(6) This is an action for false imprisonment. The imprisonment complained of upon the plaintiff is in no way affected by the time of rendition. Being pronounced at the same time, they are in law pronounced upon the same day. No statute of the United States fixes the time within which sentence is to be pronounced. Unquestionably, it would have been lawful to have pronounced the defendant free of all but to have pronounced the plaintiff upon habeas corpus. But good law is always decorous. This defendant is not bound by a judgment to which he was not a party; nor can he be adjudged liable in this action upon ideas of decorum. Respectful consideration will, of course, be given to the opinion delivered by the supreme court of the United States, and the instruction given the jury on discharging the plaintiff from imprisonment, but it does not conclude this court, nor prevent due effect being given here to the point now made. Certainly, no breach of decorum can be charged to the plaintiff, and with this in mind, the opinion of the supreme court in Ex parte Lange, the language by that court in regard to a similar case, is a pre-determined conclusion. Opinion of Clifford, J. It is wholly immaterial what part is to be deemed applicable to each count. But, the statement in respect to value comes no part of the verdict. The statute under which the plaintiff was indicted does not make the nature of the offense depend on the value of the property taken. In a prosecution under the statute, value becomes important only when necessary to justify an imprisonment exceeding one year. Imprisonment for finer than that was not signed in the act to the value of the property. In criminal cases, as distinguished from civil cases, the court, and not the jury, determines the character of the punishment to be imposed.

vacated or modified for any error or irregularity therein, and a new sentence be pronounced in conformity with the law. Writs of error, in the courts of the United States, but such courts are authorized, by statute, to grant new trials for reasons for which new trials like those herein mentioned are allowed in the courts of law. The power to vacate a sentence is implied in the power to grant a new trial, and is necessary to the proper administration of justice. It is the power of the courts of the United States, in criminal cases, to hold that such courts have not the power to vacate a sentence would often deprive the accused person of the right to an appeal. (2) The first sentence was imperfect and incomplete. It was necessary that it be perfect and complete, and it was, therefore, not only incompetent for the court, but incumbent upon it, to perfect or to vacate the sentence, as advised. It contained no directions to docket judgments as a matter of course, and there was no order to stand committed until the fine be paid. So far as the fine was concerned, the sentence was wholly ineffectual, as it stood, for want of an "award of the proper process to carry into effect the sentence of the court." Kane v. People, 8 Wend. 215. Fines imposed by the courts of the United States are to be docketed as judgments and collected by execution, as in civil cases. Payments may also be enforced by imprisonment, when so ordered by the court. Here, no commitment was ever directed or issued.

V. The exercise of the power to vacate a sentence in cases where the sentence is in part executed, does not violate the constitutional provision which forbids that one shall be attempted or executed for the same offence. (1) The application of the constitutional principle relied upon by the plaintiff in error was rejected by the supreme court in the plaintiff's case, where it was held that the court must contain a determination in the charge. (2) It sounds strange that, when a court, in pronouncing sentence, leaves unperformed the duty imposed upon it by the statute, of selecting between two kinds of punishments, then the convict may determine that question himself, and, by electing to be punished by fine, deprive the court of all power to proceed further in the premises. The picture of a person whipped in pursuance of an erroneous sentence, has been alluded to with feeling, to show the necessity for re- striction of the power of courts. But there must be power somewhere. The court of appeals has power, by statute, in case of reversal, to direct as to the sentence to be imposed, and so the court may proceed to impose the sentence so directed. Prisoners convicted of crime may escape just punishment, by paying the penalty of a fine, or by having it imposed or extended. The power to discharge upon habeas corpus. But such suggestions afford slight reason for an abrogation of the statute, in any case, or the denial of the power to discharge upon habeas corpus, in the other.

VI. The proposition that the second sentence imposed upon the plaintiff in error was void, and the sentence of delay depend upon the fact that the fine which formed a part of the first sentence was paid. Payment of the fine has, it is said, expired the crime. But the fine was never paid. This appears by the complaint; and it was also apparent at the passing of the second sentence. The facts relied on to show payment of the fine are not stated in the complaint. They show, on the contrary, that no legal payment of the fine was ever made. The facts stated are as follows: The first sentence was on October 4, 1876, within the order of the court, a two hundred dollars was handed to the clerk, and retained by him until November 7th, when it was deposited with the assistant treasurer, "to the credit of the treasurer of the United States." and, on the same day, the plaintiff obtained a check written on his account, payable to the treasurer on November 8th, upon the return, by the clerk, to the person from whom he received it. It was not so paid, but was deposited with the assistant treasurer, "to the credit of the United States, in order to prevent the possibility of a direction to return it.

(3) Money was never paid into court without leave of the court. No permission or direction to pay this money into court was ever given, and none is awared. The clerk is but the amanuensis of the court. He acts only by rule or direction of the court, and he cannot bind the court except as directed. A court is not, at the instance of any person, the judge of the rights of another, unless authorized by some statute. The fine in question was imposed for the violation of a postal law. By statute, the mail belonged to the post office department, as part of the postal revenue, and was to be deposited for the use of the post office department. "Unclaimed money in dead letters for which no owner can be found; all money taken from the mail by robbery, theft, or otherwise, which may come into the hands of any agent or employee of the United States, or any person whatever; all fines and penalties imposed for any violation of the postal laws, and all public property of the post office department, shall be deposited in the treasury, under the direction of the postmaster general, as part of the postal revenue." Rev. St. U. S. § 4303; Rev. St. U. S. § 4250. In order to effect a payment to the United States of the fine in question, the plaintiff must have the postmaster general to be deposited, under the direction of the postmaster general, in the treasury of the United States "to the use of the post office department." When so deposited.

4 "Section 1. That all moneys in the registry of any court of the United States, or in the hands or under the control of any officer of such court, which were received in any cause pending or adjudicated in such court, shall within thirty days after the passage of this act, be deposited with the treasurer, an assistant treasurer, or a designated depository, of the United States, under the same name and to the credit of such court. And all such moneys which are hereafter paid into such courts, or received by the officers thereof, shall be forthwith deposited in the manner: Provided, that nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the delivery of any such money upon security according to agreement of parties, under the direction of the court. Section 2. That no money deposited as aforesaid shall be withdrawn except by order of the judge, or judges of said courts, respectively, in term or in vacation, shall be signed by such judge or judges and to be entered and certified of record by the clerk; and every such order shall state the cause in which account of which it is drawn. Act of March 24, 1871, (17 Stat. L. §§ 1, 2); Rev. St. U. S. §§ 993, 997.

5 "The United States vs. Edward Lange. For stealing and embezzling mail bags. Oct. 5. Filled bill of indictment. Oct. 8. Arraigned. Plea—not guilty. Oct. 10. Trial commenced. Oct. 12. Trial concluded. Verdict—guilty; and the value of the property to be less than $25. nov. 3. The prisoner, Edward Lange, is sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of $250. Nov. 7. Filed petition for a new trial; same date, the prisoner sentenced to one year's imprisonment."
ed it would form part of account No. 7, "Fines and Penalties" (Rev. St. U. S. § 4049), and be available to the post office department as part of the general postal revenue; otherwise, not. Had it been paid into court, it would have been accounted for to the post office department. It was held in precise manner to the postmaster general, or, under his direction, into the treasury, to the credit of the post office department. What the plaintiff desired to do, and what the assistant treasurer, to the credit of the treasurer of the United States. So disposed, the monies never reached the post office department. Like "conscience money," it passed to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, but it balanced no account and did nothing.

(5) A sentence of the character of the first sentence passed upon the plaintiff, when made peremptory, would not be an action against the plaintiff for two hundred dollars, to be collected by the marshal upon execution; and the money, when received by the marshal, would be returned with the execution to the court, to be disposed of by the court in the manner before stated. The payment made by the defendant was voluntary, he being deemed a voluntary payment. It was not made in pursuance of the sentence, and had no effect. The court was the promisor of the money, and the plaintiff has never expiated the crimes of which he stands convicted.

VII. As far as the liability of the defendant is concerned, the legality of the acts must be determined by the law as it then stood declared. According to that law, as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, the legality of the second sentence would not be affected by the fact that a previous valid sentence, under which the accused was condemned to the punishment, had been made and set aside. In Basset v. U. S., 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 38, it was decided, that it is competent for a court, for good cause, to set aside, at the same term at which it was rendered, a judgment of conviction, though the defendant had entered upon the imprisonment ordered by the sentence. The same court that discharged Lange on habeas corpus, in 1874, declared, in Basset's Case, in 1889, that "this control of the court over a judgment with a life term, is on every day's practice." This language was used by the supreme court, in a case where, in execution of its writ of habeas corpus, the defendant was taken to prison and imprisoned several days; and then, on habeas corpus, issued on motion of the district attorney, brought from the prison into court, and then, likewise on motion of the district attorney, the judgment was vacated and set aside. The defendant then withdrew his plea of guilty and gave a recognizance for his appearance for trial at a future term of the court. Failing to appear for trial in pursuance of his recognizance, an action was brought against the sureties upon the bond. To this action the sureties answered, in substance, that Basset having been once tried, convicted, and sentenced, imprisonment on the indictment, and having been taken in execution of such sentence and imprisoned, such imprisonment was under a former judgment, and that the action of the court in holding him to bail to again answer upon the same indictment, was both an infringement of the rights of the defendant and was illegal and void. This case is directly in point, and is so conceded to be by the supreme court in Ex parte Lange. It was there held, then, the law finding upon the circuit court of the United States at the time Lange was sentenced. It is, indeed, now said by the supreme court in Bassett's Case, was made "in general terms, without much consideration, for no counsel appeared for the sureties," and that, for that reason, it is now to be disregarded. But, how could the defendant know that there was a case of such importance to the postal revenue; otherwise, not. Had it been paid into court, it would have been accounted for to the post office department. It was held in precise manner to the postmaster general, or, under his direction, into the treasury, to the credit of the post office department. What the plaintiff desired to do, and what the assistant treasurer, to the credit of the treasurer of the United States. So disposed, the monies never reached the post office department. Like "conscience money," it passed to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, but it balanced no account and did nothing.

(6) To have a defendant sued for fine, when the defendant was subjected to imprisonment and fine upon the same charge for a single offense, an action of false imprisonment and false imprisonment in consequence of acts done by the defendant in the capacity of a judge. That rule has never been departed from by the English courts. Hawkins says (book 1, c. 72, § 6): "The law has freed the judges of all courts of record from all prosecutions whatsoever, except in the prosecution of the courts, and also the judges of them, if any, in such courts, as judges. For, the authority of a government cannot be sustained unless the court and those who are so highly intrusted with the administration of public justice; and it would be impossible for them to keep up the people that veneration of their persons and respect to their judgments, without which it is impossible to execute the laws with vigor and
(3) The rule, so early established and so uniformly adhered to in England, has, without an exception, been followed in this country. The case of Yates v. Lole was among the earliest cases, and is the leading case upon this subject. Chancellor Lansing committed the act of the plaintiff to habeas corpus, by Chief Justice Spencer, of the supreme court. After his discharge was declared to be illegal by the court of errors, and the plaintiff was discharged. He then brought his action at law, and recovered the penalty given by statute. The decision rested, mainly, on the ground that the act complained of was done by the defendant in his judicial capacity, while sitting in the court of chancery, and that, for such an act, no action would lie. In the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Kent, the court, after full review, and the ruling there established was affirmed in its broadest terms, as the law of this state, and it was observed that all courts of record, from the highest to the lowest, are exempt from prosecution, by action or indictment, for what they did in their judicial character. The supreme court of the United States, in Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 335, affirmed the doctrines of Yates v. Lansing. In this country, the judges of the superior courts of record are only responsible to the people or the authorities of the state, and not to the people or any of the courts from whom they receive their commissions, for the manner in which they discharge the great trusts of their office. Judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable for civil actions for their judicial acts, even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction, and are alleged to have been done with malice or corruptly. The circuit courts of the United States are courts of record, and have general jurisdiction of all offences committed against the United States.

(4) The act here complained of was a judicial act. The circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York had jurisdiction of the offence charged against the plaintiff. It also had jurisdiction of his person, accused by the indictment because it was terminate\n by any discharge. The sentence complained of formed a part, and appears in the record as a part, of a lawful criminal prosecution then pending before that court. The plaintiff before the court, in custody, upon a good conviction theretofore had, and upon that conviction he was sentenced to serve the sentence, can it be said that the pronouncing the sentence of the court was not a judicial act? Certain inferior officers sometimes act ministerially and sometimes judicially. For instance, in taking committed when they act ministerially, such officers are liable to the party injured, but they are never liable for errors of judgment when they have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the acts complained of were in their nature judicial. Barlow v. Shepherd, 25 N. Y. 251. Acts done by judges of courts of record are classified as judicial and extrajudicial. Their acts pertaining to the causes pending in their courts are always judicial. "Judges": Ford v. Barker, 12 Coke, 23. A judi\ncial act, when performed by a judge of a court of record, may be done, although, from the want of proof before the chief justice, of the facts recited in the warrant, his act of issuing the warrant was not required to be with the authority and illegal. Taaffe v. Downes, 3 Mores, P. C. 41, note. In Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 Term R. 493, it was held, that no action lies against a judge for acts done in that capacity; that the law raises a presumption in favor of a judge, and will not (as in ordinary cases) suffer that presumption to be rebutted; and that, if otherwise, it would deter them from doing their duty. Many other English cases could be cited.
but a judge can do, then it is judicial and not extra-judicial. All acts done by a judge in furtherance of a case depending in court, the issuing of writs, making orders, and passing sentences, are judicial acts which can only be done by a judge and no other person, and must be done in a judicial capacity. The act here complained of was an act of judicial power and was not done by the defendant, being, at the end of an important criminal prosecution, where the plaintiff had been legally indicted and convicted, excepted or interfered with the proper functions of a judge, and, from the bench, in open court, at a regular term thereof, assisted by the clerk and marshal, in the execution of the sentence pronounced by the court, subject to public observation, in presence of the bar, and when the party had been heard by counsel, pronounced the solemn judgment of the circuit court of the United States, which judgment was then and there entered upon the record, and was executed by the marshal as a judgment. For, mark, the execution or commitment was issued by the defendant to the marshal. The plaintiff was imprisoned by no person actuated by a reason; but by virtue of the sentence, as a judgment of the court, executed as such by the marshal. That record still stands, and must ever stand, as the judgment of the United States, for there is no tribunal empowered to reverse it. It may be called irregular—it may be called illegal. It may have been inordinate, but the judgment of a court having general jurisdiction over all offenses committed against the United States, and which, beyond all question, acquiesced in the conviction of the defendant. It is said that the court had lost jurisdiction of the person of the plaintiff by reason of the mode of his conviction, and that the sentence of the court was simply the act of a private person in regard to a bystander. But, the court did not act in regard to the defendant. The judgment of a court having general jurisdiction over all offenses committed against the United States, and which, beyond all question, acquiesced in the conviction of the defendant, could not be lawful. It is a well-known maxim that a court has no jurisdiction of its own, and that a court has no power to commit a person to imprisonment without the consent of both court and counsel. The defendant, on the limited and narrow ground involved in the questions—whether the first sentence was valid or void; whether, valid or void, it could be vacated at the same term; whether, if the first sentence were vacated, the court had power to pronounce a second sentence; whether the power of the court to pronounce the second sentence was impaired by the alleged payment of the fine; and whether the plaintiff had, in fact, paid the fine. All these questions the circuit court refused to determine and decide. The defendant presiding, as judge, pronounced the judgment of the court thereon; and now it is sought to hold him liable upon the ground that, in so doing, he did not perform a judicial act.

IX. The judgment should be reversed, and judgment be given for the defendant.

DANIELS, J. This action has been brought to recover the damages to the property of the government, or the plaintiff by the defendant, who is the United States district judge for the Eastern district of New York. It appears by the complaint and the court, that out of the proceedings was to be shown that the proceedings had, that the plaintiff was indicted, tried, and convicted at a term of the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, held by the defendant, of the crime of larceny committed by stealing mail, and was convicted of a value not exceeding twenty-five dollars. By the act of congress defining the offence and its punishment, that rendered the plaintiff liable to be sentenced to pay a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or to be imprisoned not exceeding one year. In finally disposing of the case, the defendant referred the matter to the circuit court sitting in New York. The plaintiff paid the fine and applied to be released from custody by means of the writ of habeas corpus, because he had suffered one of the alternative punishments upon the charge. That was denied, and the court, by order entered, directed the sentence which had been pronounced to be vacated, and then sentenced the plaintiff to one year's imprisonment upon his conviction. He had then been in custody five days, and afterwards applied to the circuit court of the United States, where the circuit judge, Lewis B. Woodruff, the district judge of the Southern district, Samuel Blatchford, and the defendant, were upon the bench, presiding, for a writ of habeas corpus to discharge him from further imprisonment, because of its illegality. The court heard, and, after being considered, was denied. He then applied for another writ of habeas corpus, which, together with a writ of certiorari, was issued by the court of two judges. The plaintiff was discharged from custody. The court holding that he could not lawfully be sentenced to imprisonment after what had transpired in the case. Ex parte Lange, 15 Wall. [80 U. S.] 163. After this, the action of the defendant, for false imprisonment; and a very able argument has been made by the learned counsel for the defendant, in support of it. But the report of the case itself, as it was considered and decided by the supreme court of the United States, would seem to be sufficient to negative the assertion that such an action can be maintained, upon the facts in the case. The sentence was changed by the same court, at the same term during which the first sentence was pronounced; and a learned and extended examination by the court of last resort was found necessary for the purpose of maintaining the point put in issue, improperly and unlawfully made. The opinion in which that view was sustained—and it was done by one of the judges of the court, in time—proved unsatisfactory and unconvincing to two members of that learned court; and its conclusions were controverted by one of those two, in an opinion rarely if ever excelled in the thoroughness of its investigations and researches, or the vigorous logic tracing and exhibiting their results. Under these circumstances, it cannot with the least propriety be held that the point presented to the defendant was not a doubtful one, or that its decision and determination did not require the closest functions. The examination and discussion which it received when it was finally decided, all tend to the most conclusive and effectual proof that that of itself should be deemed to be sufficient to shield the defendant from personal liability. The law was, to say the least, in such a condition as to afford only the most meager support to each side. For every mind could very well, and would very naturally, be led to different results concerning the propriety of the punishment, or the conviction of the case by the circuit court. Two other judges of great learning and experience in that court held with the defendant, that the propriety of their decision was finally corroborated by the opinion of Mr. Justice Clifford. If, with that weight of authority in support of the action that was taken, a judge could be personally liable for its consequences, judicial protection would be at once wholly destroyed, and the true weight of the authority actually overruled.

For, the result would finally be, that all unauthorized determinations arising out of misapprehension of the law, or of miscalculations of the true weight of the authority prevailing the person or property of the party, would furnish a cause of action for trespass or false imprisonment without. The one could possibly be protected against such liability; for, even those of last resort not unfrequently find it necessary to reject, disagree, and finally overrule their own decisions. And it certainly is no discredit to the learned tribunal by whose mandate the plaintiff was set at liberty, to say that it has been deprived of the authority to guard that alternative. The law is the most complicated of all practical sciences; and it effects the advancement of business and enterprise increase and advance. Differences of opinion upon legal subjects cannot be avoided, even by the most patient attention and inquisitorial investigation: and, when they do arise, erroneous conclusions are required to be excused, as the natural consequence of human failure. A party has been brought before a court of justice in a legal manner, and circumstances are presented to it by a declaratory by the tribunal making it cannot be deprived of protection because it may afterwards, upon further and fuller investigation, turn out to have been erroneous. What was decided in the state court in re: T. 6 East, 232, 237. The court circuit had no power, even if it had the disposition, to gain for any reason if it was erroneous, to the judgment; that is to say, a decision was made by the court, and was designed to be made. The emergency which had induced itself a decree to be made. The judge could not avoid it nor escape it. Its duty required him to act, and he had the power to decide, and he did so, according to the best of his judgment; and for that he cannot, upon any sound principle of accountability, be held to be personally liable.

He had jurisdiction of the person and the subject-matter. Both were before him, and his decision was necessary. He could avoid making it; he could, and, as it turned out, he decided erroneously.

The rule by which judicial officers have been considered to have been in error in the consequences of their decisions has gone much further than is required for the protection of the defendant. In Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. 282, the assertion was approvingly mentioned, "that no authority or semblance of an authority" had been urged for an action against a judge of record, for doing anything as judge; that this was never before imagined, and no action would lie against a judge for a wrongful commitment more than for an erroneous judgment. Id. 285. That principle is, afterwards, in the same case, by the court of errors (6 Johns. 383), and to the same effect are Jenkins v. Wall, 11 Johns. 114; Vanden Heyden v. Young, 150; Wilson v. Mayor of New York, 1 Denio, 585; Weaver v. Devens, 12 Johns. 477, and the course of judicial action is imposed upon a public officer, the due execution of which depends upon, on his own, is exempt from all responsibility by action, for the motives which influence him and the manner in which such duties are performed," id. 466. To secure this immunity, it is sufficient that a case requiring judicial action is presented to the judge. Brown v. Brotherson, 1 Denio, 337; Landry v. Elits, 19 Barb. 283.

The defendant's right to exemption from personal liability of the authorities is highly analogous to the cognate circumstances than those already relied upon. For, the decision of the United States supreme court, to which he was bound to subordinate his action, had previously established the existence of the authority which he exercised in changing the punishment. Cheeung v. U. S., 3 Wall. 195; Bastron v. U. S., 2 Wall. (76 U. S.) 38. In the last case, the person proceeded against had pleaded guilty to an indictment, and had been sentenced to imprisonment, and was actually sent to prison, in pursuance of the sentence. A few days after that he was brought again into court by means of a writ of habeas corpus. At the time of the return's motion, the judgment was set aside and the prisoner had leave to withdraw his former plea complete protection for the change made in the same term, as it was in the case of the plaintiff, and the court unanimously held it to be proper. That was not done because the proceeding was favorable to the defendant, but for the sole reason that, during the same term, the court had full power to control and change its judgments. That subject was the principle cited upon which the principle rested, by Mr. Justice Clifford, in his opinion in Ex parte Lange, in the term last named. A decision of the same nature was made after the execution of the sentence had commenced, by reducing the term for which transportation had been ordered was vacated by the court. In the case of Basset v. U. S., supra. It not only had the power, but it was bound to conform its proceedings in the manner and by that authority. That was as obligatory upon the defendant at the time as positive legislation would have been; and it appears to have acted under its decision to that end. At the time that decision was strictly lawful, and it cannot be denied that the authority of that case then afforded him complete protection for the change made in the sentence, and it would probably be conceded to continue to do so, had it not been since impaired as an authority in the opinion in the plaintiff's favor. Under the doctrine of that case, he was vested with clear jurisdiction over the subject-matter brought before him, and it was his duty to exercise that power in which it should be exercised by him. That it was, as the learned justice stated in his opinion, "in all essential terms, without much consideration" (Ex part Lange) 33 Wall. (55 U. S.) 167, could not change its effect as authority, where it was followed by the court. The defendant, presiding there could not, with the least propriety, have assigned that as a reason for ignoring it as authority. All the decision was then in full force, as it had been made. It was promulgated by the court, in its published reports, was a proper exposition of the law, and it would be exceedingly unjust, under such circumstances, to render the defendant's protection dependent upon the views afterwards taken to conform to it. In the case of Buckingham v. Mead, 11 N. Y. 337, it was decided that the authority of such duties of a judicial nature are imposed upon a public officer, the due execution of which depends upon his own judgment, he is exempt from all responsibility by action, for the motives which influence him and the manner in which such duties are performed," id. 466. To secure this immunity, it is sufficient that a case requiring never been enacted. But acts previously performed are still maintained by force of the law which sanctioned them at the time of their occurrence. This principle is too familiar to require the citation of authorities for its support, and all its reasons are applicable to the case now before this court.

The principle invoked for the support of this action would sanction suits against judges for judicial acts, in a large class of cases, if it should receive the approval of the courts. It would be difficult to exclude from its comprehension all cases where imprisonment should be pronounced or continued which might afterwards be declared to be not warranted by the final view taken of the law. No authority has gone so far as that, and it is not probable that any will be hereafter so widely extended. The settled principle, on the contrary, is, that a judicial officer, in exercising the authority vested in him, shall be free to act upon his own convictions, without apprehension of personal consequences to himself. Liability to answer to every one who might feel himself aggrieved by the action of the judge would be inconsistent with the possession of this freedom, and would destroy that independence without which no judiciary can be either respectable or useful.

The defendant cannot be held liable for the consequences of the imprisonment following the change made in the sentence. He acted judicially in making it. The exigency required him to decide, and that included the power to decide wrongly, without liability to himself, particularly as it practically required the abrogation of an existing and, for the time, controlling authority, to render the error apparent. It is entirely evident that he was actuated solely by the motive of performing his duties, for the best interests of the public, by subjecting the plaintiff to what was believed to be no more than a proper measure of punishment for the offence of which he had been convicted. That he considered his acts to be fully warranted by the decision of the tribunal from which he was bound to receive the law, is clearly shown by what the case shows to have transpired; and in that view he was supported by other eminent judges. To hold him liable for a change afterwards made in it, would seem to be hardly less than a positive perversion of justice. That he cannot be held liable for the five days' imprisonment under the sentence as it was at first pronounced, is shown clearly from the view which was adopted in the decision of the habeas corpus. For, it was there distinctly held, that "the judgment first rendered, though erroneous, was not absolutely void. It was rendered by a court which had jurisdiction of the party and of the offence, on a valid verdict. The error of the court in imposing the two punishments mentioned in the statute, when it had only the alternative of one of them, did not make the judgment wholly void." Ex parte Lange, 33 Wall. [85 U. S.] 174. And, as the defendant had the same jurisdiction over the subject when the plaintiff's first sentence was vacated and the last one was pronounced, he is equally entitled to the same protection as to this portion of the case. The sentence, under the circumstances, was not void. It was simply voidable, by the operation of the restriction subsequently imposed upon the principle established by the case of Hale v. U. S., supra, and that effect was first given to it long after the power of the defendant's court had been exhausted.

The order should be reversed, and an order entered, in conformity with the usual leave to the plaintiff to amend, on payment of costs.

Orphans' Court, District of Columbia, March 21, 1883.

INFANTS—WARD OF CHANCERY—EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION OF COURT.

In all cases where an infant is a ward of chancery, no act can be done affecting the person, property or estate of the minor, unless under the direction expressed or implied of the chancery court itself.

OVERRULING A MANDATE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT. [Proceeding for the appointment of a guardian for Samuel C. Barney, Jr., and others, minor children of Samuel Chase Barney.]

PURCELL, J. In the above cause this court, on the 25th day of January, 1883, pronounced a final decree appointing Dr. Harvey Lindsley, (at discretion,) guardian to the above minor children, the court being of the opinion that Samuel Chase Barney had lost his marital rights as husband and natural guardian by the decree of divorce of Jasper county, in the state of Iowa, in equity in the district court. By that decree he was forever separated from his wife, and the custody of the said minor children was taken from him and given to the mother. It appears on the face of the decree that the court was a tribunal of competent jurisdiction both over the parties and the subject matter, and that said decree was duly and properly authenticated according to the act of congress in such cases made and provided, and this court held that the divorce was sufficient to exclude Samuel Chase Barney from the guardianship of the property of the said children, without reference to the other facts against him in the case. Also that inasmuch as the said decree of divorce declared that Samuel Chase Barney had received timely notice of the pending of the suit, by the proper publication required by law, and notice sent to his residence; it could not be inquired into collaterally by this court, and authorities were cited to that effect, and that such a decree was not ex-parte. This court at the same time stated another fact, which was entitled to much consideration, to wit, that the will of Edward De Kraft, by whom the whole estate in question was devised, was simply voidable, by the demise of Mary E. De Kraft, who intermarried with the said Samuel Chase Barney, and who was the mother of said minor children, expressly declared.

that "no husband of his daughter should ever at any time control the estate so devised."

From this decision the said Samuel Chase Barney appealed to the circuit court of this district, and by that court the decision of this court was reversed. [Case No. 18,230.] An appeal was then taken by J. W. De Kraft, next friend of the children, to the supreme court of the United States, and was dismissed by that tribunal for want of jurisdiction. [2 Black. 701.]

The circuit court (the opinion delivered by Judge Merrick) in reversing the decision of this court, made and elaborately discussed three points: 1st. That the decree of divorce rendered in Iowa could not be received in evidence for any purpose in the present controversy. 2nd. That the will of Edward De Kraft did not apply to the personal custody of the minor children, but only to the property, and that although the language of said will was clear and explicit that "no husband" of the daughter should at any time control the estate, yet as natural guardian, Samuel Chase Barney, the father, was entitled to preference in the control of said property, provided he gave sufficient bond and securities as natural guardian. 3rd. That the statute of Maryland, of 1798, in reference to the removal of guardians by the orphans' court, did not apply to Samuel Chase Barney as natural guardian.

In reference to the points thus considered by the circuit court, and upon the soundness of their decision, it would perhaps be unbecoming for this court to comment, although it may not be amiss to quote the express language of the sections of the statute of Maryland of 1798, which was held by the circuit court (in their 3rd and last point) not to apply to the present case. In subchapter 12, c. 101, of that statute, different classes of guardians are mentioned: "natural guardians" and "testamentary guardians." Then subchapter 15 provides that "the court (orphans) may upon application of an infant, or any person in his behalf, suggesting improper conduct in any guardian whatever, either in relation to the care and management of the property and person of the infant, inquire into the same, and at their discretion remove such guardian and make choice of another, who shall give security and conduct himself in the manner herein before prescribed, and shall receive the property and the custody of the ward." Could language be more comprehensive or explicit? This statute is in force in this district, and it expressly provides that the orphans' court may remove "any guardian whatever" for improper conduct, either in regard to the person or property of the ward, clearly embracing all guardians; and this has been the opinion of one of the ablest jurists, both of this District and the state of Maryland. On the 21st of March, 1833, the circuit court issued their mandate from their clerk's office, directing this court to cite Samuel Chase Barney, to give bond with sufficient securities to be approved by this court, &c., &c. Said mandate was delivered to the clerk of this court on the 4th of March, 1833, the day after the circuit court was abolished by congress.

The circuit court was the proper appellate tribunal, and this court would feel bound to respect its mandate, but it appears from this certificate, under seal of the clerk of that court, who was also clerk of the court of chancery, that on the 24th of February, 1855, a bill in equity had been filed in behalf of said minor children, who were then in the custody of Dr. Harvey Lindsey, their duly appointed guardian by this court, the property being also in his possession. Said bill alleging unfitness of said Barney, because gross immorality and incompetency rendered him unfit to have the custody of the said minor children, or to have the management of their property, consequently the said minor children became "wards in chancery" from the filing of the said bill, and the issuing the process thereon and service on said Samuel Chase Barney, on the 26th of February, which proceedings operated as a supersedeas to the action of all other courts and persons. (It was stated to this court and not denied by the opposite counsel, that the circuit court had agreed to hear an argument, and examine authorities as to the propriety of having ordered the mandate, but did not, owing to some misunderstanding between the court and counsel, R. S. Cox, Esq.) The above doctrine is very clearly stated by Judge Story in his very able work upon Equity Jurisprudence. Volume 2, §§ 1322, 1333. He says: "Wherever a suit is instituted in the court of chancery relating to the person or property of an infant, although he is not under any general guardian appointed by the court, he is treated as a ward of the court, and as being under its special cognizance and protection. In all cases where an infant is a party of chancery, no act can be done affecting the person or property, or state of the minor, unless under the express or implied direction of the court itself. Every act done without such direction is treated as a violation of the authority of the court, and the offending party will be arrested upon proper process for the contempt, and compelled to submit to such orders and such punishment by imprisonment as are applied to other cases of contempt. See, also, Wellesley v. Duke of Beaufort, 2 Russ. 20. 21. In this case the rights of the father as natural guardian were involved, and he was by the court adjudged unfit to have the custody of his children. Goodall v. Harris, 2 P. Wms. 501; Butler v. Freeman, Amb. 303; 2 Bligh (N. S.) 137.

Thus it will be seen that by the foregoing high authorities should this court regard the mandate issued by the late circuit court, or "do any other act affecting the person, property or state of the minor" from the time they became "wards of chancery," it would be guilty of contempt of the court of chancery, and may not the late circuit court have remdered themselves liable, the mandate having been issued subsequent to the filing of the said bill in behalf of the minor children? "Filing a bill in chancery on behalf of infants makes them wards of court," says Maddox in his Chancery Practice, Volume 1, p. 432. See also, the many authorities referred to in the margin by the learned author. Indeed, the circuit court, in their opinion already referred to, say that the court of chancery affords ample relief in the case of minors, when properly invoked. But if any doubts existed as to the principle in chancery, as above stated from the foregoing authorities and facts, they were removed on the awarding of the injunction on yesterday, the 20th of March, by the Hon. D. K. Carter, chief justice of the supreme court of the District, which was filed by John W. DeKraft, as next friend of said minor children, which arrested the said mandate ordered by the late circuit court, and which was brought officially to the view of this court. It is therefore ordered and decreed from the foregoing authorities and facts, that the direction contained in the mandate above referred to of the late circuit court, to cite Samuel Chase Barney to give bond and security as natural guardian to said minor children, within a reasonable time, is overruled.

This appears to have been the first adjudication in which Chief Justice Carter took part upon entering upon his term of office.

[Monroe, C. C. (Ky. Dist.) 67.]
Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. Sept., 1855.

JURISDICTION OF COURTS—COLLATERAL ATTACK—ATTACHMENT FROM STATE COURT—WRONGFUL SEIZURE BY SHERIFF—REPELV IN FEDERAL COURT.

[1. The question of jurisdiction over any particular case must be decided, in the first instance, by the court whose judicial action is first invoked. The question arises immediately upon the application for the original or first process in the action, and is necessarily decided in favor of the jurisdiction at the time when the process is issued, whether issued by the judge or clerk. And it is thereafter also necessarily decided, by implication, preliminary to every order, sentence, or mandate of the writ; and every order and process exhibits on its face a decision of the court that it is made and awarded by competent authority.]

[2. When it is within the general jurisdiction of a court in a proper case to issue a writ, or make an order, which it has issued or made, but, in the particular case, the facts were not such as confer jurisdiction, such writ or order must be taken as valid and effectual, until quashed, reversed, or otherwise superseded by a tribunal competent to review and correct the error.

[3. An order for the attachment of the property of the defendant in a personal action, in order to have it brought into the custody of the court, and subjected to whatever, after due proceedings, may be adjudged against the defendant, being within the general jurisdiction of the Kentucky circuit courts, under the Code of Practice of that state, the validity of such an attachment cannot be questioned by a federal court, in an action brought therein to replevy the property from the possession of the sheriff. The Kentucky court having necessarily decided, in issuing the writ, that a proper case was presented for the exercise of its jurisdiction, the federal court has no authority to review that decision, and consequently must respect and give full effect to the writ.

[4. An order for the attachment of the property of a defendant, issued as a provisional remedy, prior to judgment, under the provisions of Code Prac. Ky. § 229, given to the sheriff no authority to seize property which has been conveyed to another, on the ground that such conveyance was in fraud of creditors, and such a seizure, if made, does not carry the property into the custody of the court.

[5. Where a sheriff, under the authority of a writ of attachment issued by a state court, seizes property not within the command of the writ, a third person, not a party to the suit, may (when the other requisites of federal jurisdiction exist) maintain a suit in replevin in a federal court to recover the property from the possession of the sheriff; and this notwithstanding the fact that the state laws provide a mode in which he may intervene in the state court for the purpose of asserting his right to the property.]

At law.

Morehead & Brown, for defendant.

MONROE, District Judge. 1. Plaintiff's action: This action is replevin by the plaintiff, a citizen of the state of Illinois, against the defendant, a citizen of Kentucky, to recover five slaves of the plaintiff's of the aggregate value of $2,500.

2. Defendant's possession of the property: It appears that, some time prior to the commencement of this action, Henry G. Poston and Wm. Winn had commenced a suit by petition in equity in the Clarke county circuit court against John Manier, Sr., John Manier, Jr., and some other defendants. It is alleged in the petition that the plaintiffs had some time before instituted an ordinary action in that court against the defendant John Manier, the elder, and Miller Cooper, on a demand for about $720; that this suit, on the application of the defendant Manier, had been removed to the Fayette circuit court, where it remained undetermined; but that they, the plaintiffs, had recovered a judgment against this defendant John Manier, Sr., for about twenty-five dollars for their costs of a continuance of the suit. It was represented that the defendant Cooper was without property, and that since the last term of the Fayette circuit court John Manier, the elder, had sold, conveyed, and otherwise disposed of his property, or suffered or permitted it to be sold, with the fraudulent intent to cheat, hinder, or delay his creditors; that among other fraudulent transfers thus made by him was a pretended sale of a negro woman and children to his (the defendant's) son, John Manier, Jr., who was then trying to sell said slaves as his own property. They prayed the court to grant them an attachment against the property of John Manier, Sr., or so much thereof as would be sufficient to satisfy their original demand for the seven hundred and odd dollars, and the judgment and execution for costs they had obtained at the last term of the Fayette circuit court. The plaintiffs represented that the other defendants were indebted to the defendant Manier, the elder, and asked an attachment of the debts due by them to him, and that they be enjoined from paying the same to him until the further order of the court. The petition is concluded with a prayer that the rights of the petitioners be protected, and for all proper relief. On this case the plaintiffs obtained an order for "an attachment and injunction in accordance with the prayer of the petition," and the process was issued accordingly. The attachment commanded the sheriff to "attach the property of John Manier, Sr., not exempt from execution, in your county, or so much thereof as will satisfy the claim of the plaintiffs in this action," etc.; and to summon the garnishees, etc. It was directed to the sheriff of Bath county. David Trumbo was that sheriff, and, it having come to his hands, he, by the directions of the plaintiffs, and the supposed command of the writ, seized the slaves which it had been alleged in the petition had been fraudulently sold and transferred by the defendant John Manier, the elder, to his co-defendant John Manier, Jr., and thus Mr. Trumbo took and had the slaves in his possession.

3. Plaintiff's replievin: But a stranger to all this proceeding asserts that he was the owner of the slaves, and the question will be, what was the predicament of the property in the hands of Mr. Trumbo? Wesley H. Manier, a citizen of Illinois, no party to the suit in the state court, nor mentioned in the attachment or other process, in this state of things instituted in this court the present ordinary action of replievin against David Trumbo for these slaves. The plaintiff in his declaration, filed before the imposition of this writ, after the statement of his ownership of the property in the ordinary form, alleged that David Trumbo, the defendant, not adding his quality of office, wrongfully took and detained his slaves, described by their individual names and value, and still detained them; and thereupon, without showing how or upon what color the wrong was committed, prayed the relievlin of the property and for his damages. The writ having been issued accordingly, the marshal, after having taken the proper bond for the security of the defendant, took and delivered the slaves to the plaintiff. Whereupon,—

4. Plea to jurisdiction, and return demanded: Mr. Trumbo returned the attachment to the state court with his answer thereto, that by the direction of the plaintiff he had seized these slaves, without showing whose property or in whose possession found, but that they had been taken from him by the marshal on this writ of replievin; and, having thus answered the state court, he appeared here with its record, and pleaded these matters to the jurisdiction of this court; concluding with a prayer for the return of the property. The plaintiff demurred.

5. Defendant's position on demurrer: It was assumed in the argument by the counsel of the defendant that immediately on the seizure of the slaves by the defendant in his quality of sheriff, by his supposed authority under the attachment, they were in the custody of the state court, and thence inferred that this court had no cognizance of this action, afterwards commenced here to disturb such custody of that court. If the premise is true, the conclusion necessarily follows. It may be premised that the circumstances that this is a court of the United States and the Clarke circuit court a state tribunal is in no wise material to the question. If this action had been in the state circuit court of Bath, and this plea had been there pleaded, the question would have been exactly the same with this which is now here presented. But is it true that such was the predicament of the property? This must depend upon the answer to the question, was the seizure by the order of the court or the command of its process? If it was, then the act of the sheriff was the act of the court, and his apparent possession of the property thereby obtained was but as the custos for the court; and, in such case, the court not being subject to an action, he was not. But, if the sheriff acted without such command, his act of seizure was his own wrongful act, and the possession his own wrongful possession, which subjected him to the action of the party injured in any court having cognizance of such wrong. It would seem to follow that the jurisdiction of this court of the present action depends upon the interpretation of the terms of this writ of attachment, and upon this exclusively.

6. Question of jurisdiction refuted: There was a preliminary question suggested. The counsel of the defendant was asked whether the question of jurisdiction might not be retorted, and the defendant required to maintain that the Clarke circuit court had cognizance of the cause in which it had awarded this writ returnable before itself. It had been agreed by the counsel that it should be considered that the record of the cause on which that court acted was fully set forth in the plea, the question is therefore fairly presented and will be disposed of first in order. This question depends upon the law of Kentucky which prescribed the jurisdiction of the state court and regulated, or ought to have regulated, the proceedings found in this record.

7. Code of Kentucky Practice: But this class of law had been, shortly before these proceedings were commenced, all broken up, essentially altered, new modeled, in short, confounded, and by one act of the legislature compressed into a book. It will therefore be necessary to understand what is this new system. To this end we must recognize the preliminary dispositions of the Code, and comprehend its general provisions; and when this shall have been done, and not before, its particular provisions may be intelligibly applied to the subject of discussion. The act of legislation which enacted the book declared that it should be known as the "Code of Practice in Civil Cases in This State"; and it does direct every proceeding allowed in every class of case within its title. The only object of all proceedings in every such case is immediately mentioned by a term of the utmost extension, and thereupon a division thereof made which entirely exhausts the subject. "Section 1. This act shall be known as the Code of Practice in Civil Cases in this state. Sec. 2. Remedies in civil cases in the courts of this state are divided into two classes: (1) Actions; (2) Special Proceedings. Sec. 3. A civil action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice, by one party against another, for the enforcement or protection of a private right, or the redress or prevention of a private wrong. It may be brought for the recovery of a penalty or forfeiture. Sec. 4. Every other remedy in a civil case is a special proceeding."

There is here a division of remedies into two classes, but the subject of our discussion will be found in the first class, and in this only. All the wrongs suffered and apprehended by the plaintiff in this attachment are redressed or prevented by certain conservative or provisional orders and process in the ordinary action for the principal demand, specially provided as incident thereto, and significantly denominated "Provisonal Remedies," for the accomplishment of the object of such action, and not by any of the species of procedure denominated "Special Proceedings," and classed in this second division of remedies. It is therefore with this action only we are here concerned.

"The forms of all actions and suits" theretofore in use were abolished, and a new form of action established "for the enforcement and protection of private rights, and the redress and prevention of all private wrongs," regardless of all former distinctions between either legal or equitable rights or remedies.

This is an action by petition to the court, and a summons thereon for the defendant or person concerned in the defense in every case, whether the proceedings be in personam or in rem, or both a person and thing are the reus. There are two forms of proceeding, one called an "ordinary" the other the "equitable." In one the petition is headed "Petition" merely; in the other, "Petition in Equity." But the plaintiff has his election which of the two he will adopt, except when his cause has been before exclusively cognizable in equity or was of common-law jurisdiction, and the defendant appears and interposes his objection to the mode adopted; and on this objection a singular preference is given to the equity docket. If the proceeding had been erroneously commenced in the ordinary or common-law mode, the defendant has a right on his mere motion to have it transferred to the equity docket, but if, on the contrary, the plaintiff had erroneously elected the equitable mode of proceeding, the defendant cannot have the mode of procedure changed, but must submit unless he present in his answer, on oath, a defense on which he is entitled to a trial by jury. So that in every case one party or the other may elect the equitable mode of procedure unless the defendant shows that he has a right to trial of an issue by a jury, and insists on such right. And where the action has been commenced by ordinary proceeding, and remains on that docket, the plaintiff may have every issue, which before the adoption of the Code was exclusively cognizable in chancery, tried in the mode prescribed in cases of equitable proceedings. And where in such case all the issues are such as had been theretofore cognizable in chancery, though none of them were exclusively so, the defendant may have them tried in this mode.

It is manifest that it was the plan to give to the equitable mode of proceeding the preference where ever it was possible. The constitution had reserved the right of trial by jury, and a method had to be provided for such trials; but in prescribing this method the equitable mode of proceeding is departed from so far only as was absolutely necessary to accomplish this object, and, that the provisions of the law for this purpose might not have a more extended effect, it is declared that where the issues of fact theretofore cognizable in equity are in a cause commenced by ordinary proceeding, such issues might be tried in the mode of equitable proceeding on the mere motion of the plaintiff or defendant, without having the cause transferred to the equitable docket, or changing the form or mode of proceeding in any other respect. And this seemed to produce something like a common-law suit tried by the court of equity; but that the fact is, this change of the mode of the trial, divested the case of its only common-law characteristic, and made it a purely equitable cause. It thus appears that the trial by the court is necessarily to the equitable mode of proceeding, and therefore it cannot distinguish such mode of proceeding into a class of actions. It is elsewhere provided that the court may whenever it thinks proper—as theretofore practiced—order an issue in an equitable cause to be tried by a jury. So that the trial by jury is neither universal nor simply peculiar to the action by ordinary proceeding; therefore it does not necessarily even contribute to constitute a class, and other material differences must be found before such a class can be formed.

The fact is that this action of the Code, on whatever form of proceeding commenced, or conducted, or the trial is had, is essentially a suit in equity founded on the principles of the modern civil law. It is thus distinguished—by the number, complication, and shifting of the parties which is allowed—by the fact that the allegations of the several parties are all cast broad before the court, whereupon the proofs are immediately taken, after which the facts in dispute are contained by retrospection, and the proofs applied to the questions thus found—by the machinery employed—by its interlocutory orders, conservative acts, and process—by its trials by the court and its mode of trial—

by jury; and, finally, by its mode of relief, specific or remuneratory, remedial or protective, adapted to every case and every party. The parties to the action, plaintiffs and defendants, primary and secondary, or the rules in respect to them, are those of the court of equity, or civil law forum; and different—even in respect to the principal and indispensable parties—from the rules which govern absolutely the parties to the common-law action.

The plaintiff may be one who has either a legal or equitable right; and such plaintiff may have for the reus all the persons and things he may choose to have convened and arrested to answer his action, without the hazard of his cause by a misjoinder of parties. The defendants may be not only the thing demanded by the action and all the persons and things directly bound for the plaintiff's demand, but all the persons and property, in possession and in action, he expects to subject to the judgment he hopes to recover; and these defendants are all convened or brought before the court or into its custody, and consequently made subject to its action by the personal service of the summons, or an order entered on the record, warning the persons to appear and defend their rights, or by an attachment of the property itself by an officer of the court, or its delivery to such officer according to an order made in the cause. The process—actual or constructive and common to all cases, or principal and conservative and therefore only employed when necessary in consequence of the circumstances of a particular case—is exactly the same whether the mode of proceeding be equitable or ordinary.

There is a diversity in the terms in which the defendant is required to appear and answer after the service of the process, but that is here unimportant. The persons thus made defendants on appearing to the action, thereupon defend themselves or the property in their possession or which they have an interest in defending, in the same mode on whatever docket the cause may stand. We have seen that all actions are commenced by the petition of the plaintiff.

Every action whilst single is defended by either demurrer or the answer of the defendant. The plaintiff makes no express replication to the defendant's answer. He is understood to deny its affirmative allegations, and thus is made the issue. Plaintiff can demur to defendant's answer, which corresponds to setting down a cause in equity on bill and answer. But the defendant may turn on the plaintiff with his demand in reconvention or set-off, and whenever necessary call in other persons: and, making them defendants to such demands, have them brought before the court in the same mode the original defendants had been convened. In such cases the answer of the defendant, where no new party is introduced, and his petition when a third person is made a defendant, are in the nature of a cross-bill in equity. The cause is then double, and the plaintiff in the original action and the parties thus made defendants make their defense to this incidental action in the same mode a principal action is defended. What the plaintiff files is called his reply, but it is no other than an answer to the cross-bill. Thus are the issues made in every cause, however complicated it may become. The only alternations between any of the parties in respect to the facts is by petition and answer. Either may be amended.

Third persons still outstanding, whose rights are involved in the controversy, or whose possession of property is affected by any act of an officer under color of an order or process of the court, may intervene, assert their right, and submit it for discussion and decision; or oppose the actions had or threatened against their possession.

The constituents of either class of such parties may be changed whenever found necessary, either from an error in the commencement of the proceedings or a casualty in the progress of the cause. Defendants may be added, struck out, and dismissed, and new persons or things substituted and added. An original plaintiff—even a sole plaintiff—may retire and a new actor be introduced in his stead; and yet the cause may be all conducted on what is called the ordinary mode of proceeding in opposition to the equitable. And in whatever mode the suit may have been commenced, on whatever docket it may stand, every order, process, and judgment, found in all the formulas of either the courts of equity or law, or their equivalents, may be entered and awarded either by the court, the clerk or a judge in each and every stage of the proceeding, from its institution to the final trial.

By these means every provisional remedy is afforded. The property in litigation or sought to be subjected to a demand is secured from waste or damage, and from being aliened or elomed, and may when necessary be sold and its proceeds held subject to the disposition of the court. The mode of proof is not material before us; but it is substantially the same in either mode of proceeding. Every party has the right to examine his adversary either on interrogatories or on the trial in open court, touching the like facts, and the only diversity between the modes of obtaining testimony is that in the ordinary the witness must be produced and testify before the jury when within the county or an adjacent county, and able to attend. Either the jury or the court may have a view of the premises, or the object in litigation referred to in the proofs, subjected to its inspection. The same machinery is employed by the court indiscriminately—the auditor, the master, the expert, the depository, the receiver, or commissioner, as may be demanded by the circumstances of the litigation.

The several branches of the cause may be decided at different periods, either provisionally or finally. And in the final dispositions of the cause every form of judgment, decree, injunction, interdict, mandamus, or prohibition found in either the common-law court or civil-law forum may be adopted; or new forms hitherto unknown, may be devised, and all carried into execution by whatever order of process the exigency of the case may demand. These general dispositions of the Code will be sufficient.

It is manifest this action, announced at the opening of the work, is a suit in equity. It has all the distinctive characteristics of this class of proceedings in court. There is assigned to all the remedies, provisional and final, afforded by the common-law actions, and every species of procedure known to courts of equity, and therefore it is in some sense mixed or compound; but it may be more properly said that the action at law has been merged and lost in the comprehensive equity action. The circumstance that the right of trial by jury, when demandable at common law, is preserved and a mode of proceeding prescribed for this purpose, does not make it necessary to qualify this conclusion. This amounts to only the introduction of the jury into the machinery of the court of equity in certain classes of cases, and making its employment necessary when demanded by a party, whereas it was before discretionary with the chancellor. We have seen that nothing more was done.

But to proceed and apply what we have collected to our question. It is found that the idea of two courts (or a court with two sides to it), one with cognizance of one class of rights and wrongs, and with power to afford one species of remedy, and the other with jurisdiction of another sort of rights and wrongs, and with power to afford other remedies, is totally abolished. It follows that it is impossible that there can remain any such thing as an ancillary equity jurisdiction of one court, to be exercised to secure or promote the object of an action in another tribunal. Not only is there no occasion left for such jurisdiction, but it will be found that it is directed that every provisional remedy which a chancellor could afford in the exercise of his ancillary jurisdiction shall be allowed in not only the same court but in the very action whose object the proceeding is intended to conserve and promote, whether this action is conducted in the mode of an equitable or ordinary proceeding.

There are six several classes of provisional remedies prescribed in the Code—arrest of the defendant, claim and delivery of personal property, attachment of property, injunction, appointment of receiver, and deposit of property. These it is supposed extend to all the cases provided for by the conservative acts of the civil law, accomplish all the objects of the coercive process in an action at common law, and include every provisional remedy afforded by a court of equity in the exercise of either its ancillary, or principal jurisdiction; and all these remedies are incidental to every action in which an occasion for them can occur; all may be had at the institution of a suit, or at any time before judgment, and therefore constitute a part of the proceedings in the action. We shall however have occasion to mention again the attachment only. It is allowed in several different cases and on a number of grounds; but we need mention only one—it will be sufficient to say of the others that they are all issued out of the court in which the action is being or has been brought, to which they are provisional.

The provisions in respect to this case are to this effect: "Sec. 221. The plaintiff in a civil action may at or after the commencement thereof have an attachment against the property of the defendant in the cases and on the grounds hereafter stated. (1) In the case of an action for the recovery of money," "Sec. 222. An order of attachment shall be made by the clerk of the court in which the action is brought." Whenever in the case just mentioned there is filed in his office an affidavit of the plaintiff showing the "nature of his claim, that it is just, and the amount the affiant believes the plaintiff ought to recover"; that the defendant "has sold, conveyed or otherwise disposed of his property, or suffered or permitted it to be sold with the fraudulent intent to cheat, hinder, or delay his creditors." This attachment is against the defendant's property generally, and is executed against every species thereof not corporeal or incorporeal. It is executed on a debt or demand by delivering to the debtor a notice thereof, and summoning him as garnishee to the action.

8. Code applied to defendant's case: Now it is manifest that the case of the plaintiffs in this attachment was simply the case which has been started out of the Code, and that their remedy against both the property of John Manier, the elder, and the debt owing to him by the other defendants was an attachment in the action by ordinary proceeding depending in the Fayette circuit court. There was no occasion whatever for an injunction forbidding the payment of the debt to Manier by the garnishees. Notice of the attachment to the debtors and citation of them to appear and answer in the action is an effectual seizure of the debt. The question then is, we have seen, had the Clarke circuit court jurisdiction to entertain this petition in equity—constituted of nothing but the materials for a mere provisional remedy incidental to the action by ordinary proceeding in the Fayette circuit court—and to thereupon award this process returnable before itself, and thereby constitute a second suit.

9. Question of jurisdiction retorted back: But that court did take cognizance of the cause and awarded the attachment—and the question occurs, was there not included in that act a decision that the court had jurisdiction?—which must be reviewed before the main question can be reached. If there was, then the question is, has this court the power to reverse that decision; and the question of jurisdiction is retorted back. This seems to be the case and it is proper that the preliminary question be first decided.

10. Province of courts: Every superior court of general jurisdiction has prima facie power to act upon all the persons and things within the territorial limits, and subject to the legislative power, over which it is the organ. There is generally a local sphere of action prescribed for each tribunal; and the objects or subjects of the jurisdiction of each class of courts are designated in some mode by their organic law, and the jurisprudence they administer. But the question here occurs, how is this law to be applied to each case presented to the tribunals for judicial action and the jurisdiction of the court determined? There can be but one answer. The law must be applied and the question decided in the court where the judicial action is first invoked; and provisionally decided, even at the threshold of the court of the first instance. The question of the jurisdiction of the particular court occurs on the application for the original or first process in every action; whether such application is to the court or its clerk and is decided on by the clerk or the judge. It is afterwards necessarily decided preliminary to every order, sentence, and mandate of the court; a judgment upon it is implied in every such act, and every order and process exhibits on its face a decision of the court, that it is made and awarded by competent authority. It is not material whether the process is issued by the clerk on the direct and immediate order of the court or not: it is always as if by the court. In every case of the award of the process or the entry of an order which has such effect, it is either all right, in some respects wrong, or all wrong. It is only the question we are concerned. If any writ or process is sued forth or prosecuted in any court of the United States or a particular state, whereby the person of an ambassador or other public minister of a foreign state received by the president of the United States may be arrested or imprisoned, such writ or process is null to all intents and constructions. This nullity of the writ is the consequence of the fact that no court had jurisdiction to award such process against a foreign minister in any case whatever which it is possible to present. In such and the like cases where the court has no jurisdiction to consider whether a sufficient case has been made out for its action or not, its whole action is all wrong and null for every purpose. But the order or process may be what the court had no jurisdiction to make, and sent out for execution—on the facts or case before it—but which it had jurisdiction to award on a case which might have been presented for its action: in such cases the act of the court is not a nullity, nor its process void.

A capias in the common form issued on an indictment which charged no offense within the jurisdiction of the court, nor punished by any law, and which, if you choose, had never been found by the grand jury. "A true bill," will justify a sheriff or marshal in the arrest of the defendant. A writ of fieri facias issued in a cause wherein the plaintiff had shown neither the jurisdiction of the tribunal nor a cause of action in any court, to which the defendant had either appeared or been cited, and in which there had been in fact no form of judgment rendered, will justify the marshal or sheriff in not only seizing the goods of the defendant, but enable him to pass a good title to an innocent purchaser: and the reason in both these and all the like cases is, that the officer has no jurisdiction to review the decision of the court, made either by itself or its clerk, upon the case on which it acted in making the order and issuing the process; and therefore need not know what was such case; and all strangers must be allowed to. trust to the validity of such process. Every such process must be allowed its full operation until quashed, reversed, or otherwise superseded by a tribunal competent to review and correct the errors of the court whence it issued, and even after such reversal, and the writ has been quashed, what has been performed according to its command remains justified and in general valid and effectual. This tribunal is the court itself, under certain limitations, which made the order, or whose clerk issued the process without an express order in the particular case; or it is an appellate court with power to review the decisions of such court, not only for its errors in assuming jurisdiction in cases of which it had not cognizance, but for its errors committed in cases of which it had unquestionable jurisdiction.

No other tribunal, whether of the same or another government, can with any propriety review such decisions or hold for nought such an order or such a writ. It is said a court can act only on the persons and things before it, and that its judgments against the absent reus are null and ineffectual. The ancients supposed it was necessary for the parties to be in fact before the tribunal and in the physical power of its officers; and it is still supposed with us that all the parties to be acted on, whether persons or things, must be in some wise before the court. Hence, when this does not appear nor can be made out by any construction, the judgment may be ineffectual. But this nullity of the action of the tribunal results from an entirely different principle from that involved in this case: in the case supposed it is assumed there was no reus in the power of the court in any mode, and thence inferred that the court, having nothing within its power, had not acted, and therefore there was no judgment. Whereas, the present question is not upon the effect of a judgment against process in a proper case when it has been made out by any construction, whether it had been effected in a mode or was in a position which subjected it to the jurisdiction of the court. The question is upon an order of the court for an attachment of the property of a defendant in a personal action, in order to have it brought into the custody of the court, and there, after due proceedings, subjected to what might be adjudged against the defendant; and the jurisdiction of the court to award such process in a proper case is unquestionable: therefore it can be objected against the attachment, only that the court had not jurisdiction of the cause, and therefore had not competent power to award the process. But it was adjudged by that court that it had jurisdiction of the cause. It had jurisdiction to make that decision, and this court has no jurisdiction to reverse that decision, and consequently must respect and give full effect to the process thereby awarded.

11. Aggression of courts and its consequence: It is supposed that this conclusion is sufficiently apparent on the direct argument, and that it is hardly worth while to state any other form of argument to confirm it; but a very few words will show that its contradictory would not only defeat the uniformity in the administration of justice to the extent of its operation, but would, if carried out, lead to consequences altogether intolerable. If this court can discuss and thereupon hold for nought, such an order and process of a state court, it might determine that the act of its officer in its execution had been a mere trespass, not only whilst the propriety of the process had remained unquestioned, or, when it might be afterwards adjudged in the state tribunal that it was not merely void, but only voidable, and was therefore a full justification of the officer, and that all he performed under it was valid and effectual, but even when it might be subsequently held by the state courts that the process was in all respects valid and regular.

This is however but a small portion of the evils which might result from the operation of such a principle. If it be necessary to show that the state court had jurisdiction of the case on which it awarded its process, pronounced its judgment, and directed its execution, actions might be maintained in this court by every alien and citizen of other states against the officers of the state on every case of an execution upon them or their property of a state process whether original, mesne, final, collateral, or incidental, where this court might be of opinion that the proceeding had been had on a case of which such court had not jurisdiction. This might be done notwithstanding the acts of such state magistrate were irrevocable in any superior tribunal. This court might have before it actions by the convicts of the state prisons, common jails, and work houses, against their keepers, even by a person possessed of a warrant from a court or commissioner of the United States, on a charge of an offense against the United States, and if in its opinion the indictment or case otherwise shown on which the process issued was not sufficient, he might be discharged and set at large. And on the same principle a state court might have brought to its bar the criminal in a state prison suffering the penalty of his public offense, adjudged against him by a court of the United States on a full trial at its bar, and if in its opinion an error had been committed in the construction of the constitution or an act of Congress, the criminal might be set at large to defy the government and its tribunals. In the end, even persons committed for open contempt, resistance, and obstruction of the orders and process of the courts of the United States might be discharged from its custody, and thus maintained in their rebellion against all government and order. It cannot but be perceived that such cases would raise the question whether any color of office would exempt persons thus obstructing the process and defeating the judgments of the courts of the United States from the penalties denounced by the acts of Congress against such offenders. But the subject will not be pursued. It had been supposed that the principle we have laid down was everywhere practically recognized: it is acted upon a thousand times every day, and it is impossible that its converse can ever obtain whilst men have common sense and judges are lawyers.

12. Term “defendant's property” in attachments: The only question then is, did the attachment command the sheriff to take these slaves? It did not do so by a term which designated them directly, and therefore the proposition, that it was done at all, can be established only by argument. The property only of John Manier, the elder, was what the sheriff was commanded to attack. If these slaves were the property of this Manier, then the sheriff was commanded to seize them—otherwise, not. The question then is, can this hypothesis be maintained? It is not averred in the plea, and nothing is found in the record which will supply the omission and warrant the assumption of the fact. It had been affirmed in the petition on which the attachment was obtained, in effect that the slaves had been the property of John Manier, the elder, and though it was averred that he had transferred them to the young Manier, yet it was charged that the sale was fraudulent against them, the creditors of the vendor; and, this record was not only referred to in the plea, but it was agreed by the counsel that this question, on the plaintiff's demurrer, should be considered exactly as if the record had been fully transcribed in the plea. The averments in the pleadings in a record which is set out in a plea are not averments in such plea. But in order that all the objects of the counsel in their liberal agreements may be fully attained, it will be supposed that this matter was all set forth in the plea in exactly the words it is alleged in the petition. The question then is, were the slaves, in this predicament, the property of John Manier the elder, in the sense of these words in the attachment? It is plain that if they, having been his property, were sold and transferred with the fraudulent intent to cheat, hinder, and delay his creditors, they did in some sense remain his property. That the property thus situated is the property of the fraudulent vendor in the sense of the terms of the writ of fieri facias against the estate, is unquestionable.

In such case the judgment creditor is allowed fictitiously to allege that no sale of such property has been made—in other words, that the sale was void and on this hypothesis a sale of it. The proposition will pass the title: the sheriff is therefore bound to seize and sell it as the property of the defendant. But such is not the rule in the case of this sort of attachment. It is a process before judgment, and such was never the effect of such process, whatever was its particular purpose—and the reason is that the term creditor in the rule of the common law and in the statutes which declare void donations, sales, and other transfers of property to the prejudice of creditors, signifies judgment creditors.

The sheriff was not authorized to seize such property on the ordinary mesne process of attachment prescribed by the common law. It was for the purpose of compelling the appearance of a defendant in order that the plaintiff might obtain a judgment; and the same was the rule in the execution of the mesne process of attachment prescribed by the former statute law of Kentucky. It was provided by this law, an act of 1797, that when the sheriff returned the writ to answer any civil action that the defendant was "not found," the plaintiff might have an alias, or, at his election, sue out an attachment against his estate, and if the sheriff returned that he had attached any goods of the defendant, the plaintiff should be entitled to judgment. Here the object was not exactly to compel the appearance of the defendant, but to warn him to appear and defend the action. It had been before concluded that an appearance of the defendant was not indispensable, and the execution of the attachment of his property having been substituted for the personal service of the citation, it entitled the plaintiff to judgment and in personam. Now, it was the settled rule in such cases that the return of the marshal must be positive that the goods attached were the property of the defendant. It never was imagined that under this law the sheriff could assume that the goods the defendant had transferred by donation or otherwise to the prejudice of his creditors, was still his property and that he could by its seizure entitle the plaintiff to such a judgment against an absent defendant.

There was in this case, it is true, a peculiar reason for confining the sheriff to the seizure of the property owned and claimed by the defendant. It is the disturbance of such property only the defendant is presumed to notice. But this reason was only accidental. The essential foundation of the rule in every species of this class of process is that no one but the judgment creditor has any right to question the validity of such transfers of property, and therefore no party in directing, nor any officer in the execution, of process prior to judgment, can assume that such sales and transfers are null and void. The attachment in this case is not in all respects the same with the two we have mentioned, but it is a process before judgment. It is a provisional remedy allowed to secure effects to satisfy a judgment expected to be thereafter recovered, and is therefore within the principle stated: There is a judgment for $25, recovered for costs for the continuance of the action for the debt in the Fayette circuit court, mentioned in the petition; but there had been no execution issued thereon and returned "No property found," as required by the Code to entitle the creditor to maintain such suit, and have such process, in another court; and it is not supposed the sum was sufficient to give such court jurisdiction: therefore it is not supposed this matter was any portion of the grounds on which the attachment was ordered; nor that it having been inserted in the petition, had any influence on the effect of the process.

13. "Defendant's property," in the Code. But this particular writ and proceeding was allowed and directed by a new law, and we must ascertain whether in its provisions there has been any alteration made in the general rules which have determined the effect of such process. It is allowed in every civil action, whether in equity or at common law, in eight several cases, and may be had either at the commence ment of the suit or at any time before judgment. It is not intended as a substitute for personal or constructive notice. We have seen that the law required the defendant to be summoned personally, or constructively warned to appear exactly as if no such process had issued. But its object is for the satisfaction of a judgment when obtained and to this end it directs the sheriff to attach an amount of the property of the defendant, or sufficient for this purpose, and authorizes the seizure in one mode or another of every species of effects movable or immovable, corporeal or incorporeal, in possession, expectancy, or in action, not exempt by law from execution. It will not be necessary to state the several directions for the execution of the process, or the proceedings upon it, because none of them has the slightest appearance of a departure from the principles mentioned except one. It declares that "an order of attachment binds the defendant's property in the county, which might be seized under an execution against him, from the time of the delivery of the order to the sheriff; and the lien of the plaintiff is completed upon any property or demand of the defendant by executing the order upon it in the manner directed in this article." Section 223. And it might be at first supposed that the object here was first to declare in what category or predicament of the property, in what mode of its relative ownership, in respect to the parties, it was subject to this process of attachment and to establish for the rule, that wherever it was in a condition of relative ownership which rendered it subject to seizure under a fieri facias on a judgment against a defendant, it was subject to the attachment against his property. But a very brief examination of the words and the context of the law will show that the purpose was altogether different. It had been just before declared that where there were several attachments against the same person they should be levied according to the order in which they had come to the hands of the sheriff and thereupon directions had been given how the seizure should be made of every species of property, effects, and demands. It was then intended—it appears—to recognize the established principle that every attachment had its effect upon the property attached from the date it was seized, and to make this the general rule. But it was designed that one class of property, consisting of goods and lands wherein the defendant had certain legal estate, and other such property within the county, should be affected and bound from the time the sheriff received the process which commanded him to make the seizure—therefore, in order to define this class of property without a tedious enumeration of the articles or other such inconvenient mode, it was declared that the attachment should bind such property of the defendant as might be seized and sold under execution from the day the sheriff received the process. In other words that the seizure, whenever made, should relate back to that day as in case of the execution. The object, it is manifest, was not to define the property nor the predicament of the property which was subject to be seized under the attachment, but merely to define the property which when attached was to be bound from the day when the sheriff first received the writ: and might have made the seizure. There is in fact no ambiguity in the enactment. But if it were subject to two constructions, it is an axiom that an ancient and well-established rule is not abrogated by adopting a doubtful construction of a new enactment which is not necessary to accomplish the manifest object of the law; and here there is no such necessity.

This Code of Practice provides a mode most facile in which the creditor in such cases may recover his debt and have his money levied with the greatest celerity, without at all departing from the rule in question. In his "ordinary" or common-law action against his debtor he is allowed, when necessary, to make defendants all the fraudulent vendees of his debtor's property, together with the debtors of his debtor; and thereupon have his injunction, attachment, or provisional seizure; and having thus had his debts secured by bonds for the forthcoming of the property or the delivery of it to a receiver of the court, he may proceed in the same time to prepare for the trial of his principal and all the incidental actions, bring them all on for trial at once, thereupon have both a judgment for his debt and an order for it to be levied or paid out of the attached objects. It might even happen that the court having in the meantime had the attached property sold by the receiver and its proceeds brought into court, the creditor would receive his money the same hour the judgment was recorded. Now there is certainly nothing in these provisions which favors the supposition that it was intended to alter the common law which had determined the effect of such an attachment or to afford an apology for an officer’s seizing property not within the terms of the writ. The plaintiff has a right, on a proper case, to have an order for process against the property of any defendants, for the conservation of the specific or determinate objects of property he seeks to subject to his demand.

These plaintiffs might have had an order enjoining John Manier, Jr., from selling or removing these slaves, with the requirement of a bond for the observance of the injunction, and an order that if such bond should not be given that the slaves should be seized and consigned to a receiver of the court. But they took an order for an attachment of the property of their debtor only, and which gave the sheriff no authority to seize the slaves sought to be subjected unless they were his property. But it was alleged—and it is now supposed and averred in this plea—that these slaves were his property, except that they had been sold and transferred, with intent to delay and defraud his creditors, to John Manier, the younger. But on this fact they were—as between the two parties—exactly as much the property of the younger Manier as if they had been born his property. No one had a right to question the validity of such sale but a judgment creditor. And there was no judgment. It follows that the seizure of them by the sheriff was not commanded by the attachment, and therefore did not carry the property into the custody of the court.

14. Rights affected by an action: But was the property otherwise so situated as to be exempt from the jurisdiction of this court? The suit in the state court was among other things to set aside a sale of the property by one defendant to the other, and to subject it to the demand of the plaintiff against the vendor. But the plaintiff in the action here was no party to that suit and therefore cannot be affected by its pendency, nor by any judgment that may be rendered in it, unless he derived his title to the property from one of the parties subsequent to the institution of that suit; and no such deduction of title is alleged. The plaintiff stands here affirming that he was himself the owner of the property, and complaining that it was wrongfully taken from him without the authority of any process of that action, demands his remedy. Has the court jurisdiction? or must it refer him to the court where these other persons are in controversy about their rights in or upon the property between themselves on grounds which it does not appear in any wise involve either him or his title? The statement of the question ought to be sufficient to suggest the answer.

15. Intervention and opposition, elective: The plaintiff had, no doubt, the right to go into the Clarke circuit court and there on his “Third Person’s Opposition” to the seizure and detention of his property under color of its process ask its surrender; or by intervention in the controversy there pending in respect to it, have its title established against the parties to that action. But had he not his election to bring his action elsewhere? The owner is not necessitated to intervene in an action between other persons concerning his property, but may institute his own action elsewhere against any of the parties who had taken or detained it from him, and on recovering a judgment have it specifically executed immediately, unless the property be in the custody of the other court—and in such case he may rest on his judgment until the determination of such suit: when if a defendant to his judgment shall have prevailed and obtained, or been restored to the possession, he may have the specific execution. This of course he might not be able to do if a party against whom he had not obtained such judgment prevailed; and in such case it might be necessary for the owner to commence a new action—hence the convenience of the intervention.

But here the defendant was no party to any such suit, nor was the property in the custody of any court. This is the whole case: The plaintiff’s slaves were sold by one man to another; a third party, alleging this sale was fraudulent as to him, brought his action against the vendor and vendee, did not obtain an attachment against the slaves but against the property of the vendor: under this process the slaves were seized and detained by the sheriff. Was his only remedy by appearing in a court which had no custody of his property, and there opposing the wrongful actions of its officers, or intervening in a cause where his rights were not in litigation? He had his election, and this court has jurisdiction. The demurrer is sustained. The defendant may answer over.

NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE v. NATIONAL BANK OF MISSOURI.

[The Public (N. Y.) Oct. 10, 1878, p. 229.]

NATIONAL BANKS — POWER TO BORROW MONEY — LOANS TO DIRECTORS.

[A national bank may borrow money for the purpose of lending the same again to others with a view to making a profit. It may lend money, in good faith, without any fraudulent intent, to its directors as well as to others, provided the amount so loaned does not exceed the limitation of one-tenth of the capital stock actually paid in. Therefore one national bank, which loans money to another, knowing that the latter intends to loan the same to its directors, may recover the same from the borrowing bank, if it had no knowledge of any fraudulent intent in making the loans to the directors, even though the directors failed to repay the same.]

[Cited in brief in Sellem v. Charlottesville Nat. Bank, Case No. 12,642.]

This was an action at law by the National Bank of Commerce, of New York, against the National Bank of Missouri, of St. Louis, which suspended in June, 1877, to recover $400,000 and accrued interest, the remainder of a loan of $1,000,000 made by the plaintiff to the defendant. In 1869 James B. Eads, James H. Britton, John J. Roe, Charles K. Dickson, Amos Cotting, Barton Bates, and John A. Ubssell, the directors of the National Bank of Missouri, borrowed $1,000,000 of the circulating notes of the National Bank of Commerce. The claim for the unpaid balance was presented to the receiver of the defunct bank, and he declined to allow it, on the ground that the bank had not borrowed the money, but that it was borrowed by the above-named directors, and used by them for their individual benefit, and that the bank did not enjoy the advantage of the loan. An attempt was also made to show that the defendant had no right to borrow money to loan again, and that a loan of this character was illegal, and known to the plaintiff to be illegal when made. It was shown, in effect, that when the negotiations with the Bank of Commerce were opened, Mr. Eads and the other gentlemen named were not directors of the State Bank, but by large purchases of the stock became possessors of a majority and elected themselves directors October 31, 1869, and that the loan was completed in the name of the bank by contract dated December 29, 1869, by the newly-elected directors. Testimony was given to show that the loan was made only for the use of the directors, because the bank itself had at the time $1,000,000 in cash and $850,000 in bonds on deposit with the Bank of Commerce, and it was part of the contract that this deposit should remain as security until the loan was paid.

30 Fed.Cas.—71

The testimony adduced in the case shows that the $1,000,000 loan was made by the defendant a special account entered in a book entitled “Bank of Commerce, No. 2.” The directors gave their check on the funds of the pool and drew out money till it was all exhausted except $3,000, which stands to-day on their credit on the books of the suspended bank. These directors returned to the pool the amount that was paid back to the New York bank,—namely, $600,000,—but had paid back none of the balance of $400,000.

Dillon, Circuit Judge (charging jury). Under the pleadings, the defendant’s counsel conceded at the opening of the trial that the plaintiff was entitled to the sum of $400,000 with 6 per cent. interest, amounting in all to the sum of $445,582.10, unless the defendant established one or both of its special defences to the action, and accordingly the defendant assumed the burden of proof to make out such defences. The defendant has accordingly produced its evidence, and at its close the plaintiff’s counsel moves the court for a direction to the jury that such evidence has failed to establish these, or either of them, and that, notwithstanding the defendant’s evidence, and all inferences which the jury can legitimately or properly draw from it, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict.

The defences relied on are two:
1. That the contract of December 29, 1869, between the defendant bank and others, and which is the basis of this suit, and under which the $1,000,000 was lent by the plaintiff bank, is ultra vires the lawful power of the defendant bank; that is to say, that this contract was one which the defendant bank had no power, under its charter, to make under any circumstances, or, at all events, had no power to make except in case the situation and exigency of its affairs required it to borrow money, and that its situation was such that it did not need to borrow this large sum of money, or any other sum of money, and that knowledge of this fact is, by the evidence, fairly brought home to the plaintiff bank. I am of opinion that a national banking association has, under the national banking act [13 Stat. 99], the power to borrow money, and that the defendant bank, in the absence of fraud brought to the knowledge of plaintiff bank, had the power to enter into the contract of December 29, 1869, which is the foundation of this action. The legal power of the bank to borrow money does not depend upon any exigency or upon the existence of a critical condition of its affairs, or upon an actual necessity for the immediate use of the sum borrowed. It may borrow money to conduct and carry on the business of banking, and it may borrow for the express purpose of lending the same, either by discounting the notes, bills, etc., of others or on personal security, with a view to profit by the transaction. The loan of money to a national bank is not invalid because the lender may know or have reason to believe that the borrowing bank intends to lend it, when received, to others. A national bank may lend its money to its directors as well as to other persons, provided it acts in good faith and does not exceed the limitation to any one person or director of "one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of the association actually paid in." There is no claim that this limitation was exceeded in this case, as the capital stock of the bank was $3,410,000 actually paid in. If the law were that a national bank could not borrow money for the purpose of lending the same again to its directors, and that if the lender knew that such was the purpose of the borrowing bank, the transaction would necessarily be invalid. I admit that the evidence in the case is such as to justify the court to submit the question of the plaintiff's knowledge of such a purpose to the jury. But I am of opinion that where no fraud is intended a national bank may lend its money to its directors, and the fact that the lender knows, or has reason to believe, that when the money he lends is received it will be lent to the directors, does not, unless he knows, or has good reason to believe, that a fraudulent use or disposition of it is contemplated by the directors when received, invalidate the transaction. The directors had no more power over the $1,000,000 obtained under the contract in suit than they had over the $1,000,000 which the defendant bank had on ordinary deposit with the plaintiff bank, or over the $3,000,000 of capital actually paid in. A lender cannot knowingly aid an intended fraud, but he is not required not to lend because the borrowing bank may misuse their powers.

2. The second defence is that the money was procured by the defendant's directors (who signed the contract in suit professedly as sureties), not for the bank, but for their own purposes, and that they fraudulently made use of the name of the defendant bank as principal, intending all the time illegally to appropriate the money, when received, to their own use, and that the plaintiff bank had knowledge of such intended illegal appropriation of the money. These facts, if established, would constitute a defence, but after carefully considering all of the evidence touching this matter, I think that while it would justify the jury in finding that the directors of the defendant bank, when the money was received, intended to borrow the same from the bank of which they were directors, and thus get the use of it, I can see no basis in the evidence which would justify the jury in finding that the plaintiff bank knew that the directors of the defendant bank, when the money was received, intended to make any fraudulent use or disposition of it. If the jury should so find, I shall deem it my duty to set aside their verdict, and hence there is no propriety in uselessly submitting this question to them. I therefore instruct you, gentlemen of the jury, that the defences relied on have failed, and that you shall return a verdict for the plaintiff.

The jury brought in a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $445,582. The case has been appealed to the United States supreme court, the receiver of the National Bank of Missouri having been made a party defendant.

[1 Wall. Jr. App. 1123;]

BOUNDARIES—DELAWARE AND NEW JERSEY.
The territory of the State of Delaware within the "twelve miles circle" extends across the Delaware river to low water mark on the Jersey shore.

About the year 1783-84, there appeared at low tide in the Delaware river, about five miles below Cape Codd, an island of about 57 acres, which in consequence of a tradition that a vessel laden with pitch had sunk on the spot where the island afterwards rose, got the name of the "Pea Patch Island." In 1784, the proprietaries of West Jersey bought this island, describing it as situate in Salem County, New Jersey, to persons whose title became afterwards vested in Dr. Henry Gale of that state; and by act of the legislature, relinquished to Dr. Gale whatever interest it might have in the island. It had previously declared that its west boundary, at this place, came to the middle of the main channel of the Delaware river, a location which, as the main channel was then supposed to run, included the Pea Patch Island as within the territory of New Jersey. In 1803, the state of Delaware, by an act of its legislature, conveyed the island to the United States, who soon after took possession of it and began to erect a fortress upon it. In consequence of these two grants, a controversy as to the right to the island began between Dr. Gale, claiming under the title of New Jersey, and the United States claiming under the title of New York.

In the ordinary case of dispute as to title between an individual and the government, the matter would not have attracted public notice; but this case differed in several respects from an ordinary case. In the first place, it brought in question the boundary of the states of New Jersey and Delaware; and to common apprehension it brought, moreover, some disparagement to one state or the other, both of which had apparently treated the island as within its own limits; and both of which, it was asserted, had granted it away, as its own property. Public attention was moreover directed to the matter from the accidental position of the island itself. Above it lie many principal towns or cities of the three states of Delaware, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, which could be readily devastated by an enemy's fleet unless the river was protected from below, whatever happened, from the width, the course, or the shifting character of the Delaware channel, that there is scarcely any point of the island by the United States during the war of 1812, but was destroyed by fire some years after. And all the towns along the Delaware river, lying, as already stated, naked to attack from any enemy who should pass up it, were kept in great uneasiness during those many years in which the "Maine Boundary," the "French Indemnity," the "Lili-Bed Arrest" and the "Oregon Boundary" had kept our relations with the two great naval powers of France and England in uncertainty, and put them, at times, in danger of immediate rupture. Of course, they were constantly implying congress to complete or rebuild the fortresses upon this island, as all agreed, where an adequate defence could be erected; while at the same time the New Jersey claimants would appear with assertions of title to the island, fortified by written opinions from the law officers of the government itself, and by remonstrances from citizens of New Jersey against such an invasion of their territory as was contemplated by assuming possession of the island, except under grant of the individual property. In addition to this, the matter had attracted attention from a great number of unsuccessful attempts—necessarily public in one or other department and by congress to settle it; from an uncommon number of opinions of directly opposite conclusion, from lawyers of public name, both those connected with government and those in private station; and finally from two judgments in two different circuits of the United States, which were, like two edicts, and under which, in a suit between the same parties, the harmonious operation of the federal courts was made the witness of a marshal of one district turning out of possession the tenants who had lately been put in by the marshal of another. It would unnecessarily encumber this preliminary history of the case to record the various presidential recommendations, the reports of committees, the opinions of district attorneys, solicitors of the treasury and attorneys general of the United States, the congressional debates, and the various abortive agreements entered into by the departments with a view to a settlement of the question. It would be the history of litigation and claim diligently pursued for three and thirty years; and which at last by opinions and agreements, verdicts and legislation, had knotted and tied itself into such a complication of tangles, that it seemed past the possibility of any ordinary process of law to unfold and draw it straight. And when it was remembered that opinions of directly opposite conclusion on the title, had been given by Messrs. Rodney and Geo. Read of Delaware, by Messrs. Richard Stockton, McLure, Southard, G. D. Wall and J. S. Green of New Jersey, by Mr. Willis Hall of New York and Messrs. Penrose and Gilpin, solicitors of the treasury, and finally by Messrs. B. F. Butler and Legare, attorneys general of the United States, it was not wonderful that both congress and claimant should nearly give over in despair; all hope of coming to a satisfactory conclusion that the petitioner should have been wary of invoking the attention of congress, and that congress should have been impetuous in listening to the prayers of the petitioner!

In this state of long protracted litigation and treaty, on the 8th of August, 1846, when the Oregon boundary had lately been given to our relations with Great Britain a monarchical

1 [Reported by John William Wallace, Esq.]

2 Hon. G. D. Wall, D. A. U. S. for New Jersey, J. S. Green, Esq., holding at a later date, the same office, and Mr. H. F. Butler, A. G. U. S., have given their opinions in favour of the right of Mr. Humphrey, claiming under the state of New Jersey.
The case as it appeared on both sides was as follows, as reported by the court: "Title of Mr. Humphrey: On the 12th March, 1863–64, England being at that time at war with the Dutch, Charles H. by letters patent, granted in fee to his brother James, Duke of York, all that part of the main land of New England, beginning at St. Croix next to the Island Sambaica, &c., &c., and also that island called Matawock or Long Island, situate to the west of Cape Cod, being the principal parts of the said island, lands, and premises belonging and appertaining, with their appurtenances, and all our estate, &c., of, in and to the said lands and premises or any part or parcel thereof, with powers of execution in extenso, and to exercise them, not only within the precincts of the said territories and islands, but also upon the seas in going and coming to and from the same, as the duke and his assigns, &c., should think for the good of the adventurers and inhabitants there; with further power to admit any persons to trade and traffic unto and within the said parts of the said islands, and to encounter, expulse, repel and resist by force of arms, as well by sea as by land, all persons who should pretend to have any wise appertaining, as fully as the duke himself had them. Leasing &c. Laws N. J. 3–8. The object of this grant was to enable the duke to dispose of the Dutch, who were then in possession of much of New York, New Jersey and Delaware, under the name of New Netherland." that on the 7th November, 1743, the proprietors of West Jersey—in which portion of the state the Pea Patch Island was admitted to be, if in any—directed their surveyor to survey, &c., "600 acres of unappropriated land," any where in that division, and, on the 7th August, 1782, to survey 5000 acres of like land, in the same division: and that two persons named Hall, having acquired 126 acres of the warrant and a half miles and about south half a point west from the Tile house at New Castle; containing one hundred and seventy-eight acres of marsh land, bank and mud flats and allowance for roads." This survey was returned on the 27th of the same month, and being approved by the council of proprietors, was recorded accordingly. At the date of this survey the Pea Patch was just visible at low water, "about of 1782, and 521/29 acres of that of 1743, caused a survey to be made on the 8th October, 1784, on an "island," as appeared by the return of survey, "called the Pea Patch, situated in the county of Salem, about one mile west from Flint's Point, in Penn's Neck, and is about west of the mouth of Salem creek, a little above Reedy Point; also nearly south-east and by east from Hamburgh, about two the size of a man's hat." As the tide rose it was covered by water, and even in 1815, when the government of the United States took possession of it and embanked it, it was not unfrequently under water at high tide. In February, 1815, the title of the Halls was vested in Dr. Gale, through whom Mr. Humphrey claimed by a regular chain. On the 24th November, 1834, the Pea Patch, having become, in the meantime, by alluvion deposit and embankment, a large lake, and entirely above the point to which the tide rises even in its highest elevation, the state of New Jersey passed an act, on or near the shore of Henry Gale, his heirs and assigns, all the right and title of the state of New Jersey of, and to an island called the Pea Patch, situate in the river Delaware, and the title of New Jersey, treating with the lords of the council of trade and foreign plantations about a surrender of the island, and that by reason thereof doubts have arisen concerning the title of the said Henry Gale, enacts that "all the right and title of the said state of New Jersey to the said Pea Patch, situate in the river Delaware, in the township of Lower Penn's Neck, in the county of New Castle, and in the jurisdiction of the state of Delaware, as mentioned in the original survey of the island, be granted and conveyed to the said Henry Gale, or to his assigns, aforesaid, and by them and their assigns in full and ample a manner as the state of New Jersey hath right and title to grant and convey the same," reserving jurisdiction and sovereignty, &c. 2 Harrison's Laws N. J. 360.

In order to show that the deeds from the king's attorney to the Duke of York, or the Duke of York to the seven barons, have been considered and acted upon from early times as not limiting the state of New Jersey to low water mark in the Delaware river, or at any rate that the state had never been so bounded de facto, Mr. Humphrey's counsel added several statutes and publick facts and records of that state, as follows:

March 3, 1768, the proprietaries of West New Jersey—William Penn himself being one of those—issued a charter and agreement, which constituted a sort of charter or fundamental law, grant convenient portions of land for wharves, keys and harbours; and that all lands laid out for that purpose shall be exempt from taxes; and that the inhabitants of the province have free passage through or by any seas, bays, creeks, rivers, rivulets in the said province, through or by which they must necessarily pass to come from the main to any part of the province aforesaid. And, further, that all the inhabitants within the said province have liberty of fishing in Delaware river. Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 380; also, to the same effect, id. 409.

In 1679 and 1680, Sir Edmund Andrus, the governor for the Duke of York, of the colony of New York, which had been conveyed (inter alia with New Jersey) to the duke, by King Charles II. imposed a duty of ten per cent. upon all English goods and wares landed into the Delaware, which was collected at the Hoar Kilis, or Lewistown, as it is now called. But it was discontinued at the instance of the proprietors of New Jersey, who, in their remonstrance, insists that they have a right to land any where in the Delaware Bay, as the bounds of the country they bought; that the right of colonizing was part of their bargain; that they bought the soil and right of government together; and that the proprietors of the state limited them to erect no polity contrary to the laws of England; and that, with this restriction, they had the right of planting laws on the good of the adventurer and planter; that if the duke claims it by the jus regale, that power over the territory contained between the Delaware and his alienees. Smith, Hist. N. J. 116.

In 1682, the legislature of New Jersey resolved that the land and government of West New Jersey be purchased together. Smith,Hist. N. J. 163.

On the 3d October, 1693, the assembly of West New Jersey passed an act reciting that the wheribly in Delaware Bay has been in so great a measure invaded by strangers and for- eigners, that the greatest part of the oil, &c., got by that employ, has been exported out of the province, &c.; and enacting that all persons not residing in the province, nor within the province of Pennsylvania, who shall kill or bring on shore any whale or whale oil or fish from Delaware Bay or elsewhere within the boundaries of this province, &c., shall pay one-tenth of the oil, &c., to the governor, &c. Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 510.

In 1701, or 1702, the legislature of New Jersey, acting under the provisions of government of the state, which was then contemplated, request the king to confirm to them certain rights and privileges, among which is that of having and «eriting a fishery or whaling rights in the Delaware river, and that the state shall be forfeited, found or taken within East New Jersey or by the inhabitants thereof, within the sea or ocean of the state of Pennsylvania, was revived conditionally, with a supplement to it passed in 1769, in the year 1771. Allinson's Laws N. J. 379, 313, 367. Pennsylvania did not pass any similar act, and the act of New Jersey not having become operative, nothing beyond its title is given in the volume referred to.

On the 21st December, 1771, the same legislature passed "An act declaring the river Delaware a common highway for the purposes of navigation in the said river." Allinson's Laws N. J. 347. It recites that the improving the navigation on rivers is of great importance to trade and Office; and that this river may be rendered much more navigable than it now is; that many persons, desirous to promote the publick welfare, had subscribed large sums of money for the purpose aforesaid, and that it was represented others will do the same if commissioners are appointed to receive subscriptions. It then enacts that "the river Delaware shall be and is hereby declared to be a common highway for the purposes of navigation up and down the same." It then appoints commissioners to collect subscriptions, and "so much of the said moneys as may be necessary shall be paid for that purpose; and towards improving the navigation in the said river Delaware, from the lower part of the river Delaware, from the lower part of the river Delaware, from the lower part of the river Delaware, from the falls near Trenton to the river Lehigh at Easton; and the residue thereof shall be applied for and towards improving the navigation in that part of the said river, above the said necessary places, and the river Lehigh;" and then enacts that the commissioners, &c., shall have "full power and authority to clear, scour, open, enlarge, straighten, or deepen the aforesaid river, whenever it shall to them appear useful for improving the channels; and also to remove any obstructions whatsoever, either natural or artificial, which may or can in any manner hinder or impede the navigation in the said river; and to make and set up in the said river any dams, pene for water-locks, or any other works whatsoever, and to erect every necessary and fit thing, shall think fit: and also to appoint, set out and make near the said river, paths or ways, which shall be free and open for all persons having occasion to use the in 1674, and in 1680, Delaware, the navigation of the river." It afterwards (section 6) "makes it penal to hinder the commis- sion and obstruct the navigation of the river:" and, by section 6, that "every offence committed in or on the said river, against this act, shall be laid to be committed, and may be tried and determined as aforesaid in any of the counties opposite to or joining on that part of the said river, on which such offence shall be committed.

On the 28th November, 1822 the legislature of New Jersey passed an act relative to certain of its boundaries, in which it was enacted that the west boundary of certain counties, including Salem county, in which the Pea Patch was to be omitted, and the east or south boundary of the said county, as formerly, "from the mouth of the Pea River, Delaware," 2 Harrison's Laws N. J., 39, § 4. On the other hand, there were certain publi- cations of New Jersey which looked as if the state had considered that its west boundary came to but to low water mark in the river.

Title of the United States: At the date of the letters patent of March 12, 1664-65, already mentioned, from Charles II. to the Duke of York; the Dutch were in actual possession of New York, a portion of New Jersey and much of both sides of the original course of Delaware bay and river; all which they held under the name of New Netherlands. To put the Duke of York in possession of this newly acquired estates, an English fleet was sent out under the command of Col. Richard Nicolls, who styles himself "principal commissioner for his majesty in all England, and New Jersey having been conquered by the Dutch since the deeds of the Duke of York, 2d and 24th June, 1664, and restored again to England—the duke, by the treaty of Breda, granted to the crown to him, and with a view, it is probable, to prevent any question of title, regrants the same to the province of New York, and, as aforesaid, did not claim it on its west boundary, not as in the former deed, as "having on the west, Delaware river," but, in one deed, as extending "alone," and, in another, as running "in" the Delaware. Lea- ming & S. Laws N. J. 47, 414. In February, 1681, the commissioners for settling and regulating lands in West Jersey agree, with the approbation of the governor and council, that the surveyor shall measure the front of the river Delaware, beginning at Ams- phere creek, which empties into the Delaware at Trenton, and "from thence down to Cape May," and that every ten proprietors shall have ten miles of river counted on by the river. Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 436.

In July, 1683, the assembly of West Jersey enacted that the patent of the province of Pennsylvania be treated with in reference to the rights and privileges of this province "to or in the river Delaware." Leaming & S. Laws N. J. 480.

So on the 21st January, 1709, the general as- sembly of New Jersey passed "An act for di- viding and ascertaining the boundaries of all the counties in this province," which recites that by the uncertainty of the boundaries of the counties of the province, great inconveniences have arisen to that end that any revenue officers of most of those counties cannot know the limits of them: For preventing which in time to come, and the better ascertainment of the boundaries, it enacts, &c. "after having settled the boundaries of other counties as running "to" or "by" or "up" or "down" the Delaware bay or river, the bounds of Salem county begin "at the mouth" of a certain creek which empties into Delaware Bay. The act then carries the boundary round by the said "certain lines to Delaware river, then down Delaware river and bay to the place of beginning." 3 It is to be remarked, how- ever, that where counties are divided by creeks

3 or rivers, this act frequently brings the boundary of such counties only to those creeks or rivers on both sides, without extending the boundaries to that many of those creeks and rivers were left beyond any county jurisdiction whatever, until that matter was changed by an act of the legislature, declaring the jurisdiction of the several counties in this state, which are divided by rivers, creeks, bays, highways or roads." Id. In 1873, commissioners having been appointed by Pennsylvania, for the purpose of settling the jurisdiction of the river Delaware and is, &c. In 1873, of the said county, New Jersey made an agreement, regulating the jurisdiction, &c., and treating the rights of the two states in the river as about equal, down to the upper portion of the twelve miles circle; which agreement was soon after ratified (by New Jer-sey, May 21, 1788; by Pennsylvania, September 20, 1858, Id. 41) by these two states and has regulated the matter ever since.

4 A. D. 1667; 4 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 74. Several of the documents of which evidence was taken, are found in this valuable repository; but more legal evidence of them was given before the arbitrator. Ancient records were produced, being based on them, apparently, which were given in evidence before Lord Hardwicke in 1765, on the hearing of Penn v. Le- d. Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sr. 147. So when the Swedish began to fortify the Delaware, about the year 1640, the director general of the New Netherland, resident at New York, sent the following general, advertises the Swedish commander, that the "whole South river has been many years in our possession, and above and below settled by our forts and also secured by our blood." Id. So in 1646, the director general, allowed certain persons to settle upon the South river, on condition that they acknowledge the director and his council for their lords and patrons, and submit to all taxes which they have laid or may lay. Id. 119. And there was produced before the arbitrator, ancient records of five Dutch patents for lands in Delaware, emanating from Governor Stuyvesant at New York, between the years 1664 and 1685, and re- corded there (Id. 119, 120), which titles, Mr. Clayton informed the arbitrator, are recognized as valid in Delaware to this day. Other Dutch records from New York showed that in 1663 instructions were issued from the director general there, 'for the vice director in the South river and the commissioners join'd with them," in which minute directions are given as to the places in which lands are to be granted and stripped of their out settlers (Id. 52), with various other instructions showing that the district had a very close and depending relation upon the government at New York as a principal. At the conclusion of the treaty, the Delaware country apparently stood in regard to the Dutch government at New York, when the latter surrendered the Fout and made the conveyance of the patents to the crown, and with the surrender of the principal government at New York, Sir Robert Carre had no difficulty, on the 1st October, 1664, in procuring a surrender of the settlement on the Delaware.

New York continued to be, under the English, as it had been under the Dutch, the seat of a prince-monarch on the Delaware, a possession of the English government, and authority there, acting under a sort of double or mixed authority derived partly from the king and partly from the company. A variety of commissions and other publick documents, for example, were produced from Col. Nicolls, and other English governors there, granting lands in Delaware to the proprietors of the country, and pointing collectors of customs, and doing various publick acts not necessary to be stated. In eight of them, including the patents of land, there was no recital of the authority under which the act proceeded to be done. In ten others, the authority of them commissions to judicial office, there was a reference to "his majesty's service," or to power derived from "his majesty's" act being sometimes done in his name. In others, including one of a grant of land, of which however the rent was reserved to the king—the power under which the act proceeded to be derived from the Duke of York. Two others recited a joint or double authority; being "by virtue of his majesty's letters patent, and the commission and authority given unto me by his royal highness." And a third one, a proclamation by Governor Andros, one of the British government, on the same occasion, of New York, from the Dutch—went as follows: "Whereas, it hath pleased his majesty and his royal highnesses, to send me with authority to receive this place and government, and to continue in command thereunder of his royal highness, who hath given me his command for securing the rights and properties of the inhabitants, and that I should endeavoured by all meeting means the good and welfare of this province and dependencies under my command," 4 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 55-57, 73-75, 81, 82. So again, when the Delaware country surrendered to Sir Robert Carre, Oct. 1, 1664, protection was to be afforded to all who "shall take the oath of allegiance to his majesty." While in directions from Gov. Nicolls and his council at New York, in 1668, "for the better settlement of the government on the Delaware," the newly appointed counsellors are to take the oaths to his royal highness; whose laws as administered by him, are ordered to be shewed and frequently communicated to them, the said counsellors, and others. Id. 37, 38.

A fact is also mentioned in the arbitrator in his opinion, as illustrative of some title in the duke, to wit, that after Mr. Penn, March 4, 1690-91, had obtained letters patent from Charles II. of England for the province of Pennsylvania, he took a release, August 21, 1692, from the Duke of York for the same premises.

But notwithstanding the great research of the counsel of the United States, aided by several other persons connected with historical research and curiosities—who the interest of the case had induced to study it—nothing precise was shewn as to the source from which the duke claimed to derive the power which it was in evidence that he actually exercised over the district now known as Delaware. Whether the duke was under the same mistake as Lord Baltimore, who, as late as 1728, in a letter to the Governor of Maryland, v. Baltimore, swears that country is "on the east side" of the bay; which would have brought it within the limits of the king's patent of March 12, 1663-4: Whether—taken in connection with the known object of the grant, which was the dispossession of the Dutch from all this region—and not it passed under the clause of the patent, which gave him power to encounter and expulse, as well by sea as by land, any person or persons, or attempt to "inhabit within the several precincts and limits" of the territories granted with full appurtenances and with power to govern them: Whether he thought that the king's patent on the Delaware, having been at all times, and at the very date of the conquest of New York, a judgment that of that latter place, necessarily followed its course and fortune, and so passed into his hands by the terms of his patent, which gave him New York, and all powers of government over the country conveyed and all its appurtenances: Whether there might have been something, in some commission, or some instruction, giving the king to the English commander, which two centuries now rose up to hide from view, and by which the title by conquest was transferred to the duke and not to the crown: Whether the duke considered that he had no title in law, and as conqueror, meaning to procure or make at some future time, a confirmation of what he did: Or whether, finally, he exercised the more usual privilege of royal and noble blood, or by which he was not to undergo the fatigue of thinking any thing about the subject: This was all matter on which speculation might exercise its ingenuity, but on which the case itself extended no direct evidence.

However, possessing either a good title, an imperfect one, or no title at all, the Duke of York did, on the 24th of August, 1652, by a deed of feoffment with liberty of seisin, convey to William Penn, in fee, "all that the town of New Castle, otherwise called Delaware, and all that tract of land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles about the same, situate, lying and being upon the river Delaware, to the westward of America; and all the islands in the said river Delaware, and the said river and soil thereof, 5 It would appear probable that no very precise notion was had by the duke himself or his governours, perhaps, as to the nature and extent of his right here, but Sir John Werden, his intelligent agent, seems to have regarded it as a sort of pre-empion right rather than as a patent title. When Mr. Penn was applying for a grant of Pennsylvania, the board of trade on the 16th June, 1683, refer his petition, before acting on it, to Sir John Werden, to know whether such a grant as Mr. Penn wanted, "would any way intrude upon the patent of his royal highness or otherwise prejudice the same." Sir John replies: "by all which I can observe of the boundaries mentioned in Mr. Penn's petition, they agree well enough with that colony or plantation which hath been hitherto (ever since the conquest) called Col. Nicolls, held under the name of the Duke of York the province of Pennsylvania, or more particularly New Castle colony, that being the name of a principal place in it: the whole being planted promiscuously by Swedes, Finiards, Dutch, and English; all which hath been actually under the government of his royal highness at New York hitherto. But what are its proper boundaries, those of intradet the boundary being very little known, or so ill observed, as experience tells us in all the West Indies.) I am not able to say. If this be what Mr. Penn would have, I should only add the right honourable the lords of the committees for trades and plantations, will not encourage any opinion to the contrary, as to its being hitherto by the Duke of York, and would not prove to be strictly within the limits of the duke's patent; but if it be, & c., & c." Letter of June 22, 1683. 1 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 274.
lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle of twelve miles about the said town, together with all rents, services, royalties, franchises, jurisdiction and all the estates, &c. "to have and to hold the said town and circle of twelve miles of land about the said town, and lands and islands in and about the premises with the appurtenances" to Penn in fee: after which he constitutes John Moll and Ephraim Herman, "jointly and either of them severally," his attorneys, and so gives them full powers for him and in his name and stead to enter into the premises granted, and every part of them to take quiet and peaceable possession or seizin of them, or any part or parcel in the name of the whole: And after taking such quiet and peaceable possession, to deliver the same to William Penn, his heirs and assigns, or to his and their lawful attorney. Ratifying, approving, &c.

On the same day, by a second deed of feoffment with livery of seizin, conveyed to William Penn, in fee, "all that tract of land upon Delaware river, beginning on Cape Henlopen, together with free and undisturbed use and passage into and out of all harbours, bays, waters, rivers, islands and inlets, belonging to or adjoining said tract, together with all sorts of minerals, and all the estate, interest, royalties, franchises, powers, privileges and immunities whatsoever of his said royal highness therein or in or unto any part or parcel thereof." Then there was a covenant for further assurance, and an appointment of Moll and Herman to be attorneys to deliver possession and seizin to Penn exactly as in the former deed.

It further appeared from an ancient record in the county of Philadelphia, made 28th August, 1701, that on the 28th of October, 1682, as they certify under their hands and seals, in the name of the said John Moll and other persons, "being inhabitants of the town of New Castle upon Delaware river, having heard the indenture read, made between his royal highness, James Duke of York and Albany, &c., and William Penn, Esq., governor and proprietor of the province of Pennsylvania, &c., wherein the said duke transformeth his right and title to New Castle and twelve miles circle about the same, with all powers and jurisdiction, and services thereunto belonging unto the said William Penn, and having been seen by the said duke's appointed attorneys, John Moll and Ephraim Herman, both of New Castle, possession given, and by our Governor William Penn, Esq., possession taken, whereby we," says the record, "are made subjects under the said Duke William of Orange, and do hereby, in the presence of God, solemnly promise to yield him all just obedience, and to live quietly and peaceably under his government."

It appeared further from an ancient record, made at the same time, in the same office, that the same A. &c., and La Grange and eight other persons made a memorandum under their hands, October 28, 1682, that on that day and year "William Penn, gentleman, by virtue of a certain instrument of indenture, signed and sealed by his royal highness, James Duke of York, &c., did then and there demand possession of the seizin of John Moll, Esq., and Ephraim Herman, gentlemen (attorneys constituted by his said royal highness), of the town of New Castle, otherwise called Delaware, within the circle or compass of the said town: that the possession and seizin was accordingly given by the said attorneys to the said William Penn, according to the usual form, by delivery of the fort of the said town, and leaving the said William Penn in quiet and peaceable possession thereof, and also by the delivery of turf and twig, and water and fowl of the river Delaware, and that the said William Penn remained in the peaceable possession of the premises."

Next an ancient record, made at the same time and place, the original of which was made in Delaware River seizin, by the Duke of York and ten other persons, November 7, 1682, which, after reciting the duke's deed to William Penn for the territory beginning two miles south from the town of New Castle, the power of attorney to Moll and Herman, and that Mr. Penn had substituted Captain William Markham, saying twelve miles south from the said town, for him of that tract, proceeds to testify and declare that livery of seizin was delivered of it also; that the said officers subscribed to the document, on the day of the date thereof, "have been present and seen, that they the said John Moll and Ephraim Herman, in pursuance of his said oath, and by virtue of the power given them by his said royal highness, James Duke of York and Albany, &c., and in the above mentioned instrument of indenture, bearing date as above, have given and delivered actual possession unto the said Captain William Markham, to the sole use and behoof of the said William Penn, (of part in the name of the whole), of the land, soil and premises in the said instrument of indenture mentioned, and according to the true intent and meaning of his said royal highness mentioned in the same."

Next came another ancient record, without date, however, from the office for recording of deeds, &c., at New Castle, Delaware; being an account by John Moll, himself, one of the persons named in the above record, of his own part in delivering seizin of both tracts to Mr. Penn, of the mode in which he did this duty. As this quaint document has not perhaps been in print, and may not be without interest to the historian, it is here inserted in the same form in which it was given in evidence.

"These are to certify all whom it may concern that William Penn, Esq., Proprietor and Governor of the provinces of Pennsylvania and the territories thenceunto belonging at his first arrival from England by the Town of New Castle upon Delaware River in the month of October anno 1682 did send them and there our messenger aforesaid to give notice to the Commissioners of his desire to speak with them and deliver unto the said Commissioners att' which time Esq. Penn did show me two sundry Indentures or Deeds of Enfeoffment from under the hand and seal of his Royal Highness for the land and premises (to be date the 28th day of August Anno 1682 the one for the county of New Castle with twelve miles distance North and South belonging and the other beginning twelve miles below New Castle and extending South unto Cape Henlopen together with the mills and waters of the said River, Bay, Rivulets and the Islands thereunto belonging &c. underneath both which the Indenture of Deed by which were added his Royal highness letters of attorney directed unto me and Ephraim Herman directed with full power and authority for the use and benefit in his Royal Highness name unto the said William Penn Esqr quiet and peaceable possession of all that was Inserted in the said Indenture as aforesaid &c. by the sd. Eph. Herman happened to be gone from home so that he was not at that time abroad with the sd. authority; I therefore from Esqr Penn four and twenty hours consideration for to communicate with the sd Herman and the rest of the Commissioners about the premises. In which case some of time we did unanimously agree to comply with his Royal Highnesses orders whereupon by virtue of the power given unto us by the above mentioned letters of Attorney We did give and surrender in the name of his Royal Highness unto him the said land and water and all the Island and peaceable possession of the fort of New Castle by giving him the key thereof to lock upon himself and in like manner again We did deliver also unto him one turt with a twig upon it a porridge with River water and Boyle in part of all what was specified in the Indenture of Infinitum from his Royal Highness according to the true intent and meaning thereof. And few days after which we went to the house of Capt. Edmund Cawboll at the south side of Apoqenining Creek by Computation above twelve miles distance from the Town of New Castle about the 1st day of November, 1682, from which time we have had frequent and correspondent intercourse with the Commissioners of these Countys the power and orders given unto us aforesaid we asked them if they could show us any cause why and wherefore we should not proceed to act and do there as we had done at New Castle, and finding no manner of obstruction We made then and there in his Royal Highnesses name that manner and form of delivery as we had done at New Castle. Which acting of us was fully acceptable to his Royal Highness. And Anthony Brokhold then Commander in chief and his Council at New York as appears by their Declaration being dated Nov. 21, 1682, from which jurisdiction we had our Dependence all along ever since the Congress until they had made above related delivery unto Governor William Penn by virtue of his Royal Highnesses orders and Commands &c.

"Jno. Moll."

The declaration of November 21, 1682, referred to in the foregoing certificate, was a circular letter (3 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 34) by Captain Brokhold, &c., to the several justices of the peace, magistrates and other officers of Delaware, which, after receiving the two deeds of August 24th from the Duke of York to William Penn,—mentioning one of them as granted in the town of New Castle otherwise called Delaware, and all that tract of land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles around, with all islands and the river and soil thereof lying north of the southern most part of the said circle,—which deeds are spoken of as having been "here produced and shown to us, after by us well approved and entered in the publick records of this province,"—proceeds to say that "we being fully satisfied of the possession and use of the said Penn's right to the possession and enjoyment of the premises, have therefore thought fit and necessary to signify and declare the same to you to prevent any doubt or trouble that might arise or accrue, and to give you your thanks for your good services done in your several offices and stations during the time you remained under his royal highness' government. Expecting no further account than that you readily submit and yield all due obedience and conformity to the powers granted to the said William Penn in and by the said indenture, in the performance of an instrument of which we wish you all happiness."

So far as to the title derived to Mr. Penn from the grant of the Duke of York, it is unnecessary to mention certain letters patent now to be mentioned, from King Charles II. not to Mr. Penn—but to the Duke of York—granting, March 22, 1668, to him, the said Duke, and confirmed by letters patent granted about seven months before to Mr. Penn. 2 Hazzard, Pa. Reg. 27. The letters patent described the lands as "all that the town of New Castle otherwise called Delaware, and fort therein or thereunto belonging, sittuate, lying and being between Maryland and Jersey, in America. And all that tract of land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles about the said town, sittuate, lying and being between the islands of Delaware, and extending south to Cape Henlopen. Together with all the islands, land, soil, rivers, harbours, mines, mineral deposits, woods, trees, rivers, waters, lakes, fishing, running, hunting and fishing, and all other royalities, privileges, rents and commodities that shall or may happen to belong to the said town, fort, tracts of land, islands and premises, or to any or either of them belonging or appertaining, with their and every of their appurtenances, situate, lying and being between the said islands in the said river of Delaware. And the said river and soil thereof, lying north of the said town, and extending south to Cape Henlopen. And all that tract of land upon Delaware river and bay, beginning twelve miles above New Castle, and extending thence south to New Castle otherwise called Delaware, and extending south to Cape Henlopen. Together with all the islands, land, soil, rivers, harbours, mines, mineral deposits, woods, trees, rivers, waters, lakes, fishing, running, hunting and fishing, and all other royalities, privileges, rents and commodities that shall or may happen to belong to the said town, fort, tracts of land, islands and premises, or to any or either of them belonging or appertaining, with their and every of their appurtenances, situate, lying and being between the said islands in the said river of Delaware. And the said river and soil thereof, lying north of the said town, and extending south to Cape Henlopen.

These letters patent gave powers of government in the same way as those of March 12, 1688-89, to which except in or on the property granted, their language almost exactly conformed.

The original of this patent from the King to the Duke of York's grant to Penn for the twelve miles circle were produced before the hearing that day, having both, with the original chartor of Pennsylvania and two leases of August 24th to Mr. Penn, mentioned ante, p. 1129, note, been brought to Philadelphia, above the year 1684, by Mr. Coates of that city, an agent of the estates in Pennsylvania belonging to Mr. Penn's descendants in England, Mr. Coates having possession of them on a visit to his principals in England. Being at their seat of Stoke Pogis, he was shewn by them into the room of their house, near the dust told that he might find some old deeds &c. that would interest him as an American, and to which he was welcome. Happening to find the patent in the room just mentioned, he brought them to Philadelphia, where those relating to Delaware still were, on the hearing of this case. It appeared also, by an original "Breviario" of the Hon. Mr. Murray, A. G. and Sir Dud ley Browse, S. G. solicitors for the sons of William Penn and the city of Baltimore—(1 Ves. Ser. 444) before Lord Hardwicke, A. D. 1760; the bill was filed June 21, 1759—that the tract of land lying between the bay and sea on the one side, and Chesapeake Bay on the other, be divided into two parts, one being in the latitude of Cape Henlopen to the fortieth degree of northern latitude; and that one-half thereof lying towards the bay of Delaware, and the other half towards the sea, to be held in his majesty, and that the other half remain to the Lord Baltimore, as comprised within his charter.

This being done, articles of agreement were concluded in 1762, between the Earl of Baltimore and the sons of William Penn, upon which the Penns, in their title and claim to the ownership in England, praying for a specific performance and the running and settlement of the boundaries. This bill set forth title in the Penns; the Duke of York’s and the king’s deeds, (giving their dates and the description of the property conveyed, including the river, soil, and islands north of the southern part), the delivery of seizin by Moll, the circular letter by Captain Broockhold, the certificate of the acting judge for further assurance, and alleged that “immediately after the last recited letters patent had passed the great seal, the said Duke of York and no other than a trustee for the said William Penn therein, and had obtained them in pursuance of his covenant for further assurance, did deliver the last patent under the great seal to the plaintiff’s father;” that after this, and when the duke was soliciting further assurance, a patent for the Great Southern Grant for Penn, which was then preparing in order to pass the great seal, the same was stopped by Lord Baltimore, whose petition caused the patent to be held in amended form, to the committee of trade and plantations, where both parties were heard for nearly two years and a half: that it is hereby intended and expressly mentioned in the minutes made by the said committee thereon, that the dispute was a dispute between Baltimore and Penn, though the latter did sometimes use the Duke of York’s name, and though the duke himself did by his counsel and other agents sometimes assist and interpose in the suit; which latter fact the Penns rely on as a manifest proof that the duke held the king’s letters patent, for the benefit of Penn and not of himself. And finally, that, November 7th 1685, the committee made the adjudication already mentioned.

That notwithstanding this, Lord Baltimore in Jan. 1768, before the question came before Anne, who, after a counter-representation from Penn, dismissed the petition in the same month; that not yet satisfied, on May 1768, presented the matter again to the queen, who ordered it to be heard before her in council, where both Penn and Baltimore were heard, and where it was ordered that the earl’s petition be dismissed, and that the order of November 7th 1685, be ratified and confirmed in all its points and put in execution.

The case, which is the well known case reported in 1 Ves. Ser. 444, under the name of Penn v. Lord Baltimore, was heard before Lord Hardwicke who, on Sir Godfrey’s advice, decided in favour of the Penns, but “without prejudice to any prerogative, power, property, title or interest of his majesty was possessed by the Dutch and Swedes, in the year 1609, or at least before the date of the Lord Baltimore’s patent, and that it must meet again as soon as the proofs shall be ready for making out the same.” After numerous hearings, in which it appears that the Duke of York, Lord Baltimore, and Benjamin Fletch, as counsel for the Penns, were in favour of the Penns, but “without prejudice to any prerogative, power, property, title or interest of his majesty was possessed by the Dutch and Swedes, in the year 1609, or at least before the date of the Lord Baltimore’s patent, and that it must meet again as soon as the proofs shall be ready for making out the same.” After numerous hearings, in which it appears that the Duke of York, Lord Baltimore, and Benjamin Fletch, as counsel for the Penns, were in favour of the Penns, it is not clear from the text what the final outcome was.
The paper title of the United States was completed by an act of assembly of the state of Delaware, May 27, 1813: by which it was enacted, that "all the right, title and claim, which either the United States of America, or the state of Delaware, ever had over the island in the Delaware commonly called the Pea Patch, and the same is hereby ceded to the United States of America, for the purpose of erecting forts, batteries, and fortifications, for the protection of the river Delaware and the adjacent country." &c. &c. Reserving jurisdiction, &c. Del. Laws (Ed. 1829) p. 873.

The same counsel, in order to show, more specifically, that absolute control over the whole in the river Delaware, and the twelve mile circuit, had been, at least, claimed from early days by the lower counties, proved that about the year 1707, a law was passed at New Castle, whereby a tax of half a pound of tobacco per ton on all freight, was laid upon every vessel bound up or down the river; that the lower counties proceeded to enforce the tax by firing upon vessels which would not pay it; that although the general assembly of Pennsylvania strongly recommended against the matter, the law was never repealed, though its execution was hindered by defiance and resistance from Pennsylvania vessels. 1 Votes Pa. Assem. pt. 2. p. 1778.

So far as to the paper title of the respective parties, as the same was proved by original deeds or early legislative action. As to the jurisdiction exercised, de facto, in the river, it appeared on behalf of New Jersey the Egg Island, a small island low down in Delaware Bay, and Smyrna's Island, whose position could not be found by counsel, but both of which were admitted to be without the circle, were held under New Jersey, though how or for how long, did not appear. Further, that some time since 1832, a boatman having committed an assault upon some person on the river within the circle, a constable of New Jersey pursued the criminal to the Pea Patch and arrested him. "The constable had process," the boatman said to the constable, a military person, "I had a pistol; he showed no process but that." The boatman refused to go to New Jersey, said he would go on the lawful process; process from Delaware; and did not go with the constable, who went away and never came back after him. On the part of Delaware, the evidence was more full. Reed's Island and Bombay and Beenprie Hook, the only island within the circle, had always, so far as appeared, been considered as part of Delaware, a which state the people also considered as belonging. Both these islands, however, lie close to the Delaware main land; the latter being within its profile, and separated from it only by an artificial cut or canal.

Twelve persons were examined from the state of Delaware, most of them aged, and likely, it was said, from their professions or pursuits to be acquainted with the fact of what jurisdiction generally had been exercised over the circle by Delaware, for the last seventy years or more.

Among them was the Hon. Thomas Clayton, aged seventy years and upwards, sometimes a member of the legislature of Delaware, after-wards attorney general and then chief justice of that state, and more recently its representative in the senate of the United States. "It has been held," said this witness, who had resided all his life in Delaware, "it has been held, as far back as my memory goes, by the courts, public officers, and lawyers of Delaware, that the title and jurisdiction of the state of Delaware extended to a circle of twelve miles around New Castle, to low water mark on the New Jersey shore. I never heard the title or jurisdiction of the state disputed, even with part of the river Delaware, by any one, until the claim of Doctor Gale was set up to the Pea Patch; and since that, I have mentioned in the state of Delaware, lawyer or other, doubt it. Writs have been issued by the courts of Delaware to seize vessels and persons in all parts of the river islands, and vessels twelve mile circle, and I never knew such a seizure to be disputed in any court of Delaware, no other title than the jurisdicion over all such parts of the river."

James Rogers, Esquire, sixty years old, for most of his life a resident in or near New Castle, and for twenty years attorney general of Delaware, testified as follows: "It has been uniformly considered by the courts, public officers and lawyers of the state of Delaware, that her title and jurisdiction extended within a twelve mile circle around New Castle, to low water mark on the Delaware river. More than one time have I heard her title or jurisdiction over that part of the river Delaware doubted by any court, public officer or citizen. I know that writs have been often issued from the courts in Delaware for New Castle county, and that by virtue of such writs, persons, vessels and cargoes have been arrested and detained within the jurisdiction above alluded to; and in no instance, within my knowledge, was the jurisdiction ever disputed as to any question arising as to the jurisdiction of the state, when such persons were arrested or vessels and cargoes seized. I know in many cases caused writs to issue and persons to be arrested, and vessels and cargoes to be attached and seized upon the river Delaware, and within the aforesaid jurisdiction, and have been concerned in cases where process of attachment has been issued by other members of the bar. I recollect one case, in the supreme court, Bishop v. Weymouth, that was counsel for the defendant, and every defense was set up that was considered available, but no plea to the jurisdiction was set up. (The record of this suit was attached to Mr. Rogers' deposition, and showed that four pleas had been put in.)

"With respect to lands held by warrant, survey and patent, from William Penn and his heirs, the title has been universally held as good title. It has always been held by our courts that the Penn title, under the Duke of York, was the true title to the lands and waters in Delaware, so far as my knowledge extends. I know in many cases a few titles held by grant from the aborigines and from the state excepted."

Many Honorable James Booth, chief justice of Delaware, aged fifty-seven years, who was born in New Castle, and, with the exception of four years had resided there all his life, testified to the same effect, essentially the same, in all respects, as to the jurisdiction, though in language more qualified than Mr. Rogers. On the subject of the Penn title he added: "I have never been called upon to treat a case on that point, or use your knowledge and information, extends, of the justice and legality of the Penn title, under the Duke of York, lands within the state of Delaware. It was always considered, in this state, the true title to the lands and waters in the state of Delaware; although I have often seen on record some old title papers for lands from the aborigines of the country, and from Sir Edmund Andross, before the date of the deed from the Duke of York to William Penn. I have seen many titles in-excepted in court by the Penn warrants, surveys, and patents, and have always understood and believed that all lands and waters in the state of Delaware, within the twelve miles circle, are held by the Penns. The names of the Penns and their successors have been used to the minute detail of the affair, I do not now remember. About twenty-five years since, I accompanied the sheriff in the state of Delaware, in the county, and with him boarded a sloop then between the Pea Patch Island and the Jerseyshore, and was with the deputy sheriff when he arrested the captain and crew, and took the subjects on which he spoke. "I was eighty-eight years and four months old," said this witness, "I have resided in this state since 1780. My business has been that of an attorney, and on this account I have been able to keep an eye on the proceedings of the courts. The law of the land has been my study, and I have always been able to keep up with the times." Mr. John Steel of Philadelphia, aged sixty-seven, who kept a shop in New Castle in 1800, gave the following information from his own knowledge: "While residing in New Castle, I had occasion, in July or August 1800, to serve process on a man who was at the time a citizen of Philadelphia. He was about to go to sea, and I served him in that respect. He was a ship's captain, and I served him in the usual manner. He was to go to sea, and I served him in that respect." Mr. Brown, of Philadelphia, aged sixty-five, who kept a shop in New Castle in 1800, gave the following information from his own knowledge: "While residing in New Castle, I had occasion, in July or August 1800, to serve process on a man who was at the time a citizen of Philadelphia. He was about to go to sea, and I served him in that respect. He was a ship's captain, and I served him in the usual manner. He was to go to sea, and I served him in that respect." waters of the United States, had done in 1836, under those circumstances: but that vessels which could beat through the other, could not do so at all through this. The Jersey side had been kept very broad and very deep for a few rods just opposite the island, but at its head, in consequence of the Bulkhead. The greatest depth of water on the Jersey side was 35 feet. The greatest depth of water in the channel on the Delaware side was 40 feet, and on the Delaware side 35 feet. The average depth as a water road, the channel of the Jersey side is 25 feet, and on the Delaware side 23 feet. But to take the ease of the pilots and pilots of the island, no vessel drawing more than 19 feet could pass through the Jersey channel. The shortest and widest, and both about equally curved.

Touching the position of the island in regard to the two shores, it appeared that the Jersey side had been constantly washed away within the last half century, and so receding from the island; that drawing a line midway between the two, 1/2 of the island were on the Delaware side, 1/2 of the New Jersey side; that the north extremity of the island would be 2000 yards from the Delaware shore, and 2000 yards from the New Jersey shore; the south extremity 2197 yards from the Delaware shore, and 1857 yards from the New Jersey side. It was said that the area of the island is 7697/100 acres. With respect to the possession of the island, it is that in the spring of 1813, Dr. Gale having acquired the right of the Halls under the survey of 1784, went down there from Trenton, with fifteen or sixteen persons as guards, and built a fort on the island. It was built of rough boards, was about 12 by 15 feet, and had a stove in it, and the fish were plentiful. Dr. Gale had fished here the previous season, leaving it in August, 1813. The place was not a good fishery, owing to the strength and course of the currents, which swept the newts into deep water where the fish escaped. While he was there, Gen. Bloomfield of New Jersey, who was entrusted with selecting a site for a fortress, came there, saw him fishing there, and apparently claiming the island; afterward wrote to the island and asked him what he would take for it. In December, 1814, the United States sent a corps of engineers there under Capt. Clark of that service to select a site for a fortress. No building of any sort, nor the vestige of one, was then on the island, which was occupied by hundreds of thousands of crows, which made it almost a place. Capt. Clark remained there till 1816, from which time till the present, with the exception of a certain claim in 1829-30, when Mr. Humphrey was in possession under a judgment hereafter mentioned, the possession was in the United States. The names of the individual mistake which were also put in evidence.

By Delaware:

In 1787, on the 7th December, 1782, Penn, styling himself proprietary and governor of Pennsylvania, and of the lower counties, passed, with the consent of the other states, the Water Act, declaring the entire body of all the isles, points of land, and waters, within the Delaware river, "as also the said river of Delaware, and soil thereof and islands therein;" and states that the government hereby taken out of Delaware should be annexed to Pennsylvania. The enacting part provides for the union, and for the naturalization of such as were foreigners, who had been in the state in the same year, constituting the body of laws known by the name of "the great law." This act Judge Baldwin, in his opinion, hereafter mentioned, supposed to have remained in force until the American revolution.

II. That in the year 1703, the proprietaries of East and West Jersey surrendered all the rights of government which they had derived under the charters of Charles II. to Queen Anne, who accepted the surrender: and that from 1703 till 1776 New Jersey was not governed, as it is not a law, but by the proprietors, appointed by the crown, who held the same. The provincial legislature constituted the royal government, Laws of New Jersey, 26 Geo. IV. 906, 607, 614, 628, 629.

III. That in 1795, an order was given in Delaware for warrants to be issued for 1/2 ares of marsh, to be laid on an island situated about five miles below New Castle in the Delaware, called and known by the name of the island. Without evidence, however, that the warrant had issued or been laid or that any survey had ever been made. It was also stated that they had abandoned the matter because he supposed that the necessary cost of claiming and embanking would be more than the island, when reclaimed and embanked, would be worth.

By New Jersey:

I. That King Charles I. had granted to Lord Baltimore plenary power to grant to the Duke of York, all the territory between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays. Kilby's Laws of Del., 1794, which recite "that whereas, the right to the soil and lands within the known and established limits of this state, was heretofore claimed by the crown of Great Britain: And whereas by the definitive treaty between his Britannick Majesty and the United States of America, his said Majesty relinquished all rights, claims, rights, and territorial, within the limits of the said United States, to the citizens of the same, for their sole use and benefit, by virtue of the soil and lands within the limits of this state became the right and property of the citizens thereof; and at the time of passing the act to which this is a supplement, and, and now have, full power and authority, by their representatives, to dispose of the same, for their sole benefit, emption and advantage: And whereas the claims of the last and former pretended proprietors of this state, to the soil, which is to the same, are not founded either in law, equity; or it is just, right, and necessary, that the citizens thereof should be secured in the enjoyment of their estates, rights and properties." It then confirms all patents, warrants, grants, and the like, of the Duke of York, or the pretended proprietaries of the state, made at any time before January 1st, 1760; discharging them from all manner of restraints, &c., under the slender paper title, and the facts already stated which might be supposed to vary or control it. It was, in fact, an exchange of two judgments, between the two judges upon the title on the 1st of November, 1788, in the New Jersey circuit (Gale v. Bohlin [Case No. 5, 1839]), in favour of the New Jersey title; the other in 1838, in the Delaware circuit (Id. 322), in favour of the state of Delaware.

The former judgment was preceded by a trial by jury, of three days, and by a long and very laborious charge in favour of the New Jersey title from the presiding judge, the late Henry Baldwin of the supreme court of the United States, and which have enjoyed considerable reputation, and on which the bar at Western Pennsylvania, was admitted to possess, at all events, some stores of mental information, and to bestow occasional research upon his cases that nearly passed credibility. The judgment in the former case was for default of a plaintiff. On the present trial, however, the case was presented in a different aspect from what it then appeared in. No evidence whatever is given before the Court of the Delaware title from King Charles II. to the Duke of York, the non-existence of which was asserted by the New Jersey counsel, and taken for granted by the judge. The coast survey not having yet been made, the existence of any considerable channel east of the Pea Patch was unknown, and even the surveyors of the main channel were not aware of it. The island was assumed to be, and at that time probably was, in all its parts, near to New Jersey; and the fact was, that the title and possession of what was known as Delaware Bay, and all the lands contained within the same, are not founded either in law or in equity; that her title therefrom became founded on the treaty of peace; that in this condition of facts, the two states, by the Declaration of Independence, stood on an equal footing, and were equally invested with the rights of the king to all that part of Delaware river and its islands which the king had not previously granted: and therefore that this island being outside of the "main channel," and nearest to New Jersey, belonged to that state and not to Delaware. Independently of these grounds, he relies on the doctrine of adverse possession. He says that as the Hall's held the island under a survey made in 1784, and so had possession without adverse claim for thirty years, that they held the state of Delaware, until 1815, a term of thirty-five years, the right of entry by that state was barred: and connected with what his honour called "the general claim of the proprietaries of New Jersey to the islands in the Delaware from 1739, would make the title good by a prescription of seventy-four years of quiet enjoyment adverse to the right of the Penn's: and this idea it was supposed might derive strength from a recital in the act of the New Jersey assembly of November 24th, 1784, which had been represented to the assembly, that by virtue of the warrant and survey of 1784, the Hall's had "become seised of the island," and assumes that by meane conveyance, Dr. Gale had "become seised and possessed."

Under the judgment in New Jersey, it is the marshal of that circuit delivered possession to Mr. Humphreys, to whom all the persons on the island made themselves tenants at will. And on the judgment in the Delaware circuit, the marshal of that circuit delivered possession to the United States.

Each party of course was an interest which was in its favour, as conclusive on the title: but as the jurisdiction of the courts which gave them, depended entirely upon the fact whether the island was within their territorial circuit, that is, whether it was within Delaware or New Jersey, and as this point was the very one here to be decided and could not be decided without hearing the whole case, this court consented, on the recommendation of the arbitrator, to give both judgments in evidence, without prejudice, and to waive a decision of the case upon a point of mere evidence, and in a preliminary stage.

Mr. Clayton and Mr. Bayard for the United States.

Before the argument in this case, the counsel of the United States said that they begged to join in the learned readiness in acknowledging the kindness which had been extended to all the counsel who had been concerned in this suit of the controversial authorities of the city, and especially for the honor of being allowed to conduct the argument of the case in the Hall of American Independence. It seemed to be an appropriate place for the discussion of the means of defending this noble city, which was, in truth, the birthplace of American freedom. They claimed to have furnished their learned brethren with all of the assistance within their power for the health of the case. Those thanks were also due to the Historical and Philosophical Societies, to the Athenæum, and to the Law Association of the city, all of which had minutely furnished their books, documents, and charts, many of them being no where else to be found. On both sides there was the benefit of these books, yielding even more information on the peculiar subject we have to discuss, than could be found in any other city of the United States. Their thanks were also due to many gentlemen of the profession in this city, and to antiquarians for the information furnished by them. With the aids thus afforded, they thought both sides were sufficiently armed that we had a fair and full trial, and that the testimony in the case is so full as to develop the right of the special title.

The question is, whether Delaware has the exclusive right to all the Delaware river with the islands in it, and all the subaqueous soil contained within that circle whose centre is New Castle and which has a radius of twelve miles extending from that place as a centre. Delaware claims not only all the river above the circle, and none greater than New Jersey below it. We say 1. Mr. Humphrey has no title. 2. The United States have no title.

On that first branch of the matter, we contend:

1. Mr. Humphrey's grant is bad in form:

He claims under a proprietary warrant authorizing the survey of land; a warrant which does not authorize a location upon the bed of a great navigable river, as that place was in 1764, and in part is still. Then the surveyor, who returns this survey, certifies that he surveyed an island in the Delaware containing 178 acres. We know, from the actual measurement by the coast survey, that the island contains but 5760/100 acres at this day, and the testimony has proved that about 1763 the island first appeared above low water, not larger than a man's hat. It is apparent therefore, that there was no actual survey, but only the exclusion of the river, and admitting that Mr. Humphrey has a proprietary grant good in form, we say,

2. Mr. Humphrey has no title.

The territory known as New Jersey was limited by its original charter to low water mark. The language of that grant and of all subsequent grants indicates an exclusion of the river. They all grant land bounded by the river, with many easements in the river; but the river itself or its soil is conveyed by none of them. The original charter grants the Hudson river. The maxim of equity applies strongly. This natural construction of the charter is sustained by authority. In 1721, the lords commissioners of trade and plantations sent to Mr. Robert and Sir Robert, and John Ogilby, then attorney and solicitor general, the clauses of the Pennsylvania and New Jersey charters which fixed the boundaries of these provinces, and desired their opinion "whether Delaware river or any part thereof, or the islands therein lying, are by said clauses conveyed to either of these provinces, or whether we should say, these islands unto doth still remain in the crown?" "We have perused the said clauses," says the opinion of these great lawyers, "and we be of opinion that the said province of Pennsylvania, and their counsel, who laid before the House of Lords the charters, and desired their opinion whether Delaware river or any part thereof, or the islands therein lying, are by said clauses conveyed to either of these provinces, or whether we may say, these islands unto doth still remain in the crown." 1 Chalm. Op. 59.

In 1820, the New Jersey Association of the United States many years before, her "right to territory northwest of the river Ohio," it was conceded by the supreme court of the United States that no grant lay within the boundaries of Delaware, and in the Jersey boundary. Chief Justice Marshall says: "When a river is the boundary between two nations or states, it is not our province to decide thereon, and there be no convention respecting it, each holds to the middle of the stream. But when, as in this case, one state (Virginia) is the original proprietor, or, whether the river itself, or the islands on both sides only, it retains the river within its own dominion; and the newly created state extends to the river and the islands, the law will not say, the boundary. Handy's Lessee v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 375-379.

This case and the opinions of Raymond and York were cited, and the principle just mentioned was recognized as true, by Judge Washington in 1823 (Cornell v. Coryell [Case No. 3,360]) in its case of the New Jersey boundary.
Jersey extended over the whole river, Mr. Humphrey has not got the New Jersey title. None passed by either the proprietary grant of 1784, or the legislative act of 1853.

In 1702 the proprietors of New Jersey surrendered all their royalties and powers of government, and from that time onward it was the royal right held and upheld by the crown. From 1702 to 1776, the beds of all the navigable rivers within her charter, being part of the sea, were out of her control and beyond her control. The royal government alone could grant them away. The Declaration of Independence transferred all the regalia and powers of government to the state of New Jersey, in her sovereign capacity: the proprietaries after the surrender, held neither the jus regium nor the jus publicum. Any grant by them of subaqueous soil was void. Wadell v. Martin, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 361, being a case upon this identical charter, has decided the question in default of the United States there held a proprietary grant for subaqueous soil in the waters of the Raritan Bay and Rujus, which, when extinguished the holding of the defendant in that case, who claimed the submerged soil under a grant from the state legislature. The ground of the decision was that the regalia were in the state, and not in the proprietaries.

II. The United States has a good title.

Whether the common right of fishing in navigable streams is in the people at large, as part of the jus publicum, so as to prevent a grant by the crown excluding it, since Magna Charta, is a question yet open for discussion; but there is no bearing on this case. That the crown might grant a navigable river and the soil thereof, subject to the jus publicum, has been patented, and the propriety of islands arising in the river, cannot be a part of the jus publicum, because that refers solely to common rights, and islands must, from the nature of things, be subject of exclusive appropriation. The common right of navigation is now in all the people of the United States, and the navigation of the Delaware, but the common right of fishery is in the people of each state, and to the extent of her jurisdic-

As to the state title: The legislature said there were no patents, and that is the true title to the soil, whether the right arose from grant or prescription. A prescription, extending to a liberty, profits a person on the soil, not liberty of free fishery, &c. is not an acquit of the soil or water, but leaves them where it found them. Id. 32.

The argument which will also be made, that the duke had no title to the property, conveyed, until after the royal conveyance was made, and that therefore this had, as it were, a prior title to the property, is not quite as "old as creation," but it was made more than a hundred years ago by Lord Baltimore in his suit with the Penns, was then answered by Lord Hardwicke in 1762, and the Penns, as now, answered beyond all power of renewal. The earl says: "I will lay aside the question of estoppel, which is not the subject in hand. The Duke of York, being then in the nature of a common person, was in a condition to be estopped by a party instrument." In 1682, the Duke of York takes a new grant from the crown, and having granted before, was bound to make further assurance; for the improvements made by Penn were a foundation to support a bill in equity for further assurance. The Duke of York, therefore, while a subject, was to be considered a grantor, and why not afterward as a royal trustee? I will not force the question in this court; nor is it necessary, but it is a notion established in courts of equity, by modern decisions, that they are always to be treated as if they were grants from the crown. And if the person from whom the king by descent was a trustee, there may be grounds in equity to support a title proven by original deeds, found, far onward in two centuries, in their proper places, perfected by livery of seisin most formally delivered, and confirmed by the royal and ducal government in New York is impregnable. Its exhibition is conclusive.

The decision will probably be raised on these grounds as to the right of the king of England, since Magna Charta, to grant a river and the subaqueous soil to a subject so as to pass the islands subsequently lying in the river: but it is a question which is settled by authority. Martima incrementa, says Hale (De Jure Marit. 14, 178), that the right of passage, or navigation for the benefit and use of the commonalty, both ancient and modern, is in the king, but may become the property of a subject by grant or prescription; and among these many cases, those which come per insulis producunt, the sort we are now considering. It is true that in such grants the jus privatum of the grantee is always subject to the use of the public, and that any person, being to the people, and from which no grant by the crown could derogate. It is called a servitude belonging to the people. Id. 6.

be estopped. And where the estoppel works on the interest in the land, it runs with the land. The interest in the land (probably by Knightly, D'Anvers or Sergeant Wilson) is this: "Where estoppel works on the interest of the land it runs with it, and is a title." It may be admitted that generally the crown is not bound by estoppels; that is to say, no estoppel can arise from any grant or act of the king so as to bind the crown. But the crown, by descent, or otherwise, lands which are bound by estoppel as against the person under whom he purchased, the estoppel will continue even against the crown.

The language in Reg. v. Delme, 10 Mod. 200, which will be cited on the other side, is the language not of the crown, but of the land owner. It concludes with an "adjuvatur," but of counsel in argument. The authorities referred to in support of it are Let Siderin, (a doubtful authority for any doubtful position) p. 412, and that is a short note deciding that the king may bring an action where he pleases; and Hobart, p. 339, where the ruling is "warranty collateral binds not the king without true and actual assets, nor by estoppels of his own recitals except in equity." This is the distinction contended for, and it is believed that no case can be found contrary to that distinction. Even if the doctrine was technically estopped, so to pass a title at law,—of which, when coming by estoppel, it is said in one of the preceding cases "an ejectment is unjust," and that the rule should not be applied as an estoppel,—he surely was estopped in equity. His covenants for further assurance made him a trustee, whether a common or a king's person; and what more is wanted here?

But however imperfect Mr.Penn's title may have been in its origin, it was made perfect in various ways by confirmation from the crown. The letter from Queen Mary in 1694, is confirmation. It was a restoration in all things; in rights of soil and in power of government. Then, how could the sons of Penn have sustained their bill in equity before Lord Hardwicke, 10 Mod. 28, without a title and a good title. The bill in the curious breviate here produced, shews that they set out their title very fully. The act of September 20, 1775, whereby the governor and council settled the Lord Hardwicke, Penn's title, as thus set out in the bill, was confirmed by Geo. III. in 1790, and in the state of Delaware on the very eve of her declaration of independence. The legislature which passed the act of September 20, 1775, appointed the delegates who appeared in this bill four weeks after, and in accordance with their instructions, presented the bill to the states of the United States is, that each state, on the Declaration of Independence, became invested with all the sovereign power within her colonial limits.

It has had indirect confirmation of a very strong kind. At the commencement of the eighteenth century, the colonies of New England procured the passage of the statute of Anne which prohibited the crown from granting charters with royal powers within the kingdom; and after that a charter with such royal powers appears to have been granted among the colonies. But Penn's continued to be a proprietary and charter government, with royal and sovereign powers, subordinate to the crown, and in many respects resembling the government of a county palatine in England. He was never displaced but once, and then only to be restored. It derived further confirmation in 1717 when a powerful nobleman, the Duke of Sutherland, petitioned the king, without success, for a grant of Penn's three lower counties. The privy council, probably by Northey and Thompson, the attorney and solicitor general. The deed from the king was not before these officers, its existence was unknown to them. Penn, they say, was to be taken to appear, "being under a lunacy." The cause was less strong than that here presented, yet the attorney general, in both causes, reported as follows: "On the whole matter, we humbly submit it to your majesty's consideration, whether it will not be reasonable that your majesty's title should be established by the court of chancery before any grant should be made or the promises." 1 Chalm. Op. 39-40.

Was any such effort at establishing Penn's title ever made by the Earl of Sutherland, by the king or by any one? It was not. Penn's title is not needed to the Delaware river. From the decree of Lord Hardwicke (Bell, Supp. Ves. Jr. 185), which saved the rights of the crown, and gave liberty to either party to move to alter the decree in case the crown should ever disturb the possession. But no such motion was ever made that we have heard of, and we must infer the possession of the title. Indeed, there is an opinion of Northey, attorney general, expressly in favour of Penn's title to the Delaware river. Evidently it was given in consequence of a contemplated agreement between the crown and William Penn, to purchase from Penn his right of government of the peninsula, and three lower counties. Its date is 1711, and it is stated that William Penn waited upon him with his title papers, both in London and three lower counties, and had made out his title thereto. 1 Chalm. Op. 22.

But it is said, he will be as in 1884, in the controversy with Lord Baltimore, the title was decided to be in the crown. Let us look at the history of that case. At that time Lord Baltimore contested Penn's title before the privy council. He claimed that his own patent from Charles I. for wild and unincultivated land, extended from the ocean to the river Delaware, and three lower counties, and had made out his title thereto. 1 Chalm. Op. 22.

are nearly identical with those in the deeds from the duke to Penn, are the proper boundaries of Delaware, even on the supposition that Penn had not the title. For, suppose the deeds from the duke to Penn (1139) held the title, or under that of the Duke of York, or by his acquiescence; and they held by the metes and bounds in the King's deed, which have always been the practice and of the colony and state. In this aspect of the case the title is just as clear as if the Penn title were invalid. With the acquisition of jurisdiction exercised since the memory of men now living, we need not enlarge. The venerable Ken- ney John, whose high character for learning and integrity, and his opportunities to inform himself, must be well known to the arbitrator— he, and all the other professional gentlemen who have been examined, agree positively that, so far as they have ever heard or known, the state of Delaware had exercised exclusive jurisdiction within the circle and that they have never heard her right to do so questioned in Delaware, except in the single instance of these claimants under this Jersey title. Many of the paper given the state and the acts of jurisdiction by Delaware up to low water mark on the Jersey shore, her officers seizing vessels, and personal injuries against the law, in all parts of the river within twelve miles of New Castle, without question of the Delaware right. On the other hand, the only evi- dence against him in this respect is the claim of New Jersey, within the circle, that a constable came to the Pea Patch to arrest a man who might have interfered with another between the island and the Jersey shore. He showed no process but a pistol. The fisherman denied the jurisdiction of New Jersey and refused to go with the constable. He held up his gun, but the fisherman told him that if he would go to Delaware and get regular process from one of his courts, he would go no further. The fish- erson understood the common law of the country; and the people there understood no differ- ence. Without particularizing them, we need only say of the various legislative enactments of New Jersey, that none of them are of sufficient force to make the colony the charter, nor indeed to do more than countervail other enactments of the same state. The act of January 13, 1792, which brings the western limits of the counties but to the river, is strongly against them all, even if the state had a right to give herself, of her own mere motion, river and territory which belonged to others. As to the adverse possession, the evidence has already been stated. Was this such a pedis possessio as will constitute an adverse holding against the state of Delaware? Even if adverse possession made a title against that state; which the learned counsel on the other side, who stated his belief that the law may be different, will allow us to inform them that it does not. The state had no knowledge of it. It was not by his act, but if noticed, would not have been resisted. It proved to have been an unprofitable speculation, and because they knew that it would prove so, is the reason why the fishermen from New Castle never attempted any similar enterprise. You might as well go about to prove title to a whole forest, by stating that you had hunted the bear and the panther, or any other animals there, as to set up a title to an island in the river. New Jersey may prove that you had, at some time, fished for shad and her- ring on its margin. We say nothing of the ab- surdity of attempting to prescribe for a shoal beach half a mile of the river, and the case renders it unnecessary to discuss the law of prescription, or its application to such an object. It is said that Steepson's Island and Egg Island were held under grants from New Jersey. The islands were in the bay near the Jersey shore, and outside of the circle. We know nothing of either, or of the grants for them. In Smith's History of New Jersey (page 127) it is said that the Indians claimed title to "Stypson's, Island, near Delaware river." If this be true, we may safely, perhaps, declare that New Jersey had a grant for it prior to the Revolution. But we enter our protest against any attempts to establish a prescriptive right to either lands or waters within the limits of the colony, to trespass on what the law writers call "an un- guarded possession," a trespass of which the state had no notice, and it is not material to attract attention or resistance. If it could be proved that any citizen of New Jersey had built a temporary shanty on the little sand island, or painted a cow there, would it not be ridiculous to set up an adverse holding within the circle for the state of New Jersey, when the people on the opposite shore had either not noticed the fact, or, through charity for the poor man, had not driven him away? The object of Penn, in obtaining the grant of the river and soil of the Delaware may be readily conceived. It was to command the door and entrance to the western part of Pennsylvania, including the intended city of Philadelphia. He wished to protect that colony from the foreign commerce with which it would be liable, in case of war on the right bank of the river, below Penn- sylvania, and the river itself, should fall into the hands of the enemy. The river by which Hamburg, tells us that the object was the safety and security of Pennsylvania (1 Haz. Pa., Reg. 36); not only the security of the naviga- tion and commerce of the river necessary to the prosperity of his colony, but also the safety and defence of that colony against an invading foe. Without power of arrest and the marshal law for the suppression of insurrec- tion, mutiny, and rebellion, and the power of repulsing and expelling all invaders, west- express conferred upon him by the duke's deed, as explained by the subsequent deed from the king. Without the river, he could not erect a fort on an island within it, nor plant a chevaux-de-frise, to repel a hostile fleet; for, in his prior grant of the colony of Pennsylvania, of 1686, he laid it down on the east by the low water mark on the western side of the Delaware river. Observe the language of the deeds, connected with the circle. So far as they convey title, it is only that lying within the circle; but when they convey the river it is different. They con- vey all the islands in the river (i.e., the whole river) and soil thereof lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle." Penn had already the province of Pennsylvania, stretching its broad side for nearly two hundred miles along the river. He next gets twenty-four miles of a small sterile country below, and all the rest of it was doubted that he meant the grant principally for the benefit of the larger tract as well as the small one. It was an important part of the compact of April 26th, 1783, by which Penn- sylvania surrendered one-half the river above the circle to New Jersey, we have nothing to do. But we think it clear, from the evidence before us, that there was some mistake about, the Pennsylvania title, and that Penn was as great a statesman as we have succeeded him. The opinion of York and Ray- mond, in 1721, that neither Pennsylvania nor New Jersey had any title to the river by its soil, by virtue of their respective charters, was true, but this opinion would have been changed by the production of the deeds under which Penn acquired the larger part, and the counties, and all the river and soil thereof north of the southernmost part of the circle. These deeds could not have been known, we think, to the commissioners who negoated the compact of April 29th, 1783. There is no evidence to beli(e)n that islands in the Delaware were granted by Pennsylvania prior to the Revolution. See Fisher v. Carter [Case No. 4,515].

As the value of Judge Baldwin's opinion. The case was tried on the most imperfect information, and the charge is inconsistent and confusing to the jury, as was well known to the profession in Delaware. But whatever it may be, or whatever it may do, it is apparent that one of its great objects was to confirm all the titles in Delaware which had been lawfully issued, either by the Penn or the Duke of York. The judge calls the recital in the preamble of this act of Delaware her "repudiation" of the progeny of its legislative enactments. But New Jersey could not take advantage of such an estoppel, if there were any, because she is a stranger to the act. That does not affect the rights of the two states. That does not alter the relative rights of the two states.

In such a case, what is lost by one of two foreign governments by its own act with the consent of congress, is lost by the other, and it has been proved that the main channel was formerly on the Delaware side; that it had been claimed and passed through the Jersey channel while forming the island, the law of nations would, in that case, clearly give all the alluvia and all the islands westward of the main channel to the state lying on that side of it. The distinction is between alluvion and avulsion. A state loses or gains by the former, but not by the latter.

Mr. Bibb and Mr. Eaton, for the United States. The grant of the king to the Duke of York, 12th March, 1663–64, was of an immense region extending from St. Croix in the state of Maine to the Cape Cod Line of the state of New Jersey. Its object, after dispossession of the Dutch, was colonization. It conflicted with another grant by the Duke, for territory lying on the east side of that line. It was the sole object of this grant. Upon such grants, made with such objects, it is difficult to presume that a right to a natural portion of the river was withheld. It was not essential to the purposes of the grant, it was largely conducive to them, and all presumption must be in its favour. The river was in early days the only mode of passing from the northern part of the colony to the southern; the colonists were constantly upon it passing up and down. It would have been inconvenient, in the highest degree, that the country in the lower part of New Jersey, where the low water mark should have been without the limit of any cis-Atlanticie jurisdiction; amenable only to courts more than 250 miles away. The breviate produced on the other side, shows that in their suit with Lord Baltimore the widest, deep cut, shortest and most central channel. The inference must be that the volume of water which daily passes on the Jersey side, is great enough that which passes on the Delaware side. We have no definition in the books of what the "main channel" of a river is, but we suppose that such a channel is that one through which the chief volume of water passes, and which is nearest to the centre of the river. Indeed Mr. Fairfax says in so many words, that the Jersey channel is "the main channel of the river," and that it is the common waterway who navigate but small craft, consider the western channel to be the "main channel," and say generally, that it has been more navigated by vessels than the other. But they appear to have been disposed of the case in the eastern channel, and their testimony reminds us of the refusal of some of the New York pilots to believe in the existence of Gedney's channel, as a matter of fact, if only published its soundings to the world. Our Delaware pilots, although among the best in the course and depth. In 1858 the Pennsylvania line-of-battle ship, the largest vessel that ever floated on the waters of the Delaware, passed down the Jersey, not the Delaware. It is admitted that the bottom of the Delaware channel is soft, and the channel itself better known, which is the reason why it is preferred. The depth required on mud bottom would be less than an injury from grounding on a bottom of sand or gravel.

It has been proved that the depth of water in the eastern channel was much less than it is at present, and that the river has been constantly gaining for a number of years at the expense of New Jersey. That state, in 1858, was the largest vessel that ever floated on the waters of the Delaware, passed down the Jersey, not the Delaware. It is admitted that the bottom of the Delaware channel is soft, and the channel itself better known, which is the reason why it is preferred. The depth required on mud bottom would be less than an injury from grounding on a bottom of sand or gravel. It has been proved that the depth of water in the eastern channel was much less than it is at present, and that the river has been constantly gaining for a number of years at the expense of New Jersey. That does not alter the relative rights of the two states. In such a case, what is lost by one of two foreign governments by its own act with the consent of congress, is lost by the other, and it has been proved that the main channel was formerly on the Delaware side; that it had been claimed and passed through the Jersey channel while forming the island, the law of nations would, in that case, clearly give all the alluvia and all the islands westward of the main channel to the state lying on that side of it. The distinction is between alluvion and avulsion. A state loses or gains by the former, but not by the latter.

Mr. Bibb and Mr. Eaton, for the United States. The grant of the king to the Duke of York, 12th March, 1663–64, was of an immense region extending from St. Croix in the state of Maine to the Cape Cod Line of the state of New Jersey. Its object, after dispossession of the Dutch, was colonization. It conflicted with another grant by the Duke, for territory lying on the east side of that line. It was the sole object of this grant. Upon such grants, made with such objects, it is difficult to presume that a right to a natural portion of the river was withheld. It was not essential to the purposes of the grant, it was largely conducive to them, and all presumption must be in its favour. The river was in early days the only mode of passing from the northern part of the colony to the southern; the colonists were constantly upon it passing up and down. It would have been inconvenient, in the highest degree, that the country in the lower part of New Jersey, where the low water mark should have been without the limit of any cis-Atlanticie jurisdiction; amenable only to courts more than 250 miles away. The breviate produced on the other side, shows that in their suit with Lord Baltimore the widest, deep cut, shortest and most central channel. The inference must be that the volume of water which daily passes on the Jersey side, is great enough that which passes on the Delaware side. We have no definition in the books of what the "main channel" of a river is, but we suppose that such a channel is that one through which the chief volume of water passes, and which is nearest to the centre of the river. Indeed Mr. Fairfax says in so many words, that the Jersey channel is "the main channel of the river," and that it is the common waterway who navigate but small craft, consider the western channel to be the "main channel," and say generally, that it has been more navigated by vessels than the other. But they appear to have been disposed of the case in the eastern channel, and their testimony reminds us of the refusal of some of the New York pilots to believe in the existence of Gedney's channel, as a matter of fact, if only published its soundings to the world. Our Delaware pilots, although among the best in the course and depth. In 1858 the Pennsylvania line-of-battle ship, the largest vessel that ever floated on the waters of the Delaware, passed down the Jersey, not the Delaware. It is admitted that the bottom of the Delaware channel is soft, and the channel itself better known, which is the reason why it is preferred. The depth required on mud bottom would be less than an injury from grounding on a bottom of sand or gravel. It has been proved that the depth of water in the eastern channel was much less than it is at present, and that the river has been constantly gaining for a number of years at the expense of New Jersey. That does not alter the relative rights of the two states. In such a case, what is lost by one of two foreign governments by its own act with the consent of congress, is lost by the other, and it has been proved that the main channel was formerly on the Delaware side; that it had been claimed and passed through the Jersey channel while forming the island, the law of nations would, in that case, clearly give all the alluvia and all the islands westward of the main channel to the state lying on that side of it. The distinction is between alluvion and avulsion. A state loses or gains by the former, but not by the latter.
include the three lower counties which are on the west side of that bay. But it was a very large and extensive grant, of several very large tracts and territorial grants passed as we say lands appertaining to those extensive tracts." And by this the Penns claimed Delaware. This was carrying the matter certainly very far, for the limits of the Delaware were the Penns properly admit, that so carried, it is a weak point in their case. It would have passed and had to consider Delaware was dedicated, with all the considerations of the Papers properly held, that in this extent, it was the doctrine of the Penn proprietary statements of Delaware in 1735; and the state of Delaware cannot complain of that argument if you may hold of what is but a base of its garment.

How does the case stand upon authority? We have no knowledge of the circumstances under which the opinion of the crown lawyers was given in 1721. 1 Chalm. Op. 59. It is probable that it was upon the application of some person for an order for. There could not well have been any other occasion for it. Crown lawyers understood the proprieties of their office, and as might have been predicted, the opinion is in favor of the crown. But was any grant ever made in accordance with any of those consequences of it? Certainly none ever was; and considering the zeal with which these grants were asked for, we may well oppose the action of the state of Delaware. Looking only at "clauses extracted out of the charters of New Jersey and Pennsylvania; the crown lawyers have been right; looking at the whole charters, their objects, the colonization under them, and the interpretation which had been made upon them, by fifty-seven years of practice and action, they were certainly wrong.

It is certain that in Handy v. Lessee v. Anderson v. Hays [Tighe v. Keene 1716], the doctrine we opposed was but conceded, not decided. The judgment went on another point. But even the concession was upon a very different case. Virginia, a populous state, having a people living on its river, grants to the United States, out of pure liberality, "the territory northwest of the Ohio," or the claimants, nothing else. It conveys no powers of government, nor appurtenances, nor privileges, nor rights, nor whatever was connected, or appertaining to the original territory. This gift is limited to "territory northwest of the river: the bare territory. Compare the language of the act of 1768 with these grants. It is, surely, that the grant by Charles II. ante, p. 1154. One carries every thing, the other, land, and land alone. That is the difference between the poles. They are grants, and that is the only point of resemblance between them. Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 8, 230] is no authority either: for the case was decided upon the form of action alone; and though Judge Washington, referring to the grants of Charles II. and the Duke of York, does say, that "these grants in their literal terms" the claim of New Jersey below low water mark cannot be maintained, he yet says, after looking at but a portion of the grant, that "the grant is not to be restricted to that of the narrow river Delaware, or to any part thereof, below low water mark and along its whole length." It is a well-known case. It is not a case for the interpretation of the charter, or whether it arose from claim de facto. We beg to say too, that Judge Washington cannot say that "these acts prove, beyond a doubt, that the proprietaries of West New Jersey, from a very early period, possessed a right as proprietaries of the river Delaware or to any part thereof, below low water mark and along its whole length." It is a baseless assertion. And if we shall shew hereafter, whether the right arose on a nice interpretation of the charter, or whether it arose from claim de facto. We beg to say too, that Judge Washington is not the right. The grant, as it is held under a New Jersey warrant, is held under a New Jersey warrant. It is not important that these islands are without the circle; for side to the north soil the other side, New Jersey did not come, any where along her whole extent, below low water mark. If she came below that mark without the circle, the same charter or the same usurp.
Of York made good, "by estoppel" or some other operation of law, a title which, of itself, is conceded to be bad. But to this position there are objections:

I. That no charter could convey nothing which had been previously granted to Lord Baltimore, as all the land between the Chesapeake and Delaware had been in fact granted to Pennsylvania; and it is true that Penn finally established a title to the Delaware half of that same territory, in Penn v. Lord Baltimore. He did so as the report of the case shows up explicitly, in the articles of agreement of 1732, coupled with long possession and colonization. The order in council of 1760, commanding the duke after the charter to the duke, gave this territory to the king, not to Penn; and that order, so far as Lord Baltimore was concerned, deprived him of the duke's charter for deception, or as having been improperly granted. What motive Lord Baltimore had for entering into the case at all, that Penn's bill was filed, and that on them with possession and colonization he got the decree.

II. That in the case of the Duke of York, the estate which he, having nothing in, had previously granted to Penn, and if the duke had been bound, as a private person, by the two deeds, might make a title to Penn, yet the duke was freed from it so soon as he ascended the throne. The court decided in favor of the crown in Reg. v. Delme, 10 Mod. 200, as if stating a well settled doctrine, "From proceedings at law between the crown and a private person, in which the court has a discretion, and in which the crown may change its course of proceeding, the court may amend its pleadings at any time, nor will any estoppel bind the crown."

There is another inquiry to be made. Could the king of England, in his prerogative right, grant the beds of navigable streams where the tides ebb and flow, and which are thus weeded for trade and plantations, in 1717, was void, and which the crown lawyers thought was very questionable; though the crown was in dispute with the Maryland proprietors for seventy-eight years, and through two generations of both the Penns and the Duke of York not specifically applied within the circle. The whole of the western boundary of New Jersey, as far as the charter grants it, is water mark, there is no limitation to those portions above and below the circle, nor exception of that part within it. Now what on the other hand is the title of Delaware? The deeds to Penn from the Duke of York certainly convey no title as to them. But it is said that the royal charter of 23d March, 1683, to the Duke of York miles circle. His claim was to the river not over or in it; and the Penns contended that he did not even come to the river by many miles, and that he had not the right of suits against Lord Baltimore for a specific performance, Penn could acquire the property now in question. Besides, neither in time, in their agreement of 1732, had any power to contract for New Jersey; nor to compromise the rights of the colony of New Jersey. He all and answer, and decree of the court of chancery in England, for specific execution of a contract to which New Jersey was not a party, as a navigable stream of water. Lord Hardswicke, in his opinion and decree, states the case as a matter between the parties to the suit, and as not binding the tenure of the plaintiff nor the right of the Penns, nor the rights of any person not a party to the suit. While on the subject of Lord Hardswicke's decree, it is to be observed that so far from finding the Penns' Case on their deeds, the court puts it upon possession and settlement as perhaps its strongest ground.

It is admitted that the deeds of the duke and the king gave Delaware a right to the whole river and its soil, we think that the non-assertion of any specific title to the river and the 4th of a specific action and action by New Jersey, both taken in conjunction with the anomalous, ungeographical and unnatural character of the westward stream, which was in the same continuous stream, from the boundary above and below it; its total want of definition, and the impossibility of giving it a description of the 'diminution of the uncommon facility, that is to say the irreconcilable necessity for usurpation and encroachment; all urge the conclusion be by no way possible, that she did in point of fact abandon the Jersey half. Many witnesses, of whom we need say nothing except that they all came from Delaware—tell us that since the Revolution, Delaware has always claimed and exercised jurisdiction over the river within the circumference of the stream; they have never heard it denied or doubted in the state of Delaware. Both may be admitted. As to the first, the matter depends upon anti-revolutionary claims. We all agree that whatever boundary New Jersey had in 1776, that she has still. Respecting the second, the claim of Delaware rests not in a position where they were likely to hear much of the claims of New Jersey. Of course they have never heard the Delaware the same assertion, any more than they would have heard it suspected in New Jersey. They knew what they knew, but not what they did not know. They knew what they knew before the grant was born, nor what happened in places from which they were absent and remote. New Jersey was not heard by them, and they did not speak loud enough to be heard by New Jersey. The exclusive jurisdiction of the state of Delaware, attempted to be proved, is in its nature a negative; it amounts to nothing more than this, that they, these witnesses, men of a single generation, living in one state of Delaware, did not know any thing which, in the long track of time, had taken place in another state of New Jersey. The legislative enactments given by us in evidence rebut the negative evidence of anti-revolutionary "exclusive jurisdiction," attempted to be set up for Delaware. We have not brought the sworn testimony of the witnesses, but it is clear that Mr. Wall and Mr. Green, both of them holding office under the United States, have considered that Delaware did not have such rights that they have both given opinions in favour of Mr. Humphreys and against the United States under which they were acting. The witnesses have been in Delaware; and there is no evidence in any one of them, on which side of the middle line of the river the process in them was served. In a river so broad as the Delaware here is, having close to the Delaware shore the channel universally supposed to be the main one, and almost universally navigated; the large majority of the few cases where process appears to have been served on the river, would be on the Delaware and not on the New Jersey side; therefore, but little support to the Delaware claim. In no instance where the process is shown to have been served on the western side of the middle line, was there either resistance or trial. Of what judicial value—of what weight as precedent—the opinions of bound-bailliffs or of those who know by personal discovery, if it requires to be searched for, in the testimony of Mr. Janvier, taken by the United States. This gentleman who is brought to show practical illustrations of theoretical jurisprudence of more learned men, informs us that within his memory R. C. Dale, who was sheriff of New Castle County from 1830 to 1850, boarded a ship, with his posse, and arrested a person on board of her, after she had been run ashore on the Jersey side.

Again, in 1784, when the survey was made for the Falls, the island was much nearer to the Jersey shore than now. That shore has been continually washing away since the formation of the island. The main channel of the river, the greatest volume of water, and greatest depth of water, then, was next the Delaware shore, however it may be at present. Now although the publick jurisdiction between two states on opposite sides of the river, having the river as their common boundary, is buried changes with the channel of the river, yet private rights acquired under the proper jurisdiction, before the channel was reversed, are not annulled by the change of the current, nor transferred as publick domain to the other jurisdiction. The private right of property remains valid and subsistent, be it in either channel of the river, if the land be submerged or washed away. Whether therefore the island be, at this time, in New Jersey or in Delaware, it is still the property of Mr. Humphreys. It may have changed its sovereign; its owner is still the same.

But finally, the language of the duke's deed to Penn cannot be followed with the literality which a lawyer is disposed to give to every deed. "Land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles about the town of New Castle, would include land on the east just as much on the north, south and west and therefore would include land in New Jersey, when the duke could not grant as well as that in Delaware which he could." It can only grant that "land lying within the compass or circle," which the duke had a right to grant, that is to say land in Delaware. By this grant of "land," neither the river nor soil of Delaware in the counsel of the other side have themselves asserted in regard to our proprietary warrant of 1784. Besides which there is an express grant of whatever is within the circle are conveyed. The circle, then, stops with the river edge. There is nothing to carry it "land" across. The facts of the case to bring it but to this margin; and it is clear... from the Penns' own map, which is prefixed as an exhibit to the breviate of their solicitors in Pesn v. Lord Baltimore, that this was the construction upon which the Penns themselves gave to it. Now throw over to the other questions, it will be seen, by looking at the chart, that by even giving to Delaware what the duke's deed purport and evidence to do with it, from what is called "all islands in the said river Delaware, and the said river and soil thereof lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle," she will not get the Pea Patch Island. A line drawn northward from the point where "the southernmost part of the said circle" touches the river, leaves the islands on the north or out of her, then, all she claims and she leaves us all we ask for.

OPINION.

Mr. CHANCE: The arbitrator, having heard the evidence and arguments, and taken due time to examine and consider the matter, delivered the following opinion on the 15th January, this year, as thus stated in the submission: To decide the question of title to the Pea Patch Island, as derived by the United States from the State of Delaware, and by the sale, James Humphrey, claiming through the said Henry Gale, deceased, from the state of New Jersey.

The importance of the case consists chiefly in this: that it involves the question of the boundary of nearly twenty-five miles, between the states just named. It is true there is no evidence that the settlement of that boundary is not submitted, or to be decided in the arbitration; New Jersey and Delaware not being parties to the submission, nor having agreed so to submit their rights. But it is also true that in conveying, the one to the United States, and the other to an individual, the island in controversy, they have necessarily communicated to the grantees the right to assert the title respectively conveyed to them, and to dispute the adverse title, and it is very manifest that this controversy turns mainly, if not entirely, upon the question of the evidence and jurisdiction of the respective states. If the Pea Patch Island is within the state of New Jersey, the title is in Mr. Humphrey. If within the state of Delaware, the title is in the United States.

The consideration and respect due to these states, as members of the Union, in whatever respects their rights and jurisdiction, it seemed to require that as much publicity as possible should be given to the proceedings; and an intimation to that effect was promptly acceded to by the city and county of Philadelphia, in liberally granting to the arbitration the use, first, of the supreme court chamber, and afterward, of the venerable Hall of all other questions. The arbitrator was attended by the counsel of the parties, who had laboriously searched out the evidence and jurisdiction of the respective states. No material fact could be found, and followed its production with an able and learned, as well as interesting, discussion on both sides. It is believed that nothing has been omitted in either respect; and there is no reason to suppose that any thing in the shape of evidence or argument remains unexplored, which has at all other times been put upon the subject. It remains for the arbitrator, after careful deliberation, and with the aids just mentioned, having come to a conclusion satisfactory to himself, to make his award. In ordinary cases his duty would be performed by signing and delivering the needful paper, and giving it the direction which is required, in order to render it, as demanded by the submission, "final and conclusive between the United States and the said James Humphrey, claiming under the said Henry Gale, deceased."

But the same motives of consideration and respect, already stated, for giving the utmost publicity to other questions, it will be seen, by looking at the chart, that by even giving to Delaware what the duke's deed purport and evidence to do with it, from what is called "all islands in the said river Delaware, and the said river and soil thereof lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle," she would not get the Pea Patch Island. A line drawn northward from the point where "the southernmost part of the said circle" touches the river, leaves the islands on the north or out of her, then, all she claims and she leaves us all we ask for.

The island in controversy, called the "Pea Patch," lies in the river Delaware, rather less than five miles from New Castle, in a southerly or south-westerly direction. The most satisfactory evidence respecting it was given by Mr. O. Fairfax, Esq., of the United States coast survey, being from actual and careful survey and measurement. It was in water not under oath, but was received by consent of both parties; and there is no reason to doubt its accuracy. Its length is 1,083 yards, its average breadth 461 yards, and its area 760 1/10 acres. The mid-line of the island, at its north extremity, is 2,000 yards from the Delaware shore, and 2,130 yards from the New Jersey shore. The mid-line of the river Delaware, he says, runs through the island, would throw 235 1/10 acres on the Delaware side, and 657 1/10 acres on the New Jersey side. Such a line, he states, would pass through the island 46 yards north-east of the southwest extremity of the western end of the island which projects towards the Delaware shore, and 20 yards eastward of the point on the southern end of the island in the river Delaware. With respect to the water, the witness says, the main and deepest channel of the Delaware river opposite to the points of the Pea Patch is on the New Jersey side. The greatest depth of water in the channel on the Jersey side is 40 feet, and on the Delaware side 25 feet. The average depth of water in the channel of the Jersey shore is 22 feet, and on the Delaware side 23 feet. But to take the entire channel on either side of the island, no vessel drawing more than 10 feet water, at low water of spring tide, can pass through. The Jersey channel is the shortest and widest, and both about equally curved.

Witnesses have been produced to show which is the main channel of the river, as to which they have differed in opinion. The greater part, probably, have given the Delaware channel to be the main channel. They have stated that the bottom on that side is softer and more silted up than on the ground than on the east, though they state, also, that the eastern channel has undergone changes at different periods of the stream. But they have stated, too, and no doubt truly, that the shore on the Jersey side, opposite the Pea Patch, has been wearing away considerably for some years past. And, finally, judging only from sight, have asserted the island to be nearer to New Jersey than to Dela-
The view to be taken of the case, and with reference to the grounds upon which it will be deemed to result, is essentially to ascertain the particular of the testimony just adverted to. The material facts, about which there can be no dispute, are these: The island is in the river Delaware, and a deep channel on each side; it is far below the low water mark on both sides; it is not connected with the land either of New Jersey, Delaware, or Pennsylvania; and all the tide is surrounded by water. There is a shoal, called the "Buck-Lhead Shoal," from the northern end, towards the northward and eastward, but it is never bare; and is, besides, pierced by a channel of such width and depth, that vessels of heavy draught of water can pass through it. The general conclusion seemed to be on both sides, that not at all material, is, whether large sized vessels can beat through it from the western channel to be an agreed time of its beginning to be visible, against a head wind. The fact is, that vessels can pass entirely round the island, upon the waters of the river, without the tide. The island is in the waters of the Delaware. It is proper further to state, that this island is of comparatively recent formation. Maps and charts are late of the eighteenth century, do not mention it. Kensey Johns, Esq. who was eighty-eight years and four months of age, and, in his examination (Nov. 2d, 1847), a witness not more venerable for his years than for the high stations he has held, and the uniform excellence of his character, and his long life, states that he had resided in New Castle from the year 1780 till that day. He then says, "I do know it, love Pea Patch," and had known it since the year 1780. At first it appeared about the size of a man's hat. In 1818, when the United States took possession of it, it grew to be a large island. It was not worth a cent to a private citizen; the expense of banking would have been more than it was worth."

The main point, however, is that before mentioned, which will not be affected by any error in the conjecture just stated. From its first appearance, the island has always been where it now is, that is, to say, in the deep river, below the low water mark, surrounded by navigable water, and separated at all times from the land on both sides.

This account is, in fact, of the subject of controversy, are deemed to be sufficient for the present. To introduce and render clear the manner in which the evidence as to other matters, not deemed to be important, and therefore laid aside.

We are thus brought, after stating what the thing in controversy is,—enabling us to add, by what kind of title such a thing can be claimed and held,—to the examination of the case made out by the respective parties. And it is proposed to begin with the case of Mr. Humphrey, as most conducive to the right understanding of the questions to be considered.

Has Mr. Humphrey made out a title? He begins, taking the evidence from a chronological order, with the copy of the record of two warrants from the proprietaries of West New Jersey, one dated November 4th, 1770, for 600 acres of land in the Delaware, the other dated August 7th, 1782, for 5,000 acres: a return of a survey under them for Edward Hall, October 5th, 1774, "of an island in the river Delaware, called the Pea Patch, situate in the county of Salem, about one mile west of the town of Salem, in Penn's neck, and is about west of the mouth of Salem creek, &c. containing 178 acres of marsh, sand bank, and mud flats; of New Castle distant about 4 miles." The record adds: "November 3d, 1784, inspected and approved by the council of proprietors, and ordered to be recorded."

This record, authenticated as it was, was good evidence by the laws of New Jersey, and therefore was good evidence in the arbitration. It was accordingly dissented.

Many objections were made to the warrants, and especially to the survey, which need not be stated. The survey to them all was this, that if the proprietaries of West New Jersey were the owners of the island, and had power to grant it, it was for them, and for them alone, where there was no power to grant, to object to irregularities in the warrants or in the surveys under them. By accepting and approving the return of survey, and by cause it to be recorded, they waived all such objections, and no one else could make them, unless he had a right which was inferior to theirs. The survey must, therefore, be taken to be good, and to have vested the title in the Messrs. Hall, if the proprietaries had a right to grant. From Maryland connexions, was regularly derived to Mr. Humphrey, so as to vest in him all the right they had, which included all the proprietaries could give, neither more nor less.

The question then is, what right had the proprietaries? When Judge Baldwin gave his charge to the jury in the case of Gale's Leseue v. Behlum [Case No. 5, 188], in the circuit court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, (which will be more particularly noticed hereafter,) the case of Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 367, had not been decided by the supreme court of the United States. It was brought by writ of error to the circuit court just mentioned, upon a judgment there rendered, Judge Baldwin presiding. The decision of the supreme court was in 1842. Being upon a question within the jurisdiction of that high court, it is deemed to be of the highest authority in all inferior tribunals, and, of course, in this, in point of authority, the most humble of all. The point there decided—"to say nothing of the learned and satisfactory reasoning of the chief justices (Taney in delivering the opinion of the majority of the court—the very point decided—is that the surrender to the crown in 1702, by the proprietors of East New Jersey, of the powers of government, they had no right in the navigable rivers within the charter limits of New Jersey, nor to the soil under them, and have had none since. In this respect, the West New Jersey proprietors stood upon the same ground precisely. Both surrendered the powers of government at the same time, and, it is believed, in the same terms. The decision of the supreme court equally settles the law for both. It follows, that the West New Jersey proprietors, at the date of the warrant and survey, and acceptance of the survey, had no right in the river Delaware, even though it had been within the charter limits of New Jersey, (which will be hereafter examined,) and could give no right in the island to Messrs. Hall. For, upon the survey itself, it appeared that the island was "in the river Delaware," and that it was "about one mile" from Finn's point, the nearest land on the Jersey coast.

The same point was decided in the same way by the Supreme Court of the State of New Jersey, Arnold v. Mundy, 1 Halst. [6 N. J. Law] 1; Shepard v. Leversion, 1 Penn. Law 312. [7 N. J. Law] 2. Both cases is said to have been upon a location made to try the right. In the other it came up incidentally.

Two previous judgments of the supreme court of the United States, and of the judges of the highest court of New Jersey, in such a manner, certainly, do amount to binding authority. In accepting them as such, however, it is not to be understood that any doubt is entertained existing with the consent or allowance of which they were made. It may be deemed presumptuous, perhaps, even to suggest that they are approved, where appraisal is of so little consequence, and so prescriptive a weight of the judgments of these high courts, and especially by the Supreme Court of the United States. It may be allowable, nevertheless, to add, in vindication only of the effort to determine the whole to the arbitrator, that if the question were new, and to be examined without the aid of the great light thrown upon it by the opinion of the supreme court, and which should not be made to determine the question, he should, upon original grounds, come to the same conclusion as this court, and the judiciary of the United States, in the case of Walker v. Leland.

The remarks will be on the right, and against the spirit of our institutions, that great public rights all have an interest and concern in common, should be without a public, and so far as can be, in the enjoyment of their privileges. Government is the proper trustee, ever ready to have charge of the common fund, still there would be no contradiction, as is supposed, or one more completely, that the state of New Jersey, for it must be presumed that such disposition is itself in some way for the common benefit, and on this is the right to the public. A private proprietor, on the contrary, looks only, and rightfully looks only to his own advantage.

The reason upon this point is, that the survey was merely void, that it gave no title, and that no title can be derived from it, the proprietors having no right to survey a navigable river, nor any power to grant.

The next evidence of title exhibited and relied upon by Mr. Humphrey, is an act of the legislature of the state of New Jersey, dated November 24th, 1831, granting to Henry Gale, his heirs and assigns, "all the right and title of the island called the Pea Patch, situate in the river Delaware, in the township of Lower Pennock, in the county of Salem and state of New Jersey, as mentioned and described in the before mentioned survey," meaning the survey of 1784.

This act, it will be seen, was passed about seventeen years after the present controversy began, and during the time the United States were in full peace with England. By the act of 1784, Delaware, on the ground that the state was not in possession, but it was adversely held and adversely possessed, and that, by virtue of the grants of the State of New Jersey, entitled to all its rights by prescription against the crown, against the Penns and the state of New Jersey; and, in his right, by his possession, such as it was, entitled to the benefit of any limitation which had commenced or begun running from the time the estate was no adverse possession or claim, his legal seizin or possession continued till his dispossession by the United States in 1765, a period of thirty-one years, which would bar the right of entry of any adverse claimant; and, connected with the general claim of the proprietaries of New Jersey to the islands in the Delaware from 1739, would make the title good by a prescription of seventy-four years of quiet enjoyment, and bar the line of adverse claimants. "I will consider, however, the Duke of York to William Penn." He then concludes that the title under Gale is derived from the proprietors and is good, and, as has been seen, adverse to the state of New Jersey.

Unnecessary criticism upon the charge of Judge Baldwin, is forbidden by the respect due to the memory of a learned and able man, who so long filled an eminent judicial station. The several legal principles contained in the paragraphs just quoted are well known and need not be reiterated. Necessary criticism upon the charge is not to point out the one great error which vitiated the whole of the charge. It has already been done, in the case of Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 367, and not then been decided. The decision since has established a different doctrine. The question which you asked, upon full discussion and deliberate consideration, and in concurrence with the judgments of the courts of New Jersey, that from 1702, the proprietors had navigable rivers, and, as there will be occasion to consider more fully hereafter, the right of the state did not come into existence until it began is thus distinctly marked, being connected with the great public event of that day, which will never be forgotten, as it was the birth-day of a nation, a nation born in a region, and an exactness of which there is probably no other example in the annals of the world.

This then leads directly to the inquiry, whether the Delaware river was ever within the charter limits of New Jersey, in that part of it where the Pea Patch Island has since grown up. If it were, the right would have become vested in the crown by the surrender of 1702, would have so continued until July 4th, 1776, notwithstanding, and should be considered as New Jersey as a part of her sovereignty, acquired on that day by severing her connexion with Great Britain, and being, therefore, under the powers of government. The derivation would thus have been from the crown, though not by grant.

But let it be remembered that the part of the river in controversy was within the charter limits of New Jersey, the counsel for Mr. Humphreys have produced the following deeds and papers: Patent, March 12th, 1653-4, from Charles II. king of England, to his brother, the Duke of York, his heirs and assigns, for a large tract of territory, on both sides of the state of New Jersey, the last boundary of which (now the west boundary of New Jersey) is as follows: "and the lands lying within the limits of the Commonwealth of the State of Connecticut, on the east side of Delaware Bay."

Lease and release, June 22d and 24th, 1664, the Duke of York to John, Lord Berkeley, and Sir George Carteret, rectifying the grant from the king to the Duke of York, grant and convey "all that tract of land adjacent to New England on the west side of the Jerseys, and Manhitts Island, and bounded on the east by the main sea, and part by land, and part by water, and bath upon the west Delaware bay or river."

Patent, June 29th, 1674, Charles II. to the Duke of York, for New Jersey by the same description, except the islands which the former one, New York had surrendered to the Dutch, and it is stated that the people of New Jersey sent deputies to New York, and swore allegiance to the states general and the Prince of Orange. In February, 1674, a treaty of peace was signed between England and the states general, by which New York and New Jersey were restored to the English. This deed is supposed to have been made to remove all doubts which might arise from these occurrences.

There is no necessity for tracing the conveyances further. The title is regularly derived to the proprietaries of New Jersey, and West New Jersey, between whom the province was held in the portions it had been divided into by a partition theretofore made, and by the lines and bounds of the deeds of the proprietors. In 1702, the proprietors of New Jersey surrendered to the crown the powers of government, and thenceforth were only private proprietors.

Returning, then, to the question, whether the Delaware river at the part of it now in controversy was within the charter limits of New Jersey, there can at this time of day be no question. It was not within the grant, and as far as is known, there has never been a dissident opinion.

In 1721, the question was submitted to the law officers of the crown by the Commissioners of trade and plantations. The opinion of Robert Raymond, attorney general, and Philip Yorke, solicitor general, will be found in the first volume of Chalmers' Cases, and may say as follows: "We have perused the said clauses, (in the charters of New Jersey and Pennsylvania,) and have been attended by the agents of the parties who claim the province of Pennsylvania, and their counsel, who laid before us a copy of the letters patent granting the said province, &c. and the line alleged on both sides; and, upon consideration of the whole matter, are of opinion that no part of Delaware river, or the islands lying there in, are comprised within the grantings of the said letters patent, or of the said annexed extract of the grant of New Jersey; but we conceive the right to the same still remains in the crown." The opinion seems to have been acquiesced in, for there appear to have been no further proceedings before the commissioners of trade and plantations, nor before the king in council, whom the commissioners were sometimes employed to aid in colonial investigations; and upon the supposition that there were no agents present on the part of New Jersey, the answer was the question was one and the same, as if New York and Pennsylvania had been bounded by the Delaware on the east, just as New Jersey was on the west.

Some stress might, perhaps, be laid upon the nature of this opinion, partly because it does, of the character of a judicial proceeding, and some, too, upon the names of the eminent men by whom it was given, and the high position they afterwards adorned. But this is needless. The law of nations furnishes the same rule of decision. Here was the crown owning a large territory on one side of the Delaware, and (or, at the time of the latest of the patents to the Duke of York, neither the grant of the three lower counties, nor the Island of New York had been issued,) and it makes a conveyance of territory on one side of the river, bounded on, or bounded by, the river. Is this the grant of any or part of it, included in the grant? This is the very question which came before the supreme court of the United States in Mussey v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 134-140, in the year 1820. The decision of the court was delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, that the grantor retains the river within his domain, and the grantee extends to the river only, and the low water mark is his boundary. The same point was decided, in the same way, by the supreme court of New York, in Mundy, 1 Halst. [6 N. J. Law] 1, in 1821, with only this difference of expression, "the grant is to the edge of the river only," leaving a doubt whether it is a line shifting with the rise and fall of the tide. The same point, as to the limits of New Jersey on the Delaware river and bay, was, however, decided by the low water mark on the west side, was decided by Judge Washington, in Corfield v. Corrill (36 U. S. 420), in 1839, by Judge Baldwin, in Bennett v. Boggs (1 Id. 319), in 1839; and it was approved by him in Gale’s Lessee v. Beh- lin (5 Id. 1585), in 1853-4. It must, therefore, be regarded as determined, by her charters and limits, the territory of New Jersey extended only to the low water mark of the Delaware river, on the west side, and included no part of the river. It is, accordingly, so considered.

The states of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, as they are seen, being both bounded by the low water mark on their respective sides, and the river itself belonging to the crown, upon the Declaration of Independence, a new state of things, and to a full knowledge of the subject, as extinguished, and the river lay vacant, a boundary between them. "When," says Chief Justice Earl v. Anthony, "Hendy Wheats. [18 U. S. 376-379], "a great river is the boundary between two nations or states, if the property in the river is in neither, and there be no convention respecting it, each holds to the middle of the stream." The states of Pennsylvania and New Jersey adopted this rule. In 1789, a compact was made by commissioners, mutually chosen, which was ratified by acts of their respective legislatures, in 1789. By this compact, concurrent jurisdiction upon the water was given to both states, with some restrictions not necessary to be detailed; some islands were specifically allotted to each state, probably, from mutual concord. It was agreed that the rest should belong to the state to which they lay nearest, and that all the islands should thereafter be formed to the river, should be governed by the same principle. This agreement was limited, southerly, as to the peculiar boundary of the state of Delaware toucheth upon the same," (Delaware river.) As between Pennsylvania and New Jersey, this compact was formed upon great deliberation, and with all the knowledge of the subject, as must be believed from the high character of the commissioners on both sides, and is in conformity with the principles afterwards laid down by the supreme court of the United States in the case, before cited, of Hendy v. Anthony.

If, then, that part of the river Delaware lying between the states of New Jersey and Delaware, which includes the Pea Patch Island, were patented on July 4th, 1776, "the original property not being in either," it would, on that day, have become vested in the two states. In 1789, New Jersey would be entitled to the eastern portion of the river, her house out within her charter limits; succeeding to that extent to the rights of the crown, which had been divested by the Declaration of Independence. Delaware, in the same case, would be entitled to the western portion. Both would commence their right from that day. How the line would be drawn, or whether it would place the island on the side of the one state, or of the other, it is not material to inquire; for the view to be taken remains the same.

The question, having already shown that the "original property" was not in New Jersey, is then pursued to the same inquiry, whether on the eventful day referred to, the right to that part of the river was in the crown of England, or in the state. The "original property" was not in the province or colony which then became the state of Delaware. The "original property" of Delaware, that is, her title previously acquired and continued up to that day, becomes, therefore, the subject of examination, and has been accordingly examined, carefully and deliberately, by two witnesses, as far as necessary, will now be stated.

The title begins with two deeds of August 24th, 1682, commonly termed the deeds of fiefment, from James, Duke of York, to William Penn. The first of these deeds grants and conveys to Mr. Penn, his heirs and assigns, as follows: "all that the town of Philadelphia, otherwise called Delaware, and all that tract of land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles about the same, stretching north and being upon the river Delaware, and all islands in the said river Delaware, and the said river and soil thereof, lying north of the southernmost part of the said circle or two miles about the said town." The deed then covenants for further assurance, and appoints John Moll, Esquire, and Ephraim Lawry, his attorney, and any other person, to enter into and take possession and seizin of the premises, and to deliver possession and seizin to Mr. Penn, his heirs and assigns.

The second of these deeds conveys to Mr. Penn all territory from the south line of the preceding deed to the river Delaware, and the south of New Castle, and extending south to Capin Lopin, meaning Cape Henlopen. In this deed, also, the word "islands" in the said river Delaware, and the said river and soil thereof.

These two deeds, it will be perceived, embrace the whole of the territory of what were called the "Three Lower Counties," now the state of Delaware.

On October 28th, 1682, the attorney appointed in the deeds of the Duke of York, made livory of seizin to Mr. Penn of the first of the tracts, of which a record is made, and still preserved, and is, in all respects, exact and particular. On November 7th, 1682, as also appears of record, a grant was made of the tract in the second grant to Captain William Markham, Mr. Penn’s attorney. The declaration is signed by twelve witnesses, "in Delaware river," probably on their passage down the river Delaware, ten miles. Of both a record was made, and still remains, in all respects exact and particular.

There is this remarkable difference in respect to the two grants; that, in the first, the livory is stated, besides "twig and turf," to be of "water and fowl of the river Delaware." In the other, it is of "the land, soil and premises" in the indenture mentioned.

They state, also, that Mr. Penn remained in quiet possession. John Moll, the attorney appointed by the Duke of York to deliver seizin, in his certificate, also recorded, is still more precise. Of the livory, under the first deed, he says, they did give and surrender to the said Penn, Esq. actual and peaceable possession of the fort at New Castle, and of the island of Nantle, the key thereof, to lock upon himself the door; which being opened by himself again, "we did deliver also unto him, on the turf, with a twig upon it, a porcinger, with river water, and soil, in part of all what was specified in the said indenture," etc. As to the other, he says that a few days after, he went to the south side of Apoquinimink creek, by computation beyond the twelve miles, and there made livory of seizin of the lower part. The deed was recorded, and is, he says, etc. It may be necessary hereafter to refer to.

From a book kept in the government at New York, begun in 1682, and ending in 1682, a copy has been produced of an extrat or paper, to be made during that period, from the commissioner and council, beginning thus: "The record of the commissioner and council, application on Esquire Penn’s grant for New Castle, St. Jones and Whorekill, by the commissioner and chief, in council." It then proceeds to describe the two deeds from the Duke of York to Mr. Penn, of August 24th, 1682, setting out, at large, and accurately the title of the Delaware; states the appointment of attorneys to deliver free and actual possession, and adds: "as by the said indenture were produced, and shown to us, and by us well approved, and entered in the public records of this province, both may more at large appear; and we being thereby fully satisfied of the said William Penn's right to the possession and enjoyment of the premises. The paper which is addressed to the several officers of the peace, magistrates and other officers, at New Castle, Saint Jones, Deale, also Wherekill, at Delaware, or within and about the lands and premises under the title of Governor, and then after thanking them for their good service, during the time they had remained under his royal highness government, and dismissing them for no further account than that you readily submit and yield all due obedience and conformity to the powers granted to the same, in and by the said indentures, in the performance of which we wish you all happiness."

John Moll, in the certificate before mentioned, after stating the livery of saltn already referred to, adds this statement: "Which acting of us was fully accepted and well approved by strangers. It was by the order of his and his council at New York, as appears by their declaration, bearing date November 21st, 1682, and by which all the hereafter and here to follow, did our dependence all along, ever since the conquest, until we had made the above related delivery unto Governor William Penn, by virtue of his royal highness authority and command."

On October 28th, 1682, as appears from evidence of record, sundry inhabitants of the township of Deale, upon Delaware river, having heard the first of the two deeds read, and having seen the possession delivered by the Duke of York's agents, "when we are made subjects under the king to the said William Penn," make a solemn promise, in the presence of God, to yield him obedience, and to live quietly and peaceably under his government. Soon after, an act of naturalization was passed.

The objection to these two deeds, however, is that it itself had, at that time, no grant for the premises from the crown, and therefore had no title to convey. It is certain that no such grant has been produced, and it is assumed, as a fact, that no formal grant had been made to him by the crown. But, if the question were open, there would be grounds for believing that the Duke of York was some how empowered to deal with the territory on the west side of the Delaware river, and as connected with the operations he was conducting to protect or recover it from the Dutch. Not that being a subject, he could acquire any right for himself, which could not be pretended, but that in such a war, for enabling him to quiet the inhabitants, or strengthening the defense of the country against the Dutch, it was not unnatural, nor unreasonable to suppose that he might be entrusted with a large discretionary power, and even with rights in himself for its better execution, especially considering the relation he stood in to the king, and that he was himself the heir presumptive to the crown. John Moll says, they always "had their dependence from the jurisdiction of New York," which was the Duke of York's government, and it was by that jurisdiction which he had the actual exercise of the powers of government was made to William Penn, which he began immediately to exercise. There is other evidence to the same effect. The Duke of York and his governors did make grants along the Delaware, and did confirm titles derived from the Dutch and Swedish, when the states began dealing with the Swedes, confirmed by the Dutch, afterwards confirmed by the Duke of York and several of his governors, and so on.

But there is another transaction of those times, of publick notoriety, more important than any of these, not only on account of its magnitude, but also for the judicial interpretation it has received. In 1681, William Penn obtained his charter for the province of Pennsylvania, being the jurisdiction, by twelve miles north of New Castle town, and on the south by a circle drawn twelve miles north of New Castle. On August 21st, 1682, the Duke of York gave him a release of all his claim upon the province. In the recital it is expressed, "to the several officers of the peace, magistrates and other officers, at New Castle, Saint Jones, Deale, also Wherekill, at Delaware," or within and about the lands and premises under the title of Governor William Penn's title; and, furthermore, it has been held that he took subject to grants previously made or confirmations by the Duke of York's government. The Swedes held a large body of land immediately below the city of Philadelphia. The titles derived from that source are still respected. They owned also the land now occupied by the city of Philadelphia. William Penn obtained it from them, changing lands on the Schuylkill. And yet there was no formal grant from the crown to the Duke of York."

But it is unnecessary for a reason that will presently appear, to pursue this inquiry further. Perhaps, indeed, the Duke of York, by subsequently accepting a patent from the crown, and those did our dependence all along, ever since the conquest, until we had made the above related delivery unto Governor William Penn, by virtue of his royal highness authority and command."

of that act, and its preamble, it is impossible to avoid saying that the crown assented to them, thus acknowledging the validity and legal operation of the two deeds from the Duke of York to the proprietors in their possession and right of possession according to those boundaries, and the rightful exercise of the powers of government under them. An existing colony was thus acknowledged as rightfully created, and lawfully enjoying the powers of a colony by known and settled boundaries; and, in short, this acknowledgment was by all who had an interest. New Jersey had none, Pennsylvania had none, the Duke of York offended none, the New Province was encroached upon none of them; Lord Baltimore asserted a claim on the land, but it was afterwards declared to be the province of the United States, which in fact was already and justly founded upon the ancient grant of 1666. The new province encroached upon none of them; Lord Baltimore asserted a claim on the land, but it was afterwards declared to be the province of the United States, which in fact was already and justly founded upon the ancient grant of 1666.

On March 23d, 1682-3, Charles II. made a grant by patent to James, Duke of York, of the same premises which had about seven months before been conveyed by the Duke of York to Mr. Penn. The grant in its description is the same as in the two deeds of August 24th, 1682. It describes separately and grants severally the two parts of the lower counties as in those deeds. The only difference is, that in the former, there are two instruments; in the latter, only one.

This patent was here produced—brought from England some years ago by the late J. R. Coates, Esq. (who was an agent of the Purchasers') where it was given to him by John Penn, Esq, a lineal descendant of William Penn, from among the title papers of the Penn family; rather, it was understood as a thing no longer of use to him, who might prize curiosity in Pennsylvania and Delaware, than for any other purpose. At Mr. Coates's death it was given in the hands of J. de Morries, Esq., who has carefully preserved it, and now comes to us from the possession of Mr. Penn, with a preference that it has been there accompanying his possession as a part of his title.

Of this deed there have also been produced various exemplifications; one from the rolls in London, and from the records in the county, sworn to be a copy, by the Lord mayor of London, in 1735, and perhaps others. It is in the Votes of the Assembly. The original, or a sworn copy or exemplification of it was an exhibit accompanying the bill of the complainants in the case of Penn v. Lord Baltimore, filed in the high court of chancery of England, in the year 1735, and was in evidence in that case, and the original was offered to be, and probably was, produced. If this deed had preceded the deeds of the Duke of York, the regular derivation of the title from the crown to the counties could not have been disputed, and there would have been no question open but upon the construction of the terms of the patent, as to what was conveyed. But about twenty years ago, in the case just cited of Penn v. Lord Baltimore, the respondent set up the argument against the Penn grant, that it was in fact a conveyance from that order of the instruments, "that the grant to the duke being made after the deed by the duke to Penn, this grant must have been for the duke's use, and not for Penn's." The answer on the other side was, "We have a fact that will demonstrate the contrary; for we have the very original charter itself, under the great seal in our custody, ready to produce, which if the duke had intended for himself, and to defeat our title by, he would have kept, and not Mr. Penn, who was at this time of passing it, and for a considerable time longer, over in America." These things are not in a printed book, (belonging to Thomas Gilpin, Esq.) produced on the part of the United States, which is the evidence in the case, and is called in the statement the "Breviary." The case was decided by Lord Hardwicke, in 1760, and is reported in 1 Ves. Sr. 444. The title is an ancient and of great weight in every aspect, and made a final end of all controversy in England, (for there never has been a controversy since,) and thus fixes a new epoch in the history of the province, it will be conclusive to the right understanding of its proper bearing upon the immediate subject of controversy, to look back upon the earlier evidence which has been produced upon the hearing of the present case.

In 1682, Mr. Penn was removed from his government, and also in Delaware, from the Delaware river, upon the allegation that they were embraced in his patent. In 1685, the council, to whom the jurisdiction belonged, decided against him, directing a line to be run north and south, which is the present western line of the state of Delaware. Soon after, an agreement was entered into between Mr. Penn and Lord Baltimore, for settling all disputes between them.

In 1692, Mr. Penn was restored from his government, and in Delaware, it was pointed out by the crown. The alleged ground for this measure was, that disorder had occurred in his government. There was no question about title, nor was either province disturbed. They went on as before. In 1694, Mr. Penn was restored, and the government descended to his children. There has been a very general belief, that the real offender of Mr. Penn was his supposed regard for the Stuart family, and particularly the person of Prince II. Then the crown afterwards came to the throne and kingdom.

In and about the year 1711-12, a surrender of his governers powers to the crown was contemplated by Mr. Penn, and it is understood that a negotiation for the purpose was considerably advanced, when his capacity to proceed further was retarded by illness, which protracted his mind and memory for the remainder of his life. Pending the treaty, the Penn grant was submitted to the court in the case of Penn v. Lord Baltimore. Mr. Penn was heard, and something was said about it by the opinion of the court of Chancery, in 1711. It is in Chalmers' collection (volume 1, p. 22), dated February 8th, 1711, and among other things, says, "and he has made out to me his title thereto, that is, to the government of Pennsylvania, and of the 'town or colony of New Castle in Delaware.' This was in the time of Queen Anne.
In 1717, the Earl of Sutherland, alleging that he was a creditor of the crown to the amount of £20,000, applied for a grant of the three lower counties of the Duke of York. What was the object of the application? The answer is, evident enough; for he says, "the duke being in the nature of a common person, was in a condition to be enslaved from the restraints of the lord chancellor, we are at liberty to say, that the duke, at the date of the deeds, being a subject, was, in this respect, only "a private man, and not bound by estoppel as any other subject. He did not succeed to the throne till two years after. Admitting it to these things as a very sufficient reason, when they say (page 40): "But they presume the said late Duke of York might have some other grants thereof, which Mr. Penn might give an account of, but cannot, 'being under a lunacy.'" Mr. Penn died in the following year, 1718. They conclude their report by submitting for consideration, whether it will not be reasonable that your majesty's title should be established by the court of chancery, before any grant shall be made of the premises.' This was in the reign of George I. The application does not seem to have been further pursued, nor was any official act of the high court of chancery on that application. The title, therefore, passed undisturbed by the crown, by five reigns and a revolution, and the province continued to be assigned to the Duke of York, as it was founded in 1682, though it was always in view of the authorities of England, and as has been seen, frequently subjected to the examination of the king's legal advisers.

In 1733, William Penn being dead, a bill was filed in the high court of chancery, in England, by Mr. N. and Mr. R. Penn, his sons, against Charles Calvert, Lord Baltimore, to enforce the performance of the agreement made or by the Maryland charter. The boundaries between Pennsylvania and Maryland, and between Maryland and the lower counties. Recurring now to the advice of Mr. Norther and Mr. Thompson to the crown, to have the question of title determined in chancery, there is no reason to doubt that this suit was allowed, if not directed, by the privy council. "It is certain," says Lord Hardwicke, replying to an objection to his jurisdiction, "that the original jurisdiction in England, in this kind, relating to boundaries between provinces, the dominion, and proprietary government, is in the king and council. "The king was, when the province was assigned, as an original right." He adds, that the king, in council, might look upon the agreement, and allow it as evidence of the original right, he being judge as an original judge. "And therefore," he says, "the lords of the council have remitted this matter, very properly, to be determined in another place, on the foot of the contract." Lord Hardwicke was well aware of the questions to be decided finally in this case, as appears in his striking exordium of his judgment: "It being for the determination of the right and boundaries of two great provincial governments and of three counties of a united kingdom, of the Senate and the House of Commons, rather than a single judge;" adding, and my consolation is, that, if I should err in my judgment, it is not to the imputation of the injustice to a Roman senate, that will correct it." 1 Ves. 344, 445. No appeal was ever taken to the House of Lords.

In the decree, liberty was reserved to either party to apply to the court, if, "by any act or right of the crown," execution of it should be hindered by the House of Commons, rather than the Single judge; adding, and my consolation is, that, if I should err in my judgment, it is not to the imputation of the injustice to a Roman senate, that will correct it. This decree of Lord Hardwicke settled the validity and legal sufficiency of these deeds, the right of the province under them, and, of course, the boundary as described in the deeds. No appeal was taken, nor did either party ever apply, under the reservation in the decree, to set up any fact or right of the crown. It was universally acquiesced in, and became, by its own force and common consent, the law of the land from that time forth, till the charter of government issued to have power either to confirm or to dispute the rights about which it was made. Now, this was the same province which had been founded, as we have seen, in 1682; these were the deeds under which it was founded; and these were the boundaries by which it had been defined from the beginning.

Twenty-four years more elapsed, without controversy or question in England, its boundaries acts of herself and her sister states were in truth, had never disputed them,) when the delegates from "New Castle, Kent, and Sussex, on Delaware," on September 5th, 1744, met the delegates from the several colonies and provinces in North America, assembled at the Carpenter's Hall, in the city of Philadelphia, journal of Congress (I had also delegates there, and so had Pennsylvania and Maryland, all immediate neighbours, by whose treaty were bounded.

As a province or colony they were received, having a definite existence under the crown of England. Such as this province was under the crown of England on that day, and was she acknowledged to be by being received into that congress. On that day, we have seen this colony of province was, in the dominion of her bounds, which were part of them, had stood the shocks of twenty years of controversy, and finally were settled by some decree in chancery, and rested securely and quietly upon the foundations laid in 1682. In the struggles and lizards which ensued this province took her full part. On the 4th of July, 1776, she declared herself a sovereign and independent state, by the name of "Delaware," and by the united efforts of herself and her sister states was enabled to maintain it. But this state was the same that was a feeble colony in 1682, with the same rights and bounds; the same that in her more advanced age had had her metes and bounds judiciously established by the high court of chancery, and, let it be added, whose bounds were never been by the crown from the beginning, but in every way sanctioned. Could such a state, after all this, be set up to maintain her own rights? Lord Baltimore had a long controversy with her, because her grants interfered. But it was settled in England before the Revolution. The mouth of Delaware was shut by the construction of the Delaware river, and the state, equally entitled to the same rights as Delaware, was not of a nature to be actually possessed. These objections are now too late, if they ever had any foundation at all. They were long ago decided and settled in England. They were decided and settled at the Revolution; and, as to her boundaries, they stood defined and authenticated in the deeds of the Duke of York, in the patent of the king, in the proceedings of council, and in the high court of chancery, never having occasion to change from the beginning.

This course of observation, however, must here be suspended, for the purposes of this work, the construction of the deeds, as respects the immediate question upon original grants, lest it might be out of place. The question is, did the boundaries of the province go into the Delaware within the twelve miles circle, or did they not?

taken up, it is only necessary to observe that the colony of the three lower counties having been received into the congress, became in due time a state. This was a great change. But, greater in effect it was, it was a change of the fundamental rights and privileges; a change of the laws of the state, in civil cases, where one of the parties is an alien, &c. of another state, or otherwise entitled to the aid of an United States tribunal or acknowledged authority. When the charters of some of the states were found to include large masses of vacant land, which might be dangerous to the peace of the Union, did congress, or either or all of the states, attempt to define or limit their boundaries? Congress invited them to make cessions, which they freely and patriotically did, by compact, and with the conditions they thought fit to insist upon and congress to accept. And yet, in the day it was made, it is trenched on the title of every state. The question, then, to be considered, may be embraced in this general inquiry: Has the state of Delaware, by any act or default of her own, parted without the right the she then had, or any part of it? The examination of this question must, however, be preceded by an observation no one will resist, no one must resist: Delaware fairly carried out, will be found to meet and conclusively to answer most, if not all, the objections which are made to her inclusion in the United States, derived from the state of Delaware. It is this: that the inquiry is to be understood as applied to a sovereign state, with all the attributes of sovereignty, which have been yielded to the United States. Whoever would claim under the state, must, therefore, make out such case as will be available against a sovereign. The state of Delaware, by any act or default of her own, parted without the right she then had, and has not defined or limited her boundaries; not to come in her own and be one of her community, but to transfer them to an alien jurisdiction; in other words, to make them part and parcel of another state. This is the claim made by Mr. Humphrey. The right he asserts is not under the state of Delaware, but in her own.
flowed every high tide. There was no resting place upon it for the surveyor's foot or his instrument. But there is something else, much more conclusive. The surveyor returns the contents to be 178 acres. More than fifty years afterwards, when the island had been governed as a crown, and the Delaware measured, only 87.60 acres. The surveyor, therefore, did not begin a possession, though he made a sufficient survey with the proprietories acquainted as they certainly did. No survey, indeed, was necessary, for an island is sufficiently defined by the waters. The only other evidence of former possession by the United States had fixed their attention upon the spot as a site for the defence of the river. About the same time, General Bloomfield, in command of the military district, went to Delaware to negotiate a cession of the island to the United States, being himself a citizen of New Jersey. It was his business to have known the United States had fixed their attention upon the site for the defence of the river. The surveyor’s claim of title, it might be so termed for the time, still it was abandoned, leaving no mark of ownership. There was no possession, therefore, even if that could have been available. The evidence is that the island was occupied only by crews, selected by them as a lodging place for its solitude and security.

Has the state of New Jersey acquired any right under which his claim could be covered? If a case were established, in point of fact, it would be necessary to inquire how such a right could be acquired by New Jersey, the territory in question being within the state of Delaware, and subject to her laws and government. But it does not seem requisite to enter upon that inquiry, inasmuch as the proof is deemed to have made out no such case. The controversy, it will be seen, embraces two descriptions of rights, namely, the river and the soil under it, and islands in the river. The former is not susceptible of actual possession—the latter are. To begin with the latter. The evidence is, that when the river was surveyed in 1816, there was no possession, and it, connected with Dr. Gale’s claim of title, might be so termed for the time, still it was abandoned, leaving no mark of ownership. There was no possession, therefore, even if that could have been available. The evidence is that the island was occupied only by crews, selected by them as a lodging place for its solitude and security.

The evidence is plain, without question, or matter of course, whenever it finishes. The court was convened for the purpose of examining the jurisdiction in the courts either of the state or of the Union. This must be admitted to be very persuasive evidence. It is not to be disputed to the contrary, it must be deemed conclusive.

District Court, S. D. Georgia. Nov. Term, 1867.

GRAND JURY—OATH PRESCRIBED BY ACT 1862—AIDING REBELLION—WHO MAY CHALLENGE—WHEN CHALLENGE TO BE MADE—TESTIMONY.

1. Although the oath prescribed by the second section of the act of June 17, 1862 [13 Stat. 483], will one who, though still at large, has been warned by the process of the court that he will be made, during the term, the subject of an indictment for perjury.

4. When there is reasonable excuse for the delay, charges to the members of the grand jury will be heard after the body has been fully organized.

5. The accused party has no right to submit evidence in his behalf, not even with the consent of the prosecuting attorney. The grand jury are to examine the facts on which a charge is made by the government, not that on which it is denied by the alleged offender.

In the matter of the oath to be taken by jurors in the federal courts, under the act of June 17, 1832, 5 Stat. 430, in the case of the United States against Foster Blodgett.

ERIKHINE, District Judge (charging grand jury). On the first day of the present term (November 7th) you were empaneled and sworn to your oaths, and each of you, then taking the ancient common-law oath of grand jurors, and the court, at your instance, delivering to you its general charge. The court feels that it is due to you, as well as to the district attorney and the counsel for the challenger, Foster Blodgett, that the same oath as may be deemed proper to be made, and such decision as may be pronounced, be addressed to you, rather than to the court, to counsel themselves; because the matters in controversy concern, and are directly against, the legal status of several members of your body. Blodgett comes here before the court, and demands the right to challenge the polls; and for this he relies on the first section of the act of congress of June 17, 1832, which statute is entitled "An act defining additional causes of challenge, and prescribing an additional oath for grand and petit jurors in the United States courts." The first section declares that, "in addition to the existing causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, the following are hereby declared and established, namely: Without duress and coercion to have taken up arms or to have joined any insurrection and rebellion against the United States; to have adhered to any rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; to have committed, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever, to or for the use or benefit of any person or persons, whom the person giving such aid and comfort knew to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, or who he had good ground to believe had joined, or was about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and to have counselled and advised any person or persons to join any insurrection and rebellion, or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States," 12 Stat. 450.

The act embodied in the second section—and which substantially follows the language of the disqualifying causes enumerated in the first—will be read to you, but you may take or decline it, for it can be presented under the second section only, and at the suggestion of the prosecuting officers of the government, but upon your request, you will be better able to conclude whether you are, or are not, vulnerable to any one or more of the disqualifications mentioned in the first section, and that, under this statute, it is only the government that possesses the right to challenge. This court, at the last term, in the case of S. v. Cohen [unreported], which was an action of debt on bond, ruled that under the first section, the defendant, as well as the United States, was in this jurisdiction. If such is still the opinion of the court; nor can I perceive any difference in this respect between a grand and a petit jury, in this manner, be shown. U. S. v. Cornell (Case No. 14,589); State v. Marshall, 8 Ala. 302.

The following is laid down in a late accurate work on Criminal Procedure: "The most natural method is to require the witness to declare the matter under oath, on the voir dire. But witnesses are not generally required to answer questions which will tend to their disgrace; therefore, in England, the inquiry either orally or by written oath, when a juror has delivered an opinion adverse to the prisoner cannot be put to the juror himself, but it must be shown by other evidence. This point has been held the same way in the states. But generally in this country this class of questions is allowed to be put by the parties directly to the juror, after which a challenge can be made by the party, and this doctrine is also aided by express statutes. When this is not done, and even when it is, the court will sometimes determine the general object, and without prejudice to other methods, call upon the jurors, collectively or singly, to declare if they know any impediment to their serving, or if they are disqualified, to a particular objection which may have been suggested."

Bish. Or. Proc. § 788. And see id. § 786; Gooch's Case, 3 East 100. In 311, 337; Respública v. Dennis, 4 Yeates, 267; McCarty v. State, 26 Miss. 290. See concluding sentence in section 2, Act June 17, 1832 (12 Stat. 430). The challenger states in his affidavit, that the district attorney distinctly promised him that he should be permitted on the trial before the grand jury to have a defense laid before them. No such promise or agreement can have the sanction of this court. To allow evidence, either oral or written, to go before the grand inquest, on behalf of a defendant, would be subversive of the ancient and well-settled rules of courts of justice. M'Coy, 3., in Respública v. Dennis, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 236, said: "It is a matter well known, and well understood, that by the laws of our country, every question, no matter how delicate, of man's life, reputation, or property must be tried by twelve of his peers; and that their unanimous verdict is, alone, competent to settle the fact in issue. If, then, you undertake to inquire, not only upon what foundation the charge is made, but, likewise, upon what foundation it is denied, you will, in effect, be outside the jurisdiction of the petit jury, you will supersede the legal authority of the court in judging of the competency and admissibility of witnesses, and, having thus undertaken to try the question, that question may be determined by a bare majority, or by a much greater number of your body, than the twelve peers prescribed by the law of the land."

Foster Blodgett does not ask to challenge the entire panel, but he avers that there are individual disqualifications attaching to particular jurors, because of their being within one or more of the clauses of the first section of the statute. In his petition, of file this court, and which is before you, he states, among other matters, in substance, that he is informed and believes that the question is not before the court, nor yet before you, but that as yet no presentment has been made, nor indictment found and returned, into court; that, most of you are, under this statute, incompetent to inquire into his case; that he does not believe he can have a fair and impartial investigation of his case before you, or receive justice at your hands. He sets forth the names of the persons to whom he objects, and interposes a challenge to each. It was contended by the district attorney that, under this statute, it is only the government that possesses the right to challenge. This court, at the last term, in the case of S. v. Cohen [unreported], which was an action of debt on bond, ruled that under the first section, the defendant, as well as the United States, was in this jurisdiction. If such is still the opinion of the court; nor can I perceive any difference in this respect between a grand and a petit jury, in this manner, be shown.
he may present at its organization, and present challenges either to the array or to the polls; but if he be not held, by process, to answer to an indictment, he is not thus entitled. If Mr. Blodgett's challenge did not come within the spirit of this rule (for he does not within the letter of it), his motion to challenge must be denied.

In addition to the written petition of the challenger, he has also filed in court an affidavit, which has been read to you without objection on the part of the district attorney. A synopsis of so much of this affidavit as is necessary for the court to pass upon will be stated. Blodgett swears that the district attorney, Henry S. Fitch, Esq., in the city of Atlanta, during the last session of the United States court there, informed deponent that he (the district attorney) “expected to prosecute deponent before the grand jury of this court, at this term, for the offence of perjury.” Deponent says that he laid before the district attorney, by the hands of a friend, documents and papers which deponent expected to use in his defence, and informed him that he had witnesses by whom he could prove his innocence. He further says, that the district attorney distinctly promised deponent that he should be permitted, on the trial before the grand jury, to have his evidence in his defence laid before them. Further, he states that he was in attendance on this court on Thursday (7th instant), and again on Saturday that the district attorney was then in New York sick, and that it was not probable that any action could be had on his case during the term, under advice of counsel, returned home, with the promise of his counsel that he would telegraph him if the district attorney arrived and he was needed. The same telegram was received Wednesday last (13th instant), he came down with his witnesses on the succeeding morning, and informed the district attorney (who had just arrived) that he was ready with his witnesses, when the district attorney replied, “Your case is now before the grand jury; and I will see what can be done with it.” Deponent adds that he was afterwards informed by his counsel that the grand jury refused to hear his evidence.

And here the prime question presents itself, and it must be answered. Has Foster Blodgett now the right to challenge any individual member of the grand jury, who was grandly sworn, arrested and imprisoned on any criminal charge, and now brought hither by order of the court, or is he under bail only, because he is not in any of these constrained positions, is he any the less entitled to a grand jury of his country, legally qualified under its laws; and the time of the empaneling of this grand jury, the district attorney for this district was in New York, confined to his bed by sickness; and had Foster Blodgett, by virtue of this statute, then demanded of the court the right to present his challenge, I should have felt it to be my duty, as a judge, to have considered the consideration of the question until the coming of the district attorney, or until his place was filled pro tem., in pursuance of the sanction of the honorable secretary of the interior. Nor ought the unavoidable absence of the district attorney, at the time of the organization of the grand jury, to prejudice the rights of the government, and, in my judgment, he may still present challenges under the first section of the statute, or have the oath, incorporated therein, presented to the grand jurors, and the motion will be granted. But that Mr. Blodgett comes within the spirit and true intent of the rule as to the right of challenge and the time to present challenges, I do not think there is any doubt whatever. He was informed by the prosecuting officer of the United States for this district, that he expected to prosecute him before the grand jury at this term of the court for perjury. In Breeding v. State, 12 Tex. 227, it was held that a person is not affected by the finding of the grand jury may object to their fitness. 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 724. From this authority, and others that might, if necessary, be cited, and on principle, it would seem that it is not essential to the right of challenge to grand jurors that the challenger should be in prison, or out on bail; for if he be warned, as Blodgett was in this case, by the district attorney for this district—the officer to whom the duty of prosecuting for crimes against the laws of the United States is confided—that he intended to prosecute him before a grand jury at a particular term of the court, the person thus notified is thereby affected.

After a most careful consideration of the proceedings before the court, I am of the opinion that Foster Blodgett had the right to present his challenges at the organization of the grand jury, and, further, that he has not waived that right, and may present them now.

In accordance with this judgment, thirteen of the panel were excepted to under the first section of the act, for the reasons already given in the early part of the opinion, the clerk read the oath in the second section to the jurors challenged, upon which the court said that if any one of the jurors included in the challenge believed that he came within one or more of the causes of disqualification mentioned in the first section, he could retire from the jury box. All those who had been challenged, except two, withdrew.

The district attorney then said that he desired to present a motion to the court to review and reverse its decision on this point, to wit, that the mode adopted to try the challenges was erroneous. Leave was given, and he asked time to prepare his argument and produce authorities, which was also granted.

The following morning, the motion being put in writing, argument was had in support of it by the district attorney, and, contra, by H. R. Jackson, for Foster Blodgett.

THE COURT, he was the only one to testify, and the jurors who had retired the day preceding were discharged for the term. The panel was then filled from the names on the grand jury roll of the previous day, who were immediately sworn in.

THE COURT, on motion of the district attorney, and in pursuance of the second section of the statute, caused the oath therein to be read by the clerk to the jurors. But, the district attorney declining to have said oath administered, the grand jurors, under the instructions of the court, retired to enter upon their duties.

to have been committed by Captain Mackenzie, or any other person on board the ship of war Somers?

With these inquiries you submitted to the court three several charges in writing, which had been laid before your body, and which supply, in part, the foundation upon which the specific advice is requested: One is a complaint by Henry Morris against Alexander Bell Mackenzie and Guert Gansevoort "for the murder of Philip Spencer, committed on the high seas, on board the United States ship of war, under the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, on the first day of December, 1842"; one by Margaret El. Cromwell, charging, in the same terms, the murder of Samuel Cromwell at the same time and place; and one by Chas. Betts, charging the same persons with "the crime of manslaughter, in putting to death Elisha Small, at the same time and place." No other facts are communicated by your body to the court, but the observations I shall proceed to reply to these questions, will be on the assumption that the parties named in these charges were, at the time of the alleged offences, all regularly attached to the brig of war Somers as officers and men, in the service of the United States, and that their several deaths were produced by the public execution of the deceased, under the jurisdiction of Mackenzie, commander of the brig, and that Gansevoort was a commissioned lieutenant in the navy, serving in that rank on board, and in that capacity aided and assisted in the executions. It will also be taken as connected with the facts of the case that on the return of the brig to the United States, Gansevoort was charged by the order of the secretary of the navy to investigate this transaction, and that court found and pronounced the fact, that the conduct of Commander Mackenzie and Lieutenant Gansevoort in the matter was fully justified by the circumstances in which they and the ship were placed. That when the grand jury was convened, and a charge of murder and manslaughter was presented, the court was in session at Brooklyn, proceeding with the hearing and trial of the complaint now brought before your body. These facts, in substance, are admitted by the prosecutors in court, and this dispenses with the necessity of referring to you the investigation and decision of the facts, in order to give application to the rules of law that will be stated to you. The right of a grand jury to apply to the court without any necessity for them to be connected for advice and direction, in aid of the duties they are called upon to discharge, is fully recognized by the laws of this country and of England, and its free exercise is cherished and encouraged. For, although a jury, without a satisfactory certainty that the facts proved before them fall within any provision of the criminal law, may exclusively direct an indictment, and leave it to the court afterward to decide whether a crime has been committed, yet it is more consonant to a humane administration of justice to exempt the citizen from the pains and obloquy of a public accusation, where it is plain that no crime has been committed. What has been said by great authorities with respect to imperfect or uncertain proofs in support of a criminal charge applies with equal force when there is defective evidence that any law exists punishing the act charged, or when an essential ingredient to a criminal accusation that there be clear law both against the act charged and an adequate ground for the prosecution as presented. Lord Hale, Blackstone, and Chitty, in advert ing to the ancient dogma that no man is guilty, that the onus probandi is on the bill where there is probable evidence to support it, because it is only an accusation, and their inquiry and deliberation addressed to them, and that it was their province to weigh and decide the points so discussed. This transaction is intended for such a purpose as it is intended to consider your presence here as in any way varying or diminishing the rightful authority or responsibilities of the court.

The questions propounded touching the jurisdiction of the court over the matter, and to abide by the replies that may be given in this solemn investigation, and the prolonged toils attending it, would be but an idle parade.

The court cannot fail to perceive and appreciate the delicacy and importance of the interests it is called upon to decide. Your inquiries are so framed as to present the subject in its most solemn form, as well as to awaken those solicitudes and sympathies naturally accompanying the application of general rules to individual cases. You ask whether your authority extends to the investigation of crimes committed on board American ships of war on the high seas; and, if so, whether the matters set forth in the indictment are within your jurisdiction. The occurrence on board the Somers, with all its painful consequences, is thus brought before the court as being of such importance to subordinate interests as your estimation, as ministers of the law, to the great question propounded touching the administration of crime on the sea and in the high seas, and that affects and affects the whole extent and duration of these capital and important interests under this branch of the law. This question ought to be calmly examined and decided as a naked proposition of law, and without allowing the judgment of political prejudice to affect the conclusions that the result adopted may, in its operation, place the parties accused in this instance under increased misfortunes and dangers, or may tend to afford them extraordinary privileges and advantages of defence.

You are undoubtedly aware, gentlemen, that the subject matter involved in this special case has been under consideration before me, on several instances previous to the sitting of this court, and that I have repeatedly satisfied the defendants satisfactorily, the eminent gentlemen who have discussed the various and interesting questions involved in the case since the court for that purpose, but also that they presented a proper occasion for me to invite counsel, as well representing those who preferred these complaints as the parties affected by them, to afford the court the benefit of an argument in aid of the decision to be rendered. The request has been made with small satisfaction and with a view to the argument to the court, the benefit of an argument in aid of the decision to be rendered.

You have given your attention from day to day, throughout this highly able and instructive argument, occupying more than five successive days, and you will accordingly fully comprehend that neither the time I have allowed myself to study and reflect upon the argument, nor the space within which these observations to you must necessarily be compressed, will permit me to follow out, or even advert to, the multifarious positions and illustrations introduced into the discussion.

Gentlemen, it may be proper, in this connection, to add that you are not to consider the argument in court as addressed to you in your official character. In intimating to you, when your inquiries were submitted, that it would be left to your option to continue your deliberations in your room, or attend the discussion in court, I did not in any way intend to signify, no more than its respect toward you personally. You are aware that you have not been called from day to day as emboldened and in official attendance, nor is it recorded on the minutes that the grand jury has appeared in court since the day you presented these inquiries. It seemed necessary to notice these particular instances, lest it might be supposed that these arguments were meant to introduce or sanction the precedent that the grand inquest, organized and sitting as a jury, could have arguments of counsel or parties on matters under ment many persons convicted of homicides and other crimes committed on the high seas; and the question as a law fact now raised is whether the like powers extend to, and are to be exercised over, offences committed on the high seas under the control of the district of the United States. The answer to this inquiry must depend upon the same principles of construction and interpretation of the crimes acts of April 30, 1790 [1 Stat. 112], and of March 3, 1823, in connection with the act of April 24, 1819, which latter act would be a valid act and still in force. This court can exercise no jurisdiction in criminal matters not allotted to it specifically by act of congress. This principle is definitively asserted in the adjudications of the supreme court [U.S. v. Hudson] 7 Cranch [11 U.S.] 32; [U.S. v. Cooleidge] 1 Wheat. [14 U.S.] 460; and [U.S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U.S.] 366, determines that point most unequivocally, whatever may be its effect and influence on other questions connected with this case, upon which it has been so frequently cited. The objections to the jurisdiction of the court, over the subject of your inquiry result in these propositions: (1) That congress has power under the constitution to provide for the punishment of crimes committed in the army and navy, without trial in the courts of law. (2) That the statute establishing rules and regulations of the government and regulation of the navy (April 23, 1800 [2 Stat. 4]), is an exercise of that power in respect to the naval forces. (3) That the crimes acts of 1790 and 1823, neither in violation by necessity nor choice, embrace offences committed in the army; and only such offences committed in the army are punishable under the acts are guilty in law, and are to be regulated by rules and articles of war for trial in the civil courts. In support of the jurisdiction of this court over the subject of your inquiry, the general propositions are contended for: (1) That the judicial power of this court under the constitution extends to all crimes against the United States committed on the high seas, and that such offences affecting the public peace or welfare must be proceeded against by indictment and trial before a jury. (2) That the crimes acts give to this court cognizance of murder and manslaughter committed on the high seas, without distinction between public and private vessels, and are a full execution of the constitutional power in that behalf. (3) That the power to try cases in the courts of the district of the offence exercised by the court by virtue of the rules and regulations for the government of the navy, under the constitutional restriction, can give no authority to confer, if the constitution or the act is not applicable, this court must acquire the authority of congress to pass it, and receive the act as the law of the land. In connection with this point, the court has to consider the true intent for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is colorable or probable authority given to congress in this behalf, and accordingly all doubts, if any arise, will apply in support of the validity of the law, and not against it.

The provisions of the constitution which have been cited and commented upon applicable to this question are article 1, § 8, subs. 9, 11–15, and article 3, § 1, subs. 1, 2, and amendments 5 and 6.

To discern more distinctly the bearings of these several clauses upon the subject under consideration, it will be expedient to establish the following points, at least so far as they enter into the opinion I am about to submit to you. The counsel have discussed the constitutional question as to the extent and character of the powers of congress in the government and regulation of the navy with the highest ability and learning, and if the decision be left to this court to settle that question definitively, I should feel constrained to bestow on it a much more labored and thorough examination. It is given to the preparation of the opinion supporting my views a fuller development and wider range of illustration. But it does not appear to me that the case has assumed a posture rem-lish; the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution and the laws of the United States, and to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The trial of all crimes shall be by jury, and the right of trial by an impartial jury shall be held to pertain to a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger. In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed.

To a clearer comprehension of the nature and extent of the powers thus imparted by the constitution, and of the manner in which they were practically to be applied, to advert to the condition of the country in relation to these particulars antecedent to the adoption of the constitution. During the colonial stage of our country, the laws and laws supporting armies and provide and maintain navies was solely with Great Britain, and the British forces on land or at sea were subject to her laws alone. The civil polity of the colonies was, however, ample, and, in many instances, sovereign, within their respective boundaries, but their military establishments and support armies and provide and maintain navies was solely with Great Britain, and the British forces on land or at sea were subject to her laws alone.

Accordingly, although all crimes and misdemeanors committed, and punished, and only the civil courts, offenses on the high seas or on waters within the admiralty jurisdiction were placed under the cognizance of the vice-admiralty or admiralty court. The judge was elected as an appointee by the state and under the authority of the state. This jurisdiction was conferred by commissions issued from the executive branch of the state and was exercised in capital cases by the vice-admiralty judge or committing officer, in conjunction with local juries of the state. The judges of the vice-admiralty court were appointed by the king, and the judges of the admiralty court were appointed by the executive branch of the state.

The king's court was the highest court of admiralty in New England, and the judges of the admiralty court were appointed by the king. be in strict correspondence with those of England in the same particulars. The rules and articles of war were borrowed in substance from the English mutiny acts, and those of the navy were copied literally in very many respects. The trial of sea offenses was made to conform to the proceedings in like cases before the oyer and terminer of the admiralty sessions. I think the English law, as understood at that day, must have led to the conclusion that courts martial, army or navy, had exclusive cognizance over all offenses against the rules and articles, unless jurisdiction over these offenses was expressly given by statute to some other tribunal. Such acceptance of the import and operation of the articles would lend itself with the familiar usages under the continental government strongly to show that, in giving Congress power to the government and regulation of the land and naval forces and the militia. Whatsoever all of that class of cases arise there is admitted to be broad enough to cover what was at that time practiced in England, and in this country, in that behalf. The jurisdiction and of the first article (section 8, cl. 13) would probably be given by an act of Congress, as was done in the case of criminal offenses. For the fifth amendment from prosecution before a jury some cases arising in the executive or the military, and the militia. Whether all of that class of cases are not necessary to inquire, in this connection. There must, upon the plain meaning of the exception, be an act of Congress or a law or ordinance under the constitution of or the existence of the exigencies of public danger. The terms of the limitation would therefore apply to this particular service exacted from the militia, but would be unusual and extraordinary in respect to forces under the regular enlistment, and whose subjection to the authority of the general government had no necessary connection with a condition of war or public danger. I have therefore no hesitation in deciding that the power of Congress over the land and naval forces is irrespective of the actual condition of the country, and is the same in time of peace as in time of war or public danger. The further limitation to offenses for military offenses strictly, or such as are committed abroad, does not arise out of the language of the power, but is inserted because of a supposed conflict with the authority of the judiciary, if the power be understood in an unlimited sense. Whatever may be the force of this argument, it does not establish an inevitable collision between the two clauses of the section, or, if there be only a possible one, dependent chiefly upon the construction of the fifth amendment, whether the exception embraces the entire subject of cases arising in the army and navy, or only special and peculiar instances. To show a mere equivocal or dubious power in Congress is not enough to nullify a law; the want of authority is important in law of this character. It has been urged that there is an inherent restriction in the power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, confining the authority over the arms of public service to them in their organized and collective capacity. That to govern and regulate them alike and alike, with authority to control their operations and act upon them in their aggregate character, and that the provisions that the forces is only incidental, and can be carried no farther than is indispensable to maintain such organization and conduct such operations. It may be read would in any power as expressed in the articles of confederation, was that of making rules for the government and regulation of a nation, a province, a city, a necessary imports full authority over the individual subjects as well as the community collectively. Neither in this sense to govern and regulate the idea of land or naval forces limited to bodies combined and acting only in an organized form; each component part is as distinctly signified as if separate powers of the national powers is expressed in the term forces. But so also are its constituents to whatever designation of the terms; armies, divisions, brigades, regiments, companies, guards, sentinels; fleets, squadrons, separate vessels, ships, boats, crews, are land and naval forces, integrally and independently, no less than when compounded in the general mass, and so is the individual soldier and seaman. These observations, gentlemen, are all I propose to offer you on this branch of the subject. It is not my purpose to attempt to settle the true construction of the constitution in the particular under consideration. The provisions of the constitution have been reviewed to ascertain whether they plainly interdict to congress the power to pass laws to publish by courts martial, common law crimes committed in the army or navy; and if such no prohibition exists, whether there is in those provisions the incapacity to imply the existence of such power in congress. I have already stated to you that, upon general principles, and in consonance with the adjudications of our highest tribunal, it is the duty of this court to accept an act of congress as of full authority and binding, if there be only color of authority or probable cause in the constitution to uphold it. I limit myself therefore to the view that the constitution insisted on between the constitution and an act of congress assuming to take from the judiciary and confer on courts martial jurisdiction over criminal offenses in the navy, is not denied to congress. If such doubt exists, it is not to apply against the validity of the law, but in support of it. I therefore doubt that in respect to this court and the action of your finding, etc., the act of congress of April 23, 1800, is valid and obligatory, even if in its true construction it gives exclusive jurisdiction to the court martial over the homicide complained of before you.

Under this view of the subject, gentlemen, there can be no doubt of the power of congress to govern the army and navy, by bringing offenses committed in either under the cognizance of the courts of law. Heuston v. McCollum, 2 Black 61 U. S. 151 [5 How. 151 [15 Pet. 361]]. But no such expression of intention is introduced into the navy code. Whether then the courts of the United States are to take cognizance of offenses committed in the naval forces depends entirely upon the true intent of congress in that behalf as expressed in the existing laws of 1855 and 1885, and the navy act of 1800. The competency of this court under the constitution and the judiciary act—section 11 [1 Stat. 79]—to exercise the jurisdiction is plain.

The sole inquiry then is, has the jurisdiction been given it over the subject matter, by act of congress, in its terms, or by necessary implication? The argument on this branch of the case has on both sides been exceedingly full and acute; and although it has been my duty and pleasure to study the reasoning and authorities adduced, with minute care and attention, it will not be necessary to set forth in full detail the particular arguments. The necessity of the case compels me to attempt no more than to lay before you the general conclusions of my judgment upon the controlling points embraced in your inquiries. The first crimes act was passed April 30, 1790, [1 Stat. 112], at the second session of the first congress. No action had been taken on the subject at the previous session, other than to provide for the apprehension and trial of criminals. Act Sept. 24, 1789, §§ 11, 33 [1 Stat. 78].

In proceeding to institute and establish a system of criminal jurisprudence, congress acted upon the assumption that there were four great classes of national offenses over which it had supreme authority: (1) offenses of the United States, within the territorial limits of the United States; (2) offenses committed on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of the laws of the Union within the territorial limits of the United States; (3) offenses committed on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of the laws of the Union within the territorial limits of the United States; (4) offenses committed in the army and navy and militia, when in actual service of the United States. It was unquestionably competent for congress to legislate over all those subjects in a single statute or section, and when language is used of the personal interest of the subjects, and broad enough to embrace others, but not designating them expressly, it became necessary to interpret the provision resting upon the intent of the legislature, whether the law is to have the more extensive or the more limited application. For instance, this statute punishes, but not capital, misprision of felony, manslaughter, mayhem, embezzlement of public property or receiving stolen goods, committed in any port or place under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States; and this language is plainly extensive enough to include the commission of those crimes by the land forces of the United States stationed at such places. Was it the intention of congress to apply this general legislation over crimes on land to that extent? If such be the case, it is not to apply against the validity of the law, but in support of it. I therefore doubt that in respect to this court and the action of your finding, etc., the act of congress of April 23, 1800, is valid and obligatory, even if in its true construction it gives exclusive jurisdiction to the court martial over the homicide complained of before you.
courts to such extent as the discretion of congress deemed proper. Offenders in the land forces in certain cases were to be delivered over to the courts of military trial and punishment. A similar provision is contained in the English mutiny act (2 MacArthur, 229), without which it seems to be thought that the general authority to try all cases not capital, courts martial would have exclusive cognizance of that class of offenses when committed in the army. In Top. Law Dict., 2 MacArthur, 296. But no such direction or authority is incorporated in the naval code, and the design of the latter is to give the entire jurisdiction over the offenses enumerated to the naval courts martial would seem inadmissible. In this connection the reasoning of the supreme court in 220 cannot be avoided. The cases were with great talent and lucidity, and the construction of the circuit of the crimes act of 1790. The indictment was on the eighth section of that act, here also in question. The act was cautiously explored by the court to ascertain the reason for the omission within it authorizing a circuit court to try one indicted for murder on board a ship of war, within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States; and a leading inquiry was whether language in the crimes act which might embrace a ship of war should be applied to it. The court repudiates the signifcance claimed for the word "place" under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States used in the act, as comprehending only a ship of war. It is evident that conclusion upon the mere import of a word and phrase, draws from the act what must be regarded as an adjudged construction by the court as to its language and meaning, that there was no provision in that act adapted to the punishment of crimes committed in the navy. The court assigns a reason in fact why it was direc or postponed, and then adverted to the act of April 23, 1800 [2 Stat. 45], as fortifying the conclusion, because that statute specifically relating to offenses in the navy, gives no jurisdiction to courts of law of any crime committed in a ship of war, whatever it may be stationed. Although this is not an authoritative adjudication upon the specific point now raised, yet it is to the intention of congress as expressed in the act of 1800, it affords high and commanding evidence that congress has power to legislate specifically for the government and jurisdiction of the navy, and to place that government in courts martial to the exclusion of courts of law. Almost forty years have elapsed since this law was passed. In that period neither has augmented in numbers and force, and has been in service in all quarters of the globe. No instance is produced in which, during that period and under circumstances so probable to give occasion for it, the jurisdiction of the courts of law has been applied to the trial of offenses in the navy cognizable by naval courts martial. This fact is of commanding cogency to establish the common conviction of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of such jurisdiction exists. The supreme court regard it as a circumstance of deserved weight in support of the constitutionality and validity of an act of congress, that there has been a uniform course of action, or a partial acquiescence, with the power exercised under the act. [Stuart v. Laird] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 299; 11 Pet. [316] 267.

In respect to the institution of the circuit courts, most of the judges when applied to by General Washington, on the first adoption of the judiciary act, gave their opinions that the act in that particular was not authorized by the constitution. 1 Story, Const. Law, 437, 479, note. Yet the supreme court, after the law had been in a course of execution and acquiesced in for less than 15 years, decided that it was too late to interfere with the act on its face. In re question. [Stuart v. Laird] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 299. Cases to the point may be largely multiplied, but I do not regard to be the highest authority, and should regard it an exceedingly unbiased and just act in this court, after so long and notorious an execution of the act of 1800, to assume the act in the future as it was institutional and void as to any of its provisions. The jurisdiction of courts martial over the subject matter, course of action and method of proceeding with regard to be absolute and exclusive. From the examination I have bestowed on this point, I am persuaded this is the result of the English authorities, and that which is here or comment on them, because it in that country the courts of general jurisdiction would retain the subject matter. Gentlemen now satisfied with the conclusion with in a few remarks, what I propose saying to you in respect to the operation and effect of the crimes act of 1800, action of the government of course. The naval code had been in force a quarter of a century as a distinct and independent system of jurisdiction over the offenses assigned to its (site) or continued under the act of 1825 was passed. The decision in the case of U. S. v. Blevins [supra] made in 1818, had indicated to the public what was the judicial ac cepation of that code, and also as to the effect of the crimes act of 1790, in respect to offenses in the navy. The presumption that would be of the most violent character, that if congress designed by either of the later statutes to interfere with this known and settled course of action, it would be stated directly and plain expressed; and that a mere re-enactment of any provisions of the statute of 1790 would not have an operation broader than they were known to have under the former act. It is to be farther observed that though the act of 1825 (section 4) denounced the crime of murder in the same language as is used in section 8 of the act of 1790, yet other offenses are introduced into the former section not found in that of 1790—and the one is accordingly not a precise re-enactment of the other, nor to be regarded as supplanting the former law, or establishing a substantively new one. But what is still more pointed and direct, and becomes in my judgment conclusive on this point, is that in the only section (section 11) in which offenses on board vessels of war, or in relation to vessels of war, are specially mentioned, the authority of naval courts martial is expressly reserved.

In my opinion the effect of this evidence is not varied by the nature of the offense. It is limited to that section only, for the body of the section demonstrates that if congress means its penal law shall apply to ships of war on the high seas vessels will be specifically named, and imports furthermore that without being so named, they will not come within the range of legislation in respect to crimes, and the proviso affords direct and positive evidence that congress recognized the power of naval courts martial as an existing jurisprudence over crimes of a general bearing and character, and affecting the public otherwise than merely in the preservation of discipline, affects the first section of the act of 1833, which provides for the punishment of mutiny or revolt, a crime denounced in the act of 1790, committing it to the fine and imprisonment, and leaves the act of 1800, which inflicts the same punishment for the same offence, in full force.

Without pursuing the discussion further, I state to you, gentlemen, that in my judgment, neither of the acts of 1829 or 1835 gives to this court jurisdiction over the crime of mutiny committed on board a ship of war, and triable before a naval court martial. Manslaughter is not named in the naval code as an offense by court-martial, and it is contended that there is therefore nothing to intercept the jurisdiction of this court, given by the crimes act, to try and convict the punishment death for the offense imposed by the act of 1790, committing it to the fine and imprisonment, and leaves the act of 1800, which inflicts the same punishment for the same offense, in full force.

It is a general principle governing prosecutions in courts martial as well as in criminal courts of law, that the court may convict the accused of a crime of less degree than that charged in the accusation, but not of a distinct crime. 12 Peters. 591, note; 1 Tous, 244, 262. To the same effect, the first section of the act of 1790, which provides for the punishment of mutiny or revolt, a crime denounced in the act of 1790, committing it to the fine and imprisonment, and leaves the act of 1800, which inflicts the same punishment for the same offense, in full force.

Gentlemen, questions affecting the jurisdiction and rightful powers of courts of law are always of a delicate and embarrassing nature. The law imperiously demands of every tribunal that it shall employ all its rightful functions in the furtherance of public justice, and it no less emphatically forbids to it the usurpation of authority not clearly vested by law. The supreme power over all the subjects of criminal jurisprudence, the legislature is to be supposed to allot jurisdiction to one or the other, but from the best consideration I am able to bestow on the subject, I am led to the conclusion that naval courts martial have jurisdiction to punish the offense of manslaughter committed at sea on board of ships of war.

It belongs to no court to arrogate to itself a wisdom beyond that of the legislature in this respect; and in conducting the inquiry into what the law has ordained and established in this behalf, and with the facts before us, that the naval code, as a distinct system of jurisprudence under our laws, has been in force for nearly forty years, that thirty of the last years of that period have witnessed a large increase of the naval forces, and a vast scope of employment, and that the application of the naval code by means of courts martial has been constant, and not only to the department of the government,—that a quarter of a century since the highest judiciary of the land intimated and published its opinion that the general crimes act was sufficiently applicable to offenses committed on board ships of war,—and that congress since that period has legislated at large over felonies and offenses at sea, without directly bringing vessels in war within that legislation, except where the authority of courts martial was also reserved,—and that throughout the time the events on board the Semmes have most agitated the public attention, and when the civil authorities of this district openly declined to exercise jurisdiction over the case, congress continued in session without changing the law or acting upon the matter, I think we must all feel a deep conviction that this court ought not to be the first to assume such a jurisdiction, and arraign the parties accused on a matter touching their lives.

THE

LAWS OF OLERON.

[Reprinted from 1 Pet. Adm. Append. iii.]

This justly celebrated code was originally promulgated by Eleanor, Duchess of Guienne, the mother of Richard I. of England. Returning from the Holy Land, and familiar with the maritime regulations of the Archipelago, she enacted these laws at Oleron in Guienne, and they derive their title from the place of their publication. The language in which this collection of laws was originally clothed is that of Gascony, and their first object appears to have been the commercial operations of that part of France only.

By Richard I. of England, who inherited the dukedom of Guienne from his mother, this code was improved, and introduced into England. Some additions were made to it by King John, it was promulgated anew in the 50th year of Henry III., and received its ultimate confirmation in the 12th of Edward III.1 England and France contend for the honour of having originated this system of laws; but we only notice this circumstance to introduce the observation, that it affords the strongest testimony of the value of the collection, and of the high respect in which it is held by the two greatest nations of the world. Indeed it forms the basis of the celebrated Ordinances of Lewis XIV. of France, and it is admitted as authority in the courts of common law, as well as the admiralty courts of England.

The translation now published is printed from the "Sea Laws," and the editor has carefully compared it with a copy published in French by Deisseldorf, in a work entitled "Les Us et Coutumes de la Mer." He has not considered himself authorized to make any alterations in the text, but wherever a variance between the copies has been discovered, he has pointed it out, and he has given the words of the French copy, with a particular reference to the passage from which, in his opinion, they differ.

The "notes and illustrations," which are highly valuable, will be found by a reference to Clerise, to have been principally abridged from his work, and, indeed, in some instances they are extracted verbatim. While an acknowledgment of the source from whence they were derived, would have been honourable to the candour of the compiler of the Sea Laws, these Commentaries would have obtained increased authority from the reputation and talents of their real author, who is justly estimated among the most distinguished jurists of France.

ARTICLE I.

When several joint owners make a man master of a ship or vessel, and the ship or vessel departing from her own port, arrives at Bordeaux, Rouen, or any other such place, and is there freighted to sail for Scotland, or some other foreign country; the master in such case may not sell or dispose of that ship or vessel, without a special procuration2 from the owners: but in case he wants money for the victualling3 or other necessary provisions of the said vessel, he may for that end, with the advice of his mariners, pawn or pledge part of the tackle or furniture of a ship.

Observation.

The title of master is so honourable, and the command of a ship of such importance, that great care has been taken by all maritime nations, that none may be employed but honest and experienced men. By an ordinance of the admiralty in France, A. D. 1584, every master of a ship before he took upon him that trust, was to be examined whether he was fit for it. The Spanish naval laws require the same thing: El maestre de la nave, para serlo, ha de ser marinero y examinado. Cédula real del Anno 1576. Impresas con las de Indias quarto tomo. The ordinances and regulations of the Hanse Towns, do not only demand experience and capacity, but honesty and good manners. And none was to be admitted into the service of any citizen aboard his ship, without a certificate of his qualifications, as to his honesty and capacity. See their Book of Ordinances, book 6, art. 1.

The Greeks called the master of a ship ἤριξις, cujus fidei navis concurrens, to whom the government of the ship is entrusted; but so, that the master cannot sell the ship itself, nor any of her tackle or furniture, without the order or consent of the owners. However, in case of necessity, when he is in a far country, he may pawn or pledge her tackle for provisions, and, if that will not do, he may borrow money on the ship's bottom, though not without the consent of his officers and seamen. According to the Ordinances of Visby, arts. 13, 16, and Philip II. King of Spain's Ordinances in the year 1563, art. 12. Those of the Hanse Towns forbids a master of a ship, withholding he is part owner, not only to sell, but to do any thing, even to buy tackle or victuals, without acquainting the other owners of it, unless it be in a strange country, and in a case of necessity, well and lawfully attested. Articles 3-5 et seq.

By the ordinances and customs of the sea, it appears, that formerly it was not thought safe to entrust a master of a ship with the vessel 2 Brown, Civ. & Adm. Law, 40. 30 Fed.Cas.

and cargo, unless he was a freeman of that city, and part-owner of the ship; and if he was part-owner, when he had betrayed or abused his trust, the other owners might turn him out of the ship, paying him what part of his share he came to at the same price he gave for it. See Ordinances of the Hanse Towns, art. 14. And if he pretended he had sold his part to another person for more than it was worth, the other owners might have it appraised, and take it to themselves, paying him what it was valued at by such appraiser. Article 53.

The master commonly took care of every thing belonging to the ship, from the poop to the mainmast. He was obliged to understand the art of piloting and navigation, that he might know how to control the pilot, and mind how he steers the ship, y si el maestre no tuere piloto, debe obrar a ver un marinsere en la navigacion, tel' que, pueda regir la nave a fala de piloto, according to the ordinances of Spain. The mate's command reached from the stern to the mainmast, the latter included. It will not be thought improper by the curious to mention here the several officers of a ship, either men of war, or merchantmen, as they were distinguished aboard, a century of years ago.

In royal navies the first officer was the admiral; then the vice-admiral, then the captain-major or chief of a squadron. In every man of war, the first officer was the captain, the second the second in command, who enjoyed the place in honour of the sciences he professed and practised; next to him was the master, who had the charge of the table and furniture, and then the captain, and lieutenant of the soldiers. In a merchantman the first officer was the master, the second the pilot, the third the mate, the fourth the factor, or supercargo; then his assistant, accompats, the surgeons, the steward, four corporals, the cook, the gunner, the cockswain; the gunners and cockswain used to work before the mast, as well as the rest of the ship's crew, but their wages were more. There is a great deal of difference between the order of precedence on board of a ship now, and what was formerly: for the captain and lieutenant of the soldiers would think it very hard to give place to the pilot and master of a ship; and the factor, or supercargo, will as difficulty be persuaded to own the master of a vessel's superiority, except in what relates to the navigating the ship.

ART. II.

If a ship or other vessel be in a port, waiting for weather, and a wind to depart, the master ought when that comes, before his departure to consult his company, and say to them, Gentlemen, what think you of this wind? If any of them see that it is not settled, and advise him to stay until it is, and others, on the contrary, would have him make use of it as fair, he ought to follow the advice of the major part: If he does otherwise, and the vessel happens to miscarry, he shall be obliged to make good the same, according to the value upon a just appraisement.

Observation.

It is a maxim, or general sea law, that a master of a ship shall never sail out of a port, never weigh or drop anchor, cut masts or cable, or indeed do any thing of consequence, let him be in whatever danger may happen, without the advice of the major part of his company, and the merchants, if there be any aboard.—He must call all together to consult. Wisbuy, art. 14.

ART. III.

If any vessel, through misfortune, happens to be cast away, in whatsoever place it be, the mariners shall be obliged to use their best endeavours for saving as much of the ship and lading as possibly they can: and if they preserve part thereof, the master shall allow them a reasonable consideration to carry them home to their own country. And in case they save enough to enable the master to do this, he may lawfully pledge to some honest persons such part thereof as may be sufficient for that occasion. But if they have not endeavoured to save as aforesaid, then the master shall not be bound to provide for them in any thing; but ought to keep them in safe custody, until he knows the pleasure of the owners, in which he may act as becomes a prudent master; for if he does otherwise, he shall be obliged to make satisfaction.

Observation.

The ship's crew are obliged to do all that lies in their power to save things from shipwreck, and gather up what they save, on pain of losing their wages; and those that hinder or discourage them from it shall be severely punished. This law is very well explained by an ordinance of King Philip II. of Spain, in the year 1565, by which it is ordained, that the seamen shall be bound to save as much as they can from shipwreck; and in such case, the master is bound to pay them their wages, and to give them a further reward for their labour out of the goods. But if the seamen refuse to do their endeavor to save the goods, they shall neither have pay nor reward. Hanse Towns Ord. art. 44; Wisbuy, art. 15.

ART. IV.

If a vessel departing with her lading from Bordeaux, or any other place, happens in the course of her voyage, to be rendered unfit to proceed therein, and the mariners save as much of the lading as possibly they can; if the merchants require their goods of the master, he may deliver them if he pleases, they paying the freight in proportion to the part of the voyage that is performed, and the costs of the salvage. But if the master can readily repair his vessel, he may do it; or if he pleases, he may freight another ship to perform his voyage. And if he has promised the people who helped him to save the ship the third, or the half part of the goods saved for the danger they ran, the judicatures of the country should consider the pains and trouble they have been at, and reward them accordingly, without any regard to the promises made them by the parties concerned in the time of their distress.

Observation.

This law does not relate to an entire loss, but only to a partial, or rather not to the shipwreck, but to the disabling of a ship, so that she cannot proceed in her voyage without repairing, in which case the merchants may have their goods again, paying the freight in proportion to the way the ship made. If the merchant has not money to pay the freight, and the master will not credit, the latter may take like distress for payment at the market price. Wisbey, art 38; Emperor Charles V. Ordinance, art. 40.

The master can in a little time refit his vessel, and render her fit to continue her voyage, that is, if he can do it in 3 days' time at the most, according to the Hanse Town Laws; or by going to the free port of the water where they were fish'd, fifteen, or some fathoms; as also a tenth part for salvage on the goods. But if he can not had him to himself, he has no power to do it by any fault of his, the freight shall be paid him. Lege Rhadior. Numb. 2, secundo & ultimo tomo juris Graeco-Romanii in fine; Wisbey, arts. 16, 37, 55; King Philip II. of Spain's Ordinance, under the head of "Averages," art. 38.

For all charges of salvage, there are very great allowances made to the salvors, lege Rhadior. secundo 'tomo juris Graeco-Romanii Notis'; and the oath that were nor is in Promptuari Juris, lib. 2, tit. 6. By this law there was adjudged to the divers and salvors, the half, the third or the tenth of the things saved, and the third part of the water out of which they were fish'd, fifteen, or one fathom; as also a tenth part for salvage on the goods. But if they cannot be restored to themselves, and that be the cause of it, he shall be corporally punished. The same ordinances contain that fifteen mariners and salvors out of their ship all night, to pay all the damage that shall happen while they are absent. Those of the Hanse Towns, arts. 23, 23, 43, 43, and imprisonment. Some laws forbid them to undress themselves, and the Hanse Towns, art. 32, to lie with their wives aboard. The reason is, that they may always be in their places in the discharge of their duty in the preservation of the ship and goods. The obligation of the mariners to their master, begins as soon as he is hired and terms are agreed upon. The wages are always paid when the voyage is finished, and they are returned. The obligation of the master to the merchant is from the beginning of his charges, and the mariner is obliged to stow and unstow the goods, according as the place they are in is commodious or not, to keep them from damming, and promote or hinder the ship's trimming; and if by their refusing to do so, the merchandise is dammed or spoilt, they are bound to make good the damages. Wisbey, art. 48; Philip II. art. 19. By the laws of Wisbey, they are also bound to unload some goods with the master's leave, in the event of the ship ashore; for which they are to have no extraordinary allowance; but for letting things up or down, they are by the same laws to be allowed something extraordinary. The ship is always liable to be detained in their wages. The laws are very severe against those seamen that run away from ships after they are hired. In men of war, desertion is punished with death; in merchantmen, by the Hanseatic laws, or those of the Hanse Towns, they are to be marked in the face with a red hot iron, that they may be known, and be infamous as long as they live. If the mariner runs away before the voyage, when he is taken, he ought to refund half as much as the master was to have paid him for the whole voyage. If he hires himself to two masters, the first may demand him, and by the Hanseatic law, art. 1, he is not bound to pay him any wages. Provision is made for such seamen as run away, only because the master has used them ill. By the same laws, if the master entices away a mariner hired before by another, the last master shall forfeit to the first 25 livres, and the mariner, half the wages he was to have, and the former shall indemnify the latter, and the latter be bound to follow and serve the first master. However, a mariner may demand, and ought to have his discharge, either before or during the voyage, for those good time; otherwise they shall be liable to make satisfaction, if they have whatelse.

Observation.

This article relating to seamen, it will not be unacceptable to the reader to consider that other customs and ordinances we have met with concerning them.

Mariners are obliged to look carefully after everything that relates to the preservation of the ship and goods. Consolato, c. 169; Wisbey, art. 47. For which reason, they ought not to go ashore without the consent of the master or mate's permission; if they do, they are bound to answer all the damages that happen to the ship or merchandize in their absence. Wisbey, art. 17. The Regulations of the Hanse Towns, arts. 23, 23, conformable to the Rhodian Law, secundo tomo juris Graeco-Romanii in fine.
four reasons: in case he is made master or mate of another ship; if he marries, and then he is obliged to refund what he has received; if the master makes any provision in his voyage for quitting the ship; if the voyage is finished, the ship disarmed, unloaded and light, the sails, tackle and furniture taken away and secured. See Laws Wisby, arts. 34, 62.

If the master gives a mariner his discharge, without any lawful cause, and for his pleasure only; in case he does it before the voyage, and while the ship is in port, he ought to pay half as much as he was to give him for wages, and at his return he must pay him the wages he was to give him for the voyage; but if he discharges him after the ship is sailed, he ought to pay him all his wages. Wisby, art. 111.

By the Hanseatic law, the master is to pay a third of the wages only, and not to bring it to his owners' account. He is obliged also to pay him not only all his wages, if he discharges him in his voyage, but to defray the charges of his return. If after a bargain is made between the master and mariner, if the voyage had been for barter, the master must deliver the cargo, and the ship must be manned as the master was to deliver the cargo, and as he lives at the cost of the ship and cargo. Vide the Hanseatic Law, art. 35. An instance of this is told by our author. In the year 1621, Giles Esteben, a citizen and merchant of Bordeaux loaded a vessel of 36 tuns with wine for Calais, and paid for the charge of the cargo to one Filton his servant. The vessel set sail, and when she was at sea met with a Turkish rover. The corsair came up with her, and took her, but did not meddle with the vessel or the wine, either because the Alcoran forbids the Mahometans to drink or deal in wine, or because he had not the courage to fight against the master of the vessel, who was a Scotchman; for he did him nor any of his crew no manner of hurt, but took away Filton and sold him in Barbary for 780 livres. Filton returning to Bordeaux, found that his master Esteben was dead; however, he entered an action in an inferior court against the widow, for his wages, as well for the time he was detained in slavery, as for that before his captivity, as also for the reimbursement of his ransom money, but as to the latter, he should have a little patience, to see if he can be brought to reason. Vide Hanseatic, art. 29; Laws of Wisby, art. 25.

ART. VI.

If any of the mariners hired by the master of any vessel, go out of the ship without his leave, and get themselves drunk, and thereby there happens contempt to their master, debates, or fighting and quarrelling among themselves, whereby some happen to be wounded: in this case the master shall not be obliged to get them cured, or in any thing to provide for them, but may turn them and their accomplices out of the ship; and if they make words of it, they are bound to pay the master besides: but if by the master's orders and commands any of the ship's company be in the service of the ship, and thereby happen to be wounded or otherwise hurt, in that case they shall be cured and provided for at the costs and charges of the said ship.6

4 "Il doit être guéri et pansé sur le coût de ladite nef." Cléirac, 15.-E.

ART. VII.

If it happens that sickness seizes on any one of the mariners, while in the service of the ship, the master ought to set him ashore, to provide lodging and candlelight for him, and also to spare him one of the ship-boys, or hire a woman to attend him, and likewise to afford him such diet as is usual in the ship; that is to say, so much as he had on shipboard in his health, and nothing more, unless it please the master to allow it him; and if he will have better diet, the master shall not be bound to provide it for him, unless it be at the mariner's own cost and charges; and if the vessel be ready for her departure, she ought not to stay for the said sick party7—but if he recover, he ought to 7 "Et s'il guérit il doit avoir son loyer tout comptant, en rebattant les frais, si le maître l'a en a fait, et s'il meurt, sa femme ou ses prochains le doivent avoir pour lui. Voyez le have his full wages, deducting only such charges as the master has been at for him. And if he dies, his wife or next kin shall have it.

Observation.
The nineteenth article of the Laws of Wisby, the forty-fifth of the Hanseatic law, the twenty-eighth of Charles V., and the sixteenth of Philip II., which he compiled for the Low Countries, were all founded upon this law of Oleron, and contain nothing of the kind as mariners be to blame, and agree exactly with it, both if he recovers his health, or dies in the voyage. The Spaniards have another custom in the West India voyage: for in case a mariner falls sick, he must substitute another in his place, otherwise he loses all his wages for the time in which he could not work. By the Hanseatic law, art. 45, if a mariner is detained ashore by sickness, the voyage ought not to be retarded on his account. By Charles V.'s ordinances, if the mariner dies as he is outward-bound, his wife and heirs shall receive half his pay; if as he is homeward-bound, they shall have all, deducting the charge of his funeral, if there has been any. In ships of war the custom in some places has been more favourable to sailors; for we find in a treatise written by Bertrand de Lescail, of the church of a Lescail, entitled, “Advis pour aller aux Indies Orientales,” that if a man died the first day of the voyage, his heirs were to be paid as much as if he had completed it.

ART. VIII.

If a vessel be laden to sail from Bordeaux to Caen, or any other place, and it happens that a storm overtakes her at sea, so violent, that she cannot escape without casting some of the cargo overboard for lightening the vessel, and preserving the rest of the lading, as well as the vessel itself; then the master ought to say, “Gentlemen, we must throw part of the goods overboard,” and, if there are no merchants to answer him, or if those that are there approve of what he says by their silence, then the master may do as he thinks fit; and if the merchants are not pleased with his throwing over any part of the merchandise, and forbid him, yet the master ought not to forbear casting out so many of the goods as he shall see to be for the common good and safety; he and the third part of his mariners making oath on the Holy Evangelists, when they arrive at their part of discharge, that he did it only for the preservation of the vessel, and the rest of the lading that remains yet in her. And the winces, or other goods, that were cast overboard, ought to be valued or prized according to the just value of the other goods that arrive in safety. And when these shall be sold, the price or value thereof ought to be divided livre a livre among the merchants. The master may compute the damage his vessel has sustained, or reckon the freight of the goods thrown overboard at his own choice. If the master does not make it appear that he and his men did the part of able seamen, then neither he nor they shall have anything. The mariners also ought to have one tun free, and another divided by cast of the dice, according as it shall happen, and the merchants in this case may lawfully put the master to his oath.

Observation.
Of two evils, to choose the least is the law of nature as well as of nations; and when a ship is in danger of perishing, the lives of the seamen, and the goods of the ship are to be preferred to the goods. The master, therefore, may make the throwing part of it overboard the least evil. But that the master's ignorance or fear might not hurry him to do any thing to the detriment of the ship or goods, he must consult the merchants, passengers, or mariners aboard his ship, and, according as the necessity of it appears to them, to throw the goods overboard. This he is warranted to do by the Rhodian Law. Secundo Tono Juris Graeco-Romani, Num. 9, and by 20th, 21st, and 38th articles of that of Wisby. The 20th and 38th articles provide also, that if the merchants alone are against the proposition of throwing the merchandise overboard, and the rest, who have their lives and goods also to lose, consent to it, the master and third part of the seamen, making oath as they come ashore by oath, that necessity forced them to do it, and that otherwise they could not have been saved, may do it, and shall then be justified for what they did. The master is not obliged, when he comes to this extremity, to throw his own goods overboard first. The custom of the Levant is, that the ship's first officer first throws overboard his own goods, and then the rest of the ship's cargo. The Rhodian law, the 21st, 22d, and 30th, provide that when the goods are thrown overboard, they shall be taken with the consent of the merchant. The master has let out more freight than he has stowage for, he must not therefore overload his own ship, but by the Consulate is bound to find freight for them in another. If the merchants, passengers or mariners have any plate or other precious goods in their chests or trunks, they are to inform the master and clerk of it; otherwise their chests will not be liable to any average for any thing more than what is known to be within them. Persons never are reckoned in an average, but all sorts of goods whatsoever. Victuals belonging to the ship are exempted from the laws for throwing goods overboard, and privileged from paying contributions in averages. Seamen's wages are not liable to averages. By the Hanseatic Law, these wages ought to be paid by three payments, a third part before the ship goes out of the port, a third part when she is unladen, and a third part at her return. By the Rhodian Law, the sailors ought to have a ton freight free from contributions in averages, when goods are thrown overboard. To encourage this, it will be necessary to observe—that sailors were used to employ and to hire for a voyage for several considerations; some had a certain sum of money for the whole voyage, or something like a day, others hired themselves for such a proportion of the freight, or a liberty to load so much goods on board, or let out so much freight to others. But the most common way was, and the best way of hiring themselves, was for part in wages, and part in freight, either for themselves or to let out. These seem to have contributed nothing to the average for goods thrown overboard. Those who had goods contributed, unless those goods were bought with their wages, and they had only one ton exempted. The merchants who hired their freight of them had the same privilege by law as themselves.

Having had occasion to make mention of livre a livre, an explanation of it will not be unacceptable to the reader. The civilians consider every thing as composed of several parts, makes together one whole or mass of inheritance, of whatever importance it may be, great or small, as if the whole of his inheritance made one livre, one pound, as hereditatis. This part is divided into twelve equal parts, is named ounces. The merchants who masters of ships, in case of averages for goods thrown overboard, or damaged in storms, have the same view, that is, they consider the ship and goods together as one pound, and the goods lost or damaged as another; so that he who had a tenth in the pound of the cargo, a fifteenth, or any other share, must carry a tenth, a fifteenth, or any other share of the pound of the average; and this proportion of one pound to another, is what is called by the French naval laws, "livre a livre," pound to pound.

ART. IX.

If it happen, that by reason of much foul weather the master is like to be constrained to cut his masts, he ought first to call the merchants, if there be any aboard the ship, and such as have goods and commerce in the vessel, and to consult them, saying, "Sirs, it is requisite to cut down the mast to save the ship and lading, it being in this case my duty." And frequently they also cut their masting cables, leaving behind them their cables and anchors to save the ship and her lading; all which things are reckoned and computed livre by livre, as the goods are that were cast overboard. And when the vessel arrives in safety at her port of discharge, the merchants ought to pay the master their shares or proportions without delay, or sell or pawn the goods and employ the money he raises to satisfy by it the same, before the said goods be unladen out of the said ship: but if he lets them go, and there happens controversies and debates touching the premises, if the master observes collusion therein, he ought not to suffer, but is to have his complete freight, as well for what goods were thrown overboard, as for what he brought home. 9

Observation.

No merchant is obliged to pay average for goods thrown overboard, unless the master can prove he did it for the safety of his own and his men's lives, and the preservation of the ship and the rest of her cargo. What loss happens by accidents, breaking the masts, or burning the sails, or part of the goods, shall not come into the common average. By the Rhodian Laws, every merchant shall bear his own loss, and the master shall do the same. See also the twelfth article of the Laws of Wisbuy. Averages are by that to be paid for damages done ad intra, and not for those ad extra; thereupon they are obliged to purge themselves by oath, how the damage came, in the first court of admiralty they come to, and what was done in very great necessity. Indeed if pirates take the ship and cargo entire, and both are redeemed for a sum of money, the average for that shall be common, and all the concerned shall pay contribution. If the merchants and passengers aboard the ship desire the master to put into any port out of his way for fends of pirates, and in going out of that port he loses anchors or cables, those who desired him to put in there shall pay for them, and the ship ought not to pay anything toward that loss. After a general shipwreck there is no average or common contribution, but save who save can, as is vulgarly said on this occasion. If masters were thrown overboard in a storm, to lighten the ship, happen to be recovered, the owner of them ought to receive a reasonable compensation for damages by average, to those that paid him, deducting for the loss he may be at by his merchandise being dammified. The Rhodian Law enjoins this.

ART. X.

The master of a ship, when he lets her out to freight to the merchants, ought to shew them their cordage, ropes, and slings, with which the goods are to be hoisted aboard or ashore; and if they find they need mending, he ought to mend them; for if a pipe, hosehead or other vessel, should happen by default of such cordage or slings to be spoil ed or lost, the master and mariners ought to make satisfaction for the same to the merchants. 10 So also if the ropes or slings break, the master not shewing them beforehand to the merchants, he is obliged to make good the damage. But if the merchants say the cordage, ropes or slings are good and sufficient, and notwithstanding it happens that they break, in that case they ought to divide the damage between them; that is to say, the merchant to whom such goods belong, and the said master with his mariners.

Observation.

By the twelfth article of the Laws of Wisbuy, and the seventh of King Philip's, the master when he lets his ship out to freight, is 9 "Ainsi doit avoir son frein, comme si les ton neaux fussent peris." Cleirac, 24.

10 The following important passage has been omitted in the translation of this article: "Et si doit le maître payer selon qu'il doit prendre du guindage, et dans le cas de guindage é ve avec le même, et de guindage qui doit être dépôt de l'endroit." Cleirac, p. 26.

In France the owners of ships receiving freight, are not obliged to pay the expenses of loading or unloading, but they form a separate charge against the owners of the cargo. The passage above quoted authorizes a deduction from this charge of the value of any article lost or injured from the negligence of the master to furnish proper cordage, &c. If this charge is not sufficient to compensate for the loss, the master and mariners are to make up the difference.—E. bound to shew her to the merchants or their agents. The Consolato requires the same, and that the master shew to the merchants, visit not only the ropes, but all the ship above decks and below, that they may see what is wanting, and have it mended; and if it be not mended, and the merchandise is damaged, the master shall make good the loss. The forty-ninth article of the Laws of Wisbey enjoins the master to give the master notice of the faults and defects in the cordage; otherwise they shall be responsible for all accidents that may happen. For such notice given, the master does not take care to have them mended, he shall answer the damage out of his own pocket. The Rhodian Laws Secundo Tomo Julius Gregor-Romani, Num. 11, wills and ordains, that the merchant who loads a ship, shall inform himself exactly of every thing, Dilectores interrogare debet mercatores qui prius in ea marit navigaverunt. The law says he should enquire of those that have sailed in her before, but that is of little use, except as to ships newly built, but more and more out of repair, and should be always viewed by the person that is going to be concerned in them, without trusting to the information of others.

ART. XI.

If a vessel being laden at Bordeaux with wines, or other goods, hoists sail to carry them to some other port, and the master does not do his duty as he ought, nor the mariners handle the sails, and it happens that ill weather overtakes them at sea; so that the main yard shakes or strikes out the head of one of the pipes or hogheads of wine; this vessel being safely arrived at her port of discharge, if the merchant alleges, that by reason of the main yard his wine was lost, and the master denies it: In this case the master and his mariners ought to make oath (whether it be four or six of them, such as the merchant hath no exception against) that the wine perished not by the main yard, nor through any default of theirs, as the merchants charge them, they ought then to be acquitted thereof; but if they refuse to make oath to the effect aforesaid, they shall be obliged to make satisfaction for the same, because they ought to have ordered their sails aright before they departed from the port, where they took in their lading.

Observation.

This article is explained by the 23d of the Laws of Wisby, which ordains, that if the cargo is ill stowed, and the ship ill trimmed, and the mariners do not manage their sails rightly, and any damage happens by it to the ship or goods, they shall be responsible for the damages as far as they have wherewithal to do it with. There were formerly, in several ports of Guenee certain officers called "arrameurs" or stowers, who were master carpenters by profession, and were paid by the merchants, who loaded the ship. Their business was to dispose right, and stow closely all goods in casks, bales, boxes, bundles or otherwise; to balance both sides, that proper security might be given, and manage every thing to the best advantage. It was not but that the greatest part of the ship's crew understood this as well as these stowers; but those should not meddle with it, nor undertake it, to avoid falling under the merchant's displeasure, or being accountable for any ill accident that might happen by that means. There were also saqueiros, who were very ancient officers, as may be seen in the 14th book of the Theodosius Code, Unica de Saccarlis Portus Romain, lib. 14. Their business was to load and unload vessels, sail, or fish, to prevent the ship's crew defrauding the merchant by false tale, or cheating him of his merchandise otherwise.

ART. XII.

A master, having hired his mariners, ought to keep the peace betwixt them, and to be as their judge at sea; so that if there be any of them that gives another the lie, whilst they have wine and bread on the table, he ought to pay four deniers; and if the master himself give any the lie, he ought to pay eight deniers; and if any of the mariners impudently contradict the master, he also ought to pay eight deniers; and if the master strike any of the mariners, he ought to bear with the first stroke, be it with the fist or open hand; but if the master strikes him more than one blow, the mariner may defend himself: but if the said mariner doth first assault the master, he ought to pay five sols, or lose his hand.

Observation.

The law restrains the correction of the master to one blow with his fist, which the mariner ought to bear, and no more. The Consulate, c. 16, explains how far the mariner is bound to submit his master's assaulting him, in these terms: "The mariner is obliged to obey his master, though he should call him ill names, and be enraged against him, he ought to keep out of his sight, or hide himself in the prow of the ship; if the master follows him, he ought to fly to some other place from him; and if he still follows him, then the mariner may stand upon his defence, demanding witnesses how he was pursued by the master; for the master ought not to pass into the prow after him."

The twenty-fourth article of the Laws of Wisby punishes the giving the lie. The same article is very severe against the master, who strikes the mariner. The mariner that strikes, or lifts up arms against his master, was to lose half his hand in a very painful way. If the mariner has committed a crime too great for the master's authority to punish, then the master and his officersought to seize the criminal, put him in irons, and bring him to justice at his return.

ART. XIII.

If a difference happens between the master of a ship, and one of his mariners, the master ought to deny him his mess thrice, ere he turn him out of the ship, or discharge him thereof: but if the said mariner offer, in the presence of the rest of the mariners, to make the master satisfaction, and the master be resolved to accept of no satisfaction from him, but to put him out of the ship; in such case the said mariner may follow the said vessel to her port of discharge, and ought to have as good hire or wages, as if he had come in the ship, or as if he had made satisfaction for his fault in the sight and presence of the ship's company; and if the master take not another mariner into the ship in his stead, as able as the other, and the ship or lading happens thereby to be, through any misfortune, dammified, the master shall be obliged to make good the same, if he hath wherewithal.
LAWS OF OLERON (Art. XVI.)

Observation.
To deny him his mess, is, in the original, 'otter la tonnaille, an old Gascon phrase, which signifies to deny him the table-cloth or victuails for three meals:—by which is understood a day and a half. The Wisby Law, art. 25, provides for the master's making satisfaction for all damage that may happen through the want of the mariner he turns off. And the Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 27, require the master not to give the seamen any cause to mutiny; not to provoke them, call them names, wrong them, nor keep any thing from them that is theirs; but to use them well, and pay them fairly what is due to them. Some French laws ordain, that no mariner should be admitted under 18 years, nor above 50. The choice of the crew is entirely in the master: the reason is, that he ought to be himself very well assured of his seamen's ability, and not take it upon trust by report of others.

ART. XIV.

If a vessel, being moored, lying at anchor, be struck or grappled with another vessel under sail, that is not very well steered, whereby the vessel at anchor is prejudiced, as also wines, or other merchandise in each of the said ships dammified. In this case the whole damage shall be in common, and be equally divided and appraised half by half; 11 and the master and mariners of the vessel that struck or grappled with the other, shall be bound to swear on the Holy Evangelists, that they did it not willingly or wilfully. The reason why this judgment was first given, being, that an old decayed vessel might not purposely be put in the way of a better, which will the rather be prevented when they know that the damage must be divided.

Observation.
This law agrees exactly with the 26th, 60th, 67th, and 70th articles of the Ordinances of Wisby. The dividing the loss in halves, is, to prevent any cheat; for an old vessel that's worth little or nothing weight, might else be put in a new one's way: and if she runs against her, more dammages be pretended, than the old ship might fairly be valued at.

ART. XV.

Suppose two or more vessels in a harbour, where there is but little water, so that the anchor of one of the vessels lie dry; the master of the other vessel ought, in that case, to say unto him whose anchor lies dry: "Master, take up your anchor, for it is too nigh us, and may do us a prejudice;" if neither the said master nor his mariners will take up the said anchor accordingly, then may that other master and his mariners (who might be otherwise thereby dammified) take up the said anchor, and let it down at a farther distance from them; and if the others oppose or withstand the taking up of their anchor, and there afterwards happens damage thereby, they shall be bound to give full satisfaction for the same:—but if they put out a buoy or anchor-mark, and the anchor does any damage, the master and mariners to whom it belongs are not bound to make it good; if they do not, they are; for all masters and mariners ought to fasten such buoys or anchor-marks, and such cables to their anchors, as may plainly appear and be seen at full sea.

Observation.
The 28th and 31st articles of the Ordinances of Wisby, require masters to put out buoys to warn others where their anchors lie, on pain of making double or whatever damage may happen for want of them: for anchors hid under water, may do a great deal of mischief at ebb and low water. If any master spies them, and they lie near him, he may remove them, and prevent any damage coming to his ship. Harmenopolus in promptuarii titulo de rebus naufrut, hie in die crimine adductis, qui se alter explica non possunt, alterius navis anchoras salutis sue causa precipit於是. The buoys that are made use of, are either empty barrels, or pieces of the trunk of a tree, or any other light wood with baskets that swim on the top of the water, and shews where the anchors lie.

ART. XVI.

When a ship arrives with her lading at Bordeaux, or elsewhere, the master is bound to say to his company, when she is ready to load again, "Gentlemen, will you freight your own share yourselves, or be allowed for it in proportion with the ship's general freight?" the mariners are bound to answer one or the other. If they take as the freight of the ship shall happen, they shall have proportion by the ship hith; and if freight by themselves, they ought to freight so as the ship be not impeded or hindered thereby. And if it so happen, that they cannot let out their freight, or get goods themselves, when he has tendered them their share or stowage, the master is blameless; and if they will there lade a tun of water instead of so much wine, they may: and in case there should happen at sea, an ejection or a casting of goods overboard, the case shall be the same for a tun of water, as for a tun of wine, or any other cargo by livres. If they let out their proportion of freight to merchants, what freedom and immunity the said mariners have, the said merchants shall also have.

Observation.
This articles has some relation to the eighth, which treats of mariners' wages and their freight aboard. The thirtieth article of the Laws of Wisby is founded upon it. By the seamen's immunity, is meant the privilege of being the last that must throw overboard in a storm, and having a tun free from all averages. The mariners' freight should be first full; for the master is not obliged to stay for them when his cargo is all aboard. The reasons given by our author, why, in case of throwing overboard, the mariners' tun of water shall come in equally in the average, livres a livre, for a tun of wine, are, a mariner may make what use he please of his stowage, because he takes it as part of his pay; besides, in such case, the water he has aboard, lighten the ship as much as if it was wine. And the 12 "Parce que les marins se puissent défendre et s'aider a la mer."

Clerac, 38. This is omitted in the translation of the 11th article.—E.
The thirty-first article of the Ordinances of Wisbuy agrees exactly with this. The seamen's wages are not regularly due till after their work is entirely done, or they hired themselves for expired; except there are any private agreements to the contrary. The twenty-eighth article of the Hanseatic Law, ordains, that their wages should be paid at three several payments; one third when they set sail upon a voyage, one third when they arrive at their port of discharge, and the other third when the ship is returned home.

ART. XIX.

If the master hire the mariners in the town to which the vessel belongs, either for so much a day, week or month, or for such a share of the freight; and it happens that the ship cannot procure freight in those parts where she is arrived, but must by virtue of the Ordinance of Wisbuy agrees with it. In those voyages where wine is to be had, the master is bound to provide for the mariners, and then they should have but one meal a day. But when they drink water only, they shall have two meals. Charles V. and Philip II.'s Laws ordain, that the master shall order the mariners to have three certain meals a day, and if they would have more meat, they shall only have what was last at their meals, unless upon extraordinary occasions. By the fifty-second article of the Hanseatic Laws, the masters of German ships bound for France and Spain, are not to provide victuals for their mariners when they are outward bound; but when they are homeward bound, if the ship is let out to freight and the voyage long, are obliged to maintain their mariners; if they return light or empty, they are not obliged. The Portuguese in their East India Voyages maintain both mariners and soldiers outward bound, and allow each a pound and a half of biscuit, 3 pints of wine, and 3 pints of water a day, and 31 pound of salt fish a month, some dry fish, garlic and onions. But in their homeward bound voyages, they have only biscuits and water at the Cape of Good Hope, and after that they live every man on his own provision.

---Paciis descensus ad Indos:
Sed revocare gradum, veteremque evadere ad Oecum, Hoc opus, hic labor est._

In cases of necessity, when provisions fail short, all those that have victuals aboard ought to communicate to those that have not, by the Rhodian Law.

ART. XVIII.

When a vessel is unladen, and the mariners demand their freight, some of them having neither bed, chest, nor trunk aboard, the master may lawfully retain part of their wages, till they have brought back the ship to the port from whence she came; unless they give good security to serve out the whole voyage.
for if so, and damage come thereby, they are bound to make satisfaction; or if any of their company be hurt for want of their help, they are to be at such charge for his recovery, as one of his fellow mariners, or the master, with those of his table shall judge convenient.

Observation.

The reason of this law now ceases for Bordeaux, for which place it was originally intended; for the said river is so full of eating-houses and taverns on both sides, that it is not likely sailors will carry any of their salt provisions ashore, when they can get fresh. The reason of it was to keep the seamen in health and vigour, and to encourage them to go ashore two at a time, when their attendance was not necessary aboard, the master gave them an opportunity to refresh themselves at land, which is the best remedy in the world for the scurvy contracted on shipboard by living on salt meats and dry biscuit, and being crowded up in a close place for a considerable time; their eating fresh provisions, and breathing the free air at hand, makes them strong, and the better able to go through their business. It was not lawful for mariners to be drunk, or to feast on shipboard, unless there was good cause for their feasting, and the master allowed it. As we find by the thirty-first article of the Hanseatic Law, and the old law of Rhodes, Vector in navi plecem ne frigeto, & exercitor id ei ne permittas,—as one of his fellow mariners. In the original, it is "son matelet," which we in English call "comrade"; for it is the custom at sea to go on deck, and have their couplings: every two are comrades, and this French call "matejotage." These two companies, or commodities should be loving and assisting to one another. Their task is generally the same, and they are always posted together.—These of his table. The mariners in Spanish ships dress their men, and pay for it, each man for himself; but in the English, Dutch, German, and French, there is always a cook, and the seamen eat all together at the same table, six in a mess. There is commonly two tables; the master, which is served with a table-cloth, and there himself and his officers eat; and the mariners, where they have their messes.

ART. XXI.

If a master freights his ship to a merchant, and set him a certain time within which he shall have his vessel, that she may be ready to depart at the time appointed, and he lade it not within the time, but keep the master and mariners by the space of eight days, or a fortnight, or more, beyond the time agreed on, whereby the master loses the opportunity of a fair wind to depart; the said merchant in this case shall be obliged to make the master satisfaction for such delay, the fourth part whereof is to go among the mariners, and the other three-fourths to the master, because he finds them their provisions.\footnote{The right of the mariners to a part of the compensation allowed for the delay of the ship, could only arise, when they received a part of the freight instead of wages.—B.}

Observation.

The thirty-fourth article of the Ordinances of Wisby, and the thirty-ninth of the emperor Charles V., are entirely agreeable to this law. By the Hanseatic Law and Philip II's, the merchant is obliged to pay the whole freight, if he does not load the ship in 15 days after the time agreed upon; and by the Theodosian Code de Navicularis, when a vessel arrives at a port laden, the merchant to whom the cargo belongs, must unload in 10 days; and if on days, on account of holydays and Sundays, the common time for unloading a ship is 15 days; but that should not hinder the paying of the freight, which ought to be cleared in eight days, whether the ship be discharged or not. The master for his pay cannot detain the merchant aboard; but when they are in the harbor or lighter, he may stop them until he is satisfied.

ART. XXII.

When a merchant freights a vessel at his own charge, and sets her to sea, and the said vessel enters into a harbour, where she is wind-bound, so that she stays till her monies be all spent, the master in that case ought speedily to write home to his own country for money; but ought not to lose his voyage on that account; for if so happen, he shall be obliged to make good to the merchant all damages that shall ensue. But the master may take part of the wines or other merchant goods, and dispose thereof for his present necessities; and when the said vessel shall be arrived at her port of discharge, the said wines that the master hath so disposed of, ought to be valued and appraised at the same rate as the other wines shall be commonly sold for, and accordingly be accounted for to the merchant. And the master ought to have the freight of such wines, as he hath so taken and disposed of, for the use and reason aforesaid.

Observation.

The thirty-fifth and thirty-ninth articles of the Laws of Wisby are to the same purport as this; but by the sixty-eighth article of those laws, if the ship happens afterwards to be cast away, the master shall pay the merchant for the wines or other goods he sold in a case of necessity, without pretending to deduct any thing for the freight. The Hanseatic Laws forbid any master to borrow any money on any other security but the ship's bottom, that if she should be lost the debt might be paid; nor do they allow him when he is at home, to borrow any thing on her bottom, or otherwise, without acquainting the owners with it. By the forty-fifth article of the Laws of Wisby, the ship is bound to the merchant whose goods the master has sold in this manner, to make him satisfaction, though he should be herself sold, and have other owners.

ART. XXIII.

If a pilot undertakes the conduct of a vessel, to bring her to St. Malo, or any other port, and fail of his duty therein, so as the vessel miscarry by reason of his ignorance in what he undertook, and the merchants sustain damage thereby, he shall be obliged to make full satisfaction for the same, if he hath wherewithal; and if not, lose his head.

ART. XXIV.

If the master, or any one of his mariners, or any one of the merchants, cut off his head, they shall not be bound to answer for it; but before they do it, they must be sure he had not wherewith to make satisfaction.

Observation on the Two Forgoing Articles. The original calls these pilots "locmen"; for when those laws were written, there were officers aboard all ships, called pilots, who went the whole voyage, whereas the locmen were like our pilots, mariners hired at every river to guide the ship; for, dwelling on the place, the locmen was supposed to know the shore better than the ship's pilot, who perhaps was never there before. For which reason he commonly required the master to have a locman, to avoid rocks, shelves, shoals and sands, which he must be well acquainted with by long using the river: that of Eoan is very dangerous on this account, and there are sworn pilots every two leagues to guide ships up the Seine. They are very necessary all over Brittany. The forty-fourth and fifty-ninth articles of the Ordinances of Wisby, obliges the master to take a new pilot, if his own and the ship's crew demand one of him. The master finds him and maintenance, and the merchant pays him, by the sixtieth article of the Ordinances of Wisby. The loss of the pilot and his boat belongs to the said master, and in gence the ship is lost, is taken from the Consolato, c. 250— and answers to that known maxim in the law, "Qui non habet in seco, lect in corpore."
LAWS OF OLERON (Art. XXVII.)

A vessel being arrived at her port of discharge, and hauled up there into dry ground, so as the mariners deeming her to be in good safety, do take down her sails, and so fit the vessel aloof and ait, the master then ought to consider an increase of their wages kenning by kenning; and if in hoisting up wines, it happens that they leave open any of the pipes or other vessels, or that they fasten not the ropes well at the ends of the vessel, by reason it reports in the seas, and lost; and so is lost, and falling on another, both are lost; in these cases the master and mariners shall be bound to make them good to the merchants, and the merchants must pay the freight of the said damaged or lost wines, because they are to receive for them from the master and mariners, according to the value that the rest of the wines are sold; and the owners of the ship ought not to suffer hereby, because the damage happened by default of the master and mariners, in not making fast the said vessels or pipes of wine.
Observation.

Kenned by kenned, vene par vene, is a phrase used by mariners, as is also course by course, in the nineteenth article of these laws. These phrases are very ancient, and kenned was particularly used when navigation was performed by views, and by observations on the land from one prospect to another (Flor. II. vi. c 33), which was before the invention or knowledge of the use of the compass. It signifies what the logicians or metaphysicians called agreement; the arithmeticians and geometers, proportion, and others express otherwise.

ART. XXVIII.

If two vessels go on a fishing-design in partnership, as for mackerel, herrings, or the like, and do set their nets or lay their lines at Olonne, St. Gilles, Survie, or elsewhere; the one of the vessels ought to employ as many fishing-engines as the other, and so shall go in equal shares, as to the gain, according to the agreement betwixt them made. And if it happens that one of the said vessels, with her fishing-instruments, engines, and crew, perish, and the other escaping, arrives in safety; if the surviving friends of those that perished, require of the other to have their part of the gain, as also of the fish, fishing-instruments, and boat, they are to have, upon the oaths of those that escape, their part of the fish, and fishing-instruments; but they shall not have any part or share in the vessel itself.

ART. XXIX.

If any ship or other vessel sailing to and fro, and coasting the seas, as well in the way of merchandizing, as upon the fishing account, happen by some misfortune through the violence of the weather to strike herself against the rocks, whereby she becomes so bruised and broken, that there she perishes, upon what coasts, country or domicile soever; and the master, mariners, merchant or merchants, or any one of these escape and come safe to land; in this case the lord of that place or country, where such misfortune shall happen, ought not to let, hinder, or oppose such as have so escaped, or such to whom the said ship or vessel, and the lading belong, in using their utmost endeavours for the preservation of as much thereof as may possibly be saved. But on the contrary, the lord of that place or country, by his own interest, and by those under his power and jurisdiction, ought to be aiding and assisting to the said distressed merchants or mariners, in saving their shipwrecked goods, and that without the least embezzlement, or taking any part thereof from the right owners; but, however, there may be a remuneration or consideration for salvage to such as take pains therein, according to right reason, a good conscience, and as justice shall appoint; notwithstanding what promises may in that case have been made to the salvors by such distressed merchants and mariners, as is declared in the fourth article of these laws; and in case any shall act contrary hereunto, or take any part of the said goods from the said poor, distressed, ruined, undone, shipwrecked persons, against their wills, and without their consent, they shall be declared to be excommunicated by the church, and ought to receive the punishment of thieves; except speedy restitution be made by them: nor is there any custom or statute whatsoever, that can protect them against the aforesaid penalties, as is said in the twenty-sixth article of these laws.

Observations on the Two Foregoing Articles.

The civil law almost everywhere allows all shipwrecked persons, a right to gather up their shipwrecked goods. The Codex and the Roman Laws are particular in this matter. King Henry III.'s charter, before recited, is very plain upon it; and the reader is referred to it.

ART. XXX.

If a ship or other vessel entering into harbour, happens by misfortune to be broken and perish, and the master, mariners and merchants, which were on board her, be all drowned; and if the goods thereof be driven ashore, or remain floating on the sea, without being sought after by those to whom they belong, they being ignorant of this said disaster, and knowing nothing thereof; in this most lamentable case, the lord of that place or country ought to send persons to save the said goods, which he ought to secure and to put into safe custody; and give the relations of the deceased persons who were drowned, notice of it, and to satisfy for the salvage thereof, not out of his own purse, but of the goods saved, according to the hazards run, and the pains taken therein; and what remains must be kept in safe custody for one year or more; and if in that time the said goods appertain, do not appear and claim the same, and the said year be fully expired, he may publicly sell and dispose thereof to such as will give most, and with the monies proceeding of the sale thereof, he ought to give among the poor, and for portions to poor maids, and other charitable uses, according to reason and good conscience. But if he assumes the said goods either in whole or in part unto himself, he shall incur the curse and malediction of our mother the holy church, with the aforesaid pains and penalties, without ever obtaining remission, unless he make satisfaction.

Observation.

The keeping such goods a year, is in the civil law (l. ii. Cod. Nautragis); but the parliament of Paris in the year 1684, pretended to reduce the time to two months: which time was to commence from the day of proclaiming such goods in public market and fixing a placard of it on the doors of the parish church. The Consulate provides the salvors more largely, allowing them half of the goods saved, and the lord and the poor the other half (chapter 232). By some laws in France, as long as the goods are in being and unialienated, the merchant to whom they belong, has a claim to them, paying the charge of salvage; but if after a lawful time, they are sold and become another’s property, he has no claim to them. The casuists are of opinion, that if he who finds them is rich, he ought to give all to pious uses: if poor, to keep all himself, hostis suis in suum de noententia. And the thirty-sixth article of the laws of Oleron agrees with the judgment of the casuists.

ART. XXXI.

If a ship or other vessel happens to be lost by striking on some shore, and the mariners thinking to save their lives, reach the shore, in hope of help, and instead thereof it happens, as it often does, that in many places they meet with people more barbarous, cruel, and inhuman than mad dogs, who to gain their monies, apparel, and other goods, do sometimes murder and destroy these poor distressed seamen; in this case, the lord of that country ought to execute justice on such wretches, to punish them as well corporally as pecuniarily, to plunge them in the sea till they be half dead, and then to have them drawn forth out of the sea, and stoned to death.

Observation.

To plunge them in the sea, "plonger en la mer," is what the French now call "bailer en calme," and we "heelo-hawling." The word "καλωστιγμός," in Greek, signifies as much. The Goths heretofore used to practice it as a sport or exercise. Otho magnus historie Septentrionalis, lib. v. et lib. x. c. 16. And one may conceive an idea of the barbarity of the northern nations, when that was a diversion to them, which was a punishment to others; as it was of old among the Celts and Franks, and is now among the modern navigators. Luxury and scandalous persons had some such sort of punishment by the customs or laws of the old Germans, Tacitus de Moribus Germanorum, Num. 5. Tullius Horatius was punished thus to death for abusing and railing at the king Tarquinius Superbus, T. Livius. lib. prima decadsis primis. Bawds and whores are served so at Bordeaux; and scolds something like it in England, when they are put into the ducking stool. By an old ordinance of Philip II. of France, blasphemers had the same punishment. The comparison of a mad dog is perhaps made use of here, on account of the nature for his bite, by plunging in the sea before the poison has taken too deep root, which is reckoned the most sovereign remedy for bite; Augustine de Moribus Manicheor. lib. ii. cap. 8. Apuleius Metamorphos. lib. 9. It is said Baldis the great civilian, died miserably of the bite of his favorite dog, though the bite was very inconsiderable, as to any thing but the effects of it; see the twenty-first book of Ambrose Parre’s Treatise of Poisons: and Diogenes the cynic, according to Laertius, died the same death. My author has tempted me unawareas to this digression, which he very ridiculously continues about a hundred times as long; for in truth it may well be called a digression, at least, all that is not necessary to explain the metaphor in the text, and much farther we have not gone.

ART. XXXII.

If by reason of tempestuous weather, it be thought expedient, for the lightening of any ship or vessel at sea, or riding at anchor in any road, to cast part of the lading overboard, and it be done accordingly for the common safety, though the said goods so ejected, and cast overboard, do become his that can first possess himself thereof, and carry them away: nevertheless, it is here to be further understood, that this holds true only in such cases, as when the master, merchant, and mariners have so ejected or cast out the said goods, as that they give over all hope or desire of ever recovering them again, and so leave them as things utterly lost and given over by them, without ever making any enquiry or pursuit after them: in which case only the first occupant becomes the lawful proprietor thereof.

Observation.

The property of things thrown overboard remains in the merchant, and the finder has no right to them, unless they were thrown out with an intention to leave them there, and look no more after them (l. 2, in fine, l. qui levantio D. ART. XXXVI.

If any going along the sea-shore to fish, or otherwise, happens to find gold or silver, he shall be bound to make restitution thereof, deducting for his own pains; or if he be poor he may keep it to himself; that is, if he knows not to whom to restore it; yet he shall give notice of the place where he found it, to the neighbourhood and parts next adjacent, and advise with his superiors, who ought to weigh and take into consideration the poverty of the finder, and then to give him such advice as is consonant to good conscience.

Observations on the Three Preceding Articles.

There are three sorts of goods which the sea naturally drives to land: as entire wrecks: for which the cruel droit de bris was in old times established by pernicious and barbarous customs: but humane, licenses and passports have abolished it in ours. The second is, what is flung overboard for the preservation of men’s lives, and for the sparing of those, by the law, nor the custom of the sea, change their proprietors, but may be claimed and recovered by them, within the lawful time appointed by ordnance. The third sort comprehends the two first, which are not owned and demanded by the proprietor, and besides that, includes all the treasures of the sea which come out of its bowels, and it naturally drives them, as aromatic amber on the coast of Guinée, amber succinum in the German ocean, red, black, and white coral on the coast of Barbary, precious stones, fish-shells, and other riches which the sea produces, and which in the thirty-fourth article of these laws are called herpes marinae, in English, "treasures of the sea": for it cannot be otherwise so fully expressed. The word "herpes" was taken from an old Gaulish term "harpiz," which signifies to take, and its contrary "voepir," is to leave: perhaps, says my author, taken from the Greek word kolchás, or aurum mii tus harpactum est, Plautus in Aulularia: that is, the property of such things is in the finder, or the person who first takes them from the sea-bottom. Venenum electum harpago, ex quo adnotat digitorum accepts anima folks, pa- leaque vestrum fimbrias rapit. Isidorus, orig. lib. xvi, cap. 8. Nor is he who first lays his hands on these, obliged to give those that are there with him a share of what he has found, unless he pleases to do it out of courtesy, i. e. is qui ultimo. D. acqui, reg. erum Domino. Robustus de Privilegiis Scholasticorum, num. 61, notwithstanding the constitution of the Emperor Leo, which is contrary to it. This is the law of nature, and princes and lords of the coast have usurped this privilege, and laid claim to all the treasures of the sea, that it has thrown on their coasts, the lords of the coasts, that is, of the manors or lands on the coasts of France, were notorious usurpers in this, till the reign of Louis XII, when Car- dinal Richelieu, by an order of the council bearing date the 13th of December, 1629, took away the pretended rights of several lords, or very much abridged them: but he did not restore the law of nature in this case: he only enlarged his own and his successor’s privileges and authority, he being great master and su- perintendent general of the navigation and commerce of France. This order of council caused great disorders, and the Count de Olon- ne was particularly so enraged at it that his officers by main force drove away those of the admiralty, who came upon his royalty. But the French kings were now masters of their subjects’ lives and fortunes, and it would have been in vain for many such counts to have disputed the king’s edict with these words in it, "Car tel est notre plaisir": the standing reason of the French laws at this time.

ART. XXXVII.

Touching great fishes that are taken or found dead on the sea shore, regard must be had to the custom of that country where such great fishes are taken or found. For the custom, the lord of that country ought to have his share, and with good reason, since the subject owes obedience and tribute to his sover- eignt.

Observation.

This law declares, that by the ancient customs of countries, as well sovereigns as all particular lords of royalties to whom duties and tribute were due, had both heretofore certain rights to the cervices de mer, or parts of the fish, which were taken: the Cousinier de Normandie under the article of Varech, specifies what belongs to the ground. Varech and particularly that whales and other oil fish, belong to the particular lord of the royalty where they were found, that is, off whose land they were taken: on the shore in the original it is: il re- vire de la mer; and how far that is to be understood to belong to the lord of that royalty, may be found in the above mentioned cousinier: where the Varech understands as far as a man on horseback can reach with his launce: for if the fish is found farther off the shore, the lord has no right to it, though it be brought or driven a-shore afterwards.

ART. XXXVIII.

The lord ought to have his share of oil fish, and of no other, according to the lawful custom of the country where they are found; and he that finds them is no farther obliged than to save them, by bringing them without the reach of the sea, and presently to make it known to the said lord of the place, that he may come and demand what is his right.

Observation.

The Cousinier de Normandie mentions two sorts of fish, the royal fish, which are the del-phin, the sturgeon, the salmon, the turbot, the sea-dragon, the sea-barbel, and in general all fish fit for a king’s table: and oil fish; as whales, porpoises, sea-calves, and the like, of which oil may be made: all other fish are the property of those that take them in the sea, near the shore or afar off. The duke of Es- perno, which is the capital of a little territory called de Buch, had a right to the eighth penny of all the fish sold in the market at Bordeaux, that were taken within his precincts de Buch, the fishermen having heretofore vassals to the Lords de Buch. And further, whatever part of the province of Guinée the duke was in, those fishermen were on all fast days bound to supply his table with fish for himself and his family: but that the duke must pay a rea- sonable price for them, and allow them some- thing for their trouble: this right is called “blan,” and is still, or was thirty years ago, in being.

ART. XXXIX.

If the lord of the place pleases, and if it be the custom of the country where the fish is found, he may cause the same to be brought by him that found it, to the public and open market place, but no where else; and there the said fish shall be appraised by the said lord, or his deputy according to custom. And the price being set, the other party that made not the price, shall have his choice, either to take or leave it at that price; and if either of them, whether per fas or nefas be an occasion of loss or damage to the other, though but to the value of a doner, he shall be obliged to make him restitution.

ART. XL.
If the costs and charges of carrying the said fish to the said market place would amount to a greater sum than the fish itself may be worth, then the said lord shall be bound to take his share at the place where such fish was found.

ART. XLI.
The said lord ought likewise to pay his part of the aforesaid costs and charges, because he ought not by another's damage to enrich himself.

ART. XLII.
If by some chance or misfortune the said fish happens to be stolen away, or otherwise lost from the place where it was found, after or before the said lord has visited it; in this case he that first found it shall not any ways be obliged to make it good. Casus fortunis in quinque est agrimenso morum; non est pros tantur l. que fortuitis. C. pigmentellae actio.

ART. XLIII.
In all other things found by the sea side, which have formerly been in the possession of some one or other, as wines, oil, and other merchandise, although they have been cast overboard, and left by the merchants, and so ought to appertain to him that first finds the same; yet herein also the custom of the country is to be observed as well in the case of fish. But if there be a presumption that these were the goods of some ship that perished, then neither the said lord, nor finder thereof, shall take any, to convert any part of it to their own use; but as has been said, distribute the money it produces amongst the poor and needy.

ART. XLIV.
If any ship or other vessel at sea, happens to find an oil fish, it shall be wholly theirs that found it, in case no due pursuit be made after it; and no lord of any place ought to demand any part thereof, though they bring it to his ground.

Observations on the Preceding Articles.
The French author pretends, that by the forty-fourth article of these laws, which he says answers to the thirty-seventh, the kings of England, who were also dukes of Guinne, supposed that the sea is no man's particular property; but that, as well as the air, it is common to all, Instit. de Rurum Divisione, § 1. 1. alicuius juris; which, says he, contradicts what the learned Selden writes in his treatise De Domino Maris, composed by him for the kings of England, whom he supposed to be kings of the sea, exclusive of all other kings and sovereigns; and unless the opposers of Selden can find out some better arguments than hitherto they have alleged, the kings of England always believe the dominion of the sea is annexed to their crown. Under this article the author makes a long dissertation on the whale fishery on the coasts of Guienne, which might in former times be very famous, but now is very inconsiderable. After a description of whales, not at all pertinent in our sea laws, he tells us, when those animals used to come on these coasts; and because there is something historical in the relation, we shall give the reader a short abstract of it. The whales used to pass by the coasts of Guienne, near the ruins of the old castle of Bordeaux, and in a league from Bayonne, from the antumnal equinox till the winter was almost over. The fishermen had then some of their houses always out upon the watch night and day, in huts built on purpose by the sea-side, having their boats and fishing tackle ready. When these coasts discovered a whale, whenever they knew by the noise he makes in breathing, and the exhalation that rises from it like smoke, they gave notice, by a token they had for that purpose, to their fellows, who immediately ran to them, and leaping into their boats put off to sea, rowing up to the animal, to whom they approached very near, and attacked him in the head, that the wounds they gave him might be the more mortal; besides they were afraid of being struck by it, which was commonly to them: when they had killed him, they tossed him ashore and extracted the oil.

The fishermen were for the most part Biscain-iers, who were very bold and dexterous in this dangerous fishery: but what my author says on this subject will surprise the reader. The great gains the inhabitants of Cape, Boston near Bayonne, and the Biscainers of Guienne, found in the whale fishery, and the ease with which they did it, tempted them to run any hazards to come at whales. They ventured into the ocean, and set out ships to seek after the common abode of these monsters: how much, that following their route, they discovered the great and little banks of cod-fish, the island of Newfoundland, and Canada or New France, where the sea of a whal, in which they hundred years before Christopher Columbus's navigation; and if the Spaniards have been so unjust, as to rob the French of glory not of having first discovered the great Atlantic isle called the West Indies, they should confess with Cornelius Vuttor and Airolini, the Flemish cosmographers, F. Antonio St. Roman, Mange de St. Benico, del Historia General de la India, lib. i. cap. ii. p. 6, that the pilot who carried the first news to Christopher Columbus, and gave him any knowledge of the New World, was one of the French Newfoundland Biscainers. But all this is so contrary to every other history, that there is no credit to be given to it. Indeed it would have been very extraordinary, if there should have been honour pretended to by any nation, and the French had not put in a claim to it. In the year 1057, some Biscainers, assisted by the merchants of Bordeaux, floated out a ship for the whale fishery towards the frozen sea of Greenland, to the north of Ireland and Scotland, and at Spitzberg: when they last found the common station of the whales during a six months stay which they made there.
But now we come to what he is pleased to say of the English.
The English, who had not the address or industry for this fishery being raised of it, grew jealous of thither and did d them to molest them in their work, and hinder their landing, which they did every year quite. At last, they positively resolved to land in Greenland, to melt their whales' fat into oil. The Biscainers complained to Lewis XIII, and Cardinal Richelieu; but there were (Art. XLVII.) LAWS OF OLERON

so many things of more importance then negotiating between the crowns of France and England, that they could not obtain any article in their favour, nor truce for their fishery. Afterwards they fished in the open sea, caught whales where they could, and with much trouble brought the fat home, where they melted it into oil. The company of north Holland, tempted some of these Biscainers to shew their fishermen the art of whale-fishing, and after they were become expert in it, they also forbade them to fish on the coast of Greenland, and then this fishery was lost to them. There is an air of fiction in this history:—By what artifices could the Biscainers to land in Greenland; does that country belong to the crown of England? But it is not a little the French will go out of their way to carry any point they drive at.

ART. XLV.

If a vessel by stress of weather be constrained to cut her cables or ropes by the end, and so to quit and leave behind her both cables and anchors and put to sea at the mercy of the wind and weather; in this case the said cables and anchors ought not to be lost to the said vessel, if there were any buoy at them; and such as fish for them, shall be bound to restore them, if they know to whom they belong; but they ought to be paid for their pains, according to justice. And if they know not to whom to restore them, the lords of the place shall have their shares, as well as the salvors; but for preventing further inconveniences, every order of a ship shall cause to be engraved, or set upon the buoys thereof, his own name, or the name of his ship, or of the port or haven to which she belongs: and such as detain them from him shall be reputed thieves and robbers.

ART. XLVI.

If any ship, or other vessel, by any casualty or misfortune happens to be wrecked and perish, in that case, the pieces of the hulk of the vessel, as well as the ladings thereof, ought to be reserved and kept in safety for them to whom it belonged before such disaster happened, notwithstanding any custom to the contrary. And all takers, partakers, or consenters of, or to the said wreck, if they be bishops, prelates or clerks, they shall be deposed and deprived of their benedicts respectively; and if they be laymen they shall incur the penalties aforesaid. De his autem quois diripisse probatum sit, præsides ut de latronibus, gravem sententiam dicere convenit. I. ne quid. I. quo Nautfrag. D. Inecondio, hanc & navagnum. I. navigia, C. furitis. The penalties aforesaid are in the 25th, 26th, and 29th articles.

ART. XLVII.

This is to be understood only when the said ship or vessel so wrecked, did not exercise the trade of pillaging, and when the mariners thereof were not pirates, sea-rovers, or enemies to our holy Catholic faith; but if they are found to be either the one or the other, every man may then deal with such as with rogues, and deprive their trade of goods without any punishment for so doing.

Observations on the Three Forgoing Articles.

Every one has a Droit de Bris against pirates. Piratae communes generis humani hostes sunt, quis siccirco omnibus rationibus persequi incumbit; says the lord Verulam, de Bello Sacro, p. 346. For which reason, according to the civilians, Sunt ipsa jure dissidii, cum quibus publico bellum est, says Uscio. Strachia in tertia parte de nauitis; and again it is cruel to have any mercy towards pirates, Solum pietae genus est in hac re esse crudem. There is no right of action amongst them, and they have none to bring against one who attacks them or robs them. Quia in omnium forum persona constitutum est, ne ejus rei nomine furti agere possint, cujus ipsi fures sunt, lege cum quia § quarto, lege qui re sibi § primo. lege qui res. § si ego. De Furtis. &c. They have no action amongst themselves. Communi dividundo lege. communi § inter Padriones. D. communi dividundo. On the contrary, for one pirate to take from another is very lawful, and will bear no action. Lege sed ipsi Nautae. &c.

The test of these laws in this copy, is,

Witness the seal of the isle of Oleron, established for all contracts in the said isle, the Tuesday after the feast of St. Andrew, in the year one thousand two hundred and sixty-six.

This date of 1266, is too modern, and does not agree with the time when this piece was put forth, as the learned and curious Selden, libro secundo, capite 24. De Dominiolo Marin, very well observes: so that it is thought that this date of the time of the delivery of the copy, from whence the edition printed at Rouen was taken, and the test the seal established for contracts in the isle of Oleron, denotes, that it was a copy taken out by a notary from the original.
THE LAWS OF WISBUY.

[Reprinted from 1 Pet. Arm. Append. lxvii.]

Wisbury was the ancient capital of Gothland, an island in the Baltic sea. It formerly belonged to Sweden, but was afterwards annexed to Denmark, to whose crown it still continues an appendage. In Gothland there are several fine ports, the access to which is easy and safe. It is rich in cattle, of which it affords immense numbers, and abounds in venison, fish, forests of fine timber for building ships, naval stores, and excellent marble. In the north-west part of the island Wisbury was situated, a fair and populous town that is, before the year one thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, obtained an important victory over them; after which the citizens, to defend themselves against their enemies, obtained a permission from Magnus king of Sweden, to wall their city, and erect bastions and other fortifications. They flourished more and more, and grew great by their trade and navigation, to which they entirely gave themselves up; insomuch, that this town was a long time the most celebrated market of Europe; there being no city so full of merchants, and so famous for its commerce. Either came Swedes, Russians, Danes, Frussians, Livonians, Germans, Finlanders, Vandals, Flemings, Saxons, English, Scots and French to trade. Each nation had their quarter, and particular streets for their shops or warehouses. All strangers were safe and welcome there, and enjoyed the same privileges as the townspeople themselves. The magistrates of this city had the jurisdiction, or rather the arbritment of all causes or suits relating to sea affairs. Their ordinances were submitted to in all such cases, and passed for just on all the coasts of Europe from Moscova to the Mediterranean. In this account we are supported by Ohnus Magnus, lib. x. cap. 16, and Baron Herbststein in Rerum Mosecivitarum Commentario, p. 118. In the course of time, this town was entirely destroyed, except the citadel, which stands to this day. The Gothic historians do not tell us when, nor how its destruction came upon it, only that it was through civil dissensions which arose from trifles, but occasioned great factions; which set them so against one another, that it ended in the entire ruin of them all, city and citizens. The ruins of it are now to be seen, and under this citadel are found tables of marble, porphyry and jasper; evidences of the ancient splendor and magnificence of the citizens. The houses were covered with copper, the windows gilt with gold, and all that is said or that is discovered of it, shews the inestimable riches of the former inhabitants. The citizens who survived the ruin of the city, retired to the country of the Vandals and eastern Saxons, who were enriched with their wealth. Albert, king of Sweden, rebuilt the city, and granted great privileges to all that should come and inhabit it; but it never could recover its trade and former magnificence.

It was in this city of Wisbury that the sea laws and ordinances which the Swedes brought into credit, were composed; they were received as righteous and just, and are kept in the Teutonic language till now. The Germans, Swedes, Danes, Flemings, and all the people of the north observe them; but none have been so curious as to preserve the date and the remembrance of the time when they were composed and published.

Northern writers have contended that the laws of Wisbury are more ancient than the Roll d'Oleron, and have even asserted the Consulato del Mare to have been composed subsequent to them. These claims are opposed with some irritation by Cleirac, who denies their having been promulgated prior to the year 1268. In this opinion he is supported by many historical facts. But at whatever period they may have been composed, these laws have been for ages, and still remain, in great authority in northern Europe. ARTICLE I.

Whatever mariner, whether pilot, mate, or sailor, binds or hires himself to a master, if he afterwards leaves him, he shall refund what wages he has received; and besides that, pay half as much as the master had promised him for the whole voyage. And if a mariner has hired himself to two several masters, the first that hired him may claim him, and force him to serve him. Nevertheless he shall not be obliged to pay him any wages at all for the whole voyage, unless he does it of his own good will.

ART. II.

Every pilot, mate or mariner that does not understand his business, shall be obliged to repay to the master whatever wages he had advanced him, and be besides bound to pay half as much more as he had promised him.

ART. III.

A master may turn off a mariner without any lawful cause given, before he sets sail, paying him half what he had promised him for the voyage. After he has set sail, and is gone out of his port, that master who turns off a mariner without lawful cause given, is obliged to pay him all his wages as much as if he had performed the voyage.\footnote{Laws of Oleron, arts. 12, 13, 20. \footnote{Laws of Oleron, art. 5.}}

\textbf{ART. IV.}

\footnote{2 By deniers here are understood, those of which twenty-four make an ounce of silver. The double deniers are now called carolus’s or grand blancs, by the French and other nations. \footnote{3 These duties are never fixed on account of the dearness of provisions, and the value of money, which changes and increases daily. The rate of guindage or regrindage, is commonly in France five sols a last. Which is two sols six deniers tournois a ton. \footnote{4 Ord. Louis XIV. Mariners and Ships, tit. 1, art. 14. \footnote{5 The words of this article are, “de le fretter ou sous-louer à d’autres pour le même temps, et pour même voyage”: which we think we have rendered right, notwithstanding the difficulty there seems to be in the sense, or the equity of this law.}}

No mariner shall lie or stay a night ashore without the master’s leave, on pain of forfeiting two deniers, nor shall he unmoor the ship’s boat in the night, under the same penalty.\footnote{Laws of Oleron, art. 5.}

The mariners shall have three deniers a last for loading, and three for unloading, which is to be reckoned only as their wages for guindage or hoisting.\footnote{Laws of Oleron, art. 6.}

\textbf{ART. VI.}

It is not lawful to arrest or imprison the master, pilot or mariners of a ship in an action of debt, when they are ready to sail; but the creditor may seize and sell any thing he finds in the ship that belongs to his debtor, l. i, de Navicularis, lib. iv, cod.\footnote{Laws of Oleron, art. 7.}

\textbf{ART. VII.}

A ship being freighted for all the summer, the season shall end on the feast of St. Martin, or the eleventh of November.

\textbf{ART. VIII.}

Whoever shall make use of another man’s lighter, without his leave, shall pay the owner four sols a day, unless it was in a case of necessity, as of fire or the like.

\textbf{ART. IX.}

If any one has occasion to have a debt witnessed, he need not carry strangers aboard; but may make use of the people in the ship. The same he may do in all acts where witnesses are necessary, lib. x. cod.

\textbf{ART. X.}

It is not lawful to sell or mortgage a vessel let out to freight; but it is lawful to freight it or underlet it to others for the same time, and the same voyage.\footnote{Laws of Oleron, arts. 12, 13, 20. \footnote{Laws of Oleron, art. 5.}}

\textbf{ART. XI.}

If a ship that was freighted for a voyage is sent upon another longer than that, or upon several voyages; if there is no protestation or dissent entered against it, the freighter shall pay but half the damages that may happen to the ship in such longer voyage or voyages.

\textbf{ART. XII.}

If a mast, sail or any other tackling is unfortunately lost when the ship is under sail, or otherwise, the loss shall not be brought into an average. But if the master is obliged to cut his mast by the board, or spoil any of his tackling for the preservation of the ship, the bottom and the cargo shall make good the damage by an average.\footnote{Laws of Oleron, art. 8.}

\textbf{ART. XIII.}

The master shall not sell the ship, nor any part of her tackling, without the consent of the owners; but if he wants victuals he may pawn his cables and cordage: always observing to have the advice of the mariners.\footnote{Laws of Oleron, art. 9.}

\textbf{ART. XIV.}

The master being in port, ought not to depart and set sail without the advice and consent of the major part of the mariners; if he does, and there happens any loss, he is bound to make satisfaction.\footnote{Laws of Oleron, art. 10.}

\textbf{ART. XV.}

The mariners are obliged to the utmost of their power to save and preserve the merchandise, and for doing it, ought to be paid their wages, but not otherwise. It is not lawful for the master to sell the ship’s cordage, without the consent of the owners or factors: but he is bound to preserve all, as much as in him lies, on pain of making satisfaction.\footnote{Laws of Oleron, art. 11.}

\textbf{ART. XVI.}

The mariners are obliged to save as much as they can, and the merchants may take away their goods, paying the freight or satisfying the master; otherwise the said master may fit out his ship if he can do it in a little time, in order to accomplish his voyage; if he cannot do it he may relade the merchandise upon other vessels, bound for the port to which he was to carry them, paying freight for them.

\textbf{ART. XVII.}

The mariners shall not go out of the ship without leave of the master, on pain of paying the damage that may happen in their absence, unless it is when the ship lies ashore moored with four cables. In such case they may go out of her for a little time, taking care not to transgress in it.\textsuperscript{11}

\textbf{ART. XVIII.}

A mariner being ashore in the master's or the ship's service, if he should happen to be wounded, he shall be maintained and cured at the charge of the ship: but if he goes ashore on his own head to be merry, and divert himself, or otherwise, and happens to be wounded, the master may turn him off; and the mariner shall be obliged to refund what he has received, and besides to pay what the master shall be forced to pay over and above to another whom he shall hire in his place.\textsuperscript{12}

\textbf{ART. XIX.}

If a seaman falls ill of any disease, and it is convenient to put him ashore, he shall be fed as he was aboard, and have somebody to look after him there; and when he is recovered, be paid his wages; and if he dies, his wages shall be paid to his widow or heirs.\textsuperscript{13}

\textbf{ART. XX.}

If by stress of weather it is thought necessary to throw any goods overboard to lighten the ship; and the supercargoes or merchants aboard, will not consent to it, the merchandize shall nevertheless be thrown overboard, if the rest of the people aboard think it safest to do so. In such case as soon as the ship puts into port, a third part of the mariners must go ashore, and purge themselves by oath, that they were forced to do it for the preservation of their own lives, the ship, and the rest of the cargo. The merchandize so thrown overboard, shall be brought into a gross average, and be raised at the same price the other merchandize of the same sort, that was saved, was sold for.\textsuperscript{14}

\textbf{ART. XXI.}

Before the master throws any goods overboard, he is bound, in the absence of the merchant, to ask the pilot and mariners' advice, and the loss shall be made good by contribution: the ship and cargo being accountable towards it.\textsuperscript{15}

\textbf{ART. XXII.}

The master and mariners are obliged to show the merchant the ooeange that is used for holsting his goods in and out of the ship; if he does not do it, and there happens any accident, they shall stand to the loss; but if the merchant has seen and approved of it, the damage he sustains shall be borne by himself.\textsuperscript{16}

\textbf{ART. XXIII.}

If a ship is ill trimmed, and it happens that the wine she has aboard is lost through the master's ignorance or negligence in governing her, the said master is bound to pay for it; but if the mariners clear him upon oath, the leakage or loss shall be borne by the merchant.\textsuperscript{17}

\textbf{ART. XXIV.}

No man shall fight; or give another the lie aboard. He who offends in this kind shall pay four deniers; and if the mariner gives the master the lie, he shall pay eight deniers: but he who strikes him shall pay 100 sols, or lose his hand.\textsuperscript{18} If the master gives the lie he shall pay eight deniers; if he strikes he ought to receive blow for blow.\textsuperscript{19}

\textbf{ART. XXV.}

The master may turn off a mariner for a lawful cause; but if the said mariner compensates for his fault, and the master nevertheless refuses to admit him again: the mariner may follow the ship to her destined port, and he shall be paid his wages, as much as if he had made the voyage in the same ship. If the master hires a less able seaman in his place, and there happens any damage by it, the master is to make good the loss.\textsuperscript{20}

\textbf{ART. XXVI.}

If a ship riding at anchor in a harbour, is struck by another ship which runs against her, driven by the wind or current, and the ship so struck receives damage, either in her hull or cargo, the two ships shall jointly stand to the loss; but if the ship that struck against the other might have avoided it, if it was done by the master on purpose, or by his fault, he alone shall make satisfaction. The reason is, that some masters who have old crazy ships, may willingly lie in other ships' way, that they may be damned or sunk, and so have more than they were worth for them. On which account this law provides, that the damage shall be divided, and paid equally by the two ships, to oblige both to take care, and keep clear of such accidents as much as they can.\textsuperscript{21}

ART. XXVII.
A ship being at anchor in a harbour where there is so little water that she touches; another ship comes and anchors near her; if the ship's company of the former vessel require those of the latter to take up their anchor, because it is too near them, and they do not do it, the former may take it up themselves; and if the latter hinders them, they shall make satisfaction for all the damage that may happen by that anchor.21

ART. XXVIII.
No master of a ship shall lie at anchor in a haven without fastening a buoy to his anchor, to give notice to others where it is. If he omits to do so, and any damage is sustained by it, he is obliged to make it good.

ART. XXIX.
In all voyages where wine is the trade, the master is obliged to find the seamen with it, and then he may give them but one meal a day; but where it is not to be had, and the mariners drink water, he shall give them two meals a day.22

ART. XXX.
When a ship is let out to freight, the master ought to assign and shew the seamen where they are to have the stowage that belongs to them; and they must declare whether they will load it themselves, or will let the master freight it with the rest of the ship, and be paid for their proportion.23

ART. XXXI.
A ship being arrived at her destined port, those seamen who would be paid their wages there, if they have no chest nor bedding, or other moveables aboard, equivalent to their wages, they must give the master security that they will serve out the rest of the voyage, and see it completed, or he may refuse to pay them before.24

ART. XXXII.
Those seamen who bargain for a certain proportion of the ship's freight, instead of wages in money, in case freight is not to be had for her when she arrives at the port for which she was bound, and she must go further in quest of it, they must go with her: but those seamen who agreed to be paid in money, shall have their wages there.25

ART. XXXIII.
When a ship is safe at anchor, the seamen may go ashore one after another, or two together, and carry sufficient meat and bread with them for one meal, but no drink. Nor must they stay any long time ashore; for if through their absence any damage happens to the ship or goods, they are obliged to make satisfaction. And if any one of the crew is wounded, or comes by any other ill accident in doing the merchant's business, the merchant is bound to cure him, and indemnify the master, pilot and mariners.26

ART. XXXIV.
A ship being let out to hire to a merchant to freight her, and he agrees to load her in a certain time; if he fails and exceeds that time, fifteen days or more, and by this means the master loses his opportunity to freight his ship; the said merchant shall make him satisfaction for his delays, and pay his damages and interest, a quarter of which belongs to the mariners, and three quarters to the master.27

ART. XXXV.
If the master being upon his voyage wants money, he must send home for it; but ought not to lose a fair opportunity of proceeding; if he does, he shall satisfy the merchant for all the damage he may sustain by his delay; but in case of great necessity he may sell part of the merchandize, and when he arrives at his destined port, he shall pay the merchant for them at the same price the rest was sold at, and the merchant shall pay freight as well for the merchandize the master sold, as for those he delivered him.28

ART. XXXVI.
When the master arrives in a port, he should be careful to place his ship well, to moor her well; for if by his neglect in this the merchandize aboard comes by any damage, he is obliged to make it good.

ART. XXXVII.
If a ship has been in a storm, and the merchant, master or crew think she ought to be refitted, to enable her to continue her voyage, they may do it, and then proceed. However, the master shall be paid his freight for the goods saved, which are for the merchant's profit only. If the merchant has no money, and the master will not give him credit, he may take his merchandize in payment at the market price.29

ART. XXXVIII.
The master shall not throw any goods overboard, without first consulting the mer-

The merchantize thrown overboard shall be valued in the average, at the price the rest was sold for, freight only deducted. 21

ART. XL.

The master in the average shall pay his proportion for the goods thrown overboard, either by calculating what the ship is worth, or what the freight amounts to, at the choice of the merchant; and the merchant shall pay his, according to the value of the remaining merchantize. It shall be left to the merchant to leave or take the ship at the price the master rated her at.

ART. XLI.

If any one has plate or merchantize of great price in his chest, he is bound to declare it before hand, and so doing he shall be paid for his merchantize according to its worth, and the plate after the rate of two deniers for one.

ART. XLII.

If any one has money in his chest, let him take it out and carry it about him, and he shall pay nothing.

ART. XLIII.

If a chest is thrown overboard, and the proprietor does not declare what is in it, it shall not be reckoned in the average, but for the wood and the lock, if it is locked, according to their value. 23

ART. XLIV.

If it is thought convenient in any river, or off any dangerous coast to take aboard a pilot of the country, and the merchant opposes it, yet if the master, the ship’s pilot, and the major part of the seamen are of another opinion, he may be hired, and the pilot shall be paid by the ship and cargo, as averages are calculated for goods thrown overboard. 24

ART. XLV

If a master is reduced to straits for want of money or victuals, and for that reason forced to sell part of his merchantize aboard, or borrow money at bottomry, he ought to pay within 15 days after his arrival, for the merchantize at a reasonable price, neither the highest nor the lowest; and if he does not, and the ship be sold, and another master put in her, the merchant to whom the merchantize belonged, or the creditor that lent the money on bottomry, shall at any time within a year and a day, have a good right to the ship, until satisfaction is made for the goods sold, or money borrowed. 25

ART. XLVI.

A ship being laden, the master ought not to take in any more merchantize, without leave of the merchant; if he does, and there happens any occasion to throw goods overboard, he shall pay as much as he took in goods over and above the ship’s loading. Wherefore he ought when he is lading, to declare how much goods he has, and ought to have aboard.

ART. XLVII.

The seamen are obliged to keep and watch the merchantize at the request of the merchants, master and pilot.

ART. XLVIII.

If for the preservation of the commodity, the seamen turn up the corn aboard, they shall be allowed a denier a last for each time; and if they will not do it, they are liable for the damage that comes to it for want of it. They shall also be allowed a denier a last for unloading, and so for other merchantize.

ART. XLIX.

The mariners ought to represent to the master what condition their tackling for lading and unloading is in; that if the cordage is out of repair, or any other part of it, it may be mended. And if the master does not do it, he shall be accountable for whatever damage happens by that means; but if the mariners do not make their representation, the accidents that befal the merchantize shall be indemnified at their expense. 26

ART. L.

If two ships strike against one another and receive damage, the loss shall be borne equally between them, unless the men on board one of them, did it on purpose; in which case that ship shall pay all the damage. 27

ART. LI.

To prevent all inconveniences, all masters of ships are required to fasten buoys to their anchors, on pain of making satisfaction for all the damage that may happen for want of them. 38

ART. LII.
When a ship arrives at her port of discharge, she ought to be unladen with all possible dispatch, and the master to be paid in eight or fifteen days at farthest, according to the circumstances of the voyage. 39

ART. LIII.
If a ship freighted for one port, enters another, the master together with two or three of his chief mariners, ought to clear themselves upon oath, that it was by constraint and necessity that they went out of their way. After which he may proceed in his intended voyage, or ship the cargo aboard other ships, paying freight for the goods, which the merchant shall also pay him, and what else is due on account of the merchandize.

ART. LIV.
It is forbidden to any mariner to go out of the ship, and leave it, after the voyage is done and the ship discharged, unless her sails are all in, her furniture taken away, and she is sufficiently lightened of her ballast. 40

ART. LV.
If a ship strikes, the master may take out part of his cargo, and relade it aboard other ships, and the charges of it shall come into a general average upon ship and goods. However, the master and two or three of his seamen shall purge themselves upon oath, that they were forced to do it to save the ship and cargo.

ART. LVI.
When a ship arrives at the mouth of any river or harbour, and the master finds she is too heavy laden to sail up, he may put part of the cargo aboard hogs, lighters, or barges, and an average shall be made for it, of which the master shall pay two thirds, and the merchant one third; but if after the ship is entirely discharged, the ship draws too much water, and cannot sail up, then the master shall pay all the charges.

ART. LVII.
The merchandize being put aboard lighters, in order to be landed, if the master has any jealousy of the merchant's ability or honesty to pay him, he may stop it at his ship's side, and refuse to let it go, till the merchant has paid him in full for his freight and charges.

ART. LVIII.
All lighters, open or close, shall be discharged in five days.

39 Laws of Oleron, art. 21.
40 Laws of Oleron, art. 5.
ART. LXVIII.

In case of necessity the merchant may sell part of the merchandize to raise money for his ship's use; and the ship happening to be lost afterwards, the master shall however be obliged to pay the merchant for the said merchandize so sold, without pretending to deduct any thing for the freight.

ART. LXIX.

When the master is forced to sell any of the merchandize, he is obliged to pay the same price for them, as the same goods were sold for at the market for which they were designed, and the master shall be paid his freight for what goods are sold.

ART. LXX.

If a ship under sail does damage to another, the master and mariners of the ship doing the damage must swear they did not do it designedly, and could not help it, and then the damage shall be borne by both ships in equal proportion; and if they refuse to swear, the damage shall be paid by the ship that did it.
THE LAWS OF THE HANSE TOWNS.

Before we give an abstract of the laws of the Hanse towns, the confederacy which enacted them, and whose commercial policy they regulated, is entitled to some notice.

During the progress of successful commercial enterprise among the Italians, and towards the middle of the thirteenth century, the activity of the north was excited, and its attention was awakened to commerce. The Baltic was surrounded by nations immersed in extreme barbarism, whose piracies prevented the success of almost every maritime adventure, and compelled the cities of Lubeck and Hamburg, who had opened an intercourse with these people, to unite in a league of mutual defence. The immediate and extensive benefits resulting from this union, induced other towns to accede to it, and in a short time eighty-one cities of considerable importance, placed in those fertile and extensive countries which occupy the space between the lower part of the Baltic and the Scheldt, became members of the Hanseatic league. It now obtained an influence in the affairs of Europe; and while its allies were enriched by an intercourse with its members, its friendship was courted, and its hostility dreaded by the most powerful monarchs. Among the means adopted by this association to insure prosperity to their trade, and protect them from controversies with each other, was the formation of a code for the regulation of their maritime enterprise and the circumstances incident to them. These laws are evidently founded on those of the neighbouring city of Wismar, and the justly celebrated Roll d'Oleron. They appear to have been first enacted and promulgated in the year 1507, at Lubeck, which is styled the "Mother of the Hanse Towns." They were formed by a general assembly, called together for the purpose, and first appeared in the German language. Afterwards, in the year 1614, they were revised by another delegation from each of the towns, and many new ordinances were added.

For the convenience of their commercial operations, different towns were selected by the confederacy where they established warehouses and factories, and at which their intercourse with other countries was chiefly conducted. Among the principal of these was Bruges and Antwerp, in the latter of which was erected a splendid hall, at that period the boast of the northern world. There, were brought by the Italians, the rich productions of India, with the ingenious manufactures of their own country, to be exchanged for the bulky and useful products of the north. The articles obtained by the Hanseatic merchants in this intercourse, were transported to the Baltic, and from thence along the larger rivers into the interior of Germany.

An intercourse so profitable to those who were immediately engaged in it, produced other effects than an augmentation of the wealth of the Hanseatic confederacy. The arts of southern Europe began to be known; and a desire to imitate them, and to possess their productions, was the result of this knowledge. This intercourse created new wants as it increased the means of their gratification; and by the demands it excited among the inhabitants of the Netherlands and Germany, for commodities of every kind, industry was promoted; and at a very early period the manufactures of flax and wool had made considerable progress.

As Bruges became the centre of communication between the Hanseatic and the Lombard merchants, the Flemings traded with both in that city, to such extent and advantage as spread among them a general habit of industry, which long rendered Flanders and the adjacent provinces the most opulent, the most populous, and best cultivated counties in Europe.

The pleasure which is derived from tracing the progress of such associations to prosperity, and noting their influence and connection with the welfare of other states, has induced us to enter more minutely into the history of the Hanseatic body, than was originally proposed. It their example stimulated other nations to industry and trade, their laws must necessarily have obtained a corresponding estimation. Those institutions which protected the rights and regulated the contracts of these industrious adventurers, could not fail to obtain a due portion of praise and value. Accordingly we find them in extensive application among the northern powers of Europe, and governing them in their commercial transactions. By the most distinguished men of the fifteen and sixteenth centuries, whose avocations induced their attention to them, they are spoken of with great respect, and esteemed as the production of great wisdom and extensive experience.

ARTICLE I.

No master shall undertake to build a ship, unless he is assured that his owners and undertakers are agreed upon what model it shall be built, and on every thing relating to the building of it; which undertakers and owners shall be burgheers and inhabitants of one of the Hanse Towns, and no others. However, if the master will go through with the building at his own expense, he may do it; otherwise he must always have the consent of those burgheers that are concerned with him, on pain of forfeiting half a dollar a ton.²

ART. II.

No master shall begin to build a ship, after he and his joint owners or partners have resolved upon it, until they have agreed among themselves of what size, height and depth she shall be, how broad and how long, and this agreement shall be taken in writing on pain of forfeiting 12 sols a ton.³

ART. III.

The master in like manner shall not repair the ship, sails or cordage without the owner’s consent, on pain of being at all the charge of it himself, unless in case of necessity, when he is in a strange country.

ART. IV.

The master may not buy any thing whatsoever for his ship, unless it is in the presence, and with the consent of one or two of the partners; if he does he shall forfeit 50 sols: nor shall the master, or any of the owners buy any thing for the ship’s use, upon the credit of the other owners who would pay ready money for their part of the disbursement.

ART. V.

An inventory shall be taken of every thing the ship wants, that it may be bought by the master and owners jointly.

ART. VI.

The master ought to buy every thing at the cheapest rate without fraud, on pain of corporal punishment; and he shall enter in his account the name of the person of whom he bought the goods, and where they live.

ART. VII.

If a master or mariner keep back any of the merchandise he took in on freight, they shall be apprehended and punished as robbers, unless it was in case of necessity.

ART. VIII.

Nor may they give above the market price for any provisions, and what they shall buy shall be carried to the ship’s store-house, and be kept there till she is ready to sail.

ART. IX.

All masters are forbidden to sell any of the ship’s provisions, on pain of being punished as thieves, except it is at sea, when they meet with other ships in distress and danger of perishing for want of them: for which they shall however be accountable to the owners.

ART. X.

The master when the ship is returned, is obliged to deliver up to the owners, the remains of his victuals and ammunition.

ART. XI.

The master is obliged to set sail two or three days after his ship is laden, if the wind is fair, on pain of forfeiting 200 livres; and in case any one of the owners has not paid his quota of the charge of the ship’s outfit by that time, he shall forfeit as much; and the master may besides, borrow money on bottom, for the deficient owner’s quota. The merchants are bound to load the ship by a prefixed time, on pain of paying the whole freight, notwithstanding the ship proceeds in her voyage light, and in her ballast only.

ART. XII.

When the master gives in his account, he shall summon all his owners together, on pain of 100 livres forfeit.

ART. XIII.

The master shall not take any merchandise aboard on his head, or by the consent of one of his owners, without the approbation of them all: if he does, the penalty is confiscation, or other punishment.

ART. XIV.

The owners having lawful cause, may turn off a master, paying him for what share he has in the ship, at the price it cost him.

ART. XV.

All owners are forbidden to entertain any master unless he produces a certificate of his honesty and ability, and that he quitted the service of the merchants he served last, with their consent: if they do, they shall pay 25 crowns penalty.

ART. XVI.

Before the master hires any mariner or pilot, he ought to acquaint the owners with what wages he is to give them, and have their allowance of it, under penalty of 25 crowns.

ART. XVII.

If several ships are in company on the same voyage, they are obliged to stay for one another, or be liable to all the damages that may happen to the others by an enemy or pirates. 4

² In the stile of the Hanse Towns, the owners of ships are called burghers; because none but the burghers of those cities in Germany, were permitted to build ships. The inconvenience provided against by this article is to save the materials of building, that none might undertake what they could not go through with, and thereby the materials be lost: for if he who begins to build a ship, is not very well able to perfect it, and has not the approbation of his joint owners or partners, such is often the end of too rash beginnings of this kind.

ART. XVIII.

No master shall hire a mariner, before he has seen his pass or certificate of his faithful behaviour in the service of his last master, on pain of forfeiting 100 sols, unless he is necessitated to it in a strange country.

ART. XIX.

Masters are obliged to give mariners certificates of their faithful service; and if any one refuses, or delays, he shall forfeit 100 sols.

ART. XX.

A ship being forced to stay or winter in a strange country, the mariners are not to go out of her without the master’s permission, on pain of losing half their wages. 5

ART. XXI.

If the master maintains the mariners all the winter, they cannot oblige him to give them more wages; but if they endeavour to do it, they shall forfeit half of what they were to have had, and be punished further, according to the circumstances of their offence.

ART. XXII.

No seaman may go ashore without the consent of the master, pilot, mate or clerk of the ship, under penalty of 25 sols for each time.

ART. XXIII.

The seamen who are ashore with the master, are obliged to look after the boat, and return on board as soon as they are commanded: and he who stays or lies ashore, shall pay a forfeit, or suffer imprisonment.

ART. XXIV.

If the master changes his voyage, and steers another course than was intended, he ought to have the consent of his mariners, or pay them what the major party of them shall adjudge to be due to them for his changing of the voyage: and if then any one of them will not obey him, he shall be punished as a mutineer.

ART. XXV.

If any mariner sleep on a watch, he shall pay four sols forfeit: and whoever finds him asleep, and does not discover it, two sols.

ART. XXVI.

All seamen are forbidden to moor any skiffs or boats to a ship’s side, on pain of imprisonment.

ART. XXVII.

He who shall be found incapable of discharging his duty as a pilot or mariner, for which he has received wages, shall forfeit all that was promised him, and be besides punished according to his demerit.

ART. XXVIII.

Masters shall pay their seamen at three payments, one third when the ship sets sail, outward bound; one third when she is unloaded, and the other when she is returned home.

ART. XXIX.

A master may at any time turn away a mariner that rebels against, or is unfaithful to him. 6

ART. XXX.

If one mariner kills another, the master is bound to seize him, and keep him in safe custody till he arrives at his port, and then to deliver him up to justice to be punished.

ART. XXXI.

The seamen may not feast and carouse in the ship without the master’s leave, on pain of losing half their wages.

ART. XXXII.

No seaman shall let his wife lie aboard under penalty of 50 sols.

ART. XXXIII.

No seaman ought to carry powder and shot without the master’s consent, on pain of paying double the value of it.

ART. XXXIV.

The master is bound when he returns home, to give an account before the magistrate, of what forfeitures he received, and for what, under penalty of 25 crowns.

ART. XXXV.

The seamen are obliged to defend the ship against rovers, on pain of losing their wages; and if they are wounded, they shall be healed and cured at the general charge of the concerned in a common average. If any one of them is maimed and disabled, he shall be maintained as long as he lives by a like average.

ART. XXXVI.

If the mariners, or any of the company refuse to assist on the like occasion, and the ship be taken or lost, they shall be condemned to be whipped as cowards and rascals.

ART. XXXVII.

If the mariners resolve to defend the ship, and the master is afraid and against it, he shall be turned out of his post with infaunity, and declared incapable of ever commanding a ship afterwards.

ART. XXXVIII.

The ship’s ballast shall be carried to the place designed for it, and those that are refractory, and will not help in it, shall be punished by the magistrates of the place.

ART. XXXIX.

If any seaman is wounded in the ship's service, he shall be cured at the charge of the ship, but not if he is wounded otherwise. 7

ART. XL.

If any one of the seamen goes ashore without leave, and the ship happens to receive any damage in the time, or to be lost for want of hands, he shall be kept in prison upon bread and water for one year; and if any seaman dies or perishes with the ship for want of the assistance of the absent seaman, the latter shall be punished with corporal punishment. 8

ART. XLI.

If a mariner behaves himself ill the master may turn him off; but if he discharge him for no reason before the voyage begins, he shall pay him a third part of his wages, but shall not charge it in the ship's account.

ART. XLII.

If the master discharges a seaman during the voyage, for no lawful cause given, he is bound to pay him his whole wages, and defray the charge of his return; but if the mariner desires the master's leave to quit the ship, he shall be bound to restore all the money he received, and pay his own charges. 9

ART. XLIII.

If an officer or seaman quits a ship, and conceals himself; if afterwards he is apprehended, he shall be delivered up to justice to be punished; he shall be stigmatized in the face with the first letter of the name of the town to which he belongs.

ART. XLIV.

If a ship is lost the mariners are obliged to save as much of the goods as they can, and the master ought to reward and satisfy them for it, and pay the charge of their journey home: if the mariners refuse to assist the master, they shall have neither wages nor reward. 10

ART. XLV.

If any mariner falls sick of any disease, he shall be put ashore and maintained in like manner as if he was on shipboard, and be attended by another mariner. 11 However, the master is not obliged to stay for him; if he recovers his health, he shall be paid his wages as much as if he had served out the whole voyage; and in case he dies, his heirs shall have what was due to him. 12

ART. XLVI.

If mariners mutiny, and force the master to enter into any harbour or port, and the ship or cargo is lost, either in whole or in part, for which the seamen run away; if afterwards they are taken, they shall be corporally punished.

ART. XLVII.

The master shall not give the seamen any cause to mutiny, but supply them with what is convenient, and pay them what is their due punctually and faithfully. 13

XLVIII.

The master who shall debauch a seaman, and hire him after he had hired himself to another master, shall pay 25 livres, and the mariner shall pay to the first master for damages, half the wages the second had promised him.

ART. XLIX.

If a ship is stopped in a strange country, or the mariners are forced to stay there for their freight, or on another account, they shall all that time be maintained as is usual; but shall not pretend to demand any extraordinary wages; and what is due to them shall be paid to them or their assigns, when the ship is discharged. If any seaman is so bold as to leave the ship because of her stay, he shall be corporally punished according to his demerits.

ART. L.

If a master takes any gold, silver, diamonds, or other merchandize of great price, which obliges him to have a more than ordinary care of it, a fourth part of the freight of such rich goods shall be allowed him, and the owners shall have the other three fourths.

ART. LI.

The master ought to put a mariner in each boat or lighter that is to carry salt to land as well to take care of it, as to see that a right account is kept of its measure.

13 Laws of Oleron, art. 18.
ART. LII.
Mariners hired aboard ships bound for France or Spain, shall not be maintained by the masters when they are outward bound, but shall live on their own provisions; but when they are homeward bound, the master shall maintain them: and if the master advances or lends them any money, he may pay himself by deducting it out of their wages. If the ship is not laden home, the master is not obliged to maintain them.

ART. LIII.
The masters may not alienate or sell any part of their provisions or furniture until the voyage is made, and when they do, the owners shall be preferred to any other in the sale of them.

ART. LIV.
The mariners shall not take any grains of salt belonging to the ship’s loading, but shall put some aboard for their own use, with the knowledge and consent of the merchant or others concerned, on pain of being severely punished.

ART. LV.
The master or the pilot may each load 12 barrels on their particular account; the other officers six each, and the seamen four each; the cook and the boys two each.14

ART. LVI.
If a master, to displease his owners, sells his part of a ship for more than it is worth, the said part shall be appraised by men of experience; after which the owners may take it or leave it at the price it was appraised at, as they think fit.15

ART. LVII.
If a master, fraudulently, shall borrow money upon bottomry, and mortgage his ship for it, or stay with it in any port a long time, and sell it, together with the merchandize, the said master shall be incapable of having the command of a ship afterwards, and never be admitted into any city, but shall be punished without mercy.

ART. LVIII.
A master being at home, may not borrow any more money on bottomry, than his own part of the ship is worth; if he does, the other shares of the ship shall not be liable for it; neither shall he take any freight without the knowledge and consent of the owners.

ART. LIX.
If the owners are at variance, and cannot agree about the freight of their ship, that opinion shall carry it, which has the majority on its side by two or three. The master may also in such case, take up money upon bottomry, as well on their shares who do not consent, as on theirs who do.

ART. LX.
A master being in a strange country, if necessity drives him to it, may take up money on bottomry, if he cannot get it without, and the owners shall bear the charge of it.16

THE MARINE ORDINANCES OF LOUIS XIV.

While the French historians have employed themselves in tracing the commercial prosperity of their nation, at the conclusion of the seventeenth, and opening of the eighteenth centuries, to these ordinances, the civilians and lawyers of every period which has followed their promulgation, have avowed the greatest admiration of their wisdom and their justice. To the genius of Colbert, the celebrated minister of Louis XIV, France is indebted for this excellent code. Desirous of establishing the commerce of his country on a basis which nothing could successfully assail, he selected a masterly hand to compile and arrange these laws, from the prevailing maritime regulations of France and other states, and from the experience of the most respectable commercial men of his country. To these regulations which, having formed a part of the maritime code of Europe, had been acknowledged as authority by all, were added others which were considered as peculiarly necessary for the trade of France. The ordinances thus formed, were published by the French King in 1691, and have since enjoyed an uncontroverted authority over the commerce of the country for which they were intended, and have obtained the respect of every maritime state.

To the testimony in favour of this collection, which has so often been given by the most celebrated jurists of Europe, I can add that of a gentleman of our own state, a distinguished legal acquirement, who has been recently selected, with the approbation of his country, to occupy the first judicial situation in the state of Pennsylvania. In the case of Morgan & Price v. The Insurance Company of North America, decided by the supreme court of this state in January, 1807, Chief Justice Tilghman, having referred to one of the articles of these ordinances, thus expressed himself: "They and the commentaries on them, have been received with great respect in the courts both of England and the United States, not as conveying any authority in themselves, but as evidence of the general marine law. When they are contradicted by judicial decisions in our own country they are not to be regarded; but on points which have not been decided, they are worthy of great consideration."
The commentaries on these ordinances by Valin, we have reluctantly consented to omit, and the design of this work necessarily excludes from it, those articles in the ordinances which are local in their nature, or are confined to the regulation of the courts or the offices of the admiralty of France. Those only have been selected, which are founded on the general principles of maritime law, and which are thought peculiarly entitled to the notice of every commercial lawyer.

MARINERS AND SHIPS.

TITLE FIRST.

Of the Captain, Master and Patron.¹

I. No person shall be capable of being received captain, master, or patron of a ship, till he has navigated five years, and has been publicly examined in navigation, and judged capable by two ancient masters, in presence of the officers of the admiralty, and of the professor of hydrography, if any be in the place.²

II. We forbid all mariners to sail in quality of masters, and all owners to constitute any in their ships, before they be received in the aforesaid manner, under pain of three hundred livres, to be paid by each offender.³

III. However, such as are already masters shall not be obliged to undergo any examination.

IV. Such as have been received pilots, and have navigated two years in that quality, may be constituted masters without any examination, and without any act of the court of admiralty.

V. The master shall choose the ship's company, and hire the pilots, mates, mariners and sailors; but he shall advise with his owners when at the port of their residence.

VI. In places where there are hospitals of poor boys, the masters shall be obliged to choose amongst them their ship-boys.

VII. The master who shall entice away a mariner from another master, shall be fined in one hundred livres, applicable one half to the admiral, and the other half to the first master, who may take the mariner back again if he pleases.4

¹ In France those who command vessels of war, or merchant ships destined on long voyages, are called "capitaine"; masters or "patrones" are those who command vessels employed in the coasting trade.

² A professor of hydrography is appointed to teach navigation and the sciences immediately connected with it, in all the considerable seaports in France. His school is open to every one, and formerly each hospital sent two or three boys, annually, to be instructed in the sciences taught by him. Book 1, tit. 8.

VIII. A master must take care before he puts to sea, that the ship be right ballasted and laded, and well provided with anchors and tackle, and all things necessary for the voyage.

IX. He shall be answerable for all the goods laded aboard his ship, which he shall be obliged to deliver according to the bills of lading.

X. He shall be obliged to keep a book or register, quoted and flourished on every leaf by one of his principal owners, in which he shall insert the day that he was constituted master, the names of the officers and mariners of his company, the rates and conditions of their engagement, the payments he makes them, what he receives and expends for the use of the ship, and generally every thing that concerns the functions of his employment, or of which he has to render any account, or any demand to make.

XI. If, with the master's consent, there is a clerk established in the ship, to take an account of all such things, the master shall be exempt from it.

XII. No master shall lade any goods upon the ship's deck, without the order or consent of his merchants, under pain of being answerable for all the damage that may happen.

XIII. Masters shall be obliged, under pain of an arbitrary fine, to be aboard their ships themselves when they go out of any port, harbour or river.

XIV. No master, patron, pilot, nor mariner, shall be arrested for a civil debt, being a shipboard to put to sea, except it be for debts contracted for the voyage.

XV. The master, before he sets sail, shall take the advice of the pilot, mate, and other principal men of the ship's company.6

XVI. He shall be obliged before he puts to sea to give into the admiralty office, of the place of his departure, the names, surnames, and dwelling-places of his company, passengers, and persons engaged for the West Indies, and to declare at his return such as he has brought back again, and the places where he left the others.

XVII. He shall not, while in the place where his owners reside, cause the ship to be refitted, buy sails, ropes, or other things for the ship, nor take up money for that account upon the ship, without their consent, under pain of paying the same himself.6

XVIII. However, if with the owner's consent, a ship be freighted, and any of them refuses to contribute towards the necessary charges for fitting out the ship; in that case the master may take up money for bottomry for the account and upon the parts of the refusers, within four and twenty hours after he has sent them a summons in writing to furnish their proportions.7

XIX. He may likewise, during the voyage, take up money upon the ship, either for refitting, victuals, or other necessaries, or may pawn some of the rigging, or sell some goods of his lading, upon condition to pay for them at the rate that the rest shall be sold; all which must not be done without the advice of the mate and pilot, who shall write down in the journal the necessity of such borrowing of money, or selling of goods, and the manner how the money was laid out: but the master shall not in any case have power to sell the ship, without a special procurement from the owners.8

XX. If any master, without necessity, takes up money upon the ship or rigging, sells goods, pawns the tackle, or states in his accounts false and supposed averages and expenses, he shall pay what he takes up himself, be declared unworthy of being a master, and banished from his ordinary place of residence.

XXI. Masters hired to make a voyage shall be obliged to accomplish it, under pain of making good the damages and losses to the owners and merchants; and to be proceeded against extraordinary if that happens.

XXII. They may, with the advice of the mate and pilot, cause to be ducked or put in the hold, and inflict such sort of punishments upon drunken and disobedient seamen, or upon such as abuse their comrades, or commit such other faults and offences during the voyage.9

XXIII. And such as shall be guilty of murder, assassination, blasphemy, or other capital crimes committed at sea, the masters, mates and quarter-masters, shall be obliged under the entire penalty of one hundred livres, to inform against them, to seize their persons, and make the necessary proceedings for instituting process, in order to deliver the criminal into the hands of the officers of the admiralty, at the place of the lading or unlading of the ships within our kingdom.10

XXIV. We forbid all masters, under pain of exemplary punishment, to enter, except in cases of necessity, into any foreign port; and in case they be forced into any by tempest or pirates, they shall put to sea again with the first convenience.11

XXV. We enjoin all captains and masters, making long voyages, to assemble every day at noon, and oftener if necessary, the mates and pilots, and other expert persons.

and to confer with them about the latitudes taken, the courses made, and to be made, and about their calculations.

XXXVI. They shall not abandon their ships during the voyage, notwithstanding any danger, without the advice of the most expert officers and mariners; and in that case, they shall be obliged to carry off with them the money and the most precious goods they have on board, under pain of answering for it themselves, and of personal punishment.

XXXVII. If the effects so taken out of the ship be lost by any accident, the master shall be free from any danger.

XXXVIII. The masters and patrons who sail in partnership with other owners, shall have no separate dealings for their own particular account, under pain of confiscation of their goods for the benefit of the other partners.

XXXIX. They shall not borrow for their voyages any more money than what is necessary for their lading, under pain of being deprived of their places, and their share in the profits.

XXX. They shall be obliged, under the like penalty, to give before their departure, to the proprietors of the ship, a signed account of the quality and price of the goods they have aboard, and of the sums of money borrowed by them, together with the names and dwelling places of the lenders.

XXXI. If the common stock of provisions fail at sea, the master may compel such as have any in particular to deliver them up for the use of all, subject to the payment of the price thereof.

XXXII. No master shall sell the provisions of his ship, nor divert and conceal them, under pain of bodily punishment.12

XXXIII. They may however, with the advice and consent of the officers, sell to ships found in necessity at sea, provided they have enough remaining for their own voyage, and render an account thereof to the owners.13

XXXIV. At the return of the voyage, the victuals and ammunitions shall be remitted by the master into the hands of the owners.14

XXXV. If the master steer a false course, commit any robbery, or suffer any to be committed in his ship, or fraudulently give way to any alienation or confiscation of ship or goods, he shall be punished corporally.

XXXVI. A master being convicted of having delivered to the enemy, or maliciously run his ship aground, shall be punished with death.

MARINE ORD. LOUIS XIV.

TITLE SECOND.

Of the Mate.

I. The mate shall take care of the fitting out of the vessel, and before they put to sea, shall examine whether it be sufficiently provided with ropes, pulleys, sails, and other rigging necessary for the voyage.

II. At the departure he shall see the anchor hoisted; and during the voyage, he shall visit once a day all the tackle high and low; and if he observes any thing amiss, shall acquaint the master.

III. He shall execute in the vessel, and cause to be executed, day and night, the orders of the master.

IV. Arriving at a port he shall cause the cables and anchors to be prepared, and shall have the care and management of the sails and yards, and moorings of the ship.

V. In case of the absence or sickness of the master, the mate shall command in his place.

TITLE THIRD.

Of Seamen.15

I. The seamen shall be obliged to appear at the days and places appointed, to take aboard the provisions, rig out the ship, and set sail.16

II. A seaman hired for a voyage must not leave the ship, without a discharge in writing, till the voyage is ended, and the ship moored at the key and unladen.17

III. If a seaman leaves a master without a discharge in writing before the voyage is begun, he may be taken up and imprisoned wherever he can be found, and compelled to restore what he has received, and serve out the time for which he had engaged himself for nothing; and if he leaves the ship after the voyage is begun, he may be punished corporally.18

IV. However, if after the arrival and unloading of a ship at the intended port, the master, instead of returning, takes a freight to go elsewhere, the seamen may leave him if they please, except it be otherwise provided by their agreement.

V. After the ship is laded, the seamen shall not go ashore without leave from the master, under pain of five livres for the first fault: and may be punished corporally if they commit a second.19

VI. We forbid the mariners and seamen to take any bread or victuals, or draw any

VII. The seamen or other that spoils the drink, destroys the bread, makes the ship leaky, excites a sedition to break the voyage, or strikes the master having arms in his hand, shall be punished with death. 21

VIII. Any seaman sleeping in his post or upon the watch, shall be put in irons during fifteen days; and any of the company finding one asleep, and not acquainting the master therewith, shall pay five livres. 22

IX. Any master abandoning the master, and the defence of the ship in time of battle, shall be punished corporally.

TITLE FOURTH.

Of the Owners of Ships.

I. All our subjects, of any quality or condition whatsoever, may cause ships to be built or bought, fit them out for themselves, freight them to others, and drive a trade at sea by themselves, or by persons interposed; by which gentlemen shall not be reputed to do any act derogatory to their quality, provided they sell nothing by retail.

II. The owners of ships shall be answerable for the deeds of the master; but shall be discharged, abandoning their ship and freight.

III. However, the owners of armed ships shall not be answerable for their crimes and piracies committed at sea by the crews of their ships, any further than for the sums for which they may have given security, except it appear that they are partakers or accomplices in the crimes.

IV. The owners of ships may dismiss the master, reimbursing him, if he requires it, for his part in the ship, according to the estimation of understanding persons. 23

V. Every thing concerning the common interest of the owners, the opinion of the greater number shall prevail; and the number shall be computed according to the shares that every man has in the ship. 25

VI. No person may constrain his partner to proceed to the sale of a ship, except the opinions of the owners be equally different about the undertaking of any voyage. 26

23 The better to oblige owners of ships to be diligent and careful in providing themselves with honest masters, it is by this article declared, that they shall be answerable for the behaviour of the masters they put in their ships, for any sum not exceeding the value of their ships and of their freight. See Valin, Com. tom. 1, p. 568.
26 Valin, Com. tom. 1, p. 584. See, also, the case of Willings v. Blight, Case No. 17,708.

TITLE FIFTH.

Of Ships and Vessels.

I. All ships and vessels shall be reputed personality, and shall not be subject to redemptions, 27 nor to pay any duties to the lords of manors.

II. All vessels however, shall be liable for the debts of the seller, until they have made a voyage under the name, and at the risk of the new acquirer, except they have been sold by adjudication. 28

III. The sale of a ship in voyage, or under a private contract, shall not in any manner be prejudicial to the creditors of the seller.

IV. All ships shall be seized immediately after they are perfected, by the viewers or overseers of the trade or mystery of carpenters; who shall give an attestation of the burden of the ship, which shall be registered in the admiralty office.

V. To discover and regulate the burden and capacity of a ship, the hold shall be measured at the rate of two and forty foot cube for the sea ton.

VI. The officers of the admiralty shall be obliged under pain of interdiction of their offices, to take every year, in the month of December, an account of all the ships belonging to the inhabitants of their jurisdiction: which shall contain their burthen, age, quality and shape, with the names of the owners; all which they shall send to the secretary of state, who has the management of the marine affairs of that department. 29

27 The word which I here render “redemption,” is in the original “retrait lignier,” and implies a power inherent in an heir to revoke some grant, or redeem something mortgaged by his predecessors; to which sort of redemption ships are declared by this law not to be subject.
28 The design of making ships sold privately, liable for the debts of the last owner, until they have made a voyage at the risk, and under the name of the new acquirer, is only to prevent the sham sales of ships frequently made only to defraud the creditors of the seller; which certainly is a very just and commendable constitution.
29 The infraction in the last article upon the officers of the admiralty, to take a yearly account of the shipping belonging to the places of their residence, and others within the district of their courts, in order to send it to the proper secretary of state, is a very convincing proof of the regular and excellent methods observed by the French court for the improvement of navigation; which if (by the account brought in once a year) they find to decay in any place of the kingdom, diligent enquiry is made into the cause of this fact, and all manner of remedies by which the prosperity of their shipping has been obstructed, are carefully removed. Nor is this the only advantage attending their diligence and exactness in such matters; for, by those yearly lists, the French king knows, within the number of 100 men or less, how many mariners and seamen, foreigners as well as natives, there are within the extent of his dominions; and he likewise knows what number are abroad in long voyages, when they may reasonably be expected back again, and where they are to arrive, and consequently when and where they may be serviceable to him.
MARITIME CONTRACTS.

TITLE FIRST.

Of Charter Parties and Freighting of Ships.

I. All articles for freighting of ships shall be reduced into writing, and agreed to by the merchants that freight, and the master or owners of the ships freighted.

II. The master shall observe the orders of his owners, when he freights the ship at the place of their residence.\(^{30}\)

III. The charter party shall contain the name and burthen of the vessel, the names of the master and freighters, the place and time of the lading and unloading, the freight, the time the vessel is to stay at the respective ports, and the conventions about demurrage, to which the parties may add such other conditions as they please.

IV. The time of the lading and unloading the goods shall be regulated according to the custom of the respective ports, except it be determined by the charter party.

V. If a ship be freighted by the month, and the time of the freight be not regulated by the charter party, it shall only commence from the day that the ship shall sail.

VI. He who after having received a summons in writing to fulfill the contract refuses it, or delays it, shall make good all the loss and damage.

VII. But if before the departure of the ship, there should happen an embargo, occasioned by war, reprisals, or otherwise, with the country whither the ship is bound, the charter party shall be dissolved, without any damages or charges for either party, and the merchant shall pay the charges of lading and unloading his goods: but if the difference be with one another, the charter party shall be valid in all its points.

VIII. If the ports be only shut, and the vessel stopped by force for a time, the charter party shall remain, and the master and merchant shall be reciprocally obliged to expect the opening of the ports and the liberty of the ships, without any pretensions for damages on either side.

IX. However the merchant may at his own charge unload his goods during the embargo, or shutting up of the port, upon condition either to load them again, or indemnify the master.

X. The master shall be obliged, during the voyage, to have aboard the charter party, and the other necessary deeds concerning his lading.

XI. The ship, rigging and tackle, and the freight and goods laded, shall be respectively affected by the conventions of the charter party.

TITLE SECOND.

Of Bills of Loading.

I. All bills of loading for goods put aboard a ship, shall be signed by the master or the clerk of the ship.

\(^{30}\) Laws of the Hanse Towns, art. 58.

II. All bills of loading shall contain the quality, quantity, and mark of the goods, the names of the persons that lade them, and of those to whom they are consigned, the places of departure and unloading, the names of the master and the ship, and the value of the freight.

III. All bills of loading shall be triple, one shall remain in the hands of the lader; another shall be sent to the person to whom the goods are to be consigned, and the third shall be left in the hands of the master or clerk.

IV. The merchants shall be obliged within four and twenty hours after the goods are laded, to present the bills of loading to be signed by the masters, and to give them the acquittances and discharges for the customs of their goods, under pain of paying the damages of the retardment.

V. Factors and others, receiving goods expressed in bills of loading, or charter parties, shall be obliged to give a receipt thereof to the masters upon their demanding it, under pain of all expenses, damages and losses, and those of the retardment as well as others.

VI. In case of any diversity in bills of loading taken for the same goods, that which shall be in the hands of the master shall be authentic, if filled up by the merchant or his factor; and that which is in the hands of the merchant shall be good, if filled up by the captain.

TITLE THIRD.

Of Freight.

I. The freight of ships shall be regulated by the charter party or bill of lading, whether the ships be freighted in whole or in part, for the voyage, or by the month, expressing the burden by the ton, the quintal, by parts, or any other way.

II. If a vessel be hired, and the freighter does not put her full loading aboard, the master shall not take aboard any other goods without his consent nor without rendering him an account of the freight.

III. A merchant not loading the quantity of goods mentioned by the charter party, shall notwithstanding pay the freight as if he had done it; and if he loads any more, he shall pay freight for them.

IV. A master that declares his vessel to be of greater burden than she is, shall sustain the damages thereby happening to the merchant.

V. It shall not be reputed an error in the declaration of the ship's burden, if the difference does not exceed one fourth part.

VI. If the vessel be laded by parts, or by the quintal, or by the ton, a merchant being desirous to take out his goods before her departure, may do it at his own charge, paying half freight.

VII. A master may likewise unlade and lay down upon the shore any goods found in his ship, and put on board there without his knowledge, or take freight at the highest rate that any goods of that quality pay.

VIII. A merchant unloading his goods during a voyage, shall nevertheless pay the whole freight, except he be obliged to unload them by the deed of the master.

IX. If a ship is stopped in her course, or at the port of her unloading, by the deed of the merchant that freights her, or if she, after having been freighted outward and inward, is forced to return empty, the damages of the retardation, and the whole freight shall be, notwithstanding, due to the master.

X. The master shall be answerable for the damages of the freighter, if according to the judgment of intelligent persons, a vessel is stopped in her course, or at a port, by the deed of the master.

XI. If a master is obliged to cause his ship to be refitted during a voyage, the freighter shall be obliged either to wait or pay the whole freight; and if the ship cannot be rigged out, the master shall forthwith hire another; and if none can be found, he shall only be paid in proportion to the part he has performed on the voyage.

XII. However, if the merchant prove that when the ship put to sea she was unfit for sailing, the master shall lose his freight, and pay the other damages and losses.

XIII. The master shall be paid the freight of goods thrown overboard for the common safety, out of the contribution.

XIV. Freight shall likewise be due for goods that the merchant may have been forced to sell for victuals, refitting, and other pressing necessities, an account being kept by him of their value, according as the rest are sold at the place of unloading.

XV. If there happens an interdiction of commerce with any country to which a vessel is bound, and in her course, so that she returns with her loading, there shall only be due to the master the freight for going thither, even though the ship be freighted to go and come.

XVI. If a vessel, in the course of her voyage, be arrested by a supreme power, there shall be no freight due for the time of their detention, if freighted by the month; nor no augmentation, if freighted by the voyage; but the food and wages of the seamen, during the detention, shall be reputed average.

XVII. In case the person mentioned in any bill of loading refuse to accept the goods, the master, by the authority of the judges, may cause some to be sold for the payment of his freight, and deposit the rest in a warehouse.

XVIII. No freight shall be due for goods lost by shipwreck, or taken by pirates or enemies; and in that case, the master shall be obliged to restore what has been advanced to him, except there be some agreement to the contrary.

XIX. If the ship and goods be ransomed, the master shall be paid his freight to the place where they were taken; and he shall pay his whole freight if he conduct them to the place agreed to, he contributing towards the ransom.

XX. The contribution for the ransom shall be made according to the current price of the goods at the place of their unloading, deducting the charges, and upon the total of the ship and freight, deducting the victuals made use of, and the money advanced to the seamen; who shall likewise contribute towards the discharge of the freight, in proportion of what shall remain due to them of their wages.

XXI. The master shall likewise be paid the freight of goods saved from shipwreck, he conducting them to the place appointed.

XXII. If he cannot find a ship to carry thither the goods preserved, he shall only be paid his freight in proportion to what he has performed of the voyage.

XXIII. The master shall not detain the goods in his ship for default of the payment of his freight, but at the time of unloading, he may hinder them from being carried away, or cause them to be seized in the hoys or lighters.

XXIV. The master shall be preferred for his freight upon the goods of his lading, as long as they are in the ship, in lighters, or upon the quay; and he shall likewise be preferred wherever the goods may be, within fifteen days after the delivery, provided they are not passed into the possession of a third person.

XXV. Merchants may not oblige masters to take for their freight goods that are fallen in price, or that are spoiled or dammified by their own fault, or by accident.

XXVI. However, if goods contained in casks, such as wine, oil, honey, and other liquors, have leaked so much that the casks are empty, or almost empty, the merchants that laded them, may abandon them to the master for the freight.

XXVII. We forbid all brokers and others to cause, underhand, more freight to be paid for goods than is expressed in the first contract or charter party, under pain of one hundred livres, and a severer punishment if they deserve it.

XXVIII. However, the freighter of a whole ship that has not complemented her lading, may take in other goods to make it up, and apply the freight to his own use.

TITLE FOURTH.

Of the Contracts and Wages of Seamen.

I. All agreements between masters and their seamen, shall be reduced into a writing, which shall contain all the conditions, whether they engage themselves by the month, or for the voyage; whether by the profit or freight; if otherwise, the seamen's oath shall be believed.

II. The seamen shall not load any goods upon their own account, under pretence of portage, nor otherwise, without paying the freight, except it be mentioned in their agreement.

III. If by the fault of the owners, masters or merchants, a voyage be broke before the departure of the ship, the seamen hired for the voyage shall be paid for the time taken up in rigging and equipping the ship, and have one fourth of their wages; and those engaged by the month, shall be paid in proportion, regard being had to the ordinary length of the voyage: but if the voyage be broke after it is begun, the seamen hired for the voyage shall be paid their whole wages, and those hired by the month what is due to them for the time they have already served, and for that which will be necessary for returning to the place from whence the ship departed; and both shall be paid for their maintenance till they arrive there.

IV. In case of a prohibition of trade, with the place to which the ship is bound, before the voyage begins, there shall be no wages due to the seamen of either sort; who shall only be paid for the time spent in fitting out the ship: and if such prohibition happens during the voyage, they shall only be paid in proportion to the time they have served.

V. If the ship be stopped by a sovereign order before the voyage be begun, there shall be nothing due to the seamen, but their wages for fitting out the ship; but if it is during the course of the voyage, those engaged by the month shall have half wages during the detention of the ship, and those engaged by the voyage shall be paid according to their agreement.

VI. If the voyage be prolonged, the wages of the seamen hired by the voyage shall be augmented proportionally, and if they voluntarily unlade in a nearer port than that mentioned in the agreement, their wages notwithstanding shall not be diminished: but if they are hired by the month, they shall both in both cases paid for the time they serve.

VII. And as for the seamen and others going by the profit or freight, they shall not pretend any wages for equipping or damages, if the voyage be broken, retarded or prolonged by a superior power, whether before or after the departure of the ship; but if the breaking, retarding or prolonging of the voyage, happens by the fault of the freighters, the seamen shall have share in the costs and damages allowed the master, who, as well as the owners shall pay damages to the seamen, if they be the cause of the hindrance.

VIII. In case the ship be taken, or suffer shipwreck, and ship and goods be entirely lost, the seamen shall pretend to no wages; but they shall not however be obliged to restore what has been advanced to them.

IX. If some part of the ship be preserved, the seamen shall be paid the wages that are due to them out of the wreck they have preserved; and if there be only goods saved, the seamen, even those that are engaged by the freight, shall be paid their wages by the master proportionally to the freight he receives; and whatever way they be hired, they shall be over and above paid for the time they are employed in saving the wreck and goods.

X. If a master dismiss a mariner without a sufficient cause before the voyage is begun, he must pay him one third of his wages; and if after the voyage is begun, he shall pay him his whole wages, together with his charges for returning to the place of his departure; nor shall he state that to the account of his owners.

XI. If a seaman be wounded in the service of a ship, or fall sick during the voyage, he shall be paid his wages, and treated at the charge of the ship, and if he be wounded in fighting against enemies or pirates, he shall be cured at the charge of ship and cargo.

XII. But if being on shore without leave, he be there wounded, he shall not be dressed at the charge of the ship, nor of the loading; and he may be dismissed, without pretending to any more than the wages that are due to him.

XIII. The heirs of a seaman hired by the month, and dying in the voyage, shall be paid his wages until the day of his decease.

XIV. The half of the wages of a seaman hired by the voyage shall be due to his heirs if he dies outward bound, and the whole if he dies in the way home: and if he suited by the profit or freight, his heirs shall enjoy his full share, if the voyage be begun before his death.

XV. The wages of a seaman killed in defending the ship shall be entirely paid as if he had served all the voyage; provided the ship arrives safe at a good harbour.

XVI. Seamen taken in ships and made slaves, shall pretend nothing against the masters, owners, or merchants for their ransom.

XVII. But if any of them, being sent out for the service of the ship, be taken ashore, or at sea, his ransom shall be paid at the expenses of the ship; and if he was sent out for the service of ship and cargo, his ransom shall be paid by both, if they arrive happily at a good port: however the whole shall not exceed three hundred livres besides his wages.42

XVIII. The master, immediately after the arrival of the ship, shall take care to regulate the sums appointed for the ransom of captives, and the money shall be deposited in the hands of the principal owner, who shall be obliged forthwith to apply it to that use, under pain of four times the value to be paid by him, for the benefit of the seamen that are in servitude.

XIX. The ship and freight shall be specially liable for the seamen's wages.

XX. The seamen's wages shall not contribute towards any average, except it be for the ransom of the ship.

XXI. What is ordained in this title for the wages and ransom of the seamen, and dressing and treating of the sick, shall take place for the officers and all others belonging to the ship.

TITLE FIFTH.

Of Contracts of Bottomry, etc.42

I. All contracts of bottomry may be made either by a public notary, or under a private signature.

II. Money may be given upon the body and keel of the ship, and upon her rigging and tackle, munitions and provisions, jointly or separately, and upon all, or any part of her loading, for one whole voyage, or a time limited.

III. We forbid all persons to take up, upon their ships or goods on board thereof, more than their real value, under pain of being obliged in case of fraud, to pay the whole sums, notwithstanding the vessel should be lost or taken.

IV. We also forbid, under the like penalty, to take up any money upon the freight for the voyage to be made, or upon the profit expected on the lading, or even upon the seamen's wages; except it be in the presence and with the consent of the master, and under one half of the aforesaid wages.

V. We moreover forbid all persons to advance any money to seamen upon their wages and voyages in that manner, except it be in the presence and with the consent of the master, under pain of confiscations of the sums lent, and a fine of fifty livres.

VI. The masters shall be answerable in their names, for the total of the sums taken up by the seamen with their consent, except they exceed one half of their wages, and that notwithstanding the loss or taking of the ship.

VII. The ship, her rigging and tackle, munitions and provisions, and even the freight, shall be by privilege affected for the payment of the principal and interest of money given upon the body and keel of the ship, for the necessities of the voyage, and the lading.43

VIII. Such as give money upon bottomry to a master without the consent of the owners, if they live in the place, shall have no security nor privilege upon the ship, any further than the parts that the master may have in the ship and freight, though the money was borrowed for rigging the ship, or for buying provisions.44

IX. However, the parts of such of the owners as refuse to furnish their proportions for fitting out the vessel, shall be affected for the money lent to the master for the equipment and provisions of the ship.45

X. Creditors for money formerly due for such things, shall not come in competition with those that have actually lent for the last voyage.46

XI. All contracts of bottomry shall become void by the entire loss of the effects upon which the money was lent, if that happens by casualty, and within the times and places therein expressed.

XII. Nothing shall be reputed a casualty that is occasioned by the defects of the things themselves, or by the fault of the owners, master or merchants, except it be otherwise provided by the contract.

XIII. If the time of the risk be not regulated by the contract, it shall last as to the ship, her rigging, tackle and provisions, from the day she sets sail till she arrives at her intended port, and is moored at the quay; and as to the goods, it shall last from the moment they are laded on board the ship or lighter to be carried thither, till they be unladed and ashore.47

XIV. A person loading goods and taking up money upon them on bottomry, shall not be acquitted by the loss of the ship and lading, unless he makes it appear that he had there, upon his own account, effects to the value of the sum so borrowed.

XV. However, if the person that has taken money upon bottomry, makes it appear that he could not load goods to the value of the sum so borrowed, the contract, in case of loss, shall be diminished in proportion to the value of the effects loaded, and shall only subsist for the overplus; of which the borrower shall pay the interest, according to the current price of the place where the contract is made, till the actual payment of the principal: and if the ship arrives in safety, there shall be due only the interest, and not the maritime profit of the surplus of the effects put aboard.

XVI. Lenders of money on bottomry, shall contribute towards gross averages, such as redemptions, compositions, ejections, masts and ropes, cut for the common safety of ship and goods; but not for the simple averages, or particular damages that may happen, except there intervene some agreement to the contrary.

XVII. However, in case of shipwreck, the contracts of bottomry shall be reduced to the value of the effects that are saved.

XVIII. If there be a contract of bottomry, and insurance upon the same loading, the lender shall be preferred to the insurers upon the effects preserved from shipwreck, for his capital, and no further.48

TITLE SIXTH.

Of Insurances.

I. We allow all our subjects, as well as strangers, to insure, and cause to be insured, within the extent of our dominions, the ships, goods and effects, which shall be transported by sea or by navigable rivers; and we allow the insurers to stipulate a price, for which they will take the peril upon them.

II. The contract called “Policy of Insurance,” shall be reduced into writing, and may be done under private signature.

III. The policy shall contain the name and dwelling place of the insured, his quality, whether of owner or factor, the effects upon which insurance is made, the name of the ship and master, that of the place where the goods are loaded, and from whence the ship departs, and that whither the ship is bound, and where the goods are to be unloaded; and also the names of all the places where the ship is to touch, the time that the risk is to begin and end, the sums insured, the premium or cost of the insurance, the submission of the parties to arbitrators in case of contestation; and generally all other conditions which they shall stipulate between them.

IV. Goods loaded in Europe for the ports of the Levant, the coasts of Africa, and other parts of the world, may be insured upon any ship whatsoever, without naming either the master or the ship, provided the name of the person to whom they are consigned be expressed in the policy.

V. If the policy does not regulate the time of the risk, they shall be regulated as are the contracts of bottomry, by the thirteenth article of that fifth.49

VI. The premium, or cost of the insurance, shall be entirely paid at the signing of the policy; but if the insurance be made upon goods both out and home, and the vessel having arrived at the intended port do not return, the insurers shall restore one third of the premium, except there be a stipulation to the contrary.

VII. Insurances may be made upon the body and keel of the ship, empty or laden, before or during the voyage; upon the provisions and upon the goods, jointly or separately laden on board of any ship, armed or unarmed, alone or in company, for the going out or coming home, for a whole voyage, or for a time limited.

VIII. If the insurance be made upon the body and keel of the ship, her rigging, tackle, munitions and provisons, or upon any portion thereof, the estimation shall be made in the policy; allowing the insurer, in case of fraud, to oblige the concerned to proceed to a new estimation.

IX. All navigators, passengers, and others, may insure the liberty of their persons; and in that case the policies shall contain the name, country, residence, age and quality of the person that insures himself; the name of the ship, of the port from whence she sails, and that of her last departure; the sum to be paid in case of being taken, as well for the ransom as the charges of returning; to whom the money shall be paid, and under what penalty.

X. We forbid all insurances upon the lives of any person.

XI. However, such as redeem captives may insure the lives of those they redeem, and the price of the redemption; which the insurers shall be obliged to pay, if the person redeemed is taken again, or killed, or drowned in his return, or if he perish by any other means but by a natural death.

XII. Women, may lawfully engage themselves, and alienate their patrimonial estates, for the redemption of their husbands.

XIII. Any person, who, upon the wife's refusal, and by the authority of justice, lends money for the ransom of the husband shall be preferred to the wife upon the husband's estate, except for the restitution of her patrimony.

XIV. Minors may, likewise, with the advice of their relations, contract such obligations for ransom their fathers from captivity, without any possibility of revocation.

XV. The owners nor masters of ships shall not insure beforehand the freight of their ships; the merchants, the profit they expect by their goods; nor the seamen, their wages.

XVI. We forbid all persons borrowing money upon bottomry to insure it, under pain of the insurance being void, and corporal punishment.

XVII. We likewise forbid, under the same penalty, the lenders upon bottomry to insure the profit of the sums lent.

XVIII. The insured shall still run the hazard of the tenth part of the effects they lose, except there be a positive clause in the policy, declaring that they mean to insure the whole.

XIX. And if the insured be in the ship, or if they be the owners, they shall nevertheless run the risk of one tenth, though they declare that they mean to insure the whole.

49 See ante, p. 1210.

XX. The insurers may re-insure with others the effects they may have insured, and the insured may likewise cause to be insured the premium of the insurance, and the solvency of the insurers.

XXI. The premiums of the re-insurance may be smaller or greater than those of the insurance.

XXII. We forbid to cause to be insured, or re-insured, any effects beyond their value, by one or several policies, under pain of nullity of the insurance and confiscation of the goods.

XXIII. However, if there happens to be made without fraud, a policy exceeding the value of the effects laded, it shall subsist for the value of the goods: and in case of loss, the insurers shall be bound, every one for the sum by him insured, and likewise to restore the overplus of the premium, retaining only a half per cent.

XXIV. And if there happen to be several policies likewise made without fraud, and the first contains the value of the goods laded, it shall subsist alone, and the other insurers shall not be bound in the insurance, but shall render the premium, retaining only a half per cent.

XXV. In case the first policy does not amount to the value of the effects laded, the insurers of the second shall be answerable for the overplus; and if there be effects laded to the value of the insurance, in case of the loss of some part of them, it shall be paid by the insurers there mentioned at so much per 50 livre of the sums they are concerned in.

XXVI. All losses and damages happening at sea by tempest, shipwreck, running aground or aboard of other ships, changing of course of the voyage or course of the ship, detention, fire, taking, ridding, detention by princes' declarations of war, reprisals, and generally by all other maritime accidents, shall be at the risk of the insurers.

XXVII. However, if the changing of the course, voyage or ship, happens by the order of the insured, without the consent of the insurers, they shall be discharged from the risk; which shall likewise take place in all other losses and damages happening by the fault of the insured; nor shall the insurers be obliged to restore the premium, if the time of their bearing the risk be begun.

XXVIII. Nor shall the insurers be obliged to bear the losses and damages happening to ships and goods by the fault of the master and mariners, except that by the policy they be engaged for the bartrary of the master.

XXIX. The wages, diminutions, and losses, happening by the proper defects of the goods, shall not fall upon the insurers.

XXX. Nor shall they be concerned in the 50 The French, in making computations, reckon so much per livre, as we do per cent.

insured knew of the loss, or the insurer of the arrival of the ship, before the signing of the insurance.

XL. In case of proof against the insured, he shall be obliged to restore to the insurer what he has received, and pay him double the premium; and if there be proof against the insurer, he shall be likewise condemned to the restitution of the premium, and to pay the double to the insured.

XLI. When the insured receives advice of the loss of the ships or goods insured, of the detention thereof by any prince, and other accidents in which the insurers are concerned; he shall be obliged to cause it forthwith to be signified unto them, or to the person that has signed the policy for them, with protestation to make his abandonment in time of place.

XLII. However, the insured, instead of protestation, may at the same time make his abandonment, and summons the insurers to pay the sums insured, within the time specified in the policy.

XLIII. If the time of payment be not specified in the policy, the insurers shall be obliged to pay the insurance within three months after the signification.

XLIV. In case of shipwreck, or running aground, the insured may endeavour to recover the shipwrecked effects, without prejudice of the abandonment, which he may make in time and place; and of the reimbursement of his charges, as to which his affirmation shall be believed, to the value of the effects preserved.

XLV. An abandonment shall not be made but in case of being taken, wrecked, run aground, stopped by a prince, or the entire loss of the goods insured; and all other damages shall only be reputed average, and shall be regulated between the insurers and insured, in proportion to their concerns.

XLVI. No person can make an abandonment of part, retaining the other; nor any demand for average, except it exceed one per cent.

XLVII. Abandonments, and all demands for the execution of a policy, shall be made to the insurers within six weeks after the news of losses happened upon the coasts of the same province where the insurance is made; and for those that happen in another province of our kingdom, within three months; upon the coasts of England, Flanders and Holland, four months; upon those of Spain, Italy, Portugal, Barbary, Muscovy and Norway, one year; and upon the coasts of America, Brazil, Guinea, and other remote countries, two years; and that time being expired, the insurers shall not be heard in their demands.

XLVIII. In case of a ship's being detained by any prince, the abandonment shall not be made until six months afterwards, if the ship be stopped in Europe or Barbary; and a year in remoter countries; reckoning from the day that was signified to the insurers: and in that case, the exception against the insurers mentioned in the precedent article, shall only commence from the day that they may have begun to act therein.

L. However, if the goods so stopped be perishable, the abandonment may be made after six weeks, if they be stopped in Europe or Barbary; and after three months, if in a remoter country; counting from the day that the stoppage was signified to the insurers.

LI. The insured shall be obliged during these delays to use their utmost endeavours to get the arrest taken off the effects that are detained; and the insurers may do it themselves, if they please.

LII. If a vessel be detained by our order, in any port of our kingdom, before the voyage be begun; the insured may not, because of that arrest, abandon his effects to the insurer.

LIII. The insured shall be obliged, in making his abandonment, to declare all the information that he has caused to be made, and the money taken on bottomy upon the effects insured; under pain of being deprived of the benefit of the insurances.

LIV. If the insured conceals any insurances or contracts of bottomy, which, with these he declares, exceed the value of the effects insured, he shall be deprived of the benefit of the insurances, and obliged to pay the sums borrowed, notwithstanding the loss or taking of the vessel.

LV. And if he sues for payment of the sums insured beyond the value of his effects, he shall further be punished exemplarily.

LVI. The insurers of the loading shall not be obliged to pay the sums by them insured, beyond the value of the effects of which the insured proves the loading and the loss.

LVII. The evidences \(^{51}\) of the loading, and loss of the effects insured, shall be signified to the insurers immediately after the abandonment, and before they be sued for payment of the sums insured.

LVIII. However if the insured receives no news of his ship, he may, after the expiration of one year (reckoning from the day of departure) for the ordinary voyages, and after two years for long voyages, make his abandonment to the insurers, and demand payment, without any necessity of an attestation for certifying the loss.

LIX. Voyages from France into Muscovy, Greenland, Canada, Newfoundland, and other coasts and islands of America, to the Green Cape and coasts of Guinea, and all other places beyond the tropic, shall be reputed long voyages.

LX. After the abandonment is declared, the effects insured shall belong to the insurer; who must not, under pretence of the returning of the vessel, delay to pay the sums insured.

LXI. The insurer may bring what proofs he can against the validity of the attestations; but shall nevertheless be condemned by provisions to pay the sums insured; security being given him by those to whom he pays them.

LXII. A master causing goods loaded on board his own ship for his own account to be insured, shall be obliged, in case of the loss thereof, to prove the buying of them, and produce a bill of loading signed by the clerk and the pilot.

LXIII. All mariners and others, who shall bring goods from foreign countries upon which they have caused insurance to be made in France, shall be obliged to leave a bill of lading in the hands of the French consul or his chancellor, if there be any in the place where the goods are loaded; and if otherwise, in the hands of some eminent merchant of the French nation.

LXIV. The value of the goods shall be proved by books or invoices; if otherwise, the estimation thereof shall be made according to the current price at the place and time that they were loaded: included all duties and charges in getting them abroad; except the value be expressed in the policy.

LXV. If insurance be made upon returns from a country where traders only carry on by barter, the returns shall be made according to the value of the goods given in exchange for them, including the charges of their transportation.

LXVI. In case of capture the insured may redeem their effects without the order of the insurers, if they cannot give them advice thereof; but they must afterwards inform them by writing of the composition they have made.

LXVII. The insurers may take the composition for their benefit, in proportion to their concerns; and in that case they shall be obliged forthwith to make their declaration, to contribute actually towards the payment of the ransom, and to run the hazard of the return; or otherwise to pay the sums by them insured, without having any pretensions upon the ransomed effects.

LXVIII. We forbid all makers of policies, clerks of the chambers of insurance, notaries, brokers and others, to cause to be signed any policies where any blank is left, under pain of all damages and charges; and likewise to draw up any in which they themselves are concerned directly or indirectly by themselves, or by persons interposed; or to take any cession of right from the insured, under pain of five hundred livres for the first time, and deprivation of their employments in case of a relapse; which penalties shall not be in any manner moderated.

LXIX. We likewise enjoin them under the like penalties, to have a register quoted and flourished on every leaf by the lieutenant of the admiralty, and therein to record the policies they draw up.

LXX. When the policy contains a submission to arbitration, and one of the parties desire to go before the arbitrators before any contest happens, the other party shall be obliged to consent; or if otherwise, the judge shall name for the refuser.

LXXI. Within eight days after the nomination of the arbitrators, the parties shall deliver the deeds and writing into their hands; and within the eight days following, they shall pronounce sentence thereupon.

LXXII. The decisions of arbitrators shall be confirmed in the court of admiralty, within the jurisdiction of which they are pronounced: and we forbid the judge, under that pretence, to take any knowledge of the cause, under pain of nullity, and all the charges, costs and damages of the parties.

LXXIII. Appeals from decisions by arbitrators' sentences and confirmations, shall be carried before our courts of parliament, and shall not be received until the penalty expressed in the clause of submission be paid.

LXXIV. The sentences of arbitrators may be executed, notwithstanding the appeals; security being given before the judges who confirm them.

TITLE SEVENTH.

OF AVERAGES.\(^{52}\)

I. All extraordinary charges for the ships and their lading jointly or separately, and all damages which shall befal them from the time of their loading and departure, till their arrival and unloading, shall be reputed average.

II. The extraordinary charges for the ship alone, or for the goods alone, and the damage befailing either in particular, shall be simple and particular averages, and the extraordinary charges paid, and damages suffered for the common good and safety of ship and goods, shall be gross and common averages.

III. The simple averages shall be borne and paid by the owner of the thing that suffers the damages, or occasions the charge; but the gross or common averages shall fall upon the ship and goods at so much per livre, in proportion to their value.

IV. The loss of cables, anchors, sails, masts, and ropes, occasioned by tempest or any maritime accident, and damage, happening to the ship by the fault of the master or company, by neglecting to shut close the hatches, moor the ship, providing good tackle and ropes, or otherwise are simple averages, and shall be borne by the master, ship and freight.\(^{53}\)

V. Damages happening to goods by their own defects, tempest, being taken, shipwrecked, or run aground; the charges paid for preserving them, and the duties, impositions, and customs, are likewise simple averages, at the cost of their owners.

VI. Things given by composition to pirates, for ransom of the ship and loading; those that are cast into the sea, masts or cables broke or cut, anchors and other effects abandone for the common safety, damage done to goods remaining in the ship by throwing over others; the dressing and treating seamen wounded in the defence of the ship, and the charges of lightening to enter into a port or river, or to get a ship afloat, shall be gross or common averages.

VII. The maintenance and hire of the seamen of a ship detained by a sovereign prince's order, shall likewise be reputed gross averages, if the ship be hired by the month; but if by the voyage, they shall be borne by the ship only, as simple averages.

VIII. The lodemange, towage, and pilotage for entering into, or going out of a river are petty averages, one third to be paid by the ship, and the other two by the goods. 64

IX. The dues for the passport, search, declaration, anchorage, buoys, and sea marks, shall not be reputed averages, but shall be paid by the master.

X. In case of ships running aboard each other, the damage shall be equally sustained by those that have suffered and done it, whether during the course, in a road, or in a harbour. 65

XI. But if the damage be occasioned by either of the masters, it shall be repaired by him. 66

TITLE EIGHTH.

Of Ejections and Contributions.

I. If by tempest, or being chased by enemies or pirates, the master believes himself obliged to throw overboard part of his lading, to cut off his own forces, or leave his anchors; he must take the advice of the merchants, and principal men of the ship's company. 67

II. If they differ in their opinions, that of the master and ship's company shall prevail.

III. The utenails of the ship, and other things that are least necessary, heaviest, and of least value, shall be thrown overboard first, and afterwards the goods between decks: however, all must be done by the order of the captain, with the advice of the ship's company.

IV. The clerk, or such other person as performs his function, shall insert the deliberation in his book, as soon as possible; and shall cause it to be signed by those that voted, or otherwise shall mention the reason why they did not sign; and shall take as exact an account as he can of the goods thrown overboard or damaged.

V. At the first port where the ship touches, the master shall declare before the judge of the admiralty, if any be; and if none, before the ordinary judge, the reason of the ejection, or the cutting or forcing of his mast, or leaving of his anchors, and if it is in a foreign country he arrives, he shall make that declaration before the French consul.

VI. The master shall take care to make the account of the losses and damages, at the place where the ship is unloaded; and the goods cast away, and those that are preserved, shall be esteemed according to the current price thereof, at the said place. 68

VII. The reparation for the payment of losses and damages, shall be made upon the goods lost and preserved, and upon the half of the ship and freight, at so much per livre, according to their value. 69

VIII. The better to judge of the quality of effects thrown overboard, the bills of loading and invoices, if there be any, shall be produced.

IX. If the quality of goods be misrepresented by bills of loading, and they be found to be of greater value than they were said to be by the merchant that laded them, they shall contribute, if saved, in proportion to their real value; but if lost, shall only be paid according to the bills of loading.

X. And if on the other hand, the goods are found to be of a meaner quality, and be preserved, they shall notwithstanding contribute according to the declaration: and if they be cast away or damaged, they shall only be paid according to their value.

XI. The munitions and provisions, and seamen's clothes and wages, shall not contribute towards the ejection; but such things as are cast away shall be paid by contribution, out of the other effects.

XII. Effects for which there is no bill of loading, shall not be paid, though thrown overboard; but if they are saved, they shall nevertheless contribute. 70

XIII. There shall no contribution be demanded for payments of such effects as were upon the deck, if they be thrown overboard, or damaged by the ejection; allowing the owner his recourse against the master: however, if they are preserved they shall contribute.

XIV. Nor shall any contribution be made, for damage befallen the ship, except it be done of purpose to facilitate the ejection.

XV. If the ejection does not save the ship, there shall be no contribution; and the goods that are saved from shipwreck, shall not be in any measure liable to pay the loss or damage of those that have been thrown away or spoiled.

XVI. But if the ship being once preserved by the ejection, continuing her course, comes afterwards to be lost, the effects that are preserved, shall contribute towards the ejection, according to their value, in the condition they shall be in, charges being first deduced.

XVII. The effects cast away shall not contribute in any case, towards the payment of damages, happening after the ejection, to the goods that are preserved; nor the goods to the payment of the ship, if lost or broken.

XVIII. However, if the ship be opened by the determination of the chief men of the company, and of the merchant, if any be, to take out the goods; they shall in that case contribute for the reparation of the damage done to the ship, to take them out.

XIX. In case of the loss of goods put aboard of any bark for lightening of a ship entering into any river, reparation shall be made by the whole ship and loading.

XX. But if the vessel perish, with the rest of its loading, no reparation shall be made by goods put out into barges, though they arrive safe at their port.

XXI. If the owners of any goods that ought to contribute, refuse to pay their proportion, the master may, for the security of the contribution, retain, or by the authority of justice, may sell goods, to the value of their said proportions. 61

XXII. If after the reparation, the effects thrown overboard be recovered by the owners, they shall be obliged to restore to the master, and the others concerned, what they have received of the contribution, deducting for the damage caused to their goods by the ejection, and for the charges of recovering them.

JIMENO INDEX.

As to the importance of the registry of a grant in the Jimeno Index, the United States court in the case of the United States v. West's Heirs, in 22 Howard [63 U. S. 315], say:

"We do not regard the catalogue of grants as authoritative proof of grants enumerated in it, or as a conclusive exclusion of grants not so registered by Jimeno, which may be alleged to have been made whilst California was a part of the Mexican republic, though they may bear date within the time to which that index relates, but in this case it may be referred to as an auxiliary memorandum made by Jimeno himself of his action upon the petition of West."

No grant presented to the commission seems to correspond to the following numbers:

Grants appearing to be in Lower California—Nos. 482, 489, 490, 492, 497, 498, 500, 502, 555, 556, 557, 564.

The above grants, in Upper California, are supposed not to have been presented to the commission, but by a more diligent search some of the above numbers might be found to correspond to the grants presented.
GASPAR DE PORTALÁ, FROM 1767 TO 1771.

It was under Portalá that the Reverend Father Junípero Serra founded the first missions of Upper California. Father José Miguel Serra was born on the twenty-fourth of November, 1713, on the island of Majorca. At sixteen he entered the Convent of Jesus, in Palma, the capital of the island. On the fifth of September, 1731, he was admitted to holy orders under the name of Father Junípero. On the thirteenth of April, 1749, he sailed from the island with his bosom friend and biographer, Father Francisco Palou, for Mexico. They left Cadiz on the twenty-eighth of August, reached Vera Cruz on the sixteenth of December, and, traveling on foot, Father Junípero arrived at Mexico on the first of January, 1750. From thence he was sent on the Sierra Gorda, among the Pima Indians, where he remained nine years; from thence he traveled over Mexico, preaching the gospel, until the middle of 1757.

The decree of Carlos III, expelling the Jesuits from his dominions, was put in force on the twenty-fifth of June, 1761. As to Lower California, the Viceroy, Marquis de Croix, placed its execution in the hands of the Catalan captain of dragoons, Gaspar de Portalá, appointing him at the same time governor of the Peninsula, and placing under his command fifty well armed men to expel the Jesuits from the missions by force, if necessary.

Portalá embarked in Matanchel with his forces, and fourteen Franciscan monks to succeed the Jesuits. Being prevented by a storm from reaching Loreto, in Lower California, and ordered by the Viceroy, he landed at San Bernabé towards the latter part of 1767. From San Bernabé, Portalá went to Loreto with twenty-five soldiers and the captain of the Peninsula. In his conversation with the captain, he discovered that no force would be required to expel the sixteen Jesuits. When he reached Loreto, he sent for Father Bonito Ducres, missionary of Guadalupe and superior of the missions. He communicated his decree to Father Serra and two other Jesuits. He found that the captain was right, as the Jesuits respectfully submitted to the order, and left California on the third of February, 1768, on the Concepción, bound for San Blas.

After the expulsion of the Jesuits, the viceroy, with the consent of the inspector general of the kingdom, Don José de Galvez, decided to place the missions of Lower California under the care of the college of San Fernando, in Mexico. For that purpose they required twelve priests of the college, and Father Junípero was appointed president of these missionaries. On the fourteenth of July, 1767, they left Mexico for San Blas. On the twenty-first of August they reached Tepic, where four other priests were taken. Whilst they were awaiting there the construction of the vessels which were to carry them, the Concepción arrived at San Blas with the Jesuits, and they sailed on that vessel on the twelfth of March, 1768. They arrived at Loreto on the first of April; the next day each one went to the mission assigned him, Father Junípero taking care of the mission of Loreto.

Galvez having been invested with powers to visit the missions of Lower California, and having a royal order to send an expedition by sea to settle the port of Monterey, in Upper California, or at least that of San Diego, he sailed from San Blas on the twenty-fourth of May, 1768, and reached the Peninsula on the sixth of June.

In order to better carry out the intentions of his majesty, Galvez made up his mind that, besides the expedition by sea, he would send another by land. He communicated this idea to Father Junípero, who agreed with him. They decided that three vessels should sail to meet the expedition by land at San Diego; that three missionaries should proceed on the first vessel, and another on the vessel to start subsequently. They agreed that three missions should be founded: one at San Diego, another at Monterey, and a third at San Buenaventura, midway between the two first.

On the ninth of January, 1769, the San Carlos left La Paz with the members of the expedition, among whom was Pedro Fajes, who became governor of Upper California, in 1782, and had under his command twenty-five Catalan volunteers. The San Antonio left San Lucas on the eleventh, and the San José left Loreto on the sixteenth of June of the same year.

Galvez divided the expedition by land in two parts. Portalá was appointed commander-in-chief of the expedition to California, Captain Fernando Rivera y Moncada, his second in command, was to take charge of the first division.

The first division arrived at San Diego on the fourteenth of May, 1769, after fifty-two days travel from Loreto. The second division, under the charge of Portalá, with whom was Father Junípero, arrived on the first of July, after forty-six days travel. They found in port the San Antonio, which had arrived on the eleventh of April, and the San Carlos, which reached San Diego twenty days after. The Señor San José not having been heard from, it was presumed that it was wrecked.

On account of the loss of life among the crews of the vessels, it was agreed that the expedition by sea should join the one by land, and the San Antonio was ordered to San Blas for additional crew and more supplies for the two vessels. The San Carlos remained at anchor to await the arrival of the San Antonio, when both were to sail for Monterey.

On the sixteenth of July, 1769, Father Junípero founded the Mission of San Diego, at the port of that name, which in 1602 had been discovered by Admiral Sebastián Vizcaíno, who in the same year discovered the port of Monterey. Portalá, Fajes, Medina, and others left San Diego by land on the fourteenth of July, 1769, to seek out the port of Monterey; they, however, returned on the twenty-fourth of January, 1770, after having gone as far north as San Francisco without finding the above named port. The San Antonio left San Blas direct for Monterey. Fortunately, the loss of her anchor in the neighborhood of Santa Barbara compelled her to put back for San Diego to get an anchor from the San Carlos, being laden with supplies and having an additional crew, it was resolved that a new expedition, by land and sea, should start for Monterey. Father Junipero sailed on the San Antonio on the sixteenth of April, 1770, and Portali started by land the next day. The San Antonio reached Monterey on the thirty-first of May, 1770. The expedition by land had already arrived there on the twenty-fourth. On the third of June, the ceremony of taking possession of the port was performed, and on that day the Mission of San Carlos was founded. The dates of the foundation of the Indian Missions of the California in the annexed table of land claims presented to the land commission.

Gathering the foregoing facts from the life of Father Junipero by Father Francisco Palou, where they are related with such plausibility, we involuntarily feel a desire to pay a just tribute to the good works which was the object to Christianize the Indians of the Californias. It was neither gold nor honors which drew to encourage the dangers and hardships we find described in those interesting pages, and which breathe the true fervor of the servant of God; but they were true apostles, devoutly devoting their evangelical lives in teaching the simple doctrines of their faith, and the trades and occupations of civilized communities.

Father Junipero, on the twentieth of August, 1769, at San Diego, one month after the founding of the mission, Father Junipero and his party were attacked by a large number of Indians, and they were driven away only after the loss of a boy. A few days after the attack, the Indians appearing to be more friendly, Father Junipero attempted to baptize a child for the first time. Whilst completing the ceremony by pouring water on the child out of a shell, the Indians snatched away the child, leaving the confused father with the shell in his hands. It required all his prudence to prevent the soldiers from avenging the insult. The grief experienced by the father was so great that he could not get over it for several days, and he attributed his ill success to his own sins. Many years after, whilstitating in his companionship, his eyes would be filled with tears, but as he could then count 1046 christianized Indians in that mission, he would exclaim: "But let us thank God, that without the least opposition, we have accomplished so much."

On the fourth of November, 1775, the Indians again attacked that mission, reduced it to ashes, cruelly massacred Father Luis Jaime, and killed several other persons. In August, 1781, the Yankees set fire to the two missions on the Colorado river, killed four priests, eight soldiers and Captain Fernando Rivera y Moncada. These were some of the dangers encountered by these devout men; but nothing can better show the meekness and humility of Father Junipero than the following anecdote told us by Father Palou. After landing, in December, 1749, in Vera Cruz, he traveled on foot to Mexico; the journey caused his feet to swell considerably. One night, in his sleep, he scratched one of them to such an extent, that when he awoke he had made such a severe wound that he had not got over it through life. Immediately preceding Galvez's arrival, and to meet him, he had walked nine hundred miles, and as in all his travels he never wore either socks, boots or shoes but simply sandals; one evening when he arrived at San Juan de Dios, in Lower California, on his way to San Diego, his wound became such that he could not go any further. Portali, seeing his condition, ordered him to lie down and he called to him Juan Antonio Coronel, the arriero. "My son," said he, "could you not prepare something to relieve my foot and leg?" "Why, father," answered Coronel, "what then I know, am I a doctor? I am only an arriero, and all that I have cured are the wounds of beasts." "Well, which, he said, and after, "only consider that I am a beast, and that this wound is nothing but a beast's wound, which has caused the swelling of the leg and those pains which even keep me from sleeping, and prepare me the same thing you would apply to a beast." The arriero smiling, with all the assistants, said, "I will do it for you." He took some tallow and gathered a few herbs; he crushed and mixed them well with two stones, and after applying the mixture he applied it. With the help of God, as Father Junipero writes to Father Palou when he arrived at San Diego, he was not long in getting well. He was so relieved that he said his morning prayers as customary, and celebrated mass as if nothing had happened, and the expedition kept on without losing an instant.

In July, 1784, Father Palou, who was then in San Francisco, having received a letter from Father Junipero requesting his presence in Monterey, he reached that place on the eighteenth of August, and found Father Junipero afflicted with the disease which he had received in his Christian career. On the twenty-eighth, a little before ten in the evening, Father Junipero, in his room, was still able to walk to the boards covered with a blanket, on which he reclined, passing the holy cross near by, so softly did his soul depart that his faithfui companion did not know he had passed away; Father Junipero was in his seventy-first year when he died. In the fifteen years of his life in Upper California, five Spanish and nine christianized Indian families had been made, and 5,800 Indians had been baptized.

The following particulars are drawn from the Spanish archives of the state of California: On the twelfth of November, 1770, the Viceroy Marquis de Ochoa writes to Pedro Fajes, commander of the presidio at Monterey, directing him to make a settlement at the port of San Francisco.

FELIPE BARRI, FROM 1771 TO 1774.

The first mention we find of Barri as governor is in a letter he addresses in that capacity from Loreto to Pedro Fajes, commander of the presidio of Monterey, dated the second of June, 1771. On the seventh of September, 1773, Pedro Fajes was succeeded in the command of the presidio of San Diego and Monterey by Fernando Rivera y Moncada, under an order of the Viceroy Bucarely.

FELIPE DE NEVE, FROM 1774 TO 1782.

On the twenty-eighth of December, 1774, Governor Barri is succeeded by F. de Neve. On the twentieth of July, 1776, Governor Neve is ordered by the Viceroy to remove from Loreto to the presidio of Monterey; he arrived there on the third of February, 1777. Moncada is then transferred as lieutenant of Loreto, or at whatever place the presidial might be located.

THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURT REPORTS.

ABBOTT’S ADMIRALTIES REPORTS.
[Abb. Adm.]

Vol. 1 (so entitled, though no other volume was ever published) contains the following preface:

The present volume contains a full selection of the decisions in admiralty causes rendered in the United States district court for the Southern district of New York, by the Hon. Samuel R. Betts, from the early part of the year 1847 down to the close of 1850. It may be regarded as a continuation of the series of Admiralty Reports commenced by Blatchford & Howland, and continued by Olcott. The present editors have spared no pains in the effort to perform the duty which has devolved upon them; and they have enjoyed every facility which could be desired, both from the eminent judge whose decisions are reported, and from those gentlemen in whose immediate charge are the books and papers of the district court. In the hope that it may be of service, not only to their professional brethren practicing in this district, but also to those who may labor in other fields of professional life, the volume is now submitted to the bar.

ABBOTT’S UNITED STATES REPORTS.
[Abb. U. S.]
Reports of decisions rendered in the circuit and district courts from 1855 to 1871. Selected from all the circuits and districts by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott. Two volumes. New York: Dissing & Co. Vol. 1, 1870; vol. 2, 1871.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

To present the adjudications of the United States circuit and district courts, in a comprehensive and satisfactory manner, is the general purpose of this series. The progress of our national jurisprudence is embodied in the laws passed by congress, the decisions of the supreme court, and those decisions of circuit or district courts which are not reviewed on writ or error or appeal; in addition to which should be mentioned the determinations of the court of claims, as covering one important, though limited, department. Systematic and satisfactory arrangements now exist (relying partly upon government aid) for the prompt publication of the acts of congress, and for regular reports of the adjudications of the supreme court and of the court of claims. If the system of reporting the important decisions of the circuit and district courts can be made comprehensive and reliable, there will then be in operation a complete scheme, presenting the progress of the entire jurisprudence developed under the operation of the national government. To some extent the decisions of the circuit and district courts are now reported. There is, for the first circuit, a special series of circuit court reports, almost unbroken; and for the second, another, nearly, though not quite, as continuous. In some other circuits there are valuable reports covering limited periods. But there remain some circuits which are almost wholly unreported, and, as respects the district courts, there has been nothing like a systematic method of selecting and reporting what is valuable in their decisions. So far as it is practicable for reports within a particular circuit to be maintained, the cases which they may include ought not to be duplicated in these volumes; but the endeavor of this series will be to collect from the circuit and district courts at large, wherever local reports are not supported, those decisions which have general value and importance, and to report them in the best and most satisfactory manner, to the end that the current volumes of the Supreme Court Reports and of this series may give, from time to time, a good view of the course of decision in the national court. In the selection of cases to be reported in these volumes, must be chiefly controlled by the consideration of their value and utility to the practicing lawyer. There is a tendency towards the unnecessary multiplication of reports, to which, it is hoped, this enterprise will not be found to yield. The volumes will be devoted to decisions of general application and value, exhibiting the advance and progress of the national jurisprudence, the construction and application of the United States laws, the procedure of the United States tribunals, and similar subjects; and, as far as practicable, cases of local application, decisions which only resolve controverted questions of fact peculiar to the particular controversy, or repeat and apply familiar principles of law, together with decisions which there is reason to anticipate will be carried before the supreme court for review, or will be reasonably reported in standard reports to which the bar would naturally turn for them, will be excluded.

BALDWIN’S REPORTS.
[Baldw.]
Reports of cases determined in the circuit court, Third circuit, from 1827 to 1833, by Hon. Henry Baldwin, circuit justice, one of

The following dedication to Judge Hopkinson will be found on page iii:

I should do great injustice to my feelings, in submitting this volume to the profession, without testifying to them my sense of obligation to you, who have contributed so much to make its contents worthy of their approbation, not only by the opinions delivered by your self, but in others, in which it has been left to me to give the result of our mutual labor and concurring judgment. When we became associated in our judicial duties, we had an arduous task before us, the high character of the bar of the circuit court, and the nature of the causes depending therein, were too ureselves just cause for apprehension; but there was still greater reason to be appalled, when we consider the reputation which that court has acquired, and the difficulty which was for thirty years under the administration of that eminent and most beloved judge who preceded me. The highest praise which we can bestow on any mind, is to say that it possesses the large fund of legal information, acquired during a long and active course of professional experience, in the development and application of the great principles of federal and state jurisprudence. If any more imperious call could be made on any one, it was on me to exert every faculty in a way more appropriate to my major in years and practice; by a patient and laborious examination of the adjudged cases, and the analogies of the law, to so apply the test of precedents to principles, that while we followed the former, the latter should not be violated. If this volume does not suffice to show that we have obeyed those rules by the execution of every talent at our command, and the just expectations of the public have been disappointed, we must submit to their opinion; having done our best, we are spared the pain of self-reproach. But if we have in some degree adjudicated the cases before us as to have given reasonable satisfaction, or measurably preserved the character of the court, it has been by a singleness of object, its steady pursuit, and a uniformity of opinion in several judgment on the points adjudged, as well as in the illustrations and analogies on which our decisions were founded. It has been to me a subject of pride and pleasure, that the cases, in which we have been unable to agree in opinion, are fewer in number than the years of our judicial association; that when they have occurred it has been a subject of mutual regret, and each has been desirous of yielding to the other. When we were colleagues in another department of the government, we came in collision with less regret, owing perhaps to one stimulus, which neither of us now feel, or suffer to have any influence on our minds. The pride of victory is a strong incentive in political debate, in which none can engage without feeling the impulse; but however it may have operated on us during a discussion, it ended with it, and we always parted with the same mutual sentiment as we have since done after a judicial conference, when each felt compelled to adhere to his opinion, more diffidence of himself, and respect for the other. While these relations between us, others will be aware of the reasons why I dedicate this book to you.

BANNING AND ARDEN'S PATENT CASES. [Ban. & A.]

The following preface is from vol. 1:

These Reports will contain the decisions of the circuit courts of the United States in patent cases, from January 1, 1874, the date to which such decisions are reported in Fisher's Patent Cases. When the cases are reported to date, volumes will thereafter be published, whenever a sufficient number of opinions can be collected and prepared. After careful consideration, and upon the advice of some of the judges, we have omitted, except in a few cases, the insertion of preliminary statements and diagrams. The opinions, in almost all cases, fully explain the nature of the questions and the mechanical features of the inventions involved in the controversies. We are under great obligation to Judge Batchford, who has permitted us to insert those cases, decided in the Second circuit, which appear in Batchford's Circuit Court Reports, as herein reported by him. Judge Sawyer has accorded us like permission to use the cases decided in the Ninth circuit, which are reported in Sawyer's Reports, and for which we are indebted to him.

BEE'S ADMIRALTIES REPORTS. [Bee.]

The following preface will be found on page i:

These decisions are published at the suggestion of many members of the Charleston bar, and in the hope that they may afford some aid to the profession in general, and some direction to merchants, captains of ships, and others whose interests constitute the chief subject of them. It is presumed they have been in most instances, satisfactory, for in every case of appeal, except one, they have been confirmed. It was the intention and wish of the judge to revise them before publication; but he was prevented from doing so by a very long and serious illness. The candour of the profession will make due allowance for this very material circumstance. Judge Davis's decision in the district court of Massachusetts is here republished, not only on account of its intrinsic excellence, but because it gives weight to a significant decision by Judge Bee; the circuit court of Pennsylvania having given a different determination, it is desirable that the question should be finally settled by the supreme judiciary of the United States.
BENEDICT'S DISTRICT COURT REPORTS.

[Ben.]

The following note is from vol. 10, p. iii:

The cases reported in this volume are selected from the many in which opinions were handed down in the district courts of the United States within the Second circuit, between July, 1876, and January, 1880, when the publication of the Federal Reporter began. The field of these Reports is so nearly covered by the Reporter that it seems at present unadvisable to follow them. The author begs to return thanks to the members of the profession generally, and to the admiralty bar in particular, for the favors shown to the work in its previous volumes, and to announce that the present and 10th volume closes the series of Benedict's Reports.

BISSELL'S REPORTS.

[Biss.]

Cases in the circuit and district courts for the Seventh circuit from 1881 to 1883, by Josiah H. Bisell, of the Chicago bar. Ellsworth, 1884. Vols. 1 and 2 appeared in 1873, and the others at intervals until 1883, when vol. 11 was published.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

This volume, the work of the early and late hours of a practicing lawyer, is the first of a series of Reports designed to include the leading decisions of the United States circuit and district courts for the Seventh judicial circuit since the time of McClean's Reports, and to form with them a continuous and harmonious series. The opinions after passing through the reporter's hands have been revised by the respective judges. Not originally designed for publication, and in many cases laid aside as soon as the interest of a nisi prius case had passed away, the difficulties of properly preparing them and the necessary statements of facts have been greater than any one could have expected—far greater than the reporter imagined when he undertook this task. Yet the reporters of the state courts are furnished with printed records, statements of facts and briefs, and opinions prepared with reference to publication—an advantage which no one can appreciate until he has collated loose manuscript, slips of newspapers, old law periodicals, resurrected briefs and memoranda, and dusty court files. Where facts and figures have slipped from the memory of court, counsel, and litigants, it is extremely difficult to present these principles in a manner satisfactory to the profession or author; nor is it possible to do full justice to the judges whose opinions are thus presented to the public. That since the death of the late Judge MeLean, whose valuable series of reports bears his name, there should have been no regular reports of the decisions in this circuit, comprising three large and rapidly growing states, before whose tribunals are continually arising cases involving important questions and large commercial and landed interests, has long been a surprise and regret to the members of the profession. Encouraged by many of his professional brethren to collect and arrange these decisions, the reporter only hopes that if some of the cases may appear incomplete, they will remember the circumstances under which this series has been written and prepared. A number of cases have been published to the supreme court, as will appear by the notes added thereto; but the opinions below are published here, either as containing a fuller discussion of the principles involved, or because the case was decided in the upper court on some point of practice, or question not considered below. In some cases where the decision below is affirmed without discussion of principles or authorities, the opinion of the circuit or district judge acquires, so to speak, the authority of a supreme court decision. By no means all the opinions which have come to the hands of the reporter are published in this series. During the period covered by the present volume, many questions of great interest and importance at the time have become dead issues, and the value of many decisions as contributions to the permanent body of judicial decision has passed away. Many able, elaborate, and well reasoned discussions on questions connected with the fugitive slave law, special state statutes, and the varied and exciting questions arising out of the late war have been laid aside, even though some of them were both interesting in themselves and by reason of the circumstances under which they were delivered, and formed, perhaps, the ultimate portion of the judicial history of the Northwest. The executors of the late lamented Judge McDonald, associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, have kindly furnished to the reporter all his unpublished manuscript, and many of his opinions will be found in this volume. The late Judge McDonald, of Indiana, have also been delivered to the reporter to be incorporated into this series, where they naturally belong. They will form a large part of the third volume. After the materials had been collected, and the work of revising and arranging commenced, the whole narrowly escaped destruction in the great Chicago fire, and the entire destruction of all the law libraries, both public and private, necessitated a long delay. In the mean time, the numerous authorities cited by court and counsel were verified and compared. The second volume is now in the printer's hands, and the third and fourth will now as rapidly as is consistent with accuracy. To the respective judges, the clerks of the several courts, to the Editor and his able assistants, to the United States patent commissioner, and to many lawyers in this and other cities, the reporter is under obligations for opinions and information. It is hoped that the notes added to many of the cases will be found convenient to the practicing lawyer, and if the series shall meet the approval of his professional brethren, the reporter will feel that his labors of love have been amply rewarded, and that he has discharged some portion of that duty which, according to Lord Bacon, every man owes to his profession.

The following preface is from vol. 4:

Since the commencement of the publication of this series of Reports by the different judges within the circuit have come to the reporter's hands after the publication of the series which has theretofore belonged. These opinions are of such interest and value that the series would be essentially incomplete were they not to appear; even though their publication may cause a break in the continuity of the series. The reporter has, therefore, after a careful examination of these opinions, selected that which he deemed most valuable, and now presents them... in their chronological order, with such notes and references to subsequent decisions as will, he trusts, make them more practically useful to the present and present. Even in the older cases, the present state of the law applicable to the questions involved. The opinions of the late Hon. Edward McDonald of Indiana, were furnished by his executors, and revised by him for publication shortly before his decease. Those of the other judges have, in every case, been reviewed by the respective judges. For the notes, the reporter alone is responsible.

BLATCHFORD'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Blatchf.]

The following preface is from vol. 1:

Since the accession of Mr. Justice Nelson to the bench of the Supreme court of the United States in March, 1849, a desire has been very generally expressed by the profession, that his decisions as a judge of the circuit courts within the Second circuit, embracing the two districts of New York and those of Vermont and Connecticut, should be collected in a permanent form. These decisions comprise cases both at law and in equity, and questions of constitutional, commercial, revenue, and admiralty law, of patents, copyrights, and other important topics. The decision of Judge Nelson, and the fame earned by him during a judicial career, now of twenty-nine years duration, upon the bench of the supreme court of New York, and of nine of which he was chief justice of that court, and the fact that in only two reported cases, that of Lawrence v. Allen, 7 How. [48 U.S.] 735, and that of Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. [40 U.S.] 455, have his decisions in the court below failed to secure the approbation of a majority of the supreme court, have been to the reporter a sure guarantee that it required nothing but the presentation in a proper form of the cases contained in this volume to ensure for them the approbation of the profession. In this view, the preparation of the volume was undertaken in the summer of 1880, but its completion has been delayed till now by other engagements. The reporter has in his possession sufficient materials to enable him, with the addition of decisions that will probably be made during the ensuing year, to publish another volume at the expiration of about that time. Whether he will do so or not, will of course depend upon the wishes of his profession, whose indulgence I asked for this his first effort as a reporter. It is proper to say that the opinions in this volume were nearly all of them written without any view to their publication, and that the entire manuscript has had the benefit of the revision and approbation of Judge Nelson. The title of Circuit Court Reports is adopted for these Reports, to prevent their being confounded in citation with Blackford's Indiana Reports.

BLATCHFORD'S PRIZE CASES.

[Blatchf. Prize Cas.]

This volume contains the decisions of Justice Nelson and Judge Betts in prize cases. The following is the preface:

The compilation of the cases contained in this volume was undertaken at the request of the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the Southern district of New York during the Rebellion, with, perhaps, the exception of a very few cases in which decrees were entered without any opinion or memorandum of decision having been filed by the court. For the information of those who are not acquainted with the constitution of the courts of the United States, it may be well to say that the district court is held by the district judge, and that the circuit court is, as a general rule, held by the justice of the supreme court of the United States, who is assigned to the circuit embracing the court, and the district judge of the circuit, sitting jointly, or by either of them sitting alone. But it is provided by law that, in all cases which are removed by appeal or writ of error from a district to a circuit court, judgment shall be rendered in conformity to the opinions of the judge of the supreme court presiding in the circuit court. Practically, therefore, the justice of the supreme court always sits alone in hearing cases removed by appeal or writ of error from the district to the circuit court. Down to the 3d of March, 1885, appeals from decrees made by the district courts in prize cases were taken to the circuit court in like manner as appeals to the circuit court from decrees made by the district court in other cases. But section 53 of the act of congress approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act further to regulate proceedings in prize cases, and to extend and to define the jurisdiction relating thereto" (12 Stat. 760), it was provided that appeals from the district courts of the United States in prize cases should be directly to the supreme court. This provision was re-enacted by the thirteenth section of the act of congress approved June 30, 1894, entitled "An act to regulate prize proceedings and the distribution of prize money, and for other purposes" (13 Stat. 310), and is still in force. Therefore after the 3d of March, 1885, no appeals in prize cases were taken from the district to the circuit court.

BLATCHFORD AND HOWLAND'S REPORTS.

[Blatchf. & H.]

Reports of admiralty cases decided by Judge Betts in the district court, S. D. N. Y., from 1827 to 1837. By Samuel Blatchford and Francis Howland, counselors at law. One volume. A second volume was in contemplation, but was never published. New York: Jacob R. Halstead, 1835.
The following preface will be found on page iii:

It has long been a source of regret among the members of the legal profession, that there were no reports of cases, particularly of admiralty cases, adjudged in the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, other than such as were to be found scattered here and there in legal periodicals. The variety and importance of the cases decided in that court, within whose jurisdiction is found the chief commercial city of the Union, and the long experience and high juridal attainments of the distinguished judge who, for nearly thirty years, has presided there, have seemed to warrant the preparation of formal reports of some of the cases determined in that court. The present volume embraces a selection of cases in admiralty, fifty-three in number, running through a period of nearly ten years. It is intended to publish other volumes containing cases down to the present time. There is an apparent anomony in citing the laws of the United States from Little & Brown's edition of the United States Statutes at Large. But this has been done, because that edition is a standard publication recognized by act of congress, and has superseded, in most libraries, all earlier editions. In some instances, too, the rules of court referred to are cited by their number and page only, as they are contained in the volume of the rules of court in force at the dates of the decisions are entirely out of print, and the same rules differ in their numbers in the two sets of rules.

BOND'S REPORTS.

BOND.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

The liberal encouragement proffered by a number of his professional brethren, in advance of the publication of these volumes, and the assurance of the co-operation of the learned judge whose decisions are herein presented, induced the reporter cheerfully to enter upon the labor of preparing them for the press. The six volumes of Judge McLean's reports include the period dating from his appointment to the bench of the supreme court, in 1829, to the close of the year 1850. Since the last-named year, with the exception of decisions occasionally appearing in law periodicals and newspapers, there have been no reports of cases in the courts for the Southern district of Ohio. It occurred to the recorder that it could not be otherwise than acceptable to the profession to present, in an enduring form, a portion of the numerous cases before Judge Leavitt from 1855 to the spring of 1871, when he retired from the bench, after his long judicial service. And in this view, the reporter is gratified in knowing he had the cordial concurrence of many prominent members of the bar with whom he conferred. After the division of the state of Ohio, in 1855, into two judicial districts, and the establishment of a new district for the Southern district at Cincinnati, there was a rapid increase of business in both tribunals. For a few years prior to the death of Judge McLean, in the spring of 1871, and after, his failing health, prevented his regular attendance at the courts. After the appointment of Judge Leavitt for the Southern district at Cincinnati, it was impossible for him to give any considerable portion of his time to the court at Cincinnati. As a result of these causes, the labor and responsibility of presiding in the circuit court were imposed by law on the district judge. In addition to his labors there, it was his duty to hear and decide cases in the district court, and after the adoption of the internal revenue system of the United States they were exceedingly numerous, and frequently involved new and difficult questions. The enactment of the bankrupt act of 1841 greatly increased the previous heavy pressure upon the district judge. This brief reference is made, preliminary to the statement that it was a physical impossibility for the court to prepare extended written opinions in all the cases before it, which are reported in these volumes. It was deemed expedient that these reports should not exceed two volumes. The cases reported comprise but a small portion of the whole number decided by Judge Leavitt. The reporter has exercised his best judgment in selecting the cases for publication. His aim has been to include only such as might be of some interest to the profession. He has purposely omitted all the cases arising under the fugitive slave act. The abolition of slavery, and the certainty that it never could have an existence in this country, rendered the report of such cases altogether superfluous. And for a reason kindred to this, the numerous cases connected with the late civil war, with one or two exceptions, do not appear in these volumes. That was an abominable condition of the country, never, as we may hope, to return again. Some of these cases created at the time a highly excited state of public feeling; but as the exigencies which gave rise to them have passed away, it is deemed expedient not to report them.

With the consent and approval of the Honorable S. S. Fisher, the learned and laborious reporter of four valuable volumes of Patent Cases, the reporter of the present volumes has reproduced the decisions of Judge Leavitt, as reported by Mr. Fisher. If any apology for this were needed, it will be found in the fact that the edition published by him was very limited, and that the work is in the possession of only a small number of the profession.

BROCKENBROUGH'S REPORTS.

BROCK.

Sometimes cited as MARSHALL'S DECISIONS.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

In presenting the following volumes to the members of the bench and bar of the United States, the editor dedicates it but an act of simple justice to himself, to state that the task of editing them, in a suitable manner, was beset with many arduous and insuperable difficulties. Indeed, were these difficulties deemed by some, whose opinions had every claim to a respectable consideration, that it was confidently predicted of a man of his falling health, prevented his regular attendance at the terms of the circuit court. After the appointment of Judge Leavitt for the Southern district at Cincinnati, there was a rapid increase of business in both tribunals. For a few years prior to the death of Judge McLean, in the spring of 1871, and after, his failing health, prevented his regular attendance at the courts. After the appointment of Judge Leavitt for the Southern district at Cincinnati, it was impossible for him to give any considerable portion of his time to the court at Cincinnati. As a result of these causes, the labor and responsibility of presiding in the circuit court were imposed by law on the district judge. In addition to his labors there, it was his duty to hear and decide cases in the district court, and after the adoption of the internal revenue system of the United States they were exceedingly numerous, and frequently involved new and difficult questions. The enactment of the bankrupt act of 1841 greatly increased the previous heavy pressure upon the district judge. This brief reference is made, preliminary to the statement that it was a physical impossibility for the court to prepare extended written opinions in all the cases before it, which are reported in these volumes. It was deemed expedient that these reports should not exceed two volumes. The cases reported comprise but a small portion of the whole number decided by Judge Leavitt. The reporter has exercised his best judgment in selecting the cases for publication. His aim has been to include only such as might be of some interest to the profession. He has purposely omitted all the cases arising under the fugitive slave act. The abolition of slavery, and the certainty that it never could have an existence in this country, rendered the report of such cases altogether superfluous. And for a reason kindred to this, the numerous cases connected with the late civil war, with one or two exceptions, do not appear in these volumes. That was an abominable condition of the country, never, as we may hope, to return again. Some of these cases created at the time a highly excited state of public feeling; but as the exigencies which gave rise to them have passed away, it is deemed expedient not to report them.

With the consent and approval of the Honorable S. S. Fisher, the learned and laborious reporter of four valuable volumes of Patent Cases, the reporter of the present volumes has reproduced the decisions of Judge Leavitt, as reported by Mr. Fisher. If any apology for this were needed, it will be found in the fact that the edition published by him was very limited, and that the work is in the possession of only a small number of the profession.

BROCKENBROUGH'S REPORTS.

BROCK.

Sometimes cited as MARSHALL'S DECISIONS.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

In presenting the following volumes to the members of the bench and bar of the United States, the editor dedicates it but an act of simple justice to himself, to state that the task of editing them, in a suitable manner, was beset with many arduous and insuperable difficulties. Indeed, were these difficulties deemed by some, whose opinions had every claim to a respectable consideration, that it was confidently predicted of a man of his his statement, is before him: the authorities which bear upon the points, arising in it, are all collected by the researches of counsel: and while the arguments at the bar, and the views of the court, are fresh in his recollection, he retires to his closet, and with these ample materials before him, he is enabled, with the labor of a year and a half, to record, which, with entire confidence, he sends forth to the world, to encounter, and to challenge the enlightened and searching criticism of the profession. From this instance, however, all these important aids were denied. By far the greater portion of the opinions published in these volumes, came to his hands many years after they were delivered from the bench. No notes of the arguments were preserved by the late chief justice, in a single instance; and where the necessity of presenting a full statement of the material facts in a cause, was not dispensed with by the judicial rules of the court, or, by patient and laborious investigation of the papers in the cause, which were, for the most part, external and voluminous, or the extracts from them, a narrative of the facts, which constituted the basis of the opinion. To have taken the course first indicated, would have been an act of inexcusable injustice to the character of the eminent individual who had pronounced the opinions, to the profession, and to the editor himself. In such a state of things, it was impossible not to yield to the considerations which so sternly demanded, at the hands of the judge, tho dedication of his time and labour, to the important work which he had undertaken: and the course which these considerations required, was adopted, without hesitation, and without a moment's hesitation. The editor trusts, that these remarks will not be imputed to an unwarrantable wish, to expedite the labours and the obstructions he has encountered, or with any view to disarm the criticism of the learned profession, to whom they are addressed. The task, sin being incorporated in the opinion itself, no alternative remained, but to publish the bare opinion of the court, unaccompanied by the factum jurisprudentiae, or by patient and laborious investigation of the papers in the cause. The results are, for the most part, external and voluminous, or the extracts from them, a narrative of the facts, which constituted the basis of the opinion. BROWN'S ADMIRALTY REPORTS.

The following pref ace will be found on page v:

If any apology be needed for adding another volume to the already crowded shelves of our professional libraries, it may perhaps be found in the fact that, in the multitude of reports issued since the adoption of the constitution, and the birth of the admiral and admiralty systems, admiralty decisions are included; of these but one, viz., that of Mr. Newberry (of which the present volume is designed as a continuation) is devoted to cases arising upon the Western lakes and rivers. This volume was published in 1857, and is believed to be the last of the strictly admiralty series, excepting the 3d of Ware. By far the greater number of admiralty decisions are mingled with common law, equity, bankruptcy, and patent cases, and scattered through more than a hundred volumes of reports. Indeed this fact suggests the observation, that the cases of admiralty falling in the same volume these widely differing classes of cases is expensive, unphilosophical, and unsatisfactory. Few admiralty practitioners are interested in bankruptcy business, and yet to obtain the benefit of fifty admiralty precedents, they are obliged to purchase a volume containing at least an equal number of bankruptcy cases, and in the Circuit Court Reports a still larger proportion of common law and equity cases. The same is true of the patent lawyer, who is not infrequently compelled to purchase an entire volume to obtain the benefit of a single important case. Thus a great many who have not otherwise the means, nor the inclination, or the necessity, devoted to the branch of the law they particularly affect (and nearly every lawyer is more or less a specialist) are deterred by the expense from purchasing at all.

The reporter ventures to suggest to the profession that cases designed by the federal courts, instead of being reported by committees, might more acceptably to the bar, and, in the end, more profitably to the publishers, be reported by clergymen, viz.:

1. (Admiralty cases) replica cases decided in the highest courts, both in the United States and in England; and, especially, to such an extent as will enable the courts to emend the opinions to which they should be annexed, respectively. This part of a plan, not originally contemplated, has also been carried into execution; and the editor flatters himself that these notes will be found to constitute a valuable addition to the work, particularly to gentlemen of the bar in the other states of the country, and who are precluded, by their situation, from having access to extensive and well selected libraries. The admiralty decisions are reprinted from the sixth volume of Mr. Call's Reports. Their republication in these volumes was demanded, not only by their intrinsic value, but as serving as a means of reading, as far as it was possible, an unbroken series of the decisions of Chief Justice Marshall, in the circuit court of the United States, during the whole period of his judicial life. Two important cases, decided in the same court since the death of Chief Justice Marshall, are also added.
are more satisfactorily, if not better, decided by the circuit courts of several states, than they can be by a single judge.

The present volume contains the more importantly cases from other districts during the last eighteen years. The accidents of compilation have limited it to cases arising in the two districts of Michigan and the Northern District of Ohio; but subsequent volumes, if published, will probably include cases from other districts. The fact that a large majority of these cases has arisen within the Eastern district of Michigan is due not more to the fortunate location of Detroit for admiralty business, than to the painstaking industry and marked ability of the late Judge Longyear. Without formal dedication to that effect, this volume is intended as a tribute of respect to the memory of that most excellent judge and upright citizen.

In selecting material, the following cases have been, with few exceptions, eliminated: (1) Cases turning solely upon questions of fact. (2) Cases reversed. (3) Cases affirmed by the appellate court and elsewhere reported. (4) Those reversing principles of law already well settled. (5) Cases reported in other volumes. Probably some of the cases here reported were hardly worthy of the consideration that is usual; but it may prove useful to those interested in this branch of the profession. I beg to acknowledge my indebtedness to the able and learned Mr. Newberry, and to the several judges whose opinions are here published. Since the book went to press, the cases of The New State (Case No. 5,060) and The Colorado [Id. 3,025] have been affirmed, and that of The Sunnyside [Id. 13,620] reversed, by the supreme court.

BRUNNER'S COLLECTED CASES.

The object in preparing this collection of cases has been to place before the profession in a compact and accessible form, the decisions of the U. S. circuit courts, which are constantly cited in the federal digests, and are not upon the United States, which have been printed in bankruptcy and revenue law, which have been decided in circuit courts throughout the United States, and which have been printed in law magazines, periodicals, etc., from the date of the earliest decisions in some of the publication of the Federal Reporter, which latter purports to include all circuit court cases decided since its inception. Little has been in these courts are extremely voluminous, of little or no value at present, and most of these cases will be found in the Bankrupt Register. The decisions relative to revenue law are of special interest only to a very few, and are to be found collected in the Internal Revenue Record. The case is a collection, containing many valuable decisions on federal law, that have been taken from the law periodicals, magazines, and state reports, during the time when the decisions were rendered, many of which volumes are now out of print, and rarely found in the most complete public libraries. The result of such a collection is in effect to complete the series of Circuit Court Reports, and to present in connection with the already published volumes of circuit court cases, easy access to any decision rendered by the circuit courts (with the exception above stated), which may be cited or referred to. There have been added by the annotations showing the citations thereto, and the effect of such cases in subsequent decisions.

CHASE'S DECISIONS.

[Chase]

The following is the preface:

The decision of the chief justice in the case of Shortridge v. Macou [Case No. 12,873] at the June term, 1867, of the circuit court for the Eastern district of North Carolina, made a profound impression on the bar of the late Confederate States. It was the first indication of the view which the federal judiciary would probably take on the legal questions arising out of the late status of the Confederate States. It was an indication that, so far as could be seen, the judicial action of the federal courts had not been specious in form or appearance. It was a clear indication of the view which the federal judiciary would probably take on the legal questions arising out of the late status of the Confederate States. It was an indication that, so far as could be seen, the judicial action of the federal courts had not been specious in form or appearance. that would be submitted to him by the bar of Virginia and the Carolinas, and that these decisions would be of great value in settling all doubtful questions in the South growing out of the war.

I, therefore, proposed to the chief justice that, if agreeable to him, I would undertake the work of collecting his circuit court decisions for publication. He assented to the suggestion with gratification, and subsequently furnished me with copies of his decisions as fast as they were made on circuit. In the winter of 1872–73 it became apparent that his work was done. The decisions on the questions growing out of the war, made by him on this circuit and in the supreme court, had settled the principles on which the new constitution of the United States was to be administered; the views of society, impressed on the judges, were largely restored. The manuscript of this volume was then submitted to him for revision, and he went over the whole of it with the reporter, making such corrections as he deemed necessary. They were generally merely verbal, and in the main consisted of softening the language of decision used in alluding to the war. He struck out the words "rebellion," "rebels," "insurrection," and "insurgents," and substituted the words "civil war," "belligerents," etc., wherever the sense of the text would permit, and instructed me to do so wherever he had overlooked it. I had an appointment with him in the forenoon the very day he left there for New York, and he postponed it until after his return, when it was proposed to see if there would be room in the volume for his decisions in the Legal-Tender Cases [110 U. S. 421, 4 Sup. Ct. 122]. And in the cases of Texas v. Chiles [21 Wall. (58 U. S.) 488]. But he never returned, and I have left the book just as it came from his revision.

I hope thereby to contribute to the reputation of a judge whose influence, as has been said, made his decisions the foundation of the law, to the public approval of the decisions in all legal questions growing out of the war, and fatal greatly contributed to the peaceful reorganization of society in the South. I have added the constitution of the Confederate States and the acts of the Confederate congress for the conscription of all arms-bearing citizens, the impressed act, and the sequestration act, by virtue of which exercise of power the Confederate government assumed and exercised control over all of its citizens, and over all property within its jurisdiction. I have done this in order that it may be seen what force, vigor, and vitality that government had, and to place on record our claims to have been treated as a government. Whether a government de facto or a government of usurpation, or of recent government, exercising the occupatio bellica, or a government de jure, overthrown by foreign conquest, the future historian will decide: we are not competent judges.

CLIFFORD'S REPORTS.

[Cliff.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the first circuit, from 1838 to 1878, being the decisions of the Honorable Nathan Clifford, associate justice of the supreme court. Reported by William Henry Clif-in the circuit courts and the judges of the circuit courts of the United States"; evidently referring to the act of the 15th of February, 1801, by which they passed at the same session; for, before that act, there had been no judges of the circuit courts of the United States, eo nomine—by the act of February 1801, the judges of the circuit courts of the United States and the judges of the district court of the district in which the circuit court was held, were for the time being sitting. Among the powers thus conferred upon the circuit court of the District of Columbia, were the power to hold special sessions for the trial of criminal cases, the power to appoint a clerk in each of the two counties in the said District; namely, the counties of Washington and Alexandria.

By the fifth section of the act of February 27, 1801, it is enacted that the said court "shall have cognizance of all crimes and offences committed within said District; and of all cases in law and equity between parties both of which shall be resident, or shall be found within the District, also of actions and suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, in which the United States shall be a party; and also of appeals from judgments and of all seizures on land or water; and all penalties and forfeitures made, arising or accruing under the laws of the United States." By the first section of the act it is enacted, "that the laws of the state of Virginia as they now exist, shall be and continue in force in that part of the District of Columbia which was ceded by the said state to the United States; and they accepted for the permanent seat of government; and that all laws of the state of Maryland, as they now exist, shall be and continue in force in that part of the said District which was ceded by that state to the United States by the act of March 1, 1803; and in all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, and the constitutions and laws of Virginia and Maryland, as may be adopted by the common law as adopted by those states; and including also causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and seizures on land or water for breaches of the laws relating to the revenue and the laws of trade and navigation; appeals from the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and appeals from the orphans' court in relation to guardians and the administration of the estates of deceased persons; and from the judgments of justices of the peace in civil causes within their cognizance. In general, the cases which were carried up to the supreme court, by writ of error or appeal, and by the act of March 1, 1803;—having been already reported among the cases decided by that court; some few cases, however, which were reversed, will be found here reported as they are not reported in the last volume of the Reports. As the circuit court for the District of Columbia is the tribunal to which is intrusted, either originally, or by section as many justices of the peace as the president of the United States shall from time to time, think expedient, to hold their office for five years, and, in whatever relates to the conservation of the peace, to have all the powers vested in, and to perform all the duties required of, justices of the peace as individual magistrates by the laws of Virginia and Maryland respectively continued in force in the District by the first section of the act of 1803; and we have cognizance of personal demands, not exceeding the value of twenty dollars, extended to fifty dollars by the act of March 1, 1823.

By the eighth section of the act of 27th of February, 1801, an appeal or writ of error to the supreme court of the United States is given, from any final judgment, order or decree of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, where the matter in dispute exceeds the value of one hundred dollars, afterward extended by the act of April 2, 1816, c. 39, to one thousand dollars. But where the value is more than one hundred dollars, and less than one thousand dollars, the act of March 1, 1803, ordains one writ of error may be allowed by a judge of the supreme court, "if he shall be of opinion that the errors involve questions of law of such extensive

CURTIS'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Curts.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the First circuit from 1851 to 1856. By the Honorable Benjamin Robbins Curtis, associate justice of the supreme court, allotted to that circuit. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. Vol. 1 was published in 1854; vol. 2 in 1857.
The following preface is from vol. 1:

This volume includes a part of the cases tried in the First circuit since the autumn of 1851. In making the selection, I have endeavored to include only those which might be useful to the profession. A few of these, which turned wholly on the local law of a particular state, I have inserted in accordance with the wishes of gentlemen of the bar of those states.

DEADY'S REPORTS.
[Deady.]

The following is the preface:

In submitting this volume of Reports to the profession, a word of explanation in regard to the organization of the courts, in which the cases are decided, is deemed proper. The district court in Oregon, was organized in September 1, 1859, under the act of March 3, of that year (11 Stat. 255), and had circuit court powers and jurisdiction until the creation of a separate circuit court for the district, by act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 794). The cases en ti tle a volume, which, in that district of California, were decided while I held that court during portions of the years 1867-8-9, in pursuance of the designation of Justices Chase and Field of the supreme court.

DILLON'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.
[Dill.]

The following preface is from vol. 1:

This is the first volume of a proposed regular series of reports for the Eighth Circuit. No judicial tribunal in England or America has conferred upon it powers so comprehensive and various as those of the circuit courts of the United States. Their jurisdiction is original and appellate, civil and criminal. They are constantly adjudicating cases which are elsewhere intrusted to distinct tribunals. Nearly every question of a nature to come before the queen's bench, the common pleas, the chancery, the exchequer, the admiralty, or the bankruptcy courts of Great Britain, may, in an original or appellate form, come before the circuit courts of the United States. Besides, in a great variety of cases, arising under the constitution and laws of the general government, they have original jurisdiction, exclusive of all other courts. The reports of cases determined by tribunals to which are confided powers so diversified and important, possess a character, and ought to have a distinctive character, of which all other courts. In Mr. Woolworth's Reports, recently published, are collected the hitherto scattered decisions of Mr. Justice Miller, since he was assigned to this circuit, down to the date of the re-organization of the courts by the act of congress of April 10, 1890, which provided for the appointment, in each of the existing circuits, to whom, within the circuit, is given the same powers and jurisdiction which are possessed by the justice of the circuit court allotted to it. I cannot refrain from here expressing my sense of the value of Mr. Woolworth's admirable volume. The cases are nearly all new or important, and the learning and industry of the reporter are only less marked than the ability and intellectual vigor of the judge. Regularly there will be included in these Reports only such of the current cases as are believed to be important in principle, or useful to the practitioner in the federal court. Most of the states aid the publication of their law reports; and to some extent this is done by congress, in respect to the decisions of the supreme court of the United States. But the reports of the circuits must stand on their unassisted merits, and since their publication is attended with much labor and little return, the temptation exists to multiply them too rapidly by reporting useless cases. There is to some extent a distinctive character in the litigation of the different circuits. This is manifestly true of the Eighth, comprising six large, populous, and growing states: Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, Kansas, and Nebraska. Within this circuit are large commercial centres, giving rise to characteristic controversies. Bounded as the circuit is, for nearly two thousand miles, on the Mississippi, and traversed by the Missouri and other great water-courses, there originates on this vast inland navigation a large amount of admiralty business, of a character somewhat different from that in circuits bordering on the great lakes or the high seas. This circuit, too, it should be added, extends to territories, whose growing commerce is already furnishing the federal courts with admiralty causes. Four districts in the circuit stretch so far westward that they embrace various Indian tribes, sustaining different treaty relations to the general government, and peculiar relations to the states, within whose boundaries they remain; from whence we have here litigation of an anomalous, yet most interesting nature. The circuit embraces also a large portion of the public domain, some of which has been granted to railroad companies, and to different states, for specified objects; but much of which is yet subject to the various land laws of the United States, including the beneficent and salutary pre-emption and homestead acts. These circumstances, too, leave their impress upon controversies that find their way into the national courts within the circuit. Besides which, it has its share of cases in bankruptcy, and those relating to railway, insurance, revenue, commercial and corporation law. A field so vast, and one so rich in the variety and character of the materials which, with proper attention, it can be made to contribute to the building up of a symmetrical system of national jurisprudence, ought, surely, not to be neglected. Considerations like these, which the reporter has per suaded himself will meet with the approving judgment of an enlightened public, have moved him to attempt to do his part in this useful work; and to preserve, in an authentic form, for the use of others, the results of some of the labors of his co-workers and himself. The chief requirements of a law report—a clear but not prolix or redundant statement; perspicuous head-notes; and a full but accurate index, with cross-references—the reporter has endeavored to meet in the preparation of this volume. What appears in the head-notes, is intended to be the statement of a point, or principle, involved in the case and actually decided, unless the contrary be therein indicated. A few cases, involving the construction of state statutes, have been included in the volume; but for this a reason existed, either in the fact that they were upon important subjects, or because the local statute had not been settled by state adjudication. To some of the cases there have been added by the reporter, who trusts that they will be regarded as worth the brief space they occupy.

FISHER'S PATENT CASES.

[Fish. Pat. Cas.]

The following preface is from vol. 1:

When the publication of these Reports was determined upon, it was supposed that they might be included in a single volume; but, before the first pages were printed, so many cases had been received, that it was apparent that two volumes would scarcely contain them. This, together with the great difficulty of reporting a patent case intelligibly, in the absence of drawings or models, without much prolixity of statement, and the fact that a recital of facts, amply sufficient to enable the practicioner, who has not been in the case, to be emodied in nearly every opinion, led the reporter to omit the arguments of counsel entirely, and to limit himself to a brief statement as something that would be needed for a full understanding of the language of the court. Without a rigid adherence to this plan, the number of volumes would have been doubled, and a little less time be required in nearly every opinion, led the reporter to omit the arguments of counsel entirely, and to limit himself to a brief statement as something that would be needed for a full understanding of the language of the court. Without a rigid adherence to this plan, the number of volumes would have been doubled, and a little less time be required in preparing the syllabus of each case. The principal sources from which these Reports have been supplied, have been manuscripts furnished by the judges themselves; certified copies of opinions, from the originals on file in the various clerks' offices; pamphlets issued by the judges and furnished by reliable counsel, and publications in law magazines and other accredited legal journals. Many thanks are due to the judges, clerks and counsel who have assisted in furnishing opinions, charges, briefs and memoranda, without which the publication of such a work would have been impossible.

The following preface is from vol. 2:

This volume brings the reports of cases down to the close of the year 1869. The Reporter confers to some disappointment at being unable to include at least another year, but it was impossible to do so within the compass of a volume of reasonable size. It is true that some of the cases reported relate mainly to questions of fact, and do not involve any legal points of importance; since patent suits are now almost universally brought on the equity side of the court, every practitioner in this specialty will realize the importance of a knowledge of the manner in which the judges of the several circuits deal with questions of fact. As a volume of reports in a single department of the law must have a limited circulation, and would present few attractions to publishers, it seemed as if the profession must depend on such a book as this upon individual enterprise. A limited edition, at a somewhat advanced price, which could be speedily disposed of, was the only manner in which the labor of publishing and distributing such a work could be reconciled with more legitimate professional engagements. Every page has been carefully read not less than three times, and yet a few typographical inaccuracies have escaped notice. It was a less excusable error that led, in the first volume, to a mistake in the name of the late Mr. Potter, of the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, and to the affixing of a star to the name of one, who, though no longer on the bench of the court for the district of Massachusetts, which he so long graced by his industry, learning, and marked ability, still lives, to enjoy, in the respect of his fellow-citizens and of the profession who are so much his debtors, the reward of a long, laborious, and successful career in the impartial administration of private right and public justice.

The following preface is from vol. 6:

This volume was commenced by Hon. Samuel S. Fisher, under an arrangement with the undersigned (John E. Hatch and Robert H. Parkinson) to assist him in its preparation. The cases to be reported were selected by him, and a little less time be required in preparing the syllabus of each case. The principal sources from which these Reports have been supplied, have been manuscripts furnished by the judges themselves; certified copies of opinions, from the originals on file in the various clerks' offices; pamphlets issued by the judges and furnished by reliable counsel, and publications in law magazines and other accredited legal journals. Many thanks are due to the judges, clerks and counsel who have assisted in furnishing opinions, charges, briefs and memoranda, without which the publication of such a work would have been impossible.

The following preface is from vol. 2:

These Reports, of which the present is the first volume, embrace all the patent cases of the United States supreme and circuit courts not included in Robb's Patent Cases and Fisher's Patent Cases. The syllabus of each case has been newly prepared, and the statement of each case carefully revised with special reference to the exigencies of patent suits. All material portions of the specifications of the patents involved in controversy have been inserted. Numerous engravings illustrating the mechanical devices involved in controversy have been added. Heretofore, the majority of the adjudications in patent cases in litigation were wholly useless, because mechanism cannot be well understood from mere written description. The engravings render the decisions on the mechanism in dispute at once intelligible and capable of being effectively cited in deciding analogous mechanical questions involved in pending suits. No one has an occasion to say he is under many obligations to the learned reporters of the various Reports for those portions of their admirable statements of cases which he has incorporated into this work. He also expresses his obligations to the Honorable Samuel S. Fisher for many valuable suggestions as to the preparation of the work.
With the hope that this work may contribute something to the advancement of the practice and litigation under the patent laws of the United States, the author submits his work to the public.

FLIPPIN’S REPORTS.

[Flp.]

Reports of cases in the circuit and district courts for the Sixth circuit from 1859 to 1881.
By William Searcy Flippin, Esq. Two vol-
The following preface is from vol. 1:
The reporter hopes that this volume will meet with a fair reception at the hands of the profession. When his mind was made up to the task of preparing a series of reports for this circuit, he set himself to the work of collecting all available and valuable material, and succeeded in getting into his possession a large number of cases decided within the last twenty years. Some of these, however, related to questions growing out of the war and its incidents, and were not thought to be of sufficient interest or importance of publication at this day. The bankrupt act being repealed, it was deemed best to omit all cases growing out of the reorganization or consolidation, or other questions of permanent value were discussed.
Of the cases found herein, it will be seen that twelve were decided by the late Hon. James H. Tall.
all bearing unmistakable marks of his high abilities.
As his judgments (he was often so pleased to term opinions) shall be better known to his surviving brethren his fame was brighter—just as they begin to duly appreciate the truth that a great master has left them forever. The case of Tall v. New York Life Ins. Co. [Case No. 13,726], a most important one, is reported in full, as also Talcott v. Pine Grove [Id. 13,735], Memphis v. Brown [Id.

9,415], and Sharples v. Surdum [Id. 12,711].
The merits of the opinions in these cases need no other reference. A number of Judges Brown’s opinions are added by their orders, as well as decisions by Judges Withey, Welker, Swine, H. V. Wilson, Sherman, Ballard and Trigg. Judges McLean, Swain and Foy wrote others. Questions in almost all branches of the law have been fully and elaborately discussed. Some difficulty was found in ascertaining the respective times at which certain of the opinions were delivered, as also the names of counsel representing the different parties, but the hope is entertained that no good ground of complaint will be found to exist because of a failure in this regard. In the next vol-une, perhaps, the task will be easier. In this connection, thanks are tendered to that distinguished veteran in the profession, Hon.
Rufus P. Ranney, of Cleveland, for copies of opinions of Judges H. V. Willson and his firm, and to Messrs. Willey, Sherman and Hoyt of the same city, for other courtesies. Upon consultation, Judges Swayne, Baxter and Hammond gave the reporter a written consent and approval of what he is now doing. They were of opinion that they had no power to appoint an official reporter, but were willing to authorize the undersigned all the authority which they felt they possessed, and that was their consent and approval of his undertaking. Their best wishes for his success. This was the mode adopted by reporters and judges under the old English system. To some of the cases notes have been added, which it is hoped may prove of some service. The one on page 518, through mistake, crept into the body of the opinion.
The following preface is from vol. 2:
One of the district judges having suggested that he experienced considerable difficulty in finding federal decisions on points of criminal law, it was deemed advisable to insert a few cases of that character in this volume. An effort was made to bring the decisions down to July 1, 1882, but the publishers thought that would make the book too large, and wholly out of proportion to the first volume.

GALLISON’S REPORTS.

[Gall.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the First circuit, from 1812 to 1815. By John Gallison, Esq. The first edition was published in 1815–1817; second edition in 1845.
Boston: Charles C. Little and James Brown.
The following advertisement is from vol. 1:
All the cases, which appear in this volume, were decided before the subscriber assumed the office of reporter. It is much to be regretted, that the gentleman [John Stickney, Esq.], who preceded him, was unable to carry his work on as his health and professional pursuits, not only to relinquish the office, but to decline the labor of preparing the Reports for publication. The task would no doubt have been executed by him with un-mer more satisfactory, than was possible for one, who, to say nothing of other causes, was not present at the argument, and forever. He therefore, but ill qualified to fill up the outline of the minutes taken in court. In many of the cases of the full circuit, 1812, a slight sketch of the argument has been attempted, and the editor feels it his duty to apologize to the counseel for the venial blemish involved in what has been done. A consciousness of this imperfection, combined with the discovery, as the work progressed, that it would exceed the proposed number of pages, induced him, in the succeeding cases, to confine the report to the leading cases, of the decisions of the court, which fortunately has been uniformly in writing. In general, however, a very full account of the points of law will be found in the opinion. The subscriber hopes shortly to offer to the public more full reports of the many important cases, which were decided in the year 1814. This however will in some degree depend on the encouragement, the present volume may receive. When the proposals for this work are accepted, it is expected, that five hundred pages would easily contain all the cases intended to be published. Though they have, in fact, extended to six hundred and fifty pages, it is proposed to bring down the Reports to the year 1814, omitting only such cases as appeared to involve no important legal principles. It is presumed, that this course will be most satisfactory to subscribers. It has however rendered necessary the addition of one dollar to the price, in order to secure the reimbursement of the expense of publication.

Most of the questions, which are agitated in the courts of the United States, are remote from the public. The public are not the subjects of discussion in other tribunals. They form a new and distinct branch of law, connected with some of our most important rights and interests. The judgments of the federal courts and state constitutions, of treaties, and of the laws regulating our foreign commerce; the fixing of the bounds of the states marks the division of power between the whole confederacy, and its several members; the limits of the jurisdiction of the national courts, as courts of common law, chancery, admiralty and prize; in what cases this jurisdiction is exclusive, and in what concurrent with the courts of the several states; all these are topics, which must long continue to supply cases of great legal doubt, the decisions upon which will form a body of public law of the United States. The revenue laws afford another class of questions of great interest, not only to the citizen, who may often be compelled to resort to the treasury for relief from penalties incurred through mistake or ignorance; but to the numerous officers, who are appointed to watch over the execution of these laws, and to whom an accurate knowledge of the extent of their powers and duties is in the highest degree important. If to these are added the many admiralty and maritime cases, which affect the interests of navigation and commerce; the large class of contracts and civil injuries, as well as crimes and offences, which belong to this branch of the jurisdiction of the federal courts; it will be sufficiently apparent, that their decrees ought not to be confined within the walls, where they are pronounced. Nor is it enough to publish the decisions of the supreme court only. Those of the circuit courts are final in many of the greater part of the cases, that are brought before them. In revising, on trials of error, the judgments of the circuit courts, they must in all cases decide in the last resort, with the single exception provided by the sixth section of the act of 1802, c. 31. Numberless questions will necessarily arise and receive their determination in these courts, especially in commercial districts and in cases relating to the revenue laws, which will never reach the supreme court. It is hoped the abundant proof will be found in the ensuing volume. These considerations will, it is hoped, be sufficient to excuse the addition of a fourth volume. As I am engaged in more imperative duties, I now present the result in two volumes of reports. I have endeavored to verify all citations and quotations used to guard against errors of compilation, and I only desire that my work may be charitably received and prove valuable to my professional brethren.

GILPIN'S REPORTS.

[Gilp.]

The following note, addressed to Judge Hopkinson, district judge, E. D. Pennsylvania, will be found on page iii:

This volume of reports, deriving its chief value from his genius and learning, is respectfully inscribed, as some acknowledgment of his uniform kindness and courtesy, throughout a constant official intercourse of several years.

HASKELL'S REPORTS.

[Hask.]

Reports of judgments of Hon. Edward Fox, district judge from the district of Maine, from 1866 to 1881. By Thomas Hayes Haskell, Esq. Two volumes. Portland, Me.: Loring, Short & Harman, 1887-1888.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

Soon after the death of Judge Fox his executor placed in my hands the MSS. of his judicial opinions to be edited. Having devoted to this work my whole time, from the moment I was called upon to assume the duties of the position, and I only desire that my work may be charitably received and prove valuable to my professional brethren.
HAYWARD AND HAZLETON'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Hayw. & H.]

This is the first volume of a series designed as a continuation of Cranch's Circuit Court Reports, and may be cited as 1 Hayw. & H. D. C., or as 6 U. S. Cir. Ct. Rep. D. C. 6 Cranch is merely an index and table of cases for vols. 1-5. These should not be confused with the Reports of the supreme court of the District, the first of which is sometimes cited as 6 D. C., etc.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

This is the first of a series of Reports which when completed will cover a period of time from 1840 to 1858. These Reports will complete the link in the chain of records of the courts of the District of Columbia for that period, and be of great value and importance to the profession. In producing the same, all sources which could furnish any information upon the subject have been carefully explored, the records thoroughly examined, so that the work when done could be as authoritative and correct as possible. Therefore there have been no accessible reports of the proceedings in this jurisdiction since the Reports of Judge Cranch terminated with the November term of 1840. These Reports commence at the March term of 1841, and will complete the interval from 1840 to 1858, when the courts of the District of Columbia were reorganized. The cases are arranged in terms, and can easily be found and verified from the court records, and where found in contemporary works they are given from them in full, with the necessary corrections and additions. There is not another jurisdiction in the United States in which the cases are so varied. As Chief Judge Cranch said: "It is the tribunal to which is intrusted, either originally or by appeal, the execution of those laws which protect the personal liberty and property, not only of the citizens of the District, but of all the other citizens of the government, from the highest to the lowest residing therein, and of the members of both houses of congress and of all the other states, visiting this neutral ground, the common domain of all the states, it seems to be peculiarly important that the decisions of that tribunal be publicly known." Here can be found cases of admiralty from the district court, of mandamus against the officers of the government, habeas corpus against the army by congress, writs of error from the criminal court, appeals from the orphans' court, justices of the peace, and all the other courts of the United States. In addition to this it had a general jurisdiction in law and equity in cases in which either of the parties reside without the District. The five volumes as a whole, with this volume and either one or two others which are to follow, we have thought it better to number consecutively, as there are reports of the United States circuit court. It is therefore proper, as this is a continuance of the valuable work of Judge Cranch, to call it "6th United States Circuit Reports of the District of Columbia and also 1st Hayward and Hazleton's Reports of the United States Circuit Court of the District of Columbia." That the work is necessarily imperfect must be expected, considering the meager sources from which the cases are compiled. The dust and files of the old circuit court have been uncovered in obtaining the material necessary to make this volume as complete as it is.

Mr. Hayward had completed four numbers of this volume, embracing the first two hundred and twenty pages thereof, which can now be found in some of the private and public libraries of the city, and which is known as "Hayward's Reports of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia." In the preparation of the remaining portion of this volume, he has associated with him, and has had the cooperation and assistance of Mr. Hazleton, which he takes pleasure in saying has enabled him not only to present this volume to the public much earlier than he otherwise could have done, but which has added materially to the efficiency and value of the work itself.

The following preface is from vol. 2:

The original design of Hayward and Hazleton to publish, in convenient form, the decisions of the old circuit court for the District of Columbia, made during that period of its history which dates from the issue of the last volume of Cranch, in 1840, to the abolition of the court by the act of congress, approved March 5, 1862, is complete and is concluded in this volume to be designated "7th U. S. Circuit Court Reports for the District of Columbia and 2nd Hayward and Hazleton's Reports of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Columbia." These two volumes of reported cases have been compiled and printed from manuscripts of the original records of the cases then on file in the court archives in the city hall, and are, therefore, commanded to the public, and to the profession, for the record. As will be seen by their perusal, we have prefixed each case with a carefully prepared syllabus intended to present an accurate synopsis of the material points therein passed upon by the court. Some of these decisions, such as involve important constitutional questions and proceedings in mandamus, may serve the profession and the courts as precedents in future adjudications. The organization of this court consisting of one chief judge and two assistant judges, followed very closely upon the organization of the government itself. Congress conferred upon it, by the act which created it, a broad and well defined jurisdiction and jurisdiction, to which it rank and legal power equal with the circuit courts of the United States. They expressly conferred upon its "cognizance of all suits in equity and all suits at law which, by the laws of the United States, are civil suits in which a resident of one state shall be plaintiff or defendant in the courts of another state or territory; and the United States shall be plaintiff or defendant in any such suit when the matter in controversy shall exceed the sum of $2,000." This court was created by an act of congress, approved by President Adams, as early as February 27, 1801, at a period when the United States were still in their infancy, and exercised the jurisdiction conferred upon it by law, and administered justice upon the rights and property of men for more than a half century of its history. Its judges ranked, as shown by the reports, as the highest judges in the United States circuit courts, and they evinced, and the contributions they made.
to American jurisprudence. It will be found that lawyers of great learning and ability took part in these proceedings, in some instances distinguishing talent from the profession from the states. This work has not been one of profit, and we shall scarcely realize enough out of the sale of the entire edition issued to pay the expenses incurred in its publication, and it is therefore immaterial, as we shall find our compensation largely in the pleasure afforded us in thus rescuing from practical oblivion decisions of merit and value, as we believe, to the profession and to the community.

HEMPSTEAD'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Hempst.]

The following is the preface:

This volume of Reports is presented to the profession to preserve the decisions of the federal courts of Arkansas in a more enduring form than in tradition. Adjudged cases become obsolete, and it is therefore important that they should be known. In fact, if we have to appeal to recollection, or neglected records, justice safely administered can hardly be expected. Those practising in these courts have felt the inconvenience arising from the want of a published report of their decisions. If this volume shall wholly or partially remove the evil, my labor will not have been lost. It can never be a source of profit to me, and certainly distinction is not won by performing the duties of reporter. It forms a sort of judicial history of Arkansas from its commencement as a territory down to this time, and in that point of view will possess some interest there, if not elsewhere. The decisions of the superior court are embraced, because it is conceded on all hands that the court was always an able one; and although this book, no doubt, contains many cases of little or no value, yet in that respect it is not different from other Reports. Whilst tautology has been omitted in the opinions, the substance, and generally the exact language of the court, has been preserved. Cases sustaining a principle decided have been added; and if time had permitted, I should have made full notes to the cases. The late Benjamin Johnson, of Arkansas, who sat in those courts for nearly thirty years, and was their pride and ornament, generally wrote out his opinions, and before his death placed such as had been preserved in my hands. [Here follows a eulogy of Judge Johnson, which will be found in the Biographical Notes.]

HOFFMAN'S LAND CASES.

[Hoff. Land Cas.]

Reports of land cases in the district court for the Northern district of California, from 1853 to 1858, decided by the Honorable Ogden Hoffman, district judge. One volume. Reported and published by Numa Hubert. San Francisco, 1852.

The following is the preface:

The accompanying volume contains all the opinions delivered by the judge of the United States district court for the Northern district of California, in land cases, during the time over which the Reports extend. They were obtained by the reporter, with the judge's permission, from the files, and are published as originally prepared for his perusal. There has also been added a list of the governors of California from its first settlement, etc., together with a sketch of the early history of Upper California. In the appendix will be found a carefully prepared table of all the cases presented to the board of commissioners, with the number of each on the docket of the commissioners, and of the district court to which it was appealed, and the corresponding number on the Index of Jimeno; also the name of the claimant, of the original grantee, the date of the grant, and the name of the rancho and of the governor who granted it, the quantity claimed, the county in which it lies, a brief statement of the proceedings with regard to it before the board, the district and supreme courts, the number of acres when surveyed, whether a patent has been issued, together with a full index of the names of ranchos and of claimants. It is hoped the volume will be found useful to the profession.

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the First circuit, from 1870 to 1875. By Jabez S. Holmes. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1877. One volume. Covers the same period as 3 and 4 Cliff., but does not contain any cases which appeared in those volumes.

HUGHES' REPORTS.

[Hughes (U. S.).] Reports of cases in the circuit and district courts for the Fourth circuit from 1870 to 1883, with some old cases beginning in 1792. By Hon. Robert W. Hughes, district judge. Five volumes. Vols. 1–3 were published by W. & O. H. Morrison, Washington, 1877–80; vols. 4–5, by Banks & Bros., New York, 1883. The last volume is devoted to admiralty cases from 1808 to 1883.

The following preface is from vol. 1:

The decisions of the courts of the United States in the judicial circuit now designated as the Fourth, so far as yet published, are embraced in the two volumes of Burr's Trial, by David Robertson; the two volumes of Marshall's Decisions, published by John W. Brock- enbrough; the volume of Taney's Circuit Court Decisions, published by J. M. Campbell; and the recent volume of Chief Justice Chase's Decisions, published by Bradley T. Johnson. In an appendix to Sixth Call's Virginia Reports are five decisions, three of which are not elsewhere to be found,1 one of them by Chief Justice Jay, and the other two respectively by Associate Justices Iredell and Washington. These three cases, in order that they may be found in some volume of United States Reports proper, are incorporated into the present volumes. I have also incorporated a decision of Chief Justice Ellsworth never before published in a permanent form, and two other cases, from Francisco Xavier Martin's Notes of North Carolina Decisions, published in 1797. [Hamilton v. Eaton, Case No. 6,590; Jones v. Neale, Id. 7,463.] This author was afterwards chief justice of the supreme court of Louisiana. The present volumes contain all the decisions up to this time made by Chief Justice Walker, of which he has published four volumes, and all the decisions of Circuit Judge Bond preserved in manuscript form, which I have been able after careful endeavor to obtain. To them I have added a number of decisions in circuit court made by the several district judges sitting there. I probably owe an apology to the profession for the omission of many cases decided in the present volumes so many decisions in bankruptcy and admiralty of the district courts, and especially so many whose details I have been silent. But, in truth, the necessity which was felt to exist of publishing these district court decisions, suggested the publication of those also which I could not in the other circuit courts.

The admiralty jurisdiction of the ports and waters of Chesapeake Bay, and of the ports of the Chesapeake, has been decided in the important cases, reports of which cannot fail to be interesting to admiralty lawyers generally, while they are almost indispensable to those who practice in the admiralty courts of the Fourth circuit. Many cases are decided in the admiralty courts proper, which do not reach appellate courts. These decisions are upon points most frequently arising in practice, and the rulings in them are really of more practical value to the admiralty lawyer than those often are in the exceptional cases which go up by appeal for final determination. These remarks apply with greater force to the decisions of the circuit and supreme courts, on appeals, in these volumes. In the single district of Eastern Virginia, there have been filed 6,436 cases in bankruptcy, and 161 suits connected with bankruptcy, 6,616 in all. When the writer came to the bench, in January, 1874, under rulings of circuit and supreme courts then recent, and soon afterwards made, a large proportion of these cases were brought before him by petition praying the setting aside or modification of some or all of the decrees made in them. Naturally, the action of the court upon these petitions suggested or required written explanations of the principles on which the court acted. These written decisions had often to be referred to in subsequent cases, and a desire for the publication of them in comprehensive and convenient form accessible to the bar has become general. These, are the considerations which have induced the writer to inaugurate any of his other decisions in bankruptcy in the second volume, and to collect from other districts of the circuit decisions of the bench and bar of another. The result has been a serious conflict of authorities on many points of admiralty law. The comparative cheapness of the later federal reports as compared with the old, the increase of association law libraries, and, above all, the foundation of the Federal Reporter will render unnecessary the continuance of the present series. It is to be regretted that reporters have not hitherto adopted more frequently the plan of collecting admiralty decisions into separate volumes.

The present volume of decisions in the common law, equity, cases at law, indictments, etc., which I have been able to secure from the various Reports of this circuit already published, and which have been incorporated in this volume have previously appeared in print. The first six were selected from old numbers of Hall's Law Journal, the last volume of which not containing any, and a number of the remaining have appeared in the Federal Reporter. But it was then necessary to insert them, so as to make the volumes of Hughes's Reports an epitome of the federal decisions of the court—the more so, as the facilities for procuring the present series by the Federal Reporter will render unnecessary the continuance of the present series. It is to be regretted that reporters have not hitherto adopted more frequently the plan of collecting admiralty decisions into separate volumes. The practitioner who desires to make a specialty of admiralty finds the law on the subject scattered through scores of volumes of federal reports, many of them scarce and all costly. He would have the facility to purchase an entire volume for the sake of a single case. Hence, until late years the decisions of one circuit have been of the bench and bar of another. The result has been a serious conflict of authorities on many points of admiralty law. The comparative cheapness of the later federal reports as compared with the old, the increase of association law libraries, and, above all, the foundation of the Federal Reporter will gradually make this conflict disappear. In fact it is already disappearing, and under the influences above specified the system of admiralty law is daily becoming more homogeneous and less affected by the restrictiveness of former judges. And although in the past a support might not have been necessary in his profession, considering the unexampled growth of admiralty jurisdiction and litigation in the past decade, the day is not yet, in the nicest, if not embracing at least as many of the cases as exhibit the principles of law on which they turned. I should have gladly omitted the whole subject from these volumes, if I reflect, however, that these are books for lawyers and not for politicians or the populace; that the whole class of civil disorders out of which the trials grew have ceased, I hope and believe, forever; and that even if there be in the evidence as reported anything which in a peaceful era we now have entered and confidently anticipate, would tend to produce or keep alive excitement, no such effect is or will be possible. I am sure that no public evil can come from publishing the three or four times this number of decisions given in these volumes, and I should regret to find that in the manner in which the evidence has been reported any individual or class has been wronged either by omission or exaggeration.
strictly speaking a part of admiralty law, are so cognate thereto as to have been deemed worthy of insertion. The reporter, not wishing to make the head-notes, has distinguished by an asterisk those which were prepared by himself, leaving without any distinguishing mark those prepared by the judges. Some of the cases have been annotated by additional authorities on the question decided; care being taken however not to use such notes as a means of inflicting the private opinions of the reporter on the profession. He regrets that the demands of his practice prevented him from making these notes more extensive.

MCCALLISTER'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[McAll.]

MAC ARTHUR'S PATENT CASES.

[MacA. Pat. Cas.]

Reports of cases in the circuit and supreme courts of the District of Columbia on appeal from the commissioner of patents, with a table of the patents involved in such cases, and with references to cases wherein these patents have been subsequently litigated. By Frank MacArthur, examiner of interferences in the United States patent office. One volume. Washington, D. C.: William A. Morrison, 1855.

The following is the preface:

It is believed that these decisions of the judges on appeal, now presented to the profession in collected form, will prove an interesting addition to the literature of patent law. The decisions cover very nearly the entire period of the active life of the patent office. In the system of quasi-judicial investigation, or examination preceding the grant of the patent, which was instituted by the act of 1836, the judges of the circuit and supreme courts of the district of Columbia have acted for many years as the tribunal of last resort. According to the provisions of the original act of 1836 the applicant was given an appeal from the decision of the commissioner to a board of examiners appointed by the secretary of state for that purpose. By the act of 1859 this appellate jurisdiction was vested in the chief justice of the circuit court of the District of Columbia. This jurisdiction was extended by the act of 1842 to include the associate justices of the court. By the act of 1870 and by the Revised Statutes now in force the appeal is taken to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, of record in general term. In their anomalous relations with an executive department, the judges do not exercise the purely judicial functions of a court of record. The judgment is recorded in the patent office and controls the further proceedings of the commissioner, but does not preclude any person interested from renewing the contest in another forum. The very nature of the decision, however, gives peculiar value to these decisions as the opinions of the judicial mind upon the many questions that arise in the patent office in the preliminary stages of the patent unreflective by the presumptions of law that follow the patent itself throughout the subsequent litigation. In this regard there is a series of precedents bearing upon the controversies that arise by way of bill in equity under section 4816, Rev. St., to compel the issuance of the patent. For a brief period immediately following the opinion of the attorney general of August 20, 1851, the secretary of the interior exercised concurrent jurisdiction with the court as an appellate tribunal from the commissioner of patents, by way of petition, in the nature of appeal. It may now be regarded, however, as definitely established by the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of U. S. v. Butterworth, 29 O. G. 615, that the supreme court of the District of Columbia exercises an exclusive jurisdiction over the judicial actions of the commissioner. This circumstance may be thought to lend additional importance to these volumes. Many of the decisions appearing in this volume are already well known. Some of the opinions of Judge Cranch were included in an early edition of Cases on Patents, and individual opinions have from time to time found their way into periodicals or have become familiar by dint of citation; but as a body of judicial learning, the decisions have been practically unavailable to the profession. Many of the cases were digested by Mr. Law in his valuable digest, under the name of "The Manuscript Appeal Cases:" but, as the lawyer is aware, the syllabus without the case is but an illusive guide to the law. This volume has been carefully and faithfully compiled from the original records on file in the United States patent office. It is expected that another volume of equal size will bring the Reports down to date, and it is the present intention of the author to include in the second volume the opinions of the attorneys general in patent matters, now scattered through the sixteen volumes of the Opinions of the Attorneys General. [Mr. MacArthur died shortly after the first volume was published, and the second volume was never issued.] The table of patents, which immediately precedes the text, will enable the reader to follow the subsequent history of the application or patent under consideration in any particular case so far as it has been involved in litigation, and has been construed, sustained, or declared invalid.

MCCRARY'S REPORTS.

[McCr.]

MECLean's REPORTS.

[McLean.]

The following preface is from vol. 1:

These Reports were prepared and published at the request of gentlemen of the bar, in different parts of the Southern circuit: and it is hoped that they will be found somewhat useful to the bench and the bar, at least within the circuit. Many of the important cases reported were taken to the supreme court for revision, and the decisions of the circuit court in all of these were affirmed, with the exception of some two or three decrees; the principles of which were mainly affirmed, but the forms of entering the decrees were modified. These modifications are stated in the Reports. In some of the opinions of the court, there will be found a similarity to the opinions of the supreme court, on a review of the same cases. This arises from the fact, that the opinions in both courts were written by the circuit judge; who does not deem it necessary to write the opinions delivered in the circuit court, over again.

MASON'S REPORTS.
[Mason]

The following advertisement is from vol. 1:

The judicial systems of the United States, and of the separate governments composing the Union, give the promise of so unlimited an increase of cases as to form a large number of volumes forming the library of the American lawyer, already overcrowded with English reports, that some apology to the profession seems necessary for every additional one that is presented to it. The present series of Reports was commenced at a period when the relations between this country and Great Britain had thrown into the circuit courts of the United States an unusual quantity of business, and when the construction of national law, as well as the adjustment of private rights, had given great interest and importance to their decisions. From the local situation of the First circuit, a large proportion of the most important cases fell within the jurisdiction of this court; and it was thought that a collection of them might not be altogether unacceptable to the profession, nor without some advantage to the jurisprudence of the country. Although the same reasons cannot now be offered for the continuation of these Reports, as seemed sufficient to authorize their commencement, it is hoped that these gentlemen of the bar, who have occasion to look into this volume, will not find cause to regret its appearance. It has been the only object of the present reporter to give a correct statement of the cases as they were presented, and of the decisions of the court. The arguments of counsel have been added, when the nature of the discussion appeared to call for their insertion. To those, who are acquainted with the legal character of the learned justice who presides on this circuit, it will be sufficiently apparent, that this was all that would be left for the reporter to do.

NEWBERRY'S ADMIRALTY REPORTS.
[Newb.]

The following is the preface:

In this volume are collected the most important admiralty decisions, of seven districts of the United States, lying upon the great northern lakes and the Mississippi river and its tributaries, for the last ten years. The admiraltycourts favor those doing business upon these waters; and they are fast absorbing the entire mass of maritime litigation growing out of the vast business and extended commerce of our inland navigation. And up to the present time, there has been no effort made to present in an uniform form, any of the admiralty decisions of the eminent judges preceding over these courts; but the profession have been compelled to rely upon newspaper reports, and tradition, for their knowledge of the decisions that may have been rendered. The want of such a book of reports has been often felt by those practicing in the admiralty courts; and it was to supply that want, that the reporter undertook to gather from the inland admiralty courts the materials forming the present volume. The author takes this opportunity to acknowledge with pleasure, the great obligation he is under to the judges whose decisions are herein reported, for their full and hearty co-operation and assistance in enabling him to present to the profession so complete, and as he hopes will prove, so valuable an addition to the admiralty learning of the country. He also would express his thanks to the many members of the profession, from Pennsylvania to Michigan, who have so kindly and promptly given so much valuable assistance in furnishing statements of facts, and memoranda of arguments upon the trial of the different cases. The publication of these Admiralty Reports will be continued, and will probably hereafter contain the decisions of other districts not reported in this volume.

PAINE'S REPORTS.
[Paine]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the Second circuit, from 1810 to 1840. By Elijah Paine, Jr., counsel at law. Two volumes. The first was published in 1827, and the second in 1856, after the death of the editor, and under the supervision of Thomas W. Waterman, Esq. New York: R. Donaldson.

The following preface is from vol. 2:

A large proportion of the learning of the law is contained in the Reports. To be reminded of their utility, we need only to remember, that it is to this source we must look for the interpretation, not only of statutes, but also of all the leading rules and principles which compose our system of jurisprudence. Every elementary treatise derives its sanction from the reported cases, and no judicial opinion is conducted without constant reference to, and dependence upon them. They are as various as the computing and diversified interests of society, no two cases scarcely ever being in all their features precisely alike. It is this protean character which gives them their true value, for they thus become eminently serviceable as exceptions. Nothing could be more within the common transactions of active life, at the period of their decision they are of more or less practical significance; and yet, it must be admitted that in the progress of time, become obsolete, yet many, founded as they are upon the broad and everlasting foundation of universal and considerable opinions, and cited long after the occasion which gave birth to them has been forgotten. It is not surprising, then, that the opinions of the knowledge is sought after with avidity by the profession, and that the best and most useful libraries are those which are the most complete in all the standard reports. In a commercial community like ours, cases of deep general interest, involving many nice questions, are constantly being tried, and it cannot be doubted that the withholding an accurate report of them, would be a public misfortune.

The comparative value of reports must depend upon the importance of the questions decided in them, as well as upon the dignity, ability and learning of the court. It may be said, therefore, that the cases in the second volume of Paine's Circuit Court Reports, are, at least, equal in interest and importance, to any that can be found in similar publications, while some of them are of very decided value. With regard to the court, it may be sufficient to remind the reader that they not only emanate from the circuit court of the United States, but from some of the ablest judges of that court. Of the judges we have only to enumerate the illustrious names of Chief Justices Jay, Brockholst Livingston, Wm. P. Van Ness, James M. Wayne and Smith Thompson, to be satisfied of the high character of the bench which pronounced these opinions, and of their consequent weight as authority. To Justice Thompson, however, we are chiefly indebted for the learned and satisfactory decisions which are contained in this volume. [Here follows a reference concerning Mr. Justice Thompson, which will be found in the Biographical Notes.]

He subsequently filled the post and discharged the duties of chief justice of the state of New York; and on the 1st of March, 1828, a vacancy having occurred on the bench of the supreme court of the United States, by the lamented death of the Hon. Brockholst Livingston, one of the associate justices and presiding judge of the circuit court in the Second circuit; on the 9th of December of the same year Judge Thompson was appointed his successor. He was well selected in the latter capacity that the opinions contained in the following pages were pronounced. They were given by Judge Thompson when he had attained the fullest maturity of judgment, and after many years rich in experience as well as in study; they ought, therefore, to possess, and doubtless do possess, a superior value. This volume has been compiled from manuscript cases which the late Hon. Elijah Paine, Jr., had collected, and partly arranged with a view to publication. The design of Judge Paine was, that they should form a second volume in the series of his Circuit Court Reports, and he selected them with care for that purpose. They begin in 1827 and continue to 1840, thus commencing where the cases in the first volume of Paine's Chief Justice Thompson, and extending over a period of thirteen subsequent years. They were all decided in the Second circuit with one exception—a case relative to the right of life insurance companies to sue on claims which subsisted prior to the American Revolution, tried in the Virginia circuit; and in which the great principles involved, and the general obligation which ought to govern in such cases, are discussed with great learning and ability by Chief Justice Jay. As this case had been marked for publication by Judge Paine, and was in itself of considerable interest and importance, it was not thought advisable to omit it; although it did not come within the scope of the work, which was simply to report cases tried in the Second circuit. The biographical sketch of the late Judge Paine [see Appendix], prepared by his brother, Mr. Martin Paine, a physician of eminence of this city, will command attention for the feeling, yet truthful tribute paid to his public honor, and the knowledge and virtues, now that he is no more, will long be preserved. The duties of the present editor may be comprised as follows: A careful and thorough revision of the manuscript; the preparation of an outline or statement of each case, except when rendered unnecessary by minuteness and circumstantiality in the opinion; ample and comprehensive, and yet concise head notes; a complete table of cases; and a very full index. Both volumes have also been annotated with a view to introduce the more recent cases. It is hoped that the notes, which are quite extensive, will prove useful, and that they will enhance the practical value of the work.

PETE'S ADJIRALITY DECISIONS.

[Pet. Adm.]

Admiralty decisions in the district court for Pennsylvania. By the Honorable Richard Peters, with some cases decided by Judge Hopkinson, from 1780 to 1806, and a few cases from other districts. The appendix contains the laws of Oleron, Wisby, and the Hanse Towns, with the marine ordinances of Louis XIV., a Treatise on Admiralty, and the laws of the United States relative to mariners. Two volumes. Sometimes printed as one. Philadelphia: William P. Farrand, 1807.

PETE'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Pet. C. J.]

Reports of cases in the circuit courts for the Third circuit, from 1803 to 1818. By Richard Peters, Jr., counselor at law. One volume. Philadelphia: William Fry, 1819. It covers part of the period covered by Washington's Reports, but no cases are duplicated.

The following is the advertisement:

The public are exclusively indebted to Mr. Justice Washington for the reports contained in this volume. They have been compiled from his note books, in which they were entered, with no view to their being published, but solely for his private reference. They will be found to contain all the essential parts of a full report of the cases, and a faithful statement of the opinion of the court, on the points intended to be decided. It would have comported more with the estimate the editor has formed of the duties executed by him, to have omitted all the titles in the title page, but in compliance with the wishes of Judge Washington, and as this volume forms the first of a series of Reports he is about to publish, of decisions in the same court, and in which his agency will be more extensive, the present form has been adopted.
This volume contains all the cases decided in the circuit court, for the district of New Jersey, since Mr. Justice Washington presided in that court, and as late as April term, 1818; and all the decisions in the Pennsylvania district from 1815, to the division of the district, in 1838. The publication of the earlier decisions of the court, in the Pennsylvania district, has been undertaken by a gentleman, whose skill and ability for the performance of the task, is universally acknowledged, and by whose liberal relinquishment of the situation, in favour of the editor of this volume, he has become the reporter of the decisions of the circuit court of the United States, for the Third circuit.

ROBB'S PATENT CASES.

[Robb, Pat. Cas.]

The following preface is from vol. 1:

The collection of cases embraced in these two volumes, contain all of the patent cases decided in the courts of the United States and reported prior to the first of January, 1850; and all of the cases decided in the supreme court of the United States to the same period. They are arranged, as nearly as may be in chronological order; numbering one hundred and twenty-four cases, selected from sixty volumes, in addition to Washington, Brock- enborough, Peters, McLean, Paine, Gilpin, Gallison, Mason, Wallace, Sumner, Baldwin, Story, and Woodbury and Minot, of the Circuit Court Reporters—and Oranch, Wheaton, Peters, and Howard, of the Supreme Court Reporters, thus embracing all of the decisions illustrating the principles of the patent laws of the United States.

A few cases have been decided by the state courts, involving, incidentally, questions arising under the patent laws, which have been omitted, as not affecting the principles or doctrines settled by the United States courts; exclusive jurisdiction of these subjects, in the administration of the patent laws, being vested in the United States circuit and supreme courts. The decisions upon the earlier statutes, in all cases which have been modified by subsequent legislation, have been appropriately noted, with reference to the statutes, a collection of which will be found in the appendix, with marginal notes indicating the numerous alterations and additional provisions. The index embraces all of the topics discussed and decided by these courts, and is so full as to greatly abridge the labor of search for the requisite authority. It is proposed to continue this collection by the addition, from time to time, of volumes embracing the cases decided subsequent to the first of January, 1850, if the facilities afforded hereby shall be deemed sufficient to warrant it. It is much to be regretted that the numerous decisions of his honor, Judge Sprague, in the circuit court for the district of Massachusetts, have not been reported. Their luminous exposition of the principles of the patent laws, in their application to the increasing and ever-varying mechanical developments of the laws of phenomena, in their progress from obvious to refined and intangible distinctions, which characterize the cases which he has been called upon to decide, would not only have enhanced the value of these volumes, but would have greatly enriched the science of mechanical jurisprudence. Such of these decisions, however, as may have been preserved, will be collected and embraced in the subsequent volumes of these Reports.

SAWYER'S REPORTS.

[Sawy.]

The following preface is from vol. 1:

The judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the Ninth circuit, yielding to a very generally expressed desire of the legal profession in the circuit, that such decisions should be reported in a regular series, have authorized the undersigned to report such of the numerous decisions rendered as may be supposed to be of a somewhat general and permanent interest to the profession. The series will commence with the reorganization of the circuit courts, by the appointment of circuit judges, under the act of congress of April 10th, 1869. The extension of the jurisdiction of the national courts by recent legislation, and the appointment of circuit judges, who will be at all times engaged in the discharge of their duties on the circuit, has tended largely to increase the business of these courts, and legal propositions of great interest and importance are discussed in the decisions now being rendered in the United States circuit and district courts, and no circuit is likely to present a greater number of new and important questions of lasting interest, than the Ninth. The cases embrace cases at law, civil and criminal; cases in equity, admiralty, and bankruptcy; and special cases arising under acts of congress. The circuit court for the district of California, in addition to its ordinary jurisdiction, has, also, the new and final appellate jurisdiction from the United States consular and ministerial courts, and from Japan, in the exercise of which novel and interesting questions for adjudication are likely to arise. This volume contains the first case brought to the circuit court from the consular court at Canton, in the Empire of China. Should the demand for the present volume indicate that it supplies a want to the profession, the series will be continued.

The following note is taken from vol. 4, p. 405:

The following cases were decided by Mr. Justice Field, in the circuit court, before the passage of the act of 1869, providing for the appointment of circuit judges. Those relating to the title to real property are of special interest to the profession in California. The other cases are believed to be of general interest. Most of them have been often cited from the manuscript by the California bar, and a desire has been expressed that they should be reported. The charges of the court, in the few instances in which they are given, were delivered in writing; after argument, upon the points of law involved. The questions received as thorough consideration as is given to cases tried without a jury.

SPRAGUE'S DECISIONS.

[Spr.]

Decisions by Judge Sprague in maritime, admiralty, and prize causes in the district court for Massachusetts, from 1841 to 1864. Two volumes. Vol. 1 is edited by F. E. Parker; vol. 2, by John Lathrop. Vol. 1 was published in 1861 by T. & J. W. John-

The following preface is from vol. 1:

A small part only, of the decisions made by Judge Sprague, have ever been reported. Owning to his inability to use his eyes in reading or writing, his opinions were delivered orally. A considerable number of the opinions, embraced in this volume, especially the more elaborate ones, were originally written out from his dictation, and some of them are now published for the first time. The others were in the first instance reported by the counsel, and published in the Law Reporter, or elsewhere. All of them have been revised by Judge Sprague, and now appear with his sanction. In this revision, the original reports have, sometimes, been curtailed, by omitting the analysis and comparison of evidence, which, however important to the parties in the cause, are of no interest to the professional reader, who desires only to know what were the facts found by the court, upon which the law was pronounced. The head-notes were prepared by the judge; as a general rule, they contain only the points decided, but in some instances embracing legal propositions which were the foundation of the reasoning of the court. An occasional foot-note has been added, where the authorities subsequent to the decisions seemed to demand, and these, and the references to cases, have been made by me as editor. In collecting the reported cases, I have had the valuable assistance of Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Jr., of the Boston bar, by whom most of that labor was performed.

The following preface is from vol. 2:

The first volume of Sprague's Decisions was published in 1861. In the early part of 1865, Judge Sprague retired from the bench. This volume includes the most important of the decisions rendered by him subsequently to the publication of the first volume of his decisions, and some of a prior date. All of them now appear with the sanction of Judge Sprague. The prize cases were prepared for publication by Hon. Richard H. Dana, Jr. The foot-notes were made by me as editor, and the work has been published under my supervision. [Signed] John Latrobe.

STORY'S REPORTS.

The following preface is from vol. 3:

This volume contains the last opinions ever pronounced by Mr. Justice Story, and concludes the grateful labors of the present reporter. It will be found to contain no indications of failure of powers, but to give added proof of that comprehensive grasp of intellect, singular acuteness in analysis, luminous insight, and breadth of learning, which in him were so harmoniously blended, and directed to the great end of morals, justice and humanity. While the last opinion in this book was yet undelivered, Mr. Justice Story, after a short and violent illness, died on the 10th day of September, 1845, at the age of 60. Here follows an account of the proceedings of the bar upon the death of Justice Story, which will be found under "Story" in the Biographical Notes.

SUMNER'S REPORTS.

[Summ.]
Reports of cases in the circuit court for the First circuit, from 1829 to 1858, by Hon. Charles Sumner. Three volumes. The second edition was published in 1851 by Charles C. Little and James Brown, Boston.

TANEY'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Taney.]
Reports of cases in the circuit court for the district of Maryland, decided by Roger Brooke Taney, chief justice of the supreme court, from 1836 to 1851. Reported by James Maron Campbell, of the Baltimore bar. One volume. Philadelphia: Kay & Bros., 1871.

The following notice is from page iii:

As circumstances prevented the publication of this volume during the lifetime of the compiler, the laborious and important duty of reading the proof necessarily devolved upon others. In this emergency, Mr. Brightly, of the Philadelphia bar, most kindly offered his services. The family of the late chief justice desire to express their appreciation of the motives which prompted him to this "labor of love," while they feel assured they may unite with the profession in the opinion, "Nil tantum quod non etiam equiparant."

VAN NESS' PRIZE CASES.

[Van Ness.]

The following is the preface:

The first of the following opinions was published in the National Advocate on the 3d January last. The amount of property in controversy, the nature of the principles which it involved, and the ability with which they had been examined and illustrated by the judge, gave to this case a novelty and importance that attracted very general attention. The publishers were so frequently applied to, by their customers and others, for copies of this opinion, without being able to supply the demand, that they at length resolved to reprint it in the form of a pamphlet. While it was in the press, they were informed that Judge Van Ness had decided another interesting question of prize law; and on application to him, he received the second of the following opinions. This, in point of time, was first delivered; but as the printing of the other was commenced before it was obtained, the order could not conveniently be changed. This will explain also some allusions in the Case of Beswick & Son, to questions decided in the Case of Richardson.

WALLACE'S REPORTS.

[Wall. Sr.]

Reports of cases in the circuit court for the Third circuit in 1801. By John B. Wallace. One volume. The second edition was published in 1888, with two additional cases. This has been reprinted by W. J. Gilbert, St. Louis, 1871.

The following is the preface to the first edition:

By those who are conversant with subjects of municipal jurisprudence, the design of publishing memorials of adjudged cases in the circuit court is no new one; and such are the opinions which will principally occupy the attention of the lawyer. It is only for the execution of the task, that I feel anxious. I am no way satisfied, that this first essay will be thought augur favorably of the reporter. It may serve, however, to soften the rigor of judgment, to know that the opinions are made under considerable disadvantages which will not attend upon the future efforts; and if, in these circumstances, the present is thought to meet with patronage, I shall feel encouraged to proceed, in the hope of arriving much nearer to the point of merit. The state of each case will, I think, be found beyond controversy; and the opinion of the court, generally, in the words in which it was delivered: with only such slight departures in mere phraseology, as to create no variation in the sense. It does not come within the power of any one but the stenographer, to exhibit a copy of any one discourse that shall, in every particular, comport with the original. Where the opinions were written, I have been favored by the judges with leave to take copies. As to the arguments of counsel, from their nature, they require much compression: where several are concerned, the arguments of all on one side must be seen; and such are the doing this, much of the spirit, and many of the beauties of an eloquent debate will be lost. I have to lament, that it is not within the compass of such compressed arguments to be published in a complete state, at the bar of the court in which these cases were decided. All that I can profess to give the reader of this volume, is a correct state of the points made by the counsel, and the substance of the arguments on each side. It may be thought that I sometimes give to the arguments a cast rather more forensic than is usual in the modern style of reporting; and that I too frequently introduce into the principal report, colloquial and incident matter. I am not conscious, however, of having indulged this too far; and where I have yielded to it, I promise myself, it will be found a means of service, useful purpose; and to present, if not so much of symmetry, at least a more natural exhibition of the case. I have only added, that in the outset, I set my great judgment, to appear to me proper, not only to record the more solemn sentences of the law, but also to preserve rules of procedure, and the course of the proceeding. It long established, and where the practice forms and principles are well understood, or may be traced to digested systems, the preserv-}

The following is the preface to the second edition:

Frequent orders, which we have not been able to supply, for these Reports of the late Mr. Wallace, published many years ago, have induced a reprint of them; to which are added two new cases, decided in the same court, and heretofore unpublished. The volume appeared originally in a pamphlet number, and was intended to have been continued. The court itself, however, was of short duration. Its history, brief and instructive, has thus been beautifully given to us: "It was established at the close of the second administration of our government; and although this particular measure was deemed by wise men on all sides, and is still cited by many of them as the happiest organization of the federal judiciary, yet, having grown up amid the contentions of party, it was not spared by that which spares nothing. In a year after its enactment, the law which erected the court was repealed; and judges who had received their offices during good behavior, were deprived of the efficacy without the imputation of a fault." Much time and labor, it is known, were bestowed by Mr. Wallace, in recording the decisions of the court which succeeded; and we have lamented, in common with others, that the profession never realized the expectation long had, of seeing the decisions of Judge Washington thus favorably presented to the public. The publication, though actually begun, was delayed, and the manuscripts of that excellent judge, since the printing of his pages were in general so correct, that considering the size of the work, and that it is still easily to be found, a continuation of the work of the original reporter is not undertaken.

The following reference to this work of Mr. Wallace is taken from Wallace's Reporters, pp. 340-341, footnote:

It was their author's intention [John Bradford Wallace, author of Wallace, Sen., Reports] to publish the decisions of Judge Washington [associate justice of the United States supreme court], together. In possession of his son, the late Horace B. Wallace, Esq., of Philadelphia, whose testamentary executor purposes to present them to the Franklin Library (all that utilizes which are conspicuous at the bar of the court in which these cases were decided. All that I can profess to give the reader of this volume, is a correct state of the points made by the counsel, and the substance of the arguments on each side. It may be thought that I sometimes give to the arguments a cast rather more forensic than is usual in the modern style of reporting; and that I too frequently introduce into the principal report, colloquial and incident matter. I am not conscious, however, of having indulged this too far; and where I have yielded to it, I promise myself, it will be found a means of service, useful purpose; and to present, if not so much of symmetry, at least a more natural exhibition of the case. I have only added, that in the outset, I set my great judgment, to appear to me proper, not only to record the more solemn sentences of the law, but also to preserve rules of procedure, and the course of the proceeding. The following preface is from vol. 2, first edition:

This volume contains a selection of cases in the district court, principally in admiralty, decided by Judge Ware since the publication of Ware's Reports, and also some cases pronounced by him in cases decided in the circuit court. The Note upon the Admiralty Jurisdiction [Case No. 6,913], was written out at the request of the reporter, while the printing was in progress. The decisions in bankruptcy, which formed the great mass of the business in the district court, for some years after the act went into operation, have been omitted, excepting a few cases presenting points of more general application. The rubrics have been prepared under direction of the judge, who has never appeared in print as made by him at the time the cases were decided.

The following preface is from vol. 2, 2d Ed.:

This volume is a reprint of Dave's Reports, published in 1849. Its present title has been substituted for that of the former edition for sake of uniformity, it being the purpose of the publishers to issue a third volume of Judge Ware's Decisions, which have never been published in a form for preservation.

The following preface is from vol. 3:

A short time prior to the death of Judge Ware, the materials constituting the principal contents of this volume were placed in the hands of the reporter, for the purpose of preparing the same for publication in a form suitable for preservation. Some of the more important cases, especially those decided in Massachusetts district during the temporary illness of Judge Sprague, have been heretofore published in periodicals of an ephemeral character, but the major part of them has never appeared in print in any form. In preparing this, the third and last volume of Ware's Reports, the reporter did not have the benefit of the supervision of the author of these "decisions," which will account for (especially among those familiar with Judge Ware's chirography) defects which otherwise would have been avoided. But however defective the manner of executing the work, the text of the volume will be found as perfect as was practicable to make it during the process of printing; and although errors in the citations of authorities may be frequently noticed, especially of statutes, those can be readily overcome by referring to the "Eclectic," which is prepared with care since the body of the work went to press. No apology surely will be required for preserving in an enduring form the eulogiums found in the appendix, much less for giving to the public the latest opinions of him of whose prior ones the eminent judge who succeeded their author so recently said: "I believe no treatises or reports are now extant which are at this moment more useful to the profession, or more frequently acknowledged as authority, or which can afford more knowledge and information, than these reports."

The following advertisement is from vol. 3:

This volume contains the latest opinions of Judge Ware, and is entirely new. It is a sequel to the first and second volumes (the latter originally entitled "Dave's Reports") issued in his lifetime. All together give to the public the benefit of his judicial labors for more than forty years. Congress having failed to confer on him the advantages of the retirement provisions now provided for judges of the federal courts, this publication appeals with all the more force to the patronage of a profession not wont to ignore the service of a public benefactor.
WASHINGTON'S CIRCUIT COURT REPORTS.

[Wash. C. C.]

The following advertisement is from vol. 1:

When, in 1819, the editor published "Reports of Cases Determined in the Circuit Court of the United States, for the Third Circuit," it was his intention to proceed with it, and have the cases which would have placed in the hands of the profession, the decisions of that court from 1815 to the term of 1820, and to have, in consequence of an impression, derived from the limited sale of the volume, that the publication of the earlier cases, should have preceded those which were then printed. That these cases would have appeared long since, was an expectation entertained and expressed at the period referred to, this was not understood, that they had been prepared for the press, by a professional gentleman, who had devoted much time and attention to the task; and who intended to complete the work within a short time. [This reference is to Wallace's Notes of Decisions; for an account of them see Wall. 5th.]

These expectations have been disappointed; and in accordance with the wishes of Judge Washington, these Reports are now published; this volume being the first of a series, which will contain all cases decided in the Third Circuit, during the time that distinguished and learned gentleman has presided in that court. The cases are taken from the manuscripts of the judge, and will be found to contain all the matters essential to be known, and a full and accurate statement of the trial and important cases, in every case. It may be claimed with confidence, that this work will contain a body of law, the highest interest to the community.

The jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, extends to international and commercial questions, of the greatest, and of the most general importance; it is peculiar province to examine and decide upon revenue, and questions arising under the patent laws; and to the final determination by the court, of the many principles by which the land titles of a very considerable portion of Pennsylvania are regulated; these circumstances, together with the various and changing relations of the United States, between 1803 and 1815; our neutrality; our belligerent and peaceful positions; gave rise to very many important cases, and the volumes now published will be immediately followed by others, and the work will be completed as early as possible.

The following advertisement is from vol. 3:

The editor, in presenting this volume to the profession, begs leave to state, that, contrary to his expectations, the work cannot be comprehended in less than four volumes. This is the necessary result of the abundance and importance of the matter, contained in the manuscripts of Mr. Justice Washington; and of the length of the judicial period, during which he has, so honourably and so ably, presided in the circuit court of the United States, for the Third Circuit.

In this volume, are, the decisions of Judge Washington in the circuit court of Pennsylvania, from the term, 1811, to April term, 1814, inclusive; and from April term, 1815, to October term, 1819, also inclusive; and the cases decided in the circuit court of New Jersey from April, 1815, to October, 1820. The interring cases are contained in 1 Peters's Reports, published in 1819. It is not intended to proceed further with the last-mentioned work; but to complete the publication of the remaining cases decided in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, in a fourth volume to these Reports; which is expected will be printed in 1828. The three volumes of these Reports, with First Peters's Reports, and the succeeding volume of the present work, will exhibit a series of decisions, commencing in 1803, and ending in 1828. In no portion of the political existence of the United States, the cases of such novelty, State, and high importance to the community, been presented before the courts of the United States, for judicial investigation and decision; and before the circuit court, for the Third Circuit, most of the questions of law arising out of these cases, have been first examined and adjudged.

The following preface is from vol. 4:

The editor has now completed the pledge given to the profession and the public, on the commencement of this work; and the present volume contains the decisions of the circuit court of the United States for the Third circuit, comprising the districts of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, from April term, 1820, to October term, 1827, inclusive; with some cases decided in 1818 and 1819, omitted in the third volume of this work; and completing the series of cases decided in that circuit from 1803.

Few of the decisions of the court remain to be published. By the liberality and attention of Judge Johnson, this volume has been extended to an unusual size, for the purpose of completing the series, as far as practicable; and it will be found to contain a body of most useful and highly valuable law learning, and an equal, if not a greater number of interesting cases, than any volume of reports heretofore published. In the conclusion of his labours, the editor claims to avow himself of the occasion to express his high sense of the professional talents, legal discrimination, laborious and persevering industry, and excelled virtues of the learned and venerable judge, from whose manuscripts, exclusively, this work has been published. In this record of his feelings, he proudly testifies his gratitude for the affectionate friendship, and for the many manifestations of kindness which he has received from Mr. Justice Washington.

RESOLUTIONS

PROCEEDINGS UPON THE RETIREMENT OF
FEDERAL JUDGES.

BETTS, SAMUEL ROSSITER.

[For brief biographical notice, see 32 Fed. Cas. 1285.]

The following extract is reprinted from 2 Ben. 559:

Died at New Haven, Nov. 3, 1855, Samuel Rossiter Betts, for many years judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

The following were the proceedings in that court on the announcement of his death on the following day, Judge Bliatchford, with Judge Benedict, of the eastern district, being on the bench:

Hon. Samuel G. Courtney, district attorney of the United States, moved the adjournment of the court as follows: "May it please your honors, I rise to perform the sad duty of announcing formally to the court the death of Hon. Samuel B. Betts, for nearly forty-five years the judge of the United States district court in this district. He died on Monday evening at New Haven, whither he had removed after his resignation of his seat upon the bench. My acquaintance with him was of recent date, but during the time that I have been officially connected with this court I have been brought into intimate relations with him, and I always found him courteous, kind, and urban in every respect. To the older members of the bar his history is better known than to me, and I shall leave it to them to say what they have to say of his character and merits. I will only say that he died full of years and full of honors, and out of respect to his memory I move that this court do now adjourn."

Mr. E. C. Benedict rose to second the motion, and said: "I feel that it is my painful duty to say a few words in seconding this motion, because of my long acquaintance with Judge Betts, and my long practice in this court. I had known him since 1829, when I was a student in his office, and his family I had known before that time. I have practiced almost uninterruptedly in this court since his appointment, in 1827, by Mr. Adams, who, together with Mr. Clay, signed his commission. He came to this city from the country, where he had been eminent at the bar, and for some years circuit judge. He came, therefore, with great familiarity with the legal questions which occupy the courts of common law, but with little acquaintance with those with which an admiralty court must deal. When he came here there was almost no business in the court. It did not then sit a week where now it sits a month. Thus he had leisure to familiarize himself with the law of admiralty, and he soon became one of the most learned judges in that branch of the law. As time went on the business of the court increased, and his experience in admiralty became far more extended than that of any other judge that ever sat on the bench. He, more than any other man, formed the admiralty system of the United States. When he came to the bench the British view of the jurisdiction of the admiralty prevailed. He devoted himself to that branch of the law in the spirit which belonged to it of old, and which has since been adopted by the jurors and courts of this country, and his views have prevailed everywhere, though at first they were a novelty. His decisions were always characterized by acuteness, learning, and research. If they had been carefully reported they would have built up for him a reputation which would have been like that which the chancery decisions of this state gave Chancellor Kent, or which the English admiralty decisions gave to Lord Stowell. But in those days the newspapers were not now, volumes of reports, and Judge Betts always seemed not entirely satisfied with the form of his decisions, and was reluctant to publish them as he felt he had given them a more perfect finish; and though I was appointed reporter of the court many years ago, I did not succeed in getting together matter enough even for a pamphlet, before his greatly increased labors by the bankrupt act of 1860 prevented his giving any attention to it, and the idea was abandoned till its importance was destroyed by reports of other courts. Judge Betts was a man of urbanity and kindness to all who practiced before him. All who practiced in his court, young or old, always felt that they had had full opportunity to be heard, and that they had been treated with uniform kindness and courtesy — an excellent quality in a judge. We can hardly realize, in these days, when changes are so frequent upon the bench, what it was to have a judge upon the bench I vastly you, I always was. He reached great age, and gave an example to us all of the results of a quiet and uniform and industrious life of moral and domestic virtue. His death calls upon us all to prepare for that end of life to which we must all come, and which few of us can expect to have deferred as long as it was in his case."

Judge Beebe then spoke as follows: "Perhaps I, too, should say a word on the occasion which has called so many members of the bar together. When a boy I commenced a student's life in the office of my friend who has just sat down, and soon gained familiarity with the business in that office, and therefore with the business of this court. In my practice since that time I have experienced many kindnesses and often indulgence at the hands of Judge Betts. When I was first received from him treatment which gave me courage and hope, and during my long acquaintance with him there has been no mistreatment. I always have had the utmost respect and affection for him, and we all reverence his memory now that he has gone. Few men reached the years which he reached or the breadth of his attainments. He was a man of extraordinary industry, who never allowed any matter to pass before him without careful consideration, and a great many hours and years of labor were spent in elaboration, which he conscientiously believed to be his duty, for he was a man instinct in secret and out of season in the performance of duty. He has passed away, and it is due to us who remain to pay respect to his memory, and I again second the motion that the court adopt it."

Judge Benedict said: "My own relations with Judge Betts were perhaps somewhat different from those of many others. I have reason to believe that he was as a student; my first cause I tried before him; I practiced before him as long as I continued at the bar, and when I took my seat upon the bench I was in some sense associated with him as judge. To his kindness to me as a lad, to his patience with me while at the bar, and to his uniform kindness, I ascribe a large share of my desire to learn, my testimony, and the motion seems to me eminently proper."

Judge Brintchford said: "I can add but little to what has been said. Sitting in this place as the successor of Judge Betts, and brought into intimate daily contact with his decisions in all branches of the law administered here, I cannot but express the obligations which both the bench and the bar are under to this distinguished judge for the light which he has shed upon the path of this court. My acquaintance with him began some twenty years ago, and my relations with him have been intimate since then. He was always kind, encouraging, faithful, industrious, and conscientious in the discharge of every judicial duty. Of one branch of his judicial career, I can speak better, perhaps, than any other person. I refer to the great services which he rendered to his country and to the principles of law which came before the court during the late Rebellion. In preparing his decisions in those cases for the press, as I did, I was amazed at the industry with which the judges of the court, especially the seventy-eighth to the eighty-second year of his life, went through the mass of papers in those cases, going over the evidence in each, digested it, and spreading it out in an opinion, so that the volume now stands for the information of all who have need of information on any branch of that subject. As it was the first war that the country had waged, he was, as it were, treading a new path, using principles which had been already discussed, but adapting them to the new and changing needs of the times. The intelligence of the judges, the fairness of the court, the interest of the country, and the necessity of the case, all combined to make the work a fitting close to his career. He has added to the reputation of the country by it, and I think the country owes a greater debt to him than to any other man in this branch of the law. I cordially accede to the request of the bar, and direct the court to stand adjourned till Friday, and this motion to be entered on the minutes."

Judge Boyle, like almost all the distinguished men of the west, and indeed of the east, was indebted for the eminence he acquired to his own exertions. Having no influential friends in early life, and his parents being poor, he was thrown upon the native vigor of his own mind; and the history of his life affords that fine development of mind and character which justly excites universal admiration. At the bar he soon attained a lucrative business and an enviable reputation. Without solicitation, and scarcely with his consent, in 1802 he was taken up by the people and elected to congress. In that body he became highly esteemed and for his patriotism, integrity, and the public. He attracted the attention and confidence of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, in a very early degree, which bore fruit in 1805, when solicited, appointed him governor of the Illinois territory. This office was much sought after and declined. And it was not long before Judge Boyle was appointed to the court of appeals. To the fidelity and activity of Judge Boyle was appointed. The important office of chief justice he filled with great ability for many years, until he was appointed district judge of the United States for Kentucky, on the promotion of Judge Trimble to the supreme bench of the Union. At this station he carried great experience and high talent; and he continued to discharge its duties with a diligence and fidelity which the lamented death, which took place in the winter of 1833. Judge Boyle's opinions, published in the Kentucky Reports, show a mind deeply imbued with the science of his profession. They are learned, and able, and just. They place his character for high intelligence and learning on an imperishable basis; the government, of the adopted state have left to him a richer legacy. They emit and will continue to emit, in all time to come, a clear and steady light on the jurisprudence of the state, and on rights public and private. Of such a legacy the state may well be proud. It was the result of untiring and arduous research, and of high intellectual endowment.

To appreciate Judge Boyle's personal qualities, it was necessary to know him intimately. He was modest without affectation. His manners were simple and unobtrusive. In conversation he was not ambitious to shine, but, when roused to the support of his own views, it was difficult to meet him, and still more difficult to overawe him. He seemed in his discussions to have no object but truth, and he gave to his profession the prize cases which came before the court during the late Rebellion. some 10 or 12 years, while engaged in political life, Judge Campbell, on taking his seat on the bench, reviewed his legal studies with as much energy and earnestness as he had exhibited from the days of youth. He possessed a strong and well-balanced judgment. His perceptions were not quite so acute, but they were carried out and sustained by the most patient and laborious effort. In forming a correct judgment of men and measures, he had few equals; and in the acquirement and purity of purpose he was unsurpassed. As a judge, he was highly respectable, and, had his valuable life been spared, he would have become eminent. That indomitable spirit which, in youth, overcame all obstacles, was bearing him onward and upward in his judicial course. He had a capacity, a steadiness, and a perseverance which insured no ordinary degree of success, in every line of study which engaged his attention. Judge Campbell’s modesty amounted to weakness; and yet he had no common share of moral courage. He was rather prone to underrate his own powers of mind, and, indeed, he had as little self-esteem in his character as any other human being. His friendship was without alloy. It was deep and abiding. His heart was full of the most enduring principles of humanity.

CHASE, SALMON PORTLAND.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1587.]

The following obituary notice is reprinted from 4 DILL.

At the opening of the circuit court for the district of Nebraska on Thursday, May 8, 1873, the circuit judge announced the death of Mr. Chief Justice Chase, saying: “Gentlemen of the bar: The telegraph brings us this morning the sad intelligence of the death, on yesterday, of Chief Justice Chase. A life of usefulness and beneficence. In the first conflict with the arrogant slave power, he stood forth a stalwart figure, inspired by the loftiest philanthropy, and sustained by an unshakeable courage, and did dauntless battle for the weak and the oppressed. In the great Rebellion, which drained the best blood of the people and the vast wealth of the land, and the inexorable demand, still unsatisfied, called for new and strange devices for replenishing the treasury of the Union, his wise, sagacious and serviceable mind, matured, and executed a series of financial measures which supplied the great necessities of those times, and in these days, pained, perplexed, and agitated, we have never been better secured for an understanding of government. And in that highest human dignity in which we most delight to honor him, the chief of the augest tribunal over which he presided, adjudicating the new questions to which the war gave rise, and expounding the novel phases when the federal power has assumed, he towers before us a character solid, massive, and to our country and our hospitable solicitude the greatest of our country’s magistrates, Marshall and Taney.”

“Resolved, that while we mourn the loss which the nation has sustained in the demise of this great and good man, we rejoice that his life was so long protracted to be illustrated by services so beneficial and noble to his country and his countrymen.

On behalf of the court, the circuit judge responded: “We assure the bar that the court fully shares in the sentiments respecting the illustrious deceased, and his services and character, so appropriately expressed in the resolutions just presented, and in the eloquent orations with which they have been accompanied. It is not necessary to recount the history or services of the late Chief Justice. He has been called upon to act in many of the decided epochs which have marked the marvelous growth and development of our country during his time, and he has demonstrated his greatness by rising always to the full height of any demand made upon his intellectual resources. There is one portion of his public history which his countrymen, and lovers of constitutional liberty in all lands, now and hereafter, will cherish with peculiar interest. He was a life-long soldier in the services throughout the Civil War as the counsel of the lamented Lincoln, and as financial minister. Instead of pressing the securities of an imperiled nation upon the timid and unfriendly capitalists of the old world, he appealed with confidence to the people, whose highest interests were at stake. The result attests the wisdom of his wisdom and surprised the world and even ourselves. To him, as secretary of the treasury, may justly be applied, in all its glory, the magnificent eulogy which Webster pronounced on Hamilton: ‘He touched the dead corpses of the public credit, and it sprang to its feet. He smote the rock of the national resources, and a abundant streams of revenue gushed forth.’ I am aware that the opinion has, to some extent, prevailed, that Mr. Chase did not increase his reputation by his services as chief justice of the supreme court. I do not concur in that opinion. In intellectual capacity, in purity of life and character, I regard him a worthy successor of the great man to whose seat he succeeded. Before his health gave way he seemed to do as much work in the supreme court, and on the circuit, as either of his associates before him, and as any of his predecessors, had done. Some of his published judgments, particularly those respecting the constitutional powers and duties of the state and federal government, and those concerning the novel questions which grew out of the civil conflict, in logical force, clearness, and finish, beauty of expression, take rank with the best opinions of Sir William Scott or Lord Mansfield, and scarcely fall below those of even Marshall himself. We join with the bar and all classes of citizens in mourning the death of the chief justice, and in desiring to pay honors to his memory. Accordingly, the resolutions at hand will be ordered to be entered of record, and the court will be adjourned during the remainder of the day.”

On the receipt of the intelligence of the death of the chief justice, a meeting of the bench and bar of Maryland was held on the 9th of May, 1873, in the United States court room in Baltimore, and the following proceedings took place:

The Hon. Reverdy Johnson called the meeting to order by saying: “All are aware that the occasion that brings us together is to pay respect to the late chief justice, and, in order that we may organize, I move that the Hon. Justice Giles, United States district judge, be called to the chair.”
This motion being carried, Judge Giles took the chair. On motion of Hon.Reverdy Johnson, Henry Stockbridge, Esq., was chosen to act as secretary. Mr. Johnson suggested the appointment of a committee to report suitable resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting.

The chair accepted the suggestion, and appointed Hon. A. H. Marcy, Mr. Homer, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Stockbridge, Mr. Williams, W. S. Waters, R. S. Mathews, and J. P. Poole, who retired to draft the resolutions. The committee remained in conference a few minutes, and then submitted the following:

"Whereas, the bench and bar of Maryland have heard with deep regret the death of Salmon F. Chase, late chief justice of the United States, and desire to express their sense of the loss which has been sustained by the country and by the profession, and of his eminent merits as a man and a judge, therefore, be it

Resolved, that in the death of the late Salmon F. Chase the country has been deprived of the services of a jurist who has fairly adorned his high position, and who, by the purity of his life, the extent and variety of his learning, the comprehensiveness of his intellect, and unwavering devotion to justice and law, has left another illustrious example for the inspiration and guidance of our profession.

Resolved, that the spotless integrity which distinguished his discharge of duty in the many official capacities to which he had been elevated by the respect and confidence of his fellow citizens, fully entitled him to an honorable place in history, and to the grateful memories of his country.

Resolved, that the judgment of the late Mr. Chief Justice Chase had not in any large degree the happiness of enjoying those genial and generous qualities which made the late chief justice the ornament of every social circle in which he was wont to move, they cannot refrain from bearing testimony to the impressions which his presence and so qualified a life during his comparatively brief attendance in this circuit.

Resolved, that the sympathies of the bench and bar of Maryland are respectfully tendered to the bereaved family of Mr. Chase, and the secretary of the meeting is instructed to forward to them a copy of these resolutions.

Resolved, that the judges of the circuit court are requested to direct a copy of these resolutions to be entered upon the minutes of the court."

The Hon. Reverdy Johnson, in rising to second the passage of the resolutions, said he had enjoyed the acquaintance of Chief Justice Chase longer than any other member of the Maryland bar. He (Johnson) had known him at the bar, in the senate of the United States, and as secretary of the treasury of the United States, and in all these several capacities he had never seen him act more generously and kindly than he had acted from the time of his admission to the bar to the time of his death. He had discharged the duties of each with wonderful ability. He came to the bench without a great deal of the legal precedents, in December, 1864. As secretary of the treasury he discharged the high functions of his position creditably, and had been considered for years engaged in the active duties of his profession, and there was a doubt of his filling the high position of the late great predecessor, but at his first term that doubt was removed; that term at which he first presided was the December term of 1864. There were then before the court cases involving many questions of constitutional law, and he was anxious to quicken and place the people and citizens of states that had been involved in the war. Chief Justice Chase had had on all the questions that had been presented for opinions and discussed each with so much ability that it showed he was fully acquainted with the necessary preliminary considerations. Those opinions were so clearly and elegantly expressed that they were models of judicial style. No lawyer worth a start at a bench at any time, and Taney for twenty years, and Mr. Taney, upon the occasion of the death of Marshall, might, with equal propriety, be said of Taney and Chase. He presided with native dignity and unpretending grace. In point of ability he was equal of either of them. His opinions will bear the strictest scrutiny, and in learning and moral cutural traits, he was equal to those of his illustrious predecessor. There are men that survive upon the bench who fully equal him; there are others who have risen in the profession who might equal him, and it is to be hoped that in his successor may be found in equal degree the ability of a few of the earlier bench and bar from the age of learning, power, courtesy of manner, and purity of character.

R. Stockton Mathews rose to second the motion of Mr. Jones. Mr. Jones had been a member of the bar for thirty years.

"Resolved, that in the death of the late Salmon F. Chase the country has been deprived of the services of a jurist who has fairly adorned his high position, and who, by the purity of his life, the extent and variety of his learning, the comprehensiveness of his intellect, and unwavering devotion to justice and law, has left another illustrious example for the inspiration and guidance of our profession. He was a large man in the broadest sense of the term. Not a mere lawyer in unquestioning servitude to tradition, or in blind and unreflecting veneration for precedents, he sought to reach results in his decisions which would stand the tests of mutation of opinion, and change in the social organization of society in coming generations. He did not seek mere popularity or present applause, but with sure precision was always ability to anticipate the results of his decisions. In his race he was the master of all difficult problems it was of himself and his personal interest that he thought last. He possessed in a remarkable degree the austerity of temperament and the kindly graces of heart which drew towards him the homage and friendship of others with whom he associated during his comparatively brief attendance in this circuit."

Mr. Chairman, he was a grand man. It has been said that he was ambitious. But who, with such noble powers, such generous instincts, would not desire to put every great faculty at the service of his country? He was ambitious for a larger and nobler opportunity to serve, not for greatness for his nation rather than for himself. He may have felt that he was better fitted for the administrative duties of the chancellor than for the bench. One thing is assured beyond all cavil—he filled many stations and discharged great trusts, and he alarmed every one who was acquainted with his high probity, and fulfilled every duty with a disinterested patriotism which has seldom been surpassed. Mr. Mathews then drew a touching picture of Mr. Chase's appearance when he last saw him, some months ago, in Philadelphia, speaking of him as the "counterfeit person" of his former self, and closed with a warm tribute to his "generosity of heart, the charm of his manners, and the dignity of his public life." When Mr. Johnson proposed, the resolutions were put by Judge Giles, and were unanimously adopted. The meeting then adjourned.

On the same occasion, when the bench and bar of Virginia took place in the United States court room in Richmond, which was presided over by the Hon. E. B. Roane, Esq., he said that the eminent lawyer, Hon. E. B. Roane, Esq., of the court of appeals, the city of Richmond, Hon. Beverley R. Willford, judge of the circuit court for the city of Richmond, E. Barbour, Jr. was said by Hon. James T. Taylor, attorney general of Virginia, John O. Steger, and John Howard, were appointed a committee to prepare and report suit-able resolutions. They reported the following:

"Seldom is it that the hand of death seizes from the plume of honor a man more inspired by greatness and moral worth than Salmon Portland Chase, to whose memory we are now come togo. What he was born to do, was done. His impressions he had already made upon our minds and hearts, has caused a shock, from which we shall not soon recover, and is another solemn and sad reminder of the paths of glory lead but to the grave."

"From one end to the other of this broad and varied land will his death produce grief, and a sense that this time, in very truth, has death pulled down a great pillar of state, and that there are few in the land to supply his place. Called to the position of disinterest with all its duties, it may be safely said, that there was no man known to us who was better fitted to handle those novel questions than he was. His boldness and independence, and in the hour of its glory, as a thinker, and as a was too well known to be more than referred to. There was a massiveness and self-reliance, a solidity and soundness in his mind, that were impressive, and singed him out as one born to figure in matters of great concernment. The high traits of his integrity, his character, his modesty, his fear of imposition, and at the head of the treasury, the duties of which position he administered with distinguished sagac-y and originality; so much so that he falsified predictions as to the success of his measures, the maintenance of them, and that intrepidity in following them out, that have long since elicited the admirations of all, even those of us who differed from him so widely and so irreconcilably. Coming in the flush of mature manhood to the senate of the United States, he so bore himself in that high arena as to prove himself worthy of his great compers. Called the executor of the destinies of one of the American commonwealths, he guided her action during those trying times so as to earn the applause of his fellow-citizens who had placed him there; and immediately afterwards, placed in charge of the finances of the United States, his will, sagacity, and skill so conducted them that he became probably the most efficient support of his government in any great opportunity once therefore men wondered that a matter, now so clear, should have ever been obscured by misgivings. It is an interesting coincidence that the chief justice should have most distinguished himself as a judge in cases involving questions about the currency.

The greatness of Chief Justice Chase was set off by his capacity as a financier and as a jurist, in his decisions and in his opinions. He was not content merely to assert his authority, but, in restoring the supremacy of the civil law over mil-Itary rule; to bring back the rule of right and justice over that of force and the strong hand. Acting under the conviction of the absolute necessity for this, he sought to expel it by declining to exercise the powers of the territories lying in arms until civil authority was restored, until the writ of the law became supreme over the order of the day. He pronounced upon the president the justice and necessity that this state of things should at once be inaugurated, and in 1837, when the proclamation of the inauguration of the United States had assured the world that such was the case, he first entered upon his duties here. His first coming among our people was received respectfully and benevolently; the contest through which we had gone was a civil war, and that all the consequences of general war flowed from it. He declared that his desire was that his government be gentler to the federal government, so far as they concerned private rights and personal obligations, were respected by the federal courts, and he held that the court would take judicial notice of the fact that the business transactions of life here during the war were based on Confederate currency, which currency was to be counted as of its real value.

"In the case of United States v. Morrison, in the circuit court, it was declared that the orders of military officers in time of war protected persons obeying them from all liability, penal or personal, for acts of war. Following these broad and beneficent declarations of legal principles controlling the status of the late Confederate States, his decisions here during the few years he presided in this circuit did more to restore confidence, to reconstruct our shattered institutions, and to rehabilitate peace than all other acts of all other functionaries. No contrary course of decision should we have been plunged in endless confusion. All contracts made during the war and after it, all judgments, were void, and years of turmoil and exasperating controversy would have been before us all.

"The existence of the state governments...in the face of facts...being granted, all their acts relating to the common affairs of life were sustained and upheld. The Confederate currency was acknowledged, all transactions based on it became obligatory and enforceable. Immunity for acts of war...in obedience to military orders once secured, prosecutions for treason became well-nigh impossible, and so his course of judicial decision at once restored confidence, quiet, and order among our people in all their relations to themselves. He went further, for he authorized me to record that in the case of Mr. Jefferson Davis was that the adoption of the fourteenth amendment operated as a complete and perfect amnesty against all political offenses claimed to have been committed during the war, the will assisting, or abetting it. His decisions have been followed by the supreme court, whose adjudications they preceded, and we are indebted to him for the policy of the law adopted and enforced by that tribunal. I do not believe that his abilities as a jurist have ever been more fully appreciated by the pros-tion, but I am sure that the final judgment of the bar will place his decisions side by side with those of Marshall and Taney, his great predecessors.

"His style was exceedingly clear and concise, and I know no happier specimen of judicial expression than that which was the model in the case of The Gary, where he calls admirably the human Providence that watches over those who go down to the sea in ships, and do their business on the great waters; nor that other one in the case of Texas v. Chiles, where, referring to the language of the old articles of confederation, he declares the object of the latter to be to make more perfect the perpetual Union created by the former, upon the basis of an indissoluble Union of indestructible states.

"His purity as a man was beyond the breath of suspicion. Yet it is true that the business of the treasury a poorer man than he went into. He was ambitious,—not eager for applause nor desirous of the approbation of the public, but ambitious of serving his country and of reuniting her discovered members; for, he said, his only desire to be president arose from the conviction that he could bring back reconciliation and peace were he intrusted with the power of chief executive to mould the public mind into what it was to warm a friend, and so thoroughly a sympathizer with us, that he desired to make his home in this city; and on his last visit here he told me that if the house of the late Chief Justice Marshall had not been occupied by the gentleman who lives in it, he should have purchased it and fitted it up as his permanent residence. If the country the country has been deprived of a great magistrate, and we have lost a stanch and able friend."

Colonel H. B. Latrobe, in his address, stating that he had known Chief Justice Chase in early life, and in late years, and that he bore willing testimony to his rare ability and personal qualities. The resolutions were then adopted. On presenting them to the circuit court of the United States, the Hon. James Lyon, paid a tribute of high eulogy to the character and abilities of the chief justice, and mentioned an incident which occurred during the reconstructive era, when Mr. Lyons casually mentioned to him that a staff officer of the general commanding had been detailed to do duty as presiding judge of the court of appeals of Virginia. Upon the chief justice expressing his incredulity as to such a fact, thinking that a jest was being made with him, the morning paper was produced, in which a military order was published, relieving an officer from duty as judge of the circuit court of the city of Richmond, and a general order was published in the supreme court of appeals of Virginia. "Great Heavens!" said the chief justice, "and will your bar consent to appear before a court thus established?" His honor, Judge Bond, said: "Gentlemen of the bar: It is with sorrow for the occasion which requires it that I yield to the dictates of my heart. For the loss of the late chief justice, the nation at large will lament. His past eminent services in the congress of the United States, in the cabinet during the most trying period of the nation's history, and on the bench of the supreme court since, have taught all his fellow citizens to revere and honor him who loved integrity and moral and intellectual worth. But to the bar and people of this judicial circuit his loss is particularly severe and painful. He was the most valued to the court, and coming among you as he did, immediately after the close of the war, when the citizens of these states, alarmed by the result, were doubtful of the future of the war, the rights of personal security were altogether unsettled, he was enabled by his great ability and knowledge of jurisprudence, notwithstanding the most urgent questions arising out of recent events, to inspire confidence in the courts of the United States, to restore quiet and public order to the district, and to bring about a balance of justice among his fellow citizens, who had widely and vehemently differed with him in the political forum, as to win the respect of all as man of the whole bar. One by one, rapidly those who endured the strain and severity of the great conflict depart,—men whom the public, with long delight to honor,—but among those whom we lament there is no one who will hereafter be thought to excel, in uprightness, ability, integrity, and patriotic devotion to the best interest of his country in war and peace, Salmon P. Chase. I shall direct your attention to the minutes of the court, and will adjourn at once in respect to the memory of the deceased."

The court then adjourned.

The following proceedings are reprinted from 2 Hayw. & H. 435:

Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, for the County of Washington. October 18, 1856.

On the opening of this court this morning, John Marbury, Esq., after some preliminary remarks, read to the court the following proceedings:

At a meeting of the members of the bar of the District Court, held pursuant to notice, John Marbury, Esq., was called to the chair, and John A. Smith appointed secretary.

Richard S. Coxe, Esq., rose and stated that the meeting had assembled in consequence of an event which, though long anticipated, had been more than usuallyimented by circumstances. They had met to commemorate the life, virtues and character of their deceased brother, the Honorable William Cranch, who had died of the disease of the district court of the District of Columbia, who died at his residence in this city on Saturday last, September 1, 1855. Judge Cranch died at the age of 86 years, after having lived thus long as an individual, and has presided on the bench a longer period of time than had ever been heard of elsewhere. He was a member of the judges of the circuit court of March, 1801, 54 years since. He has now left us, and the place made void of his presence will be supplied; but he may say a long time would elapse before that place could be supplied with so acceptable a gentleman and one possessed of so much ability. All who knew him in the course of their practice in the courts, knew how well and admirably he fulfilled all the duties with which he was intrusted. Few judges ever excelled him; few ever equaled him in all the essentials of a great judge. He was eminent for learning in all the departments of law, (admiralty, chancery, criminal and common) and he studied himself the learning of the profession from the earliest days. We have met with a great loss, but thank God! he has left us. What a loss we must, what a loss! But thank that every young man, while he reverences, will follow him —will imitate Judge Cranch in industry, and endeavor to equal him in learning, be pure of heart as he was pure, be honorable so as to have as pure and eminent a character for the admiration of his countrymen.

Mr. Coxe offered the following resolution: "Resolved, that a committee of five members of the meeting be appointed by the chair, to draft appropriate resolutions, on the subject which has thus concerned us together." The chair appointed Richard S. Coxe, Wm. Redin, Joseph H. Bradley, James M. Carlisle and John F. Banis, Esqrs., who, having inserted the names, were sustained by their chairman, Mr. Coxe, presented the following resolutions: "The Hon. William Cranch, of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, having departed this life on Saturday, the 1st of Sept., 1855, the members of the court entertain the highest veneration for the private and public character of the deceased,—duly appreciating his great and varied professional attainment, his unflagging integrity, his patient diligence, his uniform courtesy and amenity of manner on the bench and in private intercourse, regards his youth, his subsequent long and undeviating, with deep regret as a severe public loss. They have therefore: (1) Resolved, that during the whole course of the private life of the deceased in this vicinity, extending beyond sixty years, he had eminently entitled himself to possess what he fully enjoyed, the unqualified admiration and esteem of our whole community. (2) Resolved, that as a reporter of the decisions entered on the minutes of the court, and as a judge of the circuit court, on the bench of which he occupied a seat for upwards of 54 years, he was distinguished for his requirements in all the different branches of professional business. (3) Resolved, that, for untiring industry, for indefatigable diligence in the discharge of his duties, for his kind and courteous amenity of deportment towards all, with whom he had intercourse, for dignified, patient and impartial treatment toward his colleagues and the members of the bar, (3) Resolved, that we deeply deplore the loss which the community, the profession, and we ourselves more especially have sustained in the death of Judge Cranch. (4) Resolved, that in the manifestation of the high esteem and respect we entertain for the deceased, we will wear the customary badge of mourning for the period of thirty days, and will as a body attend his funeral. (5) Resolved, that we will undertake, with the consent and approbation of the family, to erect a substantial and appropriate monument over the grave of the deceased, in commemoration of his character, and that the chairman of this meeting, Mr. Redin and Mr. Carlisle be a committee to superintend the effect. (6) Resolved, that the chairman communicate a copy of these proceedings to the family of the departed, with an expression of our confidence they have adopted. (7) Resolved, that at the next meeting of the circuit court the chairman be requested to present a copy to the court, with a request that the same may be entered upon the minutes of the court.

After the reading of the above proceedings Mr. R. S. Coxe, with some appropriate remarks, seconded the motion that the same be entered on the minutes of the court, and then moved that the court adjourn one week. To which the Hon. James S. Morrell, the presiding judge, made the following reply: "We gentlemen of the Bench and Officers of the Court: We heartily unite with you in doing honor to the memory of our lamented brother, Judge Cranch. He was all that you respectfully and appropriately ascribe to him. You have not said too much. A great and good judge has gone from us; his loss is deeply deplored by us all. But though that event is a great loss, it is the weight in the admiring memory of a grateful community, who have for so many years enjoyed the blessings of his able, pure and impartial administration of justice. In the eminent example he has left us of a pure and unsullied character and in the rich fruit of his long and indefatigable judicial labors. In addition to a display of superior legal talent, his course was marked by a calm and amiable composure of temper and patient forbearance, with an inflexible uprightness and uprightness; to the rich and the poor he was alike impartial and just, always accessible and ready, cheerfully on all occasions, however arduous, the duties required, to dispense justice. We therefore order the resolutions of the bar and officers of the court to be entered on the records of the court, and that the judge and officers of the court entertain the highest veneration for the private and public character of the deceased, duly appreciating his great and varied professional attainment, his unflagging integrity, his patient diligence, his uniform courtesy and amenity of manner on the bench and in private intercourse, regards his youth, his subsequent long and undeviating, with deep regret as a severe public loss. They have therefore: (1) Resolved, that during the whole course of the private life of the deceased in this vicinity, extending beyond sixty years, he had eminently entitled himself to possess what he fully enjoyed, the unqualified admiration and esteem of our whole community. (2) Resolved, that as a reporter of the decisions entered on the minutes of the court, and as a judge of the circuit court, on the bench of which he occupied a seat for upwards of 54 years, he was distinguished for his requirements in all the different branches of professional business. (4) Resolved, that in the manifestation of the high esteem and respect we entertain for the deceased, we will wear the customary badge of mourning for the period of thirty days, and will as a body attend his funeral. (5) Resolved, that we will undertake, with the consent and approbation of the family, to erect a substantial and appropriate monument over the grave of the deceased, in commemoration of his character, and that the chairman of this meeting, Mr. Redin and Mr. Carlisle be a committee to superintend the effect. (6) Resolved, that the chairman communicate a copy of these proceedings to the family of the departed, with an expression of our confidence they have adopted. (7) Resolved, that at the next meeting of the circuit court the chairman be requested to present a copy to the court, with a request that the same may be entered upon the minutes of the court.

Memorandum of Wm. Cranch, LL. D., chief judge of the U. S. circuit court of the District of Columbia: "Wm. Cranch, chief judge of the U. S. circuit court of the District of Columbia, was the only son of the Hon. Judge Cranch, of Charlestown, Mass., who emigrated from England to this country in the year 1746, and Mary Smith, a daughter of the Rev. Wm. Smith, of Weymouth, Mass. He was born at Weymouth on the 17th day of July, 1869, and received his early education from his mother, a woman of high accomplishments and of rare virtue, who instructed him alike in a knowledge of English and of Latin. He was afterwards fitted for college by his uncle, the Rev. Wm. Shaw, of Haverhill, Mass., in whose family he was brought up and at the time resided. In 1873, he entered Harvard University, in the same class with his cousin, John Quincy Adams, between whom and himself there was always existing a close and intimate friendship, which remained unimpaired to the time of Mr. Adams’ decease. In 1879, he graduated, and in the same year was pronounced ready for the bar by the Hon. Thos. Dawes, one of the justices of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts. In July, 1880, he was admitted to practice in the court of common pleas, and in July, 1871, in the supreme judicial court. On the death of his relative, John Thaxter, Esq., who had been seated in the practice of the bar, in Haverhill, Mr. Crane removed to that place and took charge of his unfinished business. After practicing in the courts of Massachusetts, in 1880, he moved to the city of Washington, and charged of the large contracts of Morris, Nicholson and Greenstreet. In 1880 he was appointed one of the commissioners of the public buildings, then in process of erection. In 1881 he was appointed one of the assistants of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, under the act of February 24, 1801; and on the resignation of Mr. Kitts, chief judge of the court, he was appointed by President Jefferson, in his place. Judge Cranch succeed- ed Mr. Dallas, as reporter of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States. These reports are well known, and are highly valued by the profession. He also made accurate reports of the cases decided in the circuit court of the District of Columbia, from its organization to 1841. These Reports have not failed to be acceptable to the profession and to the public, from the great variety and importance of the cases arising under the local and peculiar jurisdiction of a United States court at the seat of government. In 1827 Judge Cranch, by request, delivered "A Memoir of the Life, Character and Writings of John Adams" before the Columbian Institute. He also prepared a Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, for an act of congress, which was printed by order of congress but was never referred to a committee. In the year 1829 the director of laws was conferred upon him by Harvard University. He was an honorary member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and a member of the Antiquarian Society. The life of Judge Cranch, like that of many other distinguished men, has been marked with few of those vicissitudes which impart so great interest to biographies. In the regular exercise of his high duties for 54 years, his life has been varied only by those events which are incident to all men. As chief judge he has been eminent alike for profound learning, and for impartiality and wisdom. It would be difficult to find one in any situation who has labored more diligently, more patiently, or more successfully than he has done, in the office which he has so long and so faithfully filled.”

CURTIS, BENJAMIN ROBBINS.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1385."

The following matter is reprinted from 4 Cliff. 625:

"Pursuant to the call of the committee appointed at the meeting of the bar held Sept. 18, 1874, the members of the bar assembled in the court room of the circuit court Oct. 7, 1874, at ten o’clock. Mr. Sidney Bartlett presided. The committee, through their chairman, represented the bar and members of the bar added their tribute to the memory of the distinguished deceased.

Report of the committee: “Circuit Court of the United States, District of Massachusetts. October 7, 1874. The members of the bar of this court, brought together by the news of the decease of their brother and colleague, Benjamin Rob- bins, desire to place upon the records of the court the expression of their sense of personal bereave- ment and of a common sense of the regard we, as a people, and the country at large have sustained by his death. They recognized, with fraternal pride, in Mr. Curtis all the elements of a great lawyer and judge. Thoughtfully trained, in the common and commercial law, master of equity in the peculiar yet broad domain of jurisprudence administered in the courts of this country, his mind was broad, his breadth, and accuracy of his learning were not surpassed at the bar or on the bench of his time. With a strong mind carefully trained and disciplined, capacious and retentive memory, sound and cautious judgment, the mental qualities which illustrated and gave full force and effect to the rest were an almost intuitive capacity to discern the points on which a cause hinged, and the power of simple, clear, comprehensive statement, a method and manner as perfect when oral as when written, and which gave to the enunciation of legal principles something of the beauty and precision of the most polished orations. His manners at the bar and on the bench were quiet, courteous, and marked by a modest dignity and firmness which won, or, if need be, commanded respect. It would not better express the admiration and esteem in which Judge Curtis was held than to say that, when the last two vacancies occurred by the resignation of the justiceship of the supreme court of the United States, he was depicted by his brethren of the bar throughout the country at large, by eminent lawyers, learning, love of justice, and a thoroughly judicial mind, to discharge the duties of that exalted trust. Of Judge Curtis, as an associate and a friend, it may be said that the more he was known the more highly he was esteemed. Under a calm and quiet exterior, which to strangers seemed like coldness, he had warm affections and generous sympathies. Careful observation of life and manners, a liberal culture outside of his profession, conversation thoughtful and suggestive, and marked by curious fertility of expression, made him a most interesting and instructive companion. The name of Judge Curtis is to be added to the list of great lawyers and judges, who, not as a matter of sentiment merely, but as the result of careful study and reflection, were firm believers in the great truths of Christianity. Not insen- tient to modern scientific thought or speculation, catholic in spirit, unwilling to judge others, he retained to the last his conviction of the truth of the being and providence of God and the hope of immortal life. Recalling to-day his services to the cause of jurisprudence, his fidelity to the interest of the profession and the high rank of his character, the bar gratefully pay this tribute to his memory.

Remarks of Hon. E. Rockwood Hoar: “Mr. Chairman,—I move that the sentiments of the bar, in regard to the death of Judge Curtis, as reported by your committee, be presented to the bar by the attorney to the circuit court, which shall come in this morning, with the request that they be entered on the records of the court. I do not feel, Mr. Chairman and brethren, that it is necessary for me to add anything to the very complete expression of our thoughts and feelings on this occasion, which the report of the committee contains; yet I desire to add my personal expression of our sense of loss, and the more, because, to my own sorrow and regret, I could not attend the funeral services of our friend. Judge Curtis was a man in his position and relations in life so admirable and so complete, that a stranger could know his merits, modelled upon his own style of presentation, seems to me the most appropriate. What a monument at Alston and on Haverhill his name will be early associates at the bar is eminently true of him,—that he had the beauty of accuracy in his understanding, and the beauty of uprightness in his character.' I think that his loss at the present time is a national one, for this more than, perhaps, any other reason, that in the supreme court at Washington, the brilliancy, the comprehensiveness of some of the lawyers of the country; that in these days, when there are so many defects of taste, he was a model of good taste in the profession; that he did nothing in excess, while all his work for clear progressive learning was adequate to the occasion. I think the loss of no lawyer in the country would be so much felt by the lawyers as his. I may be able to fill these days of loose and turgid eloquence, and of imperfect legal training, of which there are so many exhibitions, with a shadow, but it is not the same. I have felt it a relief, and pleasure, and satisfaction, when they could turn for an hour or two to listen to that master of lucid statement, with a wealth of learning never paralleled, but always ample in furnishing what the case and the presentation of it required, with clear perception of the point at issue, rigorously confining himself to conveying it clearly to the mind of the tribunal which he addressed, and then stopping. I think it is felt among the profession by the country, that his brother's pillars has fallen, as well as one of its ornaments. Entirely concurring with what the paper presented by the committee of the personal courtesy, generosity, and kindliness, which were exhibited by our departed friend, I think that, meeting here as members of the bar, we are entitled to say that Judge Curtis and this bar has furnished to the country in him one who must be recognized everywhere as a great lawyer. Justices Catron and Curtis, in their addresses, have made it evident that I do not suppose he has produced upon the country or the world any leading or great impression from anything that he has said or done, except so far as he has been to the bar what the bar has been to him in his judicial position, and as he has applied its principles, in his advocacy of counsel in matters of strengthening the foundations of society, and to illustrate the value of absolute justice. But the man who has made these contributions to society, who has done so much to keep the administration of justice steady and useful to mankind, to make all the machinery of government in its daily applications serviceable to the interests of human beings, has a solid claim to respectful memory. Perhaps he has made no contribution to judicial science of the importance of which we are in some measure by his predecessor, Judge Story. Perhaps, as development did not seem to be the order of his being so great an amount as in the case of the great judges, it may have been the same that in the earlier constitutive period of our jurisprudence a man of a different character occupied the seat which he afterward occupied. The man with the learning, steadiness, and uprightness, he has left a judicial fame that any man might envy.

Remarks of Gen. Benjamin F. Butler:—"Mr. Chairman,—Being called to another sphere of public duty, I was unhappily unable to mingle my regrets with my brethren at the bar at the meeting at which this is an adjournment, at the great loss the bar of the nation has sustained in the death of our late associate, Judge Curtis. I have used the occasion thus given to dwell upon the bar of the nation, because I deem the loss of such a lawyer, with so great a national reputation, of accumulated acquirements, with such a man as a station in the highest branches of jurisprudence, a national loss. It is a tradition, and a true one, that the memory of the work of a great lawyer exists only in the traditions of the bar; and even when embodied in the form of decisions of the bench, they are only sought after by his brethren for a different purpose. On the page is written, 'Justice Curtis,' in pencil. I do not know that I could express my opinion of his characteristics with any other method than by adopting a description which I had applied as suitable to him. In the apparent decay of an ambition purely selfishly has since been emblazoned in constitutional law. If I were to venture to add, sir, a word to the resolutions now before us, so happily framed, it would be wherein they describe the lucidity and comprehensiveness of so many of the lawyers of the country; that in these days, when there are so many defects of taste, he was a model of good taste in the profession; that he did nothing in excess, while all his work for clear progressive learning was adequate to the occasion. In these tumultuous and anarchical times, when landmarks are so little respected, the loss of a calm, reflect, independent, and approved constitutional lawyer may be regarded as a public calamity. With much respect and esteem, I am very truly yours, John A. Campbell.

Remarks of Mr. Webster: "Mr. Chairman,—I came here to listen, not to speak. But esteeming and loving Judge Curtis as I did, and having occupied a place under him during almost the whole of his judicial career, I trust you will pardon me for breaking the eloquent utterances of others. Many are present who know him more intimately and shared more closely his confidence; and they can better speak of his social qualities and portray his noble character and high attainments. But my memory goes back to his college days, and to the rank he then held as a thinker and orator in the class, before his entrance to the law school at Cambridge. Even then the tendency of his mind to matters of government and law was manifest. His prize essay had for its subject, "Are the Governmental Institutions of the United States Dependent upon the Ignorance of the People?" Indeed his step from boyhood to manhood seemed nearly contemporaneous. His mental strength was a thoughtfulness and thoroughness unusual for his age. As a student he was indefatigable, and all his accumulations, whether kno"...

he could not grant their request, explaining that he had been forbidden by his physicians to expose himself to the night air, on account of a disease of the lungs. The request was disallowed. The bar was designed to be read at the reunion. It would be verbally prized, and the voluntary respect was expressed whether he would be willing to turn it down, or whether he had intended or not. The note was sent and read, and must be ever cherished by the Alumni. I would further say, that for the same reason I had intended, Mr. Chairman, to refrain from saying anything to-day, coming here simply to cast my vote. The Judge in his first address, to the Judges of the United States is probably accompanied with the unanimous consent of the bar of the court that he was the most illustrious man in the country, that he was the possessor, true in its instincts, and firm in its resolve. I have known him, in cases where he had thought the judgment had fallen too hard upon his client, to turn and relinquish every dollar of his fee, in order to soften the adverse blow, and that, too, without a word, without any open demonstration of it. I have known him, without any previous knowledge, to sanction the bar, even to the extent of not allowing him to search the net, that he went on, that he was not a man of the world, that he was a man of the law. I have known him, in cases where he had thought the judgment had fallen too hard upon his client, to turn and relinquish every dollar of his fee, in order to soften the adverse blow, and that, too, without a word, without any open demonstration of it. with pride and gratitude. After Judge Curtis's return to the bar, I enjoyed frequent professional intercourse with him, mostly as his colleague; and in the latter relation it is not easy to refrain from saying what I think was, does, and has always been, much to remember with peculiar interest and admiration. It was here that the characteristics I have mentioned of his mind, his power calmly in reserve and letting it forth in full strength at the instant it was called for, and his having his learning always ready in hand for use as the occasion suggested, made him so supremely valuable to a junior associate. He was patient and courteous in consultation with him; generous in his checking of his own a mistake in the handling of the case; considerate and forbearing towards his mistakes; ready, on occasion of his successes, with words of commendation, very few, very appropriate, and (it could never be doubted) perfectly sincere. Towards the court he maintained a dignified courtesy which was so perfect as to be a model. The principles by which he guided his conduct towards the court were the highest. He was incapable of abusing the trust which every court must put in its counselors. In matters pertaining to this trust, he walked in the light of a 'tender and vigilant conscience' as well as moral courage. I am sure that in his务必 him to a juryman over himself an extraordinary command, and enforced a constant mental and moral self-discipline. I think, perhaps, we may see in the smallest matters and in his social relations he held a kind of court within himself, and weighed evidence and secrets, as did to the case, before he allowed himself to express an opinion, or say anything that might affect the rights or feelings of any man.

As I know but little of Judge Curtis privately, I can only speak of him as his constitution and temperament were a kind of study to a spectator who respected him as much as I did. I think I am not wrong in this belief, I think that in his over himself an extraordinary command, and enforced a constant mental and moral self-discipline. I think, perhaps, we may see in the smallest matters and in his social relations he held a kind of court within himself, and weighed evidence and secrets, as did the case, before he allowed himself to express an opinion, or say anything that might affect the rights or feelings of any man. You can bear witness, Mr. Chairman, that none who did not know him at home knew him at all. He was indeed (how strange it seems to us who so knew him, that it should surprise anybody!) a warm-hearted, tender-hearted man. He prized the affection of his friends. He reaped much upon it for his enjoyment of life. It might be truly said of him that the friends he had, and their adoption tried, he grasped to his soul with bonds of steel. He appeared to their aid in their distresses, and testified that sympathy by many and many an act, very fragrant in the memory now, but of which he never spoke. "I must resist the temptation to dwell longer on such recollections. One more thought let me express before I take my seat. Others may have left as much, say, in some respects, perhaps, more than he did, to command the admiration of us, the younger men of this bar; but no one has left us so much that we could safely and reasonably imitate. If we shall do so successfully, we shall do honor to ourselves and to our profession."

The Honorable Richard H. Dana, Jr.; Mr. Chairman,—I had not the fortune to know Judge Curtis privately, well. I can therefore only speak as to that side of his character which was present to the public. And everything has been so well said that I should not rise were it not that I am unwilling to lose an opportunity of at least attempting to express that every one here feels. Seeing you, sir, reminds me of the first time I heard Judge Curtis, when he was at the age of thirty-three, in the trial of the great case of the overseers of the poor of Boston against certain proprietors of lands in the city. It was a great cause, from the amount involved, from the principles necessary to be passed upon, and from the eminence of the counsel engaged in it, of whom I now recall, besides yourself, Charles Lor- ing and John Tyler. Loring, the youngest of the counsel. I mention it, because I know you will agree with me that he then made a deep and lasting impression upon the bar and the bench. It is no breach of confidence, I suppose, for me to say that at the close of one day's great debate, at the close of his address, I was told by one of the counsel said, 'That young man ought to be chief justice of Massachusetts.' Mr. Lorin replied, 'Mr. Curtis is. He is well enough now to preside over. This was a great deal to be said of so young a man, and by such an authority as Mr. Lorin; but I do not think any large deduc- tions can be made from it, as it was not for the moment."

At the close of Mr. Dana's remarks, the report of the committee was unanimously adopted.

Circuit Court of the United States. District of Massachusetts. May Term, 1874.

The district attorney addressed the court as follows:—'May it please your honors, The sad intelligence of the death of Judge Curtis, coming over the wires, was announced to the court upon the day of his decease, Mr. Justice Shepley, who was presiding, at once directed the court to be adjourned in his honor. When the court adjourned, that the members of the bar might attend the services, and that they might hold a meeting to take such action as should be deemed proper by those who have the care of his decease. That meeting was attended in unusual numbers by members of the bar from every district in this circuit, and from other districts, all profoundly penetrated with un undisclosed sorrow at the death of their distinguished brother, leader, and friend, and grieved over the great metropolis gave utterance to their common sympathy with the members of this bar and the profession everywhere at the great loss which the country has sustained in the loss of Mr. Curtis. At that meeting a committee was appointed, to report at an adjourned meeting the sentiments of the bar, and to extend to the family of Mr. Curtis. That adjournment has been held this morning, and the expressions of the sentiments reported by that committee have been read at the bar meeting. In accordance with the custom of this bar, the attorney of the United States has been requested to present them to the court, and to ask to have them read upon the records. I would ask the respect of your honor, and I think the respect of the bar and of the court, to present them to you. I think the respect of the bar and the court should be the highest respect for his professional, judicial, and personal character, I respectfully request your honor to read these expressions of sentiment and of regard for Mr. Curtis.

stitional questions. Complete success attended his work and the practice of all his duties would have been accorded to him by the bench and many of his friends were much disappointed when he resigned his seat to resume the practice of the profession which he had chosen. He was appointed the commission of associate justice of the supreme court. Deep regrets undoubtedly were felt by many at his decision, but no one ever questioned his right to the decision. He believed that the compensation of a supreme court judge at that period was quite small when compared to what he had been accustomed to earn. He therefore declined the commission of associate justice of the supreme court.

It is never-theless true that his highest eminence and widest reputation were acquired in his forensic displays as a counsel for a brief period before he retired from the practice of law. His arguments were always clear and concise, and his words were always to the point. He was never known to waste time in irrelevant remarks or to depart from the subject under discussion. His speech was always short, to the point, and always to the point.

Other living examples of the kind there are but two or three, but not one of these is at a high court. It has been said that the court has not been able to leave the bench and resume the practice of the law, and find himself able to win in the supreme court, because he would not have what was accorded to him before his elevation, and to secure and retain for a long period a much increased and greater eminence in the forensic art than he enjoyed before he accepted the station from which he subsequently retired. Instances are certainly more frequent where the retiring judge, though he be left the court, has not the high expectation of renewed practice. Professional success, has either fallen to some lucrative instance, and become incapable of practised, professional success, or that all his hopes of professional promotion were vain, and finally to linger out an existence rendered unhappy by the constant association with a younger man who has succeeded him to the faculties and the duties which he himself has performed, as at all will bear witness who were in a situation to see and know what took place. Instead of that, old clients hastened to offer new retainers, and new clients flocked in the same direction, securing to the new applicant for professional employment, in a brief argument, a remunerative engagement that he never could have had and would have been more than satisfied with. It is impossible to obtain more than a statement of the facts of the case and to state the facts in a way that would be of any value for an advocate to explain to the court what he himself does not understand. Having mastered the facts, his own restatement of the innumerable stores of legal knowledge which he possessed, enabled him to accomplish the rest without much additional preparation, as he was able to see almost at a glance the legal weight and significance of every well-established fact in the case, whether considered separately or as a whole. Instructive examples are remunerative and remunerative engagements than he ever represented before he was promoted to the high place from which he voluted. He has not been a professional man ever since he was appointed the associate justice of the supreme court. In this instance, he has not been able to secure the services of a professional man ever since he was appointed the associate justice of the supreme court. In this instance, he has not been able to secure the services of a professional man ever since he was appointed the associate justice of the supreme court.
miliar with the criminal law, as well as with every branch of civil jurisprudence. Clearness, brevity, force, and good judgment characterized all his judicial decisions. His political opinions, as well as his judicial decisions, were maintained in the discussion of matters of fact or issues of law to the court. His address was dignified, calm, and thoughtful, and he never failed to impress the mend of the tribunal addressed that his propositions were entitled to weight, by the justness and logical force of his arguments, which were expressed in language so pure and appropriate that his sentiments never needed the adjunct of fervor or impassioned appeal to make his remarks effective, for the reason that the latter fervor nor appeal could add anything to their force. Artificial he never employed, nor would it have been appropriate, as his powers of reasoning was sufficiently great to render any appeal to sympathy, prejudice, or feeling quite unnecessary, and he seldom indulged in any words of a course of sarcasm. It is a mistake to suppose that his arguments were devoid of warmth and earnest conviction. On the contrary, occasions are remembered when, under the weight of heavy responsibility, and impelled by strong convictions, he, as it were, involuntarily gave utterance to passages of deep solemnity and impressiveness, which indicated that he had cultivated imagination as well as great logical resource. Marked success attended him both as a justice of the supreme court of Illinois and as an advocate at the bar, in both of which callings he was at times exposed to great responsibilities. Few examples that a judge has been compelled to assume a greater responsibility than was devolved upon the distinguished jurist, whose death is the occasion of these observations, when he was constrained by a sense of duty and respect from the majority of the court in the great case which was decided during the last term he ever sat in the supreme court bench. Judges and jurists may differ in opinion whether he was right or wrong, but all must agree that he acted from a sense of public duty, and that he vindicated his conclusion by ability and a course of reasoning rarely ever surpassed. Courage is well-nigh as essential in a judge as in a military commander, and all must admit that the language, upheld by his course on the occasion referred to, was prepared to go wherever conscionable duty pointed. Responsibilities of an unusual character were also assumed by him when he engaged to assist in conducting the defence of the president.

"Public men differed widely upon the subject, but no one who ever read the record of his masterly opinion stated the case will deny that he was the whole master of the occasion. In the most fearless manner, answering every part of the charge by a clear statement of the facts, and by a clear exposition of the legal and constitutional question involved in the case. Never, perhaps, did the great qualities of his mind shine brighter than on those two occasions—the one showing his high qualifications as a judge, and the other his unrivaled powers as an advocate. It seems almost superstitious to speak of the character of our deceased brother, as all admit that it was spotless, and that he lived a life of uprightness and purity from his youth to the moment when he yielded up his spirit to the great Creator. Except for a brief period, his whole professional life has been spent here, and it must be gratifying to his innumerable friends to know that those who have known him most intimately are the freest to admit that in all their intercourse with him he was always actuated by a strict regard to what was right, and by a faithful adherence to every professional engagement. Such a vacancy creates a gap which it is hard to fill on the court as well as by the bar. Many years of intimate relations had endeared him to the court as an example of high professional honor, and as a friend always to be relied upon in his learning, his industry, and his conscientious devotion to duty."

"Resolved, that the members of the bar of the state of Illinois view with sensibility the retirement of the Hon. David Davis from the bench of the supreme court of the United States, and express their profound regret that the country is deprived of the benefit of his services in that distinguished place, which he has so long adorned by his learning, his industry, and his conscientious devotion to duty."

DAVIS, DAVID.

The following proceedings upon his retirement from the bench are reprinted from 7 Biss. 13:

Hon. David Davis, justice of the United States supreme court, assigned to this circuit, having resigned his position on the bench of that court, for the purpose of filling the position of United States senator, to which he is entitled by the legislature of the state of Illinois, the members of the bar within this circuit took early occasion to express their sentiments toward the retiring justice.

Action of the Chicago bar: The Chicago Bar Association, at their regular meeting, passed the following resolutions: "The Honorable David Davis, one of the supreme court of the United States, after a service of more than a quarter of a century as judge of the circuit courts of Illinois, and a career in the legal profession subsequently retired from judicial life, the Bar Association of Chicago think the occasion fitting and proper for an expression of the sentiments of esteem and personal respect, not only from the members, in common with the bar of the country, toward him. During his judicial career no member of the legal profession in this circuit his courts were ever questioned his integrity and honor. He has those clear perceptions and that keen sense of right which made his judgment of facts presented better than precedents, and enabled him to administer the law according to its spirit. In his service of more than fourteen years upon the supreme bench at Washington and at the federal courts, he was distinguished among his fellow judges for intellectual strength, sound judgment, and skill in analyzing principles; and his opinions are models of directness, brevity, and force. In laying aside his judicial robes for another field of service to his country, Judge Davis carries with him the respect, the confidence, and the affectionate regard of the legal profession of the country."

The following were the proceedings of the southern Illinois bar:

Circuit Court at the United States, Southern District of Illinois, Thursday, July 12th, A. D. 1877.

Present, Hon. Thomas Drummond, Presiding Judge. Samuel E. Treat, District Judge.

This day addressed by J. T. Stuart, who addresses the court as follows:

"May it please your honors: A meeting of the bar of this district was held in the court room on yesterday, in which almost every section of the state was represented, and to be remembered for its numbers and for the talent, learning, and reputation of its members; a meeting called to take action in relation to the retirement from the bench of Hon. David Davis. It was hoped and expected that the able lawyer, Hon. Stephen Logan, now venerable on account of his character and age, would perform the duty now devolved upon me of putting those who have known him most intimately are the freest to admit that in all their intercourse with him he was always actuated by a strict regard to what was right, and by a faithful adherence to every professional engagement. Such a vacancy creates a gap which is difficult to fill on the court as well as by the bar. Many years of intimate relations had endeared him to the court as an example of high professional honor, and as a friend always to be relied upon in his learning, his industry, and his conscientious devotion to duty."

"Resolved, that the members of the bar of the state of Illinois view with sensibility the retirement of the Hon. David Davis from the bench of the supreme court of the United States, and express their profound regret that the country is deprived of the benefit of his services in that distinguished place, which he has so long adorned by his learning, his industry, and his conscientious devotion to duty."

"Resolved, that in retiring from his eminent judicial station, he carries with him the confidence and high personal and professional respect and regard of the members of the bar of the state of Illinois.

"Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded in the cause in the circuit to the Hon. David Davis, with an earnest expression of the hope that his future career may be as useful to his country and as honorable to himself as his position in the bar of the state of Illinois, and of the United States.

"The resolutions are expressive of the opinions of the members of the bar of Illinois in favor of the first election for judges under the constitution of 1847, making the office elective. The eighth circuit was then composed of the counties of Sangamon, Champaign, Iliin, Macon, Moultrie, Shelby, Christian, Logan, Vermillion, and Edgar; a large part of the people of the state, and of the legal profession. The election of Judge Davis was free, unimpeached, a just and certain criterion of his qualifications, and an incontestable compliment; but it was a higher compliment that for the ensuing six years he discharged the duties of that office so well, that in 1853 he was re-elected without opposition, and again re-elected in 1856 without opposition in a circuit somewhat changed. Mr. Lincoln was no mean judge, human judge he was; his decisions were in the same manner of law at the same bar with David Davis from 1833 to 1848, and before him as judge for the twelve years previous. The 1847 law on his appointment; and when he became a judge he appointed David Davis to the second vacancy on the bench of the supreme court of the United States. Judge Davis was a justice of the supreme court of the United States, and presiding justice of the circuit court of Illinois. In the long period of time that his appointment to his present position has been continued, the growth and development of his views and opinions as comprehensively as a judge. That he administered the law and constitution faithfully, the truth and the truth of the law, and his province of his convictions pointed the way; that he was a just judge; that his retirement from the bench has been the result of the long and arduous labor of the profession and the public; that the solutions of the circuit court have been carried with him in that retirement, that he was a judge of the Supreme Court of Illinois; in presenting these resolutions and confining myself to the judicial career of Judge Davis, I have not said all that I ought to say; but I cannot refrain from adding, on my own account, that I have known David Davis intimately and well as a man and as a lawyer, and in his social and political relations, for these forty-two years past; and that in all these relations he is without a stain, and that in all he has been true to himself, honest and uncorrupted, and that, from all his past life, he may be safely trusted to do, on all occasions, only what he believes to be true and right.

It is ordered, that the foregoing resolutions and the address of Hon. John T. Stuart thereupon, be spread upon the records of said court, and a certified copy thereof be transmitted to the Hon. David Davis.

Action of the Indianapolis bar: At the meeting of the Indianapolis bar, the following resolutions were adopted: Hon. Joseph E. McDonald, Gen. Benj. Harrison, Judge S. H. Buskirk, Hon. Thomas M. Browne, Hon. J. D. Morris, Judge Ed. Claypool, and Hon. W. J. Pleasbuck. This committee referred and shortly reported the following resolutions:

"The members of the bar of the courts of the United States in Indiana in the circuit to the Hon. David Davis from the supreme court, and the bench of this circuit, respectfully ask this court to accept and place upon its records this testimonial and affection for the great judicial officer who has withdrawn from this department of the public service. We have, for the last thirty years, had personal knowledge of Judge Davis as one of the associate justices of the supreme court, and as the judge assigned by that tribunal to hold the courts of the United States in the seventh judicial circuit, and we have fully appreciated his learning and ability as a judge, and his fearless, independent, impartial and严格执行 of affairs, his intuitive discernment of character, his rapid analysis of evidence, however voluminous, his pertinacity in detecting the vital facts in a cause, and his broad and masterly application of principles have stamped him as a judicial officer of the highest order, and have furnished an example of judicial service which can never be forgotten by those whose privilege it has been to assist in it as members of his court. His public record, so far as we deplore. The man whose society we have enjoyed, and whose confidence many of us have shared, had practiced at the bar with the loss we deplore. The man whose society we have enjoyed, and whose confidence many of us have shared, had practiced at the bar. His liberal humanity, his ready recognition of the rights and feelings of all with whom he is brought in contact, his indifference to merely accidental distinctions, his kindly interest in the young, his evident anxiety to search out and vindicate the very right of a cause, and his contempt for all arts, applied to his office and mind the may be diverted from the direct channel of justice, have enriched and ennobled his career, and will make its memory a useful example. Senator McDonald presented the resolutions. He referred to the time when Judge Davis came upon the bench as one particularly calculated to test the character of the judge. Patriotism ran high, and this has been intensified and embittered by Civil War. But when Judge Davis assumed the bench, patriotism was lost in the judge. From the beginning to the end of his judicial career he was never known to swerve from the path of official duty.

General Harrison referred to the recent success of Judge Davis in winning and retaining the respect of lawyers, litigants and jurors. His astuteness and political sagacity are the respect of all with whom he has intercourse as a judge or as a man. As a judge he was unsurpassed; his powers of observation and analysis were marked in the manner in which he dissected intricate questions of evidence, and the clear and comprehensive way in which he presented his views to juries. It is the expectation of his friends that he will pursue the same independence and unshakable integrity of character in the new position to which he has been called, as he ever manifested on the bench.

Hon. A. G. Porter said that Judge Davis was distinguished for the strong yet simple honesty of his character. He was intellectually and morally honest, and in his personal relations he was always honest and straightforward; the man who had described him exactly when he remarked that "Judge Davis was big all over, intellectually, morally, and personally." Hon. W. J. Pleasbuck referred to the wonderful clearness and readiness of Judge Davis in grasping and analyzing legal questions. He was eminently skilled in his profession and held high social gifts, his kindness and simplicity of character. Hon. John Hanna, General Thomas Browne, Judge Buskirk, and H. G. Fierce also made remarks, each paying tribute to the high qualities of Judge Davis as a judicial officer and a man.

The resolutions were then unanimously adopted and ordered spread upon the records of the circuit court, and a copy of the same sent to Judge Davis.
DAVIS, JOHN.

The following proceedings are reprinted from 1 Story, 618:

"Within the period of time embraced by the proceedings, the casualties, the privations, the suffering, and the disgrace by his dignity and wisdom. Upon an intimation that it was his intention to resign, a meeting of the Suffolk bar was held on the 9th of July, 1841, at which it was unanimously resolved:

"That the attorney of the United States be requested, in the name of this bar, to make known to Judge Davis the high sense we all entertain of the importance of his judicial labors, which for so many years have exhibited varied and accurate learning, sound and discriminating judgment, unwearyed patience, gentleness of manners, and perfect purity; and that Mr. Attorney be requested to express our heartfelt wishes, that he may find in retirement that dignified repose, which forms the appropriate close of a long and useful life, and to bid him an affectionate farewell."

In accordance with these resolutions, Franklin Dexter, Esq., the district attorney of the United States, at the time appointed, rose and addressed Judge Davis as follows:

"May it please your honor:—By these resolutions I am requested, in the name of the Suffolk bar, to express to you the sense of the value of your judicial labors, and their acknowledgment of the personal kindness, as well as the distinguished ability, with which they have been performed. This is, sir, to me a most grateful duty;—and yet I feel the difficulty of giving any adequate expression of the deep and warm affection of my brethren, without danger of offending the modesty, which, through a long life of usefulness, has adorned so many talents and so many virtues. I will not, therefore, depart from the simple and comprehensive language of the resolution in describing to you our general estimation of your judicial character and conduct. But let me assure you, sir, that these are not words of mere form, required by the occasion; but the sincere and spontaneous expression of the feelings and opinions of every member of the bar, and of this commercial community. It can rarely happen, that a judge, who is called upon to decide so many delicate and important questions of personal right, should so entirely have escaped all imputation of prejudice or passion, and should have found so general an acquiescence in his results. It is not to be forgotten, in the peaceful tenor of the present times, that your official career has been formerly marked with extraordinary difficulty. When you assumed its duties,—more than forty years ago,—before any of this fraternity had begun the active business of life,—the stores of judicial learning in that peculiar branch of the law, which you have been called most frequently to administer, were by no means so near at hand as at present;—then it was necessary petersa fonts, and from those fountains your own decisions have been, with those of your distinguished contemporaries in Europe and America, drawn down the principles of the admiralty law within the reach of comparatively easy exertion. A few years after that time the system of commercial intercourse, and by that the government, threw this portion of the country into a state of unparalleled distress and exasperation. An alarm of civil dissolution was suddenly checked in all its issues and enterprises, and the revolution threatened to break down the barriers that had been hitherto respected and upheld by the laws of the district court, and under your administration, that this struggle took place; and although juries refused to execute the obnoxious restrictions in which we were required by the law, we were subjected to them, yet the supremacy of the law suffered no detriment in the hands of the court. Few of us can remember by what authority, of what source, or on what principle, how painful a duty it was to be thus placed in opposition to the feelings and interests of this community. Perhaps it may be pardoned for recalling to the minds of the bar, in your presence, the beautiful language in which your own regrets were expressed, when you felt called to declare, that, disastrous as its consequences were to the country, the embargo was still the law of the land, and as such to be obeyed. If I am not amiss in my recollection, of the profession of profitable pursuits and many enterprise, to which it has been thought necessary to subject the citizens of this great community, to respect the merchant and his employment. The disconcerted mariner demands our sympathy. The sound of the axe and of the hammer would be grateful music. In the midst of a dreary waste, by the swelling sail and floating streamer, becomes an exhilarating object; and it is painful to perceive, by force of any continence, the American stars and stripes vanishing from the scene. Commerce, indeed, merits all the eulogy, which we have heard pronounced at the bar. It is the welcome attendant of civilized man, in all his various stations. It is the nurse of arts; the genial friend of liberty; justice, and order; the sure source of national wealth and greatness; the promoter of moral and intellectual improvement; of generous affections and enlarged philanthropy. Connected with the rivers, and capacious havens, equally with the fertile bosom of the earth, suggest, to the reflecting mind, the purposes of a beneficent providence, relative to the destination and employments of man. Let us not entertain the gloomy apprehension, that advantages so precious are altogether abandoned; that pursuits once so valuable shall remain unimproved. Let us rather cherish a hope, that commercial activity and intercourse, with all their wholesome energy of enterprise, and that our merchants and our mariners will, again, be permitted to pursue their wonted employments, consistently with the national safety, honor, and independence. From that time, sir, down to this most interesting period, when you are about to surrender the high trust, you have so long held, that the bar have felt undiminished confidence in the ability and integrity of your administration of the law, and of our fillial respect and affection for yourself has constantly increased with your increasing years. And while we acknowledge your right now to seek the repose of private life, we feel, that your retirement is not less, than it ever would have been, a loss to the profession and to the public. I am further instructed, sir, by the fraternity of the bar, to express to you their heartfelt wishes, that you may find in retirement that dignified repose, which forms the appropriate close of a long and useful life. May you live long and happily,—as long as life shall continue to be a blessing to you; and so long will that life be a blessing to your friends and to society."

Judge Davis was sensibly affected at this address, and it was some moments before he was able to respond. When he commenced his reply, the bar rose and gathered round the bench, while the venerable judge delivered the following address:

"Gentlemen of the Suffolk bar:—I receive gratefully and with deep sensibility your generous and kind expressions, communicated by a representative most justly entitled to that selection, and to whom I would tender my acknowledgments for his very activc and the general gov-
With the members of this bar, and with their predecessors, I have had frequent, gratifying, and improving intercourse. Should I attempt to give expression to the recollections, which on this occasion arise rapidly and somewhat confusingly to my view, I could do it but imperfectly. If a listener were present, he should ever be exhorted to be prepared to meet the same embarrassment in this particular. Frequently, no place could be found for holding the courts of the United States, but in a corner. And at one time, I recollect, Marshal Prince announced, that he had heard, or that wrote to Washington, that he knew not where to find a place for the court, but under the great tree on the common.

"Among the clerks of this court, the last-named was, as you know, most near and dear to the seats of his duties of his trust. When your obliging sentiments were read, and I listened to the interesting accompaniments, offered by a son of an esteemed friend and classmate, it brought to mind the reply made at a council fire, in a talk in our forest border. 'Good words,' said an aged chief, 'Good words, and I believe good words I cannot tell to my son, but I shall tell them to his children. Of his six sons, all now very young, some one or more in office, in the ambition to take a place in your corps. If so, I am sure, they will find a welcome, and be received with generous good will.' Mr. Bassett, his assistant in his illness, and his tried friend and classmate, became his successor in the office. You well know his merits, his accuracy, and fidelity. Everything is in the department is to my entire satisfaction. The connexion of the court with the present district attorney and marshal is quite recent. I should have remained in it if I well knew the satisfaction, with which my intercourse with them would be attended. It will be experienced, I am confident, in abundant measure by my-own position, and by all, with whom they may have connexion, in the interesting offices committed to their charge.

The Suffolk bar is greatly increasing in the forty years of my judicial life. There are on its list more than six times the number of 1801. If we deduct from the list those, who are engaged in other pursuits, although they are, and Adams, George Blake, Gay, Quincy, Rowe, Williams, and Cushing, Messrs. Hall, Otis, and Rum from the bar. Adams, Gay, Rowe, Quincy, and Cushing have changed their residence; and Mr. Williams is the only one of the names that appears at the Suffolk bar.

The officers connected with the United States courts in this district, in my time, besides the present occupants, are H. G. Otis, Mr. Adams, George Blake, H. G. Shaw, and John W. Davis, clerks; Samuel Bradford, Thompson J. Skinner, James Prince, Samuel Harris, and Jonas Sibley, marshals. Mr. Otis was but a short time in office, being removed by President Jefferson, in a few months after the apportionment received from President Adams. Mr. Blake held the office many years, some of them years of great and peculiar pressure and perplexity, with eminent ability and statesmanship, and his successor, Mr. Dunlap, performed his official duties with similar energies, and with his characteristic ardor, tempered with gentleness and prudence. Many now present remember his signal exertions, when he stood alone in the arduous trial of the pirates, in 1834, the number of the prisoners was 221, and the case was remanded by their junior counsel, being equal to the number of the jury, by whom their fate was to be decided. Mr. Mills, who succeeded Mr. Dunlap, has recently resigned. He left us with the cordial esteem of all, with whom he was connected, —faithful, accurate, and able in his official transactions. It was only regretted, that he did not find it convenient to make this, the place of his business in office, his place of abode. The discreet employment of a competent and very attentive assistant, in a great degree, was a sufficient substitute. It has always, I think, been important, and the urgency is continuously augmenting, that the attorney, marshal, and clerk of the United States courts in this district, should reside in or near the place, where the business, to which their offices have relation, is transacted. Of Marshals Bradford, Prince, Harris, and Sibley, I have spoken in deserved terms of commendation, when the present marshal was mentioned. The clerkship of the office of the United States courts, was and is, a means ofnoblesse, and very acceptable accommodations for the United States courts, and all connected with them, in this edifice, in connection with the city government. There have been times, when there has been peculiar tion, the peace and repose of families, the affairs of various associations, the nearest temporal interests, are occasionally committed to his charges. This often occurs the saddest order, when some forlorn being, in a state of awful uncertainty, leans on him for support, and life hangs trembling on his exertion. The Lawyer, Judge Lovell, suggests the opinion of one of his friends, a respected veteran, who had retired from practice, in regard to the moral tendency of the profession, which, if it were just, would impair its estimation and cloud its brightest honors. That friend is represented, as declaring, that 'He would never be backward in the recognition of this great law, nor leave him a competence, independent of it, because he doubted much, whether he could thrive in it, at all events without sacrificing more of his honor and conscience than a man of any delicacy would wish for.' Very different was the opinion of my excellent predecessor, the Hon. Judge Lovejoy, an ornament of his profession, the delight of every friend and admirer of virtue, genius, and intellect. I remember to have heard him more than once express, in his emphatic manner, his persuasion, that the sentiments and habits, generated by legal studies and pursuits, were a precious security against wickedness, and that they had a favorable tendency to invigorate and improve the moral sense, as well as the intellectual faculties. This is sustained by Lord Coke. "For thy encouragement," says that eminent jurist, "cast thine eye upon the sages of the law, and observe how they have, those, and never shall thou find any, that have excelled in the knowledge of the law, but hath drawn from the beginning of discipline, of honesty, gravity, and integrity." With such convictions and the eminent examples, which it has been my good fortune to witness, it has been my endeavor to maintain a corresponding contempt for those, and to be habitually mindful of our respective duties. Truth, says Malebranche, loves gentleness and peace. It has, I hope, been observed in our transactions together, sometimes of exciting tendency, that irritation and ill humor are not necessary incidents in legal controversies; but that the precious elements, truly and essentially appertaining to tribunals of justice, forbearance, moderation, and mutual civility, are the most favorable for full discussion and just decision, and in entire consistency with that manly character and uniform assertion of right, which it is the honor and duty of the bar and the bench respectively to maintain.

"When I received my appointment, there was a district court, and a district judge had not a seat in that court. It was then my impression, abundantly confirmed since, that the alteration of that fact was a great improvement. The employments of the district judge, of various descriptions in court, and of ministerial and miscellaneous character, are of such amounts in this highly commercial district, that it seems neither reasonable nor advantageous to require his attendance and agency in another court. This consideration will be more especially urgent, if a bankrupt law should be enacted, and the jurisdiction of the court should be enlarged in reference to crimes and offenses, one or both of which augmentations of the duties of the district judge, there seems reason to expect. By becoming connected with the circuit court, I had the satisfaction of an association and intimacy with the venerable Judge Cush- ing, and of affording, I believe, some acceptable aid in his decline of life; and I have, in my turn, received relief and great enjoyment with his distinguished successor, the Hon. Mr. Justice Story. In that connection I have found every thing that could be desired. In business, never asking nor expecting from me more than my engagements in my own special sphere would consist of. By the energy of his mind and unwearying industry, in a great degree relieving a solicitude, which I might otherwise have experienced, from the disabilities in reference to the circuit court, and by his able decisions, as well as by his learned labors, inter sylvas academic, affording salutary aid in various departments of my official duty. I have noticed with pleasure the improving influence of the law school in the University. The professional publications from some of his young pupils at this bar are highly honorable to them and to their instructor. I must forbear, gentlemen, to enlarge, though there remain topics, connected with his position, which it would not be improper to consider. A great portion of the business, which we have been concerned in transacting, has been of admiralty jurisdiction, in which the trial rests wholly with the judge, and in equity as well as law. This characteristic, in regard to a large portion of the cases before him, is attended with peculiar solemn, if he can, without not leave him a competence, independent of it, because he doubted much, whether he could thrive in it, at all events without sacrificing more of his honor and conscience than a man of any delicacy would wish for." [For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1350.]

The following proceedings are reprinted from 5 Dill. 675:

On the 20th day of May, 1879, the circuit judge sent the following order to the Clerk of the Circuit Court:

"Davenport, Iowa, May 29th, 1879. To the President: I hereby tender my resignation of the office of circuit judge of the United States for the eighth judicial circuit, to take effect at the term of Court, which begins on the first day of September, 1879. The date thus fixed will enable me to attend the rest of the summer cir-tuits to dispose of the unfinished business before me, and will likewise enable my successor, should he be nominated and confirmed before Congress adjourns, to qualify in time to hold the earliest of the fall terms. In voluntarily terminating a judicial career which has been spent on the state and federal bench, it seems fitting to add that I take this step not because I am dissatisfied with the duties of the office, but because I have recently been honored by an election to a place of commanding usefulness in Columbia College, where the labors are lighter, the compensation greater, and which also, in the leisure it affords, as well as in the duties it requires, offers opportunities for the study and advancement of the law that may well satisfy the highest professional ambition. I have the honor to be, with the highest regard, your obedient servant, John F. Dillon.

The resignation was accepted in the following letter:

"Department of Justice, Washington, June 11th, 1878. Honorable John F. Dillon, United States Circuit Judge, Davenport, Iowa: Sir:—Yours of the 20th ult., tendering to the president your resignation of the judicial duties of the United States for the eighth judicial circuit, to take effect September 1st next, is received, and the resignation accepted according to its terms. I desire to express my regret that we are to lose you in the judicial service, and to wish you a most cordial and agreeable career in the other pursuits to which you have been addressed; that you may live to see these expressions will you permit me also to concurs. Very respectfully, Charles Devens, Attorney General."

"Kansas."

On the 10th day of June, 1878, the members of the bar in Kansas in attendance at the June term of the United States circuit court, at Leavenworth, passed the following resolution:

"That the Honorable A. J. Williams be authorized to present the accompanying address to the United States circuit court, and ask that it be read upon the record; and that the Honorable Robert Crozier, on behalf of the state judiciary, and the Honorable George R. Peck, the United States district attorney, on behalf of the practicing attorneys of the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas, be requested to follow with appropriate remarks; and that the report of the several addresses be entered with thanks in the official journal of this court in the behalf of the record of the proceedings of both.

On the next day Mr. Williams presented, in open court, the following address on behalf of the bar, Mr. Justice Miller presiding:

"To the Honorable John F. Dillon: Sir:—At a meeting of the bar of the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas, it was unanimously ordered that an address be prepared and presented to you which should appropriately express the sentiments of the profession upon your voluntary retirement from the bench. In obeying that command, we feel that it is impossible by mere words to convey to you, and through this expression (which we shall ask to be made a matter of record) to the public, any adequate idea of our sense of the irreparable loss is your retirement. For ten years past it has been the habit of the bar of this circuit to look forward to the recurrence of your term, and the highest result of this pleasant prospect of meeting you as a friend and the invaluable experience of attending upon your righteous and lenient sway. The assembling of the bar has been with unbroken regularity, and thus has been knit into a delightful custom, it had fondly seemed to us would end only with your earthly career. We can only look forward to the approaching close of this relation with sadness. It is seldom, we believe, that there is mingled in so great a degree of respect and admiration for an able and upright judge with the tender regard which only characterizes sincere and intimate friendship as may be found in the case of the bar of your circuit toward yourself. It is a matter of public concern when a judge, with special aptitudes for his great calling, is ripened by twenty-one years of continuous experience, becomes emeritus and retires from the higher learned honors. The loss is not ours simply, or chiefly, nor are we alone fully appreciative of it. But the connection of bench and bar is such that we can most aptly express our desire to assure you, Sir, with a sincerity that is unfeigned, that though this proceeding partakes somewhat of the formalities of procedure of justice, yet this is not formal leave-taking. It is a parting that touches the heart and suffuses the eye. We cannot hope to add to this thanksgiving for anything to your great fame as a chancellor and judge. Neither can we extend your reputation as a philosophic student and writer upon the law, already so extensively among all Anglo-Saxon people. We seek to express only our appreciation of your public services as a jurist as witnessed and known by ourselves, and our regrets that they are about to end. The bar of your circuit owe you a debt of gratitude for many things, and an ample uniform help and encouragement you have ever extended to young practitioners. Your unfailing patience, the stimulus of your approving smile, your genial obviousness of the evidences of the young lawyer struggling for a place with his ablest fellows, have endeared you to both young and old, and taught us all for charitable assistance. Not a few of the younger lawyers of your circuit owe at least the greater part of the success they have achieved to the direct personal interest you have taken in them. We do not feel that we should omit gratefully to acknowledge the service we may all derive from the example of your professional and personal life. You have been of such a mind that it is not only that there is no excellence without great labor, but how marvelously a degree of excellence labor united to probity of conduct may attain. We behold in you one who owes nothing to fortune, and but little to prefigurement—one who has risen by force of merits alone. No envy or detraction can shadow the influence you have received, or anyfortune with which you may be endowed, for it must be admitted on all hands that the practical intellect has always penetrated the husks of discussion to the kernel of controversy, and your conclusions have, for the most part, not only stood firm, but generally, but have been warmly acquiesced in even by the counsel whom your judgments have defeated. A term of this court has not only been regarded by the oldest and most experienced of our practitioners as a school where the better parts of their profession were ably taught, but it has been a source of pride to us all that, as counselors here, we were assisting in as pure and efficient an administration of public justice as is possible anywhere. It is with the greatest satisfaction, however, that the bar of this circuit is credibly informed that your new avocation will indulge you in that staidulous leisure which, with the preservation of your strength, must result in still further benefit of the philosophic student of the jurisprudence of this country. In conclusion, we would say that we hope on so long and with that energy may attend you; that your physical and mental vigor may be long preserved for the sake of the noble science to which you have devoted your life; and that you may preserve undiminished your recollection of the bar of the eighth circuit, who will ever remember you in the warmest affection and esteem."

Following this came an address on behalf of the practicing attorneys of the United States circuit court, by Mr. George R. Peck.

May it please the court: I would be obviously improper, in the performance of the duty assigned to me by my brethren of the bar, to mar the beauty and the appropriateness of the address just presented to the court by any formal or extended remarks. This is no time for praise, unless it comes from the heart. What I could wish to do is to impress upon his proceedings here that it is a tribute, not to the judge, but to the friend. As has been so well suggested by my friend Mr. Williams, all motives for high praise are not without an adopted form. Whatever may be said here is the genuine and spontaneous feeling of the heart, or it is nothing. The court, like the king, never dies. Judge Dillon's place will be filled by another, and our contentions go on as before: but we shall miss the features of that familiar face, miss the tones of that familiar voice. If I were called upon to analyze Judge Dillon's character, I should place, where it properly belongs, the moral above the intellectual—the heart above the mind. Genius may inspire admiration, but it is only the kind and sympathetic heart that can win affection. Judge Dillon's crowning glory is that he is a man and a legislator which has endeared him to all, and especially to those who, by reason of their professional duties, know him best. I do not doubt that he is ambitious, in the truest sense of that word, but I presume he is not insensitive to the many honors which have been showered upon him, but we have all seen in that pure and blameless home, in which the great judge is dearer than ambition, dearer than fame, is that sentiment so beautifully expressed in the lines of Tennyson:

How'er it be, it seems to me
'Tis only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets.
And simple faith, than Norman blood.'

I ought to speak of his learning, known and recognized by jurists and lawyers everywhere; of his legal writings, which are cited as authority in the rude court-room of the frontier and in the classic walls of Westminster Hall. I ought to speak of his industry, that devotion to the laborious duties of his station which has enabled him to do what I believe no other circuit judge has ever done—to hold two terms of court in each district of his circuit during every year of his administration of the judicial office; and when we remember that his circuit is an empire extending from the British possessions to Louisiana, from the Mississippi to the mountains and beyond, it is a great testimony to the high sense of duty which governed all his judgments, and by which he measured all rights justify, that the judge of the law, in speaking of that clearness of vision which enabled him to see what we could not or would not, which guided him straight through all our fallacies and all our sophistries to the very heart and truth of the matter, I ought to speak of that dignity mingled with human sympathy, which made it plain to all men that here was a man who never forgot that he was a judge; here was a judge who never forgot that he was a man. I ought to speak of that strong sense of justice and equity, that hatred of wrong and oppression, which were so marked in his judicial character, that I thought, like his Museum's, he should enter unsalted the court-room of the unjust judge, robbed only in a miller's coat and hat, all heads would bow and all tongues be silenced, "This is our man!" I ought to speak of his firm base, which ever upheld the right and repressed the wrong with the same iron hand. I ought to speak of his pride—pardonable pride—that when that venerable institution of learning, seated at the commercial gateway of the continent, with whose position he was fully acquainted, sought to find the one man who could fill a most important chair, she reached her hand across the prairies and plains to our own civilization. But I have no heart to speak of these things at this parting moment. I can think only of his goodness, his kindness, and his sympathy. I know not whether a lawyer's prayer can avail anything in the chancery above, but, speaking for all my brethren of the bar, if I could tie him by the hand—that hand which has led us all so long—I would say, good bye, and may God give you peace, health, strength, and happiness, and a long life.

On behalf of the members of the southern Kansas bar, the following address was delivered by Mr. A. A. Harris, of Fort Scott:

"May it please the court: The members of the bar of the southern portion of the state feel that they cannot permit this occasion to pass without some expression of the thought that every word of the address which has been reported and unanimously adopted. Accordingly, as a humble spokesman, I here declare, not only for them, but for the people of southern Kansas, irrespective of party, creed, or sect, that, in common with the enlightened people of the whole circuit, we greatly regret Judge Dillon's determination to retire from the bench. Upon one occasion, when a client of mine had a suit pending in this court which involved to him a very large sum, and an adverse decision of which would reduce him to poverty, I was asked by him what sort of a court was the one in which we had to try our case. I told him that Judge Dillon was a pure man, and an able man; that for the purposes for which we had to try a good case that I had ever practiced in, and the worst one in which to try a bad case. I intended, sir, but to say, that is the court where Judge Dillon presided law and justice were impartially administered. At the June term, 1876, on a motion to remand a case to the state court, in which some exceedingly difficult points were to be determined, Judge Dillon, after argument by myself and my very able opponent, told us from the bench one morning that he was so glad to hear us further on the points involved. I could but say to him that about all I knew about the removal act of 1876 I had learned from him. Sir, I care not what may be the wisdom of the executive, or that body which has the power to confirm his nomination, we shall not find in Judge Dillon's success the least allusion to the clear intellect, and full, complete learning upon which we have heretofore so implicitly relied. We part with him with great regret. We shall watch his future career with great interest, and, howsoever fortune may smile upon him, he may rest assured that he has no warmer, truer friends than we.

On behalf of the state judiciary, the following remarks were made by Mr. Robert Crozier: "I would have been satisfied to have read the report of the committee as embodying my own views of the subject under consideration, but having been chosen by the committee to speak on behalf of the judges, I am under the necessity of giving a few words, which I have endeavored to do in a few words are appropriate. Being an old citizen of the state, and well acquainted with the judiciary thereof, from its origin, I feel as liberal as a gentleman occupying judicial positions in the state at the present time. Before the advent of Judge Dillon as judge of the eighth circuit, we were prepared, looking to his former reputation as a jurist, with which we were a court of the utmost respect, to welcome him with glad faces and open arms, and we did so. During the time of his administration of the law as judge of the eighth circuit, and his munitions of that business, we might be enlightened by his luminous exposition of the laws and the acknowledged and the law which he made; and we would be permitted, in the exercise of the functions of the judgments upon us, to sit under the ruling of one commanding the respect of the whole of us. In the absence of the years, I can now say, for the judiciary of the state, that our highest expectations in this regard have been more than fully realized; and not only have we realized, but there shall be a final separation, our admiration is as glowing as at the beginning. We welcomed him with open arms upon his advent; and we bow him out at his exit with the same feelings of respect and kind regard that then influenced us. He goes to another bar, with the state of the republic—a position of commanding influence in moulding the jurisprudence of the nation; and although separated from us physically, we shall feel filled with the same high admiration for him as one of the great brotherhood of lawyers, whose influence in moulding the destinies of the nation is profound and permanent. And I think, for that, for the judiciary of the state, that the regret at his departure will be considered not only a personal loss to us, but a deprivation to those with reference to whom we must administer the laws of the state. We take, however, to ourselves this consolation, that, though removed to another sphere, it will be one of such commanding influence that, although not binding upon us, we shall be compelled to respect his utterances. Very assured, at a time when he seemed again speedily or otherwise—when he comes amongst us again, although disrobed of the eminence, we shall welcome him as cordially, respect him as thoroughly, and admire him as profoundly, as at any stage of his career among us, when clothed with power to command us.

Robert C. Judd’s letter: "Gentlemen of the bar. I have no words fitting to respond to the addresses with which I have just been honored. My mind is saddened by the reflections which this parting scene suggests. How can I give them expression? I ought scarcely to attempt it. I feel bound to the state of Kansas, where I have lived and labored so many years, and I have received from one of its members. His resignation is a loss which must be felt by the bar of the eighth circuit, by the people among whom he has administered justice so long and so well, and by his associates in the address written, in the remarks which have accompanied it. I shall cherish it as long as I live, and its record here is one to which those who care for me after I am gone, will point with pride. Farewell!"

Mr. Justice Mahon then said: "The court is in full sympathy with the bar in the sentiments which have just been expressed in regard to the retirement of one of its members. But, in giving expression of regret, it is not necessary that any single line that, living or dying, I would wish to blot, is the expression of your confidence, and regard contain, and regard, which I have so kindly honored me, and in the remarks which have accompanied it. I shall cherish it as long as I live, and its record here is one to which those who care for me after I am gone, will point with pride. Farewell!"

There was subsequently presented, on behalf of the members of the bar and the citizens of St. Louis, the following invitation, engraved and elegantly illuminated:

"St. Louis, Mo., September 1st, 1879. To the Honorable John F. Dillon, United States Circuit Judge of the Eighth Circuit: We, the undersigned, lawyers, citizens, and others, citizens of St. Louis, Missouri, viewing with profound regret the prospect of your relinquishment of the judicial station you have so eminently adorned, desire to make a suitable demonstration of their high respect and regard for you personally, and of the estimation in which you are held by your brethren of the bar in this city. You therefore tender you a public banquet, in St. Louis, at such time as you may be pleased to designate. We are, sir, your obedient servants, John R. Shepley, George A. Madill, John B. To which was given the following response:

"Davenport, Iowa, September 15th, 1879. Gentlemen:—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your invitation of the 1st inst., in which, after expressing your regret at my retirement from the judicial station I have held among you so long, you have tendered me a public banquet as a testimonial of your respect and regard. I perceive from the signatures to the invitation that it comes from many of the eminent lawyers, great and small, of the city of St. Louis. Of the similar expressions which the event referred to has called forth in this judicial circuit, none has penetrated more sensibly; and if anything could make me regret a step taken from a sense of duty to myself and my family, it would be that I was leaving a region in which my judicial labors are so generously viewed and partaking from friends so devoted, to enter upon untried duties in a community in which I am personally almost a stranger. I had heard until to-day that I might be able to accept the proffered honor, but, for reasons which I need not detail, I find that I must thank you. But I may well be uncertain when my duties and engagements there will allow me to return to the west. I am, therefore, most reluctantly obliged to forego the pleasure of meeting you in the manner you propose, and the privilege of expressing my profound sense of the many obligations which I owe to the great and honorable citizens of St. Louis. Have placed me in, and saying my farewell to you and your citizens in person. Permit me to add yet another word. I look upon your invitation not simply as a compliment to me personally, but also as an expression of your sense of the supreme importance of the judicial office, not only to the great interests which you represent, but to the entire country. The fearless and independent discharge of the duties of a judge will inevitably bring him into the freest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fairest road, and the fare..."
The soundness and accuracy of his opinions, and his uniform kindness and courtesy to the bar; for a consistent administration of justice that has shed a lustre on the science of the law, and has in many ways conduced to its clearness and purification.

Resolved, that, as Judge Dillon retires to another field of labor, we trust that he may find in its wider usefulness, and some diminution of the arduous toil that has marked his judicial labors, which seemed to test the limits of physical and mental endurance; and we beg leave to assure him that he carries with him our best wishes for an easier and a long and prosperous life, and in the may, by his investigations, add to his valuable contributions to legal learning, which have already made his name a household word with the bar and the courts of the country.

Resolved, that the secretary of this meeting be requested to forward to Judge Dillon a copy of these resolutions.

Upon motion of Mr. M. W. Benjamins, the resolutions were unanimously adopted. Upon motion of Honorable C. W. W. H. English, chief justice of the supreme court of the state, the president appointed a committee of three to draft resolutions properly expressing the sentiments of the bar of Arkansas in relation to the resignation of Judge Dillon. The committee consisted of Messrs. U. M. Rose, T. D. W. Yonley, and R. A. Howard. The committee reported the following resolutions. Before reading them, Mr. U. M. Rose read the following extract from a letter recently received by him from Judge Dillon:

"Leaveworth, Kansas, June 5th, 1879. Dear Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the proceedings of the bar of Little Rock relative to my retirement from the bench. I am fully sensible of the debt I owe to the bar of your state, and I fully prize this expression of their regard and friendship. I am grateful for it. It places me under no perpetual obligation. I part from them with unfeigned regret. They have a sunny spot in my heart, and a cherished place in my memory. I beg you to accept, personally, my warm thanks for your kind expressions and well wishes. I am, very truly and sincerely yours, John F. Dillon."

At a session of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, held at the court-house in the city of Omaha, on the 25th day of June, 1879—Honorable Elmer S. Dundy, district judge, presiding—Mr. E. J. Brown, a counsel of the circuit court, appeared and stated that, at a meeting of the members of the bar, whereof he was president, a committee was appointed to express in fitting resolutions the sentiments of the bar on the occasion of the retirement of his honor, the circuit judge, from the bench, which committee consisted of Mr. J. M. Woolworth, Mr. E. W. Welby, Mr. Clinton Briggs, Mr. W. G. Richards, and Mr. G. G. Hull; that the said committee had reported to the meeting certain resolutions, which were unanimously adopted; and that the said meeting had instructed him to present the same to the court and move that the same be recorded in the record of its proceedings. Whereupon it was ordered that the motion be granted, and the clerk spread the said resolutions at length upon the records of the proceedings of the court. The resolutions are as follows:

Resolved: That, having been advised of the resignation by the Honorable John F. Dillon of his position as judge of this circuit, we are impressed with a feeling of regret, and desire to convey to him a respectful manner our sincere admiration for the great learning, impartiality, and uprightness displayed by him while on the federal bench, suit court, for ourselves and in behalf of the bar of this state, do resolve:

"First. That, during the whole of his service on the bench of this circuit, which was preceded by a judicial career of much honor, Judge Dillon has devoted to the discharge of his great and laborious duties, a full measure of integrity, capacity, learning, industry, and impartiality demanded of the incumbent, as attested by the general judgment of the bar and the people.

"Second. As a jurist and legal author, he has advanced the profession, has won a national reputation, and reflected credit upon the west, where his work has been done and estated.

"Third. As a citizen and man, he has secured the very high respect and confidence of the public, by the sincerity, uprightness, and purity of his life and character, his fidelity to obligation, and his sense and love of justice in the administration of his duty.

"Fourth. In the new and responsible field of duty to which he is called, he will have the utmost faith in his ability to meet its demands with signal usefulness and success, and our earnest wishes that he may be in all things prospered.

"Fifth. That the circuit court be requested to cause these resolutions to be entered in the record of its proceedings, and that a copy thereof be transmitted to Judge Dillon."

IOWA.

"Des Moines, Iowa, August 22nd, 1879. Honorable John E. Dillon, Davenport, Iowa: Dear Sir:—I have the honor to commit the bar of the state to communicate this wish. Allow us to suggest some evening during the next term of the United States Circuit Court at this place. We sincerely hope you will accept this proffered compliment. So long identified with the profession and with the judiciary, so intimately connected with the growth and prosperity of Iowa, and so much esteemed and respected as you are by her bar and people, we shall regard it as a very great pleasure to unite and extend to you our friendly greetings before you leave to enter, as we hope, upon even a larger field of usefulness. Be pleased to advise us of your pleasure in the promises. We are, judge, as ever, your friends, truly,

The following response was made:

"Davenport, Iowa, September 13th, 1879. Gentlemen:—Your invitation to accept a complimentary banquet from the bar of the state came here in my absence and awaited my return. I have held it for some days unanswered, and have just definitely ascertained that it will not be practicable, in view of my other duties, to engage to accept it, as I am called east immediately, and the time of my return to the state is uncertain. I trust it is unnecessary to add that the invitation and the warm terms in which you have been pleased to refer to me and to my judicial and other labors are sensibly felt and fully appreciated, for I assure you that I am bound to the state of Iowa by no ordinary ties. For one and forty years I have lived within the state, and have, during this time, have been honored by successive elections to high judicial stations; and here, under the laws and the constitution, which have been so well maintained, public and private, have been chiefly with the bar of the state, and I am truly sorry that I am precluded by other engagements from accepting the most grateful, and in all probability the last, honor I shall ever receive at their hands. I remain, as ever, sincerely and faithfully yours,

John F. Dillon.

MINNESOTA.

The members of the bar of the district of Minnesota, at the opening of the June term of the United States circuit court, at St. Paul, on the 15th day of June, 1879, held a meeting to determine what testimonial of their respect and esteem should be tendered to Judge Dillon on the occasion of his withdrawal from the bench of this circuit. A committee composed of Charles E. Flandrau, John B. Sanborn, George L. Otis, George B. Young, and Harvey Officer, was chosen, with full powers to represent the bar and the people in the arrangements for such proceedings as in their judgment would be suitable and proper. It was decided to tender to Judge Dillon a banquet and an address.

"St. Paul, Minn., June 20th, 1879. Honorable John F. Dillon: Dear Judge:—The bar of Minnesota, learning what respect and esteem you entertain for your judicial relations with this district, desires to manifest its very high esteem for you as a man, a friend, and a judge, and invites you to meet it at a dinner to be given in your honor at the Metropolitan Hotel, in this city, at such time as may be agreeable to you. We hope you will gratify us by accepting this invitation, and to designate such time as will best suit your pleasure and official engagements. With much respect, truly your obedient servants and friends.

"Charles E. Flandrau,
John B. Sanborn,
George L. Otis,
George B. Young,
Harvey Officer, Committee.

Reply:

"St. Paul, Minn., June 27th, 1879. Gentlemen:—Your invitation to a banquet proposed in your honor accepted by accepting the invitation, and to designate such time as may be agreeable to you. We hope you will gratify us by accepting this invitation, and to designate such time as will best suit your pleasure and official engagements. With much respect, truly your obedient servants and friends.

"Charles E. Flandrau and others, committee.

On the 28th day of June, 1879, the bar, having learned that Judge Dillon would take his departure from the city in the evening of that day, assembled in the court-room, under the call of the committee, in large numbers, at 3:30 P.M. On the opening of the court, Judges Dillon and Nelson being on the bench, Mr. Flandrau, who had been chosen by the committee to deliver the address of the bar, addressed the court as follows:

"May it please your honor: The great majority of the members of the bar of this district have grown up with it since its organization, and will probably continue to practise in it until their retirement. It is natural, therefore, that we should feel a deep interest in the question as to who shall be intrusted with the administration of its affairs.

"When the growth of the state rendered it necessary to increase the force of the federal judiciary by the creation of the circuit judges, we were all much rejoiced when we learned that Judge Dillon had received the appointment for this our circuit. He was no stranger to us—his fame as a jurist had preceded him. There can be no mistake in my statement, and my sentiments and public and private have been chiefly with the bar of the state, and I am truly sorry that I am precluded by other engagements from accepting the most grateful, and in all probability the last, honor I shall ever receive at their hands. I remain, as ever, sincerely and faithfully yours,

John F. Dillon.

"To the Honorable George G. Wright and others, committee."

A committee of the bar of the district have prepared an address to be presented to Judge Dillon, and have conferred upon me the honor of bearing it to him. With the permission of your honor, I will now deliver it.

The address to Judge Dillon:

"Honorable John F. Dillon, United States Circuit Judge of the District of Minnesota:

The members of the bar of this state have learned, with profound regret, that you have decided to sever your connections with the bar of this circuit. They have enjoyed, for the long series of years during which you have been its presiding justice, such agreeable relations with you personally and officially, and have held you in such high esteem as a man and a judge, that they desire to make some public expression of the sentiments which have been entertained by the bar on the occasion of this their last opportunity of holding official communication with you. We will not ask you, or the public, to weigh our opinions by the standard of our professional consequence; we know that we represent a frontier district, and we have nothing to say as to our own importance, but we can, without looking to that and the fearless and independent bar, and that nothing could induce us to give expression to what we did not conscientiously believe. Let the belles lettres of your views, then, be measured by their sincerity. We recognize in you a man of extraordinary learning in all the branches of judicial work, but to make a thoroughly good judge. We also concede to you all those qualities of temperament which are essential to the same end. You have been patient, wise, and kind. You have known and been amiable, when we have been irritable; you have always been clear, when we have been in doubt. I know no thing so edifying as to listen to your lucid expositions of the most difficult questions, which we have, in the discharge of our professional duties, so often submitted to you. In the varied interests that have been referred to your decision have involved the welfare of the greatest enterprises of the northwest, and these enterprises have always advanced in the state and so varied has been your experience as a minister of justice; so unremittent has been your industry; so ardent and the excellence of your personal qualifications have been your professional ideals, and so conspicuous and conscientious and disinterested your pursuit of them, that, in all our private and official circles, the blind and her scales are scarcely more intimately associated with the judicial function or more emblematic of its unerring discharge. I think I shall only give the sphere of the connotations of the word "minister", I say that the opportunities we have enjoyed of observing your ample learning and your skillful handling of the business of the court have been the most stimulating and highly prized of our professional privileges. The patience and circumspection with which you have been so unceasingly attentive to the door and inquirers; the rapidity with which you have grasped, and the tenacity with which you have expanded, the most intricate statements of facts; your quick and judicious perception of counsel, and to further illustrate its correctness, or to expose its fallacy; your happy combination of capacity and occasion, of your sound discretion, the splendid success, with which you have ever striven to avert that sometimes inevitable but always deplorable catastrophe, an incompatibility between fixed principles of law and the equities of a particular case—all these are salient features of your official character, as we have learned it and loved it during ten years of professional contact, and as we shall bear it with us in perpetual remembrance.

"It has been your good though arduous fortune to preside over a circuit imperial in extent, resources, and variety of industrial pursuits—skirting, as it does, the Mississippi from its source almost to the gulf at its western confines resting on the mountains. Vast and various as the ordinary litigation of such a circuit must have been, its dignity and grandeur during the two terms have been enhanced by three convulsions which have successively afflicted the several portions of your circuit. You have been called upon to administer upon the wreck of the confederacy in the south; upon the bankrupt railroad corporations in the north; and in the central part your circuit upon the most formidable conspiracy against the public revenues which has been known to the new world. I refer to the late unmanned whisky ring. Your decision upon the many novel questions thus precipitated on your court, have been pursued with admiration by the profession throughout the country, and, with a gratifying degree of confidence, are everywhere cited as a model. In a word, you have made solid and famous-worthy contributions to the noble science of the law, upon which we have long drawn. There is this in many ages, and which, with all its imperfections, is one of the finest creations of human reason. As representing a department of the public service co-ordinate and equal in rank with the two chief Departments, from which you are about to retire, I wish before closing to give brief expression to the sense of loss which I inevitably feel at the thought that all branches of the federal service upon the retirement to another field of labor of one who has been confessedly among its brightest ornaments, and who has added new lustre to the already illustrious name of the federal judiciary.

Mr. G. E. Davis's address: Governor Dutis said: "Judge Dillon:—The bar of this state received the announcement of your resignation with expressions of regret which were eloquently enthusiastic than words can here express, with due regard to the formality of this proceeding. Men of sensibility will not say in his presence concerning a person that is the object of their affection, nor can such a person bear without embarrassment, those words which fully satisfy the feeling which possesses them. He who speaks with the voice of friendship, does not say, and cannot say, to him all that absence and the future will not. This brings out the opportunity of this sad moment of parting, of this moment which gathers up into the heart its final seal. The fact that we are to stand before you as a judge no more, to cause you to feel how great is our esteem for you, how great our deprivation is. It happened that we urged your appointment to the Circuit Judge many years ago. Of the many eminent names which were under consideration for that nomination, your own was foremost. We were not for your promotion. Few of us then enjoyed your acquaintance. We had, however, become familiarized with your judicial character by frequent applications in our courts of your decisions as judge of the supreme court of Iowa, and we were guided to our preference by them. We found in them learning always more than sufficient for the case; intellectual vigor, to which that learning was an armor, not an incumbrance; mental independence creative in its character; a judicial conscience which dealt with the case and not with its consequences. With these, our prepossessions, you came to us, and there is not a shadow of the other law now-none, for they have not passed into convictions which are adorned and made forever beautiful by an abiding love and esteem. Those personal traits which experience only can teach, and which absence cannot destroy or even dim. The resolution which you have taken, while it grieves, does not surprise us. These traits are so prominent, so marked, and surely the administration of the laws of seven commonwealths, which hold six millions of people, which present diverse ins titutions. Codes which, though perhaps analogous, are yet so different as to perplex; where civilization and empire are so visibly overtopping a region where terms has not yet set up his landmark; where a legal system must be created in a few years which will survive with the passing fang of time has made illogic the decree which establishes it; surely these are boundaries which circumscribe the greatest capacity and resolution. It was for you, and not for us, that the day has passed when a thought of regret such as has rarely greeted retirement from judicial office. The patience and painstaking with which you have sought to solve the most difficult problems of both law and fact; the wisdom which, under your administration, the harshest and most testing rules of trust and law have been attempered by equity, the ripe legal learning and luscious language which has enriched and adorned your judicial decisions; the uniform kindness and courtesy with which you have characterized the intercourse of the bench with the bar, have endeared you to the bar of this district in a vastly more than common degree. Every country and state has, or has had, its golden age of the law, to which the profession loves to recur. The era of Marshall, of Johnson, of Smith, of Shaw in Massachusetts, of Gibson in Pennsylvania, of Massfield in England, and of your honor's: the people upon whose shoulders all recollection of is lost. It is due to you to speak of one act of your judicial career which has benefited the state and its people more, perhaps, than has been signified to you. The financial catastrophe of 1873 afflicted us deeply. To prepare the future for time when a multitude of the people was at a standstill, the government projected a partially constructed railway system, which had been projected and partially constructed towards the British possessions, was paralyzed at the moment when consumption seemed very near. The grand land grant depended upon the completion of the enterprise, and it was not easy to see how this could be done in the war of sudden and unlooked for events. The debility of bankrupt corporations. But in this court the expansive and administrative forces of the system of private rights was made instrumental to the public good, and both private right and public good were perfected and increased. The settling of private rights was earned, the frontier was advanced, and the homes of thousands stand to-day where we feared the wilderness would never be. But about this the court has earned what courts seldom receive—the gratitude of a people for a judicial act. Our regret at your retirement from the bench would be greatly increased were we not assured that the new field of usefulness to which you have been invited affords an ample verve for what you would necessarily have continued to contribute to had you remained in your present office. It has become apparent to us that our system of laws some time ago arrived at that stage of complexity and contradiction of precedent which demands a reform and second growth. The time, which we can all remember, when the old idea was that in point, exhumed by mousing inquiry, was a kind of fetich before which judges bowed and opposing counsel, although they stood afoot beneath the mass of cases, was compelled to rise and to remit them to their auxiliary places. I know that the great civilians were ordered by Justinian to formulate the immense mass of the Roman laws; when the empire and the extending empire compelled Mansfield to project by a continuous judicial travail of thirty years the commercial code of all English-speaking people; when the failing feudal abuses, vigor in judicial procedure, compelled D'Aguissseau to remodel the law of France. These works were done by judges. The work seen to be done in our day has passed with the honor of the judges. We hope and expect that in your new vocation you will continue to contribute powerfully to that great result, which is destined to condense and make more certain and symmetrical our cumbrous jurisprudence. Nothing more remains for me to say, except to assure you of an abiding esteem, affection, and respect, and to hope that in all stations to which you may be called, your evening of life may be made pleasant by honor, love, and friends, and by the gladsome light of jurisprudence."

Mr. Gordon E. Cole's remarks: "May it please your honor:—This item for amusement or comment in the sentiments of the address of the committee, I know that I but give utterance to the universal expression of the bar of the district. The announcement of your retirement is a matter of regret such as has rarely greeted retirement from judicial office. The patience and painstaking with which you have sought to solve the most difficult problems of both law and fact; the wisdom which, under your administration, the harshest and most testing rules of trust and law have been attempered by equity, the ripe legal learning and luscious language which has enriched and adorned your judicial decisions; the uniform kindness and courtesy with which you have characterized the intercourse of the bench with the bar, have endeared you to the bar of this district in a vastly more than common degree. [30 Fed. Cas. page 1312] grates for the step which robs us of a judge whom we can love, honor, and respect, and the bench of one of its brightest ornaments.

Mr. Thomas Wilson followed with these remarks: "May it please the court: I wish only to add a word. What one of us on this occasion says, is but the echo of what every other feels. Though it is but you first came among us, we feel your loss as almost irreplaceable. Never before have I known a judge to secure, or, as I believe, to deserve, unqualified, the admiration, confidence, and affectionate regard of the bar. You have come up to, you have held, our most elevated ideal of a great and good judge, and at the same time you have bound us to you by a friendship that will last for ages. Wherever you go our friendly eyes and hearty benedictions will follow you. I hope our loss may be your gain; that your afterlife of life may be cloudless, and your friends in your absence as dear as your presence, and to that day so much regret to be compelled to say goodbye.

At this point, during a brief pause in the proceedings, Judge Nelson inquired, "Is there anything further, gentlemen?" and receiving no response, Judge Dillon himself said: "Gentlemen of the bar: The address of the bar of Minnesota, and the remarks which have accompanied its presentation, fill me with sentiments with which some poor words of mine can but inadequately acknowledge and express. Nearly ten years ago I came to this city, bringing with me my commission as judge of this court. I was personally unknown to the entire bar of the state. You received me with characteristic cordiality and warmth. Since that time I have endeavored to understand the circuit for this district, and the relationship thus created has been to me one of uninterrupted satisfaction. You will, I think, readily credit me that your public assurance that the relation has been satisfactory to you, and that you view its termination with regret, cannot be otherwise than extremely gratifying to me. We met as strangers, and I beg to say that no part of your address gave me such real pleasure as the assurance that we part as friends. It has fallen in the line of my duty to decide, in connection with my learned associates, many causes involving large interests, some of which have excited warm feeling, and have been conducted with zeal, and in which the result must at times have disappointed counsel as well as judges. Yet, such has been the uniform respect and confidence of the bar, that, so far as I know or believe, my judgments have left no wounds which did not readily heal without a scar. You have not been disposed to credit my decisions in very complimentary terms. I cannot but feel that this is largely due to the particulars of my person. If it is thus, I should acknowledge that for whatever praise I may justly merit in this respect I am largely indebted to the wise counsel of my associates, and to your ability and learning. Fortunately, the judge who has the enlightened aid and the steady support of such a bar as I have accustomed to meet at every term in the state of Minnesota, who holds the office of judge of this circuit, holds a place of great responsibility and great difficulty. He who discharges all its various and exacting duties must shun delights and live laborious days. No man's unqualified judgment is equal to the work, and I feel that my obligations to the bar are far greater than theirs to me. I am your debtor, you are not mine. You refer to the new field of labor which I am about to enter. I forbear any extended allusion to it, and will only say that the action of the venerable university in coming to this remote circuit in Minneapolis is a chair in the institution which, with pardonable pride, points to the lectures of Chancellor Kent, delivered therein fifty years ago, over whom I am enabled to look you than it was to myself. The increased leisure it gives, the nature of the duties it requires, the compensation to labor, and the great opportunities, direct and collateral, it presents, combined to convince me that I ought to go. I do not seek it for a life of inglorious ease, but that I may the better be enabled to discharge that debt which Lord Bacon says every lawyer owes to his profession. Our official relations are practically dissolved. The last regular term. In this parting hour I love to contemplate you, not simply or chiefly as the trusted counsellors of the court, but as an assembly of my friends. The bar has always been my constituency. I claim no merit but a strenuous and well-meaning endeavor to use my power and influence and impressive expression of the esteem in which I am held. I part from my faithful and generous associate—I part, for you an instinctive, regret. The reflection saddens me that as a judge I shall never again visit your beautiful city and prosperous state. But I shall not with you with affectionate kindness, and shall always regard my relations to you as among the most fortunate circumstances of my life. I hesitate to speak the sad word which makes men melancholy but which must needs be spoken—farewell—and may the good Father of us all have you in His holy keeping.

Remarks of Judge Nelson: Judge Nelson closed with the following remarks: "I cannot permit the occasion to pass without my stating that the hearty concurrence in the sentiments of the bar, uttered in such a language, are in my office of administering justice in this district, I shall mourn his absence from the stated sessions of the court, from the loss of his counsels. His open, frank, and candid manner; his judgment, so well ripened; his learning, so varied, so extensive; and, above all, his love of truth and justice, so keen and instinctive, his respect at the outset; and terror found I could rely upon his opinion with a confidence in its correctness which is rarely experienced. I will not speak of our social relations, which have been so pleasant and agreeable, but cannot forbear thus publicly acknowledging my esteem for him as a man, and my high appreciation of his services as a pure, just, and impartial judge. I have known him better than you have; my opportunities have been greater, my associations have been more intimate. Where you have seen the mature and well-considered judgment, I have witnessed the extensive research, the untiring study of friendship. The truth brought to the investigation of difficult questions of law and fact. I entertain towards him the warmest affection of a brother, and with part with him, as we all must, with deep sorrow. It is very gratifying, however, to know that he enters a new field of usefulness, which he is well adapted to adorn, and where he will have ample opportunity to elevate and ennoble our profession. My best wishes go with him. May he be spared to continue his useful life, and may the bond of friendship cemented during his official connection with the court in this district remain unbroken in the future. The court has been properly, and these proceedings will be speedily upon the minutes of the court. It is so ordered."

The following notice is reprinted from 2 McLean:

"In the spring of 1849, Judge Holman, of the district court of Indiana, deceased, and Judge Huntington was appointed in his place. Judge Holman was appointed district judge some years before Indiana was included in the seventh district, on the organization of the state government he was appointed one of the supreme judges."

of Indiana, and continued to serve in that capacity until a short time before he received the appointment of district judge. He commenced his professional life in Kentucky, but removed into Indiana several years before it became a state. Judge Hopkins was a scholar, a lawyer, and a man of good mind. In all the relations of life he was most exemplary; and, as a judge, he was above reproach. He was beloved and respected, universally, by the profession; and to his family and connections it was irreparable. He died as a good man would wish to die, in the full assurance of a blissful immortality.

HOPKINS, JAMES CAMPBELL.

[For biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1277.]

The following obituary is excerpted from 7 Biss. 8.

The Honorable James Campbell Hopkins, late district judge of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin, departed this life at his residence in the city of Madison, Wisconsin, on the 5th day of September, A. D. 1877, during the June term of the circuit and district courts of the United States for that district. On the 4th day of September, the sitting of the bar was held in the United States court room at Madison, and was called to order by H. S. Orton, Esq., on whose motion S. B. Mann was made chairman and E. P. Smith, Esq., secretary. On motion, a committee was named by the chairman, consisting of H. S. Orton, Geo. B. Smith, Win. P. Villas, J. C. Gregory and H. M. Lewis, Esquires, to draft and report suitable resolutions, expressive of the sense of the bar in respect to the death of Judge Hopkins.

The committee reported the following resolutions:

"Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God, in his inscrutable providence, to remove by death, our distinguished fellow citizen and professional brother, the Hon. James C. Hopkins; therefore

"Resolved, that we especially condole with the bereaved and stricken family in their great affliction, and assure them of our deepest commiseration and sympathy, and while our weak words of well-intended consolation cannot assuage or mitigate their sorrow, we may be allowed to express the hope that he who has thus left them desolate, has passed into a happier existence, and that they will confidingly submit to this painful dispensation of Providence, and put their trust in the Father of all mercies, and in the widow's God."

"Resolved, that in the death of our lamented friend, the bench has lost an able and an upright judge, the profession one of its most honored and distinguished lawyers, society one of its most useful and respected members, and the state one of its best and most prominent citizens.

"Resolved, that the community has seldom been called to mourn the loss of one so perfect in all the elements and accomplishments of manhood, whose mental structure and acquirements were so symmetrical and available, whose social qualities and manners were so agreeable, attractive, and winning, and so capable and eminent as a lawyer and a judge. He was cut off in the midst of his arduous judicial labors and in the full maturity of his intellectual powers and attainments, and when he had already achieved high honors and attained great success in the high position he occupied, with the promise and prospect of still greater usefulness and higher eminence in the future. Our memories of Judge Hopkins will always be agreeable. In all social relations he was always cheerful, courteous and kind, and it seemed to him a pleasure to render personal and professional favors. Upon the bench he was prompt, sympathetic, grave and attentive. He was patient and impartial, modest and forbearing, yet dignified and firm. He had great natural aptitude and vast and varied learning as a lawyer, unerring judgment and great strength of mind, and the intuitive understanding of human nature. His decisions were considered just, adequate and impartial. He always admired and admired, and in favor of his opinions. Judge Hopkins was truly the prototype of a lawyer and a judge.

"Resolved, that in Judge Hopkins and in his successful career in life, the young have an example worthy of imitation, in self-reliance, industry, patience and perseverance."

"Resolved, that a committee be appointed to present these resolutions to the circuit and district courts of the United States, the court of common pleas, the circuit court and circuit court of the state, in this city, and request their entry of record."

The resolutions were seconded, and appropriate remarks having been made by several of the members of the bar present, were then unanimously adopted. The committee appointed H. S. Orton, Geo. B. Smith, and L. C. Sloan, Esquires, a committee to present the said proceedings to the courts named in the resolutions, to be there entered of record.

To the Hon. S. J. Finney of Madison, Wisconsin, the reporter is indebted for the following sketch of the life of Judge Hopkins:

"James Campbell Hopkins was born in the town of Pawlet, Vermont, April 27th, 1819, and was at the time of his death in the fiftieth year of his age. His ancestors both paternal and maternal were Scotch-Irish. When about five years of age, he with his parents removed to the town of Hebron, Washington county, New York, and not long afterward to the town of Granville, where he resided until he commenced his professional career. He was born in the town of North Granville, and in the spring of 1804 entered upon the study of law in the office of James McCull, Esq., at Sandy Hill, New York, and in 1817 continued it in the office of Messrs. Bishop & Agan, at Granville. He was admitted to the bar at the January term of the supreme court, in Albany, in 1845, and immediately after began the practice of his profession with Mr. Agan, at Granville, continuing with him about three years and then forming a law partnership with Mr. Bishop, which continued until he removed to Madison, Wisconsin, in the spring of 1860. He was postmaster at Granville for a period of five years, and in 1853, he was elected to the senate of New York, from the district then composed of the counties of Saratoga and Washington; he was an active, influential and efficient senator, and a member of the judiciary committee of that body. Upon his settlement in Wisconsin, he became associated in practice with Hon. Harlow S. Orton, and at once entered upon a large and successful business. Soon after his arrival in Wisconsin, a Chapter of the Order of the Knights of Labor was formed, and Judge Hopkins was elected one of the officers. He was also a member of the Grand Jury of the county in which he resided. He was a member of the State Board of Directors, and was chosen one of the directors of the Farmers' Bank, which bank was organized in Madison. He was a member of the Republican party, and always supported the party organization; but during his residence in Wisconsin, he gave but little attention to politics, his time being entirely occupied with the duties of his profession. He manifested but little or no ambition for the doubtful honors in modern political life. He was an excellent lawyer, well read in his profession, and entirely devoted to its duties. With a clear discriminating mind, familiar with the practical affairs of business men, and the methods of business transactions, and with a judgment rarely faulty, he was a cautious, safe and reliable counselor. He was a close student, and prepared his cases for trial or argument with care, and was almost certain to be ready whenever they were reached, and for any emergency which might be reasonably anticipated. In the presentation or treatment of a case to the jury or the court, he was clear in statement, convincing, vigorous and able in argument, and keeping clearly in view the practical nature of the case. He fought rather to instruct and convince, than to entertain or captivate his hearers, and whether as a plaintiff or defendant, his arguments were powerful and forcible and the arguments of the ablest and most formidable opponent. Quick to detect an error or mistake, he was certain to take advantage of it and expose it. In his intercourse with his professional brethren he was obliging and courteous, and with an extensive fund of general knowledge he was a pleasing and instructive conversationalist. Added to these advantages, his habits of great industry, and promptness in the discharge of his duties, professional and personal, enabled him to acquire an extensive and lucrative practice, and a prominent position in the front rank of the bar of the city.

"By act of congress of June 20, 1870, Wisconsin was divided into two judicial districts, the eastern and the western, and on the 9th of July, 1870, Mr. Hopkins was commissioned as district judge for the newly-created western district. He at once entered upon the discharge of the duties of his position, and until his last illness he devoted with unremitting zeal and industry all his learning, his extensive experience and distinguished ability to the discharge of his duties. He was a model of order and promptness and exact administration of the law, and his kindly and unwearying patience, rendered practice in the court in which he presided pleasant and attractive. Counsel never had occasion to complain that they had not been fully and fairly heard by him, or that even an implied restraint had been placed on an exhaustive discussion of all their points. In the hearing and decision of equity causes, and in the discharge of his work as receiver of bankruptcy estates, he was always in the vanguard, and in all his work he carried the spirit of the courts to all points of the compass. He delivered many valuable opinions which stand deservedly high as authority on questions of bankruptcy law. Long familiarity with and wide and varied experience in business transactions, enabled him to easily master the details of a case, and readily perceive the precise point upon which it depended. He was quick to detect fraud, or sham, and prompt and resolute to expose and rebuke it. The resolutions of the bar give full ear to his traits of character, for the professional and judicial, that further statement seems superfluous. During the seven years of his judicial life, when not engaged in his own court, his services were constantly occupied in holding court in other districts of the circuit, and frequently at Chicago, where he was largely esteemed as an able judge, and wherever it was his fortune to preside, he was, in his own district, the confidence and respect of the profession and all interested in the orderly, intelligent, and impartial administration of justice. He was a genial gentleman, an excellent lawyer, and an able and faithful judge."

The following is reprinted from 4 Blatchf. 517:

The following proceedings took place at a meeting of members of the bar, held in the city of New York, on the 9th of February, 1869, on the occasion of the death of the Honorable Charles A. Ingersoll, district judge of the United States for the district of Connecticut. The Honorable Samuel R. Betts, district judge of the United States for the eastern district of New York, presided at the meeting. The Honorable Josiah Sutherland, a presiding justice of the supreme court of the state of New York, the Honorable Joseph S. Bevens, chief justice of the superior court of the city of New York, and the Honorable Charles F. Daly, first judge of the court of common pleas for the city of New York, were in the chair. A motion made by Mr. Ingersoll was adopted, and the question of the propriety of having a meeting of the members of the bar was decided in the affirmative. The meeting was addressed by the Honorable Samuel L. Benedict, Esquire, clerk of the circuit court of the United States for the district of New York, and Hon. Roger B. Taney, Esquire, were in the chair. On motion of the Honorable Samuel L. Benedict, Esquire, the resolutions were adopted, after the meeting had been addressed by the Honorable Samuel L. Benedict, Esquire, James T. Brady, Esquire, and the Honorable John McKee;
to the character, the attainments and the public service of Judge Johnson, which, necessarily, and only briefly alluded to in the resolutions which I shall have the honor to present. If I am permitted as the holder of professional confidence, I shall leave to say that a gathering like this seems to me to afford a very striking illustration of the community of interest—be it great or small—between the members of the bench and of the bar, as co-workers in the same sphere of duty. It is more than a quarter of a century since Judge Johnson left the active practice of his profession here in New York, to take his place as one of the judges of the court of appeals, as then constituted. And yet, during the entire time since he left us until now that we meet to pay this tribute to his memory and to his public service, we have always clung together as a member of this bar. We have seemed to be identified with him in the many occasions when it was our duty and his to act together in reference to great and important questions relating to commercial law, and to all the other interests which are so frequently involved in the discussions of the profession and in the decisions of the courts; so that we have been still his associates. We have been before him as advocates, and have had the opportunity of witnessing the impartiality, the candor, the learning, the integrity which he brought to the discharge of his official duties; and we have also felt that there never was any intervention of that kindly feeling which so large a degree existed towards him on the part of all the members of the profession who were brought into contact with him when he was one of the judges. We mourned on his part during his long judicial service. When we last saw him presiding in the circuit court a few weeks since, we were painfully impressed with the fact that he was yielding to the burden unwisely devolved upon a single judge, which he had only too willingly assumed, and which had now been pushed to the utmost of his ability, in a manner—which entitles us to say that his effort to sustain it was heroic. In the circumstances of his death we find abundant occasion for regret. But he has left us an example of unyielding devotion to duty; and as we now, standing beside his bier, look back over this honorable and finished career, I think we may all take from it a high incentive to that continuance in patient, thorough and effective service which, alike for the humblest as the highest toiler in our ranks, is its own satisfaction and reward. By your leave, Mr. Chairman, I will now offer the following resolutions:

"Resolved, that the members of the bar of the city of New York, convened to take action in reference to the death of the Honorable Alexander S. Johnson, late circuit judge of the United States, for the second judicial district of the State of New York, express their sense of his death, and their sympathy with the bereaved family, in the highest esteem in all the relations of life.

"Resolved, that in the professional career of Judge Johnson, and in the various public positions filled by him—as a judge of the court of appeals, to which he was elected in 1851 for the full term of eight years; as a commissioner under the treaty of 1854, with Great Britain; as a member of the commission of appeals, to which he was appointed in January, 1873; as a judge of the present court of appeals, from December, 1873, to January 1, 1875; and in the federal judiciary, as circuit judge of the second judicial circuit, from October, 1855, to the date of his death—the discharge of his high functions was marked by a constant and undeviating devotion to duty, by high individual ability and by absolute rectitude of purpose.

"In the retrospect of his public life we recall these conspicuous traits of his character, and of his professional conduct, with a deep regret, and in grateful recollection of his services to his state and country. Thoroughly grounded and very early in the science of law, and with a large experience in its practice, it was his endeavor, as a jurist, to apply those well established principles, which are the basis of his duty as a judge of the court of appeals, so as to reach in each particular case a conclusion resting upon their sure foundations.

"This character was eminently fitted for the duties of the bench of an appellate court, and is amply illustrated in his reported opinions, which are distinguished for clear and lucid exposition of legal principles, and their appropriate and discriminating application to the most intricate and important questions of law and fact. While the mere presentation of facts test the fulness of his learning, the breadth of his intellect and his ceaseless industry, the rare personal qualities of mind and heart, which characterize this member, evinced in the unvarying urbanity and patience, the genial courtesy and self-control, the cordial sympathy, without bias and interest, without partiality, which with him were inseparable from the discharge of duty, will be specially cherished by his associates and contemporaries, and should be perpetuated in this testimonial to his worth. Our sorrow at the termination of his useful and honorable life, heightened by the consciousness that it was hastened by the undue pressure of judicial labors and responsibilities against which he struggled with self-sacrificing toil, finds a solace in the contemplation of that example of fidelity to duty, and that, as a minister of justice, he died in the service he imposed."

Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions, attested by the officers of this meeting, be presented to the circuit court of the United States in the district, and on this state, in such manner as shall be directed by the chairman, for entry on their minutes, and that a copy be also transmitted to the family of Judge Johnson."

Hon. George F. Comstock spoke as follows: "I beg to second what has been so ably read. The attention of the bar, of the bench and the public has been arrested by the sad event which is the occasion of this meeting. We are met together as members of a common profession, to give expression to the sense of the loss which we feel in the death of Alexander S. Johnson. That event was unexpected to us; indeed, the intelligence of it came upon us with a startling suddenness. It is very well known that some two or three months ago his health had been giving way under the accumulated labors imposed upon him by the high judicial position which he so honorably and so usefully filled. It is also known, that, not only a short time ago, he left the island of Nassau for the benefit of its mild and genial climate, in the hope and expectation, in which we shall not be surprised, his health was restored, and his usefulness continued. The first news we hear from him is the sudden and sad announcement of this death. He was eminently as a lawyer, a jurist and a citizen. I had the rare good fortune to know him, I think I may say intimately, during nearly the last twenty-five years of his life; and it is to me a source of profound satisfaction to believe that I enjoyed his friendship, as I gave him, most unreservedly, my own. The impression made upon me by his talents and learning, by the purity of his life, by his genial nature and the graces of his character, are with me a recollection which will remain as long as memory lasts. His career at the bar was comparatively a brief one, and mainly, if not wholly, in the court of appeals. I have had the advantage of a witness of that career, but it must have been one of laborious study and practice, for it made him one of the most learned lawyers that our country has ever known. As an unusually early age for elevation to the bench, the display of his learning and powers in the highest court of the state, and the recognition of him by his profession, led to the attention of the profession generally, and their appreciation of his rare qualities was exhibited by his nomination and election to that tribunal. Hon. John P. Hughes, his master of the court, and his superior in the long line of his predecessors, in finding and in gratefully recollecting of his services to his state and country. Thoroughly grounded and very early in the science of law, and with a large experience in its practice, it was his endeavor, as eight years of his life, and while, according to ordinary experience, he had scarcely reached the full maturity of his powers, he served in that capacity, as he has later, as a witness, and served eminently and usefully. At the expiration of that period the mutations of politics, the shortness of judicial terms, and the exigencies of our supreme court deprived him of a considerable number of years of his services in a judicial capacity. Retiring from the bench, he became a resident and a trial attorney, and a successful and honored practitioner, a reputation which he enjoyed for learning, ability, perfect independence and impartiality, marked him as so high a type of our legal profession as to give him a prominent place among those who during the quarter-century that he occupied the bench, and for whom his more eminent and honorable career in the public service, illuminated, as it was, by the radiance of his private virtues, will long be us a memory to cherish, and an ever-caring source of strength to us. Our holy religion tells us to believe that he has exchanged earthly toil for eternal rest.

Hon. E. C. Benson, as Chairman,—Although I knew Judge Johnson during all the time that he was at the bar in this city, and subsequently on the bench—I may say that I knew him very well, professionally and personally, and I do not intimate—I do not rise to say anything with regard to his professional and judicial career, except that I formed the impression that Judge Johnson was a man of wisdom, acuteness and impartiality which characterized him as a lawyer and a judge, but the latter is the point of view from which I take my stand in discussing the subject of this address. After all, Judge Johnson was a man of wisdom, acuteness and impartiality which characterized him as a lawyer and a judge, but the latter is the point of view from which I take my stand in discussing the subject of this address.

And so it happened that the departed jurist came to his profession through a young and education of uncommon advantage. All that could be done by influence, by social position, by opportunity, by appliance, by stimulus to effort, was his; and these advantages fell on him not on unfruitful ground. He had an intuitive apprehension, a great intellectual capacity, and was quick to appropriate and assimilate the knowledge of his time. He took delight in scientific research, and was a man of general culture and scholarly attainments. Not content with acquiring the names he liked to think out principles to their last analysis. He was peculiarly well fitted, as I think, for success at the bar, for forensic debate, and for the presentation and argument of the principles that obtain in the administration of justice. He was endowed with a sweet and magnetic voice, and a most winning manner. The whole court and all the gallery was there. The bench was his destiny. It was there that the largest portion of his business life was spent, in the manner narrated by the resolution for trans-ascendent ability as a lawyer, and fabulous powers of memory. Since that time she counts, among her orations, Greene C. Bronson, Henry R. Stambaugh, Joseph Kirkland, Joshua S. Spencer, Samuel Beardsley, Hiram Denio, and William Curtis Noyes. She has furnished for our state, in succession, three attorney generals—Talcott, Bronson, and Beardsley. At the time of the death of the eminent jurist whom we mourn, she filled two seats on the bench of the highest court of the United States: one in the circuit court, which his lamented death leaves vacant, and one on the supreme bench at Washington. And even now, at this very hour, the senatorial representation of the great state of New York is filled by her two citizens, Roscoe Conkling and Francis Kernan. Utica, so highly favored, now enrolls, with pride, while yet in sorrow, the name of Alexander S. Johnson on the bright scroll of her departed sons. We, as her or, claim him too; and there, as here, the bench and bar, laying this tribute on his tomb, in a common sympathy mourn their loss, and hold his memory in honor.

Oh, fellow citizens!—I have heard the resolutions read, and although a stranger to most of you, I desire simply to express, in common with you, the grief which has called you together. The pressure of the judicial duties of Judge Johnson has kept him out of our state almost entirely, except in the matter of appeals. His predecessor, although a native of Connecticut, came to this bench of this circuit with a reputation acquired in your state. We knew him well and esteemed his judicial reputation; and I could not keep silent, sir, with these proceedings before me, without taking advantage of the opportunity to express our sympathy, and our participation in these ceremonies to-day, and the respect we all feel for the judge who has been loaned to us by the state of New York. There is an old Japanese custom, sir, that after the death of the dead passes, each neighbor shall carry it for a short distance, as a neighborly duty which they owe to the memory of him who has gone. In that spirit, on behalf of the bar of Connecticut, I would do with you stand around the bier of Alexander S. Johnson, and speak for our bar the sentiments that were so well expressed by his memory, his judicial talents and his judicial integrity.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously.

The president, in accordance with resolutions, appointed Mr. Benjamin D. Skillman and Mr. William Allen Butler a committee to present the resolutions to the court of appeals of this state and the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

JOHNSON, BENJAMIN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 36 Fed. Cas. 1380.]

The following notice is reprinted from 1 Hemp. v.: The late Benjamin Johnson of Arkansas, who sat in those courts for nearly thirty years, was one of the most distinguished lawyers of his time. He was noted for his pride and ornament, generally wrote out his opinions, and before his death placed such as had been preserved in my hands. He could speak without emotion; and when I remember that he died full of juridical honors, beloved by all, without an enemy in the world, admired by all, and treasured by all, I cannot but say to myself we shall not see his like again. He was a safe, patient, and able judge; and the judicial distinction which he won extended far beyond the limits of his own state, and we may well wish that the judiciary of our country was always represented by such men.

LEAVITT, HUMPHREY HOWE.

[For brief biographical notice, see 36 Fed. Cas. 1382.]

The following proceedings upon his retirement from the bench are reprinted from 2 Bond:

On Thursday evening, March 30, 1871, a banquet was given by the bar of the southern district of Ohio at the St. Nicholas Hotel, in Cincinnati, in honor of Judge Johnson. The company embraced more eminent legal talent never assembled in Ohio. The entertainment in all of its appointments was exceptionally gay. The head of the table was seated the Hon. Henry Stambaugh, Judge Leavitt, the guest of the evening, and other distinguished persons. At 11 o'clock, Mr. Stambaugh, rising, addressed the assembly.

Address of Mr. Stambaugh: "Gentlemen: No more agreeable duty could have been assigned to me than that of presiding at this banquet. Lawyers seldom come together as a body except to pay a last tribute of respect to the memory of a departed brother. Hard-worked as he was, he was, as it were, a rare thing for us to meet together for social enjoyment. No other profession stands more in need of such recreation, and yet none sees less. I hail, therefore, with great pleasure, this gathering of the bench and bar. But, gentlemen, it is not that consideration alone that makes this meeting an agreeable one, but the particular occasion which brings us together. We are met to express our respect and esteem for our honored guest upon his retirement from the bench. Perhaps there is no one present who has for so many years stood in the relation of lawyer to judge as I have occupied toward the friend whom I stand at this side. I doubt not it was this consideration more than any other which moved the committee to place me at the head of this board. On July 21, 1834, I was present at a session of the district court at Columbus, when the commission of Judge Leavitt was seated. He took his seat as judge of that court. I refreshed my recollection by examination of the journal of the court, yesterday. My impression was, that during all the time which has since elapsed, Judge Leavitt was never absent from a regular term of the court. I again referred to the journal, with the assistance of my secretary and several deputies. I also examined the record, and discovered no evidence that the record did not sustain me. We did find one term at which Judge Leavitt was not on the bench, but nothing could be added to the impression formed from the journal that at that very time, though unable to leave his distant residence, he was busily engaged in the duties of his office. At chambers. Where shall we find another instance of faithful service so long continued and so punctually performed? But this is not all. The question is not merely how long, but how well. The answer to this question needs no reference to the journal, no profuse of the record. I stand here as a living witness, surrounded by a cloud of witnesses, to give the answer. The judicial station requires something more than long continued services. It requires diligent study, patient attention, strict impartiality, purity of life, social as well as official, good temper, and courteous demeanor. I have practiced the law for many years, and I can say without hesitation, that I have never practiced before any judge in whom these virtues were more highly developed. After the long career of public duty, our venerable friend retires, to private life without a stain upon the judicial eminence. In a few days another judge will sit in his accustomed seat. I relate to the coming man, that he may enjoy as long a career of usefulness, and earn as good a title to the respect and affection of the bar as his predecessor.

Mr. Stanbery then proposed the first regular toast of the evening, as follows: "Our Honored Guests." To which Senator [REDACTED] said:

Remarks of Judge Leavitt: "Mr. President and gentlemen: I have often, in the course of my life, had occasion to wish that I had some of the powers of orator. I regret to say that this high qualification has never pertained to me, and now I feel greatly embarrassed and very much at a loss to respond in fitting terms to the kind utterances of my learned and excellent friend, the president of this meeting, and the sentiments contained in the toast. It was the remark of the celebrated Edward Burke, the English statesman and philosopher, that the legal profession had a contractible influence upon the intellect, as well as upon the spirit of man. In my own case, we judge made applicable to the English bar. The learned orator had never known much about American law, or the appearance of affairs under the Constitution. I have the pleasure to utter upon this occasion my entire dissent from the opinion expressed by the eminent Sir Burke, in regard to the bar of this country. From my long association and intercourse with them, I have every reason to believe, and to infer that the sentiments uttered by the distinguished statesman to whom I have referred, has no application to the bar of the United States. There is not only the mental qualifications and accomplishments belonging to American terms of the bar of any other calling or profession, even of the highest literary order, but in point of moral qualities they are in a distinct grade among all classes of persons. If I needed an evidence of the truth of my own position in this regard, I think I might properly point to the length of the assembly and the occasion upon which they have met. You are not here, my friends, to celebrate or memorialize the incoming of a new judge to an official position. You are assembled here to consider whether you shall be actuated by selfish or interested motives. You are here simply to commemorate the fact that as a new judge the bench is about to retire from that office, to civil life, to a place and a position where he can never have occasion to consult any other interest than the public welfare, or to confer favors upon others, professional or otherwise. In other words, you are doing honor to an ancient judge without expectation of favor from his hands hereafter. I allude to this fact to show that your conduct upon this occasion is entirely devoid of any selfish motives. I ask you to consider this a part of the argument that there is no defect in the heart of the American bar. [Applause.] Gentlemen, the compliment which has been uttered by my excellent and estimable friend, is one to which I can not respond. He has done me justice, and more than justice. If there is any long view of public duty, it is in discharging the duties of a judicial station with honest purposes and motives—then I grant that the compliment is merited. But I would be satisfied if, however, it is intended to accord me the merit and the high distinction of great learning, great judicial ability, then I fear the compliment is not deserved. I have always endeavored to hold the scales of justice with a firm and equal hand. [Great applause.] I could not claim, without extreme arrogance, that I have not committed many errors and mistakes in my judgment. I have no doubt that I have; but as it is human to err, I have no right to claim any exemption from the common lot of humanity. I will remark, as the fact has been referred to by my learned friend, that in July, 1834, I first took my seat upon the bench of the district court. At that time the whole state of Ohio formed one judicial district, and the courts were then located in the year 1855, there was comparatively little business either in the circuit or the district courts of the United States. My friends tell me that the more important cases that came before the circuit court prior to the division of the state, were not as serious as the title to land in the Virginia military district; and I may remark here that there were very few, if any, cases which came before that court during the period to which I refer, in which my learned friend was not counsel on one side or the other. [Applause.] It is but year 1855. In the same state was divided, and when the courts for the southern district were established in Cincinnati, a very changed state of things existed. That city being the great commercial center for the state, business came like an avalanche into both the circuit and the district courts, and from that period I have been actively and laboriously employed in the duties of my station. [Applause.] The district court of the United States, as you are aware, has exclusive and original jurisdiction in all cases of admiralty, and it has also the same jurisdiction in all seizures upon land, and all proceedings in rem against property for forfeiture for violations of law. It has, of course, was made applicable to the English bar. The learned orator had never known much about American cases. He particularly referred to the case of the United States in all crimes. In addition to the matters of jurisdiction to which I have referred, there were duties and obligations which attended the exercise of the slave fugitive law—the act of 1793 at first, and then the act of 1850. In fact, there were cases of the description, more of them in my court, to be tried by me, than I was anxious to have; but it has been very well remarked that judges can not choose the cases which they will pass upon or try. During nearly all the time of the administration of the labor and responsibility of presiding devolved upon me, as the duties of the judge of the circuit court did not often permit or afford opportunities of attending the terms of that court. Without dwelling upon this subject, so far as my learned friend has given me any credit for solicitude, or the like, the testimony of the assembly, for I think I have, perhaps, had a longer judicial term of life, with one or two exceptions, than any federal judge under the government of the United States. This honor, you see, has exceeded me in length of term. [Applause.] One remark further, gentlemen, and I shall take my seat. In my very long official position, allow me to say for the benefit of the fraternity, that in early life I was forcibly impressed with the utterance of Mr. John Wilkes, when, in deciding the points of error that were made, he said: 'I love popularity, but it is the popularity that follows, not that which

Mr. Murat Halstead, editor of the Cincinnati Commercial, had invited an appropriate speech to... to the lady, in conclusion, stating that he had joined with great... in this testimonial to a gentleman who had done more for those who was honorable and upright in the judiciary.

The following letter, from a distinguished member of the bar, since "freed from the toils which so long pressed upon him," was read, and elicited great applause:

Letter from Hocking H. Hunter:

"Lancaster, O., March 27, 1871.

"My Dear Sir: I truly regret that business engagements place it out of my power to participate in the entertainment on Thursday, to be given as a testimonial of esteem and regard to our venerable friend, Judge Leavitt, on the occasion of his removal from the bench. I acknowledge myself, within the terms of your letter, to be one of those who have been 'longest associated,' professionally as well as personally, with his judicial functions, with the judge, extending, in fact, through the whole period of his service. And I assure you it would be very gratifying to me to be with him and to express my appreciation of his official life, now about to be brought to a close. It has been pure and faultless in purpose, impartial in its decision; and now, at the advanced period of his life which he has attained, it is my wish to assure him that I hope he may enjoy many happy years in the peaceful retirement of those who have so long pressed upon him, and when the end cometh that it may be to enter upon a new life of endless felicity. Hoping the occasion may be one by which circumstances will mark my first official appearance in this high court with the repulsive prestige of a bearer of bad news.

"May it please your honors: I appear before you not on my own motion, but by the request and by the authority of my brethren of this bar, who have desired to see from your court, and of whose expression of their appreciations, I am very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"To W. M. Bateman, Esq."

McLEAN, JOHN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1855.]

The following proceedings are reprinted from 1 Biss: 9.

Hon. John McLean, associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, was elected to form a large part of this volume [1 Biss.] and of whose reports this series is a continuation, died at the venerable age of seventy-six years, being at that time the senior associate justice of that court. Judge McLean commenced the practice in law in 1807, at Lebanon, in Warren county, Ohio, and five years afterwards was elected to congress in his district, which, at that time, included the city of Cincinnati. In 1814, he was, by the unanimous vote of his district, re-elected to congress, which position he resigned to accept a place in the supreme court of Ohio. And he had been elected by the legislature of that state. He remained on the supreme bench of Ohio till 1823, when he was appointed commissioner of the general land office, and in the succeeding year he became postmaster general. On the 7th of March, 1829, he was appointed by President Jackson one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, and at the January term, 1830, entered upon the duties of that office, which he continued to perform until the end of his life, and until the time of his death. The decisions of Judge McLean in the supreme court are reported in Peters' Reports, commencing with the third volume, and in the twenty-four volumes of Howard. His opinions on the circuit are found in the six volumes of Reports which bear his name, and are in the third, fourth, and fifth volumes of Howard. At a meeting of the members of the bar and officials of the supreme court of the United States, held in the supreme court room, December 23, 1861, Richard S. Cox, Esq., on behalf of the committee appointed for that purpose, submitted the following resolutions:

"1. That the members of this bar and the officers of the court express the sense of the grief and the loss which, in common with the entire nation, they have sustained in the death of the late Mr. Justice McLean, a gentleman of the most amiable and gentlemanly character, and in an especial manner to the profession for his eulogized accomplishments, the purity of his private character, and the arduous duties of which with which he discharged the duties of the high offices, judicial, administrative, and legislative, with which his name has been so long and honorably associated.

"2. That we will wear the accustomed badge of mourning during the present term of the court.

"3. That the heart of man and secretary of this meeting transmit a copy of these proceedings to the family of the deceased, communicating, at the same time, to those in the afflicted with which they have been visited by a wise and merciful Providence.

"4. That the honorable the attorney general be respectfully solicited to present these proceedings to the supreme court, now in session, and to ask that they may be entered on the minutes of the court.

At the opening of the supreme court on the following day, Mr. Bates, the attorney general, presented to the court the proceedings and minutes of the meeting, and moved that they be entered on the minutes of the court, addressing the court, as follows:

"May it please your honors: I appear before you not on my own motion, but by the request and by the authority of my brethren of this bar, who have desired to see from your court, and of whose expression of their appreciations, I am very respectfully, your obedient servant, W. M. Bateman, Esq."
cessfully denied and resisted. I look abroad over the country and behold a ghastly spectacle; a great nation, lately united, prosperous, and happy, and buoyed up on the hopes of future glory torn into warring fragments; and a land once beautiful and rich in the flowers and fruits of peaceful culture, staid and proud, is now bruised and blighted with fire. In all that wide space from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, and from the Atlantic to the Missouri, the small and weak voice of local justice is drowned by the incessant roll of the drum, and the deafening thunder of artillery. To that extent your just and lawful power is practically annulled, for the misted and silent arms. But let us rejoice in the hope that these calamities are only for a season; that the same Almighty hand which sustained our fathers in their arduous struggle to establish the glorious constitution which this court has so long and so wisely administered, will now be withdrawn from their children in a struggle no less arduous to maintain it. Now, indeed, we are overshadowed with a dark cloud, broad and gloomy as a nation’s pall; but, thanks be to God, the eye of faith and patriotism can discern the bow of promise set in that cloud, spanning the gloom with its bright arch, to foreshadow the coming of a day sweet and calm, and to justify our hope of a speedy restoration of peace, order, and law.

"This much, may it please the court, I have ventured to say as seem to me a fitting preliminary to the discharge of the duty, imposed upon me by the bar here present; and I do not the less all the members of the court the fact that since the close of the last term, their old and honored associate, Mr. Justice Johnson, has departed this life, for all men take sorrowful notice when "a prince and a great man has fallen in Israel." But the members of the bar, in pursuance of the custom, and stimulated, and stimulated, no doubt, by their personal reverence for the virtues and the learning of the departed judge, have held a meeting and passed a series of resolutions, which they have done me the honor to confide to me, with the request that I would present them here and ask that they may enter upon the minutes of the court as a memorial of their profound veneration for the dead, and for the high tribunal of which he was so long a worthy member. I shall not take the risk of marring the strength or beauty of the resolutions by attempting to recite them, or to comment upon them. Let them speak for themselves, for they speak well. But I believe it is the custom here and I hope it will not be unseemly in me to say a few words of my own about that virtuous judge. He was a man in whom, in all his works and teaches by his bright example. I had not the honor of his intimacy, but I have known him for more than thirty years, and under circumstances which attracted and enforced my observation. I did not consider him a man of brilliant genius, but a man of great talents, with a mind capable of comprehending the greatest subject, and not afraid to encounter the minutest analysis. He was eminently practical, always in pursuit of truth, and always able to control and utilize any idea that he had once fully conceived. In short, he was a sincere, earnest, diligent man. And this, I believe, is the secret of his success, the reason why his course through life was always onward and upward. I am informed by those who have had good opportunity to know him in all the relations of life as a lawyer, a judge, an executive officer, a neighbor, a friend, a professing Christian—that, in their belief, all his duties, in every relation, were fully performed. As a man, he lived a blameless life, and not blameless only, but sweet and attractive, by the habitual exercise of all those benign and virtuous virtues which characterized and adorned his mild and gentle nature. And while he pursued with diligence every line of study which might serve to make him at once a blessing and an ornament to society, he looked steadily beyond this transient scene, knowing that this world is a school of that eternity on which his soul rested with undying faith. I think the outlines of his character may be sketched in a very few words. He was a wise scholar; an able lawyer, as you, his brethren must know; a bland and amiable gentleman; a strict moralist; a virtuous man; and, above all, a modest and unobtrusive Christian philosopher. It is not for us to judge of his final condition; but, as feeling and thinking men, when we view the spotless morality of his life, and the pure and exalted fire which have good reason to hope that even now he is enjoying the rich reward of a well-spent life, in blissful communion with the author of all perfection. This much, at least, we do know, that his life has been a blessing to many individuals and a great benefit to his country, and that, in an honored old age, he has left behind him the sweet savour of a good name."

Mr. Chief Justice Taney replied: "The members of the court unite with the bar in sincere sorrow for the death of the late Mr. Justice McLean. He held a seat on this bench for more than thirty years, and until the last two years of his life, when his health began to fail, was never absent from his duties here for a single day. His best eulogy will be found in the reports of the decisions of this court during that long period of judicial life, and these reports will show the prominent part he took in the many great and important questions which from time to time have come before the court, and the earnestness and ability with which he investigated and decided them. They are the recorded evidence of a mind, firm, frank and vigorous, and full of the subject before him at the time. Before he occupied a seat on this bench he was the Secretary of the general of the United States, and in that post displayed an administrative talent hardly ever surpassed, with a wisdom and sagacity and common sense of purpose never questioned. Words of eulogy are hardly needed in memory of one so widely known and respected, esteemed in political as well as judicial life. We deplore his loss, and join the members of the bar in paying due honor to his memory, and direct the motion of the attorney general, and the other members of his family, to our deceased brother, to be placed on record, with this response from the court; and, as a mark of respect, we will adjourn to-day without transacting any of the ordinary business of the court."

The following is reprinted from 1 Bond, 607:

Proceedings of the United States circuit court within the southern district of Ohio, and of the bar of Hamilton county, Ohio, on the announcement of the death of Hon. John McLean, justice of the supreme court of the United States:

"Thursday, April 4, 1851. It being now announced, that Mr. Justice McLean, the presiding judge of this court, is remaining unwell, at his residence near Cincinnati, it is therefore ordered that business be suspended, and the court do stand adjourned until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning."

"Thursday, April 11, 1851. Stanley Matthews, Esquire, presented the following proceedings, and moved the court that they be entered on its journal:"

"At a meeting of the members of the Hamilton county bar, held in the United States circuit and district court room in Cincinnati, on Friday, April 5, 1851, on the occasion of the death of Judge McLean, Judges H. L. Leavitt, William Johnson, D. K. Este, C. D. Coffin, and George E. Pugh were appointed a committee on resolutions, who, after retiring, could not agree in the form of the same, which were unanimously adopted:"

"It is pleased God to terminate the mortal life of our friend and neighbor, John McLean, late an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States. He died at his late residence in the town of Cincinnati, yesterday morning, full of years and of honors—a man without reproach—a distinguished statesman—a patriot, untouched by degeneracy—a learned,
FEDERAL JUDGES

MARSHALL, JOHN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1385.]

The following proceedings of the bench and bar are reprinted from 1 McLean, 555:

At July Term, 1853, the following proceedings took place in relation to the decease of Chief Justice Marshall: The United States circuit court, for the seventh circuit and district of Ohio, opened, Monday, July 13th—present, Judges Todd and Leavitt. Immediately upon the opening of the court, Mr. Hammond, the eldest member of the bar present, rose and announced the death of Chief Justice Marshall, in the following words:

It has pleased Divine Providence to terminate the earthly career of John Marshall, late chief justice of the United States—a citizen without reproach—a patriot soldier of the Revolution—the friend, the companion, the biographer of Washington—the jurist, who, of all his contemporaries, has effected most to explain, to establish, and to vindicate a just interpretation of the constitution, its remedial bearings upon, and applications to, the individual rights and wrongs of the citizens. He died the death of a noble life at Philadelphia, on Monday afternoon, July 6th, in the 80th year of his age, surrounded by weeping relatives and mourning friends. As he had lived, he left an illustration to all around him of the Christian's hope and the good man's resignation. We must all feel the space that he has occupied. We must all feel the space that his departure. We must all deplore it—not for the departed, but for the country—for ourselves. Our consolation is, that he has left us—to posterity—

"His great example and his name."

Whereupon the court immediately adjourned. Tuesday Morning, July 14. So soon as the court was opened, Mr. Scott expressed himself as follows:

"A tribute of respect is due to departed excellence, whether, whilst living, the excellent qualities of character were displayed in the exercises of those private virtues, which rendered him so useful a citizen and endeared him to his family and to his friends, or in the discharge of those high official responsibilities, which the constitution and laws of his country may have devolved upon him. The private and public virtues of the late Chief Justice Marshall, to whose memory we pay this last tribute of respect, cannot be too highly appreciated by us who survive him. As a jurist, he has never been surpassed; but seldom, if ever, equaled. The labor, the care, the anxieties of a long life almost exclusively devoted to the service of his country, are ended. A great man has fallen; but he has left an immortal monument of his fame. His decisions as a jurist belong to posterity, who will not fail to do him justice. The ultimate effects of these decisions, which evinces such grasp of thought, on many of the great constitutional questions on which the politicians of his day were so much divided in opinion, remain to be tested. And although some may have entertained doubts whether their ultimate tendency might not be injurious, yet none, I presume, ever entertained doubts as to the purity of his intentions. He now rests from his labors, let us reverence his memory, and imitate his virtues. The last tribute of respect must be soon paid to each of us; our life is as a vapour, which remaineth but a time, and then passeth away. I am constituted the organ of a bar meeting held yesterday, to present their proceedings to the court; I present them, and move that they be entered on the journal."

The proceedings of the bar meeting having been read by Mr. Scott, Judge McLean responded to the motion in the following terms: "The court feel great satisfaction in discharging the duties of the members of the bar, on this melancholy occasion, shall be placed upon their record. It is the highest respect which we can pay, not originally, to the memory of that exalted citizen, whose loss we all deplore. For more than six years, I have had the honor to be intimately associated with the deceased, in the discharge of his duties; and this has been more than sufficient, to give me the highest admiration and respect for his eminent qualities, professional, intellectual, and moral. This is not the place nor the occasion, to speak at large of the great talents, and of that elevation of character, which, in the station he occupied, secured to him, beyond that of any of his predecessors, the most respect and confidence. His monument is seen in the judicial history of his country; and it is as imperishable as are those great principles which, in so distinguished a manner, he contributed to establish. He has fallen, and though he has fallen ripe in years and full of honors, yet his country will long mourn the loss—the profession will lament it—and most of all will the loss be felt and deplored by those who were associated with him on that bench, of which he was the distinguished ornament."

The following is reprinted from 1 Brock, 9:

Memor of John Marshall, by Joseph Hopkinson, read on the third day of March, 1837, to the "American Philosophical Society."

[Mr. John W. Brookbrown, the reporter, appended the following foot-note to this memoir in the first volume of his reports: The following brief sketch of the character and deeds of the late Chief Justice Marshall, from the pen of a ripe and accomplished scholar, is now offered to the public as an introduction to the volumes. It was, perhaps, insuperable from the preparation of such a memoir, that it should be tincted, in some degree, with the political views of the author; and it was also felt that the task of executing it should have devolved on one, who was not only eminent quality, but whose principles, opinions fully accorded with those entertained, with remarkable consistency, and enforced with singular power, by the late chief justice of the United States. The copious detail of the following paper which discusses the grave and, as some suppose, the very debatable question of the nature and scope of the powers conferred, by the constitution of the United States, the editor does not deem it proper, in this place, to express either approbation or dissent; but has chosen to present it, uncuttable and unaltered, as it came from the hands of Judge Hopkinson."

"The delay which has taken place in the performance of the duty, with which the society has honoured me, has been occasioned by various considerations which it is unnecessary now to explain. I need not assure you, that none of them will be found in an indifference to the appointment, and much less to the illustrous subject of it. The intense attention of the last summer, that of weeks and months, will not be impaired by the delay. There is nothing transient in the character and services of Chief Justice Marshall; nor will he be forgotten in the lapse of months or years; nothing that time and reflection will not confirm and consecrate. They are inseparably connected with the institutions of our country, with its history, and its destinies. You will recognize and feel them now, as fully and freshly as on the day of his death. While it is the pride of our society to enrol on its list of members, the most distinguished and honored citizens of our great republic, it is a consequence gratifying to think that we are called upon, from time to time, to record also their death, and to lament the loss of their labours and virtues, of their loss and aregone. As illustrated as our roll is with the names of the great and good, of the learned and wise, there is none that can claim pre-eminence over John Marshall. This great man, truly and emphatically born in Virginia, in the county of Fauquier, in the month of September, 1753. During his boyhood and youth, this country was entering on territory, with a scattered and rude population, and the means of obtaining even an ordinary education, exceedingly imperfect and uncertain. Notwithstanding this disadvantage, the talents of young Marshall developed themselves at a very early age. He exhibited, as was expected of the young and most eloquent orators, a decided taste for English literature, and especially poetry and history. It is worthy of observation that a mind of such solid structure, of such capacities for profound and abstruse researches, of such gigantic powers, should first have attached itself to poetry. He was enamoured of the books of the classical writers of the old English school of Milton and Shakspear, Dryden and Pope. Even here his supreme and individual and collection of masters! Here we had some assurance of the future man. He took his lessons of literature largely from devotion and sources; his teachers were the princes and nobles of the art, who stood on pedestals of adamantine with admiring ages rolling at their feet. How unlike the society, ephemeral, false, and impure models to which young readers, (and some old ones,) of the present day devote themselves, corrupting their taste, debilitating their judgment, and touching their morals with dangerous principles and irregular passions! Some of these literati, know little more than the names of Milton and Shakespeare, Dryden and Pope, and are ignorant even of the names of some of the most illustrious poets of our language. This occasion will not suffice for tracing the progress of John Marshall from infancy to manhood. When he reached the age of twenty years, the struggle of his country against foreign oppression had assumed a serious and decided aspect—a great fight—said an intrepid patriot of the east. 'We must fight,' was the response of the brave and true spirits of the interior states. The blow struck the heart of Marshall, and electrified the whole man. The core of his education, the charges of literature, law, science, in effect, his whole mind, was lost; and he betook himself to the field of mental strife, where the victory was to be won, and his country delivered, but whose position was not known. In the summer of 1775, he received a commission of lieutenant of a company of minute men, and was shortly after engaged in battle. He was in the successful engagement of the Carolinas, in the British lines of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. Does not this remind us of the best days of Greece and Rome, when their courts, their princes, their poets, and historians, however eminent, encountered the dangers and sufferings of the battle field on the call of their country? Yet we cannot but shrink and shudder to see such a life as that of John Marshall, placed in the balance against some hiring soldier, whose existence is of no value, and who is probably well paid for all the hazard to which he exposes it, by his shilling or six pence a day. But it was the cause, it was his country that demanded the sacrifice, by whatever hand he might fall. Thank heaven, he was reserved for higher and more essential services to that country. In the midst of these scenes which the niceties of war, Sir Marshall must have found some means and opportunities for study, for in 1780, he obtained his discharge, and returned to the army, and continued it to the termination of the contest. After this period his fellow-citizens seem to have understood the value of his character and destiny, for they then possessed of them. The people, until they become bewildered and maddened by the delusions and passions of party, are not blind to such gifts, nor to the worth of such men. Mr. Marshall, soon after the peace, was a member of the legislature of Virginia, and of the executive council of the state. In 1788, he was elected a representative of the city of Richmond, in the state legislature, and so continued until this time; he returned to his professional labours, but in 1788, he was again induced to take a seat in the legislative hall. He was offered by President Washington, the office of attorney general of the United States, which he declined; he withheld the solicitation of the same president to accept the appointment of minister to France, until the death of Mrs. Monroe. In 1797, Mr. Marshall,yielding his private interests and decided inclination to the public service, accepted an Embassy. He now received in the envoys to the court of France. The papers written on our behalf, and addressed to the French ministers, in their great capacity, are matters of the most important subjects of the controversy between the two countries, have not been overlooked or forgotten by those who have taken an interest in the history of the United States, at that embarrassing and perilous period. These documents are enduring monuments of the talents, knowledge, patriotism, experience, and wisdom of their framers, to whom the preparation of them was confided. Clear and impregnable in his principles of national law, faithful and firm to the rights of his country, vindicative of her claims with a sagacity and discretion, which gave no advantage to the adversary in the manner more than in the matter, of the dispute. Within two years from this decision, he resumed his professional duties. In 1799, he was elected to congress. At this moment, he was offered a seat in the Senate of the United States, but did not accept it. The time which the society may allot to me on this occasion, and which I fear I shall extend beyond my right, will not admit even of a cursory, exhibition of the independent and brilliant career of Mr. Marshall in the legislature of the Union. His speech on the occasion of Jonathan Robbins, will never be forgotten or surpassed. It is a perfect model of argumentative eloquence. No attempt was made to cast doubt or prejudice at all. It was not possible to bring contradiction or doubt upon it; there was an end of the question. In 1800, he was appointed by President Jefferson, secretary of war, and very soon afterwards secretary of state, which place he held but for a short time.

We have now arrived at the period of Mr. Marshall's career, in which he was espoused to the cause of the government, and was formed to the principles, which he meant to enliven and give it an imperishable solidity. On the 11th day of January, 1801, an auspicious and important day, Mr. John Marshall was appointed, by President Adams, chief justice of the United States. If our constitution is dear to us, if we should cherish and perpetuate and preserve a government suitable for a free and intelligent people, we should bless the day when it became the right and duty of this great and pure man to develope, define, and establish, the true and fundamental powers and character of an incomparable government, incomparable only when understood and administered by the principles which, from time to time, as occasions required, the chief justice, aided and sustained by his learned associates, has applied to its provisions; thus becoming a part of itself, and necessary to its healthful, durable, and consistent action. Of the value of his clear, discriminating, and vigorous intellect, of his unmeasurable and unassailable integrity, of his comprehensive, but regulated views; of his cool and firm judgment in the exercise of his high duties, as a member of a tribunal, in the construction and the law, and the administrator of justice, by and according to them, and them only, every one can judge; with justice and with propriety, one must, I say, be affected by his encouraging and amiable deportment, to the most humble advocate; while the statesman will reverence his clear and expansive views, and his unerring comprehension of cardinal principles; we must contemplate him, also, as a philosopher, and a man, and look to his more private virtues and accomplishments. He was an illustrious example of the truth, that simplicity is of the essence of greatness. It is so in man, in the arts, in every thing; but above all, in a man of his noble calling. He was an unassuming, hard-working, and useful man.
with the playfulness of a child; indulging in the light and amiable charities of life; enjoying to his heart's core, its innocent amusements; taking an interest in its ordinary concerns, and mixing, with some of the hopes and the sorrows of the company, and the hour. This was a spectacle more rare, than the display of superior talents, and extraordinary attainments. This was to be truly a great man. I have seen him, listening eagerly to a pleasant story; catching with intense attention, every nuance and turn, and giving, from time to time, note of enjoyment in unrestrained bursts of hilarity. He made it no part of his dignity and solemnity to wrap himself in a solemn reserve; to play the 'Sir Oracle,' to affect to be above his common feelings and excitments of his followings; to look with a cold and supercilious brow upon the occupations, interests, and pleasures of inferior men. I have seen his dark and penetrating eye, sparkle and flash with delight, at the recital of some anecdote of poignancy and exciting humour. Lord Wellesley, in his account of the character and habits of William Pitt, says, that he 'seemed unconscious of his superiority;' that he 'plunged heedlessly into the mirth of the hour,' and was endowed with 'a gay heart and social spirit beyond any man of his time.' But was not Chief Justice Marshall, a philosopher in the highest and best sense of the term? The character of his mind, was that of deep reflection, and close reasoning. He sought truth, in all the great principles of his profession, and not in accidental circumstances, or the authority of names. Having found the principle, he brought it home to the case he had to deal with, by a train of deductions, which it was impossible to separate, terminating in the conclusion, with the most perfect precision of its consequences. He was, in jurisprudence, such a philosopher, as Sir Humphrey Davy was in chemistry. He never experimented at random, trusting to chance for a discovery. His object, was, to seek for that which he sought, and expected to attain it, were philosophical, precise, and consecutive. He settled his principles, as the platform of his operations, and worked on them, step by step, until by, and through them, he reached the desired end. It was well observed to me, that there is philosophy in the judicial opinions of the chief justice, the philosophy of reasoning, of making clear and accurate deductions, from solid and established premises. This is, assuredly, a philosophy more useful and rare, than the impracticable theories, and wild visions, which are often called so.

"On the 8th day of July, 1835, in this city of Philadelphia, John Marshall died—with the same serenity in which he lived—

"Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch About him; and lies down to pleasant dreams."

At a meeting of the judge, the members of the bar, and the officers of the circuit court of the United States, for the eastern district of Virginia, held in the court room, in the city of Richmond, on the 3d November, 1835, the Honourable Philip Pendleton Barbour, was called to the chair, and Mr. Henry Gibson, clerk of the circuit court, was appointed secretary to the meeting.

The following preamble and resolutions were proposed by E. F. Leigh, Esq., and were unanimously adopted:

"John Marshall, late chief justice of the United States, having departed this life since the last term of the federal circuit court for this district, the bar, and bar, and assembled at the present term, embrace the first opportunity to express their profound and heartfelt sympathy in the bereavement of the venerable judge, who presided in this court for thirty-five years,—with such remarkable diligence in office, that he was disabled by the disease which removed him from life, he was never known to be absent from the bench, during term time, even for a day with such indulgence to counsel and suitors, that every body's convenience was consoled, but his own,—with a dignity, sustained with such strength, and firmness, without that which it, to which all men were solicitous to pay due respect,—with such profound sagacity, such quick penetration, such acuteness, clearness, strength, and comprehension of mind, that in his hands, the most complicated causes were plain, the weightiest and most difficult, easy and light,—with such striking impartiality and justice, and a judgment so sure, as to inspire universal confidence, so that few appeals were ever taken from his decisions, and long after he left the bench, the bar of the court, no juror, no witness, no suitor, in a single instance, ever found or imagined, in any thing said or done, or omitted by him, the slightest cause of offence. His private life was worthy of the exalted character he sustained in public station. The unaffected simplicity of his manners; the spotless purity of his morals; his social, gentle, cheerful disposition; his habitual self-depreciation, and boundless generosity towards others; the strength and constancy of his attachments; his kindness to his friends and neighbors; his exemplary conduct in the relations of son, brother, husband, father; his numerous charities, his benevolence towards all men, and his ever active beneficence; these amiable qualities shone so conspicuously in his public life, as he lived as he was respected, he had the rare happiness to be yet more beloved. He was, indeed, a bright example of that benevolence which consists in the union of the greatest ability, and the greatest virtue.

"Resolved, that in addition to the reasons common to us, with the whole people of the United States, we have peculiar cause to regret the loss of this wise and just magistrate, and great and good man.

"Resolved, that for the purpose of rendering merited honour to his memory, and of perpetuating, as far as it is possible to perpetuate, this expression of our sentiments of love and veneration for the judge, and the man, the circuit court be requested to enter these proceedings on its records. And that the chairman and secretary of this meeting, be requested to communicate the same to his family."

The following proceedings upon his retirement are reprinted from 10 Binch.:

At a meeting held in pursuance of the foregoing notice, and on motion of Joseph S. Bosworth, Charles O'Connor was elected president. On motion of Sidney Webster, the following gentlemen were chosen to be vice presidents: James W. Gerard, Murray Hoffman, and officers of the court, assembled at the present term, embrace the first opportunity to express their profound and heartfelt sympathy in the bereavement of the venerable judge, who presided in this court for thirty-five years,—with such remarkable diligence in office, that he was disabled by the disease which removed him from life, he was never known to be absent from the bench, during term time, even for a day with such indulgence to counsel and suitors, that every body's convenience was consoled, but his own,—with a dignity, sustained with such strength, and firmness, without that which it, to which all men were solicitous to pay due respect,—with such profound sagacity, such quick penetration, such acuteness, clearness, strength, and comprehension of mind, that in his hands, the most complicated causes were plain, the weightiest and most difficult, easy and light,—with such striking impartiality and justice, and a judgment so sure, as to inspire universal confidence, so that few appeals were ever taken from his decisions, and long after he left the bench, the bar of the court, no juror, no witness, no suitor, in a single instance, ever found or imagined, in any thing said or done, or omitted by him, the slightest cause of offence. NELSON, SAMUEL.
justice remain for our enlightenment and will descend to posterity. In these—his gifts to man—but the present and the future are participants alike; but in some things we are exclusively his benefactors. His magnificent disfavor on the bench was a model of all the judicial graces. In that high place his princely bearing and lionfront inspiration in the address and with the multitude, which it paraded the most audacious guilt. These things we have witnessed and will ever remember; but it did not convey to future ages, and an adequate portraiture of these. These memories and the pleasure of contemplating him in the serene tranquility with which closed his career are our own. The Augustan age of our jurisprudence, when Wells and Emmet argued the causes which Kent and Spencer decided, is happily in history with all that is now recognized as best and purest by the period which Nelson adorned. Patriotism and profession commute to the rising lawyers of to-day may sustain and transmit to worthy successors the great fame derived by their chiefs to the high sources and through such a noble channel.

Edwin W. Stoughton then moved that a committee of five be appointed by the chair to prepare an address of pupils to the retiring chancellor. The motion being adopted, the following gentlemen were named by the president as such committee: Ada P. Corwin, Benjamin H. Silliman, Theodore W. Dwight, George Gifford, Cornelius Van Santvoord.

The committee, after consultation, presented the following address:

To the Honorable Samuel Nelson: Sir—Your retirement from the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States affords to the present and to future ages a subject of reflection and meditative enjoyment. With the expression of their profound sense of the solid benefits conferred by your labors and example upon the bar and country of this country, from an early age to the bench of the circuit court of the state of New York, you commenced your judicial career under a system which pledged it to a long and independent tenure in return for which, you devoted to the discharge of your responsible duties, faculties and acquirements which singularly fitted you to administer justice among men. You brought to this work great energy, a noble ambition, an earnest love of justice, absolute impartiality, and a firmness of purpose, with which united a judgment of unsurpassed soundness. Acknowledging responsibility only to your conscience, to the people of the United States, and to the bar of the state, you were advanced to the supreme court, and there you proved yourself worthy to sit in the place of the great masters of jurisprudence who had preceded you, and whose reputations will endure forever. Again you were advanced, and the bar, with pride, saw you robed as chief justice of the state. As such you presided for many years, and had your judicial career terminated with the resignation of that office, the records of jurisprudence were enriched by your wisdom in the discharge of that of a great and just judge. Your labors were not thus to end. You had administered justice for the period of twenty two years. During that time you had the favor and respect of many members of that illustrious bar, which had greatly enlarged your entrance into judicial life. Around you had grown up a body of lawyers to whom you were object of adoration and reverence. You had served the state of your nativity well, and well had you maintained the honor and dignity of that high position which you possessed. Your opinions there delivered will long stand as examples of the right application of the law, and the production of a sound common sense to the cases presented for judgment. More than twenty-seven years ago, in the full maturity of your powers, you were appointed an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States. There, and at the circuit, you encountered new and untried questions. The law of nations, of admiralty, of prize, of revenue, and of patents, you mastered, and now address you can bear testimony, administered with unsurpassed ability. With critical accuracy you studied and applied a vast amount of legislation which had been within the special branches of jurisprudence you were compelled to administer. The benefits you conferred did not prove to future ages, and a magnificent career of life and study and reflection. Your kind and generous treatment of young lawyers ever encouraged them to renewed exertion; and, in struggling to deserve your approval, they were inspired by a worthy ambition, for they knew that your standard of professional excellence was high, and that to win your approval was an earnest call to exertion. Beyond all this, you have afforded the bench of this country an example by which the members of the bar, as well as the citizens of the United States, may be guided. By your long and spotless life as a magistrate, you have added dignity and lustre to the history of our jurisprudence; for, whilst the degradation and corruption of the courts and judges and officers are offensive, a revolting blot, their independence, their purity and their learning have over written the greatest and most infamous crimes.

There are among those who now address you, many who have so long been accustomed to your presence upon the bench, that they will be quite reconciled to your absence. They will sometimes earnestly wish that you could have remained to steady them in the performance of their duties, until the close of this service. But the number of these is so very small. Nevertheless, all who now address you will never cease to be thankful, that upon your retirement you have left to your family and circle of friends a model of soundness and of Lord Mansfield: 'It has pleased God to allow to the evening of an useful and illustrious life, the purest enjoyment of this country, and to lotted to it, the unclouded reflections of a superior and unfading mind over its varied events, and the happy consciousness that it hath been faithfully and eminently devoted to the highest duties of human society.' Earnestly hoping that these blessings may be enjoyed by you for many years, the members of the bar who unite in this tribute to your worth, remain forever your friends.

Edward Pierrepont, in moving the acceptance of this report, said:

"Mr. Chairman: When eminent men have died, it has been the custom among civilized nations to take some public notice of the event. But the number of the dead in a great office are so few, that it can hardly be said, that any custom touching such retirement has been established. The interest of the country makes it the more noted, and for every reason it was most fit that you, Mr. Chairman, should have been selected to preside at this unusual meeting of the bar. When a man in his early prime resigns a high office to enter some broader field of ambition, or to seek new gratifications in the pursuit of wealth, he neither deserves nor receives any special marks of approbation from his fellow-men. But when one has spent a long life in the public service, and has borne himself in his great office as to command the respect of every honest citizen, and at the call of duty lets go his hold on power, while all his faculties remain, he is a man so rare as to attract more than a passing notice; and we have not to say something of this grand old man who was eighty years old the 6th of November last, and who, by continuing three months longer, would have had an uninterrupted career of judicial life full fifty years. We search in vain for a case of the court, and there is no occasion than to have clung feebly to his place until death pulled him reluctant from his seat. Now like the man, how in his exact learning to be a judge, how in his manner of speaking, was his retirement from an office in which he, sooner than others, felt that the burden of his years might possibly diminish his usefulness. No pride, no love of power, no vanity stood for a moment in his way; a lofty sense of duty governed him in the end as at the beginning, and as all through his life. It was well known, if Judge Nelson had lived, that his aged age would prolong his stay upon the bench; but those well-acquainted with Judge Nelson knew that the high tone of his character would not allow him to retain the office one day after he had determined to resign from it. Lord Mansfield, the chief justice of the bench, considered the important character of the chief justice, and his retirement, as a loss to the bench, and declared that the bench would be incomplete without him.

Between Judge Nelson and the chief justice there were two striking points of resemblance. So noted was Lord Mansfield for preferring substantial justice to musty precedent, and so firmly did he believe in the flexibility of the common law, and that its rigid rules should bend to new exigencies in the advancement of commerce, of science, of civilization and humanity, that it was a common thing for the old lawyers to sneer at what they called 'Lord Mansfield's Equity Judgments,' and Junius, in a letter addressed to the chief justice, November 14th, 1770, says: 'I am, in matters of equity, more of an advocate of the bench, and the common law. Instead of those certain rules by which the judgment of a court of law should invariably be made to fall, you give way to your own unsettled notions of equity and substantial justice. Decisions given upon such principles do not weigh with us; we do not regard what public were not alarmed; the public saw that Lord Mansfield was right, and that 'equity and substantial justice' was what good men desired, and not the equity and justice, in deference to worn-out precedents unsuited to the advancing times.

In the construction of statutes of the United States, subtle and unsubstantial technicalities, interposed to defeat justice, had small chance of success where Judge Nelson was presiding. At the trial of the great frauds of Kohlitz, I was employed in the great dispute as to the prosecution; several of the eminent lawyers here present were engaged for the defence, and none, not even John Adams, could turn a hair of the case against Lord Mansfield and Judge Nelson for their adherence to 'equity and substantial justice.' The greatest jurists are already forgotten, while both of these great jurists will be held in reverence so long as the common law continues to be administered.

The rapid growth of the United States, as a nation, led to the necessity of a new system of courts for the United States. The Constitution of the United States provided for a Supreme Court, and the appointment of the Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court was made by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

In 1800, when the Democratic party looked around for a candidate to run for the presidency, they turned to Thomas Jefferson, who was a member of the United States and the sentiment of the people seemed to be uniform. The meeting was held in Philadelphia, and with the robes of office, he shall never make the sacred seat a stepping stone from which to ascend to any political place.

When the powers of Great Britain and of the United States undertook a negotiation which resulted in the treaty of Washington, our sagacious secretary of state, with that good judgment for which he is distinguished, selected (by the approbation of the president) Judge Nelson as one of the high commissioners; and the crowning act of a great career in the public service was the prominent part he took in concluding that treaty, by which enduring peace between these two great nations, speaking the same language, governed by similar laws, and worshipping the same God through the same religious forms, was secured.

'The Lord Chief Justice Mansfield lived five years after the resignation of his office. May our equally great and equally respected Judge live many more times than the years employed by that great statesman and that great jurist. And when old Time shall lead him to his end, Goodness and he fill up one monument.'

On the conclusion of the discussion, the meeting was addressed by Clarence A. Seward, who said:

'President: It is with unfeigned satisfaction that I have the honor to present to you the earnest and unceasing efforts of the people of the United States in the adoption of the proposed address. It is meet and right that the evening of a well-spent life should be brightened, ere its close, by the commendation, 'Well done, good and faithful servant.' The utterances of approval are more timely now than if postponed until sorrows tempered them. Better it is to die living, 'Thou art worthy of honor,' than to reserve the recognition for eulogy and mausoleum.

For thirty years Judge Nelson was an intimate friend, formed in school-boy days at Cooperstown, grown stronger, and with them both is mingled an affection which, to-day, finds cause for regret that professional intercourse must henceforth cease. For many repeated words, kindly suggestive of patience, hope, and promise, I am to-day the debtor of him in whose life I have never had any regard in which he has been held by those among whom his lifetime has been spent.

'No one knows the test of time better than I do, that we are not assembled here as a brotherhood in mourning, but to testify our affectionate regard for one.
who still lives, as is so felicitously stated in the address, 'to enjoy the happy consciousness that his life has been faithfully and eminently devoted to the highest duties of human society.'

"It is not necessary that one should have passed away to insure an example worthy of emulation. The memory of a great judge remains and will be remembered by the posterity of Mr Justice Nelson, which conspicuously marked his judicial career, and which may be mentioned in his life-time as the three graces of observance. They are his calmness, courtesy and dignity. His calmness was imperceptible, and never descanted on by himself or others. His ignorance could not disturb it. Ill temper could not ruffle it. He held himself in check, and restrained the emotions of others. It permeated the atmosphere of the forum, and insured confidence and decorum. His courtesy was natural, and therefore always manifest. It insured a patient hearing, and his sagacity and wisdom, by example, secured the courtesy of all. If it failed in so doing, a kindly word from him restored the broken harmony. His dignity, borrowed. It was nature's outward clothing of the gentleman within. It repelled familiarity, as it forbade insult, and it imparted itself alike to equal and inferior. He possessed an illustrious reputation, and became a sort of pledge to the public for security."

The country, you have included, as being one of the three graces of Mr Justice Nelson, which will ever make that charge against him. Contemporaries and tradition will alike refute that. That he has a large heart, filled with human kindness, that he is a wise man and the best of lawyers, is not the kind of greatness which can be translated into a language of jest, and which can be made acceptable by the ordinary man. It is for the younger members of the bar a manifestation of attention, precisely equal to that which was bestowed upon the older and more able advocates. It sympathized with nervous inexperience, and was itself too tender to wound by biting sarcasm or harshest jest. It could be just to one not likely to feel the blow, but it could be just to a friend, and in so doing rise superior to apprehensions of possible hostile comment. Of his logical understanding, quick perception, judicial abilities and juridical knowledge, there is no occasion now to speak. They are evinced for ourselves and for the future with that of the General Assembly of the state, and by the bar of the state, and by the bar of the United States and the country at large, confirm his position as a man of disinterested and disinterestedness of the judiciary. Again, if we compare him with those who have gained great fame, among ourselves or in the mother country, in the different departments of the law—such as lawyers, such as admiralty judges—who is there but must concede that in the number of his causes, in the magnitude of his judgments, as in the uniformity of the principles which he applied in each of these different departments of the law, he stands now, in his old age, to be compared with such masters in those separate departments as Sir William Scott, Lord Eldon, Lord Mansfield, Dr. Lushington, Kent, Spencer, Tindal and Shaw.

We find also, in this extraordinary life, no defect apparent, and nothing wanting. We mark a collective force and strength of varied and prolonged service and of sustained credit in his career, which are not to be conceded to any single life of judicial distinction, either in England or with us. He had, by the lofty and dignified charge of the great trusts confided to him, in the language of Lord Bolingbroke, "built up about him that opinion of mankind, which, fame after death, is superior strength and power in life." Whenever he moves, in whatever attitude he is regarded, these traits of dignity and force of character must always be accorded to him. My own personal observation of Mr Justice Nelson covers the whole period of Judge Nelson's services in the judiciary of the nation, and carries me back through a few years, which would not have done an unjust thing for any worldly prize or motive, entered on, used and voluntarily sacrificed, to procure the universal love, and honor, and praise that ever did English subject in this age, or any that just history does record." What was true of England's most venerable chief justice is equally true of New York's most venerable judge. Professional ties are broken here to-day, never to be reunited. Those of friendship still remain, and across them, as across the cumbrous records and registers of Mr Justice Nelson, which conspicuously marked his judicial career, and which may be mentioned in his life-time as the three graces of observance. They are his calmness, courtesy and dignity. His calmness was imperceptible, and never descanted on by himself or others. His ignorance could not disturb it. Ill temper could not ruffle it. three or four years while he remained on that bench, I had the good fortune to make his personal acquaintance, and the honor to make arguments before him in several suits. I argued, I think, before him of the most direct causes of much importance after he took his seat here, in the circuit court of the United States, being a re-argument of the case which I had argued before Judge Thompson, and his death had left undecided. From that time to this, in New York, in Vermont, and at Washington, socially and professionally, I have had the good fortune to associate with, and have been present to my personal and professional admiration. Mr. Chairman, Archbishop Whately, in his recent letter to Lord Brougham, which I have read, says that the scholars and moralists regard as a not unworthy commentary on so celebrated a text—has drawn a contrast between the relations to the community of a great lawyer and of a great judge, that is more pointed than it is flattering to those of us who adhere to the bar—more pointed, perhaps, than it is just. He says, in substance, for I quote only from distant memory, that when a pre-eminent individual is withdrawn from the service of the law, it by no means follows that the public or the administration of justice thereby suffers a loss. For, as he suggests, the great interest of society, the community, and the whole judicial establishment existing for the perfection of the administration of justice among men, where an individual has so far as his follow as greatly to overmaster them by his eloquence, by his learning, by his will, by his fame, and so, until their senses are weighed down to throw into the scales of justice against him, perhaps the community, instead of losing, gains something by the subtraction of this disturbing force. But, this critical remark to a great and eminent judge, there arises no such question. His talents, his powers, his authority, his name, his fame, are what they were intended to represent to the whole community, and when he is withdrawn from the scene of his labors, and from their beneficent distribution and activity, it is, for the moment, as if the sun were taken from the heavens. Do we not all agree that, if this be true of any judge, it is true of Judge Nelson? Now, Mr. Chairman, may we not all be permitted to feel, at this point in this remarkable life, and before the end, death, has set its corona to its illustrious work, that we may assign to Judge Nelson a place by the side of Eldon and Mansfield, of Kent and Spencer, of Shaw, of Marshall, and Taney, among those who shall hereafter be called by the endearing title of the ‘renowned for justice, and for length of days.’ Indeed, sir, in face of the classic caution against premature judgment, I feel no imputation of rashness in pronouncing this fortunate, although it has not reached its close.”

The address presented by the committee having been concluded, it was ordered, on motion, that Edwards Pierpont, that be signed by the officers of this meeting, and presented to Mr. Justice Nelson. The following committee on presentation was appointed by the president: Edwards Pierpont, Edwin W. Stoughton, Clarence A. Seward, Edward H. Owen, Charles M. Keller, William M. Evarts, Sidney Webster, Thomas C. T. Buckley, Joshua M. Van Cott, John E. Ward, Samuel L. M. Barlow, Aaron J. Vanderbilt, James Thomas, Justus F. Smith, John Sherwood. It was then moved by Edwin W. Stoughton, that a committee be appointed by the president to present the oration of Judge Evarts at this meeting to the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York. An amendment thereto was offered by Clarence A. Seward, that the president of this meeting be chairman of this committee, which having been put to vote by Mr. Seward, and accepted by the meeting, and the original motion having been adopted, the president, in pursuance thereof, added the following gentlemen as members thereof: George K. Conover, Benjamin D. Stillman, Joseph H. Choate, Stephen P. Nash, James C. Carter, Charles Donohue, George Biss, Jr., Charles M. Da Costa. A motion of William

M. Evarts was then adopted, that a committee be appointed by the president, to present the address and the proceedings of this meeting to the supreme court of the United States at Washington; and the following gentlemen were appointed the committee: William M. Evarts, Edwards Pierpont, Edwin W. Stoughton, George Ticknor Curtis, Samuel J. Tilden, Charles M. Da Costa, Charles H. Keller, Charles F. Blake, Sidney Webster. John K. Porter moved that a committee be selected by the president, of which Edwin W. Stoughton be chairman, to present the oration of this meeting to the court of appeals of the state of New York, at Albany, which having been carried, a subsequent motion, which the committee presented, that the committee be enlarged, and adopted, that the chair be authorized to name the members of this committee after the adjournment of this meeting. The following gentlemen were subsequently selected by the president: Edwin W. Stoughton, John K. Porter, Francis Ker- nan, Lyman Tremain, Samuel Hand. On motion of George Gifford, the meeting adjourned. Charles O’Connor, President. Sidney Webster, Secretary.

Presentation of the address: In fulfillment of the agreement duly imposed upon the committee appointed to present the foregoing address, Mr. Stoughton, Mr. Seward, Mr. Owen, Mr. Keller, Mr. Webster, and Mr. Hand, of the circuit and district judges of the federal courts for the second circuit, accompanied by the committee (consisting of the chairman of the district judge and Judges Benedict and Blatchford of the district judges) accepted the invitation. Judges Shipman, Hall, and Smalley were unable to be present. Mr. Justice Nelson informed the committee that he would be pleased to receive them and the judges in his house at two o’clock. The attendance of all gentlemen of the committee, having been prevented by illness, Mr. Stoughton was chosen in his place, and introduced the committee, and the purpose of its presence, by the following remarks: "Honored Sir: We appear before you to-day as a committee of the bar of the second circuit, appointed at a large meeting of the members thereof, lately held in the city of New York, for the purpose of taking action upon your retirement from the bench of the supreme court of the United States, after an uninterrupted judicial service of nearly fifty years. That meeting was preceded over by the eloquence of the Honorable Judge O’Connor, and the members of the bar composing it unanimously adopted an address, which with their entire proximate and subsequent approval, has instructed the committee to present to you. We are here to discharge that agreeable duty. We are here upon a mission of deep interest to all American judges, and, as we believe, to the bench and to the country,—to the bar, because it owes to you reverence and honor for your long, unwearying service in encouraging and instructing them; to the bench, because it is your doctor for the noble judicial example you have recorded for its guidance; to the country, because you deserve its gratitude for the devotion of your life to its service, in the performance of duties the most arduous and the most useful which your profession can form for your fellow-man. That distinguished members of the bench share these sentiments with us, is illustrated by the appearance before you upon this occasion, the representatives of the several circuits of the United States, and Benedict, whose reputations have already become national, and who, laying aside other pressing engagements and duties, have come to you from afar, at this inopportune season of the year, to manifest by their presence the interest which they feel in the position of the highest and most exalted judges of the American courts. We are here, as we believe, to witness, through its representatives, the appreciation by the other federal judges of the circuit in which you so long administered justice would have also been here, had not injury prevented, as they have signified by letters which this committee will hand you. The committee regret the sad illness of its chairman, Judge Pierpont, has prevented its attendance.
here. In consequence of this, he who addresses you has been appointed in his place; and now, in discharge of the duties imposed upon the committee, I ask to you the wish to inscribe the words of the bar, which we are instructed to present.

Mr. Stoughton here read the address, and in delivering Judge Nelson, with a copy of the proceedings of the meeting, added: "In delivering this to you, as we now do, we tender to you our best felicitation and respect and reverence."

Judge Woodruff then addressed Mr. Justice Nelson as follows: "The members of the bench of the circuit over which, honored sir, you have so long presided, have their cordial and the concurrence of the sentiments of the address tendered to you by the bar of that circuit. So truthfully and well their leading, integrity, and in that address, that we should weaken its force and gracefulness, and diminish the pleasure of their felicitation, we attempt a repetition, on our own behalf, of what has been there stated. As members of the bench, we may, however, add, that your long experience and the learning and wisdom with which you have been blessed to the duties of your high position have lessened our labors, enlightened our understandings, eased the burden of our responsibilities, and greatly furnished us for the performance of the duties we have yet to discharge; which we have to discharge without your present aid, counsel and advice we should receive from your hand, you deemed it wise to cease in the position from which you have now retired. Your learning has inspired and your example has stimulated and encouraged us to a higher estimate of judicial worth, and has awakened a nobler ambition to do what belongs to our several duties so as to gain a kindred, though it be humbler, appreciation when our work shall be finished. By that example our path is made luminous, and the grace and dignity which adorn the judicial office is constantly presented to us. A judicial life of fifty years marked, all along its array of days and months, its hours, its years, its decades, by learning, integrity, and a pure conscience, and by the honor, respect and confidence of your fellow-men. Our sincerest wish can offer to you no higher or warmer expression of our admiration and regard than the earnest prayer that we may be able, in our stations, to deserve some reasonable proportion of the esteem so justly and so cordially felt for you. I have, further, only to say: may the days be yet many in which you shall go in and out before us in reverence and in hearing. May your last days be your best days; and may they be crowned with that reward which is the true aspiration and the highest hope of a Christian life."

Mr. Justice Nelson made the following reply:

"Gentlemen of the committee: I cannot but feel extremely honored by this address of my brethren of the bar on the occasion of my retirement from the bench, not more from the friendly and complimentary opinions therein expressed than on account of the unusual and extraordinary mark of respect and affection with which it has been presented; and I am the more deeply impressed with this manifestation from the consideration that the gentlemen of the bar who have originated and promoted this honor, some of whom are before me, have been themselves not only eye-witnesses of the judicial administration which they so favorably commend, but in which many of them largely participated in their professional capacity. I shall ever recur to the sessions of the court held in the city of New York, extending over a period of more than a quarter of a century, when the business was large, and many of the causes important, involving great labor and responsibility. As an evidence of the magnitude of the business for many years, the court was held three months in the spring and three in the autumn of the year, and still left an unfinished calendar. But the gentlemen of the bar are well aware that I have been during their time, faithful to their clients and to the court, whose learning and diligence in the preparation greatly relieved the judge of his labors, and whose professional deportment and respect, banished from the courtroom every disturbing element, leaving free the full and undivided exercise of the faculties of court and counsel in their pursuit after the just and right justice of the case. No one knows better than the presiding judge how essential this state of feeling between the bench and the bar is, not only to the ease and pleasure, but to the sound and successful administration of the law. I have said that the gentlemen of the bar who have originated this unusual honor have been eye-witnesses of judicial services so highly commended. On the other hand, I can say that I have witnessed their professional career from their earliest days, and in that respect, and in the present eminence, many of whom hold my license to practice when chief justice of the supreme court of the state. This, of course, expresses my sentiments of the meeting. Mr. O'Connor, the eldest of them, is I have an exception. The first session of the supreme court of the state, after my appointment as associate justice, was the last held on the 20th of January of this year, 1840, and the city of New York, more than forty-one years ago. He was then a young counsellor, just rising in the profession. He has a good work of years before the court from the young attorneys, and was struggling upward manfully and with youthful ardor, contending for the mastery, against the aged and elder counsellors at the bar, and the prevailing impression had been, and to a qualified extent was then, among the junior members of the bar, that the extinction of the judicial bench of the court. This, according to tradition among them, had been undisguisedly so, and to a much larger extent, before the old and revered supreme court of the state. But even at that juncture and of this feeling in the court, and which was perhaps not unnatural, had not entirely disappeared. It required, therefore, for a long time to effect an revolution on the part of the junior to encounter this impression, which he must in some degree have felt in the trial of strength against the experienced and favored senior. In the country, where I have always resided, Talcott, a young counsellor, remarkable for intellectual power and legal learning at his age, led the way, under some discouragement, in the trial and argument of causes before the courts and in bar. Other juniors, taking courage from his example and success, followed. I was afterward attorney general of the state, the youngest counsellor, I believe, ever appointed to that office in New York at that time, with, perhaps, the exception of Josiah Ogden Hoffman, among the junior counsellors of the attorney generals. I was still young when advanced to the bench of the state, and as was perhaps natural, my sympathies and interests inclined the younger members of the bar, struggling upward and onward in their profession, and, as far as was fit and proper, they had my favorable consideration and kindness. I would do injustice to my feelings and convictions if I closed these few observations without making my acknowledgments to the bar of the second circuit, of my great indebtedness to them for any judicial standing to which I may be entitled. Since my advancement to the bench, nearly half a century ago, I have had their uniform good-will and friendship, have been instructed by their learning and encouraged by the expression of their favorable opinions. They have ever been not only ready but forward to economize and lighten the labors of the court when the amount of the business pressed the hardest, even at the expense of their own personal convenience. So uniform and habitual were these exhibitions of respect and friendship, that I felt, when in court and engaged in the solemn exercise of the law, that I was surrounded, not in courtesy, but in reality, by professional brothers, and that every error would be likely to be rectified, and every act worthy of commendation would receive its full reward. This address of the bar of New York on the termination of my office, in approbation of them, I look upon as the crowning reward, which will be a source of perpetual consolation in the decline of life, and so long as a
FEDERAL JUDGES

PITMAN, JOHN.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1300.]

The following proceedings are reprinted from 2 Cliff. 628:

At an adjourned meeting of the members of the bar at the Isle Island district, on Monday morning, November 21, 1864, the following resolutions, reported from the committee previously appointed upon the subject, were unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, that the death of John Pitman, district judge of the United States for the Rhode Island district, though an event in the course of nature at his advanced age of fourscore years, has, by its suddenness, in the midst of his labors, unannounced, in the still night, when no man keepeth watch, filled us with awe and dread in presence of that august power in whose hands are the issues of life.

"Resolved, that in recalling the judicial career of Judge Pitman, whether as witnessed by and known to ourselves or as derived from those who knew him as an outlaw in earlier years, we behold only virtue and goodness, an enlightened intelligence, untiring industry, unwearied patience, a clear perception, a sound mind, a love of truth, and justice, incorruptible integrity, unblemished honor, and a true humanity.

"Resolved, that though this is our peculiar province, as members of the legal profession, to express our sense of the character and worth of the deceased as a lawyer and a judge, we would not fail to recognize the common bereavement of the whole community in the loss of an able, upright, and faithful magistrate, an exemplary citizen and a good man, whose uncluttered public and private virtues won for him the respect and honor of all men throughout his long and useful life, and have secured for him an affectionate, lasting remembrance in death.

"Resolved, that while we would not intrude upon the sanctity of private grief, we respectfully tender our sincere condolence to the family of the deceased in their great bereavement.

"Resolved, that Wingate Hayes, Esq., be requested to present these resolutions to the United States circuit court now in session in Providence, with a request that they be entered upon the minutes of the court as a tribute of respect to the deceased.

"Resolved, that as a further mark of respect we will attend the funeral of the deceased in a body and send the following resolutions, signed by the chairman and secretary, to the family of the deceased, and published in the daily papers: Samuel Currey, Chairman. James Tillinghast, Secretary."

Proceedings in the United States circuit court:

The United States circuit court convened, pursuant to adjournment, in the court room, on Monday morning at 11 1/2 o'clock, Judge Clifford presiding. There was a large attendance of the members of the legal profession. Hon. Wingate Hayes, at the request of his associates of the bar, presented and read to the court the foregoing series of resolutions, and made the following address:

"May it please the court:—The members of the bar of the district have requested me to present to the court certain resolutions adopted by them as a tribute of their respect to the memory of the late Hon. John Pitman, judge of the United States district court for this district. In performing this duty it may not be improper for me to refer to some of the prominent events of his life, leaving to your honor, from whom the bar hope to have a response to their resolutions, and to my older brethren, who enjoyed his acquaintance and more intimate acquaintance with Judge Pitman, to speak of those qualities of head and heart which particularly distinguished him. Judge Pitman was born in the village of Providence, February 28, 1786. He graduated at Rhode Island College (now Brown University) in 1799, having entered that institution in the tenth year of his age. He received from the same University in 1840 his degree of doctor of laws, and at the time of his decease was a member of its trustees or fellows for more than thirty-six years. Upon leaving college he entered the law office of Hon. David Howell, who was afterwards his immediate predecessor as district judge, and pursued the study of the law there, and at Poughkeepsie, N.Y., and in New York city, for nearly seven years, when arriving at the age of twenty-five, one, and becoming eligible to admission to the bar, was admitted to practice in the mayor's court of New York in June, 1800.—De Wesley, signing his certificate of admission,—and in the supreme court of that state in the August following, his certificate then being signed by Chancellor Kent. He opened an office in New York city, but in the spring of 1807 went to Kentucky, where in the September following he was admitted to the bar, and practised law until September, 1809. He then returned to Providence and practised his profession until 1812, when he removed to Salem, Mass. There he formed the acquaintance of Judge Story, an acquaintance which ripened into an intimate friendship, and was terminated only by the death of that distinguished jurist. Mr. Pitman remained in Salem four years, and then opened an office in Portsmouth, N. H., where he practised law from 1816 to 1825. He attended events of the period during which he resided at Salem and at Portsmouth, and the associations and influences by which he was surrounded, were well calculated to develop those traits of character which marked him during the remainder of his life. The war between this country and Great Britain, and the complicated and important questions growing out of it, furnished a large business to those lawyers whose learning and skill commanded the confidence of the community. Mr. Pitman soon entered upon an extensive practice in the prize courts, and drew, it is said,—with what truth I do not know,—the first libel in the prize under the constitution of the United States. The Reports of the United States circuit court and of the supreme court of the United States attest with what ability and success in the discussion of the law of prize he met in those forums; the leading advocates of the country, some of whom, like Mr. Dexter and Mr. Webster, became, and remained for life, his personal friends. At the New Hampshire bar he came in contact with such men as Mason, Jeremiah Smith, Bartlett, Sullivan, and the Bells,—names your honor will readily recognize, of lawyers in the front rank of their profession. In 1820 he returned to his native town, where he continued in the practice of his profession, with the exception of a few years which he passed at his country residence on the shores of Narragansett bay. In December, 1829, he was elected district attorney, and in 1834, district judge, which office he held for forty years, and until the time of his decease. On Tuesday last, at the request of your honor, Judge Pitman presided in this court, and delivered the charge to the grand jury. On Wednesday and Thursday he sat by your side, attentive and interested as usual in all the business of the court. Thursday night his spirit passed away. The death of Judge Pitman, at any time, could not fail to be an event of public and probably interest to this community. Occurring as it did in the daily performance of his judicial duties, stricken down almost in our very sight, the public, and especially the members of this bar, have received the intelligence with the most profound emotion. While I would content myself with expressing my grief upon the loss of a honest man, I see him upon the beach without being impressed with his perfect impartiality, firmness, and love of truth. He was 'justum et tenacem propositi virum.'"

Hon. Samuel Currey then addressed the court as follows:

"May it please your honor: I have much to regret the absence on this occasion of the Hon. Richard W. Greene, the senior practising member of the bar in this district. I have just received a letter from him stating his attendance here, and requesting me to express to the court his regret at being absent on this melancholy occasion, as well as the deep sympathy that he attaches to the occasion. He is his own sorrow at the loss of a personal friend, with whose career as a lawyer and judge, and with whose career as a man, he cannot help but have acquainted for a great number of years, and with whom he enjoyed the warmest friendship. Judge Pitman was a man of mature age, and his death is a sad loss to the bar and the entire circle of Mr. Pitman's friends and acquaintances in Rhode Island and out of it, when I last knew him. He was a man, upright, and an honest man,—the highest and the best attainment of humanity, and the noblest work of God. To say that he was an impartial judge, is only to say what was almost self-evident. To say that he was an honest judge, is to say that he attained to the highest honesty of which humanity is capable. To say that he lived a long life, that he officiated in his long judicial career without blemish and without censure, without spiting, enmity, or spite, except what necessarily pertains to humanity, is but to say what every heart feels on this occasion.

"Judge Pitman's career was an enviable one. To be a judge is an enviable position. To be a judge and to render satisfaction to the community in which his magistracy is acknowledged, is the highest attainment of our laborious profession. But to have been associated many years in his judicial career with such men as your honor's predecessors on this bench, with Judge Curtis, with Judge Woodbury, and for a much longer course of years with the Honorable Justices of the Supreme Court (of some of them, I know the testimony of the jurists to whom I have referred, I never paid attention to the contrary, from any of them,) that he enjoyed in a singular manner the friendship, confidence, and love of your honor's predecessors on this bench. I am not able to go behind the period of my own experience, but that experience extends as a professional man over more than twenty-five years in this court; and during that period I have always admired the patience, the industry, the calmness, moderation, firmness, and dignity of Judge Pitman, both when he has been sitting with his associates and when he has been sitting alone. I remember an instance which I may be permitted to mention occasionally in these remarks. Some years since, when he had a laborious case to decide, he said to me, as I happened to be in his office on chambers business: 'Have you given attention to such and such a question of law?' and then he went on to the foundation of that question; I believe the more I study into the law, the further I am from finding the court in its bareavement, and also from the knowledge.' He stated to me what the question was and how much time he had bestowed upon it. And I recollected upon that occasion, when he was so detailed to me by members of the profession older than myself and now passed away, by gentlemen who enjoyed his friendship, who were intimate with him as a man and familiar with his character and his labors, and who addressed toward him the same high opinion which I had formed and have now endeavored feebly to express. To-day, your honor, we part with this eminent man forever, and also with the living the vacant. He has withdrawn. But the philosophical mind, and yet more the Christian mind, will not allow us to stand where we stand here to-day to do him honor, to recall the life that he lived here, the character he exhibited here, the integrity and uprightness of the man, the sincerity of the Christian, we can feel no uneasiness as to his condition in the future and the blessings of the resurrection. He died in a good, honored age. He died, as far as we know, without suffering and without a pang; and we can say, 'Peace and honor be to his grave, and rest upon a hundred of his health. Pursuant to his usual course on such occasions, he requested that the trial of the cause before the court should proceed. When he left his seat I have no doubt he expected to find relief in the open air, and that he in a brief period would be able to return; but he was disappointed. He expected to find the expected relief, he left and went to his residence, and at the usual hour in the evening returned, and a short time after the order was received; but when morning came it was found that his spirit had fled to Him who gave it, and it may confidently be hoped to receive the reward of an upright, faithful, and unfeigned life. Such, in brief, are the circumstances under which your honor and my official relations to the deceased have been suddenly terminated; and I cannot but think that they are such as should admonish us all that in the midst of life we are in death, and that no one here knows who will next rise to give us this account. Happy indeed will it be for that one, whoever he may be, if he can hopefully expect to be as well prepared for the solemn event as was the subject of these remarks. Judge Pitman was born in this city on the 23d of February, 1793, about two years after the treaty of peace. Nativity, however, was by no means the only mark which would have made him to your locality. On the contrary, it was here that he received his classical education, and it was here also that he received his professional education in the profession as the chosen pursuit of his life. Having completed his preparatory studies, he entered Brown University opinion or decision upon the case, which embraced a very wide examination of statute and common law. The opinion or decision, as far as I can remember, was so detailed to me by members of the profession older than myself and now passed away, by gentlemen who enjoyed his friendship, who were intimate mitten to the bar, his first inclination was to leave his native city and to endeavor to earn success and distinction in the law. Accordingly, he practised law for a short time in the city of New York, and afterwards at Salem, in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and then removed to Portsmouth, in the state of New Hampshire, where he remained for four years. During the period last mentioned, he was brought in contact with some of the ablest lawyers of the United States. Rockingham bar at that period had enrolled among its members such men as Webster, Mason, Smith, Shaw, Adams, and Bartlett, all of whom were orators of great learning and experience. Contemporaries of that day agree with one accord that Judge Pitman even in that circuit sustained a high rank in his profession, and that his personal character was above reproach. All who knew him concurred in the opinion that he was a lawyer of good judgment, high attainment, and much esteemed by the court. Actuated, however, by the attachments of early manhood, he accepted, in September, 1820, an invitation to return to his native city, where he has ever since resided in the midst of the friends of his youth. President Monroe appointed him district attorney of the United States for this district on the 9th of December, 1820, and he continued to discharge the duties of that office with distinguished success until the 1st of August, 1823, when he was appointed district judge of the United States for this district. Forty years and more have elapsed since he entered upon the duties of that important office, and there lives not a man to say that he has been guilty of intentional error. Better things need no man have said of him than those that will be the subject of these remarks, that his whole course as district judge of the United States was such for the period of forty years that all knowing him agree that he was a good man and a just magistrate. Prior to my appointment to the bench of the supreme court, I had no personal acquaintance with my lamented associate. Since that time our relations have been intimate and cordial. Gone to the grave in the midst of a community where he was born, and where he has lived for forty years, he needs no commendation from any quarter. Justice, however, requires me to say that for the six years during which we have been associated together in this bench, I have always found him faithful to his duties, and anxious, in the decision of cases submitted to our determination, to reach the justice of the cause without the least bias, prejudice, or partiality. His example of purity and uprightness is a good one, which all may well seek to emulate, but which few or none can hope to excel. Pursuant to the request contained in the resolutions, let the proceedings of the bar be placed upon the records of the court."

POPE, NATHANIEL.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1301.]

The following obituary notice is reprinted from 4 McLean:

Since the publication of the third volume of the Federal Judges, it has pleased God to call from life the Honorable Nathaniel Pope, district judge of Illinois. He died, after a brief but severe illness, at St. Louis, shortly after the adjournment of his court, at St. Charles, in June, 1860, about sixty-six years of age. Judge Pope was among the early settlers in Illinois. He first established his residence at Kaskaskia and Belvidere, and about forty years until within a few years before his death. The place was abandoned by him, probably, from the results of his residence in the Missouri, of late years, which illaugured the town and rendered it unhealthy. When he first made Kaskaskia his residence, it was in peaceful contemplation, the first place in Illinois. It was the seat of government for the territory. On the organization of the Illinois territory, in 1819, appointed, by Mr. Jefferson, secretary of the territory; which office he filled with credit to himself, and usefulness to the public. In 1819 the state of Illinois was organized, and Judge Pope accepted the appointment of district judge of the United States. At the time of his death he was on the bench, a length of time, of which we have few examples in our country. While secretary of the territory, and until he was appointed to the bench, Judge Pope practiced his profession. From the time he first, stood at the head of the bar in the territory. He had influential connections and friends in Kentucky, and his high standing gave him no small influence with the earlier administrations of the general government. And in this latter capacity, he was a very prominent and leading citizen. His independence and strict adherence to the political principles he avowed, which may be traced with the Jefferson school, left him behind the progress of others, who professed to be of the same school.

He was a man of decided talent. He never sought to become conspicuous as a speaker on the stump, at the dinner table, or in any such ephemeral exhibitions. But he was a man of much research, and of deep thought. He had a very strong and vigorous mind. In conversation, and in his opinions on the bench, and elsewhere, he was distinguished for the clearness of his position and the force of argument by which he maintained them. His arguments were drawn more from the resources of his mind than from the views of others. Whilst, in his legal opinions, he showed great respect for authority, he was never satisfied where his own judgment did not lead to the same conclusion. He was often at variance with him twelve years on the bench, and I seldom differed from him, in an opinion pronounced, without feeling contrary to that held by him.

He was an able common lawyer, and there were but few persons, in any part of our country, whose constitutional opinions were entitled to higher respect. With the history of the constitution he was well acquainted; and he understood well the respective powers of the federal and state governments. He seemed to be more desirous of discharging his duty faithfully, than of leaving memorials of his acts. He reported but few of his judicial opinions, two or three of which give value to this volume. No man entertained loftier views of the duties of a judge, and no one ever exercised a purer judgment in the decision of causes. Firm in his convictions, he never yielded them without being convinced of error; and then no one conformed to right and justice more cheerfully than he did. In this he set a beautiful example of an unbiased judgment, however strong and firm, ready to yield to the force of argument. He was above the infirmity of narrow minds, and never suffered a change of opinion as evidence of weakness. The state sustained a great loss in the death of this distinguished man. To his family fell the irreparable, as he lived in their affections in no common degree. And associated with him as I had been, for so many years, I heard of his death with the deepest sensibility, and sincerely deplore his loss.

SPRAGUE, PELEG.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1306.]

The following address of the bar on his retirement is reprinted from 2 Spr. 332:

To the Honorable Peleg Sprague: — Sir: The members of the bar of the courts of the United States, in which you have presided during the last twenty-three years, do not shrink from thanking you from the office of judge without an expression of their high estimate of your public services, their profound respect for your judicial qualities and attainments, and their grief for the physical disability which has caused your retirement. They esteem it to be due to their country, to you, and to themselves that they should bear their testimony to the great value of those services and the deaths and morals which alone could make them possible. They have found you to be not only thoroughly instructed in the common law, but master of those special branches of jurisprudence and legislation which it has been your peculiar province to administer. They have found in you such power of analysis as they have not known surpassed, and with it the faultless form which forms the commencement of the eastern circuit, so suddenly ensuing upon this striking termination. In the public and private employments of the bar of the metropolis of New England, to his consummate character as a judge, an author, a teacher, a citizen, and a friend, it may not be unbecoming that they should entertain an occasion thus presented, and thus bringing home to them the abrupt and affecting close of their late relation, to declare their consciousness of the distinguished privilege they have enjoyed in its hav- ing subsisted so long and with so much cordiality and satisfaction. Recalling the period of his original elevation to the bench, they persuade themselves, to the advancement and dignity of the profession, and the illustration of the doctrines of the legal science, in the high administration of justice in all its departments upon sea and land; and that they should indulge their own sincere feeling, in summing up all their impression as may be within their power, the high sense they entertain of his singular excellence and endowments as a jurist, a magistrate, and a man. In his own words, he was more generous in his own awards to the merits of others, or poured more faith and reparation to those whom he has lamented, it is meet that his memory should not want the means which it has so justly cherished, and that full measure of acknowledgment and appreciation, of which, however amply accorded by contemporary testimony, the delusive property of professional relations may have suppressed the unreserved utterance during his official life. To him, no longer living, we only pay due honors.

Resolved, that while many of us may cherish the lively satisfaction which with the extension of his circuit to this district was hailed, and recall the occasion of his judicial greeting upon the creation of our eastern section of the ancient commonwealth into an independent state, and while still recollect the period of his original elevation to the bench, we may all rejoice that the day has more than fulfilled the auspicious dawn, and has created such a clean-sustained feeling of the attractive and vitalizing, wherever it has spread, and upon whatever subjects it has shone, that although the living orb may be withdrawn, no night can follow.

Resolved, that we regard his advancement to the highest seat of our American judicature, in conjunction with various and various, the influence of his judicial attainments, the universality and splendor of his accomplishments, the munificent gifts which he has laid upon the altar of law, so many sublime graces with which he has attired its service with those elaborate and abundant expositions, of which he was the author, to us its breathing oracle, have been among the most authentic and important elements. And when we call to mind his zeal in the cause of its science, his unceasing and exhausting labors in its increasing and clearing the sources, conducting the streams and enlarging the limits of legal knowledge, the mature developments, thereof, the most lively imaginings, the portion which falls to their own lot; nor cease to recall the gratification inspired, and the cheering anticipations, by which it was imparted, by his spring and autumnal visits to this part of the circuit during the space of near a quarter of a century. And that the brief moment which has elapsed since his lamented decease, has not abated their earnest desire to offer and record their imperfect expression of admiration for his departed worth, and cherished attachment to his memory.
which nothing escaped—that fervent and intense analysis, of which nothing could elude the keenness of the forensic sagacity and judgment to which his other faculties were subservient, and all other operations and resources only ministering—the copiousness and clearness of his expoundings he has illustrated and enforced the strictest and purest doctrines of law and equity—the charms he has given to the study, and admixture, of captivations, with which he has invested the pursuit—the elevation he has imparted to the practice—the scale of legal and moral, and elementary, and professional excellence, which he has done so much to raise and to improve—the exact tone of morality which he has infused, and the enthusiasm which he has inspired, especially in the breasts of younger votaries, and the underlying glow which he has lighted up again in the bosom of those who have longest cultivated the profession, as once kindled and fed by the treasures of legal lore which he has lavished upon it—and when we add again the kindred fields of philosophy and literature which he has delighted to explore, and from which he has won so many appropriate wreaths—and more than all, when we add upon the more lofty thoughts that true, self-sacred and essential humanity which was the life-spring of his nature, and gave such energy to his indignant denunciations of all the sordid and base, the sordid stories of mental distress, the genuine love of liberty which he cherished with religious devotion, and the incorrupt firmness with which he upheld that the sacred and the just, the right and the true, and to have thrown a glory around them, which, while it has illuminated our own hemisphere, has cast a light on the regions of fame which are illustrious worth in this world, and, as we humbly hope, that high reversion which faith assigns to the pure and just in the future.

On the opening of the circuit court, on the same day, in pursuance of the foregoing, the attorney of the United States, Augustine Haines, Esq., presented these resolutions to the court, with an appropriate address. To these proceedings, his honor, Judge Ware, the associate presiding judge, responded as follows.

"Gentlemen of the bar: On my part, as one of your court, I receive with profound sensibility, and cordially respond to the terms in which you have so gracefully expressed your regard and the highest regard for the judge of this court. Having been associated with him for more than twenty years in the performance of his official duties in this district, on this occasion, which brings back fresh to my recollection the incidents occurring in an official connection of such a length of time, in all respects so pleasant and instructive, and now forever dissolved; I should do injustice to my own feelings, if I should confine myself to a more formal response to the sentiments which were so appropriately expressed by the gentlemen of the bar.

On the opening of the circuit court, on the same day, in pursuance of the foregoing, the attorney of the United States, Augustine Haines, Esq., presented these resolutions to the court, with an appropriate address. To these proceedings, his honor, Judge Ware, the associate presiding judge, responded as follows.

"Gentlemen of the bar: On my part, as one of your court, I receive with profound sensibility, and cordially respond to the terms in which you have so gracefully expressed your regard and the highest regard for the judge of this court. Having been associated with him for more than twenty years in the performance of his official duties in this district, on this occasion, which brings back fresh to my recollection the incidents occurring in an official connection of such a length of time, in all respects so pleasant and instructive, and now forever dissolved; I should do injustice to my own feelings, if I should confine myself to a more formal response to the sentiments which were so appropriately expressed by the gentlemen of the bar.

"Resolved, that the resolutions be communicated to the Court at the opening of the term, and that a copy be also forwarded to the family of the deceased by the President.
of general and polite literature, early applied himself to the severer studies of the law; and without whose labor the utilization of elegant letters as a graceful ornament in every profession of life, devoted the main energies of his mind to his choice. He has been a student of his professional studies, this became the great business of his life, and was continued with unwearied perseverance to its close. From such long and patient labor, the full realization of his educational aspirations, and with his own characteristics, he has earned a number of judgments behind him, which will remain to future ages permanent landmarks of the law, as any other judge that ever sat on the bench in this country, or on a more profound and critical examination, that error has in some cases crept into his judicial opinions, it will, I believe, also be for the good of the jurisprudence of the country. But while this patience of labor that asked for no repose, was united as it was in him with extraordinary quickness of apprehension, remarkable tenacity of memory and rare maturity of judgment, great effects might naturally be expected. The result certainly has not disappointed what might have been anticipated by the profound anticipations of his friends. He has placed himself among the very greatest lights of jurisprudence. If we may rank titles to the great branches of jurisprudence in the same order as we find the great branches of literature, we may say, in the estimation of men of science, that he has adorned the annals of that country from which we have derived the body of our common law.

There are few who will not admit that the power of the Hale, the talented and able-flots, the Hardwicke and Mansfield, who have illustrated the law in the land of our fathers. In the admixture of a judiciousness which has left behind him, he far excels any of them. His juridical works, including his judgments pronounced in the circuit court, together with his elementary treatises on various titles of the law, filled nearly thirty volumes, the exclusive productions of his own hand, and are trustworthy and often of very elaborate opinions comprised in the series of the Reports of the Supreme Court, extending through the whole course of the history of our great tribunals. Few men of whatever fertility or industry, in any department of human learning, ever have written more. No magistrate and no author in any age has enriched the jurisprudence of the common law so greatly as an addition to its treasures, whether we regard his works in their actual amount or the variety of the subjects which they treat. One of his official station, he has been placed over every branch of the law, his judicial opinions cover the whole ground of jurisprudence, and he has treated them all with such an abundance of learning and accuracy of discrimination, that it is difficult to say with what department of the law he is least familiar. Whether he be dealing with the abstruse and technical points of the old common law, or the complicated and subtle, as well as the liberal and enlarged questions of equity, or the subtlest and most difficult questions that arise out of our mixed and complex system of simple and complex government, or with those great subjects of international law which grow out of a state of war, and arise in the prize jurisdiction of the admiralty, his knowledge seems to be equally intimate and exact in all. On all these matters, so various and important, he has been called upon officially to form and deliver opinions in which private rights were involved and complicated, not only with great principles of law, but often with great public and national interests. It would be giving high praise with the magistrate, to say that he exhibited intellectual endowments equal to the work. But in saying so much, I shall, I trust, be justified in adding that this would not be rendering the full measure of praise that may justly be given. On all of these he has exhibited a depth of learning, an acuteness of discrimination, a profoundness of judgment, and wisdom, which, all together, have been equalled by few magistrates of any age, and been surpassed by none.

"It may be too much to expect of any man, however wide his learning and however penetrating his judgment, that every decision, made in the course of a long and laborious judicial life, should be free from all error. Never to fall in judgment does not belong to the condition of humanity. And it is not hereditary; for even the most profound and critical examination, that error has in some cases crept into his judicial opinions, it will, I believe, also be for the good of the jurisprudence of the country. But while this patience of labor that asked for no repose, was united as it was in him with extraordinary quickness of apprehension, remarkable tenacity of memory and rare maturity of judgment, great effects might naturally be expected. whatever moral qualities they may be combined. But we render our homage with cheerfulness and pleasure only when we find them united with purity of personal character, unsnotted integrity of moral sentiments, and a just proportion to the endowments of the mind. On the unainted purity and moral elevation of Judge Woodbury's character in private individual and a member of society, the memory of his friends may dwell with unmixed pleasure. The moral frame of his mind had its foundations deeply laid in religion: that is his principle. He lived and died in the faith of a Christian, with a deep and habitual pertinence that he was both an accountable and an immortal being. It was this deep and abiding faith that lent its soft and beautiful colors to the whole of the life, which gave energy to every effort which might improve and elevate the moral dignity of his fellow-men, which in the evening of life led him to seek a place of repose for the dead,皱纹 in the holy vaults, and in the lotus. But his austere and exalted character was marked with a sanctimony that should be otherwise, and all that is left for us is to follow him to his grave with unavailing regret, and accumulate honors so richly due to his merits, the justice which I trust will be acknowledged by a distant posterity."

Judge Woodbury then observed, in substance, as follows: "These remarks, gentlemen of the bar, shall be entered upon the records. The proper tribute to the memory of my predecessor, which has been paid by you on this occasion, is most concurred in by the whole court. My associate has responded in feelings, common to us both, on account of the lamented decease of Judge Story, and also in those expressions of sympathy and eulogiums of his character, on which a longer and closer intimacy with him qualified and rendered it more fit for him to open the best impressions of the bar. All of the profession, however, in this circuit, to some extent in the Union, and indeed, wherever an enlarged jurisprudence, connected with commercial, constitutional, and national topics, exists, may well take the liberty to express, what they cannot but feel as a deep sense of the loss which has sustained the eloquence and learning, which in him have adorned this bench for near a quarter of a century, and still longer that of the supreme court of the United States. The honor has not closed over forever. You will no more listen to the tongue, that so long and so ably vindicated here the jurisdiction and powers of the general government; and while it defended innocence with arder, and relieved the oppressed by a most liberal exercise of equitable principles, lost no fit occasion to express injustice and punish guilt. But it is some consolation, that such men do not live in vain for the future any more than the past in respect to their services. The courtesy and blandness of manner in the deceased must long be remembered by most of us as models for imitation. His life, uneventful as it was, a devotion to the justice he administered—his useful toils in serving his country and his profession—have sown seeds, which will long endure the harvest, and have met with these rewards from grateful millions, which will long encourage our youth as well as more advanced age to emulate his example. It is fortunate, that the records of much of his various labors will remain for the edification of his countrymen. And painful to many as it has been the death of one distinguished by so many excellencies and so much usefulness, it is a source of gratitude, that his efforts were spared to the world so long, and till they had accomplished so much—"
The following is reprinted from 3 Story, VII. (Preface).

At a meeting of the Suffolk bar, held in the circuit court room, on the morning of the 12th of September, the day of the funeral of Mr. Justice Story, Mr. Chief Justice Shaw, sitting in the chair, and announced the object of the meeting, the Honorable Daniel Webster arose and spoke nearly as follows:

"Your solemn announcement, Mr. Chief Justice, has confirmed the sad intelligence, which had already reached us, through the public channels of information, and deeply afflicted us all. Joseph Story, one of the associate justices of the supreme court of the United States, and for many years the presiding judge of this court, died on Wednesday evening last, at his own house in Cambridge, waiting only a few days for the completion of the sixty-sixth year of his age. This most fatal and lamentable event has called together the whole bar of Suffolk, and all connected with the courts of law, to speak in their behalf. We again meet, for we have now in the seat of Joseph Story, Judge Davis, and who was, for thirty years, the associate of the deceased, upon the same bench. It has called for another judicial personage, men in retirement, and Judge Davis. He is here, also, to whom this blow comes near,—I mean the learned judge, Judge Davis, who is the only member from South Carolina, whose side has struck away a friend, and a highly venerated official associate. The members of the school, to which the deceased was so much attached, and to whom all the ingenuity and enthusiasm of educated and ardent youthful minds, are here also, to manifest their sense of their own severe deprivation; as well as their admiration of the bright and shining professional example, which they have so loved to contemplate; an example,—let me say to them, and let me say to all, as a solace, in the midst of their sorrows,—which death hath not touched, and which time cannot obscure.

"Mr. Chief Justice, there is consolation. The little, long-cherished hope of reunion between Marshall and Story. And although we are constrained to acknowledge that 'one star is greater than another star in glory,' lest we be thankful that two such orbs have so long been allowed to reign 'lords of the ascendancy.' Our American firmament. Let us be thankful that we have hitherto been guided by examples so pure and by wisdom so unerring. Let us continue to pursue with acumen and pride a noble profession adorned by such venerable names. Let us cultivate the spirit of gentlemanly courtesy and humility. Let the case of the bosom of God and her voice the harmony of the world."
tungished, or ceasing to be, but only withdrawn; as the clear sun goes down at its setting, not darkening, but only no longer seen. This calamity, Mr. Chief Justice, is not confined to the bar, or the courts, of this commonwealth. It will be felt by every man, by every woman, and by every intelligent and well-informed man, in or out of the profession. It will be felt still more widely, for his reputation had its day in every court, and indeed by every intelligent and well-informed man, in or out of the profession. His name is enshrined in every tribunal in Westminster Hall, in the judicatories of Paris and Berlin, Stockholm and Stockholm, in the learned Universities of Germany, Italy, and Spain, by every eminent jurist in the civilized world; it will be acknowledged, that a great luminary has fallen from the firmament of public jurisprudence.

"Sir, there is no purer pride of country, than that which we may indulge, when we see America paying back the great debt of civilization, learning, and science to Europe. In this high return of light for light, and mind for mind, in this august reckoning and accounting between the intellects of nations, Joseph Story was destined by Providence to act, and did act, an important part. Acknowledging, as we all acknowledge, our obligations to the original sources of English law, as well as of civil liberty, we have seen, in our generation, objects of our love, streams turning and running backward, replenishing their original fountains, and giving a fresher and a brighter green to the fields of English jurisprudence. By a sort of successional hereditary transmission, the mother, without envy or humiliation, acknowledges that she has received a valuable and cher- lished possession from her daughter. Thus, as the English justice admits, with frankness and candor, and with no feeling but that of respect and admiration, that he, whose voice we have so recently heard within these walls, shall now bear no more, was of all men who have yet appeared, most fitted by the comprehensiveness of his mind, and the vast extent and accuracy of his attainments, to compare the codes of nations, to trace their differences to difference of origin, climate, or religions or political institutions, and to exhibit, nevertheless, their concurrence in those great principles, upon which the system of human civilization rests.

"Justice, sir, is the great interest of man on earth. It is the ligament, which holds civilized beings, and civilized nations together. Wherever her temple stands, and so long as it is duly honored, there is a foundation for social security, general happiness, and the improvement and progress of our race. And whoever labors on this edifice, with such a sense of distinction, whoever clears its foundations, strengthens its pillars, adorns its entablatures, or contributes to raise its august dome still higher, he is also the protectress, in name, and fame, and character, with that which is and must be as durable as the frame of human society. All this, Mr. Chief Justice, the pure love of country, which animated the deceased, and the zeal, as well as the talent, with which he explained and defended her institutions. His work on the constitution of the United States, is one of his most eminently successful labors. But all his writings, and all his judgments, all his opinions, and all the influence of his character, public and private, leaned strongly and always, to the support of sound principles, to the restraint of illicit power, to the discovery and re-education of licentious and disordering sentiments. 'Ad rempublicam firmandam, et ad stabilitatem virorum sanitatis, omnis olius pergeborum instiutu.' But this is not the occasion, sir, nor is it for me to consider and discuss at length, the character and merits of Mr. Chief Justice, as a writer or a judge. The performances of that duty, with which this bar will, no doubt, charge itself, must be deferred to another time, and will be committed to able hands. But, in the homage paid to his memory, one part may come with peculiar propriety and emphasis from ourselves. We have seen him descend from the bench, and mingle in our friendly circles. We have known his manner of life, from his youth up. We can bear witness to the strict uprightness and purity of his character; his simplicity, and unostentatious habits; the ease and amiable vivacity, amidst severe labors, the cheerful and animating tones of his conversation, and his fast fidelity to his friends, his attachment to his large and liberal charities, not ostentatious or casual, but systematic, and silent — dispensed almost without showing the hand, and falling and distilling like a shower from the heaven. But we can testify, also, that in all his pursuits and employments, in all his recreations, in all his recreations, in all his conversations, in his intercourse with the circle of his friends, the predominance of his judicial character was manifest. He never forgot the eminence to which he had attained. The judge, the judge, the useful and distinguished judge, was the great picture which he kept constantly before his eyes, and to a resemblance to which all his efforts, all his thoughts, all his life, were devoted. We may go the world over, without finding a man who shall combine striking realization of the beautiful conception of D'Agenou, 'C'est vain que l'on cherche, à distinguer en lui la personne privée et la personne publique; un même esprit les anime, un même objet les réunit; l'homme, le père de famille, le citoyen, tout est en lui consacré à la gloire du Magistrat.'

"Mr. Chief Justice was neither a seigneur, nor a magistrate; but he must die as a man. The bed of death brings every human being to his pure individuality; it is the time of that deepest and most solemn of all relations, the relation between the creature and his Creator. Here it is, that fame and renown cannot assist us; that a daughter, a son, a brother, must fail to aid us; that even friends, affection, and human love and devotion, cannot succor us. This relation, the true foundation on which our hopes are built and felt by conscience, and confirmed by revelation, our illustrious friend, now deceased, always acknowledged. He accepted the sacred obligations of truth, honored the pure morality which they teach, and seized hold on the hopes of future life, which they impart. He saw enough in nature, in himself, and in all that can be known of things seen, to feel assured that there is a Supreme Power, without whose Providence not a sparrow falleth to the ground. To this gracious King be trusted himself, for time and for eternity; and the last words of his lips, ever heard by mortal ears, were a fervent supplication to his Maker to take him to Himself."

The following resolutions, drawn up by George S. Hillard, Esq., and Charles Sprague, Esq., were then submitted to the meeting by Mr. Webster:

"Resolved, that the members of the Suffolk bar have learned with deep regret the passing of the Honorable Joseph Story, one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, and Dane Professor of Law in Harvard University. Resolved, that the highest gratitude, the vast debt which we and our whole country owe to his labors and services as a judge. He was elevated to the bench in early manhood, and his judicial life was prolonged to a period almost unexamined in the annals of the common law. The wisdom of the selection was immediately indicated, by the distinguished ability which he displayed, and each succeeding year has added to the splendor and extent of his judicial presence. His immortal judgments contain copies of stores of ripe and sound learning, which will be of inestimable value in all future times, alike to the judge, the practitioner, and the student. We, too, who have had such opportunity, under his judicial presence, can give our emphatic tribute of admiration to the gentle dignity with which he administered the law, to his unfailing firm impartiality, his uniform courtesy, and recognition of the rights of all who approached him, his quickness and tact in the dispatch of business, the readiness with which he applied his vast learning, and his humanity in the treatment of those towards whom he was called upon to direct the powers and frowns of the law.

It is a benefit that in regarding the deceased as an author, jurisprudence mourns one of her greatest sons—one of the greatest not only among those of his own age, but in the long succession of ages, whose fame has become a familiar word in all lands, where the law is taught as a science; whose works have been translated and commented on in several of the classical languages of the European continent; and have been revered as authorities throughout the civilized world. It was a long while yet alive, to receive, as from a distant posterity, the tribute of foreign nations to his exalted merit as a jurist.

Resolved, that we mourn his loss as a teacher of jurisprudence, who brought to the important duties of the professor's chair the most exuberant learning, the most unsparing benevolence, a native delight in the great subjects which he expounded, a copious and persuasive eloquence, and a contagious enthusiasm, which filled his pupils with the proper veneration for the law he taught it so well; who illuminated all his teachings by the loftiest morality, and never failed to show that what was ever applied to the fame of a great lawyer must be also a good man.

"Resolved, that we recall with gratitude and admiration, his character as a member of society. We have seen and felt the daily beauty of his life. We honor his memory for his domestic virtues, his warm affections and generosity. We honor his purity, elevation, and simplicity of his life and conversation, and the spontaneous sympathy which gave so cordially a charm to his highly intellectual and his graceful. The approach of age never chilled the impulses of his heart, nor deadened his interest in life. We respect, too, his activity of mind, the literary attainments which his systematic industry enabled him to acquire, and the unaffected conscientiousness which made him so ready to assume and so prompt to discharge his common duties of life.

"Resolved, that the death of one so great as a judge, as an author, as a teacher, and so good as a man, is a loss which is irreparable to the bar, to the country, and to mankind.

"Resolved, that a committee of twelve be appointed by the chair, to consider and determine the proper tributes of honor to the deceased, and to make the necessary arrangements for carrying the same into execution.

"Resolved, that the court tender their heartfelt sympathy to the family of the deceased, and request permission to join in the funeral ceremonies.

"Resolved, that the president of this meeting be requested to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased; and the attorney of the United States be requested to communicate the same to the circuit court of the United States, over which the deceased has so long presided, and ask to have them entered on the records of the court.

The resolutions were adopted, and the chair appointed as the committee provided for in the seventh resolution, Judge Davis, Hon. Jeremiah Mason, Judge Putnam, Judge Jackson, Benjamin Rand, Judge Sprague, Charles G. Loring, R. C. Curtis, Judge Warren, Charles Sumner, and Robert Rantoul, Jr. Mr. Jeremiah Mason introduced the following resolution, with a few appropriate remarks:

"Resolved, that Mr. Webster be requested to pronounce a discourse on the life and judicial character of the late Mr. Justice Story, at such time and place as shall be designated by the committee of the bar.

Mr. Dana has not fulfilled this office.

At subsequent meetings of the bar, called on the opening of the circuit court in the other circuits over which Mr. Justice Story had presided, and at the opening of the supreme court of the United States at the succeeding term, other resolutions were passed, and addresses made, expressing the deepest sense entertained by the bar and bench of the great loss which jurisprudence had sustained in his death. But, however grateful the publication of these would be to the feelings of the reporter, he fails, in contrast to them, for reasons wholly apart from their merit and his own wishes.

TANEY, ROGER BROOKE.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 5957.]

The following proceedings of the bench and bar at the time of his death are reprinted from 2 Chiff. 609:

At the opening of the circuit court of the United States for the first circuit, held at Boston, on the 1st day of October, A. D. 1854, Judge Chief Justice Taney, proceeding to the proper business, to adjourn the court to Monday, the 17th of October, A. D. 1854, at twelve o'clock, p.m. At the opening of the court on Monday, the 17th of October, A. D. 1854, Richard H. Dana, Jr., Esq., attorney of the United States, rose and addressed the court as follows:

"May it please you gentlemen—members of the bar of this court, desiring to notice in the most reverent spirit the death of the head of the judiciary of the United States, have assembled this morning and passed certain resolutions, which they have instructed me, as the law officer of the United States, to present to you, and to request that they may be entered upon its records. Permit me, sir, also to express the hope entertained by the bar, that your honor, as the associate and friend of the late chief justice, will be pleased to reply to the address from the bar.

"Some of our members have had the acquaintance of Chief Justice Taney in private life. Sherrill the recollection of his extreme courtesy, his simple dignity, and the fulness and charm of his instructive conversation. Those of us, who have appeared before the high tribunal over which he presided, desire to place on public record our sense of the gratification afforded us individually, and of the benefits conferred on the administration of public justice, by his peculiar faculty as a presiding officer, his great administrative abilities, and by the patient and unbroken attention he always gave to counsel addressing the court. And all the members of this bar, whether their knowledge of him has been personal, or only derived from the study of his judicial decisions, unite in acknowledging the purity of his private life, and those extraordinary intellectual qualities, working upon a mind and heart rich in education, acquired by the enlightened industry of early and middle life, which have placed him in the very foremost rank of American jurists. In the presence of your honor, and of gentlemen who have known him so intimately in official and private relations, it is most becoming in me, whose acquaintance with him has been slight and recent, to do no more than to present the resolutions of the bar, and ask your honor's permission to have them entered upon the records of the court."

Mr. Dana then read the proceedings of the bar, as follows:

"At a meeting of the members of the bar of the first circuit, held at Boston, on Saturday, the 18th of October, A. D. 1854, to take measures for giving expression to the feelings of the bar on occasion of the death of Chief Justice Taney, the meeting having been called to order by Richard H. Dana, Jr., attorney of the United States. Mr. Bartlett was appointed chairman, and Elias Merwin, secretary. On motion of Mr. Dana, a committee, consisting of Benjamin R. Curtis, Caleb Cushing, Richard H. Dana, Jr., and Sidney Bartlett, was appointed to prepare and report resolutions for the consideration of the bar. At an adjourned meeting, held Monday, the 17th of October, A. D. 1854, the following resolutions, reported by Benjamin R. Curtis, in behalf of the committee, were unanimously adopted, namely:

Resolved, that the members of this bar render the tribute of their admiration and reverence for the pre-eminent abilities, profound learning, incorruptible integrity, and signal private virtues exhibited by the late honored and lamented Chief Justice Taney.

Resolved, that the attorney of the United States request the proper authorities to make record of the proceedings of the bar and to cause the same to be kept on file at the court, and to have them entered on the records of the court.

"Elias Merwin, Secretary."

Mr. B. R. Curtis then addressed the court:

"May it please the court: I have been requested to second the resolutions which Mr. Attorney has presented. I suppose the reason for this request is, that for six years I was in such official connection with the late chief justice as enabled me to know him better than the other members of this bar. My intimate association with him began in the autumn of 1851. He was then seventy-three years old; a period of life when, the Scripture admonishes us, and the experience of mankind proves, it is best for most men to seek that repose which belongs to old age. But it was not best for him. I observe that it has been recently said, by one who had known him upwards of forty years, that during all those years and during his entire life, his reputation as a lawyer, as an orator, and as a man, was unimpeached. His wide and comprehensive knowledge of law, the constant and rigid care necessary to guard what little he had, the strength of character of the apparent feebleness of his vital powers, the constant and rigid care necessary to guard what little he had, the strength of character and the weakness of the apparent feebleness of his vital powers, were long disciples who made calm and cheerful; and the consciousness that he occupied and continued usefully to fill a great and difficult office, whose duties were congenial to him, gave assurance, which the event has justified, that his life would be prolonged and marked with unusual years of man. In respect to his mental powers, there was then not then nor at any time while I knew him, any evidence of failure, and I believe the memory is that faculty which first feels the stiffness of age. His memory was as clear as need was, and he, so far as any man ever knew. In consultation with his brethren he could, and habitually did, state the facts of a voluminous and complicated case, with every important detail of names and dates, with extraordinary accuracy, and I may add with extraordinary clearness and skill. And his recollection of principles of law and of the decisions of the court over which he presided was as ready as his memory of facts. He had none of the querulousness and tedium often experienced old age. There can be no doubt that his was a vehement and passionate nature; and he had subdued it. I have seen him rarely tried, when the only observable effects of the trial were silence and a flushed cheek. So long as he lived, he preserved that quietness of temper and that consideration for the feelings and welfare of others which so often diminished his bodily strength, yet down to the close of the last term of the supreme court, his presence was felt as an impregnable period of wise and useful life. I have been long enough at the bar to remember Mr. Taney's appointment; and I believe it will be generally agreed that before his removal from the bench, he was neither a learned nor a profound lawyer. This was certainly a mistake: his mind was thoroughly imbued with the rules of the common law and of equity law; and, whatever may have been true at the time of his appointment, when I first knew him, he was master of all that pertained to the special province of the courts of the United States to administer and apply. His skill in applying it was such as to cause his decisions of subtle analysis exceeded that of any man I ever knew; a power not without its dangers to a judge as well as to a lawyer; but in his case, it was balanced and checked by excellent common sense and by great experience in practical business, both public and private. His physical infirmities disqualified him from making these learned researches, with the results of which other great judges have illustrated and strengthened their written judgments; but it can be truly said of him that he rarely felt the need of them. The same cause prevented him from writing so large a proportion of the opinions of the court as his eminent predecessor; and it has seemed to me probable, that for this reason his real importance in the court may not have been fully appreciated, even by the bar of his own time. For it is certainly true, and I am happy to be able to bear direct testimony to it, that the surpassing ability of the chief justice, and all his great attainments of character and mind, were more fully and constantly exhibited in the consultation-room, while presiding over the deliberations of his brethren, than the public knew, or can ever justly appreciate. There, his dignity, his love of order, his gentleness and sweetness of disposition, were of inestimable importance. The real intrinsic character of the tribunal was greatly influenced by his presence there. How he presided over the public sessions of the court some who hear me know. The blandness of his manner, the promptness, precision, and firmness which marked his decisions, and made every word he said weighty, and made very few words necessary, and the unfailing attention which he fixed on every one who had the good fortune to address him, but all may not know that he had some other attainments and qualities important to the prompt, orderly, and safe despatch of business. The time of his predecessor the practice of the court is understood to have been somewhat loosely administered. The amount of business in the court was then comparatively so small, that the occasioned no real detriment, probably no considerable inconvenience. But when the docket became crowded with causes, and many arrests were accumulated, it would have been quite otherwise. The chief justice made himself entirely familiar with the rules of procedure, and was in the circumstances out of which they had arisen. He had a natural aptitude to understand, and, so far as was needed, to judge, the necessity of his character to have it practically complete. It was a necessity of his character to administer it with unyielding firmness. I have not looked back to the reports to verify the fact, but I have no doubt it may be found there, that even then he accused that he could not write other opinions, he uniformly wrote the opinions of the court upon new points of its practice. He had no more than a just estimate of their importance. The business of the court was regularly disposed of, by senders from nearly the whole of a continent. It arose out of many systems of laws, differing from each other, but in important particulars. It was conducted by counsel who travelled long distances, to reach the court. It included the most diverse cases, tried in the lower courts in many different modes of procedure. Some according to the course of the common law; some under the pleadings and practice of the courts of chancery in England; some under forms borrowed from the common law; many under special laws of the United States framed for the execution of treaties; and many more so anomalous as to be felt to need reduction to any classification. And the tribunal itself, though it was absolutely supreme, within the limits of its jurisdiction, and under the constitution by the constitution and by acts of congress, which it was necessary constantly to regard. Let it be remembered also, for just now we may be in some danger of forgetting it, that questions of jurisdiction were questions of power as between the United States and the several states. The practice of the court then, that of an orderly conduct of the business, drawn from a territory so vast, but questions of constitutional law, running now apace with the work of our complicated judicial system. Upon this entire subject the chief justice was vigilant, steady, and thoroughly informed. Doubtless it was in the matter of the powers of the court too far, yet speaking for myself, I am quite sure he fell into neither of these extremes. The great powers in the common practice of the bench of this country he steadily and firmly upheld and administered; and, so far as I know, he showed no disposition to exceed his jurisdiction. If I have already adverted to the fact that his physical infirmities rendered it difficult for him to write a large proportion of the opinions of the court, this was certainly not because he was not as able as any other judge to express himself, but because he was as capable as any other judge to have written. As it was, he has recorded many which are important, some of which are very important. This does not seem to me to be the occasion to specify, still less to criticise them. They are all characterized by that purity of style and clearness of thought which marked whatever he wrote or spoke; and some of them must always be known and recurred to as masterly discussions of their subject. He was of that great faculty of his country, that for the period of sixty-three years this century has had among its sons, each of whom has reigned, to extreme old age, his great and useful qualities and powers. The stability, uniformity, and correctness of our political institutions, which, in the absence of Judge Marshall upwards of thirty-four years, and in the absence of Judge Talley upwards of twenty-eight years, together with the several Justices, are not to have built up the great construction of our federal jurisprudence, of which the foundations only were laid in the time lost by Jay and Ellsworth. As a member of the bar and as attorney-general of Maryland, and as a member of the bar and attorney-general of the United States, he prepared himself, as your honor has done, for the discharge of the higher duties of the bench. His opinions, therefore, as they appear in the six last volumes of the reports, in the eighty volumes of Howard, and in the three volumes of Black, compose the great records of his judicial life; and they convey to us the memory, the greatness, and a title of fame deserving to be placed on a level at least with the opinions of any of the most renowned magistrates of France, of England, or of the United States. By reason of their brevity, they are distinguished by completeness of reasoning, comprehensiveness of grasp, and perspicuity of thought, by logical precision, clearness and perfection of argument, and by conclusions which command our respect, and not seldom our assent, even when contrary to those of the majority of the court. As rhetorical style, they are of unsurpassed excellence, and perfect models of judicial composition. The diction is pure and chaste, without none of the lawyer's tricks of wordy construction; the sentences are well constructed; the thoughts are systematically arranged; the propositions are symmetrical, with the respect due to all individual questions, not patched on rudely, or loosely scattered about, but incorporated into the sentence or paragraph; and the whole show signs of the labor of a skilful hand and well-trained intellect. In illustration of all these qualities, we may point to his opinion in the case of The Genesee Chief, which reversed the law of the court, as laid down by Marshall, on the question of admiralty jurisdiction in the navigable fresh waters of the United States; his dissenting opinion in Smith v. Turner and Norris v. Boston, commonly called the 'Passenger Cases,' and his opinions in the case of Luther v. Bordens, and the case of ... more important, not only because he, of course, spoke for the court in its official communications with the bar, but because he generally pronounced the law upon the great questions of the practice of the court. Of the inner qualities of the judicial character of the chief justice, as observed by his associates in the bench, one could see and appreciate those qualities. Mr. Curtis has spoken in terms of cordial praise befitting himself and the subject and your honor cannot fail to bear similar testimony to the exalted virtues of a cherished friend and respected chief. I speak of the private character of the chief justice only to emphasize and make plain that he was as great as any published life; tender and affectionate in domestic relations, courteous with a sort of gentle staidness of courtesy in social intercourse, dignified and yet of unaffected simplicity in all things, so that in his presence one felt the sense of his greatness, not oppressively but pleasantly, as a force that warmed and cheered, while it also attracted and elevated all within the scope of its influence. You forget, then, the great and lofty magistrate, and saw only the high-toned gentleman, the wise and good man, on whose ordinary life the weight of events alighted daily as the roses of office which invested him on the bench. May it please your honor, such, after twenty-eight years of personal observation and knowledge, are manifestations of the public character and personal and private character of Chief Justice Taney. And permit me now in conclusion to touch, and briefly, as the foundations, which are in all men's minds, and of which not to speak at all might be taken to imply that nothing can be made of the situation. We live in a country of republican institutions, where debate, oral and written, is free even to licentiousness; where political parties or factions occupy the field of public life; and where all distinguished personal and public character are subject alike to unmeasured praise or unmeasured blame according to the prevalent passions of the hour. If, as Lord Norwood was wont to say, the agitations of opinion are the consumers of life, so they are also the creators of life, in all elective governments. They are the drawbacks on the blessing of liberty, they are the price at which greatness is purchased. None, therefore, traverse the troubled sea of political affairs without being tossed or buffeted by the waves or winds of party opinion.

Thus it happened to Taney; but so also it happened to Jay, to Ellsworth, and to Marshall. Each of them passed from political life to the bench. Nay, more, Jay held the appointment of envoy extraordinary to France, and Ellsworth that to France, each while continuing for a while to be chief justice; and Marshall exercised at the same time the functions of secretary of state, and of chief justice. Be it observed of these great men, whether before, or after, or during their tenure of the chief justiceship, performed some political service, or an adjutancy, or any of the duties of the great and important office of the secretary of the treasury. Be sure, also, that if it were worth one's while, on a solemn occasion like this, to deal seriously with any of these futilities of bygone controversy, it would be easy for me to cite opinions of Jay, and Ellsworth, and Marshall, which occasioned at the time not less of party sensibility than any one of Taney's. But enough of this. If we refuse to be just even to the men of our time when they are living, we can afford to be generous to them when they are dead, and when they cease to stand in the path of our current of our interests, and our ambitions. When their human forms no longer move and speak and act, but come to be fixed and silent on the canvas of history, when the mortal man has put on immortality, and he but appears to us in memory like one of the disembodied shades of history, the divine vision of Dante, then, if living he were truly great, he looms up the more grandly in death, his proportions magnified in the haze of the distance, the feelings of the moral and emotional and intellectual, of the ages, and the majesty of the ages, in the eminence, dignity, colossal in his intellectual lineaments, to be admired and studied may not hope to be emulated—as one of the greatest among the great men of America."

Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., then addressed the court as follows:

"May it please your honor:—The eulogy upon the intellectual ability of the late chief justice I may well leave to the learned leaders of this bar, whose discrimination and experience so well fit them to the duty. I have risen simply as one who probably has known the late chief justice longer than any other member of this bar, to offer the tribute of my respect. In my youth the residence of the corporation for many years in close proximity to his, and in the daily intercourse of families it was my privilege to see him frequently in his domestic circle. Afterwards, when called to the bar, I had occasions in the supreme court to feel his personal kindness, and to observe that it was extended considerably to all the young members of the bar. A student and young lawyer in that section, I always found the local fame of Mr. Taney as the first lawyer of Maryland; the impress of Maximmich and Luther Martin, an axiom of belief. The late chief justice was not merely the calm, dignified, and unuttering laborious cabinet minister and judge as all saw him. That placid dignity was not the result of apathy, nor did it denote an emotionless nature. Within the depths of his character there was a great and stored energy: within his heart there was a depth and power of passion that stirred and woke his intellectual nature to the highest efforts of his genius. He knew how to govern himself. Like General Washington, his entire self-control, and that perfect self-command which found him once placed on the whole physical nature, gave him that loftiest of moral dignity, inspiring awe as well as admiration as his equable and emotionless conduct. He was a chief. Had he been a soldier he would have been a hero. For forty years that great man has occupied most distinguished positions in the state, with a personal bearing as unruffled as if no storm could sweep the surface. And yet amid all this native strength of character and powerful self-control, his domestic virtues were most fully developed and of the kindest nature.

"Mr. Taney accepted his judicial position as an end; and it is the greatest tribute that I can render to his political ambition. His highest eulogy, and the one most befitting the lofty station that he filled, was that in all his official and private intercourse his conduct was that of a great and gentle gentleman, and believing Christian, which he professed himself to be before the world. Heaven grant that in the future our country may have other chief justices as great and good as him." His honor Judge Clifford then spoke as follows:

"The court cordially concurs with the members of the bar in their testimony of respect to the memory of Chief Justice Taney, and will cheerfully, but with heartfelt sorrow, comply with their request to place the resolutions they have adopted upon the records of the court. Death has removed from his great mind the venerable chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, and it is eminently fit and proper that the members of this court should pause in the midst of their usual avocations and give public expression to the sense of the great loss they have sustained, and the sense of the consciousness of the high and exalted position and veneration they entertain for the exalted private virtues and distinguished public services of the great man, the great man, whose memory is closed forever. Rest assured that the court fully approves the resolutions you have adopted, and will heartily unite with you in responding to the sentiments which have been expressed to the nation of the sense of the great loss which has been sustained in his death, not only by the bench and the bar, but by the whole people of the United States, is no more than what is befitting this occasion, and entirely justifies the feelings upon the subject. Having enjoyed his confidence for more than a quarter of a century, and for six years last past been associated with him in the highest stations of the bench, I do not do injustice to my own feelings if I omitted to say that none can fully appreciate the extent of the local and personal embarrassments of the court, nor comprehend the anxiety and suffering which the court have sustained, except those who have known him intimately, and often met him at the polar end of the thousand miles of this circuit. All such must forever feel that the whole country has peculiar and lasting cause to mourn his loss as a great and good man, and as a learned, wise, and just judge. Unreal greatness of every kind always diminishes as you approach it, but true judicial greatness shines even brighter in the conference-room than in the bar or in the forms of public discussion. Those who have often met him in those weekly conferences best know the great value, logical, and correct possession of law, by which opportunities were afforded there to witness him unerring love of justice, the exhibitions of his profound experience, and the clearness, strength, and conscientiousness of his arguments, and his thorough understanding of the mind. Justice requires me to say that, in his hands, the most complicated causes were made plain and clear, and difficult questions became of easy and ready solution, and yet he was as willing to concede to his associates the rights and independences of his mind, and to exercise himself; and in cases of real doubt and difference of opinion was as prompt as any of them to modify or even yield his first impressions. Extended researches on complex and practical premises was unnecessary, as that duty has been well performed at the bar. Undoubtedly they constitute the great local advantages of the bench, nor is he less trusted, nor less respected, nor less esteemed, by the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the institutions of free government which it ordains, to endure.苏 Lice to pay upon this subject, that, in my judgment, and the opinions delivered by him in the chief justiceship during the long period he presided in the supreme court of the United States, are unsurpassed as clear, logical, and correct possession of law, if due regard be had to their number, to the magnitude of the controversies, and the scope and various parts of the questions which the controversies involved.

"Chief Justice Taney was a native of Maryland, and was born on the 15th of March, 1777, in Calvert County. As a boy he emigrated to the city of Baltimore, which is near the state of Pennsylvania, among the Carolina settlements of the state, having emigrated from England to his native county in the time of the Revolution. Many of the people in that county and for many years they experienced the disabilities incident to religious faith, under the intolerant legislation of the parent country. Better times, however, were approaching, and when the people of Maryland adopted their constitution, in 1776, they abolished all such distinctions, and established full equality of political privileges, irrespective of religious opinion. Subsequent to that period, the father of the subject of these remarks was repeatedly elected to represent his native county in the lower house of the legislature, and ever after enjoyed the full benefits of religious toleration. Influenced, perhaps, by those considerations he afterwards sent his son, Roger B. Taney, to Dickinson College, in the state of Pennsylvania, which was under the superintendence of Protestant professors. Persons who knew him well have often remarked that it was there that he learned his views of religious toleration, and it was in the beneficent of the supreme court I shoud like to have been, if I had the choice, a few years ago a new and equally accomplished competitor appeared to compete for the first honors of that distinguished, well-known, and read law with Jeremiah T. Chase, chief justice of the general court of the state, and was admitted to the bar in 1810. When admitted to the bar he immediately returned to his native county to practise his profession, and in the autumn of the same year, when but twenty-three years of age, was elected a delegate to the general assembly of the state, and his contemporaries agree that he displayed in the assembly an intrepidity of character and an uprightness of motive which secured for him the esteem and admiration of his heart. I will, but not so great as to do injustice to my own feelings if I omitted to say that none can fully appreciate the extent of the local and personal embarrassments of the court, nor comprehend the anxiety and suffering which the court have sustained, except those who have known him intimately, and often met him at the polar end of the thousand miles of this circuit. All such must forever feel that the whole country has peculiar and lasting cause to mourn his loss as a great and good man, and as a learned, wise, and just judge. between those distinguished advocates will not be attempted, as it is well known that "their professional talents were as diverse as their manner at the bar," their imperturbable. Reference to the judicial records will show that they often met, and it will be sufficient to say that the exact and harmonious division of the bench, the wisdom of the chief justice, together with his calm and clear logic, made him a full match for his polished and impassioned competitor, and that he came out of the test with his reputation as well as his professional talents. Difficulties in the cabinet of General Jackson induced Mr. Berrien to resign the office of attorney-general of the United States, and in June, 1831, the president having come to the conclusion to reconstrue the cabinet, tendered Mr. Taney that place, which he accepted; and he continued to discharge his duties with unsurpassed ability and success until, at the earnest solicitation of the president, he resigned it to accept the office of secretary of the treasury. His appointment as secretary of the treasury was made in September, 1833, and on the 23d of the same month he issued the circular and order for the removal of the deposits. By that order he gave great offence to a majority of the senate, in consequence of which his nomination was rejected, and he returned to the city of his residence to practise his profession. Whatever explanations of these events are necessary have already been given and need not be repeated. Enjoying the confidence of the president, as he did, it was hardly to be expected that he would long remain in private life, and, accordingly, upon the resignation of Mr. Justice Duval, in January, 1835, he was nominated as an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, but the senate refused to entertain the nomination, except to postpone it indefinitely on the last day of the session. Chief Justice Marshall died on the 5th of July, 1835, and on the 25th of December following, the president sent to the senate the name of Roger B. Taney for the office of chief justice of the supreme court, made vacant by the death of that illustrious magistrate. But the senate did not act upon the nomination until the 15th of March following, when it was confirmed by a large majority. Further comment upon his judicial opinions will not be attempted, except to say that they are invariably based on principles more than on decided cases, as may readily be seen by consulting any one of the thirty-three volumes where they are to be found. Taken as a whole they constitute an important addition to the memory, which needs no further inscription to insure its transmission to future ages. Great as is his loss to the country, it is even greater to the surviving members of his family, to whom his loss is irreparable. Irreplaceable, I repeat, not only on account of his great experience and profound knowledge, but also on account of his pre-eminent ability and success in presiding over the deliberations of the court. Some of the duties incident to that position are as delicate as they are important, and yet he always performed them to entire acceptance. Indeed, his whole intercourse with his associates was characterized by such a sense of justice and impartiality, and by such an unrivaled equanimity, exemplary benignity of temper, and amenity of manners, that no one of them ever had the slightest cause of offence. Nothing need be said of his private life, as all concede that it was eminently worthy of the exalted character he sustained in all the public stations which he filled. Attempts have been made to call in question his patriotism; but I think it needful only to say, I sincerely believe, that the charges were as unfounded as they are now harmless to the object of their attack. Gone to that happy state of being, in which his family and his honors, his reputation is above the reach of any such reproach. Reverence for the constitution of the United States was a leading characteristic of his judicial life, as every one knows who was ever associated with him in the bench, and as all others may know if they will but consult his judicial opinions upon constitutional questions. He revered the constitution as the great result of the Revolution, and as having been ordained "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty"; and it was a part of his character and of his duty not an act of his life inconsistent with that profession. Pursuant to the request of the members of the bar it is ordered that the resolutions which have been recently placed upon the records of the court.

The following is reprinted from 5 Blatchf. 552:

The following proceedings took place in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of New York, at the city of Albany, before Mr. Justice Nelson and Judge Hall on the 14th of October, 1854: The Death of Chief Justice Taney.

Mr. John V. L. Pruyn addressed the court as follows:

"May it please the court: I am sure that the duty I am about to perform is one which will meet the cordial approval of your holiness. It is our duty to announce in form, in order that a proper record of the event may be made, by your direction, on the minutes of the court, the sad intelligence which we all heard yesterday, of the death of the chief justice of the supreme court of the United States. His feeble health for several years past, had, at his great age, rendered this event not unlikely, which his friends and the country had looked forward as likely, in the course of nature, soon to occur, and the weight of the blow has thus been somewhat lessened by the premonitions of its occurrence. Looking at the large powers vested in the supreme court of the United States, we can not but reflect how much more secure under our form of government than those lodged with tribunals occupying relatively the same position in other countries—the extent and character of its jurisdiction, and the high respect in which its judgments have been held, the loss of its presiding judge is an event of very great importance in the constitutional and judicial history of our country. In this case that importance is unusually marked. The deceased chief justice had held his high office for the long space of twenty-eight years and upwards, discharging its duties with an ability and integrity which was admitted by the whole country. During this period many constitutional questions of great importance were passed upon by the court, after their discussion by the most distinguished counsel in the land, and most of the acts which disturbed our early judicial history were disposed of. In their decision the clear and luminous mind of the chief justice appears in every page, and his opinions will hereafter be referred to, as worthy of the reputation of a court which has numbered among its judges so many illustrious names. In the few hours which have passed (and those interrupted by other cares) since I was requested to discharge the duty I am so imperfectly attempting to perform, I have only had time to bring together a few of the events in the life of the late chief justice, which may be of interest to us who survive.

"Roger Brooke Taney was born in Calvert county, Maryland, on the 17th of March, 1777, and thus was, at the time of his death, in the 77th year of his age. He graduated at Dickinson College, Pennsylvania, in the year 1793, studied law at Annapolis, was admitted to the bar in 1795, and in the same year was elected to the house of delegates in Maryland, being the youngest member of that body. He declined a re-election to this office, preferring to give that whole time and energies to his profession. In the year 1800 he removed from his native county, where he had commenced practice, to Fredericktown, where he pursued his profession most laboriously for twenty-two years, when he changed his residence to Baltimore. During this period he attained a high position at the bar;"
and the Maryland Reports of that time show that he was engaged in many of the important cases which were brought before the courts of that state, making him, with Mr. Pinkney, Mr. William Martin, and others of the eminent lawyers of that commonwealth. In some of these cases, with the fullness of power and distinction for which he was so distinguished, Mr. Taney stood up manfully for what he believed the right, without regard to public opinion. No instance was there more conspicuous than that in the Reverend Mr. Grover, a Methodist clergyman, who had been indicted for an attempt, by his preaching at a camp-meeting, to alienate the slaves. The trial was before Mr. Taney, the cleverness and ability displayed by Mr. Taney on the trial, the prisoner was acquitted. For a long period (I quote from one of his biographers), the Methodists of that section entertained the kindest feelings for the Roman Catholic advocate, who had successfully defended their pastor against popular excitement and judicial power. Mr. Taney served one term in the senate of his native state—from 1810 to 1811. In 1833 he removed to Baltimore, where he most immediately entered upon a large practice in the federal courts. The then recent death of Mr. Pinkney, Mr. Martin, Mr. Calhoun, and others of the leading members of the bar, had left the space to be filled, which Mr. Taney entered upon with all that zeal, industry and energy, which had already secured him a wide reputation. In 1837 he was appointed, by the governor and council, attorney general of Maryland. The estimation in which he was then held, made him a public grief from the fact that he was politically opposed to the appointing power. It was during his professional career, while residing in Baltimore, that Mr. Taney and Mr. Wirt often met in professional struggles, and to the honor of the latter it should be said, that he never hesitated to speak of Mr. Taney as the highest term of the great ability of his adversary. In June, 1831, Mr. Taney was appointed by General Jackson attorney general of the United States. Most exciting questions arose during the term of Mr. Taney's administration of that office, in the great questions of constitutional law which form the groundwork of our institutions, and he readily have satisfied the courts that had been very hostile to the rights of the states. Mr. Taney never received that applause in his court, where the kindness and childlike gentleness of his manner were so apparent, how brave a head and how grand a spirit went into the exterior. He was one of the few—alas! how few there are—who had the moral courage to do what he believed to be right, and I am firmly convinced, that rather than yield his views on the great questions of constitutional law which form the groundwork of our institutions, he would readily have sustained the court. Mr. Taney addressed Mr. Justice Nelson, who was associated with him so many years in the discharge of that high official function of the court, and he so thoroughly understood his many excellent qualities both of heart and mind, his great attainments and his elevated character, that I feel that, in your presence, I ought not to say more on this subject.

"The daily beauty and simplicity of the private life of the chief justice I believe to have been almost without parallel along the great men of our country. In his conversation he was most attractive, winning and manly. In a recent conversation with Mr. Justice Nelson, he had an interview with him, with increased regard for his virtues and character. Of his religious life I cannot venture to speak, except perhaps to say that which is known to us all, and that he was one of the most prominent members of the Roman Catholic Church in this country—devoted, in the broad spirit of Christianity, to its institutions and its interests. But he comprehended all classes of men in his sympathies, and showed his faith by a life of duty, integrity and Christian devotion here, which, we reverently trust, has secured for him an eternal reward in that blessed state to which he has gone. 'Clarum est venerabile nomen—long may the influence of the ability, the integrity, and the pure and elevated character of the great departed judge, remain with the members of that august tribunal over which he so long and honorably presided. May it please the court, I now move that an appropriate entry of the death of Chief Justice Taney, be made by the clerk on the records of this court, and that the court do now adjourn.'"

Mr. Justice Nelson responded as follows: "The death of Chief Justice Taney, from his great age, in his eighty-eighth year, and bodily infirmities, was not unexpected. For several years past he has been, physically, so feeble, and, from constant, the serious apprehension of his family and friends. But his mind, during all these years, and at all times, has been happy and bright. The life and public services of this venerable and eminent judge have been so long and so conspicuously before the country, that it can hardly be necessary to do more than to allude to them. He was one of the most learned and able lawyers of the nation, while engaged in the practice of the law, and well earned and achieved the highest honors of his profession; and, in all the public offices and other important public, state and general of the United States, secretary of the treasury, and chief justice of the supreme court of the nation—his clear intellect and unperturbing habits, both in public and private life, were always distinguished characteristics. There never was a public functionary, in this or any other country, who was better able to meet the investigation of the great questions that came before him, political or judicial, or to the discharge of his high duties, a clearer understanding, or more heart, or greater patience and devotion in the pursuit of right and justice. Few men possessed a more well balanced mind in the discharge of varied duties and responsibilities, and in the application of it to the business affairs of life. In his nature and temperament, there were fewer disturbing elements than ordinarily fall to the lot of humanity. His disposition was kind and generous; and his intercourse and association with his brethren and the public at large, a large portion of whose life has been devoted to her—she the best friend and most intimate with herdevotion. Those of us who love him will feel deeply his loss. He was our friend and brother.

The following notice is reprinted from 2 Puline, (Preface)

To Justice Thompson, however, we are chiefly indebted for the learned, clear, and satisfactory decisions which are contained in this volume. In the long list of eminent jurists who have adorned the bench and bar, none, perhaps, were more conspicuous for those sterling qualities of head and heart which constitute the able and efficient judge than Smith Thompson. He possessed a mind of remarkable clearness and vigor, and powers of analysis and of ordinary kind. Modest in his deportment, and plain in his manners, he yet had a firmness of purpose and an independence of spirit, which enabled him to judge truth and right, were inflexible. His opinions, so lucid and concise, and expressed in language so simple, yet so potent, are among the monuments of our jurisprudence. Called to the bench of the supreme court of New York so early as 1802, and having for his official associates no less distinguished personages as James Kent, Morgan Lewis, and Ambrose Spencer, he at once took a prominent position, which he ever after, during a long judicial career, maintained. He subsequently filled the post and discharged the duties of chief justice of the state of New York; and on the 28th of March, 1845, the day he occupied the bench of the supreme court of the United States, by the lamented death of the Hon. Brockholst Livingston, one of the associate justices and presiding judge of the circuit court in the second circuit, on the 9th of December of the same year, Judge Thompson was appointed his successor.

THRUSTON, BUCKNER.

Circuit Court of the District of Columbia for the County of Washington. At a meeting of the bar and officers of the court on the 30th day of August, 1845, on motion, Richard S. Corr, Esq., was appointed chairman and William Brent secretary.

On motion of Joseph H. Bradley, Esq., the following respects were moved and filed—resolution adopted:

"Resolved, that this meeting have heard with deep and sincere emotion the death of the Hon. Buckner Thurston, for many years a judge of the circuit court of the District of Columbia. Resolved, that we lament the death of an individual with whom we have been long associated in the discharge of public duties, and that the intercourse of society, distinguished by his elegant attainments as a scholar, for his extensive erudition, for his integrity on the bench, and his accomplishments as a gentleman. Resolved, that we sincerely sympathize with his afflicted family in the death of Judge Thurston, full of years and ripe in character. Resolved, that the district attorney be requested to submit these proceedings to the circuit court, and to ask the bar and officers of the court in paying respect to the memory of the deceased; and that we wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days. Resolved, that a copy of these proceedings be respectfully communicated to the family of the deceased, and published in the several newspapers in this district."

James Hoban, Esq., district attorney, submitted the above proceedings to the court. To which the Hon. William Cranch, chief justice, submitted the following reply in behalf of the court:

"The court has received with great sensibility information of the death of Hon. Buckner Thurston, judge of the circuit court of the District of Columbia. Having been long associated with him in the discharge of our judicial duties, we cannot but deeply feel the loss we have sustained. His judicial life has been protracted beyond the usual term of human life, and has been uniformly marked with strict integrity. But this is not the time or place to pronounce his eulogy. His long and faithful services are well known and appreciated in the community and will be long remembered. The surviving judges deeply sympathize with the gentlemen of the bar, officers of the court, and the afflicted family of the deceased, and will join them in the testimonies of respect proposed to be entered on the minutes of the court. The court will now adjourn. Test: Wm. Brent, Clerk."

John Buckner Thurston was born in Virginia. In 1783, he received a classical education from Benjamin Huger, a distinguished Revolutionary officer. He emigrated in early life to Kentucky. Studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practiced his profession at Frankfort. In 1809, his superior talent was called into public service by being appointed United States judge for the counties of the territory of Indiana. After his appointment to the Senate of the United States from Kentucky, he declined the appointment of judge. He served as senator from December 2, 1805, to July 1, 1809. Although elected for six years, he resigned on being appointed by President Madison judge of the United States circuit court of the District of Columbia. This office he held until his death at Washington, D. C., August 30, 1845, in the 83rd year of his age, having occupied the bench 30 years. He was a gentleman in every sense of the word; that is, superior attainments combined with his urban manners in private life, made his company pleasing, instructive and procured for him general esteem.

TRIGG, CONNALLY F.

The following proceedings of the bar are reprinted from 1 Filp. v.: The Honorable Connally F. Trigg, United States district judge for the eastern and middle districts of Tennessee, died at his home in Bristol, on Sunday, April 25, 1869. He was born in Abingdon, Virginia, March 8, 1810. Was appointed by President Lincoln to the position he held at the time of his death, July 6, 1869. A meeting of the members of the Memphis bar was held, when a committee, composed of W. Y. C. Humes, M. F. Jarragin, George B. Talbot, W. F. Fitts, and S. P. Waller, was appointed, who reported resolutions highly complimentary to the deceased. These were seconded, and the resolution, introduced by Henry Craft, Esq., on a subsequent day, delivered a eulogy upon the deceased, saying among other things:

That the pioneer in judicial action upon many novel and important questions growing out of the war, and out of the legislation which it engendered; and it must have been highly gratifying to him that the supreme court of the United States affirmed his rulings. Because of his action, I have often said, the assertion is not too strong, that Tennessees owes to Judge Trigg more than to any other judge. I knew him well, and in the most intimate social relations, while these trying questions were before them, and I can say that I never saw him when he seemed to feel the slightest perplexity, or doubt, or hesitation, as to his course. He seemed to be guided by a sort of innate sense of what was right, and to go straight forward almost without need for deliberation. I presume he appreciated the supplicating returns of the war, for admission to his court without taking the test oath. Some of them were surprised that I did not consider it necessary to make an effort to get them before the bench. I told them I had become too familiar with his habit of thought and feeling to entertain a moment's anxiety as to what he would do. His opinion [delivered May 10, 1865] in that matter virtually covered the very ground upon which the supreme court afterwards rested a similar decision. As far as he was from the weakness of concession to the passion and prejudice of one side, he was equally far from encouragement or approval of the other. He was loyal in his whole being to the constitution and the Union, and ready and anxious to exert all his power and influence in favor of the principles of compromise, with secession, and looked with sternness disapproval upon the effort to tear the flag in twain; but he was a staunch supporter of every measure which went toward those who upheld the Confederate cause. He earnestly desired to see their efforts thwarted, and their military power crushed; but when this was done, it was not in his nature, nor in his construction of the law, to inflict punishment by confiscation of their property, nor by proceeding against them as criminals. I heard him say from the bench, in dealing with confiscation cases: ‘The informer does not commend himself to the favorable consideration of this court.’ I repeat that the state owes to Judge Trigg a debt of gratitude greater than to any other man who has exercised judicial functions within her boundaries. ‘The citizen does not commend himself to the favorable consideration of the court.’ I repeat that the state owes to Judge Trigg a debt of gratitude greater than to any other man who has exercised judicial functions within her boundaries.

FEDERAL JUDGES

WARE, ASHUR.

[For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1460.]

The following proceedings upon his resignation and death are reprinted from 3 Ware, 329, 337:

The members of the Cumberland bar met by invitation at the United States court room in Portland, on Wednesday, the 33d day of May, 1868, to determine the expediency of their esteem and respect for Judge Ware would be appropriate to the occasion of his retirement from the bench of the district court of the United States, a position which he had held for a great array of more than forty-four years. Hon. Thomas A. Deboliis, Hon. George Evans, and District Attorney F. Talbot, were appointed a committee to prepare resolutions expressive of the sentiments of the bar on the occasion. At an adjourned meeting, Mr. Talbot, from this committee, presented the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, that we shall ever cherish in grateful remembrance, the patience, impartiality, and courtesy, which have marked the official conduct of Judge Ware towards the members of the bar, and the amiable frankness and dignified simplicity, which in his intercourse with us individually, have formed the basis of the friendship and confidence in which he has long been held by us; that we tender to him our cordial wishes that he may find in the retirement he has chosen as the appropriate close of his long judicial career, that peace and satisfaction, which the retrospect of important service to his age and to the world, faithfully performed, cannot fail to give, and that peace of mind which flows out of a pure and blameless life.

It was then voted, that the resolutions be presented by the U. S. district attorney to Judge Ware, at the coming in of the court on Thursday, May 31st, at 11 o'clock A. M., being the last day previous to that at which he was to take effect, with such remarks as the attorney...

might deem appropriate. A few minutes after 11 o'clock the venerable judge came in, and, taking his seat upon the bench, the court was formally opened, the area assigned for the accommodation of the members of the bar, the clerks, the stenographers, and the members of the legal profession, anxious to participate in the official levee-taking. The district attorney then came forward, read and signed the usual address, accompanying the presentation with the following address:

"May it please your honor: In presenting these resolutions in behalf of the Cumberland bar, I permit myself the same sentiments and gratitude. It is said to be obliged to defer to that judgment of yours which has constrained you to terminate the professional and social relations which have subsisted between the court and the legal profession practicing in it, and to feel that the bench you are about to vacate, will be deprived of the confidence and veneration your character has given it in the popular heart. But it is grateful to review your long career as a judge, paralleled by no other in judicial history, and to remember how its foundation was laid in thorough classical, historical, and legal study, his pursuit has been illustrated marked with the lights of jurisprudence, and how it has culminated in the eminence which has crowned your prolonged labors. It is grateful, too, to know that with every step, with every act of that great man who, after a long time your employment and your diversion, have not lost their relish. You took your seat upon the bench, and your retinue is clothed with the independent character of the existence of state. Maine, by her seashore position and the enterprise and hardihood of her people destined to become a commercial and maritime state, counts herself fortunate in having had you for so many years at the head of her maritime and admiralty court. The people who have been the most closely connected to the ocean and exposed to the sea, have from the earliest times dictated its laws. While powerful chiefs subjected to their sway such territories of the land as they could occupy and defend with their arms, the sovereignty of the ocean was for them who were brave in defiance its dangers. While on the northern coasts of the Mediterranean, and on the south shores of the Baltic and North seas, merchants were gathering wealth, and mariners finding exciting adventures, thoughtful minds were collecting and expounding those principles of natural equity, and those customs and usages to which traffic had learned to accustom itself, which, in the most part insensibly enacted, form the body of the commercial law of the world. As citizens of our state, we feel no more proud of the rank of our commercial and maritime communities our merchants and ship-builders and seamen have won, than in the high repute your labors and studies have gained for you, in the principles underlying the principles of maritime jurisprudence. It was the piens amusement of the Psalmist, that they who go down to the sea in ships, and do business in great waters, see the works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep. However these wonders may affect a refined and exalted spirit, it would seem as if the effect of the storms of the sea upon ordinary men was to arouse the storms of evil passion, and that the lawless might of the open ocean made in them a feeling that they had sailed beyond the confines of human law, and crossed the line that bounds the jurisdiction of conscience and of God. Certain, however, that there are some of the darkest deeds of which human nature is capable, and its unfathomable caves hold the secrets of the bloodiest cruelties ever perpetrated by man upon his kind. The early commerce, half traffic and half plunder, though it drew civilization in its train, which, however brief, aberration of the system of statute piracy, nor could we believe, unless compelled by history, —looking at the quiet, civil, and decent social life of the maritime and insular colonies, which produced the foundations of the system of mastery, which places the persons and lives of unarmed seamen on shipboard under the custody of one doubly armed man, whose ferocious passions may be stimulated by intoxication, sometimes brings back as fugitives from far-off seas, horrors that affect the human heart in the recital. The ocean, the semi-continental, one of the last of chaos to feel the coercion of creative order, has hitherto baffled man. But every age it yields to his hand and looks on in content as he found means to venture out upon its open wastes, using its currents and its very storms as propulsion for his travel and transportation. Within our time, in the steamboat, he has subjected it to forces more completely within his control, and defying its own. He is just about to span it, with a line that has his whispered messages shall make themselves heard beneath all its uproar from continent to continent. Not less remarkable than these physical achievements, by which science and skill have made the sea docile to the uses of man, are the moral agencies, which have carried the majesty and sanction of law to the loneliest waters of the most barbarous coasts. This law, written in part only in those axioms of natural equity which a law, literal, and candid mind can read, it has been your province to explain, and to apply to the settlement of controversies, and that too, without aid from the deliberations of a jury. How to justify and vindicate the law of the land, and respect of this commercial community, whose claims you have decided, and whose property has been controlled or defended at the same time, in a period of ferment and tumult. The shipmaster, in the port of a foreign land, has been made to feel that the charter-party, defining the duties of the independent existence of the interest of the ship in the proportion of the gains of commerce, and of the merchants in profits of his venture, would be enforced and his person his return from however prolonged a voyage. The sailor, the proper ward of the admiralty, has found in the humane patience, with which ye have been wont to correct his wrongs, his beatings, his tyrants, his privations of food and wages, that your guardianship was something more than a maxim. And the coaster and adventurous landsmen, who have braved the storms of our own rocky coast to rescue wrecked ships, wrecked goods, and perilous lives, have been encouraged by your bounty to venture again upon a like benevolence.

We congratulate ourselves that your Reports, to be further enlarged, as we trust, by the publication of your manuscripts, will be enduring monuments of your humane feelings, your cultivated sense of justice, and that which characterize in other terms than those used in the resolutions we have adopted, books quoted in all the admiralty council and law courts with deference and respect, and attractive to the general scholar by their perspicuous statements, their vivid style and the confidence of their arguments. There is one obligation, however, I ought to acknowledge due from counsel for the uniform fulness and appreciative fairness, with which your opinions you state, and the candor, with which you refer to, arguments of theirs, which you found yourself compelled upon a closer analysis or a more comprehensive review to overrule. Your powers as a court have been large, your responsibilities great. You lay them down, I apprehend, without a suspicion of any man, however his fortunes may have freted at your hands, that those powers and responsibilities were ever abused in any degree or ever rendered that did not reflect a delicate and elevated sentiment of justice, and that did not commend itself to the approbation of the public good sense. But I must not recount further the obligations this bar and the entire community are under to you for the dignity of your example, and the honor you have conferred upon this high position you are now to vacate, lest I give offence to that modesty, and those simple tastes of yours, that would repel extravagance. The new continuance of this bench, let me bid you only in an official sense an affectionate farewell, hoping that those habits of recreation and employment necessarily disposed to lay aside, than the dignity of your office, will continue to bring you daily to these precincts, that
In announcing this event all sorrow and regret will be out of place. When a life endowed with rare physical and mental vigor, ennobled by worthy and patient labors, is rudely cut off, we pause and reflect upon the study and learning, dignified by simple and guileless manners, ends, there is no occasion to mourn or deplore. Its ending is rather the fit occasion to sum up and contemplate with philosophic reverence his rare good fortune. His fearless and adventurous spirit, long before it was weakened by years of labor and experience, had run its course, and had fully tested his satisfaction with the full measure of years allotted to him, and had come to look up upon life with that calmness which is the mark of a problem that fascinated his curiosity and invited his experience. Those of us, who were permitted to look upon the calm face after death had composed it to the grand and beautiful expression which belonged to its maturity, who saw how, from the placid brow and composed countenance, all traces of feeling had been chased away, could but think more kindly of that dear agent, which, seeming to crush all our hopes, leaves on the blank face, however, the promise and promise of a better life, just as the sun, after it has set, gilds the clouds and sky with its continued light. While we accept trustfully such an omen of his fate, in fact, as one of the most pleasing incidents of his life, by furnishing personal memoranda of the leading incidents of his life. Late in his old age he seems, partially, to have descended on the part with which these errors have been received, and the tenderness with which they have been handled. The unwary and distrustful, to lay the proper weight upon them, or to have the full benefit of the bar which for so long a period has been uninterrupted, in full measure and beyond what reasonably be expected, call imperiously for my grateful acknowledgment. They can never be forgotten by me, and will live as long as the pulsation of life lasts. It is only, that with the best wishes for your happiness in this life and that which is to come, I bid you a final farewell."

At the close of the judge's remarks the court adjourned.

Proceedings of the Cumberland Bar on the Occasion of the Death of Judge Ware, Which Occurred Sept. 10th, A.D. 1873.

The members of the Cumberland Bar Association met in the United States district court room, at 2 o'clock on September 10th, 1873, according to a previous notice, and Hon. Nathan Webb, the vice president, in the absence of Judge Howard, the president, took the chair. M. M. Butler, Esq., on behalf of the committee appointed for that purpose at an earlier meeting, reported resolutions expressive of the sentiments of the bar, in reference to Hon. Asa Ware, for many years judge of the United States district court for Maine district, lately deceased, and the same were unanimously adopted. At one-thirty o'clock, the court was announced, and Judge Fox took his place upon the bench. The court having been opened, Hon. George F. Taft arose and spoke as follows:

"May it please your honor: Since its last session, the eminent man, whose personal virtues and talents this court must always honor, has lain aside the burdens and infirmities of a protracted old age, and peacefully passed on to the mysteries of the life beyond. Judge Ware, who, for more than forty-four years, presided over the district court of the United States for the state of Maine, in the prime of his years, rendered distinguished and worthy service, died peacefully at his residence in this city, on Wednesday, the 10th of September last, at half-past eleven in the morning, in the ninety-second year of his age.

To the shaping and strengthening of his mind, metaphysical studies largely contributed; in relation to this he observes: 'Nothing contributes so much to sharpen the mind, and nothing to discover the weakness of an adverse argument on any subject, nothing to make nice distinctions and just discrimination, nothing to detect the artifices of justice sophistry; to comprehend the whole in one word, nothing so well teaches us the use of language, whether employed in speech or writing, as, with the greatest ingenuity, to conceal our meaning, as the study of metaphysics.' But although he recognized the value of these studies as discipline, he complained that the knowledge they furnished was uncertain, and that the modern mind, after all its efforts, had been buffeted by the same uncertainties and the same limitations that had arrested the researches of the ancient philosophers two thousand years ago. So he says, with mathematical accuracy and solid ground, and in touching their fixed and certain data, laid his hands upon the methods and methods of justice. In his own language: "Is there be any merit in the essays I have written, either miscellaneous or professional, or judicial opinions, in the selection and arrangement of the things alike? I have been more indebted to geometry than to all other studies. I think I may safely say this, when one of the greatest men ever born of his country, to him to judge, to judge, to judge, on every bench, and great in political movements (though this was the less seen by the public,) a man who would be, rather than seem great,—said that what, ever merits his arguments at the bar might have had, they were all derived from Euclid; and jurists, to whom these arguments were addressed, familiarly said of him that other advocates were plausible, but Parsons made a case plain and intelligible. I never studied a subject so well, or understood a science so thoroughly, as the elementary principles of geometry, and none of my juvenile studies had so deep and permanent an influence on my habits of mind."

"For a mind, whose leading characteristic is a love of knowledge, free of the ambition of distinction, who is unassuming, unpretentious, who prefers reward, strengthened by the severe and abstract processes of metaphysical and mathematical studies, one career naturally opens itself. It will seek truth—not in the show of parade of man's material and animal life, but in those higher relations which subsist between man as a spirit, and the source from which he springs and to which he is to return. So we are not surprised to hear Judge Ware confess, that favoring influences aided the natural bent of his genius, to fit him to enter upon the study of theology, and devote his life to the office of preaching. From this point, however, he was deterred by the apparently unexpected result to which he arrived, in turning his scientific and severe methods of investigation, to the prevalent religious beliefs of his time. These results he perhaps wisely concluded would be a too great innovation upon the cherished convictions of the religious mind of New England, to justify him in publicly proclaiming them. He had no taste for controversy. Notoriety only annoyed him. A wise skepticism, rather than a dogmatic and arro-gant self-confidence, and aye the respect for the genuine convictions of thinkers who honestly differed from him, compelled him to turn away from his favorite studies, and devote his energies to the advancement of the sciences and arts. He has his law and order, and has his wealth, and has his fame, and has his place in the state of society who have seen in the published reports of his judgments, —important contributions to the splendid system of maritime jurisprudence, that regulates the commercial intercourse of civilized nations, and ever to be remembered as the best monuments of his fame."

"The law of the sea, he was called upon to pronounce, must be as liberal and comprehensive as its own compass and extent. The common law, whose maxims had been derived from the feudal system, a highly artificial and aristocratic form of society, would never serve to regulate and restrict commerce, and account for the most daring and adventurous, nor could the codes or legal principles derived from the consent or custom of men who had submitted themselves to the notions of rectitude and fair dealing, recognized by an international comity. It was left to the enlightened sense of justice, to determine the nature of the right of the sea, and to each case as it arose. Each court was put upon its conscience to pronounce a decree that should accord with the universally accredited sense of justice, or else it would nowhere be respected as the sentence of law. If local prejudice or patriarchal feeling blinded its candor, it rightfully lost its authority. At the time Judge Ware took his place upon the bench, the English precedents in admiralty were rare, and only partly applicable to this country, where we had given our admiralty courts a more liberal jurisdiction; and as to the precedents of other countries and treatises, though the work of men of great genius and learning, it must be remembered how soon they would become obsolete, by the expansion and transformation of commerce, through the discovery of new countries, the production of new materials, the invention of more powerful forces of propulsion, and the new relations, the law of natural right, which should not only decide the case in controversy, but be an authority for like cases at home, and be only to solve the questions that arise between subjects of foreign nations, what was what was.
such an office, with such opportunities, the natural and acquired qualifications of Judge Ware were peculiarly adapted. The very taste that had inclined him to theological studies, made him a just and spirituall and ethick ideas, by which he had regulated his own life, the keen moral sense that defined in his soul so sharply the bottomless and eternal nature of sin, gave him also the power of moral perception, able to detect under most plausible disguises, every form of oppression and fraud. His metaphysical discipline enabled him to see the weakness of an adverse argument on any subject, to make nice distinctions and just discriminations, and to detect sophistry, and he had learned from good sense and sound judgment to 'select and arrange,' in his judicial opinions, the thought and the matter. When to this was added an elegance of style, derived from the study of the ancient and modern languages, a knowledge of the Latin tongue, he became, in the highest estimation as authority by the courts, and as attractive to the professional and general scholar. There was another mental trait which peculiarly fitted him to be the arbiter of the wrongs and oppressions of seamen. Few men have more heartily believed in the idea of the natural equality of all men, nor have fewer been guilty of artificial dignity. It was with difficulty that he conformed to the prescribed etiquette and decorum of his own court. It often happened that he could not be brought to assume any badge or tray or epaulet, or to take a place in any procession. He liked to come quietly and unheralded, and take his seat in court, clothed only in his ordinary apparel. His dignity came from an elevation of mind. He was a man of great and broad views; Christianity seems largely due to its recognition of the brotherhood of man, and to the solace its high hopes offer to the sufferers and sorrows of the poor and down-trodden.

"Assuming no artificial dignities for himself, he could not defer to any assumptions of rank among those to whom he dealt out justice. Different positions determined different scales of responsibility and duty, but these fairly considered, a man was a man. And belike and indeed the man he would never allow a human being to be placed, whatever might be his race or color, or his trade or calling, before those who are not of his profession. When at the end of a term of judicial service, rare in the annals of any people, and unprecedented in ours, he resigned his high office, this bar assembled in this court to express a just appreciation of the long official service he had so nobly performed. We are now assembled when the long life itself, so successful and happy beyond the common lot, is rounded to a measure of years seldom allotted to man, to do honor to his character and his record of his high worth, and to commend him, as an example of rare excellence, to the emulation of the generation of young men who are to succeed him. We rejoice in the wise, happy old age, as a fit illustration of the noble language of Cicero: 'Apollisa omnino sunt arma senectutis artes exercitationes—que virtutum, quae hominum natus, quae virtute non prospetant emera, vel verum etiam quia conscientia bene acta vitae multorumque bene fac torem recordationes justissimae."

At the close of these remarks, M. M. Butler, Esq., rose to offer the resolutions of the bar, and said:

"May it please your honor: Accompanying the announcement, which has just been made, in so fitting terms, of the decease of Judge Ware, I have been deputed by the Bar Association of Cumberland County, to present to this honorable court, over which he so long and so worthily presided, the resolutions which have been adopted in view of the occasion, expressive of our veneration of the man, and our appreciation of his virtues and public services. In discharging the duty assigned me, I am able to add, by any poor words of mine, to the beautiful tribute—alike appreciative and discriminating—which has already been paid. The death of Judge Ware certainly should be taken away therefrom.

"I am sure that our brother Talbot has not, in any degree, overestimated the importance and influence of Judge Ware's judicial labors. The estimate which Judge Story put upon them, when he said that he regarded Judge Ware as one of the ablest and most learned, if not the ablest and most learned of the then living admiralty lawyers, was concurred in by the voice of contemporary assent, and has been continued through the years. Among the great lights, by which the paths of admiralty and maritime law have been illuminated, his name is one—"a star of the first magnitude. His recorded decisions, beautiful in structure, adorned with grace, and resting on the solid foundations of principle, have marked the way to fame for his name. His services in the cause of enlightened jurisprudence have already conferred, and will continue to confer, the highest and lasting benefits on mankind. The allusions to Judge Ware as a scholar have been most happy. It was certainly not alone in profound learning that his attainments were remarkable. time to his reward. Peace be with his ashes. May we not reverently inscribe over his grave:

"Cæs est olim, ejus est nunc et est olim."

"May it please your honor: I move that the resolutio which I have read, and which, with your honor's permission, I will now read, may be received and entered upon the records of the Court.

"Resolved, that we, the members of the Cumberland county bar, deem the recent death of the Honorable Judge Ware, to be of more than two score years, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Maine, an appropriate occasion for us, who enjoyed with him the kindliest and most friendly relations, both professional and personal, to pay our affectionate tribute of respect to his memory, and to testify our grateful appreciation of his virtues and public service.

"Resolved, that the eminence of Judge Ware, in those branches of jurisprudence to which he devoted the labors of his life, has been so universally recognized, as not to need commemoration at our hands. But now that he has gone from us, we would fain give expression to our renewed sense of the importance and influence of his judicial labors, which have left so lasting an impression on all who have had the privilege of coming in contact with his name, his works, his reputation, and his increased admiration of those luminous and erudite judgments, recorded in the reports which bear his name, for sound learning, depth of research, logical acumen, felicity of illustration, and mastery of the English language, in a style of simple grandeur and beauty, are models of their kind in judicial literature, and have served no mere temporary purposes, but have become, to a great extent, the standard of the whole and administration of admiralty and maritime law throughout the land, and precedents for future jurists forever.

"Resolved, that as members of the bar, we shall cherish in affectionate veneration the recollection of the modesty, simplicity, and courtesy that distinguished Judge Ware's social and official intercourse with us; of the cordial ability that was always ready to communicate to us his varied stores of thought and learning; and of the many virtues which endeared him to the community in which he lived.

"Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be communicated to the family of the deceased, and that the same be presented to the court over which he has so long presided, with a request that they be entered of record.

Hon. Nathan Webb, United States district attorney, seconded the resolutions, and said:

"May it please your honor: In rising to second these sentiments, I am envious of Judge Ware, which have now been offered by the Cumberland Bar Association, I cannot but feel regret that I did not more thoroughly enjoy the privilege of his personal acquaintance, and am consequently unable, out of my own experience, to add anything to the tribute of affection for the man, contained in this expression of the bar. On every side are met those, who for many years associated with him on terms of friendly intimacy. All unite in their testimony to the kindness of his nature, his purity and simplicity of character, his accurate scholarship and extensive and varied attainments. Companionship with him they esteem among their most valued opportunities. Those of us, who knew him only in his judicial relations, recognize the clearness of his judgments, the depth of his learning, and of his thorough and various culture in his official life and service. Whoever studies the published opinions of Judge Ware will not fail to be impressed with the clearness of his exposition, the precision and order of his statements, the rigor of his logic, the fulness of his research, the grace of his style, and his happy capacity to discern and to uphold truth and justice. Those opinions are widely known and valued: they have been known and valued and respected from the day since they were promulgated. It is not easy for us, who have pursued our researches in those branches of his jurisprudence over which he was so illustrious, to measure the sum of our obligation to his labors under the guidance of which we walk. Neither is the toll of those who have come before him, and walk in the paths he has cleared, to be compared with his task in making those paths plain and easy. While he diligently devoted his powers to those pursuits, to his profession as a judge, he never lost his relish for the studies of his earliercare, but throughout his long life found leisure to gratify his love of literature and his appetite for knowledge. He ever turned with delight to the classics, of which, in his prime, he had been a critical student and an ardent admirer, and becoming indifferent to the interests of his own days, but was a constant and thoughtful observer of men and events, often with his pen giving important counsel and assistance in securing a wise direction of affairs. Remembering him, and the history of his life, we may account him happy, as well in the number of his years, as in the experiences they brought, and for ourselves, to whom he was so long spared, and who have the benefit of his bright example, we may, as we turn to our duties, reverently say:

"Why weep we then for him, who having won Life's blessings all enjoyed, life's labors done, Serenely to his final rest has passed; While the soft memory of his virtues yet Lingers like twilight hues, when the bright sun is set."

Hon. John Mussey, for many years clerk of the circuit and district courts, while Judge Ware presided in the latter, arose, and with much feeling said:

"May it please your honor: Having long known the distinguished jurist, whose recent decease is the occasion of this meeting of the brethren, it seems right to say a few words about one, whom for a long period I was so intimately connected. The high stand he occupied for many years as the architect of our admiralty and admiralty law, is well known to you and to the community at large. When he took the bench of the United States district court of Maine, in 1852, the rights and duties of seamen, the authority and responsibility of officers and owners of our merchant marine, were alike in great measure unknown and unrecognized by both the employers and employees. The clear head of the judge soon evinced the determination and ability to bring order out of confusion and misconception. At first, many of his rulings clashed with the prejudices of owners and masters, but as case after case came before him, the mist of prejudice and shortsightedness lifted and dispersed. Soon those of the community interested looked up to him in confidence, that good common sense—a just appreciation of the nature of Judge Ware as opportunity offered, and they were not disappointed. The most violent opponents to his teachings yielded. I say considerable extent, of his personal acquaintance, and am consequently unable, out of my own experience, to add anything to the tribute of affection for the man, contained in this expression of the bar. On every side are met those, who for many years associated with him on terms of friendly intimacy. All unite in their testimony to the kindness of his nature, his purity and simplicity of character, his accurate scholarship and extensive and varied attainments. Companionship with him they esteem among their most valued opportunities. Those of us, who knew him only in his judicial relations, recognize the clearness of his judgments, the depth of his learning, and of his thorough and various culture in his official life and service. Whoever studies the published opinions of Judge Ware will not fail to be impressed with the clearness of his exposition, the precision and order of his statements, the rigor of his logic, the fulness of his research, the grace of his style, and his happy capacity to discern and to uphold truth and justice. Those opinions are widely known and valued: they have been known and valued and respected from the day since they were promulgated. It is not easy for us, who have pursued our researches in those branches of his jurisprudence over which he was so illustrious, to measure the sum of our obligation to his labors under the guidance of which we walk. Neither is the toll of those who have come before him, and walk in the paths he has cleared, to be compared with his task in making those paths plain and easy. While he diligently devoted his powers to those pursuits, to his profession as a judge, he never lost his relish for the studies of his earliercare, but throughout his long life found leisure to gratify his love of literature and his appetite for knowledge. He ever turned with delight to the classics, of which, in his prime, he had been a critical student and an ardent admirer, and becoming indifferent to the interests of his own days, but was a constant and thoughtful observer of men and events, often with his pen giving important counsel and assistance in securing a wise direction of affairs. pelled by the infirmities of years to withdraw from this place which he had, by his learning and ability so ably filled for more than forty-four years. Although eight years have not elapsed since his retirement, a large proportion of the members of the bar now present, never enjoyed the satisfaction of practicing in the court where the majority of those who were then with us, distinguished in their high professional positions, have since passed away from the bar in the remembrance of the Fessenden, Evarts, De Buriis, Barnes, and others, is still vivid with many of us, and at last, this good old judge, so endeared to all who ever held personal intercourse with him, has been honored, after years of feeblessness and suffering, and it is just and due to his memory, that the records of this court, immediately after his death, should be preserved and handed down, as they by far exceed those who shall follow us, the expression of the great respect and attachment entertained for him by all his associates in the practice before Judge Ware, I trust that in the presence of so many of the bar who have not been thus favored, I may be excused for referring briefly to the manner in which he discharged the duties of his position, and in acknowledging the heavy indebtedness we are under to him for his studies in the laws, his zeal in the practice of his profession, and his own vindication and judgment for his conclusions, as the cases were presented before him for decision. Fortunately for him, his practice was so copious that a law had been of but little moment. His mind was not tampered by the harsh and unyielding rules of Lord Coke and his followers, and being naturally of a broad Catholic tendency, he was the most great a satisfaction that he found himself at full liberty to adopt, modify, and apply the plain rules of equity and admiralty, as the law of his court, according to the circumstances of each particular case. The strict rules of the law of evidence did not always receive his sanction and approval, as some of us may well recollect his readiness to hear almost all that a witness might press into the case, although much of the statement would not have been received in a court of common justice. His literary acquirements were second to none in this district. He was conversant with the Greek and Latin as well as with the English language, and could thus investigate and examine for himself their authorities without depending on the assistance of others. His knowledge of the Roman law and the various French writers on commercial and admiralty law is manifest in almost every one of his opinions, which we now possess. He most thoroughly enjoyed the investigation of questions of admiralty and maritime law, making the most diligent search and examination among the rules and sea laws of the ancient ports of commerce, and he pursued his studies and explorations until he was complete master of any subject that might remain open for him, but to present his conclusions in that clear and beautiful manner which is so distinctive of his style, and in which he never failed to impress, either at home or abroad. Quite often his opinion was not restricted to a mere determination of the rights of the parties, but embraced, in the individual case, the importance of his labors, and of the benefit to be derived from the knowledge he would thus impart, his opinion being, at the same time, a complete and finished exposition of the great principles of admiralty and maritime law involved in the matter in controversy, in addition to which at the time, the entire profession was almost universally ignorant of. So complete and thorough were his examinations, so convincing his judgments, that in many cases since his time, the most learned and eminent judi-ristes have referred to them as conclusive authority on the questions he so well investigated, being convinced that their own researches would shed no new light upon a matter which had received the careful and accurate investigation of Judge Ware. His written opinions were deemed so valuable, both to the public and the profession, that they were generally printed, and reprinted immediately after their announcement, and they are at once accorded by the entire profession, the very first rank in admiralty and maritime jurisprudence. In the year 1849, the volume of his reports was published, followed by a second in 1850, and the demand for these works has been so great as to render them a valuable purchase to each of them. A large number of treatises upon admiralty law, and volumes of decisions of various courts of admiralty in England and this country, have since that time issued from the press, but all, I believe, are under great obligations to Judge Ware, and none can acquire a knowledge of admiralty law, without an intimate acquaintance with his decisions. It is quite extraordinary, the multiplicity of questions which he examined, and upon which he gave his decision, often by his labors. Since I have occupied this chair, hardly a maritime question has been presented to me, in which I law, and the information he has imparted to us upon this branch of jurisprudence. In 1822, Peters and Bee's were the first volumes in the development of district courts of the United States, and most of the opinions contained in these volumes were quite brief and meager of authority, so that Judge Ware, in almost every question of admiralty and maritime law, was compelled to depend upon his own researches into the ancient laws of the sea and maritime codes, and upon his own studies and judgments for his conclusions, as the cases were presented before him for decision. Fortunately for him, his practice was so copious that a law had been of but little moment. His mind was not tampered by the harsh and unyielding rules of Lord Coke and his followers, and being naturally of a broad Catholic tendency, he was the most great a satisfaction that he found himself at full liberty to adopt, modify, and apply the plain rules of equity and admiralty, as the law of his court, according to the circumstances of each particular case. opinion prepared and announced in a very few days. The researches I have made do not indicate, that in any admiralty cause presented to him for decision, his opinion was delayed for more than the five days, and generally it was announced the week succeeding the hearing.

"Judge Ware was alike attentive and diligent in the discharge of his duties as a member of the circuit court for this district, always attending the sessions of that court as long as his health would permit. He frequently presided at jury trials, but his enunciation was not clear and distinct, and his charges were not so fascinating and effective as those of his eminent associate, Mr. Justice Story, but his rulings and instructions were almost invariably presented when requested for re-examination, and on such occasion I remember, against his own convictions, he having become satisfied that they were erroneous, whilst his associate was of opinion that they were correct, his honesty of purpose leading him to insist on his ultimate opinion and for the reversal of his rulings at nisi prius—and no judge ever strove more firmly to correct what he believed to have been an error committed by himself, than did Judge Ware on this occasion. In another cause hearing was suspended at nisi prius, and prepared by Mr. Justice Story, and although no jurist ever existed whose opinion was, with Judge Ware, of so high authority that the question of error, he felt obliged to prepare a dissenting judgment, which upon appeal to the supreme court received the sanction and approval of that tribunal.

"On some time before his resignation, it was quite manifest to all, that the infirmities of old age were gathering around him. His hearing was so impaired that for a number of years he was under the necessity of taking his seat within the bar with the witnesses in close proximity, that he might understand their testimony. William R. Eddy, one was so conscious of his weakness and infirmity as the judge, and I know that his resignation would have been presented at a much earlier date, if he had not, with strict sense of justice, realized, that he had claims upon the public, after expending so many years in its service, which it had no right to expect him to surrender so long as he could attend to the duties of his office. A year or two since, some of you, believing it but a partial recompense for the benefit he had conferred upon the profession, as well as upon the whole mercantile community, endeavored to induce congress to allow Judge Ware the advantages of the retirement provisions, which have since been conferred upon the judges of the federal courts. The house of representatives almost unanimously acceded to that dictate, but it was defeated in the senate. This kind-hearted, learned, and good judge, has finished his labors on earth, and it only remains for us to wish him a peaceful and happy retirement, and to the end pursued the practice of the law as a science and not as a trade, and did his best to maintain and uphold it as a dignified and liberal profession. He scouted the low arts that would debase it, and abhorred and denounced every attempt to corrupt it for any other purpose. He had a conscience that never slept, and he followed its light through all the mazes of the law. His laborious and absorbing character, made him always a leader among his brethren, an ornament of the profession, and a most valuable member of society.

"But great as were his merits and virtues at the bar, his rich were not confined to the state and nation for twenty-five years, as an able and upright judge, are now chief title to reverence and enigma. His idea of what constitutes a judge was that old-fashioned standard which exacted of him the richest learning, the deepest study, the strictest integrity, and the highest honesty, and he did his best to live up to it as nearly as human infirmity would permit. In whatever court he sat, the authority of his intellect was powerful with his associates, and recognized by the bar. Serving successively in the court of common pleas, the superior court, and the court of appeal, his full share to perpetuity for it. To be in companionship with one whose sense of justice was the crowning excellence of his character, and to listen to the words of one whose genial nature added lustre to the wealth of his learning on almost every subject, was no ordinary privilege. We will not indulge our regret too eagerly to twine a wreath of laurels for his fresh-made grave, one sprig at least, and that, providentially the last, may well be added by G. F. E. WOODRUFF, LEWIS B. [For brief biographical notice, see 30 Fed. Cas. 1463.]

"The following proceedings of the bar are reprinted from 33 Blatchf. 935:

"The members of the bar in the city of New York met in the United States circuit court room, on Wednesday, September 15th, 1875, in response to a call, of which the following is a copy: "The members of the bar are requested to meet in the United States circuit court room, on Wednesday, the 15th inst., at 2 o'clock p. m., to give expression to their sense of the loss which the profession and the community have suffered in the death of the Honorable Lewis B. Woodruff, circuit judge of the United States: William M. Evarts, George Gifford, John E. Douglas, Second; Edward E. Davies, Edward H. Owen, Joseph H. Choate, William Stanley, Edmund Randolph Robinson, George T. Curry, the committee, Messrs. J. Benedict, Francis F. Marbury, George Bliss, Burr W. Griswold, Joseph S. Bosworth, Charles F. Sanford."

"Hon. E. C. Benedict nominated as chairman of the meeting. Hon. Samuel Blatchford, judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York. The following additional officers were elected, on motion of George Bliss: Vice-presidents—Charles L. Benedict, Nathaniel J. Wallace, Charles W. Dodge, William D. Shipman, Murray Hoffman, Charles F. Daly, Noah Davis, Claudius L. Monell, Charles A. Rapallo, Daniel H. Early, earlier, if he had not, with strict sense of justice, real-ized, that he had claims upon the public, after expending so many years in its service, which it had no right to expect him to surrender so long as he could attend to the duties of his office. utation of his ability and learning, attracted to him a large measure of public attention; so that when, upon the reorganization of the circuit court of the United States, a judge was found to exercise its vast powers and responsible duties in this great circuit, the general sense of the profession and the public expected that he would appear and be the judicial umpire of the president in selecting Judge Woodruff as the proper man. How well the choice was justified they can best judge from this brief history. He has occupied the bench of this circuit for the last six years. In bidding farewell at the grave of this eminent and useful lawyer and judge, the members of the bar have regarded with the highest estimate of his mind and character; to cherish the memory of his life and labors; and to commend to one another and to those who follow him, his excellent example.

Resolved, that a committee of three be appointed by the chair to present these resolutions to the circuit court at its next term, to take them up in session, and to ask, on behalf of the bar, the entry thereof upon their minutes.

Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the family of the deceased.

Hon. Joseph S. Bosworth then addressed the meeting, as follows: "The members of the bar of the circuit which has given me an opportunity to express my regard for the virtues, their admiration of the learning and official usefulness, and the service rendered to the community by the most worthy and eminent of their number. It was my good fortune to have been personally acquainted with our deceased brother for many years, as a neighbor in the county we both loved. I felt the loss of his friendly and intimate association with him since our official association was ended. In his own home he was hospitable and genial. Never any reference was made to him as "Judge" when his house was filled with his relatives and friends; and I do not believe that any one of them ever had any occasion, from one act or look of his, to suppose that he was in any judicial position which he had held and adorned. It may be said of our deceased brother, that his life was useful, active, and distinguished. He was eminently beloved by his family and friends, active in every line of duty, to the bench, to the bar, and to the community at large. But his life and his example were not useful or acceptable to me, as the efficient life and instructive example of a learned and laborious lawyer, and of an able, fearless, and upright judge. He believed, and acted on the belief, that humanity is the duty of every one, and that no individual may properly terminate when the individual man has ceased to breathe. In the relations which he held, in consequence of the public trust which he had, he discharged all the duties growing out of them, worthily and well. He has gone to his rest, after a well-spent life, beloved, respected, and honored by all who knew him, and by a goodly company who personally knew him not. The community in which he lived, which he served, and in which he died, will respect his memory and feel good and great qualities in the various relations of his distinguished career. All of us will feel, and will be made happier by the consoling assurance, that, in the world to which our deceased brother has gone, all is well with him now, and forever will be.

George Gifford, Esq., then addressed the meeting, as follows: "After the much that has been said, and well said, respecting the excellencies of our departed judge, I will simply add, in my own words, my testimony to his having possessed in a high degree those characteristics which rendered him eminently fit for the judicial chair. He had a most judicious mind, and was prepared to exercise his powers of analysis when the occasion required it. His logic was compact and convincing, and whether examining the papers in a motion, or the question submitted to him on appeal, he gave to each the most careful attention and deliberate consideration. He was so thoroughly in the judicial habit of the court, that he could express, as all his opinions expressed, the honest conclusions of a well-instructed judgment. He was eminently conscientious. His manner on the bench was that which has been best described, at times, austere and harsh. I cannot resist the inclination to say one word upon this topic, although conscious of the delicate ground on which I tread. His feelings were keen and strong. He was always the sincere, earnest, and forgetful in his work, whatever it might be and wherever to be performed. This sincerity, earnestness, and energy may, at times, have perplexed and grieved the judge in disposing of questions arising at the trial, or in bane, requiring prompt and summary decision. But this was the court for the last six years. In bidding farewell at the grave of this eminent and useful lawyer and judge, the members of the bar have regarded with the highest estimate of his mind and character; to cherish the memory of his life and labors; and to commend to one another and to those who follow him, his excellent example.

Woodruff was richly endowed with properties of mind which were well calculated to insure that distinction in the administration of the patent laws for which he was so well qualified. He had no prejudices either for or against patents. His sympathies ran neither too high nor too low for inventors. His judgment was not influenced by their merits in which his balance in which their merits were correctly weighed. He was free from bias in his deliberations respecting the products of individual genius. He was patient to hear counsel, and willing to be instructed by the results of their researches. He never allowed his first impressions of a case, however strong or vivid, to lead him astray. The mechanical mechanism. He had a natural taste for mechanism, and a great power in discriminating between similarities and differences in machinery. His ability in analyzing mechanism and identifying what was essential therein, was unusually great. His power of drawing a line and discriminating between the essential parts and non-essential parts of an invention was unsurpassed. Appreciating the danger of making mistakes in disposing of the different mechanical questions which often arise, and the disastrous consequences to parties which sometimes follow, it was his habit not to dispose of such questions hastily, but to consult and confer and, sometimes, subject himself to great labor and fatigue to be sure he was right. The recorded decisions of Judge Woodruff in patent cases, are remarkable for their clearness and soundness, and are very properly much respected as reliable authority by the Federal Circuit and the courts of the several States. We were fortunate in having him called to the bench of the court in which he presided at the time of his death, but we have been still more fortunate in having him so soon removed from us."

Hon. Richard Goodman, of Lenox, Massachusetts, then addressed the meeting, as follows: "Having been notified only a few days ago that I was expected to make any remarks on this occasion, of course I must confine myself almost entirely to such reminiscences of my connection with Judge Woodruff as occur to me at this time. My acquaintance with Judge Woodruff commenced early in my professional career. After leaving the Law School at New Haven, I entered the office of George W. Strong, Esq., then one of the leading lawyers of this city; but finding that he was mainly consulting counsel and had little practice in his office, I looked around for an office where I could learn the practice as it then existed. I was introduced by a fellow-student to Mr. Woodruff, not then a judge. I found him in a building on Broadway, I think, between Cedar and Pine streets, working in the office of the Express newspaper, and his office was on the second story, and, below, of all things in contact with a lawyer, was a printing office, in which he had a sixth interest. My surprise was great that any lawyer could occupy an office with the continual sound of that hammer in his ears, and the din of the street coming up through the large round of the building. But Mr. Woodruff then displayed that great concentration of mind and devotedness to his studies that always controlled him and he was not easily diverted by extraneous objects. We continued there during nearly all the period of my studentship with him, and from thence removed to 33 Cedar street. An examination at the bar was then very difficult, as I understand, from the examination at the present time, for my learned Brother Bowditch, President of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, and the late President Fillmore, then an EX. PRESIDENT, had each examined the bar for a course of seven years. So severe was that examination that, I think, only one in three of the class was admitted. On getting through the fire of that examination successfully, I returned to the city of New York, and entered into business for myself. About a year after that, Mr. Goodman was admitted to the bar from New Jersey, in which state and in the United States courts he had an exalted reputation—was here retained in the suite of important others, eminently, the suit of Ogden vs. Astor, in which Mr. Daniel Lord, with whom our associate, Mr. Evarts, was then, or lately had been, a student, was counsel on the other side. When retained in those suits, Mr. Woodruff, looking for a man who could conduct them successfully and intelligently as attorney and junior counsel, selected Mr. Woodruff; and Mr. Woodruff, finding that those suits would occupy a great portion of the time, he would otherwise bestow upon his practice, requested me to unite with him, and we formed a partnership about May, 1843. That connection continued until the end of the term of Mr. Lord, or the death of Mr. Lord, in 1850, and with Mr. Woodruff until his decease. During that time Mr. Woodruff's business was such that he conducted it entirely with the firm name. He was not then as well known to the bar, or to the community, as afterwards, yet, by those with whom he dealt in the business, it was an important one; and it was the connection of Mr. Lord and myself with the case of Ogden vs. Astor which gave the former so high an estimate of Mr. Woodruff's abilities, and caused the promotion of a young lawyer to the bench; for I think that Mr. Lord was the active agent in having his name brought before the nominating committee. With Mr. Lord, during his professional career, especially during my connection with him, was that dangerous man, the man of one book. His library was of course, but, until he became a judge, was not extensive, the main elements in it being 'Gould's Lectures,' in six volumes, copied by himself; and, whenever he had occasion to refer to authorities, those lectures were his principal assistance. But, although he was not a reading man, not a student, not a literary man, in the ordinary phrase, as expressed by us, either in law or in literature, yet there were few men so well posted in all the advanced theories on what was going on in the world, or through the community. He was a troublesome man to discuss with, even when you were very well advanced in the subject in which you were most interested, and, whether it was a question of table-tipping or a question of science in any shape, or a question arising in the courts, or in literature, he always seemed to have thought much upon the subject, to have great acquaintance with it, and to be well able to discuss it in all its elements. In addition to that, Mr. Woodruff, from my earliest connection with him—and, as I have understood, long prior to that—appeared a man who always had his principles fixed, and not modified by them. It is a very easy thing for a man to say he has fixed principles, but it is a very difficult thing, in the midst of business or temptation, that may come thick and fast upon the lawyer in active practice—it is a very difficult thing to carry out those principles on all occasions. When the late Edward Kellogg, of Brooklyn, (so well known for his original theories on banking and finance,) at the time when there was an excessive speculation in real estate, first entered upon his business, Mr. Woodruff, who was then just commencing practice and anxious for employment, came to him and said, 'I have a large and real estate business in Brooklyn,' and said, but I don't think I can afford to pay you five dollars for every deed you draw.' Mr. Woodruff's reply to him was, 'Very well, if you have your business, but I cannot underbid my professional brethren. I understand the charge at the bar is five dollars for every deed drawn, and whatever business of that kind you bring me, sir,' that will be my charge.' Mr. Kellogg afterwards became his devoted friend as well as client, and to the profession. We were reconciled, and became friends of a large amount of business. On another occasion a man high official from Washington came on, post haste, on more than one occasion. He was a man of large business. He was a man of large station in life, with an interesting family, with a large circle of friends, by marriage and by relationship, and his house was always open. He was always open. He was always open to and endorses remarks as has been made by our brother Bosworth, as to the mannerliness and hospitality of Judge Woodruff. His mannerliness, his personal character, was above the bounds to which I thought I had been confined on this occasion. I only intended to say a good many words here with reference to the gentleman who has been so long associated with us, so long known to the whole community, who goes down to his rest as an upright judge. His career as a lawyer has been that of an able man: his career as an individual has been that of an honest man. I never, in all my reading, found but two men of great ability, and all the virtues of character, and the success of his client. It made no difference to him whether his client was a man of wealth or a man of poverty. He was the only one to whom the successful in the world in which he was engaged. He spent as much time and engaged in as laborious devotion, and had the character of one who received a large amount, and as he did upon those in which he received a larger sum. Mr. Woodruff, that Mr. Woodruff seemed to spend a great deal of time in his office elucidating subjects with clients who were boring him, which he is likely to do so, but at the same time, as we heard yesterday, he was a man of that character that when the time came that he was to give his remarks of our profession, when his time was gone, he was willing to give up and say—would not say, perhaps, but would feel—I have done my part in this world as an honest man, as a good lawyer, an uprightness, and a Civil, and I am not afraid to meet the greater Judge above.”

Hon. William M. Evarts then addressed the meeting, as follows: “Our profession has not been called together at the close of the vacation, before renewing our service in the courts and the community, to compare me as a younger brother, and I found as kind a care in his house, as much maternal affection from him, as much reverence and love, as I could have had from any devoted relative. But, if there was any austerity, it arose, in a great measure, if not altogether, as a part of his nature, and a part of his character. Within my recollection, there was a time when there was more cause than now, even, for approbation, he was a part of the body of lawyers, and a part of the judges, on account of young men coming to the bar unprepared, leaping over the barrier without adequate examination, and threatening to fill our courts with ignorance. There have been two evils under which we have been suffering—the election of judges, and the admission of lawyers without proper examination; and I think we have found out that the latter is the greater, as without a learned bar we cannot have honest and competent judges; and I have no doubt, that a man like Judge Woodruff, well versed in the law, armed with the full panoply of science, when on the bench he met gentlemen coming before him, as they had been accustomed in some courts, for the purpose of having orders corrected, or papers prepared by the judge, would allow his impartiality to exceed his bounds, and treat those solicitors in a different light from what he would if they had presented their cases as good lawyers should. But to my knowledge, and to my knowledge, Judge Woodruff, may, in the discharge of his duties, have had an earnestness which perhaps looked to outsiders like austerity; but to my knowledge, and to my knowledge, Judge Woodruff was a man of large station in life, with an interesting family, with a large circle of friends, by marriage and by relationship, and his house was always open. the good fortune to be associated, thus early in his professional career, with a lawyer than whom, I think, no one of mature experience or our recollections do not recall any one possessing greater natural powers, or more completely disciplined in all the faculties of a great forensic reputation, than Mr. Wood-Wood. And looking early into such a relation, he was by that connection brought into forensic opposition to eminent lawyers, and he bore a position on the same level with Mr. Wood. When he had attracted the approval of the great leaders in the profession, by his ability and industry, and his fitness for the public service on the bench, he, readily and by the consent of all, raised to that position. He first took a seat upon the bench, then and now the most ancient and venerable in our judicial history, a bench having the jurisdiction of the common law, and called by one of the favorite names of the common law, the 'Courts of Common Pleas.' His next judicial service was as a judge of the most celebrated commercial court, perhaps, that we have ever had in this country, the superior court of the city of New York. He there filled out, by a somewhat new experience of judicial service, his preparation for the highest station in the political service of the state, a place in the court of appeals. For it seemed as if he was so well fitted to serve us as a judge, that the confidence of the whole bar, and the political confidence of the courts or of politics were not long to deprive the community of his services. In the court of appeals, Judge Woodruff completed the judicial experience he had had as a lawyer, and that this varied experience was fully fitted for new judicial station. And when, by the defeat of his election to the seat of the chief justice, he was thrown out of political place, and there came up a new court of great importance and dignity—the federal circuit—judge of a man and individual general consent of the profession, he first occupied that eminent seat which he has just left. When he came to this new office, there was some feeling that a professional course had not made him specially familiar with the subject of federal jurisprudence, with admiral or patent law, and not much, if at all, with revenue law. But, sir, a man well instructed in the common law as Judge Woodruff was, by his experience at the bar and on the bench, has the best and only necessary preparation for any and all the special departments of jurisprudence. Those who have had the most experience in the round of those special equipments and special jurisdictions best understand that the common law is wider and deeper, more varied and more exacting in its demands and its discipline, than any other body of law. And he who has proved himself to possess the great powers of legal reason, and the great diversity for judicial facts, and the capacity of co-ordinate intellects, may well encounter untried special jurisdictions without fear. But Judge Woodruff had some personal fitness for each of these special branches of the law which every judge does not possess. He had a very thorough knowledge of the philosophies of the natural sciences, and, if he had no particular or special qualities that should fit him to the professional course had not made him specially familiar with the subject of federal jurisprudence, the force of his intellect was adequate for them all.

And, yet, all of us that have known Judge Woodruff at the bar and on the bench have felt, and all of us have exhibited this feeling to-day, that his personal qualities and his dignity were a born quality and dignified a great judicial character. That he sought distinction in the profession, and desired the promotions of the bench, is an honor to him, and to all of us. But to whatever one; but no man ever found him seeking elevation by any unworthy arts, or pursuing competition with his rivals by any secret or open intrigue. There was an office for which himself and his friends might justly think him suitable, he was ready to avow his disposition to accept the office, not to run after it. To that limit of desire he always adhered. He regarded the career of human life, not as a game, but as the duty of his public duty, and the constant observance of duty through life as the highest and best success permitted to man. He relished thoroughly the full meaning of that noble proposition of the sacred safety of human life. He strove for the enervating power, yet he is not overcome unless his strife be lawful."

The chair announced that he had received from a gentleman who was a personal friend of Judge Woodruff, upon the bench, who was unable to be present at the meeting, a communication which is joined in the same spirit of the case, and in view of Judge Shipman's former relations to Judge Woodruff, it had been thought desirable of this gentleman to be present, that the proceedings of the meeting, and be published as a part thereof. The resolutions having been unanimously adopted, on motion of Robert D. Benedict, Esq., it was voted that the reading of the letter of Hon. William D. Shipman be incorporated in the proceedings of the meeting.

"New York, Sept. 14th, 1876. Samuel Blatchford.—Dear Sir: Other and imperative engagements will prevent my being present at the meeting of the bar of this city, to be held to-morrow, to do honor to the memory of the late Hon. Lewis B. Woodruff, who, for nearly six years, has occupied the high position of United States circuit judge for the second circuit; but I am unwilling to allow the occasion to pass without a brief expression of the deep loss which the great loss which the great law, the bar, the bench, and the public have sustained by his death. My personal acquaintance with Judge Woodruff commenced at the date of his appointment to the circuit bench, and I have long known him by reputation, through his career at the bar, and on the bench of the common pleas, the superior court, and the circuit. He was an able lawyer, and an upright judge of large experience and unblenched character. But early in 1870 I was brought into close personal and official relations with him, which continued for more than three years, and gave me constant opportunity of observing his character as a man and as a judge. I soon came to admire his zealous and conscientious devotion to his duties, the strength of his understanding, and the never-absent labor and energy with which he discharged the constantly pressing and heavy responsibilities of his great office. No toil or self-denial, however severe or exacting, for a moment deterred him from a thorough examination of every case which was submitted to his decision. He fully appreciated his position, and well understood the functions of a judge to be, to administer justice according to settled rules. This was the guide to his judicial conduct, and in this he never failed. He held his office. He held his seat, with a high sense of duty, and was always delighted when a sound conclusion was reached that would operate beneficially in the particular case before him. But his rules, not his own rules, nor settle the foundation of principles, in order to relieve the exceptional hardship of an isolated cause or of a single case; he regarded and equity, to be of any value to an enlightened community, must be administered with steady uniformity, and to this end he spared neither time nor toil in the investigations which preceded his judgments, and in the preparation of his opinions which announced them. To this duty he brought a vigorous intellect, an enlightened reason, and a firm will. To say that he sometimes erred, is merely to pronounce him human. Judge Woodruff was a man of massive and sturdy nature. He was not one to reverence overmuch the lighter graces and ornamental accomplishments of a fine gentleman. He gave his large duty expanded and dignified a great judicial character. That he sought distinction in the profession, and desired the promotions of the bench, is an honor to him, and to all of us. But to whatever one; but no man ever found him seeking elevation by any unworthy arts, or pursuing competition with his rivals by any secret or open intrigue. There was an office for which himself and his friends might justly think him suitable, he was ready to avow his disposition to accept the office, not to run after it. He relished thoroughly the full meaning of that noble proposition of the sacred safety of human life. He strove for the enervating power, yet he is not overcome unless his strife be lawful."

The chair appointed as the committee to present the resolutions to the court of appeals and the circuit court, Mr. Edward L. Davies, George Bliss, and Joseph H. Choate.

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL.

The filing of letters of administration by the administrator of a deceased party hold a "proceeding" in the case, under act Md. 1785, c. 80, § 1. 126.

In a suit in equity against the members of a firm, a demurrer will not lie to a bill of revivor to bring in the representative of a deceased partner. 215.

A defendant’ll often be held in contempt of the federal circuit court by a denial of the fact of citizenship, which is properly averred, can only be taken by plea in abatement. 447.

Rule 23 of the supreme court, in equity, is inapplicable to such objections as are in abatement only. 447.

ACCOUNT STATED.

An account may be a stated or settled account, though not signed by the parties. 831.

The presumption of a promise to pay arises when the account is rendered and received without objection made in a reasonable time. 821.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The acknowledgment of a deed before a person who styles himself a justice of the court of common pleas is prima facie evidence that he was such; and it is not necessary to produce the commission of the justice until evidence is given to render the fact questionable. 62.

ACTION.

Upon a joint shipment and orders by three persons, the master of the vessel is not liable to an action by two for a breach, in the absence of an express promise. 841.

Where plaintiff has several causes of action which may be joined, and brings a separate suit on each, the court will compel a consolidation at his costs. 417.

ADMARILTY.

Admiralty has jurisdiction in the case of a tort which originated in port, but did not become a completed act until carried out upon navigable tide waters. 781.

The admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts in no way depends upon the residence or citizenship of the parties. 939.

A contract to furnish materials for the construction of a vessel built upon the shores of tide waters, and designed for use upon navigable waters, is not within the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts. 859.

If the subject-matter of a contract concern the navigation of the sea, it is a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, although the contract be made on land. 909.

A contract for wages on board of a steamboat, plying between ports of adjoining states, on a navigable tide river, may be enforced by a suit in rem, in the admiralty. 149.

The pilot, dock hands, engineers, and firemen on board of a steamboat are entitled to sue in the admiralty for their wages. 149.

Furnishing an air pump to a water craft (a "chunker") used for pumping water out of dry docks is a maritime service, and the lien given therefor by the local law may be enforced in the district court in admiralty. 308.

A contract to tow a canal boat in New York Harbor is a maritime contract, and gives rise to a lien enforceable in admiralty. 405.

A contract for an excursion trip by steamers between Philadelphia and Cape May is a maritime contract, and within the admiralty jurisdiction. 609.

The nature of a contract or service, and not the question whether the contract is made, or the service is rendered, on the land or on the water, is the proper test in determining admiralty jurisdiction. 648.

Admiralty has jurisdiction of a claim for services in cleaning a vessel on ways and for a per diem while she is on the ways, and being repaired by another person. 648.

The forcible deportation of a citizen to a foreign country in an American ship, commanded by an American master, pursuant or execution of a sentence of banishment of an illegal and self-constituted body of men, is a maritime tort, of which admiralty has jurisdiction. 781.

In cases in which a common law right has been promoted by services of counsel which a mere selfish consideration of his client's interest would not have induced him to render, a part or even the whole of his compensation may occasionally be allowed from the general fund arising from the sale of the vessel. 653.

Where an arrested vessel in any manner again comes into possession of the owner, he cannot defeat a lien against her, on the ground that the contract out of which it arose was made, and the consideration for it rendered, while the vessel was in the custody of the law. 395.

Where, on an appeal by both parties from a decree finding them mutually in fault in a collision case, the decretal was affirmed, no costs were given to either party. 299.

Where a clerk certifies the mayor, it is not necessary that the mayor should certify the clerk. 716.

The marshal is bound to take sufficient bail for the appearance of defendant, and he is judge of the sufficiency. 434

In ordinary cases of libel, special bail is not required without some special reason other than the publication of the libel itself. 402

In Virginia, special bail in an action of debt upon judgment rendered in one or the other states cannot be required by the indorsement of an attorney. 633

An affidavit to hold to bail must be positive, and the inebriety must be stated from the knowledge of the affiant, and not on information and belief. 665

Sufficiency of affidavit to hold to bail in an action for money lent. 856

A party may purchase a claim in good faith, in order to join in an involuntary petition, and make the necessary number. 492

If the sale of a claim is void for fraud or want of consideration, the claim is to be deemed to have been assigned to the petitioners. 492

Creditors whose claims are under $250 are not to be counted in computing the number which must unite in an involuntary petition. 492
In computing the amount of creditors, all the claims must be counted, irrespective of the amount. 492

A petition founded upon the suspension of payments by a bank is not negative all the circumstances which might excuse the nonpayment. 88

Acts of bankruptcy.

An executory agreement by a railroad company to transfer certificates of its stock is not an act for which it can be forced into bankruptcy. 329

A mortgage at par of the stock of a railroad company, not therefore issued, in payment of the bona fide debts of the company, is not an act of bankruptcy. 329

It is not necessary for a bankrupt to be disposed of to creditors under circumstances to give them an illegal preference, it will be an act of bankruptcy. 329

A debtor who directly or indirectly assists or facilitates the obtaining of a judgment which an execution has followed is guilty of procuring or suffering his property to be taken in execution. 529

Mere honest inaction on the part of an insolvent debtor, who is sued on a just debt, and who allows judgment to go against him, and his property to be levied upon, is not an act of bankruptcy, within Act 1867, § 39. 672

Payment of wages to employees, though made by the regular course of business, is an act of bankruptcy if done in contemplation of insolvency. 69, note

The recording after the passage of the bankruptcy act of a deed of trust made before such passage cannot be held to be an act of bankruptcy, but the consequences flowing from the act of the grantor attach as from the date of its execution. 752

It is not an act of bankruptcy, under Act 1867, § 39, as amended July 13, 1870, for a company to suspend, and not resume payment of its commercial paper, for a period of 14 days. 339

There is no suspension of payment of commercial paper, within the bankrupt act, where a note payable 1 day after date remains unpaid for 30 days, where no demand is made. 406

The nonpayment by a merchant for 14 days, without legal excuse, of a single piece of paper, is an act of bankruptcy, without reference to whether he is actually insolvent. 88

The receiver of oil lands who divides them into leasesheals, and receives the rent in oil, is not a trader, within the meaning of the bankrupt law, as he deals only in the product of his land. 529

Adjudication.

The adjudication is an essential prerequisite to an assignment of the estate to the assignee. 678

Assignment.

An election of a near relative of the bankrupt as assignee will be set aside, and the appointment by the register according to the rules of the district will be confirmed. 335

The assignee has only the right of the bankrupt except in cases of transfer in fraud of creditors. 329, 329

Assignment.

A register has the right to convey the estate to the assignee when there is "no opposing interest," although the title to the property is in dispute. 731

Property of bankrupt—What constitutes.

A claim for the destruction of a vessel for which an allowance is made under the Geneva award will pass to the assignee. 9

The assignee in bankruptcy will receive the benefit of the state statute avoiding all deeds of trust as to creditors except from the time of recording them. 752

Where the tenants rent accruing before the bankruptcy, and secured by a lien upon crops, the district court has jurisdiction of a petition filed by the landlord to recover such fund. 732

The nature of the title to real estate held by partners cannot be changed by the prejudice of the rights of separate creditors by their classification thereof in their schedule. 947

--- Exemptions.

The state exemption laws, as interpreted and settled by the adjudicators of its highest courts, are controlling on the bankruptcy court. 733

Where the members of a bankrupt firm are entitled, under the Missouri laws, to an exemption of $300 each of partnership assets. 835

The homestead exemption under the Virginia constitution exists only against debts contracted after the constitution took effect, and is by its terms subject to mortgages, deeds of trust, pledges, or other security thereon, notwithstanding article 7. 733

An insolvent merchant cannot sell his homestead and transfer the exemption to his store into which he moves his family. 660

The amendatory act of June 3, 1872, is prospective, but it may be availed of in all pending cases where assets are undistributable, and the exemption can be granted without prejudice to the interest already vested before the passage of the act. 733

--- Liens.

An assignee in bankruptcy takes the property of the bankrupt, subject to all legal and equitable claims of others. 9

A prior lien gives a prior claim, and the district court in bankruptcy may ascertain and liquidate such a lien. 803

Judgments obtained against a debtor, at the time insolvent, by creditors having no reason to believe him, are enforceable in the bankruptcy court. 663

Where a mortgagee takes possession of chattels on a default in payment of the mortgage, the mortgagor has no right therein subject to levy on execution. 717

The fact that plaintiff sued out his execution immediately upon the return of defendant's praecipe, or the judgments under which the sale took place are afterwards declared void as in fraud of the act. 917

The judgments whereby a creditor of an insolvent obtains an illegal preference are volatile, but not void per se. 904

A purchaser at sheriff's sale, after proceedings commenced in bankruptcy, where the levy was made prior thereto, will acquire a good title, notwithstanding that the judgments under which the sale took place are afterwards declared void as in fraud of the act. 904

The landlord's lien given by Code Va. c. 128, § 12, is independent of proceedings by distress warrant or attachment. 752

The right of an execution creditor or a landlord, upon a warrant of distress, is paramount to that of the assignee in bankruptcy, where the execution or warrant of distress was issued before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. 116
INDEX.

Sale.
Where a creditor is secured by a mortgagor which is valid under the state law and the bankrupt act, the court has no jurisdiction to order a sale of the property, unless the creditor consents to the bankruptcy proceedings................. 703

Proof of debts—What is provable.
Money actually paid on "puts" and "calls," which are void as wager contracto be proved as claims against the estate of the party from whom they are taken ............ 828

Secured debts.
A prior having lien on property is admitted as a creditor only for the balance of the debt after deducting the value of the property ........................................ 303

Set-off.
One to whom a bankrupt is indebted for money advanced, and who, before the bankruptcy, has purchased a note of the bankrupt, consigned to him for sale, may sell the note, and, as against a claim for the proceeds, set off his claim against the bankrupt, under Rev. St. § 5073. 1081

Payment of debts.

The bankrupt's wife must attend before the register, and submit to an examination, the same as any other witness, under Act 1867, § 28; and she may be punished for contempt, under section 7, if she refuses to answer............ 602

A witness who claims to have acted as counsel for a bankrupt cannot, on that ground, refuse to be sworn as a witness in the bankruptcy proceedings................. 541

A bankrupt summoned at the instance of a creditor who has proved his claim cannot refuse to be sworn and examined on the ground that the claim is not valid, unless such invalidity has been proved........ 306

A bankrupt who refuses to be sworn and examined under the advice of counsel will not be punished for contempt or amerced in costs other than those of the certificate. 306

One who is engaged to prevent the examination of the bankrupt summoned at the instance of another creditor....... 306

On the examination of the bankrupt, a creditor, who has filed proof of a debt, claiming that it was contracted by fraud, cannot inquire as to the facts constituting the fraud............. 656

Costs, Fees, Disbursements.
A regular taxation by the clerk should be made of all the fees and disbursements in each bankruptcy case................. 1057

The fee of the register for taking an ordinary proof of debt is $1.57 75.
For examining and filing a proof of debt taken after any other officer, 50 cents allowed ................ 1079

The sum of $50, deposited with the clerk, is not a fund in court for general distribution between creditors, but is to be disbursed under the supervision of the court. 1057

If a portion of the sum, or such portion of it as may be necessary, be appropriated to the register in the first place.......... 1057

Where a bankrupt is relieved by order of the court, from the payment of fees, the $50 deposit will be distributed pro rata to the register, clerk, and marshal............. 1057

To the filing of the petition, held, that the officer was entitled to compensation, from the assignee for keeping such sheep until claimed and received by the assignee............. 917

Discharge—Proceedings to obtain.
The bankrupt may apply for a discharge within 60 days after the adjudication, where debts have been proved, but no assets have come to the hands of the assignee .......................... 609

Where there are proved debts and assets, a discharge cannot be granted where not applied for within a year after the adjudication. 422

A member of an existing firm having firm debts and firm assets cannot be discharged on his individual petition unless the firm is also declared bankrupt................. 302

A partner who is in bankruptcy upon the petition of his co-partner cannot obtain his discharge without the consent of the other partner or the amount of assets required in voluntary proceedings ........................................ 97

Under Rev. St. § 5112, the assignee, after entering into the hands of the assignee in bankruptcy, exclusive of exemptions, must be equal to 30 per cent. of the claims proved against the bankrupt's estate, to entitle him to a discharge........ 96

Where the bankrupt was about to lose all remedy by the proceedings of the act of 1867, the court permitted a default to be opened on terms............. 833

On the death of the bankrupt, after his uncontested application for a discharge had been submitted to the court, and a favorable report of the master had been made, the court has power to order the discharge to be entered nunc pro tunc.............. 835

The presumption that the final oath required by section 29, Act 1867, was duly taken, is not overcome by the evidence that such oath is not upon file............. 835

Acts barking.
It is no ground of opposition to a discharge that a debt is created by fraud, for the discharge will not operate thereon. 663

A single debt due in a fiduciary capacity will not prevent a decree as to all other debts ................. 894

The concealment of assets and false swearing in the affidavit connected with the schedule must appear to have been intentional, to preclude a discharge. 719

The bankrupt is not chargeable with false swearing or fraud in omitting from his schedule a judgment held by him honestly to be worthless, or in unintentionally omitting a debt which he considers of value as an asset............. 317

Slight inaccuracies and a want of recollection will not warrant the belief of willful false swearing or false entries, where the bankrupt, a speculator in stocks, was obliged to rely mostly upon statements of his brokers ......................... 542

The law only requires that the books of account shall be an intelligible record of the merchant's or trader's affairs, kept with that reasonable degree of accuracy and care which is to be expected from an intelligent man in the business. Casual mistakes will not prevent a discharge. 317

A speculator in stocks is not a merchant or tradesmen within the law requiring the keeping of proper books of account. 542

An entry of notes upon the fly leaf of the blotter is sufficient. 317

A chattel mortgage given to secure a debt need not be entered upon the account books. 317

The contents of account books kept by a trader before he becomes such need not be carried into the books which he keeps as a trader............. 317
A conveyance constituting a preference may be nullified, and bankruptcy proceedings will not prevent a discharge, as it cannot be said to have been made in contemplation of becoming bankrupt 415

Scope and effect.
The discharge will bar actions brought against the bankrupt by foreign creditors, those not recognized as a bar against foreign creditors in courts of their own country. 916

Debts due to persons arising out of the fact that the bankrupt, while register of the land office, converted to his own use money deposited with him by private parties for the purchase of public lands, are not discharged. 655

Section 21, Act 1867, is inapplicable to debts which by section 33 are excepted from the operation of a discharge 656

The question whether a debt is fraudulently contracted, and therefore not affected by a discharge, can only be raised and determined in a suit to collect the debt in which the discharge is set up as a bar. 656

Prohibited or fraudulent transfers.
No transfer or assignment which would be void for fraud as against creditors if no petition had been filed or assignee appointed will be equally void against creditors recognized by the court. 762

A creditor will not be held to be under preferred by a bankrupt unless he understands that at the time of the transaction that he is dealing with a bankrupt or with his avowed agent for security or payment out of the funds of the bankrupt. 820

A transfer in execution of a contract made when there were no circumstances to impede it as an intended fraud upon the bankrupt act will be protected. 423

A merchant or dealer who cannot pay his debts in the ordinary course of business is insolvent. 114

A bill of sale by a bankrupt to a person who had knowledge of his insolvency in payment of a debt held a fraudulent preference. 540

Knowledge of the insolvency of a debtor will not be presumed to a creditor because of his knowledge of his attorney. 689

A creditor who knows that his debtor cannot pay his debts in the ordinary course of business has reasonable cause to believe the debtor to be insolvent. 114

Knowledge that a party is embarrassed in carrying out his business for want of means is not sufficient to fix on a grantee in a deed to a creditor, due to a trust deed knowledge of his insolvency, if he believed his property is more than sufficient to pay all his debts. 752

The preference is illegal where a judgment is entered upon a warrant of attachment to confess. 904

Where a sale is not made in the usual and ordinary course of business, the burden of proof is on the purchaser to sustain the validity of the purchase. 225

Suits and proceedings in relation to the estate.
Property transferred by an insolvent to another by way of preference or otherwise, where the firm has never been declared bankrupt, cannot be recovered by an assignee of the surviving partners after the death of one of them. 402

An assignee, in alleging title to property, must allege an enhancement of bankruptcy. 475

The circuit court has jurisdiction of suits brought by the assignee of the bankrupt, simply to collect the assets assigned. 533

The jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court of a suit brought by the assignee to recover property fraudulently mortgaged or conveyed is not exclusive of other district courts, and the court which first obtains jurisdiction will have the right to decide the matter. 793

Where the creditor commences suit in the state court to foreclose the mortgage before the assignee files a suit to set it aside as a fraud upon the bankrupt, the state court will have the right to decide the matter, to the exclusion of the federal courts. 793

Review.
The decision of the district court upon an application to confirm a sale of a bankrupt's estate is not within the general supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit courts. (Act 1867, § 2). 514

The circuit court has no supervisory jurisdiction in the case of a suit brought by the assignee or a creditor pending the bankruptcy proceedings, or on the rejection or allowance of a claim, but has such jurisdiction in all other classes of cases. 514

When questions of policy and expediency have been fairly before the creditors, and disposed of by them, and their consent thereto has been approved by the register and the district court, such action will not be interfered with by the circuit court. 93

The circuit court will not set aside the appointment of an assignee by the district judge where the only error claimed is in holding that no election had been made by the creditors, there being no allegation against the fitness of the person appointed. 93

On a review in bankruptcy, a district court cannot consider objections to a proceeding in composition that were not taken in the district court. 93

Arrangement with creditors: Composition.
In composition proceedings, the debtor, though present, may, by a vote of the creditors present, be excused from examination on account of illness. 98

The bankrupt is not required to attend any meeting of the creditors but one. 718

The debtor may be excused by the creditors from answering inquiries, even though he be present at the meeting, if he suffering from illness. (Act June 22, 1874, § 17). 93

A person is not disqualified as trustee, or as a member of a committee of creditors, because related to the bankrupt or a creditor or a proposed member of the committee of creditors. 93

It is no valid objection to a composition that it is unsecured and payable in installments, and that the property of the debtor is restored to him, to be dealt with at his pleasure. 93

A composition of 20 per cent. in money, secured by one note, leaving the hands of the assignee, to be converted into money, and paid to the creditors, is a lawful composition. 718

The question as to the time for the payment of the composition is one for the creditors to settle, and the judgment will not be reversed except for valid reasons. 98

Security for the payment of the composition is not always essential to its validity. 98

The fact that the creditor, provided for a composition does not certify the full payment of the composition does not make the composition uncertain; as it will not be reversed except for valid reasons. 98

The circuit court, in the exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction, will not interfere, ex.
except in a very clear case, where the district court has affirmed the action of majority creditors .................................................. 718
Where a composition has been approved by the court, when, either at his place of business or at his residence ................. 1078
In an action on a note, judgment may be given for interest from its maturity or in damages ............................................ 932

BILL OF LADING.

See, also, "Affrightment"; "Carriers"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping".

Although the bona fide holder of a bill of lading is entitled to the proceeds, the consignee has the right to deduct his commissions, and also the charges and insurance advanced by him ........................................... 412
A recital in a bill of lading that the goods received in good order may be contradicted by showing that the cask, case, etc., in which they were packed was insufficient, and that the injury to the goods was caused thereby .................................................. 932
It is not sufficient for the carrier to show merely that the packages were insufficient, and that the defect was not discovered by him, but he must show that the loss actually resulted from such insufficiency and from no fault of his .......................................................... 932

BILLS, NOTES, AND CHECKS.

A receipt, not negotiable, and intended as a memorandum of indebtedness by the maker thereof to the holder, does not come within the rule of law in which it is held that one who indorses a note, not being a holder of it, is an original promisor. .......................... 654

The transfer of property by the maker of a promissory note to the indorser for the express purpose of paying the debt will dispense with notice of nonpayment, if the amount of property thus assigned be sufficient to satisfy the liability; not otherwise, although all the property of the maker may have been thus assigned ........................................ 487
If, however, the assignment to the indorser is in trust for general creditors, and sufficient only for the payment of a small portion of the debts of the maker, such transfer, although including all the debtor's property, is not sufficient to excuse the want of notice to the indorsees ................................. 487
If the plaintiff can establish possession of the defendant's acceptance by a fraudulent practice, he cannot recover upon it ........................................... 119
A bank which discounts a note for a partner, who drew the same in the name of the firm, and forged the name of the payee, cannot assign under the assignment, but may sue in the name of the payee for its benefit .......................... 824
An indorsement for collection merely may be disregarded, and the suit brought by the indorser ................................. 1086
A declaration on note indorsed by one as agent in his own name should show that the note was made payable to such person as agent ........................................... 155

A valid bottomry bond can be made to procure a loan to pay for repairs made in a port of distress on the credit of the vessel ........................... 892
A bill for the services of a stevedore in the necessary unloading of a vessel to ascertain the extent of the damages may be included in the amount of the bond, as also a charge for commissions in procuring the loan .......................................................... 892
The lender upon bottomry in good faith, and under circumstances which justified the lender, cannot be held responsible for the reasonableness of the charges in the repair of the vessel ........................................... 892
A recital that the master was necessitated to take the steps upon the vessel, her cargo and freight, will not control the actual hypothecation clause confined in terms to the vessel and the freight ........................................... 928
An omission to include the cargo in the hypothecation, if by mistake, may be reformed .......................................................... 928
The freight pledged means the freight of the whole voyage, and not the freight for that part unperformed at the time of giving the bond ........................................... 928
The bottomry lien attaches from the date of the bond, although the ship, by reason of the default of the parties procuring the loan, never performs the voyage described in the bond, but undertakes a different voyage, and the princiial of the loan will be recovered in an action in rem, after the completion of that voyage, and as against a claimant who purchased the ship with knowledge of the facts ........................................... 84

BONDS.

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS.

The loans by building associations under an arrangement whereby the members bid for the amount and pay a premium are not usurious.

CARRIERS.

See also, "Affreightment"; "Average"; "Bills of Lading"; "Charter Parties"; "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

A steamboat bill of lading for the delivery of goods at a certain point, specifying the rate of freight to a more distant point, is a through contract and binds the carrier to deliver at the latter point.

In the absence of a special contract, the carrier can only relieve himself from liability for injury to goods by proving that it was the result of some natural and inevitable necessity superior to all human agency or control, or of a force exerted by a public enemy.

A common carrier may, by special contract, limit his common-law liability to that of an ordinary bailee for hire, but he cannot exempt himself from liability for misconduct or negligence.

The exception from liability inserted in a bill of lading does not excuse the carrier in all cases of destruction by fire. He is, notwithstanding, bound to use reasonable care and vigilance, such as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise over his own property.

Though liability for fire is excepted, the carrier is bound to do all that a reasonable and prudent man could do to prevent the entire destruction of the property after it has caught fire.

The measure of damages for the loss of property shipped is its net value at the point of destination, with interest, deducting freight.

CHARTER PARTIES.

See also, "Demurrage"; "Shipping."

An agreement for the hire of a vessel for a given term at a certain rate per month, the vessel being manned and victualled by the owners, the hire including port charges and piloting, makes the hirer owner pro hac vice.

In a charter party under seal there is an implied covenant that the vessel is seaworthy, and fit for the service for which she is chartered, and the charterer may aver such warranty, and declare on it in covenant.

In the case of separate charter parties for successive voyages, a breach of the first charter party in refusing to accept the vessel at the agreed rate, where she subsequently sails the voyage at a lesser rate, will not release the vessel from the other charter parties.

CHATTEL MORTGAGES.

See also, "Shipping."

Under Rev. St. Mass. c. 74, § 5, it is not necessary, as between the parties, that the mortgage should be recorded.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The thirteenth amendment gave to the freed slave no right of protection from the federal government superior to that of his white fellow citizens, and no exemption from the power of state control which might be exercised against others.

The privilege of the fourteenth amendment that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," prohibits the action of the state alone. It gave congress no power to legislate against the wrongs and personal violence of citizens.

The privileges and immunities which this clause forbids the states to abridge are only those which exist upon the constitution of the United States, such as the right to pass from state to state and to the national capital, to protection upon the high seas, and in foreign courts and the like.

Congress has no authority, under the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments, to declare a crime for any individual to deny to negroes the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns and steamers.

A state officer, empowered by law to select jurors to serve in the courts of common law, by selecting a colored juror, is amenable to indictment in a court of the United States, under Act March 1, 1875, § 4 (19 Stat. 333), entitled "An act to protect all citizens in their civil rights."

In North Carolina, the equal rights, in inns and public conveyances, of all persons without distinction of race, are protected by state statutes, and existed as to inns at common law; and the "Civil Rights Bill" was unnecessary in the state, and its only effect is to give jurisdiction of wrongs committed against citizens on account of race to the federal courts.

These laws, state and national, are intended to secure political and legal equality of rights to all citizens, but were not intended to establish social equality, or to enforce social intercourse between different classes of citizens.

CLAIMS.

The proof of an assignment of a claim for indemnity cannot be parol.

COLLISION.

See also, "Pleading in Admiralty"; "Practice in Admiralty."

Between sail vessels. Failure of a sloop running before the wind in the East river to foresee the point at which an approaching schooner will run out her tack so as to keep out of her way when she comes about, is a fault barring recovery for an ensuing collision.

Between steam and sail vessels. A sail vessel will be held in fault for collision with a steamer where, when sailing on parallel courses, with ample space between them, she changes her course to cross the steamer's bows, so near that the latter could not, by reversing, avoid her.

If the collision is occasioned by an alteration of the course of the sailing vessel, it devolves upon her to prove the propriety or necessity of such movement.

Mere apprehension of danger, not then imminent, is not sufficient to justify a change of course by a sailing vessel meeting a steamer under way.
In an action for damages to a sailing vessel by collision with a steamer, the burden of proof lies in the first instance on the libellant.

Vessels moored, etc.
A vessel cast off from a tug in a tide-way at fault for collision with a vessel moored can recover for increased damage from the fact that the latter’s anchor was atrip.

Tugs and tows.
Tug held in fault for starting out with a tow in a tide so strong that she could not control her maneuver and was forced against a vessel lying at a pier.
A steamer is liable for a collision with a scow caused by the steamer suddenly changing her course to avoid being run into by a sailing vessel, unless it is proved that the steamer was without fault in getting into a position which made the change of course necessary. (Reversing 960)

Lookouts.
The fact that the master of a vessel was asleep at the wheel at night will not render the vessel liable where the proofs leave it doubtful whether such fact contributed to the collision.
The failure of a lookout to report a vessel which he sees is evidence of negligence in the performance of his other duties.

Particular instances of collision.
Between sail and vessel just coming to anchor off the Battery at New York, and steamer descending the river, where both were held at fault; the sail vessel for want of a look-out, and the steamer for traveling too near the shore, in the night, at too great speed.
Between steamer and schooner at sea, where both were held in fault; the former for not taking prompt measures to avoid the collision, and the latter for not seeing the steamer causing her course to change.
Between scow cast off from tug in tide-way and with a sheer and vessel at anchor, where former was held solely at fault.

Procedure.
A joint action for collision cannot be maintained in rem against one vessel and in personam against the owner of another.
Where the blame for a collision is found to lie with the libellant alone, the costs will be taxed against him.

CONFLICT OF LAWS.
Where a policy of insurance is written at the home office of the insurance company, and transmitted to an agent in another state, who had authority to receive applications for policies and payment of premiums, and through whom losses were paid, the contract is governed by the laws of the state of the domicile of the company.
Where the contract was that the purchasers should pay the sellers in England, and the contract of sale was to remit bills of exchange on England, the contract will be held to be governed by the laws of that country.

CONFUSION OF GOODS.
An agent who, without authority, mixes his principal’s goods with his own, so that he cannot distinguish them, must lose what he contributed.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.
The limitation in the fifth amendment, “when in actual service in time of war or public danger,” refers only to the militia, and does not apply to the regular land and naval forces. In respect to the latter, the power of Congress is irrespective of the actual condition of the country, and is in time of peace as in time of war or public danger.
The power of controlling navigation is incidental to the power to regulate commerce, which the constitution confines upon Congress; and, consequently, the power of Congress over the vessel is correspondent with that over the cargo.
Under the power to regulate commerce and to make the laws necessary and proper for carrying that power into effect, Congress has authority to give full protection to commerce by its criminal jurisprudence.
Statutes passed by Congress in pursuance of this power are of paramount authority, and cannot be invalidated or impaired by the action of any state or states. Any law, ordinance, or constitution made by them for that purpose is wholly nugatory, and can afford no legal protection to those who may act under it.
A state law providing that a note whose consideration is the right to make, use, or vend a patented invention, shall bear upon its face the words “given for a patent right,” and that such note shall be subject to the same defences in the hands of a third person as in the hands of the original owner, impairs the value of patent right property, and is unconstitutional.

CONTINUANCE.
If, after a plea of nil debet by the appearance bail, the principal gives special bail, and pleads the same plea, plaintiff is entitled to a continuance of course.
The court will not continue a cause for the absence of a witness who has been summoned, if no attachment has been moved for, if the witness resides within 100 miles of the place, although he resides out of the district.

CONTRACTS.
See, also, “Sale”; “Vendor and Purchaser.”
Although a letter of retraction of an offer of sale be actually on the way at the time that letter of acceptance is mailed, yet the contract is closed unless such letter of retraction be received prior to the mailing of the letter of acceptance.
A contract between the heirs contesting a will, which excluded him, and the executor, for a division of the estate between them if the heir was successful, is void against public policy.
Where, on a contract for the sale of grain, the parties do not contemplate delivery, but expect simply to settle the differences as established by future prices, the contract is void as a wager contract.
If a purchase of sale of grain for future delivery, made in the form of a contract, is in fact simply a bet or wager on differences, the form it assumes does not affect its invalidity.
A contract for the sale or purchase of grain for future delivery, legitimate on its face, cannot be held void as a wagering contract merely by showing that one of the parties so understood it. To render it void, it must be proved that both parties regarded it simply a wager on differences.
“Futs,” or the privilege, for a nominal consideration, of delivering a largecrop of grain within a certain time at a specified price, when taken of persons notori-
A custom or usage of paying debts in Confederate notes in the insurrectionary states during the war of the Rebellion was illegal, and cannot be sanctioned as of any binding force.

The performance of a contract to deliver ten of the first quality is not excused by the fact that no such lots can be obtained in the market.

In an action for damages for a breach of contract, no evidence of fraud is admissible.

On breach of a contract to haul all the stone which defendant had contracted to supply for certain work were plaintiff, after part performance, was not allowed to complete, he is entitled to recover the contract price for the material unshipped, together with the profit he would have made had he been allowed to complete the contract.

A photograph is not a print, cut, or engraving, within Act Feb. 3, 1891, § 1.

Two states may, by concurrent legislation, unite in creating the same corporate body with the same name.

Under Act Mass., March 3, 1809, providing that the "corporation may, at any legal meeting called for that purpose, assess" each share, etc., the power to assess cannot be delegated to the directors.

A by-law authorizing the directors "to take care of the interests and manage the concerns of the corporation," does not import an intention to delegate to the directors the power to lay assessments.

An unauthorized assessment of the same amount as a dividend previously declared, made payable on the same day, cannot be collected out of such dividend, without consent of the stockholder.

The capital stock of a bank is a trust fund to be paid out of the bank and where any portion of it, before the expiration of the bank charter, is divided among its stockholders without providing funds which ultimately are sufficient to pay the outstanding bank notes, the fund may be followed into the hands of the stockholders.

A bill in equity for such purpose might be maintained by some of the holders of the bank notes against some of the stockholders, the impossibility of bringing all before the court being sufficient to dispense with the ordinary rule of making all parties in interest parties.

In such case the decree against the stockholders before the court should be only for their contributory share of the debt, in the proportion which the stock held by them bore to the whole capital stock.

In New York, a receiver appointed under a judgment creditors' bill may receive unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock without a previous call by the corporation.

A stockholder may sue to enjoin the collection of a tax against the corporation, making the directors parties defendants to the bill.

A manufacturing corporation is not liable upon a note or evidence of indebtedness indorsed by an officer for the accommodation of a third person.

The authority of an officer to sign and indorse promissory notes for the company does not imply authority to sign or indorse notes for the accommodation of third persons.

In a bill against a foreign corporation by a judgment creditor for a sequestration of its property and the appointment of a receiver with power to collect unpaid subscriptions to stock, it is a sufficient statement of the amount which the undelivered subscriptions to state that they are more than sufficient to pay the judgment.

The fact that such corporation has no property in the district and no property anywhere but the demands for such unpaid subscriptions, is no objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and no defense to such suit.

As to the allowance of costs in the federal courts prior to the fee bill of 1853, see.

Act March 3, 1847, regulating costs in admiralty proceedings in rem where less than $100 is recovered, is repealed by Act Feb, 26, 1853.

Full costs will be given in an action of covenant, though the verdict be for one cent only.

Where, in a suit in equity for infringement of a patent, defendant was held to have infringed one claim, and another claim was held to be invalid, no costs were allowed to either party.

The amount of the costs of a suit in New York may be proved by parole.

The acts of congress in relation to costs in the case of a cause removed from a state court to the federal court apply only to such costs as accrue after the removal.

A bond for costs, which omits the name of the nonresident plaintiff about to institute suit, is defective, and the suit should be dismissed.

Nor can bond be given after the institution of suit, so as to prevent dismissal.

Witnesses who attend without being summoned are voluntary witnesses, and their fees cannot be taxed against the losing party.

Models of the plaintiff's patent, and procured by the defendant in good faith, may be included in the taxation of costs, but not other models.

Copies of patents, either that of the plaintiff or others, procured by the defendant, cannot be taxed as costs to the plaintiff.

A county which, in disregard of the limitation upon the power given it by statute that it be held, issuing them absolutely payable to bearer, is liable thereon to a bona fide holder for value, who bought them in the market, is an exception to the rule quoted above. 403

In the case of bonds issued in pursuance of the authority of an ambiguously worded statute, the court will adopt a liberal construction of the statute in order to sustain them, though it would have prevented their issue had application been made therefor in season. 544

An election which results unfavorably to the subscription for stock in a railway company does not exhaust the power of the county board to subscribe, but the question may again be put to vote. 1111

Comparative authority of federal and state courts: Process. 73

The law of a state in a given case may provide a mode in which a third person may intervene when his property is attached on process, and yet prevent another person maintaining a relitigating federal court, where his property is attached under process of a state court. 73

In the case of two suits between different parties having different purposes in view, commenced in courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, where possession of property which is the subject of the suit is necessary to the relief asked in each case, that court which first seizes the property acquires jurisdiction over it, to the exclusion of the other, even when the suits were commenced, or process in personam was served. 73

The court, on a bill filed by railroad bondholders to construe a trust deed and to compel trustees to take possession, or for the appointment of a receiver, on service of a subpoena and a restraining order, obtained by a suit to eject the trust property, and possession taken upon process of another court in subsequent proceedings is in contempt of the former, though the latter court first obtains actual possession. (Per Woods. C. J.) 73

Federal courts—Grounds of jurisdiction. 122

An alien assignee of a judgment obtained by a nonresident can maintain a suit thereon in the federal court, though his immediate assignor was a citizen of the same state with the defendant. 116

The mere allegation that a party is an alien is not sufficient to give jurisdiction. There must be an allegation that he is a citizen of some one foreign state. 116

In the case or a corporation, it must be alleged that all the corporators are citizens of some one or more state or states of the United States 116

A citizen of one state may sue in the federal circuit court of another state to recover acts which, if consummated, would do irreparable injury to his property in the latter state 626

If the jurisdiction be sought by making all the parties concerned in interest plaintiffs, those who are citizens of the same state with the real defendants may refuse to join in the suit, and may be made defendants 388

— Circuit courts.

The circuit court has jurisdiction to aid in enforcing the judgment of a state court. A state cannot maintain as plaintiff an action in the circuit court of another state. 116

Act Feb. 25, 1889, does not enable the federal circuit court to take parties to suit in equity which may affect a resulting interest in the subject of controversy vested in a party not before the court. 382

Where an objection for the reason that a party has been sustained at a final hearing, the court, instead of dismissing the bill, usually retains the cause, in order that he may be made a party. 331

A proceeding to bring into court a person who becomes a necessary party in consequence of an act performed by himself, after the commencement of the suit, though supplemental as to the former parties, is original as to the new party, and, though the former suit was commenced before the passage of Act May 4, 1858, it may, if afterwards instituted, be, within the meaning of the law, a suit brought under its enactment 331

Under that act, and under the previous law and practice of the circuit court in equity, a subpoena issued in such a case, out of the circuit court for either of two districts of a state or of another state, served in the other district of the same state. 331

The holder of bank notes payable to bearer is not an assessor in a choice in action within the jurisdiction act of 1789, and the jurisdiction act of 1789, limiting the jurisdiction of the circuit court 435

A foreign corporation may be sued in the Circuit Court of Cook county, Illinois, to recover damages on an agreement of its entire property 73

A foreign corporation may be sued in the Circuit Court of Cook county, Illinois, to recover damages on an agreement of its entire property 73

— District courts.

The district court in one state has no jurisdiction in personam against a citizen of another state, not served with process in the former state. 125

The 11th section of the judicial act of 1789 applies to the courts of the United States sitting in admiralty, as well as when sitting in equity and common law. 150

Jurisdiction cannot be obtained on libel in personam, in admiralty, by process of foreign attachment, where respondent, being a nonresident, is not found within the district. 150 — Administration of state laws.

The federal courts follow the rules of construction of state statutes established by the highest courts of the state. 606

On questions touching the tenure of real estate the federal courts are to be governed by the laws and decisions of the courts of the country where such real estate is situated 47

The federal circuit courts will divide the decision of the highest state court as to the admissibility of evidence and the force and effect of deeds defe-effect of deeds defectively acknowledged. 707 — Proceeding in enforcing judgments.

A state law regulating the practice of the state courts does not apply to the federal courts unless adopted by such courts or the act of Congress. 792

The federal court, in granting writs of mandamus for the purpose of compelling a municipal corporation to levy a tax, will...
CRIMINAL LAW.

See, also, "Arrest"; "Grand Jury"; "Habeas Corpus"; "Indictment and Information"; "Trespassers".

Congress has not, by the crimes acts of 1823 and 1835 (4 Stat. 175, 176), given the civil courts any jurisdiction over the crime of murder, when committed on board a United States ship of war, and before a court-martial under the navy regulations.

Quære, whether Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 11, conferring on the circuit court concurrent jurisdiction with the district court of all crimes and offenses cognizable therein, applicable to jurisdiction subsequently conferred on the district court in specific terms under the fugitive slave law.

Under the constitution, treason or other crime committed within the limits of the United States can be tried only within the state and judicial districts within which it is committed, and the accused has the right to a trial by jury in such state or district. If, therefore, the condition of such state or district be such that the federal courts there cannot or will not perform their functions, crimes committed there can not be punished by the regular administration of justice.

It is an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment, under the act of 1790 (1 Stat. 618, c. 1), for a citizen of the United States, at a time when a part of the inhabitants of the United States are in rebellion against the government, to write letters to a member of the British parliament, urging that body to acknowledge the independence of the insurgents.

In cases of misdemeanor, not only those who are present, participating in the act, but those who, though absent when the offense was committed, did procure, counsel, command, or abet others to commit it, are indictable as principals.

In a case where a jury declared that they could not agree after being kept in consultation several days, the judge gave them a binding instruction to bring in a verdict of guilty.
DAMAGES.
Sales of goods at auction are not conclusive evidence of the value of goods in an action for damages for breach of contract. 52
The damages in the case of a rotten and unseaworthy vessel brought in collision with a wharf, where the condition of the vessel was not the sole cause of the injury, are the natural and necessary consequences of the collision to the vessel in her actual state of repair. 625
The master of a vessel who willingly and knowingly carries into execution the sentence of banishment of an illegal and self-constituted body of men is liable for exemplary damages. 781
In actions of tort the motive of defendant may be inquired into to increase the compensation. 781 DEED.
See, also, "Acknowledgment."
A deed to A, in consideration of a sum of money paid, or secured to be paid, in the usual form, of a deed of bargain and sale, is to be considered as a conveyance executed, notwithstanding a covenant by the grantor "to make a patent," which can only mean to obtain one, and deliver it to the grantee. 63
Under the resolve of the legislature of New Hampshire, approved June 22, 1851, conveyances of state lands by a land commissioner may be recorded in the office of the secretary of state at any time, and take effect only on being so recorded. 553
A curative statute, passed in a state in which a deed of land in another state was improperly acknowledged, acknowledges the extraterritorially and work curatively upon the deed in such other state. 707
Rev. St., § 564, does not apply to Rev. St. Mo. c. 109, § 38, pertaining to the admissibility in evidence of certified copies of deeds for military bounty lands, nor does it abrogate the common-law mode of proving the execution of deeds. 707
DEMURRAGE.
The lien for demurrage is lost by a delivery of the cargo, and a receipt of the freight, without any agreement that it is to be held subject to the lien. A statement by the master that he should look to the cargo for the claim will not preserve the lien. 308
DEPOSITIONS.
The notice of taking the deposition under Act 1780, § 30, must be given by the magistrate before the taking of the deposition is to be taken. A notice given by the party is not sufficient. 845
The ex parte deposition of a deceased witness, not taken by consent, cannot be read in evidence. 913
Rev. St. § 564, must be strictly complied with in taking depositions de bene esse; and the witness must be sworn to testify the "whole truth" of the entire subject of the depositions, and not as to each interrogatory. 255
As to the mode of administering the oath, it is sufficient in that respect to follow the directions of the statute law of the state of the United States where the depositions were taken. 235
The deposition of a witness, on the part of the plaintiff, who had given certificates upon which a recovery was expected to be obtained, and who expected a commission of 1 per cent. on the amount to be recovered from the defendant, but which certificates were not evidence in the cause, is admissible. 55
The testimony of a witness, taken under a commission directed to five persons, or any one of them, cannot be read in evidence if another person than the commissioner, and who was not named in the commission, assisted in taking the examination of the witness. 55
Depositions under a commission issued to a place where the commissioners are prohibited executing the commission, taken according to the law of the place, in the presence of the commissioners by the judge, are admissible. 376
The certificate of commissioners who have taken a deposition that they had taken the oath prescribed in their commission, is sufficient evidence of that fact. 346
The magistrate who takes a deposition under the act of congress must certify the reasons of its being taken. 562
If all the interrogatories, either in form or substance, are not put to the witnesses, the depositions cannot be read. 376
It is no objection to reading a deposition taken abroad that the witnesses had previously been examined and cross-examined under a commission in the United States. 376 DECENT AND DISTRIBUTION.
In a suit to obtain the distribution of property which came into the hands of the administrator of an executor, where plaintiffs claimed as heirs at law and next of kin of testator, the legal representative of the testator is not a necessary party. 388
In a suit by one of the next of kin to obtain a distribution of property, the executor or administrator of a deceased next of kin, and not his devisee or heir, is made a party. 388
DETINUE.
Detinue lies against a person who has quitted the possession of property prior to the institution of suit. 521
A legal eviction or return of the property before suit will bar the action. 521 DISCOVERY.
A cross bill for discovery charging that plaintiff was a nominal one, and that the real plaintiff was a citizen of the same state with defendant, filed after the original bill was set for hearing, on information subsequently obtained, must be answered before the original suit is heard. 386
A bill of discovery must set forth a title sufficient to support or defend a suit, and pray a discovery pertinent thereto; and where it cannot be sustained as a bill of discovery, it cannot be retained for the purpose of relief, unless it makes an independent case. 841
DISTRIBUTION ATTRAINEES.

Under the provisions of Act May 18, 1842, which are made permanent by Act March 5, 1845, the district attorneys for the Northern and Southern districts of New York are entitled to the same fees that are allowed to attorneys, solicitors, and counsel in the supreme court and court of chancery of New York, according to the nature of the proceedings, for like services rendered therein.

The act of the legislature of New York abolishing all attorney and counsel fees (Laws N. Y. 1849, c. 428, § 303) does not affect the rights of those district attorneys to the rate of compensation allowed to attorneys and counsel in the supreme court of New York, as it stood at the time of the passage of that act.

Where there is an allowance in the supreme court or court of chancery of New York, according to the nature of the proceedings, for a corresponding service, the district attorney can have no other or greater compensation.

But it is not necessary, in order to entitle the district attorney to that service or fee, that a corresponding service or fee for a like service should be given to attorneys, solicitors, and counsel by an existing law of the state.

Where such corresponding service or fee is given by any existing law of the state, the usage and practice is to refer back to some prior law or rule of law regulating the fees of attorneys and counsel, wherein may be found an allowance for a corresponding service.

DIVORCE.

Alienation will not be granted to a wife before she answers.

EJECTMENT.

A warrant and survey of Pennsylvania lands, and payment of the purchase money, are sufficient to give a legal right of entry to ejectment.

An heir who enters upon the death of a tenant for life is an intruder, and not entitled to notice to quit.

Equitable estopple in pais cannot be set up as a defense to an action at law to recover the possession of real property.

The death of the lessor of the plaintiff cannot be taken advantage of upon the general issue.

A statement in the evidence upon which defendant relies to sustain his claim of ownership is irrelevant.

The defendant may allege in his answer that he is the owner of the premises in controversy, but if he couples such allegation with a statement of the grounds of his title, from which it does not appear that he is such owner, the matter may be stricken out as sham.

A statement in the evidence upon which defendant relies to sustain his claim of ownership is irrelevant.

If a defendant omits to make a defense at law, equity will not afford him relief.

If a defendant omits to make a defense at law, equity will not afford him relief.

EMBEZZLEMENT.

Charge to grand jury on the law of embezzlement by officers of national banks.

EQUITY.

See also, “Court,” “Injunction”; “Pleading in Equity,” “Practice in Equity.”

Where there is a plain and adequate remedy at law, a court of chancery has no jurisdiction.

If a defendant omits to make a defense at law, equity will not afford him relief.

In the case of a sale under a decratal order, a purchaser in equity who pays money into a covenant with surety to pay the purchase money, and has defaulted, the remedy at law is inadequate, and the equity will compel performance.
INDEX.

Parol evidence cannot be given of the contents of printed cards bearing the joint names of defendents as a proof of partnership. 119

Parol evidence cannot be given of a transfer in writing, without proof of the loss of the writing, or otherwise accounting for its nonproduction. 249

Hearsay and reputation are not admissible to prove particular facts in a contest as to private rights, so proof that a stone monument was reputed to have been put down to designate a private grant is not admissible. 650

Declaratory judgment may not be given, except in answer to evidence of other declarations of the witness, inconsistent with what he had previously sworn to. 669

Parol evidence of the declarations of an auctioneer, contrary to the written terms of sale, is not admissible, but such evidence, as to the property intended to be sold by him, is proper. 680

The private opinion of a witness as to the fraud or fairness of plaintiff's conduct, derived from facts which appeared before the witness as an arbitrator, is not admissible. 913

When a witness states the grounds of his belief of a material fact, his belief, together with the reasons of his belief, is admissible as other evidence to be left to the jury. 144

Correspondence, between the parties in a cause and others, called for by notice, but which the party who is called for does not read, cannot be read by the party producing it. 55

It is improper to question a witness as to the grounds of the jury which would constitute the ground of a separate action. 722

EXECUTION.

See, also, "Attachment"; "Bankruptcy"; "Garnishment"; "Judgment"; "Judicial Sales."

An officer leaving property levied on in the hands of the defendant subjects it to be seized upon by subsequent creditors of the defendant. 1080

An officer of another state forfeits any lien he may have on property levied on by allowing it to be taken out of the jurisdiction of the state. 1080

After the marshal has served the writ to bring the proceeds of a sale into court, he may pay it to the plaintiff on the execution, on his responsibility, for the right of the plaintiff to receive it. 647

The court will not interfere, in a summary way, to distribute money, the proceeds of an execution, or decide on the rights of those who claim it, unless the money be paid into court. 647

Where the purchaser at the sale refuses to comply with its terms, the marshal should again offer the property for sale if he has time to do so, and, if not, by a proper return, enable plaintiff to take out an alias vend. ex. 647

The marshal makes his return to process at his peril. The court will not dictate its form. 647

The return of the marshal to a writ cannot be traversed in an action between the parties to the suit in which the writ issued. 130

The court will not, on motion, discharge a prisoner for debt, who has the benefit of the bonds, because the creditor refuses to pay the daily allowance. 88

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

Letters of administration have no operation in other states except by sanction of such states. 441
INDEX.

FRAUD.

A bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration and without notice from a fraudulent grantee will hold the estate subject to the claim of the original grantor.

A plea to a bill to set aside a conveyance as having been procured by fraud, which avers that defendant is a bona fide purchaser under the original grantee, but fails to aver that he has paid the whole consideration before notice of plaintiff's claim, is bad.

Where a deed in favor of two persons is obtained by the fraud of one, though without the privity of the other, the deed is void as to both.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

An absolute bill of sale is fraudulent as to creditors, unless accompanied and followed by possession.

A parol gift bona fide made prior to the Geneva award for the destruction of a vessel by a Confederate cruiser is good as against subsequent creditors.

A parol promise by a husband to his wife for love and affection to make such a gift does not work a waiver and cannot be enforced.

A conveyance by an insolvent to his wife of personal property for a consideration of one-fifth of its value is conclusively fraudulent.

To render an antenuptial settlement void as in fraud of creditors, both parties must concur in or have notice of the intended fraud.

If the settlement is not bona fide the fact that it is made for a valuable consideration will not save it.

If the amount of property settled is extravagant, or grossly out of proportion to the station or circumstances of the husband, and he is embarrassed by debt, and the other party knows it, this, itself, is sufficient notice of fraud.

To ascertain the purpose of the grantor in a marriage settlement, evidence of fraudulent transfers by him to other persons at or about the time of the settlement is admissible.

Actual knowledge, on the part of the prospective wife, of the fraudulent purpose of the grantor in the marriage settlement, is not necessary to avoid the settlement. A knowledge of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent person, and put her on inquiry, amount to notice, and are equivalent to actual knowledge.

A deed of marriage settlement by a person in embarrassed circumstances will be set aside where the prospective wife knew of his embarrassments and demanded a marriage settlement before she would marry him.

In a court of law a deed cannot be sustained in part and avoided in part for inadequacy of consideration.

A conveyance by the husband to the wife, in consideration of the relinquishment of the right of dower of other lands worth three times as much as the dower right, is not absolutely void in a court of law.

GAMING.

See "Contracts."

GARNISHMENT.

The garnishment act of the territory of Arkansas of 1851, is not prospective.
GRAND JURY.

Grand jurors may, for cause, be challenged by any person to be affected by their finding. The right is not restricted to such persons as are in prison or under bail upon charges of crime; it may be exercised by one who, though still at large, has been warned by the prosecuting attorney of the court that he will be made, during the term, the subject of an indictment for perjury. 11571

The accused party has no right to submit evidence in his behalf to the grand jury, not even with the consent of the prosecuting attorney. 11571

The grand jury are not restricted to acting upon such cases as may be brought before them by the district attorney, but may examine any other cases, as they see fit. 090

A grand jury of the United States is limited, as to the scope of its investigations, (1) to such matters as may be called to its attention by the court; or (2) may be submitted by the district attorney; or (3) may come to the knowledge of the grand jurors in the course of their investigations of the matters thus brought before them, or from their own observations; or (4) may come to their knowledge from the disclosures of their associates on the grand jury. 992

A grand jury of the United States sitting in California has no such general authority to inspect the books of officers of the United States as is exercised by the grand juries of the state in relation to the books of the state officers. 092

Grand jurors should present no one, unless, in their deliberate judgment, the evidence before them is sufficient, in the absence of any other proof, to justify the conviction of the party accused. 998

To justify the finding of an indictment, the grand jury must believe that the accused is guilty. They should be convinced that the evidence before them, unexplained and uncontradicted, would warrant a conviction by a petit jury. 992

The district attorney has a right to be present before the federal grand jury at the time of testimony for the purpose of giving information or advice, and may interrogate the witnesses; but he has no right to be present during the deliberations of the grand jury. 992

It is the duty of the grand jurors to keep their deliberations secret. They are not at liberty to state even that they have had a particular matter under consideration. They should allow no one to question them as to their own individual actions or the actions of their associates on the grand jury. 992

It is a crime, under the act of 1872, for a person, in violation thereof, and for the purpose of influencing the action of a grand jury, to send to them any letter or communication relating to any matter pending before them, or pertaining to their duties, without a previous order of the court. 092

GRANT.

See, also, "Public Lands."

It is not necessary to produce the deed poll from the person in whose name the application was made for a tract of land, in order to support the title of the plaintiff in an ejectment for the land, the plaintiff having obtained the warrant and paid the purchase money. 62

The entry, in the books of the land office, that the balance of the purchase money was paid by the person "to whom the patent had issued," is evidence that a patent did issue, although the patent is not produced. 63

Where, a judicial measurement and delivery of a tract of land according to fixed boundaries has been made by the Mexican government, and long acquiesced in, the boundaries will not be modified, although they include a considerable quantity in excess of the amount specified in the grant. 882

The court has no jurisdiction of an appeal from the decision of the board of land commissioners where notice is not filed with the clerk within six months, as prescribed by the act of 1852. 889

Claim to Mexican land granted confirmed upon the evidence. 885

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

In all cases where an infant is a ward of chancery, no act can be done affecting the person, property, or estate of the ward, unless under the direction, expressed or implied, of the chancery court itself. 1100

HABEAS CORPUS.

When a debtor is in the prison bounds, the court will not award a habeas corpus to discharge him on the ground that his creditor has refused to pay his daily allowance. 146

Courts will refuse the writ where no probable ground of relief is shown in the petition, or where it appears that petitioner is duly committed for felony or treason plainly expressed in the warrant of commitment. 288

But where probable ground is shown that the party is in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, and is imprisoned without just cause, and therefore has a right to be delivered, the writ of habeas corpus then becomes a writ of right, which may not be denied. 288

Where the service of the writ was prevented by force, it was ordered to be placed on the files of the court to be served when and where practicable. 288

HOMESTEAD.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

Where a person has acquired a right to a rural homestead under the Texas laws, the subsequent extension of the limits of a city, so as to embrace a part thereof, does not affect such right. 835

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

In the absence of consent on the part of her husband, a wife cannot dispose of her personal property by will during his lifetime. 1088

Where a husband voluntarily abandoned his wife and neglected to provide for her, she may dispose of any property she may have subsequently acquired in such manner as she may please. 1088

Where a woman, during coverture, makes a contract in reference to her separate estate, and subsequently, after the death of her husband, promises to pay the same, she is liable. 964

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION.  Page 958

The offense need not be called by its statutory name where it is set out in its proper terms.

INFANCY.  Page 840

Infancy cannot be given in evidence upon a plea of nil debet to an action of debt on a promissory note in Virginia.

See, also, "Patents."

At the time of granting an order to show cause against a motion for a preliminary injunction, an immediate restraining order may be granted, to be in force until the decision of the motion, for the purpose of preventing irreparable injury to complainant. (Rev. St. §§ 718, 4221.)

Reasonable notice is required to be given to the defendant of the time and place of moving for an injunction. 226

The provision of the judiciary act of 1799 requiring reasonable notice of a motion for a preliminary injunction is repealed by Act June 22, 1874.

The defendant will be heard in opposition to the motion, and is permitted to file his answer.

Affidavits will be received in behalf of both parties on application for an injunction.

An injunction will be refused when there has been a failure to file a bill in equity, as there is, in such a case, nothing upon which a motion for an injunction can rest.

A judgment in attachment will be enjoined if defendant had no actual notice, and had a good defense, and his failure to make defense was owing, not to any fault or negligence on his part, but to the fault of the plaintiff.

Mere negligence in an attorney, unaccompanied by fraudulent combination or conspiracy, is not sufficient to arrest a judgment at law.

A suit will lie to restrain the collection of an unlawful tax against a corporation, the remedy at law being inadequate.

A rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue for breach of an injunction in the federal courts in the proper practice, but a motion should be made, on notice, that defendant stand committed for the breach.

Where an injunction has been dissolved, and afterwards reinstated, and is still pending, no suit can be maintained on the injunction bond as for a breach of it.

INSOLVENCY.  Page 856

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

A discharge of a debtor, under a state insolvent law, does not discharge a debt due from an insurer to another at the time the insolvent proceedings take place, and who does not become a party to such proceedings.

A discharge is an absolute extinguishment before the proceedings makes no difference.

An agreement in the policy that no action should be sustainable at law or equity until arbitration shall have determined what amount is due is not unlawful, and in such cases, a discharge under the insolvent law of one state bars an action for a debt contracted in another.

INSURANCE.  Page 301

See, also, "Marine Insurance."

A policy lapses by failure to pay a premium in advance as it becomes due unless the course of dealing between the agent and the insured has been such as to induce a belief that there is no liability for the exchange of individual accounts between such persons.

Under Act Mass. 1861, c. 130, it is provided that if a mistake is made, the amount paid could be obtained after forfeiture of the policy by failure to pay a premium.

The right of an insurance company to recover on a policy under the policy and Act Mass. 1861, c. 186, is a property right which survives to the representatives.

Equity could not relieve against the failure to submit notice of the claim and proof of death within 90 days, as provided by the policy, although the original policy had been forfeited therefor, though this failure resulted from ignorance of the existence of the policy.

A representation in an application for an insurance policy that the applicant is "sober and temperate" does not mean that he totally abstains from the use of intoxicating liquors, or that he has not been drunk on some occasions. It means, rather, that he is temperate in the use of spirituous liquors, not addicted to their excessive use.

Under a policy conditioned to be void in case the insured should "die by his own hand," there is no liability if the insured kills himself while in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, and from anger, pride, jealousy, or a desire to escape from the ill of life.

If, however, his reasoning faculties are so far impaired that he is not able to understand the moral character, the moral nature, consequences, and effect of his act, or if he was impelled thereto by an insane impulse, which he had not the power to resist, the insurer is not liable.

Neither an act of suicide, nor an attempt to commit suicide, creates a presumption of insanity that would be sufficient to justify a jury in finding a person insane; but such an act may be considered, in connection with the previous conduct of the person, as evidence of insanity.

The declarations of the insured husband, made after the date of the policy, as to his health existing, or matters of private history occurring, prior to the date of the policy, are not admissible as evidence in a suit by the wife upon her policy.

Forfeitures provided for in policies are for the benefit of a policyholder, and may be waived by it.

A forfeiture will be considered as waived where, subsequent to its accruing, the insurance company, with knowledge of the facts, waives the contract as still subsisting, and manifests an intent not to take advantage of the forfeiture, and does not insist on the duty of the insurer indicating a purpose to claim it.

An agreement in the policy that no action should be sustainable at law or equity until arbitration shall have determined what amount is due is not unlawful, and in such cases, a discharge under the insolvent law of one state bars an action for a debt contracted in another.

JUDGMENT.

Rendition and entry.
The act of the circuit clerk in filing the docket transcript of a judgment is a ministerial act, and not void though done on a nonjudicial day, and the judgment creditors thereby acquired a lien upon the real estate of the judgment debtor, in the same as if done at any other day. Relief against: Opening: Vacating.
At common law a judgment cannot be set aside on motion after the term at which it was rendered. The contrary rule in New York is not followed by the federal courts. 444
A general allegation of difficulty in procuring vouchers, or of unavoidable delay in settling up at an accounting, without stating from what circumstances that difficulty and delay arose, is not sufficient ground of objection to a judgment at law. 105
Equity will not relieve against a judgment at law, upon pleno administrativ, on the ground that the defendant at law could not produce vouchers to support his plea, unless there be in the bill an allegation of fraud, mistake, surprise, or accident. 104

Of different jurisdictions.
A judgment against the plaintiff in an action does not preclude the court of another state from examining the question whether the plaintiff is a citizen of the state of the plaintiff, or by some other persons in her name and without her knowledge or consent. 476

JUDICIAL SALES.
See, also, “Equity.”
A purchaser on a sale under a decrétal order in equity will not be set off from his purchase by submission to a forfeiture of his deposit. 458

In the case of a covenant with surety to pay the purchase money given by the purchaser, a court of equity will by attachment compel performance as against both principal and surety. 458

The surety in a covenant by the purchaser at a sale under a decrétal order to pay the purchase money cannot take any exceptions to the title where the principal has failed to do so. 458

Defendant may attack plaintiff’s general character in respect to the subject-matter of the charge in order to reduce the damages. 692

LIENS.
See “Admiralty”; “Bankruptcy”; “Maritime Liens”; “Mechanics’ Liens”; “Shipping.”
MARINE INSURANCE.

Where the policy contained the clause “to add an additional premium if by vessels rating lower than A5,” and the cargo was shipped in a vessel with a lower rating, the insured could recover, in case of loss, the value agreed in the policy, less such additional premium beyond the agreed per cent, as the underwriters might deem adequate for the increased risk.

A deviation, under the direction of the master and last remaining officer when dying, in order to place the vessel in charge of the American consul, is excusable.

A deviation for water, where the necessity really and fairly existed, and a sufficient quantity was originally taken on board, and the port at which the vessel puts in is the nearest, is justifiable.

The act of an American consul in whose hands a vessel is placed by the crew, after the death of all the officers at sea, in changing her cargo so as to lighten her, is not chargeable to the insured, and is no defense to the policy, unless the vessel was actually overloaded.

The same rule applies to the appointment of a British master by the American consul which increased the risk, making the vessel a good prize had she been armed in a French cruiser.

MARITIME LAW.

See also, “Admiralty.”

The admiralty law cognizable in the federal courts is not the civil law of the Roman government, but the admiralty law of Great Britain.

Independent of Act Feb. 26, 1845, under the constitution, the maritime law of the United States has the same application to cases upon the lakes as upon tide waters.

MARITIME LIENS.

See also, “Admiralty”; “Affreightment”; “Bottomry and Respondentia”; “Demurrage”; “Shipping.”

The right to a lien.

A maritime lien is a jus in re, constituting an incumbrance on the property, and existing independent of the process used to execute it.

Material men have a lien for repairs under the admiralty law only in the case of foreign ships, or ships belonging to other states.

A lien arises under the maritime law for materials and labor furnished in repairing a vessel in a foreign port.

The ports of the different states belong to each other, within the meaning of the admiralty law in relation to liens.

No lien arises under the maritime law for materials furnished at the instance of the owner to a vessel in her home port.

A lien arises for water casks furnished on the credit of a foreign ship.

A lien arises for a diving bell, air pump, and other apparatus supplied a vessel which were not necessary for her use as a navigating ship, but were indispensable for the accomplishment of the enterprise in which she was about to engage.

Where a British ship was adjudged forfeited to the United States, and was ordered sold by the marshal, but the purchaser failed to comply with his contract, so that a subsequent sale was necessary, held, that the vessel was subject to a maritime lien in the hands of the last purchaser for materials and labor expended in making repairs between the dates of the two sales. 529
Where a mortgage for materials furnished, the lien is discharged, or it does not attach 909
By the law of Great Britain, the master has no right, even in a foreign port, to pledge his vessel for necessaries, or create a lien thereon by any other form of hypothecation than a formal bottomry bond. 501
The question of a lien on a British vessel which puts into a Danish port in distress for advances to make repairs must be determined by the law of Great Britain. 601
Where a vessel, while undergoing repairs in a foreign port, is sold to her master, who resides in such port, held, that a lien arose for such repairs under the general admiralty laws 134
Where a person takes drafts from the master, pledging the vessel for the amount, for repairs in a port of distress, with knowledge of a letter from the owners limiting the master's authority, he has no lien on the vessel 497, 501
The fraud of the agent of a vessel and the owner in a port of distress in making out fraudulent accounts against the vessel for repairs will not invalidate drafts drawn for such payments, and expressed to be recoverable against the vessel, freight, and cargo, in the hands of a person who, without knowledge of the fraud, discounted them 497, 501
The record of a mortgage in the office of the collector is not constructive notice to material and repair men. 134
Priority and enforcement. Maritime liens have priority over mortgages 939
A lien for materials and repairs will have priority over a mortgage owned by one who was presented to the material and repair men as a part owner of the ship, and who, by his bearing, himself confirmed the impression that he was one of the owners. 134
The party claiming a lien on a vessel for materials must show that the contract under which they were furnished had reference to some particular vessel, in the construction or repair whereof such materials were to be used 881
A material man whose lien is discharged by the giving of credit is still entitled, upon petition, to be paid out of remains and surplus in the registry 909
Waiver: Discharge: Extinction. A lien against a vessel is waived, as against a purchaser, where the claimant, of whom inquiries are made by the purchaser, is silent as to his claim. 444
A maritime lien is not diverted by the death of the owner of the vessel and the representation by the administrator of the insolvency of his estate. 873
Lien under state laws. The statute of Maine conferred on mechanics and material men such a lien on domestic vessels as the general admiralty law imposed on them on foreign vessels 873
A trench excavated in front of the launching gangs of a ship for the purpose of deepening the water is not labor performed in launching the vessel, within Act May 30, 1855, c. 533, giving a lien where vessels for such labor 604
The lien given by the law of the state of New York, for repairs to a domestic ves-SEL has priority over a mortgage on the vessel given before the repairs were made. 34, 36

The rights of a creditor having a lien against a vessel under Rev. St. Act No. c. 125, § 35, are paramount to the rights of the general creditors under the laws of the state regulating the distribution of the proceeds of deceased insolvent debtors 877

MARSHAL.
The marshals, being called upon by the court to bring before them any defendant arrested by him upon any original writ or mesne process, according to the tenor of his return, and failing so to do, will, on motion, be amerced to the amount of the debt, or damages and costs, and judgment will be entered thereon, nisi, the second day of the next term. 343
The legality of the service of subpoenas made by a deputy, and his right to fees, is not affected by the failure of the marshal to make a return of the appointment of such deputy to the district judge within 373
A deputy marshal is not entitled to charge for service or mileage for himself as a witness. 373
The fees for a service by a deputy marshal legally belong to the marshal, and his receipt for them operates as a discharge from liability for such service. 373
The deputy's remedy for compensation for services performed by him is against the marshal for whom he performed the services 373

MECHANICS' LIENS.
Under the mechanic's lien law of the District of Columbia, no extra work not completed within three months preceding the filing of the claim in the clerk's office is covered by the lien. 972
Under the rule that payments made by a debtor should be applied to the debt least secured, general payments by a debtor, not directed by him to be applied to the contract specifically, may be applied to the extra work, whether completed within the three months or not, provided such extra work was completed and the money due for it 972

MILITIA.
A justice of the peace in the District of Columbia is not an officer of the government of the United States, under Act May 8, 1792, and is liable to militia duty 535

MORTGAGES.
See, also, "Chattel Mortgages": "Shipping."
A covenant by a debtor with a creditor to purchase certain lands and then mortgage them to him, will be enforced in a court of equity by a decree of sale. 699
A third person who advances the purchase price for a settler on public lands, taking the receiver's certificate of location as security for payment, and giving back bond for a deed upon repayment, will be held a mortgagee, and the settler or his assigns may redeem. 699
A deed absolute in form may be shown to have been really a mortgage, by the oral testimony of two witnesses, against the de-etails of the agreement those deeds are not satisfactory in themselves, and are accompanied with admissions that some confidential relations existed between the parties, not consistent with the terms of the deed. 741

Under the Indiana Code of 1838, a neglect to record a mortgage prior to the prescribed time did not invalidate it, except as to a subsequent bona fide purchaser or mortgagee, whose claim under the mortgage was first recorded. 748

In Oregon a mortgage is a mere security, and the mortgagee, both before and after copies of the instrument are broken, subject to the lien of the mortgage, and he cannot be deprived of the possession of the same by his will otherwise than by foreclosure and sale. 398

A mortgagee has no right or authority to take possession of the mortgaged premises and hold the same for the satisfaction of his debt, without the consent of the mortgagee. 898

A mortgage given to secure the payment of four promissory notes made to raise means to work a plantation is valid, and, upon the negotiation of the notes, relates back to the date of execution. 811

A mortgage to secure advances not to exceed a certain amount is good as security to the full amount of the advances made in excess of such amount, diminished by partial payments on account executed as a substitute for a preceding one, the former will at once cease to have any validity or effect. 752

A mortgage or deed of trust made as security for a debt will operate as a security for the same continuing debt, though the evidence of it be changed by renewal or otherwise. 752

A mortgagee of lands to which the mortgagee has no present title is entitled in equity to the benefit of an after-acquired title. 699

A mortgage given to secure a debt due and payable, no time of payment being specified, may be redeemed or foreclosed at any time. 699

Junior mortgagees may foreclose without making prior mortgagees parties, but a sale in such case will be subject to the prior mortgage. 850

A general notice calling mortgagees to present their claims will not make them parties or bind them, but they must be served with process or voluntarily appear. 850

Where the court has taken possession of the property by the appointment of a receiver in a suit by junior mortgagees, the senior mortgagees cannot gain possession by a suit subsequently begun until the first is decided. 859

In a suit by assignees of a note and mortgage, if the assignment is denied it must be proved. 748

The presumption of redemption is released after 20 years' possession by a mortgagee does not apply to a case where the mortgagee was in possession under an absolute deed, with an agreement that the mortgagee might redeem, and could not be found to have been specific in time being fixed, and the mortgagee having no notice or request to redeem. 741

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

See, also, "Counties"; "Railroad Companies."

Under the authority to issue bonds in payment of a subscription to be made payable to "the president and directors of the railroad company, and their successors and assigns," bonds made payable to "the railroad company or bearer" are valid. 544

Negotiable paper, the proceeds from which are to be devoted to a law authorizing their issue, which recites that the conditions required by law have been complied with, are unimpeachable in the hands of an innocent holder for value. 544

A city, which has power to borrow money and has issued bonds therefor, which were void because unauthorized and the holder, is liable to the purchaser of such bonds or his assignee, for money had and received, for the amount actually paid to the corporation for the bonds, with simple interest thereon. 442

In the absence of constitutional restrictions, a legislature may authorize a municipal corporation to aid in the building of a railroad in which the inhabitants are interested, and such authority may be given with or without the assent of the qualified electors of the municipality. 544

A clause in a state constitution requiring the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters to the giving of aid to railroad companies does not apply where a debt has already been incurred for that purpose, and the legislature may thereupon authorize the issue of bonds to pay therefor, without submitting the question to the people. 544

Proceedings on an inquiry under Act March 3, 1805, in relation to opening, extending, and regulating streets in Washington county, D. C. 676

A municipal corporation has no authority to take upon itself the burden of requiring a road or bridge in which the public as well as the corporation are interested, when the same is outside the limits of said corporation. 1063

NAVIGABLE WATERS.

See, also, "Bridges."

Under the power to regulate commerce, congress have power to prevent the obstruction of any navigable river which is a means of commerce between states. 628

The paramount right of the public to use a navigable river as a highway and to prevent the state legislature, in the absence of a conflicting enactment of congress, from authorizing, controlling, or carrying out public improvements upon the stream, although they may involve a partial obstruction or considerable detention to navigation. 603

Under the constitution and laws of Wisconsin, any obstruction to the use of a navigable stream by the public for purposes of navigation, which is erected without a constitutional legislative authority, is a nuisance, and liable to be abated either at the suit of an individual or at the instance of the state. 503

The right to cross a navigable water by a railroad bridge must be given by the sovereign power, by a special or general act. 626

Where a company is authorized to construct a railroad between two points, "over" a navigable water, a right to construct a bridge over that water is implied, as a necessary means of carrying into effect the power granted. 626

The decision of the acting commissioner of the board of public works, under the Ohio statutes, approving the plan or location of a proposed bridge over navigable waters, is final and conclusive. 626

NAVY.

NE EXEAT.

A ne exeat bond only binds the sureties to the extent of the final decree, and if defense is not substantially made in the district, according to the condition of the bond, they will be discharged all together. 913

NEGLECT.

Section 12 of the act of 1838 (5 Stat. 304), which declares that every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on board any steam vessel, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to duty the lives of any persons on board may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, makes the negligence, etc., in question, a crime, when followed by the consequences which ensue; with certain motive or intent on the part of the persons charged. 900

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Act April 20, 1818, § 6 (3 Stat. 449), forbidding military expeditions by individuals against countries with which the United States are at peace, commented on. 1017

To constitute the offense of beginning or setting on foot, or aiding or abetting in the preparation against a friendly power, within section 6, it is not necessary that the expedition shall be actually set on foot. It is sufficient if such preparation are made for it as show an intent to set it on foot. 1019

Any combination of individuals to carry on the war, or the preparation of any warlike instrument, within the meaning of the statute, and the contribution of money or anything else which shall tend to such combination may be a violation of the statute. 1021

To “provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise,” within the meaning of section 6, such preparation must be made as shall aid the expedition. The contribution of money, clothing for the troops, provisions, arms, or any other contribution which shall tend to forward the expedition or add to the comfort or maintenance of those engaged in it, is a violation of this provision. 1018, 1021, 1023

The overt act is not an invasion of a foreign country, but taking the incipient steps in the enterprise, such as providing the means for the expedition, furnishing munitions of war or money, enlisting men, and, in short, doing anything and everything that is necessary to the commencement and prosecution of the enterprise. 1020, 1021

Where a privateer was illegally fitted out and commissioned in this country by the French minister, but was afterwards dismantled and her register canceled, then sold to a foreigner, and fitted out and commissioned in a foreign port, held, that her proceedings under the latter commission were in violation of the neutrality law. 7

To constitute the offense of accepting and exercising a commission to serve against a foreign prince, state, etc., with whom the United States are at peace, under the first section of the act of congress, some overt act under the commission must be done, such as raising men for the enterprise, collecting provisions, munitions of war, or any other act which shows an exercise of the authority which the commission was supposed to confer. 1018

NEW TRIAL.

Where a jury has had a case before it and disagreed, a second trial cannot be had by another jury from the residue of the panel. The case must go over, in order that it may be tried on a new venire. 103

In granting a new trial for defects in the charge, the court will make it a condition that the verdict shall stand until another shall be rendered. 913

NIUANCE.

A person who owns properties, such as tanneries and mills, located upon a navigable stream, for which he depends in part for his trade, may sue to enjoin the obstruction of the navigation of the bay in which the river empties by a private corporation, where the same would injure his trade. 623

It is an indissoluble offense to inflict punishment on a servant or slave, to the annoyance or nuisance of citizens whose pleasure or business carry them near the scene of infraction. 1087

The question of nuisance or no nuisance is one of fact, exclusively for the jury to decide. 1087

OBSTRUCTING JustICE.

Act April 30, 1790, making it a misdemeanor to willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose an officer of the United States in serving or executing any process or warrant which embraces every legal process whatsoever, whether issued by a court in session, or by a judge or magistrate, or acting in the due administration of any law of the United States. 953

Any obstruction to the free action of an officer or his assistants in the service of process, willfully placed in their way, is sufficient to constitute the offense. Actual or threatened violence is not necessary. 953

The provisions of Act 1790, § 22, apply equally to the execution of process under the fugitive slave law. 1013

PARTIES.

The court will not make a decree, the execution of which would affect the right of a party not before it, or throw a cloud upon his title; and where such party is necessary to a final decree the bill should be dismissed without prejudice. 844

In the case of a bill against a banking corporation, to account for certain property held by them, as collateral security for debts due them from a third person, and to apply the surplus, after satisfying themselves, to the plaintiff for debt, the debtor is a necessary party to the bill. 116

A state which is an indorser of bonds secured by a statutory mortgage is not a necessary party to a suit brought by holders of the bonds to foreclose the mortgage. 850

In a suit by a creditor of a corporation to reach a fund which has been distributed among its stockholders, all the stockholders need not be made parties, the impossibility of bringing all before the court being sufficient to dispense with the ordinary rule of making all persons in interest parties. 495

In suits in rem or admiralty, all persons having claims of a like nature against the thing may join in a single libel for the purpose of having the question decided, whether the claims arise from tort or contract. 879 PARTNERSHIP.

A partner in a milling firm, who permits his co-partner to hold the firm out as a dealer in grains by the use of cards and letter heads indicating such business, will be liable on contracts for the sale and purchase of grain for future delivery, made in the name of the firm. 331

A partner's liability may be proved by evidence of general reputation. 119

PARTY WALLS.

A party wall, though built wholly on one lot, after it has remained there 12 years cannot be pulled down by the owner of such lot and rebuilt on the surveyed line. 139

Where a nine-inch party wall is torn down, it cannot be rebuilt by a 14-inch party wall. 139

Where the defendant built a party wall in the erection of his adjoining store, and is put to necessary expense in making the party wall fit for his use, the jury, in assessing the damages, may take into consideration such extra expense, unless the party, or those under whom he claims, waived the defects. 1073

PATENTS.

The commissioner of patents.

The chief clerk is the acting commissioner as well in the necessary absence of the head of the office as in case of a vacancy de jure. 577

Patentability.

The word "useful" (Act 1830, § 6) is used merely in contradistinction to what is frivolous or mischievous. 397, 1060

The result alone, even when shown to be mechanical, useful, and beneficial to the public, in the manufacture of a better article, is not sufficient evidence of novelty and invention. 789

A mere principle may be the subject of a patent, where embodied and applied so as to afford some result of practical utility in the arts and manufactures. 367

The date of invention is the time when the patentee conceives the idea of doing the thing in substantially the way in which he patents it. 507

The true test of invention is not whether an ordinary mechanic can make the combination, if it is suggested, but whether he would make the combination without suggestion, by means of his ordinary knowledge. 507

The principle or essential characteristic of an invention involves two elements: (1) The object attained; (2) the means by which it is obtained. 255

The claim of the art of cutting ice by means of an apparatus worked by any other power than human claim of an abstract principle, and void. 723

The application to railway carriages of an improvement in axles or bearings which was well known as applied to other carriages, held not patentable. 259

A new and improved method of producing a useful result or effect is as much the subject of a patent as an entire new machine. 367

The fact that the invention was not made in a machine which anticipates the patented invention did not understand nor have in view the particular advantage of, or function performed by, such feature as to prevent its invalidating the patent. 489

Prior machines relied upon to defeat a subsequent patent must have been working machines, which have either done work or been capable of doing it. They must not be mere experiments, afterwards abandoned. 507

The substitution in a solar microscope of a photographic lens for a microscopic lens is patentable, if the latter did not produce the effect or perform the functions of the former. 549

An invention of a flour paste containing corrosive sublimate to prevent putrefaction, but in such small quantities in proportion to the flour that its poisonous and corrosive qualities are neutralized by the flour and the paste thus rendered innocuous, is not anticipated by a flour paste in which a larger proportion of corrosive sublimate was used for the purpose of making the paste poisonous and corrosive. 556

Where an anticipating device has been changed, so that by the change the thing which is produced is practically a new structure, the new device, though subsidiary to the former one, is patentable. 907

A ruffle made by machinery at one operation, which theretofore required two or more, is not for that reason patentable. 610

A patent for a design for a reel, consisting of the making of the reel in the shape of a well-known mathematical figure,—the reel itself, as an article of manufacture, being old,—is not valid, under Act March 2, 1891, § 11. 612

A patent for cooked meat put up in a solid form, in its natural state, without disintegration or desiccation, in hermetically sealed packages, cannot be sustained as a new article of commerce. 251

The method of cutting up meat, preparing it with antisepctic, preserving in cans, pressing afterwards, and then hermetically sealing the cans, is not patentable, for want of novelty. 251

The rule that a claim for a combination of old instrumentalities in a machine is not anticipated by a prior invention in which the combination or equivalent instrumentalities appears, when the inventor of the second patent has changed the mechanism so as to produce new and valuable results, stated. 43

The previous construction of a machine relatively to that of a patent, but which proved unsatisfactory in operation, and was therefore abandoned, does not operate as an anticipation of the patent. 261

A combination, to be patentable, must disclose something new, either in the combination itself or in the result achieved. 517

Who may obtain patent.

It is not the person who has produced an idea, but he who has embodied it in a practical machine, and reduced it to practical use, who is entitled to protection. 273

The original inventor of a machine, who has reduced his invention to practice, is entitled to a priority of patent right, although subsequently the same machine may have been invented by another person. 491

The fact that another first conceived the idea and embodied it in a machine will not prevent a later inventor obtaining a patent, where the former abandoned his experiments before the machine was perfected.

An inventor who does not reduce his invention to practice, or apply for a patent till after 18 months, others in the meantime having invented the same thing, and reduced it to practice, cannot recover for a breach of his patent.

Prior public use or sale.

Experimental use to ascertain the utility, value, or success of the thing invented by practice is not fatal to a patent.

The mere using by the inventor of his patent in trying experiments, or by his neighbors, with his consent, as an act of kindness, for any purposes only, will not destroy his right to a patent therefor.

A prior public use for which the inventor's right to a patent much appear to have been with his knowledge and consent.

Prior description or foreign patent.

If a previous patent so far describes a mode of covering by a subsequent patent that any mechanic of ordinary skill could, from the description in the first patent, construct or supply the essential parts of the mechanism described in the second patent, the latter is void.

If the description in the foreign publication is fully as definite as the specifications in the application for the patent in this country, it is sufficient to defeat the patent.

A foreign patent is not admissible as evidence to anticipate an American patent of a prior date, to the exclusion of the foreign patent.

Abandonment: Laches.

Loss of means by one of two joint inventors, rendering him unable to prosecute his plans in respect to the invention, combined with the assurance of his co-inventor that when the latter should move in the matter of procuring a patent the former should have an equal interest therein, held to excuse laches.

Where an invention has not been abandoned to the public, and has not been in public use or on sale with the consent and allowance of the inventor, no lapse of time will affect its validity when granted.

Caveat.

Where a caveat is precise and definite in every detail, and the application does not vary therefrom, the patentee cannot claim that the caveat protected anything more.

A caveat will protect only one of several distinct patentable subjects falling within its general scope, though, in connection with other circumstances, it may furnish strong proof of his claim to priority in another invention in the same line.

Application and issue: Interference.

A joint patent may be issued to two persons, where each has invented a distinct improvement on the same machine, the object sought to be attained being a unit, and the legal effect in both to vest in each of them a joint interest in both improvements.

A single patent cannot be taken for two machines which conduct to the same common purpose and object, though they are each separately completed and independent objects.

The fact that the first inventor of a new and useful improvement has not in its specifications described the same with the clearness and particularity required by the statute as a condition of obtaining a patent will not aid a subsequent inventor upon an interference between them.

The objection that one of two parties, who claim as joint inventors, is not in the evidence to have been in fact a joint inventor with the other, is not available to the unsuccessful party in an interference proceeding.

The deposition of one not a party to the interference, tending to show that he was a joint inventor with one of two parties who are claiming as joint inventors, and that the other had no part in it, though not admissible to establish the other claim, may yet be considered as affecting the rights of the joint applicants.

Declarations of a party to an interference at any time before the contest arose, describing his invention, are admissible from necessity, and as part of the res gestae, for the purpose of showing what he had invented at the date of such declarations.

A party who, pending an interference proceeding, assigns all his interest in the subject-matter, to a mere nominal party, is nevertheless incompetent to testify therein.

A party to an interference, necessary, be allowed by his own oath to prove the loss out of his own custody of a paper as a foundation for proving by other testimony the contents thereof.

In the case of a joint invention, the deposition of one of the inventors alone may be received to show the facts of which he had made.

Appeals from commissioners' decisions.

Where the commissioner's refusal to grant a patent is based upon want of novelty, the judge cannot consider the reason of appeal which is occupied mainly in a description of the object and importance of the machine, and of the comparative merits of the applicant's machine and a prior machine, which the commissioner has cited as an anticipaton.

Reasons of appeal which state "that the decision is in opposition to a clear apprehension of the merits of the case"; "that the decision is in opposition to the arguments of the applicant," affirm to precedents which have governed such cases; and "that the decision is adverse to the opinion of skillful and competent men," held too vague and indefinite to raise any question for the judge to pass upon.

Upon an appeal in an interference proceeding the judge is not confined to the mere question of priority, but has jurisdiction to determine the question of the patentability of the alleged invention.

Validity.

When necessary to make the description of an improvement to a machine understood by a person in the trade to which it belongs, the whole machine must be described.

In such case the patentee must distinguish the part he claims, to prevent the patent being void for ambiguity.

The mechanical parts, principles, or combinations not claimed as new, but previously stated in the specification, are admitted to be old, and need not be so stated or particularly described.

Where a patentee describes old known devices as a part of his invention, and they are essential to his improvement, the patent is invalid.

An inventor is bound to describe, in his specification, in what his invention consists, and what his particular claim is. But he is not bound to any precise form of words, provided their import can be clearly ascertained by fair interpretation, even though the construction may be inaccurate. 723

A signature to the patent, and the certificate of copies, by a person calling himself "notary," if not assented to on its face in controversies between the patentee and third persons, as the law recognizes an acting commissioner of patents. 572

The mistake in a patent may be corrected by the commissioner who granted it without a resubmission or resubmission, where it is material the letters cannot operate except on cases arising after the correction is made. 572

The correction of a clerical mistake operates from the date of the original patent. 577

The sanction of the secretary of state to the correction of a clerical mistake in letters patent may be given by a separate writing. 577

The omission to take the oath or pay the fee will not render the patent void when granted. 1060

Drawings annexed to a patent issued under the act of 1837 form no part of the specification, where no drawings were annexed to the original patent. 258

Extent of claim. Where a patent is for a peculiar combination or arrangement of old devices, and not for a new device, the patentee is not entitled to insist upon mechanical equivalents. 806

The inventor of an improvement cannot entitle himself to a patent more broad than his invention. 491

The patent is not for a principle or a principle, but for the means described for accomplishing the result. 295

Repeal of patent. Where a scire facias is ordered to be issued against a patentee under Act Feb. 21, 1793, to repeal a patent, the court will not restrain the United States to be substituted as plaintiffs in place of the petitioner. 485

Reissue: Disclaimer. Upon a reissue of a patent, the petition for such a reissue may be granted. If he had known how. 217

A reissue of the original patent anything of his invention is warranted by the description contained in the specification and the drawings connected with it. 549

In a reissued patent the patentee need not claim all that was claimed in the original patent. 1060

The reissue of a patent granted by the patentee at the request of the assignees, and a reissue to the patentee, who unilaterally terms the patent that assignee to the original patent, though irregular, does not vitiate the reissue. 298

The decision of the commissioner of patents in respect to accepting a surrender of an old patent, and granting a new one, is not reexamined elsewhere, unless it appear on the face of the patent that has exceeded his authority. 593

In the case of a joint patent the joint patentees are not affected by the decision of the commissioner of patents, nor is it necessary to question upon an application for a reissue. 217

Extension: Renewal. A reissue granted to an assignee may be extended to the patentee. In judgment of law, a reissue is only a continuation of the original patent. 1000

A notice of an application to extend the original patent is a sufficient notice of an application for the extension of a renewal in the United States. 1060

An extension of the term of the patent may be granted to the administrator of the patentee. 352

On a surrender and extension, the new letters may be issued with an amended specification. 567

A patent surrendered and renewed operates as from the commencement of the original patent, except as to causes of action arising before the renewal. 572

The functions of the commissioner in extension cases are judicial, and his judgment settles conclusively all questions of notice. 1080

Act July 4, 1830, applies to patents issued before its passage, and a prior assignee of an original term is entitled to the benefit of an extension where the contract provides that any alteration or renewal should accrue to the benefit of the party paying. 253

The assignee or grantee under the original patent does not acquire any right under the extended patent unless such right is expressly conveyed to him by the patentee. 586

A person using under license patented machines during the original term is entitled to continue the use of the identical machine during an extended term. 565

The assignee of the territorial right to make, construct, and use the patented article may, during the term of its subsequent extension, continue to use and repair the patented articles, where patented articles are not produced by the party taking under the extended patent, waives any rights which he had to use such machines when the first term expired. 617

Assignment. An assignment of a patent by one or more administrators is valid. 367

A patentee cannot, by a surrender of his patent, affect the rights of third persons, to whom he has previously assigned his interest in the whole or a part of the patent, unless the assignees consent to the surrender. 593

License. Under a license to use the patented machine in certain territory, the licenee may build more than one machine, but is open to use both at one time. 565

A clause in a license restricting the use of the invention within a certain territory, and the sale of the product therein, is not repugnant to the concluding clause that the licenee "has all the rights" which the patentee has in said territory. 561

Under a license to run a patented machine, with the restriction that the product should not be made for others by persons to be carried out of a specified territory and resold as an article of merchandise, the product cannot be sold out of the territory, or sold to persons to be carried out of that territory. 215

A license to manufacture and sell carriage and similar articles, with the proviso that the same should not be made by others, is not repugnant to the concluding clause that the licensees should not be able to sell, does not prohibit the licensees from procuring the patented fixtures to be made by others. 483

A license to run a patented machine may be assigned, and the assignee must perform the conditions which the assignor prejudices. 227

A violation of a patent does not work a forfeiture of a license under the patent, except where the licensee has assumed such a hostile attitude towards the patent as to amount to a repudiation of the right conveyed by the license.

The forfeiture of a license may be enforced according to its terms, by reason of the abandonment or neglect of the licensee. If a license gives notes payable at different times under the agreement that the license should be void if any of the notes should become due and unpaid, the license is forfeited the moment a note becomes due and is unpaid; and it is optional with the licensor either to suffer the license to remain in force or to treat the license as forfeited, and enjoy the further use of the patented machine.

Where, in such a case, the licensor applied for an order of the court, an order was made granting it, unless the licensee should, within 60 days, pay the amount of the note and other unpaid notes, with costs.

Where a license is revoked, and the licensee is sued as an infringer, he is at liberty to avail himself of any defense ordinarily open to any defendant charged with infringement.

Sale of patented machine or product. A patented machine, sold to one who had a license to use it on payment of a royalty having been taken, was taken to pieces, and the parts sold at auction as scrap iron, on the death of the licensee. Held, that the purchaser of such parts had no right to reassemble the machine.

Infringement—What constitutes. The patent protects the principle applied, and it cannot be evaded by the adoption of mechanical equivalents based upon the same principle.

The plan of making use of the patent to use the machine for all purposes for which it is applicable.

A specification in a patent to use the machine for all purposes for which it is applicable.

The use of chemical equivalents in place of one or more of the elements of a patented compound may infringe the patent for the compound, although in some respects the substituted equivalents are improvements.

The making of a combination in a patented machine gives the inventor no right to use the original invention while the term of its patent continues.

The identity or diversity of two machines depends, not on the employment of the same elements or powers of mechanisms, but upon producing the given effect by substantially the same mode of operation, or substantially the same combination of powers.

A patent for a combination of three distinct things is not infringed by combining two of them with a third, which is substantially different from the third element described in the specification.

A patent for two machines, each of which is a new invention, is infringed by the use of one of such machines.

A patent for preventing the fouling of ships' bottoms, similar to the patented paint, but substituting another for oxide of copper, held not an infringement.

A patent for increasing or decreasing the draft of a locomotive by carrying the exhaust pipes of the engine to the bottom of the smoke pipe, and there controlling the draft, the substantial identity is infringed by a locomotive in which a like result is accomplished by carrying the exhaust pipes to the bottom of the smoke box, instead of the smoke pipe.

Who liable. Defendant is liable for an infringement, in the use of an infringement, by one who worked in his factory by the piece, furnishing his own tools.

Remedy generally. If the patentee, after obtaining his patent, dedicates or surrenders it to public use, or acquiesces for a long period in the public use, without objection, he is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity to protect his patent; and such acquiescence may amount to complete proof of a dedication or surrender thereof to the public.

A bill in equity quia timet will lie for an injunction upon well-grounded proof of an apprehended intention of defendant to violate a patent.

Preliminary injunction. For the purpose of restraining the unlawful use of a patented machine out of the jurisdiction of the court, the court should have jurisdiction of the person of defendant.

But where an injunction is directly against the machine itself, as in extreme cases of contumacy, or of fraudulent contrivance to evade an injunction, the proceedings must be instituted in the district in which the machine is located.

Where a plaintiff moves for an injunction, and it is denied on defects pointed out, it is too late for him to wait until after the defendant has closed his proofs for final hearing, before removing his motion, designed to cure such defects.

On motion for an injunction, an affidavit of a single witness is not sufficient to outweigh the oath of a patenteel and the general presumption arising from the grant of the letters after a great lapse of time.

A separate affidavit by plaintiff that the patentees were the first and original inventors dispensed with where the bill contains such an averment.

A general allegation by affidavit, or in information and belief, that the thing patented existed before, without disclosing the particular facts, or the belief, is insufficient.

Advantage cannot be taken of complainant's delay in applying for an injunction where his suspicions of infringement were allayed by direct misrepresentations of defendant.

The burden of proving that the invention, where the motion is resisted on the ground of laches, is upon the plaintiff.

The grant of a patent, without notice to a prior patenteel of the application, is no bar to a preliminary injunction, if the statute allows the latter.

An injunction will not be issued against a respondent's using a machine, unless it is proved that he has used it himself, or employed others to use it for him, or at least has profited by the use of it.

Where long possession of a patent has existed, and frequent recoveries under it, an injunction will be issued, the originality of the invention by the patentee not being denied, unless the letters appear for some cause illegal or void.

An injunction will not issue where it does not appear from the record that defendant has ever made or sold the infringing articles in the district.

An injunction will not issue where it does not appear from the record that defendant has ever made or sold the infringing articles in the district.

The purchasers from defendant of the alleged infringing machine, whose use by him has been enjoined, will be restrained from using the machine where the injunction remains in full force .................. 567

Where a licensee has violated the license by using the machine under a misapprehension of his rights, and has discontinued such violation, a provisional injunction will not be granted. 215

Where the respondents deny the validity of the patent of the plaintiffs, the court will dissolve the injunction. 567

If the suit at law is not by that time brought against them to try its validity ............. 567

After the neglect of an order to file demurrors and the overruling of a demurrer as bad, the case will not be opened for further hearing as to a temporary injunction previously granted, unless respondent show by affidavit that the course pursued was not for delay, and indemnity is also filed. 567

An injunction will not be dissolved on account of doubts as to the validity of a new patent issued to correct clerical mistakes in the original patent .................... 577

A motion to dissolve the injunction will not be heard on the same evidence on which it was granted, or new evidence improperly neglected to be offered before. 581

The injunction would be dissolved on the answer denying the validity of the patent supported by evidence, unless plaintiff produced more evidence sustaining its validity. 581

Where, on a motion to dissolve an injunction, the evidence seems to preponderate in plaintiff’s favor, the court will continue the injunction until the right can be tried at law or by issue out of chancery. 551

The sending of circulars to parties engaged in the trade notifying them of a preliminary injunction, is improper. 249

Procedure.

Prior to Act July 8, 1870, there was no statute limiting the time within which a suit must be prosecuted, either at law or in equity, for the infringement of a patent. 429

The assignee of a patent right, in part or in whole, cannot maintain any suit at law or in equity, either as sole or as joint plaintiff thereof, at least as against third persons, until his patent has been recorded in the proper department, according to the requisitions of the patent acts. 723

In a suit for infringement, where the assignee cannot, by a cross-bill which sets up no color of title in himself, demand a discovery from the plaintiff in the original suit as from the source of his title, it is replete with error. 841

An injunction granted on an original bill, before the surrender of a patent, cannot be made to extend after the surrender, unless a supplemental bill be filed, founded thereon. 593

The defense that a reissue is invalid, on the ground that the patent does not contain a sufficient specification of the proportions of the ingredients to meet the requirements of the law, cannot be considered and relied upon in the answer. 421

The defense that the patentee has dedicated or surrendered his patent to the public will not be noticed unless explicitly relied upon and put in issue by the answer. 723

No notice is required by Act July 4, 1836, § 15, of the names and places of residence of the parties by whom it is intended to prove a prior knowledge and use of the thing patented. 258

In the suit at equity, the party defendant, or his assignee in part, a disclaimer by the patentee alone will not entitle the plaintiff to the benefits of Act 1837, c. 45, §§ 7, 9. 723

A disclaimer after suit brought is not sufficient to entitle plaintiff to a perpetual injunction. 723

Evidence.

The presumption, arising from the letters patent, that the patentee was the original and first inventor, in the absence of the application for the patent, extends back only to the date of the letters patent, and in no case does it extend further back than to the time of the filing of the original application. 295

The patent and certified copies of the record and drawings deposited, with the references thereon, are prima facie evidence of the particular invention described if the same are made in pursuance of the law. 269

Certified copies of the patent and specification, and of the drawings, under oath, filed under Act March 3, 1878, are prima facie evidence. 277

The evidence must leave no room for a reasonable doubt in order to sustain the defense of want of novelty. 429

Injunction and its violation.

A party enjoined against the use of a patent is guilty of contempt if he afterwards use another patent, similar in principle, with knowledge that the author of such patent had previously been enjoined. 581

Where reference is made to a master to take an account, an injunction was withheld until the coming in of his report. 776

The limitation of two years in section 2037 does not apply to a proceeding to review a decree in equity. 256

Accounting: Damages.

Though plaintiff has an established license for, where the profits made by the infringer amount to more than such fees, plaintiff is entitled to recover such profits on an accounting. 619

Marking patent or patented machine or infringing it.

The marking of the article of an article, which has been patented, can affix upon such article the word “Patented” or any other word of similar import, together with the date of the patent, after the patent has expired. 222

Such an article does not come within the meaning of the statute which prohibits the affixing of the word “Patented” upon any “unpatented article.” 222

RELEASE AND DISCHARGE.

A release to one of two joint obligors extinguishes the obligation, and equity will not relieve in such a case, although it is most apparent the extinguishment was not intended by the parties.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

See, also, "Courts."

Right of removal.
Where a case is duly removed under Act Sept. 24, 1879, § 12, by defendant, the question of jurisdiction is not dependent upon any provisions of section 11.

The amount in controversy is not material on the question of the right of removal of an action having been commenced against a federal officer for an act done under color of the federal revenue laws.

A suit cannot be removed from a state court into the circuit court of the United States, where a part of the plaintiffs or defendants are citizens of the state where the suit is brought and of some other state.

A suit brought against co-partners to remove a cause as to him alone, was not removed by Act March 3, 1875.

Time for removal.
A removal cannot be had under Act March 3, 1875, of a suit pending at its passage, wherein a trial had been had before its passage, although the verdict was set aside and a new trial granted.

Proceedings to obtain.
A petition for removal is sufficiently signed and verified by the attorney of the party to remove.

Notice of the application for the removal of a cause is not necessary.

An order made in contempt proceedings in circuit court before the removal will be recognized and enforced in the federal court.

If such an order was appealed from, the federal court will hold in abeyance proceedings for its enforcement until the appeal is disposed of.

If a suit removed from the state court comes into the federal court impressed with all the rights and liabilities of the parties to costs which accrued or attached by the laws of the state, while the suit remained in the state court.

Effect of removal: Subsequent proceedings.
The right to object to the jurisdiction of the federal court after removal of the cause from the state court is not waived by the failure to raise the objection at the first term of the court after the record is filed.

Where a suit is commenced by summons, and a new suit for complaint is filed, defendant may, in his petition for removal, show that the amount in controversy exceeds $900; and plaintiff is not entitled to a remand by afterwards filing a complaint stating the amount in dispute at less than $900.

Where a case is removed as having been commenced against a federal officer for an act done under color of the United States revenue laws, the question whether the defendant was acting in performance of his duty as an officer of the customs under the revenue laws is a matter to which the parties are entitled in the merits of the case, which cannot be raised upon a motion to dismiss the suit.

REPLEVIN.
Replevin will lie for the goods of a stranger taken in execution as the goods of the debtor, if taken out of the actual or constructive possession of the plaintiff.

Upon the plea of property in the defendant, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff.

It is not necessary to the validity of a replevin bond that the plaintiff in replevin should be bound in the bond.

In debt on a replevin bond, setting forth the condition and averring special breaches, the pleas of general performance, non damnum, and the defendant had no property in the goods repleved, of null nul, record, where no record is averred in the declaration, and a plea to the whole declaration which is an answer to a part only, are bad.

Actions of replevin, in Alexandria, may, on motion, be tried by the first judge.

The only judgment that can be issued in favor of the defendant in replevin is one cent damages and a return habendae. He must rely upon a suit on the replevin bond for his damages.

In replevin for goods distrained for rent arrear, if the jury do not render such a verdict as will enable the court to render the statutory judgment in favor of the defendant, the court may render the commonlaw judgment for a return of the goods repleved; and in an action upon the replevin bond, for not returning the property, the defendant may, in mitigation of damages, show that no rent was in arrear.

The value of the goods stated in the replevin bond is prima facie evidence of plaintiff's damages; and, if defendant should contend for a less amount, the burden of proof is on him to show it.

If the jury, in replevin, do not find the value of the goods distrained, their finding of the amount of rent in arrear is surplusage.

REPORTERS.
Notes and prefaches of the United States circuit and district courts reports.

SALE.
See, also, "Contracts"; "Vendor and Purchaser."

Where property is in the possession of a person as agent at the time he accepts an offer of sale to him, no formal delivery is necessary to pass the title.

The master of a vessel, to whom its cargo of wood is offered at a certain price per cord "for the quantity shipped," is justified, in accepting the same, as meaning the quantity actually shipped and not that stated on the bill of lading, though the owner intended the latter.

The title to machines ordered and supplied by persons who had the exclusive right to sell such machines in the state, with the understanding that they were to pay for them if sold within the state, if not, that they were "to take them for the next season," where the transaction appeared upon the invoices of the manufacturer and the invoices of the consignees as a sale, passes to the consignees upon delivery.
Where goods are to be paid for on delivery, the title does not pass where they are taken to the place of delivery and laid down, a time being offered in payment. The seller has no right to compulsorily deliver a moiety of a vessel when in possession of the other party is not, in general, indispensable to pass the property.

Where there is a warranty, the examination and approval of part of the articles which are delivered is not a waiver of the contract as to the others.

In a contract for the sale of articles without warranty, if there be no fraud on the part of the seller, he is not answerable for the quality of the articles.

Salvage.

The relief of property from an impending peril of the sea by the voluntary exertion of those who are under no legal obligation to render assistance, and the consequent ultimate safety of the property, constitute a case of salvage.

A vessel, out of sight of land, and in danger of destruction, with 210 persons and 800,000 dollars sick with a deadly, infectious disease, and with no navigator aboard, flying a signal of distress, is in a position to have salvage service rendered her.

Leading the way safely out to sea for a sail vessel anchored among the shoals off Cape May, and in danger of going ashore if her cable should part, after an unsuccessful attempt to tow her, is a salvage service entitled to a liberal reward.

The court will not prohibit the payment of any part of the salvage to the crew of a stranded vessel who refused to assist in getting her after wrecked except upon the promise of extra compensation out of the salvage.

One who recovers and carries off, against the express commands of the master, cargo accidentally fallen overboard in the salvage operation, which the authorized salvors intend to save at their earliest convenience, cannot recover salvage thereon.

A vessel employed for a stipulated sum by the principal salvors with the acquiescence of the master of the wrecked ship, cannot, under any circumstances, recover salvage in addition to the sum agreed.

Damages caused by grounding to a steamer which, being delayed by a salvage service rendered by her, reached her destination at low water, and struck in going over Plock, are too remote, and cannot be recovered against the salvaged vessel.

The net proceeds of a direct voyage into port by a salver were only $206, and the owner, after notice, failed to appear, the whole proceeds of freight to the salvors.

Fifty-three per cent. allowed upon gross valuation of $41,924 for saving cargo, mainly by drift, from ship totally wrecked on Florida Reefs.

$5,000 awarded to a steamer worth, with her cargo, $600,000, for piloting out to sea without any consent a vessel for which a sailing vessel worth $125,500, from a position of considerable peril among the shoals off Cape May.

$13,000 allowed upon a valuation of $29,000 to professional wreckers for getting a ship off of Florida Reefs.

The master has no right to compulsorily deliver a moiety of a vessel in fulfillment of the contract, the title to the first lot continues in him.

Where the seller of merchandise delivers it to the wrong vessel, which sails before the mistake is discovered, and he subsequently sells a similar goods to the right vessel in fulfillment of the contract, the title to the first lot continues in him.

The master of a ship wrecked upon the coast has the custody and charge of the property, and, as against strangers and salvors, may make such arrangements as he sees fit for saving it.

Scire facias.

A scire facias is an action to which a party may plead, and it may be executed in the same manner as a summons.

Seamen.

Protection and relief.

"Vessel of commerce," within Act Sept. 28, 1850, abolishing flogging, includes vessels engaged in whale and other fisheries.

The provisions of the act, imposing a penalty on masters of vessels in the merchant service for shipping seamen without articles, extend to the merchant marine upon the lakes and public navigable waters connecting the same.

A female shipped as cook and steward is entitled to all the rights, and subject to all the disabilities, of a mariner; and the provisions of the statute as to shipping articles apply equally to her.

In an action of debt, to recover a naval penalty under Act 1790, c. 29, § 1, against the master of a vessel for shipping seamen without articles, a showing for all the penalties is sufficient.

The contract of shipment.

The description of a voyage, as "from Boston to Valparaiso or other parts of the Pacific Ocean, at and from the closest home direct, or via ports in the East Indies or Europe," is not sufficiently certain, and the articles do not bind the seaman.

In the case of ambiguous shipping articles, the construction most favorable to the seaman is to be adopted.

Under shipping articles authorizing the master to touch at certain intermediate ports, "or as he may direct," he may stop at places not named, without violating the contract with the seaman.

Where a seaman is appointed to act as mate of a vessel, by the master, during the voyage, he may be removed by the master for incompetency, and is not entitled to any wages other than those originally contracted for.

A master has no right to degrade his mate in a foreign port for an alleged offense, and make him do seaman's work; and, if the mate refuse to do duty as a seaman, the master is bound to offer him a passage home.

Conduct of master or mate in respect to seamen.

The abolition of "flogging" does not prohibit corporal punishment of a different kind administered by officers of vessels to compel obedience to lawful commands, or to preserve the discipline and good order of the ship.

The advice of an American consul in a foreign port, gives to the master of a vessel no justification for an illegal act.

The imprisonment of seamen is not justified where they peacefully refuse labor from an honest mistake of their right to discharge.
INDEX.

The practice of imprisoning disobedient seamen in foreign goals is of doubtful legality, and to be resisted by a strong case of necessity. 146

Wages—Right to. Where a seaman suffering from a disease when he ships during the voyage, his administrator cannot recover wages. 718

Where a voyage is broken up by a seizure of the vessel for the debts of its owners, one month's extra pay was allowed the seamen. 600

The master may seize on board of his vessel, inflict reasonable personal correction, or discharge him without payment of his wages, according to the enormity of his offence. 146

-- Deductions: Extinguishment. If the imprisonment of a seaman in a foreign port is improper, the expenses of it, or of the employment of a person in his stead, are not to be deducted from his wages. 146

Where a cask of wine was lost while being hoisted aboard by the master and crew, held, that the master, mate, and crew must share the loss with all the rest of the ship's equipage, in proportion to their monthly wages; and the fact that the master had paid out the seamen did not in any wise affect the contribution of the mate. 106

Where a seaman is imprisoned for misbehavior, he does not forfeit the wages accruing during his confinement. 470

To justify the forfeiture of a seaman's wages, his absconder, under the provisions of Act July 20, 1790 (1 Stat. 151), it is indispensable that there be an entry in the logbook of the name of the seaman, and of his having gone without leave. 470

SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM. A partnership debt cannot be set off in an action by an assignee of one of the partners. 692

SHIPPING.

Public regulation. An American registered vessel, while at sea, sold in part to resident citizens of the United States without a bill of sale reciting her registry, and without a new registry until her arrival at her home port, does not lose her privileges as an American vessel. 46

A vessel sailing under a fishing license may touch at a foreign port, and procure supplies, without incurring forfeiture under the acts of congress. 40

Taking on board in a foreign port, and bringing into this country, two barrels, without hire or reward, but as a favor to a friend, supposed to contain crockery, but really containing liquors, is not engaging in trade within the meaning of section 32 of the act of February 18, 1783 (1 Stat. 316), and does not subject the vessel and cargo to forfeiture. 40

Title to and ownership of vessel. The benefit until default of payment, is valid as an immediate conditional sale. 323

The majority owners in value of the vessel against consent of the minority, but they must communicate their design. 50

A part owner, who will neither appraise, nor make advances for outfit, cannot legally demand freight, but his share of the vessel will be secured to him. 50

The master. Where the master had leave to take his wife with him, and nothing was said about his son, five years old, he was not required to pay a reasonable amount for his passage. 327

The expense of regulating the master's chronometer, where he used it for the benefit of the ship solely, should be borne by the ship. 327

It is not the duty of a mate, in loading casks of wine from the deck, and bearing with his own hands the cask from the side, as it is about to come aboard. 106

Trustees holding the title of a vessel, and controlling and managing her for the benefit of others, are liable for the master's wages. 327

The master and crew of a vessel are not entitled to liens for their wages. 939

Employment of vessel. Where, during a blockade of the Chesapeake by the British, a vessel was chartered with a Sidmouth license, though such license was not expressed in the charter party, held, that the contract was valid. 140

Notwithstanding the charter party is invalid, the charterer may, by subsequent negotiation, be liable as on a new contract to reimburse the shipowner for any expenses incurred in attempting performance. 140

The vessel is liable for the negligence of the master to present a proper manifest, preventing the owner of the goods shipped from passing them through the customs. 922

Vessel owners are not liable for damage to iron shipped under a bill of lading exempting the vessel from accountability for rust, unless the rust was received before hand, and through want of proper stowage and care. 930

In case of loss or damage incurred by a bill of lading, the presumption of law is that such loss or damage was occasioned by the act or default of the carrier. 33

Lightermen, to whom is committed the charge of transporting goods from the shore, and slinging them in the lighter, for hoisting aboard, are responsible for any defect or negligence in the manner of slinging. 106

The vessel is liable, where it is found that the master, having no right to run shore on the bill of lading, or for cargo, for injury to the portion saved, and for salvage paid under a decree therefor. 33

In respect to the liability of the vessel for contracts of transportation made with the master, the law makes no distinction between passengers and merchants. 919

Where a passenger determined, before the date of sailing, not to take passage in the ship, he cannot complain that the ship did not sail on the day as agreed, and recover back his passage money paid. 917

The vessel is liable in specie, for passage money advanced, and for damages for failure to deliver goods shipped, where the master fails to perform his agreement to transport a passenger with his consent. 919

Where the master failed to fulfill his contract to carry libelant, held, that he was entitled to recover from the vessel the passage money paid in advance, the expenses incurred in waiting the sailing of another ship, and the sum paid to such other vessel for passage.

Limiting liability.
The limitation of the owners’ liability by Act March 3, 1851, § 3, to the amount or value of their interest in the ship and her freight then pending, does not limit or affect their liability for loss, damage, or injury resulting from the fault of such vessel to another vessel and her cargo from a collision between the two vessels. (Affirming 681.)

On a libel in personam for damages to a vessel in collision, the district court in admiralty has no power to reserve its final decision whether the owners may take appropriate proceedings to limit their liability, where neither the ship and freight nor the amount or value is within its control.

The value to another of the liability to the owners of a vessel is limited is the value immediately after the injury, and before the vessel is repaired.

Where a vessel is sailed on shares by her master who is not an owner, the interest of the owners in the freight in proceeding to limit their liability is only one-half such amount.

SLAVERY.
The prohibition of the importation of colored persons (Act Feb. 28, 1803) does not apply to colored seamen employed in navigating a vessel.

Congress has power to prohibit citizens and residents of the United States from engaging in the slave trade with or between foreign countries, both under the power to regulate commerce (Const. art. I, § 8, subd. 3), and because such traffic concerns the relations between citizens of the United States and those of foreign countries.

A vessel becomes liable to forfeiture because built or equipped in the United States for use in transporting slaves from one foreign country to another, Act May 10, 1800, so soon as any preparation of it for such purpose is made, a completion of the equipment not being necessary.

A vessel is “employed in the transportation of slaves from one foreign country to another” (Act May 10, 1800), so as to be liable to forfeiture, when it is on a voyage to procure slaves for that purpose, though no slaves have as yet been taken on board.

Justice on a voyage known to be for the purpose of procuring slaves for transportation from one foreign country to another is a violation of Act May 10, 1800, forbidding citizens and residents of the United States to serve on a vessel used in such transportation.

The history of the “Fugitive Slave Law,” and such law construed in a charge to a grand jury, by Nelson, C. J.

Under the fugitive slave law of February 12, 1850, the judge or magistrate has no power to issue a warrant to arrest the fugitive, or to commit after the examination is over and the certificate is granted, and such a warrant is wholly invalid for any purpose.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.
The matter entitling the party to an amendment of his contract may be set up by way of defense to a proceeding to enforce a specific performance of the contract, where the clause omitted through mistake or accident would, if found in the instrument, constitute a ground of defense.

But such a defense cannot be set up where the rights of a bona fide purchaser have been intervened which would or might be seriously prejudiced by giving effect to the defense.

STATES.
The territory of the state of Delaware within the “twelve-mile circle” extends across the Delaware’s fault of low-water mark on the Jersey shore.

The ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory was superseded by the adoption of the constitution of the United States, and the admission to the Union of the states formed from that territory.

The United States laws act directly upon individuals, and are to be enforced by national instrumentalities. A state, as a political body, cannot be compelled to execute such laws.

STATUTES.
To warrant a court in declaring unconstitutional a law passed by congress, the defect of legislative power must be of the most plain and indisputable character.

The fact that a law of congress has been in course of execution for many years, and has been acquiesced in during that time, is a strong reason why the courts, especially those of a subordinate character, should not decide the same to be unconstitutional.

The inhibition of the enactment of special laws giving effect to informal or invalid wills or deeds does not apply to a general curative statute.

The provisions of a statute, so far as they are inconsistent with those of a subsequent statute relating to the same subject-matter, are by implication, if not expressly, repealed by the later statute.

An act introduced for the purpose of validating certain bonds which did not pass the legislature by the vote required by the constitution is not constructive notice to anybody of anything.

SUBROGATION.
The fact that the state, which had insured railroad company bonds, and was secured by a mortgage, could not be sued, is no reason why the holders of the bonds should not be subrogated to the rights of the state, and have the benefit of the security.

TIME.
When the question is as to the effect of a proceeding instituted on the same day on which an act affecting the validity of such proceeding was passed, the precise time at which the act became a law may be properly inquired into.

TOWAGE.
See, also, “Collision”; “Salvage.”
The contract of towage implies knowledge of the channel and safe pilotage.

In making up a tow, vessels of war shall be placed behind those of lighter craft.

A tug which, in towing a ship, necessarily brings her against a wharf, is liable in damages, although the ship was rotten and unseaworthy, unless her condition was the sole cause of the injury.
TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES.

The exclusive right to use the trade-mark of a manufacturer or peddler does not authorize him to make any false or fraudulent representation or misrepresentation of the goods, or to sell them, as his goods, to the public, by implication on a sale of the business to him, but he may use the trade-mark, provided he do so in a manner not to deceive the public.

TREASON.

Until belligerent rights are accorded by the political department of the government to the state or people of rebellion, the judiciary must regard them as rebels and lawless usurpers, and supply to them the penal law.

The words "levying war," as used in the constitutional definition of "treason," include not only the act of making war for the purpose of entirely overturning the government, but any combination forcibly to oppose the execution of any public law of the United States, with intent to prevent its enforcement in all cases, if accompanied or followed by an act of forcible opposition to such law in circumstances of such combination.

If a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting a treasonable purpose, and does so in force, that is "levying war," but it must be an assemblage in force, a military assemblage in a condition to make war.

A force must be some overt act done, or some attempt made by the persons, to execute, or towards executing, that purpose. The assembly must be in a condition to use force, and must include, if necessary, to further, aid, or accomplish the treasonable purpose.

An assembly is treasonable in a military manner, if they are armed and march in a military form, for the express purpose of overawing and intimidating the public, and thus attempt to carry into effect the treasonable design, this will, of itself, amount to a levy of war, although no actual blow be struck, or engagement take place.

If a body of men be actually assembled in force, in a condition to make war, in order to overturn the government at any one place by force of this levying war, it is not necessary that the assembly should be with military arms and array; numbers alone must be the requisite force.

If any such assembly, for the purpose of subverting the government at any place, take forcible possession of any fort, arsenal, or other part of the public works, it is an act of levying war.

If a convention, legislature, junto, or other assemblage entertain the purpose of subverting the government, and to that end pass acts, resolves, ordinances, or decrees, even with the view of raising a military force to carry their purpose into effect, this alone does not constitute a levying of war.

A conspiracy to prevent, by force, the execution of any law of the United States in all cases, is a treasonable conspiracy, and if there be an actual assemblage of men for the purpose of carrying this intention into execution, that is, of acting together, and preventing by force the execution of the law generally, this constitutes a levying of war, and involves the crime of treason.

If there be an assembly of persons, with force, with an intent to prevent the collection of lawful taxes levied by the government, or to destroy all customhouses, or to resist the administration of justice in their public offices, and the assemblage proceed to execute this purpose by force, this is treason against the United States.

A mere treasonable conspiracy, whether for the purpose of entirely overthrowing the government, or to prevent the execution of any of its laws, is insidious to the public, and involves the crime of treason, as defined by the constitution of the United States. In addition to the conspiracy, there must be an actual assemblage of men for the purpose of carrying the conspiracy into effect by force.

The sudden outbreak of a mob, or the assembling of men, in order, by force, to prevent the execution of a law in a particular instance, and then to disperse, with no actual intention of continuing together or reassembling for defeating the law generally and in all cases, is not a levying of war such as constitutes treason.

The combination of a body of men, with the design of seizing, and the actual seizing, of the forts and other public property of the United States, is a levying of war against the United States, and is treason.

All persons engaged therein are by the law regarded as levying war against the United States; and all who adhere to them are to be regarded as enemies; and all who give them, in any part of the United States, aid and comfort, come within the provisions of the act of April 30, 1790, and are guilty of treason.

The meaning of the words "overthrowing" used in the constitutional definition of treason and in the statute, is an act of a character susceptible of clear proof, and not resting in mere inference or conjecture.

Words, oral, written, or printed, however treasonable, or self-incriminating of themselves, do not constitute an overt act of treason.

In a civil war, persons who adhere to their allegiance are not, although they may be in an insurrectionary district, regarded as enemies; and trade with such persons, in good faith and without collusion, with the enemy, is lawful, unless interdicted by the government.

To be employed in actual service in an army raised to oppose the government in its action, or directly or indirectly to aid or assist in the levying or embodying of a military force for the purpose of overthrowing the government, are plainly acts of "levying war" and involve the commission of the crime of treason.

The constitutional definition of treason, however, is of a broader signification, and includes all those who join a hostile army after war is begun.

The words "States," in the case of "giving them aid and comfort," include, in general, any act committed after war actually exists which indicates a want of loyalty to the government and sympathy with its enemies, and which, by fair construction, is directly in furtherance of their hostile designs.

After war actually exists, it is treasonable to sell, or to provide arms or munitions of war, or military stores and supplies, including food, clothing, for the enemy; to hire, sell, or furnish boats, railroad cars, or other means of transportation, or to advance money or obtain loans for the use and support of the hostile army; and to communicate intelligence to the enemy by letter, telegraph, or otherwise, relating to the strength, movements, or position of the army.

Mere expressions of opinion indicative of sympathy with the war, and no sufficient under the constitution and laws, to warrant a conviction of treason.

To constitute the United States by levying of war against the United States in their sovereign character, and not merely a levying of war exclusively against the sovereignty of a particular state............. 1046
There may be treason against a state by mixed up or merged in treason against the United States. If the treasonable purpose be to overthrow the government of the state, and forcibly to withdraw it from the Unions, and thereby prevent the exercise of the national sovereignty within the limits of the state, this would be treason against the United States.............. 1049
If the troops of the United States should be called out by the president, upon the application of a state legislature or executive, to withstand the state against domestic violence, and there should be an assembly of persons with force to resist and oppose the United States troops, this would be treason against the United States, although the primary intention of the insurgents may have been only to overthrow the state government or the state laws...................... 1036

ning, counselling, or countenancing the violence, or if, through the agency of others therto,

he is guilty of treason.... 1047
An alien resident may be guilty of treason by co-operating either with rebels or foreign enemies.............. 1042, 1047
The expressions, "levying war," and "adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," in the constitutional definition of treason, were borrowed from the ancient law of England, and are to be understood in the sense in which they are understood in England when the constitution was adopted.............. 1047
Direct proof of the combining to prevent the enforcement of a law may be found in direct or circumstantial evidence of the individual party before the actual outbreak, or it may be deferred from proceedings of meetings in which he took part openly, or which he either prompted or made effective by his countenance or sanction, commending, counseling, or insidiously forcible resistance to the laws.............. 1047 Direct proof of the purpose, however, is not legally necessary. The concert of purpose may be deduced from the concerted action itself, or it may be inferred from facts occurring at the time, or before or afterwards.............. 1047
The constitutional provision that "no person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same evitable, nor on confession in open court" (article 5, § 2), applies, it seems, only to the proofs on the trial, and not to a prelimipossesion of property is not the criterion to determine whether a demand and re-sal are necessary in an action of trover........ 967

Where a person purchases personal prop-essary to support an action of trover........ 967

TRUSTS.
The trustees of a family settlement in which infants are interested may be chan-aged by consent of the parties, upon a bill filed for that purpose only.............. 869
A trustee given the power to sell the trust property and reinvest in other property, when the same can be done advantageously, has not an unlimited power of sale, and a sale to his personal creditor in part payment of a debt is not a valid excution of the trust; and, where the purchaser has notice of the violation of the trust, the property is chargeable in his hands with the trust.............. 631 Purchasers who take bona fide and valid execution of a trust in their chain of title, who believed their title good, where the trust is enforced and the land is, entiled to the amount of incumbrances which they have paid, and per-nant improvements made, as well as ances they have made to the estatue trust, to be offset against the profits. 631

Prior to Act July 31, 1861, there was no law for punishing treasonable combinations or conspiracies which were not committed by an overt act, and the act of that date, however, makes criminal not only combinations to overthrow the government, but conspiracies or mere acts, whether done by few or many, whether public or private, forcibly to resist, or even to delay the execution of any law.............. 1040 Act July 31, 1861, was designed to punish the mere act of conspiring, which, under the constitutional definition and the act of 1790, do not involve the crime of treason, unless there is an attempt to consummate the treasonable act...................... 1036 Act Aug. 6, 1861, making it a high misdemeanor to recruit soldiers or sailors in any state or territory to engage in armed hostility against the United States, or to open a recruiting station for the enlistment of such persons, was intended to reach acts not deemed treasonable under the statute of 1790.............. 1036

UNITED STATES MARSHALS.
See "Marshal."

USE AND OCCUPATION.

In Virginia an action for use and occupation will lie although there be a parcel of land within the time, and rent certain, if it be waived, and a promise to pay for the time occupied. 337

USURY.

See, also, "Banks and Banking."

The making a note payable at a place in which the exchange sells at a premium does not constitute usury, nor does it render the note void in the hands of a bank whose charter prohibits the taking more than a certain rate of interest. 824

A contract not usurious at the time it is made cannot become so by any future contingency. 824

A stranger cannot set up usury as a defense. 785

All notes, whatever is the character of the contract, will be granted in equity only upon condition that plaintiff pay the amount of money advanced, or allow a decree for. 785

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

See, also, "Bankruptcy": "Fraudulent Conveyances": "Grant": "Sale": "Specific Performance."

To constitute a purchaser without notice, it is not sufficient that the vendor contract should be made without notice, but that the purchase money should be paid before notice. 631

The court will set aside an action for breach of a covenant to convey lands, the title to which was not in the defendant, is the value of the lands. 160

WAR.

See, also, "Price": "Treason."

The mayor and common council of a city in Virginia, elected under the de facto government of that state during the Civil War, during the occupation by federal forces, did not derive their authority from the military, and a suit based upon acts done by them cannot be removed into the federal court, as acts done in obedience to the orders of the national authority. 597

WILLS.

It is not necessary to the validity of a will of personal property that it should have any date, that it should be in the handwriting of the testator, or signed by him, or have any subscribing witnesses, provided it was drawn at his request, and according to his dictation. 1068

From 1766, when the act of 29 Car. II. was enacted, no nuncupative will can, under any circumstances, pass real estate. 1099

In the District of Columbia there must be not less than three witnesses to a nuncupative will where the amount of personal property exceeds £50. 1099

Where the orphans' court in the District of Columbia passes upon the question of which of two papers is the last will of deceased, and an issue from such court is pending in the circuit court, the orphans' court has no jurisdiction to pass upon the question whether another paper is the last will of testator. 953

A will is not effective until proved in the proper court. 956

A devise expressly for life or in tail cannot be enlarged into a fee by other words of doubtful import. 63

A devise to a, and, if he die without heir or issue, the estate to go to B., his brother, gives an estate tail to A. by implication. 63

A direction by a testator that his estate shall be held in trust for his daughter and her heirs, free from the control of disposal of any husband she might have, and exempt from his debts, contracts, or engagements, does not refer to the right of guardianship of the husband over the children after the death of the wife. 1069

A devise to an only daughter and her husband, "to them, their heirs begotten of their bodies, or assigns, forever, or, for want of such heirs or assigns, then to the heirs begotten by, or either of them, to their assigns forever," gives an estate tail to the daughter and her husband, which, in the event of their death without issue, is to go to the heirs of the body of the survivor. 694

Under a devise to testator's wife of all his property, except outstanding debts, which he directs that she shall collect as executrix and give to three persons as hereafter to be directed by him, where he dies without making such direction, the wife does not take title under the will to such debts or their proceeds. 388

Testator bequeathed a certain sum of money to a person in trust to invest in lands in the names of six grandchildren, to be conveyed and vested in them, and, in case of the death of any of them, the share of the child so dying should go to the survivors. Held, that he will have reference only to a death occurring after the time of judgment. 433

A devise of lands "after payment of debts" subjects the land to the payment of the debts. 716

WITNESSES.

See, also, "Bankruptcy": "Costs": "Deposition": "Trial."

The general rule of law is that a party to a suit cannot be a witness. This rule is founded on the interest the party has in the suit, and when that interest is removed the objection ceases to exist. 55

A plaintiff who has assigned all his interest in the suit to a co-plaintiff, and has deposited a sum with the clerk to cover all costs, is competent. 55

The court will not look to remote contingencies in order to disqualify a witness from giving testimony. 55

A constable, defendant in replevin, who justifies under an execution, if indemnified by the plaintiff therein, is a competent witness. 336

The bankrupt is a competent witness where his assignee is a party, as he can testify as a register in bankruptcy may be served outside the district but within 100 miles of the place where the witness is required to attend. 692

A summons to a witness to attend before a register in bankruptcy may be served outside the district but within 100 miles of the place where the witness is required to attend. 542

If a witness, whose residence is not at the place of holding court, is summoned at the place of trial, he is allowed to return to his home, but not for coming to the court. 518
