitted it is evidence of all statements of fact in it contained. When the facts thus certified show a full compliance with all the requirements of the statutes, it must at least be considered prima facie evidence of the proper registration of complainant's trade-mark. In the absence of all evidence to the contrary it must be deemed conclusive. Since writing the above I have found a case sustaining the position herein taken. Vide Walker v. Reid [Case No. 17,084].

Having disposed of these objections, I now turn to the last question, viz.: Does the evidence warrant holding the accused for trial? A committing magistrate acts in a twofold capacity,—as a court in deciding questions of law and of evidence; as a jury in finding questions of fact. But the scope of investigation before the magistrate falls far short of a trial of a prisoner before the court and a jury. It is not required before the magistrate as it is before the jury, that all reasonable doubt of the prisoner's guilt must be removed; it is only required that the evidence be sufficient to establish probable cause that the prisoner committed the offence charged. In the present case probable cause of two facts must be created.

I. That the prisoner committed the offence. The evidence of Chapman and Benedict is conclusive on this point.

II. Did he do it with intent to defraud? It is contended by counsel, both in their oral and written argument, that it must be presumed that the labels sold by defendant were for a legitimate purpose, and that in dealing with Chapman and Benedict the presumption is they had authority to act as agents of complainants, and therefore defendant was dealing with complainants, and they could not be defrauded by the transaction. The evidence before me, in substance, is that Chapman, a man unknown to the prisoner, and who assumed the name of Benedict, applied to the accused for labels of complainant's trade-mark; the accused promised to furnish them, and did so on the following day, delivering them after dark in a lager beer saloon on South Washington Square. That when he entered this saloon Mr. Benedict was behind the bar. He asked for Benedict, and when Mr. Benedict said he was the man, he hesitated to transact the business with him, and did not until Mr. Chapman, who had given the order, presented himself. The counterfeit labels were delivered, the price paid, and the prisoner, though solicited, refused to give a receipt. The Monday following, Mr. Chapman swears, he again saw the accused, and in connection with the transaction, he—the accused—stated that if it were known what he had done, he would be sent to the state's prison. It was further testified by Mr. De Bary, as general agent of G. H. Mumm and Co., that all the wine of that firm shipped to the United States came to his firm, and that G. H. Mumm and Co. never sold labels to their trade-mark except as attached to packages containing their goods. No evidence on the part of the accused was offered.

From this evidence I can see no escape from the conclusion that the offence was committed with intent to defraud. There can be no other reasonable deduction from the evidence. No fraud was committed because the immediate purchaser, and the complainants who furnished the money, knew what was being bought. The prisoner, however, had no knowledge of the person with whom he was dealing; if he had, evidence of such knowledge would have been proper to destroy the presumption of intent. The immediate consequence of such transaction is a double fraud,—first, destroying the business of a firm which has taken years to build, by diverting the profits of their trade, and by destroying confidence in their product of manufacture by palming off a spurious article as genuine. And, second, by inducing the public to purchase an article other than that for which they supposed they were paying. It is a fraud on the complainants, and a fraud on the public, and the evidence, to my mind, is sufficient for finding that there was probable cause to believe that such a fraud was intended by the accused. The motions to dismiss are therefore denied, and in the absence of further evidence, the prisoner must be held to await the action of the grand jury.

It seemed to me, when the questions of law herein discussed were raised, that they were ones calling for a decision of the courts empowered to construe and interpret statutes. That they were not properly cognizable by a committing magistrate, whose duty, as I understand it, is to uphold and enforce the statutes as he finds them. Acting on this view, I declined to hear argument on the motion to dismiss the proceedings on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the act in question. The questions, however, being raised and argued, and this being the first arrest under the act of 1876, I felt it my duty to give them as full and as just consideration as I was able. I, however, disclaim any ambition to assume functions or duties not properly within the scope of a committing magistrate. And, as an excuse for giving expression to my views in this unusual form, I state that the questions presented in a proceeding of this nature are entirely new, and that in this form it may be convenient in the event of similar prosecutions before me.

UNITED STATES v. STEPHENSON'S EX'RS et al.

[1 McLean, 462.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. June Term, 1839.

SEALED INSTRUMENTS — SCRAWL SEALS — BONDS TAKEN UNDER FEDERAL STATUTES.

1. To constitute a sealed instrument at common law, it must be sealed with wax or some tenacious substance.

2. In this country a scrawl has been generally substituted for a seal, by the legislation of the different states.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

3. A bond taken under an act of congress is not governed by the local law of the state where it may be executed.

4. The bond, in contemplation of law, is given at the seat of the federal government; as at that place the officer must account, for the performance of his duties.

5. A bond with a scrawl seal, given under an act of congress, is good.

6. A bond required to be given by congress, must be presumed to be such an instrument as by general usage, is denominated a bond.

7. A scrawl is substituted for a seal, by general usage, both in a popular and legal sense.

[Cited in Tolman v. Spaulding, 3 Scam. 13.]

At law.

Mr. Baker, late U. S. Dist. Atty.

Breese & Davis, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought for a bond given by Stephenson, in his life time, as a receiver of public moneys; and the plaintiffs seek to recover of his representatives and his sureties a balance of moneys received by him but not paid over to the government. The defence set up is, that the act of congress requires a bond to be given, and that the instrument declared on is not a bond, at common law, it not having been sealed. This question is raised by special demurrer. The acts of congress establishing the several land offices, require the "receivers of public moneys, for lands, to give bonds with approved securities." The bond in question has scrawl seals, but there is no act of congress declaring that a scrawl may be substituted for a seal, and it is contended that the common law rule applies. And there is no question that at common law, a bond is a sealed instrument, and that the seal must be formed of wax or some tenacious substance that will receive and retain an impression. 2 Leigh, N. P. 730.

The supreme court of New York have decided (5 Johns. 244) that an instrument executed in Virginia with a scrawl seal which, by the statute of that state was a seal, but which instrument was to be carried into effect, in the state of New York, could not be considered a sealed instrument. The common law rule, on this subject, prevails in New York. Seals were invented and were in common use, long before the art of writing was in general use. The seal was known by the impress it bore, and the act of sealing was a deliberate and solemn act, which gave greater dignity to sealed than unsealed instruments. This distinction which originated in a rude and barbarous age, has become one of the axioms of the law, and is still rigidly adhered to. The reason on which this distinction was founded is far less forcible now, than it formerly was; but it is still regarded as a settled principle. With few exceptions the legislatures of the different states have, by special acts, provided that a scrawl should constitute a seal. This has been done in Illinois where the bond was executed, and it is insisted that the local law must govern the instrument in this case. The bond was executed with the condition that the receiver should faithfully discharge his duties, and account and pay over to the government, all monies received by him. He is to account to the proper department at Washington City, and pay the money to the treasurer of the United States at that place, or at such other place as should be directed. In contemplation of law the bond was executed at the seat of government, as that is the place where the chief officers of the executive reside, and to whom the receiver was amenable for the faithful discharge of his duties. The local law, therefore, does not govern the bond either as to its character or effect. It is an instrument given under an act of congress, and must be construed with regard to such act, and the general principles of law which are applicable. [Cox v. U. S.] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 173, 203; [Duncan v. U. S.] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 435.

The argument is not without force that where a term is used in legislation, which has a technical and well defined meaning at common law, the term is supposed to be used with reference to such meaning. And it is contended that the word "bond" is well understood at common law, and that this rule must govern the instrument under the act. This inference may be admitted, where there are no counteracting circumstances. The case in 1 Bos. & P. 360, was where a bond with a scrawl seal had been given in Jamaica, where the scrawl was recognized as a seal, and a suit was brought on it in England. The pleadings raised the question whether such an instrument could be declared on as a bond; and the court inclined to think it could not be, there being no proof of the usage in Jamaica. The case, however, was compromised, on the debt being paid by the defendant, and the plaintiff paid the costs.

From the reference to the usage in this case by the court, it would seem, that such usage if proved, would be recognized as the law of the contract. But, however this may be, the question for the court to determine is, whether in the act of congress the word bond must be defined by a reference to the common law, or to the usage, founded on local legislation, which obtains generally in the different states. The fact that the states have legislated on this subject, proves the inveteracy of the common law rule; but this does not operate against the inference we are about to draw. There is no common law as exclusively applicable to the federal authority. In the exercise of its judicial functions, it adopts the common law of the state, within which the case arises. But there is no general principle that pervades the Union, as a rule of right or of action, which is independent of the common law recognized in the states respectively. This, however, is not a question of local law, either statutory or common, but of construction and definition. What did the legislature mean by the word "bond" as used? That they intended to include an instrument, which at common law was denominated a "bond," is admitted, but did they intend to include under the designation of "bond," an instrument having a scrawl seal? This can best be determined by the general use and application of the term in this country.

It would be a dangerous precedent to go out of the country for the meaning of terms used in a statute, which, by common usage, have a definite meaning. The policy of a law is influenced not more by local considerations, than are the words used in the enactment of it. And words thus adopted are not to receive a technical and strained meaning against the popular sense. The principle may be fully and forcibly illustrated in the case under consideration. Congress is composed of representatives from the different states, and in those states with the exception of some two or three, an instrument sealed with a scrawl is as much a bond in its character and effect, as if it were sealed by wax or wafer, or any other tenacious substance. By a law of congress, certain officers are required to give bond; now, must this bond be sealed with wax, &c. or will a scrawl seal be sufficient? A scrawl equally with wax, by general usage, constitutes a seal. Is this general usage to be rejected, and the common law definition of a bond, only to be adhered to? On the contrary, is it not manifest that the legislature constituted as has been stated, legislate under the influence of general usage and popular definition? When the term "bond" is used, may it not, and indeed must it not, be presumed to be used in reference to the generally understood signification, as well in legal proceedings as in popular language? There is no rule of construction which is believed to conflict with this. It affords the only safe standard by which to judge of the language of a popular and representative body. To reject this safe and reasonable rule, for one however venerable for its antiquity, which has been exploded by almost all the states, would be to reject the lights of experience and modern advancement for the maxim of a barbarous and unenlightened age. The general legislation and usage of the states on this subject, may be said to give, in this case, the common law to the federal government. At least that it affords the only safe rule by which the terms used by congress are to be defined and understood. Where a state has adopted the common law, as in New York, and has not legislated on the subject, it is admitted that the common law definition of a bond would, in such state be the correct rule. The parties to the bond under consideration, as appears from its language, have treated the scrawls as seals, and have acknowledged them to be their seals. And shall that which a party calls a seal, and has acknowledged to be his seal, be rejected as such, under a general usage which makes it a seal? We think not. On the contrary, we think in reason and on established principles of construction, the instrument under consideration must be considered a bond within the requirement of the act of congress, and as such, binding on those who signed it. Judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Case No. 16,387.

UNITED STATES v. STERLAND.

[3 Quart. Law J. 244; 6 Pittsb. Leg. J. 50.]

District Court, W. D. Virginia. July, 1858.

EVIDENCE—DECEASED WITNESS.

1. In a prosecution against a postmaster, evidence having been given that the office was suspected on account of the disappearance of mail matter which led to investigation, and ultimately to the prosecution, it is competent for the defendant to repel the presumption arising from this testimony, by showing that miscarriages of the mails, sent through the same office continued after his removal from the office.

2. The rule that the testimony of a deceased witness may be given in evidence on a second trial between the same parties does not apply to a criminal cause. Such evidence is inadmissible to support either the prosecution or defence.

At October term, 1856, James Sterland was indicted for stealing a letter and its contents from the post office at Wytheville, Va., he being a clerk employed in said office. He was put upon trial at that term, but the jury failed to agree. He was again tried, with the like result, at May term, 1857; and now was put upon trial before a third jury, at this term.

It was proved that the prisoner was a clerk in the post office at Wytheville, and entrusted with the management of the mails at that place. A mail agent who was the principal witness for the prosecution, testified that in 1856 the post office at Wytheville had fallen under suspicion owing to irregularities, and disappearances of mail matter, which seemed to be attributable to that office. He had therefore investigated the matter and his investigation had resulted in this prosecution.

After the case for the United States was closed, the prisoner called a witness, James H. Myers, and stated that his purpose was to prove by this and other witnesses that after the 29th day of October, 1856, (when the prisoner was arrested and imprisoned,) divers letters containing money and valuables, which had been mailed at Wytheville, had never reached their destination; and that he was in jail from October, 1856, till the latter part of May, 1857, when he was admitted to bail. Objection was made to the admission of this testimony, and counsel were heard on the question.

F. B. Miller, U. S. Atty.

Floyd, Wysor & Cook, for prisoner.

BROCKENBROUGH, District Judge. Evidence has been given that prior to the commencement of this prosecution this post office had fallen under the suspicions of the department in consequence of delinquencies in the transmission of the mails, for which this office was believed to be responsible; and that these suspicions were the motives leading to the action and investigation which terminated in this prosecution; and it is also shown that the defendant was a clerk in this office, and of course exposed to these suspicions. This testimony was not necessary to support the prosecution. The facts might have been detailed without any statement of the suspicions which put the agents of government in motion. But that evidence is before the jury and the prisoner is exposed to its influence against him. Whatever may be the weight of the testimony —be its effect much or little—he must suffer something from its operation. It therefore seems pertinent to rebut the effect of this evidence. To do this the prisoner offers to show that after he was arrested and imprisoned, and therefore relieved from all suspicion on account of subsequent delinquencies, there were still irregularities and miscarriages in this office. I think this is relevant and proper testimony. He is to be affected by evidence of delinquencies occurring while he was in the office. I think he ought to be allowed to show that after his connection with the office had terminated and he was in such a situation as to render it impossible to suspect him, the delinquencies continued to occur. I must admit the evidence for what it is worth.

In the further progress of the case the prisoner proved that Eli Rider was examined as a witness in his behalf on the trial at May term, 1857, and that Rider had since died. He then called a witness who said that he heard Rider's evidence and could detail it; and the prisoner then proposed to offer Rider's statements in evidence. This was objected to on the ground that in a criminal trial, proof of the testimony given by a deceased witness on a former trial is not admissible. For the general rule on the subject the prisoner's counsel referred to 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 163–166, and to Strutt v. Bovingdon, 5 Esp. 56. On the other side, Finn v. Com., 5 Rand. [Va.] 701, was relied on.

BROCKENBROUGH, District Judge. There is no question as to the rule that in a civil action either party may give in evidence the facts deposed to by a deceased person who has testified upon a former trial. But I do not find that this course has ever been allowed in a criminal trial. On the other hand, Finn's Case is a direct authority against the admission of such evidence. It is true that in that case the testimony was offered against the prisoner, and the court held that it was the right of the accused to be confronted with his accuser and the witnesses. But if such evidence cannot be used against him, is it not a corollary from the decision that it may not be used in his favor? To me it seems that it is. But the defendant's counsel contend that Finn's Case is not binding upon this question, because upon the point now in dispute that decision was a mere obiter dictum. It is true that in Finn's Case the witness whose former testimony was offered against the prisoner was not dead; but he had left the commonwealth—was beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and for all the practical purposes of the prosecution was in the same condition as if dead. If it had been a civil action, proof of his statements on the former trial would have been admissible. The question therefore in that case was not precisely identical with the one at the bar; but the court considered the subject in both aspects, and decided that the absent witness could only be regarded as a dead man; or rather they decided that, even if he were dead, his statements would not be heard, and still less could they be admitted on the ground of his absence from the jurisdiction. I cannot say that I approve the rule as it is established. I can easily preceive the great oppression and hardship under which a man might suffer by reason of the death of his witness. It does seem that it is casting upon him an injury resulting from the act of God; and the remarks of Lord Ellenborough, in Strutt v. Bovingdon, are very apposite, that this is not the loose asseveration of an irresponsible person, but his statement under the sanction of an oath, and it comes in that sacramental form in which alone is evidence to be heard. But I have no alternative, and am constrained to hold that this evidence is not admissible.

The prisoner was found guilty and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment in the penitentiary of the United States.

Case No. 16,388.

UNITED STATES ex rel. VAN NORTHWICK v. STERLING.

[2 Biss. 408; [1] 3 Chi. Leg. News, 187; 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 100.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan., 1871.

MUNICIPAL BONDS—DUTY OF CITY AUTHORITIES—POWER TO COLLECT TAX.

1. The fact that the total revenue of a city is used in defraying its current expenses, does not constitute a legal or sufficient excuse for not paying its maturing indebtedness.

2. They have no right to spend their income in this way, leaving their bonds and other debts unpaid; but are bound to provide for and pay the latter, and on failure or refusal, this court will, by mandamus, compel them so to do.

3. A city, which by its charter has certain general powers of taxation, and by consent of a majority of its legal voters at a proper election, can levy and collect a further tax, cannot plead that they have not sufficient power to collect an adequate tax to pay their debts. Under such a charter the authorities should, from their ordinary revenue, discharge their legal indebtedness, and provide for their ordinary expenses by a further tax, according to their charter.

This was a demurrer to the return to an alternative writ of mandamus.

The substantial allegations in the application for this writ are that on the 20th of October, 1870, said relator [John Van Northwick], by the consideration and judgment of this court, recovered against said respondent, a municipal corporation of this state, with power to borrow money and issue bonds, a judgment for the sum of $5,069.57, which said judgment was for the amount then due and unpaid on certain bonds and coupons theretofore issued by said city to the relator; that due notice of said judgment had been given the respondent, and its officers requested to pay the same; but they failed and neglected to take any steps toward providing for such payment; and praying a writ of mandamus to compel the levy and collection of a sufficient tax to pay and satisfy said judgment.

To this writ the respondent filed an answer, admitting the recovery of said judgment and its non-payment, and also admitting the corporate existence of the respondent under the laws of this state, but insisting that by its act of incorporation said city authorities were only authorized to levy taxes at the rate of one per cent. per annum on the valuation of the taxable property of said city; that the expenses of said city government amount to about six thousand dollars per annum, and that the total receipts from taxes, licenses and fines, which were all the sources of revenue the respondent had, were only about six thousand dollars per annum. It further appeared from the return that said city charter contains in addition to the clause conferring power to assess and collect a tax of one per cent. on the valuation of the property of the city, this further clause: "The said city council may, however, levy and collect a tax for city purposes greater than one per cent., provided the same be done with the consent of a majority of the legal voters of said city voting at a general or special election ordered for such purpose." It further appeared that said city was in debt upon bonds bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, exclusive of said judgment, to the amount of $6,424.70, and a floating indebtedness of about $2,100. In other words, the substance of the return was that all the revenue derived from taxation at the rate of one per cent. and from licenses and fines was used in the payment of the current expenses of the city government, leaving nothing with which to liquidate said judgment and the other maturing indebtedness.

To this return the relator demurred, as being an insufficient answer to the writ.

Jewett & Jackson, for relator.

F. Sacket and M. S. Henry, for respondent.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The question raised by the demurrer is, does the return show a legal and sufficient excuse for the failure or refusal to pay the judgment referred to. There is no dispute as to the existence of the indebtedness, nor as to the power of the respondent to incur the same, so that the only question is as to the power and duty of the court, upon the admitted facts, to enforce its payment by the process of mandamus. The only excuse or reason urged against the application being the want of power in the corporate authorities to levy the tax requisite for the purpose.

Questions kindred to this have of late attracted much attention, and have been the subject of much discussion, both in this court and elsewhere, and the uniform tenor of the decisions has been such as to leave no doubt as to the general power of courts to enforce by mandamus the levy and collection of taxes by municipal corporations, for the purpose of paying the debts and obligations of such corporations. But it is insisted by the respondent that none of the cases have gone to the extent of compelling such levy and collection of taxes unless the same came within the delegated powers of the corporation.

For the purposes of this case I do not deem it necessary to discuss the abstract question as to what courts shall do in cases where there is a want of adequate power of taxation to pay a legally contracted indebtedness, as it seems to me the respondent has ample corporate power to meet this emergency. It has power to levy a tax of one per cent. on the assessed value of all real and personal property within its limits. And with the consent of its legal voters, expressed at any general or special election, it has an unlimited power of taxation. It seems then clear to me that if the tax of one per cent. was not sufficient to raise the amount needed to meet this liability, it was the duty of the city authorities to call an election and require its voters to vote a sufficient tax for the purpose. The duty of paying municipal debts is as obligatory upon the citizens as upon the officers of the city. Indeed, the city authorities are only the agents of the citizens. Besides, what right had the city officers to expend the entire income of the city from the one per cent. tax in payment of current expenses, and leave this indebtedness unprovided for? Why did they not, from the proceeds of this one per cent. tax, pay the bonds and coupons on which this judgment was rendered, and take a vote as to the expediency of raising a further tax to defray current expenses? The proceeds of this one per cent. tax are not specially set apart and dedicated to the payment of current expenses.

The bonds for which this judgment was rendered had been legally issued, and the city authorities and voters were all chargeable with notice that they were due and ought to be paid. They should then have levied and collected an adequate tax in apt time to have the money ready when their obligations matured, and, having failed to do so, are guilty of a breach of duty which the writ of mandamus will compel them to perform.

In the case of City of Galena v. Amy, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 705, the city authorities of Galena had power, if they thought the public good required it, to levy a tax, etc. There the power was discretionary in the city authorities, and yet the court held that they were bound to exercise this discretion, and compelled them by mandamus to do so.

The same doctrine is enunciated with equal emphasis in Supervisors v. U. S., 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 435; Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, Id. 535; People v. City of Cairo, 50 Ill. 154; Riggs v. Johnson Co., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 166. The aspect then of the case is this: The respondents owe the debt, and acknowledge their legal and moral obligation to pay it, but have failed to take the necessary steps to raise the funds wherewith to do so. They have the power to levy and collect an adequate tax, and their duty is co-extensive with that power. For these reasons the mandamus must be made peremptory.

NOTE. The United States circuit court has power to issue a mandamus requiring state or municipal officers to levy and collect a tax. U. S. v. Treasurer of Muscatine Co. (Lansing v. County Treasurer) [Case No. 16,538]; U. S. v. Lee Co. [Id. 15,589], and cases there cited. The municipality having issued the bonds may be compelled to pay the interest. Flagg v. UNITED STATES v. STERN.

[5 Blatchf. 512; [1] 6 Int. Rev. Rec. 169.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 13, 1867.

BRIBERY—INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS.

The words, "and shall be thereof convicted," in the 62d section of the internal revenue act of July 13th, 1866 (14 Stat. 168), which makes it an indictable offence to bribe an officer of the United States, are to be treated as surplusage.

[Cited in Edwards v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (Colo. Sup.) 21 Pac. 1012; Gould v. Wise (Nev.) 3 Pac. 33; Henderson v. Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co., 81 Mo. 608.]

This was a motion in arrest of judgment. The defendant [David Stern] was indicted, under the 62d section of the internal revenue act of July 13th, 1866 (14 Stat. 168), for an attempt to bribe an officer of the United States, and was found guilty by the jury. The motion was founded on the ground that, under the section, as it was drawn, no conviction could be had.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The phraseology of the section in question is certainly extraordinary. It is as follows: "And be it further enacted, that, if any person or persons shall, directly or indirectly, promise, offer or give, or cause or procure to be promised, offered or given, any money, goods, right in action, bribe, present or reward, * * * * to any officer of the United States, * * * * with intent to influence any such officer or person to commit, or aid and abet in committing, any fraud on the revenue of the United States, or to connive at, or collude in or to allow or permit, or make opportunity for, the commission of any such fraud, and shall be thereof convicted, such person or persons so offering * * * * shall be liable to indictment in any court of the United States having jurisdiction, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding three times the amount so offered, * * * * and imprisoned not exceeding three years." Such being the act, the point taken is, that it must be held to be inoperative and impossible to be executed, as, by express words, a previous conviction is made necessary before an indictment can be found. Such, indeed, must be the result, if any effect is to be given to the words, "and shall be thereof convicted." It is not a case of the mere transposition of a word or a sentence; nor can any signification be given to the words referred to, which will render them consistent with the rest of the provision. To give them any meaning at all, as they stand, is to render the whole act meaningless; and the question is, whether these words, standing as they do, shall be treated as surplusage and of no effect, or whether, by giving them effect, the whole act shall be rendered void. Without these words, the act is complete; for, it defines an offence, declares it to be the subject of indictment, and provides a punishment on conviction. It is an act which was loudly called for, to prevent, if possible, a crime justly supposed to be of great and alarming frequency. To suppose that congress, while pretending to remedy such an evil, intended to pass an act which, by its own express words, was to be rendered wholly ineffective, under any possible circumstances, is to suppose congress to be capable of deliberate folly, if not of fraud upon the public. I entertain no doubt, that it is the duty of a court to prevent such a result, and, by treating the words in question as surplusage, to carry out the intention of congress, as manifested by the passage of an act on the subject in question, and by the various provisions which are incorporated in the act.

The section must, therefore, be read as if the words, "and shall be thereof convicted," which are without meaning, as they are used, were not present. This disposes of the question raised on behalf of the prisoner, and judgment must, accordingly, be entered on the verdict.

Case No. 16,390.

UNITED STATES v. STETSON.

[3 Woodb. & M. 164.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1847.

INDICTMENT — DIFFERENT OFFENCES — JUDGMENT — WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS — LARCENY.

1. When an indictment describes in different counts different offences, and of different grades and punishments, implied from the same transaction, and the verdict is guilty of the last count only, judgment may properly be rendered on the verdict.

[Cited in brief in State v. Watson, 63 Me. 134.]

2. If articles stolen are alleged to belong to owners "unknown," the indictment is good on its face; and if the owners were, in fact, known, the objection should have been taken to the evidence at the trial for a variance or by special plea.

The respondent [Matthew Stetson] had been indicted and tried at the first session of this term, for a charge of piracy, in one count, for running away, piratically, in July, 1845, with a cargo of whale oil, at Sidney, in New South Wales, in the barque La Grange, a vessel belonging to citizens of the United States, of which he was commander, and which had sailed from New Bedford. In another count he was charged with larceny of the same oil. In both, the owners were described as unknown. At the trial he was found guilty of the second count.

His counsel, at the adjourned session of the court in September, A. D. 1847, filed a motion in arrest of judgment, a copy of which is annexed: "And now, after verdict and before judgment, the said Matthew, by his counsel assigned to him by the court, move the court in arrest of judgment, that the prisoner be discharged, for the causes following, viz.: 1st. Because the indictment avers the property to be of certain persons whose names are to the jurors aforesaid, unknown; and Atkins Adams, a witness on the trial, testified that he was one of the owners of said property; and that he appeared as a witness before the grand jury, who found the bill of indictment in this case; so that by inquiry, the grand jury might have ascertained the names of the owners, and ought to have averred them in the indictment. 2d. Because the first count is for felony, and the second for a misdemeanor, which two counts cannot be properly and legally joined in one indictment."

J. Wingate Thornton, for the prisoner.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. The first ground assigned for the motion in arrest of judgment has been fully considered by this court, in U. S. v. Peterson [Case No. 16,037]. There it was held that if two counts were united in one indictment for the same offence, describing it in the two as of different degrees of turpitude, so as to regard different kinds of punishment of like character, the judgment would not be arrested. And the impression conveyed is, that if the punishments were of a character clearly different, the motion would prevail; and the more especially so, if the crimes were connected with two different transactions. The reason for it then would be, that the court had no means of knowing of which grade of crime, under a general verdict, a jury had supposed the defendant to be guilty, if it was but one transaction; or of which of the two, if there were two transactions. But on the contrary, the inference might, perhaps, as well be in both cases, that the jury found the prisoner guilty under both counts, and both being good in form, the court might at least sentence him for either. In this case, however, there is no difficulty in rendering judgment on the last count alone, as the jury have found the prisoner guilty of that count alone. The transaction was also one and the same which was referred to in both counts. There is no danger to the prisoner in this course, and we are not aware of any precedents against it, when the verdict, as here, was not general on the whole indictment, but limited, ipsissimis verbis, to the last count. The cases cited for the prisoner on this point from 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 254; Archb. Cr. Pl. 60; and 3 Term R. 100, were, with many others, considered and explained in the Case of Peterson, before referred to.

In respect to the second objection, it resolves itself, when analyzed, into a question rather of fact than law. It is, in substance, that the indictment describes the owners of the oil stolen as "unknown," when in truth they were known,—one of the witnesses being the owner. But a motion in arrest cannot be maintained for an error in fact committed by the grand jury and existing in the indictment. It must rest on exceptions in law to what is alleged as a fact, and in law a description of the owners of the property as "unknown," is very common and is legal. See forms passim, 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 212; Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 25, § 71; 2 Hale, P. C. 181; Cro. Car. 36; Plowd. 85b; 2 Chit. Cr. Law, 499. At the same time it may be in some views important to the prisoner to have the ownership stated truly; and the question is put by his counsel, how can he avail himself of a mistake in the indictment in this respect, unless by a motion in arrest? No difficulty is seen in objecting to the evidence at the trial, if it states the owners to be known, when in the indictment they are described as unknown. If the difference be material it would be considered a fatal variance in the proof or in the probata from the allegata. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 175, 213; 2 East, P. C. 651, 781; 3 Camp. 265, note; 2 Leach, 578. Again, perhaps, it might if material, be pleaded specially on leave at the time of filing the general issue. But in the present case the counsel for the prisoner is probably under a mistake in supposing all the owners of the oil were known at the trial. One of the owners of the ship was present at the trial; but he was only a part owner of either the ship or the cargo. And after the lapse of many years since the transaction, and the owners being numerous, there was an inherent difficulty in describing each of them, which probably led the grand jury and justified them to state that the owners were not known. Motion overruled.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 341.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1833.

KEEPING DISORDERLY HOUSE—EVIDENCE OF REPUTATION.

Upon a count for keeping a disorderly house, charging that the defendant suffered persons of ill fame to come together, &c., evidence may be given of the general reputation of such persons. And the same evidence is admissible upon a count for keeping a bawdy-house.

[Cited in Henson v. State, 62 Md. 235; State v. Towler, 13 R. I. 66.]

The indictment [against Jemima Stevens] had two counts: 1. For keeping a bawdy-house. 2. For keeping a disorderly house.

THE COURT permitted evidence to be given of the general reputation of the persons who visited the house, in support of the averment in the second count, that the defendant suffered persons of ill fame to come together, &c.; and also of the averment in the first count, that the defendant suffered evil-disposed persons, &c., to commit fornication, &c.

UNITED STATES v. STEVENS et al.

[2 Hask. 164.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Nov., 1877.

CRIMINAL LAW—REASONABLE DOUBT—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES—CONSPIRACY—EVIDENCE OF ACCOMPLICES — MASTER AND SERVANT — QUITTING EMPLOYMENT.

1. A reasonable doubt is more than a captious doubt. It is a doubt for which a reason may be assigned, not necessarily sufficient to convince another, but such as may properly influence a juror honestly endeavoring to perform his duty.

2. Jurors should not disbelieve a witness, unless for good reason and they must determine the facts regardless of statements either of counsel or court.

3. A conspiracy to obstruct the mail in violation of Rev. St. § 3995, is a violation of section 5440, as a conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States.

4. An intention to obstruct the mail flows from an unlawful act that so operates, although its primary object was to accomplish another purpose.

5. Upon prima facie proof of a conspiracy the acts and declarations of each conspirator are competent evidence to go to the jury upon the trial of any one of them.

6. The jury must be first satisfied of a common design, confederation and purpose, before the acts and declarations of one participating are competent evidence against a confederate to prove the scope and purpose of the conspiracy.

7. It is lawful for employés, without any illegal purpose, to quietly and peaceably leave the service of their employer by concerted action at a given time so long as they do not violate any contract to remain longer.

8. It is unlawful for employés, whose employment is at an end, to combine to induce others to quit the same service at the same time, but before their employment has expired.

9. One, employed to work a day, cannot lawfully quit work before the day is done.

10. An engine driver employed by the day, to daily make a particular run, cannot lawfully quit before the run is made.

Indictment for conspiring to obstruct the United States mail. The defendants [George W. Stevens, George W. Kent, Warren H. Walker, Charles Stevens, Taylor L. Dodge, and Henry G. Mills] were members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and with their fellows, engine drivers on the Boston & Maine Railroad, sixty-seven in all, struck, and by concert of action, quit work at four o'clock in the afternoon. One of these engineers, not a defendant, at work by the day, whose accustomed run was from Exeter, N. H., to Portland, Me., and back, having partly completed his return run in charge of an engine hauling a mail train, at four o'clock stopped the train away from a station in an out of the way place east of Kennebunk in Maine, detached his engine and kept control of it until six o'clock by running it back and forth on the road, then extinguished the fire, drew the water from the boiler and abandoned it, the mails being thereby delayed. The first four defendants were members of a committee of the striking engineers directing or advising their conduct, and all the defendants were convicted.

The cause was heard upon a motion for a new trial for misdirection, and because the verdict was against law and evidence. After elaborate argument, it was considered by the court that no error existed in the charge presented below, and that the verdict was neither against law nor evidence, and judgment was ordered on the verdict without any formulated opinion.

Nathan Webb, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Almon A. Strout, for G. W. and C. Stevens, Kent and Walker.
Charles P. Mattocks, for Dodge and Mills.

Before SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge, and FOX, District Judge.

FOX, District Judge (charging jury). The counsel on both sides of this cause have dwelt with some force upon its great importance, and I feel that it is not inappropriate for me to reaffirm that proposition. I apprehend that however many causes you may any of you have been engaged in as jurors, there never has been one in which there was really a greater interest and greater questions involved than in the present cause. I know that during the experience that I have had in this place, I have had none come before me in which I felt there were more important matters involved than I feel that there are in the present cause which is now to be determined by you. It is of vital importance to these defendants, because it involves punishment both of fine and imprisonment in case they are found guilty. Therefore, gentlemen, in their behalf I invoke of you a most careful and candid consideration of the testimony, that no wrong be done to them by you in your deliberations. It is also of the greatest importance to the government and to the public at large.

You are well aware that the constitution of the United States has delegated to the United States government the control and direction of the mails. When the government was formed, it was deemed of so great importance, the management of this great department, that it was decided that it should not be committed to the various states, but that the general government for the general public welfare should control and regulate the management of the mails. And probably each one of you, on reflection, will come to the conclusion that there is no department of the government in which the public at large have so great an interest and derive so much benefit from as they do from the post office. Think one moment what the consequences would be if the mails should be destroyed for a single day that are passing merely in this state of Maine—how many sufferers there would be.

The government of the United States, therefore, having had committed to it by the constitution the control of the mails, has seen fit to legislate upon the subject, and has done so fully for its protection. It has declared that it shall be an offense to knowingly and wilfully obstruct the mails. It has also declared that there shall be such an offense as amounts to conspiracy, by the combination of two or more persons to violate the law of the United States, and, having thus combined, by doing some act in perfecting the violation. It has been stated to you what the punishment is in the one case, and what the punishment is in the other, and it is a fact that the law provides a more severe punishment, decidedly more severe, for a conspiracy to violate this provision of the law by knowingly and wilfully obstructing the mails than it does for the mere simple act of one person committing the crime.

You may ask yourselves why the government has seen fit, why congress has seen proper to impose a heavier punishment for the conspiracy than for the crime itself; probably a moment's reflection will satisfy you that it is quite right that there should be this distinction. The crime can be committed by a single person; generally speaking conspiracies are much more substantial than that. The moment there is this combination of purpose to violate the law, there is that element of force brought to bear upon the law which is much more difficult to contend with than the act of a single individual. Here is this combination of men in one case, while in the other there is the single individual. You can all, in a moment, see that where large masses of people are concerned in resisting the law, the law itself has much more to contend with than it would if each one of them stood alone without any combination; that it is much more difficult to resist a mob and escape danger that the law may be put down and the courts be overcome, than in the case of the single individual, where there is not this concert of action. Therefore, it seems to me, it was wise that congress should declare that, while we punish the one man merely for the commission of the offense, if a body of men get together and say we will stand against the law and we will resist and break the law, we will punish these men because they come with more force to resist the law and with more power to overcome the court; that it is right and just and proper that there should be this difference made in punishment.

Now, therefore, gentlemen, if these men have violated the law, let them take the consequences of it; if they have not violated the law, it is your duty and no doubt it will be your pleasure to say that they are not guilty. You will remember, that the presumption of innocence is a presumption which the law makes in all cases, even when a party has been indicted by the grand jury of the country. The indictment is simply to put the party upon trial, to subject him to inquiry. You are not, from the mere fact of the indictment having been found, to find that he is guilty of the offense with which he is charged. This presumption remains till you are satisfied of his guilt, and you must be satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. What is meant by a reasonable doubt? I refer you to the language of the Chief Justice of the United States in one of the Ku Klux Cases, where he was called upon to explain the meaning of reasonable doubt. He says:

"The burden of proof, gentlemen, is upon the government. It is a wise maxim of the law in favor of life and liberty, that every man is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty, and this presumption is to continue with you, sitting as jurors, until it has been overcome by the testimony beyond a reasonable doubt. But a reasonable doubt is something more than a captious doubt, a mere vague notion that possibly the accused may be innocent. It must be a doubt for which a reason may be assigned. It need not be a reason sufficient to convince another, but it must be such as may properly influence the mind of one who is honestly endeavoring to perform his solemn duty as a juror." U. S. v. Butler [Case No. 14,700].

That is the language of the chief justice of the United States of America, which I am bound to receive as law, and so declare to you. You are bound, both in civil and criminal cases, to receive as the law whatever the court may declare it to you to be. There must be some tribunal which shall determine what the law is; the law must be fixed and stable and permanent and not dependent on the notions of men who are called occasionally to examine it; and therefore, it has been wisely determined that the court shall declare the law and that the jury shall determine the facts. It is therefore your province to determine all the facts, to believe such witnesses as you see fit; you have no right to disbelieve a witness upon mere prejudiced assumptions without there is something in the appearance of the witness or in his testimony in conflict with other testimony. You should deal fairly and justly with witnesses, and, unless there is some good reason for you to disbelieve them, you should believe their testimony. But the whole is for you; you are to draw your own inferences and pass upon the whole case and determine what is proved to your own satisfaction; you will not be governed in regard to that matter either by the statements of court or counsel. The counsel in the ardor of conflict may miss-recollect or misstate testimony; the court may misapprehend the testimony. So that, after all, if from any source whatever there is a statement made in regard to testimony, which according to your recollection is incorrect, you must be governed by your own recollection and not by such statement, no matter whence it came.

The act of congress (Rev. St. § 3995) declares that "any person who shall knowingly and wilfully obstruct or retard the passage of the mail, or any horse, carriage, driver or carrier, carrying the same, shall, for every such offense, be punishable by a fine of not more than one hundred dollars."

Now, the meaning of this section has been declared by the supreme court of the United States, which in this case I am bound to receive as the law of the land and so declare it to you. The supreme court of the United States in 1868, being called upon to interpret that section, declared: "The statute of congress by its terms applies only to persons who 'knowingly and wilfully' obstruct or retard the passage of the mail, or of its carrier; that is, to those who know that the acts performed will have that effect, and perform them with the intention that such shall be their operation. When the acts which create the obstruction are in themselves unlawful, the intention to obstruct will be imputed to their author, although the attainment of other ends may have been his primary object. That statute has no reference to acts lawful in themselves, from the execution of which a temporary delay to the mails unavoidably follows." U. S. v. Kirby, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 485.

That portion to which I especially call your attention as applicable to the charge here as to what constitutes an unlawful and wilful obstruction of the mail is: "When the acts which create the obstruction are in themselves unlawful, the intention to obstruct will be imputed to their author, although the attainment of other ends may have been his primary object." That construction has been carried out repeatedly of late years.

Now that being the crime which these parties are charged with having conspired to commit, and such being the definition of it, what do we find in regard to a conspiracy? There is no general statute touching the subject except section 5440, and that reads as follows:

"If two or more persons conspire, either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars and not more than ten thousand dollars, and to imprisonment not more than two years." That is to say, there must be a combination, an agreement; that agreement may be inferred from the proceedings of the parties; but there must be an understanding with two or more persons to commit an offense against the United States.

Some questions were raised in the outset in regard to this indictment, and whether the allegations which are here found in the indictment constitute an offense. For the purposes of this trial I instruct you, that a conspiracy to commit an offense described in section 3995 is within section 5440, and is an offense under the latter section; that the indictment in the present case is in due form, and with the requisite averments charges these defendants with the commission of an offense under section 5440. If I am wrong in this, and it should be necessary, those who are over me will come in and aid us in the investigation. It seems to me there can be no doubt in regard to it. You will take that as the law, that this indictment does charge these men with the commission of an offense within these two sections.

Now, gentlemen, in regard to the evidence which has been offered here; some tribunal must determine as to the admissibility of testimony; and the law has declared that the court shall, in the first place, say whether the testimony is or is not admissible as tending to prove the guilt or innocence of the party. The duty, therefore, devolved upon me, sitting here alone, to determine what testimony should be admitted in this cause. The trial has been somewhat more complex than most causes, involving matters which do not often arise, and the court had to thread its way, the best it could, when there was an attempt to offer evidence bearing upon the defendants in the cause, that another party, whom the law may deem the agent of the defendants, had been concerned in performing an act which would be evidence against them.

A good deal of time you will notice was occupied, and properly, in the discussion of the admissibility of testimony; and you must have noticed that the court, whether correctly or not, ruled out a very large portion of the testimony which the government undertook to offer in this cause, and that I have limited the testimony to the acts of the defendants themselves and of those who may be called the "striking engineers." I had doubts whether I was not restricting the government within somewhat narrow limits; I have more doubts now, but, under the circumstances of the case, I gave, in every instance, the defendants the benefit of the doubt. I rejected all testimony to the admissibility of which I entertained any serious doubts, for I did not want to subject them to the consequences of any illegal testimony, because if I did, I should have done them a very great wrong. I, therefore gentlemen, as I think, have admitted not a particle of testimony here which was not clearly admissible against these defendants.

The law is peculiar in regard to conspiracies, and in regard to the evidence of parties who may be said to be co-conspirators. Mr. Greenleaf, the learned author of a book on Evidence, which we all receive in almost every instance as the most correct exposition of the law, says: "A foundation must first be laid by proof, sufficient in the opinion of the judge to establish prima facie the fact of conspiracy between the parties, or proper to be laid before the jury as tending to establish such fact. The connection of the individuals in the unlawful enterprise being thus shown, every act and declaration of each member of the confederacy, in pursuance of the original concerted plan and with reference to the common object, is, in contemplation of law, the act and declaration of them all, and is therefore original evidence against each of them. It makes no difference at what time any one entered into the conspiracy. Every one, who does enter into a common purpose or design, is" generally deemed "in law a party to every act which had before been done by the others, and a party to every act which may afterwards be done by any of the others in furtherance of such common design. Sometimes, for the sake of convenience, the acts or declarations of one are admitted in evidence before sufficient proof is given of the conspiracy, the prosecutor undertaking to furnish such proof in a subsequent stage of the case. But this rests in the discretion of the judge, and is not permitted, except under particular and urgent circumstances, lest the jury should be misled to infer the fact itself of the conspiracy from the declarations of strangers." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 111.

And in another volume he again calls our attention to this same subject, and declares: "The evidence in proof of a conspiracy will generally, from the nature of the case, be circumstantial. Though the common design is the essence of the charge, it is not necessary to prove that the defendants came together and actually agreed in terms to have that design, and to pursue it by common means. If it be proved that the defendants pursued by their acts the same object, often by the same means, one performing one part and another another part of the same so as to complete it, with a view to the attainment of that same object, the jury will be justified in the conclusion that they were engaged in a conspiracy to effect that object. Nor is it necessary to prove that the conspiracy originated with the defendants, or that they met during the process of its concoction; for every person entering into a conspiracy or common design already formed is deemed in law a party to all acts done by any of the other parties, before or afterwards, in furtherance of the common design. The principle, on which the acts and declarations of other conspirators and acts done at different times are admitted in evidence against the persons prosecuted, is that, by the act of conspiring together, the conspirators have jointly assumed to themselves, as a body, the attribute of individuality so far as regards the prosecution of the common design, thus rendering whatever is done or said by any one in furtherance of that design a part of the res gestæ, and therefore the act of all. It is the same principle of identity with each other that governs in regard to the acts and admissions of agents when offered in evidence against their principals, and of partners as against the partnership." 3 Greenl. Ev. §§ 93, 94.

In this same Ku Klux Case, the chief justice of the United States had occasion to consider this branch of the law, and he there declared more concisely, but substantially as Mr. Greenleaf has declared: "Each member of a conspiracy is responsible personally for the acts of every member thereof, done in furtherance of its illegal purpose, whether he be himself present or not. It follows that the acts and declarations of one of the conspirators, while actually engaged in giving effect to the common purpose, may be given in evidence against his co-conspirators. Having a common purpose, the acts and declarations of one, while carrying that purpose into effect, are the acts and declarations of all. But isolated acts of violence by individuals who may have been engaged in the conspiracy cannot be used against the others, unless it appears that they were done in furtherance of the common purpose. All are bound by them if they resulted from the original unlawful agreement between the parties to accomplish by their concerted action the proposed result."

You thus have the law clearly declared by the chief justice of the United States of America, that parties may be affected by the acts of others when there is a conspiracy to commit a common crime, when they are all actuated by a common purpose to effect a common result. The acts of one affect the others exactly as the acts of your agent would affect you, Mr. Foreman, in case you employed an agent to transact any business for you.

But, gentlemen, although in the outset the admission of this testimony was a matter for the opinion of the court, exercising its best judgment, after all, it comes back to you for your consideration under the following instruction: I say to you that in the opinion of the court there was prima facie evidence that these defendants with the other engineers, who on February 12th quit the employment of the Boston & Maine Railroad, were jointly acting in combination and concert, and aiding and assisting each other in carrying out the common purpose of a violation of section 3995, in obstructing the mails, so as to make the acts and declarations of such engineers done and made in the furtherance of, and during the pendency of the unlawful purpose, competent evidence to go to the jury against these defendants, but that it still remains a matter for the determination of the jury, whether those engineers were so acting in concert and co-operating with each other and these defendants in the common design of wilfully obstructing the mails. If so acting in concert and co-operating, in the opinion of the jury, then their acts and declarations, if done and made in pursuance of, and while engaged in carrying out the common design and object, and before it had been completed and determined, were competent evidence to be weighed by the jury against these defendants; but if not so co-operating, then such acts and declarations are not to be considered by the jury, but are to be rejected from the case, in pursuance of the general principle, that the acts and declarations of one person are not evidence against another.

So that it comes back to you to consider whether there was this concert and combination among all these persons—among the whole sixty-seven engineers. If so, then whatever any one of them thus did or said in furtherance of the common object is competent evidence to weigh against the rest. But, if there was no combination, the defendants are not to be affected by the acts of a stranger for whose acts they are in no way responsible.

We now come to the charge which is made and the evidence introduced by the government to sustain that charge. There are upon trial six men; two by the name of Stevens, one by the name of Kent, and one by the name of Walker, have been known throughout this trial as a committee of somebody or some party; there are two others upon trial, who were not members of the committee, Mills and Dodge; there are two other persons named in the indictment, Whitten, about whom you have heard a good deal, but who is not now upon trial, and Merrill, whom we have heard but little of, and who, I understand, was not originally one of the men who struck, but was one of the new men engaged, but whom it was claimed did not perform his contract. Your attention is to be directed to the four men of the committee and two other men, Dodge and Mills.

The government charges that the defendants conspired together to wilfully and knowingly obstruct the mails running on the Boston & Maine Railroad from Portland to Boston. The charge is that this was done on the twelfth of February. I have to say to you that the government is not confined to that day; it may prove the act at any time and on more than one day at or about that time; and if it does prove the offense to have thus been committed by these defendants, it is sufficient, although the averment is that it was on the twelfth of February.

The government has offered before you certain documentary testimony, which I do not understand is denied to be connected, so far as it is of any avail, with these first four defendants, the two Stevens', Kent and Walker. There are these papers which purport to be signed by them. Whether they were signed by them or not, you will probably think is of very little consequence, because there is no question made but that these papers are their acts, as I understand. You will have these papers before you, and in connection with them the letter of Arthur, who was the head man of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. Examine them carefully, and see what they say and what they propose to do. In the first place you will ask yourselves the question, for whom did these men act? Were they acting for themselves, or were they acting for the whole Brotherhood of Engineers? And, if you take these communications together, all which eventually came to Mr. White, president of the Boston & Maine, you will judge for yourselves whether there can be any doubt that these men did not merely act for themselves, but that they claimed to act in behalf of, and as representing the whole body of the engineers of the Boston & Maine. It is important that you should take this matter into consideration in an ulterior view of the case. If they were acting for all the engineers, then you will enquire whether they had authority to act for all the engineers. It is for you to determine, from all the testimony, whether or not these men assumed to act merely for themselves as a committee, without being delegated by the engineers as a body, or whether the whole body of engineers got together and appointed these men their committee to carry out their purposes. I think, gentlemen, but of that you will judge, that the evidence shows that this committee did not undertake to act for themselves alone, but undertook to represent the whole body of engineers.

What do they say they will do? In those letters they make various demands, claiming to act, and saying they are acting in behalf of the engineers of the railroad; they finally come to the conclusion that on the twelfth day of February, at four o'clock, they will quit work if their demands are not complied with. The defendants say that is all they undertook to do, that is the whole extent of all these men had any purpose or design to accomplish; merely to quit work. I have a few words to say to you in regard to the rights of men to quit their work under such circumstances. We all understand that in this country no man can be made to make any particular contract with another person or company as to his work. Each man is at liberty to make just such a contract as he pleases. On the other side, the corporation is at liberty to employ him, and has a right to say just what the terms of their contract shall be, what shall be the extent of the labor, and how long it shall continue, and when it shall determine; and no man can step in between them and say, "You have no legal right to do anything of this kind."

So that, gentlemen, each one of these engineers had a right to make his own bargain with this company to be employed at just such wages as the company would agree to give him, and if he did not choose to employ with them, he could go on his way and leave the company to procure other men as it could. They had a right to elect that the term of service should be a week, or two weeks, or a year, or a day; whatever the term of service was, the parties were obliged to carry out, or else they would be guilty of violating their contract.

Now, I say to you this: Where there was no term of service agreed upon, or if the term of service which was agreed upon had expired, then the man had a right to leave the service, and nobody had a right to compel him to remain in the service. In this case I go farther than that, and say that these engineers had a right, if they saw fit, peaceably and quietly and without having any illegal purpose or object in view, to agree among themselves to quit work at any hour after reasonable notice, at an hour when they were not under a contract to work beyond that hour; but, if they were under contract to work beyond that hour, then for any combination or concert of men whose time was up, and so declared, to induce the others, whose time was not up, to violate their contract, to break off and leave their work, was an illegal act which the law would not justify them in doing.

Now, gentlemen, it may be important for you to determine, when you come to what was done on the twelfth of February by these different engineers, whether there was any concert of action to cause persons, who were under obligation to work beyond four o'clock of that day, to violate that contract to quit their work when they were bound by their contract to continue their work. That is a matter for you to determine. The evidence, as I understand it, is, but as I have before said, when I state testimony, it is always subject to your recollection, that there was no obligation for any man to work for any length of time beyond the day on which he was employed; they were hired by the day and were paid by the day, and when the day's work was ended, under that contract, they were at liberty to quit. But, gentlemen, if a man was employed to do a day's work, if that was the contract under which he was employed, he had no right to quit at four o'clock and say, I will not work beyond this time, for he would thereby violate his contract just as much as though he had been hired by the year, and had quit after working but six months, and said the balance he would not work. The duration of the contract is of no consequence, provided there was a conspiracy to induce the men to break their contract, to give up their work during the time the contract was in force, which it required them to go on and complete.

This point is important as bearing upon the conduct of Whitten and of Cook, who, I think, were on the noon trains between Boston and Portland. I inquired particularly of Mr. Furber, but you will recollect what the obligation was, what those men were expected to do under their contract with him, for how long they were hired and what was the route which they were engaged for, and he went on and stated that they were hired by the day, that the route which they were employed for was between Exeter and Portland, back and forth. Now, gentlemen, if that was the contract, and those two men were employed on the twelfth of February to run from Exeter to Portland and back again, they had no business, when they were in the course of performing that contract, to quit their engine, and the other men had no business to induce them to do it; and if there was a conspiracy, therefore, on the part of those men whose time was up, and who were under no obligation to work during the rest of the day, if those men conspired to induce and did induce these two men to quit their work for one hour during that day, when by the terms of the contract they were obliged to work the day out, it was an illegal arrangement, an illegal act which the law will not justify.

It is for you to determine from all the testimony what this contract was, how Cook and Whitten were employed, and whether their contract was of that character that they had a right to quit any moment and leave their train where it might be, in the woods, and take the engine and go off and leave the passengers there; or whether the contract was that they should take that train through to Portland or to Exeter, deliver it up there, and thus do the work they agreed to do. If the contract was, as last stated they were guilty of a breach of contract in not doing it. It is for you to determine whether there was in this respect a conspiracy to do an illegal act.

I repeat, that no man who was under any obligation to work after four o'clock had a right to agree with his fellows that he wouldn't work after that time. If they were under no obligation to work after four o'clock, they had a right to enter into an agreement to leave at that time, but they had no right to undertake to induce parties, who were obliged by contract to work beyond four o'clock, to break that contract and leave their work. Therefore, you will determine this question in the first place, what the contract of these men was, the one who left the Portland train going out and the one who left the Boston train coming down, and the other man on the Newburyport train, and whether or not they were justified, under the terms of the contracts they had entered into, in leaving the trains as they did. There may be no positive direct testimony before you as to what these contracts were. Perhaps there is no direct testimony before you that Whitten agreed to run his train from Portland to Exeter and from Exeter to Portland. It is for you to say what was a fair understanding of that contract and whether these men had a right to leave their engines and thus abandon the road, abandon the train and abandon the mail for two hours at least as was done by Whitten. Therefore you will examine that question for yourselves, determine what these contracts were, whether there was any breach of them, and whether these defendants conspired with them to break their contracts.

Now, gentlemen, what was done on the twelfth of February? I propose to read some of the testimony upon this point to you, not trusting to my own recollection in regard to it; I do not even ask you to trust to my minutes, but, refreshing your recollection, you will determine whether I am correct or not. We will, in the first place, take the afternoon train which left Portland, and I will call your attention to Weymouth's testimony. He says:

"I was conductor of passenger train on Boston & Maine mail train February 12th; I. was to leave Portland at three o'clock for Boston, started on time. Benjamin Whitten had charge of engine, Murray fireman, six cars all told. We got within about three miles of Kennebunk depot, train was stopped, unusual place. I looked out and found engine had left the train and was some distance off, moving. I left the train in charge of baggage master and brakeman; called on Howard and a fireman with Smith to go up the track with me. Howard was a spare engineer in the car. We went up the road; locomotive stopped near a mile from train. When we were within a short distance, engine started again, went half a mile and stopped. We got within a short distance; engine moved and then stopped; it pretty soon came back twenty miles an hour, passed us. Whitten was on, managing the engine; I signalled to him; he made signs he would receive me; he stopped a short distance below us, he said 'keep them men back and you may come up.' Some passengers were following us. I stopped the men, went to the engine; old fireman was on; I got on engine, on foot board. Whitten said he was willing for me to get on, but 'them men' should not on any condition, nor no one else with the intention of taking the engine from him. I asked Whitten, if he struck at four, by whose authority he was keeping the engine. He said he was ordered by the committee to keep the engine till six unless a compromise was made with company, in which case, they would be notified by telegraph; if they received notice to keep on working, he would back up and couple on train by my notifying him from the office, and that if he did not get any order from Boston, at six he should leave engine without any water in tank or boiler, or a fire, with pump let down so she should not be hurt if she stood there all night. I told him I would go to the depot and if any order came I would notify him. He said orders were to come from committee; I was not able to regain engine before six."

There you have the statement of what was done by Whitten with that engine, and that testimony is corroborated to some extent by Howard. You have also the testimony in regard to the other engine which was the other side of Kennebunk. That engine, if I recollect right, had Cook on as engineer, and when they got down in the vicinity of Wells, according to the testimony, he signalled and the brakes were put on. He disconnected his engine and kept possession of it until about six o'clock when it was given up without any damage being done to it of any kind, excepting the fire was out, the hose was disconnected and the water was out of the boiler. You have also the testimony in regard to the train on the Newburyport branch.

Here are three engines connected with mail trains. You will ask yourselves in the first place, were those mails obstructed on that day? Were they wilfully and knowingly obstructed? That is to say, did those who had charge of the engines purposely and designedly separate the engines from the cars and prevent the trains from going on and prevent the mails from being carried? Because if the train could not go on, the mails which are a part of it could not, and a detention of the train would be a detention of the mails. You will ask yourselves whether there is or not any question that on that day, the two mails between Boston and Portland, one up and the other down, were obstructed and were obstructed for some little time? And that, I understand the testimony shows, was done by Whitten and Cook. Were Whitten and Cook, in what they did, carrying out the common design with these defendants of obstructing and detaining the mails? And was their object to obstruct and hinder the train from going forward at that time? If you find that was the common purpose and object, and it necessarily resulted from it that the mail was detained, then you will be justified in finding that they conspired together to wilfully and knowingly obstruct the mail.

Now the defendants say that they had no such purpose as that: "Our object was to quit work; these men have done what they did beyond and outside of what we contemplated; we supposed and knew that the company were advised of what we were about; they had made arrangements to take the trains out of our hands at four o'clock, and we supposed it would be done, the old men stepping out and the new men stepping in." If that was their purpose, simply to quit work themselves, and they conspired simply to quit work, those who had a right to, whose time was up, it was all right. If their time was not up, they were guilty of a breach of contract and were acting illegally.

The government says that the testimony shows very conclusively that the object was far deeper and beyond any thing of that kind; that there was a purpose, a design to obstruct and retard the trains, to interrupt all the business of the road, and that that purpose, at four o'clock, in the vicinity of Boston, was carried out; that the cars were disconnected from the engines, and that they retained possession of the engines for two hours after four o'clock, hoping that some arrangement might be made.

If these men agreed together to interrupt all the business of the road, to detain all the trains wherever they might be, if that was their object, and if it necessarily followed from a detention of the trains that the mails were obstructed, and they did this knowingly and wilfully, you will be justified in finding these defendants guilty of conspiring to knowingly and wilfully obstruct the mails.

These men say they were acting as "committee of all the engineers." What are the acts of three of their principals, three of the men, for whom these four men say they were a committee, whom they undertook to represent? What do we find their principals doing? We find them separating their locomotives from the trains, running away from them in the way that has been stated before you, and not on four o'clock quitting work and leaving the engines as they then were, for men, it is argued, were known by the defendants to be ready to take their places when it was necessary. The government goes farther and says that there are other facts in connection with this which show it was not their mere purpose to quit work then, but that it was to interrupt the business of the road, and especially to delay all its trains; and those facts are that there were a number of locomotives in the yard in Boston, and when Furber and Smith called for those locomotives and let the engineers know that they would take them into their possession, and then went to get men to take their places, returning in less than five minutes, they found the fires dumped, the hose disconnected and water out of the boilers. If it was their purpose simply to leave work, the government asks you why did those men, when they could have quit their engines in a moment, instead of doing that, do what they could to render them for the time being unfit for use?

It was said long ago, "By their fruits ye shall know them." And by the acts of these men you must judge what their purpose and design was. If it was simply to leave their work, would they not have done it without detaining these trains, or dumping the fires, or drawing off the water, or disconnecting the hose? Would they not at once have given up the trains to the various men who were there to take them? Was their purpose to retain the possession of the train, which was delayed, when coming to Portland, two hours, in order that some arrangement should be made? Or was it simply that they did this of their own will and pleasure without in any way acting in concert with those in Boston.

Then, there is another fact which it is my duty to call your attention to, and that is the condition of trains up and down the road. You have the testimony of Beal, that after four o'clock, according to his recollection, there was not a single live engine on that road. Hamilton, who was on the road with him, thinks there was one which was running from Lawrence into Boston. Beal says that, all the way up and down that road, the engines were set one side with fires out, water drawn off, and were left in that condition.

The government asks you whether or not these are the acts of men who merely meant to quit work, or the acts of men who meant to put this road in such a position that its trains for the time being should be interrupted. The matter is for you to decide, and not for me, drawing your own inferences, applying your reason to it, judging these men by their acts and the consequences of their acts, whether they did intend that which the government says they did.

Now, stepping beyond the twelfth of February, what do you find? You find that there was a train which should have left Portland the next morning, but which did not leave till about noon. You find that one engineer was bought off, and that, when they undertook to put another engineer on, stories were circulated in regard to the engine being unsafe, and that he did not go, and when a third was procured, the old man, the witness Bonney tells you what took place in regard to him. You have testimony that Whitcomb, one of the striking engineers, came to the Preble House with two or three men, merely bowed to Beal, and then left the two or three men who accompanied him there in conversation with Beal; that these men there drew out the sum of $1500 and actually offered it to him on condition that he would abandon his train and not run it to Boston the next day, and that Whitcomb, afterwards, in conversation inquired whether they had made a trade with him or not, and blamed him for not being willing to carry out the arrangement. That evidence is for you to consider as bearing upon the question as to what these parties contemplated. What did the striking engineers, as a body, contemplate? Did they contemplate leaving their employment and going about their own business? Or did they contemplate so dealing with the road and the new men employed as to compel the road to take old men back into their employ and forgive what had taken place.

There is also the testimony of Averill, the new engineer, who run down here to Portland. He says that Mills met him the next morning, and that an arrangement was made by which they were to pay him the sum of $100, $20 down, and then to employ him for a certain length of time. You will recollect the conversation which took place. He states that: "Mills told me he would write a letter to Arthur to show the agreement I had made. I told him to write to Geo. W. Stevens and he would show it to Arthur. He said he would do it." Mills does not appear to have written that letter, but somebody wrote a letter and handed it to Averill and he says "I took it up and showed it to Stevens. Presented the letter to Stevens at room forty-seven, the headquarters of the Brotherhood. Stevens opened the letter and said it was all right; he spoke of Arthur's seeing the letter. Arthur saw it, said it was all right and they would do as they agreed. I was in their office every few days. I had some conversation with three of these men, Chas. Stevens, Kent and Walker, at the Brotherhood in regard to their paying me. I had conversation with Mills and Whitcomb. They said that they were sure of carrying the day, going to beat the B. & M. in a few days. They said a good many men had been bought off and that they had money enough."

It is for you to say whether or not Averill's testimony should be believed. One of the learned counsel says he does not believe his story. The reason why he would not believe him is not before you. It may be that his being counsel in the case may make some difference in that respect. The question is whether you believe him, whether you have any right to disbelieve what he has said. If there is anything inconsistent in his story, if his appearance is that of an untruthful witness, you should make such deductions as you think proper. What is his testimony? He testifies expressly that four of these men, Geo. W. Stevens, Chas. Stevens, Kent and Walker all spoke about paying him and carrying out a contract which he had made with Mills in regard to his employment if he would leave the road. Is that or not evidence bearing upon this question. And is it or not important, as bearing upon this question, whether there was an agreement with these four men simply to quit work, or whether they still continued on that day carrying out the purpose and object of preventing the running of the road, of obstructing the trains, of hindering everybody, whether connected with the mails, or the running of the road, or passengers from passing over that road? Does it or not show that after this twelfth of February they were doing all they could to hinder and obstruct the business of that road? If that was so, and they were endeavoring to carry out that purpose and design, you may well find that they were guilty of conspiracy to knowingly and wilfully obstruct the mails.

You have the testimony of Hilton and the paper produced by him dated February twentieth, by which it was agreed that Hilton should receive three dollars and a half per day during the strike, and sixty dollars per month for three months after, and that he should be admitted to the Brotherhood. That is signed by Arthur, Sanborn, Webster, and also by Chas. Stevens and G. W. Stevens, who are two of the defendants and who were two of the committee. The government claims that this testimony corroborates that of Averill, and shows that these men meant something more than to quit work; that they meant to impede and obstruct the operation of that road; that they were doing what they could to prevent Hilton from further running on that road.

Gentlemen, you are obliged, having taken the oath you have, to decide this cause according to the evidence; to look the matter fairly and squarely in the face, and let your honest judgments, your conscientious convictions decide this matter. Let your common sense determine what these parties meant by all they did and said, and how far their purpose was to obstruct and hinder the business of that road. If you find that there was a common purpose and object to hinder the road and prevent its running, hoping thereby to be reinstated, and that it was a necessary consequence of such hindrance that the mails were retarded, and that they wilfully and knowingly hindered and retarded the mails, it is your duty to find these men guilty so far as they are connected with it. What I have said has been mostly in regard to the four committee men. You have the testimony in regard to Mills. You will judge whether if the others are guilty there is any doubt as to his guilt.

Then comes the testimony in regard to Dodge. The government says he ran his engine on to the wharf in Portland, but so long as there was anything for him to do, he staid by and did his duty faithfully; but they say he was one of the conspirators originally, and that before six o'clock he had made up his mind to quit work, and had left his engine down there where he had no right to. If you find the others guilty, and you think you are justified in making any exception in his case, you will acquit him, if not, convict him. You are at liberty to convict one or more, or all, or acquit all.

Now take this case and apply your honest judgment to it, and render such a verdict as the law and the evidence warrant. If in any way you allow yourselves to be governed by fear or prejudice, there will be no satisfaction, after you have returned to your homes, in the retrospect of your labors here.

Several requested instructions have been passed to me.

1. "The means of carrying out the alleged conspiracy when made unlawful by statute, should be fully set out, and must be proved as alleged." I have given you that instruction and repeat it.

2. "An association of workmen formed for the purpose of raising their wages is not unlawful." If that is the mere object, to raise their pay, and they do not undertake to do anything illegal, it is not unlawful.

3. "The presumption that a man shall presume the natural and necessary consequences of his voluntary acts does not apply in a criminal case where the act done or contemplated (in case of a conspiracy) was lawful and the means lawful." If they undertook to do a lawful act, there is no presumption that they intended to do any unlawful act.

4. "Where a criminal charge is to be proved by circumstantial evidence, the proof ought to be not only consistent with the prisoners' guilt, but inconsistent with any other rational conclusion." So far as the proof depends upon circumstantial evidence, that is a rule of law which you are bound to apply.

5. "In this case, it is a fact to be left to the jury to determine, whether the acts done or contemplated were wilfully and knowingly done." I give that.

6. "Conspiracy is a corrupt agreeing together of two or more persons to do by concerted action something unlawful, either as a means or an end." That, I suppose, is a true definition of conspiracy at common law.

7. "If the jury merely find that several of these defendants conspired to do one illegal act, and that certain others of the defendants conspired to do another illegal act, they cannot bring in a verdict of guilty against any of the defendants." There must have been a concert of action to do the illegal acts charged in the indictment or else you cannot find them guilty.

Case No. 16,393.

UNITED STATES v. STEVENS et al.

[2 Int. Rev. Rec. 54.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1865.

INTERNAL REVENUE — MANUFACTURERS OF KNAPSACKS.

[Persons who, by a special agreement with a government contractor engaged in manufacturing knapsacks, supplied and sewed upon each knapsack two small buckles and straps, without any other connection or participation in the production thereof, were not "manufacturers," within the meaning of the 75th section of the act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 462), and are not liable to pay the tax thereunder. Reaffirming Cases Nos. 16,393a and 16,393b.]

This was an action [against Stevens and Carples] for the recovery of some $16,000 taxes upon certain knapsacks in part manufactured by defendants. The defendants resisted the payment on the ground that they were not manufacturers, but only employed by the manufacturers to add to the knapsacks buckles and tags. It was shown on behalf of the government that more than one-half of the value of the goods consisted of these additions.

BETTS, District Judge. This case was submitted May 23, 1865, to the judgment of the court by the counsel for the United States as defendants, on written arguments, with the restriction "not to be decided before July 24 next." I am not advised of the reason for the restriction. The action was in assumpsit for the recovery of duties or taxes to the amount of $16,000. The declaration charged that the defendants, as copartners, on the 1st of March, 1863, were indebted to the plaintiff at New York in that sum, according to the provisions of the 75th section of the act of congress, approved July 1, 1862 [12 Stat. 432], entitled "An act to provide internal revenue, to support the government, and to pay interest on the public debt." The declaration alleges, the indebtment accrued "for the duties on knapsacks manufactured and sold, and removed for consumption and for delivery to others than agents of the manufacturers within the United States or territories thereof, between September 1, 1862, and January 31, 1863, inclusive: and being so indebted, undertook and promised to pay the same," &c. A plea of the general issue was interposed, with a notice annexed, that on the trial the defendants would give in evidence and insist that the aforesaid knapsacks were manufactured and sold, not by the defendants, but by one Henry S. McComb, under contracts entered into by him with the government. The defendants had no interest in said contracts, and were neither parties nor privies thereto. That the materials used in making said knapsacks, except buckles and brass trimmings, were furnished by said McComb; and that the defendants and workmen were employed by McComb simply to strap and finish the knapsacks after the same had been delivered to the defendants by McComb in an advanced stage of completion, and received compensation from said McComb for such work and labor. The action was brought to trial before the United States district court, and a jury in the city of New York, December 20, 1864. There was no difference between the government and the defendants in the facts of the case. They corresponded also fully with the pleadings filed by the parties and stated above.

After the evidence was given and the counsel for the United States and the defendants had presented to the court their views of the purport and legal effects thereof, and the court had suggested to the counsel its impression that the defendants were not shown by the evidence produced to be parties within the description of the act of congress referred to and declared upon, and more especially are not included in that portion of the act rehearsed and counted upon in the declaration filed in this suit, charging the indebtment of $16,000 to be duties legally collectable from the defendants, and the liability of the latter to pay the same in this action; and as this form of procedure does not appear to have been sanctioned by any considered judicial construction of the law of the case, the court shall advise the jury to find upon the evidence that the defendants were not liable to the libelants for the amount of duties claimed in the suit, and that they render a verdict in the cause for the defendants; but with leave to the plaintiffs to move upon a case to be made by them to set aside such verdict and have judgment at the discretion of the court entered in their favor for the amount of duties claimed in the action. Such verdict was rendered accordingly. [See Cases Nos. 16,393a and 16,393b.] The motion to set aside that verdict has now been argued in writing by the counsel for the defendants and by the assistant district attorney for the plaintiffs.

The action instituted and pending before the court in the instance relates, exclusively to the collection under the laws of congress of duties and taxes upon articles of domestic internal manufactures, composed of military equipments and knapsacks, approved July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 432, § 75). The fabric is according to the proofs equally entitled to that denomination, whether manufactured in an exceedingly simple and cheap form, a single bag or sack, or being connected with additional appendages, the union of the two comprising larger conveniences, superior finish and greater mechanical skill and labor. They are, when either way constructed, a manufactured article, the complete knapsack, embraced in the denomination given to the article stated in the revenue law declared upon. Two classes of citizens or subjects of the government are liable to taxation under the statutes in question, and to pay assessments pursuant thereto. The first may be said to be the producers thereof;—because being an article of general and extensive merchandise and traffic, the masses in number and value of the commodities will probably be concentrated in most instances in the hands of capitalists or general dealers, and not be supplied individually by them as citizens and manufacturers. They acquire, hold and vend the articles, and pay assessments upon them as marketable property and effects in the capacity of producers equally if obtained in market overt, or in fabrication as mechanics themselves. The second general class will be that of the actual manufacturers of the commodities taxable. There, also, it will doubtless be found that practically a meagre proportion of the artisans personally are made liable to pay duties directly upon the fabrics, or that the actual makers are known from contributors of materials, funds, labor, or other aids to the general production. Where cases do exist in which manufactured property is owned and held and both sold, or removed for consumption, or for delivery to others than agents of the manufacturer, &c., &c., upon whatever terms or conditions their manufactures may have been created and produced as between the mutual proprietors thereof, it will be competent to the government to deal with common property so produced and held under the law in question, with all the legal rights and remedies that might be exercised by individuals against persons standing in like relations in respect to each other, and reciprocal rights and responsibilities springing therefrom. Upon that principle the United States, in this action, assuming that the defendants are manufacturers of dutiable products which are subject by law to the payment of $16,000 of duties or assessments, claim by implication a contract and premium by the defendants to pay that sum to the plaintiffs. This suit is brought and its proceedings are framed to enforce that supposed engagement and liability. The defendants are sued as copartners, claimed by the plaintiffs to be engaged in the business of manufacturing knapsacks, who prove them to have been employed therein by H. S. McComb, under an agreement with him to assist and aid in that business. The defendants made no engagewith the plaintiffs, but performed their engagement with McComb exclusively under a special contract in writing with him to that end. The only work they did in the making of the knapsacks was supplying and sewing the small straps and buckles on each one and furnishing materials therefor of the value of a few cents to each knapsack. All the rest of these knapsacks, it is proved by the evidence, were made, painted and materials furnished by McComb, with whom the defendants were not connected in business except in the special particulars of mechanical labor and supply in aid of the business of McComb. The declaration avers no undertaking on the part of the defendants binding them to make the knapsacks for the use of the government, or to secure or pay the plaintiffs the amount of duties recoverable from any parties on the completion of the manufactured articles. That matter on the terms of contract between the defendants and McComb, as proved on the trial of the cause by the plaintiffs, remained in the hands of the defendants as agents or sub-workers of McComb, or was entirely at the disposal of McComb, as the producer or manufacturer thereof, or the sole agent shown by the evidence entitled to their delivery. It is not proved by the plaintiffs that the defendants were any way parties or privies to engagements or responsibilities (if any subsist) between McComb and the plaintiffs in relation to the making of the said knapsacks. The incidental services performed toward completing the business intrusted to the defendants by McComb, and performed by them according to the evidence furnished by the plaintiffs, cannot in any propriety of speech be termed making or manufacturing the article, more than cutting and stitching on pairs of straps to the legs of boots by a boot or shoemaker can be called manufacturing or making indefinite quantities or furnishings of boots. The plaintiffs establish no right of action against the defendants to recover from them the sum demanded by the plaintiffs "for" (in the averments of the declaration) "knapsacks manufactured and sold and removed for consumption, and for delivery to others than agents of the manufacturers within the United States or territories thereof."

Considering this suit, then, upon the pleadings and proofs offered by the plaintiffs, it must be adjudged not sustained upon grounds of legal sufficiency, in technical points of view or upon the merits, and the decision of the case must be in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiffs. I am accordingly of opinion that the plaintiffs have shown upon the case no lawful cause of action in this suit, and that judgment be confirmed upon the verdict rendered in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiffs, without cost.

[N. Y. Times, Aug. 12, 1865.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1865.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS — WHO IS A MANUFACTURER.

[A person, having a contract with the government to furnish a lot of knapsacks, purchased the cloth, and had it cut and sewed together and painted elsewhere, and then delivered the goods to defendants, who put upon them the leather straps, buckles, &c., necessary to complete the knapsacks. The cost of this work was nearly but not quite as much as the cost of what was previously done. Held, that the government contractor, and not the defendants, were the manufacturers of the knapsacks, within the meaning of the statute.]

This was an action [against Stevens & Carples] to recover the internal revenue duty on twenty-five thousand knapsacks alleged by the government to have been manufactured by the defendant, amounting to about $12,000. It appeared in evidence that a man named McComb, residing in Delaware, had a contract with the government to furnish so many knapsacks. He accordingly bought the cloth and had it cut, sewed together and painted elsewhere, and then delivered them to the defendants to have them put on the leather straps, buckles, &c., which were necessary to finish them,—the cost of the work which they did being nearly but not quite as much as the cost of what was done before the knapsacks were delivered to them. When they had done their work on them they delivered them to McComb, who delivered them to the government on his contract.

Mr. Smith, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Mr. Fullerton, for defendants.

BY THE COURT (BETTS, District Judge). The evidence being in, the judge directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, holding that McComb was the manufacturer, instead of the defendants. But as the point was new, he directed it to be entered subject to the opinion of the court, that it might be brought up for fuller argument if desired.

[The case was afterwards twice argued upon motions for a new trial, and to set aside the verdict, and the conclusion above reached was sustained in both instances. Cases Nos. 16,393b and 16,393, respectively.]

Case No. 16,393b.

UNITED STATES v. STEVENS et al.

[N. Y. Times, Aug. 12, 1865.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1865.

INTERNAL REVENUE — WHO ARE MANUFACTURERS.

[Persons who, by a special agreement with the manufacturers of knapsacks, supplied and sewed upon each knapsack two small straps and buckles, without any other connection with or participation in the production thereof, are not to be regarded as manufacturers, within the 75th section of the act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 462), and are not liable to pay the tax thereon.]

This was a motion for a new trial on a case. The action was in assumpsit [against William S. Stevens and Bernard Carples] for the recovery of taxes to the amount of $16,000. The declaration alleged that the defendants, as copartners, were indebted to the plaintiffs in that sum on March 1, 1863, according to the provisions of the 75th section of the internal revenue act of July 1, 1862, "for the duties on knapsacks manufactured and sold and removed for consumption and for delivery to others than agents of the manufacturers, within the limits of the United States," &c., &c. A plea of the general issue was interposed, with a notice annexed that on the trial the defendants would prove that the knapsacks were manufactured and sold, not by the defendants, but by one Henry S. McComb, under contracts entered into by him with the government; that the defendants had no interest in the contracts, and were neither parties nor privies thereto; that the materials used in making the knapsacks, except buckles and brass trimmings, were furnished by McComb; and that the defendants and their workmen were employed by McComb simply to strap and finish the knapsacks after they had been delivered to them by McComb in an advanced stage of completion, and were paid by McComb for such work and labor.

The case being brought to trial before a jury, there was no difference between the government and the defendants as to the facts of the case, and accordingly the court directed the jury to find for the defendants, with leave to the plaintiffs to move, upon a case to be made, to have the verdict set aside, and have judgment entered in their favor for the amount of taxes claimed. [Case No. 16,393a.]

Mr. Courtney, for the United States.
Mr. Elmore, for defendants.

BY THE COURT (BETTS, District Judge). According to the proofs a fabric is equally entitled to the denomination of knapsack, whether manufactured in an exceedingly simple and cheap form, a single bag or sack, or connected with additional appendages, the union of the two comprising larger conveniences, superior finish and greater mechanical skill and labor. They are, when constructed either way, a manufactured article, the complete knapsack embraced in the denomination given to the article in the revenue laws declared upon. Two classes of citizens or subjects of the government are liable to taxation under the statute in question. The first may be said to be the producers of the article. Being an article of general and extensive merchandise and traffic, the masses in number and value of the commodities will probably be concentrated in most instances in the hands of capitalists or general dealers, and not be supplied individually by them as citizens and manufacturers. They acquire, hold and vend the articles and pay assessments upon them as marketable property and effects, equally if obtained in market overt or in fabrication as mechanics themselves.

The second general class will be that of the actual manufacturers of the commodities taxable. There, also, it will doubtless be found that practically a meagre proportion of the artizans personally are made liable to pay duties directly upon the fabrics, or that the actual makers are discriminated or known from contributors of materials, funds, labor or other aids to the general production. Where cases do exist in which manufactured property is owned and held, and sold or removed for consumption, or for delivery to others than agents of the manufacturers, &c., &c., upon whatever terms or conditions the manufacture may have been created and produced as between the mutual proprietors thereof, it will be competent to the government to deal with common property so produced and held under the law in question, with all the legal rights and remedies that might be exercised by individuals against persons standing in like relations in respect to each other, and reciprocal rights and responsibilities springing therefrom.

Upon that principle the United States, assuming that the defendants are manufacturers of dutiable products which are subject by law to the payment of $16,000 of duties or assessments, claim by implication a contract and promise by the defendants to pay that sum to the plaintiffs, and the defendants are sued as co-partners, claimed by the plaintiffs to be engaged in the business of manufacturing knapsacks. But they prove themselves to have been employed therein by McComb under an agreement with him to assist and aid in that business. The only work they did in the making of the knapsacks was supplying and sewing two small straps and buckles on each one, the material being of the value of a few cents for each knapsack. All the rest of the knapsacks were made and painted and the materials furnished by McComb, with whom the defendants were not connected in business except in these special particulars.

The declaration avers no undertaking on the part of the defendants binding them to make the knapsacks for the use of the government, or to secure or pay the duties recoverable from any party on the completion of the manufactured articles. That matter on the terms of the contract between the defendants and McComb remained in the hands of the defendants as agents, or sub-workers of McComb, or was entirely at the disposal of McComb, as the producer or manufacturer thereof, or the sole agent shown by the evidence entitled to the delivery. The incidental services performed by the defendants cannot in any propriety of speech be termed making or manufacturing the article, any more than cutting and stitching a pair of straps to the legs of boots by a bootmaker, can be called manufacturing or making indefinite quantities of boots.

Considering the suit, then, upon the pleadings and proofs offered by the plaintiffs, it must be adjudged not sustained upon grounds of legal sufficiency in technical points of view, or upon the merits, and the decision of the case must be in favor of the defendants. Judgment for defendants on the verdict.

[The case was again submitted on written briefs, and the conclusion above reached was adhered to by the court, and judgment entered accordingly. Case No. 16,393.]

UNITED STATES v. STEVENS.

[4 Wash. C. C. 547.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1825.

SEAMEN — CONFINING THE MASTER — PLEADING AND PROOFS—VARIANCE.

1. What constitutes the offence of confining the captain. What is the offence of an assault, with a dangerous weapon.

[Cited in U. S. v. New Bedford Bridge, Case No. 15,867.]

2. An indictment for confining the captain, and for an assault with a dangerous weapon, committed on the high seas in the "outer road" off St. Domingo, in a vessel belonging to citizens of the United States, is supported by proving those offences to have been done in the "inner" road, and in port.

[Cited in U. S. v. Staly, Case No. 16,374; Ex parte Byers, 32 Fed. 407.]

3. The rule as to variance between the indictment and the evidence, as to time and place.

4. The indictment need not negative the fact, that the defendant was tried and convicted or acquitted by the foreign tribunal.

The first count in the indictment was for confining the captain, and the second for an assault on board of a vessel belonging to citizens of the United States, with a dangerous weapon. Both offences are charged to have been committed on the high seas, in the outer road off the port of St. Domingo. The master gave in evidence that, whilst the vessel was lying in the port of St. Domingo, and in the "inner road," he was hastily passing the mate at night, and might unintentionally have touched him with his arm. The mate immediately seized him by his collar, twisted his hand in his cravat, where he held him for some time, and in the struggle, the mate fell on the deck, and the captain on him, the mate still retaining his hold, and the captain repeatedly ordering him to loose his hold and he would let him get up. The mate at length cried out for assistance, which brought two or three persons forward, who with difficulty, relieved the captain from the hold the mate had of him. The captain, apprehending himself to be in danger, retreated to his cabin and got out his pistol, which he laid on his bed, and was then returning to the deck, when, at the foot of the stairs, he was met by the mate, who presented a pistol, which he declared to be loaded, to the breast of the captain. The latter immediately seized the muzzle and turned it from his breast, and succeeded finally, with the assistance of some persons from the deck, to wrest the pistol from his hand.

The District Attorney and Mr. Biddle, for the United States.

Grillin & Pettit, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). 1. That upon the facts stated by the captain, if believed by the jury, both of the offences charged in the indictment were proved. That the captain was confined upon the deck by the hold taken of him in the first rencontre, and afterward by presenting the pistol at his breast in the cabin, and thereby preventing him, for a time, from going upon deck. And that the latter act amounted to an assault with a dangerous weapon.

2. It has been objected, by the counsel for the defendant, that the evidence being that the alleged offences were committed in the port of St. Domingo, and not in the outer road, off the port, as laid in the indictment, the latter was not supported, and consequently that the verdict must be for the defendant. This objection, in the opinion of the court, cannot avail the defendant, see Chit. Cr. Law, 184–241. Where place or time is material, and enters into the substance of the description of the offence, there it must be precisely laid and proved. So if a scienter be laid, when it forms no part of the offence, or it be laid to be feloniously done when the act is not felonious, neither need be proved. Chitty, in his first volume of Criminal Law, 241, after having stated with what seeming accuracy time, place, sums, magnitudes, quantity, and value must be described in the indictment; sums up the whole doctrine by observing, that a variance in the evidence from those points will never be material, unless the essence, or degree of the offence consists in their correctness. Now it has been decided that the offence of confining the master may be committed in port, as well as on the high seas, and such is the manifest construction of the twelfth section of the crimes act of 1790 [1 Stat.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

112]. And by the fifth section of the late crimes act it is declared, that if any offence shall be committed on board of a vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, while lying in a port within a foreign jurisdiction, by any person belonging to the ship's company, or by any passenger, it may be cognizable by the proper circuit court of the United States, in like manner as if it had been committed on the high seas. The place then where the offence was committed, if it be committed in a foreign port, or on the high seas, does not at all constitute any part or degree of the offence; and being therefore immaterial, it need not be proved. Nor does the proviso to the fifth section make any difference, as the counsel for the defendant contended it did. It is not necessary that the indictment should negative the fact that the defendant had been tried, and convicted or acquitted by the tribunal of the country where the offence was committed. If he was so, it is for the defendant to plead it. The plea is still immaterial to the substance of the description of the offence, or to the degree of it.

Case No. 16,395.

UNITED STATES v. STEVENSON.

[1 Abb. U. S. 495.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb. Term, 1869.

PROCESS ACTS—FOLLOWING STATE PRACTICE—ATTACHMENTS—RULES OF COURT.

1. An information prosecuted in a district court must be regarded and treated as a common law proceeding; except in that aspect a district court can have no jurisdiction of it.

2. The forms of process (except style) and modes of proceeding in the United States courts, sitting within the thirteen states which originally composed the Union, in actions at common law, are the same as those which were employed in the supreme courts of the states, respectively, on May 8, 1792; except so far as the United States courts may have prescribed alterations.

3. Section 1 of the act of May 19, 1828 (4 Stat. 278), relative to process of the United States courts, does not apply within states which were members of the Union before September 29, 1789 And the act of May 8, 1792 [1 Stat. 275], does not adopt, prospectively, laws which may have since been passed by the states (though it enables the several courts to adopt them), but only adopts those then existing.

4. It is not necessary, in order to establish that a particular mode of proceeding has been adopted by a United States court, that there should be found a written rule declaring such adoption. The practice of a court may be established without the existence of a positive written rule.

5. Under the practice which has prevailed in the district court for the Southern district of New York, an attachment may be issued in aid of a common law information prosecuted by the United States.

Motion to vacate an attachment.

[1] [Reported by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

J. E. Ward and C. A. Seward, for the motion.

T. Simons, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty., opposed.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is an action at common law. The first paper placed on the records of the court in it was an information, which was filed on March 1, 1867. It states that the attorney of the United States comes "in a suit of common law and informs the court" that the United States bring suit against the defendant for the cause of action propounded in two articles which follow in the information. The substance of them is, that the United States were entitled to the immediate possession of certain bales of cotton, their property; that the defendant, being in possession of the cotton, unlawfully converted and disposed of it to his own use; that such conversion was fraudulent; and that the proceeds of the property had been disposed of by the defendant with intent to secrete the same from and to defraud the United States. The information prays that process of attachment may issue against the property of the defendant, and is accompanied by an affidavit in support of the application for an attachment.

Indorsed on the information is a direction signed by my predecessor, and dated February 28, 1867, in these words: "Let process of attachment issue against the property of the within-named Vernon K. Stevenson, agreeably to the prayer of the within-named information, and let the said Vernon K. Stevenson be cited to appear on the return of process herein, and answer to the allegations in this behalf." Thereupon, process was issued to the marshal on March 1, 1867, reciting that the information had been filed "in a certain action at common law," and commanding the marshal to cite the defendant, if found in his district, to appear and answer the information, and, also, to attach the property of the defendant. The information and the process stated the claim at the sum of one million dollars.

The return of the marshal to the process was that he had served a copy of it on the defendant, and had also served a copy of it on the president of a bank in the city of New York, stock in which was alleged to be owned by the defendant.

On March 1, 1867, a notice, signed by the district-attorney, and entitled in the suit and indorsed as being a lis pendens, was filed in the office of the clerk of this court. The notice states "that an action has been commenced, and is now pending, in this court, upon an information against the above-named defendant, and that a warrant of attachment, according to the rules and practice of this court and the statute in such case made and provided, has been duly issued therein against all and singular the property of the said defendant, Vernon K. Stevenson, both real and personal, situate and being within the city and county and state of New York, and also situate and being in the Southern district of the United States for the state of New York, and that the following is a description of all and singular the real estate of the said defendant, Vernon K. Stevenson, situate and being within the said city and county and state of New York, attached, levied upon, and affected under and by virtue of said process or warrant of attachment," and closes with a specific description, by metes and bounds, of the real estate referred to, which embraces forty lots of land in the city of New York. A like notice of lis pendens was filed by the district-attorney in the office of the clerk of the supreme court for the city and county of New York.

The defendant put in his answer in the suit, and the issue has been tried by a jury, resulting in a verdict for the defendant, under the direction of the court, on a question of law. [Case No. 16,396, opinion of district court.] The government has taken steps toward a review of the decision. [Id., opinion of circuit court.]

The defendant now moves to vacate the attachment on the ground that it was issued without authority of law, and to set aside the notices of lis pendens, on the ground that they were filed without authority of law.

In regard to the attachment, it is claimed that this court has no authority to issue any attachment in a common law action; that in the practice of the courts of the United States for this district, no attachments have ever been issued in common law actions; that the right to issue attachments and the right to file notices of lis pendens are not matters of ordinary legal right, but exist only as creations of positive statutes; and that there is no statute of the United States which authorizes this court to issue an attachment, or to sanction the filing of a notice of lis pendens in a suit of the character of the present one.

This suit must necessarily be regarded as a suit at common law, or this court would have no jurisdiction of it; for, by sections 9 and 10 of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 77), no jurisdiction of any equity suit is given to this court, except of suits in equity against consuls or vice-consuls; and by section 9 of that act, in connection with section 4 of the act of March 3, 1815 (3 Stat. 245), jurisdiction is expressly given to this court of all suits at common law where the United States sue.

The statute which governs the forms of process and the forms of proceeding, and the modes of proceeding in suits at common law, in the courts of the United States, is the act of May 8, 1792 (1 Stat. 275). The second section of that act provides that "the forms of writs, executions, and other process, except their style and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits in those of common law, shall be the same as are now used in the said courts respectively, in pursuance of the act entitled 'An act to regulate processes in the courts of the United States,' . . . . except so far as may have been provided for by the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, subject, however, to such alterations and additions as the said courts respectively shall in their discretion deem expedient, or to such regulations as the supreme court of the United States shall think proper, from time to time, by rule, to prescribe to any circuit or district court concerning the same." The act referred to, "to regulate processes in the courts of the United States," is the act of September 29, 1789 (1 Stat. 93), the second section of which provides "that until further provision be made, and except where by this act or other statutes of the United States is otherwise provided, the forms of writs and executions, except their style, and modes of process and rates of fees, except fees to judges, in the circuit and district courts, in suits at common law, shall be the same in each state respectively as are now used or allowed in the supreme courts of the same." This court existed when these acts of 1789 and 1792 were passed. It, therefore, is required, by the act of 1792, to use as its forms of process and modes of proceedings in suits at common law, the forms and modes which it was using in such suits on May 8, 1792 (and which forms and modes were required by the act of 1792, taken in connection with the act of 1789, to be the forms and modes used or allowed on September 29, 1789, in the supreme court of the state of New York), subject only, as provided by the act of 1792, to any provisions contained in the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 73), and also to such alterations and additions as this court shall, in its discretion, deem expedient, and also to such regulations as the supreme court of the United States shall think proper, from time to time, by rule, to prescribe to this court.

The first section of the act of May 19, 1828 (4 Stat. 278), does not apply to the present case, because the state of New York was admitted into the Union before September 30, 1789; and the third section of that act applies only to final process.

It is unnecessary to cite authorities to show that on September 29, 1789, there was no process of attachment of property used or allowed in the supreme court of New York in a common law action where an individual was the plaintiff, and where the defendant was personally served with process in the action, unless the defendant was shown to be an absconding or concealed debtor. No general process of attachment of property in a common law action in favor of an individual plaintiff was known to the common law. The only statute authority which existed on September 29, 1789, for the issuing of an attachment by the supreme court of New York in a common law action, was that conferred by the act of the legislature of New York, passed April 4, 1786 (1 Greenl. Laws N. Y. 214), which provides that when a debtor secretly departs the state, or keeps concealed within it, a creditor, or creditors, to a certain amount, may apply to a judge of the supreme court showing the debt, and the departure or concealment of the debtor, with intent to defraud his creditors of their just dues, or to avoid being arrested by the ordinary process of law, and proving the departure or concealment by two credible witnesses, and obtain from the judge a warrant to attach the real and personal estate of the debtor. The present case was not one of that kind.

No provisions on the subject are found in the judiciary act of September 24, 1789; and the supreme court of the United States has never, by rule, prescribed any regulations to this court in regard to the issuing of attachments in common law actions.

The supreme court decided, in Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1, that the act of 1792 was confined, in its adoption of state laws, or regulating the modes of proceeding in suits at common law, to those in force in September, 1789; that it did not recognize the authority of any laws of that description which might be afterwards passed by the states; and that it enabled the several courts of the Union to make such improvements in their forms and modes of proceeding as experience might suggest, and especially to adopt such state laws on the subject as might vary to advantage the forms and modes of proceeding which prevailed in September, 1789.

It is not necessary that a practice of a court to be recognized or sustained, should be embodied in a written rule. Written rules are undoubtedly preferable, but a practice in respect to a particular matter in a court may be established without the existence of a positive written rule. Fullerton v. Bank of U. S., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 604, 613; Duncan v. U. S., 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 435, 451. The fact that my learned predecessor, who presided in this court for more than forty years, granted this attachment, is the strongest possible evidence that he must have regarded it as the practice of the court to issue an attachment in a case like the present one, and that he must have understood either that such practice existed in the supreme court of New York on September 29, 1789, or that a departure had been established, either by written rule or by the practice of this court, from the practice which existed in September, 1789; and that this court had, within section 2 of the act of 1792, altered its form of process and mode of proceeding in the suit, like the present one, in such manner as to authorize the issuing of the attachment that was issued in this case. The judge who issued it knew better than any other person the practice of this court in the respect in question, and his action in a case of the character of the present one, involving a claim of so large an amount, and affecting real estate of such large value, must be regarded by me as conclusive in regard to the fact of the establishment and existence of a practice which warranted the attachment in this case. Whether he regarded it as reposing on the privilege of a prerogative of the United States, or on the construction of some written rule of this court, or on acquiescence and uniform mode of proceeding, or on some specific acts. of congress, cannot be ascertained, as his views are not on record, and the point is immaterial on this application. I am satisfied, from inquiry, that the matter of issuing the attachment was deliberately considered by him, and that his conclusion was not hastily reached. The propriety of that conclusion is strengthened by the fact that nearly two years have elapsed without the authority of the court to issue the attachment being questioned by the defendant. So far, therefore, as the motion to vacate the attachment is founded upon an alleged want of authority in this court to issue it, the motion must be overruled.

The act of March 14, 1848 (9 Stat. 213), was referred to as affecting the question. The act provides "that whenever, upon process instituted in any of the courts of the United States, property shall hereafter be attached to satisfy such judgment as may be recovered by the plaintiff in such process, and any contingency occurs by which, according to the laws of the state, such attachment would be dissolved upon like process pending in, or returnable to, the state courts, then such attachment or attachments made upon process issuing from, or pending in, the courts of the United States within such state, shall be dissolved, the intent and meaning of this act being to place such attachments in the courts of the states and the United States upon the same footing." No contingency, such as is referred to in this act, is shown to have occurred, as a ground for dissolving this attachment.

So far as the motion is based upon the ground of amnesty and pardon, of which the defendant claims the benefit, those matters go to the entire action, and not merely to the question of attachment, and must be brought up, if at all, by way of plea. The question of pardon was so brought up in the Case of Armstrong's Foundry, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 766.

If the attachment was properly issued, it was not irregular to file in the office of the clerk of this court the notice of lis pendens that was filed therein. As to the one filed in the office of the clerk of the state court, this court has no control over the records of that court, or over the action of the district-attorney in filing it there.

Motion denied.

UNITED STATES v. STEVENSON.

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 12, 1869.
Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1869.

SEIZURE OF ENEMY PROPERTY ON LAND—FORFEITURE—ACTS OF JULY 13 AND AUGUST 6, 1861, AND MAY 20 AND JULY 17, 1862.

1. The seizure of enemy property as prize of war on land is not authorized by the law of nations, and can only be upheld by the municipal laws of the nation which seeks to enforce the forfeiture.

2. Where a statute denounces a forfeiture of property as the penalty for an offence, and does not say that the property or its value is forfeited, the forfeiture takes place at the time the offence was committed, and operates as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the government.

3. The act of July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 255), was not a mere temporary act. Forfeitures incurred under it during the continuance of hostilities might be enforced afterwards.

4. The 5th and 9th sections of that act must be construed together, and the forfeiture declared in the 5th section can be enforced only by a seizure of the property.

5. The act of August 6, 1861 (12 Stat. 319), May 20, 1862 (12 Stat. 404), and July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 589), are subject to the same construction, and forfeitures under them can only be enforced by a seizure of the property.

This suit was a suit in trover brought by the government against the defendant [Vernon K. Stevenson], to recover the value of 1,000 bales of cotton, alleged to have belonged to the government and to have been converted by the defendant to his own use. The ground taken by the government was, that the defendant, being president of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, came into possession of the cotton, which had belonged to the Confederate government, and thus, by right of forfeiture, to the government of the United States, and that he brought the cotton to New York and there disposed of it and kept the proceeds.[2]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge (charging jury). The right of recovery, in this case, on the part of the government, rests upon municipal statutes, because the action, although not a suit in rem, following a seizure of property on land, is sought to be made equivalent to such a suit. The case, therefore, does not fall within the class of suits which follow captures of property on the sea, jure belli, under the law of prize. The law in regard to captures of property on land, which is claimed to be forfeited to the government under the operation of the rules of war, has been settled by the courts of the United States, by repeated adjudications; and the government must recover, if at all, in this case, precisely as if it had now under seizure the cotton in question. The government claims that the defendant has taken the cotton and disposed of it to his own use, and that it has the same right to maintain this action of trover against the defendant, for the conversion of the cotton, as it would have had to maintain a suit in rem against the cotton, or as it would have had to maintain a suit against the defendant for the conversion of the cotton, if, after a decree of condemnation of the cotton, in a suit in rem against it, and before a sale of it, the defendant had got possession of it and converted it to his own use.

As early as the year 1814, in the case of Brown v. U. S., 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 110, it was held by the supreme court of the United States, that the seizure of enemy property as prize of war, on land, jure belli, is not authorized by the law of nations, and can only be upheld by the municipal laws of the nation which seeks to enforce the forfeiture. That decision and the doctrine of it were cited and approved by Mr. Justice Nelson, in the circuit court of the United States for this district, in May, 1865, in the case of U. S. v. 1756 Shares of Capital Stock [Case No. 15,961]. That was a suit in rem, prosecuted under the confiscation acts of August 6, 1861 (12 Stat. 319), and July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 589). In his opinion in that case, Mr. Justice Nelson, speaking of those acts, remarks, that they expressly provide that the proceedings under them shall conform to the proceedings in admiralty and revenue cases; and the conclusion he draws, and it is one which applies to all the confiscation acts relied on in this case, from the act of 1861 down, is, that these acts are nothing but an extension, by act of congress, to enemy property captured on land, of the rule which, according to international law, had always been applied to enemy property captured at sea, and that the same rules must be applied in both cases. It necessarily follows, that the right which the United States are seeking to enforce in this suit, and the rights which they would seek to enforce by a suit in rem, if they had seized this cotton under these laws, are rights which rest wholly upon statute law.

It has been held by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of The Reform, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 617, that the act of July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 255), which is one of the acts on which the government relies for a recovery in this case, was not a mere temporary act; and that, although the restrictions upon commercial intercourse prescribed by that act were limited in duration to the period of the existence of hostilities, still, forfeitures incurred under it during the continuance of hostilities may be enforced afterwards. Therefore, in a proper case, the government could now enforce a forfeiture incurred by the defendant in respect to property, notwithstanding the proclamations of the president in regard to the cessation of hostilities. But the difficulty in the present case lies here, that the government has failed to prove the first material allegation in the information; and that is, that they are entitled to the possession of this cotton in such a manner that they have a right to enforce that right of possession in this action.

[2] An attachment was issued at the beginning of the suit, under which real and personal estate belonging to the defendant was seized. After the trial of the cause, a motion was made to dissolve the attachment. Judge Blatchford's decision, denying the motion, is reported in [Case No. 16,395].

The 5th section of the act of July 13th, 1861, declares that all property in transit to or from any insurrectionary state or section shall be forfeited to the United States. It was held in one case by Chief Justice Taney, in the Maryland district (U. S. v. 2,000 Bushels of Wheat, cited in U. S. v. The Francis Hatch [Case No. 15,158]), that the proper interpretation of that 5th section is, that no property can be condemned under it unless such property be actually seized while in such transit. But, without passing upon that point, I am entirely satisfied (notwithstanding the declaration, in the 5th section of the act, that, for the offence defined therein, the property shall be forfeited to the United States), that, inasmuch as the title of the United States must be based wholly upon the statute, the whole statute must be construed together. The 9th section must be construed in connection with the 5th section. The 9th section provides, "that proceedings on seizures for forfeitures under this act may be pursued in the courts of the United States in any district into which the property so seized may be taken and proceedings instituted; and such courts shall have and entertain as full jurisdiction over the same as if the seizure was made in that district." My view of this statute is, that it clearly contemplates that the forfeiture declared in the 5th section is to be enforced only by a seizure of the property; and that such forfeiture cannot be enforced in any other manner. Inasmuch as the whole right is statutory, if congress has seen fit to limit the statutory right to a forfeiture to be enforced only by a seizure of the property, the United States are so limited; and, inasmuch as that is their only right, if they are unable to seize the property, their right does not come into being, but remains an imperfect right. Congress has not seen fit to go any farther than to say: "You shall have this forfeiture if you seize the property." But if, for any reason, whether from the act of the defendant himself, or from any cause whatever, the government cannot seize the property, it cannot enforce the forfeiture.

This view is entirely consistent with the decisions that have been referred to by the counsel for the government, in reference to the time when a forfeiture declared by statute in favor of the government takes effect. The general language of all those decisions is, that where a statute denounces a forfeiture of property, as the penalty for the commission of an offence, if the denunciation is in direct terms, and not in the alternative, that is, if the statute does not say that the forfeiture shall be of the property or its value, the forfeiture takes place at the time the offence was committed, and operates as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the government. But, in every one of the cases cited, and in all the cases on the subject, in the courts of the United States, which have fallen under my observation, in the first place, the proceeding was in rem, and, in the second place, the question always came up upon the point as to whether, in such proceeding in rem, the title of the government to the property, and to a decree condemning it as forfeited, could be cut off by reason of the intervening, after the commission of the offence, of the title of a bona fide purchaser. It is only in respect to such a question that the decisions have been made. The principle is a sound one, unquestionably, and the whole subject has been fully considered in an opinion given by the district judge of the district of Kentucky, (Judge Ballard,) in the case of U. S. v. 56 Barrels of Whiskey [Case No. 15,095]. In that case, which was a suit in rem for a forfeiture of whiskey, a person claimed to be a bona fide purchaser of the whiskey, and that his purchase before prosecution, though after the commission of the offence, cut off the title of the government; but the court decided in favor of the government and against the claimant. In the case of Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366, which is one of the leading cases on the subject, the opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Wayne, and all that he says on the point must be taken together. He says: "The forfeiture is the statutory transfer of right to the goods at the time the offence is committed. If this was not so, the transgressor, against whom, of course, the penalty is directed, would often escape punishment, and triumph in the cleverness of the contrivance by which he has violated the law. The title of the United States to the goods forfeited is not consummated until after judicial condemnation; but the right to them relates backward to the time the offence was committed, so as to avoid all intermediate sales of them between the commission of the offence and condemnation." That decision cannot be considered as going any farther than the question then before the court; and it is, in my judgment, contrary to principle and precedent to hold, that the United States can enforce a right of property, in a suit of the kind now on trial before this court, by claiming that the forfeiture, solely as between themselves and the defendant, was complete and perfect at the time of the commission of the offence, without any judicial proceeding to enforce such forfeiture.

But, even if the rule could be different under some statutes, I do not think it could be different under this statute of 1861, because, the forfeiture provided for by the 5th section of that act, taken in connection with the 9th section, is a forfeiture that can be enforced only by a seizure of the property.

I now pass to the act of May 20, 1862 (12

Stat. 404). Even if the regulations of the secretary of the treasury, made under the acts of 1861 and 1862 and other acts are to be considered as matters of which the court can take judicial notice, because they are expressly referred to by their dates, and adopted, in the third section of the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 376), and even assuming that this cotton would have been forfeitable by virtue of regulations made by the secretary of the treasury in pursuance of the act of 1862, still that act is subject to the same construction as the act of 1861; and, although the 3d section of that act declares that property which shall be transported in violation of the act, or of any regulations of the secretary of the treasury established in pursuance thereof, shall be forfeited to the United States, yet the 4th section of the act says, that "the proceedings for the penalties and foreitures accruing under this act" (covering those accruing under regulations to be established by the secretary of the treasury, as well as those accruing under the act itself), "may be pursued * * * in the modes prescribed by the 8th and 9th sections of the act of July 13th, 1861, to which this act is supplementary." Therefore, in this respect, the construction of the act of 1862 must be the same as that of the act of 1861. The proceedings for a forfeiture under the act of 1862 must be pursued in the manner prescribed by the 9th section or the act of 1861, that is, by seizure, and in no other way.

The next statute is the act of August 6th, 1861, before referred to. That act provides, that if any person, during an insurrection, after the president shall have declared by proclamation that there is an insurrection, shall acquire, sell, or give any property to aid the insurrection, the president shall cause such property to be seized, confiscated, and condemned, and that the condemnation shall take place in the district or circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of the amount, or in admiralty, in any district in which it may be seized, or into which it may be taken and proceedings first instituted. The statute does not declare any forfeiture at all. It merely provides that the president may cause any property to be seized; and, unless he causes it to be seized, the statute does not cover it at all. Therefore, it is plain that there can be no suit or recovery founded on that act, unless the property is first seized.

The remaining act is the act of July 17th, 1862, before referred to, the 5th section of which provides, that "to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion, it shall be the duty of the president of the United States to cause the seizure of all the estate and property, money, stocks, credits, and effects of the persons hereinafter named in this section," (including persons thereafter acting as officers of the army or navy of the rebels in arms against the government of the United States,) "and to apply and use the same and the proceeds thereof for the support of the army of the United States." No forfeiture is declared by that act, in any other language. It merely states that the president may seize the property and apply it to the support of the army of the United States.

As it does not appear, in this case, that any of the cotton was seized, these views of the various statutes relied on by the government seem to me to dispose of this case. They lie at the very threshold of it, without the examination of any other questions.

The theory upon which the information in this case proceeded when it was filed, if that theory can be judged of from the information and the affidavit appended to it—for, the information refers to and embodies the affidavit as a part of the information, and the affidavit refers to and embodies the information as a part of the affidavit—is, that this cotton was the property of the public authorities concerned in the rebellion, and that the United States, by virtue of their sovereign right, became the owners of the cotton, eo instanti, at the very moment the rebel authorities claimed to own it. Such a right in the United States, if it existed in this case, would not at all depend upon any of the statutes which have been cited; and, if it were shown, in point of fact, by the testimony in this case, that this cotton belonged to the acting public authorities who were carrying on the rebellion, and calling themselves the Confederate government, the right of the United States, by virtue of their being the sovereign power, and by reason of such acting public authorities being rebel authorities, would come into operation over the property, by virtue of the constitution of the United States, and of their sovereign authority, irrespective of any statute, so as to make the subsequent conversion of the property by the defendant a tort, as against the immediate right of possession of the United States. But there is no such testimony in the case. The evidence is quite clear that none of the cotton, for the proceeds of which the government sues in this case, was the property of this so-called "Confederate Government," or of any of its subordinate governments acting in rebellion and hostility to the United States.

Therefore, as I before remarked, the right which lies at the threshold of the claim of the government to recover in this case, being a right resting wholly on the statute, and such right not being supported by any statute, even conceding all the facts to be as shown by the government, it is the duty of the court to instruct you, upon the facts and the law, that the government cannot recover, and that the defendant is entitled to your verdict. I should hesitate so to direct you in a case like this, if I were not entirely satisfied that the government cannot recover in it under any circumstances. I, therefore, direct you to find a verdict for the defendant.

The jury, under the foregoing instructions, rendered a verdict for the defendant.

The case was taken, by writ of error, to the circuit court, which, in October, 1869, affirmed the judgment. The following was the opinion of that court:

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This is a writ of error to the United States district court of the Southern district of New York. The suit is an action of trover brought by the United States against Stevenson, to recover the value of a large quantity of cotton, which, it is alleged, belonged to the plaintiff, and had been converted by the defendant to his own use. The cause was tried before a jury, and, on the trial, it appeared that the defendant, being a resident and citizen of Tennessee when the recent civil war broke out, remained in the state, and took part with the insurgent states, and was the president of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and ran the road in their service; and that, while thus engaged, he bought cotton within those states, and shipped it, with the knowledge and assent of the so-called "Confederate States," from Wilmington, North Carolina, to foreign ports, in violation of the United States blockade. It also appeared that, as the Union army approached Tennessee, and Nashville, he removed cotton that he had bought, and cotton also that belonged to others, further into the interior, to prevent the same from being captured by the forces of the United States. There is no proof in the case, that any part of the cotton was ever in the possession of the United States, or that they ever had any title to the same, or that it ever belonged to the so-called "Confederate States," but, on the contrary, it was purchased in the Confederate States, by the defendant, and shipped by him abroad, in violation of the existing blockade, and sold abroad, or sold within the said states. The court below, at the close of the testimony, being of opinion that no case was made out on the part of the plaintiffs, directed a verdict for the defendant.

The act of July 13th, 1861 (section 5), made it lawful for the president of the United States, where a state of insurrection existed, to declare it by proclamation, and provided that, thereupon, all commercial intercourse by and between the same, and the citizens thereof, and the citizens of the rest of the United States, should cease, and be unlawful, &c., and the goods, &c., coming from said state or section into other parts of the United States, &c., should be forfeited to the same. 12 Stat. p. 255. The act supplementary, passed May 20th, 1862, (12 Stat. p. 404,) section 3, confers on the secretary of the treasury the power, upon satisfactory grounds of belief that the goods, &c., are intended for any place in the possession or under the control of the insurgents, in all cases where he may deem it expedient to do so, to require security that they will not be carried to such place, nor used to give aid or comfort to the insurgents; and provides that a transportation in violation of the act, or of the regulation, shall work a forfeiture.

The act of August 6, 1861 (12 Stat. p. 319, § 1), provides that, during the insurrection, goods purchased or sold with intent to use or employ the same, &c., in aiding or promoting the insurrection, shall be subject of prize and capture, and it is made the duty of the president to cause the same to be seized and confiscated.

The act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. p. 591, § 6), makes the property of persons engaged in rebellion, who will not return to their duty in sixty days after warning by proclamation of the president, subject to seizure, and it is made the duty of the president to seize, &c.

The only remaining act that is material to refer to is that of March 3, 1863, § 1, (12 Stat. p. 820,) which authorizes the appointment of agents to collect captured and abandoned property.

I need hardly say, that neither of these statutes, or any provision in them, has any bearing on the facts, as disclosed in the case, or affords any ground for an inference or conclusion that the cotton in question, sold and converted to his own use by the defendant, belonged to the United States. Certainly not, unless all the property of citizens or people in the Confederate States belonged to the United States during the war.

There is another branch of this case that furnished, perhaps, the grounds for its original institution, which, as has turned out in proof, has utterly failed. The original information, as it is called, went on the ground that the defendant had fraudulently converted the cotton to his own use, and that the proceeds were disposed of with intent to secrete the same, and defraud the government, and prayed for process of attachment against the property of the defendant. Thereupon process of attachment issued, and a large amount of real and personal estate was attached, and still remains under the said process. The affidavit upon which this process was issued is remarkable, when compared with the facts of the case, as proved before the jury. The affiant states, that he was the person who filed the information against the defendant, which was on the 17th of December, 1866; that 3,000 bales of the cotton, or thereabouts, being in the states of Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee, were the property of the Confederate States, when the defendant took possession of it; that, in the summer of 1865, he transported the same to the city of New York, within the Southern district of New York, to be sold and disposed of at that city, and converted the cotton into money, the proceeds of which, amounting to $1,000,000, or thereabouts, the defendant received, and has converted the same into real or personal estate in that city; that the cotton was brought into the state of New York from the insurrectionary states, in violation of the proclamation of the president, of the 16th of August, 1861, and of the acts of congress, (referring to them;) and that it was the property of the United States. It was upon this affidavit that the process of attachment was issued, which seems to have been in some way regarded as a seizure, not of the cotton, but of the real and personal estate of the defendant, as a substitute for the same; and yet, the case has been tried as a simple action of trover and conversion in personam.

The case, as tried in the court below, and as ruled by the learned judge, is a very simple and plain one, and, in every aspect in which it has been presented, on the testimony, can lead to but one result, and that is, that the United States showed no title to the property, or to the possession of it, which was indispensable to maintain this action.

As it is shown that the affidavit on which the process of attachment issued was wholly untrue and false, or mistaken, the process of attachment must be set aside and discharged. Instead of the cotton belonging to the Confederate States, it belonged to the defendant; and, instead of being shipped to New York in violation of the acts of congress, it was shipped from a Confederate port to a foreign country, in violation of the blockade of the port of Wilmington; but this fact could not change the title of the property, or work a forfeiture of the same to the United States, unless seized as prize of war.

The judgment below is affirmed, and the process of attachment is set aside and discharged.

[A motion had been made in the district court to discharge the attachment, but was denied. See Case No. 16,395.]

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—CONFIRMATION.

[Grant confirmed, where the title paper produced by the claimants was regular and proven to be genuine, and the expediente from the archives showed that all the preliminary proceedings were in due form, and that the grant was confirmed by the departmental assembly about six months after its date, it appearing that the conditions had been complied with.]

Claim for two leagues of land in Contra Costa county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.

Volney E. Howard, for appellees.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case is for a piece of land called "Medanos," embracing two square leagues "a little more or less." It was confirmed by the board, and the cause has been submitted to this court on appeal, without argument, or the statement of any objection to its validity.

The title paper is produced by the claimants and its genuineness duly certified. The expediente from the archives not only shows that the preliminary proceedings were in due form, but that the grant was confirmed by the departmental assembly about six months after its date. It is also shown that the conditions were fully complied with. The delineation on the diseño appears to be rude and inexact, but the title itself describes the boundaries of the tract with some precision. In that document the land is mentioned as that known by the name of "Medanos," and bounded on the south by the land of Citizen Noriega, on the north by that of Citizen Salvio Pacheco, on the east by the river San Joaquin, and on the west by the "lomarias" or small hills. The third condition states the extent of the granted land to be two square leagues, a "little more or less." Some of the witnesses appear to have supposed that the land embraced within these boundaries would include a tract of far greater extent than that mentioned in the condition. But it is clear that they have confounded the "lomarias" mentioned in the grant with the range of mountains known as the "Contra Costa Hills," which lie at a considerable distance, and which would, if taken as the western boundary, not only include a tract of country of great extent, but also one or more intervening ranchos. It would seem, however, that the "lomarias" spoken of are a range of low hills, and that the land included within these and the other boundaries of the grant has about the extent mentioned in the grant.

Such appears to have been the view taken of the case by the board, and we see no reason for a different conclusion. The mesne conveyances appear to be regular. Under the proofs offered, the claimant, [Jonathan D.] Stevenson, is entitled to a confirmation of the part conveyed to him by the deed as reformed according to the intentions of the parties under the decree of the district court of this state.

A decree affirming the decision of the board must be entered.

PRACTICE—POSTPONEMENT OF TRIAL—COURT RULES—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS.

[1. Where the plaintiff in a common-law case, which has been placed on the calendar, and is called in its regular order for trial, desires a postponement until the next term for the purpose of obtaining the testimony of new witnesses, it is not the proper practice to move on affidavits for such postponement. The practice in such case is (by district court rule 240) regulated by the rules of the circuit court, under which (rules 38 and 51) the plaintiff alone can notice a jury case for trial, and if, when it is called, he is not ready, all that is required is that he shall fail to respond, in which case it is marked as "Passed." After the jury for the term has been discharged, defendant may move for a judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff in answer thereto may show his excuse, and if it be deemed sufficient, the court can permit him to stipulate to try the cause at the next term.]

[2. In an information at law against defendant for removing and converting to his own use certain cotton belonging to the United States, held, that certain newly-discovered evidence, showing new transactions, in relation to the cotton, and in respect to which plaintiff showed that he was guilty of no laches, was sufficient ground for allowing a postponement of the trial until the next term, and for permitting an amendment to the information, even after the case was called for trial on the calendar.]

S. G. Courtney, U. S. Dist. Atty.
John E. Ward, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This cause, which is an information filed by the United States, in a common-law action, against the defendant [Vernon K. Stevenson] for the alleged conversion of certain cotton, the property of the United States, being on the jury calendar of this court for trial at the present term, and being called in its order for trial, the district attorney moves on affidavit that the trial of the cause be postponed to the next term on the alleged ground that the testimony of sundry witnesses who are named, and who reside in Tennessee and elsewhere in the United States, cannot be procured in time for a trial at the present term and must be taken by commission, and that the necessity for the testimony of those witnesses has just been discovered under circumstances which excuse all charge of laches on the part of the United States. The motion so made is wholly unnecessary and not according to the practice of the court. By rule 240 of this court, the practice applicable to this case, at its present stage, is regulated by the rules of the circuit court now in force. By those rules (rule 38) only the plaintiff in a common-law suit can notice it for trial before a jury on an issue joined. The defendant cannot notice it. When it is noticed and put on the calendar by the plaintiff, if when it is called for trial the plaintiff is not ready to go to trial, it is unnecessary for him to make any motion, or to do anything more than fail to respond to the case when it is called. If he so fails, the case is marked as "Passed," and the defendant cannot then or there ask for any action of the court in the matter. But by rule 51 of the circuit court, after the discharge of the jury in the same term for which notice of trial was given by the plaintiff, or at the next term, the defendant may move for judgment dismissing the suit because the plaintiff did not go to trial. If, in answer to such motion, the plaintiff shows sufficient excuse, to be approved by the court, for not having gone to trial, the court can permit the plaintiff to stipulate to try the cause at the next term. It would be sufficient in the present case to deny the motion of the plaintiff, as unnecessary and not according to the practice of the court; but, inasmuch as the whole subject is before the court now on affidavits on both sides, and the defendant moves to dissolve the attachment issued in the case, and the district attorney expresses his willingness to consider the defendant as moving to dismiss the suit under rule 51 of the circuit court, I shall dispose of the matter as if the defendant were making that motion.

The plaintiff also asks leave, on notice, to amend his libel by adding a new count. The testimony of the witnesses named in the affidavits on the part of the plaintiff as therein stated goes directly to the averments contained in such new count. The libel, as it stands without such new count, would seem to be confined to the transportation by the defendant of the cotton in question to New York, and the conversion of it there. The new count is not confined to transactions in the cotton at New York, but is broader in its scope. The answer already put in by the defendant denies all transactions in the cotton in question, at New York or elsewhere, and is therefore broad enough to cover the new count. I think that, under the facts disclosed in the affidavits on the part of the plaintiff, the amendment to the libel must be allowed, and that those affidavits show that the plaintiff has not been guilty of any laches. They show a sufficient excuse on the part of the plaintiff for not going to trial at this term. I shall therefore permit the plaintiff to stipulate to try the cause at the next term, and shall hold the attachment.

An order will be entered allowing the amendments proposed, and also dismissing the suit and dissolving the attachment because the plaintiff failed to proceed to the trial of the cause when it was called, in order, at the present term, unless the plaintiff, within five days after the entry of such order, gives to the defendant's attorney a stipulation to try this cause at the next term of this court at which a jury shall be in attendance, and the cause shall be called for trial in its order on the calendar; and if such stipulation be so given, then the suit is to stand and the attachment is not to be dissolved.

DISTILLER'S TRANSPORTATION BOND—DEFENSES—SEIZURE OF GOODS IN TRANSIT—PLEADING—REPLICATION.

1. To a suit upon a bond for the transportation of highwines, it is a sufficient defense that during the act of transportation the officers of the government seized them, and that the collector of the district to which they were consigned refuses to grant a certificate of delivery to him.

2. The government having by its own act prevented the performance of the condition of the bond, is estopped from recovering upon such a breach.

3. The fact that the seizure was made by reason of the wrongful act of the persons having the highwines in charge makes no difference. The government had the election to seize them in transit or await their delivery; but if it does the former, it cannot afterwards sue for the breach of the bond.

4. To a plea setting up the above facts it is not a good replication that the seizure was properly made for a violation of the internal revenue laws, for which the wines were afterwards duly forfeited in the district court.

This was an action of debt on behalf of the United States against Stewart and his sureties upon his transportation bond.

J. O. Glover, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Goudy & Chandler, for defendants.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is a suit upon a distiller's bond for the transportation of 100 barrels of highwines from Keithsburg, Ill., to St. Louis, Mo., and the delivery thereof to Barton Able, collector of the First district of Missouri. The third plea of the defendants sets forth in substance that said wines were duly transported to St. Louis and landed upon the levee there, and were then, immediately after their arrival, seized by an officer of the United States, and while in the exclusive possession and control of such officer, seven barrels of said wines were, without the consent, fault or neglect of defendants or either of them, carried away to some place unknown by some person or persons unknown; and that the remaining 93 barrels of said wines were afterwards by the said officer removed from said levee, and delivered to Barton Able, collector of the First district of Missouri, who received the same and placed them in a warehouse in St. Louis, where they have ever since remained. Defendants also aver that such seizure was without their privity or consent, and that said Barton Able hath ever since refused to make and deliver to defendants a certificate showing that said highwines or any part thereof have ever been delivered to him.

To this plea a replication was filed, setting up in substance that 93 barrels of said wines were seized upon an information filed in the United States district court for the Eastern district of Missouri for an alleged violation of the internal revenue laws, and that afterwards such proceedings were had in said court on said information that a degree of forfeiture was entered against said highwines for said violation of the internal revenue laws; and to this replication a demurrer is interposed by the defendants.

Some technical objections to the form of this replication were made in the demurrer, but as no stress was laid upon them in the argument I shall proceed at once to consider the main question raised by the pleadings, which is, whether the replication is a sufficient answer to the plea, and whether said plea is a sufficient answer to the declaration.

The condition of the bond is that the said 100 barrels of highwines shall be transported from the bonded warehouse of said Stewart at Keithsburg, in the Fourth district of Illinois, to the city of St. Louis, and there delivered to Barton Able, collector of the First district of Missouri, within ten days from the date of said bond; and that within ten days thereafter a certificate of said Able, or his successor as such collector, showing that said wines had been so delivered to him, and by him placed in a bonded warehouse in his district, should be produced to the collector of the Fourth district of Illinois. The effect of the defense thus set up is that while the obligors in the bond were in the act of performing said condition, said highwines were seized by the revenue officers of the United States, and while so held seven barrels were taken away by some person unknown, and the replication avers that the remaining 93 barrels were afterwards libelled and condemned for alleged violation of the internal revenue laws. By the conceded facts, then, performance of the condition of this bond has been prevented by the acts of the agents of the obligee. In other words, the plaintiff has, through the agency of its officers, rendered the performance of the condition of the bond impossible. True, the seizure which made it impossible for the defendants to fulfill the condition of the bond, was made by reason of the wrongful act of some one having said wines in charge. But does that make any difference? The government had its election to seize them in transit, or await the performance of the condition of the bond and seize them afterwards. The wines could not be in two places at once. If the government interposed to prevent their delivery under the bond, is it not estopped from recovering for a breach of the bond caused by its own act?

No direct authorities upon bonds of this character have been cited, nor have I been able to find any. But the case seems analogous in all essential principles to the case of People v. Bartlett, 3 Hill, 570. In that case a recognizance had been entered into for the appearance of the principal to answer a criminal charge. Default was made, and to a sci.

fa. on the recognizance it was pleaded that the principal had, after giving said recognizance, been arrested, and was then held in confinement in state's prison under another criminal charge. The court held the plea sufficient, and Nelson, Chief Justice, said: "I am of opinion that the plea is a good answer to the action. It is a general principle of law that when the performance of the condition of a bond or recognizance has been rendered impossible by the act of God, or of the law, or of the obligee, the default is excused." The principle enunciated in this authority is certainly broad enough in its fair, logical application to support the defense to the bond set up by the plea, and the replication, instead of answering the plea, only goes more into the detail of the same proceedings on the part of the government which the plea relies upon. It certainly does not answer the plea to say that the goods were not only seized, but were afterwards condemned by the same judicial proceedings initiated by the seizure. The replication only makes it more certain that the performance of the condition of the bond has been rendered impossible by the act of the obligee.

The demurrer to the replication is sustained.

UNITED STATES v. STEWART.

[Crabbe, 265.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May, 1839.

NAVY—ENLISTMENT OF MINORS.

[Cited in Re McNulty, Case No. 8,917, to the point that minors might be enlisted in the navy, but not in the army, without the consent of their parents or guardians.]

This was a habeas corpus, addressed to Commodore [Charles] Stewart, as commanding the navy yard at Philadelphia, requiring him to produce the body of Bishop Priest, alias Lewis Johnson, alleged to be a minor improperly enlisted in the navy. The proof of minority wholly failed, and the petitioner was remanded.

In connexion with the case, Judge HOPKINSON prepared the following summary of cases, on the question of the enlistment of a minor in the navy:

The question came before the circuit court of the United States for the First circuit, in 1816. U. S. v. Bainbridge [Case No. 14,497]. One Robert Treadwell, an infant of the age of twenty years and about eleven months, born on the 2d August, 1795, enlisted in the navy, to serve two years, in May, 1815. He had deserted, was brought to trial before a court martial, in June, 1815, and was sentenced to serve in the navy for two years from the 19th June, and to forfeit the wages then due him. He had a father living, then absent at sea, and it appeared that the enlistment had been without the father's consent. It was contended for him: (1) That congress had no power to pass an act authorizing the enlistment of minors without the consent of their father; (2) that congress had passed no act authorizing such enlistment; (3) that it was not a contract for the benefit of the infant. The other side took these grounds: (1) That the contract, as made by the minor, was a valid one; (2) that if he might, at any time, have avoided it, he could not do so after he had been legally sentenced by a court martial; (3) that the acts of congress, for enlistments in the navy, make continual and particular mention of "boys," who are required by the nature of the service. Story, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court. He stated the first question to be, whether the contract of enlistment, supposing it to have been made without the consent of the father, was void or not. By the common law, the father has a right to the custody of his children during their infancy. He is also entitled to the benefit of their labor, while they live with him, and are maintained by him. These rights, however, depend upon the mere municipal rules of the state, and may be enlarged, restrained, or limited, as the wisdom or policy of the times may dictate, unless the legislative power be controlled by some constitutional prohibition. The constitution of the United States gives congress the power "to raise and support armies," and "to provide and maintain a navy," and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper" to execute these powers. The services of minors may be useful and important to the country, both in the army and navy. In the navy, the employment of minors is almost indispensable. Congress, therefore, have the power to enlist minors in the naval service, and the exercise of the power is justified by the soundest principles of national policy. They need not require the consent of the parents; such an assertion is extraordinary; it assumes that the legislative power cannot be exercised in derogation of the common law. Minors are enrolled in the militia, to perform military duty; and in the British navy minors are not only enlisted without the consent of their parents, but employed against their own consent. Do the laws of the United States authorize the enlistment of minors into the navy? All the acts authorize the employment of midshipmen, who are invariably minors. All the acts since June, 1798, authorize the president to engage "boys," in the ordinary duties of the navy. In no one of the laws is the consent of the parents or guardians required. The laws manifestly contemplate that it is a personal contract made by the infants themselves, for their own benefit. They are entitled to the pay, bounty, and prize-money. As to the case of a voidable contract made by an infant, at common law, it is meant that the contract is voidable by the infant, at his own election, and not by the assent or dissent of the parents. The acts of congress could not intend to authorize an infant to enlist in the navy, and yet to avoid the contract at his election. "Upon the whole, as congress have authorized 'boys' to be engaged in the service of the navy, without requiring the previous consent of their parents to the contract of enlistment, that contract, when fairly made with an infant of reasonable discretion, must be deemed to have a semblance of benefit to him, and to be essential to the public welfare, and, therefore, binding to all intents and purposes." The acts respecting enlistments in the army provided "that no person, under the age of twenty-one years, shall be enlisted by any officer, or held in the service of the United States, without the consent of his parents, guardian, or master, first had and obtained, if any he have." Afterwards, in January, 1813, the enlistment of minors, over eighteen years of age, was expressly authorized; and the proviso which required the consent of the parents, &c., repealed in December, 1814. Story's Laws, 1285, 1433 [2 Stat. 791; 3 Stat. 146].

The case of Emanuel Roberts, 2 Hall, Law J. 192, before Nicholson, C. J., Baltimore county, 1809: The constitution gives to congress the power of raising and maintaining a navy; the petitioner enlisted in the service of the United States; it is, therefore, a proceeding under the authority of the United States. It is alleged that the party is only sixteen years of age, and was drunk when he enlisted. The court recognises the contract of enlistment as a contract or agreement in which the United States was one party, and the petitioner the other. In the extreme case of a child eight or ten years of age, the court would discharge him, because of his incapacity to make a contract; not an incapacity arising from the general principle that he who has not attained the age of twenty-one years is incapable of binding himself, but from an actual imbecility of mind, owing to his tender years. The petitioner is not of this description. If he be only sixteen years of age, he is remarkably well grown. "Although it is a general rule that a person under twenty-one years of age cannot bind himself by contract, yet I am far from saying that this rule will apply in its unlimited extent, to prevent young men from enlisting in the service of their country, or to authorize their discharge upon an application to the courts of the United States." He was of opinion that the court had no right to interfere in the case.

Com. v. Gamble, 11 Serg. & R. 93, before the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in 1824: Gibson, C. J. "The single question to be decided is, whether the enlistment of a minor, into the corps of marines, is void by any act of congress, or at common law. The act which regulates enlistments in the army, prohibits the enlistment of minors, except as musicians; and, on the other hand, the act which regulates the enlistment of seamen, expressly authorizes the enlistment of minors." The marine corps has no necessary connexion with the army; it is a part of the naval establishment, and is exclusively subject to the orders of the secretary of the navy. He thinks that the contract of enlistment in the navy, by a minor, is good, independently of the statutes, at common law. Such a contract is good, if for the benefit of the minor, and he is far from being convinced that the contract of enlistment is not of this kind. He puts the case on the ground of public policy, which requires that a minor be at liberty to enter into a contract to serve the state, whenever such contract is not forbidden by the state itself. This is the common law of England. The petitioner was in confinement, on a charge of desertion. The chief justice said: "The law is clear, that he must abide the sentence of a court martial, before he can contest the validity of his enlistment." Prisoner remanded.

Com. v. Murray, 4 Bin. 487, in 1812: The syllabus of the case is: "Under the act of congress of January 31, 1809 (2 Story's Laws, 1109 [2 Stat. 514]), authorizing the president of the United States to cause to be engaged certain able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to serve in the navy, an infant who has arrived at years of discretion, and has neither father, master, nor guardian, may make a valid contract to serve according to the act, notwithstanding he has a mother with whom he resides at the time, and whose consent was not given to the contract." "An infant owes reverence and respect to his mother, but she has no legal authority over him, nor any legal right to his services." "Under the constitutional power of congress to provide and maintain a navy, that body may by law authorize minors to enter into contracts for service in the navy, notwithstanding such contracts if made by an infant might not be binding upon him at common law." The opinion of Tilghman, C. J., cites section 8, art. 1, of the constitution, giving congress power to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy; this includes all powers necessary to the object intended. The service of persons, under twenty-one years of age, is useful to the country and to themselves. Certainly infants, not under the control of any other person, may make such a valid contract. He gives no opinion whether infants may not engage themselves in the navy, without the consent of parents, master, or guardian. In this case there was no father, master, or guardian, and the mother had no legal rights. The petitioner was of an age fully to comprehend the nature of the engagement, and there was no person who had any lawful authority over him. Yeates, J.: It has not been contended that an infant under the years of discretion, or one whose services have been engaged by a personal contract, can lawfully engage in the navy. The petitioner was seventeen years and seven months old. His father was dead; his mother had no legal rights; there was no prior contract; and the court presumes this contract which he has made is for his benefit. Brackenridge, J., goes on the ground that the contract is for the benefit of the infant. He had neither father nor guardian, nor any means of living, except the trade of a shoemaker, which his health did not permit him to pursue. All idea of the act of congress is excluded. The judge will not touch it, as it has nothing to do with the case; he can give no authority to the other contracting party. Congress cannot change the principles of the common law; the legislature of a state, alone, may do it.

UNITED STATES v. STEWART.[1]

SAME v. WRIGHT.

[2 Dall. 343; Whart. St. Tr. 172.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. 1795.

TRIALS FOR TREASON—TIME ALLOWED DEFENDANT FOR BRINGING WITNESSES—RIGHT TO BAIL.

[1. In trials for treason, especially where the trial is held in a county distant from that in which the crime is laid, the prisoner is entitled, in all cases, after being furnished with the names of the witnesses against him, to a reasonable time in which to bring testimony from the counties in which those witnesses live.]

[2. Where a person indicted for treason obtained a postponement on the ground of the absence of witnesses, but afterwards, when the court was about to adjourn for the term, announced his readiness to proceed to trial with the same witnesses previously available, held, that this would not entitle him to be released on bail, the court being then unable to hear the case.]

The prisoners being brought to the bar, on separate charges of high treason, Lewis read their depositions, stating the absence of material witnesses in both cases, and moved to postpone the trials 'till an opportunity was given, to procure the attendance of those witnesses from the western counties. He urged, the general inconveniency of a commitment and trial at so great a distance, from the scene of the criminal transaction; the friendless situation of the prisoners, and the poverty of the witnesses; and he alledged, that, under such circumstances, an immediate trial would be a mere ex parte proceeding. To shew the lenity with which persons thus charged have always been treated, he cited Fost. Crown Law, 1, and to account for the delay in procuring the witnesses, he observed, that as the act of congress (1 Story's Laws, 63, § 29 [1 Stat. 88]) declared, that "in cases punishable with death, the trial shall be had in the county where the offence was committed," if it could be done without great inconvenience, the prisoners might reasonably have expected that indulgence, until the motion for a special court had been refused, on account of the peculiar difficulties of the case, in opposition to the general inclination of the judges. Nor could there be any preparation for trial 'till the charge was known, and the names of the witnesses who were to prove the indictments. By the practice under the constitution and laws of Pennsylvania (and the case is the same here) a defendant cannot have compulsory process to bring in his witnesses, before he has sworn that they are material; and he cannot so swear 'till he knows the charge and the witnesses that support it. It is essential to the administration of justice, and to the feelings of humanity, that the defendants should have time to investigate the characters of witnesses, and to bring proofs in contradiction to the accusation. Hence, even in England, where the counties are generally smaller than in this country, a period of ten days is allowed, between the time of furnishing lists of the witnesses and jurors, and the time of trial. 7 Anne, c. 21; 4 Bl. Comm. 345. And altho' the act of congress (1 Stat. 112, § 29) only says that copies of the indictment and a list of the jury and witnesses shall be delivered to the prisoner "at least, three entire days before he shall be tried," yet it must certainly be the intention of the legislature to afford an opportunity to canvass the characters of the witnesses, or the provision would be nugatory: that opportunity cannot be deemed to commence 'till he knows their names, and it cannot be deemed to be compleat, unless he has had time to send for information to the places in which they reside. The court will, therefore, exercise a discretion as to the length of time to be allowed, in proportion to the distance; and, conformably to the case in Fost. Crown Law, 1, the time so allowed for preparation, will be subsequent to the delivery of the copy of the indictment, and the lists of witnesses.

Rawle (attorney for the district) premised, that an acquiescence in the present motion, would, probably, put off the trial for the term. He urged, that the prisoners must long ago have known the nature of the charge, and the proofs necessary to their defence; and ought to have made an earlier application for the aid of the court to procure their witnesses. Due diligence has not been used, nor, indeed, is it so stated in the affidavits; and it is not only necessary to satisfy the court that the witnesses are material; but also that the party applying has been guilty of no laches, or neglect, in omitting to apply to them and endeavouring to procure their attendance. 3 Burrows, 1513. Ever since the 20th April, there has been an opportunity to make this motion; which was not the case in Fost. Crown Law,

[1] [This was one of the trials arising out of the so-called "Whiskey Insurrection," occurring in western Pennsylvania in the year 1794. For a full account of the proceedings, see U. S. v. Insurgents, Case No. 15,443.]

1, as that arose before a special court, acting under a special commission, for special purposes. Nor can there be a just reason to object to the trial's coming on, because of the place at which the court is held. On the motion for a special court, sufficient was disclosed to shew, that the indictments would be presented in Philadelphia; and it was a mere speculation afterwards to suppose that another place would be appointed for the trials; particularly as all the jurors and witnesses had been actually summoned.

BY THE COURT. The only argument of weight in support of the present motion, is that which relates to the period of furnishing the prisoners with the names of the witnesses; but it is, of itself, conclusive: for, unless an opportunity were afterwards given to investigate the characters, and trace the conduct of the witnesses, it would be nugatory and delusive to furnish the list of their names. The act directs notice to be given; this must be intended for the purpose alluded to, and, for the attainment of that purpose, time is, undoubtedly, necessary. It must, therefore, be considered as a rule in this case, and in all other cases of a similar nature, that a reasonable time shall be allowed, after a list of the names of the witnesses is furnished to the prisoners, for the purpose of bringing testimony from the counties in which those witnesses live. The trials of Stewart & Wright were, accordingly, postponed; and it was then agreed that they should not be brought on 'till the trial of the other prisoners, who were ready for trial, was concluded; but so much time was consumed in this previous business, that the judges declared they could not longer protract the sitting of the court, on account of other circuits, and, therefore directed the cases of Stewart & Wright to be continued generally 'till the next term. It appeared, however, that on the preceding day, Lewis had informed the attorney for the district, that he would proceed to trial in the case of Stewart, with the testimony already in his possession, though he expected other witnesses; and, on this ground, as the court was about to break up, he moved, that Stewart should be admitted to bail.

But, BY THE COURT, it was Stewart's own fault, not the fault of the prosecutor, that the trial was postponed. He has now the same witnesses, that he had at the time of the postponement; but the judges cannot, consistently with their other duties, enter on the trial. It is true, that we have established it as a principle, that no laches should be imputed to the prisoner, for taking time to send into the counties where the witnesses for the prosecution reside, after he had received notice of their names; but that is not the case at present. Stewart has no claim upon the legal discretion of the court; and, indeed, the circumstances must be very strong, which will, at any time, induce us to admit a person to bail, who stands charged with high treason.

Case No. 16,401a.

UNITED STATES v. STEWART et al.

[2 Hayw. & H. 280.] [1]

Criminal Court, District of Columbia. Aug. 18, 1857.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CALLING OUT MILITARY IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—RIOT—ELECTIONS.

1. The 15th clause of the 8th article of the constitution of the United States, which confers upon congress the power to provide for the calling forth of the militia to execute the laws of the United States, and the act of congress of February 28, 1795 (1 Stat. 424), apply to the states.

2. The 2d section of article 2 of the constitution, which makes the president commander in chief of the army and navy of the United States; and section 3 of the same, which makes it his duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, empower him to call out the military in aid of the civil authorities of the District of Columbia.

3. Where the commissioners of election closed the polls contrary to the law, which required them to be open from 7 a. m. to 7 p. m., it was the duty of the mayor to demand that the polls be opened, but he had no power to enforce the demand.

4. Where parties, at least three in number, did in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people, with a determination to assist one another against any who should oppose them, act together according to previous concert and arrangement, for the purpose of thwarting the efforts of the mayor to have the polls open, and opposing his efforts to preserve the public peace, as many of them who thus acted would be guilty of a riot.

After the close of the testimony on the part of the United States and the prisoners [Dan Stewart and others], Mr. Key asked two instructions of the court to the jury, which he read to the court as follows: If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the mayor of Washington made an application to the president of the United States and the secretary of the navy to order out the United States marines to assist him in preserving the public peace, and the said marines were accordingly ordered by the secretary of the navy, and were marched by the direction of the mayor to the place of disturbance, to wit: to the first precinct of the Fourth ward, then the said mayor and the said marines were there legally. If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the commissioners of election of the said first precinct of the Fourth ward closed the polls of said precinct for no other reason than the one given, that is, the presence of the said marines, then the act of said commissioners in closing said polls was an illegal act, and the said mayor, by virtue of his office, and in execution thereof, possessed full power and authority to order the said polls to be opened, and all persons who in a violent and turbulent manner, acting together, either by previous concert or by concert springing up at the time, opposed the efforts of the said mayor, either to have the said polls opened or to preserve the public peace, are guilty of a riot.

Mr. Scott said that he could not admit such a point to be allowed, of the right of the secretary of the navy to call out the military under arms, and give the discretionate authority to the mayor to use them as he might think best. The president had no right to use the military force of the United States in a proper case, to quell or prevent a riot; he might use the means which were provided by law, and such means only; he contended that the constructions of the court of the article in the constitution in relation to the execution of the laws had an important qualification. A justice of the peace had authority to make others keep the peace; sheriff's, constables, marshals are peace officers, all have the like authority; a sheriff charged with the process of a court has authority to summon his posse to aid him; but all this authority pertains to all these officers only in certain cases; these means provided by the law are only to be resorted to when these means are necessary. If the marshal of this district receives authority to summons or execute upon citizens of this district, has he power to go into the streets to summons a posse to assist him to execute? With certainty does that authority belong to him only when resistance is made to such execution of the laws Yet if the act of the president or secretary is beyond question; if the act of the mayor is beyond question; if the discretion of the parties is to be the law on that occasion, how long will it be before military rule fixes its iron grasp upon us? The laws of congress give a municipal charter to this district. It confers upon them legislative powers. It provides for stated elections; time and place is prescribed for the election, and to prepare the points or places of election, and of giving the votes. Has the president the right, or any subordinate member of the cabinet, of their own heads, or at the suggestion of the mayor, to march the military to these places and make the citizens vote through a file of marines? If they have the right at their will, there must be a call existing to justify the ordering out—there must be something to make the act necessary. Now, what circumstances can make such an act necessary, or excuse it? If the peace is disturbed, if riots occur, or affrays, the law imposes the duty on the civil authority of that community to suppress it, and imposes the means of discharging that duty. The mayor has his police, his auxiliary guards. He has power to increase this force by especial appointment. The law imposes the duty on them of suppressing, and providing for the means of suppressing, those riots or disturbances. If all this is not so, your marshal may go with a file of marines to execute a summons—the United States military may be used for almost any peaceable purpose in the walks of life. When this military was called out there was no justifiable cause, there was absolutely none. It is necessary that it should be shown in this case that there was a lawful necessity existing at the time before calling out the military. As to the point raised in the second instruction, Mr. Scott asked whose duty it was to open the polls and conduct the elections? He apprehended it would be found that the duty was conferred upon those commissioners who were judges of the election; that to their honor, integrity and discretion the law confided the faithful conduct of that election; that they were the judges of the manner and the time for receiving votes, with no appeal from their decisions, which were such as the law provides, peaceably engaged in the performance of their duty; when peace and quiet prevailed around them, and the citizens engaged in the exercise of their rights, a portion of the United States military parades upon the ground, with loaded muskets and flashing bayonets, to participate in the business of election.

The district attorney exalts the mayor into an officer in command of a military force, to dictate to the judges; the proposition is confined to the simple fact of opening the polls, but he goes further, and says that he has the power to open the polls, and to proceed with the election; and it is but one step further to command how they shall proceed with the election, and to say, if the peace was disturbed, who disturbed it; if a riot occurred, who occasioned it; he apprehended, the military. If the mayor, with his army in array, transcended his right, have the people not the right to express disapprobation; to resist his assumed dictation?

As to the second proposition of the district attorney, they asked the court in effect to say that these commissioners were guilty of a riot; he assumes as a fact what is a matter of proof, to be expressed at the termination of the trial. The mayor had a right, for a proper reason, and for sufficient cause, to call out the military; but in no case is this to be done in the absence of that cause, or the president to be marshal of this district. He closed by saying that he apprehended that he had pointed out in a lucid manner the reasons which the counsel for the defence had for refusing to accede to the extraordinary proposition of the district attorney.

Mr. Key proceeded to read to the court, from the charter, the laws governing the conduct of municipal elections.

Mr. Bradley proposed to offer law authorities in relation to the points contained in the proposition of the district attorney. He entered his protest against those propositions in a most emphatic manner; that no irresponsible discretion was vested in the mayor or any other civil officer, either by the laws of this country or of England; he referred to the case, among others, of the British rioters, as reported in the Common Law Reports of England, in support of his position. Mr. Bradley went on to say that the first thing to be considered by the jury was: was it an unlawful assemblage? Was there a breach of the peace? If there was none, then the marines were unlawfully called out. It might be an unlawful assembly in a very slight degree, then there was no pretence for calling out the military. Such cases must depend upon their own circumstances. The jury was to judge, under the particular circumstances, whether the mayor used more violent means than were necessary to disperse the mob. He apprehended that it would not be determined that the discretion of the magistrates in this country went further than it did in England. If there is no law to justify the mayor in his course, then we are justified, and could to all intents and purposes, resist any unjustifiable and irresponsible exercise of such discretionary power.

Mr. Key replied, contending, in the course of his remarks, that the act of the mayor was just and legal; and that the act of the president in acceding to his application for the marines, fortified by an affidavit which was sworn to by a respectable citizen of Washington, and granting him discretionary power to use them according to the exigencies of the case, was a proof of the confidence reposed in him by the president, to do and act as the danger and peril of the citizens thus disturbed might in the case seem to warrant. He said that it was contended by the other side, that the riot had ceased when the mayor first went to the polls; what did the mayor find to be the case when he arrived there? He found the barricades broken and the polls closed. All was quiet, said the counsel for the defence, but it was the quiet that prevails on the battle-field after the fight is over, and no victim is left to make resistance. Was it not manifestly the mayor's duty, under these circumstances, to employ such force as had been placed in his hands and at his command? He did employ that force, and legally too; he used those means for the maintenance of the public peace and good order in the community, which peace has been flagrantly violated. Was it not remarkable that the judges of election had taken the unwarrantable responsibility of closing the polls in violation of all law, at a time when, according to the testimony which had been given on the part of the defence, all was quiet, and the voting was proceeding peaceably? And upon what plea, then, did they do this? It was upon the vapory excuse springing out of a sickly and absurd sentimentality that they would not receive votes with the flashing bayonets of the marines directed towards their breasts. What right had they to refuse compliance with the express provisions of the law, when all was peace and quietness around them? The marines were a square off; they could not have been afraid of them at the time the polls were closed. He contended that the conduct of the judges ought to be held up to universal opprobrium, and they consigned to everlasting shame.

Mr. Key quoted from the act of congress of 1812, contained in [2 Stat. 721], to show "that the mayor shall see that the laws of the corporation shall be duly executed, and that he shall punish any disobedience of those laws on the part of its officers."

Mr. Key cited many other authorities to sustain the action of the mayor and in support of his instructions. He contended that the commissioners had violated the laws by closing the polls, and that it was but proper, under the existence of all these facts, to ask the court to instruct the jury that the marines were on the ground legally and for the exercise of a legal purpose.

Mr. Ellis said that Mr. Key had referred to the constitution of the United States to show the authority of the president to call out the marines and interfere in the case now before the court. The argument was that this portion of the constitution gave the president the power. He contended that it gave no such authority to the president. At the present time the president is not the United States—not quite. His power then is not here, but in the legislation of congress on the constitution. He quoted from the law to show in what cases the president may call out the military. He contended that there were but three cases in which the president may call out the military; they were only in case of an insurrection, an invasion, and when necessary to the sustaining of the law. He contended that the authorities cited by the district attorney were not applicable to the matter now pending, that the law did not authorize the mayor to do what the district attorney contended to authorize him to do.

P. B. Key, U. S. Dist. Atty.

R. E. Scott, Joseph H. Bradley, Vespasian Ellis, and Ratcliff & Carrington, for the prisoners.

CRAWFORD, J., gave his answer to the instructions as follows: With reference to the first instruction, the court said that much argument had been expended in relation to the president's power to order out the military. The 15th clause of the 8th section of the article of the constitution of the United States, which confers upon congress the power to provide for the calling forth of the militia to execute the laws of the United States, to suppress insurrection and repel invasion, has been referred to, as well as the act of February 28, 1795, in 1 Stat. 424; but the terms of the law itself show that it applies to the states, and to a different class of contingencies than the one that is alleged to exist in this case. The act of 1807 has also been cited, but the court was of opinion that this provision in the constitution and the laws passed under it have no application to the inquiry submitted to the jury. There was another clause in the 2d section of article 2 of the constitution which makes the president commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States; and section 3 of the same article makes it his duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. It was under these two last named sections of the constitution that he apprehended the power to call out the military forces in aid of the civil authorities would be found. The 15th clause of section 8 of article 1 of the constitution, under the appropriate head of "What congress shall have power to do," bestows legislative power; and section 2 of article 2 imposes the presidential duty. The chief magistrate of the United States, acting for this district, possesses the power which was exercised in this instance, and being the head of the proper department, the act of the secretary of the navy was, to all intents and purposes, the act of the president. The authority, then, according to the evidence which the jury had heard, was a necessary application of the power granted by congress, and was properly and lawfully exercised by the executive upon this occasion. The president could not make himself personally cognizant of all the circumstances whenever he was called upon to act. The representations made to him were such as not only to justify but to require the executive of the United States to do all that he did do. The marines and the officers who commanded them were legally at the polls of the first precinct of the Fourth ward, for they were there in obedience to orders. The mayor had a legal right to be there also, in his official character as mayor, either to quell the riot or to see that the laws of the city were duly executed. Although the act of the executive in this case was authorized by law and required by duty, the mayor was using a discretionary power when he applied to the secretary of the navy for the assistance of the marines; for the simple fact that he, and he alone, as every other officer similarly situated, must decide when the proper time has arrived to make such an application, shows that it lies at his discretion. Still, an inferior officer must in the first instance resort to the civil power, and it may be material to know whether he had done so, but if the civil power is too weak to repress the riot, or if the riot or disturbance be so great and so dangerous that it must be apparent that an attempt to quell it by the civil officers must be absurd—that such an attempt must necessarily be unsuccessful, and would only be followed by the scoffing at and derision of those who should attempt it, and by an increased tumult—the court was of opinion that resort might be had to other means, without further recourse to the civil power.

If the jury believe from the evidence, that marines made the first attack upon the rioters, and whatever of violence and turbulent conduct and acts proceeded from the defendants, or from any others connected with them, were resorted to in resisting such attack, then it would be their duty to inquire whether the defendants were guilty of a riot at that particular time and hour of the day; for the disturbance of the morning was wholly unconnected with the marines in any shape, except so far as it was the ground upon which the military were brought out. But if they should believe from the evidence in the case that the marines, after their arrival at the polls, where they were then legally, without any offence or violence upon their part, were first assailed in a violent and turbulent manner, according to previous concert, whether remote or immediate, on the part of the defendants, or any of them, either with or without connection with others who are not now upon trial, for the purpose of driving off the marines in spite of their opposition, then the defendants or so many of them as thus assailed the marines would be guilty of a riot.

With regard to the second instruction asked by the district attorney, the court remarked that the conduct of the elections, in the city of Washington, is confided by law to these commissioners, to be appointed as the law prescribes. Their duties are expressly pointed out by the law, and among these it is specified that they shall keep the polls opened from 7 o'clock in the morning until 7 o'clock in the evening. The commissioners cannot lawfully close the polls between those hours, and nothing short of some overruling necessity which makes it impracticable for them to receive the votes offered, or to continue the election, will excuse the closing of the polls. If the jury believe from the evidence that the polls were closed in the first precinct of the Fourth ward, in the language of the prayer, for no other reason than the presence of the said marines, then the act of closing them was illegal.

The mayor of the city of Washington has no powers other than those which are given him by the acts of congress and the laws of the corporate authorities, passed in pursuance and by virtue of the powers conferred upon them by congress. Among the duties of the mayor it is enjoined upon him by the "Act further to amend the charter of the city of Washington," passed on the 4th of May, 1812 (section 3; 2 Stat. 723), is to see that the laws of the corporation be duly executed. That provision was not repealed as had been asserted here. The act of May 13, 1820, § 1 (3 Stat. 584), repeals only so much of the law of 1812 as is "inconsistent with the provisions" of said act of 1820; and the law of May 17, 1848, § 1 (9 Stat. 223), continues the act of 1820 in full force for 20 years, with the same repeal (section 17; 9 Stat. 230) of the acts in conflict with its own provisions.

As to the recited duty of the mayor, as had been asserted, the mayor had the authority to request or demand that the polls should be opened, but he could not enforce that demand, for there are no specific powers conferred upon him for that purpose. If you believe from the evidence that he demanded of the commissioners to open the polls when closed, but did not take any further or other steps that such demand should be carried into effect, it is no more than his duty required. And lastly, if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant, or any of them, with or without the conjunction of others named in the indictment, but numbering at least three persons, did, in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people, with a determination mutually to assist one another against any who should oppose their act together according to previous concert and arrangement, remote or immediate, for the purpose of thwarting the efforts of the mayor to have the polls opened, or to prevent those efforts from succeeding, or for the purpose of opposing his exertions to preserve the public peace and preventing their success, then the defendant, or so many of them as thus acted, would be guilty of a riot.

The jury came into court, and represented to the judge their inability to agree upon a verdict. The judge thereupon discharged them.

Case No. 16,402.

UNITED STATES v. STEWART.

[4 Wash. C. C. 226.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1818.

COUNTERFEITING—BANK NOTES.

Counterfeiting an indorsement on a post note of the Bank of the United States, is not an offence under the eighteenth section of the act incorporating the Bank of the United States [3 Stat. 275].

[This was an indictment against Charles Stewart upon the charge of counterfeiting, under the act of congress incorporating the Bank of the United States.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. There are two motions before the court: (1) For a new trial; and (2) in arrest of judgment.

The indictment contains four counts. The two first are for forging a bill or note of the Bank of the United States, and for attempting to pass the same. The third is for falsely making and counterfeiting an order on the said bank, indorsed by the defendant upon the said bill, as follows, viz.: "Pay William Weston or order;" signed "John Thornton." The fourth is for falsely altering a bill or note of the said bank, by the same indorsement. The bill or note, stated in the indictment, and given in evidence, is a post note of the Bank of the United States, payable to William Jenner & Co. or order, for one hundred dollars, with the following indorsements on the back of it, viz.: "Pay Mackie, Milner & Co. or order. William Jenner & Co." "Pay William Jenner & Co. Mackie, Milner & Co. William Jenner & Co." "Pay Churchman and Thomas or order. D. Bell." "Pay William Morton or order. John Thornton." The forgery of the last indorsement by the defendant was fully proved. The evidence which was given on the trial, applied only to the third count; and the question is, whether the false indorsement made by the defendant, is an offence within the eighteenth section of the law for incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, passed the 10th of April, 1816. It is perfectly clear, I think, that it does not amount to a forgery, or alteration of the bill or note itself, which is the sole act of the corporation, and contains its promise to pay; whereas the indorsement is the separate act of a person claiming a right to the note.

Does the indorsement upon a note or bill of exchange, requiring the contents to be paid to a third person, amount to an order, within the meaning and intent of the act of congress? I think not. A bill of exchange is said to be an order by the drawer upon the drawee, to pay the contents to the payee. It is also, and with equal propriety, called an assignment to the payee of so much money in the hands of the drawee. I am not disposed to fall out with either of these definitions. But there can be no doubt, that the indorsement upon a bill or note, directing the contents to be paid to the indorsee, amounts to nothing more than the assignment of a mere chose in action; and whether it be made in the form of an assignment, or of an order, its nature is the same. That the act did not intend, by the word "order," to include an assignment of a bank note, may be fairly presumed from the work "check," with which it is associated; the latter meaning, in common parlance, a draft payable to "bearer," and it was on that account, probably, that the word was added.

I am strongly confirmed in this construction of the act of congress, by observing, that the statutes of England against forgery of negotiable papers of almost every kind, extend, by express words, to the indorsements made on them. Such, for instance, is the statute of 15 Geo. II. c. 13, against forging the notes of the Bank of England, or bills of exchange, or bonds under the seal of the corporation, or "any indorsement thereon." Such are the statutes of 12 Geo. I. c. 2, as to East India bonds; 12 Geo. I. c. 32, as to the moneys of suitors in chancery; 42 Geo. III. c. 1, as to exchequer bills; and 2 Geo. II. c. 25, as to deeds, bonds, bills, notes or receipts. And it is observable that the statute of 45 Geo. III. c. 88, not only includes the forgery of bills and notes, and the indorsements or assignments thereof, but also any warrant or order, for payment of money. I admit that these provisions in the English statute, are by no means conclusive of this point. But as the nature of negotiable paper is as well understood in England, as in any country in the world, the care taken in those statutes to punish forged indorsements, proves, at least, that the legislature of that country has not thought that the word order would be sufficient for the purpose. As the evidence given at the trial applied only to the indorsement, which, in the opinion of the court, is not an offence within the act of congress, the judgment must be arrested.

UNITED STATES v. STIEN.

[13 Blatchf. 127.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D New York. Sept. 20, 1875.

CRIMINAL LAW—FORFEITURE OF RECOGNIZANCE—FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

A defendant in an indictment moved to set aside a forfeiture of a recognizance given by him for his appearance to answer the indictment, on the ground of irregularities as to the time and place of calling him to appear, and of entering the forfeiture. He had absconded to avoid a trial on the indictment, and was a fugitive from justice. Held, that the motion must, for that reason, be denied.

[Cited in U. S. v. Evans, 2 Fed. 150.]

Asa W. Tenney, U. S. Dist. Atty.

John J. Allen, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a motion made in behalf of Christian A. Stien, to set aside a forfeiture of a recognizance given by him for his appearance to answer an indictment found against him. The application is based upon irregularities as to the time and place of calling the defendant to appear, and of entering the forfeiture. The application is opposed upon several grounds —among others, that the defendant has absconded and fled the country, for the purpose of avoiding trial for the offences with which he is charged in the indictment referred to, and is now a fugitive from justice. The fact that the defendant has so absconded, not being denied, furnishes a proper ground for the denial of this motion, made as it is on behalf of the defendant. The presence of the accused in court when any proceeding is being taken in his cause, made necessary by the law in many instances, is always desirable, and, under circumstances such as this case presents, a refusal to hear argument in absence of the defendant seems to be a proper course.

Nor should one under indictment be permitted to defy the authorities by flight, and, at the same time, through an attorney, to appeal to them to act in his behalf. See In re Genet, 3 N. Y. Sup. Ct. [3 Thomp. & C.] 734; Brinkley v. Brinkley, 47 N. Y. 49.

The motion is, accordingly, denied, without passing upon any of the questions raised as to the regularity of the forfeiture in question.

UNITED STATES v. STINER et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 24, 1871.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—CREDITOR'S BILL.

1. An intent to defraud subsequent creditors is sufficient to avoid a conveyance, at the suit of such creditors, if it was either voluntary or not made in good faith.

2. Under the 11th section of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 78), this court has jurisdiction of a creditor's bill, brought by the United States, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars.

[Cited in Winter v. Swinburne, 8 Fed. 52.]

In equity.

Thomas Simons, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty., for plaintiffs.

John Winslow, for Dankel and wife.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a creditor's bill, founded on a judgment, recovered by the United States, in the district court for this district, against the defendants [Joseph H.] Stiner, Cornelius J. Dankel, and [Bernard] Heller, on the 23d of March, 1870, and docketed against them on the 25th of March, 1870, for $11,040. On an execution issued thereon, $106.72 was made, the expenses of the marshal in making it being $109.16. Otherwise, the judgment and execution are unsatisfied. Such judgment was rendered against Stiner, as principal, and the others as sureties, in a stipulation given on the release of property seized in a suit in rem, brought by the United States against such property, being property found on the distillery premises of Stiner, for the forfeiture thereof, for a violation of the internal revenue laws. The bill is brought especially to reach certain real estate in 33d street, in the city of New York, and certain other real estate in 25th street, in said city, which formerly belonged to Cornelius J. Dankel, and which he, by a deed, dated November 1st, 1869, and recorded December 29th, 1869, at 55 minutes past 2 o'clock, p. m., in the office of the register of deeds of the city and county of New York, conveyed to the defendant [Adolph] Isaacson, and which Isaacson, by a lease, dated November 1st, 1869, and recorded June 12th, 1870, leased to said Cornelius J. Dankel, and which Isaacson conveyed to the defendant Georgine Dankel, the wife of the said Cornelius J. Dankel, by a deed, dated January 1st, 1870, and recorded May 14th, 1870. The bill charges, that, after the execution of the stipulation, and prior to the recovery of the said judgment, and at or before the hour of noon, on the 29th of December, 1869, a verdict was rendered by the jury, in the said suit for forfeiture, condemning the property seized, and a decree of condemnation was thereupon duly entered; and that such several instruments were made without consideration, and not in good faith, and with the concurrence of the two Dankels and of Isaacson, in the design of defrauding the plaintiffs, and of transferring to the said Georgine Dankel the ostensible ownership of the property, in view of the liability of the said Cornelius J. Dankel, in consequence of his stipulation, and the rendering of said verdict and decree, and the judgment and execution in pursuance thereof, so as to prevent the plaintiffs from levying upon and selling any of said property, in satisfaction of their recovery and demand. The bill prays for an injunction restraining the Dankels and Isaacson from alienating or encumbering the said real estate, and for a receiver of the property of Stiner, Cornelius J. Dankel, and Heller.

The plaintiffs now move for an injunction against the Dankels, restraining them from alienating any of their property, and especially from alienating or incumbering the said real estate, and for the appointment of a receiver of all the property of each of the defendants. The notice of motion appears to have been served only on the solicitors for the Dankels, and the motion is opposed on their behalf.

The defendants Dankel and wife have put in an answer in the suit, which purports to be the answer of both of them, but is not signed or sworn to by Mrs. Dankel. It sets up, that, when Dankel conveyed the premises to Isaacson, Dankel did not owe the plaintiffs any money, and they did not become judgment creditors of his till the 23d of March, 1870; that the plaintiffs have no right to inquire into any conveyance made by Dankel of his real estate before they became creditors of his; that the conveyance to Isaacson was made in pursuance of an agreement made prior to November 1st, 1869, by which a cash payment of $2,000 was to be made by Isaacson to Dankel, on the delivery of the deed, and Isaacson was to give certain promissory notes to Dankel, and certain other payments, in regular instalments, of $5,000 each, secured by mortgage, were to be made thereafter, at certain specified times; that such cash payment of $2,000 was made when said deed was so delivered, on the 1st of November, 1869, and at that time the notes were made and delivered, in pursuance of the agreement; that, on or about the 1st of January, 1870, Isaacson, finding himself unable to pay such notes, which were then about maturing and had matured, made an agreement with Mrs. Dankel to sell the premises to her for a certain and valuable consideration, which, however, is not stated, and then conveyed such premises to her on terms satisfactory to all concerned, which terms, however, are not stated; that the plaintiffs were not judgment creditors of Dankel at the time of the conveyance to Isaacson, or at the time of the conveyance to Mrs. Dankel; that, prior to the sale of the premises to Isaacson, Mrs. Dankel had an interest in them, and was a part owner of them, and her money had been used by her husband in their purchase, to the amount of about or upwards of $1,000; that, several months before the 1st of November, 1869, Dankel and wife had taken steps to sell such real estate, and without reference to the claims of any possible creditors; and that the sale to Isaacson was not made for the purpose of cheating or defrauding the plaintiffs.

In addition to the facts set forth in the bill in regard to the deeds and lease, it appears, by affidavit, that Isaacson executed to Dankel a mortgage on the premises referred to, for $25,000, dated November 1st, 1869, and recorded January 12th, 1870; that a satisfaction of such mortgage was recorded March 2d, 1870; and that Isaacson and his wife executed to one Joseph Fleischel a mortgage on the same premises, dated December 20th, 1869, for $25,000, and recorded May 14th, 1870, satisfaction of which was recorded January 16th, 1871. It also appears, by the affidavit of Cornelius Stagg that, in January, 1871, Isaacson stated to Stagg, that he resided in Brooklyn, and was by occupation a vermin destroyer, that, about November, 1869, Dankel proposed to him to make a purchase of said premises, that he was induced by Dankel and his friends to enter into an arrangement for the transfer of the property to him, not knowing at the time for what purpose, that he afterwards discovered that it was for the purpose of Dankel's avoiding his responsibility in a suit then pending in the district court, that, in accordance with said arrangement, he, Isaacson, on taking a deed of the property, paid Dankel $3,000, and gave him a promissory note for $2,150, due about January 1st, 1870, and a mortgage on the property for $25,000, payable in instalments of $5,000, the first becoming due about January 1st, 1870, and a lease of the 25th street premises, that it was agreed between him, Isaacson, and Dankel, that, if the note, or the first instalment of $5,000 on the mortgage, should not be paid when due, the entire arrangement should become void, and the property should revert to the possession of Dankel, and it was also agreed that Dankel should collect and pay to Isaacson the rents of all of the said property, that he, Isaacson, at the request of Dankel, executed the mortgage to Fleischel, for the purpose, as was stated to him by Dankel, of money being raised upon it by Fleischel, to be applied to the prior mortgage executed to Dankel, but that no money was paid by Fleischel to Isaacson in consideration of the execution of the mortgage, nor was any money ever raised thereon, or so applied, that, at some time during January, 1870, Dankel called on him, Isaacson, and stated, that, the note and the first instalment of the mortgage being due and unpaid, the whole transaction was annulled, as agreed on, and he, Dankel, would give him, Isaacson, back his note, or destroy it, the mortgage to him, Dankel, to remain in his possession, and he, Dankel, to destroy the lease, and that he, Dankel, did not wish to hold the property in his name, and he, Isaacson, should make out a deed of it to Mrs. Dankel, that this was done, that the consideration expressed in the deed to Mrs. Dankel was $500, but he, Isaacson, never received anything from her, or from any one, towards such consideration, and that Dankel paid to him, Isaacson, about $1,300, as rents of the property, up to and including January, 1870. Mr. Stagg also states, in his affidavit, that, in January or February, 1871, he had an interview with Mrs. Dankel, who admitted to him that she never paid any consideration to Isaacson for the conveyance of the property to her, and did not know that any was ever paid, that she never saw Isaacson until he brought her the deed already executed, which she then gave to her husband, who kept the same in his possession, that her husband told her that his attorney advised that she should call the transaction of the transfer of the property to her by Isaacson, a sale, that, on the afternoon of the 31st of December, 1869, her husband came home looking worried, and told her that he had been at his lawyer's, and that, a few days after, said deed was brought to her. Mr. Stagg further says, in his affidavit, that, in January, 1871, he had an interview with Cornelius J. Dankel, who admitted to him, that, the day the distillery was condemned, he heard of it, and the next day Isaacson sold the property to his wife.

No affidavit is produced from Isaacson. Dankel makes no affidavit in contradiction of his statements to Stagg, nor does Mrs. Dankel contradict Stagg's statement as to what she said in his conversation with her. Mrs. Dankel states, in her affidavit, that, when the deed from Isaacson was executed and delivered to her, it was thought best, in view of the fact that Mr. Dankel was in ill health, that, as Isaacson was unable to fulfil his contract, an agreement should be made with him, by which he should convey the premises to her, Mrs. Dankel, and that that was done.

The ground is taken, on the part of Dankel and his wife, that the plaintiffs cannot maintain this suit, unless they were creditors of Dankel when he conveyed to Isaacson. This is not the law. Under the statute and decisions in New York, as well as under the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, an intent to defraud subsequent creditors is sufficient to avoid a conveyance, if it was either voluntary or not made in good faith. I had occasion to examine this question recently, in the case of Sedgwick v. Place [Case No. 12,620]. In the present case, there can be no doubt that the whole scheme of the conveyance to Isaacson was a plan to defraud the United States, in view of the approaching trial and the expected condemnation of Dankel's distillery property, and that Dankel and Isaacson knowingly acted in bad faith. But, at all events, before the conveyance to Mrs. Dankel, the verdict of condemnation was rendered, the stipulation having been previously given. The formal judgment against the stipulators had not been entered, but, short of that, their liability had lost its contingent character. If any validity be acknowledged in the agreement between Isaacson and Dankel, the reversion of the title to the premises, on Isaacson's default, was to Dankel, and the conveyance of the premises by Isaacson to Mrs. Dankel, at Dankel's request, in pursuance of Isaacson's liability under the agreement, such conveyance to Mrs. Dankel being without consideration, leaves the premises, as between Dankel and his creditors, in the same position as if they had been conveyed by Isaacson back to Dankel, and, between Mrs. Dankel and such creditors, in the same position as if, after such conveyance back, Dankel had conveyed them to his wife, as a voluntary settlement.

It is urged, in the written brief of the counsel for Dankel and wife (the motion not having been argued orally), that this court has no jurisdiction of this case; that this is the first time it was ever claimed that a suit of this sort could be maintained in this court; that the view that this court has no such jurisdiction is held in other districts; and that the fact, that such jurisdiction does not exist, is so well understood and conceded by the bar and the courts, that, at the last session of congress, an act was introduced, and is now pending, to confer jurisdiction on the courts of the United States in such cases. The point of the objection to the jurisdiction of the court is not stated, and it is not possible to conceive what it is. The jurisdiction is plainly conferred by statute. The eleventh section of the act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 78), contains this provision: "The circuit courts shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners." This is a suit of a civil nature, in equity, in which the United States are plaintiffs. It may be that it does not sufficiently appear by the bill that the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, although the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs exceeds that amount, for the want of averments in the bill or admissions in the answer that the judgment debtors have property exceeding in value five hundred dollars, exclusive of costs, or that the real estate referred to exceeds in value that amount, exclusive of costs. But, as the real estate, which it is the principal object of the bill to reach, is undoubtedly of the value named in the statute, the bill can readily be amended. With that done, there can be no difficulty in the jurisdiction. The district court would have no jurisdiction of the suit, for jurisdiction is conferred upon it, by section 9 of the act before cited, only of suits at common law, where the United States sue, and the matter in dispute amounts, exclusive of costs, to the sum or value of one hundred dollars. If the United States cannot bring such a suit as this in a circuit court, they can bring it in no court of the United States. It would follow, then, that, for eighty years, whenever the United States have had occasion to bring a creditor's bill, they have been unable to bring it in a court of the United States; for, the only legislation covering the case is in the act of 1789. The proposition has no foundation. The act referred to as introduced at the last session of congress, to confer jurisdiction in cases of this kind, was, as I understand it, an act to make the remedy in favor of the United States, in cases of this kind, more speedy and efficient, and not to confer jurisdiction over creditors' bills by the United States on the circuit courts, a creditor's bill being a suit of a civil nature, in equity, in the exercise of a recognized branch of equity jurisdiction, and being covered by the eleventh section of the act of 1789.

The plaintiffs may amend the bill, as suggested, and then an injunction will issue enjoining Dankel from making any transfer of any of his property, and enjoining him and Mrs. Dankel from making any transfer of said real estate and from incumbering the same, and a receiver will be appointed of said real estate and of all the property, equitable interests, things in action, and effects of Dankel. If notice of the motion is not necessary as to Stiner and Heller, the receivership will extend to their property.

UNITED STATES v. STOCKWELL et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 671.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

RIOT—PROOF OF INTENT—DECLARATIONS—TRIAL—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY.

1. Upon an indictment for a riot it is not necessary to prove an agreement or proposal to do the unlawful act before it was done, or at the time of doing it; but from the doing of the act, accompanied by declarations of an intent to do it, the jury may infer a previous intent and agreement to do it, and mutually to assist each other in doing it; and in the absence of all contradictory evidence they ought so to infer.

2. After an instruction has been given by the court to the jury, at the request of either party, and argued by counsel on both sides, the court will not permit counsel to argue the same question of law to the jury in contradiction to the opinion of the court.

3. The right of the jury to decide the law, as well as the fact, in a criminal case, results only from their power to find a general verdict.

[Cited in U. S. v. Taylor, 11 Fed. 473.]

[Cited in Territory v. Kee (N. M.) 25 Pac. 926.]

4. The question whether one fact can be inferred from another, is a question of law, and to be decided by the court; and if, in law, the inference can be drawn, it ought to be drawn, if there be no contradictory evidence.

Indictment for a riot. It charged that the defendants [Stockwell and Cropley], and six others to the jurors as yet unknown, "with force and arms at the county aforesaid, did on the 2d of April, 1835, unlawfully, riotously, routously, and tumultuously, assemble together to disturb the peace and government of the United States, and to break into and destroy the dwelling-house of one Martha Nailor in said county; and being so assembled," &c., made "great noises, riot, tumult, and disturbance," "and remained together, making such noises, riot, tumult, and disturbance and breaking, for a long space of time, namely, for the space of five hours then next following, to the great terror and disturbance not only of the citizens of the United States there and thereabouts inhabiting, &c., but of all, &c., passing and repassing in and along the public highways, and against the peace and government of the United States."

Upon the trial, W. L. Brent, for defendants, moved the court to instruct the jury "that should the United States have failed to prove, to the satisfaction of the jury, that an agreement, or proposal, to attack the house was made before the attack was made, or at the time of the attack, the defendants are entitled to an acquittal;" which instruction THE COURT gave; but at the prayer of Mr. Key, the district attorney, also instructed them "that if they should believe, from the evidence, that an attack was made on the house of the witness, by the traversers, and two or more persons, who had there assembled together with declarations that they were attacking "the rats," and would have out Bell, to revenge the wrongs of an injured craft, then the jury may therefrom infer a previous intent of the parties so to attack the said house, and a previous agreement so to do and mutually to assist each other in doing the same; and in the absence of all contradictory evidence, they ought so to infer."

After these instructions were given by the court, Mr. Brent proposed to argue to the jury that the court had erred in giving the last instruction; but CRANCH, Chief Judge, informed him that the court would not permit him to do so.

Mr. Brent then observed to the court that he thought this rule infringed the right of the jury to decide the law as well as the fact.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, replied that the right of the jury to decide the law, was only the right to find a general verdict which includes both the law and the facts of the case. That the question whether one fact can be inferred from another is a question of law, and to be decided by the court; and that if the inference can, in law, be drawn, it ought to be drawn by the jury, if there be no contradictory evidence.

Case No. 16,406.

UNITED STATES v. STOCKWELL et al.

[1 Hask. 447.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Dec., 1872.

INFORMERS—DECREE FOR PAYMENT—AGREEMENT BETWEEN INFORMERS.

1. An informer's share in the registry of the court should be decreed to be paid directly to the persons beneficially interested and entitled to hold it.

2. An agreement between informers to divide the informer's share equally is valid and should be regarded by the court in distributing it.

Petition by several persons that the informer's share of penalties in the registry of the court be decreed to be paid to them severally as the persons giving the information which led to the prosecution.

FOX, District Judge. In the fall of 1867, Bartlett & McCoy were detectives in aid of the revenue, assigned to the northeastern district and acting under N. W. Bingham, special agent of the treasury for the state of Maine. McCoy ascertained from one Johnson, who resided in Fredericton, N. B., that large frauds on the revenue had been committed, and to induce Johnson to afford further information, McCoy gave to him his note for five hundred dollars, but nothing definite was disclosed by Johnson as to the precise character of the frauds, or when, where, or by whom committed. In Dec. Bartlett & McCoy were instructed to go to Fredericton and if possible ascertain further in regard to this matter. They met Johnson at Fredericton who refused to make farther disclosures, and then told McCoy he had destroyed his note and absolutely declined to hold any communication with McCoy upon this subject. Bartlett, who had previously had some slight acquaintance with Johnson, and who had been present at the interview between him and McCoy which had been somewhat unpleasant in its character, that same evening sought another interview with Johnson, the result of which was, that Johnson, without making any disclosures as to the transactions within Dowling's knowledge, that evening introduced McCoy & Bartlett to one Thomas Dowling, a shipping and commission merchant, doing business at Fredericton. Before Dowling would make any disclosures, he insisted that an agreement should be entered into between the four, viz., Bartlett, McCoy, Johnson and himself, respecting the informer's share in the penalties and forfeitures which might ultimately be recovered of the guilty parties. He refused to be known as the informer himself, and insisted that McCoy or Bartlett should institute the proceedings, prosecute them to judgment, claim as the informers, and that the amount thus received should be equally divided between the four persons. An agreement to this effect was then and there drawn up by Dowling, signed by all the parties and intrusted to Dowling for safe keeping, which agreement Dowling subsequently destroyed under the pretense that it known it might affect his credit as a witness, but it was destroyed without the authority or consent of either of the other parties so far as it now appears. After this agreement had been executed, Dowling produced his books and papers showing gross frauds to have been committed by him in shipping to Stockwell & Co. and other parties shingles, which were the production of New Brunswick but documented as American shingles, the product of Maine, in order that they might be entered free of duty, these documents being verified by Dowling's oath. By virtue of these documents the shingles were thus entered at various ports, and the government thereby defrauded of large amounts of duties.

Stockwell & Co. being the importers of various cargoes of these shingles, actions were accordingly brought against them for both duties and penalties, a trial of one of which actions was had and judgment rendered for the government, and thereupon a compromise was made of all of said actions by the payment by Stockwell & Co. of a considerable amount now on deposit in the registry, the informer's share of which amount is now the subject matter of controversy. Bartlett has filed a petition in behalf of himself, McCoy, Dowling, and Johnson, claiming that by virtue of their written agreement, they as joint informers were jointly entitled to this sum. Dowling and Johnson have also presented their petition praying that they alone may be adjudged the informers.

After Dowling had made his disclosures to the officers, he agreed to furnish in ten days to Bartlett, who was to continue in that neighborhood, copies verified by his affidavit of all papers in his possession relating to these frauds, which he did, and soon after these papers were produced by McCoy, Bartlett, and Bingham, to the judge of the district court of Maine, accompanied by McCoy's affidavit and petition for a warrant to search the premises of Stockwell & Co., which was issued and their books and papers seized, and they afforded important testimony in behalf of the government upon the trial of the action against them. It is now claimed in behalf of Dowling that he was in fact the sole informer; that from him McCoy and Bartlett obtained the information which established the guilt of Stockwell & Co., and that these officers were then acting only in compliance with the instructions of their superior officers in obtaining this information from Dowling and presenting it to the district judge as evidence to authorize the search warrant. It is quite certain that most important evidence was thus elicited from Dowling without which the government would not have been able to ferret out the fraud and its perpetrators; but this evidence was communicated to the officers where they had no official authority whatever, and moreover was not the only evidence offered in the trial to establish the guilt of the parties, as their own books and papers were very important testimony in fixing upon them a guilty knowledge. Of all the claimants, Johnson appears to have contributed the least to the success of the undertaking, and yet he is joined with Dowling in the petition that they may be adjudged entitled to the whole share. Under the decisions of this court, there can be no question that a revenue officer under certain circumstances may be entitled to claim as an informer; and I am of opinion that these four persons having each borne their respective parts in procuring the necessary information and evidence which resulted in the conviction, and having in the outset agreed in writing that they would make common cause of the undertaking, would work together in accomplishing it and share equally the advantages to be realized therefrom, are thereby now precluded from any inquiry by the court as to the degree of benefit which each conferred by his individual services. Good faith requires that they should abide by their contract, and that neither of them should be permitted without the consent of the others to repudiate it and by extrinsic evidence endeavor to satisfy the court that one or more of the associates did not by his services aid equally with the others in the advancement of the common purpose. Especially should such an agreement under the circumstances be obligatory upon Dowling, as he was well aware of the amount of evidence he could produce to ensure a conviction, and before making any disclosure whatever, acting undoubtedly for his own interest as he understood it, insisted that the officers should procure such further evidence as could be obtained by them, and should prosecute the suits to judgment.

This agreement was not without consideration, being mutual, and was not in contravention of law, and if Dowling should receive the full amount. I hold he would be accountable to McCoy and Bartlett for their respective proportions of it. In the distribution of this fund, it is the duty of the court to ascertain the parties beneficially interested and who are legally entitled to hold it, and to decree the payment to them directly rather than subject them to the expense and delay of further controversy with Dowling for the recovery of their proportion from his hands if he should receive it. In suits at common law, if justice can be done between the parties directly, and circuity of action thereby be avoided, the courts do not hesitate to adopt such a course and allow the party to recover that to which he is entitled, and which he might by ulterior proceedings obtain from one who should receive it from the defendant; and this court cannot hesitate as to the propriety of applying this rule in the distribution of money in its registry, it being entirely free from any technical difficulties which sometimes arise in proceedings at common law.

It is claimed that if the court is of opinion that Dowling was within the language of the act of 1867 "the person giving the information which led to the prosecution," that then the court is bound by the provisions of that law to award to him the informer's share, although he may by his contract be bound to pay the other parties their proportions of it. Under ordinary circumstances such would probably be the result; but the court is of opinion that parties jointly engaged in such an enterprise may, as between themselves, agree as to the distribution of the informer's share; that such an agreement when fairly made is conclusive between them as to their respective rights, and should be recognized and enforced by the court as the only proper evidence in a hearing upon this question in any controversies between the parties relating thereto.

Decree that Bartlett, McCoy, Johnson and Dowling were joint informers, and that the informer's share be divided equally among them.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 552.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1825.

DISTRESS FOR RENT—POWERS OF BAILIFF.

A bailiff cannot lawfully force himself into a house, by the outer door (although partially opened by one within), to make a distress for rent.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Indictment for assault and battery upon one Theodore Meade, who was a constable employed by the landlord to levy a distress for rent. Having knocked at the outer door, it was partially opened by Mrs. [Elizabeth] Stott, but seeing the constable, she instantly endeavored to close it. The constable, having one arm and one leg in, forced it open and entered. Mrs. Stott then collared him and struck him with a bed-wrench, and seized his bag and threw it out of the window; and for this assault and battery she was indicted.

Mr. Hewitt, for defendant, contended that the bailiff had no right to force the door open, under those circumstances, but was himself a trespasser, and cited Lee v. Gansel, Cowp. 1.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said that the bailiff had no right to force the door open, under those circumstances. That he could not lawfully use force to get in, although the door was partially opened by the defendant. It was like the case of a door fastened by a chain so as to allow it to be opened a few inches only. In Lee v. Gansel, Lord Mansfield doubted, whether, if the chamber of Gansel could be considered as his castle, and the door so far opened as to admit the thigh of the officer, he could justify forcing himself entirely in, so as to arrest Gansel.

Verdict, "Not guilty."

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1854.

INDICTMENT — MOTION TO QUASH — DISCRETION OF COURT — POWERS OF COMMISSIONERS — WARRANTS OF ARREST — POWERS OF DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

1. It is within the discretion of the court to entertain a motion to quash an indictment, or to hold the defendant to plead in abatement, or demur.

2. An indictment under the 22d section of the act of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 117), must show by proper averments that the process was legal.

[Cited in U. S. v. Cover, 46 Fed. 285.]

[Cited in Com. v. Doherty, 103 Mass. 444.]

3. A commissioner empowered to issue a warrant under the statute of the United States of September 18, 1850 (9 Stat. 462), must be such a commissioner as is particularly described in that act, and consequently an averment in an indictment for resisting such a warrant, that it was issued by a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States, is not sufficient.

[Applied in U. S. v. Wilcox, Case No. 16,692. Cited in U. S. v. Myers, Id. 15,847; Ex parte Lane, 6 Fed. 36; Pettibone v. U. S., 13 Sup. Ct. 546, 148 U. S. 197.]

4. An averment that a warrant was duly issued, is insufficient; the facts constituting the due issue must be set forth.

5. The want of an averment of the facts showing that the commissioner was authorized to issue the warrant, cannot be aided by referring to the records of this court.

6. That part of the 29th section of the judiciary act (1 Stat. 88), which provides that jurors shall be drawn from such parts of the district as the court shall direct, is not repealed by St. 1840, July 20 (5 Stat. 394), and is still in force.

This was a motion to quash an indictment against Martin Stowell, for obstructing the marshal in the service of legal process. The obstruction complained of occurred during the proceedings for the rendition of Anthony Burns, in the year 1854.

Before CURTIS, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The grand-jury at the present term returned into court an indictment against Martin Stowell for obstructing the marshal of this district in serving legal process. The indictment is framed under the twenty-second section of the act of April 30, 1790. The accused having been arraigned, submitted, through his counsel, a motion to quash the indictment. It is within the discretion of the court to refuse to entertain such a motion, and put the party to plead in abatement, or to demur, in order to raise questions affecting the regularity of the finding of the indictment, or its formal or substantial sufficiency. In this case, the court being satisfied, on the presentation of the motion, and looking into the indictment, that some of the causes assigned therein, were proper to be discussed and decided in this form of proceeding, have, for the sake of convenience, allowed the counsel to present their views on all the questions, which, in their apprehension, it was proper to make; not intending, however, to depart from what we consider to be a sound rule, that questions admitting of doubt, and involving such difficulty as to require a protracted and elaborate examination, should not be decided in this form of proceeding, especially when the motion is not made till the jurors and witnesses are in attendance for the trial. Having given to some of the questions raised, that consideration which we have found necessary to a decision, I will now state the opinion of the court thereon.

The indictment contains five counts. The first is the most full and particular, and an examination of that will render any extended observations on the others unnecessary. This count alleges, in substance, that the defendant knowingly and willingly did obstruct, resist, and oppose the marshal of this district in serving and attempting to serve a certain warrant and order, which are set out in the count. The clause of the 22d section of the act of 1790, on which this indictment depends, makes it an offence knowingly, and wilfully to obstruct, resist, or oppose any officer of the United States in serving, or attempting to serve, or execute, any legal process whatsoever. To constitute an offence under this law, therefore, the obstruction must have been of legal process; and whatever may have been the form or purpose of the process, it is not legal process, within the meaning of this act, unless it emanated from, and was issued by, some tribunal, judge, or magistrate, authorized by the laws of the United States to issue such process. It is clear, also, that the indictment must show, by proper averments, that the process was legal, not only in form and purpose, but as emanating from some court or officer empowered by law to issue such process. What particular averments are necessary to show this authority to issue the process alleged to be obstructed, depends upon the character of the tribunal, or officer, from whom it came. If, as in this case, the officer who granted the process, had, by law, only a limited and special authority, dependent for its existence upon particular facts, every fact necessary to the existence of that authority, must either be averred in the indictment, or appear on the face of the process set out therein. Whether it be sufficient, that some of the facts necessary to the existence of power to issue the process, where the jurisdiction is special and limited, appear upon the face of the process itself set out in the indictment, but are not averred in the indictment to be true, so as to be traversed and put in issue by a plea of not guilty, it is not necessary in this case to decide. See Wise v. Withers, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 331; Elliott v. Piersol, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 340; Allen v. Gray, 11 Conn. 95; Savacool v. Boughton, 5 Wend. 170 (which contains an elaborate review of the cases); People v. Warren, 5 Hill, 440; 1 Russ. Crimes, 511; Fost. Crown Law, 311, 312; 1 Hale, P. C. 460. It will be seen, when we come to examine the indictment, that the defect, which we think exists in the averments to show authority to issue the warrant, is not aided, so far as the act of 1790 is concerned, by any thing on the face of the warrant itself.

The first count alleges that "heretofore, namely, on the twenty-fourth day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-four, a certain warrant and legal process, directed to the marshal of the said district of Massachusetts, or either of his deputies, was duly issued under the hand and seal of Edward G. Loring, Esquire, who was then and there a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States, for said district, which said warrant and legal process was duly delivered to Watson Freeman, Esquire, who was then and there an officer of the United States, namely, marshal of the United States, for the said district of Massachusetts, at Boston, in the district aforesaid, on the said twenty-fourth day of May, in the year aforesaid, and was of the purport and effect following, that is to say: "United States of America. Massachusetts District, ss.: To the marshal of our district of Massachusetts or either of his deputies, Greeting:—In the name of the president of the United States of America, you are hereby commanded forthwith to apprehend Anthony Burns, a negro man, alleged now to be in your district, charged with being a fugitive from labor, and with having escaped from service in the state of Virginia, if he may be found in your precinct, and have him forthwith before me, Edward G. Loring, one of the commissioners of the circuit court of the United States for the said district, then and there to answer to the complaint of Charles F. Suttle, of Alexandria, in the said state of Virginia, merchant, alleging under oath that the said Anthony Burns, on the twenty-fourth day of March last, did, and for a long time prior thereto had owed service and labor to him, the said Suttle, in the said state of Virginia, under the laws thereof, and that, while held to service there by the said Suttle, the said Burns escaped from the said state of Virginia into the said state of Massachusetts; and that said Burns still owes service and labor to said Suttle in the said state of Virginia, and praying that said Burns may be restored to him, said Suttle, in said state of Virginia, and that such further proceedings may then and there be had in the premises as are by law in such cases provided. Hereof fail not, and make due return of this writ, with your doings thereon, before me. Witness my hand and seal at Boston, aforesaid, this twenty-fourth day of May, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-four. Edward G. Loring, Commissioner. (L. S.)" These are the only parts of the first count material to the present inquiry, which is, not whether it could be proved on the trial, that Mr. Loring had authority to issue this warrant, but whether these averments are sufficient, in point of law, to show to the court that he had that authority.

The first section of the act of congress of September 18, 1850, taken in connection with the sixth section of the same act, confers power to issue warrants to arrest fugitives from service upon "the persons who have been, or may hereafter be appointed commissioners, in virtue of any act of congress, by the circuit courts of the United States, and who, in consequence of such appointment, are authorized to exercise the powers that any justice of the peace or other magistrate of any of the United States may exercise, in respect to offenders for any crime or offence against the United States, by arresting, imprisoning, or bailing the same, under and by virtue of the 33d section of the act of the 24th of September, 1789, entitled

'An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States.'" It appears, then, that to have authority to issue a warrant under this act of 1850, the person issuing it must not only be a commissioner appointed by a circuit court of the United States, but a commissioner thus appointed on whom have been conferred the powers respecting the arrest, imprisonment, and bail of offenders, which were conferred on justices of the peace by the 33d section of the act of 1789 (1 Stat. 91). That is, he must be such a commissioner as is particularly described by the act of 1850. Does the averment, that the person who issued this warrant was "a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States for said district," amount, in legal intendment, to an averment that he was such a commissioner as is particularly described in the act of 1850? If every person who is a commissioner of the circuit court, ex officio, possesses, by law, the powers as to arresting, imprisoning, and bailing offenders, granted to justices of the peace by the act of 1789, then it might be intended by the court that this commissioner had those powers, and, consequently, that he was one of those commissioners upon whom the act of 1850 conferred the power to grant such a warrant. But, on the other hand, if there may be commissioners appointed by the circuit court, who do not possess those powers, then an averment that a person was a commissioner appointed by this court, does not amount to an averment that he was such a commissioner as is described by the act of 1850, and therein empowered to issue warrants of this kind.

It was argued by the defendant's counsel, that this court issues commissions to take depositions in particular cases, and that the persons thus empowered are commissioners appointed by the circuit court. We feel some doubt whether persons acting under a dedimus potestatem in a particular case, are so far known to the laws of the United States as commissioners appointed by the circuit court, that we could say they might fairly, and would naturally, be included under those terms. But there is a class of commissioners appointed by the circuit court, not adverted to by the counsel, who are known to the laws of the United States as commissioners, and who do not ex officio possess the powers to arrest, imprison, and bail offenders against the laws of the United States. By the act of congress of August 12, 1848, § 1 (9 Stat. 302), passed to give effect to stipulations in treaties with foreign governments, for the extradition of persons charged with certain crimes, power to arrest and hold for extradition, is conferred, amongst others, upon "commissioners authorized so to do by any of the courts of the United States." We think it clear that commissioners appointed for this purpose under this act, would not possess, ex officio, the powers to arrest, imprison, and bail offenders against the laws of the United States. It is true, that it seems to have been the design of congress, when it has from time to time conferred new powers upon commissioners appointed by the circuit courts of the United States, to confer them upon that class of commissioners who were originally authorized to be appointed by the act of February, 1812 (2 Stat. 679), to take bail and affidavits in civil causes in the circuit courts; and, accordingly, by apt terms, the persons so appointed have been described, in subsequent laws, as those to whom the new authority was intended to be given. Acts March 1, 1817 (3 Stat. 350); August 23, 1842, § 1 (5 Stat. 516); August 8, 1846 (9 Stat. 72). In all these instances, as well as in the act of 1850, for the extradition of fugitives from service, the intention of congress is apparent, to confer power on that class of commissioners who had been or should be appointed to take bail and affidavits, &c. But the act of August 12, 1848, for extradition under treaties, does not confine the powers therein granted to commissioners who had been, or should be appointed to take affidavits and bail, or to arrest, imprison, or bail offenders against the laws of the United States. There is not only the absence of any such description of the commissioners who are to exercise the powers conferred by the act of 1848, but the sixth section provides, in terms, that "it shall be lawful for the courts of the United States, or any of them, to authorize any person or persons to act as a commissioner under the provisions of this act." By force of this act, therefore, there may be commissioners appointed by the circuit court for this district, to exercise the powers therein conferred, and those only. The averment that the person who issued this warrant, was a commissioner appointed by the circuit court, would be fully satisfied by proof, that he was thus appointed to make extradition under treaties, though he had no other power whatever. And it necessarily follows, that this averment does not show to the court that this was such a commissioner as had lawful power to issue this warrant, and consequently the indictment does not show that the warrant was legal process, because it does not show that it proceeded from one having lawful authority to issue it.

We have been referred to a precedent of an indictment for resisting an officer of the United States in the service of legal process, found in Whart. Prec. 567. That process issued from a district court of the United States, a court of record, and not technically an inferior court. All its jurisdiction and powers are matter of law, to be judicially noticed. The distinction between such a court and a magistrate having only a special authority, is settled. In favor of the jurisdiction of the latter, the law makes no intendment. 1 Saund. 70, note 3; 1 Chit. Pl. 306; Sackett v. Andross, 5 Hill, 330.

These principles of criminal pleading are so well settled, and their applicability to this case is so clear, that no authority need be adverted to. But the case of Rex v. Everett, 8 Barn. & C. 114, is in point. That was an indictment for unlawfully soliciting one Hooper, a person employed in the service of the customs, to omit to make a seizure. The law did not make it the duty of all persons employed in the service of the customs, or confer on all such persons the power, to make seizures, but only on certain officers of the customs, and persons empowered for that purpose by the commissioners of customs. The indictment alleged, that Hooper was a person employed in the service of the customs, and that it was his duty in such employment to make a certain seizure. The defendant having been convicted, moved, in arrest of judgment, that the indictment did not show that Hooper could by law make a seizure. The court held the objection fatal; that it was not enough to aver it was the duty of Hooper to make the seizure; that the facts from which that duty arose must be stated; that as all persons in the service of the customs had not this power, and as no other fact besides his being in that service was alleged, the judgment must be arrested. In the case at bar, as in that case, only certain persons possess the power in question. It is not shown that Mr. Loring was one of those persons; and the allegation that the warrant was duly issued, does not help the indictment. Whether duly or unduly issued is a question of law, and the facts to constitute a due issue must be pleaded, that the court may be able to decide whether the issue of the warrant was duly or unduly made; just as in the case in 8 Barn. & C. 114, it was held not sufficient to aver that it was the duty of Hooper to make seizures, but the facts from which that duty arose should be averred. See, also, Rex v. Lyme Regis, Doug. 79; Everard v. Paterson, 6 Taunt. 625, 2 Marsh. 308.

It may be suggested that, inasmuch as the appointment of Mr. Loring emanated from this court, and is a matter of record here, the court may take judicial notice of the fact that he was authorized to act as a commissioner, in arresting, imprisoning, and bailing offenders against the laws of the United States, and so that he was such a commissioner as is described in the act of 1850. We suppose it to be true that Mr. Loring was such a commissioner, and that his authority could be proved by producing the record of his appointment; but this cannot affect the decision of the question now under consideration. An indictment must contain every averment necessary to show that an offence has been committed; and the want of any such averment cannot be supplied, by showing that the fact thus omitted appears on other records of the court. Suppose a conviction upon an indictment thus defective, were to be carried by writ of error to another court; the conviction must be reversed there, because the court of errors could have no judicial knowledge of the omitted fact. Yet, if erroneous in the court above, it would be equally erroneous in the court below. The indictment must be sufficient of itself, when aided by those intendments which the law requires to be made from what appears therein; and it cannot be made good by merely extraneous matter, though that may be matter of record. It is true, this objection to the indictment is technical, and there does not seem to be reason to suppose, that in this case, the absence of this averment in the indictment can be of any practical consequence to the defendant, so far as respects the substantial merits of his case. But the rules of law which prescribe the essentials of a good indictment, are as binding on the court as the act of congress under which the indictment is framed; and the defendant has the same right to call on the court to give complete effect to the former, as the government has, to require the enforcement of the latter. For these reasons we are of opinion, that it does not appear by this first count that the warrant set out therein was legal process.

It has been made a question at the argument, whether the indictment shows that Burns was held, at the time of the alleged obstruction, under the original warrant, or under the order made by the commissioner on the adjournment, or under both. But as it is not shown by the count that Mr. Loring was such a commissioner as was empowered by the act of 1850 to hear and determine this subject-matter, it necessarily follows that it is not material in this case how that question should be decided.

Of the other counts in the indictment, it is necessary to say only, that neither of them is as full and specific as the first, and neither of them contains enough to show, that the process alleged to be obstructed was legal. One of them seems to have been framed in conformity with precedents under the laws of the states, for resisting, opposing, or assaulting an officer of the law while in the performance of his duty. But the act of 1790 requires that the officer should be resisted, obstructed, or opposed, in serving, or attempting to serve, or execute, some order or rule of a court, or some legal process. State officers, especially those who are guardians of the public peace, have many official duties to perform without process. They are protected by the laws under whose authority they act in discharging their duties; and offences may be committed against them, and consequently persons may be indicted therefor without alleging or proving that any legal process existed. So under the 8th section of the act of 1850, the offence of resisting or obstructing the claimant, or any one lawfully assisting him, either with or without process, is described; and an indictment under that section need not show that any legal process existed. But under the act of 1790, the resistance or obstruction of some legal process or precept is the very gist of the offence, and therefore the indictment must show what the process or precept was, and must set forth such facts as, if true, would make the process legal. Our opinion is, that as neither of the counts in this indictment describes, by sufficient averments, any offence against the act of 1790, under which alone, the government claims that the indictment can be supported, it must be quashed.

This renders it unnecessary to decide the other questions which have been argued, and, with one exception, we desire to be understood as neither expressing nor intimating any opinion thereon. There is, however, one question which has been argued by one of the defendant's counsel, which so far affects both the past and present practice of the court that it would be unjust to the suitors to allow it to be supposed that any doubt can be raised concerning it.

At the October term, 1832, this court adopted a roster of towns and cities, from which jurors to serve in the circuit court were to be returned. This roster contained ten distinct tables of towns and cities, in which the name of the town or city was set down, and opposite each was placed the number of grand and traverse jurors who were to be drawn therefrom. One of these tables was to be used for each term, taking the tables in rotation as they stand on the roster. This practice has been followed, as we understand, from the adoption of the order to the present time. The roster embraces a large part of the maritime towns and cities of the state, and many others, whose local situation renders access to the place where the court is required by law to be held, comparatively cheap and easy. It excluded the more remote interior towns of the state altogether. In forming these lists of towns, this court was undoubtedly governed by that clause of the 29th section of the act of congress of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 88), which provided that jurors "shall be returned, as there shall be occasion for them, from such parts of the district from time to time, as the court shall direct, so as shall be most favorable to an impartial trial, and so as not to incur an unnecessary expense, or unduly to burden the citizens of any part of the district with such services." In the discharge of the duty thus made incumbent on the court by this act, our predecessors seem to have considered, as we have done, that inasmuch as a large part of both the civil and criminal cases tried here are of a commercial or maritime character, a jury drawn from commercial and maritime towns would be most conversant with such transactions generally, and best able to bring to their investigation that experience which would enable them most satisfactorily to decide such controversies; following, in this respect, as nearly as the circumstances will permit, the well-known maxim of the common law, recognized both in the constitution and laws of the United States, that a jury should come from the vicinage; and also, that in drawing jurors from those cities and towns not remote from the place where the court is held, they would obey the other requirement of the statute, to avoid unnecessary expense. And, further, that the population of the towns and cities embraced in the roster was so great, and the number of the jurors and the length of their attendance necessary to do the business of the court, comparatively so small, that the inhabitants of those towns and cities would not be unduly burdened by the service.

It is now insisted, however, that it has been discovered by one of the defendant's counsel, that since the year 1849 this court has been pursuing an illegal practice by using this roster; that a jury summoned in pursuance of it is not returned according to the laws of the United States; and, consequently, that not only this indictment, but all presentments and verdicts here made or rendered, for a period of upwards of fourteen years, have been illegal and invalid. The supposed ground for attributing this very grave mistake to the court is, that by an act of congress of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), the clause of the 29th section of the judiciary act, under which the court has acted, was repealed. To ascertain whether this be so, it is necessary to examine the two statutes. The clause in the judiciary act of 1789 is as follows: "And jurors in all cases to serve in the courts of the United States shall be designated by lot or otherwise in each state respectively, according to the mode of forming juries therein now practised, so far as the laws of the same shall render such designation practicable by the courts or marshals of the United States; and the jurors shall have the same qualifications as are requisite for jurors by the laws of the state of which they are citizens, to serve in the highest courts of law of such state, and shall be returned as there shall be occasion for them, from such parts of the district from time to time as the court shall direct, so as shall be most favorable to an impartial trial, and so as not to incur an unnecessary expense, or unduly to burden the citizens of any part of the district with such services."

This clause provides for three things: (1) The mode of designating jurors, as by ballot, lot, or otherwise. (2) The qualifications of jurors, as age, citizenship, residence, &c. (3) The locality from which jurors, so designated and so qualified, shall be drawn. The first two are required to be governed, as nearly as may be, by the laws of the states, as they existed on the 24th day of September, 1789. The third is referred to the discretion of the court, to be regulated by the considerations as to impartiality, expense, and undue burden of the service, which are pointed out in the act. The third particular is that now in question, and the act of July 20, 1840, which is relied on as repealing this third provision, is as follows: "That jurors to serve in the courts of the United States, in each state respectively, shall have the like qualifications, and be entitled to the like exemptions as jurors of the highest court of law of such state now have and are entitled to, and shall hereafter from time to time have and be entitled to; and shall be designated by ballot, lot, or otherwise, according to the mode of forming such juries now practised and hereafter to be practised therein, in so far as such mode may be practicable by the courts of the United States, or the officers thereof; and for this purpose the said courts shall have power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and impanelling of juries in substance to the laws and usages now in force in such states; and further, shall have power, by rule or order, from time to time, to conform the same to any change in these respects which may be hereafter adopted by the legislatures of the respective states for the state courts."

It is obvious, on even a cursory reading of this act of 1840, that it does not expressly repeal the former law, or any part of it; and, also, that it contains nothing touching the subject of the locality from which the jurors are to be drawn. It applies solely to the first two particulars embraced in the former law, namely, the mode of designating jurors, and their qualifications. It changes the law as to the mode of designation, and the qualifications of jurors in this: that whereas by the act of 1789, the laws of the states existing in September, 1789, were the only rules respecting qualifications and mode of designation, this act of 1840 adopts as rules of qualification and mode of designation, the law of the states which existed on the 20th day of July, 1840, and also any state laws which might thereafter be passed touching those subjects. The practical necessity for this change in the law is very apparent. The act of 1789 having reference only to the state laws then in existence, there were no rules on this subject in the new states, by force of any positive law. The necessity is met by the act of 1840, and there it stops. Neither in terms nor by any implication has it repealed the residue of the law of 1789, which confers a discretionary power on the court respecting the part of the district from which the jurors are to be drawn. It is a well-settled and familiar rule that the law does not favor repeals by implication, and a subsequent statute repeals a former statute by implication, only so far as the one is directly and necessarily repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the other. There is no repugnancy between these two acts as respects the locality from which jurors are to be drawn. Both may stand together without conflict or inconsistency. In the same 29th section of the act of 1789, occurs another provision respecting the locality from which jurors are to be drawn. It is as follows: "In cases punishable with death, the trial shall be had in the county where the offence was committed, or where that cannot be done without great inconvenience, twelve petit-jurors at least shall be summoned from thence." Certainly the act of 1840 has not repealed this clause. Yet there is as good ground for so arguing, as for the assertion that it has repealed the other direction contained in the same section respecting the locality from which jurors shall be summoned. Our clear opinion is, that so much of the act of 1789 as requires this court to determine from what parts of the district jurors are to be drawn, is still in force, and consequently this objection is without foundation.

Upon another objection to the indictment, grounded on the fact that the venire for the grand-jury was issued to, and returned by, the marshal, and that he was not an indifferent person within the meaning of the 29th section of the act of 1789, and that for this cause the court should, on motion, quash the indictment, after it had been received and filed, and the defendant had been put to plead thereto, we have formed no opinion. If it had been alleged that the marshal, or any other person concerned in returning the grand-jury, had been guilty of any unfair or improper conduct in forming the panel, we should have deemed it our duty carefully and promptly to investigate the charge. This would have been due to the purity of the administration of the law, which the court should most sedulously guard. But the objection has been rested merely upon the legal ground, that however fair in point of fact may have been the conduct of the marshal, he was not legally qualified to return this grand-jury. As the question, in the mode in which it is presented, is attended with difficulty, and as it is not necessary to a determination of the motion to quash the indictment, and as it does not affect the general practice of the court, we have thought it proper to reserve our decision thereon, until it shall need to be decided, and until it shall come before us unattended by the difficulties which arise from the time and mode of raising it. The result is, that the motion to quash the indictment for the cause that it does not appear therein that any offence was committed, must be allowed.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, remarked, that he concurred in the opinion delivered by Judge CURTIS. There were, he said, several kinds of commissioners, some of which have power to issue warrants for the arrest of persons escaping from service or labor, and others have not. This indictment does not show that this commissioner is one of the former class, and therefore it does not set forth that the warrant specified was issued by a competent authority. Several other questions have been presented, which would deserve very grave consideration, but it was not then necessary to decide them.

John P. Hale suggested that the same order be issued in the cases of certain other defendants indicted for the same offence, whose counsel had argued to the court as in the case of Martin Stowell.

Mr. Hallett, U. S. Dist. Atty., objected; and said he would enter a nolle prosequi in each of the other cases. He insisted on his right to take this course, declaring that Martin Stowell was the only party arraigned, and his case the only one before the court. Whether, under this decision, it would ever hereafter be possible to frame any indictment to meet these cases, he said, would be a matter of future consideration; but at present he only asked the right which belonged to the prosecuting officer, of disposing of the indictments in the other cases.

C. M. Ellis insisted that justice required that the other cases should be disposed of upon the motions which had really been argued.

After some further remarks, Judge CURTIS said the court did not perceive that it can make any difference, now or hereafter, whether an entry be made that the indictment be quashed, or of nolle prosequi. The court understood that all the cases had been heard upon the motion; but, at the same time, as a general rule, the prosecuting officer has power at any time before a jury is impanelled, to enter a nolle prosequi. The court will not restrain this power, if he chooses to exercise it, in these cases. However, the motion must be made at this time, so that the court may see that the same rights are secured to the defendants as if their cases were included in this order.

UNITED STATES v. STRICKER.

[12 Blatchf. 389.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 21, 1874.

FORFEITED RECOGNIZANCES—MOTION TO REMIT—PRACTICE.

An action having been brought on a forfeited recognizance, and a motion being made, under section 1020 of the Revised Statutes, to remit the forfeiture, on the ground that the party bound to appear was, when called, in the custody of a state officer under a warrant issued out of a court of the state, in a civil action, held, that the motion must be denied, on the ground that the question could be best determined on the trial of the action.

This was a motion [against Samuel Stricker], made under section 1020 of the Revised Statutes, to remit the penalty of a forfeited recognizance, on the ground that the party bound to appear was, when called, in the custody of a state officer under a warrant issued out of a court of the state, on a criminal charge.

Thomas Harland, for the motion, cited Caldwell v. Com., 14 Grat. 698; U. S. v. Feely [Case No. 15,082]; People v. Bartlett, 3 Hill, 570.

BENEDICT, District Judge, denied the motion, upon the ground that the question could be best determined on the trial of the action which had been brought upon the forfeited recognizance.

UNITED STATES v. STRONG.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 251.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1821.

LARCENY—BAILMENT.

If goods be delivered to a workman for a special purpose, and he afterwards take them away with intent to steal them, it is larceny.

Indictment [against Samuel Strong] for stealing sundry copper bolts, the property of the United States.

The prisoner was a workman in the navy yard and employed in driving such bolts. The bolts were delivered to him from the shop where they were cut. He offered to sell them, having first carried them home to his house.

Mr. Ashton, for defendant, contended that it was not larceny, unless the defendant took them with intent to steal them. No trespass was committed. There must be an unlawful taking. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33, § 2.

Mr. Swann, U. S. Dist. Atty., contra, cited 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33, §§ 5, 6. That if the person to whom the possession of the goods has been delivered by the owner, takes away a part of them, with intent to steal it; as in the case of a carrier, or weaver, or miller, it is larceny; so if one has the bare charge, or the special use of goods, but not the possession of them, as the shepherd, butler, servant, and guest; for in these cases the offence may properly come under the word "cepit."

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, doubting) instructed the jury that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that the bolts were delivered to the prisoner for the special purpose of driving them into the vessel, and he afterwards took them away, with intent to steal them, it was larceny.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1829.

EXAMINATION OF WITNESS.

Upon an indictment for a nuisance, in keeping a public gaming-house, the question, Who dealt the cards? is too general. Witness not bound to answer it.

Indictment [against John Strother] for a nuisance, in keeping a common gaming-house.

Mr. Swann, for the United States, asked the witness, O. Carr, "Who dealt the cards?"

Mr. Jones, for defendant, objected that it was too general.

And THE COURT (nem. con.) sustained the objection.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS—INTRUSION OF WHITES.

The president having set apart the Pyramid Lake reservation for the use of Indians, the whites who go upon the reservation to fish, do so "contrary to law," within Rev. St. § 2147.

[Cited in U. S. v. Bridleman, 7 Fed. 903; U. S. v. Martin, 14 Fed. 821; Id., 17 Fed. 153; U. S. v. Howard, Id. 641.]

[This was an indictment against John Sturgeon and others for violation of section 2147 of the Revised Statutes.]

Charles L. Varian, for the United States.

Robert M. Clarke, for defendants.

HILLYER, District Judge. The defendants, nine in all, are charged with returning to the Indian country, after having been removed, in violation of section 2148, Rev. St.

The special verdict and agreed facts show that these men were engaged within the limits of the Pyramid Lake Indian reservation, fishing, and dealing and trading in fish; that they were, by order of the proper authorities, removed from the reservation, and that thereafter they returned and resumed their former business of fishing.

That the reservation is Indian country, has just been decided in the case of U. S. v. Leathers [Case No. 15,581].

The only point not decided in that case material here is this: It is argued that taking fish inside the reservation is not unlawful; that the superintendent of Indian affairs has no power to decide what is contrary to law, or who is within the reservation contrary to law, under section 2147, or without authority of law, under section 2149, and that the return after removal, to continue a lawful occupation, is no offense.

If this argument is sound, the whole purpose of the law, in setting apart lands for the separate use of the Indians, is defeated.

It has been shown in the Case of Leathers, [supra,] that very large powers and discretion in the management of Indian affairs have been committed to the president, secretary of the interior, commissioner of Indian affairs, and other agents.

It may be added, that by section 2131 of the Revised Statutes a superintendent of Indian affairs is authorized to revoke the license of any person whenever, in his opinion, it is improper to permit such person to remain in the Indian country. By section 2147 the superintendent, agents, and subagents have authority to remove from the Indian country all persons found therein contrary to law. By section 2149 the commissioner of Indian affairs is authorized and required, with the approval of the secretary of the interior, to remove from any tribal reservation any person who, in the judgment of the commissioner, may be detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Indians.

The military force may be used to remove such persons. I think these sections show that whether it is proper to permit a trader to remain in the Indian country, or whether any person is detrimental to the welfare of the Indians, are questions left in the one case to the superintendent of Indian affairs, and in the other to the commissioner and secretary of the interior. The courts will not review their decision in these matters, and the party removed, if he feels himself aggrieved, must seek redress by other means than a return to the reservation in defiance of the authority removing him.

But there is to my mind another good reason for holding that the present defendants were found in the Indian country contrary to law, when they were found established on the reservation engaged in the business of fishing,—i. e. catching them for sale.

The president has set apart the reservation for the use of the Pah Utes and other Indians residing thereon. He has done this by authority of law. We know that the lake was included in the reservation, that it might be a fishing ground for the Indians. The lines of the reservation have been drawn around it for the purpose of excluding white people from fishing there, except by proper authority. It is plain that nothing of value to the Indians will be left of their reservation if all the whites who chose may resort there to fish. In my judgment, those who thus encroach on the reservation and fishing ground violate the order setting it apart for the use of the Indians, and consequently do so contrary to law.

Hunting and trapping in the Indian country constitute, under section 2137, an offense; but these things are by no means the only ones it is unlawful to do in the Indian country.

The reservation having been set apart by competent authority for the use of the Indians, anything which deprives them of that use is unlawful and contrary to law. When the defendants established their fisheries on the shores of the lake, they, contrary to law, appropriated to their own use a portion of that which the United States, acting through its duly authorized agents, had set apart for the use of the Pah Utes and other Indians. Therefore I think that, without reference to section 2149, these defendants were found within the Indian country, contrary to law, within the meaning of section 2147; that they were properly removed, under the orders of the president and secretary of the interior; and that by their return they have committed the offense defined in section 2148 of the Revised Statutes, as charged in the indictment.

They are all consequently adjudged guilty, and must appear for sentence July 15, 1879.

Affirmed on appeal to the circuit court. [Case unreported.]

Case No. 16,414.

UNITED STATES v. STURGES et al.

[1 Paine, 525.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New York. April Term, 1826.

MORTGAGES — TRUSTS — CREDITOR'S BILL — ASSIGNMENTS OF MORTGAGES — NOTICE OF EQUITIES — PLEADING — WAIVER OF DEFECTS — DISCHARGE OF IMPRISONED DEBTOR — RELEASE OF SURETIES.

1. Where a mortgage is given by a debtor to his co-debtor to secure the latter against the debt of their creditor, equity considers the mortgagee as a trustee for the creditor, and where a judgment has been recovered, will apply the mortgaged property in satisfaction of the judgment, or remove the encumbrance, so that it may be subjected to execution.

[Cited in Warner v. Helm, 1 Gilman, 231.]

2. The principle which governs such cases is, that the collateral security is a trust created for the protection of the debt, and that it is the duty of a court of equity to see that it fulfils the purpose for which it was intended.

3. A judgment creditor who applies to a court of equity for its aid to enforce a judgment at law, if he asks its aid to reach a chattel, must show that he has taken out execution at law, and pursued it to every available extent, in order to show a lien upon the chattel; but if the aid is sought as to land, it is enough to show a judgment creating a lien upon the land.

4. Although a mortgage be absolute upon the face of it, a court of equity will inquire into the real purpose for which it was given, and apply it to that use.

5. It is a rule of equity that a judgment creditor at law is entitled to redeem an encumbrance upon land, and thereby secure his legal priority.

6. The assignee of a mortgage or other chose in action, takes it subject to the same equity that it was subject to in the hands of the assignor.

[Cited in Upham v. Brooks, Case No. 16,797; Corbett v. Woodward, Case No. 3,223.]

7. And the rule that it is only an equity residing in the original debtor, and not the equities of third persons, against the assignor that have this effect, does not exclude a judgment creditor, claiming to redeem: He stands in the place of the debtor, and has his equity.

8. An assignee who might have obtained notice, and ought to have sought it, stands in no better situation than if he had actually obtained it.

[Cited in Re Hook, Case No. 6,672.]

[Cited in brief in Digby v. Jones, 67 Mo. 105.]

9. A mortgage was given in reality to indemnify the mortgagee, but purporting to secure a sum of money payable in one year, and five years afterwards it was assigned, the whole sum appearing from the instrument to be unpaid. Held, that the circumstances of the case should have put the assignee upon an inquiry, from which he would have learnt the true consideration of the mortgage.

10. An objection to the equity of the bill, which might have been taken advantage of on demurrer, is not favourably received at the hearing of the cause after answer.

11. A discharge from imprisonment by the secretary of the treasury, of a debtor to the United States, under the act of 1798, does not discharge his co-obligors and sureties in the bond from their liability.

In equity.

R. Tillotson, for complainants.

H. Wheaton and E. Paine, for defendants Burroughs and Sturges.

E. Slosson, for defendant Butler.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. By the bill and answers in this cause it appears, that on the 9th of October, 1815, the defendants, Butler and Sturges, became security for Minturn and Champlin, in a bond for the payment of duties, to a large amount; that the bond not being paid at the time stipulated, separate suits were prosecuted against the principals and sureties, and separate judgments obtained, in December, 1816; that payments had been made from time to time upon the judgments, leaving, however, a large balance still due; that after the execution of the bond, and before the judgments were obtained thereon, viz. on the 12th of August, 1816, Butler and his wife executed a mortgage on certain property in the city of New-York, to Josiah Sturges, for the payment of twenty-seven thousand dollars. The mortgage was duly registered on the 16th of August, 1816. The mortgage upon its face purports to be an absolute mortgage to secure the payment of twenty-seven thousand dollars. The bill alleges, that it was in fact given to indemnify Sturges against the bond he had executed as surety for Minturn and Champlin, and for no other purpose; that Sturges had paid no monies on the bond, or towards the judgment recovered against him upon it, and that none had been realized from his property; that the mortgage remained uncancelled of record; and that by reason thereof, the house and lots so mortgaged could not be sold, under the judgment obtained by the United States against Butler, as no person would bid for the same, so long as the property remains covered by the mortgage. And the bill seeks to have the mortgage cancelled and discharged of record, or the benefit thereof applied to the use of the United States, or such other relief as shall seem fit and proper.

The original bill was filed against Butler and Sturges only, and they answer separately. Butler admits the execution of the mortgage, as stated in the bill; that he never received any consideration for it from Sturges; alleges, that the bond referred to in the mortgage was never delivered to Sturges, and denies that the mortgage was given for the purpose of securing Sturges; but alleges, that it was executed and recorded, and retained by him for upwards of two years, solely with the view of raising money upon it to pay off the judgments against him on the Minturn and Champlin bond; denies that at the time of executing the mortgage, or at any time since, he was indebted to Sturges. And he sets up, in discharge of his liability on the judgment in favour of the United States, that in the fall of the year 1819, Minturn and Champlin, the principals, were committed to prison on a capias ad satisfaciendum, and were afterwards discharged from imprisonment by the secretary of the treasury, without his consent.

Sturges, in his answer, admits the execution of the mortgage, but denies that it was given to secure him against the Minturn and Champlin debt exclusively, but that it was also intended to secure him for all monies owing to him by Butler, and for all other liabilities incurred by him for Butler, as well as for monies he might be compelled to pay on account of said bond; and alleges, that Butler was indebted to him in a large sum of money, and that he had become responsible for him, endorser of promissory notes, and acceptor of bills of exchange to a large amount; and also alleges, that he had been damnified by reason of his becoming security for Minturn and Champlin, and that his property had been sold and sacrificed under the judgment obtained against him; and also insists on the discharge of Minturn and Champlin by the secretary of the treasury, as in Butler's answer set forth. Sturges also sets up, that being indebted to Oliver Sturges and Benjamin Burroughs in the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, he on the 9th of October, in the year 1821, assigned the said mortgage to them in full and complete satisfaction of said debt, and was thereupon released and discharged by them from the said debt.

In consequence of the disclosure in the answer of Sturges, that the mortgage had been assigned to Sturges and Burroughs, a supplemental bill was filed against Burroughs, the surviving partner, calling upon him to answer the allegations in the bill, and set forth his knowledge in relation to the assignment, &c., and praying that said assignment might be delivered up to be cancelled, or such release executed by Burroughs, as survivor of Sturges and Burroughs, as might be deemed proper and necessary, to enable the United States to enforce their judgment against the mortgaged premises.

Burroughs, in his answer, alleges, that on the 9th of October, 1821, Josiah Sturges was indebted to Sturges and Burroughs in the sum of eighteen thousand eight hundred and sixty-six dollars; that the assignment of the mortgage was made in satisfaction of fifteen thousand dollars, part of the said sum so due from him; that the mortgage has not been transferred by him to any other person; that no part of the interest on the fifteen thousand dollars has been paid: and that the fifteen thousand dollars is now due and unpaid, except so far as it has been paid by the assignment of the mortgage, and that he has no security except the said assignment; and denies any knowledge of the suits of the United States on the Minturn and Champlin bond, or of the judgments, or that the mortgage was executed to indemnify Josiah Sturges against said debt, or that Josiah Sturges was indebted to the United States; and avers that the assignment of the mortgage was executed bona fide by Josiah Sturges, to secure the debt of Sturges and Burroughs, and for no other purpose.

I have been thus particular in noticing the material allegations in the bill, and the admissions in the several answers, because it is upon these alone that whatever relief is given, must be founded so far as the rights of Butler or Sturges are concerned. No testimony has been taken in the cause that can vary such a result. Butler, one of the defendants, is the only witness examined on the part of the plaintiffs. The reading of his examination has been objected to on the ground of interest. The validity of this objection will be hereafter noticed, when I come to consider the cause as it relates to the rights of Burroughs. It is there alone it can be of any importance; for it is unavailing, so far as it contradicts the answer of Sturges. It is but the testimony of one witness, which will not outweigh the answer, asserting a fact responsive to the bill, there being no corroborating circumstances to take the case out of the general rule on this subject. The rights and interests of the several defendants being somewhat at variance with each other, it becomes necessary to consider the case as it stands between the United States and each one separately. The effect and operation of the discharge of Minturn and Champlin from imprisonment by the secretary of the treasury, is a branch of the defence set up, both by Butler and Sturges, and will be afterwards considered.

In the first place then, as it respects Butler, he admits that he never received any consideration for the mortgage. That although it was duly executed and registered, it was retained by him, and was given solely with the view of enabling him to raise money upon it, to pay off the judgment of the United States against him upon the Minturn and Champlin bond. If no consideration was given by Sturges for the mortgage, it is either a mere nominal or a fraudulent encumbrance, and upon either ground cannot be upheld as any impediment to the obtaining satisfaction of the judgment of the United States. And if it was a bona fide transaction, intended for the purposes set out in Butler's answer, the United States were beneficially interested in the use to which it was to be applied. It was to raise money to satisfy their judgment; and Sturges, in this view of the case, would become the trustee of the judgment creditor. And although the mortgage is absolute upon the face of it, a court of equity may inquire into the real purpose for which it was given, and apply it to that use. Moses v. Murgatroyd, 1 Johns. Ch. 119, 473. The allegation in the bill is, that the mortgage was given by Butler to indemnify Sturges, his co-surety, against the bond entered into for Minturn and Champlin. Although the admission in Butler's answer does not support this allegation in terms, yet it is such as to warrant the granting of the relief prayed for, either to have the mortgage delivered up and cancelled of record, or that the mortgaged premises may be sold, and the proceeds applied towards payment of the judgment of the United States; and such application of the proceeds would operate by way of indemnity to Sturges. And besides, there is a general prayer for relief, under which any relief may be granted, which the proofs or admissions will warrant.

It is objected, however, that there is a want of equity apparent on the face of the bill in two particulars: 1. It seeks the aid of a court of equity against sureties, without showing that the United States have attempted to collect the debt of the principals, or alleging that they are insolvent. 2. The bill is filed to obtain the aid of a court of equity to enforce a judgment of a court of law, without showing that the United States have exhausted their legal remedy.

There are several answers to be given to these objections. If, admitting the charges or facts stated in the bill to be true, there is no foundation in equity for the relief prayed; it was a proper case for a demurrer, and the objection comes now with less weight than it would at an earlier stage of the proceedings. But admitting the first branch of the objection to be well founded in principle, it is waived, and the omission supplied by the answer, which shows, that the United States have attempted to collect the debt of the principals, Minturn and Champlin; that a judgment had been recovered against them, and execution issued, upon which they were imprisoned and discharged by the secretary of the treasury, under the act of congress of the 6th of June, 1798 (3 Bior. & D. Laws, 54 [1 Stat. 562]), which could not have been done until it had been ascertained that they were insolvent, and unable to pay the debt. And it is to be presumed, that all the examination required by the act to be made by the secretary of the treasury, was made before he discharged them from imprisonment. At all events it does not lie in the mouth of the defendants, who set up this discharge as a part of their defence, to say it was not given pursuant to the requirements of the act of congress.

The second branch of the objection is not supported by authority to the extent in which it is laid down. The rule seems to be, that if a judgment creditor wants relief in equity as to a chattel, he must show that he has taken out execution at law, and pursued it to every available extent, before he can resort to a court of equity for relief. This is necessary in order to show a lien upon the chattel. If the aid is sought as to real estate, it is enough to show a judgment, creating a lien upon the land. And this the bill does show. 4 Johns. Ch. 676. The objection, therefore, that there is a want of equity apparent on the face of the bill, cannot be sustained. As against Butler then, there can be no reason why the relief prayed should not be granted. If the mortgage was given without consideration, and merely as he alleges, to enable him to raise money to pay off the judgment; he and the United States were the only parties who had any interest in it, and there is no principle on which it can be upheld as a valid outstanding encumbrance.

2. The next inquiry is, how stands the case as it relates to Sturges? He sets out many matters as between him and Butler, not called for by the bill, and which can avail nothing, either against the United States, or against Butler. His rights in the present case, must be determined from his admissions, which are responsive to the bill. He admits the execution of the bond, and the recovery of the judgments as alleged in the bill, and also the execution of the mortgage; but denies it was given solely for the purpose of indemnifying him against the bond as one of the sureties of Minturn and Champlin, but was given as much to secure him for monies owing him by Butler, and against all other liabilities incurred by him on Butler's account, as against the Minturn and Champlin bond. He denies the allegations in the bill, that he had paid no money on account of the bond, or that none had been realized out of his property; but alleges, that his property had been sold at a sacrifice under the judgment against him, and great damage thereby sustained by him. The admissions then of Sturges, show that the mortgage was not given to secure the payment of twenty-seven thousand dollars as it purports upon its face, but that it was given as collateral security, and to indemnify Sturges against responsibilities he was under for Butler, including the Minturn and Champlin debt. Had the admission of Sturges been that the mortgage was given solely for the purpose of indemnifying him against this debt, there can be no doubt but that it would have been within the proper province of a court of chancery, either to remove the encumbrance, or apply it towards payment of the debt for which it was intended as collateral security. The principle which governs such cases is, that the collateral securities are trusts created for the better protection of the debt, and that it is the duty of the court to see that they fulfil the purpose for which they were intended. 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 93; 1 Johns. Cas. 205; 2 Johns. Ch. 296. But the admission of Sturges in the present case, shows that this mortgage was given as security for whatever debt there was due from Butler to him, and as an indemnity against the Minturn and Champlin debt, and all other responsibilities he had come under for Butler. If the United States ask for a decree upon this admission, without any other proof, it must all be taken together, so far as it is responsive to the bill; and it would be inequitable to take from Sturges this indemnity, without inquiry into the state of these accounts, and the responsibilities he is under for Butler; and the only course, therefore, that can be adopted, as between the United States and Sturges, is to refer the subject to a master, to make the proper inquiries. If it was a mortgage for the payment of money absolutely, all that the United States could claim, would be to redeem the mortgage. And in the present case, all the legal purposes for which the mortgage was given must be fulfilled, before it can be removed out of the way of the judgment of the United States.

3. The next inquiry is, as to the rights of Burroughs, who is an assignee of the mortgage, without notice of the special purposes for which it was given. He took the assignment in payment and satisfaction of a debt of fifteen thousand dollars, due from Sturges to him; and the question is, whether he stands in any better situation, or has acquired any greater rights under the mortgage than Sturges himself possessed. The mortgage is only a pledge or security for the payment of a sum of money; it does not purport upon its face to be an absolute and unconditional conveyance of the land. It is subject to redemption by the mortgagor; and those claiming under him acquire all his rights in that respect; and the assignee of the mortgage stands in the place of the mortgagee, and can claim no greater rights under the mortgage than he could. It is a general and well settled principle, that the assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to the same equity it was subject to in the hands of the assignor. This was the doctrine laid down in the case of Turton v. Benson, 1 P. Wms. 496, and in numerous other cases in the English courts. 1 Vern. 691, 764; 1 Ves. Sr. 123; 4 Ves. 121. The same principle was fully adopted and sanctioned by the court of appeals in the state of Virginia, in the case of Norton v. Rose, 2 Wash. (Va.) 233, and by the court of chancery in this state in the case of Murray v. Lylburn, 2 Johns. Ch. 443. The qualification of the rule as laid down by the chancellor in the latter case, does not affect the question now before the court. The rule he says is generally understood to mean the equity residing in the original obligor and debtor, and not an equity residing in some third person against the assignor. All the United States claim here, is the equity residing in Butler, the original debtor and mortgagor. They ask only to be placed in his shoes, and to redeem the mortgage, or have it stand only as an encumbrance to the same extent that it would have stood against him. It is a rule of equity, that a judgment creditor at law is entitled to redeem an encumbrance upon real estate, and thereby secure his legal priority. 4 Johns. Ch. 692.

Although Burroughs is an assignee without notice of the equity now claimed, he is chargeable with negligence in not seeking for information. By proper inquiries from Sturges, he could have ascertained the nature and extent of his interest in the mortgage. An assignee cannot found an equity on his own negligence. If he might have had notice, and ought to have sought it, he stands in no better situation than if he had actually obtained it. And there are circumstances in this case that ought to have excited his diligence, and put him on inquiry. The mortgage is dated the 12th of August, 1816, and the twenty-seven thousand dollars which it purports to secure, is made payable on the 12th of February thereafter; and the mortgage was not assigned to Burroughs until October, 1821. The cause of the delay, and whether any, and what payments had been made, were very natural inquiries for him to have made, and it is hardly presumable, that he did not make them; and if he did, it is most likely he was fully informed as to the situation of the mortgage; and if he did not, it was a negligence which is entitled to no favourable consideration in a court of equity. Had the mortgage been really given to secure the payment of twenty-seven thousand dollars as it purports, and the whole, or any part of it had been paid before the assignment; it could not be pretended that the assignee, although ignorant thereof, could again enforce payment; and still such a claim would be sustained with the same equity as is set up in the present case. Burroughs in his answer does not deny the allegations in the bill, as to the purposes for which the mortgage was given; he only alleges his ignorance thereof. It requires, therefore, but one witness in support of these allegations; and as Butler is the only witness who has been examined for that purpose, it becomes necessary to decide upon his competency. He is not objected to because a party in the cause: one defendant may be examined in equity for the plaintiff, or for his co-defendants if he has no interest in the event (1 Phil. Ev. 6; 2 Johns. Ch. 530; 3 Atk. 401); though ordinarily this cannot be done at law. In whatever point of light Butler is considered as standing, he does not appear to me to have such an interest as to exclude his testimony. If the mortgage is to be considered as given without consideration, and for the purposes alleged by Butler, he is interested to uphold it; as he would thereby protect his own property against the judgment of the United States; and in this view of the case, his interest is against the party calling him. If the mortgage is considered as a real security for the twenty-seven thousand dollars, Butler stands indifferent between the parties. His property is at all events swept away, either by the judgment or the mortgage; and it is immaterial to him under which it is taken; and so far as respects his liability to costs, his interest is against the complainants, and to defeat the suit. Burroughs must, therefore, under the allegations in the bill supported by the testimony of Butler, be considered as standing in the place of Sturges; and the extent of his interest as assignee of the mortgage, must depend on the result of the reference to a master, in relation to the matters between Butler and Sturges.

4. The only remaining question is, as to the effect of the discharge of Minturn and Champlin from imprisonment by the secretary of the treasury, under the act of congress of the 6th of June, 1798. This act, although it authorizes the discharge of the party from imprisonment, expressly provides, that the judgment shall remain good and sufficient in law, and may be satisfied out of any estate, which may then or at any time afterwards belong to the debtor. The effect and operation of such a discharge upon the liability of the co-obligors in the bond, has received the direct decision of Mr. Justice Story, in the case of Hunt v. U. S. [Case No. 6,900]. The leading cases in the books on this subject are referred to, and it is fully and explicitly admitted, that the operation of the discharge at common law, would be to exonerate the co-obligors: But under the special provisions of the statute, such is held not to be the effect. It is there said that the sole ground upon which a co-obligor is discharged is, that the debt or judgment has been once satisfied; but that when the law has declared that a particular act shall not be deemed a satisfaction of the debt or judgment, it would seem to follow, that it could not be pleaded as a discharge of any party to such debt or judgment. I do not mean to enter into an examination of this point as an open question; nor would I be understood as intimating any doubt as to the correctness of the decision. But finding the point directly adjudicated in one of the courts of the United States of co-ordinate jurisdiction with this, I shall adopt it as governing the present case. It is of the highest importance that there should be a uniformity of decision in the construction of statutes: and I the more readily adopt the construction as laid down in the case of Hunt v. U. S.; because although in that case the question could not have been carried to the supreme court of the United States; yet in the present case, should there be any dissatisfaction with the decision, it may be reviewed by the supreme court, and a construction settled which will be obligatory upon all the other courts of the United States.

Upon the whole, therefore, the cause must be referred to a master, to take and state an account between Butler and Sturges; showing the balance, if any, due to Sturges, and also to inquire into and state the responsibilities he is under for Butler; and the testimony taken upon the reference must be certified to this court, to be used on the final hearing of this cause: and all matters of equity and further directions, are reserved until such hearing and the coming in of the report of the master.

Case No. 16,415.

UNITED STATES v. SULZBERGER et al.

[7 Int. Rev. Rec. 201.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1868.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAW—REMOVAL OF WHISKY WITHOUT PAYING TAX—CONSPIRACY.

In the case of the United States against Ferdinand Sulzberger, George Strauss, Charles Hartman, Jacob Fleischauer and Jacob Hess, for conspiring to remove whisky without paying tax, tried before Judge Blatchford in the United States district court, Mr. Phelps, for the government, argued from the evidence that there was abundant proof of the conspiracy charged. He cited the requirements of the law as to the notice to be given by distillers to the collector, the regulations as to the cistern-rooms of distilleries, &c. He then spoke of the peculiar situation and arrangement of the premises in question, as being strong prima facie evidence of intended fraud, and said the evidence of spirits having been removed on the night in question was irresistible, as the testimony showed that the still had been running from 6 o'clock on the morning of the day in question till near midnight, about 17 hours. The capacity of the still was 1,000 gallons in 24 hours, giving about 700 gallons in the time stated, while only 267 gallons were found in the cisterns, leaving 433 gallons unaccounted for, except on the hypothesis of their removal to the rectifying establishment.

THE COURT, in charging the jury, cited the sections of the law applicable to the case, and said that to prove a conspiracy, such as charged, it was simply necessary for the jury to be satisfied that the defendants were acting in concert, or with a mutual understanding, for the purpose of preventing the spirits from being inspected and branded according to law, or for effecting their removal, without being inspected and branded according to law, to a place other than a bonded warehouse.

After the jury had retired, Assistant District Attorney Bell moved that the defendants be remanded to the custody of the marshal to await the result of the verdict.

This motion was opposed by Mr. Fullerton, counsel for the defendants, who argued that the defendants were out on bail, and were entitled to their liberty until the case was finally disposed of.

Mr. Bell held that the condition of the bail bond was fulfilled, and that whether that was so or not it was the universal practice in this district for the court to remand the defendants to the custody of the marshal after the case had gone to the jury.

THE COURT refused to grant the motion, and thereupon the defendants took their departure.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty against all the defendants but Jacob Hess, who was acquitted.

On Thursday Hartman and Fleischauer appeared in court, the latter having disappeared with the other defendants, except Hartman, since the verdict was rendered. Sulzberger and Strauss were called and their bail forfeited for non-appearance. Hartman and Fleischauer were then arraigned for judgment. Counsel for defendants presented to the court testimonials of Fleischauer's good character and also depositions of Jacob Hess and Fleischauer to the effect that the latter had no connection with, intention or knowledge of the removal, if any had been made, of spirits from the distillery.

THE COURT in passing sentence said substantially that the penalty incurred by the defendant was a fine of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000 and two years' imprisonment, at the discretion of the court. It was the duty of the court and all those engaged in the administration of the law to carry out its provisions, and by that means to suppress the demoralization that existed, and create a healthy public opinion in its stead. In the case of Fleischauer the conviction should stand against him, but the sentence should be suspended and remain in force to be hereafter, if found necessary, enforced at any time, should the defendant transgress the law. The case of Charles Hartman was different. The sentence of the court in his case should be a fine of $5,000 and ten days' imprisonment, and to be further detained in custody until the fine shall be paid. Hartman was then removed to prison and Fleischauer released.

UNITED STATES v. SUMMERS.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 334.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1833.

CRIMINAL LAW—PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES.

Peremptory challenge allowed, upon an indictment for stealing a slave, in Alexandria, D. C.

Indictment for stealing a slave, the property of Mrs. Jenkins, under the Virginia statutes of December 17, 1792, p. 190, § 29, and January 25, 1799, p. 387, making it a felony punishable by death without benefit of clergy; and the penitentiary act of congress, § 14, changing the punishment from death to penitentiary confinement and labor (4 Stat. 448).

A question was made whether he had a right to peremptory challenge, under the Virginia law of the 13th of November, 1792, p. 103, § 8.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) allowed the peremptory challenge.

Verdict, not guilty.

[2 Bond, 342.] [2]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. Feb. Term, 1870.[3]

CUSTOMS DUTIES — UNDERVALUATION — RIGHTS OF INNOCENT PURCHASERS.

1. Where property subject to duty is imported into the United States at a fraudulent undervaluation, a bona fide purchaser before the government has instituted any proceedings, or made its election to proceed in rem for a forfeiture, or to sue for the value of the property, obtains a good title, unaffected by the fraud in the entry.

2. The government, in such case, has no lien on the property in the possession of such purchaser, for the deficiency in the duty paid.

[3] [Affirmed by the circuit court; case unreported.]

3. If such a lien existed in this case, a forfeiture could not be claimed, as that ground is not set up in the information.

At law.

Warner M. Bateman, Dist. Atty., and Henry Hooper, for the United States.

Collins & Herron, for claimants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The proceeding in this case is an information in the name of the United States, in which the forfeiture of 123 boxes of sugar is claimed for having been imported in violation of law. The sugar was imported by the house of Perkins & Co., of New Orleans, and entered by them at the collector's office at that city. A large quantity, numbering some 300 boxes, was consigned to the house of Adolph Wood & Co., of Cincinnati, and was sold in different quantities, some at public auction, and some by private sales. In June last, upon information received by the surveyor of customs at this port, of fraud in the entry of the sugar at New Orleans, several lots were seized by his order in the possession of different purchasers, and libeled in this court. James H. Laws & Co. have intervened for seventy boxes of this sugar, and claim the property. They deny all knowledge of the fraud charged in the entry of the sugar, and claim title as innocent purchasers.

The only ground on which it is claimed that sugar is forfeited to the United States is the alleged entry of the sugar at a fraudulent undervaluation. The question of fraud is not now before the court, but it is conceded that the sugar was invoiced and entered as being of a grade or quality subject by law to a duty of three cents per pound, whereas the legal duty was five cents.

The questions now presented are: (1) Is the sugar subject to forfeiture in the hands of the claimants, the purchasers in this city? (2) If not forfeitable, has the government a lien on the sugar for the alleged deficiency of two cents on the pound, in the duty paid?

As to the first question, the evidence on the hearing proved conclusively that the various lots of sugar were sold openly in this market at their full value, without any knowledge by the house of Wood & Co., the consignees or the purchasers, or any reason for the suspicion that there was any irregularity or fraud in the importation and entry. The evidence on this point is not controverted by the attorney of the United States, and does not admit of a doubt. These claimants, therefore, insist that as innocent purchasers their title to the sugar is valid, and must be protected, and the case of Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366, is cited as decisive of this question. In that case the supreme court held that under section 66 of the customs act of 1799 [1 Stat. 677], which gives to the United States, in cases of entries at a fraudulent undervaluation, the right to proceed in rem for the forfeiture of the property, or for the value thereof, a bona fide purchaser, before the United States had made its election as to the mode of proceeding, was invested with a good title, unaffected by any fraud in the entry of the property. The first section of the act of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 737], under which these informations are filed, though more specific and comprehensive in providing against frauds by undervaluations, is the same as section 66 of the act of 1799 in recognizing the alternative right of the government to proceed for a forfeiture or a recovery of the value of the property. The case cited is, therefore, directly in point on the question stated, and a decisive authority in favor of the rights of these claimants.

As to the other question, namely, whether the government has a lien on the sugar for the alleged deficiency of two cents a pound in the duty paid, the court entertains no doubt. It is clear that if there existed such a lien, it could not be enforced in these proceedings, for the obvious reason that no such claim is asserted in the informations, and no judgment or decree could be entered on such a basis. The only ground of forfeiture set forth is the alleged fraudulent undervaluation of the sugar; and this is the only ground on which the court could base its judgment of forfeiture. But, apart from this consideration, I am clear the United States has no lien on the sugar in the hands of bona fide purchasers for the deficiency in the duty paid.

It is claimed by the district attorney that the government has a lien for duties on all property or articles imported, in the entry of which a fraud has been committed, from the time of the commission of the fraud, and that such lien inheres in the property, and follows it, into whosesoever hands it may pass, and wherever it may be found. That the general principle is recognized and enforced as applicable to violations of the customs and revenue laws, may be conceded. But its application to the case before the court is not admitted. If it is law, as decided by the supreme court, that a bona fide purchaser, before the government has made its election as to the course it will pursue, acquires a valid title, it is not easy to perceive how that title can be impaired or affected by any supposed lien of the government on the property. It would seem, therefore, that the general doctrine of a continuing lien on property subject to forfeiture for fraud on the customs and revenue laws, does not apply to the statute referred to, denouncing and punishing the entry of property at an undervaluation. The construction given to that statute by the supreme court seems to imply a modification of the law on that particular case, in relation to the general doctrine of the government's lien for taxes or duties. The court more readily adopts this conclusion, for the reason that the enforcement of the lien asserted in this case would operate most inequitably upon the purchasers of the sugar in question.

As before stated, if there was a fraud in the entry, they are not implicated in it. They have purchased the sugar in open market, and paid its full market value. The claim now made of two cents a pound, the alleged deficiency in the duty paid, would be equal to seventeen per cent. on the value of the sugar, and would be a loss to them to that extent. Now, as this sugar passed through the custom-house at New Orleans, after being subject to the scrutiny of the government officers, and was put into the market with their voucher that the law had been complied with in its entry, it would be a grievous hardship that innocent purchasers should be the sufferers. And there would seem to be no necessity, so far as the protection of the interests of the government is concerned, for the enforcement of the rigid doctrine insisted on by the district attorney. The United States has a plain remedy by suit against the importers for the deficiency, if any, in the amount of duty paid. If by reason of the insolvency of the importers, or any other cause, this remedy is not available, the loss to the government is but a just penalty for the negligence, incapacity, or corruption of its custom-house officials. The seventy boxes of sugar seized will be released to the claimants.

This case was appealed by the United States to the circuit court, where the decree of the court below was affirmed.

Case No. 16,419.

UNITED STATES v. SUNOL et al.

[1 Cal. Law J. 252.]

District Court, N. D. California. 1863.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

[Modification of the official survey directed, on a review of the evidence.]

Official survey of the rancho known as "El Valle de San José," in Alameda county. Rejected February 21, 1863.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The contest between the claimants in this case and the owners of the Santa Rita Rancho having been settled by mutual agreement, the only remaining inquiry is whether the official survey is within the exterior limits of the Rancho El Valle de San José. It is objected, on the part of the United States, that a rectangular piece of land, on the northeast, is improperly included, as is also a considerable tract on the southwest.

The first objection is evidently untenable. On any construction of the grant and diseño, the Valle of San José, granted to the claimants, extended as far north as the base of the hills called "Lomeria," on the diseño. The northern line, it would seem, from the indications of the diseños, both of the El Valle and of the Santa Rita Ranchos, as well as from the terms of the respective grants, to have been intended to be drawn from the Parage, or Cañada de la Tassajera, eastwardly, to the edge of the lomitas of the Positas, which form the western boundary of the "Las Positas Rancho." But a small portion of this tract is included in the official survey; the line between the Santa Rita and the El Valle Ranchos having been settled, as before stated, by agreement. The grant for El Valle contains no limitations of quantity. It was confirmed by the board and by this court by metes and bounds, and that decree has become final. As, then, the tract on the northeast is clearly within the limits of the grant, there can be no reason for excluding it from the survey.

With respect to the land included on the southwest there is more difficulty. The boundaries mentioned in the decree of confirmation are as follows: "On the southeast by the Corralitos, on the east by the edges of the Lomitas de las Positas, adjoining the water; on the northwest and north by the Place of the Arroyo, or Cañada de la Tassajera." The diseño represents an arroyo issuing from a tular swamp, or lagoon, and flowing in a southeasterly direction, not far from the base of a range of hills, on the west, marked "Loma Alta." From the range of hills, on the eastern side of the diseño, three streams are represented as flowing across the plain from east to west, and nearly at right angles to the general course of the creek issuing from the Tular, or the Arroyo de la Laguna. The first, or most northerly of these, is marked "Arroyo Mocho." It still retains its name, and its identity is not disputed. The second stream, inscribed "Arroyo de las Taumanises," is represented as flowing nearly parallel to the Mocho, and emptying into the Arroyo de la Laguna. Immediately south of it, and extending across the plain from east to west, a range of hills is delineated, which serve to divide the valley of the Taumanises from that of the Arroyo del Alameda, another creek flowing in a similar direction to the south of the hills. It would seem clear, from the topographical map of Lewis, that the Arroyo de las Taumanises of the diseño must be the stream now known and laid down by him as the "Arroyo Valle." The third stream, inscribed "Arroyo del Alameda," is likewise represented on the diseño as flowing from the extreme eastern limits of the map, across its entire breadth from east to west, and falling into the Arroyo de la Laguna. It appears to be assumed, both by the claimants and the United States, that the stream intended to be delineated is the Arroyo de las Calaveras, and not the Arroyo de San Antonio. Mr. Dyer, the witness for the United States, identifies it with the former; but Mr. Lewis, a witness for the claimants, and who prepared the map exhibited by them, expresses his belief that the Arroyo del Alameda, of the diseño, is the Arroyo de San Antonio. Of the correctness of this opinion there cannot, I think, be much doubt.

The Arroyo de las Calaveras flows from the southeast, and falls into the Arroyo de la Laguna, at a point not far from the confluence of that stream with Arroyo de San Antonio. At this point the latter makes an abrupt turn, nearly at right angles to its previous course, and, breaking through the hills, flows in a direction nearly due west. But the courses of the Arroyo de la Laguna above this point of junction, and that of the Calaveras, though the streams flow, the one from the north and the other from the south, form a nearly straight line along the western side of the plain. But the Arroyo del Alameda of the diseño is represented, as before stated, as issuing from the mountains on the east, and flowing from east to west across the whole breadth of the tract on its southern side. If the Arroyo del Alameda be not the San Antonio, then that stream is wholly omitted, notwithstanding that the much smaller streams of the Mocho and the Arroyo Valle are carefully delineated. The course, too, of the Alameda, with reference to the range of hills represented as lying between it and the Valle, and immediately south of the latter stream, entirely corresponds with that of the San Antonio, as laid down on Lewis' map; while the Calaveras wholly fails to satisfy these indications.

For these reasons I think that Mr. Lewis is right in identifying the San Antonio with the Arroyo del Alameda of the diseño. The point is not important, except in showing that the name of "Corralitos," was intended to apply, not merely to the range of hills on the southern portion of the western line, but, as indicated by the diseño, to the range lying south of the San Antonio, and running from west to east, so as to form the southern limit of the plain. The name may, however, have been also applied to the same hills where, turning to the northwest, they form the southwestern limit of the grant. That the hills on the south of the San Antonio, and not merely those west of the Calaberas, were intended to be designated on the diseño under the name of "Corralitos," is also to be inferred from the language of the grant, which describes the tract as bounded by the Corralitos on the southeast. The same description is given in the decree of confirmation.

Adopting, then, this construction of the diseño, the intention of the grant is clear. It was to grant all the plain, or Valle of San José, up to the hills which bound it on the south, the southwest and the west. This would, necessarily, include the valley of the Calaveras. For, though the junction of the Arroyo de la Laguna and the Alameda (and, in this connection it is immaterial whether the Alameda be the San Antonio or the Calaveras) is laid down on the extreme southwestern edge of the diseño, yet its other indications, and the fact that the Corralitos hills are represented as extending to the point of junction, and nearly connecting with the range on the west, show that it was intended to include all the land bounded by those two ranges. But, in running the lines on the southwest, it has not, apparently, been attempted to follow the line of the Corralitos hills, expressly mentioned as a boundary, both in the grant and the decree. It has been stated that the Arroyo de la Laguna, after receiving its affluents, the San Antonio from the east and the Calaveras from the south, turns abruptly at right angles, and flows through the hills in a direction nearly due west. No part of its course in this direction, or beyond the point of junction, is represented on the diseño; and yet there is included in the survey at least two miles of that stream to the west of the point of junction. The western line of the survey, which, in descending the valley of the Arroyo de la Laguna, appears, in accordance with the diseño to follow substantially the line of hills which form the western boundary of the valley, on reaching the point where the arroyo bends to the west, also makes an abrupt deflection in the same direction, and running due west more than two miles turns to the southeast, running along the crest; or even as stated by Dyer, on the western slope of what the map of Lewis denominates the "Corralitos Hills."

I can see no reason why a line near the base of the hills should not be adopted on the southern, as it is on the northern, portion of the line. The indications of the diseño—the natural limits of the tract, now and at the date of the grant known as "El Valle de San José"—and the terms of the grant and decree, which call for the Corralitos as a boundary, show conclusively that those hills were not intended to be included. It has already been stated that the hills inscribed with that name on the diseño, and mentioned in the grant, are probably the range on the south of the San Antonio, rather than those west of the Calaveras on the southwest, though, perhaps, the term may have been applied to both. But, on either supposition, the diseño shows that the tract was bounded on the south, the southwest and the west by ranges of hills and that boundary should be followed.

I therefore think that the official survey should be modified in this respect and that the line of hills marked "Corralitos" on Lewis' map should be taken as a boundary. By this is meant not that their base should be meandered, or that the low foot or projecting spurs should be excluded, but that the line should be substantially followed, as appears to have been done in the survey of the northern portion of the western line.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

No objection made by the district attorney to the confirmation of this claim.

Crockett & Crittenden, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The validity of this claim was proved by the production of the original grant and of the expediente from the archives. The expediente also shows that the grant was registered in the secretary's office, and also, by order of the governor, in the office of the prefecture of the First district. Both the expediente and the grant produced by the claimant contain the certificate of registry, and of the approval of the grant by the departmental assembly. The evidence shows a substantial compliance with the conditions, and the boundaries and extent of the granted land are clearly indicated by the description in the grant and the delineations on the map. No objection to the confirmation of this claim having been made by the district attorney, we do not deem it necessary to recapitulate at length the preliminary proceedings before the governor, nor to refer particularly to the evidence by which its validity has been established.

A decree affirming the decision of the board must therefore be entered.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

[Indians had a right to receive grants of land under the Mexican laws.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was unanimously confirmed by the late board of commissioners. It has been submitted to this court on the proofs taken before the board, and without argument on the part of the appellants, or the statement of any objection to its validity. On reference to the opinion of the board, we find but two questions discussed, and which, it is presumed, were the only points made on the part of the United States. The first relates to the location of the grant. The board, after an elaborate and thorough examination of the testimony, arrived at the conclusion that the calls in the grant and the delineation of the tract on the diseño are abundantly sufficient to enable a surveyor to locate the grant. On examining the transcript, this opinion of the board seems fully sustained by the proofs, and the doubts or difficulties felt by some of the witnesses as to the proper location of the land seems to have originated in a misconception of the true meaning of some of the calls in the grant. The grantee is shown to have occupied his land from a period anterior to his grant; to have lived there with his wife and children, and to have made considerable improvements. To the discussion of the second and more important question, whether Roberts, the original grantee, being an Indian, had a right to receive grants of land under the Mexican laws, and to convey the land so granted, the board devote a large portion of their opinion. But that question has been settled in the supreme court in accordance with the views expressed by the board, and is no longer open for argument in this court. The genuineness of the original documents is not questioned, and the title of the present claimant appears to have been regularly derived from the original grantee and his heirs, and to have been accompanied by possession.

A decree affirming the decision of the board must therefore be entered.

UNITED STATES v. SUTTER.

[Hoff. Dec. 27.]

District Court, N. D. California. June 10, 1861.[1]

CALIFORNIA LAND GRANTS—LOCATION OF QUANTITY IN LARGE TRACT—CONVEYANCES—ESTOPPEL—SURVEYS.

[1. When a certain quantity has been granted within limits which embrace a much larger tract, the quantity granted is to be located within the exterior limits, at the election of the grantee. Following U. S. v. Fossatt, 21 How. (62 U. S.) 445.]

[2. As a general rule the conveyance by the grantee to third persons of portions of the lands within the exterior limits may justly be considered as an election of the location, and as estopping him to make any subsequent election inconsistent with it. Yet the building of a house and other permanent improvements by the grantee himself would seem to afford as decisive evidence of an election as the conveyance to some other person, and that a subsequent purchaser of the house and improvements might justly claim that the election was made and the location fixed, so as not to be affected by conveyances made after the making of the improvements.]

[3. Therefore the court will treat the building of a house, and surrounding buildings, as locating the grant upon the site thereof to such an extent as, while it satisfies the latter principle, will at the same time protect the right of early grantees, by treating their grants as successive locations of portions of the tract according to their dates.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This cause comes up on objections to survey filed on the part of the United States and of various purchasers under [John A.] Sutter, who have intervened in the proceeding, under the act of 1860. The boundaries of the land confirmed to the claimant are described in the decree of the board as follows: "On the south by a line drawn due east from the Sacramento river, so as to touch the most southerly point of a pond or laguna, situated near said river, and about five miles south of the American river, as represented on the map filed in the case, marked B. and B. P. L., exhibit to the deposition of Juan B. Alvarado, March 15, 1855, which line is also marked on said map Lindero, labeled Norte 38° 49′ 32″, on the north by a line drawn due east from the Sacramento river to the southern base of the mountains known as the Buttes, and represented on the said map as Los Tres Picos, and from thence until it intersects the eastern boundary of the tract as represented on said map and described in the grant and in the depositions of said Vioget; on the west by the said river Sacramento, and on the east by the margins of Feather river inclusive. For more particular description, reference to be had to the copies of the grants filed and proved in the case, marked A and C., to the map marked B., and to the depositions of John J. Vioget and Juan B. Alvarado, all of which are filed among the papers in the case."

This decree was affirmed by the district court, but on appeal to the supreme court it was reversed, so far as it confirmed the claim for twenty-two leagues under the Sobrante grant, but affirmed with respect to the eleven league grant. Eleven leagues have thus far been surveyed and located, and the survey has been returned into court under the provisions of the act of 1860. In the opinion of the supreme court it is stated that "the cause is remitted to the district court for further proceedings in respect to the location of the grant of Alvarado within the limits set forth in the grant and the accompanying map on file in the case." [21 How. (62 U. S.) 170.] It will be observed that the decree of the board and of this court, which was thus in part reversed and in part affirmed, did not attempt to make any discrimination between the right to eleven leagues acquired under the Alvarado grant and that to twenty-two leagues supposed to have been acquired under the Micheltorena or Sobrante grant. It confirmed to the claimant all the land "within his rancho as laid down on the map which accompanied the grant for eleven leagues." But the claim under the Sobrante grant having been rejected by the supreme court, and the cause remitted that the eleven league grant might be located within the limits set forth in the grant and accompaning diseño, it is evident that the smaller quantity must now be located within the limits decided by the board and this court to be the boundaries of the original map; the only effect of the partial reversal of the decree by the supreme court being to reserve to the nation, i. e., to the United States, the excess beyond the eleven leagues, instead of considering it as conveyed to the claimant under the Sobrante grant. If the limits of the tract out of which the eleven leagues are to be taken had not been so explicitly determined by the decree of the board, and adopted by the supreme court, there might be much room to doubt whether the southern boundary line marked "Lindero latitud norte 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec.," on the map B. P. L., was in fact intended by the governor to be the southern limit of the tract, out of which the eleven leagues just granted were to be taken. It has unfortunately happened that neither the original grant nor the map which accompanied the petition are before us.

The grant has been burnt and the map lost. The contents of the former we learn from the borrador draft in the archives and from a copy of the original of record in the county clerk's office; but the precise indications of the map, according to which the governor granted, cannot now be ascertained with any certainty. The grant describes the northern boundary as Los Tres Picos, and the parallel of latitude 39 deg. 41 min. 45 sec.; and the southern boundary as the parallel 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec. In fixing these boundaries it might reasonably be inferred that the governor adopted some lines drawn on the map before him, and supposed to be, and marked as, the parallels of latitude mentioned in the grant. But on one of the maps presented as copies of the one which accompanied the petition are the two lines found marked as mentioned in the grant. The map "B. P. L." first appears as an exhibit to the deposition of Governor Alvarado. He states that it seems an exact copy of the diseño, except that on the Feather river were marked localities which Sutter thought would be suitable for the settlement of families under him. "I named the degrees of latitude as Sutter had them marked on his diseño. I told him I did not know the latitude; but, as he insisted on having them so, I described them accordingly." The evidence is silent as to the origin of the map B. P. L., thus introduced to our notice. We are not informed when, by whom, from what origin, or for what purpose it was made. But, if the testimony of Alvarado be accurate, it is not a copy of the map attached to the petition, for the northern line of latitude is not 39 deg. 41 min. 45 sec., as mentioned in the grant, and which Alvarado declares he adopted from the diseño, but 39 deg. 32 min. 45 sec. The southern line marked on the map corresponds with the call of the grant, but the map is in this respect inconsistent with itself as will presently be shown. There was also produced by the claimant a map marked A. P. L. This map Vioget states to have been made by him for Captain Sutter in 1843, and to be a true copy of the original, except that some dotted lines are omitted which were intended to mark swampy lands. As Vioget, at the time of Sutter's application for a grant, made two maps of the tract solicited, one of which was sent with the petition, and was the diseño before the governor when the concession was made, and the other was retained by Sutter, it is reasonable to conclude that the copy A. P. L. was made from the latter and not from the former, which remained in the archives at Monterey. The supreme court seem to have supposed that this copy by Vioget was the map filed by the claimant with his petition. But such was not the fact. The map B. P. L., already referred to, was that filed with the petition, while the Vioget copy marked A. P. L. was not produced until some years afterwards. On this latter map the southern parallel of latitude is laid down precisely as in the map B. P. L., but it is marked "latitud norte 38 deg. 41 min. 32 sec." The position of the northern line is in like manner identical with that of the northern line on B. P. L., but it is marked "latitud norte 39 deg. 33 min. 45 sec." If, then, the original of this map was before the governor, it is evident that he did not adopt either parallel of latitude laid down on the map as the boundary of the tract he intended to concede.

It will be observed that not only do the numbers of the northern and southern boundaries on A. P. L. fail to correspond with those mentioned in the grant, but they also differ from those marked on the same lines on B. P. L. For the southern boundary on the latter is numbered 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec., while on the former it is numbered 38 deg. 41 min. 32 sec.; and the northern parallel on the map B. P. L. is marked 39 deg. 32 min. 45 sec., while on A. P. L. it is 39 deg. 33 min. 45 sec., neither of which latter corresponds with the call of the grant for latitude 39 deg. 41 min. 45 sec. It is stated by Vioget that in making his preliminary survey or reconnaissance of the land to be solicited, he established with such imperfect instruments as he could command the latitude of two points, viz., Sutter's Fort and the junction of the Sacramento and Feather rivers. The latitudes of these two are laid down on both maps. That of the fort is 38 deg. 45 min. 42 sec. The southern boundary is evidently intended to be fixed about four miles to the south of it. This is shown not only by its position on the map, and by reference to natural objects, but by the testimony of Vioget as to the points from which it was drawn. If, then, the map "B. P. L.," or its original, was before the governor when he made the grant, and the southern lindero, as thereon laid down, was adopted by him, it disclosed on its face its own absurdity, for the latitude of the fort is marked 38 deg. 45 min. 42 sec., while the boundary four miles to the south of it is marked 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec., thus making the latitude increase towards the equator. Vioget himself declares that such a mistake could never have been committed by him, and the map A. P. L., which he testifies was a copy made by himself from the original, would seem to show that it was not in fact committed, for on that map, as already stated, the southern line is marked 38 deg. 41 min. 32 sec., which would be its true latitude, supposing the latitude of the fort four miles to the north of it to have been correctly determined. But notwithstanding this discrepancy, we might have supposed that a map similar to B. P. L. was before the governor when he made the grant, and that by some error the southern boundary was marked 39 deg. 49 min. 32 sec. instead of 38 deg. 41 min. 32 sec., and the numbers so inscribed upon it were adopted by him, if it were not for the circumstance that the northern line of B. P. L. does not answer the call of the grant, —for that instrument mentions, as we have stated, the parallel 39 deg. 41 min. 45 sec. as the northern boundary, while the northern boundary on B. P. L. is marked 39 deg. 32 min. 45 sec. Under these circumstances it is urged by the United States, with much force, that neither of the lines delineated on the maps was intended to be adopted by the governor. That the southern parallel on the map before him must have been marked 38 deg. 41 min. 32 sec., as on A. P. L.; for Vioget himself declares he could not have committed the blunder of making the latitude increase towards the south, that the northern line must have been marked as on A. P. L., 39 deg. 33 min. 45 sec., and that the governor determined to grant a tract commencing eight miles north of the southern parallel on the map before him, i. e., eight miles north of a line marked 38 deg. 41 min. 45 sec., making north latitude 38 deg. 49 min. 45 sec., and extending a corresponding distance north of the northern parallel 39 deg. 33 min. 45 sec. as marked on the map, making 39 deg. 41 min. 45 sec., which are the boundaries mentioned in the grant. On this theory alone it is urged we can account for the absence on either map of the parallel called for in the grant as the northern boundary.

In explanation of this supposed action of the governor, it is urged that the application of Sutter was for an impressaire grant, or for a grant of lands to be distributed amongst colonists whom he proposed to introduce. That the extensive establishments he had already formed at the fort below the American river, forbade the idea that he could have wished to distribute amongst new colonists any portion of the land he was already in possession of, and to a considerable extent, had improved and cultivated. That the same considerations apprised him that the land occupied by him and lying almost under the guns of his fort would not be granted to any other person, as valdio or vacant, more especially as he had originally settled on it by permission of the governor. He was therefore secure in his possession. But he was desirous as stated in his petition, of "enlarging his enterprise by the introduction of twelve families," and for this purpose he solicited and the governor granted a tract of eleven leagues, without intending to include the land adjacent to the fort already occupied by him. It was only after he had distributed the land just granted, and had thus conferred on the nation what was deemed an important service, that he asked and obtained for his own use, and that of his son, a tract of twenty-two leagues, or eleven leagues each, being the maximum quantity which any individual could obtain for his personal benefit, and the granting of which indicated that the governor supposed he had already distributed the eleven leagues just granted for that purpose, but which he could not have imagined to have included the fort and large establishment of Sutter, on which so much labor and money had been expended. But whatever force there may be in these views, I am compelled, under the decision of the supreme court, to consider the question presented as no longer an open one. In its opinion the court recognizes in the most explicit manner, the map B. P. L. filed with the petition to the board of commissioners, as proved to be that referred to in the grant, and according to which the governor made the concession. "With this map," says the court, "we have no difficulty in locating the grant so as to include New Helvetia." After alluding to the fact that the exact position of the line of latitude mentioned in the grant is twenty miles to the north of the establishment, the court says: "But the map shows that the line of the southern boundary is south of New Helvetia, and is so related to natural objects represented on it, as to be easily determined. Vioget accounts for the error in the designation of the line by the imperfection of the instruments, and proves that a starting corner was fixed, and the line traced on the ground. This is better evidence of the true location of the southern line, and conforms to the probabilities of the case. Upon the whole evidence we find that the grant and the map filed with the petition in 1852, before the board of commissioners, have been proved." It will of course be noticed that the point more immediately under consideration in the foregoing extract was whether the call in the grant for the parallel of latitude 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec. should be satisfied by ascertaining with mathematical exactness that parallel, or by adopting a line supposed to be that parallel and so marked on the map. It was of course held that the line actually referred to and intended to be designated by the governor should be adopted, notwithstanding that by reason of imperfect instruments or erroneous observations it might have been incorrectly marked as a certain parallel of latitude. The attention of the court does not appear to have been directed to the circumstance that on the map A. P. L., also produced by the claimants and proved by them to be a copy of the original, the same line is differently marked and does not correspond with the call of the grant, and that on neither A. P. L. or B. P. L. is any northern line found marked as described in that instrument. But whatever may have been the points brought to the notice of the court by counsel, the decision is explicit. The map filed with the petition in 1852, before the board of commissioners, is pronounced to be "proved." That this was the map B. P. L. there can be no doubt. The decree of the board which was affirmed by the supreme court with regard to the eleven league grant, established the southern boundary as the line marked 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec. on the map B. P. L., and this court is, by the mandate and opinion of the supreme court required to locate the land grant by Alvarado within the limits set forth in the grant and the accompanying map on file in the case. The only effect of the partial reversal of the decree of the board and of this court, was that the surplus land within the limits of the map, instead of passing to Sutter and his son under the Sobrante grant, reverts to the United States. Under this decision of the supreme tribunal, I have no choice but to consider the map B. P. L. as a copy of that referred to in the grant, and the line of latitude laid down upon it, and marked 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec. as intended by the governor to be the southern boundary of the tract within which eleven leagues were to be taken and the surplus reserved to the nation.

The survey which is now before the court has been made in conformity with another map, which, for the first time, was produced and placed in the hands of the surveyor when about to make the location. It is marked Exhibit Von Schmidt, No. 2. No proof of its origin or authority is offered. In its general features it corresponds with the other maps produced, but like A. P. L., the southern line of latitude is marked 38, 41, 32; the latitude of the fort, four miles to the north, being marked as on both A. P. L. and B. P. L., 38 deg., 45 min., 42 sec. But it differs from both those maps in having marked upon it in squares colored in green eleven leagues of land,—two to the south of the American river and nine on the margins of Feather river, beginning at a point on that river a short distance to the north of its junction with the Sacramento. Before this map can be treated as fixing the location of the eleven leagues granted by the governor, two points must be established: 1. That it was submitted to him with the petition or before the grant was made. 2. That he adopted his designation of the land solicited and his grant with reference to it. On both these points the proofs almost entirely fail. Governor Alvarado, who was the first witness called to prove the correctness of the map B. P. L., testifies that "that map seems an exact representation of the diseño except that on the latter there were marked on the Feather river localities which Sutter thought would be suitable points for the settlement of families under him." This statement is corroborated by Bidwell, who swears that on the map he saw in the archives certain squares were marked, but he is unable to give their location. But it does not appear from Alvarado's testimony that the localities so indicated by Sutter, as suitable for the settlement of families, were adopted by him as the precise designation of the eleven leagues conceded; and even if they had been so adopted, we shall presently see that they could not have been those delineated on the map recently produced.

In order to explain and establish the location of these squares, alleged to have been marked on the diseño submitted to the governor, the claimant has introduced in evidence the deposition of J. J. Vioget, taken in the case of U. S. v. Covilland [unreported] which was a claim under a grant by Sutter for a portion of the tract granted to him. In this deposition, Vioget describes the manner in which he surveyed and located the eleven leagues intended to be asked for by Sutter. He states, in substance, that he located two leagues south of the American river; that he then ascended the Sacramento to its junction with the Feather river, and thence up the latter to the Canadian ford, where, finding the land to be good, he commenced to lay off the remaining nine leagues; that he laid them off one after another, taking most of the land on the east side of the Feather river,—but each of the nine leagues had a part of it on the west side of the river. The northern line or boundary of the last league he particularly describes as drawn one league in length from west to east. Of that league about one-quarter of a mile was on the west side of Feather river, and the remainder on the east side of it. He further states, that he did not run the eastern lines of the nine leagues. He ran on the west side of the river, and drew the eastern line parallel to it, and the distance of one league from it. It was not a straight line, on account of the bends in the river. From this testimony of Vioget it is very clear that the squares marked by him on the map were of one square league each,—extending one after the other towards the north,—that each of them embraced land on both sides of the river, and that no one of them was more than a league in breadth, from east to west. But the squares, if such they can be called, marked in green on the map recently produced, in no respect conform to this description. All of them, except the first or most southerly, exceed a league in width, and the last is no less than three leagues in width, making the northern line three leagues in length instead of one league, as positively stated by Vioget. It is therefore evident that even on the supposition that Vioget marked the square described by him on the map transmitted to the governor adopted that designation, and granted the precise parcels of land so marked out (which he does not pretend to have done), the green map now exhibited affords no assistance in ascertaining their location. That map stands, therefore, not only wholly unsupported by evidence, but disproved by Vioget himself, whose testimony shows that the squares marked on it are wholly unlike those marked by him on the diseño. But the green map, even if its origin and authenticity had been more satisfactorily established, could hardly now be substituted for the map "B. P. L." which was originally produced by the claimant, and which his counsel so strenuously insist has been decided to be a correct copy of the diseño, by the supreme court. If, then, I am right in declining to consider the suggestions of the United States as to the probable intention of the governor in fixing latitude 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec. as the southern boundary, and in treating the location of that line as drawn on "B. P. L." as finally determined by the supreme court, I must, for the same reason, refuse to receive a new map, which can control the location only on the supposition that it and not B. P. L. is a true copy of the diseño adopted by the governor. But on other grounds it may well be doubted whether the governor intended or Sutter considered the grant as embracing only the specific tracts of land stated by Vioget to have been marked by him on the map. The fact that the earliest distributions of lands by Sutter on execution of the trust on which the grant was made, was, to a considerable extent, of tracts not included in the squares marked out by Vioget, would seem decisive proof that he did not consider his grant to be confined to those specific parcels, but to be, as decided by the supreme court, of eleven leagues, to be located within the general limits set forth in the grant and accompanying diseño.

Dismissing, then, from consideration, the exhibit von Schmidt, No. 2, we are left, as under the decision of the supreme court we should at all events have been compelled to do, to locate the eleven leagues within the general limits described and delineated on the map B. P. L. In the grant the land is described as eleven square leagues, comprehended in the extension which the diseño attached to the expediente marks out, without including the lands overflowed by the currents and force of the rivers, and having for boundaries on the north the three summits (Los Tres Picos) and latitude 39 deg. 41 min. 45 sec. north; on the east, the margins of Feather river; on the south, latitude 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec. north; and on the west, the Sacramento river. With this description, and with the map B. P. L. which, under the decision of the supreme court, we are bound to accept as an accurate copy of the diseño referred to, it is not difficult to ascertain with the general limits of the tract within which the eleven leagues were to be located. On the south is the line of latitude marked as mentioned in the grant, and its position determined by natural objects. On the west is the river Sacramento. On the north is a line of latitude which, though it is not marked with the same numbers as those mentioned in the grant, is inscribed "lindero," and must be taken to have been intended to be designated by the governor, if we assume, as just stated, that this map, or an accurate copy of it, was before him. The eastern boundary is the margin of Feather river. Unassisted by the diseño, there might perhaps be room for doubt whether by this description it was intended to include both banks of that stream. But now without referring to the map it would seem most probable that the governor, if he had intended to bound the tract on the east by the Feather river, i. e., to make it include only the west bank of the stream, would have said so in terms. It is not pretended that the grant included the west bank of the Sacramento river, for the grant using the most obvious and natural form of expression bounds the tract on the west by the Sacramento river. But in fixing the eastern boundary, the governor varies the phraseology and declares that boundary to be not the Feather river but the margins of the Feather river. All doubt, however, is removed by recurring to the map. On either side of the Feather river on the east side of the Sacramento, as well as on the north and south sides of the American, is extended a dotted line, evidently intended to indicate the land solicited and to mark the division between the available lands on the margin of those streams, and the overflowed and tule lands, which beginning at a greater or less distance from their banks, extend over so large a portion of the country. Towards the north, as we ascend the Feather river, these lines diverge, leaving a considerable tract of good land on either side of the stream, while along the Sacramento, both above and below its junction with the Feather, the line of tule or swamp land approaches to within a short distance of its margin. It is shown by the testimony that these dotted lines along the Feather river and along the Sacramento, above the mouth of the American river, indicate with as much exactness as could be expected, the limits of the high lands susceptible of occupation and cultivation as distinguished from the tule lands. And we have the direct testimony of Vioget to the fact that they were drawn with that intention. When, therefore, the governor, with a copy of this map before him, declared that the eleven leagues granted were comprehended within the extent of country delineated on the diseño, without including lands overflowed by the currents of the river, it is reasonable to suppose that he referred to and adopted the discrimination between the high and the overflowed lands, which was so clearly made on the diseño. If this be the true construction of the description in the grant as explained and aided by the indications of the diseño, the question as to location presented in this case does not materially differ from that which so often arises in this class of cases, viz., when a certain quantity is granted within limits which embrace a much larger quantity by what rule is the location of the quantity granted to be determined? Under the Mexican system the duty of laying off and segregating the granted land properly belonged to the magistrate who gave judicial possession. There is no reason, however, to suppose that in measuring the land according to the ordinances the party interested was not allowed to exercise a reasonable election as to its location, provided he did not give it such a form as would be inconvenient and impair the value of the adjoining public domain. U. S. v. Fremont, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 565. It was accordingly held by the supreme court in U. S. v. Fossatt, 21 How. (62 U. S.) 445, that one league confirmed in that case was to be located within the exterior limits of the grant at the election of the grantee or his assigns. But in many of the cases presented to this court it has appeared that the whole tract within the exterior limits has been sold by the grantee to various purchasers, or a part has been sold, perhaps equal to the whole quantity granted, and the remainder retained by the grantee. A contest thus inevitably arose either between the purchasers inter sese, or between them and the grantee, as to the location of the land confirmed. As between the different purchasers there seemed no rule to be adopted but to treat the conveyances as operating as an election on the part of the grantee of the land conveyed, and as estopping him, or subsequent purchasers under him, to float the grant to any other portion of the tract included within the exterior limits than that whereon, by his deeds, he had declared it to be located. This rule, though it has not received the sanction of the supreme court, has, it is believed, been acquiesced in by the bar and the suitors, and it is commended to us by its reasonableness and justice. For nothing would be more unjust than to allow a grantee, after disposing of large portions of the land within the exterior limits mentioned in his grants,—after extensive improvements have been made and numerous persons holding under a title derived from him have settled upon the land,—to elect a location of the quantity confirmed on an entirely different portion of the tract, so as not only to leave without title those to whom he had conveyed, but perhaps to embrace the lands of settlers, who, relying upon his first election, have treated the sobrante or excess beyond the quantity granted as vacant public land. But if this rule, which thus protects purchasers under an ordinary grantee, be just, it should, a fortiori, be applied to a case like the present. For the grant to Sutter was not the usual grant to an individual colonist, but was asked for and made to him by an impressario.

In this petition to the governor, Captain Sutter, after referring to the extensive establishment which by the permission of the government he had already formed, proceeds to say: "For all these reasons he finds himself under the necessity of enlarging his enterprise by establishing twelve families, and to solicit the kindness of your excellency that you may be pleased to grant him eleven leagues of land in his establishment of New Helvetia, situated towards the north, according to the land represented in the sketch which he has the honor to present to your excellency." The governor accordingly makes the grant, subject to the approval, not of the departmental assembly, as was usual in grants to individuals for their own benefit, but to that of the supreme government as was required by law when grants were made to impressarios for the purpose of distribution among settlers. When therefore, Sutter, having obtained this grant, proceeded o distribute it among various settlers, he was for executing the trust, and rendering the consideration on which the grant had been made. Nor should he, or subsequent purchasers under him, for he is understood to have parted with all his interest in the claim, be permitted now to locate the grant so as not to include the lands distributed by himself amongst his early colonists.

As against a grantee, or purchasers under him, seeking to exercise the right of electing a location, subsequently to and differing from a location already constructively elected by deeds of conveyance, the reasoning above mentioned would seem conclusive. But it commonly happens that soon after obtaining his grant, and prior to any conveyance of any portion of the land, the grantee has erected a dwelling house, corrals, etc., and has cultivated portions, more or less extensive, of his land—ignorant of the dimensions of the tract within his exterior boundaries; or supposing, as was formerly not uncommon, that his grant was by metes and bounds, and that the whole tract within his exterior boundaries would be confirmed to him, he may have conveyed away portions remote from his houses and cultivations—the purchaser perhaps taking the risk of having the land purchased included in the survey—and it may be, paying a price less than its value by reason of the uncertainty as to the location. But the grantee or a subsequent purchaser under him might, notwithstanding such conveyance, insist that no location should be made so as to exclude his ancient dwelling house, his corrals, and his cultivated fields. He might urge with great force that his occupation and cultivation constituted the principal equity of his claim; that it would be absurd to confirm his claim because he had settled upon and improved it, and afterwards to declare that his house and improvements were not upon his own, but upon public land. He might also urge that the erection of a house and corrals—the cultivation of the adjacent land—especially when effected at great expense and followed by a residence of many years, are acts which indicate an election far more unmistakably and emphatically than any conveyances could do—and that subsequent purchasers of remote parts of the tract are affected with notice of the fact that so far as his homestead and adjacent lands are concerned his election was already made, and the location fixed. So, too, the purchaser of his house and improvements might reasonably claim that wherever the grant might finally be located, it ought at all events to include what the grantee had by acts so notorious and unmistakable averred it to embrace. And the location so originally made by the grantee should not be affected by the execution of perhaps quitclaim deeds, without consideration, of which he, the purchaser of the house and improved land, neither had nor could have had any notice. In addition to this, when we consider how readily frauds upon the purchase of the homestead or even upon settlers (who naturally look to the house and settlement of the grantee as determining the location of the tract), might be committed by means of antedated conveyances, it will, I think, be apparent that the mere execution of deeds to purchasers cannot in all cases be accepted as an election by the grantee of the location of the land which is to be adopted by this court by causing the survey to be made of the tracts so conveyed, including them successively in the order of their dates until the whole quantity granted be obtained.

If, then, in any case, the grantee could be deemed by his occupation and cultivation to have fixed the location of the grant as against any subsequent purchases of other portions of it, Sutter must surely be considered to have done so. As early as 1839 and two years before the date of the grant, he had formed a settlement near the junction of the American and Sacramento rivers, which he named New Helvetia. In the year 1841 he commenced the erection of a fort at his own expense, having previously been commissioned by the government to guard the northern frontier. The fort was surrounded by a high wall, and was defended with cannon. Within it were dwelling houses for his servants and workmen, and workshops for the manufacture of various articles of necessity. A grist mill, a tannery and a distillery were attached to the establishment. A number of Indians were domesticated by him, and contributed to cultivate his fields of grain, and to defend the settlement from more savage tribes. He was possessed of several thousands of horses and neat cattle, which were under the care of his servants. There were collected at different times from twenty to fifty families, and there were in the course of years some hundreds of persons connected with the establishment. U. S. v. Fossatt, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 172. Such was the character of the establishment to which Sutter gave the name of New Helvetia, and it had already received considerable development, when, in 1841, he solicited of the governor "eleven leagues of land in his establishment of New Helvetia, situated towards the north, according to the land represented in the sketch." The governor accordingly grants for him and his settlers, the said land called New Helvetia, and in the third condition defines its boundaries as has been stated. It is suggested by the supreme court that even without the aid of any map whereby we could learn the actual location of the southern parallel of latitude called for in the grant, a question might arise whether the general description of "New Helvetia" should not overrule the particular description by metes and bounds contained in the third condition. "But with the map which shows that the line of the southern boundary is south of New Helvetia, we have no difficulty in including it in the grant." It is evident that the supreme court did not anticipate that if New Helvetia was found to be within the exterior boundaries, any location of the eleven leagues so as not to include it would be made. The court even seems to have considered that the designation in the grant of the extensive and well known establishment of Captain Sutter might overrule the description by lines of latitude contained in the third condition, even without the aid of the map, which showed by natural objects the position of the southern boundary. Assuming then, that early settlement, extensive improvements, and the designation of New Helvetia by name, must be taken to have fixed the location of the grant so far at least as that New Helvetia must be included in it, we proceed to ascertain its boundaries. The place called New Helvetia before the grant was made, appears to have had no definite limits. The fort, which was its headquarters, and the land in its vicinity, are stated by the captain to have been understood to embrace all of New Helvetia. The designation, therefore, of New Helvetia in the grant, in no respect assists us in fixing its southern and eastern boundaries, which are disputed. In the official survey a southern boundary has been adopted, which corresponds neither with the line of latitude marked "lindero" on the map, nor with the line run by Vioget, nor even with the green map, which was placed in the hands of the surveyor. The location of the land has been fixed in accordance with a statement of Vioget that he intended to measure exactly two leagues below the American, and that he included a larger quantity because he erroneously reckoned the Spanish league as equal to three terrestrial miles. The line of the survey has therefore been made to correspond with that of Vioget for only a portion of its extent, and it leaves it at a point from which when extended to the American river, it will embrace exactly two leagues. But this location is open to insuperable objections. There is no proof whatever that the governor had any knowledge of Vioget's alleged intentions with respect to the quantity of land to be located in the vicinity of the fort, or that he adopted the boundary described in the grant and delineated on the diseño under the impression that it would include two Spanish leagues and no more. Nor does Sutter himself appear to have at any time, supposed that he was confined within a boundary which should include that precise quantity. In the year 1841 he states that he broke the ground for a vineyard and planted vines at a spot which is to eastward of the line of the official survey, and in 1847 he constructed a flour mill near the same place, at an expense of $24,000. The race for this mill commenced near an oak tree, which by almost all the witnesses who were early residents of the country, is stated to have been well known as the eastern landmark of New Helvetia. Hall, Buzzell, Bidwell, and many other witnesses, identify the "blazed oak tree on the southern bank of the American river, about fifty yards above Sutter's old mill-dam, or where the mill-race commences." This tree is stated by Von Schmidt, the surveyor, to be four miles to the eastward of the line run by him as the eastern boundary. It is shown that among the earliest colonists whom Sutter established on his land were Atkinson, Montgomery, Perry McCoon, Wyman and others, who seem to have been settled on the land south of the American river, and near the eastern boundary, which has been excluded from the official survey. The oak tree referred to by the witnesses is situated at or near the spot where, as Vioget states, the line ran by him terminated; and it likewise corresponds with the eastern termination of the dotted line marked on the map B. P. L. I am unable to perceive on what grounds I should be justified in refusing to treat it as the eastern limit of the grant.

With regard to the southern boundary, a more difficult question is presented. The grant states that the land is bounded on the south by the parallel 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec. of north latitude. The map B. P. L. shows the true situation of the line so designated. The western termination on the Sacramento river of the line is not seriously disputed. It is testified to by Vioget, whose deposition with regard to its actual location, was accepted by the board and adopted by the supreme court as sufficient and controlling evidence on the point. It is contended that that parallel forms the southern boundary throughout its whole extent, until it meets the eastern boundary. In other words, that the southern boundary line is a line drawn due east from the Sacramento at the point of beginning as testified to by Vioget, and that the eastern boundary is a line drawn nearly south from the blazed tree before mentioned, until it meets the southern boundary. In support of this theory, it is argued with great force that the grant calls for that parallel as a boundary, and not for any line run by Vioget which differs from it. That it appears from the testimony of the early settlers that Sutter's eastern line was universally recognized as running south from the blazed tree until it intersected a line drawn due east from the Sacramento. That in the grant to Leidesdorff of land on the American river immediately eastward of Sutter, and which extended two leagues south of that river, the boundary line between these grants is represented as running in a southerly direction for two leagues. And that in the map of the Sacramento valley, made by Bidwell in 1844 at the request of Governor Micheltorena, and compiled from the grants and maps in the archives, the land of Sutter below the American is represented as nearly a square shape, and bounded on the south and east by the lines contended for. It is further urged that the land in the southeast corner which would thus be included, constituted at that time, the most valuable portion of the tract, and that in 1850 it was sold for a large sum to R. Gelston, who has separately presented his claim for it, and now intervenes for his interest. On the other hand, it is urged that Vioget's deposition conclusively shows where the southern boundary was in fact run. That it was delineated on the map by a dotted line, which, as it could not then have been intended to indicate the division between high and tule lands, must have been meant to indicate the boundary of the tract solicited, and that the mention of the parallel 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec. in the grant, does not show that the governor meant to establish it as a boundary throughout its whole extent, particularly as no eastern termination is given. But that it was mentioned as the southern limit of the tract because the southern boundary as shown by the dotted lines, commenced at the same point on the Sacramento river and for a short distance coincided with it. The question, however, seems no longer an open one. In the decree which was affirmed by the supreme court, the tract is described as bounded on the south by a line drawn due east from the Sacramento river, so as to touch the most southerly point of a pond or lagona situated near such river, and about five miles south of the American river, as represented on the map filed in the case, and marked B. P. L., which line is also marked "lindero latitud norte, 38 deg. 49 min. 32 sec." As to the line so marked on B. P. L., there can be no question. It must therefore be accepted as the southern boundary of the tract, notwithstanding that except for a short distance at its western extremity it differs from the dotted line which Vioget swears he ran for a boundary.

Assuming, then, that the grant embraced all the land contained between this southern boundary and a line run southerly from the "blazed tree," the question arises whether the location should now be made to embrace this large tract, to the exclusion of lands equally within the grant which Sutter had conveyed to other parties long before his deed to Gelston. It has already been remarked that, as a general rule, the conveyances to third persons by a Mexican grantee of portions of the land within his exterior limits may justly be considered as an election of the location, and as estopping him to make any subsequent election inconsistent with it; yet that the building of a house and other improvements, and an ancient and notorious cultivation and occupation of a particular portion of the land, would seem to afford as decisive evidence of an election as the conveyance (it might be, without consideration) of some other portion; and that the purchaser of the house and improvements might justly claim that the election was made and the location fixed by the grantee so as not to be affected by any subsequent conveyance, of which he, the purchaser, may have had no notice; that the reasoning applied with great force to a case like the present, where the effect of determining the location by the dates of conveyances alone would be to exclude from the survey the great establishment of Sutter, upon which he had settled so many persons, which gave a name to, and was the principal consideration for making the grant. But these considerations furnish no answer to the perplexing and difficult question, to what extent must the establishment of Sutter be deemed to have located his grants? If, for example, his boundary had been a league or more further to the south, should the occupation and cultivation of the fort be treated as having located the grant upon the eight or nine leagues which would then have been found south of the American river, to the exclusion of those lands which he, soon after the grant, and in execution of the trust confided to him, distributed among his settlers, and which were "situated towards the north," as asked for in his petition. It would seem more just to treat the establishment at New Helvetia as locating the grant upon its site and the adjacent lands, to such an extent as, while it satisfies the principle that his establishment fixed to a certain degree his location, will at the same time enable us to protect the rights of early colonists, for whose benefit in part Sutter received his impressario grant, and whom he at once proceeded to establish upon the land. The quantity of land thus to be assigned to New Helvetia is of course to a certain extent arbitrary. I have been unable to discern any better line of limitation than the original line run by Vioget. This, although not adopted by the governor nor by the supreme court, as the southern exterior limit, was, nevertheless, if Vioget is to be believed, run by him as the boundary of the tract to be solicited. That Vioget ran some line as a boundary cannot be doubted; and Sutter himself, in his deposition taken on behalf of Gelston, cordially testifies from a confused and uncertain recollection of the line as established by Vioget. To question 11, "How do you know the eastern line runs south by east?" he says: "I do not know exactly, and don't like to make a mistake. It was fixed by Vioget when I showed him what land to take. Question 12. What are your means of knowledge that the eastern line was ever fixed? Answer. Vioget told me so; he told me he had surveyed it. Question 13. Did he describe to you what boundaries he had surveyed? Answer. Yes; he described them to me, but I cannot describe them. I cannot without riding over the grounds or having my papers, tell much about them. Question 14. Did Vioget inform you how he ran the eastern line; if yea, what information did he give you? Answer. It is now so long ago I do not know what information he gave me. Question 16. What landmarks do you know on the southern line? Answer. I know of none; I have to refer to the surveyor."

In answer to question 22, which related to other lines, he says: "I am not personally familiar enough with these lines to give testimony satisfactory to myself; I am not willing to make mistakes under oath; I cannot answer the question definitely; I refer to the surveys that have been made by Captain Vioget." It is evident from these statements that Sutter considered his boundaries to be the lines run by Vioget, of which, however, he seems to have had a very confused idea; and this conclusion is corroborated by the circumstance that he does not appear to have made any conveyance of, or settlement upon, lands outside of those lines, until in comparatively recent times and after the grant of the Sobrante, which gave him all the lands included in his map. If to these considerations we add that the map itself indicates by dotted lines the boundary which Vioget testifies he ran, and that the land south of those lines, and between them and the parallel of latitude, is marked "Tierras Steriles," it will, I think, be evident that, as against the early colonists of the more northern portions of the tract, we ought to restrict the location of the New Helvetia portion within the lines originally run by Vioget, and delineated on the map which the supreme court has pronounced to have been proved. But it is objected that, of the land lying south of the American river, all those portions which were liable to overflow from the force and currents of the river are to be excluded. That a considerable portion of the tract, including in great part the site of the present city of Sacramento, is overflowed whenever there are floods or freshets in the river, is not only testified to by the witnesses, but demonstrated by the fact that the city of Sacramento has found it necessary to construct very extensive levees at great expense. But it also appears that a great part of the land on the margins of Feather river is liable, in a greater or less degree, to inundation from the same cause; and at periods of extraordinary floods the whole country is submerged except a few high points of land which rise like islands above the waters. The land thus occasionally overflowed yields abundant pasturage throughout the greater part of the year, and it is even said to be superior in that respect to the high land, which is never submerged, though it is doubtless unfitted for the production of cereals. The dotted lines on the map B. P. L. along the Sacramento and Feather rivers, are stated by Vioget to have been intended to mark the limits of the available land which was solicited; but if, construing the grant as is proposed, we exclude all the lands which were liable to inundation, a large, and perhaps the greater portion of the lands along the rivers included within the dotted lines will be excepted from the grant,— lands which were the first granted by Sutter, on which his earliest colonists were settled, and which have ever since been held under the title so acquired. The dotted lines, running nearly east and west on either side of the American river, could not, like those which followed the course of the Sacramento and Feather rivers, have been intended to mark the division between the high lands and the tule swamps. But if, as we are bound to assume, they were upon the original diseño as they now appear on B. P. L., they would seem to show that Sutter intended to solicit, and the governor to grant, all the land included within them. The testimony of Vioget is positive to the fact that he ran the southern line so as to include the whole tract lying in the angle formed by the Sacramento and American rivers. That Sutter, who at the date of his petition has already formed his extensive establishment at the fort, should have intended to exclude from his grant an irregular and undefined strip of land immediately adjacent to it, and lying between that building and the place on which his embarcadero was situated, would seem highly improbable especially as he had already to some extent cultivated and established his Indian servants upon it; as it afforded good grazing for his cattle throughout the greater part of the year,—and was suitable for the cultivation of vegetables,—and above all, if it be true as stated, that the two years during which he had up to that time occupied the fort, had been remarkable for the absence of rain, and no floods had within his experience occurred to apprise him of the liability to inundation of the land It is also to be observed that the governor, in excluding from the grant the lands periodically overflowed by the impelled currents of the river, merely adopted a suggestion contained in the petition of Sutter, evidently intended as explanatory of the sketch which he submitted. When, therefore, the governor granted him the eleven leagues, as exhibited on the map, without including the lands Sutter desired to except, he may not unreasonably be considered to have accorded a privilege to, rather than imposed a restriction on the grantee, by permitting him to take all the land supposed to be fit for cultivation and settlement, but to reject, if he saw fit, the swampy and unavailable portions which were included within the limits of the map. When, therefore, he saw that immediately adjacent to the establishment of Sutter a tract was laid out, contained within dotted lines, which could have served no purpose but to indicate its boundary,—when the same lines were continued north along the margins of the rivers, while outside of them the lands were marked "Tulares y Tierras Esteriles,"—it is unreasonable to suppose that he meant to prohibit the grantee from occupying a portion of the land within those lines, insignificant in extent, though important now as the site of a city, merely because on a more accurate examination it might be found to come within the terms of the description of the land which the grantee was not bound to take.

For these reasons I am of the opinion that the settlement at the fort, and the extensive establishments erected in its vicinity at so early a day by the grantee, must be taken as an election of a location which neither he nor purchasers claiming under him can now disturb, and that that location must be taken to embrace all the land lying between the American and Sacramento rivers and the dotted line delineated on the map B. P. L., which I understand to coincide substantially with the line actually run by Vioget and described in his deposition. With respect to the remainder of the tract, I know of no rule by which to be governed except to treat the conveyances by Sutter to his colonists as operating as successive locations of portions of the tract in the order of their dates. The first distribution of lands made by Sutter under his impressario grant, was by lease for nine years to Cordua et als. of the north-eastern portions of the tract lying between the Yuba and Feather rivers. This lease was made renewable for a second term of nine years. The reversion has since been bought by the assignees of the lessee, and a claim for the land has been separately presented and confirmed in the case of U. S. v. Covilland [1 Black (66 U. S.) 339]. Under the title thus acquired the land has been occupied since January, 1843. It is objected that the original conveyance did not transfer the whole title, but was merely a lease; the present owners of the land have only such right to priority of location as the release of the reversion would confer upon them, and as the date of that instrument is later than that of several conveyances by Sutter of other portions of the tract, the grant must be located so as to embrace the latter. But the question is, not what particular estate for life, for years, or in fee, may have been originally acquired, by those who settled upon the land under Sutter, but whether the latter has done any acts, or created any interests which limit and control the right of electing the location of his grant which he might otherwise have exercised. When, therefore, Sutter having obtained a concession for the express purpose of settling families upon it, within eighteen months of its date, and as his first act under it not only establishes a colonist upon its most remote and dangerous frontier, but executes to him a lease for nine years, renewable for nine years after the expiration of the first term, it seems clear to me that neither he nor any subsequent purchaser under him is at liberty to give to the tract any location which will not embrace the lands so emphatically affirmed by him to be within its limits. No objection has been made by those representing this claim to the northern boundary, as established by the official survey. That boundary must therefore be preserved, and the grant to Sutter located so as to embrace the lands to the south of it included within their original lease provided, and so far as they are contained within the dotted lines marked on the map B. P. L. The conveyance next in date is that to Grimes and Sinclair. But independently of the fact that, through some strange misconception of his rights, Sutter appears to have attempted to convey a tract much larger in extent than the whole quantity granted to him, the boundaries of the tract so conveyed are not only beyond the boundaries mentioned in the grant, but would extend according to the scale on the diseño, considerably beyond the margin of the paper on which it is drawn. Grimes himself seems to have been aware that the title so acquired from Sutter was in great part void, and he at an early day applied for and obtained from the Mexican government a grant for ten square leagues, embracing a part of the land conveyed by Sutter. But, it has already been observed that the map B. P. L., when taken in connection with the words of the grant, excluding from the tract the lands overflowed by the currents of the river, indicates unmistakably what were the boundaries of the land intended to be excluded, and especially with reference to the lands east of the Sacramento river, and below the mouth of the Feather, are we compelled to accept the dotted line as indicating the boundary of the tract; for, otherwise, there would be no eastern boundary whatever. The only eastern boundary, mentioned in the grant is "the margins of the Feather river. This description, though, without the aid of the dotted lines it would be vague and undefined, might still be accepted as affording some indication of the extent towards the east of that northern portion of the tract." But for that part of it towards the south, and below the mouth of the Feather, it would afford no eastern boundary whatever, and the grantee would have been at liberty to extend his land indefinitely in that direction, or at all events so as to comprise all the land lying between the Sacramento and the margin of the map —lands which are marked upon it as "Tulares y Tierras Steriles," and which are obviously intended to be excluded. For these reasons, it seems to me clear that only that portion of the land conveyed to Grimes can be included in the location, which lies along the American river, west of the limits of his ten league-grant, along the Sacramento river, and between those rivers and the dotted line marked upon the map B. P. L.

It is stated by Vioget, when describing the measurement of the squares heretofore alluded to, that he laid off a small strip of land on the Sacramento, but did not intend to include in it the grant. But there is no evidence that this intention was known to or acted on by the governor. The strip is clearly within the limits described in the grant, and marked on the diseño B. P. L. It appears on that map as much a part of the land solicited as the wider portions of the same tract where the dotted lines, as they extend northwards, gradually diverge from the rivers. The land has been treated as his own by Sutter, and I can see no reason for concluding that it was not a part of the tract out of which the eleven leagues were to be taken. Various other conveyances by Sutter have been proved, but it is not necessary specially to refer to them. It is sufficient here to say that each of them successively should be taken as fixing the location of the grant, as to the lands embraced in them. They are understood to be within the limits of the general boundaries, and of the dotted lines on B. P. L., and will be particularly mentioned by names and dates in the order of a new survey, to be entered in pursuance of this opinion. It is believed that under this location all of the lands covered by the earlier conveyances made by Sutter before receiving the Sobrante grant will be included in the survey to be made. These have evidently the higher equity. For they were made in execution of the trust created by and out of the lands conveyed in the just grant which has alone been confirmed,—while the later conveyances may have been in great part intended as transfers of rights supposed to have been acquired under the Sobrante grant, which has been rejected by the supreme court. I have felt more difficulty and embarrassment at arriving at a conclusion in this case than in any other it has been my duty to decide. The undefined character of the exterior boundaries; the loss of the original maps; the inconsistencies and differences in the maps which have been presented as copies; the entire absence of any rules settled by judicial authority, which might have guided me in making a location of the comparatively small tract of eleven leagues out of the large area included in the map; the numerous alienations by Sutter of lands greater even in extent than the quantity included in both grants, and of which until the decision of the supreme court, he was supposed to be the owner. All these circumstances have contributed to render it more than ordinarily difficult to arrive at any satisfactory decision.

I am fully aware of the force of the objections which may be urged against the conclusion to which I have come. The most that can be said is, that that conclusion is perhaps less objectionable than any other. Its correctness rests mainly on the answers to be given to the following questions: 1. Is the settlement at New Helvetia to be treated as a location by Sutter of at least a portion of his grant, to which any subsequent location by conveyances must be subordinated? 2. Is the location so made properly restricted to the land the boundaries of which were run by Vioget and delineated by dotted lines on the map B. P. L., or ought it to include all the land between the American river and the parallel of latitude drawn on the map and mentioned in the grant? 3. Should the lands shown to be subject to inundation at periods of high water be excluded from the tract? 4. Should the various sub-grants by Sutter be deemed to have operated as locations by him of the tracts conveyed, and should they now be successively included in the survey in the order of their dates, until the whole quantity granted is obtained? I have put the points on which this decision chiefly turns in this form in order that the attention of the supreme court may more directly be drawn to them, and in the hope that in the answers to be given to them by the superior tribunal, I may be furnished with some definite rules, established by the highest authority, to guide me in this most difficult and perplexing class of cases.

[NOTE. An appeal was taken to the supreme court, where the decree of the district court confirming the survey and location of 11 square leagues to Sutter, approved May 11, 1863, was reversed and set aside, and the survey and location of the grant by A. W. Von Schmidt, approved February 18, 1860, substituted in place thereof. The case was remitted to the district court, with directions to confirm the survey as to the location of the said grant. 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 562.]

UNITED STATES v. SWANN.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 148.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1803.

COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES.

A slave is not a competent witness for a free mulatto in a public prosecution.

[Cited in U. S. v. Mullany, Case No. 15,832; U. S. v. Gray, Id. 15,252.]

Indictment for theft [against Nancy Swann, a free mulatto].

Mr. Hewitt, for defendant, prayed for a summons for a negro slave as a witness for the defendant.

THE COURT inclined to think that the slave could not be a witness against her, and therefore not a good witness for her, and refused the summons.

APPEAL AND ERROR.

The power to issue "all other writs not specially provided for by statute" (Judiciary Act, § 14) only applies where jurisdiction already exists 561

The nature of a writ of error, and when it lies, discussed in an opinion by Clifford, J. 561

A finding of fact by the district court is not a subject of review by a writ of error when the record does not show that any rules of law were violated, or that any erroneous construction of statute was applied to the facts proved.....1114

Where the record is actually returned and filed in due time, and the copy of the writ of error is correct, a mere clerical error in the return day in the original writ is immaterial, and is cured.....1097

On reversal of a judgment in an action brought by a writ of error from the district court, the circuit court may, if justice require, award a venire facias de novo, triable at the bar of the circuit court..... 967

ASSAULT AND BATTERY.

Striking at a person, though no blow be inflicted, or raising the arm to strike, or holding up one's fist, if done in anger or a menacing manner, constitutes an assault... 359

The mere taking hold of another's coat, if done in anger, or a rude and insolent manner, or with a view to hostility constitutes an assault and battery..... 359

It is an assault to double the fist and run it at another, saying, "If you say so again, I will knock you down."..... 43

It is an assault to threaten to strike a woman with an uplifted club if she open her mouth 798

A person who flourishes or points a deadly weapon at another, intending personal harm, is guilty of an assault, within Act March 3, 1825, § 22, although no battery has been committed 930

A person is guilty of the offense if he could have reached the person intended by extending his arm, so as to inflict a blow, although no blow was actually given..... 930

If a man be present, and encourage an assault and battery, he is a principal..... 806

Whether an assault was with a dangerous weapon or not may depend upon matter of fact, as upon the manner of the assault; and the court cannot declare, as a matter of law, that an assault, if committed with a belaying pin, was with a dangerous weapon..1128

ASSIGNMENT.

BAIL.

See, also, "Criminal Law."

The announcement of readiness to proceed to trial at the close of the term before adjournment will not entitle the prisoner to be released on bail, where he had previously obtained a postponement on the ground of absence of witnesses.....1338

A certificate in the usual form, by the treasury officials, that a certain balance is due by the defendant to the United States, is not sufficient cause for bail.....1158

Where the indictment does not describe an indictable offense, the magistrate has a discretion as to the amount of bail, and is not criminally liable for taking insufficient bail 1157

An acknowledgment without the signatures of the parties certified by a justice of the peace is all that is required to make a recognizance valid and obligatory..... 528

A recognizance of bail is not objectionable because embracing the amounts required upon two separate indictments..... 746

Where the accused is admitted to bail pending consideration of objections to the indictment, the recognizance is a binding obligation, though the indictment be eventually adjudged void..... 746

A person under recognizance to appear at a certain place at a certain hour is not in default before the expiration of that hour, and he is not bound to appear elsewhere.. 915

The cognizor must be called at the time and place when and where he was bound to answer, and an entry made of his default on the minutes of the commissioner, which he returns to the court, to show a breach of the condition of the recognizance..... 915

It is not sufficient to aver and prove aliunde that the cognizor had in fact absconded, and did not intend to appear, and could not have appeared if he had been called 915

Where defendant absconded, and the trial proceeded in his absence, and he was acquitted, held, that the estreat would be set aside on application of the bail..... 954

A motion to set aside a forfeiture of a recognizance given for appearance to answer an indictment, on the ground of irregularities, will be denied, where defendant is a fugitive from justice.....1344

A motion to remit the forfeiture of a recognizance on the ground that the party, when called, was in the custody of a state officer, under warrant issued out of the state court, will be denied on the ground that the question can be best determined on the trial of the action on the forfeited recognizance 1356

A bond signed by a third person, whose name did not appear in the body thereof after its execution by defendant and another, does not import a joint liability, and a joint action cannot be sustained thereon... 528

BANKRUPTCY.

A discharge in bankruptcy does not discharge debts due the United States..... 873

Act 1867, § 44, punishing the fraudulent disposition of the goods of a debtor, obtained on credit, and remaining unpaid for within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, is within the power of congress, as a law "necessary and proper" for carrying the bankrupt law into effect..... 631

A deputy clerk, being authorized to act the same as the principal, has the right to administer oaths in bankruptcy; and such oaths are presumed to be administered in the presence of the court, and by virtue of its authority 151

The repeal of the bankrupt law of 1800 by Act Dec. 19, 1803, bars a criminal prosecution thereunder 458

An indictment under Rev. St. § 5132, will lie before an order of adjudication in bankruptcy 49

In an indictment under Act 1867, § 44, all matters necessary to constitute the offense as defined therein must be pleaded.. 614

The description of the goods should be as definite as in a declaration in trover..... 614

The word "feloniously" should be omitted, the offenses being indictable as misdemeanors 614

An indictment for obtaining goods under false pretenses (Rev. St. § 5132, cl. 9) need not charge an intent to defraud creditors generally 49

The negative averment that the accused was in fact not carrying on business and dealing in the regular course of trade when he obtained credit for goods on false pretenses is not necessary..... 49

Under an indictment based upon Rev. St. § 5132, cl. 9, it must be shown that defendant falsely represented that he was carrying on business in the ordinary course of trade, and that such representations induced the seller to part with his goods.... 490

Under clause 10, it must be shown that the intent to defraud existed in the mind of the bankrupt against his creditors generally, and not against the particular creditor from whom the goods were obtained.. 490

To sustain a conviction for concealing assets from the assignee, it is not necessary to prove a demand by the assignee.....1170

To sustain a conviction for a fraudulent disposal of goods, it is not necessary that such goods shall have been obtained within three months prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy.....1170

The compulsory examination of a bankrupt under oath cannot be given in evidence against him on a criminal proceeding.... 616

BANKS AND BANKING.

See, also, "Internal Revenue."

Customs bonds left with a bank for collection, and paid with the proceeds of notes made by the principal, and bearing forged indorsements, will be held discharged, and the bank cannot enforce the priority of payment of the United States out of the assets of the principal..... 905

COMMON LAW.

In the absence of statutory provisions, the federal courts resort to the common law for guidance in the construction of legal terms and phrases..... 390

COMMON SCOLD.

An indictment charging defendant with being a common slanderer or common brawler is not sufficient. It should charge defendant as a common scold or common barrator, in technical language..... 906

Upon the trial on an indictment for being a common scold, particular instances of scolding may be given in evidence..... 907

The offense of being a common scold is punishable as a nuisance at common law, by fine and imprisonment, the punishment by ducking being obsolete..... 907

CONSPIRACY.

See, also, "Internal Revenue."

A conspiracy is where two or more persons confederate or combine to do an unlawful act, and it may be proved by direct and positive evidence, or by facts showing that there was a concert of action and a unity of purpose in effecting an unlawful object 1144

Both the agreement or combination to do an unlawful act, and an act done by one or more in pursuance thereof, are necessary to constitute the offense..... 197

An agreement whereby a commissioner taking evidence in support of a claim against the United States is to have a contingent fee of $5,000 is not necessarily criminal 181 parties thereto becomes the act of all, and they are all alike guilty..... 181

The fact that the overt acts charged and proven were severally criminal is no answer in an indictment for conspiracy, and such overt acts may be proven to show the existence of the conspiracy charged..... 813
Identity of conspiracy is not destroyed by the connection at a subsequent time of new parties therewith..... 197
A conspiracy to do an unlawful act, formed in one district, and in part executed there, is punishable in that district, though it was consummated in other parts of the United States 181
The defendants may be tried in any district where the overt acts were committed. 813
An indictment will lie for a conspiracy to cheat by selling a free negro as a slave...1277
The time and place of conspiracy must be alleged in the indictment.....1260
On a joint indictment against several, the acquittal of some of defendants does not prevent the conviction of two shown to have conspired 813
It is not necessary to set forth the county in which the alleged conspiracy was formed, and it may be rejected as surplusage..1144
Where the syndic of a firm is charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States in preferring a false claim, there is no conclusive presumption that he had acquired all the knowledge from the books of the firm which a proper execution of his trust would have required him to gain.... 181
Upon prima facie proof of a conspiracy, the acts and declarations of each conspirator are admissible upon the trial of any one of them 1312
The jury must be first satisfied of a common design, confederation, and purpose, before the acts and declarations of one participating are competent evidence against a confederate to prove the scope and purpose of the conspiracy.....1312

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

While the power to regulate commerce among the states is vested in congress, the judicial power cannot act until congress prescribes the rule in regard to commerce.. 686

A person who can discriminate a right from a wrong act is liable to punishment, and his acts are the best test of his sanity..1072

The concealment of the offense, as well as flight from justice, and a judicious use of the money stolen, by a thief, show a knowledge of the offense.....1072

Where there is conflicting testimony on the question of the sanity of the prisoner, he is entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt 1074

Principal and accessory.

An accessory after the fact cannot be tried as a principal unless the indictment show either that the principal has been convicted, or has fled from justice, or cannot be found..... 90

Jurisdiction.

Extent of the criminal jurisdiction of the United States stated by Field, C. J.....1132

The federal courts have no common-law jurisdiction to try and punish crimes, but only such jurisdiction as is expressly authorized by the constitution or by congress.. 91, 694

The federal courts have jurisdiction of all criminal cases arising under the federal laws 1147

The circuit court has jurisdiction to inquire into and pass upon all acts charged by competent authority to be public offenses, and presented to it by such authority for its consideration..... 746

The jurisdiction of the United States to punish crimes extends to vessels sailing under their flag, wherever they may be.....1132

Except offenses committed on the high seas, or in places in the states which are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, there are no felonies against the United States cognizable by courts of the United States, except those which are expressly made such by act of congress.....1060

"High seas" (Act April 30, 1790, c. 9, § 8) mean any waters on the sea coast which are without the boundaries of low-water mark 899

An offense committed in a bay which is entirely landlocked and inclosed by reefs is not committed on the high seas within Act March 26, 1804, c 40..... 871

The federal courts have jurisdiction, under the act of 1825, over their own citizens, in foreign countries, for offenses committed on tide waters..... 822

An American vessel was wrecked within 150 feet of the Mexican shore, and completely broken up and destroyed. Defendant recovered a part of her treasure, buried in the sand under water, and converted the same. Held, that the United States courts had no jurisdiction either over the place or property 1132

The court, in a capital case, arrested judgment on its own motion, for want of jurisdiction, and directed that the prisoner be turned over to the state authorities.... 923

Preliminary hearing: Arrest, commitment, custody, and discharge of accused.

No instruction or official authorization is required for the institution of a criminal prosecution, and it is the duty of a judge to issue a warrant on the complaint of any citizen 1123

A United States commissioner has power to let to bail one brought before him on a criminal complaint, pending the proceeding, in those states where justices of the peace have a similar power..... 915

The commissioner has power to adjourn to another time and place, as incident to the power to hear and determine, but he cannot adjourn in the absence of the accused 915

Pending the hearing of a motion for new trial on conviction as a common scold, defendant was required to give bail for appearance and for good behavior..... 907

In order to justify a committing magistrate in holding the accused for trial, it is only necessary that the evidence should show probable cause to believe that the prisoner committed the offense charged.....1303

A person arrested in one district cannot be removed to another until after examination and commitment, but is entitled to examination in the district in which arrested 1056

A warrant for the removal of a prisoner to another district, in which he was indicted, will not be granted, in the absence of the original affidavit or information or indictment, or duly-certified copies thereof, or proof of the commission of the offense.. 128

Limitation of prosecution.

Act April 30, 1790, § 32, limiting the prosecution of offenses not capital to two years, is applicable to common-law misdemeanors, in the District of Columbia..595, 1124

The finding of an informal presentment is not the finding or instituting of the indictment, so as to take the case out of the statute 1124

There must be a leaving of one's home, residence, or place of abode within the district, or a concealing of one's self therein, to avoid detection or punishment for some offense against the United States, to constitute a "fleeing from justice," under 1 St. 117, § 32..... 212

Control of prosecution.

The United States district attorney has no absolute power to dismiss a criminal charge while an examination of the accused is proceeding before a commissioner, or the grand jury 984

After indictment found, and before trial commenced, the district attorney has absolute power to enter a nolle prosequi.... 984

The district attorney has power, under control of the court, at any time before a jury is impaneled, to enter a nolle prosequi..1350

Arraignment and plea.

In cases of felony the prisoner must be arraigned in the criminal bar, or dock..521, 543

The prisoner charged with a felony need not hold up his hand when called, if he admits himself to be the person indicted.... 543

In misdemeanors, as well as in felonies, two or more pleas in abatement, not repugnant to each other, may be pleaded together 750

On demurrer to an indictment, where it is not suggested that defendant has any defense thereto, judgment absolute will be rendered against him on overruling the demurrer 673

Pleas of the general issue and the statute of limitations, being double pleading, are not allowable, and the special plea will be stricken out....1070

Time and place of trial.

A motion to bring on the trial will take precedence of a motion for an attachment against absent witnesses....1192

Conduct of trial.

Practice of abusing witnesses and attacking absent persons by counsel, in arguments to the jury, commented on..... 819

When several persons are charged in one indictment with the same offense, each defendant has a right to be tried separately..1041

Trials for misdemeanors may be had, after service of summons upon the accused, without his actual presence in court, especially if he be represented by counsel..1030

The accused is not entitled to the minutes of the proceedings before the grand jury, nor, in the absence of strong reasons to the contrary, should they be furnished him....1275

Where there has been no preliminary examination, it is within the discretion of the court to order a list of the witnesses sworn before the grand jury to be furnished the accused 1275

Upon an indictment for a nuisance in keeping a public gaming house, the question, "who dealt the cards?" is objectionable as too general 1357

Counsel will not be permitted to argue a question of law to the jury, in contradiction of the previously expressed opinion of the court 1347

Evidence.

The court will take judicial notice of the public statutes of the state referred to in the indictment 673

The examination of a witness before an examining court, where the witness has since died, is competent evidence upon the trial of the party for the same offense.... 490

The rule that the testimony of a deceased witness may be given in evidence on a second trial between the same parties does not apply to a criminal case....1307

Words accompanying acts are admissible to show the intent..... 236

The statements of a party charged with absconding, made on his way from the place of his residence, as to his intention of returning, is competent evidence to disprove the charge 490

Where the evidence shows that defendant made a false statement about the circumstances of the commission of the crime charged, he may show that he had good reason to believe at the time that the statement was true..... 696

False and contradictory statements, and falsification of records by defendant, and special circumstances not consistent with his innocence, may all be considered in determining his guilt..... 696

Confessions extorted from the prisoner cannot be used against him..... 631

Confessions to be excluded from the jury must have been made by the prisoner under some hope of advantage, or extorted by some apprehension of danger..... 189

Confessions made to an examining magistrate under hopes excited by statements that his punishment might be mitigated are not admissible 580

While a confession made upon promise of favor is not admissible, the fact that the prisoner went to the place where the property was secreted, and identified it, is admissible 798

The whole confession must be given in evidence if any part is given, but the jury is not bound to accept it all as true...624, 1233

Good general character avails a defendant only in a doubtful case..... 902

Proof of good character may afford good ground for a presumption of innocence if there is doubt of guilt, but it will not overcome satisfactory proof of guilt.....1144

A reasonable doubt is a doubt for which a reason may be assigned, not necessarily sufficient to convince another, but such as may properly influence a juror honestly endeavoring to perform his duty.....1312

Jury.

The jury are not the judges of the law in the federal courts. 810

The question whether one fact can be inferred from another is a question of law, to be decided by the court.....1347

The right of the jury to decide the law as well as the facts results only from their power to find a general verdict.....1347

Where the jurisdiction depends upon facts to be found by the jury, the latter may, under the direction of the court as to matter of law, affirm, through the medium of a general verdict, whether there is or is not jurisdiction..... 950

The court may require that the constitutionality of the act on which the indictment is founded shall be argued to the court, instead of the jury..... 810

After the jury is sworn in a capital case, and the cause has been opened, the court, without the prisoner's consent, cannot discharge a juror at his own request..... 696

A jury sworn, even in a capital case, may be discharged by the court under any sudden and uncontrollable emergency, and such discharge is no bar to another trial..1067

The prosecuting attorney, after the jury are impaneled and witnesses sworn, has no right to enter a nolle prosequi, because the evidence is not sufficient to convict, which will not have the effect of a verdict of acquittal.....1067

The jury having been discharged after being out only about four hours and reporting that they were equally divided and could not agree, the court was divided on the question whether the discharge was justifiable under the circumstances..... 504

Verdict: Judgment: Sentence.

One good count in an indictment will sustain a general verdict although the others are bad..... 604

Where a sealed verdict is brought in by consent of the parties, the court will not permit the jury to be questioned as to their finding, but will order them to be polled... 604

The court will not delay judgment merely to give defendant time to discover new evidence on which to ask a new trial..... 696

In misdemeanor cases in the federal courts, the court, and not the jury, should assess the fine..... 23

Where a statute merely alters the punishment of a common-law offense, the statutory punishment may be inflicted, although the indictment does not conclude against the form of the statute..... 187

In cases of statutory crimes punishable by fine, or by fine and imprisonment, the federal courts may sentence defendant to confinement in jail until the fine is paid... 822

A prisoner confined in a New York jail under a sentence which did not fix the place of confinement is not entitled to the deduction of five days during every month, under Act March 3, 1875, but to the deduction allowed by Rev. St. § 5543..... 977

Review.

A writ of error does not lie from the supreme court to the circuit court..... 551

Page

If the alleged error be in the judgment itself, and not in the process, a writ of error does not lie in the same court to correct it 561

A writ of error coram vobis does not lie in the circuit court, either from its own judgment, or the judgment of the district court 561

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

See, also, "Forfeiture"; "Seizure."

Customs laws.

The revenue acts of 1799 and 1863 apply to commercial intercourse between Canada and the United States as well as to other foreign countries 1030

The contemporaneous exposition by the government of an act prohibiting certain importations, followed by the concurrent practical construction for 30 years, will govern, as against the claim of the government to a different construction..... 718

Rates of duty.

To authorize the entry of small pieces of bolt iron under the name of "chain links," it must be proved that they have been previously known in commerce by that name.. 958

Where bar or bolt iron has been changed by subsequent manufacture, it ceases to be subject to duty as such, although it may not have become a new and distinct manufacture, having a new name or use..... 958

A vessel sailing in ballast from Boston, by way of New York, to San Francisco, for a cargo to Europe, is not engaged in "coastwise" trade, within Act June 1, 1872, § 10; and articles withdrawn from bond, and used in repairing her, are exempt from duty 460

Trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States is "foreign trade," and not "coastwise trade," within Act June 1, 1872, § 10..... 460

Invoice: Entry: Appraisal.

An oath taken under Act March 1, 1823, not so modified as to conform to the provisions of Act March 3, 1863, is not sufficient to support an entry, and will work a forfeiture of the goods.....1036

Under Act Aug. 30, 1842, the price or value of the goods must be stated in the invoice according to the actual market value or wholesale price at the time of purchase in the principal markets of the country from which the imports are made.... 240

Goods imported by the manufacturer must be invoiced at the actual market value at the time and place of manufacture. (Act March 3, 1863).....1099

"Market value" is the price at which the manufacturer holds the goods for sale, and which purchasers are willing to pay in the ordinary course of trade.....1099

Evidence is not admissible to show that there was not in fact such an actual market value 1099

The cost of production, with the addition of a manufacturer's profit, is admissible as tending to show market value, when no evidence of sales can be given.....1099

The cost of the raw materials is to be taken at the market price of such material at the time when the manufacture of the goods was completed.....1099

The sum at which an agent who purchased goods for his principal surrendered them to the latter, because he was unable to pay more, is not the proper invoice price; otherwise where the agent violated his authority in purchasing the goods.....1115

The government is not bound by the acts of its consul in certifying to the correctness of an invoice, when based upon false and fraudulent statements 1099

In assessing ad valorem duties on given weights, the actual weight when landed governs 75

The merchant appraisers in whose presence the packages must be examined by the customhouse officer under Act 1799, c. 22, § 67, must be in a situation to be able to witness the examination, and to see and testify to a part, at least, of the contents of each package 340

Under Rev. St. §§ 2927, 2928, there can be an appraisement for an abatement of duties for damage sustained to the goods during the voyage after entry and payment of the estimated amount..... 523

Within a year from the entry a collector may make a reliquidation, notwithstanding a previous liquidation and payment of the duties, which will be binding upon the importer in the absence of an appeal..... 521

Neither accident, mistake, nor innocence of fraudulent intention is a sufficient defense to an information for forfeiture of a package of goods containing an article not described in the invoice. (Act May 28, 1830.) 401

But evidence of accident or mistake may be given to rebut the inference of fraudulent intention 405

The decision of the collector as to the rate and amount of duties is final and conclusive, under Rev. St. § 31, unless the owner, within 10 days after the ascertainment and liquidation, appeal therefrom to the secretary of the treasury 1276

In the absence of such appeal, the courts cannot grant relief.....1276

Manifest.

Articles purchased for the ship's equipment to replace articles lost or deteriorated by use are not subject to duty, and need not be entered in the manifest..... 264

Hempen cables and hawsers are not "vessel and cabin stores" (1 Stat. 644, § 23), nor are they "sea stores" (Id. § 45)..... 264

Importations from Canada held governed by Act March 2, 1821, and not by Act August 30, 1842, § 19..... 187

A horse brought in from adjacent foreign territory as a mere instrument of conveyance in the prosecution of a temporary journey, is not within Act 1821, § 1, and no manifest thereof is necessary..... 315

The master is not liable for not entering on a manifest goods brought on board a foreign vessel, and concealed by the steward. (Act March 2, 1799.).....1283

An information will lie directly against a vessel for the recovery of the penalty for importing goods not included in the manifest without a previous prosecution of the master 669, 672

In such suit proof that the master had no actual knowledge that the goods were on board will not exempt the vessel from liability 672

The district court has jurisdiction on an information against a vessel and her master alleging importation of merchandise not included in the manifest to enforce the penalty against the vessel without a trial by jury 669

A suit to recover the penalty against the master of the vessel for the importation of merchandise not included in the manifest is a suit at common law, and he is entitled to a trial by jury..... 669

An information against a vessel and her master charging the importation of merchandise not included in the manifest may be amended without terms in respect to allegations of ownership of the vessel..... 669

On an information against a vessel and her master for the penalty for the importation of merchandise not included in the manifest tried as a civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the answer of the vessel does not except to such joinder but that of the master does, the information will be dismissed as to him and a decree entered against the vessel....669, 672

If the master make report of arrival he is not liable to the penalty (Act March 2, 1799, § 30), though he do not repair to the office of the principal officer of customs for that purpose 779

Unlading.

Goods free of duty cannot be lawfully unladen and delivered without a written permit from the collector and naval officer. (Act March 2, 1799, § 50.)..... 954

Mackerel, the property of an American citizen, caught in an American vessel by an American seaman, and shipped in an American vessel from a foreign port of transshipment, cannot be landed under such section without a written permit.... 954

Innocence of intention cannot, any more than ignorance of law, afford a defense to the master or owner of a vessel for a violation of Act March 2, 1799, § 50..... 954

The removal of dutiable goods from the vessel to the wharf is an unlading, within Act July 18, 1866, and, where no permit was granted, will subject them to a forfeiture 161

Goods were taken at night in a boat from the vessel, and when partly unloaded on the wharf the witness discovered himself, and the goods were all returned to the vessel. Held not a landing, within Act March 2, 1799 1246

Act March 2, 1799, § 27, which makes the unlading an offense, applies only to the captain and mate.....1246

Liability for duties: Lien: Actions.

Although included in the invoice, goods lost on the voyage are not subject to duty.. 75

Payment of duties into the state treasury or to the Confederate government, on goods imported at a place entirely in control of the rebel forces during the war of the Rebellion, will not discharge the duties 494, 1029

A deputy collector has no authority to waive a tender proposed to be made by importers, by acknowledging a tender when none is made..... 75

The lien on imported goods for duties is relinquished by the taking of bond and security therefor, and delivery to the consignee 34

Violations of law: Forfeiture.

A bona fide purchaser of goods imported at a fraudulent undervaluation before the government has instituted proceedings obtains a good title unaffected by such fraud, and the goods are not liable for the deficiency 1363

To subject goods to forfeiture for fraudulent undervaluation, it must be shown that the goods were invoiced below their value, with an intent to defraud the United States 1033

To entail a forfeiture for undervaluation, under Act March 2, 1799, § 66, and Act May 28, 1830, § 4, there must be a concurrence of undervaluation, and intent to evade payment of duties..... 269

An intent to evade the payment of duties is essential to the maintenance of a prosecution for the personal penalty for fraudulent entries, and the declaration must aver a scienter. (Act March 2, 1799, § 66).... 546

The government may proceed in the first instance either for the forfeiture, or for the personal penalty 546

To authorize a recovery against a consignee of the value of goods fraudulently invoiced, where he is not the owner, but merely an agent to sell, knowledge on his part of the fraudulent undervaluation is necessary to establish the "actual intention to defraud." (Act June 22, 1874, § 16.).. 129

Goods invoiced at their actual market price cannot be forfeited for undervaluation, although in fact the price stated was below the market value at the place of exportation 268, 269

Goods invoiced at the price paid on a bona fide sale are not subject to forfeiture, though it be below the ordinary market price. (Act 1799, c. 128, § 66.).....1111

But the terms "actual cost" do not apply to the case of a voluntary gift or conveyance, where the substantial consideration is not money, or its equivalent estimated at a money price, nor where the consideration is partly money, and partly love and affection 1111

An information alleging fraud in the importation of merchandise at an undervaluation (Act March 3, 1799, § 66) must aver that the valuation was under cost at the place of exportation.....1030

A direct averment that the person making the fraudulent entry was either owner, consignee, or agent of the property (Act March 3, 1863, § 1) is not necessary where it appears from the statements of the information that the person was either the owner, or acted as agent of the owner...1030

An averment that the requirements of the statute, which are merely directory to the revenue officers and the importer, have been complied with, is not necessary. (Act March 3, 1863).....1030

Where probable cause of seizure is shown, claimants have the burden of showing the absence of fraudulent intent....1099

Where it appears that the goods were entered at only about one-half of the invoice price of like goods purchased by other importers at the same time, and imported by the same vessel, the claimants have the burden of substantiating the invoice by clear proofs.....1115

Evidence of prior undervaluation is admissible only to show the intent with which the present undervaluation was made....1099

On a libel to forfeit goods for false valuation, proof of correct entries made about the same time of the same kind of goods by the claimant is admissible to show that he knew their real value..... 274

In a case of false invoice valuation, evidence of other fraudulent acts, of a similar nature, committed at about the same time, is admissible on the question of intent.... 274

Advances made in good faith, by auctioneers in possession, upon goods entered at a fraudulent undervaluation, before the government had elected to proceed for a forfeiture, or to sue for the value, are a lien upon the proceeds.....1035

Fraud will not be imputed to an importer in invoicing goods at the weight as given by the customary method of weighing, but the appraisers are not bound thereby..... 75

An indictment for an offense against Act Aug. 30, 1842, is not barred, if found within five years subsequent to the act charged..1071

A false and fraudulent valuation in an invoice not demanded by the statutes, and which can be of no avail at the customhouse, is not of itself sufficient to justify condemnation of the goods..... 240

The limitation of five years for prosecutions for crimes under the revenue laws (Act 1804, § 3) is applicable to an action of debt to recover the value of imported goods for fraudulent entries..... 546

Act March 2, 1821, § 1, as re-enacted March 3, 1823, is not repealed by Act Aug. 30, 1842, § 19.....1136

The latter act is aimed at frauds on the revenue in cases where an entry of goods and an invoice are required as prescribed by the act of 1823.....1136

An attempt to make an entry by means of any false or fraudulent invoice, affidavit, etc., with intent to defraud, completes the ground of forfeiture, though the fraudulent entry is not carried out. (Act June 22, 1874, § 12.).....1092

The making of a false affidavit of damage, with intent to defraud the revenue, is sufficient to incur the forfeiture.....1092

Where an affidavit of damage is in fact false, there is a prima facie presumption of an intent to defraud the revenue.....1092

Evidence of other fraudulent transactions is admissible to show the intent with which the act was committed.....1092

The illegal act of one partner without the knowledge or consent of the others is sufficient to forfeit the partnership goods....1092

Dutiable goods, imported as passenger's baggage, where no attempt was made to have them passed as such, and the owner, without knowledge of their seizure, offered them with correct bills of lading and moneys for entry at the customhouse, held not forfeitable, either under Act March 2, 1799, § 50, Act March 3, 1863, § 1, or Act July 18, 1866, § 4..... 171

Where the claimant sets up mistake as an excuse for disagreement with the entries, the fact that probable cause of seizure has been made out does not impose upon him the necessity of making out an unusually clear case of mistake..... 154

The hurried entry of goods in the absence of the owner, where pillage by the enemies' soldiers was threatened, held a sufficient excuse for a mistake..... 154

The question whether the difference between the entry and the invoice arose from accident or mistake is one exclusively for the secretary of the treasury, and cannot be raised at the trial on a seizure as forfeited under Act April 20, 1818..... 244

Where an article not described in the invoice is found in a package, the whole package, and not the article alone, is forfeited. (Act May 28, 1830.)..... 405

To justify the forfeiture of a package of goods under section 4, Act May 28, 1830, either the package must contain an article not described in the invoice, or the package or invoice must be made up with intent to evade or defraud the revenue..... 401

Under Act March 2, 1857, c. 63, if an invoice or package of imported goods contains some articles which are indecent or obscene, and others which are not so, the whole are liable to forfeiture; the unlawful ones being destroyed, and the others sold 255

Under a count alleging that certain articles imported were indecent and obscene, and asking that they be condemned and destroyed, the government cannot ask for a forfeiture and sale of other articles in the same case, which the verdict finds to be lawful 255

A bond for the delivery of goods seized must be for the market value of the goods at the place of seizure, without any deduction for the regular amount of duties... 343, 1015; contra, 340

The amount of duties payable on giving bond for the value of goods seized is only that demandable if the fairness of the importation had not been impeached.....1015

Where the goods are afterwards condemned, the claimant loses the amount of the duties thus assessed, as well as the value of the goods forfeited.....1015

Where a bond has been given with the addition of penal duties under protest, the excess will be directed to be paid to the claimant 1015

Page

A certificate of probable cause of seizure will be granted where it appears that the seizure was made in good faith, and after consultation with the surveyor, naval officer, and district attorney..... 264

Proof that the fact of an intended illegal importation was previously known to the revenue officers, and that they acted thereon in making the seizure, is admissible..... 164

A violation of an act requiring that certain goods shall be packed in a certain way does not subject goods not so packed to forfeiture, in the absence of a statute declaring such forfeiture..... 167

Upon information filed against goods alleged to be forfeited, the goods pass out of the hands of the collector who seized them into the hands of the marshal, whose custody is thenceforth that of the court.....1015

After information filed against goods alleged to be forfeited, no penal increase of duties can be exacted by the collector, and such an exaction will not affect the prosecution 1015

Where the claimant knew that his method of importation was contrary to law, the burden is upon him to show affirmatively that he did not adopt such method with intent to evade the payment of duties..... 164

Where the duty of the master of a vessel arriving from a foreign port to repair to the office of the chief officer of the customs, and there make report (Act 1799, c. 22, § 36), cannot be performed, by reason of the neglect of the officer to do that which is prerequisite, the statute is not violated... 708

Foreign distilled spirits.

It is unlawful to fill with domestic tax-paid spirits any casks in which foreign spirits have been imported, even where the brands, stamps, and marks required by law have been removed. (Act March 1, 1879, § 12.) 263

The certificate required to be given on the importation of distilled spirits (Act March 2, 1799, § 41) is an "official document granted by the collector," within Act 1825, § 19, relating to forging and counterfeiting. 976

The provision requiring the certificate to be signed and countersigned is complied with where the signature is printed..... 976

Where the certificate which the supervisor of the revenue was authorized to issue (Act March 2, 1799, § 41) was issued by the collector, an indictment under Act March 3, 1825, § 19, for altering it, must allege that the collector was designated by the president to fulfill the duties of the supervisor under Act March 3, 1803, and that the certificate was issued in such capacity..... 975

Bonding: Warehousing.

An instrument not in the form of a bond with a penal sum and condition, but containing the requirements of the statute (1854, c. 30), where the obligors were not prejudiced by the form, held a sufficient bond under the statute..... 539

A surety who has discharged a duty bond to the United States is entitled to be subrogated only to the preference and priority of the United States to be first paid out of the estate of the principal. (Act March 2, 1799, § 65.)..... 616

A surety in such case cannot maintain assumpsit in the name of the United States against the assignees of the principal..... 616

Where a surety pays the bond, he cannot maintain an action on it in the name of the obligee against his co-obligors, nor an action for money laid out and advanced, except in his own name..... 616

The "additional duty of 100 per cent." secured by transportation bonds under Act 1854, c. 30, § 6, is 100 per cent. on the original duty, and not on the invoice value of the goods..... 539

The transportation bond, under such section, properly includes the original duty as well as the additional duty, the bond first given for the original duty being canceled 539

Customs officers.

Inspectors are, in law, officers appointed by the head of the treasury department... 1

An inspector is an officer of the customs, the obstruction of whom is an offense, under Act March 1, 1799, c. 128, § 71.....1006

Proof that an inspector was commissioned and sworn, and in the actual execution of the duties of the office, with the knowledge of the treasury department, is sufficient proof of his appointment to support an indictment for obstructing him in the performance of his duties.....1006

It is not necessary to produce the commission of appointment to prove such appointment 1006

The offices of deputy collector and of inspector may be held by the same person. (Act 1822, c. 107.)..... 1

A deputy collector acting also as inspector may receive additional compensation therefor 1

A collector removed from office before the expiration of the year is entitled to the maximum amount of $3,000 out of the fees, etc., collected at such time, under Act 1822, c. 107, providing that the excess of emoluments over $3,000 in any one year shall be paid into the treasury..... 482

DEED.

Where the description in a deed is not impossible or repugnant, the court will not reform it, as against third persons who purchased the remaining interest of the grantor at sheriff's sale without knowledge of the error in the description..... 474

An application to reform a deed, held, should not be entertained after the lapse of 11 years, where all persons had dealt with the land on the theory that the description was correct..... 474

DEPOSITION.

A motion for the appointment of commissioners to take testimony abroad is not grantable of course, and previous notice to the adverse party is necessary..... 444

On an application for a dedimus potestatem, the court will consider the materiality of the testimony, and the purposes for which it is invoked..... 444

A commission opened before it came into the hands of the clerk will be set aside... 623

A false certificate of magistrate as to the time and place when and the person by whom the deposition was reduced to writing will render it inadmissible.....1158

A party attending on the taking of depositions will be presumed to have waived objections to the competency of witnesses not raised at the time. But objections not known at the time may be raised on the reading of the deposition..... 244

DISORDERLY HOUSE.

The sale of spirituous liquors to negroes assembled in considerable numbers in and about a house on Sunday constitutes a disorderly house 625

The name of a prosecutor must be indorsed on an indictment for keeping a bawdyhouse 715

Page

On a prosecution for keeping a bawdyhouse, the United States cannot give evidence of the general reputation of the house 894

Upon an indictment for keeping a house of ill fame, evidence of the ill fame of defendant cannot be given..... 69

Under an indictment for keeping a bawdyhouse, evidence is admissible of the general reputation of the people who frequent it...1312

Under an indictment for keeping a disorderly house, charging that defendant suffered persons of ill fame to come together, etc., evidence is admissible of the general reputation of such persons.....1312

DUELING.

Upon an indictment for unlawfully carrying a challenge to fight a duel, a scienter must be proved.....1037

EJECTMENT.

Defendant cannot rule the marshal to return a hab. fac. poss., although plaintiff may do so.....1127

If, after plaintiff is put into possession under a hab. fac. poss., he is turned out by the defendant, he may, upon suggesting vice comitatus non misit breve, obtain an attachment or an alias hab. fac. Aliter, if he is turned out by a stranger.....1127

If the first writ be returned executed, plaintiff cannot issue out an alias. If the writ, though executed, has not been returned, and an alias issues on the suggestion of the plaintiff, resistance to such writ is an offense. Aliter, if the first writ had been returned 1127

The hab. fac. poss. cannot be executed after the return day, and, if it be attempted, resistance to it is no offense against the act of congress.....1127

ELECTIONS AND VOTERS.

The offense of preventing the free exercise of the right of suffrage (Act May 31, 1870, § 19) is complete by the forcible expulsion from the polls of voters waiting in line to cast their ballots, though they afterwards returned and voted.....1267

Act May 31, 1870, § 20, providing for the punishment of persons illegally registering under the state law at an election for a representative in congress, is not unconstitutional 673

The offense is sufficiently described in the words of the statute adapted to the particular circumstances involved therein.... 673

Act La. April 11, 1877, does not authorize the use of separate ballot boxes for state and federal offices..... 143

Rev. St. § 5515, does not apply to a violation of the state laws regulating elections, when such violation does not affect the election, or the result of the election, of a delegate or representative in congress.... 143

An allegation that defendant knowingly offered to give O. a bribe to vote, the said O. being then under 21 years of age, sufficiently charges knowledge of such nonage 310

The mayor of Washington, D. C., has no power to enforce a demand that the polls should be kept open as required by law....1339

A copy of a township election return filed with the county clerk, accompanied by his certificate that it is a full and correct return of such election as filed, sent to the office of the secretary of state, is not an official paper under the election law of New Jersey..1267

EMBARGO AND NONINTERCOURSE.

Page

Construction and effect of Acts March 1, 1809, and March 2, 1811, in relation to the place of lading of prohibited articles..... 69

Imported cargo taken in at a port with which intercourse is prohibited is prima facie presumed to have been laden with an intention to import the same into the United States 467

The value of $400, in determining the liability to forfeiture for taking on goods without permit and inspection (Act Jan. 9, 1808), may be made up by the aggregate of different shipments at different times and places 587

Sea stores and provisions are not to be considered as a part of the cargo, so as to be forfeitable under such act, along with goods which the vessel was prohibited from taking on board..... 587

An inspector may go on board of any vessel to discover if any goods, etc., were illegally laden on board contrary to the embargo acts; and, if obstructed, an indictment will lie, under Act March 1, 1799, c. 128, § 71.....1006

A British subject living in Bermuda, who came to the United States in his own vessel to take his children home from school, returning after two weeks with a cargo, held not a resident within the United States, under 2 Stat. 351..... 486

Vessels and cargoes liable for forfeiture under Act April 18, 1818, may be delivered to the claimants upon giving a bond for value 541

Validity of bond given under Act Dec. 22, 1807 1161

An action of debt upon a bond given under the embargo laws is a penal action, and the jury are judges both of the law and the facts..... 608

Sufficiency of bond given under Act March 1, 1809, c. 91, § 13..... 967

An open boat is not a ship or vessel, within Acts 1820, c. 122, and 1823, c. 150, which prohibit commercial intercourse from the British colonies.....346, 354

British ships or vessels excluded from our ports by such statutes are such as are owned by British subjects having a British domicile, and sailing under a British flag, and not ships or vessels owned by British subjects domiciled in the United States... 346

British-owned vessels are included in the prohibition, although not registered or navigated according to the British navigation and registry acts..... 354

The forfeiture attaches to the cargo on board at the time the vessel enters or attempts to enter our ports, and not to any cargo subsequently taken on board, though on board at the time of the seizure..... 354

The government has the burden of showing that the goods seized were part of the cargo on board at the time of the offense.. 354

EQUITY.

See, also, "Injunction."

In the exercise of its equity jurisdiction, the federal circuit court, as to persons and matters within its jurisdiction, can afford relief where it can be afforded by the principles of the high court of chancery in England 416

The right of the United States to retain moneys due their debtors by an award under a treaty with a foreign power will not affect their right to proceed in a court of equity 38

Where the party has a legal remedy, but a trust is created, equity has concurrent jurisdiction 38

The aid of equity will not be given to enforce a judgment at law against a chattel, unless it appear that the creditor has tried to enforce the same by execution at law; otherwise as to land upon which the judgment is a lien 1358

A written instrument will not be reformed upon the ground of mistake unless the same be made out by the clearest and most unequivocal evidence..... 32

A bill of review lies either for error in law appearing on the face of the decree, or for new material matter which has come to light afterwards, and which could not have been used at the time the decree was made.. 932

Act May 26, 1824, confers on the superior court of the territory of Arkansas the powers of a court of chancery for the purpose of trying the validity of claims mentioned therein, and a bill of review may be maintained therein..... 932

A bill of review must be founded on new matter to prove what was before in issue.. 932

It rests in the sound discretion of a chancellor to grant or refuse a feigned issue, and it will not be awarded where there is sufficient proof to enable him to decide..... 932

The verdict of the jury on a feigned issue is not conclusive..... 932

Where the allegations of the bill are so defective or vague that a precise decree cannot be rendered upon them, proof must be adduced before a decree can be made.. 932

Where the case is submitted upon the bill and answer, the answer must be taken as true, and where it denies the case made by the bill the bill must be dismissed..... 999

Error.

See "Appeal and Error."

ESCAPE.

After a prisoner has been released upon a limit bond, the sheriff can confine him again only on the bail's becoming insufficient. He cannot accept a surrender.... 176

Under Act Jan. 6, 1800, the sheriff is bound to take a bond for the limits, as provided by the state laws, from a prisoner confined on process from a federal court.. 176

The assignment of such a bond discharges the sheriff from liability for a subsequent escape 176

An assignment of such a bond to the United States, when they are plaintiffs, is valid, and its acceptance by the secretary of the treasury will be presumed to have been authorized 176

EVIDENCE.

See, also, "Criminal Law," "Names of Particular Crimes."

The federal courts take judicial notice of the acts of congress, and they need not be set forth or specially referred to in the proceedings before them..... 696

A waiver or right of a privilege must plainly and clearly appear, and every reasonable presumption may be made against it 711

After notice given to produce the original policy of insurance, and proof of the existence thereof, the register in the hands of the company should be introduced in evidence, and not a copy therefrom..... 467

Where a contract alleged by a party appears to have been in writing, he must either produce it, or show that it is not in his power to produce it, to prove its execution or contents..... 598

Rev. St. § 886, applies only to suits against persons accountable for public moneys as such, and is inapplicable to an action for moneys alleged to have been paid to defendant by the mistake of a government disbursing officer..... 684

A certified statement of a balance due, and a report thereof to the comptroller, is not such a transcript from the books and proceedings of the treasury as may be given in evidence under Act March 3, 1797, § 2..... 462

A certified copy made evidence by statute must show that the statutory requirements have been complied with..... 873

A journal kept by the master of a ship alleged to be insane held admissible to prove his sanity, by the style in which it was kept.....1041

When the intent or guilty knowledge of a party is material to the issue, collateral facts tending to establish such intent or knowledge are properly admissible in evidence 274

EXECUTION.

An alias cap. ad resp. must be tested at the return of the original writ, and made returnable at the next ensuing term..... 411

An extent under Act Mass. March 17, 1784, upon real estate, is not good unless it appear by the return that all the appraisers are sworn, nor unless all the appraisers concur in the appraisement.....1125

But it is not necessary that the levy should be recorded in the registry of deeds within the time prescribed by the statute, as between the parties to the execution, nor that the certificate of appraisement should be made and signed by the appraisers....1125

A debtor of the United States, discharged, by order of the president, under Act March 3, 1817, cannot be arrested again on a new ca. sa. by the marshal for his fees, irrespective of an agreement to that effect...1149

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Neither the war department nor the treasury department has authority to sell public property put under its management or superintendence, and the bringing of an action for the price or value of such property is not an affirmance of a sale made without authority..... 149

The head of a department is authorized, in the administration of the duties of his office, to employ agents, and to determine when an exigency arises demanding their employment 603

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

A probate court has no jurisdiction to make an appointment of an administrator of the goods of a person who at the time is alive 470

Where an administrator is appointed of a person who at the time is alive, money paid to him in that capacity may be recovered back, where it has not been paid over.. 470

Right of action upon an administration bond by a creditor of the intestate in the District of Columbia.....1048

An action cannot be maintained upon an administration bond of an executor for not giving in a claim against himself, until the claim has been established under Act Md. 1798, c. 101, § 20, cl. 8..... 895

In Washington county, D. C., there must be a return of non est, or of fi. fa., against the executor or administrator, before suit upon his bond. (Act Md. 1720, c. 24.).... 673

An executor indebted to the estate cannot, in an action upon the administration bond brought by creditors or legatees, discharge himself by showing payments to his co-executors 895

The administrator of the surety in a collector's bond, who pays away the assets on the intestate's debts before notice of the government's claim, is not guilty of a devastavit 806

In a suit against the administratrix of a surety in a revenue bond, brought 13 years after the breach, a plea of want of assets, and fully administered before notice of the bond, held good..... 624

In an action upon an administrator's bond to recover a distributive share of the estate, defendants may retain for necessaries furnished the distributee..... 819

EXTRADITION.

Article 27 of the treaty of 1794 with Great Britain, which provides for the reciprocal extradition of fugitives charged with the crimes of murder and forgery, is not in contravention of the constitution of the United States, as violating the right of trial by jury..... 825

Article 27 of the treaty of 1794 with Great Britain applies to citizens of the United States who have committed the specified crimes within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, and have fled to this country 825

A murder committed on board a British vessel of war on the high seas is committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, within the meaning of the treaty of 1794... 825

Where a treaty of extradition does not state which department of the government shall execute its provisions, the judiciary will take jurisdiction..... 825

Where a person is arrested, and brought up to be held to bail for trial in another district, a certified copy of the indictment found in such other district, if it be consistent and set forth an offense, is competent evidence against defendant..... 593

FALSE PRETENSES.

An indictment cannot be sustained in one place for obtaining money by false pretenses, made in another place..... 578

FISHERIES.

No registered ship or vessel, while she remains registered, can engage in the whale fisheries (Act 1793, c. 52); but she must surrender her register, and be enrolled and licensed for the fisheries..... 890

A fishing vessel licensed to catch codfish cannot catch mackerel, except as bait, or provisions for the crew.....454, 456

A vessel licensed for the codfishery will not be forfeited for catching mackerel, which is incidental merely, and not the main object of pursuit..... 758

On a libel for forfeiture for breach of a license to catch codfish, by catching mackerel at a certain time and place, parol evidence is admissible of catching mackerel at other times and places during the trip, as showing the real business of the voyage... 454

Act July 29, 1813, c. 35, § 7, in relation to bounties, does not require any oath to the agreement referred to therein..... 146

FORFEITURE.

Page

See, also, "Customs Duties"; "Informers"; "Internal Revenue"; "Shipping."

Where a party, for fraudulent purposes, mixes up goods prohibited by a revenue act with those not prohibited, the whole will be forfeited..... 284

A forfeiture denounced in direct terms in a statute as a penalty takes place at the time the offense is committed, and operates as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the government..256, 753, 1118, 1329

In such case, possession of the property by a sheriff under civil process will not prevent the federal courts from taking jurisdiction on a libel of information, claiming forfeiture..... 753

But where there is more than one remedy provided, and the government may elect to proceed for the forfeiture, or in some other way not involving a forfeiture, the title does not vest in the government until the performance of some act amounting to an election..... 1118

Act June 22, 1874, § 16, which makes the finding of an intent to defraud a prerequisite to a forfeiture of goods, though in terms restricted to cases in which issue of fact is joined, is applicable to suits in rem in admiralty, even where there is no answer or appearance..... 167

On a libel to forfeit goods for alleged violation of the revenue laws, where the goods had been seized by, and were in the possession of, a collector of customs, the marshal will be required to attach the property by leaving a copy of the monition with the collector, and a notice requiring him to retain the property until the further order of the court..... 248

Jurisdiction to proceed by information for the condemnation of property forfeited under the revenue laws depends upon the possession of the property, actual or constructive..... 174

On an information of forfeiture, the goods themselves are regarded as the defendant, and it is no objection to the admission of proof of communications made to the revenue officer that they were made in the absence of the claimant..... 164

In a suit on a bond for the redelivery of property seized, the amount of the judgment is the highest price for the property between the date of the bond and the date of the judgment..... 873

Where property seized as forfeited before information filed is bonded as for a seizure made under Act July 13, 1866, § 9, a verdict of condemnation on a count based upon section 26 cannot be sustained..... 174

The difficulty is not remedied by the fact that after the information was filed the property was reseized, and then taken possession of by the marshal on a monition founded on the information, and then rebonded by its owner..... 174

In a suit to forfeit manufactured tobacco, raw materials, and certain tools, the words "condemning the goods," in a verdict "in favor of the United States," may be rejected as surplusage..... 665

Claimants contesting a forfeiture under Act 1864, § 48, are subject to costs on a judgment of forfeiture..... 1026

In suits brought to enforce forfeitures, the clerk is entitled to tax 1 per cent. on the proceeds (Act Feb. 26, 1853, § 1), and the district attorney 2 per cent. (Act March 3, 1863, § 11), notwithstanding the repeal by Act June 22, 1874, § 2, in relation to payments of commissions, etc., to federal officers..... 266

FORGERY.

Page

Any addition to a genuine paper, or any alteration of it in an essential particular, so as to give it a different meaning, is a forgery..... 362

To forge the name of a magistrate to the jurat of an affidavit is a forgery of the affidavit..... 362

A note of an unincorporated bank, "payable out of the joint funds thereof, and no other," is a promissory note, within Act Md. 1799, c. 75, § 1..... 1148

Aiding or assisting in forging papers with intent to defraud the government consists in the commission of any act having a tendency to forward or facilitate a forgery committed by another..... 362

To trace a name with a pencil, afterwards filled up by another in ink, or to take measures to prevent surprise or detection while the forgery is being committed, would be such an act..... 362

Act March 3, 1823, § 1, applies only to instruments altered or forged for the purpose of obtaining moneys from the United States, their officers or agents..... 746

A forged paper, inclosed at B., directed to a person in W., and put into the post office at B., is not uttered in W..... 578

The offense of attempting to pass a knowingly falsely altered national banknote (Rev. St. § 5145) is not a felony, and the indictment need not charge such offense to have been feloniously committed..... 1060

In an indictment for forging a bill in the name of a fictitious drawer and indorser, the subsequent indorsements need not be stated..... 479

In an indictment for forging a bill of exchange, the omission of the words "account of" is fatal..... 479

Defendant has no right to peremptory challenges..... 1065

On an indictment for forging a bill in the name of a fictitious drawer and indorser, the prisoner's indorsement is admissible to prove his intent to defraud, although such indorsement be not set forth in the indictment..... 479

Evidence is admissible that a parcel of counterfeit checks and drafts on other banks than that alleged in the indictment, and others printed on bank paper not filled up, were found in defendant's possession.. 179

Witnesses skilled in handwriting will not be permitted to give their opinion, upon inspection of the papers, whether the forgery was done by defendant..... 625

FRAUD.

Fraud is not indictable unless it concerns the public, or be committed by false tokens or false pretenses..... 595

An indictment for defrauding the United States of a land warrant will not lie, under Act 1823, c. 38..... 50

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

An intent to defraud subsequent creditors is sufficient to avoid a voluntary conveyance, or one not made in good faith, at the suit of such creditors..... 1344

GAMING.

Sections 1, 12, Act March 2, 1831, so far as they relate to the offense of keeping a faro bank, or other common gaming table,

Page

are to be construed together, and when so construed they contain a complete description of the offense and its punishment....1149
A single day's use of a gaming table, called a "sweat cloth," at a race track, is not the keeping of a common gaming table, within Act March 2, 1831, §§ 1, 12.....1155
The game called "equality" held within the meaning of the words "other device," as used in the Maryland gaming act (1797, c. 110) 1280
An indictment for keeping "a gaming table" is bad..... 817
An indictment for keeping "a faro bank" is bad, unless it aver the faro bank to be a common gaming table..... 817
An indictment for keeping "a certain public gaming table, called 'faro bank,'" is bad 817

GRAND JURY.

Witnesses cannot be sent to the grand jury on the part of the accused..... 410
The absence of a venire for the summoning of a grand jury, in a case where it is required, is a ground of challenge to the array 727
Challenges to the array of grand jurors, being abolished by the laws of New York, are abolished in the federal courts of New York; but in the case of improper conduct in designating, summoning, and returning them, the accused has a remedy by motion 727
The court will not interpose for technical irregularities for which there is no right of challenge, unless it appear that the accused is prejudiced 727
Under Act Aug. 8, 1846, providing that no grand jury shall be summoned except upon an order for a venire to be made by a judge, a verbal order given by the judge to the clerk is sufficient, though no order be filed or entered of record..... 727
The omission to issue a venire in such case is ground of challenge to the array.. 727
Such omission, however, is not good ground for a motion to set aside the panel for cause 727
A challenge to the array on the ground that the jurors have been selected, summoned, and returned by a person unfit to summon an indifferent jury touches the qualification of the panel..... 727
A challenge to a grand juror for favor, on the ground that he is the prosecutor, or a witness for the prosecution, duly subpœned or recognized, goes to his qualification 727
The fact that a grand juror had on a previous summons attended the court as a juror, within two years, does not constitute such a disqualification (Rev. St. § 812) as will render bad an indictment found by the grand jury of which he is a member.. 750
Where a period of two full years has elapsed between the beginnings of two terms at which a juror was summoned, he is not liable to challenge under Rev. St. § 812, irrespective of the term of service.. 750
Under 2 Rev. St. N. Y. p. 724, §§ 27, 28, persons "held to answer" are the only persons who can challenge either the array of grand jurors, or the individual grand jurors, for favor..... 727
A grand juror cannot be withdrawn after he is sworn, for a cause which existed before he was sworn..... 410
Defendants who have not had any earlier chance to object to the composition of the grand jury by which they have been indicted may do so by plea in abatement..... 750
The federal officers in New York have no right to change or alter the state boxes and ballots as furnished to them by the state officer 727
Evidence before a grand jury must be competent legal evidence, such as is legitimate and proper before a petit jury..... 727
Any abuse or improper conduct on the part of any person admitted to the grand jury will be investigated by the court..... 727
Witnesses before the grand jury may consult their previous affidavit to refresh their recollection, and affirm facts previously stated on paper..... 727
Sufficiency of oath of witnesses sworn to testify before a grand jury..... 727
A general oath to give evidence touching criminal charges to be laid before the grand jury without reference to any particular person is unobjectionable..... 727
But where the oath names one or more persons, evidence cannot be given under it in support of an accusation against others.. 727
A grand juror may be required to testify as to the evidence given before the grand jury 595

GRANT.

See, also, "Public Lands."

Indians had a right to receive grants of land under the Mexican laws.....1367
The fact that the grantee himself was acting governor, and made out the papers to himself, according to a petition presented to a previous governor, held not sufficient to justify rejecting the claim, where the possession had been long continued, and all the papers were regular..... 537
Prior and continued occupancy of a tract adjoining that granted will extend to the latter, so as to rebut any presumption of abandonment of the grant.....*896
Under a grant designating the quantity as two leagues, a little more or less, the court will not confirm a claim to a tract of four or five leagues..... 502
Where the conditions of a grant have been performed cy pres, though no approval has been given by the departmental assembly, the claim is entitled to confirmation 716
In the absence of archive evidence of the grant, the fullest and most satisfactory proofs of possession and occupation during the existence of the former government, under a notorious and undisputed claim of title, and clear and indubitable evidence of the genuineness of the grant produced, will be required 580
The record of the act of possession, based on depositions containing statements upon which the alcalde acted, cannot be contradicted by testimony of aged, illiterate, and infirm witnesses as to their recollection of what was done or intended by the alcalde.. 471
Where land is granted with reference to a map which clearly indicated the quantity, it will be assumed that the intention was to grant all the land included in the boundaries, though in a subsequent condition the quantity was erroneously stated..... 395
The claimants of a grant are estopped to object that parts of the land which they have sold and conveyed as part of their rancho are not within its limits, for the purpose of completing their quantity by embracing in the survey lands not conveyed by them 393
Land will not be excluded from the claimant's survey because included in the diseño of a neighboring rancho, where the latter has not been surveyed, and the owners have not intervened 393
One claiming title to a confirmed grant in opposition to the confirmee, but under the same original grantee, is entitled, under Act 1851, § 13, to enjoin the issuance of a patent to the confirmee pending a suit in the state courts to determine the title as between the two..... 946

The recital in a grant of pueblo lands by the prefect as "within the demarkation" of the pueblo affords presumptive proof, in the absence of opposing evidence, that the land was so situated, and that the officer acted within the limits of his authority 1062
A grantee will not be decreed an equivalent for a deficiency within his exterior boundaries out of a sobrante accidentally found to exist within the exterior boundaries of a neighboring grant..... 881
The word "point" in the description, "a straight line drawn to the beach, and from that point" another line, held not to mean a mathematical point, but to refer to the beach as one of the boundaries.....1264
A junior grantee cannot insist on a survey which will overlap a prior grant for which a patent has been issued, where he will obtain the full quantity without such overlapping 1261
When a certain quantity has been granted within limits which embrace a much larger tract, the quantity granted is to be located within the exterior limits at the election of the grantee.....1368
The building of a house and the making of improvements within such limits by the grantee may be considered as an election of location in favor of a subsequent purchaser thereof, and will be so treated by the court, to protect an earlier grantee, where there are conflicting claims 1368
Where it appears that the governor intended to accede to the petition, and the land has been long occupied and enjoyed under the grant or promise to grant, and by everybody recognized as belonging to the grantee, the latter has an equitable title, which the United States will respect.....1264
The failure to strictly comply, in regard to time, with a condition requiring a house to be built upon the land, will not prevent the confirmation of a grant otherwise valid, and confirmed by the departmental assembly..1262
A case in which an order has been entered rejecting the original survey, and giving directions for a new and reformed survey, is still "pending," within Act June 14, 1860 1019
In a proceeding to contest or reform a survey, no decree can be deemed final which does not adopt and approve some survey and plat fixing with precision every line of the land 1019
A case is "pending," within the act of 1860, where a motion for rehearing remains unargued and undisposed of at the date of the passage of the act..... 36
The extension of the line beyond the limits of the grant recognized by the government and adjoining proprietors for a number of years held sufficient to warrant confirmation of a survey adopting such boundary 72
A grant of land, held, should be surveyed in accordance with the claimant's original survey and election, where large expenditures have been made, in reliance thereon, without objection by adjoining owners..... 798
In a proceeding to correct a survey under the act of 1860, the district court has no jurisdiction to review and reverse the final decree whereby the genuineness and validity of the claim is established..... 806
After affirmance of a decree of the district court, it may, upon objections to the survey, inquire whether the boundaries described therein are in accordance with its own decree, and with the title papers upon which the judgments of both courts, as shown by their opinions, were founded... 497
Claim confirmed on evidence from the archives supported by long-continued possession, though the original title was lost.... 883
Claim to a Mexican land grant confirmed on evidence of continued occupancy and proper proceedings leading up to its issue, and of its issue and loss.....1262
Mexican land grant confirmed where it appeared that all the preliminaries were in due form, the conditions complied with, and the grant confirmed by the departmental assembly 1333
Mexican land grant confirmed on proof of due preliminary proceedings, approval by the departmental assembly, and a compliance with the conditions.....1367
Modification of the official survey of the Mexican grant directed on a review of the evidence 1365
Claims to Mexican land grants confirmed upon the evidence.....37, 358, 365, 395, 409, 410, 477, 502, 532, 592, 752, 809, 876, 883, *896, 948, 1051
Claims to Mexican land grants rejected upon the evidence.....495, 531, 532, 891
An official survey of a Mexican land grant confirmed upon the evidence.....529, 877
Official survey of Mexican land grant rejected upon the evidence..... 879

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

A guardian will be held liable on his bond for money received in another jurisdiction for the use of his ward.....141, 142
A guardian is liable upon his bond to pay over the money in his hands to a person appointed as his successor, though the latter has not given bond as guardian..... 142
In an action on a guardian's bond, for failure to comply with an order of court, it is not necessary to set forth the facts justifying the granting of the order..... 141

HABEAS CORPUS.

Neither the state nor the federal courts have power to take from the custody of each other persons confined under their lawful authority 726
A writ of habeas corpus was issued just prior to the suspension of such writ as a military necessity by the president, and the marshal was directed by the president not to execute the same. The court unanimously protested against the action of the military authorities..... 599

HIGHWAYS.

There is no public road in Maryland, the obstruction of which may be punished by a criminal prosecution, unless it be properly laid out and recorded..... 985

HOMICIDE.

A particular malice against deceased is not necessary to constitute murder, if there be deliberate malignity and depravity in the conduct of the party..... 899
The difference between murder and manslaughter consists in the existence of malice, express or implied, in one case, and the absence of malice in the other..... 390
Where it is shown that a person was intentionally killed, the law implies malice, and the party who caused the death has the burden of rebutting the implication...390, 1074
To make a man a principal in murder, it is not necessary that he should inflict the mortal wound, if he be present, aiding and abetting the act..... 899

If a number of persons conspire together to do an unlawful act and death happen in the prosecution of the design, it is murder in all. If the unlawful act was a trespass, the murder, to affect all, must be done in the prosecution of the design. If the unlawful act be a felony it will be murder in all, although the death happen collaterally, or beside the principal design..... 899

If several persons conspire to commit a felony, and, if necessary, to kill any person who shall oppose them in the execution of the design, and death ensue in prosecution of the design, it is murder in all who are present, aiding and abetting in executing the design 899

There are no degrees of murder, under the laws of the United States..... 390

An indictment as accessory before the fact of murder will not lie in the federal courts, there being no act of congress covering such offense..... 694

Neither words nor gestures, however insulting or irritating, nor an assault, will justify the killing of the aggressor. His killing is justifiable only when there is an apparent intent by him to commit a felony, and the danger is imminent, and the species of resistance used necessary to avert it... 390

By "imminent danger" is meant immediate danger, such as must be instantly met, and cannot be guarded against by calling upon the assistance of others, or the protection of the law..... 390

A man may repel force by force in the defense of his person, his family, or property against any one who manifestly endeavors, by violence or surprise, to commit a felony.. 390

Mere threats against the person or life of another will not justify homicide, even when an attempt at execution is made, unless the danger be so imminent as not to admit of any delay in meeting it on the part of the assailed..... 390

An offender having made public threats against the life of an officer having a warrant for his arrest, the latter is justified in taking his life, where he so acts with a rifle when the attempt at arrest is made that the officer has reason to believe that he intends to execute such threats..... 795

An indictment for murder will not lie in a federal court, except as authorized by an act of congress..... 997

Sufficiency of indictment for murder under the act of congress punishing opposition to the enrollment of the national forces.... 997

A person indicted for murder on the high seas is entitled to only 20 peremptory challenges 918

INDIANS.

Indians belonging to a tribe maintaining a tribal organization on a reservation within the limits of a state are amenable to the state laws for offenses off the reservation, and within the limits of the state.... 923

A white man may incorporate himself with an Indian tribe, be adopted by it, and become a member of it, so as to be included within the effect of a pardon of offenses committed by citizens of the tribe..... 684

A white man, who, at a mature age, is adopted into an Indian tribe, is not an "Indian," within the exception of Act June 30, 1834, § 25, of jurisdiction of "crimes committed by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian"..... 886

Where land is set apart by the president for the use of Indians, whites who go upon the reservation to fish do so "contrary to law," within Rev. St. § 2147.....1357

The federal circuit court has no jurisdiction, under the act of 1834, to punish offenses committed by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian.. 950

Congress has the power to prohibit the traffic of spirituous liquors between the Indian tribes, or members thereof, within as well as without the limits of the state.....1049

An Indian may be punished for disposing of spirituous liquors to another Indian, under Act March 15, 1864.....1049

The "Indian country," within the meaning of Act June 30, 1834, declaring it a crime to introduce spirituous liquors therein, is only that portion of the United States which has been declared to be such by act of congress.....1021

Such act was not extended, propria vigore, over the territory of Alaska, upon its cession to the United States.....1021

Such act as amended March 15, 1864, was not extended over Alaska by Act July 27, 1868, extending the laws "relating to customs, commerce and navigation" over that territory 1021

The title of the Cherokee tribe to their lands is a base, qualified, or determinable fee, without the right of reversion, but only a possibility of reversion, in the United States 742

The Cherokee tribe derived the title to their lands by grant from the United States, and such lands cannot be held to be "lands of the United States," within Rev. St. § 5388..... 742

The treaty-making power of the United States can make a sale or grant of land to an Indian tribe without an act of congress.. 742

Without the assent of the general government, the state probate courts cannot administer upon the property or credits of Indians who were members of a tribe which maintained towards the United States its tribal relation..... 470

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION.

See, also, "Criminal Law"; "Internal Revenue."

When lies.

Where a statute has prescribed the mode of prosecution, no other can be sustained... 528, 904

An offense against the laws of the United States, which is of a character not capital or infamous, may be prosecuted in the federal courts by an information according to the course of the common law.....1056

The district attorney may proceed by information, though an indictment against the same person for the same offense has been quashed for insufficient averments..... 68

A preliminary examination, or an order to show cause, and a hearing thereon, is not a necessary preliminary to a proceeding on information..... 894

An information prosecuted in a district court must be regarded and treated as a common-law proceeding.....1326

Finding.

On a motion to quash an indictment on the ground that no evidence of defendant's guilt was adduced in support of an application for a warrant for his arrest, the court cannot inquire into the sufficiency of the evidence, but may quash the indictment, where none was given.....1056

The court has no power to inquire into the mode in which the examination of witnesses was conducted before the grand jury, for the purpose of invalidating an indictment 727

It will, however, inquire into the competency of evidence, whether oral or documentary, and into the manner of authenticating the latter..... 727

Page

The court cannot revise the judgment of the grand jury upon the evidence, for the purpose of determining whether or not the finding was founded upon sufficient proof, or whether there was a deficiency in respect to any part of the complaint..... 727

It cannot be pleaded in abatement to an indictment that it was founded on illegal testimony introduced before the grand jury..1186

It is discretionary with the court to quash an indictment, or to hold defendant to plead in abatement or demur.....1350

Form.

A conclusion of an indictment founded on a statute, "contrary to the true intent and meaning of the act of congress of the United States in such case made and provided," is good.....1167

When a statute makes one or more distinct acts, connected with the same transaction, indictable, they may be charged as one act..... 949

A motion to quash an indictment is a proper mode of taking objections to it for want of form or substance..... 367

It is discretionary with the court whether it will quash an indictment for defect of form 367

A defect pleadable only in abatement is not ground for quashing an indictment.... 590

A defendant acquitted upon a flaw in the indictment will be remanded for trial at the next term.....1148

Indorsement.

The designation "foreman" is sufficient to show that the person to whose name it was appended was foreman of the grand jury 561

The sworn assistant of the district attorney may sign the latter's name to an information 68

At common law, the name of the prosecutor need not be written at the foot of the indictment 23

The name of a prosecutor must be written at the foot of an indictment for a misdemeanor under the Virginia law.....1037

It is not a good ground for arrest of judgment that the name of the prosecutor was not indorsed upon an indictment for a misdemeanor in Virginia.....1085

It is no ground for general demurrer to an indictment for a misdemeanor under Acts Va. Nov. 13, 1792, and Act 1795, p. 346, that the name of a prosecutor is not written at the foot of the indictment.. 952

Description of offense.

An indictment need not aver the existence or provisions of a public statute upon which the prosecution is founded..... 785

Where an exception in an act does not occur in the enacting clause, it is not necessary to set it out, or negative it in the indictment 973

It is generally sufficient to describe a statutory offense in the words of the statute 367

In indictments for misdemeanors it is sufficient to lay the charge in the words of the act describing the offense, unless it appear that those words include cases not intended to be embraced within the laws, in which event the indictment must show the case to be one not thus excluded..... 590

Where a criminal statute does not so define the acts constituting the offense as to give the offender information of the nature and cause of the accusation, an indictment which does not go beyond the words of the statute is defective 1300

The particulars constituting the offense are matters of evidence, and need not be pleaded 367

Page

It is not charging an offense in the alternative where the language describes the same offense 604

Time and place.

An allegation that the crime was committed on board a vessel belonging to citizens of the United States, within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of the court, and without the jurisdiction of any particular state, sufficiently shows the jurisdiction 561

An indictment for a statutory misdemeanor need not charge the offense with the particularity of time, place, and circumstance required for a felony or a common-law offense, as defendant has a remedy by application for a rule for specifications and particulars..... 973

Joinder of parties and offenses.

It is not a misjoinder of offenses in different counts unless they belong to different families, or the judgments and punishments are inconsistent with each other.. 515

Offenses of the same class may be included in the same indictment..... 216

A count for a misdemeanor and one for a felony cannot be joined in the same indictment 1046

Counts for conspiracy cannot be joined with counts for murder..... 997

Two or more counts for misdemeanor may be joined in one indictment..... 595

A count for stealing and a count for receiving stolen goods may be contained in the same indictment..... 624

Where an indictment describes in different counts different offenses, of different grades and punishments, implied from the same transaction, and the verdict is guilty of the last count only, judgment may properly be rendered on the verdict.....1311

Variance.

Where an indictment for resisting a customs officer improperly describes the office, the variance is fatal..... 526

An allegation in an indictment, which is not impertinent or foreign to the cause, must be proved, though a prosecution for the same offense might be supported without such allegation..... 598

An indictment for an assault committed on the high seas in the outer road off St. Domingo, on an American vessel, is supported by proving the offense to have been committed in the inner road, and in port..1325

Conviction of other offense than that charged.

On an indictment for a felonious entry and taking of goods from a storehouse, held, that defendant might be found guilty of simple larceny..... 716

INFORMERS.

The informer is he who first gives to some officer authorized to act upon it information which leads in fact to a seizure and forfeiture 300

An officer who obtains information by the examination of witnesses compelled to testify before the grand jury is not the informer 300

An officer who acts on information furnished him by another officer, intended to be given the government, and does not discover new facts by his own diligence, or who merely makes certain what was suspected, is not the informer..... 300

Under Act 1864, § 179, as amended July 13, 1866, officers of the internal revenue may be informers..... 300

It is only when the amount of the penalty has been recovered by judgment of the court that an informer is entitled to a moiety thereof 300
Where liquor is forfeited by consent in pursuance of an agreement with the commissioner of internal revenue, a person, to be entitled to a share in the proceeds, must make out a clear case..... 168
The informer's share is to be calculated upon the gross proceeds of the forfeitures without deducting costs. (Act June 30, 1864, § 179, as amended July 13, 1866.) 318
Where the proceeds of a condemnation do not exceed $500, the informer is entitled to his percentage upon the gross amount after deducting costs of the proceedings.....1027
An informer may sue in his own name under Act Feb. 28, 1799, § 8..... 544
Where the informer is not a government officer, the United States is not liable for costs 544
The court may require an informer to give security for costs, and in case of refusal strike his name from the record.... 544
An informer's share in the registry of the court should be decreed to be paid directly to the persons beneficially interested, and entitled to hold it.....1348
An agreement between informers to divide the informer's share equally is valid, and will be regarded by the court in distributing it 1348

INJUNCTION.

Injunction may issue to stay irreparable mischief or waste in cases of disputed title 416
Where the amount in dispute is great, and the inability of the party to respond is greatly disproportioned to such amount, such insolvency is a proper subject for an allegation in the bill..... 416
The institution of an action at common law is not an indispensable prerequisite to a bill for an injunction..... 416
On a motion to dissolve an injunction, matters set up by way of avoidance in the answer responsive to the bill should be deemed on such motion equivalent to an affidavit by defendant..... 416
Where the answer denies directly and positively, upon personal knowledge, the allegations of the bill, the injunction will be dissolved, in the absence of extraordinary circumstances 416
A denial on information and belief of facts distinctly alleged making out a case for injunction, cannot arrest the issue of the injunction, or authorize a dissolution of it, if one has been granted.....416, 444
Such denial will not be deemed sufficient because the allegations of the pleadings are not sworn to from personal knowledge... 444
A general denial of allegations by one uninformed as to their truth is not sufficient to dissolve an injunction..... 932

INTEREST.

Interest will run from the time of a statement of a balance of account against a person, though the amount was subsequently reduced on the allowance of further credits claimed 357

INTERNAL REVENUE.

See, also, "Forfeiture"; "Informers"; "Seizure."

Assessments and collections.

A provision for the collection of a tax in districts where the same is forcibly resisted so soon as such resistance is put down does not show a want of uniformity in the tax.. 810
Visitorial powers are not conferred upon internal revenue officers under Rev. St. §§ 3177, 5241, authorizing them to examine the checks of the national bank..... 414
A national bank is not exempt from examination by the internal revenue officers under Rev. St. § 3177..... 784
A clerk of a supervisor of internal revenue cannot make such examination..... 784
A dealer in tobacco has no right to forcibly eject a customs officer from his premises after the officer has fulfilled his errand 4
The obligation or duty to pay taxes is one which may be enforced by suit, by an action at law, or a bill in equity, according to the nature of the relief sought..... 397
A demand for the payment of taxes is necessary, under Rev. St. § 3186, to create and bring into operation a lien therefor, and such demand must state the amount of the tax..... 399
A suit will not lie to recover a tax in a district other than that in which the tax accrues, or that in which the delinquent resides, although he may be found and served with process therein. (Rev. St. § 733.) 139
In a suit for taxes defendant cannot plead a set-off, legal or equitable, growing out of independent claims..... 397
To a suit to recover the balance of a tax the defense that the amount already paid was determined to be the true amount by the assessor cannot be tried upon demurrer 133
The remedy against an illegal tax assessment pointed out..... 397
An internal revenue collector is not responsible for more than ordinary care and diligence in the collection of bonds for duties placed in the hands of an attorney by his predecessor for suit by direction of the commissioner of revenue.....1257
In such case the collector is not bound by a treasury statement charging him with the amount of such bonds.....1257

Special taxes.

An association whose initiation fees were used to buy a stock of liquors which were dealt out to members only on payment by the drink, at cost price, is a partnership for the sale of liquors at retail, and each member thereof is guilty of violating the statute, where the special tax is not paid.. 893
Where a person has complied with section 24, Act July 13, 1866, as to giving notice, bond, etc., he is not liable to indictment for carrying on the business within the 10 days after the receipt by the collector of the assessment list without having paid the special tax.....1050
An intent to defraud forms no part of the offense of the omission to pay the special tax imposed by Act June 20, 1868, § 44.. 724
Where the tax has been paid, and the barrels properly marked, branded, and stamped, the spirits cannot be seized under Act July 20, 1868, § 44, while in the hands of an innocent purchaser, for frauds of the distiller..... 303
Section 45 (14 Stat. 163) is not rendered unconstitutional by the provision which requires affirmative proof on the part of the claimant of the payment of the taxes due on the spirits seized.....1029
Act July 20, 1868, § 96, does not authorize a forfeiture of spirits or liquors thereunder for a violation of section 45, as a specific penalty or punishment is imposed by the latter section for its violation..... 332
The knowing and willful omission, neglect, or refusal of the wholesale liquor dealer to cause packages of distilled spirits to be gauged, inspected, and stamped (Act July 20, 1868, § 25) will expose all distilled spirits and liquors owned by him to forfeiture under section 96..... 282

A knowing and willful failure to comply with section 25 will cause a forfeiture by virtue of section 96. Otherwise with a neglect of the requirements of section 47, which provides a penalty for a breach thereof. (Act July 20, 1868.)..... 168

A retail dealer in liquors, who also purchases and sells malt liquors in quantities of more than five gallons at the same time, is not required to keep the book provided for in Act July 20, 1868, c. 186, § 45..... 717

The book is to be kept only by wholesale dealers in domestic spirits, and a person does not become such dealer by taking out a wholesale license for selling ale, though he also sells domestic spirits at retail.... 717

A rectifier and wholesale liquor dealer, who enters upon his books spirits bought by him, and the names of the manufacturers or rectifiers marked on the barrels as the names of the persons from whom purchased, instead of the names of the actual sellers, incurs the forfeiture denounced by Act July 13, 1866, § 26..... 344

The forfeiture denounced by section 26 (Act July 13, 1866) applies only to the spirits, apparatus, and articles in the possession of the offender at the time of the act or neglect whereby forfeited, and not to those subsequently acquired, and found in his possession..... 344

Wholesale dealers are bound to "cause" their casks to be stamped and branded in the cases which come under Act July 20, 1868, §§ 25, 47..... 168

The forfeiture by section 57 (Act July 20, 1868) is general, and that section imposes a penalty for a violation of section 25 in case the unstamped packages contain more than five gallons 170

The intention of congress must be manifest and unmistakable to justify the courts in construing a law imposing a forfeiture as extending to property which, before seizure, had been sold to an innocent purchaser *303

The fact that barrels containing spirits purchased in the open market bear all the brands indicating payment of the taxes does not create a presumption that such taxes have been paid.....1029

The ticket given by a pawnbroker under the California law is "an agreement or contract," within section 170, Act 1864.....1174

A person whose occupation is to sell agricultural produce in public market is liable to a tax as a "produce broker" (Act 1866, § 79), though the produce is raised by himself upon his farm.....1080

Liability of a peddler for carrying on business without payment of the special tax after application for a license, where he stopped business before the tax was assessed, and refused to pay it..... 616

Persons supplying and sewing two small buckles and straps upon knapsacks, under agreement with the government contractor, are not liable for the manufacturer's tax. (Act July 1, 1862, § 75.).....1321, 1323, 1323

A person who gave out to customers combinations of numbers, specifying them as being in certain lotteries, entering the same in his policy book, and paying the customers according to the drawings, though no certificate or ticket was given, held a policy holder, and liable for the special tax.....1291

Construction of Act July 24, 1813, in relation to duties on refined sugars..... 493

Wine made from grapes grown in the United States is not subject to a tax under Act June 6, 1872, § 12, because made in imitation of sparkling wine by injecting carbonic acid gas by a separate process of manufacture 238

Distilled spirits.

A person who makes alcoholic vapor in the process of making vinegar by machinery which is not adapted to the condensation of such vapor, held not a distiller. (Act July 13, 1866, §§ 21, 23; Act March 2, 1867, § 16.) 320

The manufacture of alcohol in the process of making vinegar, though the alcohol is not released from its impure state, is within the prohibition of Act July 20, 1868, § 4. 626

The premises and property thereon are forfeited where there is a wash and a still on the premises capable of distilling, and fermented liquors are there distilled without authority, though the product of the establishment is not distilled spirits, but only vinegar 1303

A distiller is bound to pay taxes on 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of his distillery, although this may be more than the amount of spirits actually produced.. 175; contra, *1082

The "deficiency" tax is based upon the quantity of spirits actually produced, or on 80 per cent. of the capacity of the distillery. (Act July 20, 1868.)..... 739

Where the producing capacity of a distillery is reduced by a direction of the government that the distillery be run only a certain number of hours, a pro rata tax only can be collected..... 411

The words "in execution and pursuance of" are equivalent in meaning to the words "to effect the object of."..... 202

A distiller's bond given under Act July 1, 1862, § 39, conditioned that the distiller should comply with the conditions of such act and of such other acts as might thereafter be enacted, held valid....64; contra, 53

In a suit on a distiller's bond for the amount of an assessment (Rev. St. § 3182) defendant may impeach the assessment, though he has not first appealed to the commissioner 43

It is no defense to a prosecution for executing and signing a false and fraudulent bond that defendant knew nothing of his sureties, but hired a man to obtain them, and that they swore to all that was required by law..... 213

The testimony of a subscribing witness that the bond was taken away and returned with the signature of a person whom the witness had seen sign another bond, held sufficient proof of execution by him..... 213

Under Act July 13, 1866, a removal by a distiller of spirits from the place of distillation to a bonded warehouse is a legal act..*303

Spirits in bond may be forfeited for noncompliance of the provisions of the revenue laws 636

Distilled spirits, purchased in good faith, while in a bonded warehouse of the United States, upon which the purchaser paid the taxes, cannot be afterwards seized and condemned as forfeited for the failure of the distiller to keep proper books and to make proper reports. (Acts July 13, 1866, and March 2, 1867.).....*303

The fact that distilled spirits are seized, condemned, and sold for violation of the internal revenue law while bonded, does not release the obligors on the warehouse bond..1272

The fact that the purchaser at the sale paid the tax is immaterial.....1272

It is a good defense to a suit on a distiller's transportation bond that during the act of transportation the government officers seized them, and the collector of the district to which they were consigned refuses to grant a certificate of delivery.....1335

It is immaterial that the seizure was made by reason of the wrongful act of the persons having the goods in charge....1335
Under Act July 13, 1866, § 9, the raw material found, if intended to be used for a fraudulent purpose, may be seized, and is subject to forfeiture, without reference to the place where it is found.....1110
Under Rev. St. § 3453, it is not necessary, in order that other personal property found with the distilled spirits be forfeited, that raw materials intended to be used in the manufacture should be found in the same place 1098
Personal property found in buildings in the same inclosure with a building in which an illicit distillery is carried on, and in such juxtaposition to it that the owners thereof could not be ignorant of the existence of the still, is subject to forfeiture. (13 Stat. 240, § 48.)..... 638
Personal property situated upon distillery premises and used in the business of illicit distilling is subject to forfeiture, irrespective of its ownership and knowledge by the owner of its unlawful use..... 256
The interest of a mortgagee of personal property remaining in possession of the mortgagor may be condemned for unlawful acts of the mortgagor, though the mortgagee be innocent thereof.....1025
The tools, implements, and other personal property must be found in the place or building or within the yard or inclosure where they were intended to be used, and the information should aver such fact....1110
Act June 30, 1864, § 68, confers no authority for the seizure of a distillery, and the lot on which it is situated, or for subjecting such real estate to forfeiture..... 237
"Form 122" for the return of spirits emptied for rectification, held authorized by law 292

Fermented liquors.

The penalty of $200 (Act July 13, 1866, § 49) is imposed not for the omission to make the proper entries, but for the failure to keep any books at all..... 211
An indictment for removing malt liquors without affixing or canceling the proper stamps (Act July 13, 1866) need not negative the cases where the law authorizes a removal without affixing a stamp..... 973

Tobacco and cigars.

Under Act July 13, 1866, § 9, a tobacco manufacturer is required to keep a book showing the goods manufactured as well as those sold..... 639
An entry was made on the sales books of tobacco sold, and a check was taken for the amount, but subsequently the manufacturers gave their check to the purchaser for the same amount, and the tobacco did not pass from their possession, but was treated and disposed of as their own. Held, that the tobacco was illegally returned for tax. (Act June 30, 1864, § 94.).....639, 650
Manufactured goods under Act 1864, § 90, means goods the manufacture of which is completed, so that the goods are in a condition to be sold..... 639
Under Act June 30, 1864, §§ 90, 94, as amended by Acts July 13, 1866, and July 20, 1868, a completed sale or a completed removal of manufactured tobacco is a necessary preliminary to the accruing, assessment, and payment of the tax upon it.... 650
Goods found in the possession of a person for the purpose of being sold or removed in fraud of the law are subject to forfeiture under Act June 30, 1864, § 48, as amended July 30, 1866, though there has not been a completed sale or removal thereof 650
It is illegal for a tobacco manufacturer to remove from the wholesale to the retail department a quantity of tobacco, and to make a return and pay tax on it as one sale instead of on the actual sales in the retail department..... 650
The fraudulent intent or purpose of the person in possession of articles seized because found in a place where the articles or raw materials mentioned in section 48 (Act June 30, 1864, as amended July 13, 1866, § 9) are found does not constitute an element of the ground of forfeiture..... 317
In such case the burden is on the claimant to show that the situation of the property is consistent with his entire innocence of complicity with the offenses for which such articles or raw materials were seized.. 317
The forfeiture of the raw materials is not made dependent on their being seized in the possession of the person in whose possession forfeitable taxable articles are found 650
Where cigars are made in the back part of a room and sold in the front part thereof, the back part is to be regarded as a manufactory, and they cannot be removed to the front part without first branding and stamping 79

Banks and bankers.

But one penalty is imposed by Act June 30, 1864, §§ 110, 120, as amended July 20, 1866, for all failures to make returns prior to commencement of a suit to recover penalties for such failure..... 133
National banks are liable to a penalty for failing to make return of dividends declared, etc., during the period between July 1 and December 30, 1870. (Act July 14, 1870.) 1299
Said dividends, etc., are subject to a tax of 2½ per cent. during said period.....1299
Sufficiency of complaint in an action against a bank for the $1,000 penalty for failing to make return of its net earnings, incomes, or gains under Act June 30, 1864, § 120, as re-enacted July 14, 1870.....1297

Income taxes.

A person's compensation as state's attorney for a certain county is not liable to the income tax..... 818
The income tax acts require a return for taxation as income of all gains derived from the sale of corporation stock in 1868, if purchased at any time after August 5, 1861..1175
A bona fide exchange of stock for other property is not a sale thereof from which profits are derived liable to taxation as income 1175
A transfer of stocks for a collectible promissory note, or an exchange thereof for lands which are sold within the year for collectible promissory notes, is considered as a sale of such stock for so much cash...1175
The beneficiary of a trust fund under a will, who had not on October 1, 1870, become entitled to the possession or enjoyment of, or to the beneficial interest in, any of the principal sum (Act July 14, 1870, § 3), is not liable to the legacy tax under Acts June 30, 1864, §§ 124, 125, and July 13, 1866, § 9..... 134
The amount of a promissory note taken in 1871 on a sale in that year of a patent right not maturing or paid until 1872, is not taxable as income for 1871. (Act July 14, 1870, § 6.)..... 973

An information under Rev. St. § 3453, is sufficient if it follow the language of the statute, and without an express averment that the taxes were not paid.....1028

An information of forfeiture for violation of Act July 20, 1868, § 44, need not aver that the special tax was assessed, or that payment was demanded and refused, or neglected to be paid, but only that the business was carried on without payment of such tax. 724

An information of forfeiture must aver that the property sought to be adjudged forfeited was used in the illicit distillation charged, or was the product of such distillation 259

A description of property claimed as forfeited as "all the boilers, stills, and other vessels used in the distillation of spirits, and all the distilled spirits—being about twelve barrels—now in the distillery owned by W.," is not sufficiently specific..... 259

In an information of forfeiture for neglect to make the entries required by Act July 20, 1868, § 45, it is not necessary to aver the time the liquors were received or sent out, or from whom received, or to whom sent 724

The validity of an assessment against a distiller may be inquired into by defendant's answering a bill by the United States to subject to the payment of such assessment lands transferred to them..... 816

The courts have no power under the act of 1864 to release on bond or stipulation goods seized for forfeiture under sections 48, 68 1122

The notice required to be given to persons executing a bond for the return of property seized is that prescribed by Rev. St. § 3459, and not the previous rules of the court 1028

It is no defense to a surety in a stipulation for property seized that on appeals by the claimant bonds were taken without surety, with the approval of the district attorney, and that government bonds had been given as further security, which had been stolen 637

An agreement by a district attorney to release a surety on a stipulation for value on condition of his giving information against other persons is not valid without the concurrence of the commissioner of internal revenue, the secretary of the treasury, and the attorney general..... 635

A stipulation by the government officials of immunity from penalties or forfeitures in consideration of testimony of violations of the law will be enforced by the courts.. 884

—— Penalties: Actions therefor.

The penalties prescribed in section 96, Act July 20, 1868, apply to those who knowingly or willfully do or omit to do the thing forbidden or required, only when there is no specific penalty imposed by any other section of the act.....313, 724

The penalty imposed for a violation of section 48, Act June 30, 1864, must at least equal double the amount of duties sought to be evaded, and in no case must it be less than $500.....1253

An action in personam to recover the forfeiture of $500 under Act July 1, 1862, § 54, will lie, although the seizure provided for therein has not taken place..... 50

An indictment under Act 1866, c. 184, § 25, must allege that the still was intended to be used within the United States for distilling spirits, and that defendant failed to give the notice, etc..... 742

An indictment which charges defendant with carrying on the business of a wholesale liquor dealer without the payment of a special tax therefor, at a certain place, continuously between certain dates, is sufficient without stating the means or circumstances by which he became such dealer.. 409

An indictment averring the removal of spirits on which the tax had not been paid to a place other than the distillery warehouse, "and" the concealment thereof, is not bad for duplicity, under Rev. St. § 3296 202

An allegation that the tax on certain spirits "had not been paid" is sufficient without an allegation that it "was still due and owing"..... 202

On an indictment for removing distilled spirits on which the tax has not been paid, the precise quantity alleged, and that the removal took place at the precise time stated, need not be proved..... 197

Under a count for removal and concealment, conviction may be had if removal is proved, though concealment is not shown 197

On an indictment for carrying on the business of a liquor dealer without having paid the tax, evidence is admissible of a sale of liquor on a day subsequent to that named 810

A distiller's bonded warehouse which the law requires him to provide is a part of the distiller's premises, and proof of the unlawful removal of spirits therefrom sustains the averment that the removal was from the distillery.....1144

Where indictments are found under Act June 30, 1864, both for making false returns (section 15) and for perjury (section 42), the prosecution must elect between them 914

—— Evidence.

Where rectified spirits are seized while in process of sale by a rectifier as free of tax, a claimant has the burden to show that the tax has been paid. (Act July 13, 1866, § 45.).....1085

Where defendants have rebutted the presumption of law as to the validity of the assessment, the burden of proof is shifted upon the government to establish its validity 816

On an information to enforce a forfeiture the statute of limitations is available as a defense under a plea of the general issue.1089

Previous fraudulent intent and previous fraudulent acts are admissible to show a fraudulent intent in a subsequent transaction 639, 650

On the trial of an indictment against a manufacturer for making false and fraudulent returns for a given month, evidence of false returns in previous months is admissible to show a fraudulent intent..... 914

On an indictment under Act March 2, 1867, § 30, the government is not bound to strict proof of the ownership of the rectifying distillery to which it is alleged the spirits were unlawfully removed.....1144

On an indictment for a conspiracy under Act March 2, 1867, § 30, there must be satisfactory evidence not only of the conspiracy charged, but of the overt act averred, to carry into effect the object of the conspiracy 1144

Where the evidence on a question is all one way, the court need not submit the question as one of fact to the jury..... 317

To prove a conspiracy to remove whisky without paying the tax, it is only necessary to show that defendants were acting in concert, or with a mutual understanding, to effect the removal without inspection and branding according to law.....1362 —— Verdict: Judgment.

Where an information of forfeiture in different counts avers several frauds under different sections of the statute, a verdict of forfeiture will be sustained if any one count is good 260

Under Act July 13, 1866, § 45, the judgment or decree of forfeiture relates back only to the date of the seizure, and does not affect the title of an innocent purchaser, acquired subsequent to the date of the wrongful act, and before the seizure.....1118

INTERNATIONAL LAW.

A servant selling spirituous liquors for his master, without license, is not liable to the penalty 470, 1072

JUDGMENT.

A judgment rendered by a federal circuit court is a lien upon all lands of defendant within the district, without being recorded in the several counties where such lands lie..... 999

A decree of forfeiture of spirits for alleged frauds on the revenue is not conclusive in a subsequent proceeding for the forfeiture of the distillery and numerous articles contained therein..... 260

A judgment distributing the proceeds in the registry upon an information of forfeiture cannot be modified or altered by the court after the close of the term..... 278

The federal district court, three years after rendering a decree in a confiscation case, cannot reverse the same.....1097

Judgments and decrees are not assignable at law, so as to vest the legal title in the assignee; but the latter takes only an equitable interest, subject to the equities attaching to them in the hands of the assignor 932

JURY.

See, also, "Grand Jury."

The federal courts cannot deprive parties of the right of trial by jury by referring the issues of fact to referees..... 711

The constitutional right to trial by jury may be waived by the party..... 711

In a proceeding in the federal district court against property seized as forfeited under the internal revenue laws, to which a claim is interposed, the claimant has a constitutional right to a trial by a jury 281

In forming a jury the federal court need not adopt the mode required by the state laws, when, in the opinion of the court, it is impracticable to do so..... 620

The provision that jurors shall be drawn from such parts of the district as the court shall direct (Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 29) is not repealed by Act July 20, 1840.....1350

It is discretionary with the court to give, or not to give, any directions as to the place from which jurors shall be summoned; and it is no ground of challenge to the array that the marshal summoned the jurors according to his own will, where there was no application for directions..... 620

A juror who has sat on the trial of a person indicted for the same offense as defendant is not competent.....1246

An objection that one of the jurors had served on the jury of the next preceding term is too late after the jurors are sworn.. 477

Where defendant accepts a juror with knowledge that he has had a conversation with a third person about the case, he cannot afterwards object to a verdict on that account 1175

Under Act March 3, 1868, § 2, there is no right of peremptory challenge except in capital cases 696

Peremptory challenge allowed upon an indictment for stealing a slave in Alexandria, D. C. 1363

The court will at a subsequent term order a fine against an absent juror to be struck out, where the clerk neglected to enter a similar order made at a previous term 1148

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

Foreign and domestic coin and bank bills are "personal goods," within Act 1790, c. 36, § 16, relating to larceny on the high seas 11

Quære: Whether stealing a bank note is larceny, within the act of April 30, 1790, § 16 38

A driver of a coach, who, with knowledge of the ownership of goods left therein by the owner by mistake, takes and converts them with intent to steal them, is guilty of larceny..... 484

A person who procures goods under the false pretense that the owner had sent him for them, and appropriates them for his own use, is not guilty of larceny..... 825

A workman is guilty of larceny where goods delivered to him for a special purpose are taken away by him with intent to steal them 1356

Property abandoned is not within the meaning of Act March 3, 1825, § 9, against

plundering or stealing property from or belonging to a vessel in distress or wrecked, lost or abandoned.....1132
The federal courts have jurisdiction of the offense of plundering property from a stranded vessel or after it has been thrown upon the shore. (Act 1825, c. 65, § 9.).... 540
"Plunder," as used in such section, includes the criminal taking of the goods of another by open force, or by secret fraud, and furtively, from a vessel in distress, etc., and also an embezzlement by the master and others 540
"One silver coin of the value of fifty cents" is a sufficient description of the property stolen 810
An indictment charging the stealing of "notes of some bank established by a charter from the government of the United States, or of some individual state of the United States," in the language of the act, is not sufficient..... 595
The goods of the wife, in her separate shop, where not kept for her separate use, must be averred to be the goods of the husband 36
Goods stolen from a married woman living by herself, her husband not contributing to her support, may be charged as her property 452
An indictment alleging articles stolen to belong to owners unknown is good on its face, and the objection that the owners were in fact known must be taken to the evidence at the trial for a variance, or by special plea 1311
On a trial for larceny, held, that the prisoner was entitled to a peremptory challenge of 20 jurors, under Act Va. Nov. 13, 1792 506
A slave convicted of larceny in Alexandria county, D. C., sentenced to be burnt in the hand and whipped..... 78

MARINE INSURANCE.

Liberty to touch at a place does not justify trading, and trading would be a deviation avoiding the policy..... 467

MARSHAL.

The marshal is bound to obey the writ as he receives it, where the statute is directory to the court or the clerk only, but in demanding bail he acts at his peril.... 23
An indorsement even by the court, will not justify the marshal in requiring bail, where the statute does not require it.... 23
The marshal is entitled to interest on sums due to him and not paid after demand, and must pay interest on sums due from him after demand.....1249
A marshal is not entitled to commissions on money paid to his deputies for taking a census 1249
A marshal who pays over to his deputies or assistants, for taking a census, less funds than he received from the government, is liable to the penalty of $500. (Act March 3, 1839.).....464, 465
A sale of treasury notes by the marshal for currency at 8 per cent. premium, and a payment of his deputy in such currency, is a violation of the law.....464, 465
A marshal who extends an execution on real estate for the government is entitled to his fees from the government, though the land be not yet sold or redeemed or in any way converted into money.....1249
A marshal is not to be allowed for services as keeper or inspector of the state jails, except in a case where especially directed by the court.....1249
A charge by a marshal for distributing venires to town clerks at $2 each is legal, but not for travel as if serving venires himself, when they are in fact served by a constable 1249
Though the certificate of a judge allowing a marshal's account is prima facie evidence of its legality and proper amount, the treasury department may reject it, if believed improper 1249
Rev. St. § 786, limiting the time within which actions must be commenced on marshal's bonds does not apply to actions instituted by the United States..... 695

MINES.

The United States have not conveyed or dedicated the minerals in the public lands to individuals or the public..... 416

MINISTER.

The privileges of a foreign minister are not extended to a person having a commission from a revolutionary government not acknowledged by the United States.....1123

If a foreign minister commits the first assault, he forfeits his immunity so far as to excuse defendant for returning it..... 359

It is no defense to an indictment for an assault on a foreign minister that defendant was ignorant of his public character.. 359

Upon an indictment for an assault committed on a foreign minister, proof that the person assaulted is received and recognized by the executive of the United States, is conclusive as to his public character..... 359

MORTGAGES.

An assignee of a mortgage four years overdue, and wholly unpaid, is chargeable with notice of its true consideration, which inquiry would have revealed.....1358

A judgment creditor may redeem a mortgage upon land upon which his judgment is a lien, even as against an assignee of the mortgage 1358

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

Authority to incur a debt does not carry with it the power to levy a tax to pay the debt, where other provision is expressly made for such payment.....*131

Where a city exhausts its revenues in defraying current expenses, mandamus will lie to compel it to pay matured, outstanding bonds 1308

NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The states composed from the Northwestern Territory cannot obstruct their navigable rivers, they being by the ordinance declared to be forever public highways 91

An individual suffering special damages by an obstruction of a navigable river may have a civil redress by a suit, though the obstruction be authorized by a state, if it be contrary to, or conflict with, an act of congress 91

Where a bridge to be constructed over navigable waters, with the draws as proposed, will not cause any appreciable obstruction to commerce, the federal courts will not act to enjoin the same..... 686

The obstruction of navigable rivers under the laws of the original states is not punishable as a crime, unless contrary to some clause in the federal constitution, or a treaty or an act of congress..... 91

The circuit court has no jurisdiction to punish as a crime the obstruction of navigable tide waters by the erection of a bridge, without an express grant of authority by congress..... 91

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

A federal judge has power, on just grounds of suspicion, to require a bond to observe the neutrality laws..... 680

The presentation of a grand jury, charged with the duty of inquiring into the existence of the organization whose object was the invasion of the territory of a friendly power, that they believed such organization to exist, but could get no evidence, because witnesses refused to testify on the ground that their answers might criminate them, held sufficient ground of suspicion 680

Act June 5, 1794, extends to warlike expeditions from this country, though not intended to aid one belligerent against another, but directed against a friendly power at peace with all the world.....367, 380

To constitute the offense against section 3, the vessel must not only have been fitted out with intent to be employed against a friendly nation, but actually armed for that purpose 1123

An expedition, to be within Act June 5, 1794, § 5, need not to have been consummated without deviation of course. It is sufficient if it was begun and the means prepared to be carried on from the United States, though the vessel, at the identical time of sailing, was not in complete readiness for hostile engagements.....1233

To constitute the offense of beginning, setting on foot, or providing the means for a military expedition against a nation with whom the United States are at peace, under Act April 20, 1818, § 6, there must be a hostile intention connected with the act of beginning or setting on foot the expedition.. 380

When connected with such hostile intent, the crime is completed either by beginning, or setting on foot an expedition, or providing or procuring the means therefor..... 380

To constitute the offense, it is not necessary that the expedition should start for its destination 380

The guilty purpose must be proved, and the guilty acts done, within the judicial district where the indictment is found..... 380

The fact that defendant set on foot a military expedition, in violation of Act June 5, 1794, § 5, with the knowledge and approbation of the president, is no justification, as the president has no authority to set on foot a military expedition against a nation with which the United States are at peace 1192

On a trial on indictment under Act June 5, 1794, § 5, the president's message to congress, and other documents transmitted therewith, are inadmissible to show the existence of a war at the time the acts were charged to have been committed.....1233

Sufficiency of indictment for setting on foot and preparing the means for a military expedition against a foreign country with which the United States were at peace.... 367

A French citizen transiently within the United States cannot be criminally prosecuted for piracies and robberies committed by the captain of a privateer owned by him, upon neutral vessels..... 393

NEW TRIAL.

It is ground of new trial that the court submits as a question of fact to the jury a material fact, where the case was tried upon the assumption that such fact was admitted 1131

Where the government has so conducted the trial that defendant is entitled to take certain facts as admitted, and does not offer evidence thereon, he is entitled to a new trial, where such facts are subsequently left to the jury.....1138

A verdict for defendant in a suit to forfeit goods for violation of the internal revenue laws will not be set aside as against the evidence, though as to a small part of the goods the court entertains no doubt that upon the evidence the verdict is wrong. 277

The newly-discovered evidence must have come to the knowledge of the party since the trial, and must be so material that it would probably produce a different result..1175
Newly-discovered evidence impeaching the credibility of one of the witnesses is no ground for a new trial..... 604
A new trial will not be granted on the ground of surprise unless it appear that such surprise is in no degree attributable to the negligence of the applicant.....1175
A new trial will not be granted for misconduct of a juror in which the applicant participated 927
Grounds stated upon which a court of common law may grant a new trial..... 340
A motion for a new trial is too late after the case has gone to the supreme court on a certificate of a division of opinion on a motion in arrest of judgment.....1080

OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE.

A warrant of distress is not a legal process, within Act 1790, § 22, in relation to resisting officers 47
It is an indictable offense to combine to oppose the execution of a justice's warrant, without knowing its nature, and assaulting one of the parties attempting to execute it 237
It is not necessary that a constable should have a warrant to suppress an affray, in order to make opposition to him unlawful 538
An attorney and client conspiring to resist an officer are equally guilty.....1161
An indictment under Act April 30, 1790, § 22, must show by proper averments that the process was legal.....1350
A commissioner empowered to issue a warrant under Act Sept. 18, 1850, must be such a commissioner as is particularly described in that act.....1350
An averment in an indictment for resisting such a warrant that it was issued by a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States is not sufficient.....1350
The want of an averment of the facts showing that the commissioner was authorized to issue the warrant cannot be aided by referring to the records of the court....1350
An averment that a warrant was duly issued is insufficient. The facts constituting the due issue must be set forth.....1350
On an indictment for conspiring to resist an officer, actual violence need not be shown, but threats, and acts intended to terrify, or of a character to terrify, a prudent officer, are sufficient, even though he be not prevented thereby from executing his process 1161
The taking away of a vessel by her owner after she has been attached by a marshal, but while not in his actual custody, or that of a keeper, is not an offense under Act March 2, 1831, § 2.....1010

The bankrupt's intentional omission to state a part of his property in his sworn schedule is perjury under the act of 1825.. 151

To constitute the offense of false swearing under the fisheries bounty act of 1813, there must be a willful and corrupt intent to swear falsely.....1165

The secretary of war may prescribe the contents of affidavits by drafted soldiers claiming exemption from military service, and false swearing as to such facts is perjury. (Act March 3, 1863.).....1259

A notary public is an officer authorized to administer oaths in such cases.....1259

Whether a false oath was taken under mistake as to the law or fact involved therein is a question of fact for the jury..1175

Upon a conviction of perjury the court may inflict the punishment of fine, imprisonment, and the pillory.....1255

PIRACY.

A commanding officer making seizures of vessels carrying contraband of war to the enemy acting in good faith under a forged commission, is not guilty of piracy.....1172

The United States court will treat as pirates all persons engaged in plundering vessels of United States citizens under authority of a government set up by insurgents against whom a civil war is being waged 1134

A subordinate officer, who in good faith enters a formal protest against a seizure by his vessel, is not guilty, with the others, of an act of piracy.....1172

The seizure of a vessel carrying arms and munitions of war to a port of the enemy by an armed ship, whose officers held commissions from the hostile country, is not piracy 1172

The federal circuit court has jurisdiction of piracy on board of an American ship, committed in an open roadstead adjacent to a foreign territory, and within half a mile of the shore. (Act April 30, 1790, c. 9, § 8.)..... 899

PLEADING AT LAW.

A demurrer goes to the first defect in pleading 1281

The amendment of a libel in the district court will not be allowed where the same introduces a new, substantive cause of action, and a new charge against defendant. Otherwise where the new cause of action corresponds in character, and is kindred in nature, to that presented in the original libel 291

The variance is fatal where the paymaster general of state militia is described in a suit on his bond as "principal paymaster" of the state militia.....1284

POST OFFICE.

Post routes and roads, and private letter carrying.

A person who sends a packet of letters by a passenger over a post road, without the knowledge of the proprietors or their agents, is not subject to the penalty provided by Act March 3, 1825, § 19..... 588

Officers.

A postmaster, until the action of the postmaster general, does not vacate his office by remaining out of the neighborhood.. 480

An action on a bond of a postmaster is barred after two years after the date of the last item charged against him. (Act 1825, § 3.).....1006

Offenses—Unmailable matter.

The mailing of a postal card containing words imputing illicit intercourse to third persons, but no epithet in the form of a substantive or adjective, is an offense under Rev. St. § 3893, punishing the mailing of postal cards containing "indecent or scurrilous epithets." 611 —— Robbery: Theft: Embezzlement.

Rev. St. § 5467, is not confined to the offense of stealing or taking things out of a letter packet or bag, but includes the taking of the letter itself..... 485

An employé in a post office, who steals gold dust from a letter in the mail, is liable to indictment, whether the same be mailable or not, under Act July 1, 1864, § 12.. 696

No one can be convicted under Act 1825, § 21, who is not employed in the post-office department 189

To convict a person of stealing a letter, etc., who is employed in the department, such employment must be distinctly alleged and proved 189

To constitute the offense, it is not necessary that the letters stolen should have been taken out of the post-office building..... 189

Some evidence is necessary of the genuineness and value of banknotes charged to have been stolen out of a letter..... 189

A letter dropped in a post office, intended for a person at such place, is not a letter intended to be "conveyed" by post. (Act 1825, c. 275, § 21.) 232

Page

The stealing or taking a letter, etc., under section 22, means a taking with a criminal intent, and not a taking through mistake, or with an innocent intent..... 480
A letter delivered to an authorized agent cannot be charged to have been embezzled 949
A person who receives a letter from a letter carrier, addressed to another, without fraud or artifice, is not liable to indictment under Act March 3, 1825, § 22, where he opens the same and embezzles money therefrom 451
In an indictment for embezzling a letter containing money (Act July 1, 1864, § 12), it is not necessary to aver that the letter embezzled was intended to be conveyed to any particular place, but only that it was intended to be conveyed by post..... 231
An averment that a letter deposited in the post office at New York was addressed and directed to a person named at Philadelphia, and was intended to be conveyed by post, is not an averment that the letter was intended to be conveyed by post from New York to Philadelphia..... 231
An averment as to the ownership of the money is not necessary..... 231
An indictment under Act March 3, 1825, § 22, which alleges that defendant did secrete "and" embezzle a certain letter, is not defective 949
In an indictment for embezzlement, it is sufficiently certain to charge that defendant was "a person employed in one of the departments of the post-office establishment of the United States."..... 466
When the embezzlement is of a letter containing a banknote, it is not necessary to describe the note..... 466
The presumption of theft arising from the disappearance of mail matter may be repelled by evidence of the miscarrying of mails sent through the same office after defendant's removal 1307

— Obstructing correspondence.

It is an offense to open a letter, which has been in the post office, before delivery to the addressee, with intent to obstruct his correspondence, or pry into his business or secrets, though the letter was not sealed, and was written by defendant himself, and the addressee's name was not correctly given. (Act March 3, 1825, § 22.).... 590
The indictment need not allege any venue of the lawful intent, nor that the opening was unlawful, nor that the addressee was a real person 590
Section 21, which prescribes a punishment for the detention of a letter or packet, refers to a letter or packet detained before it reaches the place of destination..... 480
An intention to obstruct the mail flows from an unlawful act that so operates, although its primary object was to accomplish another purpose..... 1312
Act March 3, 1825, § 22, in relation to opening letters to obstruct correspondence, etc., applies only where the possession of letters was obtained wrongfully from the post office, or from a mail carrier..... 451
A person who, without artifice, receives a letter for another, addressed in his care, and opens and destroys the same, cannot be convicted of opening the same with the design to obstruct the correspondence, etc., of another 22
A letter carrier who delivers letters from house to house is a mail carrier, within Act March 3, 1825, § 22..... 451
The writer of a letter which has passed from the office where mailed has no right to intercept it, or authorize its delivery to a person other than the one to whom it is directed 206

Page

On an indictment for taking a letter from the post office with intent to obstruct correspondence (Rev. St. § 3892) defendant may be convicted without evidence of an unlawful, clandestine, or fraudulent taking 206
Proof of an intentional nondelivery of a letter so taken from a post office may be sufficient 206
A person indicted for such taking of a letter with intent to pry into the business or secrets of another cannot be convicted if he knew the contents of the letter before he received it 206
It is no defense that the letter related in part to defendant's business, or that in good faith he believed that the letter was of no value to the person to whom it was addressed, even if such be the fact, or that the letter was voluntarily delivered to defendant by the postman..... 206

PRACTICE AT LAW.

A stipulation induced by misrepresentations is not binding on the court..... 502

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY.

The practice of the federal courts in admiralty is governed by the rules of admiralty law found in the English Reports...1027

PRESIDENT.

The president has power to call out the military in aid of the civil authorities of the District of Columbia. (Const. art. 2, § 2.)..1339

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

No action will lie in the name of a principal on a written contract made by his agent in his own name, although defendant knew the agent's character..... 415

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

See, also, "Bonds"; "Office and Officer."

The sureties on the bond of a receiver of public moneys are not liable for moneys received before the date of the bond, but during his term of office.....1281
The sureties on the bond of a receiver of public moneys are not liable for money which came into his hands the day after the expiration of his term of office.....1281
A discharge from imprisonment by the secretary of the treasury of a debtor to the United States, under the act of 1798, does not discharge his co-obligors and sureties in the bond from their liability.....1358

PRIZE.

A capture by naval forces of property stored in a warehouse near the shore of a harbor is a subject of prize jurisdiction...1027
Where no prevarication or other improper conduct on the part of the captured vessel is shown, the question of condemnation of the vessel is to be determined from the papers found on board.....1273
A captured vessel is subject to trial and condemnation for violating the law, whether the persons or means employed in making the seizure were authorized or not.... 236
The destination of arms and munitions of war, and the use intended to be made thereof at the time of seizure, furnishes a test of their status as contraband or otherwise 1087

Page

A United States vessel is not subject to condemnation because it carries a special pass or license from the enemy, or the enemy's agent 1273
Seamen on board a prize captured and condemned as enemy property have no lien for wages, as against the title of the United States and the rights of the captors.... 932
The absence of all papers, where the vessel was captured off a blockaded coast, far out of the route of her ostensible voyage, after a long chase, held a strong presumption of intentional destruction..... 236

PUBLIC LANDS.

See, also, "Grant."

The state, under its power of eminent domain, may make public roads through the lands of the United States, unrestricted by the proprietary right of the latter.. 686
The person commencing an improvement has a right to continue, and any one that intervenes may be considered a trespasser..1292
On the abandonment of a military reserve by giving notice to the secretary of the interior, the same may be considered as a part of the public lands open to entry and sale as other lands..... 686
An indictment will lie for cutting or removing timber from any of the public lands, though the same are not reserved for naval purposes.....726, 978
Persons occupying under the pre-emption, homestead, and mining acts, before becoming the owners of the land, may cut and use the timber thereon, so far as the same may be necessary to accomplish the purpose for which the land is occupied, but no further 86
The cutting and sale of timber from four acres in advance of the mining operation, where the only reason assigned is that the stumps may rot and be more easily removed, held unnecessary, and therefore unlawful 86
A nominal fine, only, imposed for cutting timber, where defendant had made full reparation, and there was no intention to defraud the public 38
The term "timber" signifies the standing trees and the felled trees prepared for transportation to a vessel or sawmill, such as sawlogs or lumber in bulk, but does not embrace any article manufactured from the tree, such as shingles or boards..... 978
An indictment for removing timber from public lands must state the particular section or quarter section from which the timber was taken, as a part of the description of the offense..... 978
An indictment which describes the land, in general language, as "lands of the United States," is not sufficient..... 978
An indictment for removal need not allege that the timber was removed from the land on which it was grown, or from which it was cut..... 978
In an indictment for trespass in cutting timber, it is not necessary to describe every kind of timber cut..... 726
The grant of lands under water to adjacent proprietors, under Act N. Y. April 10, 1850, c. 283, must be confined to a line starting at the intersection with the shore, and extending at a right angle with the thread of the stream, or at a right angle into the lake, without any regard to the course or direction of the line upon the land 911
A person obtaining a grant in violation of the statute will be restrained, at the suit of a proprietor of adjacent lands entitled to the grant, from making erections upon the lands..... 911

RAPE.

Page

An attempt by a slave to ravish a white woman is punishable by death..... 460

RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS.

The receiving of stolen goods in one jurisdiction with knowledge that they were stolen in another is an offense in the former jurisdiction 3

RELEASE AND DISCHARGE.

While a defendant is charged in execution, the debt is considered as satisfied, and a discharge of one co-debtor is a discharge of all 411

RIOT.

To constitute a riot, three or more persons must assemble with intent by force and violence to do some unlawful act, and mutually to assist each other against any one who should oppose them in doing such act; and the act must be done in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people 477
Premeditation and conspiracy, or promises of mutual assistance, are not necessary to constitute a riot..... 477
A man may be convicted of a riot, who was not actively engaged therein, if he was present and ready to give support if necessary 477
Three or more persons who act in concert, by prior arrangement, in a violent and turbulent manner, in opposing a public officer in the performance of his duty, held guilty of riot.....1339
The previous intent and agreement to do the unlawful act may be inferred from the doing of the act accompanied by the declaration of an intent to do it.....1347
A person convicted of assault and battery committed in a riot may still be tried and convicted of the riot..... 477

ROBBERY.

To constitute robbery, there must be fear or force 1080

SALE.

A usage in the grain trade in a certain locality to deliver barley in sacks may be shown, when nothing is said in the contract as to the mode of delivery..... 871
Where the seller notifies the buyer that he regards the contract as rescinded, and will make no more deliveries under it, the purchaser may treat the contract as wholly broken, and at once recover damages upon the entire contract, without demand.. 871

SEAL.

The common-law rule that a seal must consist of wax, or some tenacious substance, does not apply to a bond taken under an act of congress; and, under the general usage, a scroll is sufficient to make the instrument a sealed instrument.....1305

SEAMEN.

Shipping articles to a certain port and a market are sufficiently definite.....1290
The statutes requiring bond for the return of all the crew do not apply to foreign seamen shipped at their own home for a particular cruise, ending where it began, and discharged there according to the terms of their contract..... 452

Under the statutory bond to exhibit the crew list and produce the persons named therein, the master is bound to exercise all his lawful authority for the purpose of bringing back the persons named therein.. 406
It is the duty of the master to find and apprehend all deserters or seamen leaving the ship openly..... 406
The master is not exonerated from his covenant by merely showing physical inability subsequently accruing on his part to perform it, or that others, whose consent and concurrence were necessary, would not permit its performance..... 406
The master should be considered as relieved from the performance of the condition of the bond when, by reason of sickness, or by being superseded in a foreign port, he becomes unable to perform the conditions 406
In an action on a bond for the safe return of the crew, parol evidence is admissible of the contents of a consul's certificate authorizing the discharge of one of the men, on proof that such paper has been lost 452
A voyage from A. to B., or some other port, and return to the United States, is not ended on arrival at the first port of the United States, unless it be the port of discharge 1166
The master has authority to confine his seamen in a common jail in a foreign port for offenses and misconduct, in extreme cases, where the proper correction or punishment cannot be effectual on shipboard.. 912
To complete the offense of maliciously and without justifiable cause forcing an officer or mariner on shore, or leaving him behind in a foreign port (Act 1825, c. 276, § 10), it is not necessary that he should be in a condition to return, and willing to return 89
It is an offense, under such act, to leave behind a seaman imprisoned by the master for using abusive language on the refusal of his application for a discharge... 89
The offense of maliciously forcing a mate on shore at a foreign port, and leaving him there, may be committed, although no physical force was used, as in the case where the mate left the ship under a well-grounded fear of his life had he remained on board 809
The forcing a mariner on shore must be done both without justifiable cause, and maliciously, to justify a conviction under Act 1825, c. 65, § 10..... 912
"Maliciously," in such statute, means, with a willful disregard of right and duty, or doing the act against a man's own conviction of duty..... 912
A mere intention to give pain, or to torture the person assaulted, will not support an indictment against the master for an assault on the mate with intent to kill..... 809
The owners may change the master after the seamen have shipped..... 210
The master has authority to displace the mate and all other subordinate officers during the voyage..... 966
The mate is a seaman, within the act of 1790, c. 36, § 12..... 966
One who secretes himself on board before sailing, and discovers himself after the vessel is at sea, is not one of the crew, though the master requires him to work, as a condition of his having food, and he does work 1128
Seamen of the United States, put on board a vessel of the United States by a consul, are bound to the same obligations, which exist in cases of articled seamen....1041

Page

A distressed American seaman, sent home on board an American vessel, his fare being paid by the American consul, is bound to do duty as a seaman when called upon by the mate of the vessel..... 930
Foreign seamen on board American vessels are as much subject to punishment for acts of revolt, or attempts to commit revolts, as Americans..... 515
Where a registered vessel has entered on a whaling voyage without surrender of her register, she is not an American ship, within Act 1835, c. 40, and an indictment will not lie against her crew for an endeavor to make a revolt..... 890
A revolt, under Act March 3, 1835, c. 40, consists, not only in an attempt to usurp the command from the master, or to transfer it to another, or to deprive him of it, for any purpose, by violence, but in resisting him in the free and lawful exercise of his authority 515
The crew have no right to disarm the master, though using a deadly weapon, if they are in a mutinous state, and exercising personal violence to resist his lawful command 515
Seamen who, with good reason, believe a vessel to be unseaworthy before the voyage is begun, may lawfully refuse to go to sea in her 210
An endeavor to make a revolt, within Act April 30, 1790, c. 9, § 12, is an endeavor to excite the crew to overthrow the lawful authority and command of the master and officers of the ship.....1166
A combination by the crew to prevent the vessel from going to sea pursuant to the order of the master is an attempt to commit a revolt 210
To constitute an endeavor to commit a revolt (Act 1790, c. 36), there must be some effort or act to stir up others of the crew to disobedience of the master..... 966
A seaman who comes on deck to ascertain the cause of a disturbance, and refuses to go below when ordered by the master, may be punished for an endeavor to make a revolt..... 822
Any confinement of the master, whether by depriving him of the use of his limbs, or by shutting him up in the cabin, or by intimidation, preventing him from the free use of every part of the vessel, amounts to a confinement, under Act April 30, 1790, § 12 1246
To constitute a confinement of the master (Act 1790, c. 36), it is sufficient that there is a personal seizure or restraint, although it may be for the purpose of inflicting personal chastisement..... 966
Any confining of the master, whether by force or intimidation, is a confinement, within 1 Stat. 112.....1041
The master cannot be confined by the officers and crew, except in a clear case, to prevent his committing acts which might endanger the lives of all on board.....1041
A seaman may endeavor to escape the infliction of personal chastisement for offensive language used, and may resist for the mere purpose of protecting himself from injury 1247
Where the master uses an unlawful weapon, or the seaman is exposed to danger of his life or limbs, he may resort to any necessary species of defense to avoid the danger 1247
Where the master strikes a seaman, and is seized and so firmly held by him that he cannot extricate himself, the seaman is guilty of confining the master.....1247
One who joins in the general conspiracy, and by his presence countenances acts of violence, but who does not individually use force or threats to compel the master

to resign the command, is guilty of the offense of confining the master.....1041
Where seamen who request a survey, when in port or within sight of land, are treated with unnecessary severity, their remedy is at law after their return, and not a resort to violence, unless in danger of the actual loss of life, and then at their peril, as the result may turn out.....1290
A vessel lying on the sea outside of the bar of a harbor of the United States, within three miles of the shore, is on the high seas 1166
A vessel lying in the mouth of a river a mile and a half wide is on the high seas, within Act April 30, 1790.....1246
A vessel lying in a harbor, fastened to the shore by cables, and communicating with the land by her boats, and not within any inclosed dock, or at any pier or wharf, is on the "high seas," outside of low-water mark on the coast.....1002
The federal circuit court has jurisdiction of the offense of endeavoring to make a revolt on board of an American ship in an inclosed dock into which ships are floated on high tide, in the port of Havre..... 822
An indictment for confining the captain, for an assault in a foreign port on a vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, need not negative the fact that defendant was tried and convicted or acquitted by the foreign tribunal 1325
Seamen are not liable criminally, where, on going on board, and after examining the vessel, they refuse to serve on the ground that she is unseaworthy, though she was not in fact unseaworthy; otherwise where they refuse to continue after commencement of service 1290
The crime of endeavoring to make a revolt is one against the master, and it is sufficient to charge it in the words of the act of 1835 to give the court cognizance of it, even within the requirements of Act March 3, 1825.....1002
On an indictment for an endeavor to make a revolt (Act March 3, 1835, § 2), it is not necessary to give documentary proof of the national character of the vessel..1002
To render a vessel American, so as to punish offenses on board of her, it is enough to show that she sailed from and to an American port, and was apparently owned and controlled by citizens of the United States..... 515
The log book kept by the master is not evidence in an indictment for a revolt and confining the master 1041
Where there is a verdict of guilty on two counts,—one for a revolt, and another for an attempt to excite it,—the judgment will not be arrested..... 515

SEIZURE.

See, also, "Customs Duties"; "Internal Revenue."

The provisions of Act May 8, 1792, § 4, requiring the marshal to take custody of all goods seized by revenue officers, were abrogated by Act July 18, 1866, § 31.... 248
Reasonable cause sufficient to justify seizure means probable cause, and imports a seizure under circumstances which warrant suspicion 315
Where probable cause of seizure is shown, claimants have the burden of showing by a fair preponderance of evidence that the illegal acts charged were not committed 1092
The seizure of a vessel which, under a codfishing license, has incidentally caught mackerel, is a municipal seizure, expressly provided for by acts of congress as justifiable if a certificate of probable cause is given 758
A certificate of probable cause will be given if the officer making the seizure acts in good faith, and has reasonable grounds to suppose that the law has been violated. 758
A certificate of reasonable cause for seizure will be granted where it appeared that the collector acted under the instruction of the former officer in making the seizure, upon a construction of the statute adopted by the secretary of the treasury in conformity with an opinion of the attorney general 723
It makes no difference whether the collector acted under a mistake of facts or of the law 723
A reasonable ground of suspicion is reasonable cause for a seizure..... 723
A lapse of two years held no bar to the application, but the laches were sufficient to cast the costs of the action against the collector upon him 723

SET-OFF AND COUNTER-CLAIM.

Claims against the government are not admissible as a set-off which have not previously been presented to and disallowed by the proper accounting officer, except in the case of absence from the United States, or unavoidable accident preventing such presentation 1139
The rejection of a claim by an officer authorized by special act to settle the same on equitable principles does not preclude its being set up as a set-off.....1139
In a suit by the government on a marshal's bond to recover moneys collected on execution, defendant cannot set off accounts which had been presented as a charge against the government in another claim to which they have a good defense under the statute of limitations..... 613

SHIPPING.

See, also, "Fisheries."

An enrollment and license duly executed does not require delivery to give it validity. 544
The vessels included within Act 1831, § 3, are not subject to forfeiture under Act 1792, § 16, relating to sales to foreigners without delivering up the certificate of registry 987
A vessel which has been enrolled and licensed under the act of 1831, but whose license has become void by a subsequent sale, is no longer a licensed and enrolled vessel, so as to be subject to forfeiture by her sale in whole or in part to a foreigner in violation of section 32..... 987
A vessel enrolled and licensed under the act of 1793 for the coasting trade and fisheries is not subject to forfeiture under the act of 1792, § 16, for false swearing on application for registration..... 987
The master is not liable for the penalty for the nondelivery of the temporary register (Act 1793, c. 52, § 3) unless there be an arrival at the port to which the vessel belonged, not by accident or from necessity, but intentionally, as one of the termini of the voyage 1038
The mere touching at a port to land passengers when on the way to another port will not make a case within the act.....1040
To work a forfeiture of a vessel for having been engaged in a trade other than that for which she is licensed, the old employment must have been abandoned, and a new trade must be permanently and exclusively pursued 758

Page

A libel under Act Feb. 28, 1793, § 32, need not specify the particular trade in which the vessel was engaged at the time of the seizure..... 454

A canal boat without motive power of its own, towed through a canal by horses, and on navigable waters by a steamer, does not come within Act Feb. 18, 1793, in relation to vessels employed in the coasting trade.. 219, 494

The exception in section 42, Act Aug. 30, 1852, applies to a vessel built and used as a ferryboat, and employed one day only in carrying passengers three miles distance to a state fair 386

A steamboat employed in transporting passengers between ports in the same state is not within the inspection law of August 30, 1852 1021

A passenger steamer navigating the Ohio river between Pittsburg and Gallipolis, having but one licensed pilot on board, the captain acting also as pilot, has not the number of pilots required by law..... 986

The captain may temporarily supply a deficiency in the complement of pilots which arises during a voyage without his consent, fault, or collusion, but he cannot begin a new voyage with a deficiency..... 986

A master who, without being licensed, performs the duty of pilot to make up the required number, is liable to a penalty of $100 (Act Aug. 30, 1852), besides subjecting the boat and its owners to a penalty of $500. (Act July 7, 1838, § 1.)..... 986

Where a mate appointed master in a foreign port knowingly sails with a larger number of passengers than that allowed by law, he is liable for the fine of taking an excessive number of passengers on board, though the agreement of shipment was made by the former master..... 4

The penalties provided for by the passenger act of 1848 can only be recovered by an action of debt on the common-law side of the court..... 89

Sufficiency of indictment under Act Md. 1796, c. 67, § 19, for giving a pass to a slave 625

Congress has power to pass the acts of 1793 and 1850, providing for the rendition of fugitive slaves..... 990

A member of a vigilance committee formed to prevent the arrest of a fugitive slave is liable for aiding, assisting, and abetting in his escape..... 918

On a prosecution for aiding in the escape of one arrested under lawful process as a fugitive slave, it is not necessary to show that he actually was the slave of the person at whose instance the process was issued 918

Page

The rendition of fugitive slaves under the acts of 1793 and 1850 is an executive, and not a judicial, proceeding, and trial by jury is not necessary therein..... 990

STATES.

On the admission of a state into the Union, the United States parts with jurisdiction over land owned by them therein, so far as the general purposes of government are concerned, except as to such jurisdiction as is expressly reserved and accepted.....1288

Jurisdiction which a state has once exercised cannot be withdrawn from it, and conferred on the general government, without the consent of the state.....1288

STATUTES.

Where a statute of the United States makes any provision upon a subject within the scope of the powers of the general government, the state laws upon the same subject cease to operate..... 23

Where any part of a state law is not applicable to the case at the time of the enactment of an act of congress referring to the laws of the states as rules of decision, the whole statute is inapplicable..... 23

The title of an act of congress, when at variance with its provisions, will not be considered, except to explain doubtful meanings 709

A penal statute will not be given a retroactive effect unless the intention is clearly expressed 1296

In the construction of a penal statute an offender who is protected by its letter cannot be deprived of its benefit on the ground that his case is not within the spirit and intention of the law..... 684

Repeals by implication are not favored, particularly in revenue laws, and will be only held to exist when the repugnance is positive, and then only to the extent of such repugnance 303

The provision in a subsequent act providing a limitation for a prosecution, "any law or provision to the contrary notwithstanding," repeals prior provisions on the same subject 546

Where a subsequent statute expressly substitutes a different tribunal to determine a question, it impliedly repeals the former statute 244

The repeal of a statute pending proceedings to enforce a penalty or forfeiture under it will bar further proceedings, where there is no saving clause.....1089

Where a statute makes it a felony to steal the notes of any particular incorporated bank, the act of incorporation becomes a public statute, and may be proved by the statute book..... 595

The unwritten law of a foreign government may be proved by parol evidence, but the written law can only be proved by itself 359

The statutes of England may be proven by the printed publications thereof obtained from the queen's printer..... 276

The construction of a foreign statute by those whose duty it is to apply and administer it will be followed, unless it appear clearly that it has been misinterpreted...1062

SUBROGATION.

Where a debtor gives his co-debtor a mortgage to secure the latter against the debt of their creditor, the mortgagee will be considered in equity a trustee for the creditor....1358

TERRITORIES.

Act July 20, 1868, imposing a tax on distilled spirits, being a general act, and passed since the acquisition of Alaska, is in force there 1021

TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES.

The fact that the eagle is the national emblem of the United States does not prevent its appropriation by private parties for use as a trade-mark, especially when there is but slight resemblance in the figure of the eagle so used to that of the national emblem 1303

The right of the proprietor of a trade-mark to its exclusive use, and to protect and enforce such right by proceedings in chancery, exists by virtue of the common law, and independently of the trade-mark acts 875

A person cannot imitate the trade-mark of another by using any of its prominent and distinguishing words, where calculated to deceive the cautious and careful purchaser 875

The certificate of the commissioner of patents as to the registration of a trade-mark held admissible in evidence under Rev. St. § 4940, and prima facie evidence of proper registration 1303

TREASON.

The going from the enemy's squadron to the shore for the purpose of peaceably procuring provisions for the enemy is not an act of treason; otherwise where provisions are carried towards the enemy with intent to supply them, though such intention is defeated 628

TRIAL.

See, also, "Continuance"; "Criminal Law."

The construction of the federal constitution by the supreme court is binding on the jury as well as the court.....1065

The constitutionality of an act of congress is not a proper subject for the consideration of a jury 1065

If a contract is to be made out through a correspondence, the question of its construction is one for the court, regardless of its extent 1046

Where, after a jury is sworn, it appears necessary to examine and determine accounts between the parties, the jury will be discharged, and the case sent to an auditor 895

The court has no right to give the jury any direction upon questions of fact, but should call their attention to particular points, and observe upon the tendency, force, and comparative weight of conflicting testimony 958

A verdict is nugatory in so far as it finds facts not put in issue by the pleadings.... 255

Under Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 32, the court may give judgment as the right appears, without regarding any imperfection or want of form in the verdict..... 665

Where a cause of action against three is joint and several, and two join in their plea, and the other pleads severally, but no finding is made as to one of those pleading jointly, it is no ground of arrest of judgment against the other..... 217

TRUSTS.

A broker for an army paymaster, who accepts his official checks in payment for stock transactions, is charged with notice of the trust which a suitable inquiry would have revealed, and is liable to the government for property thus embezzled..... 585

UNITED STATES.

On the admission of Kansas into the Union, jurisdiction within forts of the United States within the state was not excepted, and the consent of the state is necessary to the exercise of federal jurisdiction therein..1288

A suit prosecuted in the name and for the benefit of the United States will not be recognized in the federal courts unless they are represented by the district attorney, or some one designated by him.....1350

No property belonging to the United States can be disposed of except by authority of an act of congress. (Const. art. 4, § 3.)..... 149

A contract made with the secretary of the navy cannot be rescinded by the chief of the bureau having charge of such contracts 1046

The acts giving the United States preference in cases of insolvency will not be so construed as to destroy prior legal liens....1065

An assignment, to entitle the United States to their priority (Act March 3, 1797, § 5), must be an assignment of all the debtor's property, but it need not be for the benefit of all his creditors..... 6

The United States is not entitled to a priority, under Act 1799, c. 128, § 65, out of funds in the hands of assignees, unless there be a general assignment by the debtor of all his property..... 32

An assignment by partners of all their effects for the payment of their debts, for which the partnership estate is inadequate, is an act of insolvency which will give the United States preference in the payment of their debts against the firm or its members 1056

The fact that a creditor gave up his intention of levying in consideration of a general assignment in trust, first to pay his claim, and then the debt of the United States, will not prevent the assignment being fraudulent and void as against the United States 6

WAR.

See, also, "Limitation of Actions"; "International Law"; "Neutrality Laws"; "Prize."

The power of making war is exclusively vested in congress, but the president has power to repel invasions by hostile forces, even when congress has not declared war..1192

The condition of peace or war, in a legal sense, must be determined by the political department of the government, and the courts are bound by that decision.... 284

The conditions of war and peace are purely for political determination, and courts will not take judicial notice that hostilities of the late Civil War ceased, and peace was restored, by the surrender of any particular army. (Reversing 324.)..... 325

The prescriptions of the federal government impose no legal or moral obligation, and obedience is justified only on the ground of deadly coercion by violence or threats 325

The principle of the law of nations, that where a war exists between two distinct and independent powers there must be a suspension of all commercial intercourse between their citizens, is not applicable to the war of the Rebellion.....1087

Assumpsit will lie by the United States, after the return of peace, to recover against a person indebted for money had and received to one of the insurgent state governments, as on a common-law obligation..1163

Under Act July 13, 1861, and the president's proclamation in pursuance thereof, citizens of the rebellious states prima facie become, for purposes of commerce, quasi enemies, and cannot sue in the federal courts 292

A granting of a license to trade by the secretary of the treasury restores the standing of the grantee, so as to enable him to be heard in the federal courts..... 292

Every inhabitant of a state in rebellion during the Rebellion is considered as an alien enemy, and incapable of appearing in a federal court as a claimant of property libeled therein 334, 335

In determining the status of rebel persons and property, the federal courts are guided by municipal, and not by international, law 292

The concession of belligerent rights by the government of the United States to the Confederate States did not operate to suspend the revenue laws, so as to relieve goods imported in a port under control of the insurgents from the payment of duties to the United States 1293

Nor was such effect produced by the proclamation of April 19, 1861, declaring a blockade of certain ports.....1293

Upon a libel of information to condemn certain railway shares of an alien enemy, the railway company cannot become a party without showing that it is the true and bona fide owner, and that no other person is the owner of the property in dispute. (Admiralty rule 12.)..... 335

The confiscation act (Aug. 6, 1861) is constitutional, and applies to real estate... 781

A forfeiture of property is imposed by Act Aug. 6, 1861, only where it is employed, with the knowledge or consent of its owner, in aid of insurrection..... 337

A federal district court in New York cannot acquire jurisdiction in rem to declare a forfeiture under the confiscation acts of August 6, 1861, and July 17, 1862, of shares in the capital stock of an Illinois corporation 337

Under such acts the proceedings to condemn enemy property when seized must conform to the proceedings in admiralty and revenue cases..... 337

An alien enemy has a right to appear as claimant, and to answer and defend the suit under such acts..... 337

Act July 13, 1861, is not a penal, but a revenue, statute, and is to be construed liberally, so as to accomplish its proposed object 284

Goods are "proceeding to" the interdicted port (Act July 13, 1861), and the shipper is guilty of an "attempt" to transport them in violation of law (Act May 20, 1862), when he procures a permit by the use of fraudulent invoices 284

A license to trade in the rebellious states, obtained through error, mistake, or fraud, will not prevent the forfeiture under Acts July 13, 1861, and May 20, 1862, the same being prohibitory acts..... 292

Merchandise at sea, consigned to merchants in an insurrectionary state, but assigned to creditors in New York, to cover previous advances, three days before the proclamation of August 16, 1861, and passing into the custody of the assignees on its arrival, held not subject to confiscation.... 271

A sale of contraband property by a citizen of one belligerent country to a citizen in the other belligerent country is a breach of allegiance 284

The mere existence of a law prescribed by an insurrectionary government in itself is not sufficient to justify a sale to it, and prevent a forfeiture of the property sold, under Act Aug. 6, 1861. (Reversing 324.). 325

In a proceeding under Act Aug. 6, 1861, to forfeit an interest in a vessel, the pleadings and proceedings are subject to like rules as in ordinary cases of prize of war; and the mere charge of the offense is all the specification that need be made in a libel alleging that the property was seized as prize 527

A pardon and amnesty do not annul past transactions, so far as to invalidate a previous judicial confiscation and sale of a claimant's property 1097

Forfeitures incurred under Act July 13, 1861, during the continuance of hostilities, might be enforced afterwards.....1329

Forfeitures declared under Acts July 13, 1861, § 5, Aug. 6, 1861, May 20, 1862, July 17, 1862, can only be enforced by seizure of the property 1329

The establishment of the provisional court for Louisiana by the president, as commander in chief of the forces of the United States, while they held the territory in which it was to exercise its functions, was an act warranted by the law of nations 768

Such court continued rightfully to exercise its functions so long as its commission remained unrevoked, and the power of the United States continued to support it in the exercise of them..... 768

The agreement of capitulation between Generals Sherman and Johnston was a mere military parol, terminating with the war, and the persons included were liable to arrest for treason after the war..... 911

The seizure of enemy property by the United States as prize of war on land, jure belli, is not authorized by the law of nations, and can be upheld only by an act of congress 337, 1329

WASTE.

The working of a gold mine is the taking away the substance of the estate..... 416

A court of equity will, in some cases, enjoin the removal of the fruits of past waste 416

On a motion for injunction to enjoin waste, complainant, on bill and answer, cannot read affidavits in support of his title 416
