Mr. Key then objected, that the affidavit was not sufficiently certain. It was written upon the back of a copy of the charter-party, upon which the suit was brought, and which was annexed to the plaintiffs' account current with the defendant. It was made by the plaintiffs, and stated "that there is now due and unpaid upon the original charter-party, of which the within is a true copy, twenty-four hundred and thirty-three dollars and six cents; the whole amount of said charter being thirty-two hundred and twelve dollars and ninety-six cents, of which seven hundred and seventy-nine dollars and ninety cents have been paid, agreeably to the account current by us signed and hereunto annexed, which exhibits the true and perfect state of the demand now existing between the said Simonton and ourselves," "and that the foregoing account current is just and true in all particulars." The affidavit ought to be as positive and direct as that required by the statute of 12 Geo. I. c. 29. But it is not positive. It says, "agreeably to the account current hereunto annexed." The account shows that the balance is carried to a new account which is not produced. It avers that the account exhibits the true state of the "demand" between them and the defendant, not the amount due. It does not state that any thing is due from the defendant, nor from anybody else, to the plaintiffs. Travers v. Hight [Case No. 14,151], in this court, at June term, 1812; Young v. Moriaty [Id. 18,167], at the same term; Bartleman v. Smarr [Id. 1,074], Dec. term, 1810; Welsh v. Hill, 2 Johns. 100.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, doubting whether the affidavit was sufficiently certain) overruled the objections to the affidavit, and ruled the defendant to give special bail.

On a subsequent day (May 26th,) Mr. Barrell, for plaintiffs, moved the court to amerce the marshal, to the amount of the damages and costs, for not bringing in the defendant when called upon by the court, at the return of the capias. The damages, at the time of the arrest of the defendant, were not stated in, or upon, the writ; no declaration had been sent with the writ, and no affidavit filed to hold the defendant to special bail; but while the defendant was in custody of the marshal, upon this writ, Mr. Barrell, the plaintiff's attorney, made this indorsement upon it: "Covenant on charter-party; damages, 4,000 dollars." The charter-party was not filed, but was produced by the plaintiff's attorney while the marshal had the defendant in custody, upon this writ, before one of the judges upon habeas corpus, and was shown to the marshal, to the judge, and to the defendant, who made no objection to it. The covenant was to pay $425 per month, to commence on the 7th of July, and to pay $600 on the arrival of the vessel at Havana. The judge ruled the defendant to give special bail; or rather, refused to discharge the defendant without special bail.

Mr. Barrell contended that the Maryland act of 1715, c. 46, § 3, applies only to actions of trespass on the case, where the damages are uncertain; and that in all other cases the marshal is bound to take full bail; and if he does not produce the body of the defendant, at the return of the writ, the court, upon motion, is bound, by the Maryland act of 1794, c. 54, § 2, to amerce him in the whole amount of the debt or damages, and costs.

Mr. Key, contra. The marshal can be amerced only $133⅓, or 8,000 pounds of tobacco, according to law, and the practice of this court, under the act of Maryland of 1715, c. 46. The statute of 12 Geo. I. c. 29, never was extended to Maryland, and the practice in that state, before that statute, and before the act of 1715 was settled, that the defendant might be held to bail, in all actions, without affidavit, and the sheriff was to take a bail-bond in 8,000 pounds of tobacco. The statute of 1715 speaks only of actions on the case; but the same practice previously prevailed in all actions. Actions of covenant are within the mischief of the act of 1715; which act recognizes the previous practice, and limits the amount of bail. Gorsuch v. Holmes, 4 Har. & McH. 54 (Judge Samuel Chase's opinion); Anon., Id. 159. By the English statute of 23 Hen. VI. c. 10, the sheriff was obliged to take a bail-bond in a reasonable amount, of which the sheriff was to judge. If he took a bail-bond, he was justified; if he did not, he was liable to an action for escape. The practice in Maryland, where there was no special order, before 1715, was to take a bail-bond for 8,000 pounds of tobacco. If the damages were not mentioned in the writ, and if no declaration was sent with the writ, in what amount was the marshal to take bail? How could he be safe against both plaintiff and defendant? In this case, the marshal took a bail-bond in $4,000, and has tendered it to the plaintiff's attorney, who refused to accept it.

Mr. Barrell, in reply, observed that the case cited from 4 Har. & McH. 159, was not upon a question of amercement, but upon a question of ruling bail. That if the marshal required excessive bail, the remedy of the party was by habeas corpus. He relied upon the positive requisition of the act of Maryland of 1794, c. 54, § 2, which gives the plaintiffs a right to judgment against the marshal for their whole amount of damages and costs, for not producing the body of the defendant upon the return of the writ.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. This is a motion to amerce the marshal to the full amount of damages and costs, for not bringing in the body of the defendant, according to the tenor of his return upon the capias ad respondendum. The action is for covenant broken, brought upon a charter-party, by which the defendant covenanted to pay to the plaintiffs $425 a month for the use of a vessel. At the time of the arrest of the defendant, no declaration was filed, nor any affidavit of debt, nor even an indorsement on the writ of the amount claimed; nor did the amount of damages claimed by the plaintiffs appear in the writ. The marshal took a bail-bond, in the penalty of $4,000, which he offered to assign to the plaintiffs before this motion was made. By the law of Maryland, 1794, c. 54, § 2, it is enacted, "that where any sheriff or coroner, being called upon, by order of the general court, or any county court, to bring before them any defendant or defendants before arrested by such sheriff or coroner, upon any original writ or mesne process, according to the tenor of his return, the court, on motion, shall cause such sheriff or coroner to be amerced to the amount of the debt or damages, and costs due from the defendant or defendants, to be ascertained by the oath of the plaintiff or plaintiffs, his, her, or their agent, factor, or attorney, and such other proof as the court may require, and shall and may enter judgment nisi, the second day of the next term thereafter, for the amount of the amercement aforesaid, in the name of the plaintiff or plaintiffs, and for his or their use, against such sheriff or coroner, which judgment shall be as valid and effectual as any judgment rendered upon any verdict of a jury." This act is peremptory, that the court shall cause the sheriff to be amerced to the amount of damages and costs.

But it is contended, on the part of the marshal, that the act of Maryland, 1715, c. 46, § 3, ought to be extended to actions of covenant, because they are within the same mischief. By that section it is enacted, "that in all actions of trespass on the case, where damages are laid to be above 4,000 pounds of tobacco, if no declaration be sent with the writ expressing the true cause of action, the sheriff shall not require a bail-bond exceeding the sum of 8,000 pounds of tobacco, although the damages be marked on the writ for any greater sum whatsoever." By the English statute of 23 Hen. VI. c. 10, sheriffs and all their ministers may deliver to bail or main-prize, upon sufficient surety, all persons arrested by writ, bill, or warrant in any personal action. Of the sufficiency of that surety, the sheriff was the judge. By the statute of 13 Car. II. st. 2, c. 2, the bail for appearance shall not be bound in a penalty above 40, if the cause of action be not particularly expressed. Before that statute it might be in any sum the sheriff pleased. Day's Com. Dig. "Bail," p. 30, K, 4. But it appears by the cases cited by the counsel of the marshal, from 4 Har. & McH. 5, 159, that neither the statute of 13 Car. II. st. 2, c. 2, nor that of 12 Geo. I. c. 29, nor the subsequent statutes of George, were ever considered in force, or practised upon in Maryland. The present question, therefore, depends upon the statute of 23 Hen. VI. c. 10, and the Maryland acts of 1715, c. 46, § 3, and 1794, c. 54, § 2. By the statute of 23 Hen. VI. c. 10, if the sheriff return a cepi corpus, or reddidit se, he shall have his prisoner at the return day, as before the act. And if he has not, he shall be amerced by the court, upon a rule given to bring in the body. Com. Atty. 311; Eterick v. Cowper, 1 Salk. 99; Day's Com. Dig. "Bail," K, 5. The first amercement was only 40s., but issues were from time to time subsequently increased, until they amounted to the debt or damages, and costs claimed by the plaintiff. This practice under the statute prevailed in Maryland before the year 1794, when the act was passed, making the amercement a direct remedy for the plaintiff, and authorizing the court to amerce the sheriff to the full amount of debt or damages and costs, in the first instance.

We are not informed of any case in Maryland, in which it has been decided that the statute of 1715, c. 46, § 3, comprehends actions of covenant, as well as actions of trespass on the case. The preamble of that section shows that the evil intended to be remedied, was the holding to bail in spiteful and malicious actions of trespass on the case, in which the plaintiffs laid their damages very high. The same cause of complaint was not very likely to exist in actions of covenant, because they must be brought upon the contract of the party, and it is therefore not probable that the legislature intended to extend the remedy to such actions. It is evident from that statute itself, that before that statute the sheriff was bound to take sufficient bail for the appearance of the defendant in all cases; and that he was the judge of its sufficiency. The act of 1794, c. 54, § 2, makes no exception in favor of actions of covenant, or any other action, and is peremptory upon the court. We think, therefore, that the marshal must be amerced to the amount of the damages due from the defendant to the plaintiffs.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, not having heard the argument, gave no opinion.

[For further proceedings in this case, see Cases Nos. 17,893 and 17,894.]

Case No. 17,893.

WINTER et al. v. SIMONTON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 62.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1826.

COVENANT—ACTION BY SURVIVING PROMISEES.

In an action of covenant by two survivors, upon a charter-party made with three persons, the declaration should state the death of one, and aver that the defendant had not paid the money to the three, or to either of them.

Covenant, on a charter-party made to Samuel Winter, Samuel G. Bowman, and Joshua Bowman. The declaration was in this form:—"John W. Simonton, late of Washington county, was summoned to answer to Samuel Winter and Samuel G. Bowman, survivors of Joshua Bowman, in a plea that he keep with them the covenants made between the said Samuel Winter, and Samuel G. Bowman, and one Joshua Bowman, now deceased, and the said John W. Simonton according to the force, form, and effect of certain articles of agreement of charter-party executed between them, &c., and whereupon the said Samuel Winter and Samuel G. Bowman, by Samuel B. Barrell their attorney, say," &c. And after setting forth the terms of the charter-party, and the employment of the vessel by the defendant, until she was totally lost by the perils of the sea, and that according to the terms of the charter-party the sum of $2,734.17 had become due by the defendant, of which he had notice, "yet though often requested the said Simonton has never paid said sum of $2,734.17 to the plaintiffs, but hath wholly refused and neglected so to do contrary to the form and effect of the said charter-party, and of the said covenants of the said defendant, by him in that behalf made with the said plaintiffs in manner and form aforesaid," &c.

To this declaration the defendant demurred generally; and objected: (1) That the death of Joshua Bowman is not stated in the declaration, but only in the recital of the writ, which is no part of the declaration, but a mere formal part of the record to be made up by the clerk. (2) That it is not averred that the money was not paid to Joshua Bowman in his lifetime. 2 Selw. N. P. 405, 406; Hardr. 320; 1 Chit. Pl. 79, note, 304, 317, 326. (3) That it is not averred that the defendant did not give good bills on Boston, New York, or Philadelphia, which by the terms of the charter-party he was allowed to do.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Jones, for plaintiffs, contended: (1) That the recital was a sufficient averment of the death of Joshua Bowman. 1 Har. Ent. 35. (2) That the averment that the defendant had never paid the money, implies that it was not paid to the three, or either of them. (3) That although there were two modes of payment allowed, yet a general averment of non-payment included both.

R. S. Coxe, in reply. (1) The death of Joshua Bowman is only suggested in the recital of the writ. There is no averment of his death upon which the defendant could take issue. The precedents all require a positive averment of the death in the declaration. 1 Har. Ent. 35, 163; 2 Chit. 45; 2 Selw. N. P. 405. (2) The averment in the declaration is that the defendant did not pay the money to the plaintiffs; but he might have paid it to Joshua in his lifetime. The covenant is to pay to the three, not to two only. The breach should be coextensive with the covenant. (3) The covenant upon oyer differs from the statement of it in the declaration, where it does not appear to be in the alternative.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) said that the 2d objection was fatal, and gave no opinion as to the others. The plaintiffs had leave to amend on payment of costs.

[See Cases Nos. 17,892 and 17,894.]

Case No. 17,894.

WINTER et al. v. SIMONTON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 104.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.²

AGREEMENT TO HIRE VESSEL—ACTION FOR HIRE —CONSTRUCTION OF PLEA—DEPOSITION—CERTIFICATE OF COMMISSIONERS.

1. An agreement to hire a vessel, "from Bath to Havana, and from thence to Mobile or elsewhere, in any legal trade for the space of twelve months, at and after the rate of $425 a month, —$600 to be paid on the arrival of the brig at Havana," the owners covenanting "that the said brig shall be tight, stiff, staunch, and strong, well victualled and manned at their own expense, during that period, the dangers of the sea only excepted"—the hirer paying "all port-charges and pilotage at every place" to which she may go, is not a contract of freight.

2. With regard to the destination and loading of the vessel, the hirer is owner pro hac vice.

3. The general owner is not bound to see that the master performs the voyages indicated by the hirer; the master and mariners being, in that respect, subject to the order and control of the hirer.

4. In an action for the hire of a vessel according to the terms of a sealed agreement, the defendant, by pleading, "that he had paid to the plaintiffs all and every such sums of money as were become due and payable from the said defendant, according to the tenor and effect of the said articles of agreement," assumes upon himself the burden of proving that he had paid the hire of the vessel, for the time and at the rate stated in the declaration; and the plaintiffs are not bound to prove any of the facts therein charged.

5. The certificate of the commissioners who have taken a deposition, that they had taken the oath prescribed in their commission, is sufficient evidence of that fact.

6. They are quasi officers of the court, and are to be believed.

Covenant upon an agreement under seal, which was in substance as follows:—That Winter and Bowmans of Bath, (in Maine,) owners of the brig James Munroe of Bath, "agree to let or hire the said brig to the said Simonton, from Bath to Havana, and from thence to Mobile or elsewhere, in any legal trade, for the space of twelve months, at and after the rate of $425 per month, and the said Winter and Bowmans agree that the said brig shall be tight, stiff, staunch, and strong, well victualled and manned at their own expense, during that period, the dangers of the sea only excepted; and the said Simonton on his part agrees to pay or cause to be paid, to the order of the said Winter and Bowmans, on the arrival of the said brig at Havana, the sum of $600; and the said Simonton agrees to pay, or cause to be paid all port-charges and pilotages at every place where she may go to; and the said Simonton further binds himself and agrees to pay, or cause to be paid, after the first-mentioned payment, $600 from time to time, as the charter of the said brig amounts to that sum; that is to say, when the said brig earns $600 at the rate of the before-mentioned charter, it is to be paid in Spanish milled dollars in the United States, or in good and approved bills of exchange at from ten to sixty days sight on Boston, New York, or Philadelphia, to the order of Winter and Bowmans. And it is further understood clearly that the said Winter and Bowmans are to be at no other expense than that of victualling, manning, and keeping the hull and rigging of the said vessel in good order. And the said Simonton agrees that this charter shall commence nine days before the brig's leaving the wharf for sea, which shall be noted at the foot of each agreement, being signed in triplicate; and it is understood, the said Simonton has liberty of lading said vessel with any articles he may think proper, contraband goods always excepted;" penalty $2000; and dated July 15, 1820. At the foot of the agreement is the following, signed by all the parties:—"In case war between the United States and Spain takes place in the intermediate time of the within specified charter of the within named brig James Munroe, it is understood between the parties that the charter shall be null and void on the first information of that event; but that the said

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

² [Reversed in 5 Pet. (30 U. S.) 141.]

Simonton shall deliver the said brig to the within named Samuel Winter and S. G. and J. Bowman, at Bath aforesaid, he paying charter at the rate within specified, up until the time she is so delivered, the dangers of the seas and enemies excepted. And the parties within named further agree, that the charter shall commence on the 7th day of July, 1820." The declaration, after setting out the substance of the contract, and averring performance of the covenants on the part of the plaintiffs to be performed, averred that the brig, on the 7th of July, 1820, being in fit and proper condition, was, by the said Simonton, taken into his service, and on the 16th sailed from Bath, and afterwards arrived at Havana; during all which time, and afterwards, the said brig, under the direction and control and in the employment of the said Simonton, until the 20th of January following, when, during the prosecution of a voyage under the direction of the said Simonton, the brig was lost by the perils of the sea; at which time she had earned $2,734.17, for the hire and affreightment of the said brig, in virtue of the said charter-party, viz., at the rate of $425 per month, during the said term of twelve months, for which the said brig had been let and hired by the said charter-party, as aforesaid, and from and after the said 7th day of July, 1820, until the loss of the brig as aforesaid, &c.; which said sum of $2,734.17 was then and there in arrear and unpaid, and due and owing by the defendant to the plaintiffs, of which he had due notice, but has never paid the same, &c.

After the opinion of the court upon the demurrer heretofore taken to the declaration, the plaintiffs had leave to amend it, which they did, and the defendant then pleaded four pleas in bar, viz:—First plea. "That he, the said defendant, hath paid to the said plaintiffs all and every such sums of money as were become due and payable from the said defendant, according to the tenor and effect, true intent and meaning of the said articles of agreement, and of this he puts himself upon his country. And the plaintiffs likewise." Second plea. "That the plaintiffs did not, on their part, perform and keep the covenants and stipulations in the said articles of agreement contained, on their part and behalf to be performed and done, according to the tenor and effect, true intent and meaning of the same, in this, to wit: that the said brig or vessel in the said articles of agreement mentioned, the James Munroe, did not pursue the voyage and voyages which the said defendant ordered and appointed for her, and carry on the legal trade in which the said defendant engaged and employed her; but did, without any sufficient lawful cause therefor, depart and deviate from the same; and did, on the 27th of November, 1820, while subject to the order and control of the said defendant, under and by virtue of the said articles of agreement, omit and fail to proceed from Port au Prince to Crooked Island, as the defendant had ordered and appointed; and did unlawfully, and in violation of said articles of agreement, and of the duty and obligations imposed by the same, proceed to the port of Havana, in the island of Cuba, against the orders and directions of this defendant, whereby he sustained great loss and expense, and the voyage in which the said vessel or brig was engaged was greatly delayed and defeated; and afterwards, while the said articles of agreement continued in full force and effect, viz., on the 30th of December, 1820, the said brig or vessel did unlawfully sail from said Crooked Island to Ragged Island, instead of proceeding to the port of Mobile, to which she was destined and bound, according to the orders and instructions of this defendant, whereby and by reason of such unlawful deviation from her voyage, and violation of the orders of this defendant, the said voyage was wholly defeated; and the said brig or vessel was afterwards, viz., on the 20th of January, 1821, wholly lost by shipwreck, and a cargo on board belonging to this defendant, of the value of $10,000, was wholly lost and destroyed to this defendant; and this he is ready to verify," &c. Third plea. This plea was, in substance, that while the brig was lawfully subject to the orders and directions of this defendant, she was dispatched and ordered by the defendant, in a lawful trade, from Port au Prince to Crooked Island, and sailed in the said voyage; "Yet the captain and crew of the vessel, in violation of the orders of the defendant, did carry the said brig to the port of Havana;" whereby, &c. Fourth plea. The fourth plea, in substance, was: That on the 30th of December, 1820, the brig being at Crooked Island, to take in a cargo of salt for the defendant, to be carried direct to Mobile, the defendant procured insurance to be made from Crooked Island to Mobile; yet the captain and crew, well knowing the premises, and without the consent of the defendant, deviated from the said voyage without lawful authority or excuse, and proceeded from Crooked Island to Ragged Island; in consequence of which deviation the brig was lost, and the insurance became void. To the three last pleas there were general demurrers, and joinders.

Mr. Barrell for the plaintiffs, to show that the matters pleaded in these pleas were not conditions, or covenants precedent, cited 5 Petersd. Abr. 313, 314, 318, 325, 326, 328, 329; Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555; Ritchie v. Atkinson, Id. 295; Shields v. Davis, 6 Taunt. 65; Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 East, 381; Sheels v. Davies, 4 Camp. 119; Cole v. Shallet, 3 Lev. 41, 5 Petersd. Abr. 390; Bornmann v. Tooke, 1 Camp. 377.

Mr. Bradley and Mr. Coxe, contra, contended that obedience of orders was, in the nature of things, precedent to the right to recover for the use of the vessel; that freight is not earned until the end of the voyage, and the delivery of the goods; that the contract of freight is entire; that, in the present case, nothing was due until the end of the twelve months for which the vessel was hired; that the question whether a covenant be precedent or not depends more on the nature of the covenant than on its words. They cited Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555; Ritchie v. Atkinson, Id. 295; Shields v. Davis, 6 Taunt. 65; Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 East, 381; Sheels v. Davies, 4 Camp. 119; 5 Petersd. Abr. 314, note, 329, 347, 368; Hotham v. East India Co., Doug. 272; Constable v. Globerie, Palm. 397; Bornmann v. Tooke, 1 Camp. 377; Osgood v. Groning, 2 Camp. 466; Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burrows, 882; Cook v. Jennings, 7 Term. R. 381; Olhson v. Drummond, 2 Chit. 705; Com. Cont. 323; Penoyer v. Hallett, 15 Johns. 332; Liddard v. Lopes, 10 East, 526; Caze v. Baltimore Ins. Co., 7 Cranch (11 U. S.) 362; Selw. N. P. "Covenant," 444; 4 Bac. Abr. 627, "Merchant," H.; Byrne v. Pattison, 2 B. & A. 17; S. C. Abb. Shipp. 270, note; 2 Bac. Abr. "Covenant," D; 2 Selw. N. P. 439; Jac. Sea Laws, 229; Abb. Shipp. 134, 163, §§ 13, 209; Ritchie v. Atkinson, 10 East, 306; Magalhaens v. Busher, 4 Camp. 54, 55, 389; Abb. Shipp. 133, 179, 265, § 19; 3 Chit. Pl. 96, 317, 319, 490, 492; 5 Petersd. Abr. 341, §§ 2, 345, 346; Clarke v. Gurnell, 1 Buis. 167; Mackrell v. Simond [2 Chit. 666], Abb. Shipp. 209, 267; Bright v. Cowper, 1 Brownl. & G. 21; Smith v. Wilson, 8 East, 445. See, also, Cole v. Shallet, 3 Lev. 41; Shower v. Anderson, T. Jones, 216; Porter v. Shephard, 6 Term. R. 665; Campbell v. Jones, 6 Term. R. 571; Thorpe v. Thorpe, 1 Salk. 171; Gibbon v. Mendez, 2 Barn. & Ald. 17; Vallejo v. Wheeler, Cowp. 144, 147, 154, 155; Hutton v. Bragg, 2 Marsh. C. P. 339; S. C. 7 Taunt. 14; Trinity House v. Clark, 4 Maule & S. 288; Saville v. Campion, 2 Barn. & Ald. 503, 5 Petersd. Abr. 299; Paul v. Birch, 2 Atk. 621; Frazer v. Marsh, 13 East, 238; S. C. 2 Camp. 517; M'Intyre v. Bowne, 1 Johns. 229; Hooe v. Groverman, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 215; Fletcher v. Braddick, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 182; Story, Abb. 33 (27); Cheriot v. Barker, 2 Johns. 346; Tate v. Meek, 2 Moore, 278, cited in 2 Barn. & Ald. 509, not then reported; Yates v. Railston, 2 Moore, 294, also cited in 2 Barn. & Ald. 509; Yates v. Mennell, 2 Moore, 297.

[See Cases Nos. 17,892 and 17,893.]

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The second plea sets up, by way of defence, supposed breaches of covenant on the part of the plaintiffs, and the questions occur: 1st, whether any of the facts stated constitute such a breach of covenant on their part; and, 2d, if so, then whether the covenants, so broken by the plaintiffs, were precedent covenants on their part. Both of which questions must be answered in the affirmative, or the plea must be adjudged bad. Do any of the facts averred in the plea constitute a breach of covenant on the part of the plaintiffs? The facts stated in that plea are, that the brig did not pursue the voyage and voyages which the defendant ordered and appointed for her, and carry on the legal trade in which the defendant engaged and employed her, but did, without any sufficient or lawful cause therefor, depart and deviate from the same; and did, on the 27th of November, 1820, while subject to the control of the defendant, omit and fail to proceed from Port au Prince to Crooked Island, as the plaintiff had ordered and appointed, and proceeded to Havana, against the orders and directions of the defendant; and on the 30th of December sailed from Crooked Island to Ragged Island, instead of proceeding to Mobile, according to the orders of the defendant; by which deviation, and violation of orders the voyage was defeated, and the vessel and cargo lost, on the 20th of January, 1821. This plea is founded upon the supposed obligation of the plaintiffs, either by express covenant, or by implied duty as owners, to see that the brig should perform such voyages as the defendant should indicate; and that the discharge of such obligation or duty was a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiffs to recover the sum stipulated to be paid for the hire of the brig. No such express covenant is found in the charter-party.

The only express covenants, on the part of the plaintiffs are: (1) To let or hire the brig to the defendant, to be used by him, from Bath to Havana, and from thence to Mobile or elsewhere, in any legal trade, for the term of twelve months; (2) that she shall be tight, stiff, stanch, and strong, well-victualled and manned, at the plaintiffs' expense, during that period; the dangers of the seas excepted. If there be any covenant that the brig should go to Havana, or any other port, it is a covenant on the part of the defendant, and for the security of the plaintiffs; for if the brig had never arrived at Havana, the plaintiffs, according to the case of Gibbon v. Mendez, 2 Barn. & Ald. 17, could never have recovered any thing for the hire; because no payment was to be made by the defendant until the arrival of the brig at that port. Nor was there an implied obligation upon the plaintiffs, as owners, to see that the brig should perform such voyages as the defendant should indicate. The possession of the whole vessel and crew was delivered to the defendant, to use them in such voyages, and in such lawful trade as he should think proper with the single limitation of going first to Havana. In that respect, the vessel, the master, and mariners were, as is admitted by the plea, subject to the order and control of the defendant. He had a right to direct the lading and destination of the brig, and he was to pay all port charges and pilotages at every place to which she might go. No orders, in these respects, were to be given to the master or mariners, by the plaintiffs. That it was the intention of the parties that the possession of the brig should belong to the defendant is evident from his covenant in the memorandum at the foot of the charter-party, that in case of a war with Spain, he should deliver the brig to the plaintiffs at Bath, "he paying charter at the rate within specified until the time she is so delivered, the dangers of the seas and enemies excepted."

In regard, therefore, to the destination and loading of the vessel, the defendant himself was owner pro hac vice; and the plaintiffs were under no implied obligation to see that the specific voyages should be performed, which the defendant might project. This was not a contract of freight, but of hire. The plaintiffs did not covenant to carry goods, or to perform any specific voyage. In Story, Abb. Shipp. p. 273, it is said, that if the price of transportation of goods be paid upon their being laden on board the vessel, even "this payment, although commonly called freight, is not properly so denominated, that word denoting the price rather of actual carriage than of receiving goods in order to be carried; and therefore in the case of Blakey v. Dixon, 2 Bos. & P. 321, the court, admitting that an action might be brought for money agreed to be paid on receiving the goods on shipboard in order to be transported, decided that such money could not be recovered by the name of freight." Freight is a compensation for the carriage of goods. Watson v. Duykinck, 3 Johns. 335. In the present charter-party the word freight is cautiously avoided, even at the expense of some awkwardness of expression. The plaintiffs agree to "let, or hire," not "let to freight," as is usual in charter-parties of affreightment. The instrument is called "this memorandum of an agreement;" not "this charter-party of affreightment," as is usual in contracts for freight. The word voyage is not used in any part of the instrument, probably because that word, in common acceptance, includes the idea of a mercantile adventure, and not merely the act of going from one port to another; and because the price to be paid was for the time and ability to use the vessel, and not for the actual use of her. The word "freight" was probably avoided because it implied an actual transportation of goods, and it might possibly be said that no freight would be due if no goods should be transported. The usual words "for a voyage," were probably avoided because it might be said that no freight would be earned until the voyage should be ended. The parties have substituted the word "charter" for the usual term "freight." Thus the defendant agrees "to pay $600 from time to time as the charter of the said brig amounts to that sum: that is to say, when the said brig earns $600, at the rate of the before-mentioned charter, it is to be paid in Spanish milled dollars," &c. And again, the defendant agrees "that the charter shall commence nine days before the brig's leaving the wharf for sea;" and in the memorandum it is provided that, in a certain event, the defendant is to deliver the brig to the plaintiffs at Bath, "he" (the defendant) "paying charter at the rate within specified." The defendant was at liberty to take in goods on freight. In that case the defendant would be entitled to the freight and the plaintiffs to the hire, or the charter, as it is called in the agreement; and each might insure his own interest. The plaintiffs might insure the hire the defendant the freight. If the defendant had taken in goods on freight, the shipper's remedy for non-delivery of those goods would have been against the defendant as owner pro hac vice, and not against the plaintiffs. The court is therefore clearly and unanimously of opinion that this is a case of hire and not of freight. The price was earned by time, not by the carrying of goods, or the ending of a voyage, except as to the payment of the first sum of $600 at Havana. The arrival of the vessel at Havana was a condition precedent to the payment of that sum, not because it was the freight of goods, nor because the voyage was there ended; but because, until the arrival of the brig at Havana the casus foederis would not have occurred.

The court being of opinion that there was no obligation upon the plaintiffs, either express or implied, to see that the vessel performed the voyage, projected by the defendant, it is unnecessary to consider the other question, viz. whether the plaintiffs' discharge of such an obligation, if it had existed, would have been a condition precedent to the payment of the sum stipulated to be paid for the hire of the vessel; and all the cases may be laid aside which were cited to show that freight is not due until the goods are delivered, or the voyage ended; and to show what covenants are precedent, and what are mutual. The court has carefully examined the authorities cited, and many more, to show in what cases the owner, and in what the charterer, shall be considered as the owner pro hac vice; and they find no case in which the charterer has been held to be owner pro hac vice, so strong as the present; and none in which the possession of the vessel, for the time, has been more completely transferred to the charterer. It would occupy too much time to remark particularly upon the authorities which have been consulted upon that point.

The court has also examined the declaration, and can see no substantial fault in it; and we are unanimously of opinion that the 2d plea is bad. The 3d plea avers a deviation by the master and crew, while the vessel was lawfully subject to the orders and directions of the defendants; and the 4th plea avers that the captain and crew deviated, whereby the vessel and insurance were lost. The court is of opinion that both these pleas are bad for the reasons before given in regard to the 2d plea.

After the opinion of the court was given, the cause came on for trial upon the issue joined upon the first plea, which was, in substance, that the defendant "hath paid to the said plaintiffs all and every such sums of money as were become due and payable from the defendant, according to the tenor and effect, true intent and meaning of the said articles of agreement; and of this he puts himself on the country," and the plaintiffs likewise.

Upon the trial of this issue, Mr. Barrell, for plaintiffs, offered the deposition of Mr. Weber, the master of the brig, taken under a commission from this court.

Mr. Bradley, for defendant, objected that it did not appear that William Terry, who certifies himself to be a justice of the peace, and that the commissioners took before him the oath required by the commission, was a justice of the peace.

THE COURT, however, overruled the objection, saying that the certificate of the commissioners was sufficient evidence that the oath had been properly taken. They are quoad hoc the officers of this court, and are to be believed.

In the course of the trial, which occupied several days, THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, absent) instructed the jury, at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, "that the plea is no traverse of any averment in the declaration necessary to establish the primary obligation to pay what is therein demanded, nor imposes on the plaintiffs any necessity, in supporting the issue on their part above joined, to prove any averment in their declaration; but that the whole onus probandi, under the affirmative plea of payment, is on the defendant to prove such payment as he has alleged;" the court being of opinion, and so expressing it to the jury, that upon the issue joined in this case, and which the jury had been sworn to try, the defendant had assumed upon himself the burden of proving that he had paid the hire of said vessel for the time stated in the declaration, at the rate of $425 per month.

The defendant took a bill of exceptions and carried the cause to the supreme court, where it was reversed (5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 141), for error in that instruction; but Mr. Justice THOMPSON, who delivered the opinion, intimated that the judgment of this court upon the demurrer, was probably correct.

Case No. 17,895.

WINTER et al. v. UNITED STATES.

[Hempst. 344.]¹

District Court, D. Arkansas. Oct., 1848.

SPANISH LAND GRANT—OPEN CONCESSION—NEGOTIATION OF SURVEY—IDENTIFICATION OF MONUMENTS.

1. Hearsay and reputation are not admissible to prove particular facts in a contest as to private rights, and hence proof that a stone monument was reputed to have been put down to designate a private grant, cannot be received.

2. By the laws and ordinances of Spain, and the regulations and usages of the province of Louisiana, the survey of an open concession or grant was necessary to give it locality and to perfect the title in the grantee, and without which private was not separated from public property, nor was the grant valid as against the government which made it, and hence not valid against the United States.

[Approved in De Villemont v. U. S., Case No. 3,839; Cited in Glenn v. U. S., Id. 5,481.]

3. The regulations of Count O'Reilly, of 1770; those of Gayoso, of 1797; those of Morales, of 1797; the regulations existing in Florida as to the survey of lands, and decisions of the supreme court of the United States on that subject, referred to and commented on at large.

4. A survey of lands under the Spanish government, as with us, meant and consisted in the actual measurement of land, ascertaining the contents by running lines and angles, with compass and chain; establishing corners and boundaries, and designating the same by marking trees, fixing monuments, or referring to existing objects of notoriety on the ground, giving bearings and distances, and making descriptive field notes and plots of the work [Ellicott v. Pearl] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 441; [U. S. v. Hanson] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 198.

[Cited in Muse v. Arlington Hotel Co., 68 Fed. 641.]

5. A warrant or order of survey could be executed by the surveyor-general of the province of Louisiana or by any deputy appointed by him, or by the district surveyor, or by the commandant of a post, or by a private person specially authorized by the governor general or intendant; but Spain never permitted individuals to locate their grants by mere private survey.

6. The supreme court of the United States has decided in various cases, that an actual survey of an open concession was a necessary ingredient to its validity, and that it must also have been an authorized survey to sever any land from the royal domain. These cases cited.

7. A party is bound to abide by his own pleadings, and cannot therefore be permitted to prove any thing in opposition thereto.

8. Therefore a petition which prays for the confirmation of an indefinite grant, and shows on its face by express averment, that the same was not surveyed, presents a case in which the claim must be rejected.

9. Fixing a stone post or monument at any particular spot, with however much solemnity, was not equivalent to a survey, nor could it in the very nature of things designate any particular or specific land, and it was, therefore, an unauthorized act, not recognized by the Spanish government.

10. No usage or custom can prevail against an express law of the lawmaking power.

¹ [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

11. Under the government of Spain, as well as by the civil law, conditions in grants were required to be performed, and were not inserted as mere matters of form.

12. A grant of one million of arpens of land, at the port of Arkansas, made by the Baron de Carondelet, governor-general of Louisiana, to Elisha Winter, on the 27th of June, 1797, rejected, because the grant did not designate any particular land, and was not designated and ascertained by an authorized survey.

Petition for the confirmation of a Spanish grant, determined in the district court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, under the act of congress of the 26th of May, 1824 (4 Stat. 52), before Benjamin JOHNSON, District Judge. The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court. A translation of the concession referred to in the petition and thereto attached, was as follows:

"The Baron De Carondelet, Knight of the Religious Order of St. John, Field Marshal of the Royal Armies, Governor-General and Vice Patron of the Province of Louisiana and West Florida, Inspector of the Troops of the Same, &c. Being desirous to promote the population and agriculture by all the means adapted to the political circumstances of the times, and advertng to the proposals made to the government by Elisha Winter, to the end of forming a settlement in the post of Arkansas, for the cultivation of flax, wheat, and hemp; therefore, in order to realize said object, I presently concede to said Elisha Winter one thousand arpens of land square, to William Winter five hundred arpens square, to Gabriel Winter five hundred square, and to Samuel Price, Richard Price, William Hubble, John Price, William Russell, Joseph Stetwell, and Walter Karr, fifteen arpens of land in front by forty in depth, to each of them respectively, in consideration of the good information given to me of their excellent deportment and good principles, under the express conditions, that as soon as they shall have settled themselves on their respective surveys, which the commandant of the post will cause to be executed, there shall be delivered to each one his title deed in due form; that the settlement is to be made as united and as closely connected as possible, nor are any other American families to be admitted than those above named, and such as the government may permit to settle, which permission may be given in the meal time by the commandant to the good colonists, such as Spanish, French, German, and Irish, who shall make application; but no manner of admission shall be granted to vagabonds, and for any contravention of this clause the commandant will be held responsible. Provided, that if in the term of one year the lands appropriated in this document to the families above named, respectively, are not occupied, this concession shall be void, which shall be attended to in all its parts by the commandant of the district, who is charged with the strict execution of the whole, consistent with the beneficence and humanity of the Spanish government. The present given at New Orleans, the 27th of June, 1797.

"[L. S.] The Baron De Carondelet.
"Andrez Lopez Armisto."

Among various exceptions to testimony adduced by the petitioners, was one to the deposition of William Russell. The material parts of the deposition were as follows:—William Russell being duly sworn, says, the first time he was at the post of Arkansas, was either in 1812 or 1813; that he then heard the grants to the Winters frequently spoken of, and that it was the general understanding of the community at the post of Arkansas, that three grants, one to Elisha Winter, one to William Winter, and one to Gabriel Winter, had been made by the Spanish government; that William Winter had settled on the lands granted to him, very soon after the grant was made, and that he continued to reside on it until his death, and was buried on it. It was generally understood and reported at the post, that Elisha Winter, soon after the date of the grant, brought from Lexington, Kentucky, a hewn stone or monument, three or more feet long, and of large size, which was established under the superintendence of Don Carlos De Villemont, the then Spanish commandant of the post, in 1798, as the south-east corner of the tract granted to Elisha Winter, and as the south-west corner of the tract granted to William Winter. The place pointed out to me, as that where William Winter settled and lived and died, was north of east of the corner-stone, and one mile and a half from it. The grant to William Winter was generally understood, and reputed at the post of Arkansas, in 1812 or 1813, to lie east of that granted to Elisha Winter; that the lines of these tracts were to be run to the cardinal points, and that the line dividing them was to be run north from this corner-stone. He has heard the said Don Carlos De Villemont say, that the stone was planted with a good deal of public ceremony for the purpose of putting the grantees in possession of their lands. As to these matters he has no personal knowledge, and what he does know and states is derived from hearsay and reputation. In 1816 or 1817, he was at the said corner-stone, which had then fallen down and was lying on the ground; but it was generally said to be at the same spot where it was first set, in 1798.

To this deposition the United States, by S. H. Hempstead, district attorney, excepted on the ground that it was formed of "matters of hearsay and reputation as to particular facts, and therefore inadmissible." An exception was also taken to the statement of Don Carlos De Villemont, made before Frederick Bates in 1813, on the ground that the latter had no authority to take it.

These exceptions having been argued by Daniel Ringo, for the petitioners, and S. H.

Hempstead, Dist. Atty., for the United States, THE COURT, on the 7th of September, 1846, delivered the following opinion:—

OPINION OF THE COURT (JOHNSON, District Judge). The first exception is to the second deposition of William Russell. It is not deemed necessary to notice any other ground of exception to this deposition than the one which relates to hearsay and reputation. The court heretofore ruled in this case, that hearsay and reputation was not admissible to prove particular facts in a contest as to private rights; and it may not be improper briefly to state the reasons on which the rule is based. It is certainly a general and long established principle of the law of evidence, that hearsay and reputation is not competent to prove any fact in a court of justice. The reason is that evidence ought to be given under the sanction of an oath, and an opportunity afforded of cross-examination. It is also unquestionable, that there are some exceptions, which are probably as ancient as the rule itself, and which are allowed, either because the danger attending such evidence is not likely to occur in the excepted cases, or because greater inconvenience would result from its exclusion than its admission; and among these exceptions are questions relating to public rights. In these cases common reputation is admitted, because such rights being matters of public notoriety, and of great local importance, become a continual subject of discussion in the neighborhood, where all have the same means of information, and the same interest to ascertain the claim. 1 Phil. Ev. 248; Weeks v. Sparke, 1 Maule & S. 679; Morewood v. Wood, 14 East, 329. The boundaries of parishes or manors may be thus proved, because they are more or less of public concern; and it is not to be doubted that if a contest should arise between two states or two countries, as to boundary, general reputation would be admissible. Gris. Eq. Ev. 220. The tradition, however, of a particular fact, as that a post or stone was put down, or turf dug in a particular spot, is not competent evidence to establish a private right, because it is not a matter of public concern in which the community are interested. This rule is undoubtedly sustained by the English cases, and by the weight of authority in the American courts. 1 Phil. Ev. 250; 3 Term R. 709; 5 Term R. 123; 14 East, 330; 1 Price, 253; 1 Anstr. 298; Cherry v. Boyd, Litt. Sel. Cas. 7; Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. (Va.) 276; U. S. v. Kingsley, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 483; Elecott v. Pearl, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 412. The whole object and scope of Russell's deposition is to prove matters of reputation, or the voice of common rumor, which relate to no public; but to a strictly private right. The petitioners are prosecuting a private claim in this court, in which the public are not interested in the sense contemplated by the rule as to public matters. The deposition of Russell is, in the opinion of the court, incompetent and inadmissible as evidence, and must be rejected.

The third exception is to the testimony of Don Carlos De Villemont, purporting to have been taken before Frederick Bates, as commissioner, in 1813. The main ground relied on by the district attorney to exclude this testimony is, that "the recorder of land titles, acting as commissioner, had no jurisdiction over the case, and had therefore no authority to take the testimony." By an act of congress of the 13th of June, 1812 (2 Stat. 748), power was vested in the recorder of land titles to investigate and report on certain Spanish and French claims in the state of Missouri. His authority appears to have been confined to two classes of cases; first, to the claims of persons who were then actual settlers on the land they claimed, and whose claims had not been before that time filed with the recorder of land titles. Such persons were allowed to file a notice in writing, stating the nature and extent of their claims, and the written evidences thereof, which were directed to be recorded. Second, to claims which had been presented to the board of commissioners of Missouri, but had not been decided on by that board. The recorder has authority to take testimony in these two classes of cases. 1 Land Laws, 622. Now this case could not belong to the first class; because the claimant was not then an actual settler on the land; nor did he file any notice of claim with the recorder. Nor could it belong to the second class, because, although it had been before the board of commissioners, it had been rejected by that board. It had therefore "been decided on," and whether rightfully or wrongfully, it was not his province to determine. It was certainly not the intention of congress, either by that or any subsequent law, to give him authority to reinvestigate either confirmations or rejections of claims made by the board of commissioners. Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 454. This case, then, was not regularly before him; he had no jurisdiction over it for any purpose whatever, and it must therefore follow that he had no authority to take the testimony, and that it is of no more force or validity than a mere ex parte statement. It must, therefore, be excluded. The second deposition of William Russell, and the testimony of Don Carlos De Villemont, must be rejected and suppressed.

The remaining exceptions of the district attorney to the evidence adduced by the petitioners, will be reserved for decision till the final hearing of the cause. Depositions suppressed.

Samuel C. Roane and Frederick W. Trapnall appeared as counsel for the petitioners. Daniel Ringo was also of counsel for the petitioners, who argued the law and facts of the case at great length. The following is a synopsis of his argument, and the points and authorities referred to by him:—

The grant is indisputably proven. The lands granted are at the post of Arkansas. Is not this definite? Cannot a survey be made from it? The lands were granted for settlement and agriculture, as is particularly shown on face of the grant. They were granted June 27, 1797, to be settled in one year. In the winter or spring following, all the grantees removed to the post and settled there as agricultural farmers, embarked in a business not previously followed by them, and remained there engaged in such business until at and after the United States took possession of the country, a period of seven years at least. This is proven by Stilwell and Many. Their settlement was upon the nearest vacant land to the post; the land between their settlement and the post was occupied by and granted to others. This is proven by Stilwell and Pelham. They removed there with the avowed design of settling on lands granted them by the Spanish government, and induced Stilwell to remove with them to occupy lands granted to him by the same instrument. This is proven by Stilwell. Winter procured in Kentucky, and brought with him to Arkansas, a stone two feet long, avowedly for a corner monument to the lands granted him, which, shortly after their arrival at the post, was taken to his dwelling, and thence to a place some two miles distant, and planted in the ground upright, just outside the lands granted to and occupied by others, where it has ever since remained. This is proven by Stilwell. Winter, thenceforward, claimed there the quantity of land given by said grant; his claim was notorious, and must have been known to the commandant, and he exercised acts of ownership by occupancy, and by bartering some of it with Stilwell's father. The settlement at the post consisted then of some forty or fifty families, confined within the compass of four or five miles from the post. Proven by Stilwell. Stilwell's father was put into possession of his land by the commandant; and in the same manner was every one who settled at the post invested with the land occupied by him. The grant contained an order to the commandant to put the grantees in possession of the granted lands; establish the boundaries of their lands respectively; whereupon a title deed in form should be given to each, and provided that if the lands granted were not occupied by the families named in the grant within one year, the concession should be void. Settlement on the granted lands within one year, was the only condition prescribed to the grantees; the commandant was charged with the duty of establishing the boundary, or making the surveys, and forbid to admit other Americans, not named, as settlers. This proves, incontestably, that the commandant possessed and exercised the control of the settlements made at the post, or within his jurisdiction, allowing only such persons to settle there as he was ordered by his superior, or himself judged proper to admit, and excluded such as he was directed, or chose, from settling. Also that he prescribed to each the place of his settlement, which was to be as united and contiguous as possible; and he is commanded expressly to attend to the strict execution thereof in all its parts.

What was it that the commandant was thus enjoined to attend to, and do or see done? (1) To survey, cause to be surveyed, or establish the boundaries of the lands granted. (2) To see that each family to whom the lands were granted was established on the same within one year from the date of the grant. (3) To see that no more or other American families than those named were admitted to settle on said lands. Did he perform these orders? The Winter families and Stilwell removed to the post, and were settled and established there as early as the spring of 1798; Stilwell was formally put into possession by the commandant; the Winters at once made extensive improvements, erected permanent buildings, cleared lands, cultivated wheat, flax, hemp, and cotton; brought to the country sheep and other stock, the first that were ever there, and slaves and hired men; brought a stone to be planted as a monument on corner to the land granted, which was planted within two weeks after their arrival at a place contiguous to, but outside of the lands then occupied by others, so that a line extended west and east from it would embrace their settlement north of such line, in the quantity of lands granted to them; continued their settlement at the same place for seven years under the Spanish government, claiming the land as their private property under said grant, and that said stone had been planted by the commandant as the south-east corner of E. Winter's tract. These facts were notorious; were much talked of; were known to the various commandants, who never molested them, or denied their right, as claimed; nor did they ever complain that the commandant had not done what was required of him, nor did the governor ever complain that his orders had not been executed. The commandant was a public officer, and the law presumes that he discharged his duty, and the presumption is therefore irresistible that he established the boundary of the lands granted to Winter and his sons; that he caused said stone to be planted as a monument of such boundary; that it indicated the south-east corner of the tract of Elisha Winter; and that he saw the Winter family established on the lands so granted to them, according to his orders and the usages and customs then observed at said post. As to presumption, Hartwell v. Root, 19 Johns. 345; Ross v. Reed, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 482; Frost v. Brown, 2 Bay, 133.

With this conclusion every act of the parties accords; while no one fact has been or can be adduced to militate against this presumption; let us see. The grant was made June 27, 1797. By it the commandant was required to set apart to each family the lands granted; and they were to establish themselves on the lands so granted and set apart for them respectively within one year: these facts are incontestably proven. Winter procured in Kentucky and brought to Arkansas a hewn stone of large size, two feet long,—there was no other such at or near the post,—removed to and settled at the post. The stone was set up conspicuously in the prairie immediately after. Winter claimed the land to the extent of the grant northwardly, claimed the stone as his southeast corner. All these facts were notorious at the post in 1798, and thenceforward; no one then controverted his rights as claimed. But it has been said in argument that the stone may have been planted without the authority or direction of the commandant. For what purpose? Can a rational man suppose that Winter would have procured, transported, and planted it, without any object? or that he would have planted it with the design of making title to lands not granted to him? or that the commandant would have suffered him to establish himself on the land, of which he publicly claimed this was a corner monument, and quietly occupy it for seven years under such claim, and to exercise all the acts of ownership over it? Such a supposition is directly opposed to the ordinary conduct of men, to the usages of the Spanish authorities, to the express orders to the commandant, and utterly irreconcilable with the acts and conduct of the parties, and the legal presumptions based on them. Nor could any of the parties at that period have anticipated a change of government, or acted in reference to such event; nor can it be presumed that Winter, by such conduct, could have expected to make title to or hold the lands claimed by means other than those warranted by the laws, usages, and customs then prevailing in said district; so that no possible motive for planting said stone without the direction and authority of the commandant can be conceived.

But it has been also urged that this is a general grant, which could only be so located as to sever the granted lands from the domain, and make them the property of the grantees, by an actual survey thereof, made by or under the authority of the Spanish surveyor-general. To this we reply, that the governor-general, as viceroy, possessed, in regard to the disposal of the public lands, all the powers of the king. 1 White, New Recop. pp. 367-372; 2 White, New Recop. p. 31, § 23; Id. p. 38, § 45; Id. p. 41, § 50; fee-simple right acquired in four years, Id. p. 49, § 75; grants not revoked without fault of grantee, Id. p. 99; as to mode of grants, surveys, &c., Id. p. 474; Morales's letter of

Oct. 16, 1797; custom, 1 White, New Recop. p. 360, tit. 7; as to dominion, Id. p. 85, cc. 1-4, mode of acquiring, Id. 91, cc. 9-11; Id. p. 154, §§ 1-3; Id. p. 300, c. 7; Id. pp. 341-344; Smith v. U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 326. He was neither restrained by any law or order of the king, nor could he be by any regulations of his predecessors, for his powers were equal to theirs, and he could limit or abrogate them in whole or in any particular.

In the present grant he expressly orders the commandant of the post to establish the boundaries, or cause the surveys to be made, as he had an unquestionable right to do. It is in proof that no surveyor was then in the district of Arkansas, nor any actual surveys made for years thereafter. That post was a frontier, remote from the capital and exposed to Indian depredations, and no actual survey of these lands could safely have been made; which facts were doubtless known to the governor, and fully account for the orders given by him to the commandant to establish the boundaries of the lands, or cause them to be surveyed, thus dispensing with a survey by the surveyor-general of these lands. That no survey by actual admeasurement and running and marking the lines was then made, is admitted; but that a boundary was fixed by the commandant, we insist is established: (1) By proof of the occupancy by the grantees. (2) By the planting of the stone as a monument of the boundary, and the marking of trees to indicate the boundary. (3) By the figurative plots of said tracts returned to and found in the land archives of said province and district.

The lands at the post were then in Lower Louisiana (proven by Stoddard), and the archives belonged to the office at New Orleans, the capital; and these plots were found in said archives in 1805, indorsed by Trudeau, the surveyor of said province; that they were received by him October 8, 1798, as appears by the certificate of Armesta; the same remained in the archives at New Orleans on the 1st March, 1808, as appears by the certified copies made on that day by Trudeau, the same person who had custody of the originals in 1798, and also in 1808; also in the records relating to said province taken to Florida on the surrender of Louisiana; the same evidence is found in 1808, and Trudeau, in April, 1808, again certifies that he took a copy of the original plot, and deposited the same among the archives; and the same remains in said office in 1848, as appears by the testimony and certificate of Bringier, the present depository thereof, under the authority of the state of Louisiana. In 1808, June 18, the copies of said plats, of 1st and 2d of March, were produced to the board of commissioners for Louisiana and recorded in the recorder's office established by the United States at St. Louis. At that time the whole was within the same jurisdiction; and copies from the office at New Orleans, where the originals then were, without additional authentication, were as conclusive as the originals or protocols which by law must remain among the archives, and unless shown to be antedated or fraudulent, were conclusive. 1 White, New Recop. tit. "Proofs." Such copy, therefore, imported such verity as by law clearly entitled it to be used as evidence, and to be admitted to record by the United States recorder. Trudeau had been intrusted with the custody of these archives by the Spanish government, and they continued in his custody afterwards under the authority of the United States government; he was their lawful custodian, and he had a right, under the unaltered laws and usages in force in the province, to authenticate copies of them, as he did; nor was there then or now any authorized imputation that such survey or plot was made at a different time, or received at a different time from that stated by Trudeau, namely, October 8, 1798, or that such plots have not been in his office as public archives ever since. And can it now be presumed, without evidence, that they were not made and deposited in 1798, or that the plots of survey were not made by proper authority? If not made by such authority, would they have been received and kept on record as archives by the proper depository of the surveys as authentic evidence of title? Such presumption is contrary to reason, and not warranted by any principle or rule of law; but on the contrary, the presumption from the facts is irresistible. that it was a plot or survey authorized in such case, constituting an authentic evidence of title in the grantees to the lands therein indicated. Otherwise it would not have been so officially filed and preserved by the lawful and proper depository of such evidences of title; nor can he be presumed to have acted fraudulently in the matter.

The evidence of genuineness of these plots is, therefore, at least prima facie, established; and there is no testimony contravening this fact. The presumption that the commandant executed the order of the governor, established the boundary of said lands, or caused said plots thereof to be made, is corroborated by these facts; and the stone being mentioned thereon, as a point in the boundary, corroborates the evidence and presumption that said stone was planted by the commandant, or his authority, as a monument or evidence of the boundary of said lands. These copies of said plots, as stated above, were recorded by the board of commissioners June 18, 1808. By acts of congress claimants were required, within a limited time, to produce for record the written evidence of their right, under penalty that if not so recorded they should never be received in evidence in any court; which requirement Winters complied with June 18, 1808, and his grant and these plots were then recorded by the recorder of the United States. But it has been said that the recording gives them no character or validity as evidence; that the recorder should record papers produced without regard to their genuineness or otherwise, and that before a copy of such record can be read, the genuineness of the original must be proven by extraneous evidence.

Can such be a fair exposition of the acts of congress requiring such documentary testimony? If so, the effect would be simply to impose burdens on the claimants, and seduce them into a fatal but delusive security as to the evidences of their titles, by requiring them, under the penalty of losing the benefit of such documents as evidences of their rights if they should fail to have them so recorded, and subjecting them to the expenses incident to such recording. Such we cannot conceive to have been the design of the government, or the effect of the law; and we insist, that by recording them they were intended to be made evidence without further proof, as without such recording they are forbidden to be received as evidence in any court. 1 Land Laws, 519, 528, 548, 620, 636, 640. If such be not the fact, no advantage whatever could result to the claimants, but only advantages to the government, and burdens and prejudice to the claimants; a result not warranted by the spirit of the acts of congress, but directly opposed to it. See MacKay v. Dillon, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 445. Copies admitted by court in Missouri, and admission not disapproved.

But from lapse of time, if from no other principles, the transcripts of these plots ought to be received as evidence, being from the proper office and made by the proper depository of the original papers, in which office they are in this instance shown to have been since 1798, a period of fifty years, within which time witnesses to the transaction are presumed to have died or departed the vicinity, and especially such may be presumed to be the case in the circumstances of the present case, the act having taken place under a foreign government, and seven years before the present government acquired jurisdiction; the smallness and sparseness of the settlements, and the removal of many of the inhabitants on the change of government, as well as the death of all the parties to the transaction,—the grantees, the commandant, and the surveyor-general. See Duncan v. Beard, 2 Nott & McC. 406; Phil. Ev. 477, 479, and notes; 3 Phil. Ev. 1310; Jackson v. Laroway, 3 Johns. Cas. 283; Hewlett v. Cock, 7 Wend. 371; Barr v. Gratz, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 213; Winn v. Patterson, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 674; Patterson v. Winn, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 240; 1 Starkie, Ev. 343; [Thomas v. Horlocker], 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 14; Jackson v. Blanshan, 3 Johns. 292; 10 Johns. 495; 3 Har. & McH. 581; Id. 196; 1 Bay, 364; 2 Nott & McC. 55; 2 Munf. 129; 2 Wash. [Va.] 276; 6 Bin. 435; 2 Day, 280.

It has been asked, also, who are the Marquis. De Casa Calvo, and Andres Lopez Armesta? We prove the signature of the latter, and that he was secretary of the province, which may also be seen by the documents published by authority of congress; and by the same it is shown who the Marquis of Casa Calvo was, and his official character. 2 Land Laws, Append. 165, 166. These documents show the change of sovereignty on the 30th November, 1803; they were deposited in the provincial archives, then under the dominion of the United States, December 28, 1803, and certified by Spanish officers, and now published as well authenticated. Spanish proclamation of May 18, 1803, by Salcedo and Casa Calvo, supposes and requests the continuance in office of the existing judicial and ministerial authorities. The dominion, as before stated, was delivered November 30, 1803; October 31, 1803, congress authorized the president to vest in such person or persons as he might elect; the military, civil, and judicial powers, &c.; and on the 26th March, 1804, passed acts for establishing territorial governments, to take effect October 1, 1804, in which provision is made for continuing the existing laws, &c. By what laws and what officers was the country governed in its municipal affairs after the change of dominion, and before the existing laws and officers were reenacted or reappointed by the United States? Surely there can be no doubt as to this; the existing laws and officers remained until superseded by others appointed by the United States. The dominion only was changed, and every thing else remained as before. If this were not so, what was the situation of the province after the cession to France in 1800, and before the cession to the United States in 1803? The sovereignty or right of sovereignty was in France, but the actual government was administered by the existing authorities, and their acts of an administrative character, indeed all their acts, have been recognized by the United States and by France. The official character of Don Vincent Folch is shown by document No. 29. 2 Land Laws, Append. 227. He was governor of Florida from November, 1796, to 1809, and from May, 1809, to October, 1809, and we present his official authentication, as such, of the documents and plots of these lands, showing that they exist in the archives of Louisiana, removed to Florida by Casa Calvo; and his authentication under his seal, as viceroy of Florida, is as authoritative as the great seal of Spain, for as to the province, he stands in place of the king. Lincoln v. Battelle, 6 Wend. 484; Vandervoort v. Smith, 2 Caines, 155; Paekard v. Hill, 7 Cow. 434.

In addition to these evidences (which apply to all the cases), the testimony of Gabriel Winter establishes the position of the lands of Wm. Winter, the establishment of the corner of his tract by De Villemont, and his investiture of the land granted him by the commandant. He speaks from personal knowledge, is a competent witness, and is in every particular fully corroborated by other testimony; his interest, if any, is in the question only, which does not disqualify him. 3 Starkie, 781; 1 Starkie, 84, 85. Gabriel Winter never occupied his land, nor was it occupied for him by any tenant of his. But if the proof establishes the grant, and the fact that his land was set apart to him according to the usages of the Spanish government or orders of the governor, and can be identified, it is his. Now if the survey offered be evidence, although the plot is figurative only, it is sufficient; the place of beginning is easily identified, the geography of the country shows where the lake on which it commences is situated, and this the court will judicially notice; and if there is any difficulty about the identity (if the other facts requisite are established), the court should direct a survey, as was done in Florida in sundry cases. By establishing the Winter family on any portion of the lands granted, the condition of the grant as to occupancy was fulfilled, according to the usages then in force; but occupancy was not indispensable, if the lands were set apart for him after being granted to him; they were severed from the domain and became his private property, and we prove that performance of specified conditions was not usual nor required. Customs established control the general laws on subjects to which they relate, and which they embrace. It is proved that there was no surveyor in Arkansas to 1802, which fact must have been known to the governor, and therefore his order required only the establishment of boundaries or beginning points for the surveys; and for the like reason, the custom, as proven, that lands were in that mode assigned to individuals, and they put in possession under and by such designation or establishment of boundary, is not only shown to have existed, but it existed of necessity. Where lands are occupied under a grant, a survey may be presumed. [O'Hara v. U. S.] 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 283. A copy of a deed required to be enrolled is as good evidence as the original. Dick v. Balch, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 33; Jackson v. Cole, 4 Cow. 587; Jackson v. King, 5 Cow. 237; Peck v. Farrington, 9 Wend. 44. Entries of surveys made in his office by registers of land-office in Kentucky or Virginia are evidence of the facts, are public records, and it is not to be presumed that he would place on his records any thing not authorized; and facts proved by such records must be received as prima facie evidence. Galt v. Galloway, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 342, 343. So, we insist, the rule is as to matters recorded by the recorder of land titles, who is a sworn officer, and those received and deposited as records or archives by the Spanish surveyor-general, from both of which officers we have authenticated copies of the figurative plots of Winter's survey or grant of lands, as also a sworn copy from the present depository and keeper of the latter. Williams v. Sheldon, 10 Wend. 634; People v. Denison, 17 Wend. 312.

A copy of an award recorded in a county, which is afterwards divided, of lands situated in the new county, is properly authenticated by the clerk of the old county. Jackson v. Tibbits, 2 Wend. 592. And so, we insist, is now the rule as to records made in Louisiana, before the division, respecting lands now in Arkansas. Hearsay and general reputation competent testimony as to boundaries. 1 Phil. Ev. 249, 251. The acts and declarations of Winter, from the date of the grant to the date of his settlement at the post, in regard to his removal there, its object, the transportation of the stone and its object, as well as the declaration of Winter, extracted from Stilwell by the examination of the United States, and in answer to interrogatories propounded by them, are competent proofs; the former are res gestæ as to the matter, and the latter being proof elicited by the United States, they can neither impeach the witnesses or object to its competency. What a deceased witness has sworn to at a former trial between the same parties, in relation to the same issue, is proper evidence. Jackson v. Crissey, 3 Wend. 251; Crary v. Sprague, 12 Wend. 41. We insist that the parties and issue were the same when these cases were before the commissioners that they are now; and what witnesses then said, who are now dead, is good evidence, which embraces all the witnesses examined by said commissioners. See, also, Act Cong. 1824, § 4.

S. H. Hempstead, Dist. Atty., argued the case fully in behalf of the United States, on all the points presented; but to defeat the claim relied mainly on the position, that as the concession was indefinite in itself, a survey was necessary to give it locality, and as no survey was ever pretended to have been made, the concession was void. As to the necessity of a survey, which was the turning point in the case, the following is a synopsis of his argument. The survey of lands was always a matter of the first importance in the province of Louisiana. It was generally expressed and always implied, in all grants not capable of complete identification by natural boundaries. They were made upon conditions that they were not to interfere with previous grants, or in the very phraseology of the grants themselves, "without prejudice to third persons," which most strongly implied the necessity of a survey as the only practicable mode of conforming to this requisition. Actual survey and the actual demarcation of boundaries, by persons properly authorized, were the only means by which authentic official evidence could be furnished of the location of grants, and the separation of private from public property. Without going further back than 1754, the royal regulations and orders, the regulations of the several governors and those of the in-tendants from that time to the acquisition of Louisiana, affords ample evidence of the truth of the proposition, to say nothing of the uniform usage of the provincial government upon that subject. It is prescribed in the royal regulations, of October 15, 1754. The sixth clause was based on the fact that many grants, sales, and compositions of lands, made after the year 1700, were held by the grantees, without having been surveyed or valued, and directs that confirmations should be withheld until such surveys and valuations should be executed. The seventh clause also speaks of survey and valuation. 2 Land Laws, 52. Count O'Reilly, invested with unlimited civil and military powers, was sent by the king of Spain, in 1769, to the province of Louisiana, for the purpose of establishing there a permanent civil and military government. He states that the king had been pleased by his patent, issued at Arauguez, the 16th April, 1769, to delegate to him powers to establish in the military, the police, the administration of justice, and in the finances, such regulations as should be conducive to the service and the happiness of his majesty's subjects in the colony. On the 18th February, 1770, O'Reilly established general regulations with regard to granting the royal domains. The 12th is as follows: "All grants shall be made in the name of the king by the governor-general of the province, who will at the same time appoint a surveyor to fix the bounds thereof, both in front and depth, in presence of the judge and of two adjoining settlers, who shall be present at the survey; the above-mentioned five persons shall sign the process verbal which shall be made thereof, and the surveyor shall make three copies of the same, one of which shall be deposited in the office of the scrivener of the government and cabildo; another shall be delivered to the governor-general, and the third to the proprietor to be annexed to the titles of his grant." 2 Land Laws, Append. 206.

The regulations of O'Reilly were not only expressly sanctioned by the king, on the 24th August, of the same year, but Don Louis De Unzaga, then the governor-general of Louisiana and his successors, were specially required to conform to them in all points, until they should be changed by his majesty. 2 Land Laws, Append. 530. From the 18th February, 1770, this regulation requiring a formal and particular survey of concessions, was the law of the whole province of Louisiana, and from the 24th August following, possessed the force of a royal cedula, which no representative or tribunal of the Spanish monarch was at liberty to modify or disregard. It does not appear that it was ever abrogated, or changed by the king, and indeed the uniform practice of the provincial government conforming to it, is the highest evidence of its having become firmly ingrafted upon the civil system of government which existed in the province of Louisiana. But this is not the only evidence. Governor Gayoso, in his instructions, of the 9th September, 1797, declares that the forms established by his predecessors, in which to petition for lands, should be followed, and it is apparent that they carry out the general policy contained in those of O'Reilly. In a letter of Gayoso to Morales, the intendant-general, dated March 5, 1799, he says: "I also send you the form of the first decree which it has been the custom to issue before the survey was made. Of the registers which will soon be sent you, you will see the form in these used by all my predecessors." The intendant-general of the province of Louisiana, Morales, in a letter to Don Pedro Varela Ulloa, the king's minister, dated October 16, 1797, respecting grants of land, says: "In order to obtain lands from the exchequer (fisco) the custom is still pursued which prevailed when the French were masters of the country, except in so far as the government and the intendency acted in concert; and no other form is or has been observed than the presentation of a memorial by the petitioner praying for a certain number of arpens and designating their location. In virtue of this the surveyor or commandant of the post, with the assistance of the neighbors, makes the survey, and if no objection be offered puts the party in possession and gives him the papers necessary for having his title drawn out; this title is issued upon the strength of these papers, a minute of it being preserved in the office, in order that it may be noted in the book of grants; the sum which is to be paid to the surveyor or commandant for his trouble, is then delivered or put aside; and the duty of five per cent. for office fees being retained, the petitioner remains in full and quiet possession of the quantity of land which it may please the governor to grant. What I have said in the last paragraph must be understood as regarding inhabitants or planters who solicit grants of land; with respect to new settlers, although the commandant of the district in which they wish to fix themselves, may have surveyed and assigned to them the quantity of land which they and their families are considered capable of cultivating, there are yet but few who have obtained the titles which should have been furnished to them." 2 Land Laws, Append. 542.

The power of granting lands was exclusively vested in the intendency, in 1798, it having been previously exercised by the governor-general; this appears from the royal order of October 22d, 1798. 2 Land Laws, Append. 208, 542-545, et seq. Morales, intendant-general of Louisiana, published his general regulations, July 17, 1779, consisting of thirty-eight articles relative to granting lands. The 15th article is in almost the same language as the 12th clause of the regulations of Count O'Reilly; it is as follows:—

"Article 15th. All concessions shall be given in the name of the king, by the general intendant of the province, who shall order the surveyor-general, or one particularly named by him, to make the survey and mark the land by fixing the bounds not only in front but also in the rear; this survey ought to be done in the presence of the commandant or syndic of the district, and of two of the neighbors, and these five shall sign the process verbal which shall be drawn up by the surveyor." The 16th article requires the process verbal with a certified copy to be sent by the surveyor to the intendant; to the end that on the original process verbal, the necessary title paper, with the certified copy attached, be issued and delivered to the grantee. The original was required to be deposited in the office of the secretary and recorded, "to the end that at all times and against all accidents the documents which shall be wanted can be found." The 17th article requires the titles of concessions to be recorded in books to be kept for that purpose. The 18th article is as follows:—"Experience proves that a great number of those who have asked for land think themselves the owners of it; those who have obtained the first decree by which the surveyor is ordered to measure it and put them in possession; others, after the survey has been made, have neglected to ask for the title to the property; we declare that any one of these who have obtained the said decrees, notwithstanding in virtue of them the survey has taken place, and that they have been put in possession, cannot be regarded as owners of land until their real titles are delivered completed with all the formalities before cited." The 25th and 38th articles show that the grantees were obliged to pay the surveyor for his services, and to have the surveys executed at their own expense; and the more particularly was this the case in gratuitous concessions. "The fees of the surveyor in every case comprehended in the present regulation, shall be proportionate to the labor and that which has been customary until this time to pay," is the language of the 30th article. 2 Land Laws, Append. 208, et seq.

It is true that these regulations were promulgated after this particular concession was made; but it is obvious that they merely embodied general principles contained in antecedent royal orders, and regulations of previous governor-generals, and enunciated with greater particularity, rules, regulations, and usages then existing in the province of Louisiana, and which had existed long anterior to the year 1797. This is not left to doubtful inference, for the intendant Morales expressly informs us that he prepared his regulations "after having examined with the greatest attention the regulation made by the Count O'Reilly, of the 18th February, 1770, as well as that circulated by Governor Gayoso, of January 1st, 1798, and after he had taken counsel of the assessor of the intendancy and of other persons skilled in those matters." The regulations of Morales, then, did not profess to establish any new system, but merely to give publicity to an old one, and point out with more precision those things which were esteemed essential to obtain a complete right of property in granted lands. No substantial alterations were made, and indeed their similitude to those of the Count O'Reilly in their main parts cannot escape observation, and, in a word, a close scrutiny will prove that. It was no idle assertion of the intendant that he had examined the regulations of the Count O'Reilly with the greatest attention. 2 Land Laws, Append. 209.

It cannot admit of doubt, that even long before O'Reilly was sent to Louisiana, there were surveyors in each of the districts of the province, who were salaried officers, and whose duty it was to survey grants of land when called on by grantees for that purpose, and to make an official report of such surveys to the governor-general or granting power, which then became an official record. It appears from the letter of the king's minister, the Marquis De Grimaldi, that O'Reilly had appointed surveyors for districts in the province at half their former salary, which appointment the king approved. 2 Land Laws, Append. 530. Indeed, it is a matter of public history, that surveyors were always "part and parcel" of the government of the province of Louisiana. If we look to the official records of the Spanish government in Florida, we shall find, that at least as early as 1791, instructions, emanating from the provincial government, were given to surveyors, as to the manner of measuring and establishing the boundary lines of granted lands. 1 Land Laws, Append. 1004. In that year, Quesada, governor of Florida, appointed Pedro Marrot to the office of surveyor-general, and prescribed several standing rules for the direction of that officer. The 9th rule is: "When lands are to be surveyed bounding those of individuals having them of their own, they will be cited to appear for the purpose of exhibiting their titles permitting them to remain in possession, running the lines without injuring them; and the government reserving the right of examining at a proper time the validity of their titles, and the defects of their petitions." Again, in the 1st rule he is directed to "take care that the measurements be made adhering to the title."

These instructions or rules were dated and issued October 24, 1791. 1 Land Laws, Append. 997, 998. On the 29th October, 1790, it had been communicated to governor Quesada as the order of the king of Spain, that foreigners who would freely present themselves and swear allegiance to his majesty, should have lands granted and measured to them, in proportion to the working hands each family might have. 1 Land

Laws, Append. 996. The 9th clause of the regulations of Governor White, of October 12th, 1803, declares that all persons who abandoned or ceased to cultivate lands, which at any period shall have been measured to them by the surveyor-general, although they had obtained the corresponding title of property, should nevertheless lose and forfeit their right thereto. 1 Land Laws, Append. 101. Governor Estrada, who succeeded Governor White, commissioned George J. F. Clarke as surveyor-general of the Province of Florida, on the 2d of May, 1811. The commission recites, that whereas, the appointment of public surveyor being vacant on account of the absence of Don John Porcel, who exercised the same, and therefore being in the want of one for the measurement by the government in the laying off of lands, &c. 1 Land Laws, Append. 1003. Certain instructions were promulgated by Estrada, on the 11th June, 1811, for the government of the surveyor-general in the discharge of his official duties; some of them will be referred to. "2d. The surveyor having been called on by any person to measure and bound lands to him, he will require his title of property or grant from government, that on sight thereof he may proceed to its measurement and demarcation." "5th. To each person whose lands have been measured, a plot will be given, constructed in running lines of ink, marking in the perimeter the corners by a small circle of a line in diameter, and on the longitude of each line note its magnetic direction and length in chains and links. . . . In the centre of plot he will place in numbers the acres of land which he has measured. The plot being made, he will deliver it with the following description: 'Plot of the number of acres of land of A. B., in such a place, measured and bounded by the public surveyor of this province. Don George Clarke, East Florida, the day of the year and month on the same tract. George Clarke.' 6th. The surveyor will keep a book of large paper, and copy therein the plots he gives out according to the foregoing article. . . . 7th. The book mentioned in the foregoing article will serve to show government what lands are vacant or not measured; he should form in legal surveys a journal of his operations, to satisfy the persons having lands adjoining. 8th. That the boundaries shall be permanent, he will cause to be drove down at the corners stakes of three feet long and three inches thick at their heads, leaving them three inches above ground. 9th. Those who employ the surveyor will pay him four dollars per day for his personal services, calculating from his departure from the mansion where he is found until he concludes the work performed for them." 1 Land Laws, Append. 1004.

The commissioners for ascertaining Spanish claims in West Florida, namely, Samuel R. Overton, Joseph M. White, and Craven P.

Luckett, in their report, in 1824, state that "the first step in obtaining a gratuitous concession, was the presentment of a petition to the sub-delegate, or authority vested with the power of disposing of lands. This petition was referred to the surveyor, who was required to report whether the tract solicited was vacant and royal domain." "The subject was next submitted to the fiscal or king's attorney, whose province it was to state whether or not there were any objections to a compliance with the petition. When these reports were found to be favorable, the sub-delegate made the concession, fixed the terms, and passed the decretal order of survey. After all which had been fulfilled and executed, it was forwarded to the office of intendency for confirmation. Where any doubts existed as to the land being vacant and royal domain, the order of survey preceded the concession." 1 Land Laws, Append. 1043.

Such a mass of evidence, running through a period of more than fifty years, and harmonizing in all its parts, must certainly be regarded as establishing the necessity of surveys. No exceptions are provided for, and if there were any, it is the duty of the claimant to prove them by the strongest testimony, inasmuch since the law and the uniform usage under it are against him. It is evident that a warrant or order of survey could be executed by the surveyor-general or any of his deputies, or the surveyor of any district, or by the commandant of a post, or by a private person specially authorized by the governor-general or intendant. It appears to have been at one period a common practice in Florida for private persons to execute warrants or orders of survey by the direction of the governor, and upon which surveys formal and perfect titles were issued. 1 Land Laws, Append. 1014, et seq.; U. S. v. Harrison, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 198, et seq. In Smith v. U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 334, it is said that "Spain never permitted individuals to locate their grants by mere private survey. The grants were an authority to the public surveyor or his deputy to make the survey as a public trust to protect the royal domain from being cut up at the pleasure of the grantees. A grant might be directed to a private person, or a separate official order given to make the survey; but without either, it would not be a legal execution of the power." Again: "But neither in this, nor the record of any of the cases which have been before us, have we seen any evidence of any law of Spain, local regulation, law, or usage, which makes a private survey operate to sever any land from the royal domain; on the contrary, all the surveys which have been exhibited in the cases decided were made by the surveyor-general of the province, his deputies, the special order of the governor or intendant, or those who represented them. No government gives any validity to private surveys of its warrants or orders of survey; and we have no reason to think that Spain was a solitary exception, even as to the general domain, by grants in the ordinary mode for a specific quantity to be located in one place."

Between a survey by the public surveyor and an authorized survey by a private person, there was a wide difference. A survey made by a public surveyor, in the discharge of his public duties, is admitted in evidence in suits between other parties, because the act is done under oath, and in the discharge of his duties to the government and the public. These duties are to measure the land by compass and chain, to establish corners, mark lines, and to preserve accurate field notes of the survey, with such explanations as may be required to give it certainty. A plot is then made, which embodies, in a condensed form, the whole survey, and shows the lines, corners, trees, rivers, creeks, and other natural and artificial objects on the ground, with such remarks as may explain them. The statement, however, of collateral facts not within the scope of his proper official functions, are not admissible as evidence. Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 441; U. S. v. Hanson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 198. It is upon this principle that it has been frequently held in the Florida cases, that because of the official character of the surveyor-general, the plots and certificates made by him, in the discharge of his official duty, have accorded to them the force and character of a deposition; but as to a survey by a private person, nothing is presumed, and every thing must be proved. U. S. v. Hanson, Id. 200, 201; [Smith v. U. S.] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 334; [U. S. v. Low] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 162.

The Spanish regulations attended to most clearly evince that when a concession was made, the duty was imposed on the grantee of having the order of survey executed, and the survey returned to the proper officer at his own expense, and without any cost to the royal treasury. In other words, the concession being an authority to the surveyor-general and his deputies to make the survey as a public trust, it was the duty of the grantee to call upon him for that purpose, or to procure authority for a private person to do it. The government contented itself, in the first instance, with giving the authority to survey, and then leaving it to the party to procure the execution of that authority. If he failed, he could not claim any right of private property in the grant, nor could he obtain any title without complying with this necessary condition. There was no law, order, cedula regulation, usage, or custom of the province of Louisiana or Florida which authorized this condition to be dispensed within any case, or under any circumstances. It is also evident that a survey meant in these provinces what it means with us, the actual measurement of land, ascertaining the contents by running lines and angles, marking the same, and fixing corners and boundaries. 6 Jac. Law Dict. 157; Webst. Dict. When the phrase is applied to land, no other meaning is attached to it by lexicographers; nor is it used in a different sense in the jurisprudence of any country with which I am acquainted. This is no idle inquiry, because these kind of cases are not to be tried by common law rules, but by the laws, customs, and usages of the province of Louisiana; and hence the judges of the supreme court, in all the cases brought before them, have referred to these as guides. In doing this it would have been impossible to overlook the fact that actual surveys were a necessary ingredient to the validity of grants under the Spanish dominion, and it has consequently been directly or indirectly arrested in numerous cases decided by that tribunal to be equally necessary under the government. Wherry v. U. S., 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 327; U. S. v. Forbes, Id. 180; Buyck v. U. S., Id. 220; O'Hara v. U. S., Id. 297; U. S. v. Delespine, Id. 328; U. S. v. Miranda, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 155; U. S. v. Low, Id. 162; U. S. v. Harrison, Id. 198; U. S. v. Clarke, Id. 228; U. S. v. King, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 784.

The Spanish document adduced as the foundation of this claim is an open order of survey, and might have been located in any part of the then district of Arkansas. It had no locality, no definite description of any particular land. There are two substantial conditions in it: 1st, that the lands conceded should be surveyed in one year, which the commandant of the post should cause to be executed; and, 2d, that the grantees should settle upon and occupy their respective surveys within that period. These two conditions are fairly deducible from this paper, which, for the sake of convenience, will be called a grant; and it may be observed that it was undoubtedly competent for the governor-general to order the commandant to cause the survey to be executed. Smith v. U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 327. It is not pretended that the lands mentioned in the grant were ever surveyed under the Spanish government; indeed that they were not, is shown in the petition itself. But it is said that as to the lands granted to Elisha and Wm. Winter, a stone or stones were planted, and that this gave locality and identity to the tracts, and severed them from the royal domain. The bare statement of the proposition is its refutation. Fixing a stone or post is no survey, nor is it equivalent to a survey. It does not of itself indicate whether it is the corner of a north, east, south, or west line; nor does it indicate that the lines are to run from it to the cardinal points of the compass. But to go further: planting a stone to designate any particular corner, with a contemporaneous assertion that a parallel line is to be run a certain distance and direction, and thence in other directions, so as to form a square, is no identification of the land by any mode known to the Spanish government; nor is it so in fact. There are no visible lines, no visible boundaries, nothing to apprise our neighbor how far he may go without trespassing upon our soil, and nothing to indicate the lines of separation between public and private property. The idea of giving identity to a million and a half of arpens of land without measurement, and without actually running and marking a single line, is really too absurd to merit consideration. If it were not gravely insisted on, it might well be thought to be an experiment on human credulity.

Now supposing, for the sake of argument, that all the testimony taken or adduced in this cause, as to planting a corner-stone, is competent, and that none of it ought to be excluded, what does it amount to? Certainly to nothing more than that in 1798 Elisha Winter, the father, planted a large stone, intending thereby to designate the tract granted to him; and that this was done in the presence of the commandant of the post of Arkansas, Don Carlos De Villemont. It is a singular and important fact, that the statement of this person, made more than thirty years ago, when the matter must have been fresh in his recollection, is entirely silent as to what course the stone was to designate, or to what points of the compass the lines were to run from it. This omission could not have proceeded from defect in memory, and it can only be accounted for on the supposition that the act of planting the stone was esteemed to be of so little consequence, that nothing was said on the subject. As if to admonish us of the intrinsic infirmity of hearsay evidence, and the propriety of excluding it, it is stated by persons examined since the pending of this suit that they understood, principally however from the family of Winter, that this stone was actually intended to designate the south-east corner of this tract, and that the lines were to run to the cardinal points of the compass; a statement condemned by the silence of Don Carlos De Villemont, the very person who would have known it if such had been the fact. Could the stone, in the very nature of things, designate or identify any land? Could it not be the corner of four separate tracts? Could not lines from it be run north as well as south, and east as well as west, or north-east, north-west, south-west, or south-east? It was, therefore, an idle and nugatory act, and could not, in the very nature of things, separate any land from the royal domain.

It cannot be doubted that a survey was contemplated and required by the grant itself, a requisition indeed enforced by a general law sanctioned by the monarch himself. The petitioners, satisfied as they must be that nothing was done equivalent to a survey, or to identify the land, are driven to the flimsy excuse that there was no public surveyor within the district of Arkansas, and thus indirectly admitting a survey to be essential. The commandant alluded to says:—"There was no public surveyor in the district of Arkansas at that time (1798), nor afterwards, during my command, down to the year 1802; on which account these tracts were not surveyed nor platted in the ordinary manner." This is insufficient to excuse the non-performance of the conditions, because the fact must have been as well known in 1797 as it was the year after. U. S. v. Kingsley, 12 Pet [37 U. S.] 484. The condition was not impossible, but on the contrary was reasonable and proper, and one of two things must be established by the claimants, either that it was complied with, or that the performance of it was excused by the governor-general, and also that he was competent to excuse its performance, because, as plenary as his authority might have been, he was a subordinate officer, bound to execute the will of the king, whether expressed in royal orders, regulations, or in other modes which might have been adopted. The Baron Carondelet had no dispensing power; he could not say that a survey need not be made, or that a right of private property should vest without identity to the land. But it is fruitless to inquire what he might or might not have done, since it is not pretended that the performance of the conditions was ever excused. To say that there was no public surveyor in the district of Arkansas in 1798, amounts to nothing. There was a surveyor-general at New Orleans, who could constitute deputies and send them to any part of the province to execute surveys at the request of a grantee, and upon the payment of the usual compensation. If Elisha Winter did not choose to invoke his aid, the governor-general could have authorized a private person to make and return the survey, which it is reasonable to infer would have been done upon application, especially as we are informed that Winter was on terms of intimacy with that functionary, and was, according to the proof, in New Orleans a greater portion of the time between 1797 and 1800. The commandant of Arkansas post could doubtless have authorized a competent person to make and return the survey, by virtue of the direction in the grant to cause the surveys to be executed. The means to enable Winter to comply with this part of the grant were ample, sufficiently convenient, and at his command. Surely judicial tribunals will not undertake to relieve him from the consequences of his own neglect. The time allowed, one year, was abundant; and certainly it was not too much to expect, that as he had obtained from the bounty of the government a grant of enormous size, larger than many of the German principalities, he would not only willingly bear the inconvenience and expense of its separation from the royal domain, but would hasten the consummation of that event with all the forms and solemnities known to the law.

Under the Spanish government, the mode of designating grants, and investing individuals with the right of property therein, was attended with solemnity and publicity. The practice in such cases was in many respects analogous to livery of seizin, as used under the feudal system at an early period of English jurisprudence. A grant delivered out for survey meant, not as in our country, a perfect title, but an incipient right, which, when surveyed, required confirmation by the governor. [U. S. v. Hanson] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 200. And hence in this concession a survey is enjoined, to the end that each grantee may receive a title in due form. In the province of Louisiana, not only were actual boundary lines to be marked and established, and corners planted by an authorized surveyor, but the party was then formally put into possession, either by the surveyor or commandant, in the presence of his neighbors, provided there was no objection, and it did not interfere with the rights of third persons. The grant required a survey of the land, not planting a stone, which without survey could be nothing but an idle ceremony. But it is insisted that no lands were surveyed at the post of Arkansas, and that it was a custom there for the commandant to put persons in possession without it. To that I reply that the assertion is not proved, but if it was, such a custom,—if a thing rarely practised and confined to a few interested persons can be so called,—was in positive violation of the law existing in the province on that subject. No usage or custom can ever prevail against an act of parliament,—a principle which must utterly destroy the usage of the post of Arkansas.

But it is said that it was the policy of the Baron De Carondelet to encourage settlements, and to dispense with surveys, if necessary to attain that end; and we are entertained with a sort of review of the acts of himself as governor-general. But will it advance us a single step in the cause to inquire into the policy of the baron during the five years he was governor-general, or to contrast his administration with that of Estevan Miro, his predecessor, or Gayoso, his successor? It would be quite as pertinent to investigate the Spanish intrigue set on foot as early as 1790 to separate the territory west of the Alleghany mountains from the Union, and its total failure; or to show that the Baron De Carondelet commenced his administration in 1792 with a scheme to sever Kentucky from the confederacy and bring her under Spanish dominion, and failed in it; or that he set it on foot a second time in 1795, sent an emissary into Kentucky in the person of Gayoso, then lieutenant-governor of Natchez, and again failed; or that the baron made a third attempt in 1796, and again signally failed. It would be a waste of time to wade through the rubbish of Spanish rule, to find out the policy of Spanish officials. We should discover enough at every step to demonstrate hostility to American citizens and American interests; corruption in office, and breaches of public and private faith. Whether the policy of the Baron De Carondelet was good or bad, is of no importance to the present question. He had not the right, and did not, in point of fact, dispense with a survey.

But it is said that figurative plots of the Winter grants were found in the offices in New Orleans. And of what avail is it to produce figurative plots or plans—mere creatures of the brain—office sketches, that can be made at any time? These sketches only present the supposed outlines of a tract of land, which could be made at a distance from the land, and without ever seeing it, by one having a general knowledge of the face of the country. They show no bearings and distances, no field marks or boundaries, no latitude or longitude, and no natural or artificial objects on the ground. Constructive journeys, constructive corners, constructive lines, make up these constructive surveys. They are destitute of reality, and carry deception on their face. Two conditions arise from a fair construction of the concession: First, that each grantee would cause his grant to be surveyed; second, that he would establish himself on it within one year; and it was upon the performance of these conditions that each grantee could receive his "title deed in form." Non-performance within the time limited amounted to a forfeiture, or, to use the express language of the concession, the grant "became void." To speak with legal exactness, the lands granted could not vest in the grantees until a compliance with those conditions. No specific lands were appropriated in the document itself, and as none were severed from the royal domain by authentic survey, it was impossible for the grantees to occupy the lands granted. Occupancy is equivalent to seizin or possession, and it is certainly too clear to be controverted, that identity of the premises is essential to a seizin in law, as it is necessarily implied in a seizin in fact. U. S. v. Miranda, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 159; Arredondo's Case, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 741.

JOHNSON, District Judge. This is a petition filed by the heirs of Elisha Winter, under the act of congress of the 26th May, 1824, entitled "An act enabling the claimants of lands within the limits of the state of Missouri and territory of Arkansas to institute proceeding to try the validity of their claims," revived for five years by the act of 17th July, 1844; and the claim mentioned in the petition is for one million of arpens of land, in the state of Arkansas, based upon a Spanish concession, made by the Baron De Carondelet, governor-general of the province of Louisiana, the 27th day of June, 1797, to Elisha Winter, the ancestor of the petitioners. 4 Stat. 52; 5 Stat. 676. The answer of the district attorney denies all the statements and allegations in the petition, and full proof is demanded thereof. From the commencement of the case, every reasonable indulgence has been extended to the claimants, to enable them to procure all the proof within their reach, and doubtless we now have all that could be found, material to their rights.

The case has been thoroughly investigated by the counsel on both sides, and it gives me pleasure to add, that it has been argued by them with great zeal and uncommon ability, and which will the better enable me to form a correct opinion upon the questions which it is now my duty to decide. Most of the testimony offered by the claimants has been excepted to by the district attorney; and these exceptions are on file in the case, as a part of the record. Some of them were decided by the court before the hearing; but finding that course of proceeding calculated to produce inconvenience and delay, and in a collateral manner bring about a decision upon the merits of the cause, the rule requiring exceptions to be filed was rescinded. But I will add, that as far as decisions have been made on exceptions, they are entirely satisfactory to my mind, and will be adhered to, and the principles therein contained, applied upon the present occasion.

As to the exceptions filed by the district attorney, not yet expressly decided, I will merely remark, that it is not deemed necessary to the rights of either party that this court should decide specifically upon each exception, because it would be useless as far as it could have any effect here; and in case of appeal to the supreme court, all the testimony and the exceptions to it will appear of record, and thus each party there will derive the same advantage and benefit, as if there was a specific decision upon each exception; for the inquiry then will be, not how this court has decided, but whether the decision is sustained by the principles of law, and warranted by legal and competent evidence. Without taking upon myself, therefore, the unnecessary labor of deciding collateral questions, I will now proceed to the main and prominent points in the case.

The paper in the Spanish language, which is produced as the foundation of this claim, is really nothing more than an order or warrant of survey, and strictly speaking is not a concession; but for the sake of convenience I shall call it the latter. Several translations of it have been brought to the notice of the court, but I shall not undertake to determine how nearly these translations assimilate to each other, because, should this case be taken to the supreme court, that tribunal will have no difficulty in ascertaining the true meaning of the paper. Without descending to particulars on this point, I will only observe that I regard this concession as authorizing Elisha Winter to select, within the then district of Arkansas, one million of arpens of land, which was to be severed from the royal domain, and occupied within one year from the date of the concession, or else the concession to be void; in other words, that he was to establish himself upon it in one year. The genuineness of the signature of the Baron De Carondelet to the concession, has been, in my opinion, sufficiently proved by competent witnesses,—those who are acquainted with his handwriting,—so as to entitle it to be used as evidence in any court of justice.

The district attorney in his argument, insists that the Baron De Carondelet had no authority to make so extensive a grant, and that if he could rightfully do so, he might with the same propriety have conceded to any private individual, as a mere gratuity, a whole parish or district of the royal domain. Certainly no one can doubt that a concession so immense ought to be closely scrutinized; but at the same time I do not feel it incumbent upon me to inquire into the precise extent and nature of the powers vested in the governor-generals of Louisiana as it respects the quantity of land which could be granted. The supreme court of the United States has frequently decided in this kind of cases, that a grant or concession made by an officer who has by law authority to make it, carries with it prima facie evidence that it is within his power, unless the contrary is shown; and it is, therefore, no longer a debatable question. U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 691; [U. S. v. Percheman] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 51; [U. S. v. Clarke] 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 436; [Delassus v. U. S.] 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 134.

Without further inquiry, therefore, I shall assume that the Baron De Carondelet possessed the power to make this concession; that the extraordinary extent of it is no objection to its validity and then comes the main question in the case, namely, whether the land mentioned in the concession, was separated from the royal domain, so as to vest a right of property in the grantee, and thus bring it within the purview of the treaty of Paris of the 30th April, 1803. It is almost superfluous to add, that the whole case must turn upon this solitary point, for however meritorious the claim may be, and however strong the considerations which may favorably recommend it to the political departments of the government, it is not competent for the judiciary, either to grant land, give an equivalent, or confirm a claim that is destitute of identity. Indeed, the act of the 26th May, 1824, confers the special and limited authority under which this court must act in these cases; and by reference to that law it will be seen that the locality of a claim must be ascertained to give the court jurisdiction. 4 Stat. 52. Now this concession on the face of it is utterly indefinite, and does not appropriate any specific lands to the grantees; and hence it is material to inquire whether an actual survey of such a concession as this was necessary to vest a right to the property in the grantee? The district attorney maintains the affirmative; and in my opinion he has successfully sustained that position, by referring to royal orders; to regulations of different governor-generals of the province of Louisiana, running through a period of nearly fifty years; to regulations in Florida, on the same subject; and lastly, to various adjudications of the supreme court of the United States.

It is perfectly obvious, that among civilized nations, where individual ownership of the soil is recognized as a right, some mode of designating every man's land must necessarily be adopted. Indeed, without any regulations at all upon that subject in Louisiana and Florida, the survey of lands would have followed as a natural consequence upon making grants; for without surveys, the confusion in land titles, and the disputes and litigation that must have ensued, would have been intolerable evils which no government would allow. In point of fact the survey of grants of land was common in the province of Louisiana as early as 1754, because the sixth and seventh clauses of the royal order of that year, of date the 15th October, expressly require surveys to be made. 2 Land Laws, 52.

The most solemn and imposing regulations, however, upon the subject of surveying lands, are found in the twelfth clause of the general regulations of Count O'Reilly, civil and military governor of the province of Louisiana, promulgated on the 18th of February, 1770. That clause is as follows: "(12) All grants shall be made in the name of the king, by the governor-general of the province, who will at the same time appoint a surveyor to fix the bounds thereof, both in front and depth, in presence of the judge ordinary of the district, and of the adjoining settlers who shall be present at the survey; the above-named four persons shall sign the process verbal which shall be made thereof, and the surveyor shall make three copies of the same; one of which shall be deposited in the office of the scrivener of the government and cabeldo, another shall be delivered to the governor-general, and the third to the proprietor to be annexed to the title of his grant." 2 Land Laws, Append. 206.

The regulations of O'Reilly probably stand upon higher ground than those of any of his successors, because they were expressly sanctioned by the king himself, on the 24th August, 1770, the same year they were promulgated; and the governor-generals of Louisiana were specially required by the monarch to conform thereto, until it was his royal pleasure to change them. 2 Land Laws, Append. 530. There is no evidence that they were changed or modified at any subsequent period as far as surveys of grants were concerned. On the contrary, the instructions of Gayoso, dated the 9th September, 1797, and the regulations of Morales, intendant general of Louisiana, published 17th July, 1799, very clearly indicate that surveys were essential. In fact the fifteenth article of the regulations of Morales, is almost literally copied from the twelfth clause of O'Reilly's regulations already referred to. The general practice of the government conformed to these regulations; and it is known that there was a surveyor-general in upper, and another in lower Louisiana, each of whom had authority to constitute as many deputies as they pleased, with a view to execute surveys. Undoubtedly the Spanish regulations show, that when a concession was made, the duty was imposed on the grantee of having the order of survey executed at his own expense; and a return of the survey was to be made to the proper officer; and all this without cost to the royal treasury. In other words the concession was an authority to the surveyor-general and his deputies, to make the survey as a public trust; and it was the duty of the grantee to call upon him for that purpose, or procure authority for a private person to do it.

The government contented itself in the first instance with giving the authority to survey, and then leaving it to the party interested to procure the execution of that authority. No law or regulation existing in the province of Louisiana, has been brought to the notice of the court, which dispensed with a survey in the case of an open floating concession, and it is presumed there was none. It is also quite evident that a survey under the Spanish government meant, as with us, the actual measurement of land, ascertaining the contents by running lines and angles, marking the same, and fixing corners and boundaries. 1 Land Laws, Append. 996-998, 1001, 1003, 1004, 1014, 1043; U. S. v. Hanson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 198; 6 Jac. Law Dict. 157. "The survey," say the supreme court, in Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 441, "made by a surveyor being under oath, is evidence as to all things which are properly within the line of his duty. But his duty is confined to describing and marking on the plot the lines, corners, trees, and other objects on the ground; and to subjoin such remarks as may explain them; but in all other respects, and as to all other facts he stands like any other witness, to be examined on oath, in the presence of the parties, and subject to cross-examination." This case is cited, because in pointing out the duty of a surveyor of land, it clearly shows the nature of a survey, and what must be understood by it; namely, running lines with compass and chain, establishing corners, marking trees and other objects on the ground, giving bearings and distances, and making descriptive field notes and plots of the works. These are the ingredients of an actual survey, as well as the evidences of it; for it is not the mere assertion of the surveyor that he had surveyed land that makes it so. U. S. v. Hanson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 200.

A return by the surveyor-general, embracing a description of a survey of land in legal form, was prima facie competent evidence without further proof on which the granting power could act. Plots and certificates, on account of the official character of the surveyor-general, had accorded to them the force and character of a deposition. [U. S. v. Hanson] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 200, 201; [U. S. v. Wiggins] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 346.

It is evident also, that a warrant or order of survey could be executed by the surveyor-general, or any deputy appointed by him; or the surveyor of the district, or by the commandant of a post, or by a private person specially authorized by the governor-general or intendant. It appears to have been at one period a common practice in Florida, for private persons to execute warrants or orders of survey by the direction of the governor, and upon these surveys formal and perfect titles were issued to the interested parties. 1 Land Laws, Append. 1014 et seq.; [U. S. v. Hanson] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 198. In Smith v. U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 334, it is said that "Spain never permitted individuals to locate their grants by mere private survey. The grants were an authority to the public surveyor, or his deputy, to make the survey as a public trust, to protect the royal domain from being cut up at the pleasure of grantees. A grant might be directed to a private person, or a separate official order given to make the survey; but without either, it could not be a legal execution of the power." And in the same case it is further said, that, "neither in this nor the record of any of the cases which have been before us, have we seen any evidence of any law of Spain, local regulation, or usage, which makes a private survey operate to sever any land from the royal domain. On the contrary, all surveys which have been exhibited in the cases decided were made by the surveyor-general of the province, or his deputies, or under the special order of the governor or intendant, or those who represent them. No government gives any validity to private surveys of its warrants or orders of surveys, and we have no reason to think that Spain was a solitary exception even as to the general domain, by grants in the ordinary mode, for a specific quantity to be located in one place."

The supreme court of the United States, in various cases, has either directly or indirectly decided, that an actual survey of an open floating concession is a necessary ingredient to its validity; and that it must also be an authorized survey to sever any land from the royal domain. I shall make no comment on these cases, but merely refer to them. Wherry v. U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 338; Smith v. U. S., Id. 327; U. S. v. Forbes, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 180; Buyck v. U. S., Id. 230; O'Hara v. U. S., Id. 297; U. S. v. Desepine, Id. 328; U. S. v. Miranda, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 155, 162; U. S. v. Hanson, Id. 198; U. S. v. Clarke, Id. 228; U. S. v. King, 3 How.

[44 U. S.] 784; U. S. v. Lawton, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 26. But upon this point I need not multiply authorities. Ordinances and regulations expressly sanctioned by the king, practice conforming to these regulations, the decisions of our courts of justice, all combine to establish it as a proposition beyond dispute, that a concession indefinite in itself, is void, without the aid of an official survey. In most grants, even those of a descriptive character, which designated the place where the lands were to be located, a survey was required to be made and returned before a party could obtain a formal and perfect title. Non-interference with the rights of others was a condition which attached to all grants, and was generally expressed; but if not expressed, always implied. This, of itself, demanded an actual survey on the ground, as the only certain mode of observing that condition. The actual demarcation of boundary lines by authorized persons, and the formal return of the proceeding were the only means of affording authentic official evidence of the location of grants and the separation of public from private property.

It is not pretended that the lands mentioned in this concession were surveyed within one year, nor before the 10th day of March, 1804. On the contrary, the fact is distinctly alleged in the petition, that there was no actual survey; and an excuse is offered for the omission, which, when scrutinized, will be found to be insufficient. According to a well-established rule, this averment cannot be controverted by proof on the part of the petitioners; they being bound to abide by their own pleadings. To obviate the want of a survey, it is said that a corner-stone was planted, under the direction of Don Carlos De Villemont, to designate the grant made to Elisha Winter, and that it was a proceeding of great solemnity. There is, in my judgment, no competent evidence adduced to show the planting of this stone by the authority, or under the direction and superintendence of Don Carlos De Villemont, as commandant of the post of Arkansas. But if there was, it has been shown to be a clear departure from the Spanish regulations respecting the location of grants; and hence a nugatory and idle act. Fixing a stone post or monument at any particular spot is no survey, nor equivalent to it; nor is it the slightest indication whether it is a northern, eastern, southern, or western corner; nor does it indicate how the boundary lines are to run. But to go further still,—planting or erecting a stone to designate any particular corner with a contemporaneous assertion, as to how the lines are to run from it, is no identification of land, nor can these acts, in the very nature of things, give it any known or certain locality. I repeat, that if there was full proof of the act of planting a stone, or erecting a monument, it was an illegal act, and severed no land from the royal domain. The concession required a survey, a process verbal of it and its return, not the planting of a stone; and therefore the proceedings of the commandant, said to have been adopted to designate the lands granted, were not only in violation of the plain requisitions of the concession itself, but were not sanctioned by any of the ordinances, orders, or regulations of the Spanish government. If a survey could have been dispensed with, it is reasonable to infer that it would have been done in the concession itself, and that planting a stone, or some such act, would have been substituted in its place. But this is not the case, and indeed so far from it, a survey and the return of it are clearly contemplated, and upon that the proper title was to be furnished to the grantees in form.

The Baron De Carondelet, plenary as his powers may have been, was subordinate to the king, and was obliged to observe his royal ordinances and orders. As governor-general, he had no dispensing power; and to say nothing of the insuperable difficulty of locating a tract of land of a million of arpens by the mere erection of a monument as a corner, it is sufficient to observe that he had not authority to dispense with a survey of the land in a case like this, and that it would have been illegal to do so; and there is perhaps no better proof of it than the fact that this proceeding, said to have been officially reported to the Baron De Carondelet, must, if so reported, have been regarded by him as illegal, and as a departure from the concession; for otherwise the presumption is almost irresistible, that the title in form promised in the concession would have been furnished to the grantees, and more especially as Elisha Winter was said to have been on terms of intimacy with the baron, and to have been in New Orleans much of his time between 1798 and 1800. In my judgment, it was a condition that the grant should be surveyed, and without it the grantee could not be said to be established on any specific land; he could not be said to have the legal seizin or possession of any specific land (U. S. v. Lawson, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 29); and therefore I disregard all the proof respecting the occupation by the Winters of a tract of land near the post of Arkansas, which they claimed as a grant from the Spanish government, as being entirely irrelevant.

But it is urged upon me that conditions were inserted in Spanish grants as a mere matter of form; that a compliance with them was not required; that there are no instances where grants have been declared forfeited for a non-compliance with conditions; that the hostility of the Indians would have prevented an actual survey, and that there was no surveyor at the post of Arkansas. As to danger from Indians, it may be replied, in the spirit of the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Kingsley, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 484, on a similar occasion, that a grantee cannot be permitted to urge as an excuse in fact or in law, for not complying with his undertaking, a danger which applies as forcibly to repudiate the sincerity of his intention in asking for the grant, as it does to his inability from such danger to execute it afterwards. And as to there being no surveyor at the post in the district of Arkansas at the time, it was a fact which he must be presumed to have known at the date of the concession, and cannot therefore be permitted to derive any advantage from that circumstance; nor was he confined to the district of Arkansas in obtaining a surveyor. It was imposing no extraordinary hardship, and was indeed asking but little at his hands, to require a survey of this enormous gratuity.

Now as to conditions being inserted in Spanish concessions as matters of form only, it seems to me to be a singular position to assume before a judicial tribunal, and not less singular that proof of it should be adduced. If I am at liberty to disregard certain parts of this concession as being formal and not requiring observance, may I not with the same propriety reject the whole? And is this to be a rule in this kind of cases, and to form a landmark in their adjudication? Judicial decisions would then depend upon the integrity and intelligence of witnesses, not on the written law, and would vary as often as the opinions of men. Such proof can have no weight with me, because of its uncertainty, and because it contravenes known regulations and laws which existed in the province of Louisiana, and which I prefer as guides to the loose declarations of witnesses of whom we know nothing.

While upon this point, I will also add, that if it was the usage at the post of Arkansas to designate lands by merely fixing some corner thereto, it was a usage repugnant and contrary to express written law, and therefore void. 1 Bl. Comm. 77; 3 Term R. 271. No usage or custom can prevail against an express act of the lawmaking power. If the performance of conditions was not required, they would hardly have been inserted; and the fact that surveys and occupation were required by the terms of almost every concession, are conclusive proof that so far from being matters of form, they were really matters of the first consequence, and indicated the permanent establishment of the only certain system of separating private grants from the public domain. According to my recollection, the civil law used in Spain, and introduced into the province of Louisiana, was equally as strict as the common law with regard to exacting a compliance with conditions, and as rigidly excluded parol proof, either to change, vary, modify, or annul, or in any manner affect such conditions. Code Nap. b. 3, c. 4, § 1. But what perhaps is more to the purpose, the supreme court has held that conditions could not be dispensed with, but must be performed. U. S. v. Kingsley, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 486.

There are other points that might be noticed, but it is not necessary; and in closing this opinion, I will adopt the language of the supreme court in Lawton's Case, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 28, as applicable on the present occasion. This concession, in its leading features, cannot be distinguished from various others, where no specific land was granted, or intended to be granted; but it was left to the grantee to have a survey made of the land in the district referred to by the concession by some person properly authorized, by which additional act the land granted would have been severed from the king's domain, and have become private property. Let the claim be rejected, and the petition be dismissed, at the costs of the petitioners. Ordered accordingly.

NOTE. The cases of Heirs of William Winter, Deceased, v. United States, and Gabriel Winter v. United States, for 250,000 arpens each, depending upon the same facts and principles, were severally argued by Daniel Ringo, for the petitioners, and S. H. Hempstead, Dist. Atty., for the United States, in conjunction with the preceding case; and, under the foregoing opinion, the claims were severally rejected, and the petitions dismissed. In each of the three cases appeals to the supreme court were prayed and granted, but never prosecuted any further, and were abandoned. The case of Putnam v. U. S. [Case No. 11,484], claiming under Elisha Winter by conveyances, was dismissed.

WINTER (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 16,743 and 16,744.

WINTER (WAYNE v.). See Case No. 17,304.

Case No. 17,896.

WINTERMUTE v. REDINGTON.

[1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 239.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. Dec., 1856.

PATENT FOR INVENTION—IMPROVEMENT IN APPLICATION FOR HYDRAULIC POWER—SPECIFICATIONS—INFRINGEMENT.

1. The principle so embodied and applied, and the principle of such embodiment and application are essentially different; the former being a truth of exact science, or a law of natural science, or a rule of practice; the latter, a practice founded upon such truth, law, or rule. A new and improved method of producing a useful result or effect is as much the subject of a patent as an entire new machine.

[Cited in Johnson v. McCabe, 37 Ind. 538.]

2. The word "machine" in the statute includes new combinations as well as new organizations of mechanism, and hence there may be a patent for new combinations of machinery to produce certain effects, whether the machines constituting the combination be new or old. In such a case, the patent is not for an abstract principle, but for the particular application of the principle which the patentee professes to have made.

3. Parker's patent is not for the vertical or horizontal arrangement of the wheels upon the shaft, or the putting them in pairs; neither does it embrace, as a distinct discovery, the concentric cylinder inclosing the shaft, nor the spout, the gate, the outer cylinder, or the buckets on the wheel.

¹ [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

4. The purpose or aim was to obtain an increase of power with a given quantity of water; and the secret of the invention of the wheel is the vortical motion of the water on the wheel, which operates as a coefficient to the reactive power of the water in the buckets.

5. The identity that is to be looked to, in an action of infringement, respects that which constitutes the essence of the invention, namely, the application of the principle. If the mode adopted by the defendant shows that the principle admits of the same application in a variety of forms, or by a variety of apparatus, such mode is a piracy of the invention.

6. But if the defendant has adopted variations which show that some other law, or rule of practice or science, is made to take the place of that which the patentee claims as the essence of his invention, then there is no infringement.

7. In estimating the actual damages the rule is to give the value of the use of the patented thing during the illegal user, or in other words, the amount of profits.

8. An assignment of a patent by one of two or more administrators is good, and passes the entire interest.

9. The patentee may be regarded as a purchaser from the public, being bound to so communicate his secret, by specification, drawings, and models, that it shall be successfully available to the whole community at the expiration of his patent.

10. The right to an invention dates from the time of discovery, and the patentee is secure in his patent if his machine or manufacture was not in public use when he made his application.

11. The word "useful," in section six of the act of 1836 [5 Stat. 119], and in section one of the act of 1793, does not prescribe general utility as the test of the sufficiency of an invention to support a patent. It is used merely in contradistinction to what is frivolous, or mischievous to the public. It is sufficient if the invention has any utility.

[Cited in Cook v. Ernest, Case No. 3,155.]

12. When the exact nature and extent, or essence of the claim can be perceived, the court is bound to adopt that interpretation of the patent, and give it full effect.

13. In describing an improvement in a machine, it may be necessary, and when so, it is proper to describe the whole machine, as it operates with the improvement, in order to make the description understood by a person of the trade to which it belongs; and if this is not done, the patent fails for obscurity.

14. Where a patent is for an improvement on an old machine, if the whole of it, the old and the new, is described in the specification, the patentee must distinguish what part he claims, or the patent will be void for ambiguity.

15. A patent can not be sustained for a mere principle; but a principle may be embodied and applied, so as to afford some result of practical utility in the arts and manufactures, and under such circumstances a principle may be the subject of a patent.

16. It is, however, the embodiment and application of the principle which constitutes the grant of the patent.

This was an action on the case [by John Wintermute against Alexander H. Redington], tried before Judge Willson and a jury, for the infringement of letters patent granted to Zebulon and Austin Parker, October 9, 1829, and assigned to plaintiff. The nature of the patent is sufficiently stated in the report of the case of Parker v. Hulme [Case No. 10,740].

G. M. Lee and S. S. Fisher, for plaintiff.
Herrick & Barlow, S. F. Andrews, and R. Hitchcock, for defendant.

WILLSON, District Judge (charging jury). The plaintiff has brought his action on the case to recover for an alleged infringement of a patent, for which letters patent were granted in October, 1829. The patent issued originally to Zebulon Parker and Austin Parker, and on the 19th day of October, 1843, was renewed by Zebulon Parker, for seven years, extending its duration thereby to October, 1850. Austin Parker before that time having deceased, the renewal was for the joint benefit of Zebulon Parker and the estate of Austin Parker.

A transcript of the record of the court of common pleas of Trumbull county, Ohio, is in evidence showing, that at the November term, 1834, Robert McKelvy and Eliza Parker were appointed administrators upon the estate of Austin Parker; also an assignment, dated July 31, 1841, from McKelvy, administrator, etc., to Z. Parker, of all the interest of said estate in the patent. There is also in evidence, an assignment of the entire interest in the patent from Z. Parker to the plaintiff, dated May 17, 1847.

To this paper evidence of title, no exceptions have been taken by the defendant, except to the assignment of McKelvy (the administrator) to Zebulon Parker. It is claimed that inasmuch as both administrators did not join in the assignment, a part only of the interest in the patent passed to the assignee.

This exception is not well taken. Administrators of an estate are not, properly speaking, trustees in whom is vested the legal title. The law clothes them with certain powers, by which they are enabled to transmit the legal title of property. They are mere instruments of the law, and the effect is given to their acts upon the same principle that title to property is transferred by the official act of a sheriff or marshal; and it is well settled, that if a man appoint several executors, they are esteemed in law but as one person representing the testator. Acts done by one of them, which relate to the delivery, gift, sale, or release of the testator's goods or personal property, are deemed the acts of all. The same rule obtains with reference to the acts of administrators. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 9 Cow. 35. I am unable to see any force in the objection made to the assignment of McKelvy.

Such is the position of the plaintiff upon the record, as to title. The defendant has pleaded the general issue, and given notice of the want of novelty in the invention. As the validity of this patent has been drawn in question, it becomes the duty of the court to examine it, and determine its character. The general character of the patentee's invention, as declared in the patent itself, is, "a new and useful improvement in the application of hydraulic power." To obtain a right understanding of the invention, however, we must resort to the specifications, which by law are required to accompany the patent.

In the introductory part of the specifications, the invention of the patentees is claimed to consist of "a new and useful improvement in the application of hydraulic power, by a method of combining percussion and reaction, applied and exemplified in: 1st. A compound vertical percussion and reaction waterwheel, for saw mills and other purposes, with the method of applying the water on the same. 2d. An improved horizontal reaction waterwheel, with the method of combining percussion with reaction on it. 3d. A method of combining percussion with reaction on common reaction wheels, or those already in use." Then follows the statement that "the principle upon which this improvement is founded, is that of producing a vortex within reaction wheels, which, by its centrifugal force, powerfully accelerates the velocity of the wheel, and adds proportionately to its momentum."

Taking the definition of percussion, as given by Mr. Morton, an expert, it is safe to say, its legitimate meaning, as used by the patentees here, is a power over and above reaction, derived from the impingement of the water, with a momentum due to its velocity, upon the buckets placed obliquely in its line of motion. The term being thus understood, we have clearly and satisfactorily exhibited in this part of the specifications, the purpose of the invention; which is the application of hydraulic power to the propulsion of water-wheels by a new and improved method.

In pursuing the specifications further, we find the minute details, the modus operandi, of producing a wheel or machine for this new and improved method. Before construing the patent and specifications, in order to ascertain what the patentees claim to be their invention, it is proper for us to recur to some well-settled principles of law which will govern the court and direct the jury in applying the testimony in the case.

As the patent law of the United States grants the patentee a monopoly, and not only awards damages, but inflicts a penalty for a violation of the exclusive privilege, it requires that the invention shall be so described, in the specifications, that one acquainted with the art or manufacture to which it relates, may not only understand the invention, but be able by following the specifications, with the aid of the drawings, to construct the machine, or make the combination, which is the subject of the patent. And this rule of law is founded on the equitable principle, that a monopoly or exclusive privilege should not be given to an individual without a just equivalent to the public. While the statute holds out encouragements to stimulate invention and improvement in the arts and manufactures by securing to the inventor a remuneration for his outlay and a reward for his ingenuity, nevertheless, the consideration for which the patent issues to him, is the benefit he confers on the community, by his discovery eventually becoming public property. The patentee may be regarded as a purchaser from the public, being bound to so communicate his secret by specification, drawings, and models, that it shall be successfully available to the whole community at the expiration of the patent. I state this principle of law thus fully, for the reason that in the experiments made before you by Paul C. Parker, a millwright, on his machine, the scroll seemed to be a detriment to the wheel. That scroll, the plaintiff's counsel say, was too large, and not constructed in accordance with the specifications of the plaintiff's patent. If so, the experiment goes for nothing. Then, any witnesses, who have condemned the use of the scroll, should prompt you to a careful examination of the specifications, models, and drawings, that you may determine whether they furnish the instructions and data sufficient to enable a good and skillful millwright to construct the scroll, and all other parts of the machinery, so as to produce the effect claimed by the patentees, and in doing this you will recur to all the testimony given in the case, as to the sufficiency of the patentee's specifications, models, and drawings in that regard.

In the second place, is this alleged invention new and useful? By section 1 of the act of 1793 [1 Stat. 318], re-enacted by section 6 of the act of congress of July, 1836, it is provided that any person or persons having discovered or invented any new or useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement on any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, not known or used by others before his or their discovery or invention thereof, and not at the time of his application for a patent, in public use or on sale with his consent or allowance as the inventor or discoverer, and shall desire to obtain an exclusive property therein, may make application in writing, etc.

It is an essential requisite of this law, that the invention be new; and in relation to the time in reference to which the invention must be new, our statute differs materially from the English statute, enacted in 1623. By that act of the British parliament, the invention was required to be new at the time of the issuing of the letters patent; a long time thus intervened after application made and before the grant of the patent, in which the discovery was made public, and the patentee suffered by piracy upon his discovery. The consequence was, that for more than two hundred years it was almost impossible for a patentee to sustain his patent in the English courts, in a suit for infringement, for the reason that his invention was in use, and, therefore, not new at the date of issuing the patent.

Our statute is more just and liberal to the patentee. The right to the invention dates from the time of discovery, and he is secure in his patent if his machine or manufacture was not in public use at the time he made his application. The question of novelty in this invention, therefore, must be considered with reference to the time of discovery in 1828. Again: The patent itself is prima facie evidence of novelty, and this prima facie evidence is strengthened by the fact of the renewal of the patent. It can only be overcome by proof made under the defendant's notice, and your inquiries in that particular are restrained by the notice.

The questions of the sufficiency of that notice, and the admissibility of proof under it, have been fully argued by counsel and decided by the court. They are questions with which you had nothing to do. Such proof as was permitted to go to you under the ruling of the court, you are to receive as evidence of previous invention, knowledge, or use, and none other. You will refer to your minutes of the testimony to refresh your recollection of what was sworn to by Urbane Kelsey, Jesse Stow, Jabez W. Phillips, Wm. H. Thurston, Perley Blakeslee, Elisha Garrett, and Henry Wetmore. The testimony of these witnesses, coupled with the exhibition of models of the "Kelsey wheel," "Humiston wheel," "Foster's Crossing wheel," and the "McComb wheel," is all, and I believe the only, evidence proper for you to consider in ascertaining the want of novelty in the Parker patent. It is for you to determine its effect under the rules of law that will be given to you by the court.

There are certain legal rules which will govern you in testing the novelty and utility of this invention. And I may here remark, that the word "useful," in the section of the statute which I have quoted, is not used for the purpose of establishing general utility at the test of a sufficiency of invention to support the patent. It is used merely in contradistinction to what is frivolous or mischievous to the public. Mr. Justice Story has illustrated this rule by saying that "a new invention to poison people, or to promote debauchery, or to facilitate private assassination, are not patentable inventions. But if the invention steers wide of these objections, whether it be more or less useful, is a circumstance very material to the patentee, but of no importance to the community." It is quite sufficient if it has any utility. The plaintiff, then, has answered the requirements of the law, if his invention in usefulness is but a slight improvement on former wheels, even though it be for an improvement upon what is old.

In testing the novelty of the invention, the task is more difficult. Where the patent is for an improvement on an old machine, if the whole of it, as well the old as the new part, is described in the specifications, it is essential that the patentee distinguish what part he claims, since, if this does not satisfactorily appear, the patent will be void for ambiguity. Or, if the clear construction of the patent and specification taken together, is, that he claims the whole machine in its improved state, the patent will be void by his claiming too much. And if the specifications contain a description of what is old and known, as well as what is new, what is claimed as new must be distinguished. In specifying an improvement in a machine, however, it may be necessary, and when so, it is proper to describe the whole machine as it operates with the improvement, in order to make the description understood by a person of the trade to which it belongs; and if the patentee fails to do this, his patent fails for obscurity. The simple purpose of the law, in requiring the patentee to distinguish new from old, is, that it may distinctly appear what his invention is. It is sufficient if what is claimed as new appears with reasonable certainty on the face of the patent and specifications, or by necessary implication. These are governing rules of law, where the claim of the patent is for parts of a machine, those parts being essentially what is claimed as the improvement on the whole machine.

There is, however, a class of cases to which these stringent rules do not apply, although the discovery is in the nature of an improvement on what is old. Where any new contrivances, combinations, or arrangements are made use of in machinery, although the chief agents are well known, those contrivances, combinations, or arrangements may constitute a new principle, and then the application or practice will necessarily be new also. And in such a case, the new and improved method of producing a useful result or effect, is as much the subject of a patent as an entire new machine.

The word "machine" in the statute includes new combinations as well as new organizations of mechanism, and hence there may be a patent for new combinations of machinery to produce certain effects, whether the machines constituting the combination be new or old. In such a case, the patent is not for an abstract principle, but for the particular application of the principle which the patentee professes to have made. And I have no hesitation in saying, that the invention or discovery claimed by the plaintiff's patent is substantially of this class. With this view of the case, I know it is objected that the patentees here claim the discovery of abstract principles, and it is urged, that in contemplation of law, principles of science are never new, or the subject-matter of a patent.

It is true that a patent can not be sustained for a mere principle. For instance, Sir Isaac Newton's discovery of the principle of gravitation could not be the subject of a patent. But it is equally true, that a principle may be embodied and applied, so as to afford some result of practical utility in the arts and manufacturers, and that under such circumstances a principle may be the subject of a patent. It is, however, the embodiment and the application of the principle which constitute the grant of the patent. And it has been justly said "that the principle so embodied and applied, and the principle of such embodiment and application, are essentially distinct; the former being a truth of exact science, or a law of natural science, or a rule of practice; the latter a practice founded upon such truth, law, or rule."

Now, percussion, reaction, and centrifugal force are, in the abstract, neither new principles nor subjects of a patent. But their embodiment and application to machinery may be both new and useful, and entitle the discoverer to the exclusive use of his invention. The patentees in this case claim the discovery of embodying these principles in a water-wheel, and their application in a new and improved method of propulsion. And this it is competent for them to do.

Having stated these rules of law for your government, let us examine more minutely the patentee's claim. It is the business and duty of the court to construe the patent and specification for the purpose of determining what the claim of the discovery or invention is; whether it is for the invention of a new water-wheel, or for the discovery of an improved water-wheel merely, or whether it is for an improved method of applying hydraulic power for the propulsion of water-wheels. And it is the province of the jury, under the instruction of the court, as to what the invention is, to determine whether such invention is new and useful.

In construing this patent and specifications, we recognize the force of the rule laid down in Curtis on Patents (section 391): "That the patentee is to be presumed not to intend to claim things which he must know to be in use; and that the specifications should be so read as will make the claim coextensive with the actual discovery or invention."

What, then, is embraced in the claim of this patent? It is not the vertical or horizontal arrangement of the wheels upon the shaft, or the putting them in pairs. It is absurd, said my brother Leavitt, to suppose that a man of ordinary intelligence would claim as his invention the self-evident truth in mechanics, that a wheel on a horizontal shaft should be vertical. Neither does it embrace, as a distinct discovery, the concentric cylinder inclosing the shaft; nor the spout, the gate, the outer cylinder, nor the buckets on the wheel. These and many other things are mentioned in the specifications as necessary fixtures and adjustments in the patentee's combination and arrangement. This combination and arrangement is for the application of hydraulic power to the propulsion of water-wheels by a new and improved method.

The purpose or aim of the patentees evidently was to obtain an increase of power with a given quantity of water. They claim that by the arrangement of the concentric cylinder and the spout of spiral termination, a greater leverage is obtained by applying the water on the wheel in the line of motion, and at as great a distance as possible from the center. The outer cylinder gives it a vortical motion and the inner cylinder gives it greater force by directing it from the center. By the adjustment of the scroll (when properly made), the water passes around and between the cylinders, so that it is directed to the wheel in such proportion that as the volume of water diminishes by passing through the issues, the remainder is kept up to the work and is thus caused to press equally upon the entire circumference of the buckets.

In these arrangements of machinery, the patentees claim a combination of pressure or percussion, reaction, and centrifugal force that produces a combined power of propulsion. And here lies the secret of the invention of this "Parker Wheel." It is the vortical motion of the water on the wheel, which operates as a coefficient to the reactive power of the water on the buckets. It is what the patentees claim it to be, to wit: "An improvement in the application of hydraulic power, by a method of combining percussion with reaction." This is evidently what is claimed by the inventors; and when the exact nature and extent, or essence of the claim of the inventors can be perceived, the court is bound to adopt that interpretation of the patent, and to give it full effect.

This conclusion is drawn from the hypothesis that the terms "reaction wheels" and "common reaction wheels," as used in the specifications, were understood and employed by the patentees in the technical sense of those words, and as understood and defined in books of accredited authors. Since the invention of the "Parker Wheel" one hundred years ago, the term "reaction," as applied to water wheels, has been well understood as contradistinguished from "impact" or "percussion."

That the patentees use the term "reaction" in its technical sense, is evident from the language employed in the specifications in relation to the size of the issues and the quantity of water admitted upon the wheel, as compared with that leaving it at the issues.

That they understood what a common reaction wheel was, is further evident from their description of it in the specifications, in which they say, "It runs under the penstock. Through the floor; a circular hole is made, nearly equal in diameter to the internal diameter or the rim, and concentric with the wheel. The hole through the floor is lined with staves in cylindrical shape," etc., and then the buckets and issues are described. This description answers to that of the "McComb Wheel" which has been testified to by witnesses, and illustrated by an exhibited model of reaction wheel in common use at the date of issuing the Parker patent. Now, it is claimed that this old reaction wheel was propelled by the water (when full in the forebay) pressing or acting first on the disc of the wheel, and then in the lines if its radii upon the buckets, and spouting out at the issues, thus preventing by its course the possibility of a vortical motion on the wheel.

From a careful examination of the specifications, I am fully satisfied that the essence of the invention is, the producing a vortical motion on a reaction wheel in the line of its motion, and that the invention of producing a vortical motion upon a percussion or impact water-wheel is not within the claim of the patent.

This construction of the patent and specifications by the court, will be regarded by you in your inquiries upon the questions of novelty and utility. In declaring what the patentee's claim is, I have sufficiently indicated the opinion that the invention is not frivolous, and that it is the proper subject of a patent.

Thus far in the case, there are presented to you three inquiries: 1st. Do the specifications and drawings furnish such full directions that a skillful millwright can construct a waterwheel containing the combination claimed by the patent. 2d. Is the invention useful? 3d. Is it new?

If you find affirmatively on these three propositions, you will then recur to the testimony, and inquire whether the defendant has infringed upon the plaintiff's right. In this branch of the case, the duty and labor of examining and weighing the testimony, the law, for wise and sound reasons, has imposed upon you. It is made the duty of the court, however, to declare the rules of law by which you are to be governed in applying the evidence.

We have already stated that when a person has invented some mode of carrying into effect a law of natural science, or a rule of practice, which constitutes the peculiar feature of his invention, such discovery may be secured to him by a patent. Hence it follows that he is entitled to protect himself from all other modes of making the same application. The substantial identity, therefore, that is to be looked to, respects that which constitutes the essence of the invention, namely, the application of the principle. If the mode of carrying the same principle into effect, adopted by the defendant, still shows that the principle admits of the same application in a variety of forms, or by a variety of apparatus, the jury will be authorized to treat such mode as a piracy of the invention. But if the defendant has adopted variations which show that the application of the principle is varied, that some other law, or rule of practice or science, is made to take the place of that which the patentee claims as the essence of his invention, then there is no infringement. Curt. Pat. 338.

If the defendant, in the use of a reaction water-wheel, whether on a vertical or horizontal shaft, whether single or in pairs, has run it, or caused it to be run, by the aid of the vortical motion of the water upon the wheel in its line of motion, he has violated this patent; provided he has used, in so doing, any or all of the patentee's mechanical contrivances for producing that vortical motion or mechanical equivalents for any or all of them to produce it. This contains, in a nut-shell, the whole law of the case upon the question of infringement. A different rule of law would obtain, if the shute, cylinders, scroll, and other contrivances were embraced in the claim of the patent. This view of the case renders it unnecessary for me to notice in detail the great number and variety of points made by counsel, upon which they have desired the court to instruct you.

If you find, from the testimony, explained and illustrated as it has been by the models which are in evidence, that the defendant has infringed upon the plaintiff's right, then the only question remaining for your consideration, is that of damages.

If you find for the plaintiff, you will assess and return as your verdict, the actual damages he has sustained by the infringement, whether such infringement was an intentional violation of the patent or not: and in estimating the actual damages, the rule is, to give the value of such use during the term of the illegal user, or in other words, the amount of profits actually received by the defendant between the 17th of May, 1847, and the 19th of October, 1850. This rule is fully stated in the case of Parker v. Banker [Case No. 10,725].

The case, gentlemen, is now committed to your hands. I have cautiously abstained from all comments upon the testimony. It has been so thoroughly examined and canvassed by counsel on both sides, that even an allusion to it by the court would be a work of supererogation. The patient and careful attention which, for more than two weeks, you have given to the evidence and arguments of counsel, is a sufficient guarantee that your verdict will accord with the law and the testimony. Although the long time occupied in the trial has challenged your patience, you have, nevertheless, been amply compensated in the elucidation of important principles of philosophy and law, and by the exhibition of profound erudition of scientific witnesses, which has been surpassed only by the ability and learned disquisition of counsel in the trial and argument of the cause.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Parker v. Hatfield, Case No. 10,736.]

Case No. 17,897.

WINTERMUTE v. SMITH.

[1 Bond, 210.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1858.

DEPUTY MARSHAL—FAILURE TO RETURN APPOINTMENT—RIGHT TO FEES—SUIT AGAINST MARSHAL.

1. Where a deputy marshal was regularly appointed by a marshal, and duly sworn as deputy, but no return of such appointment was made by the marshal to the district judge, such omission did not affect the legality of the service of subpenas made by such deputy, nor deprive him of the right to his fees.

2. A deputy marshal is not entitled to charge for service or mileage for himself as a witness.

3. Though the service is rendered by the deputy marshal, the fees legally belong to the marshal, and his receipt for them operates as a discharge from liability for such service.

4. A deputy marshal's remedy for compensation is against the marshal for whom he performed the services.

[Action by Alfred Wintermute, assignee, against Daniel Smith.]

G. M. Lee, for plaintiff.

Thomas Ewing, Jr., for defendant.

LEAVITT, District Judge. The writs in this case were returned as served by Samuel Dolph, deputy marshal, and the fees for mileage and service by the deputy indorsed on the writs. The clerk has taxed these costs thus charged by the deputy marshal for mileage and service. In this case, judgment has been entered against the plaintiff for costs. The plaintiff now moves to have the taxation corrected by striking out the fees charged by Dolph, as deputy marshal, including traveling fees for services. It appears that, prior to last October term, there had been an agreement between Wintermute, as counsel for the plaintiff, and Ewing, as counsel for the defendants, that the subpenas should be served without the intervention of an officer, the service to be acknowledged by the witnesses. This arrangement was made to save costs to the parties.

Prior to the service of the writs, Wintermute wrote to one Anderson, at Newark, inclosing the subpenas, and referring to the arrangement with Ewing, but saying he would not trust to that, and directing that they should be served by Dolph, who he says was a regular deputy marshal. Dolph served the subpenas, and made return as before stated. Several of the persons served say they acknowledged service of the subpenas, but no such acknowledgment appears on the writs. Dolph swears in his affidavit that he served the writs. The question is, whether, under these circumstances, Dolph is entitled to his fees. It is alleged that he was not a deputy. It is proved that he was regularly appointed by the late marshal, and duly sworn as a deputy; but no return was made by the marshal to the district judge of the appointment of Dolph as a deputy. This omission, if he was duly appointed and sworn, would not affect the legality of the service of the subpenas so as to deprive the deputy of the right to fees. He is not, however, entitled to charge for service or mileage for himself as a witness, and the fees so charged must be stricken out. It seems there has been a full settlement of the marshal's fees by the plaintiff in all these cases, who holds receipts for the payment of them, embracing a release from all further liability to the marshal for his fees. There can be no doubt the fees belong legally to the marshal, and he controls them, though the service is rendered by a deputy. All writs are directed to the marshal, and he is supposed to serve them, and the writs are returned by the marshal as served by deputy.

¹ [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The marshal's receipt must operate as a discharge of the plaintiff, so far as the marshal's fees are concerned, and I do not see how they can be collected by the plaintiff. But still there is no ground for an order to retax the costs, as they do not appear to have been illegally taxed. I suppose, however, the clerk would be justified in making an entry in such case, that the marshal's fees for the service in question had been satisfied. The marshal's receipt would be sufficient authority for this. Dolph's remedy for compensation for his services is against the marshal for whom he performed the services. The court can not, therefore, make a formal order for the retaxation of these costs. This seems not to be necessary, according to the views of the court, as before intimated.

Motion overruled.

Case No. 17,898.

WINTERPORT GRANITE & BRICK CO. v. The JASPER.

[Holmes, 99.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1872.

CONTRACT OF SALE—OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE—CARGO OF VESSEL—SALE AT INTERMEDIATE PORT.

1. The agent of the owners of a cargo of wood, described in the bill of lading as consisting of ninety-five cords, more or less, while the vessel was lying in a port to which she had been taken in an unseaworthy condition, offered by letter to sell the wood to the master of the vessel, at a certain price "per cord, for the quantity shipped." The master seasonably mailed to the agent an acceptance of the offer, and on the next day wrote that he would have the wood surveyed, and would remit as soon as he could make it convenient. On receipt of these communications, the agent replied, claiming that the term "quantity shipped" in his offer meant the quantity "as per bill of lading," and requiring the master at once to remit the proceeds, with the bill of lading to verify the account, and notifying him that the wood was not his "property to move away or dispose of until he complied with these conditions." Before this reply was received the master sold the wood, which on survey proved to contain seventy-eight cords and one foot. Held, that the sale was complete, and the title to the wood vested in the master, when his acceptance of the offer to sell was mailed.

¹ [Reported by Jabez S. Holmes, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. A voyage from Maine to Boston was abandoned on account of unseaworthiness of the vessel, caused by perils of the seas, and the vessel taken to an intermediate port, where the agent of the owners of the cargo sold the cargo to the master. Held, that the owners of the cargo had no lien upon the vessel for non-delivery of the cargo at the port of destination.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

[This was a libel by the Winterport Granite & Brick Company against the schooner Jasper (F. W. Nickerson and others, claimants). From a decree of the district court dismissing the libel (case unreported), libellants appealed.]

George W. Esterbrook, for appellants.

D. A. Gleason and C. W. Phillips, for claimants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Libellant shipped, in November, 1867, a quantity of pine-wood on the schooner Jasper, then lying in the port of Winterport, Me., to be transported to Boston and delivered to Phinley W. Reed, the agent of the libellants. The master of the schooner gave libellants a bill of lading for ninety-five cords, more or less, with the usual exception of the perils of the seas. The vessel sailed on her voyage, and proceeded down the Penobscot river as far as Bucksport Narrows, when a heavy squall from the north-west drove the vessel ashore, where she lay two tides, causing her to leak badly. After getting her off, the master proceeded with her down the river to the port of Stockton, where the master came to anchor, and called a survey, which pronounced the vessel unseaworthy.

The crew then left the vessel on account of her unseaworthy condition. The master remained on board, and with some assistance took the vessel to Rockland, where the wood was landed and subsequently sold. In October, 1868, this libel was filed, alleging the shipment of ninety-five cords of wood, according to the bill of lading; that the master converted to his own use seventy-eight cords thereof, and carelessly and negligently lost the balance; and praying for process against the schooner, her tackle, apparel, and furniture.

The answer admits the shipment of the cargo, but denies that the amount shipped exceeded seventy-eight cords and one foot; alleges that the schooner sailed from Winterport with that quantity on board; that without fault of the master or crew she was driven ashore, and became unseaworthy and unable to complete the voyage; that she was got off in a reasonable time thereafter, and as soon as it could be done, and proceeded to the port of Stockton, where the master immediately notified the agent of the libellants of the facts; and that thereupon the libellants, through their agent, bargained and sold all the wood to Josiah G. Staples, the master of said schooner. The answer alleges that the voyage was terminated at Stockton by the perils of the seas, without default for which the schooner would be liable; and that the liability of the schooner then ceased, any further detention of said wood having been solely in pursuance of the contract of sale between the libellants and Staples.

At the time of the shipment of the cargo, Olesser Gray and William R. Ginn were part-owners in the Jasper. In January, 1868, they sold their interest to Henry S. Staples, who owned the remaining shares in the schooner. In June, 1868, Staples sold the schooner to George W. Reed and William B. Reed, of Bangor, Me. From the time of the disaster to the time of filing the libel the schooner was either in the district of Maine or the district of Massachusetts, or on voyages between ports in said districts, being frequently in the ports of both districts. Libellants are a corporation established by the laws of Massachusetts, and having also a place of business and agents at or near Winterport, in Maine.

On the 22d of November, the master advised the agent of the libellants that the vessel had been ashore, and was not seaworthy to perform the voyage; that he would be obliged to discharge the cargo, and pile the wood on the wharf; that the vessel would require to have the sheathing taken off, and to be recaulked and sheathed, which, on account of the ice, could not be done until spring. He then inquires of the agent, "What is the least you will take for the wood here?" On the 25th of November, Reed acknowledges the receipt of the master's letter of the 22d, and writes: "Should you prefer to buy rather than ship the wood, you can have it for four dollars per cord, for the quantity shipped." On the 29th of November, the master writes to Reed, acknowledging the receipt of Reed's letter of the 25th, and accepting his offer of the wood.

On the 30th of November, Staples again writes to Reed: "I have concluded to take up with your offer. I think of going to Rockland, and do the best thing I can with the wood, and I will remit the money as soon as I can make it convenient. I will get a sworn surveyor on the wood, and good measure as I can."

On the 3d of December, Reed writes to Staples acknowledging the receipt of Staples's letter of the 30th, but claiming that Reed's offer to sell for "four dollars per cord for the quantity shipped" "means per bill of lading," and requiring the master at once to remit the proceeds, with bill of lading to verify the account, and notifying Staples that the wood was "not his property to move away or dispose of until he complied with these conditions." Before this letter was received, Staples had sold the wood for four dollars and thirty-seven cents per cord in Rockland, accounting to the owners for the advance of thirty-seven cents per cord, as freight from Winterport to Rockland.

The offer to sell the wood to Staples, and his acceptance, were both unconditional. When a proposition is made in writing, and sent by post, the person making the offer can retract or modify by a subsequent letter reaching the other party at any time before an answer of acceptance is written and put in the mail. But as soon as such answer is placed in the mail, the contract is closed as to both parties. Although a letter of retraction be actually on the way at the time when the letter of assent is mailed, yet the contract is closed, unless such letter of retraction be received prior to the mailing of the letter of assent. The acceptance by written communication takes effect from the time when the letter of acceptance is sent, and not from the time when it is received by the other party. Adams v. Lindsell, 1 Barn. & Ald. 681; Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. Cas. 381; Taylor v. Merchants' Fire Ins. Co., 9 How. [50 U. S.] 390; The Palo Alto [Case No. 10,700]; Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103.

The property was in the possession of Staples, and no formal delivery was necessary to change the title. His letter of acceptance reached Reed before Reed's letter of Dec. 3 was written. And even if the modification of the contract by the letter of Dec. 3 took effect, and the wood was not to become the property of Staples "to move away and dispose of until he had complied with the conditions" of that letter, it is clear that, after that time, he would hold the cargo, not as agent of the owners of the schooner, but subject to the arrangement between Staples and the owners of the cargo. The owners of the schooner, after that time, were under no obligation to forward, in fact they had no right to forward, the cargo to Boston, the place of its original destination. If the libellants had any lien on the cargo until the price was paid, they clearly had no lien against the vessel, having waived any right to have the cargo delivered in Boston, and consented to accept it at an intermediate port.

And if any claim existed against the vessel, libellants should have enforced it within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time is a question dependent upon the circumstances of each case; and the court, in the exercise of its discretion in determining this question, will be guided by the evidence of opportunities to enforce the lien, of the lapse of time, of the change, if any, of ownership. In this case, ten months had elapsed; the vessel had been in Massachusetts four times, and she was in Boston eighteen days before being libelled, consigned to the same person who, as agent of the libellants, had been the consignee of the cargo in controversy, and had been publicly advertised and sold before the service of the libel. If the libellants had any lien, they would have lost it by their neglect to enforce it under such circumstances. Decree affirmed, with costs.

Case No. 17,899.

WINTER'S BANK v. ARMSTRONG.

[Cited in First Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 36 Fed. 61. No opinion filed; nowhere reported.]

Case No. 17,900.

In re WINTHROP.

[5 Law Rep. 24.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March 26, 1842.

IMPRISONMENT OF BANKRUPT.

A judgment creditor enjoined from committing a bankrupt to prison.

[Cited in brief in Ex parte Hoskins, Case No. 6,712; Ex parte Waddell, Id. 17,027.]

In this case the bankrupt [Grenville T. Winthrop] presented his petition, setting forth that the petitioner, upon the 8th day of March, was, upon his petition to this court, declared to be a bankrupt; that an assignee had been appointed, according to the late act of congress [5 Stat. 440], in his behalf, and that it was necessary for him to be ready, at all times, for examination in regard to his affairs; that he had filed his petition for a discharge; that Ebenezer Trescott, of Boston, recovered a judgment against the petitioner, in the court of common pleas, at the last January term, and had sued out an execution thereon, and placed the same in the hands of a deputy sheriff of Middlesex, on March 22d, with written directions to collect the amount of the same, or commit the petitioner forthwith to prison, and in consequence of such directions, said deputy sheriff was about to commit the petitioner to jail. Wherefore he prayed, that said Trescott, and said deputy sheriff, and all other persons, might be enjoined from arresting or committing the petitioner to jail, until a hearing could be heard upon his petition for a discharge.

William C. Aylin, for petitioner.
Ebenezer Trescott, pro se.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, sustained the application, and granted the injunction. He observed, that it appeared, by the affidavits of the petitioner and the assignee, that the presence of the petitioner was necessary, to give information to the assignee, and to assist him in relation to the estate; that the petitioner ought to be in a situation at all times to obey the orders of the court, and that his being in close confinement would conflict with the proper exercise of the jurisdiction of the court under the bankrupt law. But, besides this, the object and purpose of the creditor here were inconsistent with the object and purpose of the bankrupt law. He sought to coerce his debtor to give him a preference. The law forbade that preference. The object of enforcing the execution was to compel the debtor to turn out property, or to disclose secret funds, wherewith to pay the debt. But the bankrupt law had divested him of all his property. He could have no funds; and if he should, from any property, open or secret, pay this execution, the creditor could derive no benefit therefrom, as he would be immediately compelled to pay over the same to the assignee, upon a proper application for that purpose. It is the purpose of the bankrupt law to distribute all the property of the bankrupt among his creditors, and, if he has conducted fairly, to discharge him from his debts. This process has been commenced in the present case. The petitioner has been divested of all his property, for the benefit of all his creditors. The time for hearing his application for a discharge has not yet arrived. Shall the creditor, in this interval, after the bankrupt has been by law absolutely disabled from paying this debt, be permitted to use an instrument to coerce payment, when there is no reason to doubt that the bankrupt has acted in good faith, and will be entitled to his discharge from this very debt?

The judge decreed an injunction until the further order of court, observing that it would be open to the creditors, at any time, to move to have it dissolved.

WINTHROP (SULLIVAN v.). See Case No. 13,600.

Case No. 17,901.

WINTHROP v. UNION INS. CO.

[2 Wash. C. C. 7.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1807.

MARINE INSURANCE — DEVIATION FROM COURSE — CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY — USAGE — DEPOSITION TAKEN UNDER COMMISSION.

1. Action on a policy of insurance on goods on board the ship Maryland, at and from New-York to the Cape of Good Hope, with liberty to proceed to, and trade at the Isle of France, and any other port or ports in the Indian seas, and at and from the ports she might go to, back to New-York; with liberty to touch and trade, as usual, on the outward and homeward voyages, for refreshments. The vessel touched at the Isle of France, thence to Trincomala, proceeded to Madras and sold part of her cargo, and went from thence to Tranquebar, where she took in goods and proceeded to Batavia; there she sold the remains of her original cargo, as well as the goods taken in at Tranquebar, and sailed from Batavia with a cargo purchased with the proceeds of her outward cargo, and of the goods taken on board at Tranquebar. After leaving Batavia, all the officers died; and before his death, the captain directed one of the seamen, who was ignorant of navigation, to take the ship to the Isle of France, and deliver her to the consul. She arrived there, and was despatched for New-York, under the command of a British subject, but was lost on the voyage. Held, that the trading was within the terms of the policy. That the proceeding to the Isle of France, was not a deviation. That the acts of the consul, if irregular, could not prejudice the rights of the insured.

[Cited in Coles v. Marine Ins. Co., Case No. 2,988.]

[Cited in brief in Winter v. Delaware M. S. Ins. Co., 30 Pa. St. 337. Cited in Schroeder v. Schweizer Lloyd Transport, etc., Co., 60 Cal. 477.]

2. Evidence of a usage to explain some clause in the contract of insurance, is regular; but it can only be resorted to when the law is unsettled, and then the construction must be determined by the usage, and not by the opinions of witnesses.

[Cited in Folsom v. Merchants' M. & M. Ins. Co., 38 Me. 421. Cited in brief in Keener v. Bank of U. S., 2 Pa. St. 239; Walsh v. Homer, 10 Mo. 8.]

3. Depositions taken under a commission, issued to a place where the commissioners are prohibited executing the commission, taken according to the law of the place, in the presence of the commissioners, by the judge, may be read in evidence,

4. If all the interrogatories, either in form or substance, are not put to the witnesses, the evidence cannot be read.

[Cited in brief in Louden v. Blythe, 16 Pa. St. 538.]

5. It is no objection to reading a deposition taken abroad, that the witnesses had previously been examined and cross-examined under a commission in the United States.

6. The protest of some of the crew, taken at the Isle of France, was permitted to be read, to invalidate their evidence under a commission.

Action on a policy, of the 4th of January, 1804, entered into by the Union Insurance Company, on goods on board the Maryland, lost or not lost, at and from New-York to the Cape of Good Hope, with liberty to proceed to, and trade at the Isle of France, and any other port or ports in the Indian seas, and at and from the ports she might go to, back to New-York; with liberty to touch and trade, as usual, for refreshments, on the outward and homeward voyage. The policy was open, and 20,000 dollars were insured. The ship sailed from New York, on the voyage, about the latter end of December, 1803, and touched at the Cape of Good Hope; whence she departed, and touched at the Isle of France, and went thence to Trincomala, in the island of Ceylon. It did not appear that she traded at any of the above ports. From Trincomala, she went to Madras, where she sold a part of her cargo, and received in return an order on Tranquebar, a Danish port on the Coromandel coast, where she took in goods purchased with the above order, and then proceeded to Batavia; there she sold the residue of her American cargo, as well as that part taken in at Tranquebar, and invested the proceeds in a return cargo, and about 10,000 dollars in specie, on account of the plaintiff, and 4000 dollars belonging to the captain. The crew were generally sick at Batavia, and the first officer died there, or shortly after she sailed on her return voyage. Before the ship had left the Straits of Sunda, the second officer, in a state of delirium, shot the master, Captain Wickham; and shortly after died. The master appointed an officer in his room, and being himself seized with a lock-jaw, and sensible of his danger, he called to him one of the seamen, Beardsley, a young man on board, and asked him if he could lay the ship's course for the Isle of France; and being answered in the affirmative, he directed him to conduct her to that island, and deliver her to the American consul at that place. The master shortly after died, before the ship had cleared the Straits, and before any course had been laid. A council of the crew being called; they determined, in their situation, that it was best to go to the Isle of France; and, accordingly, Beardsley conducted her there in safety, and delivered her to Mr. Buchanan, the American consul. Mr. Sauliera, (the correspondent of the plaintiff, and to whom the captain, who was also the sole consignee, was recommended by his owner, in case he should want his assistance on the outward voyage,) claimed the right of taking the vessel and cargo; which, being resisted by Buchanan, the American consul, the question was brought before the court of admiralty of the island, where the possession and management of the vessel was decreed in favour of Buchanan. Buchanan obtained an order of the court for a survey of the vessel, and either upon the report made by the surveyors, or for some other reason, he thought the vessel was overloaded; and in order to lighten her, he sold a part of her cargo of sugar, and invested the proceeds, as well as the 14,000 dollars, and about 1600 dollars received from passengers, in a lighter load, consisting of indigo, &c. He employed a Mr. Adamson, a British subject, then in the island, to command and navigate the ship to New-York; and permitted some Englishmen, who had been prisoners in the island, to take their passage in the ship to New-York. The ship sailed from the Isle of France, and was lost on the American coast, within a day's sail of New-York. On notice of loss, a regular abandonment was made. The property of the plaintiff was admitted. One of the objections made by the defendants to paying the loss when the abandonment was made, was, that the ship when she left Batavia, was overloaded. But this was so clearly disproved by the evidence in the cause, that it was abandoned on the trial.

¹ [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

A number of depositions were taken and read, proving the facts above stated, which are noticed in the charge. The protest of Beardsley, and of most of the witnesses who have deposed in the cause, was read to discredit their testimony, as to the intention of Captain Wickham when he left Batavia, to call at the Isle of France. The defendants offered to prove by witnesses, a usage, in voyages like the present which prevented the selling on board of any part of the cargo at any intermediate port, at which the vessel was permitted to call. To prove that such evidence was proper, were cited Park. Ins. 30, 42, 45, 49; Johns. 333. The admission of the evidence was opposed by the plaintiff's counsel.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

BY THE COURT. An usage to explain some clause in a policy, is proper. If the construction be doubtful, it is the safest guide, because most likely to accord with the intention of the parties; who, it is to be presumed, had a view to the usage when they contracted. But usage can only be resorted to where the law is doubtful and unsettled; and even then the construction must be determined by the usage, and not by the opinions of the witnesses, however respectable they may be. In this case, the usage which the defendant expects to prove, will not contradict, though it may qualify and explain the permission which is granted by trading at the ports in the Indian seas; and it will contradict no settled principle of law on that subject. The evidence, therefore is proper.

Witnesses were then examined who stated, that where the termination of the voyage was fixed, the permission to trade, was, according to usage, confined to ports in the line of the voyage; but where this was not the case, as in the present instance, the trading might be backwards and forwards, out of the line. They mentioned two cases, where the policies resembled the present, except that the insurances were upon time, and a trading, similar to that which took place in this case, was carried on, and not objected to; and concluded, generally, by saying, that such a trading, in such a voyage, and under such a policy, is considered lawful, within the general usage of trade.

The defendant's counsel then offered to read depositions taken under a commission to the Isle of France, which was opposed upon two grounds: first, that it was executed not by the commissioners named, but by the judge of the admiralty, or some tribunal of that nature in the island: second, that many of the interrogatories were not put to the witnesses, neither were they answered. As to the first objection, it appeared that the execution of a foreign commission at that place by individuals, was considered by the government as an assumption of sovereign power, which was not permitted to be exercised. The American consul, to whose management this business was entrusted, in pursuance of the advice of counsel, petitioned the judge of the court to execute the commission, which he did with great solemnity, in the presence of persons named in the commission; but the interrogatories were not all put in the form they were propound-ed by the counsel in this country, and some of them were not put at all.

In support of the commission, it was argued that this was the best evidence, which, from the nature of the case, could be produced; and if it be rejected, it will be impossible, in this or any other case, to obtain testimony where the witnesses reside in any part of the French dominions. In the case of Church v. Hubbard, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 236, it was decided, that foreign laws must be proved like other matters of fact; but that, if such proof was unattainable, inferior evidence, even the certificates of a consul, might be admitted. As to the second objection, the interrogatories are informally put; yet, if they are substantially answered, it ought to be deemed sufficient; particularly in a case where the execution of the commission was taken from the persons named in it, by the imperious interference of a foreign power.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, was of opinion that the first objection ought not to prevail. The object of courts is, that the administration of justice should not be impeded by difficulties of form. The substantial purpose for which a commission to examine witnesses is given, is to obtain the evidence of those witnesses fairly, fully, and impartially. The commission, the interrogatories, &c., constitute the form by which this purpose is to be effected. If the substance be obtained, but from imperious circumstances not controllable by the court, the form cannot be observed; a correspondent relaxation is proper, in order to prevent the courts of justice from being impeded. Upon this ground, which is rendered tenable by the general principles of law, the first objection ought to be overruled. A contrary decision might be productive of extensive mischief in commercial questions. But, whilst the form in which the commission is executed, may, in a case like the present, be disregarded; it is, nevertheless, the duty of the court to see that the evidence has been fully and fairly taken. If the interrogatories be substantially put, though not in the precise form in which they are propounded by the parties; and if it appear that they are answered by the witnesses, it will be sufficient. But they ought all to be put, and should be all answered; as well those of the one side, as those of the other. This is not the case, as to any of the depositions under this commission. To mention one instance, among many others, which might be selected from the commission. The witness, by a cross-interrogatory, is asked, if the Maryland came into the Isle of France from necessity. In answer to some other question, he states, incidentally, that she came in, having lost all her officers; and this is said to be an answer to the above question. But that question was calculated to draw from him every circumstance of necessity within his knowledge, such as stress of weather, leakages, being overloaded, &c. Each party has a right to have full benefit of his interrogatories, and to have them fully answered. This objection, therefore, is conclusive against the depositions.

PETERS, District Judge, fully concurred in the opinion upon the last objection, but he was not perfectly satisfied as to the first; although he concurred, rather than divide the court.

A third objection was made to the reading of Beardsley's deposition, taken under this commission, that he had been previously examined and cross-examined, under a commission in the United States. But the court thought this no reason why his second deposition should be rejected. The protest of Beardsley and some others of the crew, stated, that the Maryland sailed from Batavia for the Isle of France, and that they believed this was the intention of Captain Wickham, that he might there dispose of part of the cargo. But in the depositions of the same witnesses, they declared that they did not swear to this protest, and that if it was interpreted to them they did not understand it, and would not have signed it if they had. But the judge who received the protest, certifies that it was interpreted to the appearers, and sworn to by them.

The counsel for the defendant, Dallas and Rawle, objected to the plaintiff's right of recovery, upon the ground of a deviation committed in three instances; 1st, in selling at Madras, buying at Tranquebar, and reselling at Batavia; 2d, in going to the Isle of France; 3d, in breaking bulk, and changing her cargo there. Second; that the policy was vacated by taking on board an English captain at the Isle of France. They cited, in support of the first act of deviation, Lafabre and Wilson, Park. Ins. 294; on the third, Park. Ins. 309, 310, 313; 2 Marshall Ins. 413; Park, Ins. 295; Esp. 610; 3 Esp. 257; 5 Esp. 56. Upon the second point, they relied upon the evidence to prove that she did not touch at the Isle of France from stress of weather, from being overloaded, or from the incapacity of the ship to proceed. The loss of officers was a mere pretence. The captain intended, when he left Batavia, to stop there. On the third point, they insisted that the American consul was to be considered as the agent of the insured, legally substituted as such by the captain, who united in himself the characters of master and consignee. If so, then the changing of the cargo, and taking in an additional cargo purchased with the 14,000 dollars, was clearly a deviation, and was committed by the plaintiff's agent. On the last point, they insisted that the putting on board an English commander increased the risk, inasmuch as it would, by an ordinance of Louis XV., have made her good prize had she been taken by a French cruiser.

For the plaintiff, these positions were controverted by Tilghman and Ingersoll, particularly as to the facts respecting the second ground of deviation. They denied that the captain had meditated a deviation, and insisted that the American consul was the agent of all parties concerned.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The plaintiff has proved every thing necessary to his right of recovery; and the question is, whether by any act, inconsistent with his contract, he has discharged the underwriters from the obligation to indemnify him for the loss which has happened. The claim is resisted on account of three distinct acts of deviation; first, on the outward voyage, in buying and selling a cargo in the ports at which she was permitted to touch; second, in calling at the Isle of France on her return voyage; and, thirdly, in changing her cargo there, and the taking in a new cargo purchased with the specie brought from Batavia. Another objection is made to the recovery, upon the ground of the risk having been increased by taking on board, at the Isle of France, an English captain to command the ship home.

To understand the first objection under the head of deviation, we must attend to the nature of the voyage insured. What was it? From New-York to the Cape, with liberty to proceed to, and trade at the Isle of France, and thence to any port or ports in the Indian seas; and at and from the ports she might go to, back to New-York, &c. It is contended by the counsel for the defendants, that the permission to trade beyond the Isle of France, is merely constructive, and cannot be more extensive than the express permission to trade at the Isle of France; that though the plaintiff might have touched at as many ports as he pleased, in order to dispose of his outward cargo, yet he could only take in a return cargo at those ports, and had no right to dispose of any part of it at any port on the voyage: that a more extensive construction would be highly unreasonable, by prolonging and increasing the risk beyond the time and measure which could properly have been contemplated by the underwriters.

It may be well doubted, whether this increase of risk to the extent supposed, is not in a great degree imaginary. The buying and selling would be nothing more than a change of cargo, and it must always be the interest of the insured to terminate the voyage as soon as possible. But be this as it may, it is always in the power of the insurers to prevent the consequences of a protracted voyage beyond the period they may be willing to insure, by limiting the duration of the risk. Insurances upon time, seem to be peculiarly fitted to trading voyages, and in most cases accompany them. The only two instances mentioned by the witness called to prove an usage, as to voyages like the present, were insurances upon time. It is impossible for the underwriter to calculate the period when a trading voyage will terminate; and it may, therefore, be prudent for him to say, that he will not take the risk longer than a fixed number of months, &c. But it is unnecessary to consider the extreme case mentioned by the defendant's counsel. It will be more prudent to confine our inquiries to the very case before us. Does the policy protect the selling at Madras? the investment of the proceeds of that sale in a cargo at Tranquebar, and the resale of it at Batavia? The first consideration is, do the words of the policy, properly construed by the rules of law, protect such a trading? If they do, then, secondly, is there any usage of trade which restrains the construction? First, the permission to trade at the Isle of France, ought, upon every principle of construction, to be carried forward so as to apply to the ports in the Indian seas; for, otherwise, the permission to go there would be a mere mockery. Indulgences granted by the underwriter, ought to be and certainly are always paid for by the insured; that of going to any port in the Indian seas, was no doubt, considered in the present policy. But the insured would never avail himself of the permission to go to ports in the Indian seas, unless for the purpose of trading. If, then, the policy is to be so construed, what does it amount to? A license to trade at the Isle of France, and at any port or ports in the Indian seas. If the insured might trade at those ports, he might buy and sell at them, not in the limited manner contended for by the defendant's counsel, but by repeated acts; for I state it, that buying and selling to this extent, is the very essence of trade. It is by repeated acts of buying and selling, and taking in barter, that trade is carried on; and therefore, the words used in this policy are broad enough in their general import to cover such a trading, unless they be restrained by usage, or other expressions used in the policy.

The words used in this policy describe the risk in its utmost latitude, both as to the course of the voyage, and as to the trading outward. As to the voyage, the termination not being stated, the vessel was unfettered as to its course; and this is an additional proof of the great latitude intended to be given to the insured. Second; is this construction opposed by any well established usage of trade? An attempt was made by the defendants to prove such an usage; but, so far as usage was proved at all, it was directly against the defendant, and in support of the construction given to the policy.

The calling at the Isle of France on the return voyage. It is in proof by the testimony of a witness, that the Isle of France is out of the direct course of the voyage from Batavia to New York; and without a stoppage there, would protract the voyage about twenty days. Permission to call at the Isle of France on the home voyage is not granted by the policy, and consequently the going thither was clearly a deviation. But a deviation, if committed against the will of the master, or even voluntarily, for the purpose of saving the property, is excused upon the ground that all the parties to the contract, impliedly consent to it for their mutual benefit. But then it must appear that the master, in making the deviation, acted bona fide, according to the best of his judgment, for the general benefit of all the parties concerned; and in estimating the fairness of the measure, it is proper to attend to his motives, to the end he had in view, and to the consequences. He may err in judgment; the necessity may not have been extreme; but a necessity or justifiable cause must exist, and must be satisfactorily proved. His real motive ought to correspond with the one assigned, or he will furnish strong ground of suspicion that he has not acted bona fide.

The instances of necessity which are generally met with, are stress of weather; injury sustained by the ship, which requires to be repaired; to avoid an enemy; going to join convoy, and the like. But these are only examples, which serve to illustrate the principle. There may be many other instances, where the necessity will be equally great, and equally valid, to excuse the deviation. Our inquiries will then be directed to the following points: What was the asserted object in calling at the Isle of France? Was it the real one? The first officer on board, then the second, and lastly the captain, all died before the vessel left the Straits of Sunda, and before the vessel's course had been shaped. Upon the death of the first officer, the captain had appointed another; but he seems never to have acted, and we never hear any thing further of him. The captain, previous to his death, but after he was seized with a lock-jaw, and when he was certain of dying in a short time; inquired of Beardsley, a young man, and a common seaman, if he could shape the course of the vessel to the Isle of France. Upon being answered in the affirmative, he directed him to conduct her thither, and deliver her to the American consul. Unless a deviation had been previously meditated by the captain, it is strongly to be inferred from his conduct on this occasion, that he thought Beardsley the most competent of the crew to navigate the vessel; but yet, that he had not sufficient confidence in his skill, to entrust him with the command further than the Isle of France, which was not much more than half the distance they had to run to the Cape of Good Hope. This opinion of the captain seems to have been confirmed by that of the crew, who, in a council called after the melancholy fate of the captain, determined, that in their situation, it was proper to go to the Isle of France. One of the witnesses has deposed, that if the crew had not been extremely good, he doubted if Beardsley could have conducted the vessel even to the Isle of France. This, then, was the situation of the vessel. What was the end proposed by going to the Isle of France? If the witnesses are to be believed, it was to be relieved from the danger to which the vessel and crew were exposed, by the unfortunate loss of all the officers who could be depended upon. But was this the real purpose for going there? It is denied by the defendant's counsel, who contend that it was a mere pretext to conceal a previously formed plan of Captain Wickham, to go from Batavia to the Isle of France. If this should be made out to your satisfaction, it will be difficult to give credit to the necessity resulting from the loss of officers, which is assigned as an excuse for the deviation.

The evidence relied upon by the defendant is; first, a letter from the American consul to the plaintiff in which he states, as coming from Beardsley, that the vessel had come in on her voyage from Batavia to that island, in consequence of her being overloaded. It is strange that Beardsley should have assigned that as a reason, when it is admitted on all hands that she was not overloaded; and Beardsley, in his deposition, declared that he never heard of an intention to go to the Isle of France from any of the officers, and that she was not overloaded. Second; the reports of the persons appointed at the Isle of France to inspect the vessel, who state that she required repairs and lightening. This, however, is strongly opposed by other evidence taken in the cause. Third; a letter from Adamson to the plaintiff, after the loss, in which he states that the vessel sailed from Batavia to the Isle of France. But it is to be remarked, that Adamson was picked up at the Isle of France, after the arrival of the vessel; and, therefore, could not have known any thing which had previously taken place. Fourth; the journal of Beardsley, which is headed, "Journal of a voyage from Batavia to the Isle of France." You will judge what weight ought to be given to this evidence. Lastly, the protest of Beardsley, and of some of the crew, made at the Isle of France.

On this evidence it is proper to remark, that the court allowed it to be read for the purpose of discrediting the witnesses who had signed the protest, and given evidence in the cause; but not to establish any one fact. If it has the effect for which it was permitted to be read, then you will consider whether there is evidence sufficient, without the depositions of those persons, to prove the case, and to justify the motives of the deviation; but not whether the protest establishes the contrary; and in presenting this inquiry, it may be proper to attend to what all these witnesses have deposed; that they did not understand the paper as it was interpreted to them; if they had, they would not have signed it. Though I should be very cautious in crediting such testimony, in contradiction of the certificate of a foreign competent consul; yet the certificate, in this case, goes no farther than to say that the protest was interpreted and sworn to, which might be, and yet might not have been understood.

On the other side, you have heard the following evidence: first, two letters from Captain Wickham shortly before he left Batavia, in which he speaks of sailing on his return to New-York, and to touch at the Cape of Good Hope, in order to settle some business there. Whether he could have any motive to conceal from his owners his intent to go to the Isle of France, if he entertained it, you must judge. Second; the evidence of Beardsley, of the boatswain, and of one of the crew; who depose that they never heard of any intention to touch at the Isle of France, until after the captain was sick, and sensible of his danger. The boatswain states that he was told by the captain and mates that they were to return to New-York, and to touch at the Cape. These witnesses, as well as Captain Lacher, give the reasons for their belief, that the Isle of France was not in the contemplation of Captain Wickham. But what seems most strongly to corroborate the evidence of these witnesses, is the order given by Wickham to Beardsley, shortly before his death. The diffidence he manifestly indicated of Beardsley's skill to navigate the vessel, even as far as the Isle of France; his directions to deliver her, not to Mr. Sauliera, the correspondent of his owners, but to the American consul; not by name, for probably he knew neither his name nor character, but as distinguished by his official station, as the commercial agent of the United States; without a single direction what this public character was to do, after he had received possession. These circumstances seem strongly to persuade the mind, that the order to deviate grew out of the necessity of the case, and could not be the result of any previously formed intention. As to this, however, you are the proper judges.

Third; the changing of, and adding to the cargo at the Isle of France; trading, except for refreshments, not being permitted on the homeward voyage. The changing of the cargo was sufficient to avoid the policy, if, under the circumstances of the case, it were imputable to the plaintiff. The reason is, not that the risk insured is increased, but that it is not the risk insured; and, therefore, it could be no excuse to say that the load was lightened by the change. If a necessity exist to throw overboard, or to land a part of the cargo, the act of doing so may be excused; but, in this case, there is no evidence of any necessity to lighten the vessel. She is proved to have been tight, and fit to perform any voyage.

The next inquiry is, were the transactions at the Isle of France, imputable to the insured? Was the result varied by the act of any person representing him, and acting, constructively, as his agent? The affirmative is asserted by the defendants. Or did they result from a misfortune occurring in the voyage, which, for a time, took the property out of his possession, and afforded an occasion for the interference of a third person, acting for the benefit of all concerned. This is contended for, on the part of the plaintiff.

This is a question, which, in point of law, presents the greatest difficulty in the cause. Let us go by steps. Had Captain Wickham lived, and done these things, the defendants would have been discharged. Had he authorized or permitted the American consul or any other person to do them, the consequences would have been the same. Had Beardsley been appointed by Captain Wickham his successor, generally, and had he done, authorized, or permitted the doing of these things, still the policy would have been avoided. But who was Beardsley, and what were his powers? He was a sailor, taken from the crew of the vessel, clothed by the captain with a limited authority to conduct the vessel to the Isle of France, and there to deliver her and the cargo to the American consul. The moment he executed this order, all his authority ceased, and he returned to his former situation of a common seaman. He gave and could give no power or authority whatever to the American consul. Who was Buchanan? Not the consignee or agent of the owners, either so appointed by them, or by the substitution of the captain; who was, whilst living, both master and consignee. The captain clothed him with no special powers whatever; and if he possessed any, they were such as flowed from the necessity of the case, and from his official character as the commercial agent of the country he represented, and to which the vessel belonged. The vessel came to the Isle of France in distress—if you think, from the evidence, there existed a necessity strong enough to justify her going there; and, in such a situation, as required the American consul to take care of the vessel and cargo, and to afford his assistance to both. Wickham gave no directions to that officer; and, therefore, seems to have had nothing in view, but to call upon him to perform his duty as consul. He is no more to be considered as the agent of the plaintiff, than he would have been had the captain died without giving a direction, or if she had floated into the Isle of France, without officers, or without a crew. In addition to the circumstances of the case which threw her under his care, he states that he acted for the benefit of all concerned, and he acted too under the sentence of a competent tribunal, who vested him with the possession of the property.

The question of law, then, upon this point is, is the insured responsible for the conduct of third persons, done in consequence of a misfortune occurring in the voyage, from which misfortune alone, and not from any act of the owner or his agents, such third persons derived their power to inter-ferre? The court is of opinion that he is not. The decision of this point settles the only remaining one, the putting an English captain on board. Let this have been right or wrong, it was not the act of the assured, expressly or constructively.

To conclude. The first question is purely a question of law; as the defendant admits, that an usage, such as was stated in the opening, is not proved, and the law is in favour of the plaintiff. The second is a mixed question of law and fact. If you are of opinion, upon the whole of the evidence, that the going to the Isle of France was a measure of necessity, produced by the loss of officers, that the captain, who gave the order, and Beardsley, who executed it, acting according to their best judgment; were actuated by honest motives to promote the general benefit of all concerned, and did not assign this motive as a mere cover to a previously formed plan to go there: then this point is also in favour of the plaintiff; if your opinion upon the evidence should be otherwise, then it is in favour of the defendant. If your sense of the evidence upon the second point should be in favour of the plaintiff, and that the authority given to Beardsley was such as I have considered it, then the next question, in point of law, is also with the plaintiff.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, the full amount of his demand.

WIRT (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,745.

WIRT (WARFIELD v.). See Case No. 17-174.

WIRTZ (JOY v.). See Cases Nos. 7,553 and 7,554.

WISCONSIN, The. See Case No. 6,317.

WISCONSIN, The (BOYER v.). See Case No. 6,317.

Case No. 17,902.

WISCONSIN v. DULUTH et al.

[2 Dill. 406; 11 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 709; 5 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 299; 4 Chi. Leg. News. 405; 7 Am. Law Rev. 369; 29 Leg. Int. 268.]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. June, 1872.

RIGHT OF STATE TO SUE IN FEDERAL COURT.

A state cannot maintain as plaintiff an action in the circuit court of the United States.

[Cited in State of Texas v. Lewis, 12 Fed. 3; s. c. 14 Fed. 66; Harvey v. Com., 20 Fed. 421; Ames v. State of Kansas, 111 U. S. 469, 4 Sup. Ct. 447.]

The bill in equity of the state of Wisconsin asserts the interest of the state and of her citizens in the navigation of the river St. Louis, from its mouth, where it empties into Lake Superior, at Superior City, for about twenty miles up the river, a part of which, by reason of the expansion of the river, is known as the "Bay of Superior," and it alleges that the city of Duluth, and Mr. Luce, the mayor of that city, and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, are now extending a dyke into the navigable waters of said river, whereby the use of the river for navigation will be seriously obstructed, and the rights of the state of Wisconsin and of her citizens will be impaired. The bill prays for an injunction, and other appropriate relief.

Orton & Setzer, for the State of Wisconsin.
Mr. Stearns, for defendant.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and DILLON, Circuit Judge.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. The case comes before us at this time for a preliminary injunction, and the defendants raise the question of the jurisdiction of the circuit court, and move to dismiss the bill on that ground.

The question thus presented is whether a state of the Union can maintain a suit in a circuit court of the United States. It is one of interest and of great importance. As we shall presently see, it does not appear to have ever been decided by the supreme court, and has only received the attention of the circuit courts in two or three reported cases.

It is not claimed in behalf of plaintiff that the jurisdiction can be maintained on the nature of the rights asserted in the bill without regard to the character of the parties, but it is insisted that as one of the states of the federal Union, Wisconsin can sustain any action which can properly be brought in a circuit court. The constitution, in the second section of the third article, declares that the judicial power shall extend to controversies between a state and citizens of another state, and as the defendant Luce and the city of Duluth are undeniably citizens of the state of Minnesota, the case in that respect comes within that provision of the fundamental law. The succeeding clause, however, of the same section, in defining the jurisdiction of the supreme court, the only court established by the constitution, uses language which cannot be disregarded in this connection. It says that in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction. In all other cases before mentioned, it shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the congress shall make.

As this is a case in which a state is a party, the supreme court undoubtedly has original jurisdiction of it, if it is one to which the power of the federal judiciary extends; and this jurisdiction it has without the aid of any act of congress, for it is conferred in clear and express terms by the constitution. Nor is this affected by the eleventh amendment to the constitution, for that only protects the states from suits commenced or prosecuted against them when brought by citizens of another state or of a foreign state. It may, therefore, be safely affirmed that the supreme court would have jurisdiction of this suit, so far as the character of the parties can give it, if brought in that court. Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How. [54 U. S.] 518. As that court has original jurisdiction of such suits, it would seem that it cannot have in any such case appellate jurisdiction. The section in the constitution which confers it as original is followed by the declaration that in all other cases before mentioned the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction. Did the framers of the constitution intend to give to the supreme court both an original and appellate jurisdiction in the same class of cases founded in the character of the parties? Or did it by this clause intend to define the cases in which it should have original, and those in which it should have appellate, jurisdiction, and to distinguish and separate them from each other? The natural import of the language used, defining specially the cases in which it has original jurisdiction, and declaring that in all others its jurisdiction shall be appellate, favors very strongly the idea that in those classes of cases of which it has original cognizance, it can have no appellate jurisdiction. If this be a sound exposition of the constitution, it follows that if there is in the circuit courts a jurisdiction concurrent with the supreme court in cases to which a state is a party, no appeal or writ of error can be taken when the suit is brought in the former. This would be an anomaly in our system of jurisprudence, which stands alone, and it weighs very heavily against a construction of the act of congress creating the circuit courts, and conferring their powers, which brings such cases within their jurisdiction by mere implication.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

But waiving this view of the subject for the present, these propositions may be fairly deduced from the constitution in regard to suits brought by a state against citizens of another state: (1) That the judiciary power of the federal government extends to such cases. (2) That the supreme court has original jurisdiction of such cases. (3) That jurisdiction is conferred on no other court of such cases by the constitution propria vigore.

Conceding, then, that the jurisdiction of the supreme court as derived from the constitution is not exclusive in this class of cases, we must still look to some other source of authority than that instrument when a concurrent jurisdiction is claimed for some other court. It may also be conceded, and perhaps that is the established doctrine, that the states have lawfully conferred such a power on their own courts when exercised on persons or property within their territorial limits, and that to this extent such a concurrent jurisdiction exists. But when it is claimed for any other federal court than the supreme court, the power must be found in an act of congress.

It is a proposition which admits of no further debate, and needs the citation of no authorities at this day, that all courts of the United States, except the supreme court, being the mere creatures of congressional statute, can exercise no jurisdiction but such as is given by those statutes; and even the supreme court is limited in all except the original jurisdiction given it by the constitution—a very small portion, indeed, of the power which it exercises—by the will of congress as expressed in its legislation. We turn, then, to the act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], establishing the judiciary system of the United States, to which alone we can look for the requisite authority; for though there are many subsequent statutes conferring jurisdiction on the federal courts, there are none which can affect the question before us. The fourth section of that act creates the circuit courts, and the eleventh defines their powers, and confers their jurisdiction. The latter declares that they shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and the United States are plaintiffs, or petitioner, or an alien is a party, or the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state.

This is all that is to be found in this section conferring jurisdiction on the ground of the character of the parties, and we look here in vain for any jurisdiction where a state is a party. I do not know if the idea has ever been advanced that a state is a mere aggregation of its own citizens, and therefore has the same right to bring suit that any one of its citizens has. It has not been asserted by counsel in the case before us. It certainly cannot be maintained upon any sound view of the constitution. If the word "state" is used in that sense in the constitutional provision, it is useless, because there is the provision that the judicial power extends to controversies between citizens of different states, and if a state is but the aggregate of its citizens, then the other is unnecessary. The clause in that instrument conferring original jurisdiction on the supreme court in cases where a state is a party, certainly does not confer jurisdiction when citizens of different states are parties. In view, then, of the constitutional foundation on which alone a state can be a party in the federal courts, no such construction of the statute defining the jurisdiction of the circuit court can be sound.

A like conclusion results from an examination of the thirteenth section of the judiciary act. It declares that the supreme court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies of a civil nature where a state is a party, except between a state and its citizens, and except, also, between a state and citizens of other states, or aliens, in which latter case it shall have original but not exclusive jurisdiction. Now, in all these cases congress makes a very clear distinction between a state and its citizens, and it denies to the supreme court any original jurisdiction between a state and its own citizens, and confers on it jurisdiction original but not exclusive, as between a state and citizens of other states. This latter is the precise class of cases to which the one before us belongs; and it would be a violation of all sound rules of construction to say that the same jurisdiction exactly is conferred on the circuit court, by using the phrase, "controversies between citizens of different states,"—a phrase applied both in this statute and in the constitution to a very different class of controversies from the case under consideration.

This precise question was raised in the case of Osborne v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 841, in which the jurisdiction conferred by the constitution, where a state is a party, is held to apply only where a state in its corporate or sovereign character is by name an actual party to the record.

It is argued, however, that inasmuch as the constitution, in conferring original jurisdiction in this class of cases on the supreme court, did not make that jurisdiction exclusive, and the thirteenth section of the act of 1789 declares expressly that it shall not be exclusive, that the concurrent jurisdiction which is thus implied to be or remain in some other court must be in the circuit court. It would be a sufficient answer to this to say that if it must necessarily be in a court of the United States, it might as well be sought in the district court as in the circuit court, for there is nothing in the statute defining the jurisdiction of either of those courts which refers to this jurisdiction, even by implication. But even if the language of the thirteenth section of the judiciary act does imply a concurrent jurisdiction in some other court, we have already seen that such a jurisdiction exists now, and has always probably existed in the state courts. And the probability that it was to this that the thirteenth section had reference is the stronger, because in many other cases that statute recognizes, both in express terms and by fair implication, such a concurrent power in the state courts with those of the United States. Such is the case with the great body of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts in regard to aliens, citizens of different states, and suits brought by the United States. So, also, of admiralty courts, where the common law furnishes a remedy, and other grounds of jurisdiction of the district courts mentioned in the ninth section of the same statute. There is every reason, therefore, to infer that congress in declaring that the original jurisdiction of the supreme court in this class of cases shall not be exclusive, had reference to the jurisdiction over the same class of cases intended to be left with the state courts, and which, as we have already seen, they have uniformly and constantly exercised without objection. But if congress can confer on the circuit courts an original jurisdiction in this class of cases, concurrent with that of the supreme court, it is a sufficient answer to say that it has not done it. And in the face of the fact that congress has not in any other instance whatever, during a period of over eighty years that the government has existed, attempted to confer on those two courts a concurrent jurisdiction, is an argument of great force against implying such exercise of the power, in the absence of words expressly granting it. It would indeed be curious if, when the constitution which gave so limited an original jurisdiction to the supreme court, made a suit brought by a state against citizens of another state, one of that limited number, congress had conferred the same jurisdiction on an inferior tribunal without an appeal to the former.

Looking at the question which we are considering as it may be affected by the authority of judicial decisions, we have been unable to find, with the limited opportunity which the exigency of this case gives for investigation, any case in which it has been decided that such jurisdiction exists in the circuit court.

Some reference is made to the remarks of the supreme court, and in the dissenting opinion of the chief justice in the Wheeling Bridge Case, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 18, which are supposed to favor such a doctrine. But no such question was before the court, and both the chief justice and Justice McLean said nothing more than that the merits of that case, which was an original suit in the supreme court, must be governed by the same rules of law as would govern the circuit court of the district of Virginia, if the case was pending before it; but it does not appear that the question whether the case with such parties could be sustained in that court had occurred to their minds. Such a suit, brought by the state of Indiana, was tried by Mr. Justice McLean in the circuit court, without the question being raised. It is the case of Indiana v. Miller [Case No. 7,022], and was removed by consent from the state court and the facts stipulated for the judgment of the court on the case. No thought seems to have been given, either by the court or counsel, to the question of jurisdiction.

On the other hand, we have the judgment of the circuit court for the district of Georgia, as stated by Judge Iredell, in the case of State of Georgia v. Brailsford, 2 Dall. [2

U. S.] 402. The case, as reported in Dallas, was a suit brought in the supreme court by the state of Georgia, by a bill in chancery. Judge Iredell, in his opinion, says that in a suit about the same subject matter before him in the circuit court, he had refused to permit the state of Georgia to intervene, because the circuit court could have no jurisdiction of a case in which a state was a party. He had, then, at that early day, decided this question; and though Mr. Justice Wilson thought it was error, he gives no reason for it which at this day would have any weight.

The case of Gale v. Babcock [Case No. 5, 188] is also directly in point. Mr. Justice Washington, in that case, remanded it to the state court, on the ground that the circuit courts had no jurisdiction of a suit to which a state was a party. And in a very recent case (North Carolina v. Trustees of University [Id. 10,318]) the circuit court of North Carolina decided the same way. These three are all the direct decisions we have found, and they all deny the jurisdiction.

We are well satisfied that such is the sound construction of the constitution and the acts of congress bearing on the question; and we have the less reluctance in dismissing the bill, as we must for want of jurisdiction, in this court, because we have no doubt that both the state courts of Minnesota and the supreme court of the United States are open to the state of Wisconsin for such relief as she may be entitled to.

NOTE. A similar bill was afterwards filed by the state of Wisconsin in the supreme court of the United States, but the controversy is said to have been subsequently adjusted. [See 96 U. S. 379.] As to the former bill by the United States, see U. S. v. Duluth [Case No. 15,001.]

WISCONSIN (MADISON & P. R. CO. v.).
See Case No. 8,938.

WISCONSIN CENT. R. CO. (STERN v.).
See Case No. 13,378.

WISCONSIN M. & F. INS. CO. BANK (ROBINSON v.). See Case No. 11,969.

WISCONSIN VALLEY R. CO. (WARREN v.). See Case No. 17,204.

Case No. 17,903.

WISDOM v. MEMPHIS.

[2 Flipp. 285; ¹ 8 Cent. Law J. 109; 7 Reporter, 298; 11 Chi. Leg. News, 138.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. Nov. Term, 1878.

PRACTICE OF FEDERAL COURTS—MANDAMUS—LEVY OF TAXES.

1. Where writs of mandamus are resorted to for the purpose of compelling a municipal corporation to levy a tax, this court will conform as much as possible to the state practice in similar cases.

¹ [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. Unless special circumstances should require it, a peremptory writ will not be issued, commanding a levy of taxes to pay a judgment against a municipal corporation at a time different from the next general levy.

At law.

Before BAXTER, Circuit Judge, and HAMMOND, J.

HAMMOND, J. The writ of mandamus at common law issued out of the court of king's bench, and could only be applied for in term time, but was returnable before the court at any time to be fixed by the court, in its sound discretion, to suit the exigencies of the particular case. In Tennessee the practice is regulated by statute, and under the act of 1831 (Code § 3567) it has been the practice of the judges authorized to issue the writ, upon a petition being presented, duly verified, to grant in vacation a fiat for the alternative writ returnable to the next term of the court. This alternative writ is in the nature of an order to show cause, and if on the return day no cause is shown against it, the peremptory writ issues, commanding the act to be done. While the federal courts have no general jurisdiction, like the court of queen's bench, or of the circuit courts of the state, to issue writs of mandamus for all purposes where applicable at common law or under the state statutes, they do have power to use them when necessary to enforce jurisdiction already acquired, and it is auxiliary to their general jurisdiction. One of the most frequent uses to which the writ is put, is to compel a municipal corporation to levy a tax authorized by law to pay a debt on which a judgment has been rendered in this court. When used for that purpose, we think we are not only authorized, but required by the act of congress making the practice in the state and federal courts uniform, to conform as much as possible to the state practice in similar cases.

We shall, therefore, on a proper petition filed and verified, either in vacation or term time, direct the alternative writ to issue, returnable to the next succeeding term of the court, or to some day of the same term, as the case may require, giving reasonable notice to the defendant corporation to show cause why a peremptory writ shall not issue. If no sufficient cause is shown, or default is made, the peremptory writ will command the corporation to levy the tax on or before the time of its next annual levy, as required by the law governing it in levying taxes for like or general purposes, and returnable accordingly. We do not doubt the power of the court in a proper case to compel a special levy of the tax to pay the judgment, at a time different from the general levy; such, for instance, as the disobedience of a peremptory writ, or some other special circumstance requiring such a course. In this case we do not think the plaintiff is without fault in failing to have had the tax levied at the last annual levy. It is undoubtedly true that it is the duty of the city to obey the alternative writ, and not put plaintiff to the expense or delay of a peremptory writ; but if it fails to do so, like any other debtor it can only be compelled by the ordinary course of legal process to discharge the duty. The application for a special levy is denied, and the peremptory writ will issue, commanding the city to levy a tax to pay this judgment at its regular levy, and that it make such levy on or before the 15th day of next July, and certify the said levy to the proper officers for collection as required by law, and that said writ be returnable to the next November term of this court thereafter.

We have taken this occasion to define and regulate the practice which will govern us hereafter in the ordinary course of business in cases like this, with the reservation that the discretion of the court will be exercised to accommodate the remedy to the exigencies of any extraordinary case which may arise, according to the rights of the parties and the justice of the case.

Rule is now, in the first instance, to show cause why peremptory mandamus shall not issue; so made because of the indisposition of parties to make levies.

Case No. 17,904.

WISDOM v. WILLIAMS et al.

[Hempst. 460.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. April, 1846.

PLEA PUIS DARREIN CONTINUANCE.

A plea puis darrein continuance, admits the plaintiff's cause of action, displaces all previous pleas and defenses, and the defendant must stand on that alone.

[This was an action of debt by William S. Wisdom against John W. Williams and Hugh A. Blevins.]

A. Fowler, for plaintiff.
Daniel Ringo and F. W. Trapnall, for defendants.

PER CURIAM (JOHNSON, District Judge). A plea puis darrein continuance admits the plaintiff's cause of action, and even if the plea is established still the plaintiff is entitled to costs. It has the effect of displacing all other pleas and previous defences, and the party is obliged to stand on that alone. 10 Wend. 679; 1 Chit. Pl. 441; [Bank of U. S. v. Carneal] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 548; Stephen, Pl. S1, 83; [Wallace v. McConnell] 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 152; Story, Pl. 53, 54. By operation of law the previous pleas are considered as stricken from the record, and every thing is confessed except the matter contested by the plea puis darrein continuance.

WISE (ALEXANDRIA v.). See Case No. 187.

¹ [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

Case No. 17,905.

WISE v. BOWEN.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 239.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1821.

COMPETENCY OF WITNESS — INTEREST — OFFICER JUSTIFYING UNDER EXECUTION.

The defendant in replevin, who justifies under an execution directed to him as a constable, if indemnified by the plaintiff in the execution, and having no other interest than the possibility of receiving commissions and fees upon an execution which may be issued again in the same cause, is a competent witness for the defendant.

[Cited in Dixon v. Waters, Case No. 3,936; Hilton v. Beck, Id. 6,509.]

Replevin. The defendant pleads property in one Bellmyer, and justifies the taking, as constable, under an execution, to him directed, in the cause of Holtzman v. Bellmyer [unreported]. Holtzman, the real defendant, had indemnified the defendant Bowen, who, upon voir dire, stated that he was indemnified by Holtzman, and did not think himself interested, unless to the amount of his fees on an execution which might be issued in the case of Holtzman v. Bellmyer, in case the property should be found to be in Bellmyer.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) thought this interest too remote, and permitted the defendant to be sworn as a witness.

Case No. 17,906.

WISE v. DECKER.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 171.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1804.

ASSUMPSIT FOR RENT.

Assumpsit will not lie at common law on a parol demise. The statute 11 Geo. II. c. 19, is not in force in Virginia.

Assumpsit for rent, on a parol demise. Demurrer to 1st count.

Mr. Taylor and Mr. Jones, for defendant. Assumpsit will not lie at common law for rent on a demise. 11 Geo. II. c. 19; Esp. N. P. 20; 4 Bac. Abr. 366; Chapman v. Southwicke, 1 Lev. 204; Johnson v. May, 3 Lev. 150; Dartnal v. Morgan, Cro. Jac. 598; Clerk v. Palady, Cro. Eliz. 859; 2 Bl. Comm. 41; Co. Litt. 141 (6). There must be a special and collateral promise. Reade v. Johnson, Cro. Eliz. 242; Symcock v. Payn, Id. 786; Slack v. Bowsal, Cro. Jac. 668; Brett v. Read, Cro. Car. 343; Acton v. Symon, Id. 414; Ashbrooke v. Snape, Cro. Eliz. 240.

The statute 11 Geo. II. was made to remedy this inconvenience; but that statute is not of force in Virginia.

Mr. Young, for plaintiff, cited Dartnal v.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Morgan, Cro. Jac. 598; 4 Bac. Abr. 366; Hunt v. Sone, Cro. Eliz. 118.

The count was adjudged bad by THE COURT, nem. con.

[See Case No 17,907.]

Case No. 17,907.

WISE v. DECKER.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 190.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1804.

USE AND OCCUPATION — SUBSTITUTED PLAINTIFF.

1. In Virginia an action for use and occupation will lie although there be a parol demise for a time and rent certain, if it be waived, and a promise to pay for the time occupied.

2. The writ is not abated by substituting the assignee as plaintiff in place of the bankrupt.

Assumpsit, for use and occupation. Plea in abatement, for variance between the writ and the amended declaration. General demurrer and joinder. The writ was sued out before the bankruptcy of McCrea. After the assignee was appointed he was admitted plaintiff, under the 13th section of the bankrupt law. The general demurrer to the plea was adjudged good, and respondeas ouster awarded. Plea, non assumpsit, and issue.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury that if, from the evidence, they should be of opinion that the agreement was for a year certain, at a certain price, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover on either of the counts.

THE COURT instructed the jury that, if they should be of opinion, from the evidence, that there was such an agreement, but that it was afterwards waived, and that the defendant promised to pay for the time he occupied, then the evidence would support the counts.

[See Case No. 17,906.]

Case No. 17,908.

WISE v. GEIGER.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 92.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1802.

DEFECTIVE AWARD.

An award may be good in part and void in part.

Debt on an Award.

Mr. C. Lee, for the defendant, objected that the award was not complete, in this, that it does not ascertain how the outstanding debts due to the partnership shall be valued; it says only that they shall be divided equally, value and value alike. Kyd, Awards, 83, 88.

Mr. Simms, for plaintiff. An award may be good for part, and void for part. Independent of the provisions respecting those debts, they have awarded the sum of four hundred dollars to be due by the defendant to the plaintiff; and for this sum the action is brought. 1 Bac. Abr. 142; Fox v. Smith, 2 Wils. 267b; Addison v. Gray, Id. 293; Wills v. Maccarmick, Id. 148.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT were of opinion that the award was good as to the part upon which the suit was brought, it being an independent matter.

Case No. 17,909.

WISE v. GETTY.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 292.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1828.

SUIT BY ADMINISTRATOR — PLEADING AND PROOF.

In an action by an administrator, upon the trial of the issue of non assumpsit, the plaintiff need not produce his letters of administration.

Assumpsit on a promissory note to the intestate. Plea, non assumpsit and issue.

On the trial the defendant's counsel (Mr. Marbury) called for the plaintiff's letters of administration.

Mr. R. S. Coxe, for plaintiff, cited Starkie, pt. 4, pp. 547, 548.

THE COURT said, that the representative character of the plaintiff is not in issue, and the plaintiff need not prove it.

Case No. 17,910.

WISE v. GROVERMAN.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 418.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1807.

RIGHT TO CONTINUANCE.

If, after a plea of nil debet, by the appearance-bail, the principal comes in and gives special bail, and pleads the same plea, the plaintiff is entitled to a continuance of course.

There had been a plea of "owe nothing," by the appearance-bail and issue. The principal defendant now came in, and gave special bail, and pleaded the same plea, "owe nothing."

Mr. Jones, for plaintiff, contended for a continuance, as a matter of course.

Mr. Youngs, for defendant, cited the case of Alexander v. Patten [Case No. 171], where the court refused a continuance to the defendant, on account of the appearance of the administrator of the plaintiff.

But THE COURT thought the plaintiff entitled to a continuance of course, in the same manner as on setting aside a writ of inquiry, it being the default of the defendant that he did not appear before. Continued.

DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 17,911.

WISE v. RESLER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 182.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1819.

ACTION BY EXECUTOR FOR RENT—ALIENAGE OF REAL PARTY.

In the year 1796, A. covenanted with B. to pay rent to the "heirs and assigns" of C. a citizen of the United States, who had died in the year 1785, having as his nearest of kin and heir at law, a sister who was then an alien; and a British subject, and who was born and always resided in Scotland; held, that the executor of B. might recover the rents against the executor of A. in an action of covenant for the use of the sister, notwithstanding her alienage.

The parties agreed upon a state of the facts, as follows:—Wise, in 1796, conveyed a lot of ground in Alexandria to Resler, in fee, rendering an annual rent, to be paid "to the heirs and assigns" of one John Adams, a citizen of the United States, who had died in the year 1785, leaving as his next of kin and heir at law, his sister Janette Barrett, who was an alien, born in Scotland, and who always resided there. The rent being in arrear, the executor of Wise brought this action of covenant against the executrix of Resler, to recover the rents for the use of Janette Barrett, the alien heir.

Mr. Swann, for defendant, contended that as this suit was brought for the use of Janette Barrett, her alienage was a bar, because she could not take real estate by descent, nor claim as heir at law.

Mr. N. Herbert, contra.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover..

Judgment for the plaintiff.

[See Case No. 17,912.]

Case No. 17,912.

WISE v. RESSLER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 199.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1820.

INTEREST ON RENT.

In covenant for rent, interest does not accrue until demand.

In the trial, a question arose, whether the jury was bound to give interest on the rents from the time they became demandable, or from the time of actual demand.

N. Herbert and Mr. Taylor, for plaintiff.
Mr. Swann, for defendant.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra.) The tenant is not in default until demand; and interest ought not to be given unless from the time of the default of the tenant.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[See Case No. 17,911.]

WISE (SCOTT v.). See Case No. 12,548.

WISE (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,746.

WISE (VIRGINIA v.). See Case No. 16,972.

Case No. 17,913.

WISE v. WITHERS.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 262.]¹Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1805.²

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—LIABILITY TO MILITIA DUTY.

A justice of the peace in the District of Columbia, is not an officer, judicial or executive, of the government of the United States, and is liable to do militia duty.

Trespass for distraining goods for a militia fine; special justification under a warrant, &c.; replication, that the plaintiff was a justice of the peace; demurrer and joinder. The act of 3d of March, 1803 (2 Stat. 215), to provide for the organization of militia of the District of Columbia, excepts from enrolment all those who are exempted from military duty by the laws of the United States; and the act of the 8th of May, 1792 (1 Stat. 272), exempts from military duty "the officers, judicial and executive, of the government of the United States."

THE COURT (CRANCH, Circuit Judge, contra) decided that the defendant, who was a justice of the peace in the District of Columbia, was not an officer, judicial or executive, of the government of the United States.

This judgment was reversed by the supreme court. 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 331.

WISHART (SLACOM v.). See Case No. 12,933.

WISNER v. BARNETT. See Case No. 17,914.

Case No. 17,914.

WISNER et al. v. OGDEN et al.

[4 Wash. C. C. 631.]³

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1827.

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—PARTIAL INTESTACY—LIMITATIONS—TRUSTS—SUIT AGAINST EXECUTOR'S ADMINISTRATOR—PARTIES—JURISDICTION—DIVERSE CITIZENSHIP.

1. The testator devised as follows: "I give to my wife, her heirs and assigns, all my estate, real and personal, excepting my outstanding debts, which I order my said wife, whom I appoint my executor, to collect, and give three persons that I shall hereafter direct her to give the same to." The testator died without naming the three persons, and giving any direction. The wife collected the debts, and invested them in securities; for one half of which the next of kin of the testator brought this suit. Held, that these outstanding debts did not pass by the will to the wife, as residuary legatee, or devisee or executrix, or as a trustee by implication; but they are to be distributed according to the statute of distributions of the state.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

² [Reversed in 3 Cranch (7 U. S.) 331.]

³ [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

2. Where a bill in equity states a case to which the act of limitations applies, without bringing it within some one of the savings, the defendant may take advantage of the bar by demurrer.

[Cited in brief in Derrickson v. Cady, 7 Pa. St. 30; Cited in Perkins v. Rogers, 35 Ind. 141.]

3. The rule in equity as to the statute of limitations in cases of trusts is, that those trusts which are mere creatures of a court of equity, and not within the cognizance of a court of law, are not within the operation of the statute. So long as there is a subsisting and continuing trust, acknowledged or acted upon by the parties, the statute does not apply. But other trusts, which are the ground of an action at law, are within it. Under this rule, the statute does not apply in the state of New Jersey to a bill by legatees or distributees.

[Cited in App v. Dreisbach, 2 Rawle, 305; Hayward v. Gunn, 82 Ill. 389; Hedges v. Norris, 32 N. J. Eq. 197; Webster v. Newbold, 41 Pa. St. 492.]

4. This suit was against the administrator pendente lite of the executrix, (charging in the bill that the administrator had possessed himself of all the securities in which the outstanding debts had been invested, and claimed them as the property of his intestate,) and such of the next of kin as the bill charges had refused to join in the suit. It is in this case no objection for the want of parties that the legal representative of the testator is no party.

5. The executor or administrator of the deceased next of kin, who might be made a party, must be. It is not sufficient to make his devisee, or persons entitled to his estate parties.

6. If the jurisdiction of the court could be ousted by making all the parties concerned in interest plaintiffs; those who are citizens of the same state, with the real defendants, may refuse to join in the suit, and may be made defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This is a bill in equity brought by some of the next of kin of Oliver Barnet, according to the statute of distributions of the state of New Jersey, against the administrator of Elizabeth Barnet, the executrix of the said Oliver Barnet, appointed by the orphan's court of this state, pending a controversy in that court concerning the validity of the asserted will of the said Elizabeth, and the rest of the next of kin of Oliver, the testator. The merits of the controversy depend upon the true construction of one of the clauses in the will of Oliver Barnet, deceased; and this question, as well as many others of minor importance, comes before the court for decision upon a special demurrer to the bill, filed by Isaac Ogden the administrator, pendente lite, of Mrs. Barnet. It becomes necessary, therefore, to state the material parts of the bill, upon which the different questions are raised. The bill alleges that Oliver Barnet, a citizen of this state, departed this life in December 1809, without issue, leaving his wife (the aforesaid Elizabeth,) and one brother named Joseph, and the children of a deceased sister Sarah Wisner, viz. Polydore B. Wisner, Henry B. Wisner, one of the plaintiffs, Harriet, the wife of Libeus Lathrop, and Mary, the wife of Oliver W. Ogden. That Joseph, the brother, and Polydore, the nephew of the testator, afterwards died; the former leaving two sons, Gideon and Ichabod, to whom he devised all the residuum of his personal estate; and the latter, leaving the other plaintiffs, his children. That Oliver Barnet, being at the time of his death seised and possessed of a large real and personal estate, and entitled to a considerable amount of outstanding debts, duly executed his last will and testament, in which is contained the following clause, viz: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Elizabeth Barnet, her heirs, and assigns, forever, all my estate both real and personal, excepting my outstanding debts, which I order my said wife, whom I hereby constitute and appoint my sole executrix, to this my last will and testament, to collect, and give three persons that I shall hereafter direct her to give the same unto." That the testator gave no direction to his wife as to the three persons to whom she should pay these outstanding debts; whereby they are to be considered (as the bill alleges) as undisposed of; and passed to the executrix as assets to pay debts, and to distribute according to the statute of distributions of New Jersey. The bill then charges that Elizabeth Barnet duly proved the above will, and took upon herself the burthen of its execution. That she collected all the outstanding debts, and placed the amount at interest, on bonds, mortgages, and other securities, which remained due at the time of her death, which happened in June 1825. That she left a paper purporting to be her last will and testament, which was fraudulently imposed upon her, whereby she was made to appoint Jonathan Ogden, since deceased, and Isaac Ogden, her executors; which paper, being offered for probate, was caveated, and is now sub judice in the orphan's court, where administration of her estate and effects, pendente lite, was granted to the said Isaac Ogden, who has possessed himself of all the evidences of the outstanding debts of Oliver Barnet. The bill further charges, that Ichabod and Gideon Barnes, Libeus Lathrop, and Harriet, his wife, and Oliver W. Ogden, and Mary, his wife, all of them citizens of the state of New Jersey, although equally entitled with the plaintiff, Henry B. Wisner, to the share of the outstanding debts of Oliver Barnet, as the representatives of Sarah Wisner, having refused to unite with the plaintiffs in this suit; and for this reason, they are prayed to be made defendants. The prayer of the bill is for an account as to a moiety of the outstanding debts, one fourth of which is claimed as belonging to the children and grand children of Mrs. Wisner, and the other fourth to the two sons and devisees of Joseph Barnet; the bill admitting that the other half belonged to the widow of the testator.

The demurrer to this bill assigns eleven causes, the whole of which may be considered under the following heads: (1) The construction of the will of Oliver Barnet. (2) The bar of the act of limitations; and (3) The want of proper parties. The first presents the important question, since, if it be determined against the plaintiffs it renders the consideration of the other objections unnecessary; and if, in their favour, it will dispose of all the objections except those which come under the second and third heads.

I. It is contended in behalf of the representatives of Mrs. Barnet; that, by the omission of the testator to name the three persons to whom the outstanding debts were to be given, his widow became entitled to them—(1) As residuary legatee; if not so, then, (2) that she took them as undisposed of, in the character of executrix; and if in neither of these characters, then, (3) as a trustee by implication, upon a trust which the omission to name the cestui que trusts prevented her from executing; and consequently, that the property excepted from the devise to her, cannot be considered as undisposed of, but it remained with her, discharged of the trust.

1. In support of the first ground upon which the claim of Mrs. Barnet is asserted, the counsel for her administrator cited, and relied upon the case of the Duke of Marlborough v. Lord Godolphin, 2 Ves. Sr. 61. I have examined that case with attention, and am clearly of opinion, that it is, in all its essential features, unlike the present. The Earl of Sunderland, by his will, devised to his wife £30,000, and, after some other bequests, he gives all the rest and residue of his personal estate to his eldest son Robert Lord Spencer, except such other legacies as he should indorse on his will in nature of a codicil. He afterwards indorsed on his will, that the £30,000 given to his wife should be to her use for life only, and after her death, to be distributed amongst such of his children, and in such proportions, as she, by any instrument in writing, in nature of a will, or by deed should appoint. His widow made a will, and thereby gave certain portions of the above sum to two of the children, who died in her life time, and the legacies to them were consequently lapsed. One of the questions in the cause was, whether those legacies passed under the residuary clause to Robert Lord Spencer, or were undisposed of, and belonged to the children of the first testator. Lord Hardwicke decided that they were not withdrawn by the exception from the residuary bequests, and of course could not be considered as money undisposed of. That a residuary legatee or executor, stands in the place of an heir to take whatever may fall in, without the intention of the testator, as by operation of law; and consequently that the lapsed legacies must fall under the bequest to the residuary legatee. Now it is manifest that that case differs from the present in two essential particulars. In the first place, the £30,000 was not in fact excepted from the residuary bequest, the exception, as to its terms, being not of any specific sum or article, but "of such other legacies as he the testator should indorse on his will in the nature of a codicil." But the £30,000 was disposed of in the body of the will, and not by the indorsement, which operated merely as a modification of the bequest of that sum made by the will, by limiting the interest of the wife to a life estate, and disposing of the remainder among such of her children as she should appoint; but no legacy is given by the indorsement upon which the exception could, or was intended to operate. This is not a fanciful distinction; the reasons which have been stated being those assigned by the chancellor himself, as one of the grounds upon which he decided that part of the case.

Another ground upon which that decision was founded, and which strikingly distinguishes it from the present, was, that even if the £30,000 had been excepted, still the exception would say no more than the law would imply; since, if the exception had not been made, the personal estate was subject to any disposition which the testator might afterwards make by a codicil, and consequently, the exception, in the language of the chancellor, "nil operatur." It is very manifest that the exception of a sum of money from a general bequest which is not distinguished or distinguishable from the mass of the testator's property, is no indication of an intention to withdraw it from such general devise of all the testator's property, and can amount to nothing more than a declaration of his intention to dispose of that sum by a subsequent codicil, which leaves the general devise in full operation, if such subsequent disposition should not be made. This is a very different case from an exception, or reservation of specific property, which the testator declares an intention to dispose of to some other person; in which case, the property, so excepted, is expressly and absolutely withdrawn from the general bequest. This distinction is taken and strongly enforced by the chancellor in the above case, in answer to the case of Davers v. Deves, 3 P. Wms. 40, which was cited at the bar in opposition to the claim of the residuary legatee. In that case, the testator declared in his will, that he intended to dispose of all his household furniture by a codicil. He then proceeds to make some bequests, and afterwards gives all the residue of his personal estate not disposed of, or intended to be disposed of by his codicil, to A. He afterwards made a codicil, but omitted to dispose of his furniture. The court decided that the furniture was not bequeathed by the will, but was reserved to be disposed of by the codicil; and consequently that it could not go to the residuary legatee, without a violation of the intention of the testator. This case is not to be distinguished from that now under consideration. In the one, furniture is excepted from the residuary bequest, and, in the other, the exception is of outstanding debts. They are both of them specific, distinguishable from the general mass of the personal estate, and, if disposed of by will, they would be equally treated as specific legacies, subject to all the rules applicable to that species of legacy. See, also, the case of Frederick v. Hall, 1 Ves. Jr. 396. I cannot, in short, imagine, how property of this description, excepted out of a general bequest, can be decided to pass under it, without violating the manifest intention of the testator. For I know of no form of words which could more distinctly express his intention that the specific property should not be included in the general devise than by excepting it from that devise, and reserving it to be disposed of to some other person, and in some other way. The claim of Mrs. Barnet, therefore, as a devisee of these outstanding debts, cannot be maintained.

2. We are next to inquire, whether she is entitled to those debts, in her character as executrix, by operation of law? The rule upon this subject is at this day perfectly well settled. The appointment of an executor vests in him, at law, all the personal estate of the testator, and if there be a surplus remaining, after satisfying the debts and legacies, he is entitled to it, in exclusion of the next of kin. But if it can be collected from any circumstance, or from any expressions in the will, that the testator intended for the executor, the office only, and not the beneficial interest in such surplus; equity will carry that intention into effect; by considering and treating him as a trustee for those to whom the law would have given the surplus in case of a complete intestacy. The rule is correctly stated by Fonblanc, vol. 2, p. 131, note 11, where all the cases in support of it are collected. One of the instances stated by him, in which this equitable principle prevails, is, where the testator appears to have intended to make an express disposition of the residue, but by some accident or omission such disposition is not perfected. A stronger case to illustrate and enforce this instance, in which the equitable principle prevails, can hardly be imagined than that of Bishop of Cloyne v. Young, 2 Ves. Sr. 91. Another instance is, where a legacy is given by the will to the executor, expressly for his trouble, or is given generally and absolutely, which last position is fully supported by the case of Cook v. Walker, cited in 2 Vern. 676; Farrington v. Knightly, 1 P. Wms. 544; Nourse v. Finch, 1 Ves. Jr. 344. It is true that the case of Foster v. Munt, 1 Vern. 473, would seem to place the exclusion of the executor from the residue upon the circumstance of the legacy being given to him for his care and trouble. But upon a view of all the cases upon this point, it is manifest, that there is no distinction between a legacy given to him upon that consideration, and where it is given generally. Both of the reasons which have been stated for excluding an executor from his legal right to the surplus, apply in their full force to the present case; for it is manifest that the testator intended, not only to dispose of the outstanding debts to three persons, most probably in his contemplation at the time he made his will, but to exclude his executrix from taking them, by withholding them from the general bequest to her. She is also a devisee of all his estate real and personal, with the exception of those debts, which she is ordered to collect for the use of the persons for whom they were intended.

3. The remaining ground upon which this claim is placed is, that the right to the outstanding debts vested in Mrs. Barnet by necessary implication, to enable her to dispose of them amongst the three persons to be designated by the testator.

The whole error of the argument upon which this claim is founded consists in the supposed necessity for vesting a legal estate by implication in Mrs. Barnet, in order to enable her to execute the trusts which the counsel for the defendants, not the will, raises. For, what trust had she to execute under this will, which the law did not require her to execute in her capacity of executrix? She is ordered to collect the outstanding debts, and to give them to the three persons that the testator should thereafter direct her to give them to. As executrix, it was her duty to collect the debts, and afterwards to dispose of the money as the testator should direct. The law constituted her a trustee for those purposes, and the will invests her with no other or greater powers. It gave her no power to select the objects of the testator's bounty, or to exercise a discretion as to the manner of apportioning the legacy among those objects in case he had named them. Had he named the three persons, and directed in what proportions they were to take, the case would have been precisely the same as if the nomination and direction had been contained in the will, and the law would then have pointed out the duties of the executrix. If the persons had been named, but no directions given as to the proportions to which they were severally to be entitled, the law would have considered them as tenants in common, and entitled to share the debts which might be collected equally between them. Their right would have been derived immediately under the testator, and not under any act to be performed by Mrs. Barnet. But these new trusts and powers are inferred by the counsel from a particular expression in the devise, which they construe to vest in Mrs. Barnet a discretion which is no where expressed in the will. She is to give the money so collected to the three persons to whom he shall direct her to give it. It may well be asked, what sort of a gift is that which one person is compelled to make by the exercise of another's will, and in unconditional submission to that will? A gift implies, et vi termini, the exercise of an uncontrolled will in the donor, and if that does not exist, the disposition of the thing parted with flows from a duty or obligation imposed upon the agent by some superior, whose injunctions he is not at liberty to disobey. It is certainly any thing but a gift. The expression, therefore, when used in this sense, is most clearly synonymous with pay, transfer, deliver over, or any other expression of similar and appropriate meaning. It is stated in the fourth volume of Bacon's Abridgment (page 339), that any words in a will which manifest an intention to create or give a legacy, are sufficient for that purpose, as if the testator say "I do order or appoint to be paid, given or delivered" such a thing to a particular person. So, if the testator desire his executor to give a certain sum of money to another, it is a good bequest; clearly showing, if authority were required for that purpose, that the expressions mean the same thing, and that either of them amounts to a gift or bequest by the testator. The cases cited and relied upon by the defendants' counsel in support of the last proposition under this head, are in all their essential features unlike the present. In that of Harding v. Glyn, 1 Atk. 469, the wife took the estate, which she was desired to distribute at or before her death amongst the relations of the testator, beneficially as devisee; the objects of the testator's bounty were sufficiently designated to enable the court to execute the trust, and the power to select amongst those relations the individuals most deserving of the bequest, was vested by the will in the wife. Under these circumstances the court construed the estate devised to the wife to be only for her life, with a trust in favour of such of the relations of the testator as she might choose to give the property to. But it is added that, if the objects of the trust had been so uncertain that the court could not say who were intended, then the word "desire" would be construed, not as a trust, but merely as a recommendation, in which case the estate of the wife would be absolute. In the case now under consideration, Mrs. Barnet took no interest whatever under the will in the outstanding debts, which, in consequence of the omission of the testator to nominate the objects of his bounty, can be construed into an absolute estate in her, and she had no trusts to execute other than those imposed on her by law, as executrix. In the case of Martin v. Dough, 1 Ch. Cas. 198, there was an express devise of the £40 to the trustee, upon trusts which could not be executed in consequence of the failure of the testator to state them to the trustee. The devise was considered to amount to an exclusion of the right of the executor, and no question arose as to that of the next of kin. These are all the cases cited by the defendants' counsel which seem to bear upon this point; and I am of opinion, upon this first head, that the next of kin of Oliver Barnet are entitled to a moiety of the debts outstanding at the time of the testator's death, to be distributed amongst them according to the statute of distributions of this state.

II. The second general head of inquiry presented by the demurrer is, whether the right of the next of kin of Oliver Barnet is barred by the statute of limitations?

A preliminary question under this head was made by the plaintiffs' counsel, which must first be decided; and that is, whether the bar can with propriety be interposed in the form of a demurrer to the bill? This is a mere question of practice, and if it be unsettled in the English chancery court, the circuit courts of the United States may adopt that which is most likely to subserve the ends of justice. There can be no doubt but that the general course of the practice in those courts, as well as in the American courts of chancery, has been to set up the bar of the statute in the form of a plea. It must nevertheless be admitted that there are some very strong cases to sanction the practice which has been adopted in the present instance. In the case of Jenner v. Tracy, 3 P. Wms. 287 [note], a demurrer to a bill to redeem, after twenty years possession in the mortgagee, was allowed. In 2 Madd. Ch. Prac. 246, it is stated that, to a bill to redeem, if it appear that the defendant has had twenty years possession, he may plead the statute of limitation, or demur. This author cites Mitf. Pl. 213, who states that a demurrer has been allowed in such cases, and cites the above case from P. Williams, and the case of Orde v. Heming, 1 Vern. 418, as his authorities; but he adds that "the latter cases seem to the contrary." In the case from Vernon, the demurrer was overruled, not because advantage could not be taken of the statute by demurrer, but because the bill stated that the mortgager had agreed that the mortgagee should hold possession till he was satisfied. In the case of Foster v. Hodgson, 19 Ves. 182, which was a bill for an account, which stated that there had been no demand for twelve years, the chancellor allowed a demurrer to the bill, but with great hesitation. And it was stated by the counsel in the case of Deloraine v. Browne, 3 Brown, Ch. 646, that Lord Kenyon had allowed a demurrer in the case of Beckford v. Close [cited in 4 Ves. 476]. These are all the cases I have met with on that side of the question. The case of Aggas v. Pickerell, 3 Atk. 225, is the only one which was cited against the practice. In that Lord Hardwicke positively denied that advantage could be taken of the statute by demurrer; assigning as the reason for his decision, that it would prevent the plaintiff from bringing himself within the savings of the act, by replication, or by evidence on the plea, or by amending his bill. The soundness of the reason upon which this decision is founded may, I think, be questioned, since the plaintiff may, in all cases, avail himself of any savings in the statute applicable to his case, by alleging the fact upon which it is founded in his bill, which would compel the defendant to resort to his plea or answer. In the above case of Foster v. Hodgson, it was stated by the chancellor that in cases where the statute of limitations might be pleaded, the bill ought to allege the facts, to take the case out of the statute, if such exist. Where the defendant means to rely, not upon the act of limitations as a bar, but upon length of time, upon which to raise a presumption against the plaintiff, he undoubtedly cannot do so by demurrer. DeLoraine v. Browne, 3 Brown, Ch. 646; Edsell v. Buchanan, 2 Ves. Jr. 83; 4 Brown, Ch. 254.

Upon the whole, I am inclined to think that in cases where, from the allegations in the bill, the statute of limitations may be urged as a bar of the remedy, it may be done in the form of a demurrer. I should have been very glad to have got clear, for the present, of the statute of limitations, by putting the defendant to his plea; as the question, whether the act of limitation will apply to a suit brought by legatees, or distributees, will turn very much upon another, which is, whether those persons have an adequate remedy to recover their legacies or distributive shares at common law, under the statute of this state; which latter question was merely glanced at by the counsel upon the argument, but was by no means as fully spoken to as its importance required.

The rule applicable to this subject appears to me to be very intelligibly and correctly laid down in the case of Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 90; which the learned chancellor states to be, that those trusts which are mere creatures of a court of equity, and not within the cognizance of a court of law, are not within the operation of the statute of limitations; that so long as there is a subsisting and continuing trust, acknowledged, or acted upon, by the parties, the statute does not apply; but that other trusts which are the ground of an action at law are within the statute of the limitations. Upon these principles, he questions the correctness of his own decision in the case of Decouche v. Savetier, 3 Johns. Ch. 190, that the statute could not be pleaded to a suit in equity brought by legatees or distributees, the statute of New York having provided a legal remedy in those cases. Upon examining this statute, I find that it enables a legatee, or distributee to bring an action of debts, detinue, or account, against the executor or administrator, to recover, (in case it appear that there are assets sufficient to pay the debts and other legacies) the whole, or if not, his proportionate share, and the court before whom the action is brought is empowered to appoint auditors to ascertain the facts necessary to enable it to decide the cause.

If I rightly comprehend the statute of New Jersey upon this subject, its provisions are different from the one just referred to. It directs the executor's or administrator's bond to be taken to the ordinary, but gives him no power, as it would seem, to call the executor or administrator to account; this power being vested in the orphan's court; which is to order distribution, on the account being allowed, and to decree and settle such distribution when the persons entitled may have their remedy at law. See Rev. Laws, pp. 177, 178, §§ 11, 12. "But in point of fact," observes Mr. Griffith in his very useful and learned work entitled the Law Register, vol. 4, 1192, 1193, "the orphan's court seldom make any decree for distribution, or decide to whom the surplus is to be paid. The practice has been for those entitled to distribution, either to sue the bond, or to bring assumpsit at law against the administrator, founded on the statute, stating the amount settled, the plaintiff's title, and averring the sum due to him as a distributee." "Doubtless," he adds, "the true way is for the orphan's court to decree distribution, and from time to time to settle the sums due to any particular person on application and hearing, &c. And then the court can proceed to compel payment (perhaps) by attachment, or the party may apply to the ordinary to sue the bond, or an action would lie on the statute after a decree made, settling the right and the amount." "It may be questioned," he observes, "if the ordinary can sue the bond till the orphan's court has ordered distribution, and determined to what the party is entitled, as distributee." The above quotations, taken in connection with the provisions of the statute, render it, I think, doubtful at least, whether the courts of common law in this state have a concurrent jurisdiction with the other courts in suits of legatees and distributees; since it would seem that no action can be brought except for what is settled and decreed by the orphan's court; the action at law seeming to have been provided merely to enforce the decree of, or adjustment made by that court. My present impression is, that the act of limitations does not apply in this case, although it is entertained with so much hesitancy, that I shall consider the question as open for argument, should it be relied on in the answer.

III. The last general head under which the objections raised by the demurrer have been classed, is the want of proper parties.

It is objected: (1) That the executor or administrator of Oliver Barnet ought to be made a party. (2) That the executors or administrators of Joseph Barnet, and of Polydore Wisner, are not parties. (3) That Ichabod and Gideon Barnet, and Libeus Lathrop and Harriet his wife, and Oliver W. Ogden and Mary his wife; ought to have been parties plaintiffs, instead of defendants.

1. The first of these objections seems to be fully answered and removed by the case stated in the bill, and the relief prayed for. The bill charges that Elizabeth Barnet, in her life time, collected all the outstanding debts; and that since her death, the defendant, Isaac Ogden, as her administrator, possessed himself of all the mortgages, bonds, bills and notes, and other securities for the outstanding debts due to Oliver Barnet; as well those which remained outstanding in his name, as those which had been changed and renewed in the name of his executrix; that he has made an inventory thereof as the property of the said Elizabeth Barnet, claiming the whole as such, and denying the right of the plaintiffs to any part thereof; and the prayer is, that Ogden may account for the outstanding debts; the evidences of which he has in his possession, and may pay over to the plaintiffs their proportion of the same, or may assign to them the securities taken therefor. Now, although it is true that if this bill were brought for an account of the administration of the estate of Oliver Barnet, and for a distribution of the general assets of that estate; the only proper party to such a suit would be the legal representative of that estate, which the administrator of Mrs. Barnet certainly is not; yet it is not to be questioned, that if her administrator has obtained the possession of specific property, to which others are entitled, either as legatees or distributees, those persons may follow such property into his hands, and may treat him as a trustee thereof for their use; and in such case, the legal representative of the testator need not be made a party, since no decree is asked against him. That is precisely the present case, particularly in regard to such of the securities as were renewed in the name of Elizabeth Barnet. How far it may be necessary to make the legal representatives of Oliver Barnet a party defendant, as to such of the securities as may continue to be in the name of the testator, if any such there be; is a question which does not arise upon this demurrer.

2. The second objection is unquestionably well taken. The only person entitled, in law or in equity, to the assets belonging to the estate of Joseph Barnet, and of Polydore Wisner, is the executor or administrator of those persons, upon whom the duty to pay their debts and legacies, and to distribute the surplus which may remain, is devolved by law. Those who are entitled to the assets remaining after debts and legacies paid, may undoubtedly maintain their bill for an account against the executor, in case the assets have come to his hand, or against him and those who withhold the assets; but it is absolutely necessary in the latter case, that the executor or administrator in whom the legal right to the assets is vested, should be made a party.

3. The last objection is entirely without foundation: as I hold it to be a settled rule of practice in the courts of chancery, that if there be more parties than one, all of whom must be before the court, in order to enable the court to make a decree, and some of them refuse to join in the suit as plaintiffs; those who bring the suit may, and are obliged to make the other parties defendants, unless in those cases where the parties, being very numerous, some of them are permitted to sue for themselves and on behalf of those others.

In this case, the bill states, and the demurrer admits, that the persons to whom this objection applies had refused to join in the suit; which I hold to be a sufficient reason for making them defendants. But it is suspected by the defendants' counsel, and the argument proceeded mainly on that suspicion, that the alleged refusal of those defendants to unite in the suit was a mere contrivance to give jurisdiction to this court; since those defendants, being citizens of this state, could not sue their co-defendant, who is also a citizen of the same state. This fact may have a better ground than suspicion to stand upon; it may be admitted as a truth; and yet there is no act of congress, and no principle to be extracted from the constitution of the United States, which forbid such an arrangement to be made for the avowed purpose of maintaining a suit in the courts of the United States. If a citizen of one state, with a view to enable him to bring a suit in those courts, should change his domicile, bona fide, and make himself a resident citizen of another state, I am yet to learn that the motive for his removal, if clearly proved, or avowed, would oust the jurisdiction of the court. The ninth cause of demurrer, which could not be well included under either of the above general heads is, in substance, that the plaintiffs claim as distributees, and yet set forth a will of Oliver Barnet, and show that he died testate. There is certainly nothing in this objection; speaking technically, the claim of the next of kin to a part of the personal estate which is undisposed of by the will, and to which the executor is not entitled, is not that of distributees, in the strict sense of the statute of distributions, which is confined to cases of intestacy. But a court of equity, where the right of the next of kin is established, will declare the executor to be a trustee for them, and will follow the rule of the statute in distributing the personal property so undisposed of. See the case of Davers v. Dewes, 3 P. Wms. 40. Upon the whole, my opinion is, that the only valid cause of demurrer which is assigned is the not making the executor or administrator of Joseph Barnet, and of Polydore Wisner, parties. The consequence is, that, unless the plaintiff obtains leave to amend, so as to get rid of this objection, the demurrer, which goes to the whole bill, must be allowed.

THE COURT overruled the demurrer as to all the causes assigned, except as to the want of parties as above mentioned, and allowed it so far; and on motion to amend the bill, so as to make the legal representatives of Joseph Barnet and Polydore Wisner, parties, THE COURT ordered the cause to lie over for that purpose; reserving till the next court a decision as to costs.

WISSMAN (SAGORY v.). See Case No. 12,217.

WISTAR (YORK v.). See Case No. 18,141.

Case No. 17,915.

The WITCH QUEEN.

[3 Sawy. 17.]¹

District Court, D. California. March 4, 1874.

VESSEL IN LEGAL CUSTODY—CREATION OF LIEN.

An owner who has regained possession of his vessel after seizure, either by successfully defending the original suit or by paying or giving bonds for the payment of the debts for which she was seized, cannot defeat an otherwise valid lien on the ground that the contract out of which it arose was made, and the consideration for it rendered, before the release and while the vessel was in the custody of the law.

[Cited in The Young America, 30 Fed., 790; The Willamette Valley, 62 Fed. 298.]

In admiralty.

F. B. Mildram, for libellant.

E. J. Pringle, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The libel in this case is filed to recover compensation for services rendered by the libellant to the vessel as shipkeeper. At the time the alleged contract for these services was made, the vessel was in the custody of the marshal, having been seized on a warrant out of the admiralty in various suits then pending. She has since been released on bond, and on coming into the hands of her owner she was again libeled and seized in the present suit.

It is objected that inasmuch as she was in the custody of the law at the time the alleged contract was made, and the services rendered, the owner could not, by any contract which he might make, create any valid lien upon her.

In support of this view, the advocate for the claimant contends that the state statute, under which this lien is claimed to arise, and which authorizes a proceeding in rem, cannot be construed as intended to confer a right of action in a state court against a vessel in the custody of this court, and such, it is argued, would be its effect if the lien now claimed be allowed.

It is further argued that any lien, whether maritime or by municipal law, is founded upon a supposed credit given to the rem, and that no such credit can be given where the vessel is in the custody of the court, and that "no lien can grow out of a contract made by a party not having any possession or control, and where the party in possession (the court) is confessedly not liable."

That if such liens could be created while the vessel is in the custody of the court, they would attach to the vessel in the hands of a purchaser at the sale by the marshal, and the court would thus be unable to give a good title.

To determine the validity of these objections, it will be necessary to consider what are the relations of the owner to a vessel attached under a warrant of the admiralty and in the possession of an officer of the court, and what are the rights which third persons may acquire against the vessel, in the nature of a privilege or lien; and in doing so I will, for clearness, assume in the first instance, that the lien now claimed is such as the maritime law recognizes, and that it would be incontestable, except for the fact that the contract which gave birth to it, was made and the services rendered when the vessel was in custodia legis.

1. It is not contended that the owner of a vessel seized under a process in rem, and in the custody of the court, can, by any contract he may enter into with third persons, interfere with or affect the action of the court in proceeding to condemn and sell the vessel to satisfy the demands for which she has been libeled. The security of the libellants can in no degree be impaired by any act of the owner after the seizure, nor can any of the acquired liens so created be set up either against the vessel in the hands of a purchaser at the judicial sale or against her proceeds when brought into court for distribution.

Thus a wharfinger whose demand has accrued after seizure, can set up no lien on the vessel even if his possession could be considered such as to create one, but he must present his claim to the court for allowance, as part of the expenses of justice; and if he has obtained possession of the rem, or having become the purchaser, refuse to pay the whole purchase-money, the court will, by summary process, enforce a redelivery or payment. The Phœbe [Case No. 11,066].

Even where a party is in possession at the time of the commencement of the suit of some of the apparel of the ship (e. g. sails), which he has repaired, and on which he has a lien at common law, the court will order him to deliver them up and look to the court for the protection of his rights. The Harmonie, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 178.

But the point under consideration is different from that presented in these cases. The inquiry here is, can the owner, after he has regained possession of the vessel, either by successfully defending the original suit or by paying or giving bonds for the payment of the demands for which she has been seized, defeat an otherwise valid lien, on the ground that the contract on which it is claimed was made, and the consideration for it rendered, before the release, and while the vessel was still in the custody of the law?

¹ [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Property in the possession of an officer of a court under lawful process is in the custody of the law, and the possession of the officer partakes of the inviolability of the law itself. It, and the rights growing out of it, will be firmly upheld against all interference which might obstruct the court in the fulfillment of its functions, or impair the rights of the suitors before it.

But the effect and consequences of taking property into the custody of the court must be measured by the objects to be attained by it, and there would seem to be no reason to deprive the owner of any right, the exercise of which is consistent with the attainment of the objects of the seizure and the enforcement without hindrance or diminution of the rights growing out of it.

If the owner of property so situated is incapable of making a contract which will give rise to a lien or privilege, he would be equally incapable of making an express hypothecation or mortgage, or even, so far as is perceived, making a valid bill of sale of the vessel; and yet these contracts, subordinated as they would necessarily be to the authority of the court, and the rights of the suitors before it, he might make, without in the least degree interfering with the one or impairing the other.

The consequences of the principle contended for might be pernicious in the extreme. The owner would be deprived of all power of disposing of his property, or, on the faith of it, obtaining the means to make necessary repairs, supplies for a new voyage, or funds to enable him to satisfy the very demands for which she had been seized.

He also might use this alleged incapacity as an instrument of fraud; for, by suffering the vessel to remain under attachment in the custody of the marshal's ship-keeper (a circumstance which might easily escape observation), he might, while she so remained, cause extensive repairs to be made or supplies furnished, and upon her release, deny all right of recourse against the vessel on the pretense that she was in custodia legis when the repairs were made, or the supplies furnished.

I see, therefore, no reason for the principle contended for, either in the interests of the owner or those of commerce, or those of the administration of justice. It is said that liens are grounded upon the credit, express or presumed, given to the vessel, and that no such credit can be given to a vessel in the custody of the law, for such a credit is impossible. But this is obviously a statement of the position of the advocate of the claimant, not an argument in support of it.

It is equivalent to saying that no lien was contemplated by the parties because none could, by law, be created, and that no lien was created by law, because none was contemplated by the parties. Where there is no proof of an exclusively personal credit, a party dealing with the owner of a vessel is presumed to look to the remedies which the law gives him. What those remedies are, is in this case the very question at issue.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that the fact that the contract under which the lien is claimed, was entered into while the vessel was in the custody of the law, is no bar to a libel in rem, to enforce the lien against the vessel in the hands of the owner, to whom she has been restored on dissolution of the admiralty attachment.

2. If this general proposition be true, I do not perceive that the circumstance that the lien arises under the municipal, and not under the maritime law, will make any difference; provided this be a case where the state has legislative authority to create a maritime lien, and this court has jurisdiction to enforce it. On these points no objection was raised.

The suggestion that the framers of the state statute could not have contemplated a lien or a remedy in rem against a vessel in the custody of this court, is answered by the observation that no such intention is attributed to the framers of the statute, and no such effect given to the law.

The lien claimed in this case, though founded on services in part rendered while the vessel was in the custody of the law, attached to her only after she had been restored to the owner. It is sought to be enforced against her, not in the hands of a purchaser at a sale ordered by the court, but in the hands of her original owner, by whom the contract to which the law annexes a lien was made. The evidence with regard to the facts is irreconcilably conflicting.
* * * Decree for the libellant.

Case No. 17,916.

The WITCH QUEEN.

[3 Sawy. 201.]¹

District Court, D. California. Nov. 30, 1874.

LIEN OF MATERIAL MEN—PROPERTY COVERED.

Where a vessel was supplied with a diving-bell, air-pump, and other apparatus not required for her use as a "navigating ship," but indispensable for the accomplishment of the enterprise in which she was about to engage, held, that the lien of the material men extended to all articles belonging to the owner which (not being cargo) have been placed on board for the objects and purposes of this voyage.

In admiralty.

Milton Andros, for libellants.

E. J. Pringle, for claimant.

¹ [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. There can, I think, be no doubt that the material and supply men by whom the libels in these cases have been filed, are entitled to a lien under the general maritime law, independently of the state statute. The vessel, although enrolled here, was owned in New York. The claimant is a New York corporation. The authorities are clear that the question whether a vessel is to be regarded as foreign or domestic within the rule laid down in the case of The General Smith [4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 438], depends upon the residence of her owner, and not on the place of her registry or enrollment. Hill v. The Golden Gate [Case No. 6,492]; Bond v. The Superb [Id. 1, 624] 2 Pars. Adm. 326, and cases cited.

This vessel must therefore be regarded as a foreign vessel, to which supplies have been furnished in a port other than her home port. For these supplies she is, by the maritime law, liable in rem.

The voyage contemplated by the vessel, and for which supplies were furnished, was a pearl-fishing voyage. As part of her necessary equipment for this enterprise she was provided with a diving-bell, air-pump, and other apparatus—not required for her use as a “navigating ship,” but indispensable for the accomplishment of the objects of the particular voyage she was about to enter upon.

It is contended that these articles are not subject to the lien of material men.

No case in point has been cited, but the question seems to be settled by the eighth rule in admiralty of the supreme court.

That rule provides that “in all suits in rem against a ship, her tackle, sails, apparel, furniture, boats, or other appurtenances, if such tackle, sails, apparel, furniture, boats, or other appurtenances are in possession or custody of any third person, the court may, after a due monition to such third person, and a hearing of the cause, if any, why the same should not be delivered over, award and decree that the same be delivered into the custody of the marshal.” In what sense the word “appurtenances” is used by the supreme court, cannot be doubtful.

The previous enumeration of “tackle, sails, apparel, furniture and boats,” includes everything belonging to the vessel as a “navigating ship.” Unless the word “appurtenances” applies to other objects on board belonging to the owners, for the purposes of the voyage, it can have no operation. The word was, no doubt, used advisedly by the supreme court.

In the case of The Dundee, 1 Hagg. Adm. 109, Lord Stowell held that whatever is on board a ship for the objects of the voyage and adventure on which she is engaged, belonging to the ship and not being cargo, constitutes a part of the ship and “her appurtenances,” within the meaning of the statute of 53 Geo. III. c. 139. And this decision was affirmed in the court of king’s bench. Gale v. Laurie, 5 Barn. & C. 156. The articles in that case claimed to be “appurtenances” were “boats, fishing tackle, such as harpoon’s-lines, rockets, casks and various other implements termed fishing stores.”

The value of the ship, her tackle, etc., was £2685, and that of her “fishing stores” was £2236. It is plain that if the “fishing stores” in that case, though their value was nearly equal to that of the ship, were properly considered as part of her “appurtenances,” the diving-bell, air-pump, etc., in the case at bar, must be treated as embraced within the same description. The judgment in the case of The Dundee was rendered more than twenty years before the admiralty rules were framed by the supreme court, and the latter must be deemed to have purposely employed the term in the sense which had so long been attached to it by express judicial decisions.

I consider the language of the admiralty rule above cited so clear and decisive, that further discussion of the point is unnecessary. An additional observation however, may be permitted. The common law rule, derived from the civil law, by which the ship-owner was held responsible in solido for all damages caused by the acts of his servants, the master and crew, has both in England and America been modified by statute.

The liability of the owner is now limited to the value of the ship and freight, or, in the language of the statute of 53 Geo. III., c. 139, “the ship, freight and appurtenances.” By abandoning these he may discharge himself from all personal liability. The creditors are thus restricted to a particular fund, and being so restricted, the maritime law gives them a privilege or lien upon it.

“When the law,” says Mr. Justice Ware, “confines a creditor to a particular fund for his remuneration, it cannot be so absurd as to prohibit him from making that fund available, by laying his hand on and securing it. The maritime law is not chargeable with any such absurdity after it has, on principles of a general policy, restricted him to a particular fund; it not only permits him to proceed directly against it in specie but gives him a privilege against it over the general creditors of his debtor.” The Rebecca [Case No. 11,619].

If, then, the lien of the creditor is co-extensive with the liability of the ship-owner, in ascertaining the limits of the latter, we necessarily determine the extent of the former. Any general considerations, therefore, which show that appurtenances of a ship, such as those in question in this case, and in The Dundee, ought not to be exempt from liability, also show that they should be subject to the creditor’s lien.

The statutes in England and America, to which I have referred, merely re-establish the ancient rule of the maritime law, which prevailed universally among the commercial nations of the continent. Norwich Co. v.

Wright, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 48. These laws were for the encouragement of commerce, but were not intended to favor one class of vessels more than another.

"If a ship," says Lord Stowell, "is run down at sea by a merchant vessel, the wrongdoing vessel is by the act that diminishes the general responsibility, still liable to contribute not only to the extent of herself, but to that of her freight outward and of her freight homeward if contracted for, and for what her owner's property would have paid for freight if it had been liable for freight. But in this class of vessels (i. e. fishing vessels) there is no freight either outward or homeward, nor any owner's property on board, and unless the fishing stores are made responsible in contribution, there is no fund for compensation but the vessel itself, as is actually contended for in the present instance. This class of vessels is highly favored by the British legislature and most deservedly. * * * But surely it can be no part of the intended encouragement that they shall be qualified to do mischief at a cheaper rate than other vessels. If nothing but the vessel itself be liable, that would present a result apparently very unequal and unjust, not only to the injured vessel whose compensation was so much abridged, but likewise to all other vessels which, having committed the like injuries, were subjected to a so much severer retribution." The Dundee, ubi supra.

There is great force in these observations, and if they show that "fishing stores" ought not to be, and are not exempt from liability to contribution, they also, as before remarked, prove that the lien of the creditor must extend to them.

The denial of the lien in the present case would be peculiarly unjust.

It is not disputed that the persons who have furnished the diving-bell, air-pump, etc., have a lien on the vessel for their price. They thus come in concurrently with the other material-men for their proportion of her proceeds. It would be most unjust that the very articles, the supplying of which gave birth to this lien, should be exempted from its operation.

I think, therefore, that the lien in this case extends to all the articles belonging to the owner, which (not being cargo) have been placed on board for the objects and purposes of the voyage and enterprise in which she was about to engage.

The supplies appear to have been ordered in part by the master, with the owner's knowledge and consent, and in part by the latter.

Under such circumstances the supply-men have a lien in rem, for the satisfaction of their claims. The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 129; The Gay, Id. 758; Stringham v. Schoener [Case No. 13,536].

The parties may, very possibly, be able to settle by agreement, the amounts due to the several libellants. Should any controversy arise, it may be brought before the court or referred to the commissioner to take testimony and report.

WITHERBURY (UNITED STATES v.).
See Case No. 16,747.

Case No. 17,917.

WITHERELL v. WIBERG.

[4 Sawy. 232; 9 Chi. Leg. News, 271; 15 Alb. Law J. 392.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. April 12, 1877.

NATURE OF MORTGAGE—MORTGAGEE'S RIGHT TO POSSESSION—FRIVOLOUS PLEA.

1. In Oregon a mortgage is a mere security, and the mortgagor, both before and after condition broken, is the owner of the premises, subject to the lien of the mortgage, and he cannot be deprived of the possession of the same against his will otherwise than by foreclosure and sale.

[Cited in Oregon & W. Trust Inv. Co. v. Shaw, Case No. 10,556; Semple v. Bank of British Columbia, Id. 12,659 and 12,660; Gest v. Packwood, 34 Fed. 373.]

2. A mortgagee has no right or authority to take possession of the mortgaged premises and hold the same for the satisfaction of his debt without the consent of the mortgagor.

[Cited in Edwards v. Wray, 12 Fed. 44; The Holladay Case, 29 Fed. 230.]

3. A plea stating that the defendant is in possession as assignee of an unsatisfied mortgage, but which does not allege that he entered with the assent of the mortgagor, is frivolous, but not sham or redundant.

[Cited in Oregonian Ry. Co. v. Oregonian Ry. & Nav. Co., 22 Fed. 249.]

4. The nature and duration of an estate license or right to the possession, how pleaded within the meaning of section 316, Civ. Code Or.

[Cited in Lewis v. Oregon Cent. R. Co., Case No. 8,329.]

[This was an action by Timothy D. Withereil against C. M. Wiberg.]

Charles B. Upton, for plaintiff.

Walter W. Thayer, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought by the plaintiff as a citizen of New Jersey, against the defendant as a citizen of Oregon, to recover the possession of the undivided one-half of two hundred and twenty-two acres of land, situate in Multnomah county.

Among other defenses, the answer contains a plea that the defendant "has a right to the possession" of the premises; "that the nature and duration of said right is that of a mortgagee in possession under a certain mortgage executed by H. F. Davis, the owner of said lands in fee to I. A. Davenport, on January 11, 1859, of which defendant is assignee, and upon which there is now due the sum of $4786; and that he is entitled to the possession of said property until the payment of said amount due upon said mortgage."

¹ [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 15 Alb. Law J. 392 contains only a partial report.]

The plaintiff moves to strike out this defense "because the same is sham, redundant and frivolous." The defense is neither sham nor redundant. A sham defense is one which is palpably false. Bachman v. Everding [Case No. 708]; Hadden v. New York Silk Manuf'g Co., 1 Daly, 388. Nothing appears from which the court could even surmise, let alone declare that this plea is false. If redundant matter be inserted in a pleading, it may be stricken out on motion. Civ. Code Or. § 84. But an answer or defense cannot be stricken out, as a whole, upon the ground of redundancy. Redundancy consists in irrelevant allegations or unnecessary repetitions, or perhaps prolixity of statement of such as are material; and the motion to strike out must be directed at such allegations, repetitions or statements. Bowman v. Sheldon, 5 Sandf. 657; Fasnacht v. Stehn, 53 Barb. 651. Section 74 of the Code authorizes an answer or defense to be stricken out as a whole if it be frivolous. Under the New York Code (section 247) the plaintiff, in case of a frivolous answer or defense, is entitled on motion to judgment on the pleadings. An answer or defense is frivolous when it contains nothing which affects the plaintiff's case—when it denies no material averments of the complaint and sets up no defense thereto. Hull v. Smith, 1 Duer, 649.

Counsel for the plaintiff maintains that this plea contains no defense to this action, because: (1) It does not comply with section 316 of the Civil Code, which provides that "The defendant shall not be allowed to give in evidence any estate in himself or another in the property, or any license or right to the possession thereof, unless the same be pleaded in his answer. If so pleaded, the nature and duration of such estate or license, or right to the possession, shall be set forth with the certainty and particularity required in the complaint." And (2) it does not allege that the defendant took possession of the premises with the consent of the mortgagor.

On the argument it was suggested by counsel for defendant that the phrase, "nature and duration of such estate," etc., was uncertain, and therefore it was difficult to say how much or how little particularity and detail is required in a defense of this kind. But the force of the suggestion is not perceived. The "duration" of an estate, whether it be in fee or at will, signifies the quantity or duration of the tenant's interest in the premises. The term is well known to the common law. 2 Bl. Comm. 103; 1 St. Wash. 45.

To set forth in a plea, then, the duration of the estate or right to the possession which a defendant may claim in the premises, is simply to state the quantity of his interest therein, or the length of time he is entitled to the possession thereof. The "nature" of an estate signifies its qualities or incidents, without reference to its duration or extent, as that it is upon condition, or is held jointly or in severalty. This term is also well known to the common law. 2 Bl. Comm. 152, 178; Wash. St. 406.

To set forth this "nature" and duration, then, in an answer, "with the certainty and particularity required in a complaint," must ordinarily be a very simple matter. It is sufficient to allege that the party is the sole or part owner in fee-simple or upon condition, or for life or years of the premises, as the case may be; or, in case of some special license or right to the possession for a limited time or special use, to state succinctly the license or right to the possession as claimed, with the necessary facts constituting it.

This defense may be insufficient on demurrer for not stating the fact directly with the circumstance of time that the mortgage or debt secured thereby was duly assigned to the defendant, instead of the allegation, "of which the defendant is the assignee." But it is not frivolous on that account. The fact is stated that the defendant is the assignee of the mortgage, and if that is deemed insufficient or too uncertain, the objection must be made by demurrer or motion to make more definite and certain. Civ. Code, §§ 66, 84.

But, if it is necessary that it should appear that the defendant is in possession with the consent of the mortgagor or his assignee, I suppose this defense is frivolous. This is a question upon which this court follows the law of the state, as expounded by its supreme court.

At common law a mortgagee in fee of land is considered as absolutely entitled to the estate, subject to its being defeated by the grantor's performance of the condition in his deed—as the payment of a sum of money in a prescribed time and manner; and also, if so provided, to the grantor's right to occupy until a failure to perform the condition. But upon such failure the mortgagee at once becomes the absolute and unconditional owner of the estate. 1 St. Wash. 510; 4 Kent, Comm. 154.

But this doctrine was long since modified by the courts of equity. In Casborne v. Scarfe, 1 Atk. 603, Lord Hardwicke laid down the rule that the mortgagor in possession was the owner of the land; and in Rex v. Inhabitants of St. Michael's in Bath, 2 Doug. 632, Lord Mansfield held that the mortgage was only a security, saying: "It is an affront to common sense to say the mortgagor is not the real owner."

The doctrines of equity on this subject have been gradually recognized by courts of law, so that a half century ago Chancellor Kent could exultingly say: "The case of mortgages is one of the most splendid instances in the history of our jurisprudence of the triumph of equitable principles over technical rules, and the homage which those principles have received by their adoption in the courts of law." 4 Kent, Comm. 158.

At this day, in some of the states, notably New York, Wisconsin and California, the equitable doctrine has been followed to its logical results, so that a mortgage is there considered a mere chose in action, a security for the debt, while the mortgagor is considered the owner of the premises, subject only to the lien of the mortgage, until a foreclosure and sale. Jackson v. Willard, 4 Johns. 42; Runyan v. Merserau, 11 Johns. 538; Waring v. Smyth, 2 Barb. Ch. 135; Jackson v. Bronson, 19 Johns. 325; Gardner v. Heartt, 3 Denio, 234; Kortright v. Cady, 21 N. Y. 363; Trim v. Marsh, 54 N. Y. 603; 4 Kent, Comm. 157; Russell v. Ely, 2 Black, 576; McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 409; Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 592; Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 621; Kidd v. Teeple, 22 Cal. 262; Bludworth v. Lake, 33 Cal. 264.

This result has been facilitated by the force of legislation, of which section 323 of the Oregon Civil Code is a substantial copy. It declares, "A mortgage of real property shall not be deemed a conveyance, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover the possession of the real property without a foreclosure and sale according to law." In Kortright v. Cady, supra, the court in speaking of this statute, says, "that the legislature in enacting it undoubtedly supposed they had swept away the only remaining vestige of the common law which regarded a mortgage as a conveyance of the freehold."

In Anderson v. Baxter, 4 Or. 110, the supreme court of this state held that "a suit to foreclose a mortgage is not for the determination of any right or claim to or interest in real property, but a proceeding to have the mortgaged property adjudged to be sold to satisfy the debt secured thereby. * * * It is the mere collection of a debt charged upon specific property by resorting to the property as a means of satisfying it." This is equivalent to saying that the mortgage is a mere security for the debt, and that the mortgagee acquires no interest in the property by virtue of the mortgage, but only the right to subject it, according to a prescribed proceeding, to the satisfaction of his debt.

In Roberts v. Sutherlin, 4 Or. 222, the same court, commenting upon the case of Anderson v. Baxter, said that it was therein determined "that the execution of a mortgage does not vest in the mortgagee any title to or interest in the mortgaged premises, but that it is only a security for a debt, similar to that created by a judgment." In effect, this squares with the celebrated dictum in Gardner v. Heartt, supra: "The mortgagee has neither a jus in re nor ad rem, but a specific lien, similar in character to a general lien created by a judgment upon the land of the judgment debtor." In Roberts v. Sutherlin the action was ejectment, and the defendant pleaded that the premises were mortgaged to secure the payment of a certain sum of money of which a certain portion was still due, and that the mortgage was duly assigned to the defendant, who "entered into the possession of the premises with the full assent of plaintiff."

On demurrer this was held a good defense, the court saying, that while by reason of section 323, supra, "a mortgagor cannot against his will be divested of his possession of the mortgaged premises, even after a default without a foreclosure and sale, * * * we know of no law or of any good reason to prevent the mortgagor from placing his mortgagee in possession of mortgaged premises if he chooses to do so. * * * And when the duration of the possession of the mortgagee thus acquired is not limited by his agreement with the mortgagor, we think that the legal effect of the same is, that he may retain it until his mortgage debt is paid. And we do not think that this doctrine conflicts with the rule that a mortgage is simply a security for a debt, and vests in the mortgagee no legal title to or interest in the mortgaged premises." From these decisions, it appears that the rights of parties to a mortgage in this state are governed by what is called the doctrine of equity, as distinguished from the original common law rules on the subject. As was said by Mr. Justice Field, in McMillan v. Richards, supra, "the original character of mortgages has undergone a change. They have ceased to be conveyances, except in form. They are no longer understood as contracts of purchase and sale between the parties, but as transactions by which a loan is made on the one side and security for its repayment furnished on the other. They pass no estate in the land, but are mere securities, and default in payment of the money secured does not change their character."

Notwithstanding this change in the law of mortgages, the mortgagee is still so far favored that, if after default in the payment of the debt he acquires possession of the premises lawfully, he may hold them until the rents and profits satisfy the same. And this brings us to the real question in this case, what under the circumstances constitutes a lawful possession of or entry upon the mortgaged premises by the mortgagee? In Roberts v. Sutherlin, the court said that possession obtained with the assent of the mortgagor is lawful, and no case has been found which expressly makes such possession or entry lawful without such assent. Indeed, it is impossible to conceive how a person like a mortgagee, who, in the language of Roberts v. Sutherlin, has "no legal title to or interest in the mortgaged premises," could lawfully enter upon and possess the same without the assent of the owner. It follows as a logical deduction from the premise, that a mortgage passes no estate in the land, and a default in payment does not change its character, that a mortgagee cannot acquire lawful possession of the mortgaged premises by an entry thereon, even if peaceable, without the consent of the owner, the mortgagor. Otherwise the mortgagor might be divested of his possession against his will; and this the court in Roberts v. Sutherland say cannot now be done.

In Waring v. Smith, supra, the court say: "The only right the mortgagee now has in the land itself is to take possession thereof, with the assent of the mortgagor, after the debt has become due and payable, and retain such possession until the debt is paid." In Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 593, the court say that the statute preventing the mortgagee from maintaining ejectment against the mortgagor, "takes from the mortgagee all right to the possession, either before or after condition broken." In Johnson v. Sherman, 15 Cal. 287, the court, after stating that the possession of the mortgagee under the mortgage "does not change what was previously a security into a seisin of the freehold," says: "Possession taken by consent of the owner"—the mortgagor—"or by contract with him, may confer rights as against third parties, but they are independent and distinct from any rights springing from the mortgage, from which they derive no support." This language was quoted with approval in Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 625; in which latter case the court say: "Although a mortgage in this state of itself confers no right of possession, yet, when possession is taken by the mortgagee after condition broken, by consent of the mortgagor, it will be presumed, in the absence of clear proof to the contrary, to be the understanding that the mortgagee is to receive the rents and profits and apply them to the payment of the debt secured." In Russell v. Ely, 2 Black, 578, the supreme court, in commenting upon the Wisconsin statute which prevents the mortgagee from recovering possession until the equity of redemption has expired, say: "If the mortgagee has no right to recover the possession by legal proceedings, it would seem that he should not be permitted in any other manner to obtain that possession against the consent of the mortgagor or the person holding under him." But in Pell v. Ulmar, 18 N. Y. 142, it is stated that if "the mortgagee obtains possession without force," he is entitled to hold against the mortgagor; citing Van Duyne v. Thayre, 14 Wend. 236; Phyfe v. Riley, 15 Wend. 254; Watson v. Spence, 20 Wend. 262; and Fox v. Lipe, 24 Wend. 164. Now a possession obtained "without force" may also be obtained without the consent of the mortgagor, and if that is the sense in which this dictum is used in Pell v. Ulmar, it appears to stand alone, and is certainly not borne out by the authorities cited in its support. In Van Duyne v. Thayre, the court say: "If the mortgagee, after forfeiture entered into possession, either by the consent of the mortgagor or by means of legal proceedings, he may defend himself there, at least until his debt is paid." In Phyfe v. Riley, the language used is: "But if the mortgagee, after forfeiture, obtains possession in some legal mode other than by an action," why should the mortgagor recover the possession without paying the money secured by the mortgage? In Watson v. Spence, the expression is: "If the mortgagee, as such, had obtained possession, he could still hold until payment," the court citing the last two cases, thereby indicating that the possession intended must be obtained with the consent of the mortgagor, or by legal proceedings. In Fox v. Lipe, it was held that a mortgagee who enters under a sale made by authority of a power in the mortgage, may defend his possession against the mortgagor, even if the authority be doubtful. And in the comparatively late case (1874) of Trim v. Marsh, 54 N. Y. 604, it is said, that since the statute has taken away the right of the mortgagee to recover the possession of the premises, "the mortgagor, both before and after default, is entitled to the possession of the premises, of which he cannot be deprived without his consent, except by foreclosure."

Considered, then, either in the light of authority or reason, it seems that the possession of the mortgagee must be taken with the assent of the mortgagor. Upon the modern doctrine concerning the nature and effect of mortgages, which appears to prevail in this state, the mortgagee has no interest in the mortgaged premises. His lien is likened to that of a judgment lien creditor. His right is to have satisfaction of his debt, and his remedy, as mortgagee, is not a right to take possession of the premises, but to have them sold upon judicial proceedings. This being so, he cannot lawfully enter upon the mortgaged premises without the consent of the owner, any more than the judgment lien creditor can enter upon the lands of his debtor. Because the premises happen to be vacant, or the mortgagor's back turned, and the mortgagee is thereby entitled to get upon them without a breach of the peace, this does not make his entry lawful. A person cannot lawfully enter upon the lands of another without some right or authority for so doing. A peaceable entry is not per se lawful. An entry without right or authority, however peaceable, is tortious, and cannot avail the party making it anything. As the mere relation of mortgagor and mortgagee does not give the latter the right to enter and occupy for any purpose or time, the authority to do so, if any exists—apart from legal proceedings—must arise out of some contract, consent or agreement with the mortgagor by matter collateral to and independent of the mortgagee.

It follows that, as this plea does not show any right or authority in the defendant to take possession of or occupy the premises as against the owner, the plaintiff, it is frivolous and worthless. The motion to strike out is allowed.

WITHERS (BOYD v.). See Case No. 1,752.

WITHERS (McCLELLAN v.). See Case No. 8,696.

WITHERS (PAYSON v.). See Case No. 10,864.

Case No. 17,918.

WITHERS v. THORNTON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 116.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.

ACTION FOR LIBEL—SPECIAL BAIL.

In ordinary cases of libel, special bail is not required without some special reason other than the publication of the libel itself.

Action on the case for a libel which charged that the plaintiff's patent for an improvement in winged gudgeons, was a gross imposition, and the plaintiff an imposter.

The affidavit to hold to bail, did not aver the charge to have been made either falsely or maliciously; nor that any damage has resulted to the plaintiff exclusively, from the libel charged in the declaration; but that the damage, of which he complains, resulted from that and other publications, and verbal denunciations, "together with certain other letters, handbills, and publications of the said Thornton," so that it does not positively appear to the court by the affidavit, whether any, or if any, how much of the damage arose from the libel charged in the declaration.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to require the defendant to give special bail. In ordinary cases of libel, special bail is not required without some special reason other than the publication of the libel itself, such as non residence of the defendant, or the like. See Norton v. Barnum, 20 Johns. 337; Clason v. Gould, 2 Caines, 47; Van Vechten v. Hopkins, 2 Johns. 293; Barnes, Notes, 79, 80, 108; Chetwin v. Venner, 1 Sid. 183; Marquis of Dorchester's Case, 2 Mod. 215.

WITHERS (WISE v.). See Case No. 17,913.

WITHERSPOON (OGDEN v.). See Case No. 10,461.

WITHINGTON (BALL v.). See Case No. 815.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 17,919.

WITHROW v. FOWLER.

[7 N. B. R. 339; 6 Alb. Law J. 422; Pac. Law Rep. 102.]¹

District Court, E. D. Missouri. Nov. 7, 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNEE OF PARTNERS—RECOVERY OF FIRM PROPERTY.

An insolvent firm made a transfer to a creditor in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]. One of the partners died, and, within four months of the date of the transfer, the remaining partners, but not the firm, were adjudged bankrupt. Held, that the assignee could not recover the property transferred by the partnership to a partnership-creditor, by way of a preference or otherwise.

The plaintiff in this suit [James E. Withrow] sought to recover, as assignee of Thomas S. Dunbar and Edward T. Smith, bankrupts, $512.32, the value of certain accounts and claims alleged to have been transferred by the bankrupts to the defendant [M. K. Fowler] within four months of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy against Dunbar and Smith, they being at the time insolvent, and the defendant having, at the date of the transfer, reasonable cause to believe them insolvent, and that the transfer was made in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act. Defendant in his answer denied all the material averments of the petition. The case went to trial before a jury. It appeared that Dunbar and Smith, the bankrupts, were members of the firm of Dunbar, Smith & Co., composed of themselves and George W. Thompson. Defendant was a creditor of the firm, and the transfer of the accounts and claims mentioned in the petition was made by the firm to the defendant, in satisfaction of a debt due him by the firm. Between the time of the transfer and the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, Thompson, one of the members of the firm, died. Dunbar and Smith, the remaining members, were thereafter adjudged bankrupts upon a creditor's petition, but the firm of Dunbar, Smith & Co. was not declared bankrupt. Plaintiff was then elected assignee, and the usual assignment was made conveying to him all the estate of Dunbar and Smith. Defendant's counsel raised the point that the assignee in bankruptcy of two members of a firm could not recover a preference given to a firm creditor by a firm composed of three members.

Krum & Patrick, for plaintiff.
Dryden & Dryden, for defendant.

THE COURT (TREAT, District Judge) sustained the point and charged the jury as follows: "The jury are instructed that the plaintiff cannot recover in this action for any property or accounts transferred or assigned by the copartnership of Dunbar, Smith

¹ [Reprinted from 7 N. B. R. 339, by permission. 6 Alb. Law J. 422, contains only a partial report.]

& Co., to a creditor of said copartnership, by way of preference or otherwise."

The jury returned a verdict for defendant.

Case No. 17,920.

In re WITKOWSKI.

[10 N. B. R. 209.]¹

District Court, S. D. Mississippi. 1874.

EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPT.

The assignee in bankruptcy has no right to examine the bankrupt under the provisions of section 26 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 529)], after his discharge from his debts and liabilities provable under said act.

[Cited in Wagner v. Superior Court of Los Angeles Co., 100 Cal. 361, 34 Pac. 820.]

In bankruptcy.

HILL, District Judge. The only question which need now be considered arising out of the proceedings before the register as certified, is, "Has the assignee a right to examine the bankrupt under section 26 of the bankrupt act, after the discharge of the bankrupt from his debts and liabilities provable under the bankruptcy?" This is the first time this question has been presented to me, and aside from its importance to the parties interested in these proceedings, is one of no small importance to bankrupts and those entitled to their examination, and should be definitely settled, that the latter may know the time in which the examination must be made, and the former when he is freed from liability to such examination. The act does not in express terms limit the time for the examination, but there must be a time when this right ceases, and this time must be ascertained from the evident intent and purpose of the law, as found from an examination of its different provisions, and from which it will be found that all questions pertaining to the bankrupt, his estate, and those having claims upon it, shall be settled and terminated within the shortest period in which it can fairly and reasonably be done. Hence it is provided that proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy must be commenced within six months after the act of bankruptcy is committed; suits to recover property and assets from those to whom they have been sold or transferred in fraud of the bankrupt act must be commenced within six months from the sale or transfer. Proceedings to recover back property, money, or other means given as a preference, against the provisions of the act, must be commenced within four months from the time the preference is given. Exceptions to the report of exemptions must be filed within twenty days. Opposition to the bankrupt's discharge must be made on the very day fixed to show cause against it, and specifications must be filed within ten days thereafter. Suits by or against the assignee respecting the property rights of the bankrupt estate must be brought within two years after the appointment of the assignee, and to this no exceptions are engrafted. The discharge of the bankrupt is conclusive of the regularity of the proceedings, and can only be attacked in the court granting it upon proceedings for that purpose, commenced within two years from its date, and for some of the causes mentioned, unknown to the attacking party, when it was granted. The reason for this speedy action is obvious. The purpose of the law is to place within the possession of the creditor that to which he may be entitled, within the shortest reasonable time, and at the same time, if the bankrupt has made a fair and honest surrender, and complied with the requisitions made of him, to give him a speedy release, and let him begin anew to provide an honest living for himself and those dependent upon him, and again become a useful and active member of society.

To attain these objects, the whole machinery is framed and adjusted. The creditors are at the earliest period notified of the proceedings and made parties to it; it is their right, and they have the opportunity to except to everything done prejudicial to their interest. This they must do at the proper time so as not to retard or embarrass the proceedings. They are notified of the different meetings of the creditors, and especially of the third, generally the last meeting, when the assignee's report and account is required to be filed. This meeting is held before the register upon the day fixed to show cause against the bankrupt's discharge, when he is required to be present, and submit to his final examination by the register, the assignee, or any creditor who has proved his claim; and at any time before this the bankrupt, his wife, and any other witness may be examined by any creditor who has proved his debt upon a proper showing, or by the assignee, who is both the agent of the creditors and officer of the court. Thus ample opportunity is given all interested to look into and protect their interest, and if they neglect to do so within proper time have no one to blame but themselves. After a careful examination of the whole question, I am satisfied that this last meeting of the creditors and final examination of the bankrupt concludes the right of the assignee as well as the creditors to an examination of the bankrupt under the 26th section of the act. But, while this is so, it does not exclude the creditors from an examination of the bankrupt upon the trial of an issue opposing the discharge, or for its revocation after granted, or the assignee from calling him as a witness upon the trial of any cause by or against him touching the bankrupt's estate. But in such investigations the bankrupt occupies the position of a witness, his counsel may cross-examine him, or he may appear as a witness in his own behalf, and the examination must be confined to the issue made by the pleadings. I am sustained in the conclusions reached, by Judge Woodruff, of the Second circuit, in an able and exhaustive opinion in Re Dole [Case No. 3,964], referring to the case of Jones [Id. 7,419] and the case of Dean [Id. 3,701].

¹ [Reprinted by permission.]

In this case the last meeting of creditors and time for the final examination of the bankrupt, was held on the 21st day of June, 1869; but one debt had then been proved, and no exceptions filed; the assignee's account was approved, and he discharged. The register certified that the bankrupt had complied with the requirements of the law, and nothing appeared against his discharge; and nothing appearing against his discharge a decree was entered awarding him his discharge, and on his application a certificate was issued to him on 1st day of February, 1871. More than two years elapsed after the granting of the discharge, before any other step was taken by the assignee, when he filed his application for permission to bring suit for the recovery of assets alleged to have been fraudulently omitted from the bankrupt's schedules, and which had but recently come to his knowledge, which leave, upon the ex parte application, was granted. To aid this recovery is the purpose of the examination sought, and which was applied for and an order made by the register the 1st of March last, to which the bankrupt excepted, and claiming his right to exemption from such examination, refused to answer many questions propounded to him by the assignee, and which it is insisted by the assignee he should be compelled to answer.

Under the conclusions reached, the bankrupt is entitled to the exemption claimed from such examination, and cannot be compelled to make further answer under this order, which, with the proceedings under it will be set aside, without prejudice to the assignee, to have the benefit of the testimony of the bankrupt in the proceedings now pending against him or others in the court in New York, to recover the assets claimed to be due the bankrupt estate, to be taken under the rules of that court.

Case No. 17,921.

WITT v. HERETH et al.

[6 Biss. 474; 1 13 N. B. R. 106; 8 Chi. Leg. News, 41; 1 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 436.]

District Court, D. Indiana. Oct., 1875.

REDUCING DEMAND TO JUSTICE'S JURISDICTION—LIEN OF EXECUTION—RECOGNITION IN BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDING.

1. In Indiana, a plaintiff may reduce his demand to bring it within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace.

2. The lien of an execution will be respected by the bankruptcy court, though the plaintiff sued out his execution immediately upon the rendering of the judgment, and the defendant filed his bankruptcy on the same day. The creditor has a right to follow all the remedies which the law gives him.

On the 31st day of July, 1875, Henry Hereth filed his complaint before William H. Schmitts, a justice of the peace in and for Center township, Marion county, Indiana, demanding judgment against William M. Aughinbaugh for two hundred dollars upon a note, the principal of which was two hundred dollars and eighty-three cents, and on the same day a summons was duly issued to a constable of said township, and served on said Aughinbaugh. On the 3d day of August, at 9 o'clock a. m., that being the time at which said cause was set for trial, the said Aughinbaugh was duly called and defaulted, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff for two hundred dollars and costs of suit.

Subsequently, on said 3d day of August, the plaintiff filed his affidavit with said justice, averring that the collection of his judgment would be endangered by further delay in the issuing of execution. Thereupon an execution was issued on said judgment, which was immediately levied upon the goods and chattels of the said Aughinbaugh sufficient to satisfy the debt and costs. And later, on said day, the said Aughinbaugh filed his voluntary petition and was adjudged a bankrupt.

On this agreed statement of facts the court is asked to decide whether the lien of the execution and levy was displaced by the subsequent proceedings in bankruptcy.

Morrow, Trusler & Henry, for complainant.
Bixby & Norton, for defendants.

GRESHAM, District Judge. Justices of the peace in Indiana have jurisdiction to try and determine suits founded on contract, when the debt does not exceed two hundred dollars. 2 Gavin & H. St. p. 579.

Unless otherwise directed, justices shall issue execution on all judgments, when the defendant has appeared, after the expiration of four days from the rendition thereof, and in cases of default after the expiration of ten days; but when it shall be made to appear by affidavit that delay will endanger the collection of the judgment, execution shall issue immediately. 2 Gavin & H. St. p. 600.

It is insisted that the justice had no jurisdiction to render the judgment, because the note sued on exceeded the sum of two hundred dollars, and that the statute did not allow the plaintiff to remit part of his claim so as to reduce it to two hundred dollars for the purpose of giving justice jurisdiction.

Even if it had appeared that the plaintiff had thus reduced his claim by remitting the interest and part of the principal, I would have no doubt on the question of jurisdiction.

The amount demanded determined the jurisdiction of the justice, and not the principal of the note or the amount actually due on it. If the plaintiff saw proper to reduce his claim to a sum within the jurisdiction of the justice by remitting part of it, no one had a right to complain, for no one lost anything but himself. Wetherill v. Inhabitants, etc., 5 Blackf. 357; Remington v. Henry, 6 Blackf. 63.

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Clearly the plaintiff was barred from maintaining another action on the same note, even if his judgment was for less than was due him. The facts agreed upon fail to show that the plaintiff remitted any part of his claim, and the presumption is that he demanded all that was due him.

It is further insisted that the filing of the affidavit, the issuing and levy of the execution upon the same day upon which the judgment was rendered, and the subsequent commencement of voluntary proceedings in bankruptcy on the same day, show collusion between the plaintiff and the bankrupt, and something more than passive non-resistance on the part of the latter. I do not think so. All these facts might have existed without collusion. It must be admitted that the circumstances excite a suspicion that the bankrupt was trying to aid the plaintiff in obtaining a lien, but they go no further. It may be that the plaintiff knew of the insolvent condition of the bankrupt before he commenced his action, and that he hoped, by diligence, to get an advantage over the other creditors. He pursued a remedy that the law gave him. The other creditors were not equally diligent, and none of them saw proper to institute proceedings in bankruptcy and invoke the aid thereby of this court to prevent the plaintiff from obtaining his judgment, execution and levy, and the law imposed no duty on the bankrupt to go into voluntary bankruptcy to defeat the plaintiff in his efforts to procure a lien. Wilson v. City Bank, etc., 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 473.

It was as much a part of the plaintiff's remedy to file his affidavit and cause his execution to be issued and levied before the expiration of ten days, as it was to obtain his judgment.

An order will be entered requiring the assignee to pay said judgment and costs out of any funds in his hands not otherwise appropriated.

NOTE. The same rule as to reduction of demand prevails in Illinois. Raymond v. Strobel, 24 Ill. 113; Simpson v. Updegraff, 1 Scam. 594; Bates v. Bulkeley, 2 Gilman, 389; Korsoski v. Foster, 20 Ill. 32; Ellis v. Snider, Breese, 336.

WITTIG (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,748.

Case No. 17,922.

The W. J. WALSH.

[5 Ben. 72.]¹

District Court, E. D. New York. March, 1871.

TOWAGE—JURISDICTION—LIEN.

1. A lien exists upon a canal-boat, for towage services rendered to her in the harbor of New York, which an admiralty court has jurisdiction to enforce.

2. What is a maritime contract, considered.
[Cited in Lands v. Cargo of Coal, 4 Fed. 480; The Wilmington, 48 Fed. 567.]

In admiralty.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a proceeding in rem to recover of the canal-boat W. J. Walsh the amount of several towing bills due the owner of the steam-tug G. H. Starbuck, for the towage by that tug of the canal-boat, on several trips from Williamsburgh, in this district, to Elizabethport, in the state of New Jersey. The performance of the service is admitted, and the amount demanded is conceded to be due. But it is set up that the services mentioned in the libel were not performed on the high seas; that the W. J. Walsh is not a sea-going craft, but a canal-boat, without masts, sails, rigging, or anchor; that she has no means of propulsion, and can only move or be moved by power not belonging or appertaining to her, and is serviceable only by being towed by steam power; by reason whereof, it is contended that this is not a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

These facts, stated in the libel and answer, are admitted, and the case is to be disposed of upon the question raised thereby. There is no room to contend that the towage contracts set up in the libel are not maritime contracts. A maritime contract in law, as now understood, is any contract which necessarily is appurtenant to navigation, such as the transportation of passengers or freight on navigable waters—or the navigation of vessels on such waters—or supplying the necessities of vessels used on such waters. A contract to furnish the motive power to a vessel so used is of the same class. It appertains to navigation, in the strictest sense, and is as distinctly maritime in character as a contract to steer the boat, or to carry cargo in her. The steamboats which tow the boats and barges, by means of which commerce between New Jersey and New York is transacted, are as much engaged in navigation as are the boats in which the cargoes are placed; and it is all not only navigation, but commerce among the states. Indeed, the contract in question contains almost all the features formerly considered necessary in a maritime contract, under a much narrower view of the jurisdiction than at present prevails. I am, therefore, at a loss for any ground upon which it can be held that here is not a maritime contract. That there is a lien is equally clear. This contract being made for the benefit of the vessel, and necessary to enable her to perform her natural functions, binds the vessel. This is the general rule of the maritime law; and the reasons of the rule are fully applicable to such contracts as the present, for nothing is more necessary to such a vessel as this than that she should, at all times and everywhere, carry with her a credit which will procure for her a motive power. This she secures by the implied lien upon her bottom which the law creates in favor of any one rendering that service; and she can secure it, practically, in no other way. As to the idea that the form of the boat, or her incapacity to navigate the broad ocean, or her want of motive power within herself, can make any difference in her rights and liabilities on such a contract, I have nothing to add to the remarks made in the case of The Kate Tremaine [Case No. 7,622].

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Let a decree be entered in favor of the libellant for the amount demanded in the libel.

W. K. MUIR & DAVIDSON, The (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,749.

WOLCOTT (FRASER v.). See Case No. 5,065.

WOLCOTT (THOMAS v.). See Case No. 13,915.

Case No. 17,923.

In re WOLF.

[4 Sawy. 168; 17 N. B. R. 423.]

District Court, D. Nevada. Jan. 18, 1877.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—COMMERCIAL PAPER—NON-PAYMENT.

The mere letting a note, payable one day after date, remain unpaid forty days after it falls due, is not an act of bankruptcy, in the absence of any demand of payment, or other facts to show a suspension and failure to resume.

[Cited in Brown v. Jefferson Co. Nat. Bank, 9 Fed. 264.]

[Cited in Lindsey v. Flebbe, 5 Colo. App. 218, 38 Pac. 399.]

This was a petition for an adjudication of bankruptcy, charging that the respondent had suspended and stopped payment of his commercial paper, and had not resumed in forty days. Upon the return day of the order to show cause, the only proof offered of the act of bankruptcy was a promissory note made by E. Wolf in favor of one Parker, for $1,000, payable "one day after date," which showed upon its face that it had been due more than forty days. There was proof that no demand had ever been made on Wolf for payment of the note. No other evidence was produced tending to show a suspension of payment and failure to resume.

J. B. L. Brandt, for petitioner.

M. N. Stone, for respondent.

HILLYER, District Judge. It could not have been the intention of the framers of the bankrupt law to make the simple fact that a note like this remained due and unpaid for forty days an act of bankruptcy. There is certainly a reasonable presumption that the parties to such paper made payable one day after date did not expect it would be paid on the day it fell due. No demand being made on him, the maker would be likely to let the note run for an indefinite time; and it would be, it seems to me, a most unjustifiable construction of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], to say that by so doing he was stopping or suspending payment of his commercial paper.

¹ [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Suspension of payment means something more than a failure of the maker of such paper as this to seek the holder and pay him. Business men understand very well what the term means; there is the idea in it of a failure to pay from an inability to do so; and here there is nothing to show that the debtor was not abundantly able and willing to pay the note on presentation.

The prayer of the petition is denied.

Case No. 17,924.

WOLF v. CONNECTICUT MUT. LIFE INS. CO.

[1 Flip. 377; 1 Cent. Law J. 301.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Michigan. April Term, 1874.

FEDERAL PRACTICE—TAXATION OF COSTS—REMOVAL FROM STATE COURT.

1. Where a suit comes into the federal court by removal, it brings along with it, as an incident, all the costs which accrued or attached under the state law, during the time it remained in the state court.

[Cited in Cleaver v. Traders' Ins. Co., 40 Fed. 864.]

2. The acts of congress, prescribing what costs may or may not be taxed, apply to such costs as accrue after the removal of such cause into the federal court.

3. These are the rules that the federal courts follow in taxing costs.

[Cited in Trinidad Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Robinson, 52 Fed. 348.]

On the mutual application of the parties for directions to the clerk as to taxation of costs. This cause was commenced in the circuit court for the county of Wayne, in this state, and after issue and one continuance in that court, the cause was removed to this court by the defendant, under and in pursuance of the acts of congress in such cases made and provided. After sundry proceedings had in the case in this court, unnecessary to mention here, the plaintiff [Helena Wolf], discontinued her suit, and judgment was entered against her for costs to be taxed. The defendant now brings its bill of costs for taxation, in which are included items of costs accrued in the state court before removal to this court, amounting in the aggregate to $15, and $7.50 paid to the clerk of the state court for transcripts in making the removal. These items are objected to on behalf of plaintiff on the ground that there is no act of congress allowing such costs to be taxed in this court.

¹ [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

D. C. Holbrook, for plaintiff.
C. J. Walker, for defendant.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. A suit removed from a state court comes into this court impressed with all the rights and liabilities of parties as to costs which accrued or attached by the laws of the state while the suit remained in the state court. Acts of congress prescribing what costs may or may not be taxed apply only to such costs as accrue after the removal has become complete and this court is invested with jurisdiction.

In the state court, in case of discontinuance, the defendant would be entitled by the state laws to all his costs made up to that time, and I think this court is bound, in case of removal to this court before discontinuance, to administer those laws as to all such costs which accrued while the suit remained in the state court.

No adjudicated case involving this exact question has fallen under my notice, but the cases cited below involve principles applicable to this question, and so far as they go, fully sustain the foregoing propositions. I am also informed by my brother Judge Withey, of the Western district, that such has always been the uniform practice there. See Ellis v. Jarvis [Case No. 4,403]; Field v. Schell [Id. 4,771]; Gier v. Gregg [Id. 5,406]; Ackerly v. Vilas [Id. 120].

The clerk is therefore directed in this, and all like cases, to tax to the party recovering costs, all costs to which he would have been entitled under the state laws, accrued while the suit remained in the state court, and up to the time the suit was duly entered in this court. Ordered accordingly.

Case No. 17,925.

WOLF v. The MAITLAND.

[See Case No. 8,979.]

Case No. 17,925a.

WOLF v. MUTUAL BENEFIT LIFE INS. CO.

[2 Cin. Law Bul. 304.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1877.

LIFE INSURANCE—SUICIDE—INSANITY—TEMPERATE HABITS.

[1. Under a policy conditioned to be void in case the insured should "die by his own hand," there is no liability if the insured kills himself while in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, and from anger, pride, jealousy, or a desire to escape from the ills of life. If, however, his reasoning faculties are so far impaired that he is not able to understand the moral character, the general nature, consequences, and effect of his act, or if he was impelled thereto by an insane impulse, which he had not the power to resist, the insurer is liable.]

[2. A representation in the application that the applicant is "sober and temperate" does not mean that he totally abstains from the use of intoxicating liquors, or that he may not have been drunk on some occasions. It means, rather, that he is temperate in the use of spirituous liquors,—not addicted to their excessive use.]

P. Houk and G. R. Sage, for plaintiff.
Young & Gotschall, for defendant.

SWING, District Judge (charging jury). The petition in this case alleges, in substance, that on the 5th day of March, 1866, the defendant entered into a contract of insurance with the plaintiff (who was then the wife of John T. Wolf), whereby, in consideration of an annual premium of $195.30, to be paid on the 5th of March in each year, it insured the life of the said John T. Wolf for the period of life, or for twenty years if that event should not sooner occur, in the sum of $5,000, said sum to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff after notice and proof of the death of the said John T. Wolf. That she paid the premiums according to the terms of the policy. That her said husband died March 31, 1869. That she had made proof of death within ten days thereafter, and gave notice and proof thereof to the defendant, demanding an adjustment and payment, but defendant refused and still refuses to pay the same. That she has complied with all the conditions of the policy on her part, and asks judgment for $5,000, with interest from the 31st day of March, 1869.

The answer sets up eight separate defenses, all of which, except the first and fifth, have been abandoned by the defendant. The first defense is, that the contract contained a condition that in case the said John T. Wolf should die by his own hand, said policy should be void, null and of no effect, and that said John T. Wolf committed suicide by drowning himself. The fifth defense is, that the contract was made and entered into and said policy was issued in consideration of the representations made to said company, in the application of said plaintiff for said policy, and it was then and there agreed that the answers of the said John T. Wolf in said application should form the basis of said contract between himself and said company, and that the said John T. Wolf, in said application, answered and represented, that he was sober and temperate, and had always been so, whereas in fact, the said John T. Wolf was not at the time sober and temperate, but was then, and for a long time prior thereto had been, intemperate, and in the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors intemperately and to excess.

The plaintiff replies to the first defense: 1. She denies that John T. Wolf committed suicide by drowning or by any other means. 2. That if the said John T. Wolf committed suicide, he was of unsound mind before and at the time of his death, and that at said time his faculties were impaired to such an extent, that he was unable to understand the moral or physical character, nature or consequence of his acts, and if he committed suicide he was impelled thereto by an insane impulse which he had not the power to resist. To the fifth defense the plaintiff replies that she denies that the said John T. Wolf was at the time said policy was issued, or that he had been prior thereto intemperate or in the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors intemperately or to excess, and that his habits were then well known to said company. In order to entitle the plaintiff to a recovery in this case, she must have established by the evidence that the contract of insurance was entered into as alleged. That the premiums were paid as provided for in said contract of insurance, and that John T. Wolf was dead, and that due notice and proof thereof had been made to the defendant. If the evidence therefore establishes the existence of these several facts, your verdict will be for the plaintiff, unless the evidence has established one of the defenses relied upon.

The first defense is, that the contract contained the condition "that in case the said John T. Wolf should die by his own hand, the policy should be null and void," and that the said John T. Wolf committed suicide by drowning himself. It is admitted that John T. Wolf did take his own life by drowning himself; but the plaintiff says that at the time he did so, and before, he was of unsound mind, and his faculties were impaired to such an extent that he was unable to understand the moral or physical character, nature or consequence of the act, and that he was impelled thereto by an insane impulse which he had not the power to resist.

In the examination of the evidence bearing upon this defense, it is important for you to know the true legal meaning of the words "shall die by his own hand," and what effect shall be given to the facts set up in the reply to this defense. Literally, these words embrace death by the act of the party through accident or mistake, and yet it could hardly be said that this was the sense in which the parties to the contract understood they were using them. They would also embrace the act of self-destruction when the party was wholly without mind, and yet the authorities are uniform that that would not come within their proper meaning. But the extent of the mental capacity which should be possessed by the party taking his own life in order to bring the case within the meaning of these words, is a question upon which there was, and still exists among jurists the widest difference of opinion, the treatises and books of reports are filled with learning upon the various theories entertained; but with the view I take of the law, it would serve no valuable purpose to review the arguments in their support. It may, however, be remarked, that it is not strange that this difference should exist; for whilst science has to some extent discovered the members and organs of the body, the parts and elements which constitute each, their different offices and functions, their relation to and effect upon each other, and their powers as a unit; yet it has failed to invent a microscope with lens powerful enough to enable us to see the mind, and no human being has ever lived with capacity sufficient to analyze it; no wonder then that philosophy and science have failed to ascertain fully the relation which the mind and body sustain to each other, or how the mind acts upon or through the body; how the material is affected by the immaterial. But in the administration of justice, the quality which shall be assigned to an act, depends so much upon the intelligence with which it is directed, that jurists have adopted certain rules by which this quality is determined by the degree of intelligence apparently professed by the author of the act, at the time of its commission. As already observed, these rules are not uniform, but we are relieved from choosing between them, for it is our duty, as well as our pleasure, to follow the rules as announced by the supreme court of the United States.

In Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 580, Mr. Justice Hunt, after a very elaborate review of the conflicting authorities upon the question, announced the opinion of the court as follows: "We hold the rule on the question before us to be this: If the assured, being in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, from anger, pride, jealousy, or a desire to escape from the ills of life, intentionally takes his own life, the proviso attaches, and there can be no recovery. If the death is caused by the voluntary act of the accused, he knowing and intending that his death shall be the result of his act, but when his reasoning faculties are so far impaired that he is not able to understand the moral character, the general nature, consequences and effects of the act he is about to commit, or when he is impelled thereto by an insane impulse which he has not the power to resist, such death is not within the contemplation of the parties to the contract, and the insurer is liable." And in Bigelow v. Berkshire Life Ins. Co., 93 U. S. 284, Mr. Justice Davis, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "There has been a great diversity of judicial opinion as to whether self-destruction by a man in a fit of insanity, is within the condition of a life policy where the words of exemption are that the insured 'shall commit suicide,' or 'shall die by his own hand.' But since the decision in Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 580, the question is no longer an open one in this court. In that case we held that they referred to an act of criminal self-destruction, and did not apply to an insane person who took his life."

If the jury find from the evidence that John T. Wolf came to his death by throwing himself into the river, and that at the time he did so, he was in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, and from anger, pride, jealousy, or a desire to escape from the ills of life, intending when he threw himself into the river to drown himself, the plaintiff cannot recover. But if John T. Wolf voluntarily threw himself into the river, knowing and intending that it should produce death, but when his reasoning faculties were so far impaired that he was not able to understand the moral character, the general nature, consequences and effect of throwing himself into the water, or, if he was impelled thereto by an insane impulse which he had not the power to resist, the plaintiff will be entitled to your verdict.

The second defense is: That John T. Wolf represented that he was sober and temperate, and had always been so, when, in fact, he was not sober and temperate, but was and had been intemperate, and had been in the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors intemperately and to excess. By the terms of this policy, this representation became a part of the contract between the parties, and if the testimony satisfies you that, at the time this contract was entered into, John T. Wolf was not sober and temperate, or had not been so, there can be no recovery in this case. Webster defines the word "sober" as "temperate in the use of spirituous liquors." "Not overpowered by spirituous liquors." The same author defines "temperate" as "moderate; not excessive." It will, therefore, be seen that these words do not imply that, in order for a man to be sober and temperate, that he should totally abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors. And the fact that a man may have been drunk on some occasions, does not, of itself, make him an intemperate man. Keeping in view these definitions, you will examine the evidence, and ascertain if it sustains the second defense; if so, the plaintiff cannot recover; if it does not, the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict.

The jury are the sole judges of the weight of the evidence; if there should be a conflict in the evidence, it is the duty of the jury to reconcile, if possible, such conflict. If, however, they cannot do so, they will accept that which they think, under the circumstances, ought to be believed, and reject that which they think is not entitled to credit.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

Case No. 17,926.

WOLF v. PLUNKETT.

[1 Flipp. 427.]¹

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. April 2, 1875.

JUDGMENT LIEN — RIGHTS OF EXECUTION PURCHASER—PRIOR EQUITIES—EJECTMENT.

1. Notwithstanding the decree of a court of chancery divesting the legal title of a judgment debtor before a sale under execution of the land in controversy, the purchaser at such sale will prevail at law over the owner of the junior legal title, even if it were founded on the older equity.

2. P. exchanged lands with L. and wife. This was on Sept. 28, 1867. On the 12th of September, 1867, a judgment had been rendered against P. at the suit of another person, and the lien attached, as a matter of course to the land of P. L. and wife, becoming dissatisfied at this turn of events, proposed a cancellation of the exchange; the same was agreed to by P., and L. and wife were put into possession of the land they had conveyed to P. The judgment creditor proceeded with his execution; the land now in possession of L. and wife was sold, and the owner of the judgment bought it in, and thereupon died. His devisee brought suit against defendant in ejectment to recover the same, the title to which had passed by sale from L. and wife through several hands before vesting in defendant: Held, that the purchaser at the execution sale had the better title, and that his devisee was entitled to recover.

3. And if L. and wife, through whom defendant traced his title, had any equity which is good and was subsisting when plaintiff's testator obtained his judgment, they can assert the same in a court of chancery, and there only.

4. Courts of law cannot notice equities.

Mrs. Looney owned the tract of land in controversy. She and Pfannenstiehl made a trade by which Pfannenstiehl conveyed her certain property in Memphis, and Mrs. Looney conveyed him the tract of land in question and other tracts. The last mentioned conveyance was made on the 23th of September, 1867. On the 12th of September, 1867, the plaintiff's testator, Louis Wolf, recovered against Pfannenstiehl in the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, a judgment for a debt. He caused the land involved in this suit to be levied on by the marshal of the United States, under an execution issued on the judgment, and to be sold, and bought it, and took a deed from the marshal conveying it to him. A dispute arose between Mrs. Looney and Pfannenstiehl as to the trade they had made, and Mrs. Looney filed a bill to have it cancelled. On the 6th day of April, 1868, a decree was entered in the suit just referred to, which was in the chancery court of Shelby county, whereby, by the consent of the parties (Mrs. Looney and Pfannenstiehl,) the trade between them was cancelled, and the title to the tract of land now in dispute, was divested out of Pfannenstiehl and was vested in Mrs. Looney. Mrs. Looney then conveyed her title to George Gantt. The latter conveyed to Bradshaw, and Bradshaw conveyed to Elijah Plunkett, who took possession, after which the suit was brought. Pfannenstiehl was in possession of the land from September, 1867, when he made the trade with Mrs. Looney, until April, 1868, when the trade was cancelled between them and he returned the possession to Mrs. Looney. Louis Wolf died and devised the land to the plaintiff [Dorothea Wolf] by his will, and she brought the action of ejectment against Plunkett after he entered into possession. The cause was tried before Hon. BLAND BALLARD, District Judge of the United States for the district of Kentucky, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, at Memphis, and a jury. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and a motion for a new trial by the defendant.

¹ [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Wm. M. Randolph, for plaintiff.

George Gantt and Duncan K. McRae, for defendant.

BALLARD, District Judge. I still think that the purchaser, who claims under the plaintiff's judgment and the marshal's sale, has a better legal title than the claimant under the decree rendered in the suit of Looney and wife against Pfannenstiehl, which suit was instituted after the judgment was rendered and after the lien of the judgment had attached to the land in contest.

It is not disputed that had Pfannenstiehl voluntarily conveyed the land to Looney after the judgment, the title of Looney would be inferior to that of the execution purchaser. Now, the decree under which Looney and the defendant claim having been rendered by consent, I am by no means certain, that it confers any better title than the private deed of the party would have conferred. Indeed, I am, strongly inclined to think it does not.

But, it is said that the lien of the judgment attaches only to the interest of the judgment debtor in the land, and does not disturb any prior equity. This may be true, but it is not perceived how the defendant's case is helped thereby. Concede that Looney has an equity which is not affected by the plaintiff's judgment and purchase, this equity cannot avail in this action. This is an action at law; and it is well settled that courts of law cannot notice equities.

Moreover, I do not see how it can be assumed in this case that Looney had any such prior equity. There is no evidence of it, unless it be found in the record of the suit of Looney and wife against Pfannenstiehl. But the plaintiff in the judgment against Pfannenstiehl was not a party to this suit, and it is not perceived how he can be affected by its admissions and findings.

Defendant's counsel do not insist that the institution of the suit by Looney and wife against Pfannenstiehl precluded plaintiff from enforcing his judgment. He does not claim that plaintiff is a lis pendens purchaser. He concedes that plaintiff's title relates to the date of his judgment, or at least to the date of his lien. But he insists that the title of the judgment debtor, having been divested by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction—in virtue of what he calls a prior equity in Looney and wife before the sale under the execution—no title was obtained by the execution sale.

I do not admit the correctness of this proposition, and I have been referred to no authority which sustains it. I have never before heard it asserted that a junior legal title could at law prevail over an older one, even though the former were founded on the older equity.

The case of Parks v. Jackson, 11 Wend. 442, so confidently relied on by defendant's counsel, does not at all militate against this view. The majority of the court in that case decide that a party who receives a conveyance, pending a suit against the grantor affecting his title, is not a lis pendens purchaser, if the conveyance were made in pursuance of a valid consideration existing prior to the institution of the suit. Consequently, as he who acquired his conveyance in pursuance of such obligation had the older legal title, his title is, at law, the better.

The unsuccessful party in that case had no title under an execution sale made in pursuance of a judgment, which was a lien. The majority of the court expressly say, that the deed of the sheriff was void; and it is because of this—as I understand the opinion—that the purchaser at the sale by execution failed.

The authority of this case is in one respect adverse to defendant. It shows that the sale under the judgment and execution was valid, notwithstanding the pendency of the suit of Looney and wife, and this position is abundantly sustained by other authority. The other cases cited by counsel of defendant do not sustain his position. They only establish that a valid equity is not affected by a subsequent judgment lien.

Counsel infer too much from the statement of the court in the case of Nickles v. Haskins, 15 Ala. 622. In that case the execution debtor had, prior to judgment, given a bond for title, and in performance of his bond he had, after the sale under the judgment and execution, conveyed. The court, following strictly the facts, say: "The defendant in the execution, at the time the land in question was sold, had not executed a deed pursuant to his bond, and consequently had a legal title which might be sold and conveyed by the sheriff." The court are not to be understood as intimating that, had the defendant in execution executed a deed pursuant to his bond before the sale under execution, he would have had no legal title which could be sold. They confine themselves to the facts of the case before them. The deed in that case, which was executed pursuant to the bond given before the judgment under which the plaintiff claimed was in fact executed, not only after the judgment, but after the sale and conveyance made by the sheriff; and the court, in deciding against the title under the deed, stated the fact respecting the time of its execution without at all intimating that the title would have been any better had the deed been made before the sale by the sheriff. The bond, say the court, would only invest the defendant with a mere equitable title, etc., etc., and such title cannot be set up as a bar to a recovery in ejectment. That the inference which defendant's counsel would draw from this case is incorrect, may be conclusively shown by the subsequent case in the same court, of Sellers v. Hayes, 17 Ala. 749. It appears that in this case Beck obtained a patent for the land in controversy, August 8, 1832. Immediately afterwards, in 1832, he sold the land to Varner, who paid the purchase money, and in 1835 and 1836 entered into possession. Varner assigned his bond for title to Houston, who took possession and retained it until the suit; and in 1842 the patentee, Beck, conveyed to Houston.

On the other hand, the plaintiff showed that on the 17th of May, 1836, a judgment was rendered against Beck in favor of one Brown, for $250; and in 1844 the land was sold under a pluries execution to satisfy the judgment, the plaintiff becoming the purchaser.

It thus appears that at the time of the judgment Beck had the legal title, and Varner or his assignee, Houston, the equitable title, and that at the time of the sale under the execution Houston had both the legal title and the possession. But the court decide that his legal title at law was inferior to the purchaser's under the execution; and among other cases to which they refer in support of their decision, is Nickles v. Haskins, supra.

The court say: "It cannot be denied that a judgment binds the lands of the defendant from the time of its rendition, and the lien thereby created is co-extensive with the limits of the state. Campbell v. Spence, 4 Ala. 543. It is equally clear that the legal estate or title alone is bound by a judgment at law, and that a mere equitable title, however perfect it may be, is not bound by a judgment, nor can it be sold under execution. * * * As a judgment binds the legal title, the recovery against Beck in 1836 created a lien on the land in controversy, although in a court of equity Beck would have been held as a mere trustee for Varner, who had paid the purchase money in full and held Beck's bond for title. The sale by the sheriff in 1844 gave the purchasers a title which dates back from the day of the rendition of the judgment, for from that time the land was bound. 3 Ala. 560; 13 Ala. 304. These principles, which we think incontrovertibly settled, show that the legal title of the plaintiff is the oldest; that dates back from the rendition of the judgment, whilst the deed to the defendant cannot have relation back, but gives legal title only from the time of its execution."

The principle decided in this case is supported by numerous decisions in Tennessee, and is, in fact, the general principle everywhere recognized. If there is any opposing decision, my attention has not been called to it. The decision and the doctrines announced in it are entirely conclusive against the claim of defendant, so far as it is founded on his supposed equity and the subsequent decree.

I come now to the matter which seems to be most relied on by defendant, and in respect to which I have, from the opening of the trial, had most doubt. He insists a new trial should be granted, because it does not appear that the land, of which defendant is in possession, is the same land which was sold under plaintiff's execution. But it is to be observed that this question was fairly submitted to the jury, and they have found against defendant. It is not claimed that any improper evidence was submitted to the jury. No ground, therefore, is presented for disturbing their verdict, except such as goes to the submitting of the question to the jury at all. And hence, defendant's counsel insist, with much earnestness, that the levy under which plaintiff claims is void for uncertainty, and that the court should, in consequence of this defect in plaintiff's title, have told the jury to find for the defendant.

After examining all the authorities referred to by defendant's counsel, and after the fullest consideration, I remain of the opinion expressed at the trial, that the levy is not void. It is certainly not as specific as it might have been, but it is, I think, sufficiently specific to distinguish with reasonable certainty the land levied on from other lands owned by Pfannenstiehl.

The levy describes the land as "a tract of land in the strip * * * between the old and new state line of Tennessee, containing 159 acres, known as the northwest quarter of section seventeen (17) and the John Devine Place," levied on as the property of Charles Pfannenstiehl.

Here is much more particularity and minuteness of description than any of those which were held void in the cases referred to by counsel. In Pound v. Pullen, 3 Yerg. 338, the land levied on was not otherwise described than as "eight thousand acres of land, lying in four different tracts." In Brown v. Dickson, 2 Humph. 395, as "lot No. — in the town of Greenville"; in Huddleston v. Garrott, 3 Humph. 629, as "all the unsold land of the heirs of McIver in the bounds of Overton county and which lies within the bounds of the forty thousand acre tract, granted by the state of North Carolina to Stockley Donelson and William Terrell by grant No. 289"; in Taylor v. Cozart, 4 Humph. 433, as "three tracts of land, one containing 300 acres; another 50 acres, and another 110 acres, all in the county of Carroll—the property of H. Cozart; and in Lafferty v. Conn, 3 Sneed, 221, as "350 acres of land the property of Edmond Collins."

Now, in all these cases it will be seen that the description is so vague that it does not, except perhaps in the case of Huddleston v. Garrott, furnish the slightest clue to the locality of the land referred to; and, if the description in the present case were like any of these, I should not hesitate to pronounce it void. But it is not at all like any of them. It is more like the case of Parker v. Swan, 1 Humph. 80, and Trotter v. Nelson, 1 Swan, 7, respectively. In the former the levy was "on the right, title, claim and interest that John Dock has in and to 70 acres of land lying on the west fork of Stone's river;" and in the latter the levy was on "two tracts of land of the defendant John Colter lying in Sevier county, in the 6th district; one of said tracts containing 122 acres, and the other 140 acres," etc.

In the course of their opinion in the latter case the court say: "There can be no uncertainty in the matter, unless it should happen that the same person has other tracts in the same civil district containing the same quantity of acres, which is very improbable."

The description which I am asked to pronounce void, is much fuller than that which the court here adjudged good, and the language here used by the court may be employed in the present case, mutatis mutandis.

There can be no uncertainty in the matter, unless it should happen that Pfannenstiehl owns two northwest quarter sections in the strip between the old and new state lines of Tennessee, each containing one hundred and fifty-nine acres; which is very improbable.

It rarely happens that a description in a deed or levy of land can be so certain as to dispense with all parol proof to fix its identity, and nothing is better established than that such proof may be resorted to when the description is not on its face so vague as to render it void. There is nothing vague on the face of the description here. I do not know that there is more than one northwest quarter section No. 17, in the strip referred to in the levy—especially do I not know that there is more than one northwest quarter section which belongs to Pfannenstiel, and still more especially do I not know that there is more than one northwest quarter section No. 17 in that strip which belonged to Pfannenstiel and containing only one hundred and fifty-nine acres.

The levy not being void on its face, the case was properly submitted to the jury, and I think they were more than authorized to find as they did. The motion for a new trial is therefore overruled.

In conclusion I must be permitted to say: First, that in my opinion, Wolf was not only a proper, but a necessary party to the suit of Looney and wife against Pfannenstiehl, and that as he was not a party thereto he is not concluded by the decree rendered therein. Second, that if Looney and wife have any equity which is good, and which was subsisting when Wolf obtained his judgment—they can assert it in a court of equity, and in a court of equity only.

WOLF (RUTHERGLEN v.). See Case No. 12,175.

Case No. 17,927.

WOLF v. The SELT.

[See Case No. 12,649.]

Case No. 17,928.

WOLF et al. v. SMYTHE.

[7 Biss. 365; 1 9 Chi. Leg. News, 175.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Feb. 5, 1877.

BILL OF LADING—BONA FIDE HOLDER—DEDUCTIONS FOR AGENT'S COMMISSIONS.

Although the bona fide holder of a bill of lading is entitled to the proceeds, the consignee has the right to deduct his commissions, and also the charges and insurance advanced by him.

[This was a suit by Aaron Wolf and others against John G. Smythe.]

H. G. Lunt, for plaintiffs.

Leffingwell & Johnson, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This case was tried several weeks since by a jury, and a judgment rendered for $685.88. The suit was brought to recover the proceeds of four car loads of wheat, shipped by a man named Belden, to the defendant, Smythe, which the plaintiffs claim was duly assigned to them by Belden, and that they are entitled to the proceeds. It appears that Belden was a wheat buyer in Iowa, and the plaintiffs are bankers. The plaintiffs, in due course of business, advanced money to Belden with which he bought the wheat and shipped it to the defendant, who is a commission man in this city, for sale. Smythe received the wheat in question and sold it.

The evidence shows that Belden, on the shipment of the wheat, passed the bills of lading over to the plaintiffs, who had advanced him the money, and they made the drafts, and the drafts and the bills of lading came forward together, were duly presented to Smythe for payment, and he instead of paying the money on the drafts, passed it over to Belden's private or general account. This question has been up several times before the court, and the rulings have been uniform, that the party holding the bill of lading on a draft of that kind is entitled to the proceeds. So there is no necessity of re-discussing the law in that case. The trial, however, was an ex parte trial, and the court allowed plaintiffs to recover the full amount of the drafts at the time of the trial. The defendant was not represented. Pleas were in, but the pleas were the general issue.

The defendant shortly afterwards entered a motion for a new trial, and the matter came up on affidavits, and in the course of the discussion and disclosure of facts, it appears that no credit was given to the defendant, Smythe, for the charges which he paid upon this wheat. The wheat was shipped forward to the defendant, in this city, to be sold by him, and he advanced the charges and insurance, and was entitled to his commission. No credit was given him for the charges and commissions, but the plaintiffs took the judgment for the full amount of the drafts with interest to the time of the trial. Smythe now comes in with some affidavits showing that the net proceeds of the wheat were only $578.57. Judgment was rendered for $685.88. I have no doubt that the defendant is entitled to that reduction, and therefore the judgment should be reduced to $578.57 by remitting $107.31. A remittitur of $107.31 will be entered.

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

WOLF, The DAVID E. See Case No. 3,594.

WOLFE (BAIRD v.). See Case No. 760.

Case No. 17,929.

WOLFF v. CONNECTICUT MUT. LIFE INS.
CO

[2 Flip. 355; 8 Ins. Law J. 97; 7 Reporter, 357.]¹

Circuit Court, E. D. Michigan. March, 1879.
LIFE INSURANCE—SUICIDE OF ASSURED—INSANITY.

Although neither an act of suicide, nor an attempt, nor a threat to commit suicide alone creates such a presumption of insanity as would justify a jury in finding a party insane, such an act may properly be considered in connection with the previous demeanor and conduct of the party as an item of testimony tending to prove insanity.

Motion for a new trial. The action was upon a policy of insurance, which insured the life of Henry Wolff, in the amount of $2,000. Defense was made that the assured committed suicide; which was a risk not covered by the policy; to which the assured replied that he was insane at the time he took his life. The case was brought before a jury and a verdict rendered for the full amount of the policy and interest. The motion was made for a new trial upon the ground that the evidence admitted to go to the jury to the effect that the assured was insane at the time he took his life, was improper.

The evidence of insanity consisted of certain eccentric and temporary hallucinations, occurring from about a year and a half up to about three months before the suicide; the first of which occurred about a year and a half before his death when he was walking home, at noon, with his brother. The latter relates the incident as follows: "It had rained before, and there was a puddle of water standing on the sidewalk, and when he came there he slapped me on the arm and says, 'See! there is money, can't you see? I will make money out of that. That is the biggest thing in the world to make money out of.' I laughed at him, and I says, 'What is the matter with you, are you out of your mind, or what ails you?' 'Don't you see that dog,' he says, 'he is chasing me. Why he follows me all the time.' There was no dog there. He went to dinner as usual and returned to his work in the afternoon." At another time he awoke his wife in the night and wanted to know if she didn't hear singing outside. He said he thought he heard them singing just as in church. It appears that no person was there. Shortly after this incident he retired and went to sleep, and in the morning was up about his business as usual. His wife relates another occurrence as follows: "Then again he got up in the middle of the night when it was raining and thundering. When I woke up he was off. I didn't know where he was. I got up and made the light and waited about an hour and then he came, and he had been up on top of the house and was all wet. I didn't know where he was, and I asked him and he said he had been on top of the house. He did that two or three times in one summer, the last summer of his life. He said it was very nice on top of the house when it rained; he liked it. * * * Again: he woke up one night and wanted to go off; I had just been sick and I could not follow him. He got up in the middle of the night, in his night clothes—as I was I could not go—and took the key out of the door, and he got up and went off. He just put on slippers and went off with nothing on. About five o'clock in the morning a policeman came and wanted some clothes for my husband. He said they had him in the police station and they wanted some clothes for him to put on; he often did that nights. This was in the summer before his death." At another time his brother relates that "he came to my house very early in the morning, about five o'clock, knocked on the door and I got up out of bed and asked him what was the matter. He says, 'Can you see all those men out there? All these men want to kill me, every one of them. Don't you see them? Every one, straight up there on the whole street want to knock me down.' I says, 'What is the matter with you. Come here and sit down.' My wife gave him a cup of coffee and he sat down, but he talked of different things, took his coffee and went off. He went to work after breakfast as usual." On another occasion he came into the store in the middle of the afternoon, locked the door, and taking the key, went up stairs where his brother was and made some remarks betraying hallucination and temporary derangement. At another time he came up stairs where his men were at work and compelled one of the men to walk up and down the room briskly forty or fifty times. This was because he thought he had been slow about some errand. He bought a horse, after that, for $120, but not being satisfied tried to sell him to his clerk for twenty-five cents. The clerk paid the money. At night when he went home he found the horse at his stable, Wolff having ordered his teamster to take him there. The next day the clerk says, "I told him I was only joking when I gave him the twenty-five cents; that I would like to have him taken the horse back; 'No,' he said, 'I was sick of my bargain;' he did not want the horse; so I kept him. I offered it to him several times. He would not take it back until after he died, I gave it back to Mrs. Wolff." At another time his sister-in-law came with her husband, on Sunday, to his house. Wolff told her he did not want her there, and she must go home. This seemed strange to his wife as he had always before been glad to see her when she came. On the day he died, a female acquaintance and friend of the family came to visit at his house. Wolff sent her home, so much to his wife's chagrin that she went home with her. On her returning she found her husband lying upon the sofa with a discharged pistol in his hand. The testimony showed that several times within this time he threatened to take his own life, declaring to his brother that he would not live longer. He had returned home from his work on the occasion of dismissing the friend of his wife, as above stated, and soon after shot himself. This was, substantially, all the testimony tending to show insanity.

¹ [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 7 Reporter, 357, contains only a partial report.]

Trowbridge & Dowling, for plaintiff.

C. I. Walker and A. B. Maynard, for defendant.

BROWN, District Judge. In considering whether there was sufficient evidence of insanity to be submitted to the jury, it was insisted at the outset of the argument that the act of suicide in itself was no evidence of mental aberration, and, indeed, it was conceded that, standing alone, it would not be sufficient proof to justify a verdict for the plaintiff. I find no case which goes further than this. In Terry v. Insurance Co. [Case No. 13,839], and Coverston v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. [Id. 3,290], it is stated, "There is no presumption of law, prima facie or otherwise, that self-destruction arises from insanity." In Moore v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. [Id. 9,755], Judge Longyear says, "The fact of suicide is not, in itself, evidence of insanity." In McClure v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. [55 N. Y. 651], it is said by the New York court of appeals, "Insanity cannot be presumed from the mere commission of this act." The question was fully and ably discussed and considered in Coffey v. Home Life Ins. Co., 35 N. Y. Super. Ct. 314. The court upon the trial at nisi prius charged that, "The law cannot and does not presume that a party, in the full possession of his mental faculties in that normal condition of mind that we call sanity, will deliberately take his own life, and, therefore, as there is no presumption, it favors insanity at the time of the committing of the act of self-destruction. I therefore charge you as a matter of law, that as affecting this case, you must presume that the deceased, when he took his life, was not in a sound state of mind." This was held to be error, and Chief Justice Barbour, in delivering the opinion, says: "The most that can be said is that, inasmuch as many and perhaps most persons who destroy their own lives, are insane at the time, the fact of such self-destruction itself wholly removes the presumption of sanity." Sedgwick, J. in concurring, also announces that "a judge cannot determine whether an individual case of suicide is the result of insanity; that he cannot make a presumption upon the subject which is a generalization, more or less perfect, from individual cases." The same judge remarked in a subsequent case, in the same volume (Weed v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., Id. 387): "The mere fact that a man kills himself does not create a presumption that he was insane. The general presumption is that every man is sane until the contrary facts are proved by the facts of the case. Suicide is but one fact which goes to the jury with all the other pertinent facts, for the purpose of getting from them a verdict as to whether the facts prove insanity."

This is the limit of authority upon the subject. It follows, then, that neither an act of suicide, nor an attempt, nor a threat to commit suicide, standing alone, creates a presumption of insanity that would be sufficient to justify a jury in finding the party insane. None of the cases, however, go so far as to say that such an act cannot be considered in connection with the previous demeanor and conduct of the party, as evidence of insanity. Indeed, to say that suicide under no circumstances is evidence of insanity is to contradict the experience of every person who has dealt with the insane. One of the most frequent forms of mental disease is known as the suicidal mania. Dean, Med. Jur. 508. The author remarks in connection with this form of derangement: "Another feature it possesses in common with other forms of mental hallucination, is the occasional exacerbations that are continuous; when its symptoms for a time disappear the clouds of melancholy seeming to vanish, and all appearances indicating a return to health and its enjoyments. Again the propensity will reappear and generally, in the end, accomplish its purpose." I think no court could be found to hold that the repeated and causeless attempts to take one's life would not be proper to go to the jury as evidence of insanity. If repeated attempts are evidence, it is difficult to say why a single attempt or an act of suicide may not also be permitted to go to the jury, as there must be a first time. From motives of public policy rather than upon strict philosophical principles, the law has pronounced, and I have no doubt properly, a single act insufficient evidence of mental disease; but in connection with other circumstances it has always been deemed worthy of consideration. In the leading case of Borradaile v. Hunter, 5 Man. & G. 639, Erskine, Judge, told the jury that they must take the act itself into consideration in connection with his previous conduct, and then say whether, at the time of its commission, they thought him capable of knowing right from wrong. So in Brooks v. Barrett, 7 Pick. 94; and in Burrows v. Burrows, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 109, it is said the law does not consider the act of suicide as conclusive evidence of insanity; but in both these cases it was laid before the jury in connection with other circumstances. See, also, 1 Redf. Wills, 116; Duffield v. Robeson, 2 Har. [Del.] 375; Chambers v. Queen's Proctor, 2 Curt. Ecc. 415. In all these cases it is inferentially, if not directly, decided that suicide is a legitimate item of testimony.

The rule of the criminal law is the same. From motives of public policy the law will not permit a person charged with larceny to say that the act itself proves him insane, while repeated and causeless acts of the same kind would be the strongest and only possible evidence of a species of mental disorder known as kleptomania. Dean, Med. Jur. 502. Instances are by no means rare of ladies whose birth and education would render them abhorrent of a criminal act, and whose circumstances would naturally remove them from temptation, being detected in frequent attempts to steal articles of trifling value, apparently from no motive except gratification of an abnormal passion. Such facts are undoubtedly proper to be laid before a jury, as evidence of kleptomania. A like rule would quite frequently obtain in cases of arson, homicide, and possibly other crimes. In determining, then, whether the evidence of insanity in this case was sufficient to justify a verdict for the plaintiff, I think the fact of the suicide and the threats, made upon the day of the death of the deceased, were proper to be considered by the jury in connection with his previous conduct.

It is insisted, however, that the insane acts, relied upon, were simply eccentricities of demeanor or, at most, temporary hallucinations, which lasted but a few minutes at a time, and ceased entirely some months before his death, leaving him perfectly sane and able to take care of his business. It is quite true there is no presumption of continuous insanity, temporary in its character, but I apprehend in most, if not all the cases, that support that doctrine, that the delusions were connected with some bodily disease, such as fever, pleurisy or delirium tremens, and necessarily ceased with returning health, or that they occurred so long previous to the commission of the act in question there could be no possible presumption of their repetition. People v. Francis, 38 Cal. 183; Staples v. Wellington, 58 Me. 459, 460; Hall v. Unger [Case No. 5,949]; Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. v. Peters, 42 Md. 414; Carpenter v. Carpenter, 8 Bush, 283; Greenl. Ev. 689.

It does not appear in this case that Wolf was affected with any disorder likely to be accompanied by insane manifestations. The delusions to which he was subject extended over a period of several months, and recurred without regularity, and apparently without cause. While nothing unusual was observed in his demeanor, for some months before the day of his death, his manner upon that day was such as to attract his brother's attention, and his conduct towards a visitor at his house such as to excite his wife's anger and induce her to leave his house. In this class of cases courts are very loth to take the question of insanity from the jury, and in the recent case of Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. v. Redel [95 U. S. 232], the supreme court of the United States said, if there was evidence of insanity the judge could not properly take the case from the jury. While I think there is nothing in this case indicating that the court intended to vary the rule announced in Pleasants v. Fant, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 116, and that the court would still be justified in disregarding a scintilla of evidence and instructing a verdict for the defendant, I think very great caution should be exercised in withdrawing from their consideration questions of insanity upon which the opinions of men, equally wise, are likely to differ. While it is quite possible there may be a strong bias in this class of cases against insurance companies, this is an argument which should be addressed to the legislature rather than the courts. I think there was no error in submitting the question of insanity to the jury in this case.

This case should be read in connection with Moore v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. [Case No. 9,755].

WOLFINGER (ROSS v.). See Case No. 12,081.

Case No. 17,930.

In re WOLFSKILL.

[5 Sawy. 385.]¹

District Court, D. California. Jan. 21, 1879.

DISCHARGE OF BANKRUPT—EFFECT OF PREFERENCE.

Where the bankrupt had made a conveyance constituting a preference fourteen months before the commencement of the proceedings, held, that the discharge should be granted notwithstanding. The words "in contemplation of becoming bankrupt" considered.

[In the matter of Berry Wolfskill, a bankrupt.]

James T. Hoyt, for bankrupt.

W. V. Wells and John C. Hall, for creditors.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The discharge of Roberts, one of the bankrupts, is opposed on the ground that being insolvent, and in contemplation of becoming bankrupt, he made a payment to one of his creditors for the purpose of preferring him over his other creditors, and of preventing the money so paid from coming into the hands of his assignee in bankruptcy, and being distributed under the act. The testimony shows that the payment made was of an honest debt, and although it amounted to a preference, yet it was not made in contemplation of being adjudged a bankrupt; for the present proceedings were not commenced until fourteen months afterwards. It is contended that the words "becoming a bankrupt" mean committing an act of bankruptcy for which the debtor might be adjudged, and the words "in contemplation of becoming bankrupt" mean, in contemplation of committing an act of bankruptcy. In the bankruptcy act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440] the expression used is "in contemplation of bankruptcy."

¹ [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

In Everett v. Stone [Case No. 4,577], Mr. Justice Story explains and defines their meaning. He held that they do "not point merely to cases where the bankrupts contemplate a formal adjudication in bankruptcy, either in voluntary or involuntary proceedings, but they extend to cases where the bankrupts contemplate a complete and total stoppage of their business and trade. In short, contemplation of bankruptcy means a contemplation of becoming a broken-up and ruined trader, according to the original signification of the term—a person whose table or counter of business is broken up—bancus ruptus."

In Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 168, the supreme court gave for the first time a construction to the phrase. Mr. Justice Curtis delivering the unanimous opinion of the court says, after remarking that at common law conveyances by a debtor to bona fide creditors are valid, even though intended as preferences: "This common law right it was the object of the second section of the act to restrain, but at the same time in so guarded a way as not to interfere with transactions consistent with a reasonable accomplishment of the object of the act. To give to these words 'contemplation of bankruptcy' a broad scope, and somewhat loose meaning, would not be in furtherance of the general object for which they were introduced. The word bankruptcy occurs many times in this act. It is entitled an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, and the word is manifestly used in other parts of the act to describe a particular legal status to be ascertained and declared by a judicial decree. It cannot be easily admitted that this precise and definite term is used in this clause to signify something quite different. It is certainly true in point of fact that even a merchant may contemplate insolvency, and the breaking up of his business, and yet not contemplate bankruptcy. He may confidently believe that his personal character, and the state of his affairs, and the disposition of his creditors are such that when they shall have examined into his condition, they will extend the time of payment of their debts, and enable him to resume his business. A person not a merchant, banker, etc., and consequently not liable to be proceeded against and made a bankrupt, though insolvent, may have come to a determination that he will not petition. The contemplation of these states not being in fact the contemplation of the other, to say that both were included in a term which describes only one of them would be a departure from sound principles of legal interpretation."

The construction given to the expression by the court was that to render the security void, the debtor must have contemplated "an act of bankruptcy, or an application by himself to be decreed a bankrupt." In the enumeration in the act of 1841 of the cases in which a debtor may be adjudged, the giving of a preference is not mentioned. But by the act of 1867 [14 Stat. 517] a preference given in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency is declared to be an act of bankruptcy (section 30); and under section 35 the transaction may be avoided by the assignee, if the proceedings in bankruptcy be commenced within the prescribed period, and the creditor had the reasonable cause for belief and the knowledge mentioned in the section. It has, therefore, been held that the words in contemplation of becoming bankrupt mean in contemplation of committing an act of bankruptcy, and that inasmuch as a preference by an insolvent, or by a person in contemplation of insolvency, is an act of bankruptcy, such a preference must be deemed to have been given "in contemplation of becoming bankrupt."

In Re Goldschmidt [Case No. 5,520], Mr. Justice Blatchford refused a discharge to a bankrupt who had made an assignment of all his property for the equal benefit of all his creditors more than ten months before the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, holding that the assignment was made with intent to hinder and delay his creditors, and to prevent his property from coming into the hands of the assignee. But in Re Freeman [Id. 5,082], the same learned judge held that a transfer of property alleged to be fraudulent made nine months before the filing of the petition, was not fraudulent within the meaning of the act.

The same construction of the clause in question appears to have been adopted by Bradford, J., in Re Pierson [Case No. 11,153]. And in Re Jones [Id. 7,446], Mr. Justice Lowell held that preferences given without regard to the bankruptcy, and more than six months before the filing of the petition, could not be set up in opposition to a discharge. This case is a strong one, for it was alleged that a previous proceeding in the state of Maine had been dismissed "for the purpose of getting rid of the objection that the preferences had been given within four months of the petition in that case." See, also, In re Locke [Id. 8,439], and In re Burgess [Id. 2-153].

In the case of In re Lutgens [unreported], this court followed the ruling of Mr. Justice Blatchford in Re Goldschmidt [supra], but the point was not very carefully considered as a clearly fraudulent conveyance, made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud creditors appeared to have been made. In Re Kafore [unreported], Mr. Justice Wallace held that a general assignment made in good faith, and without preferences, was an act of bankruptcy, and would defeat a discharge, notwithstanding that it was made more than six months before the filing of the petition.

In Re Warner [Case No. 17,177], to which I have been referred, the point under consideration did not arise as the preferences were given about a month before the filing of the petition. In Re Cretiew [Id. 3,390], the ground of objection was actual fraud. It will be seen from the foregoing that the authorities are conflicting.

I confess that I am not wholly satisfied with the construction of the clause in question, which treats every technical preference upon which an adjudication might be made as given "in contemplation of becoming bankrupt," because, being "an act of bankruptcy," it renders the debtor liable to be adjudged a bankrupt.

Were it not for the fact this construction seems to have been generally adopted, I should have been disposed to hold that the expression "in contemplation of becoming bankrupt" was intended to mean the contemplation of becoming a bankrupt, i. e., of being so adjudged, as the observations of the supreme court above cited seem to imply, or else the contemplation of the condition of affairs described by Judge Story in Everett v. Stone [supra], viz., the contemplation of a complete and total stoppage of the debtor's business and trade, and of becoming a broken-up and ruined trader.

This construction would preserve the distinction between a "contemplation of becoming bankrupt," as mentioned in section 29, and the contemplation of bankruptcy, or insolvency, as mentioned in section 39. But with regard to the second point, the weight of authority seems to be that to constitute "the fraudulent preference under this act," mentioned in section 29, it must have been such as are mentioned in section 35 and section 39, and have been given within, at most, six months preceding the filing of the petition. See In re Harper [Case No. 6,085].

I adopt this construction not without grave misgivings. It is open to serious objections. But it avoids the seeming incongruity of refusing a discharge on account of a preference which constituted an act of bankruptcy, when that preference could not, at the time of the commencement of the proceedings, have been the basis of an adjudication. If, after the expiration of six months, an act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor can no longer be alleged against him in proceedings in invitum, it would seem reasonable that a similar prescription should run in his favor, when the commission of the same act is urged as an objection to his discharge.

On the whole, though with considerable hesitation, I decide to grant the discharge.

WOLGA, The (CHATFIELD v.). See Case No. 2,632.

Case No. 17,931.

WOLVERTON v. The ALLEGHENY.

[The case reported under the above title in 1 Chi. Leg. News, 81, is the same as Case No. 205.]

Case No. 17,932.

WOLVERTON v. LACEY.

[18 Law Rep. 672.]

District Court, N. D. Ohio, Feb., 1856.

CONSOLIDATION OF ACTIONS—DEBT FOR PENALTIES UNDER ST. 1790, CH. 29, § 1 (1 STAT. 131)—DECLARATION IN—FEMALE SEAMEN—SHIPPING ARTICLES—MARITIME JURISDICTION ON THE LAKES.

1. Where the plaintiff has several causes of action which may be joined, one suit only should be brought; otherwise, the court will compel a consolidation with costs of the application therefor.

2. In an action of debt, to recover several penalties under the act of congress of 1790, c. 29, § 1, against the master of a vessel for shipping seamen without articles, a single count for all the penalties is sufficient.

3. A female shipped on board a vessel as cook and steward is entitled to all the rights and subject to all the disabilities of a seaman or mariner, and the provisions of the statute concerning shipping articles apply as well to such cook and steward as to the sailor before the mast.

4. The provisions of this act, imposing a penalty on masters of vessels in the merchant service for shipping seamen without articles, extend to the merchant marine upon the lakes and public navigable waters connecting the same.

5. Independent of the act of congress of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 726), under the constitution, the maritime law of the United States has the same application to cases upon the lakes as upon tide waters.

At law.

John Crowell and F. T. Wallace, for plaintiff.

D. K. Carter and D. O. Morton, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

WILLSON, District Judge. This is an action of debt, brought to recover penalties under the first section of the act of congress of July 20, 1790. The declaration contains but one count, and is, as to form and material averments, substantially in accordance with the established precedents for declarations on penal statutes. The plaintiff alleges that the defendant, on the 6th of May, 1855, was master of the schooner Yorktown, a vessel of over fifty tons burden, and navigating the waters of the lakes, and that with her he made a voyage from Cleveland to Chicago. That he employed and shipped on board for said trip, at Cleveland, ten persons as seamen in various capacities, one of the ten a female cook. That said voyage was performed with such crew, none of whom had signed shipping articles of agreement, as required by the statute. Whereby he insists that the defendant has forfeited the sum of twenty dollars for each of the persons so employed, and thereby claims that an action qui tam hath accrued to him, to recover for himself and the United States the aggregate sum of two hundred dollars.

The defendant's plea is nil debet. During the progress of the trial several questions have been raised by the defendant's counsel, and argued on both sides with much ability. One ground taken is, that separate suits should have been brought for each penalty. Another is, that if it is competent to consolidate in one suit the actions to recover the several penalties, then the declaration should contain separate counts for each penalty. The third and main point is, that the first section of the statute of 1790 has no application to the merchant marine of the lakes.

This action is properly brought so far as relates to the consolidation in one action of the suits to recover these penalties. The law abhors an unnecessary multiplicity of suits. Where a plaintiff has two or more causes of action which may be joined in one, he ought to bring one suit only; and in such case, if he commences more than one, he may be compelled to consolidate them, and pay the costs of the application. 1 Chit. Pl. 228. This is a principle of law designed to protect a defendant from an unreasonable accumulation of costs. In this case, had the plaintiff commenced ten different suits, the court, on motion, would have ordered a consolidation at his costs.

We are equally clear that the second objection is not well taken. If the action of debt is the proper mode to recover penalties accruing under this statute (and this seems not to be questioned), then a single count is sufficient. It matters not whether it is alleged that the defendant shipped one or a dozen seamen without articles for the voyage, provided the plaintiff in his declaration has set forth specially and accurately the facts bringing the defendant within the statute declared on. The object and purpose of pleading is to apprise the opposite party of the facts constituting the cause of complaint against him; and they should be set forth with sufficient certainty, that the record may be a protection against future recovery. We do not see how the defendant would be better informed as to the subject-matter of the suit, and thereby be enabled to make a better defence, had this declaration contained a count for each penalty. Each seaman is named and described, to the number of ten, the full complement of the crew on the particular voyage. The defendant is thus as fully informed of the acts complained of, as if particularly set forth in separate counts. It is competent to embrace in one count several penalties upon a penal statute. People v. McFadden, 13 Wend. 396.

Equally well settled is another point raised in the case, viz. that a female may be entitled to all the rights and subject to all the disabilities of a seaman or mariner. Since the decision of Lord Stowell in the case of The Jane & Matilda, 1 Hagg. Adm. 187, this doctrine has been fully recognized by the courts of England and the United States. It is now well determined that the term "mariner" includes cooks, stewards, carpenters, coopers, and firemen as well as sailors. In fact, all on board the vessel, employed in her equipment, her preservation, or the preservation of the crew, are denominated "seamen." And hence services performed by a female in the capacity of cook, entitle her to a proceeding in rem to recover her wages therefor as a mariner. Thackarey v. The Farmer of Salem [Case No. 13,852]; Conk. Adm. 72; Fland. Mar. Law, 354, 355. The requisition of the statute, therefore, as to signing shipping articles, extends as well to the cook or steward as to the sailor before the mast.

Without further discussion of questions which may be regarded as incidental to the main matter in controversy, I proceed to the inquiry, does the act of July 20, 1790, extend to and become operative for the government and regulation of seamen engaged in the merchant service on the lakes? This question has been raised and argued by counsel as if this suit was a proceeding in the admiralty, and in its determination, the court should apply the rules and be governed by the principles of admiralty law. It is insisted that the statute of 1790 never was intended for, and in fact never had any binding force and effect on waters not subject to admiralty jurisdiction; that until 1845 there was no admiralty law applicable to the lake marine; that the act of February 26, 1845, extending the jurisdiction of the district courts to certain cases upon the lakes, in providing, "that the maritime law of the United States so far as the same is or may be applicable thereto, shall constitute the rule of decision in such suits," vested in the courts judicial power to determine the question of the applicability of the statute of 1790 to the lakes. And the defendant resists such application on the ground of public policy; that it would be detrimental alike to seamen and owners of vessel property; that the requirements of the statute have never been enforced here, owing to the want of adjudged cases as authority, and that it would be as difficult to make seamen sign shipping articles as required by the first section, as it would be absurd to enforce the provisions of the eighth section as to vessels engaged in the Canada trade. This court has cognizance of this suit by virtue of the ninth section of the act of 1789 [1 Stat. 76], which declares that the district courts shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of all suits for penalties and forfeitures under the laws of the United States. This proceeding is not a suit in a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. It is a common law action, and the process, pleadings, and proceedings are in accordance with the practice and principles of the common law.

But suppose we grant the point claimed by the defendant, viz. that the statute of 1790 is operative only on waters subject to admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, wherein does this benefit the defendant? In passing the act of 1845 (at least in the provisions before referred to) congress performed a work of supererogation. Since the decision in the case of The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443, it has been a settled principle of law, that admiralty jurisdiction is not confined to tide water, but extends to the public navigable waters of the United States. The narrow and restricted definition of "tide-water admiralty jurisdiction," as declared by the courts of England and explained by English writers on the subject, is now rejected by the federal courts. The supreme court has boldly, and we think wisely, overruled the case of The Thomas Jefferson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 428, and the Orleans v. Phœbus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175; and in so doing has shown the unreasonableness of giving a construction to the constitution which would measure the jurisdiction of the admiralty by the tide. The great and increasing magnitude of the commerce of the lakes, and the almost fabulous increase of the lake marine, has finally caused the courts to pause and inquire, whether, in all its varied rights and business arrangements, there is anything to distinguish this great lake commerce from the other maritime commerce of the world. It has been truly said that "a salvage, an average, a bottomry, a case of wages on Lake Erie, are as clearly cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and have reason to be subject to the same rules and regulations of maritime law, as similar cases on the Black Sea, the Baltic, or on Long Island Sound. Their nature is the same everywhere—they are maritime everywhere." It is not surprising, therefore, that for the purpose of extending equal justice to all, the supreme court should have departed from its narrow construction of the constitution, as given in the case of The Thomas Jefferson, and placed the admiralty jurisdiction upon a basis of perfect equality in the rights and privileges of the citizens of the different states, not only in the laws of the general government, but in the mode of administering them. This is done in the case of The Genesee Chief.

Independent of the act of 1845, under the constitution, the maritime law has the same application to cases upon the lakes as to those upon tide-waters. Congress, doubtless, has the power to prescribe the mode of proceeding in admiralty, as was done by the act of 1845, in saving to the parties the right of trial by jury. The admiralty jurisdiction on the lakes, however, lies deeper and beyond the act of 1845. Hence the objection that the statute of 1790 is operative only on waters subject to the admiralty jurisdiction, has no force in the case. Besides, there is nothing in the language of the law of 1790 restricting its operations to cases upon tide water. Its language is, "every ship or vessel," "every seaman or mariner," without any allusion to salt water or the tides; clearly covering all cases of seamen employed and serving on ships or vessels engaged in the merchant service on the public navigable waters of the United States. The registry and enrollment act of 1793 [1 Stat. 287] is not more specific than this as to the waters on which it should apply; yet its binding force and effect upon the shipping of the lakes has never been questioned or disregarded in practice.

Aside from the importance of divesting the law of its uncertainty, it is in our opinion equally important as a matter of public policy, that the first section of the act of 1790 should be enforced here. The loss of life and property on the lakes is annually on the increase. From authentic sources it is ascertained that in the single year of 1854, the loss of life was one hundred and nineteen persons, and the loss of property $2,187,285 by disaster. These alarming facts induced this court, at a recent session of the federal grand jury, to call the attention of that intelligent body to this subject; and the jurors were instructed to inquire whether these losses were occasioned by the noncompliance with the statute of 1849 [9 Stat. 380] in relation to signal lights, and the steam vessel acts of 1838 [5 Stat. 304] and 1852 [10 Stat. 61]. The grand jury, after devoting much time and examining a great number of witnesses, reported to the court, among other things, "that a frequent cause of disaster on the lakes has been the want of sufficiency of seamen and a lack of efficiency in them, and a want of control on the part of masters of vessels over their men. This results in a great part from the neglect of masters of vessels to comply with the statute requiring them to have their men sign shipping articles. Insubordination results at times when legalized authority is most needed. The men abandon the vessel (perhaps in the first port), and she is obliged to return, it may be, without an adequate supply of hands, or if there is, a continual changing makes them always strangers to the vessel and the ways of working her." We are satisfied that a just and fair interpretation of the law, as well as the dictates of a sound public policy, demand the enforcement of the first section of the statute of 1790.

This brings us to the testimony in the case. It is in evidence that in May, 1855, the schooner Yorktown (of which the defendant was master) was a registered vessel of over fifty tons burden, and that she made the trip from Cleveland to Chicago with a crew of ten persons, as charged. Four only of the persons employed on the vessel for the trip have been sworn and examined in the case. These are Daniel Chottison and his wife Jane, Samuel W. Wolverton and Robert McKay. They all testify that on or about the 5th of May, 1855, they were shipped on board of said vessel at Cleveland, in the various capacities of mate, sailor, and one of them, Jane Chottison, as cook; that they made the trip from Cleveland to Chicago and back, and that neither of them signed shipping articles, and that they had no knowledge of any such papers on board the vessel. Neither of the witnesses were able to state whether the remainder of the crew signed shipping papers or not. Some conversation had in the presence of the defendant, between two of the crew, at the time they were paid off and discharged in Chicago, is in evidence, tending to show that they also had not signed articles. But the conversation was not addressed to the defendant, and it is doubtful whether he, in fact, heard it; at all events, it is too vague and uncertain to justify the court in giving it any weight. As to the remaining six men of the crew, there is no evidence before us that will warrant a charge of delinquency of the defendant and subject him to penalties. We therefore pronounce for four penalties, and judgment is accordingly rendered against the defendant for the sum of $80 and costs of suit.

Case No. 17,933.

WONSON v. GILMAN et al.

[2 Ban. & A. 590; 1 11 O. G. 1011.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. April 13, 1877.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT — PAINT FOR SHIPS' BOTTOMS.

A patent for paint for preventing the fouling of ships' bottoms, and composed of (1) a suitable medium, (2) the oxide of copper yielding a poisonous solution in water, and (3) mineral matters separating the particles of the oxide, and retarding such solution, is not infringed by a paint containing a similar medium and similar mineral matters for retarding solution, but, in place of the oxide, containing arsenite of copper.

[This was a bill in equity by Augustus H. Wonson against Sumner Gilman and others, for the infringement of letters patent No. 40,515, granted to Tarr & Wonson, November 3, 1863, reissue Nos. 4,598 and 4,599, granted October 17, 1871.]

Browne & Holmes, for complainant.
A. A. Ranney, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The patent in this case, so far at least as division B is concerned, was sustained by the court in the case of Tarr v. Folsom [Case No. 13,756]. It was there decided to be for an improved paint to prevent the fouling of ships' bottoms by the adhesion of barnacles, sea-weeds and other substances, a paint which can be applied with a brush like ordinary paint, and which is compounded of, first, a suitable vehicle or medium; second, the oxide of copper, yielding a poisonous solution in water; and, third, such earthy and mineral matters as separate the particles of the oxide and retard such solution. That case did not necessarily involve, nor does the present case, any decision as to division A, for, if the defendants infringe in this case, the infringement is of division B, as defendants use the suitable vehicle, and also earthy and mineral matters which retard the solution of the poisonous ingredient, and if that poisonous ingredient be an oxide of copper, then they use all the elements of the combination in division B.

¹ [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The real question presented in this case is one of infringement only, and the solution of that question is dependent upon the other question, whether the poisonous substance which is used as an ingredient in the defendants' paint can, within the limitations of complainant's patent, and within the terms also of the contracts between the parties, be properly classed as an oxide of copper, or as such an equivalent of the oxide of copper as is not disclaimed in the patent, or licensed to be used by the contract between the parties.

Certain agreements between the parties, which are in evidence, contain stipulations that the defendants shall not be prevented thereby from "the making, compounding, using or vending of any paint wherein metal, copper, or the sulphurets, sulphates or sulphides of copper are ingredients, whether with or without a suitable basis, and whether used alone or with any other preservative ingredients except only the oxide of copper."

By the terms of the patent, and according to the principles upon which the complainant's patent, in view of the state of the art, was sustained in Tarr v. Folsom [supra], the patent is limited to the use of oxide of copper, and does not embrace, as equivalents for the oxide, any of the salts of copper, however poisonous. The defendants use, as the poisonous ingredient, in their paint, the arsenite of copper, prepared by precipitating the copper from a solution of the sulphate, chloride or nitrate of copper with arsenite of soda.

Inasmuch as the salt of copper used by defendants, which was generally the sulphate of copper, was a substance composed, according to the old nomenclature in chemistry, of oxide of copper on the one side and sulphuric acid on the other, or, according to the new nomenclature, as sulphuric acid in which two atoms of hydrogen have been replaced by copper, the salt being expressed as one whole, consisting of copper, oxygen and sulphur, it necessarily results that as oxide of copper, according to the old notation, or oxygen and copper, according to the new, can be found by analysis of the sulphate of copper, so in like manner these same elements can, by analysis, be found in the basic arsenite of copper prepared by precipitating the copper from a solution of the sulphate of copper with arsenite of soda.

Accordingly, we observe that several chemists of distinction, examined as experts in the case, find, by analysis of the defendants' paint, oxide of copper; but they admit that the arsenious acid and the oxide of copper were chemically combined. If sulphate of copper were used in the defendants' paint, and such use of sulphate of copper is admissible without infringement, under the license given both by the disclaimer in the patent and the stipulation in the agreements, an analysis of the paint would show the oxide of copper. So, after the conversion of the sulphate of copper into arsenite of copper, by the use of arsenite of soda, an analysis of the paint into which the arsenite of copper enters as an ingredient, will show the presence of copper and oxygen. But these elements, in their new chemical combinations in the new substance, a basic or tribasic arsenite of copper, cannot strictly be said to exist as an oxide of copper, with any more propriety than metallic copper, or arsenic, can be said to exist, as such, in the sulphate of copper or the arsenite of soda. Nor was arsenite of copper a known equivalent for the oxide of copper as a poisonous ingredient in a marine paint, at the date of complainant's patent.

Without undertaking to decide upon the different theories, respecting chemical combinations, maintained by the eminent chemists who have been examined by the respective parties, after a careful examination of all their testimony, I am satisfied that this case must be decided on the practical views above expressed. The conclusion is, that the paint of the defendants, manufactured in the manner testified to by Professor Ordway, is not an infringement of the complainant's patent. Bill dismissed.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Tarr v. Webb, Case No. 13,757.]

Case No. 17,934.

WONSON v. PETERSON et al.

[3 Ban. & A. 249; 13 O. G. 548.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. March 11, 1878.

REISSUE OF PATENT—VALIDITY—INFRINGEMENT—PAINT FOR SHIPS' BOTTOMS.

1. The validity of division B of reissued patent No. 4,599, dated October 17th, 1871, granted to James G. Tarr and Augustus H. Wonson, reaffirmed. Tarr v. Folsom [Case No. 13,756] followed.

2. Doubts expressed as to the validity of division A of the said reissued patent.

¹ [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

3. The defence that the reissue is invalid on the ground that the patent does not contain a sufficient specification of the proportions of the ingredients to meet the requirements of the law, unless set up in the answer, cannot be considered.

4. The defendants held to infringe division B of complainant's patent by the use of sulphuret of antimony in combination with oxide of copper and a suitable vehicle or medium, notwithstanding that, to the oxide of copper is added a small quantity of arsenite of copper or arsenate of copper, or both, it appearing that sulphuret of antimony is an earthy or mineral matter which dissolves in water more slowly than the oxide of copper.

[This was a bill in equity by Augustus H. Wonson against Benjamin D. Peterson and others for the infringement of letters patent No. 40,515, granted to Tarr & Wonson, November 3, 1863, reissue Nos. 4,598 and 4,599, granted October 17, 1871.]

Causten Browne and Browne, Holmes & Browne, for complainant.

Chauncey Smith and Shattuck, Holmes & Munroe, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. In the case of Tarr v. Folsom [Case No. 13,756], this court decided that division B of the reissued patent to Tarr and Wonson was not void by reason of describing an invention different from the one described and claimed in the original patent, because the original patent clearly suggested a marine paint composed of oxide of copper, an earthy or mineral base, and a vehicle or medium. A doubt was then entertained by the court, which it has since had occasion, on a motion in another case for a preliminary injunction, to express, that division A could not be sustained for a paint compounded of two only of the ingredients, viz.: oxide of copper and a vehicle or medium. But, after careful re-examination in the light of the more elaborate discussion of the question in this case, the court adheres to the opinion that the invention substantially, though not accurately and fully described in the original patent, is the one more accurately and clearly described in the reissue division B. The object of the reissue was to correct this inadvertence in the original description. There is no ground to conclude that it was intended to embrace something not invented by or known to the patentee at the time of his original application. The marine paint he described and made and sold had the three ingredients described and claimed in division B. The substance he mixed with the vehicle or medium was a substance produced by roasting the pyritous friable ores, the exposure to air and heat converting the contained copper into an oxide, and the other mineral and earthy substances remaining after the roasting serving in the paint to interpose, between the particles of oxide of copper, substances which dissolve in sea-water more slowly than they do.

An objection is raised, in argument, against the validity of the reissue, on the ground that the patent does not contain a sufficient specification of the proportions of the ingredients, to meet the requirements of the law. This defence is not set up in the answer and cannot be considered. Goodyear v. Providence Rubber Co. [Case No. 5,583]; Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 793.

The defence of the anticipation of this patent by the Wetterstedt patent was fully considered in Tarr v. Folsom [supra]. The disclaimer, in the Tarr and Wonson patent, of such mixtures as are referred to in the Wetterstedt patent should be construed as the Wetterstedt patent itself is to be construed. That patent describes a ship's paint to be made of pulverized antimony and pure oxide of copper, in which a protective influence of the antimony upon the copper is incorrectly ascribed to a supposed galvanic action. The antimony in the Wetterstedt patent was not so used that it performed the function of a base, retarding the dissolution of the copper, by itself dissolving more slowly than the oxide of the copper.

The testimony of Brown and Gardner, when carefully considered, does not prove an anticipation of the Tarr and Wonson invention. Sulphuret of antimony, used by defendants in their paint, is an earthy or mineral matter, which dissolves in water more slowly than the oxide of copper. It comes within the description of the retarding earthy or mineral basis described in the division B, and the use of it, in combination with oxide of copper and a suitable vehicle or medium, constitutes infringement, notwithstanding to the oxide of copper is added a small quantity of arsenite of copper or arsenate of copper, or both.

Decree for injunction and account as prayed for in the bill.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Tarr v. Webb, Case No. 13,757.]

WONSON (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,750.

WOOD, Ex Parte. See Case No. 6,825.

Case No. 17,935.

In re WOOD.

[6 Ben. 339; 1 13 N. B. R. 96; 1 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 366.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1873.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—AMENDMENT OF PETITION.

A bankrupt's petition, which was filed in February, 1868, alleged only that he "had a place of business in New York." In February, 1873, he asked to file an amended petition, in which the words, "and has there carried on business of his own," were added. Held, that the amendment could not be allowed, as the words "business of his own" are not found in the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], but that the application to amend might be renewed, on an affidavit showing the facts and the reasons why the amendment was not asked for sooner.

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[In the matter of Edward T. Wood, a bankrupt.]

The petition in this case was filed February 29, 1868. It stated that the petitioner "had a place of business in New York." In February, 1873, the petitioner asked to file an amended petition, in which the following words: "And has there carried on business of his own," were added to the above allegation.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The amendment asked cannot be granted in the form proposed. The words, "business of his own," are not found in the act. The motion may be renewed on notice, on an affidavit showing the existence, at the date of filing the petition, of the facts specified in section 11 as necessary to give jurisdiction, setting forth specifically the words proposed to be stricken out and those proposed to be inserted, and the reasons why the petition was not made originally in the proper form, and the reasons why the amendment was not applied for sooner after the filing of the specifications.

Case No. 17,936.

In re WOOD.

[8 Ben. 237.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. Sept., 1875.

BANKRUPTCY—TIME OF APPLICATION FOR DISCHARGE.

1. W. was adjudged a bankrupt on March 2, 1868. His application for a discharge was not made till June 19, 1869. A debt was proved and assets came to the hands of the assignee. Held that, under the decision of the circuit court for the Northern district of New York, in Re Sloan [Case No. 12,945], the application was made too late, and that no discharge could be granted in the case.

2. All applications for discharge must be made within one year from the adjudication. Where no debts have been proved, or no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, the application may be made after the expiration of sixty days from the adjudication. Where debts have been proved, and assets have come to the hands of the assignee, the application may be made after, but not till after, the expiration of six months from the adjudication.

[In the matter of Edward T. Wood, a bankrupt.]

S. G. Courtney, for bankrupt.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The adjudication of bankruptcy in this case was made March 2, 1868. The application for a discharge was not made till June 19, 1869. Under the recent ruling of Mr. Justice Hunt (concurring with the opinion of Judge Wallace), in the case of In re Sloan [Case No.

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

12,945], in the Northern district of New York, the application was made too late, because not made within one year from the time of the adjudication. Mr. Justice Hunt says: "The authority to apply for a discharge rests entirely upon section 29. It must necessarily be taken with the limitations in that section contained. The only right to apply, there given, is to be exercised within one year from the time of the adjudication. In my judgment, this applies to all cases, whether there are debts proved, or assets received, or not. It is a case of limited authority, and there is no power to grant a discharge, unless it is applied for within the time prescribed. The excuse of the bankrupt for the delay is a reasonable one, and, if there was power, I should accept it as satisfactory." It has heretofore been the practice of this court to allow applications for discharge to be made after the expiration of one year from the adjudication of bankruptcy, in cases where the two circumstances concurred, that debts had been proved, and assets had come to the hands of the assignee, the construction given by this court to section 29 of the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 531)],—section 5108 of the Revised Statutes,—being, that the application within one year from the adjudication was required only where no debts had been proved or no assets had come to the hands of the assignee; that, where either of those circumstances existed, the application might be made at any time after the expiration of sixty days from the adjudication, and within one year from the adjudication; and that, where debts had been proved and assets had come to the hands of the assignee, a discharge might be applied for at any time after the expiration of six months from the adjudication, and even after the expiration of one year from the adjudication. In the present case a debt was proved, and assets had come to the hands of the assignee. Therefore, under the former rulings of this court, the application was in time, although not made until more than 15 months after the adjudication. But the decision in Re Sloan [supra], is that of the circuit court, in review of the decision of the district court, and is controlling on this court. It is to the effect that the proper interpretation of the statute is, that all applications for discharge must be made within one year from the adjudication; that, where no debts have been proved, or no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, the application may be made after the expiration of sixty days from the adjudication; and that, where debts have been proved, and assets have come to the hands of the assignee, the application may be made after, but not until after, the expiration of six months from the adjudication. Under this construction, no discharge can be granted in this case. The question is one of the power and jurisdiction of the court, and not one depending upon the opposition of a creditor.

Case No. 17,937.

In re WOOD.

[5 N. B. R. 421.]¹

District Court, W. D. Tennessee. 1871.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT TRANSFER.

A transfer which is only the execution of a contract made when there was no circumstance to impeach it as an intended fraud on the bankrupt law, and when the parties were acting in good faith and long before anything occurred to throw a suspicion over the solvency of the debtor, will be protected, and a bill brought by the assignee in bankruptcy to recover personal property conveyed under the above state of facts will be dismissed.

[Cited in Smith v. Craft, 17 Fed. 706.]

In December, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, within six, but more than four months prior to the filing of the petition in this case, James P. Wood, the bankrupt, proposed to one Willingham, to whom he owed a note for five thousand dollars, to convey to him certain land in payment of the debt, which proposition Willingham declined. Wood then told him that he could very easily sell the land and would do so to pay that debt if Willingham would take the purchase notes, to be secured by lien on the land in payment, to which Willingham agreed, but not in writing. Wood did afterwards sell the land and took notes for the purchase money for about the amount of the Willingham debt. Before they were delivered, Howell, Wood & Co., an extensive mercantile firm at Memphis, became bankrupt, and it was generally rumored that J. P. Wood was, by their failure, rendered insolvent by reason of his liabilities for that firm, but there was no proof that Willingham knew or had cause to know of these rumors about James P. Wood. He had before that come to Brownsville by appointment, to settle with Wood and take the purchase notes, but owing to sickness of one of the parties the settlement was not made. A few days after the failure of Howell, Wood & Co., James P. Wood and Willingham did settle by the surrender of Wood's note and the transfer to Willingham of the purchase notes for the land, and within four months afterwards James P. Wood became bankrupt. It was in proof that James P. Wood was regarded as solvent, and that at the time of the transfer of the notes it was not positively known in the community, when these transactions took place, to what extent he was involved in the failure of Howell, Wood & Co.; but it was the general belief that he was very largely so involved. The assignee filed a bill in the district court to set aside the transfer of the notes to Willingham and to recover them for the estate.

Smith & Jefferson, for assignee.

Estes & Jackson, for Willingham.

¹ [Reprinted by permission.]

TRIGG, District Judge, held that the transfer was not fraudulent under the bankrupt act in the above state of facts. He held that the transfer was only the execution of a contract made when there was no circumstance to impeach it as an intended fraud on the act, and when it was conceded the parties were acting in good faith, and long before the failure of Howell, Wood & Co. had thrown a suspicion over the solvency of James P. Wood; that it was not necessary that the contract then made should have been in writing, nor was it necessary that the notes should have been transferred to entitle Willingham to them, or to make the contract binding on Wood. In delivering the notes after he became insolvent he was only doing what he was bound by his previous agreement to do, and in the absence of all actual or intentional fraud in such delivery, it was the completion of a contract valid in itself and made in good faith before the insolvency, and the bill was dismissed, the assignee taking an appeal.

Case No. 17,938.

WOOD et al. v. ABBOTT et al.

[5 Blatchf. 325.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York, July, 1866.

COPYRIGHT—PHOTOGRAPHIC PRINTING.

A picture on paper, made by the art of photography from a glass "negative," is not a print, cut or engraving, within the 1st section of the copyright act of February 3, 1831 (4 Stat. 436).

[Cited in Yuengling v. Schile, 12 Fed. 107.]

This was an action [by Hamilton Wood and others against Milton S. Abbott and others] in the nature of a qui tam suit, founded on the 1st, 4th, 5th, and 7th sections of the act of February 3, 1831 (4 Stat. 436), relating to copyrights. At the trial, a verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, for the sum fixed by the 7th section of the act, subject to the opinion of the court, and the plaintiffs now moved for judgment on the verdict.

George W. Wingate, for plaintiffs.
Thomas C. Fields, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The plaintiffs charge the defendants with pirating certain alleged "prints or engravings," the copyrights of which the plaintiffs allege belong to them. The case presented by the proofs is a novel one, at least in this court, and requires a statement of the facts in order to see the precise point which the judgment of the court determines. The plaintiffs are photographers in the city of New York, and are engaged in business as partners, under the name of the New York Photographing Company. One Fish, an artist, drew in crayon two original drawings or designs of the human figure, one called "The Golden Age," and the other "School Days." These pictures he sold to the plaintiffs, and assigned to them, so far as he could legally do so, all the rights which he had to, or growing out of, the same. The object of this sale and assignment by Fish and purchase by the plaintiffs was to enable the latter to manufacture and copyright photographs of the original drawings. To carry out this object, the plaintiffs caused what are known in photography as "negatives" to be taken. From these negatives they produced great numbers of copies of the original designs, but of a very much smaller size. Before the publication and sale of these copies, the plaintiffs deposited in the clerk's office of the United States district court for the Southern district of New York, printed titles of the designs, together with photographic copies thereof. They also, before the publication and sale of such copies, impressed on the latter the words, "Entered according to act of congress, &c." There is some dispute, in the evidence, as to whether or not these words were impressed on all of the pictures before they left the hands of the plaintiffs, but, for the purposes of this motion, I shall assume that they were placed on them all. These photographic copies were quite small, and were mounted on cards of nearly the same size, about two and a half inches by four. The pictures themselves were on a piece of thin paper, and these were pasted on the cards. The words "Entered according to act of congress, &c.," were not on the thin paper upon which the pictures were taken, but were impressed on the cards upon which they were pasted, just at the foot of the pictures. The defendants insist that, inasmuch as the statute requires these words to be "impressed on the face thereof," in order to entitle the party to the benefit of the act, the impression of the words on the card at the foot of the picture was not a compliance with this requirement, and that, therefore, the alleged copyright furnishes no protection to the publishers. It is not necessary to determine this point in the present case, for there is another one more prominent and strongly marked, which, in the judgment of the court, is decisive of the controversy between these parties.

The defendants, having purchased a copy of each of these small photographic pictures, made negatives from them, and, from such negatives, printed and sold in the market copies almost identical with those made and sold by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs insist that, upon these facts, they have shown valid copyrights for these small photographs, made from the original designs in their possession, and that the defendants have infringed their rights in the premises, and the question is, whether the verdict taken at the trial can be supported by the 1st section of the act of 1831, upon which the alleged copyrights are founded. That section provides, that "any person or persons, being a citizen or citizens of the United States, or resident therein, who shall * * * invent, design, etch, engrave, work, or cause to be engraved, etched, or worked, from his own design, any print or engraving, and the executors, administrators, or legal assigns of such person or persons, shall have the sole right of printing, reprinting, publishing and vending such * * * print, cut, or engraving, in whole or in part, for the term of twenty-eight years from the time of recording the title thereof, in the manner herein-after directed." A glance at this section will show that the question in controversy is, whether or not these photographs are prints, cuts or engravings, and, therefore, protected by the statute.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The principal ground upon which the plaintiffs claim the validity of the copyright is, that, as they allege, the photographs are "prints." The process by which these photographs are taken, is substantially as follows: The original picture is transferred to a prepared glass plate, according to the well-known practice of photographers. This copy of the original is called a negative, and, as seen in the medium of transmitted light, the lights and shadows of the original are reversed. A sheet of prepared paper is then laid upon the plate, both paper and plate are put into a frame of the proper size, in which pressure is applied to the paper by appropriate means, so as to bring the paper into contact with the plate throughout its entire surface, and then the plate is exposed to the light of the sun. The rays of light transmitted through the glass, throw the picture on the prepared paper, and fix it there in positive light and shadow. By this means, reduced copies of the original are extensively multiplied. The pressing of the paper upon the glass plate, is to make the contact of their surfaces perfect throughout, in order to prevent the diffusion of the light, and the consequent blurring of parts of the picture, which would occur in spots where this contact did not take place. In other words, the pressure is to hold the paper to the glass plate, in such a way as to secure a uniform chemical action of the light on the paper, controlled or disturbed in no way, except by the shadowy image on the glass itself. The rays of light paint or delineate, by chemical action, the image on the paper, guided by the image on the glass. These rays paint it in just the same way in which they paint the negative on the glass, except that, in the latter case, they are reflected from the original, while in this they pass directly through the transparent plate. This is a new and beautiful art, discovered long after the statute in question was enacted. It is not a development of the art of making prints or engravings which existed at the date of the act. Then, a print was defined to be "a mark or form made by impression or printing; anything printed; that which, being impressed, leaves its form, as a butter print, a cut in wood or metal to be impressed on paper; the impression made; a picture; a stamp; the letters in a printed book," &c. As used in this statute, it was synonymous with the term "engraving," with which it is connected in the act, which means, in this relation, "an engraved plate; an impression from an engraved plate." This new art of photography, and all its kindred processes, is an entirely original and independent mode of taking pictures of material objects, and multiplying copies of such pictures at pleasure. That combination of creative or imitative power and mechanical skill by which the artist works out his own conception, or the embodied conception of another, in a fixed form, the fruits of which the law was intended to protect, is not brought into play. No block, plate, or stone is engraved. No figure is drawn, etched, raised, or worked on any surface from which copies are to be produced by impression or printed. The image thrown by light reflected from the original and passed through a camera produces a negative, and, when the light passes through the transparent negative on to paper held in contact with glass, it produces a positive. The image is no more formed by pressure when the positive is made on the paper held in contact with the glass plate, than when the negative is made on the glass by rays reflected from the original at a distance. In both cases, the only force that contributes to the formation of the image is the chemical force of light, operating on a surface made sensitive to its power. The springs in the pressure frame hold the paper firmly in contact with the glass, and thus prevent the diffusion of the light after it passes through the negative. This position of the paper and plate renders the operation of the light direct and strong, and brings out the lines of the picture clearly and sharply. The manufacture of these positives is called, in the language of this new art, "photographic printing." But names are not things. It is not printing in any sense known to the arts at the time this copyright act was passed; nor is it an extension of the old processes, or a new development of the art of printing or the art of engraving, as those arts were then understood. It is an entirely original and independent method of producing and multiplying pictures—an art, not of printing or engraving, but of securing the delineation of pictures by light operating on sensitive surfaces. In no just sense, therefore, can it be said to be within the act of 1831. Congress, proceeding upon this view, by the act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 540), extended the protection of the copyright act to this new art of photography. This, however, was not done till after the copyrights in question were taken out, and this suit was brought. These plaintiffs, therefore, have no remedy in the present case. The verdict must, therefore, be set aside.

Case No. 17,939.

WOOD v. ALLEGHENY COUNTY.

[3 Wall. Jr. 267; 1 20 Leg. Int. 228.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Nov. Session, 1859.

COUNTY BONDS PAYABLE TO BEARER—NEGOTIABILITY.

1. Where a county is authorized by statute to issue bonds, but is subjected to certain restrictions in limitation of its power, and disregarding the limitations, issues them absolutely payable to bearer, and they pass into the hands of a bona fide holder for value, who has bought them in the market in the course of trade, the county is liable on them. The court will in such case not look behind the face of the bond, nor inquire whether the bonds have been issued with all the forms prescribed or not.

2. Ex. gr. the county of Allegheny was authorized by the legislature of Pennsylvania to issue bonds in aid of certain railroads—but it was prescribed that the subscription should be advised by the grand jury of the county; and until the railroad was completed the railroad company should pay the interest on them. The jury advised the subscription, providing that no sales should be made below par. The bonds were issued to the company, who, having procured an act of assembly to that effect, sold them greatly below par. Having passed into the hands of bona fide holders, who bought them in the course of trade, and being on their face payable to bearer, the county was held liable on them for the interest, the railroad having failed to pay it.

This was a suit brought to recover the interest due on several bonds of the county of Allegheny, which had been issued in aid of certain railway companies, and under authority or pretence of authority of statutes of Pennsylvania, giving the county power to take stock in them. The railways ran to other counties, and even into other states. The statutes, however, authorized the subscription, only after a previous recommendation had been made by the grand jury of the county in favor of it; and contained a provision that the railway companies, and not the county, should pay the interest on the bonds until the roads were completed. The grand jury had recommended the subscription, coupling their recommendation, however, with a proviso, as a condition of their recommendation, that the bond should not be sold below par. As soon as the recommendation had been obtained from the jury, the parties projecting the railways, or jobbers and brokers whom they employed, procured, by very irregular ways, an act of assembly authorizing a sale irrespective of price; and the bonds were bartered away by the same class of people, at enormous, not to say at fraudulent rates of discount; the county officers, who had supposed that the railway companies would always be able to pay both interest and principal and that the county was but lending its credit, having been grossly negligent of the interests entrusted to them, while the railway agents themselves were men of no higher character than such as belongs to low politicians and swindlers. The acts of assembly requiring the railway companies to pay the interest till the roads were completed, were printed in full on the backs of the bonds. The bonds were all payable to bearer, and the coupons in the now common form of such things. The railway companies having neither completed their roads nor paid their interest, the county was now sued by bona fide holders of the coupons of bonds for value.

For the county it was argued—

I. The county, as a corporation, has no power to make any subscription of this kind; and the legislature cannot confer power on a body merely municipal, to exercise rights which belong only to its own competence.

II. But if this were not so, and if the county had power, the sale at anything less than par was illegal and void. The grand jury, which was a party to the contract of subscription, had stipulated that the bonds should be sold only at par. They meant that the money to be received by the railway companies should go pari passu with the increasing indebtedness of the county; and to prevent that exact thing which has occurred, st., a claim on the county for millions, while the money received by the railways has been less than thousands. The railway managers—receiving, doubtless, a large commission for the operation—“engineer” the matter through the grand jury room. They inveigle that body into a subscription, on the assurance that the bonds shall not be sold below par. Nor is this all: the grand jury themselves declare it to be a condition of their recommendation, that the bonds, if not thus sold, shall not issue at all. The managers of the railways then procure an act of assembly annulling the condition. The county, engaging in an enterprise of risk, had a right to say on what terms it would engage; and it did say. It said: “If you can get as much money as is represented on the face of our bonds, we believe that you can build your road, and that it will be profitable; but unless you put dollar for dollar into your road against the debt which we are incurring for it, we will not take your stock at all.” This was a vital point every way; vital in point of law, and vital as respected the chance of the county’s getting dividends from the stock subscribed for. For unless the managers could get money enough to complete the road, the enterprise was certain to leave the county a debtor, while it was equally certain to bring nothing to pay the debt. The success or failure of the road depended on adherence to the condition. The grand jury contracts for such adherence. Can the legislature, of its own power, annul the contract?

III. The statute made it obligatory on the companies to pay the interest on the bonds till the road was completed. This act being printed on the back of the bonds, was notice to the person about to buy the bond, that the county assumed but a limited responsibility. Subscribing to railways is no regular or proper business of counties, even conceding it to be lawful under any circumstances. But for the statute authorizing it, the subscription would be confessedly void. That is now, an adjudged point in Pennsylvania. The statute which makes valid the subscription, validates it only quatenus et quodam modo. As soon as a person saw one of these bonds at all, he saw the qualified liability. It must be observed, that this was not an unusual sort of limitation of a well known and usual sort of contract. Municipal bonds payable to bearer, and in aid of railroads, had not theretofore been usual instruments in the United States. They were quite new. The thing, in its general nature, was special. Why may it not be considered so in its particular character as well? The whole subscription might or might not have been rendered nugatory by such a provision as was here notified to the person about to deal in the bonds; but there the provision was, and was plainly. There was nothing illegal in it, and being as legible as the contract, and on the same sheet, makes part and parcel with it.

¹ [Reported by John William Wallace, Esq.]

GRIER, Circuit Justice. If the right of a municipal corporation to subscribe, even when authorized by the legislature, to purposes so alien to its general purpose as the construction of works of improvement which, in their largest part, are in distant counties and in other states, were open to me for consideration as a new point, I cannot say that I should hold such subscription other than simply void. The strongest arguments at law have been made against such subscriptions, and they are worth recurring to as containing true and lawyer-like views of the extent and character of municipal powers. But the matter is not open in this court. The legislature of Pennsylvania has authorized counties to make such subscriptions, and the supreme court of the state has decided (though by a bare majority) that the act is constitutional. The views of that court upon the statutes of their own state bind this court.

In spite, then, of all the resistance by the county to paying these bonds, here are the bonds, upon which the county "promises to pay." The county said to the railroad companies, "We want to help you: we have not the money, but we will lend you our credit: our promise to pay." That promise is, or should be, sacred. Doubtless many improper things have been done. The whole business of making cities and counties subscribe to railways was unwise. This will be admitted now; though the counsels of the able and conservative men who took ground against it was not heeded when given. Mercantile and popular clamor demanded "subscription." Traders, politicians, and all kinds of interested jobbers urged and drove the matter, while commissioners, grand jurors and legislators have been led in the train. It is to be lamented that such things should be done; but they have been done. If the electors of our cities choose to hand over the great concerns of our public offices to ignorant and unprincipled administrators, they must suffer for it. They must themselves bear the burdens which they put it in the power of knaves to pile upon them. Whatsoever a man soweth, that he shall reap; and when he sows the wind, he is apt to reap the whirlwind.

The objections urged against the plaintiff's claim would have force, if the question were between the county and the railway companies. But it is not. It is between an innocent holder for value of a bond payable to bearer, and the party who sent it out into the market (or handed it over to others to do so) where it has been sold in the course of trade. It is useless to bring forward here, as against the business operations of this day, abstract dogmas out of Blackstone and the Institutes of Coke. Such instruments as these are were never dreamed of in their day. The laws of trade suggest and govern these matters. As I said in the beginning: "Here is the bond. Here is the fact." Your promise to pay is put upon the market. You gave it this negotiable and coupon form for the purpose of facilitating sale, and preventing all questions of equity about it. And now, when the promise has been put on the market, and sold to an innocent holder, you set up these equities. That won't do. Why did you issue your bonds, if you meant that the holder should look to the railways? Why did you not leave the railways to issue their own? For this reason only, that you knew that capitalists would trust you and would not trust them. I esteem the bold, and hardy, and industrious people of this county. I feel for them, with this load of debt put upon them by the careless and unworthy persons whom they have elected into office. But they have allowed the bonds to be issued and sold, and they must pay them.

Judgment for plaintiff.

NOTE. The county commissioners of Allegheny having still refused to pay the bonds, and refused obedience to a mandamus of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, to levy a tax for the said purpose, were all put into gaol, where they remained for many months. An arrangement was finally effected between the creditors and the county, by which the principal of the bonds was acknowledged, and a reduced rate of interest accepted.

WOOD (ARGUELLES v.). See Case No. 520.
WOOD (BOUCICAULT v.). See Case No. 1,693.

Case No. 17,940.

WOOD v. CARR.

[3 Story, 366; ¹ 6 Law Rep. 156.]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1842.

SET-OFF OF EXECUTIONS—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

All actions and matters of difference between the parties having been referred to referees, they made separate reports, upon which executions issued and were placed in the hands of the sheriff. Before the executions were issued, one of the parties assigned the amount he might recover to third persons, who had full notice of all the facts. Held, that the assignee was not protected by the proviso of the statute of Maine, of the 13th March, 1821, c. 6, § 4, the claim not having been "assigned to him bona fide and without fraud;" and that the original parties having mutual executions against each other, the sheriff had a right to set off one against another, notwithstanding the notice given to him of the assignment.

The defendant, being sheriff of the county of Penobscot, had placed in his hands for collection, an execution issued on a judgment recovered by the Bangor House Proprietary against the plaintiff. He had also placed in his hands for collection an execution issued on a judgment recovered by the plaintiff against the Bangor House Proprietary. Thereupon, at the request of said plaintiff, the defendant satisfied the plaintiff's execution, by setting the amount thereof, due and unpaid off, upon the execution in favor of the Bangor House Proprietary, indorsing the said amount on the said execution in part payment and satisfaction thereof. This action was brought against the defendant for an alleged misfeasance in making the said set-off. It appeared in evidence, that the plaintiff and the said proprietary having got into difficulty and dispute, several actions were brought by the proprietary against the plaintiff; all of which were referred, with all matters of difference between the parties, to three persons. The referees made separate reports in and by way of final disposition of each of the said actions, and the judgments, on which the said several executions issued, were judgments in pursuance of and upon acceptance of the said referee's report. After the said referees had so agreed to report, the plaintiff assigned the amount he might recover in the action, in which judgment was entered up in his favor, and execution issued, as herein before stated, to third persons, for the consideration and purposes therein expressed. And this action was brought by such third persons, in the name of the plaintiff, for the benefit of such third persons, who well knew the whole transaction and facts here stated. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff, by consent, subject to the opinion of the court. If the sheriff had a right to make the set-off, he having been notified of the assignment, the verdict was to be set aside. If he had by law no right so to do, but was bound to collect the amount, and pay the same over to the assignee of Wood, said Wood being insolvent at the time of said assignment, then judgment was to be entered on the verdict. The statute of Maine, of the 13th of March, 1821, c. 6, § 4, provides that whenever any sheriff shall at the same time have several executions wherein the creditor in one execution is debtor in the other, he may cause one execution to answer and satisfy the other so far as the same will extend; with a proviso (among other things) that it shall not "affect the rights of any person, to whom, or for whose benefit, the same judgment, or execution, or the original cause of action thereof, may have been assigned bona fide, and without fraud."

C. S. Daveis, for plaintiff.

W. P. Preble, for defendant.

For the defendant was cited Hatch v. Greene, 12 Mass. 195; and for the plaintiff, Greene v. Darling [Case No. 5,765], and Howe v. Sheppard [Id. 6,773].

STORY, Circuit Justice, after stating the facts, and reviewing the decisions, said: I have no doubt whatsoever, that the assignment having been made with a full knowledge of all the facts, the assignee must take the same, subject to all the known equities between the original parties. To give it any other and further effect would, in my judgment, contravene the policy of the statute of Maine, and make it an instrument of injustice, as well as of fraud. In no sense can an assignee be said to be a bona fide holder of an assignment without fraud, who, by procuring that assignment, seeks to defeat the just rights of the other party. Notice is universally deemed, if not at law, at least in equity, to place the party in a situation of a trustee, as to all the rights, which he acquires, affected by that notice. He, who has notice of equities, which he seeks to defeat, is, in the eyes of a court of equity, deemed guilty of a constructive fraud; and he is not a bona fide holder, although he may have paid a valuable consideration therefor. In the sense, then, of the statute of Maine the assignee is not within the saving of the proviso: for the claim has not been "assigned to him bona fide and without fraud."

It appears to me, therefore, that the verdict for the plaintiff ought to be set aside. I wish to add, that there is nothing in the case of Greene v. Darling [Case No. 5,765], or that of Howe v. Sheppard [Id. 6,773], that, in the slightest degree, infringes the doctrine stated in the present opinion.

Verdict set aside.

¹ [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

Case No. 17,941.

WOOD et al. v. CLEVELAND ROLLING-MILL CO.

SAME v. UNION IRON-WORKS CO.

[4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 550.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. May, 1871.

PATENT FOR INVENTION—TIME OF APPLICATION—SUIT FOR INFRINGEMENT—IMPROVEMENTS IN MAKING NUTS.

1. The acts of congress in force in 1851 did not prescribe the time within which a patent should be applied for, after the invention was perfected.

2. Where it had not been abandoned to the public, and had not been in public use or on sale with the consent and allowance of the inventor, no lapse of time, however protracted, barred an application for a patent, nor after it had been granted, affected its validity.

3. Prior to the act of July 8, 1870 [16 Stat. 198], there was no act of congress limiting the time within which a suit must be prosecuted, either at law or in equity, for the infringement of a patent.

[Cited in May v. County of Logan, 30 Fed. 257.]

4. It is not a subject of inquiry, upon the trial of a suit for infringement, whether a prior machine could have been so modified as to do the work of the patented machine.

5. Where the existence of a prior machine is attempted to be proved, and the maker of it is at hand, but is not examined, it is a circumstance to be considered in weighing the value of the other testimony as to the existence and character of the machine.

6. A claim for "making nuts for bolts, by subjecting the blank of which the nut is to be formed, at a welding heat, to compression between swages, or dies, in a close die box, or matrix, and punching the eye of the nut during the continuance of such pressure, for the purpose of welding up any imperfections in the iron and giving a symmetrical shape and smooth finish to the nut, and of preventing any injury to the nut which it might suffer by the passage of the punch through it, if it were not thus sustained by the sides of the die box and forcibly compressed between the dies," describes a patentable subject matter.

7. In such a patent, the state of the iron is as much a part of the claim as the means and appliances by which the process is conducted and the result accomplished.

8. In the fossils of geology, belonging to certain classes of animals, regular gradations from a low form of organism to a much higher one, are found to exist. The contrast between the highest and the lowest is very striking. The same thing takes place in the progress of inventions. Models and machines in the same series, upon inspection, not unfrequently exhibit curious points of analogy to such fossils. Sometimes one will be found to reach almost the highest point afterward attained, but to fall short of it. The difference is that between success and failure.

[Cited in Westinghouse v. Gardner, etc., Air Brake Co., Case No. 17,450.]

9. When a great success is achieved in the field of mechanical invention, and the higher organism is protected by a patent, it is almost as certain that invasions will follow, as that there exists the relation of cause and effect. Such is the voice of universal experience.

¹ [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

10. When the infringer is called to account, it is usually asserted that the invention in one of the lower grades is substantially the same with that of the patentee. The confidence of the attacking witnesses is often in proportion to the distance in time that one is removed from the other.

[Cited in Hawes v. Antisdell, Case No. 6,234.]

11. When the defense of want of novelty is made out, it is the duty of courts and juries to give it effect. But such testimony should be weighed with care, and the defense allowed to prevail only where the evidence is such as to leave no room for a reasonable doubt upon the subject.

[Cited in Hawes v. Antisdell, Case No. 6,234; Miller v. Smith, 5 Fed. 364; The Driven-Well Cases, 16 Fed. 411; American Bell Tel. Co. v. People's Tel. Co., 22 Fed. 313; Thayer v. Hart, 20 Fed. 694; McDonald v. Whitney, 24 Fed. 602; Kittle v. Hall, 29 Fed. 514; American Bell Tel. Co. v. American Cushman Tel. Co., 35 Fed. 739; Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Julien Electric Co., 38 Fed. 127.]

12. Reissued letters patent for "improvement in the manufacture of nuts," granted February 15, 1859, to James Wood, assignee of William Kenyon, examined and sustained.

13. The machines described in patents granted to William Chisholm, November 17, 1863, and to James Paton, November 29, 1864, are infringements of the Kenyon patent as reissued.

These were bills in equity, filed [by Charles A. Wood and others, executors of James Wood, deceased] to restrain the defendants from infringing letters patent [No. 8,427] for "improvement in the manufacture of nuts," granted to Joseph P. Haigh, Andrew Hartupee, and John Morrow, assignees of William Kenyon, October 14, 1851, reissued to them March 18, 1856, assigned and reissued to James Wood, February 15, 1859 [No. 666], and extended for seven years from October 14, 1865; also, letters patent [No. 13,118] for "improvement in making nuts," granted to Henry Carter, assignee of Isaac H. Steer, June 19, 1855; and also letters patent [No. 8,322] for "improved nut and washer machine," granted to Henry Carter and James Rees, August 26, 1851, reissued June 19, 1855 [No. 313], and assigned to complainants. These inventions related to the manufacture of hot-pressed nuts. The mechanism covered by the Kenyon patent subjected the nut blank, while at a welding heat to compression in a close fitting die box, and then punched it while under pressure, while that set forth in the Carter and Rees patent, punched the nut, and then compressed it upon the punch.

The claims of the several patents and reissues were as follows:

Original patent to Haigh, Hartupee & Morrow, assignees of William Kenyon: "The compressing and discharging the nut and washer by means of the follower or hollow piston, the bracket, cross-head, and the moving die box, constructed and operating substantially as described."

Reissue of March 18, 1856: "(1) The use of the die T, and die box M, for severing the blank; the close die box in combination with the dies and bracket X, for pressing; and the punch L, for perforating the same during the pressure, the whole operating conjointly as herein described, for making nuts or washers at one operation. (2) The manner substantially hereinbefore described of so arranging the dies, in relation to the punch, that any excess of iron in the blank shall be forced into the path of the punch, thus securing the compression of the nut without risking the breaking of the machine."

Reissue of February 15, 1859: "(1) Making nuts for bolts, by subjecting the blank of which the nut is to be formed, at a welding heat, to compression between swages or dies in a close die box or matrix, and punching the eye of the nut during the continuance of such pressure, for the purpose of welding up any imperfections in the iron, and giving a symmetrical shape and smooth finish to the nut, and of preventing any injury to the nut which it might suffer by the passage of the punch through it, if it were not thus sustained by the sides of the die box and forcibly compressed between the dies. (2) The use of a die box, closed at the sides, for surrounding the nut, and sustaining its sides while it is subjected to pressure, substantially in the manner hereinbefore described. (3) The combination of the compressing dies P and T, with the die box M, for the purpose of compressing the nut while it is sustained at the sides, and thus welding up any imperfections in the iron, and compacting its fibre, so as to give strength as well as exterior finish and symmetry to the nut. (4) The combination of the punch L, with the die box M, and compressing dies P and T, for the purpose of compressing, confining, and restraining the opposite faces of the nut during the passage of the punch through it, and thus preventing any injury to the nut during the process of punching; and also for the purpose of insuring the making of the bore of the nut in the proper relative position to its upper and lower surfaces. (5) The combination of the die box M, the compressing dies T and P, and punch L, constructed and arranged substantially as hereinbefore described, for the purpose of making hot pressed nuts, at a single operation, by severing a blank from a bar of heated metal, compressing it into shape, and punching a hole or eye through it, while under compression, and delivering the finished nut from the machine. (6) Arranging the compressing dies in relation to the punch, and regulating their relative motion in such manner, substantially as hereinbefore described, that any excess of iron in the blank shall be forced into the path of the punch in the compressing dies, thus securing the compression of the nut without risk of damage to the machine."

Original patent to Henry Carter, assignee of Isaac H. Steer: "(1) Making a nut at a single operation, from a heated bar or plate of metal, by cutting off the blank from the bar, punching a hole or eye through it, and swaging it into shape, substantially as herein set forth. (2) Punching the eye of the nut in a die or press box, by which it is surrounded and firmly supported, and thus prevented from straining or bursting during the operation, substantially as set forth. (3) Shaping nuts by subjecting them, while hot, to powerful and sudden compression on the punch and in the punching die, substantially as herein set forth, whereby they are finished with such a degree of smoothness, regularity, and precision that in the condition in which they come from the machine they are fit to use in the construction of most kinds of machinery, and are, at the same time, sounder and stronger than unpressed nuts made by machinery."

Original patent to Henry Carter and James Rees: "The two punches moved at the same time with different velocities, and in the same direction, in combination with a die box, within which the nut is formed, substantially as herein set forth."

Reissue of June 19, 1855: "We are aware that Isaac H. Steer, about the year 1840, proposed to make nuts by the process we have here described, but never completed a machine which would do this automatically, therefore we do not claim this process in itself, and irrespective of machinery; but being the first to construct a machine capable of making nuts by this process, without any other or further manipulation than is required for feeding in the bar of iron, we claim as our invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, the machine substantially as herein described, for making nuts by cutting the blank from a heated bar of iron, punching its eye in a closed die box, pressing it into shape while in the die box and on the punch, and then discharging it, as specified."

The defendants were using machines constructed under letters patent, the machine used by the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company being made in substantial accordance with the machine described in letters patent for "improvement in machines for making nuts," granted to William Chisholm, November 17, 1863, and that used by the Union Iron Works Company being made in substantial accordance with the machine described in letters patent for "improvement in machine for making nuts," granted to James Paton, November 29, 1864.

In the Chisholm machine, the nut blank was cut off and forced into a matrix and against a female die, which retreated, allowing the punch to enter the iron. The movement of the male die being somewhat more rapid than that of the female die, compressed the nut.

In the Paton machine, the matrix was composed of four pieces, three of which were movable while the other was attached to the stationary die. The forward movement of the matrix cut off the blank, and by the aid of the stationary side completely inclosed it in a close die box, in which it was compressed and punched.

Geo. Willey, S. S. Fisher, W. Bakewell, and G. Harding, for complainants.

W. H. Burrige, A. F. Slade, S. F. Andrews, and R. P. Ranney, for defendants.

SWAYNE, Circuit Justice. These cases present substantially the same questions. They have been argued together, by the same counsel, and with great ability on both sides. I have considered them with care. Some of the points which they present are not without difficulty.

But finding myself ready to decide both the cases, I shall proceed to announce my conclusions. The time at my disposal will allow me to do but little more. The announcement, however, will be so shaped as to show, as clearly as remarks more extended would, the grounds of the judgments which will be given. The analysis of the testimony, the examination of the authorities, and the processes of reasoning, which have produced the results, must, to a great extent, necessarily be omitted.

The suits are for the infringement of three patents: The Kenyon patent, granted originally to Haigh, Hartupee & Morrow, assignees of Kenyon, October 14, 1851, No. 8,427, reissued to the same parties March 13, 1856, reissue No. 361, and reissued to James Wood, assignee, February 15, 1859, reissue No. 666; the Steer patent, granted to Henry Carter, assignee of Isaac H. Steer, June 19, 1855, No. 13,118, and the Carter and Rees patent, granted to Henry Carter and James Rees, August 26, 1851, No. 8,322, reissued June 19, 1855, reissue No. 313.

All these patents were extended by the commissioner for the period of seven years from the expiration of their respective original terms. No question is made as to the title of the complainants.

In the view which I take of the cases it will be necessary to consider only the Kenyon patent. The claims in the specification of that patent, as reissued to Wood, are substantially as follows: (1) For making nuts, by subjecting them, at a welding heat, to compression between swages in a die-box, and punching the eye during the pressure to remedy any imperfections in the iron, and prevent the injury which might arise from the punching process, if the sides were not thus sustained and compressed at the time of its performance. (2) The use of the die-box as before stated. (3) The combination of the compressing dies with the die-box, as before stated. (4) The combination of the die-box, compressing dies and punch, as stated in the specification. (5) The combination of the punch and dies with the die-box, as before stated. (6) Arranging the compressing dies in relation to the punch, and regulating their relative motion, as described, so that any excess of iron in the blank shall be forced into the path of the punch within the compressing dies, thus securing the compression without any injury to the machine.

The main feature of the invention covered by this patent, as claimed by the complainants, is, compressing iron at welding heat, in a box, between sliding dies, and forcing a round punch through the mass while thus heated and compressed, causing a hole to be formed with smooth and compact walls or sides, and finally the removal of the nut without injury.

The invention of Kenyon dates back to the year 1835. His own testimony is clear and explicit to that effect, and it is so corroborated by the other evidence in the case as to leave no room for doubt upon the subject.

Nothing is shown which tends in any degree to establish the abandonment of his rights. It is clear that he intended from the time of the making of his first model, which was in 1835, to take out a patent. His poverty, and not his will, caused the delay. The acts of congress in force when his patents were issued did not prescribe the time within which a patent should be applied for, after the invention was perfected. Where it had not been abandoned to the public, and had not been in public use or on sale with the consent and allowance of the inventor, no lapse of time, however protracted, barred an application for a patent, nor, after it had been granted, affected its validity. Act of July 4, 1836, §§ 6, 15 [5 Stat. 119, 123]; act of March 3, 1839, § 7 [Id. 353]; Allen v. Blunt [Case No. 217]; Kendall v. Winsor, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 327; McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 208. Here there was only delay. It was unmingled with any other adverse consideration.

The Cleveland Rolling Mill Company admits, in its answer, that the machines, which it uses in making nuts, are constructed in substantial accordance with the patent to William Chisholm, dated November 17, 1863. The Union Iron Works Company makes the like admission with reference to the patent of James Paton, dated November 29, 1864. The specifications of these patents, the models exhibited in evidence, and the expert testimony—I refer particularly to that of Winter on one side and of Clough on the other—satisfy me that a case of infringement is made out.

The use of machines constructed under both patents, involves the compression of the hot metal, and the application and action of the mandrel, substantially as in the Kenyon machine. This proposition I did not understand to be seriously contested at the argument.

Such is the complainants' case, and it must prevail unless one or more of the grounds of defense relied upon by the defendants shall avail to defeat it. The objections alleged to lie in the way of the complainants will now be considered.

When these suits were commenced there was no act of congress limiting the time within which a suit must be prosecuted either at law or in equity for the infringement of a patent. The act of 1870 does not affect them. There is no proof tending to show the abandonment of the rights secured by the Kenyon patent since it was issued. The complainants have not lost their remedy by laches in the institution of these suits. The Carter and Rees patent and the Steer patent having been laid out of view, the attacks upon them need not be considered.

The patents to Berry, Jackson, Holmes, Arnold, and to Conger and Woodbury, and Rome's French patent, and Poole's French patent, are not for machines to make nuts, and it is not shown that any machine made under either of them was ever used or attempted to be used for that purpose. Certainly neither of them is for a machine identical in any essential particular with the Kenyon invention, nor is it alleged that any of his claims are for the mechanical equivalent of any thing which either of these patents described and appropriated. They are all interesting as showing the state of the kindred mechanic arts to which they relate, but beyond this they have no bearing upon the cases under consideration.

The Colebrook machine was used only to make washers, and they were made of cold iron. It was not applied to hot iron. The spring, which was an element in it, was incapable of sustaining the intense compression effected by the Kenyon machine. The object and dominant ideas of the two machines were different. Whether the Colebrook machine could have been so modified as to do the work of the Kenyon machine, is not in these cases a subject of inquiry.

The nut machines relied upon by the defendants are four in number:

(1) The machine of Dr. Andrews. He furnished Charles Waters the means to make a nut machine, which was in existence when his deposition in these cases was taken. He thinks it was in the year 1848, but is not certain as to the time. He used other devices also for making nuts, and sold the nuts in the market. He says he used a machine for punching, about—as he believes—the year 1832, or 1833. In his examination-in-chief, he declined to describe it. In his cross-examination he seems to have been more explicit. He took out a patent. This, he thinks, was in 1853. The patent is not in evidence, and he does not state what it was for. This testimony is too vague to affect the Kenyon patent. Aside from the question of date, it describes nothing identical with either of the essential elements, which go to make up Kenyon's invention.

(2) The Ratcliff machine. Ratcliff himself was at hand when the testimony upon the subject was taken. He was not called; why not? This is unexplained. His machine was abandoned, and went out of use. It was antedated by Kenyon's invention.

(3) The machine described in Lamb's application for a patent. The application was rejected, withdrawn, and not renewed. After a careful examination of the description which he gives, I am not satisfied that his alleged invention involved the main feature of Kenyon's—which is intense and unyielding compression of hot metal during the action of the mandrel. Kenyon's invention was also prior in date.

(4) Enoch Scott's machine. A patent was issued to Scott, December 26, 1833. The record and model were burned when the patent office was destroyed by fire. The patent has not been restored to the office. Scott's invention was for making nuts as well as other things, and was unquestionably older than Kenyon's invention. It is also clear that he made nuts out of hot as well as cold iron. His machine was made at Rochester, removed to Waterford, thence to Ramapo, and finally to Haverstraw, in New York. A large number of witnesses were examined in relation to it by the parties. The testimony upon several material points is in conflict, and can not be reconciled. It would serve no useful purpose to analyze and discuss it. A few remarks, embodying the results of my reflections, will suffice.

I entertain no doubt of the validity of the Kenyon patent here under consideration, as regards the invention described in the specification. To my mind the case of Leroy v. Tatham, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 134, is conclusive upon that subject.

The turning point of these cases is the alleged want of novelty in respect to the Kenyon patent, and the fate of that defense depends upon the testimony as to the Scott machine.

The subject is not free from difficulty. At the close of the argument my mind was in a state of suspense. It is not now entirely free from doubt. But after a careful consideration of the evidence and of the arguments of counsel, I am not satisfied that the idea of making nuts out of iron in the "waxy" condition of welding heat, and subjected to such pressure on every side when the mandrel passes through the blank, was ever present to the mind of Scott, or that his machine was designed or competent to perform the work of Kenyon's machine upon iron in that condition.

These, as before remarked, are the essential features of Kenyon's invention. The state of the iron is as much a part of it as the means and appliances by which the process is conducted and the result accomplished. It is not shown by any testimony in the case, that these ideas were not original with Kenyon, nor that, until after he made his first model, they ever existed in the mind of any other person.

In the fossils of geology, belonging to certain classes of animals, regular gradations from a low form of organism to a much higher one are found to exist. The contrast between the highest and the lowest is very striking. The same thing takes place in the progress of inventions. Models and machines in the same series, upon inspection, not unfrequently exhibit curious points of analogy to such fossils. Sometimes one will be found to reach almost the highest point afterward attained, but to fall short of it.

The difference is that between success and failure. When a great success is achieved in the field of mechanical invention, and the higher organism is protected by a patent, it is almost as certain that invasions will follow, as that there exists the relation of cause and effect. Such is the voice of universal experience.

When the infringer is called to account, one of two defenses is usually set up, and frequently both. First, that the invention in one of the lower grades is substantially the same with that of the patentee. The confidence of the attacking witnesses is often in proportion to the distance in time that one is removed from the other.

Their imagination is wrought upon by the influences to which their minds are subjected, and beguiles their memory. When the defense is made, it is the duty of courts and juries to give it effect. But such testimony should be weighed with care, and the defense allowed to prevail only where the evidence is such as to leave no room for a reasonable doubt upon the subject.

The other defense is, that the machine of the infringer is so different in principle, and so wide a departure from that of the patentee, as to constitute an original and independent invention. Questions of the latter kind are not difficult to deal with, and a serious error in their solution can hardly occur. Here both these defenses are interposed. The witnesses as to the Scott machine spoke of what occurred more than thirty years before. The discrepancies in their testimony, and its conflict with that of the complainants, are therefore not surprising.

The Kenyon invention is a valuable one. It had borne successfully the test of more than one litigation when these suits were instituted. The decision of Judge Morsell was not made in the case of the application, upon which reissue No. 666 was founded. In that case there was no contest and no appeal.

None of the defenses relied upon, according to my views of these cases, can avail the defendants.

These remarks have been submitted to my learned brother, the district judge, who sat with me at the argument. I am authorized to say, he concurs in them. In preparing them I have had the benefit of his views and suggestions. A decree will be entered for the complainants in both cases.

[See Case No. 2,475.]

WOOD (COSTIGAN v.). See Case No. 3,265.

WOOD (DAVIS v.). See Case No. 3,659.

Case No. 17,942.

WOOD v. DENNY.

[1 Biss. 73.]¹

District Court, D. Wisconsin. Aug. Term, 1855.

RULES OF DESCENT—LAWS OF WISCONSIN.

A testator bequeathed a certain sum of money to a person in trust, to invest in lands in Wisconsin, in the names of six grandchildren, to be conveyed to and vested in them in fee simple, directing that in case of the death of any of said grandchildren, the share of the child so dying shall go to and vest in his or her surviving brothers or sister. After the lands were purchased, and deeds made conveying them in fee simple to the grandchildren as tenants in common, one of the grandchildren died intestate, unmarried, and without issue. The undivided interest of deceased in the lands passed, by the laws of Wisconsin, to the grandchild's father, and was subject to levy and sale for the father's debts.

The will of Dr. Gideon Jaquex, of the state of Delaware, contains the following provisions: "I give and bequeath unto my friend, John S. Newlin, of the city of Philadelphia, the sum of three thousand dollars, upon this special trust—that is to say, to invest the said sum of three thousand dollars in the names of my grandchildren, Edward Denny, Gideon J. Denny, Henry Denny, Martha Anne Denny, Alfred Denny, and Oswald Denny, in the purchase of lands in the territory of Wisconsin, and to be conveyed to and vested in my said grandchildren in fee simple. And it is my mind and will, and I do hereby declare and direct, that in case of the death of any, or either, of my said grandchildren, the share of the child so dying shall go to and vest in his or her surviving brothers or sister." The lands were selected and conveyed in fee simple to the said grandchildren as tenants in common. Subsequent to such conveyances, Oswald Denny, one of the said grandchildren, died intestate, and in his minority. Charles G. Denny, the defendant, against whom this judgment was rendered, is the father of said grandchildren. The question presented on this motion to set aside the marshal's sale is, whether the undivided share of Oswald Denny, deceased, in the lands so selected and conveyed, is subject to sale under execution issued on this judgment.

Jason Downer, for plaintiff. The provision relates to the death of the testator, or, at most, to the execution of the will. 2

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Jarm. Wills, 621. The trust was completed and executed by the purchase of the lands. Jarm. Wills, 660, 661; Moore v. Lyons, 25 Wend. 119; Earl v. Grim, 1 Johns. Ch. 494; Murray v. De Rottenham, 6 Johns. Ch. 54.

D. A. J. Upham, for defendant, cited the following authorities: 4 Kent, Comm. 533; 2 Jarm. Wills, 449, 452, 456; Deffis v. Goldschmidt, 19 Ves. 566, 572; Hulburt v. Emerson, 16 Mass. 240; Stones v. Heurtly, 1 Ves. Sr. 165; Morton v. Morton, 8 Barb. 18; Daniell v. Daniell, 6 Ves. 297; Cutter v. Doughty, 23 Wend. 513; Newton v. Ayscough, 19 Ves. 534.

MILLER, District Judge. This is an absolute and unrestricted bequest of three thousand dollars to John S. Newlin, in special trust, to be invested by him in lands in Wisconsin, in fee simple, in the names of the testator's grandchildren. Upon the decease of the testator the grandchildren become vested as cestuis que trust, and clothed with power to compel in equity the execution of the trust. It is of little moment whether the provision of survivorship relates to the event of the decease of a grandchild or grandchildren in the testator's life time, or before the execution of the trust, as Oswald Denny died after the trust was fully executed. But it may be well to remark, that the law seems to be settled, that where the bequest is absolute and unrestricted, provisions such as this one, unlimited as to time, are construed to make them provide against the event of the legatee dying in the lifetime of the testator. Courts have seized with avidity upon slight expressions or circumstances, so to construe such provisions, to prevent a lapse, and also to avoid a restraint of alienation.

The word "share" must refer to the money, the subject of the bequest. And the words "go to and vest in," are more appropriate for passing the money, than real estate, particularly as the will appears to be drawn with legal precision. The bequest is to be construed as if the testator had directed that the trustee shall make the investment in lands in Wisconsin, in the names of such grandchildren as may survive him, or as may be living at the time of the investment, immaterial which in this case.

The money was directed to be invested in lands in the names of the grandchildren in fee simple. But if the provision of survivorship were construed to relate to the lands, the grandchildren would not become vested of an estate in fee. The technical words of the will should be construed according to their legal meaning. It would not do for the court to attempt by construction to mould the fee, so as to give effect to a conjectural intention. The testator did not direct that the fee should be defeasible throughout the entire life of the grandchildren.

The lands were conveyed to the grandchildren as tenants in common in fee simple; but there was no obligation resting on the trustee to accept joint conveyances. Six tracts or pieces of land might have been selected and purchased for the consideration of five hundred dollars each, and a conveyance might have been made of a tract in severalty to each grandchild. If the will had directed that the conveyances to the grandchildren should be as tenants in common of the lands, possibly there might be some plausibility in the argument that the word "share" should apply to the lands as well as to the money. If the lands had been conveyed to the grandchildren in severalty, there would not be anything to which the word "share" could be applied. The lands are not per se the subject of a limited or conditional bequest, but they are an absolute and unconditional investment in fee simple of a bequest. The grandchildren became seized in fee of the lands by virtue of the deeds of conveyance to them in their own names, not by devise under the will. When the conveyances were delivered to the grandchildren, including Oswald, the trust was fully executed, according to the directions of the will, and the office and duties of the trustee ceased. In executed trusts, whether by deed or will, the rule of law must prevail. The deeds conveying the lands to the grandchildren as tenants in common in fee simple, were in conformity to the directions of the will, and also according to the laws of this state. By section 44, c. 56, p. 317, Rev. St., all grants and devises of lands made to two or more persons, except as provided in the following sections, shall be construed to create estates in common, and not in joint tenancy, unless expressly declared to be in joint tenancy.

Oswald Denny having died intestate, seized of an estate in fee simple, without living issue or a widow, by the law of Wisconsin, his share in the lands descended to his father; and being thus vested in Charles G. Denny, the defendant, they became subject to sale under execution on this judgment.

=====
Case No. 17,943.

WOOD v. DIXON.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 401.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1807.

STRIKING-OUT APPEARANCE.

The court will not order the defendant's appearance to be struck out, so as to charge the marshal.

The plaintiff had ordered the writ in proper person, and his appearance was so entered on the docket. On calling over the appearance docket,—

Mr. Law, for defendant, had entered an appearance for the defendant, without bail, although a note had been filed as to the cause of action.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

F. S. Key now moved to appear for the plaintiff, and to have defendant's appearance struck out, and defendant ruled to bail, or the marshal amerced.

But THE COURT refused, because the marshal, by the appearance, was discharged from the duty of keeping the defendant in custody, and it is to be presumed has discharged him, and cannot retake him.

Case No. 17,944.

WOOD et al. v. DUMMER et al.

[3 Mason, 308.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1824.

CORPORATIONS—CAPITAL STOCK—TRUST FUND FOR CREDITORS—BILL IN EQUITY—PARTIES—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURT.

1. An incorporated bank divided three-fourths of its capital stock, before the expiration of its charter, among the stockholders, without providing funds which ultimately were sufficient to pay its outstanding bank notes. It was held that the capital stock was a trust fund for the payment of the bank notes, and might be followed into the hands of the stockholders.

[Cited in Curran v. State of Arkansas, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 308; Cleveland v. La Crosse & M. R. Co., Case No. 2,887; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Howard, 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 410; Winans v. McKean, R. & Nav. Co., Case No. 17,862; Putnam v. New Albany, Id. 11,481; Haskins v. Harding, Id. 6,196; Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 621; Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 61; Scammon v. Kimball, 92 U. S. 369; Bowden v. Santos, Case No. 1,716; Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 687; Union Nat. Bank v. Douglass, Case No. 14,375; Foreman v. Bigelow, Id. 4,934; Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 213; Wilbur v. Stockholders, Case No. 17,636; Mutual Building Fund & Dollar Sav. Bank v. Bosseux, 3 Fed. 837; Holmes v. Sherwood, 16 Fed. 728; Scoville v. Thayer, 11 Fed. 190. Distinguished in Walsler v. Seligman, 13 Fed. 416. Cited in Fogg v. Blair, 133 U. S. 541, 10 Sup. Ct. 341; Winters v. Armstrong, 37 Fed. 521; Gould v. Little Rock, M. R. & T. Ry. Co., 52 Fed. 684.]

[Cited in Baker v. Atlas Bank, 9 Metc. (Mass.) 192. Cited in brief in Ballin v. J. & F. B. Friend Lace Importing Co. (Wis.) 47 N. W. 517; Beach v. Miller, 130 Ill. 163, 22 N. E. 464; Bent v. Hart, 73 Mo. 643; Bouton v. Smith, 113 Ill. 485. Cited in Chaffee v. Rutland R. Co., 55 Vt. 126; Clapp v. Peterson, 104 Ill. 31; Clayton v. Ore Knob Copper Co., 109 N. C. 385, 14 S. E. 38; Commercial Fire Ins. Co. v. Board of Revenue of Montgomery Co., 99 Ala. 1, 14 South. 492; Conover v. Hull, 10 Wash. 673, 39 Pac. 168; Coulter v. Robertson, 24 Miss. 298; Crandall v. Lincoln, 52 Conn. 95. Cited in Elyton Land Co. v. Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Co., 92 Ala. 407, 9 South. 133; Fear v. Bartlett, 81 Md. 435, 32 Atl. 323; First Nat. Bank of Deadwood v. Gustin Minerva Consol. Min. Co., 42 Minn. 333, 44 N. W. 200; Fox's Appeal, 93 Pa. St. 417; Germantown P. Ry. Co. v. Fittler, 60 Pa. St. 131; Goodin v. Cincinnati & W. Canal Co., 18 Ohio St. 182. Cited in brief in Heman v. Britton, 88 Mo. 550. Cited in Higgins v. Lansingh, 154 Ill. 301, 40 N. E. 380; Hightower v. Thornton, 8

Ga. 486. Cited in brief in Hill v. Fogg, 41 Mo. 567. Cited in Hill v. Pioneer Lumber Co., 113 N. C. 173, 18 S. E. 108. Criticised in Hospes v. Northwestern Manuf'g & Car Co., 48 Minn. 192, 50 N. W. 1119. Cited in Hulings v. Hulings L. Co., 38 W. Va. 374, 18 S. E. 629; Jones v. Whitworth, 94 Tenn. 602, 30 S. W. 738. Distinguished in Lamb v. Laughlin, 25 W. Va. 310. Cited in Landis v. Sea Isle City Hotel Co. (N. J. Ch.) 31 Atl. 763, 764; Leathers v. Janney, 41 La. Ann. 1120, 6 South. 886; Lexington Life, Fire & Mar. Ins. Co. v. Page, 17 B. Mon. 413; Mann v. Pentz, 3 N. Y. 422; Mott v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 30 Pa. St. 9; National Trust Co. v. Miller, 33 N. J. Eq. 163; O'Bear Jewelry Co. v. Volfer (Ala.) 17 South. 527; Ohio L. & T. Co. v. Merchants' Ins. & Trust Co., 11 Humph. 32; Reid v. Batonton Manuf'g Co., 40 Ga. 98; Rouse v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 503, 22 N. E. 296; Shields v. Clifton Hill Land Co., 94 Tenn. 123, 28 S. W. 675, 676. Cited in brief in Stebbins v. Edmonds, 12 Gray, 204. Cited in Taylor v. Miami Ex. Co., 5 Ohio, 165. Cited in brief in Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Frear Stone Manuf'g Co., 97 Ill. 538; Whitwell v. Warner, 20 Vt. 439.]

2. A bill in equity for such purpose might be maintained by some of the holders of the bank notes against some of the stockholders, the impossibility of bringing all before the court being sufficient to dispense with the ordinary rule of making all parties in interest parties.

[Cited in Omaha Hotel Co. v. Wade, 97 U. S. 21; First National Bank of Hannibal v. Smith, 6 Fed. 216; Dormitzer v. Illinois & St. L. Bridge Co., 6 Fed. 220; Swan Land & Cattle Co. v. Frank, 39 Fed. 461; Chicago Trust & Sav. Bank v. Bentz, 59 Fed. 646.]

[Cited in Adler v. Milwaukee Pat. Brick Manuf'g Co., 13 Wis. 61; Brewer v. Michigan Salt Ass'n, 58 Mich. 356, 25 N. W. 377. Cited in brief in Livingston Co. Agricultural Soc. v. Hunter, 110 Ill. 157; Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Hill, 86 Mo. 468. Cited in Williams v. Boice, 38 N. J. Eq. 371.]

3. In such case the decree against the stockholders before the court, should be only for their contributory share of the debt, in the proportion which the stock held by them, bore to the whole capital stock.

[Cited in Curran v. State of Arkansas, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 308; Payne v. Hook, 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 432; Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. 795.]

[Cited in Brundage v. Monumental Gold & Silver Min. Co., 12 Or. 322, 7 Pac. 316; Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Canada & S. L. Ry. Co., 127 Ind. 271, 26 N. E. 790; Hightower v. Thornton, 8 Ga. 486. Cited in brief in Lane v. Nickerson, 99 Ill. 284. Cited in Wetherbee v. Baker, 35 N. J. Eq. 506; Williams v. Traphagen, 38 N. J. Eq. 58.]

4. The holder of bank notes, payable to bearer, is not an assignee of a chose in action, within the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20 [1 Stat. 78], limiting the jurisdiction of the circuit court.

[Cited in Cooper v. Thompson, Case No. 3,202.]

Bill in equity brought by the plaintiffs [Joshua B. Wood and others], as holders of the bank notes of the Hallovell and Augusta Bank, against the defendants [Jeremiah Dummer and others], as stockholders in the same bank, for payment of the same notes upon the ground of an asserted fraudulent division of the capital stock of the bank by the stockholders. The defendants put in answers, denying the fraud, but admitting the division of the capital stock, &c.;

¹ [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

and denying the plaintiffs' title to relief. The general replication was filed, and the cause was set down for a hearing upon the whole merits, at the last October term of the court, upon certain admissions of the parties.

Alden & Whitman, for plaintiffs.
Bond & Longfellow, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The Hallowell and Augusta Bank was incorporated in March, 1804, by the legislature of Massachusetts, with a capital stock of $200,000, divided into shares of $100 each, for a term which expired on the first Monday of October, 1812, with the usual rights and privileges belonging to the banks in the same state. In June, 1812, the legislature passed an act (Act of 1812, c. 57) continuing all the banks, whose charters would expire on the first Monday of October, 1812, as corporate bodies until the first Monday of October, 1816, "for the sole purpose of enabling said banks gradually to settle and close their concerns, and divide their capital stock." And by a further act, passed in December, 1816 (Act of 1816, c. 110), the term was prolonged for three years from the passing of this last act. In January, 1813, at a meeting of the stockholders of the Hallowell and Augusta Bank, a vote was passed, ordering a dividend to be made among the stockholders of the bank of fifty per cent. of the capital stock thereof; and in October in the same year, a vote was passed for a further dividend of twenty-five per cent. of the capital stock, making in the whole a dividend of seventy-five per cent. of the whole capital stock among the stockholders. The notes of the bank continued to circulate in good credit until after November, 1814; and the plaintiffs were, in October and November, 1814, owners in their several rights of notes of the same bank to a sum in the aggregate amounting to more than $29,000, which were presented for payment to the bank, and payment refused. The plaintiffs received certain notes of the directors as collateral security, but these were never paid. In fact one quarter part of the capital stock of the bank had never been paid in, but was secured by the notes of the stockholders, called "stock notes"; and about $90,000 of debts (beside stock notes) were due from certain directors of the bank, who became insolvent and utterly unable to pay the same. So that nearly three quarters of the stock was lost or unpaid, either from insolvency or some other cause, and left the bank involved, after the division of the stock, in deep insolvency. In June, 1812, another and new bank was incorporated, composed in part of the same persons, with the same corporate name. The new bank, for a considerable time, continued to give credit to, and circulate the notes of the old bank; and the bill asserted the new bank to have become possessed of the funds of the old bank to a very large amount.

Such are the principal facts; and the claim of the plaintiffs is to be reimbursed by the defendants, (who are owners of three hundred and twenty shares) out of the dividends of the capital stock received by them, the amount of the debts, so due to the plaintiffs respectively, for the bank notes above stated.

The case is full of difficulties. The bill is drawn in a very loose and inartificial manner. It proceeds principally upon the grounds of a gross over issue of bank notes, and other violations of the charter, and of a fraudulent dividend by the stockholders with a knowledge of their insolvency; grounds, which are denied by the answers, and are not in the slightest degree established in the proofs. It does not directly proceed upon the ground, that the defendants hold a trust fund applicable to the payment of the debts of the corporation; but leaves this to be picked up in fragments by a minute analysis of the bill. I pass, however, over these objections, for the purpose of considering that, which is the principal point argued in the cause, whether the capital stock in the hands of the stockholders is liable to the payment of the debts of the bank.

It appears to me very clear upon general principles, as well as the legislative intention, that the capital stock of banks is to be deemed a pledge or trust fund for the payment of the debts contracted by the bank. The public, as well as the legislature, have always supposed this to be a fund appropriated for such purpose. The individual stockholders are not liable for the debts of the bank in their private capacities. The charter relieves them from personal responsibility, and substitutes the capital stock in its stead. Credit is universally given to this fund by the public, as the only means of repayment. During the existence of the corporation it is the sole property of the corporation, and can be applied only according to its charter, that is, as a fund for payment of its debts, upon the security of which it may discount and circulate notes. Why, otherwise, is any capital stock required by our charters? If the stock may, the next day after it is paid in, be withdrawn by the stockholders without payment of the debts of the corporation, why is its amount so studiously provided for, and its payment by the stockholders so diligently required? To me this point appears so plain upon principles of law, as well as common sense, that I cannot be brought into any doubt, that the charters of our banks make the capital stock a trust fund for the payment of all the debts of the corporation. The bill-holders and other creditors have the first claims upon it; and the stockholders have no rights, until all the other creditors are satisfied. They have the full benefit of all the profits made by the establishment, and cannot take any portion of the fund, until all the other claims on it are extinguished. Their rights are not to the capital stock, but to the residuum after all demands on it are paid. On a dissolution of the corporation, the bill-holders and the stockholders have each equitable claims, but those of the bill-holders possess, as I conceive, a prior exclusive equity. The same doctrine has been recognized by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Yose v. Grant, 15 Mass. 505, 517, 522, and Spear v. Grant, 16 Mass. 9, 15.

If I am right in this position, the principal difficulty in the cause is overcome. If the capital stock is a trust fund, then it may be followed by the creditors into the hands of any persons, having notice of the trust attaching to it. As to the stockholders themselves, there can be no pretence to say, that, both in law and fact, they are not affected with the most ample notice.

The doctrine of following trust funds into the hands of any persons, who are not innocent purchasers, or do not otherwise possess superior equities, has been long established. Lord Redesdale in Adair v. Shaw, 1 Schoales & L. 243, 262, lays it down in very broad terms. He says: "If we advert to the cases on this subject, we shall find, that trusts are enforced not only against those persons, who rightfully are possessed of the trust property, as trustees, but also against all persons, who come into possession of the property bound by the trust with notice of the trust; and whoever comes so into possession, is considered as bound with respect to that special property to the execution of the trust." And a very strong recognition, as well as application of the principle, will be found in Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 562, 574, even in a court of common law. Upon this ground, assets disposed of by executors by misapplication, or existing in the hands of debtors, where the executor is insolvent, or there is collusion, are often reached in favour of creditors, as a trust fund. Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves. 152, and the cases there cited fully illustrate this position.² The cases of partnership furnish also a pretty strong analogy. There, in equity, partnership funds will be followed in favour of creditors into the hands of third persons. It is true, that, as the master of the rolls said in Campbell v. Mullett, 2 Swanst. 551, 575, the equities of creditors are to be worked out through the medium of the partners. They have no lien, but something approaching to a lien, which courts of equity will regard and enforce, in all cases, where superior rights, which ought to be protected, do not intervene.³ It is not, however, necessary to search for analogous cases; for upon the plain import of the charter, the capital stock is a trust fund for creditors, and the stockholders, upon the division, take it subject to all equities attached to it. They are, to all intents and purposes, privies to the trust, and receive it cum onere.

Another consideration is, whether the suit is well founded in point of jurisdiction. The 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (chapter 20) provides, that no circuit court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action, in favour of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange. It has been objected, that this section prohibits the present suit. But my opinion is, that it is wholly inapplicable. In the first place, the bank notes were payable to bearer, and the bearer does not claim by any assignment. He is an original holder. Bank notes pass in and out of the bank many times, and the property in them vests by mere delivery in the person, who comes fairly in possession of them. In the next place, the plaintiffs do not found their title to relief solely upon their right as holders of these notes. Their present cause of action is collateral to that right. Their demand against the defendants is original in themselves upon the non-payment and insolvency of the bank, and is not derived under the title of any other person. It never vested in any other person, and has never come to them by any assignment. See Bean v. Smith [Case No. 1,174].

The next consideration is, whether the bill makes out a case, which upon the facts proved or admitted, entitles the plaintiffs to relief. I have already adverted to the loose structure of the bill. It primarily charges the case, as a case of fraud; that is now abandoned. If it can stand at all, it must be simply on the fact, that the defendants have the funds in their possession. That alone could not entitle the parties to relief, without allegations of insolvency on the part of the corporation or of the non-existence of other funds. Now the bill does not allege, that the corporation is insolvent, nor that it is dissolved, nor that there is no other corporate property, out of which the debts can be paid. These are extraordinary omissions; and if there had been a demurrer to the bill, it would be difficult for the court to have strained hard enough to support it. But these defects are in some degree helped by the answers, which admit the insolvency of the corporation, and show, that in fact no sufficient funds for payment of its debts are in existence, independent of the capital stock. Then again the bill (notwithstanding the intimations thrown out by the court on a former hearing of the cause) does not charge, that the capital stock is a trust fund, appropriated by law and the charter to the payment of the debts, and that the surplus only, after such payment, belongs to the stockholders. Such an allegation was most fit to have been made upon the grounds, on which ultimately the plaintiffs concluded to rest their case at the hearing. The court is therefore compelled to thread it out by inference and intendment and exposition of the charter, as made part of the pleadings. Then again the bill charges the new Hallowell and Augusta Bank to be possessed of large funds of the old bank, which ought to be applied to the payment of the debts of the latter; and without attempting to bring the new bank to a hearing, the bill has, by the plaintiffs, been dismissed as against the new bank, leaving all the inferences, deducible from the charge in the bill, in full force against the plaintiffs. This ought to have been cured by an amendment of the bill.

² See, also, Moses v. Murgatroyd, 1 Johns. Ch. 119; Dexter v. Stewart, 7 Johns. Ch. 52; Shepherd v. McEvers, 4 Johns. Ch. 136; Long v. Majestree, 1 Johns. Ch. 305; Riddle v. Mandeville, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 322; Russell v. Clark's Ex'rs, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 69.

³ See, also, Ex parte Ruffin, 6 Ves. 119, 127; Ex parte Fell, 10 Ves. 347; Ex parte Williams, 11 Ves. 3; Ex parte Harris, 1 Madd. 583; Ex parte Kendall, 17 Ves. 514, 526; Murray v. Murray, 5 Johns. Ch. 60; Ex parte Lodge, 1 Ves. Jr. 166; Taylor v. Fields, 4 Ves. 396; Young v. Keighly, 15 Ves. 557.

I advert to these defects, not in the spirit of censure, (for I am well aware, that an apology is found in the fact, that chancery proceedings have, hitherto, but in a slight degree engaged the attention of the bar in this district), but in a spirit of regret, because they have been most embarrassing to the court in every step of its progress, and distressed it by creating a perpetual struggle between the desire to do justice to the parties, after so prolonged and expensive a controversy, and the difficulty of overcoming technical principles.

The exception as to parties ranges itself under this head. There is no allegation in the bill, that the old corporation is defunct, so as to dispense with its being made a party. The answers do not deny, that it yet has a legal existence, and therefore afford no help to cure the defect. Now, if in existence, nothing can be more clear, than that it ought to have been made a party to the bill. It is the original debtor; its funds are to be applied in payment of debts, and it would be wrong to touch those funds, without the most plenary proofs, that the debts were due, and the corporation had no defence.

There is a case very much like the present in many of its circumstances. It is Curson v. African Co., reported in 1 Vern. 121, and somewhat more fully as to the facts in Skin. 84. The plaintiff was a creditor on bond of the old African Company, which became insolvent, but did not surrender its charter, and a new company was incorporated, consisting for the most part of the old members, to which the old company assigned its effects for payment of its debts. The suit was against the new company, for payment of the plaintiff's debts out of these effects, as a trust fund. The difficulty was, that the old company was not made a party to the bill. Lord Keeper North had some hesitation about the necessity of issuing process against the old company, because they had no property, on which a distringas could issue to compel them to appear. But he seems to have had no doubt of proceeding, if the company was dissolved, nor of operating on the fund itself. He said: "If an executor convey over all the estate, and go to the Indies, or elsewhere not to be found, the estate shall be liable to satisfy the creditors; but this shall be after he hath stood out all process." Skin. 84, 85. The objection, however, was finally waived, and the plaintiff had a decree for forty per cent. being the same amount as the other creditors had received. This difficulty in point of averment and proof (for the fact of dissolution is notorious to all) may, however, as I think, be overcome. The acts of the legislature creating the bank, and continuing its existence for a limited time, are made part of the bill; and as a prolonged existence cannot be presumed, and is not asserted in the answers, the court must take it to be true, that the corporation expired by the legislative limitation, antecedent to the filing of the bill. Upon the clearest principles it cannot be necessary to make a non-existing corporation a party. But then it is argued, that no decree ought to be made without making all the stockholders parties to the bill, for all are liable to contribution. I agree, that if proper parties are not made, the defendant may demur to the bill, or state it by plea or answer, or may object to a decree at the hearing, or even obtain a reversal, in some cases, after a decree. Whenever, taken either by demurrer, or plea, or answer, or at the hearing, the court, if the objection is well founded, is not bound to dismiss the bill, but may retain it, giving leave to make new parties.⁴ The subject as to who are necessary parties, and when they may be dispensed with, was a good deal discussed by the court in delivering its judgment in West v. Randall [Case No. 17,424]. The principal cases are there collected and commented on. The general rule is, that all persons materially interested, either as plaintiffs or defendants, are to be made parties. There are exceptions, just as old and as well founded, as the rule itself. Where the parties are beyond the jurisdiction, or are so numerous, that it is impossible to join them all, a court of chancery will make such a decree, as it can, without them. Its object is to administer justice, and it will not suffer a rule, founded in its own sense of propriety and convenience, to become the instrument of a denial of justice to parties before the court, who are entitled to relief. What is practicable to bring all interest before it, will be done. What is impossible or impracticable, it has not the rashness to attempt, but it contents itself with disposing of the equities before it, leaving, as far as it may, the rights of other persons unprejudiced. In respect to the exception on account of the numerosness of parties, the question has been discussed and acted upon in many cases, particularly in Chancey v. May, Prec. Ch. 592; Leigh v. Thomas, 2 Ves. Sr. 312; Lloyd v. Loaring, 6 Ves. 773; Adair v. New River Co., 11 Ves. 429; Good v. Blewitt, 13 Ves. 397; and Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. 320.⁵ The result of the whole cases is, that where the parties are so numerous, that it is inconvenient or impracticable to bring all before the court, the rule, which is founded on the consideration of public good, shall not be applied, since it would defeat the purposes of justice.

⁴ Cooper, Eq. Pl. 33, 289; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 144, 145; Jones v. Jones, 3 Atk. 110; Wyatt, Pract. Reg. 299; 1 P. Wms. 428, 599; 3 P. Wms. 331; Palk v. Clinton, 12 Ves. 48, 58; Bishop of Winchester v. Beavor, 3 Ves. 314; Attorney General v. Jackson, 11 Ves. 365; Millegan v. Mitchell, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 220; Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. 321, 325; Madox v. Jackson, 3 Atk. 406.

Now, no case could afford a stronger illustration for the application of the principle, than the present. Here, the capital stock is divisible into 2,000 shares of 100 dollars each. Every share is transferable, and may be unlimitedly assigned to any persons whatsoever, whether citizens or aliens, residents or non-residents. It is obviously impracticable in such a case to bring all the stockholders before the court. Many of them may reside, and probably do reside, in other states; and the court must presume, that the shares are very variously distributed. There is no complaint, that the defendants now before the court do not represent effectually the interests adverse to the plaintiffs, or that the struggle is not maintained with all due legal pertinacity. Nor is it pretended, that the other stockholders have means of affording a more effectual defence to the defendants in respect to their own particular interests. The objection is now made upon dry technical principles of strict right, and upon these it cannot and ought not to be sustained. The case of the City of London v. Richmond, 2 Vern. 421, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 86, Prec. Ch. 156, 1 Brown, Parl. Cas. 516, is in point. There, the city had granted a lease of certain water to one A, who afterwards assigned over the lease to trustees in trust for the holders of the shares, (900 shares) into which it was divided. The rent being unpaid, the bill was brought against the assignees and some of the shareholders; and upon an objection, that all ought to have been joined, it was expressly overruled, upon the ground of its impracticability. There is an anonymous case in 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 166, pl. 7, to the same effect. Certain persons became subscribers to a bank to be authorized by parliament, and £6,000 was expended in endeavoring to effect the object. The persons, who had advanced the £6,000, brought their bill for repayment against sixteen out of two hundred and fifty subscribers. The court overruled the objection taken for want of all the subscribers, because the plaintiffs sought to recover only their proportion of the loss from the defendants.

Upon the whole, my opinion is, that the objection of the want of sufficient parties cannot be maintained. We may then proceed to the merits of the defence, as disclosed in the answers. One ground there taken is, that the demands of the plaintiffs respectively are barred by the statute of limitations. But this bar to a decree cannot, upon the facts, be sustained. The rights of the plaintiffs accrued as against the defendants within six years; for until a refusal of payment by the bank of its notes, followed by an inability to discharge them, there was no cause of proceeding in equity against the defendants. There is no positive bar to suits in equity; but whenever any limitation is adopted, it is ordinarily regulated by analogy to the common law. Here, the claim is against a trust fund in the hands of the defendants; and in cases, not of constructive, but of express trusts, so long, at least, as they are not encountered by an adverse possession and denial of right, the statute of limitations does not begin to run. I should have very great difficulty in allowing a bar of the statute of limitations to operate in a case of this nature, unless where the circumstances of negligence on one side, and of positive denial of right on the other were very cogent. Here the capital stock was actually divided, to the amount of $150,000, in January and October, 1813, at a time when it was perfectly well known, or ought to have been known, that a very large number of bank notes, amounting, I believe, to more than $90,000, were due, and outstanding against the bank. If what has fallen from the bar be correct, this large amount remains yet unpaid. How was its payment provided for? Simply by the notes due to the bank, then outstanding, the productiveness of which could not be then ascertained, and the utter insolvency of the debtors has been since fully established. These notes, indeed, to an amount of more than $140,000 (including the stock notes, for the unpaid quarter part of the capital stock,) were due almost entirely from the directors of the bank, from whose official misconduct the stockholders ought certainly to derive no benefit, if they are not to be affected with any private responsibility.

The only other ground, suggested as a defence by the defendants is, that they have been guilty of no fraud, and that the division of the capital stock was an act authorized by law; and there is no equity to relieve the plaintiffs by throwing the loss on the stockholders. The answer to this argument, for such it is, has already been given. The stockholders have no right to any thing but the residuum of the capital stock, after payment of all the debts of the bank. The funds in their hands, therefore, have an equity attached to them, in favour of the creditors, which it is against conscience to resist. To be sure, the plaintiffs might, if their bill had been properly framed, have shown a much stronger case for equity, and might have shown due diligence in attempting to enforce their rights. I allude to the known facts of the various suits at common law, some of which have been cited at the bar, and others brought to this court for decision, in which great efforts have been made to obtain a remedy at law, by the bill-holders, without success.

⁵ See, also, Wendell v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. Ch. 344; Wiser v. Blachly, 1 Johns. Ch. 437; Brasher's Ex'rs v. Vancortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. 242; Van Vechten v. Terry, 2 Johns. Ch. 197.

The next question is, what sort of decree the plaintiffs are entitled to. Are they entitled to a decree, to the full amount of the dividends received by the defendants respectively, towards payment of the debts due from the bank to them, or are they entitled only to a pro rata payment out of that dividend, in the proportion, which the stock, held by the defendants, bears to the whole capital stock? The bill does not allege, that the other stockholders, who have received dividends, are insolvent, or out of the jurisdiction of the court. Nor does it state what the amount of the debts due from the bank to bill-holders, or others, is. It would have been desirable, as far as it was practicable, that all the other creditors, who had a common interest, might have been brought before the court. But neither party has urged it, or waived any formal objection to the introduction of them. The court, therefore, in proceeding to do equity to those before it, must take care that it is not the instrument of injustice to others who are not represented. Non constat, if the whole fund is taken from the defendants in favour of the plaintiffs, that there will remain any solvent stockholders, from whom the other creditors can claim any share. It is true, in the case of City of London v. Richmond, 2 Vern. 421, 1 Brown, Parl. Cas. 518, that, though all the parties in interest were not before the court, the full rent was decreed. But that case furnishes no rule for the present, for there the trustees of all the shareholders were before the court, and they were the assignees of the estate, and therefore held it liable to the rent. In the anonymous case in 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 166, pl. 7, the decree was only for a proportion of the money expended. But there the bill asked for no more. I rather incline to think that the judges in the cases in 15 Mass. 505, and 16 Mass. 9, meant to indicate an opinion in favour of the bill-holders only for a proportion, unless special circumstances were made out, such as insolvency, &c.

What would be the effect of the introduction of an averment of the insolvency of the other stockholders, or their being out of the jurisdiction, or of other circumstances denoting a peculiar equity, in a bill of this nature, it is not now necessary to decide. See Madox v. Jackson, 3 Atk. 405; Attorney-General v. Jackson, 11 Ves. 365. Taking into consideration the manifest defects of the present bill, the long delay in instituting the present suit (which is not accounted for in any averments framed for this purpose,) the possible, nay, probable intermediate insolvencies of some of the stockholders, the injustice which may arise to other creditors of the bank, not before the court, by any other course, I have come to the conclusion, that our duty is best performed by holding the plaintiffs entitled to a decree, that the defendants pay out of the dividends of the capital stock received by them, so much of the debts due to the plaintiffs, as the number of shares held by them in the same capital stock (viz. 320 shares) bears to the whole number of shares in the capital stock (viz. 2,000 shares).

There is much force in the suggestion, that the corporation books have been withdrawn and secreted, so that the plaintiffs were unable originally to ascertain who the other stockholders were. But this difficulty might, in some measure, have been overcome by apt averments in the bill; and the disclosure of the names of several stockholders in the answers puts the plaintiffs in possession of facts, by which, at their choice, they might by an amendment have brought those persons before the court, or have assigned a sufficient reason for the omission.

My judgment accordingly is, that the defendants are to pay the plaintiffs, in the proportion already intimated, and no further. Decree accordingly, with costs.

In 2 Vern. 396, there is a note stating, that in the case between Dr. Salmon and the Hamburg Company, the members in their private capacities were made liable, the company having no goods. That case is not reported in any other book, and the circumstances of it are not therefore known.

Case No. 17,945.

WOOD et al. v. FORREST et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 303.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1822.

REPLEVIN BOND—VALIDITY.

It is not necessary to the validity of a replevin bond that the plaintiff in replevin should be bound in the bond.

Debt upon a replevin bond. The bond was in this form: "Know all men, by these presents, that we, Richard M. Scott, trustee of Mrs. Elizabeth C. Watson, and Henry Forrest, James Watson, and J. G. Slye, of Washington county and District of Columbia, are held and firmly bound unto Basil Wood and Henry B. Robertson," etc., but was executed by the last-named three obligors only, Mr. Scott not having signed or sealed it. The condition was in the usual form, but it stated, in its recital, that the writ of replevin, which was about to be sued out, was "to be returnable to the said circuit court next to be held at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on the — of — next." The defendants, after oyer, demurred generally to the declaration.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Randall, for defendants, contended that the bond was void, because not taken according to the directions of the statute of 11 Geo. II., c. 19, § 23, which, in case of replevin for distress taken for rent, requires the bond to be taken "from the plaintiff and two responsible persons as sureties." So, a bail bond, the condition of which is not conformable to the statute, is void. 5 Com. Dig. 646, 647.

Mr. Jones, contra. That might perhaps have been a ground for a motion to quash the replevin, but the defendants cannot now take advantage of it. The blank, in the condition as to the day of sitting of the court, is immaterial, as it states it to be "the said circuit court next to be held at the city of Washington," the time for the holding of which is made certain by law.

THE COURT took time, during the vacation, to consider the case, and, at the next term, rendered judgment upon the demurrer, for the plaintiffs; and the plaintiffs executed a writ of inquiry, and the jury assessed their damages to the full amount of the debts and costs for which the property had been taken in execution by the plaintiffs, who were constables.

Case No. 17,946.

WOOD v. FRANKLIN.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 115.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.

DEBT ON REPLEVIN BOND—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEAS.

In an action of debt upon a replevin bond, setting forth the condition and averring special breaches, the plea of general performance is a bad plea; so is the plea of non damnificatus; so is the plea that the plaintiff had no property in the goods replevied; so is the plea of nul tiel record if no record is averred in the declaration; and so is a plea to the whole declaration, which is an answer to a part only.

Debt on a replevin bond given in the suit of Arguelles v. Wood [Case No. 520]. The declaration set forth the condition of the bond, and averred (1) that Mrs. Arguelles did not prosecute her writ with effect; (2) that she did not establish a lawful right to the goods replevied; (3) nor return the goods, although a return was awarded by the court; and (4) that she did not pay the damages and costs adjudged by the court.

The defendant, at the last term, had leave to amend his pleading, and now offered to plead (1) general performance; (2) as to so much of the declaration as averred that the plaintiff had recovered a judgment against Mrs. Arguelles, no such record; (3) non damnificatus; (4) that the goods were the property of Mrs. Arguelles, without this, that the plaintiff had any property in the same.

R. S. Coxe, objected to the receiving of these pleas, under the leave to amend, because they would be all bad upon demurrer. The pleas of general performance and non damnificatus are bad after assignment of special breaches. The plea of no such record is bad, because no record was averred in the declaration. The plea that the plaintiff had no property in the goods replevied is bad, because no such property was averred in the declaration; and the plea is wholly impertinent and immaterial.

The defendant also pleaded that the court did not order a return; but this plea being pleaded to the whole declaration, when it is only an answer to one of the breaches assigned, is also bad.

And of this opinion was THE COURT, who rejected the pleas (nem. con.).

The authorities cited were Cutler v. Southern, 1 Wms. Saund. 116; 2 Chit. Pl. 528, note a; Postmaster General v. Cochran, 2 Johns. 413; Brackenbury v. Pell, 12 East, 588.

Case No. 17,947.

WOOD v. GOLD.

[4 McLean, 577.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1849.

FOREIGN ADMINISTRATOR—RIGHT TO SUE.

1. Letters of administration can only authorize the individual to administer on the estate of the deceased, within the state in which they were granted.

[Cited in Leonard v. Putnam, 51 N. H. 250.]

2. Suit cannot be brought in any other state, without the sanction of said state.

[This was a suit by Jethro Wood's administrator against Amos and Daniel Gold.]

Baker & Willard, for plaintiff.

Mr. Gould, for defendants.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. A motion is made for a nonsuit, on the ground that suit is brought under letters of administration granted in the state of New York. Letters of administration do not authorize a suit to be brought by the administrator in any other state. Except by sanction of other states, they can only operate within the jurisdiction under which they were issued. The statute of Michigan requires letters to be taken out in this state, to exercise the duties of administrator here, or to bring suit.

WOOD (HOPKINS v.). See Case No. 6,693.

Case No. 17,947a.

WOOD v. The INFANTA.

[See Case No. 7,030.]

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

¹ [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

Case No. 17,948.

WOOD v. LOUISIANA.

[5 Dill. 122.]¹Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1878.²

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—INVALID BONDS—REMEDY OF PURCHASER—IMPLIED ASSUMPSIT.

A municipal corporation issued bonds valid on their face, but in fact void, because they were antedated to evade the registration act, and were not registered. The corporation had power to borrow money, and the proceeds of the bonds passed into the city treasury and were used for lawful purposes. Held, that the corporation was liable in an action for money had and received to the purchaser of the bonds or his assignee, not for the amount of the bonds, but for the amount of money actually paid for the bonds to the corporation, with simple interest thereon.

[Cited in Gause v. City of Clarksville, Case No. 5,276; s. c., 1 Fed. 357. Distinguished in Hall v. Scott County, 7 Fed. 342. Cited in Dorian v. City of Shreveport, 28 Fed. 295; Morton v. City of Nevada, 41 Fed. 588.]

This was an action for money had and received by the defendant from the plaintiff [Thomas J. Wood] in part, and in part from the plaintiff's assignors. The city received the moneys sued for as the consideration of certain bonds issued by it, and antedated so as to evade the local registration act of March, 1872, which was construed in Anthony v. Jasper County [Case No. 488]. Apparently the bonds were valid. If the true date had been that named in the bonds, no registration was necessary. The bonds were never registered, and for this reason the city repudiated any obligation to pay them. The plaintiff and his assignors did not know that the bonds had been antedated. The defendant demurred to the petition.

C. H. Krum, for plaintiff.

David Wagner and D. P. Dyer, for defendant.

TREAT, District Judge. This is a suit for money had and received by the defendant from the plaintiff and plaintiff's assignors. The officers of the defendant, in order to evade the Missouri act of March, 1872, requiring registration, antedated certain bonds, which subsequently were bought by the plaintiff and his assignors, in open market, at ninety cents on the dollar. Those bonds were void for nonregistry. If they had not been antedated—that is, if they had been executed and issued in fact as on their face they purported to have been—they would have been valid and obligatory.

As the city had power to borrow money for the purposes defined in its charter, is it to be held liable for the money thus borrowed through sale of bonds which were void from noncompliance with the registry act? The fraudulent contrivances of the defendant's agents, whereby through invalid bonds they obtained the money of the plaintiff and his assignors, ought not to preclude the plaintiff from recovery, if he was a bona fide holder for value, to the extent that the defendant actually received the money therefor, provided there was lawful authority to borrow money for the purpose for which the same was received and used. If money was obtained by the defendant through such invalid contrivances, and the same could have been lawfully borrowed in another manner, and if the money thus procured was received and used for lawful purposes, why should not the defendant be held liable? The bonds, as stated, were invalid, as such, and no suit could be maintained thereon. They were bought, innocently, in the open market, from the duly constituted and recognized agents of the defendant, at the rate named, and the net sum received (eighty-five cents on a dollar) passed into the city treasury and was disbursed for lawful purposes. Full and detailed reports of receipts and disbursements concerning the same were made from time to time, and received the sanction of the mayor and city council. There is no doubt that the plaintiff, as to all except two of the bonds, bought them directly from the city's agents, at the rate named, and paid to said agents accordingly. As to the other two bonds, the facts are that they were sold under like circumstances to the respective assignors of the plaintiff, at the same rate, and subsequently bought of said assignors, bona fide, for the same price.

It is of the first importance to bear in mind, however, that the city could neither borrow nor expend money except when authorized by its charter and the law. It cannot set up the fraudulent or unlawful contrivances of its agents, whereby plaintiff's money was procured and used for lawful purposes, as a defence in this action, if the plaintiff or purchaser was not in pari delicto as to said wrongful conduct.

As to the bonds bought not directly from defendant's agent, the assignee is subrogated to the rights of the assignor. This has been settled in this circuit (Shirk v. Pulaski County [Case No. 12,794]), and if not directly adjudged, at least broadly intimated, by the supreme court of the United States.

The next inquiry is not free from doubt. The fund commissioner was not to sell the bonds for less than eighty-five per cent. of their face value. He did pay that sum to the defendant, five per cent. having been used for commissions and expenses of sale. The city was prohibited from increasing its debt, but was bound to meet its existing indebtedness. To meet that indebtedness and current expenses, including the expenses of negotiating this loan or borrowing the sum needed, the plaintiff's ninety per cent. was received. That sum, therefore, was had and lawfully applied, and the defendant must answer therefor. Of course, the plaintiff can receive interest only at the rate of six per cent. on the sum so advanced by him or his assignors, from the date when payment of interest ceased.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Affirmed in 102 U. S. 294.]

It is unnecessary to distinguish, more clearly, this case from one where, through the fraudulent acts of a municipal agent, money has been procured by him for unlawful purposes, or through him passed to the municipality for unlawful objects and been so used. The doctrine, not of fraud alone, would, in such a case, have to be considered with reference to the respective parties, but also the doctrine of ultra vires.

The case before the court is, in its worst aspects, simply this, to wit: A procurement through unlawful means of a given sum of money, which was received by the principal and by the latter lawfully used; the lender being innocent that the means used were invalid. A municipality can exercise no powers not conferred upon it, nor can it resort to forbidden means to accomplish a prohibited result. It necessarily acts through agents, and it is important that such agents should be restricted in their agency to prescribed modes of action. But suppose they violate such prohibitions, or transcend willfully the restrictions imposed on them, yet the fruits thereof, being received by them, are applied to the lawful objects of the municipality; and suppose the lender, in ignorance of any fraudulent devices of the kind, parts with his money in good faith, and the municipality has had and used the money so procured for lawful purposes, or still has it in its treasury, shall it refuse to refund the same?

It is not necessary to go into an inquiry in this case as to matters wherein an agent on one side, and the party dealing with him on the other, are in pari delicto. Here we have the recognized agents of the city undertaking to raise funds for lawful purposes, and by antedating the bonds raising said funds, giving, as evidence of the money borrowed, bonds which, for statutory reasons, could not be enforced as bonds. The purchaser of said bonds, or (what is the same) the lender to the borrowing city, parts with his money, which the city received and lawfully used, although the purchaser or lender received as evidence of what he advanced the bonds on which he could not recover directly; is he, therefore, to lose the money so by him loaned and used by the city? One who deals with a municipality must be sure that it is acting within its corporate powers. If its agents are acting beyond such powers, he deals at his peril.

If the municipality has the power to raise funds for prescribed purposes, but is forbidden to raise them in the manner adopted by its agents, may the innocent lender hold the city liable as for money had and received, notwithstanding the funds came into its possession through prohibited means used by its agents? Here a technical question is encountered. If the lender knows that the means are unlawful (taking cognizance of the law as to said means), shall he have the aid of the court to recover? But if, through the designed fraud of the city's agents, he is innocently misled into the purchase of the bonds, which on their face are outside of the prohibitions of the statute, and the city receives the avails thereof, and uses such avails in a lawful way, shall he be remediless?

The broad distinction must be recognized between an effort to enable a municipality to exceed the limits fixed to its indebtedness, and a resort to prohibited means to raise funds for a lawful purpose. It was a positive requirement that the obligations of the city should not exceed a specified amount, with exceptions as to past indebtedness. It was also a positive requirement that future bonds should be registered in conformity with the act of March, 1872.

It appears from the evidence that the bonds in question, heretofore pronounced invalid for nonregistry, were the means through which plaintiff's money went into the treasury of the city, and was used for lawful purposes; and it appears also that the purchaser of the bonds did not know of the false antedating. The rules invoked concerning the relationship of vendor and vendee in open market, as to municipal bonds, cannot affect this case; for those rules pertain solely to vendors (other than the obligors) and their vendees. The obligor's liability still remains, and depends on considerations entirely distinct from those arising between an ordinary vendor and vendee.

This is a suit as between the obligor of the bond and the assignee thereof. The bond being for statutory reasons void, the assignee is not protected by the law merchant. The equities of the original transactions are open, and evidence thereon has been had. The assignee being subrogated to all the rights of the first assignor, may recover from the obligor what he (that assignor) actually paid, and no more. He cannot recover on the bond, because that was invalid, and hence not obligatory, but is entitled to a recovery of what the city actually received from the first vendee of the bond. If ninety cents on a dollar were paid, as heretofore stated, that is the amount of the recovery, with six per cent. interest on what is due. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 730, and notes.

Judgment accordingly.

See Gause v. Clarksville [Case No. 5,276.]

[This case was taken by writ of error to the supreme court, and the judgment was there affirmed. 102 U. S. 294.]

Case No. 17,949.

WOOD v. The LUMBERMAN.

[3 Hughes, 542.]¹District Court, E. D. Virginia. 1879.²

LIEN ON VESSEL—WAIVER.

Where a purchaser of a vessel, who takes pains before purchasing to ascertain the claims against her and to see them settled, is informed by a claimant (who is afterwards the libellant) that he has but one small claim, which is afterwards paid, and this claimant fails to inform him of the existence of a negotiable note given in payment of another claim which is receipted, and which the vendor shows as receipted to the purchaser, held, that this negotiable note is not a lien upon the vessel.

In admiralty. In this case John E. Wood libels the tug for the amount of $104.24, the price of coal furnished the tug while it was owned by C. H. Hostetter. The tug was soon afterwards purchased by Brillinger, the present claimant and owner. The law of Virginia gives a lien to material men upon domestic vessels. Wood, through his agent, had given a receipt for the amount of his bill for coal, in which no mention was made of a promissory note taken by Wood in payment of the bill. Brillinger saw this receipt, but heard nothing of the note, before he paid for the tug.

Further facts in the case were the following: Before Brillinger purchased the steamer of C. H. Hostetter he required the latter to settle all bills against her, so that there should be no claim made after he should become the owner. This Hostetter did, with the exception of a few small bills which Brillinger was willing to assume, or trust to be paid. Among other bills produced to Brillinger by Hostetter as having been paid, was that of the libellant, filed with Brillinger's answer, and now attached to this paper. If Brillinger had suspected that the bill had not been actually paid, he would have deducted it from the purchase-money, as he did in the case of some small bills he assumed. He also made inquiries, so far as he could, as to outstanding bills against the steamer before he would run the risk of a final settlement. He went with H. H. Hostetter, brother of C. H. Hostetter, who was in the employment of the latter, to see libellant. Did not see him, but saw libellant's brother, who seemed to have charge of the business. On inquiry, he said he had nothing against the steamer but a small bill for coal, but that they had a note against C. H. Hostetter which would soon be due, and he hoped he, H. H. Hostetter, would provide for it. This small bill was soon after paid by H. H. Hostetter. This was just after C. H. Hostetter had left the state, and his disappearance had been talked of. After Brillinger had purchased and paid for the steamer he got coal from libellant, and paid bill when presented, but nothing was said to him about the steamer owing anything for which C. H. Hostetter had contracted, except the small bill paid afterwards by H. H. Hostetter, as mentioned.

H. H. Hostetter confirmed the testimony of Brillinger as to the statement of libellant's clerk or superintendent at the yard, and the payment of the small bill by him as mentioned.

Captain Brown said he remained in charge of steamer after Hostetter sold to Brillinger; that once after Hostetter had left, when he was taking in some coal, he spoke to the younger Wood about Hostetter having gone off leaving debts, etc.; and that Wood said Hostetter left in debt to them, but that he did not owe them anything they could make out of the boat.

L. D. Starke, for libellant.

W. H. C. Ellis, for respondent.

HUGHES, District Judge. I think, on the facts of this case (the libellant having given a receipt for his claim, in which he made no mention of his note, and by which Brillinger, who saw it, was thrown off of his guard, and Wood's brother or clerk having declared to Brillinger that the house had no claim on the tug), that the lien was waived, and the purchaser took the vessel clear of the lien.

The decree given under this decision was affirmed on appeal by Bond, Circuit Judge. [Case unreported.]

Case No. 17,950.

WOOD et al. v. LUSE et al.

[4 McLean, 254.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1847.

JUDGMENT—MOTION TO SET ASIDE.

1. A judgment can not be set aside on motion, after the term in which it was rendered.

[Cited in The Illinois, Case No. 7,003; Shuford v. Cain, Id. 12,323; U. S. v. Millinger, 7 Fed. 189; U. S. v. Walsh, 22 Fed. 648.]

2. In New York it is otherwise.

[Cited in The Illinois, Case No. 7,003.]

3. But the supreme court follow the common-law doctrine on this subject.

[Cited in The Illinois, Case No. 7,003.]

[Proceeding by Wood, Grant & Wood against Luse & Niles.]

Mr. Davidson, for plaintiffs.

Joy & Porter, for defendants.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This is a motion by defendants to set aside certain proceedings, as well in the above cause as in another, in both of which judgments had been obtained more than six years ago. An affidavit is filed as the foundation of the motion. If the motion was not objectionable on other ground,

¹ [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Affirmed by circuit court; case unreported.]

¹ [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

It is clear that the proceeding on the original suit and the notes on which it was founded, could not be revised in this manner. If the judgment was irregularly entered, as if no notice had been served on the defendants, so that it could not otherwise be considered than as a nullity, the court would entertain the motion. In New York, motions to set aside a judgment which had been entered at a preceding term, or perhaps years before the motion, are frequently made and acted upon, as their merits may require. But by the common law, the judgment of a previous term can not be set aside on motion. And this is the doctrine of the supreme court. It is admitted that relief, in modern practice, is given on motion where, formerly, an audita querela was necessary. But this does not apply to the solemn judgments of the court. A clerical error in the entry of the judgment will be corrected at any time, but judgments can not be set aside on motion, after the term at which they were entered. The motion is overruled.

WOOD (McINTIRE v.). See Case No. 8-825.

WOOD (MANHATTAN MEDICINE CO. v.). See Case No. 9,026.

Case No. 17,951.

WOOD v. MANN et al.

[1 Sumn. 506.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1833.

CONVEYANCE PROCURED BY FRAUD—BILL TO SET ASIDE—DEFENSES—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—ARGUMENTATIVE PLEADING.

1. Where a bill in equity was brought to set aside a conveyance asserted to have been procured by fraud, and one of the defendants pleaded, that he was a bona fide purchaser under the grantee of parcel of the premises, without notice of the asserted fraud, and that he had paid a part of the consideration money, and that the residue was secured by mortgage, held, that this plea furnished no bar to the bill; that it should have averred, that the whole consideration of the purchase had been paid before notice of the plaintiff's title.

[Cited in Livingston v. Story, 11 Pet. (36 U. S.) 393; Pierpont v. Fowle, Case No. 11-152.]

[Cited in Dugan v. Yattier, 3 Blackf. 248, note. Cited in brief in Richards v. Stanley, 50 Vt. 151.]

2. The above plea overruled absolutely, and the party ordered to answer generally.

3. A bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, and without notice, under a fraudulent grantee, would hold the estate at law against the original grantor.

[Cited in Re Estes, 3 Fed. 142; Dowell v. Applegate, 7 Fed. 887.]

[Cited in Hovey v. Hobson, 53 Me. 452.]

4. Query, whether a bona fide purchase, for a valuable consideration, without notice, is a good bar in equity to a legal title asserted, as it is to an equitable title.

[Cited in Townshend v. Simon, 38 N. J. Law, 242.]

5. The following was the denial in the plea of the notice of the fraud asserted in the bill; namely, "that this defendant had no notice whatever of any title, claim, or demand of the complainant, or of any other person, to or in the lands so purchased by this defendant, as aforesaid, which would affect the same, or any of them, or any part thereof." Held, that this is argumentative and insufficient. It should expressly and in terms deny, by proper averments, notice of the fraud charged in the bill.

6. The bill charged notice of the asserted fraud against one of the defendants, in general terms, to wit, "that the defendant then and there well knowing all and singular the premises," etc. Held, that the bill should be amended so as to charge the notice more directly.

Bill in equity to set aside a certain conveyance, made by the plaintiff [Josiah Wood, Jr.] to one John R. Adams (a defendant), asserted to have been procured by fraud and imposition upon the plaintiff. The bill averred, that Elisha Fuller, one of the defendants, had notice of the alleged fraud and imposition, in the following terms; namely, "the said Fuller then and there well knowing all and singular the premises, and combining and confederating as aforesaid, the nominal consideration of the said deed, being stated to be forty thousand dollars; but what consideration, or whether any consideration, was paid therefor by the said Fuller, your orator knows not; and the said Fuller combining and confederating as aforesaid, well knowing all the premises," etc. Fuller pleaded, that he was a bona fide purchaser under Samuel H. Mann of parcel of the premises, without notice of the asserted fraud or imposition; that he had paid a part of the consideration money, and that the residue was secured by a mortgage. Upon motion of the plaintiff, the plea was set down for argument, as to its validity in matter as well as in form.

Mr. Rand, for plaintiff.

Mr. Washburn, for defendant Fuller.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The first question made at the bar is, whether, if the plaintiff asserts a legal title, the plea of a bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration, without notice, is a good bar in equity to a bill, like the present, which is for discovery and relief. Without doubt, a plea to the whole bill, which is bad in part, and good in part, may be allowed to the extent to which it is good, and overruled as to the residue. It may be good as to the discovery, and bad as to the relief. See Coop. Eq. Pl. 230; Mitt. Eq. Pl. (4th Ed., by Jeremy) pp. 294, 295. Upon the question, whether a bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration, without notice, is a good plea in bar to a legal title asserted, as it certainly is to an equitable title, there is considerable contrariety in the authorities. Lord Nottingham is reported in the case of Burlace v. Cooke, 2 Freem. Ch.

¹ [Reported by Charles Sumner, Esq.]

24, to have held the plea to be a good bar. But he is said, in the subsequent case of Rogers v. Seale, Id. 84, to have changed his opinion. Both these cases, however, are, as Mr. Sugden has well observed, very ill reported. Sugd. Vend. (7th Ed.) 762. In Parker v. Blythmore, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. "G," p. 79, Finch, Prec. 58, the master of the rolls held the plea good. Afterwards, in Williams v. Lambe, 3 Brown, Ch. 264, Lord Thurlow held the plea bad to a bill for discovery and relief. And in the later case of Jerrard v. Saunders, 2 Ves. Jr. 453, Lord Loughborough held the plea good, adhering to, and approving, the doctrine of Lord Nottingham in the case of Bassett v. Nosworthy, Finch, 102. The elementary writers, too, on this subject are as ill agreed as to the result of the authorities; Mr. Sugden adopting one view, and Mr. Belt and Mr. Beames another. Sugd. Vend. (7th Ed.) 762, 763; Belt's note to 3 Brown, Ch. 263; Beames, Pl. Eq. 234, 245. Mr. Chancellor Kent has come to the conclusion, that the rule in England is according to the decision of Lord Thurlow. Methodist Episcopal Church v. Jaques, 1 Johns. Ch. 74. If it were material to decide this point in the present case, I should take more time to consider it. It appears to me, that some of the cases admit of distinctions, which may reconcile them. There may be good ground to refuse a discovery against such a purchaser, when the bill might be maintainable for relief. And there may also be good ground not to interfere with such a purchaser, so far as to take from him any paramount legal title, which he has honestly obtained; and yet, when that title is not paramount to the legal title of the plaintiff, to give him full relief. The case of dower before Lord Thurlow may stand upon this distinction; and perhaps others. But it is, in my judgment, wholly unnecessary to decide the point; and therefore I leave it for farther consideration.²

The groundwork of the argument here fails; for it is not true, that the plaintiff does assert a title strictly legal in all aspects of the case. The argument insists, that the conveyance of the plaintiff to Adams was a mere nullity; not voidable, but utterly void. But, however, it may be treated as between the original parties, in a loose and general sense, as a nullity, it is not so in fact, or in law. The title was voidable for the fraud; and not void. A bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, and without notice, under the fraudulent grantee, would hold the estate at law against the original grantor. That doctrine has been repeatedly affirmed by this court; and particularly in the case of Bean v. Smith [Case No. 1,174]. It has more recently been fully sanctioned by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Somes v. Brewer, 2 Pick. 184. So that, according to the well-established doctrine in this commonwealth, the deed of the plaintiff to Adams cannot be treated as utterly void, but as voidable only. See Ricketts v. Salwey, 2 Barn. & Ald. 360; Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 133. Resort, then, is now had to a court of equity, not to enforce a legal title, but to obtain a declaration, that the original deed was fraudulently obtained, and of course to procure from the defendant, Fuller, a re-conveyance, if he purchased with notice, as the bill asserts in general terms that he did. The plaintiff asks for a discovery, which itself is equitable relief, for the purpose of having a surrender of the asserted fraudulent titles of the defendants, which is also equitable relief. Whatever, then, may be the case, as to a purely legal title asserted in a court of equity, it does not strike me, that this can be treated as a case of that sort upon the actual structure of the bill and plea.

² See Rancliffe v. Parkyns, 6 Dow, 149, 230; Wallwyn v. Lee, 9 Ves. 24; Strode v. Blackburne, 3 Ves. 222. In Payne v. Compton, 2 Younge & C. 457, Lord Abinger held the plea of a bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration without notice was good in equity as a defence against a plaintiff relying on a legal title.

But it is very clear, that the plea furnishes no bar to the bill. In order to make it a good bar, it is necessary, that it should aver, that the whole consideration of the purchase had been paid before notice of the plaintiff's title. Now, the plea admits, that part of the purchase money has been paid, and that the residue is unpaid. It is plain, then, upon the unshaken doctrine of the authorities, that the plea is bad. Lord Redesdale has laid down this doctrine in full and exact terms in his excellent work on Pleadings in Equity. Speaking upon the subject of a plea of this sort by a purchaser, he says: "It (the plea) must aver the consideration and actual payment of it; a consideration secured to be paid is not sufficient." Mitf. Eq. Pl. (4th Ed., by Jeremy) p. 275; Coop. Eq. Pl. 282. And he is fully borne out by authority. Hardingham v. Nicholls, 3 Atk. 304, is directly in point; and indeed the doctrine has passed into a common axiom of equitable jurisprudence. Harrison v. Southcote, 1 Atk. 538; Story v. Lord Windsor, 2 Atk. 630; Jewett v. Palmer, 7 Johns. Ch. 65; Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 449. Therefore I have no doubt, that the plea must be overruled. And the only question, then, will be, whether it should be overruled generally, or should be permitted to stand for an answer, with liberty to the plaintiff to except; for without such liberty, it would be establishing it as a good answer (Maitland v. Wilson, 3 Atk. 814; Sellon v. Lewen, 3 P. Wms. 239); or whether the benefit thereof should be reserved to the hearing of the cause, to avail, quantum valere possit. Lord Redesdale has fully stated the appropriate effect of each of these courses: "If," (says he,) "upon argument the benefit of a plea is saved to the hearing, it is considered, that, so far as appears to the court, it may be a defence; but that there may be matter disclosed in the evidence, which would avoid it, supposing the matter pleaded to be strictly true; and the court, therefore, will not preclude the question. Where a plea is ordered to stand for an answer, it is merely determined, that it contains matter, which may be a defence, or part of a defence; but that it is not a full defence; or it has been informally offered by way of plea; or it has not been properly supported by answers, so that the truth of it is doubtful." Mittf. Eq. Pl. (4th Ed., by Jeremy) p. 303. See, also, 1 Turn. & V. Prac. (6th Ed.) p. 826. The same doctrine was held by Mr. Chancellor Walworth in Orcutt v. Orms, 3 Paige, 459.

It appears to me, that the proper course in the present case is, to overrule the plea absolutely, and to order the party to answer generally; in which case he may insist upon the same matters of defence by way of answer, and have the full benefit of them. The matter of the plea does not furnish a complete bar to the bill; for even if the title in the defendant, Fuller, is unimpeachable, because he had no notice of the fraud or imposition; still, as the whole purchase money has not been paid, the plaintiff may be entitled to relief to the extent of the unpaid purchase money. It is unnecessary now to decide, whether, if the defendant stands in the predicament of a bona fide purchaser without notice, having paid part of the purchase money, the deed to him can be set wholly aside, or set aside pro tanto; or whether the remedy of the plaintiff against him is to have the residue of the purchase money paid over to him, if, upon the full hearing of the cause, the plaintiff establishes the case, as put forth in his bill. The other parties have an interest in the decision of these points; and therefore they should be reserved to the hearing.

But what is with me decisive for overruling the plea is, that it does not expressly and in terms deny, by proper averments, notice of the fraud and imposition, which are charged in the bill, and of which, (though in a very loose and inartificial manner,) the defendant, Fuller, is charged by the bill as having notice. It is clear, by the authorities, that it is not sufficient to deny generally notice of such facts, so charged, in the answer in support of the plea; but the answer must deny them specially and particularly, as charged in the bill. This was the decision of Lord Hardwicke in Radford v. Wilson, 3 Atk. 815, and it has been constantly adhered to, as undoubted law. See Mittf. Eq. Pl. (4th Ed., by Jeremy) p. 276; Coop. Eq. Pl. p. 283 (238, 239); Beames, Pl. Eq. p. 247; Jerrard v. Saunders,² 2 Ves. Jr. 187, 4 Brown, Ch. 322; Senhouse v. Earl, 2 Ves. Sr. 450; Willis Eq. Pl. p. 568, note; Sugd. Vend. (7th Ed.) p. 761; Rancliffe v. Parkyns, 6 Dow, 230. It is true, that the plea need not be so particular as the answer in support of it. But still it must generally by proper averments deny notice of the fraud and imposition, otherwise the fact of fraud and imposition will not be in issue. Id. The case of Pennington v. Beechey, 2 Sim. & S. 282, fully supports this distinction. The vice chancellor on that occasion said: "It is not the office of a plea to deny particular facts, even if such particular facts are charged." At the same time he held, that there must be a general denial of notice in the plea, and special denial of the particular facts in the answer in support of the plea. But I think the averment of the plea, in this case, is too argumentative, and not sufficiently pointed. It is, "that this defendant had no notice whatever of any title, claim, or demand of the complainant, or of any other person, to or in the lands so purchased by this defendant, as aforesaid, which would affect the same or any of them, or any part thereof." Now this is no denial of notice of the asserted fraud and imposition; but it is merely arguing, that he had no notice of any title, etc., in the lands, which could affect the same. How can the court say, until it knows, what facts he had notice of, whether they would affect the title or not? The averment contains a denial of matters of law, and not of matters of fact.³

I have the less hesitation in overruling the plea absolutely on this account, because if it were permitted to stand for an answer with liberty to except, it would be defective, and upon exceptions must be amended. And no difficulty will occur in stating fully, by way of answer, all the matters which may establish the defence. At the same time I am satisfied, that the bill requires amendment, so as to charge the notice more directly; and the answer should meet the allegations more distinctly. Plea overruled.

[For subsequent proceedings, see Cases Nos. 17,952, 17,953, and 17,954.]

Case No. 17,952.

WOOD v. MANN.

[1 Summ. 578.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1834.

JURISDICTION OF COURT—CITIZENSHIP OF PARTIES —HOW OBJECTION RAISED—PLEA IN ABATEMENT—ANSWER.

1. The circuit courts of the United States are not inferior courts, in the sense of the common law.
2. Where the jurisdiction of the circuit court depends upon citizenship of the parties in different states, this must appear by proper averment in the record; and if it do not, the omission will be fatal at any stage of the cause. See Wilson v. City Bank [Case No. 17,797]; Bank of Cumberland v. Willis [Id. 885];

³ See Coop. Eq. Pl. p. 283; Mittf. Eq. Pl. (4th Ed., by Jeremy) pp. 286, 287; Jerrard v. Saunders, 2 Ves. Jr. 187, 4 Brown, Ch. 322; Claridge v. Hoare, 14 Ves. 59, 66.

¹ [Reported by Charles Sumner, Esq.]

Findlay's Ex'rs v. United States Bank [Id. 4,791].

[Cited in Brown v. Noyes, Case No. 2,023.]

[Cited in Adams v. Jeffries, 12 Ohio, 271.]

3. The exception to the jurisdiction of the court, by a denial of the fact of citizenship is of a preliminary nature, and must be taken by plea in abatement, and not by any general answer.

[Cited in Nesmith v. Calvert, Case No. 10,123; Brown v. Noyes, Id. 2,023.]

[Cited in Young v. Providence & S. S. S. Co., 150 Mass. 555, 23 N. E. 581.]

4. The twenty-third rule of the supreme court, in equity, declaring, "that the defendant, instead of a formal demurrer or plea, may insist upon any special matter in his answer, and have the same benefit thereof, as if he had pleaded the same matter, or demurred to the bill," is simply in affirmance of the common practice of courts of equity, and applies to matters to the merits, and not to such objections as are in abatement merely. Story, Eq. Pl. § 266.

5. Where an exception to the jurisdiction was taken in the answer, it was properly struck out, on reference to a master, for impertinence.

6. Impertinences are any matters not pertinent to those points, which are properly before the court for decision, at any particular stage of a cause.

Bill in equity [by Josiah Wood, Jr., against Samuel H. Mann]. The answer of the defendant was excepted to for impertinence, and referred to a master, who reported, that the answer, being a general answer to the whole bill on the merits, was impertinent in an allegation, which traversed and put in issue the citizenship of the plaintiff alleged in the bill. The defendant filed an exception to the report on this point.

B. Rand, for plaintiff.

F. Dexter and J. Mason, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The point now before the court is, whether the exception to the report of the master is well taken or not. The plaintiff in his bill has alleged, that he is a citizen of the state of New Hampshire, and that the defendant is a citizen of the state of Massachusetts. Upon the bill, therefore, it is clear, that the court has jurisdiction over the parties in the case. The defendant, however, instead of putting in a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, denying the citizenship of the plaintiff, has chosen to put in a general answer to the merits, and has prefaced it by a denial of the citizenship of the plaintiff; so that, if this proceeding is correct, upon the replication being filed, testimony must be taken to all the points involved in the answer, as well to that, which regards the citizenship of the plaintiff, as to those, which regard the merits; and the hearing must cover all the grounds in controversy. This course is most manifestly a very inconvenient one, and exceedingly embarrassing to the court. And the question is, whether the defendant has a title to insist upon it, as matter of right; for, as matter of discretion, to be allowed by the court, it is impossible, that any court should voluntarily submit itself to so much embarrassment.

That the denial of the citizenship of the plaintiff is matter proper for a plea in abatement; and that this is the usual form, in which it is brought before the court, cannot admit of any doubt. Whether, being thus matter properly in abatement of the suit for defect of jurisdiction, it can be insisted on in any other manner, or in any subsequent stage of the cause, is the very hinge of the present controversy. If we resort to the general analogies of law or equity for sources of argument, they seem to establish the general proposition, that matters properly pleadable in abatement cannot be taken advantage of in any other manner than by a plea in abatement. There are some exceptions; but they stand upon very peculiar grounds. There is a peculiar fitness in the application of this principle to cases of pleas to the jurisdiction; for a general answer certainly does, by necessary implication, admit the competency of the court to entertain the suit between the parties, and to take testimony, and hear it upon the merits. It is true, that if it is apparent upon the face of the record, that the court has not jurisdiction over the cause, or over the parties, the court will dismiss it, whether the parties consent to the jurisdiction or not. If therefore the subject matter is not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity; or the proper parties are not before it; or the case as made is not fit for the interposition of its authority; and the matters are apparent on the face of the proceedings, the court will of its own mere motion, in any stage of the cause, dismiss the bill. This is familiar practice in chancery in many classes of cases; and in the courts of the United States, it is also familiar in a class of cases, which, owing to their peculiar organization, can rarely occur in other courts of equity. The courts of the United States are courts of limited jurisdiction; but, as has been often solemnly settled, they are not inferior courts in the sense of the common law, whose jurisdiction is to be scanned by the niceties applied by the common law to inferior courts. The circuit courts of the United States have no jurisdiction of suits between citizens, unless they are citizens of different states; and not always even then, under the act of congress of 1789, c. 20 [1 Stat. 73]. In every writ and bill bringing a suit before the circuit court, it is, therefore, indispensable to show by proper averments in the record, that the plaintiff and defendant are citizens of different states; and the omission is fatal in any stage of the cause, unless it is cured by an amendment. But where the citizenship is properly averred, the circuit courts have complete jurisdiction, unless that jurisdiction is ousted by a denial of the citizenship and proof of the non-existence of the citizenship of either party as alleged. So many cases have been decided upon this distinction, that it has become a general doctrine, as unquestioned in fact, as it is unquestionable in its nature. But notwithstanding the circuit court may have the most clear jurisdiction over the parties, still the case or the subject-matter may not be within the proper jurisdiction of any municipal court in any form of proceeding, or not in the form adopted, either at law or in equity. In either case the objection is open; and the court itself will decline jurisdiction and dismiss the suit.

There is a perfect novelty in the present experiment upon the usual proceedings of courts of equity. That alone would lead one to doubt of its correctness. The very silence of the practice under such circumstances would be quite significant of what the true rule is. If the course of practice has been to take such an exception by way of plea to the jurisdiction, and not by way of general answer, or in a general answer, it would be difficult to believe, that the right existed, to take it by way of answer, and had never been tried. Upon looking into the books of practice I have not been able to find a single case, in which the slightest hint is given, that an exception of this nature can be taken otherwise than by a plea to the jurisdiction. It is uniformly stated to be a matter of abatement, and proper for a plea; and it is never alluded to, as having any place in a general answer, or as fit to be allowed to be there. Lord Redesdale, in his admirable treatise on Equity Pleadings (page 222), treats of it under this head, and this only. So do Mr. Cooper, Mr. Beames, Mr. Maddock, and Mr. Hind.² The orders of Lord Clarendon in chancery manifestly presuppose, that this is the appropriate, and, I may say, the only correct course. Beames, Orders Ch. pp. 172-174. Lord Hardwicke in Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sr. 446, puts the point in the very view which has been suggested: "To be sure," says he, "a plea to the jurisdiction must be offered in the first instance, and put in primo die; and answering submits to the jurisdiction; much more when there is a proceeding to hearing on the merits, which would be conclusive at common law. Yet a court of equity, which can exercise a more liberal discretion than common law courts, if a plain defect of jurisdiction appears at the hearing, will no more make a decree, than where a plain want of equity appears." And again, in Roberdeau v. Rous, 1 Atk. 544, Lord Hardwicke said, that the defendant should not in that case have demurred to the jurisdiction; for a demurrer is always in bar, and goes to the merits of the case; and therefore, that it was informal and improper in that respect; for he should have pleaded to the jurisdiction. Lord Eldon, in Iveson v. Harris, 7 Ves. 254, in effect remarked, that if a defendant in an inferior court has pleaded to the jurisdiction, he can plead nothing inconsistent with it; and therefore he must not do any thing to give the court jurisdiction; and if he has waived the objection, or has so pleaded as to make it incompetent to him to stay the proceedings afterwards, the objection is gone. See, also, Anon., 1 P. Wms. 476, 477. In Edgworth v. Davies, 1 Ch. Cas. 41, an objection, very similar to the present, was taken by way of plea; and the cases there cited show the general practice.

There being, then, a total absence of all direct authority in the case, what are the grounds, upon which the present exception can be maintained? First, it is argued that the twenty-third rule of the supreme court in equity causes (in 1822) declares, "that the defendant, instead of a formal demurrer or plea, may insist upon any special matter in his answer, and have the same benefit thereof, as if he had pleaded the same matter, or had demurred to the bill." But this rule is merely in affirmance of the common practice of courts of equity, and applies to matters to the merits, and not to such objections as are in abatement merely, and are not proper for a general answer. Again; it is argued, that the supreme court have, on various occasions, taken notice of defects of jurisdiction, and of objections thereto, although not taken by way of plea. That is true; but it was, where the matter was apparent upon the record; and not, where the matter was dehors the record, and properly to be brought forward by way of plea in abatement. Thus in Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 308, the question was, whether the citizenship of the parties, as described in the record, gave the court jurisdiction; not whether that citizenship as alleged was true in fact. The case of Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 422, turned merely upon the point, whether the proper parties were before the court for a decree, it being insisted, that the husband of one of the plaintiffs (a mere formal party and a defendant) appeared to be a citizen of the same state as the plaintiff, and so ousted the jurisdiction. In Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 558, the question was, not whether the court had jurisdiction over the parties to the suit, for that was clear; but whether the state of Ohio was not also a necessary party to a decree, the defendant being a mere nominal party, and the state having the real interest in the suit. It was not, then, a question of jurisdiction, but of proper parties to a final decree. Breithaupt v. Bank of State of Georgia, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 238, was a mere question, whether there was a sufficient averment of the citizenship of the parties on the record. The case of McDonald v. Smalley, Id. 620, can furnish no just precedent. The manner, in which the question came before the court, was founded upon a local statute, and the circuit court dismissed the bill for want of jurisdiction, upon ascertaining the facts in the mode prescribed by the local law. The objection, therefore, was taken in a peculiar mode, quite irregular indeed, but founded in local practice. In Conolly v. Taylor, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 556, the only question was, whether upon the facts of citizenship, as averred in the record, the court were ousted of jurisdiction. As to some of the parties, defendants, the court could not exercise any jurisdiction in the state, where the suit was brought; as to others, it could. The bill might be dismissed as to the former, and retained as to the latter. The substantial objection was, that one of the original plaintiffs was a party, who could not sue as plaintiff in the circuit court; but this objection was removed by striking out his name as plaintiff, and making him (as might properly be done) a defendant. The cases, then, which have been relied on in support of the right, totally fail to establish it. They are distinguishable upon clear and admitted principles.

² Coop. Eq. Pl. pp. 238-240; Beames, Eq. Pl. pp. 53, 56-62; Id. pp. 77, 79-98; 2 Madd. Ch. Prac. pp. 238-241. See, also, Lube, Eq. pp. 208, 209; Com. Dig. "Chancery," I, 1; Hind, Prac. pp. 170, 171, 195, 214; 2 Hov. Supp. p. 20.

But, if there were no practice, and no authority bearing on the present question, how ought it to be decided on principle? It seems to me, that upon principle it is necessarily of a preliminary nature, and ought, therefore, to be taken by plea, and not by any general answer. So the admitted rule is at common law; and it has been repeatedly recognised by the supreme court. Courts of chancery in many cases, as to pleadings, follow the rules of the common law. See Story v. Lord Windsor, 2 Atk. 630, 632. And many objections to the jurisdiction of courts of equity, which might be taken at an earlier stage, come too late at a hearing of the merits, or after the parties have gone on to proceedings, which presuppose jurisdiction. The rule was recognised in Underhill v. Van Cortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. 369, and Ludlow v. Simond, 2 Caines, Cas. 56. There is good sense in the distinction; and indeed the doctrine is less founded in the mere municipal jurisprudence of a single nation, than in the principles of universal law. It is quite as much the law at Rome, as it is in England or America. All pleas to the jurisdiction are objections to entering into the litis contestatio; and they must, and ought, therefore, to precede the litis contestatio. When the party submits the merits of the case to be heard by the court on the pleadings and testimony, he admits, that the court has jurisdiction for the purpose. Until it is ascertained, that the court has jurisdiction to inquire into the merits, what authority is there to authorize the hearing? Consider for a moment the difficulties in the case now before the court. The defendant makes a general answer. He requires the court to examine the whole merits; he puts at issue all the material grounds of defence; he requires testimony, if they are contested, to be taken to establish them. How can the court order commissions to take testimony on the merits, if it has no jurisdiction? Until this is firmly established, it has no authority to take a single step beyond the facts necessary to establish it. Suppose the defendant's answer is false in its allegations; or evasive, or insufficient; can the court proceed to ascertain, whether it is subject to exceptions of this sort, until its jurisdiction is established? Suppose the party after an insufficient answer is in contempt; can the court proceed to punish him, while the question is yet pending of jurisdiction, or not? So, if the witnesses under the commission refuse to answer to the merits, and are in contempt, are they under the like circumstances punishable? Suppose they swear falsely, are they indictable, if the jurisdiction should be ultimately surrendered upon proofs in pais? These, and many other questions may be asked; and I cannot perceive, how they can be satisfactorily answered, if the doctrine of the defendant's counsel is admitted. When the general replication is filed to a general answer, the proofs must be taken to all the material facts, which are controverted. The hearing must be upon the whole facts. The court cannot direct proofs to be taken to the single point of jurisdiction in the answer, excluding all other proofs. Such a course is utterly unknown in chancery. It would overthrow all rules on this subject. I confess myself wholly unable to arrive at any other conclusion, than that upon principle such a mixture of matters in abatement and to the merits is wholly inadmissible. I do not quote the case of Dodge v. Perkins [Case No. 3,954], as an authority on the point, though, at least to the judges sitting under that decision, it ought to have some weight, unless they are clearly convinced, that it was erroneous in its principles. The principle stated in that case, and applicable to the present, was not an obiter dictum. It was a question directly before the court, and formed the very ground-work of the ultimate order made in the cause, giving leave to the plaintiff to amend his bill, and to the defendant to withdraw his answer, and to plead. I know, that the question was then very deliberately considered by the court; and the position taken was supposed to be one sustained by established principles. In the course of my attendance in the supreme court, since that period, I have constantly supposed, when questions of this sort have arisen, that the doctrine was clear. I never have heard it doubted or denied by the judges; and if it were not, that I dare not trust my memory upon subjects, where decisions in print do not confirm it, I should be inclined to say, that the habit of the court was, at least by implication, to acknowledge and act upon the doctrine, although there may have been no formal promulgation of it. But if there be no decision in favor of the doctrine, I feel great confidence, that there is none against it. And, upon principle, I have not a single doubt, what the rule is, and ought to be. There is, however, a late case before the vice chancellor, Chichester v. Donegal, 6 Madd. 375, which appears to me to settle, as far as authority may settle, this doctrine, upon the footing for which I contend. And it is the stronger, because it coincides with the opinion of Lord Stowell upon the same point in the ecclesiastical court. "I state," said the vice chancellor, "without exception, as a general principle, that in courts of equity, as well as courts of law, a party admitting a fact, which gives jurisdiction to a court, and appearing and submitting to that jurisdiction, upon general principles and upon all analogies known to us, can never recede, or, as it is called in the Scotch law, 'resile,' from those facts, and withdraw that admission." And in the very case, in which this opinion was given, the only admission was by implication arising from the party's having omitted to plead to the jurisdiction, and entering into proceedings upon the merits of the case.

The remaining question is, whether the exception can be properly taken in this form upon a reference to the master, and a report for impertinence. It does not strike me, that this point is of any serious importance; for if the court should be satisfied, that the matter was not proper for an answer, and involved inquiries, not in that stage of the cause open to litigation, I have no doubt, that it would be the duty of the court, as a matter of self-protection, to suppress it. It is a great mistake to suppose, that, if the parties do not object to a matter, the court are bound to entertain cognizance of it, and to decide it. But is this matter of impertinence or not? It is argued, that it is not, because it does not answer the description given by Gilbert in his Forum Romanum (page 209), where he says, that "Impertinences are, where the records of the court are stuffed with long recitals, or with long digressions of matters of fact, which are altogether unnecessary and totally immaterial to the point in question," and he then proceeds to illustrate it by instances. Doubtless such matters, as he states, are impertinences. But they are not the only matters of this sort, even if the generality of expression in the latter part of the sentence, as to immaterial facts, would not (as I am not prepared to admit) cover the present case. Impertinences are, as I conceive, any matters not pertinent or relevant to the points, which, in the particular stage of the proceedings, in which the cause then is, can properly come before the court for decision. If the cause is at issue upon a general answer, purporting to be to the merits, any matter not going to the merits is properly to be deemed an impertinence. Lord Clarendon's orders³ put this matter in a clear light. Counsel are to take care, says the order, that the bill, answer, or other pleading "be not stuffed with repetition of deeds, etc., in hæc verba; but the effect and substance of so much of them only, as is pertinent and material to be set down, and that in brief terms, without long and needless traverse of points not traversable, (that is, as I conceive, not traversable in that stage of the cause,) tautologies, multiplication of words, or other impertinences, occasioning needless prolixity," etc. The cases of Nanney v. Totty, 11 Price, 117, and Wagstaff v. Bryan,

1 Russ. & M. 28, appear to me to be very closely in point, as to this very matter of impertinence. It may be added, that the twenty-second section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, manifestly contemplates matters declinatory of the jurisdiction to be in abatement, and to be taken advantage of by way of plea. It provides, that no writs of error shall be sustained and reversals had (and appeals are governed by the same regulations) for error in ruling any plea in abatement, other than a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, or such a plea to a petition or bill in equity, as is in the nature of a demurrer.

Upon the whole, my opinion is, that the master's report is correct; that the exception to it ought to be overruled, and the report to stand confirmed accordingly; and the allegation to be struck out from the answer for impertinence. Livingston v. Story, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 393. Decree accordingly.

[For other proceedings in this case, see Cases Nos. 17,951, 17,953, and 17,954.]

Case No. 17,953.

WOOD v. MANN et al.

[2 Summ. 316.] 1

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1836.

EQUITY PROCEDURE—PUBLICATION OF TESTIMONY —EXAMINATION OF NEW WITNESSES—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. The general rule of equity proceedings is, that after publication of the testimony, no new witnesses can be examined, and no new evidence can be taken, unless where the judge himself, upon or after the hearing, entertains a doubt, or when some additional fact, or inquiry is indispensable to enable him to make a satisfactory decree.

[Cited in Eilert v. Craps, 44 Fed. 793.]

2. A witness may be examined to the mere credit of the other witnesses, whose depositions have been already taken and published in the cause, but he will not be allowed to be examined, to prove or disprove any fact, material to the merits of the case.

[Cited in Teese v. Huntingdon, 23 How. (64 U. S.) 12.]

3. The time for publication will be enlarged, or more properly, the time for taking the testimony will be enlarged, after publication has passed, though not in fact made, according to the rules of the court, provided some good cause therefor is shown upon affidavit, as surprise, accident, or other circumstances, which repels any imputation of laches. The affidavit is indispensable, except in a case of fraud, practised by the other party.

4. Exhibits in the cause may be proved after publication, and even vivâ voce at the hearing, when there has been an omission of the proof in due season, and they are applicable to the merits.

5. Fresh interrogatories and a re-examination have been permitted after publication, where depositions have been suppressed from the interrogatories being leading, or for irregularity, or where it has been discovered, that a proper release has not been given, to make a witness competent.

6. Semble, that new testimony may be taken after publication to facts and conversations occurring after the original cause is at issue, and publication has passed.

³ Beames, Orders Ch. pp. 165, 166; Id. p. 167, and note 6. See Mitf. Eq. Pl. p. 318.

¹ Reported by Charles Sumner, Esq.]

[Cited in Gass v. Stinson, Case No. 5,261; Jenkins v. Eldredge, Id. 7,267.]

7. The court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, allow the introduction of newly discovered evidence of witnesses to facts in issue in the cause, after publication and knowledge of the former testimony, and even after the hearing. But it will not exercise this discretion to let in merely cumulative testimony.

[Cited in Ocean Ins. Co. v. Fields, Case No. 10,406; Jenkins v. Eldredge, Id. 7,267.]

8. The same rule holds in cases of bills of review, and supplementary bills in the nature of bills of review.

[Cited in Irwin v. Meyrose, 7 Fed. 536.]

9. Semble, that the rule ought to be confined to cases of the discovery of new evidence of a documentary nature, and the testimony of witnesses, necessary to substantiate this.

Bill in equity [by Josiah Wood, Jr., against Samuel H. Mann and others] to set aside a certain conveyance made by the complainant to one John R. Adams (a defendant,) asserted to have been procured by fraud and imposition, upon the plaintiff. The case has already been twice before the court, on interlocutory motions [Cases Nos. 17,951 and 17,952], and was set down for a hearing, at the next September adjournment of the court. A petition was now filed on behalf of the plaintiff, to take the testimony of a witness, to be used in the cause, at the hearing, upon the ground, that it was material testimony, going to the merits of the case, as put in issue, and which has been very recently (within a few weeks) discovered by the plaintiff. The petition was supported by the affidavit of the plaintiff, as to the recency of the discovery of the evidence, any by an ex parte deposition, given by the witness himself of the facts, which he can establish, consisting of confessions made by the defendant, Mann, to the witness about five years ago, and before the institution of the present suit. Publication of the evidence in the cause passed nearly a year ago; the parties have long been in full possession of it; and indeed, for their convenience it was printed, and open to the freest inspection. The question was on the admissibility of this evidence, at this stage of the cause.

B. Rand, for plaintiff.

F. Dexter, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Of the materiality of the testimony now proposed to be taken, no doubt can be entertained. It goes to establish many of the leading points of fact in controversy between the parties; and if not vital in the cause, it is on all sides admitted to have a most stringent force and pressure. It is under circumstances, so rare and so novel, that this court is called upon to decide one of the most important and delicate questions of practice; than which, indeed, few, if any, can be presented, better deserving of deliberate consideration, and striking deeper into the foundations of equity jurisprudence. It is upon this account, that I have taken time to examine the whole subject, with all the aids, which could be derived from the labors of counsel and my own auxiliary researches; feeling, as I do, an anxious desire to perform on the present occasion, exactly what upon the most careful survey of principles and authorities, it is my duty judicially to perform. The general rule in equity proceedings is, that, after publication of the testimony, no new witnesses can be examined, and no new evidence can be taken. This rule is at least as old as the time of Lord Bacon, among whose Ordinances in Chancery, we find the following: "No witnesses shall be examined after publication, except by consent, or by special order ad informandum conscientiam judicis; and then to be brought close sealed up to the court to peruse or publish, as the court shall think good." The true exposition of the latter qualification of this rule would seem to be, that the new evidence to inform the conscience of the judge, should not be taken, but upon or after the hearing, when the judge himself entertains a doubt, or when some additional fact or inquiry is indispensable to enable him to make a satisfactory decree. So was the doctrine held in Newland v. Horseman, 2 Ch. Cas. 74; and it is strongly fortified by what fell from Lord Manners in Savage v. Carroll, 2 Ball & B. 444, and by the master of the rolls in Parken v. Whitby, 1 Turn. & R. 366. Except for such purposes and under some special order of the court itself at or after the hearing, no such testimony, taken after publication, is now deemed admissible, at least unless under extraordinary circumstances, under the rules. The practice of taking such testimony before the hearing, and keeping it sealed up to be used by the court at the hearing, if it should be deemed meet, is said by the text-writers to have fallen into disuse, and not to have been in practice for more than a century.² There is an old case reported in Cary, 83, which shows what the old practice was; and I quote it in the very words of the report. "Upon affidavit made by the plaintiff, that since publication granted he had divers witnesses (setting down their names) come to his knowledge; therefore ordered he may examine them before the examiner, ad informandum conscientiam judicis." No other circumstances are stated; and therefore it is impossible to know, what the facts were, or whether the other testimony taken had been actually seen by the plaintiff.

The general rule is founded in the obvious public policy of suppressing perjury, and the fabrication of evidence, to meet the exigencies of the cause after the full bearing and weight of the testimony are understood by all the parties. If, under such circumstances, the parties were permitted to supply the actual deficiencies of the evidence from time to time, as they should be found out, there would be strong temptations to corrupt, and insidious practices to obtain new evidence; and there would be a premium held out for delays and omissions of diligence in taking the evidence, until the whole strength of the adversary's cause was disclosed. Courts of equity, from considerations of this sort, have always been disposed to uphold the rule with a firm and rigid exactness. Lord Eldon, in Whitelocke v. Baker, 13 Ves. 511, said: "This court will not enlarge publication, without a very special case made. The party's want of knowledge of the rules of proceeding, and want of attention in his solicitor, are not sufficient. The rules of justice are founded in great general principles, not to be broken down by such circumstances." Lord Macclesfield, in Cann v. Cann, 1 P. Wms. 727, laid down the doctrine in more emphatic terms. "The precedent methods (said he) of this court were, that, after publication is passed, and the purport of the examinations known to the parties, neither side is allowed, though they come recent, to enter into part examination of the matters in question, since otherwise there would be no end of things, and such a proceeding would tend to perjury, as well as vexation."

² Hind, Prac. 316; Beames, Orders Ch. 33, notes 117, 118; Dalby v. Mace, Toth. 192; Cary, 83; Wyatt, Prac. Reg. 354, 355; Willan v. Willan, 19 Ves. 592.

Exceptions, however, have been admitted to the general rule; and to these our attention will now be directed, in order to ascertain, how far they are applicable to the circumstances of the case before the court. The exceptions will be found for the most part to turn upon grounds entirely consistent with the policy of the general rule, and in no manner trenching upon its justice or inconvenience. At the same time, they exhibit in a marked manner the reluctance of the court to break in upon the general uniformity of the practice, except under very special circumstances.

It will not be necessary to go over the authorities at large; for they do not present any general diversity of judgment, requiring comment or criticism. They rather arrange themselves into classes, in each of which every successive judge has shown a solicitude to keep within the limits prescribed by his predecessors.

The first class of exceptions is, that of the examination of witnesses to the mere credit of the other witnesses, whose depositions have been already taken in the cause. This is the ordinary practice, and is done upon articles or objections filed. Beames, Orders Ch. p. 32, § 72; Id. p. 187, § 80. But, then, in these cases, the general interrogatory only, whether he (the proposed witness,) would believe the other on his oath, (which is the usual form of putting the interrogatory in England, and differs widely from that, in which it is usually put in America; see 1 Starkie, Ev., 2d Ed. London, 1833, 182; Watmore v. Dickinson, 2 Ves. & B. 267, 268; Carlos v. Brook, 10 Ves. 50), is that, upon which the new examination is allowed, unless under very special circumstances. And there is this close limitation upon such special circumstances, that the interrogatory shall not be to any facts put in issue in the suit; but only to such facts, as merely touch the credit of the witness. This doctrine was expounded very fully, by Lord Eldon in Purcell v. M'Namara, 8 Ves. 324, 326; Wood v. Hammerton, 9 Ves. 145; Carlos v. Brook, 10 Ves. 50; White v. Fussell, 1 Ves. & B. 153; and it was recognized and acted upon by Mr. Chancellor Kent in Troup v. Sherwood, 3 Johns. Ch. 558, where he critically examined the leading authorities. But, what is most important in its bearing on the present case, is the absolute refusal of the court in these cases, to allow the witness to be contradicted as to any fact, which he had sworn, touching the merits of the matters in issue between the parties. "If," said Lord Eldon, in Purcell v. M'Namara, "for instance, the fact is material to the merits of the case, and the witness has sworn to it, there is great danger of bringing other witnesses, under color of discrediting that witness, to prove or disprove such fact." See Gilb. Forum Rom. 147; Smith v. Turner, 3 P. Wms. 413.

Another class of exceptions is, where the application is made to enlarge the time for publication, or more frequently to enlarge the time for taking the testimony after publication has been, in form, though not in fact, made, according to the rules of the court. To such applications, whenever they will cause any delay in the cause, the court does not listen without some good cause shown upon affidavit; such as surprise, accident, or other circumstances, which repel any imputation of laches. See Gilb. Forum Rom. 124; 1 Harris, Ch. Prac. (by Newland) c. 43, pp. 285, 287. See, also, Watmore v. Dickinson, 2 Ves. & B. 267, 268; Cutler v. Cremer, 6 Madd. 254. And in all cases of this sort before the application is allowed, the party and his clerk in court, and solicitor, are required to make oath, "that they have neither seen, heard, read, nor been informed of any of the contents of the depositions taken in that cause; nor will they see, hear, read or be informed of the same till publication is duly passed in the cause." Gilb. Forum Rom. 146. See, also, Anon., 1 Vern. 253; Hind, Prac. 384, 385. And this affidavit is so important, that the court will never dispense with it, except in a case of fraud practised by the other party, to evade the rule; as was the case in a memorable instance in Lord Somers's time, stated by Chief Baron Gilbert (Gilb. Forum Rom. 146). Lord Eldon, in commenting on the affidavit, and the strictness of the rule requiring it, said: "That it is founded upon this, that no more dangerous mode of proceeding can take place than permitting parties to make out evidence by piecemeal, and to make up the deficiency of original depositions by other evidence." Whitelocke v. Baker, 13 Ves. 512. In the same case, where a motion was made, the effect of which was to introduce new evidence to be taken after the cause had been set down for a hearing, he added: "The next ground for this motion is the materiality of the farther evidence, which it is supposed can be given. If that could be represented as most highly material, I dare not trust myself with laying down a precedent, that would authorize attempts to bring forward an application in every case, where even after a cause had been set down the party might see, that it would not be convenient to hear the cause upon the evidence, on which he originally intended to put it. The danger from that would be enormous." Whitelocke v. Baker, 13 Ves. 512. The only material abatement from the force of this language, as applied to the present case, is, that it was spoken in a case not of newly discovered evidence, but of known evidence alleged to have been improperly and irregularly taken. Mr. Chancellor Kent, in Hamersly v. Lambert, 2 Johns. Ch. 432, reviewed the authorities, and sustained the doctrine, as above stated, with all the weight of his own great opinion.

Another class of exceptions is the proof of exhibits in the cause, after publication, and even viva voce at the hearing, where there has been an omission of the proof in due season, and they are applicable to the merits. Gilbert, in his Forum Romanum (p. 183), takes notice of this practice, and says: "Upon this rehearing any exhibit may be proved viva voce, as upon the original hearing. But no proof can be offered of any new matter, without special leave of the court, which is seldom granted." The like doctrine is fully supported in many cases. See Wright v. Pilling, Finch, Prec. 496; Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley, 10 Ves. 238; Buckmaster v. Harrop, 13 Ves. 458; White v. Fussell, 1 Ves. & B. 153; Higgins v. Mills, 5 Russ. 287; Wyld v. Ward, 2 Younge & J. 334; Williams v. Goodchild, 2 Russ. 91; Dale v. Roosevelt, 6 Johns. Ch. 256.

Another class of exceptions is, where depositions have been suppressed, from the interrogatories being leading, or for irregularity, or where it has been discovered, that a proper release has not been given to make a witness competent; in every such case, from the obvious necessity, and in furtherance of justice, fresh interrogatories, and a re-examination have been permitted. Lord Arundell v. Pitt, Amb. 585; Perry v. Silvester, Jac. 83; Curre v. Bowyer, 3 Swanst. 357; Sandford v. Paul, 3 Brown, Ch. 370; s. c. 1 Ves. Jr. 398, 2 Dickens, 750; Spence v. Allen, Finch, Prec. 493; Shaw v. Lindsey, 15

Ves. 380; Cox v. Allingham, Jac. 337, 341, 343; Callow v. Mince, 2 Vern. 472. In the case of Sandford v. Paul, 2 Dickens, 750, 3 Brown, Ch. 370, and 1 Ves. Jr. 398, it appears from Mr. Dickens' Reports, that the subject was a good deal examined, and many authorities are cited by the reporter to show, that the strictness of the rule had been relaxed in special cases of this nature.

All these classes of exceptions stand upon peculiar grounds, and steer wide from any of the just objections, which have been urged against the introduction of new evidence, after the pressure of the evidence, as taken, is fully known to both parties. The qualifications and limitations accompanying these exceptions demonstrate, in the most full and satisfactory manner, that the design of upholding the policy of the general rule constitutes the main ingredient in the view of the court in acceding to, or refusing every application. If the existence of the evidence is fully known at the time of the taking of the depositions, and if it is not purely the case of written evidence, it will be difficult to find any uniform relaxation of the general rule, that after publication passed, and the depositions have been seen, no new evidence shall be admitted.

The question, then, is reduced to this, whether new evidence by witnesses, which has been discovered since publication has passed, and the contents of the depositions been made known, can, consistently with the general objects and purposes of the rule, be allowed? Now, this is partly a matter of authority, and partly of principle. And I fully agree, that, if upon a rehearing, or upon a bill of review, or upon a bill in the nature of a bill of review, the evidence of new witnesses ought to be let in, then it ought now to be allowed, to avoid circuitry of remedy and increased expenses in litigation. If, on the other hand, it would not, under such circumstances, be allowed; and if, in analogous cases, it has been rejected; and if no direct authority can be shown in favor of the motion; then, since it must be a case of not infrequent occurrence in practice, each of these considerations will furnish strong objections against the motion.

I have said, that if upon a rehearing, or a bill of review, the plaintiff would be entitled to the benefit of this testimony, he ought now to be entitled to it; and, as it is applicable to points already in issue, there is no need of a supplementary bill. In this view of the subject I feel myself strongly fortified by the language of Lord Eldon in Milner v. Lord Harewood, 17 Ves. 148. "There is" (said he) "no recollection of a supplemental bill of this kind; and if a new practice is to be settled, the strong inclination of my opinion is, that when the particular case arises, where either conversation or admission of the defendant becomes material after answer or replication; or, as in this instance, after examination of witnesses in the original cause; or if a new fact happens after publication, which it is material to have before the court in evidence. when the original cause is heard, it is much better, if the examination of witnesses, if required, should be obtained upon a special application for the opportunity of examining, and that the depositions may be read at the hearing; or if discovery is required, that the party should file a bill for that purpose merely; and if relief is required, that the answer comprehending the discovery, should be read at the hearing of the original cause." This language would certainly seem to show, that there were cases, in which new testimony might be taken after publication, at least as to facts and conversations occurring after the original cause is at issue, and publication passed. Here, however, the application is to admit newly discovered evidence of confessions before the bill was filed. In Willan v. Willan, 19 Ves. 591, Coop. Eq. 291, the same great judge said: "It is perfectly established, that after publication, previous to a decree, and the depositions have been seen, you cannot examine witnesses farther without leave of the court, which is not obtained without great difficulty; and the examination is generally confined to some particular facts. At the hearing of the cause, the court sees all the evidence; and if, instead of deciding upon inference, it directs inquiries, the decree directing these inquiries is, in truth, the leave of the court given for farther examination of witnesses upon the very point." It is difficult to ascertain the precise limitations, which ought to be applied to language so general; and whether the learned judge meant merely to advance the suggestion, that the court might, to satisfy its own conscience, direct new evidence to be taken at or after the hearing; or whether he meant to state, generally, that new testimony might be taken, upon a case made to the court, at any time after publication, and before the hearing. Unfortunately, the case did not call for a more explicit declaration of opinion. But my impression is, that the former was all, that was intended by the language.

In Smith v. Turner, 3 P. Wms. 413, the cause was heard, and there appearing to the court some reason to suspect, that the defendant had a deed in his custody, it was ordered, that he should be examined on interrogatories touching the deed. Upon the examination, he denied his having the deed, and all the circumstances relating thereto. The master. certified, notwithstanding, that he thought it reasonable, that the plaintiff, who prayed a commission to examine witnesses to falsify the defendant's examination, should have one. But the court refused it, saying: "At this rate three or four causes might spring out of one; and though there could be no mischief in examining the party himself; yet the examining witnesses, after publication passed, especially where it may relate to the matter in issue, is against the rule of the court, and may be greatly inconvenient, and make causes endless." This case certainly affords a strong illustration of the real purport of the general rule; and would make one hesitate in supposing, that Lord Eldon meant, in the cases above stated, to maintain a broader doctrine.

In Ward v. Eyles, Mos. 377, the court would not allow a party in a cross bill to examine witnesses after publication passed, and the depositions seen, to the matters in issue in the original cause. On that occasion, the lord chancellor said: "There is no rule in this court more sacred, than, that witnesses shall not be examined in another cause, to matters in issue in a former." Yet, certainly, in a cross bill, the party would be entitled to more favor, than upon a mere application in the original cause.

In Mayor of London v. Dorset, 1 Ch. Cas. 228, where a trial of an issue was directed at law, an application was made for a commission to examine a witness eighty years old, who was not discovered until that time, and was unable to travel. If she was able to travel, she would be examinable at the trial, though publication had passed. The court granted the commission, apparently, as it should seem, upon the ground, that otherwise the testimony would be lost; and yet the witness might, if living, be examinable at the trial at law.

In Bank v. Farques, Amb. 145, 1 Dickens, 167, where a hearing was adjourned over, and it was moved for liberty to examine a witness, to prove the handwriting of a witness to a deed, material in the cause, the motion was granted by Lord Hardwicke. So, in Abrams v. Winshup, 1 Russ. 526, where the evidence proved the execution of the will; but the witnesses had not been examined as to the sanity of the testator; the cause was adjourned at the hearing, and liberty given to exhibit an interrogatory to prove his sanity. In each of these cases, the object was special, to establish the verity of a necessary document in the cause.

In Blake v. Foster, 2 Ball & B. 457, an application was made upon the hearing for liberty to adduce newly discovered evidence partly oral, and partly documentary. It was rejected, not upon any ground of the nature of the evidence; but because it was not in reality newly discovered. The case, therefore, decides nothing to our present purpose.

In Clarke v. Jennings, 1 Anstr. 173, 174, a motion was made after publication for leave to exhibit interrogatories, to authenticate an old paper writing material in the cause, and for a commission to prove the same. The motion was opposed as being too late, and that exhibits only can be proved after publication. The court of exchequer thought, that though not an exhibit, it was in the nature of one, and granted the rule, so as that it did not delay the hearing of the cause. It is proper to remark, that the application was confined to a mere written document.

In Williamson v. Hutton, 9 Price, 194, after a title cause had been set down for a rehearing, a motion was made on behalf of the plaintiff for the examination of one or more witnesses, to prove certain accounts or rentals, and a terrier or memorandum, made by a former vicar, and to read the depositions at the rehearing, upon the ground of their having been discovered since the original hearing, and were before unknown to the plaintiff. The court granted the motion; and it was added: "If these papers had been found at the hearing, we should have ordered the cause to stand over, for the purpose of giving the plaintiff an opportunity of exhibiting an interrogatory." This too was the case of a written document.

In Cox v. Allingham, Jac. 337, permission was given at the hearing to exhibit an interrogatory as to the loss of a deed, omitted by mistake to be proved in the proper manner. Sir Thomas Plumer, in delivering his opinion on this occasion, stated his strong impression of the dangers, that would arise, if in every instance a party, whose case broke down at the hearing, were at liberty to go into farther evidence. At the same time he admitted, that it was too late to argue, that there could be no case of exception to the general rule, after it had been departed from in some instances, and by great authorities. He also took notice of the circumstance, that the evidence proposed to be given related only to the proof of a document.

In Ord v. Noel, 6 Madd. 127, an application was made to file a supplemental bill, in the nature of a bill of review, on account of the discovery of some deeds and facts, connected therewith, since the decree. The vice chancellor refused the petition; and the only remarks, material to our present purpose, which he made on that occasion, are,—that if the plaintiff had applied, after he had discovered the contents of these deeds, and before the cause was finally heard, to have the benefit of this discovery at the hearing, the court would have found the means to render him that justice; and, that the new matter for a bill of the nature proposed must be such as, if unanswered, would clearly entitle the plaintiff to a decree, or would raise a case of so much nicety and difficulty, as to be a fit subject of judgment in a cause. Brigham v. Dawson, Jac. 243, was a similar application, and shared a similar fate.

Coley v. Coley, 2 Younge & J. 44, was an application after publication passed, and the cause set down for a hearing, for liberty to examine two further witnesses, one only having been examined, to prove the execution of a will in the pleadings mentioned. The court granted it, saying, that if upon the hearing of the cause, the plaintiff had been unable to prove the execution of the will, the case would have been allowed to stand over, for the purpose of supplying that proof, upon payment of the costs of the day.

Then came Wylid v. Ward, 2 Younge & J. 881, where upon a rehearing, a motion was made to exhibit an interrogatory to prove certain facts, upon the ground, that they were newly discovered since the original hearing. Upon this occasion, there was an elaborate argument by counsel. But the court granted the motion, saying; that it had a discretion to grant or refuse it, according to the circumstances of the particular case.

In Williams v. Goodchild, 2 Russ. 91, an application was made, upon an appeal from a decree of the vice chancellor to the lord chancellor, for permission to use on the hearing of the appeal, some old documents and bailiff's accounts, which had been discovered since the original hearing. On that occasion Lord Eldon said: "I cannot lay it down, that new evidence can in no case be received; nor will I decide, that it is not to be introduced in this case, if the evidence, here tendered, shall be shown to be in its nature admissible, and a proper ground for its introduction shall be laid." The question was afterwards adjusted by an arrangement between the parties.

These are all the English authorities, bearing directly on the point now before the court, which the researches of counsel, as well as my own, have brought to my notice. What is very remarkable is, that not one of them presents the case of an application to introduce newly discovered oral evidence; or newly discovered witnesses; but they all relate to written documentary evidence. The courts, upon deciding upon these applications, however, made no allusion to any distinction, or practice excluding oral evidence; and the generality of the language sometimes used might incline one to believe, that the evidence of new witnesses might, under some circumstances, be within the contemplation of the court. Finding no direct English authority, either way, upon the point of the exclusion of oral evidence, unconnected with new written evidence, I have sought for information in cases of an analogous nature, such as bills of review, and supplementary bills, in the nature of bills of review; for (I repeat it), if in such cases, the evidence would be admissible, it ought now to be admitted. Unfortunately, there are not many cases of this sort to be found, and those, which do exist, do not afford any very satisfactory lights to settle the question now before the court. Indeed, bills of review are of very rare occurrence. Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst in Partridge v. Usborne, 5 Russ. 249, 250, observed, that for the period of a century past very few instances had occurred of bills of review having been allowed to be filed. In that very case, he allowed matters, dependent upon oral as well as written evidence, which had been discovered since the decree, to be brought forward by a supplemental bill, in the nature of a bill of review. But then they related to facts, not previously in issue in the cause. He thus settled a doubt, which had long existed on this very subject; and in respect to which, there was a dictum of Lord Eldon the other way, in Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 348.

Lord Chief Baron Gilbert (Gilb. Forum Rom. 186), in laying down the rules, as to granting bills of review, puts one of the requisites in these words: "Thirdly; they can examine to nothing, that was in issue in the original cause, unless it be any matter happening subsequent, which was not before in issue, or upon matter of record, or writing, not known before. For, if the court should give them leave to enter into proofs upon the same points, that were in issue, that would be under the same mischief, as the examination of witnesses after publication, and an inlet into manifest perjury." Now, if this is to be deemed a true exposition of the doctrine in courts of equity, it makes an end of the present application. The difficulty is, whether the modern decisions affirm the practice in so limited a form.

Lord Hardwicke in Norris v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 35, said, that the rules of Lord Bacon upon bills of review had never been departed from. And, professing to give the substance of those rules, he added: "By the established practice of this court there are two sorts of bills of review; one founded on supposed error appearing in the decree itself; the other a new matter, which must arise after the decree; or upon new proof, which could not have been used at the time, when the decree passed." The ordinance of Lord Bacon is substantially as here stated; his language on the last matter is: "Nevertheless, upon new proof, that is come to light after the decree made, and could not possibly have been used at the time, when the decree passed, a bill of review may be grounded." Beames, Orders Ch. p. 2, note 3. See, also, Patterson v. Slaughter, Amb. 293. In the case of Norris v. Le Neve, the application for the bill of review was not confined to "new proof" of a mere documentary character; but it embraced other facts of an oral nature; and Lord Hardwicke took no notice of any distinction between oral and written evidence. But he did take notice, that the new discoveries amounted to no more than corroboratives only of the former points in issue. In another case (Gould v. Tancred, 2 Atk. 533), before the same great judge, no notice was taken of any positive distinction between oral and written evidence, although certainly there may be good ground for such a distinction. In Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 354, which indeed was an application founded on the discovery of new documentary evidence, Lord Eldon said: "As far as I can ascertain, what the court permits with regard to bills of review upon facts newly discovered (he does not say, 'documents'), the decisions appear to have been upon new evidence, which, if produced in time, would have supported the original case." He added also in the same case: "The ground is even apparent on the face of the decree; a new evidence of a fact (not saying 'written evidence') materially pressing upon the decree, and discovered at least after publication in the cause." In Partidge v. Osborne, 5 Russ. 195, the new evidence (which went to points not before in issue) was certainly largely founded in mere oral proofs and testimony; yet it was admitted. The language of Lord Eldon in Milner v. Lord Harewood, 17 Ves. 148, already cited, appears to me to confirm the conclusion, that upon rehearings and bills of review, upon newly discovered evidence, parol evidence to facts is not necessarily prohibited by any general practice or rule of law.

I had occasion, in the case of Dexter v. Arnold [Case No. 3,856], to examine this subject with a good deal of care in reference to bills of review. I was not, at that time, able to satisfy my mind, that the doctrine, as to the admissibility of newly discovered evidence, was limited to written evidence of a documentary nature. The subsequent authorities have not helped the matter in this particular. Upon principle it may, perhaps, be found difficult in all cases practically so to limit it; although no person is more sensible than myself of the great inconvenience and danger of admitting new evidence of a parol nature, after the former evidence in the cause has been seen; and, a fortiori, after the original cause has been heard. The reasons are well stated in Jones v. Purefoy, 1 Vern. 47, and still more forcibly in the case of Respass v. McClanahan, Hardin, 350, 351, to which I shall presently advert. In examining the decisions of Mr. Chancellor Kent, in which he has collected the leading English decisions on this point, not only after publication, but upon bills of review, it will be seen, that he has exhibited a strong disinclination to allow the introduction of any newly discovered evidence, merely cumulative or not of a documentary nature. This is manifested in an especial manner in Hamersley v. Lambert, 2 Johns. Ch. 432, in Livingston v. Hubbs, 3 Johns. Ch. 124, and Troup v. Sherwood, Id. 558. Yet he is compelled to admit, that there may be exceptions to the general rule. I cannot find, however, that he has ever made a direct decision, that the newly discovered evidence of witnesses to the facts in issue is not admissible on a hearing, or rehearing, or bill of review. He has, indeed, on one occasion said, that the nature of the newly discovered evidence must be different from that of the mere accumulation of witnesses to a litigated fact. Livingston v. Hubbs, Id. 127. But his decision did not turn particularly upon that point. The language in Taylor v. Sharp, 3 P. Wms. 371, upon which he has placed some reliance for this qualification of the doctrine, does not seem to me to have looked to any supposed difference in regard to the nature of the new matter, that is, whether newly discovered testimony, or newly discovered documents; but singly to the fact, that it was newly discovered matter of some sort.

I have thus gone over the principal cases (with an exception, which will presently appear), which seem to me to be applicable to the more general question before the court. The result has been already incidentally suggested. But I will give it in a more direct and positive form. It is, that there is no universal and absolute rule, which prohibits the court from allowing the introduction of newly discovered evidence of witnesses to facts in issue in the cause, after publication and knowledge of the former testimony, and even after the hearing. But the allowance of it is not a matter of right in the party, but of sound discretion in the court, to be exercised cautiously and sparingly, and only under circumstances, which demonstrate it to be indispensable to the merits and justice of the cause.

I am driven, therefore, and I regret it, by this view of the matter, to the consideration of the special circumstances of the present case, and to decide, whether the court ought, upon general principles, and in the exercise of its just discretion, to grant the present petition. The objections which forcibly present themselves against it, are: (1) The great length of time since the publication of the evidence; (2) the nature of the evidence itself, being the asserted confessions of the defendant, to many of the most material points in the case, a species of evidence, of which it has been truly remarked, that it is the most easy to fabricate, and the most difficult to refute; and (3) the fact, that it is merely cumulative or corroborative testimony to the very points in issue. In my judgment, each of these objections has great intrinsic weight. The last has been thought by Mr. Chancellor Kent as of itself decisive. I find, too, that the same view of the matter has been taken by several other of the American courts, upon very solemn occasions. In Respass v. McClanahan, Hardin, 350, it was held by the court of appeals of Kentucky, at that time adorned by minds of uncommon ability, that the discovery of new witnesses to prove a matter of fact in issue in the original cause is not a ground for a bill of review. The reasoning of the court is so very full and clear on the point, that I would gladly transfer it to this opinion, if it would not occupy too large a space. Upon that occasion the court said, that after the most careful search, they could not find one case reported, in which a bill of review had been allowed on the discovery of new witnesses, to prove a fact, which had before been in issue; although there were many, where bills of review have been sustained on the discovery of records and other writings, relating to the title generally put in issue. The same doctrine has been since repeatedly affirmed by the same court, and particularly in Bowles v. South, Hardin, 460, and Head v. Head, 3 A. K. Marsh. 121. It was also adopted and acted on by the court of appeals of Virginia in Randolph's Ex'r v. Randolph's Ex'rs, 1 Hen. & M. 180.

I am not able to satisfy myself, that this objection to the evidence is not well founded. On the contrary, the more I reflect, the more I feel the difficulty of the admissibility of merely cumulative and corroborative testimony, though newly discovered, to the facts in issue. If I were to decide in favor of its admissibility, I should, as far as I know, be the first judge, who ever acted upon so broad a doctrine. I am not bold enough to adventure upon such a course. On the contrary, if I were called upon to frame a rule, it would be to exclude all testimony of newly discovered witnesses to any facts in issue, unless connected with some newly-discovered documents. There is no authority in favor of the petition. There is authority against it. No book of practice states any thing, which leads to the conclusion, that evidence, like that now proposed, has ever been admitted at the original hearing, or upon a rehearing, or upon any bill in the nature of a bill of review. So far as the books of practice speak, they lead in the opposite direction. See Hind, Prac. 59-63; Gilb. Forum Rom. 183; Wyatt, Prac. Reg. 94-97; Id. pp. 353-355. My judgment, therefore, is, under all the circumstances, that the motion ought not to be granted.

[For subsequent proceedings in this case, see Case No. 17,954.]

Case No. 17,954.

WOOD v. MANN et al.

[3 Sumn. 318.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1838.

SALE UNDER EQUITY DECREE — ENFORCEMENT AGAINST PURCHASER—ATTACHMENT—INTEREST.

1. Under a decretal order of the court, certain lands were sold by the master, and the purchaser, in conformity with a further decretal order, gave security to the master, in the shape of a covenant, with a surety, to pay the purchase-money within fifteen days. The money was not paid, by either the principal or surety, within the appointed time. Held, that, on occasion of this default, a remedy at common law would be inadequate; that no proper damages could be given at common law upon a covenant taken by a court of equity to enforce its own decretal orders; that a court of common law could not entertain a suit upon such a security; that whoever makes himself a party to the proceedings of a court of equity, and undertakes to do a particular act under its decretal orders, may be compelled to perform what he has undertaken; that a court of equity may, by attachment, compel a purchaser at a sale by the master, to complete his purchase, by paying in the purchase-money; and that a surety, who has made himself a party to the proceedings, as in the present case, is in the same predicament with the purchaser, and may be proceeded against by attachment. And it will make no difference, that the surety was not aware, that, in becoming so, he subjected himself to the summary process of the court; nor that the plaintiff had a right, on the default, to resell the lands; nor can the surety take any exception to the title, if the purchaser, his principal, has failed to do so.

¹ [Reported by Charles Sumner, Esq.]

[Cited in The Kate Williams, Case No. 7,623; American Ass'n v. Hurst, 7 C. C. A. 598, 59 Fed. 3.]

[Cited in Rout v. King, 103 Ind. 557, 3 N. E. 250; Warfield v. Dorsey, 39 Md. 304; Townshend v. Simon, 38 N. J. Law, 241; Atkinson v. Richardson, 18 Wis. 246.]

2. A purchaser under a master's sale will not be let off from his purchase by a submission to a forfeiture of his deposit.

3. What circumstances amount to a waiver by the purchaser of a reference of the title to a master.

4. Under the circumstances of the case, and in pursuance of a decretal order, the defendant was charged with interest up to the time of the final payment of the purchase-money; although, under the circumstances, the purchaser and surety were not charged with interest, after their default.

5. The principal and surety have no claim upon the rents and profits of the estate, except from the time when the conveyance to them is completed.

[This was a bill in equity by Josiah Wood, Jr., against Samuel H. Mann, John R. Adams, and others.]

In this case, which had been several times before the court [Cases Nos. 17,951, 17,952, and 17,953], a sale of certain real estate, mentioned in the bill and proceedings, having been made by the master, pursuant to a decretal order of the court, the biddings were ordered by the court to be re-opened, by a decretal order of the 9th of December, 1837; and, in pursuance of the same order, another sale was had before the master, on the 20th of December, 1837, at which sale Simon C. Hewett became the purchaser of certain parcels of the land; and Valentine O. B. Brown became the purchaser of certain other parcels; of which sale and purchases the master made due report to the court, on the 23d of December, 1837. Among the conditions of sale, it was provided, that the purchase-money should be paid in gold or silver coin and the currency of the United States; that the purchaser should pay down, or secure, five per cent. of his purchase in cash, and the remainder on receiving his deed from the master; and should sign an acknowledgment of his purchase at the time of the sale. If the purchaser should neglect, or fail, to comply with the conditions of his sale, his deposit, and all his interest and claim in the premises, struck off to him, should be forfeited, and the lot or parcel be again put up for sale; a conveyance to the purchaser was to be made as soon as might be after the confirmation of the master's report of the sale. On the same day, on which the report of the master was filed (the 23d of December, 1837), Simon C. Hewett filed a petition in court, praying for a confirmation of the sales made to him; and Valentine O. B. Brown, at the same time, prayed a confirmation of the sales made to him. On the same 23d of December, 1837, the court passed a decretal order, confirming the sales, unless cause was shown to the contrary, on or before the 27th of the same month. No cause was shown, or objection made. The plaintiff was to be at liberty to apply for a resale, if the purchasers did not pay the purchase-money, and complete the contract.

On the 30th of December, 1837, the master filed a supplementary report, stating that he had prepared proper deeds of conveyance of the land purchased by Simon C. Hewett, and Valentine O. B. Brown, ready to be delivered to them, upon the payment of the purchase-money. On the same day (the 30th of December, 1837) Valentine O. B. Brown filed a petition, referring to the preceding facts, praying that time might be allowed for preparation of a suitable deed from the master, and the payment of the purchase-money into court, as to the court might seem reasonable; and also stating, that he (Brown) had assumed the purchases made by Hewett, and that he was responsible for the same, and praying for a reasonable time to raise the money therefor. On the same day a decretal order was passed by the court, stating, among other things, the sales and proceedings and petition of Brown, and also, that Brown had given security for the payment of the purchase-money of the lands sold to Hewett within fifteen days; and that Hewett consented to the substitution of Brown as purchaser, as aforesaid; and thereupon it was ordered by the court, that the reports of the master stand confirmed; that Brown be substituted as the purchaser instead of Hewett; that Brown pay to the master the amount of the purchase-money within fifteen days from that day; and the master, upon the payment, should execute a due conveyance to him of the premises; that, if Brown should fail to pay the purchase-money, as above ordered, then it should be at the election of the defendant (Adams), within five days, to pay the amount, and to have a conveyance of the premises to himself; if neither Brown nor Adams should pay the purchase-money, then the premises to be again set up for sale, under the direction of the master. All the parties assented to this order. Owing to the extreme pressure of the times, the money was not paid within the fifteen days; the master then proceeded to advertise a resale of the premises. The proceedings upon the proposed sale were, however, stopped, upon an intimation from the court to the master, made with the assent of the plaintiff and the defendant (Adams). On the 27th of March, 1838, the defendant (Adams), with the assent of the plaintiff, filed a petition, which, after stating the proceedings, and that the security given to the master was a covenant by V. O. B. Brown with Ebenezer T. Andrews as surety, to pay the purchase-money within the fifteen days, and that the money had not been paid, as by a report of the master, therewith exhibited, appeared; and also, that a resale, from the embarrassments of the times, would be greatly to the prejudice of the petitioner, prayed, that the order for a resale should be rescinded, and also, that the said Brown and Andrews should be cited to appear and show cause, why they should not pay the money, and why process of contempt should not issue against them upon their failure so to do, and for other relief. An order was accordingly passed by the court, suspending the proceedings for a resale, and directing cause to be shown by Brown and Andrews at the rules, on the first Monday of May, 1838, why the prayer of the petition should not be granted. Process was duly served on Brown and Andrews; and the cause was further proceeded in at the May term of the court, 1838, when Andrews appeared and showed cause; but Brown made no appearance, and showed no cause against the petitions. The substance of Andrews's affidavit was, that he was a mere surety, without any interest or security; that he never supposed, that by giving such covenant he should become amenable to any summary process of the court, to comply with the terms thereof; that, by the conditions of sale, the premises were to be put up again, if the conditions were not complied with; that, by the decretal order of the 30th of December, a resale was directed, if the purchase-money was not paid; that proceedings towards a resale had been had, but Brown had been taken sick soon after giving the obligation, and ever since confined to his house, and unable to attend to business, and still was sick, and has been unable to raise the money; that he (Andrews) ought not to be called on, and is not liable to pay the money, by reason of his being surety as aforesaid; that he is unacquainted with the title to the premises, and does not know who is legally competent to convey the same; that the master has never reported, that a good title can be made; that Brown has never been ordered by the court to pay the money; that no decree has been made, that he shall complete the purchase; that, upon the opening of the biddings, the sales were enhanced in price from $11,481.88 to $15,975; that the deposit money paid by Brown is a sufficient security; and then submits it to the court, whether he ought to be compelled as surety to pay the purchase-money; whether Brown should not first be decreed to complete the purchase, etc.; and, finally, that Adams has no right to insist on this proceeding.

The covenant delivered to the master, is as follows: "Know all men by these presents, that, whereas, Simon C. Hewett, at a sale of lands in Lowell, on the 20th of December, instant, by George S. Hillard, Esq., master in chancery, was the highest bidder, and did purchase some of the lands then sold by said master, by the order of the circuit court of the United States for the First circuit, and whereas, Valentine O. B. Brown has assumed the purchases made by said Hewett, amounting in all to about eleven thousand dollars: Now, I, the said Valentine O. B. Brown, as principal, and I, Ebenezer T. Andrews, of Boston, as surety, do covenant and agree with Josiah Wood, Jr., who is the person for whose benefit said lands were sold, that the said lands purchased by said Hewett and assumed by said Brown, as aforesaid, shall be paid for in fifteen days from this date, agreeably to the conditions and provisions of said sale; and we will pay the same to said master within that time. In testimony whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals, this thirtieth day of December, A. D. 1837. In presence of," etc.

The master, on the 29th of March, 1838, reported to the court, that the purchase-money had not been paid; that he had prepared the deeds ready for delivery on the payment of the purchase-money; and that he had demanded payment under the consent both of Brown and Andrews, who declined to pay the same. And he has since returned the bond into court, stating it to have been executed in open court.

F. Dexter, for Adams.

B. Rand, for Wood.

Mr. Sprague, for respondent Andrews.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The proceedings in this case have been somewhat irregularly conducted; but the substantial merits cannot be open to much controversy. The decretal order of the 30th December, 1837, was expressly passed upon the footing of this very security or covenant given by Brown and Andrews for the payment of the purchase-money in fifteen days, the parties being present in the court and offering the security, as the foundation of the decretal order, to be passed upon the petition of Brown for further time to complete his purchase and pay the purchase-money. Now, stripped of all artificial forms and technical reasoning, what is the substance of the argument urged on behalf of the respondent Andrews? The money has not been paid according to the covenant, either by the principal, or by the surety; and although the covenant has been thus violated, the instrument itself, though in form a security to the court, through the master, for the due payment of the money to the master, is in reality no security at all to be enforced by the court. The appropriate remedy is merely a resale of the property, provided for in that decretal order; or, possibly, and at most, a remedy at the common law for damages upon the covenant. Now, if this be the true posture of the case before the court, it is one of a very extraordinary nature. Brown asked of the court an indulgence of fifteen days to pay the purchase-money into the court, giving security for the due payment at that time; and yet the security is no security at all for the due fulfilment of his undertaking to the court; but a resale is the true and proper security. Under such circumstances of what possible use could be the covenant with a surety; since the resale could be as well made without it as with it?

But then it is said, that a suit would or might lie at the common law for damages on the covenant. Suppose it would, is it not plain that that would afford no adequate redress. A specific performance of the contract, and a completion of the purchase are what is required, and not damages possible or positive for the non-performance of it. The remedy at the common law would be utterly inadequate; and the proper suit, if any, would be a bill in equity for a specific performance of the very covenant. If such relief could be granted upon an original bill, framed for such a purpose, I should be glad to know why it may not be given in the present suit, to which the purchase is a mere incident, as the propriety of the relief must depend upon the very same facts now before the court, and upon none others. But what damages could be given by a court of common law in a case of this sort, upon a covenant or security given to or taken by the direction of a court of equity to enforce its own decretal orders? Did any one ever hear of such a suit upon such a security? What damages could be given? What means could a court of common law have to ascertain or measure the extent or nature of the damage? How could it know, what would be held to be the nature, operation, and extent, of such a security in the view of a court of equity? or what other means a court of equity might adopt to enforce it, or to redress the injury done by it, either by a re-sale or otherwise of the premises? Until the final action of a court of equity by its own modes of redress, or other exercise of jurisdiction, it would be utterly impossible for a court of common law to possess any adequate measure of damages; or to ascertain whether there were any damages at all. And even then, it could arrive at the result only upon a review of the whole proceedings in equity, which, if it were competent in point of jurisdiction to re-examine, it is not too much to say, that it would be a task of great embarrassment, and critical peril. The truth is, and I have no doubt, that a court of common law would so hold, that it has not any proper jurisdiction to entertain any suit upon a security of this sort given in the course of a proceeding in another court of justice. It might just as well undertake to enforce a stipulation taken in the admiralty, or a written acknowledgment of the purchaser at a sale before a master, or an undertaking of a party to pay money into court upon a special order. In my opinion there is and can be no effectual remedy administered in the present case, unless it can be by this court as a court of equity.

But it is said, that the present application is not made in behalf of the plaintiff, who had the conduct of the sale; but of the defendant (Adams), whose property has been subjected to the sale; and that it is not competent for Adams to ask the court to enforce an order of this court. It is unnecessary to consider, whether there is any validity in this objection upon principle or not; for the plaintiff, Wood, has adopted the petition and application of Adams, and now strenuously seeks its due enforcement. The objection, then, degenerates into a pure question of form.

Then, what are the grounds of objection to the jurisdiction of the court? First, it is said that there is no case to be found, in which a proceeding has been had of this sort against a surety. But the jurisdiction of courts of equity does not depend upon the existence of a case, in which the particular exercise of it asked for can be shown; but upon general principles and analogies, applicable to the structure of the court. No doubt is now entertained, that a court of equity may, by attachment, compel a purchaser, at a sale by the master, to complete his purchase by paying in the purchase-money. It stands upon the plainest principles of the court, that he who makes himself a party to the proceedings of the court, and undertakes to do a particular act under the decretal orders of the court, may be compelled to perform what he has undertaken. It is a mere incident to the due exercise of the principal jurisdiction, and indispensable to the due enforcement of the orders of the court upon persons who have submitted themselves to its jurisdiction. A sale before the master might otherwise become a mere mockery, and give an entire immunity to purchasers, to speculate upon the chances of the sales. Yet this doctrine, now so well established, was quite novel, as an exercise of jurisdiction, as late as 1808, when it was recognized and acted upon by Lord Eldon, in Lansdowne v. Elderton, 14 Ves. 512, who at first doubted, whether there was any instance of committing a purchaser, and whether the court could go further than to discharge him from his purchase. His lordship, however, did not hesitate ultimately to act upon the jurisdiction, and said, that the principle required it equally in the case of a purchaser, who could not be permitted to baffle the court and disobey an order, more than any other person. And Sir Samuel Romilly, who argued in support of the motion, said, that there was no distinction between a purchaser and any other person not a party; and he put the case of tenants in common, ordered to attorn to a receiver. The notion, indeed, is utterly groundless, that no person, but a direct party to the suit can be made subject to the orders or process of the court.

Now, what substantial distinction can there be between the exercise of the jurisdiction over the purchaser himself, and that over the surety, who has equally undertaken, under the proceedings, to pay the purchase money to the court? Each is equally a principal as to the court, and each simultaneously and substantially incurs, as to the court, the same responsibility. Suppose, the surety alone had undertaken to the court, for and in behalf of the purchaser, to pay the purchase-money; would he not have been liable to the same process of the court, as if he were the purchaser? Suppose, the purchase had been by an agent for the purchaser, and the agent had expressly undertaken to the court to pay the purchase-money and complete the purchase, could there be a doubt that the process of attachment would lie to compel him to the performance of his undertaking? The difficulty of the whole argument consists in treating the surety, as a stranger to the proceedings; whereas he is in fact a party to the proceedings under the sale, and has agreed to become so, as far as the payment of the purchase-money is concerned. It appears to me, that the predicament of a surety is not in the slightest degree distinguishable from that of a purchaser, or of any other person, who makes himself, by his own undertaking, a party to any of the proceedings of a court of equity. He thereby submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court by the necessary implications of law, whatever may be his own private notions on the subject, with which the court cannot intermeddle; and he becomes amenable, like any other party, to the process of the court, to compel the due performance of his own undertaking.

The case of Richardson v. Jones, 3 Gill & J. 164, has been cited as an authority against the exercise of the jurisdiction against a purchaser or his sureties, in a case like the present. To the principal points decided in that case I perceive no solid objection; and under similar circumstances I very much incline to think that this court ought to make the same decree as that given by the appellate court, dismissing the petition of Benjamin Richardson, and dismissing the appeal from the interlocutory order of the chancellor, directing a payment of the purchase-money into court, or to show cause to the contrary. The whole force of the argument addressed to us is founded upon doctrines supposed to be given upon points and principles confessedly not then in judgment. In that case the court admitted the authority of a court of equity to enforce the payment of the purchase-money by attachment, as against the purchaser himself. But the court thought, that where, according to the terms of the sale ordered by the court, the sale was not to be a cash sale; but a bond with sureties was to be taken by the trustee at the sale for the payment of the purchase-money at a future time, there, inasmuch as the sale on those terms was, when made and ratified by the court, upon giving the bond with sureties, for a complete execution of the whole order of the court, touching the sale, the remedy for the subsequent payment of the purchase-money, was, for the trustee, by a suit at law on the bond, and not by a summary process of the court. The court, on that occasion, said: "There must be a decree or order of ratification, amounting to a decree, for the payment of the purchase-money, as a foundation for an order to bring it into court. It is not merely on the ground that the purchase-money is remaining unpaid, that such an order is passed; but it is on the principle, that there is a decree for the payment of the purchase-money, and the purchaser, being in contempt, the order has for its object the enforcement of that decree. Where there is not such a decree, there can be no such order. And an order of ratification, sanctioning and confirming a contract of sale, by which bond and security is given for the payment of the purchase-money, cannot, we think, be construed to amount to a decree for the payment of it. Where the sale is a cash sale, the order of ratification is held to amount to a decree for payment, which must be enforced in chancery, there being no remedy at law. But where it is not a cash sale, and bond is given for the purchase-money, the order of ratification adopts the bond, which stands in the place of a decree for payment, to be enforced at law." Now, whether this reasoning be entirely satisfactory or not; or whether it does not proceed upon an assumption of the very matter in controversy, as to the jurisdiction, is a question, with which I do not intermeddle. Much of the reasoning for the proper solution of such a question might depend upon the terms of the sale and of the bond, and upon the intention to make it a sale on credit, trusting to the personal responsibility of the parties, and not to the powers of the court to enforce its own orders and jurisdiction as to the payment of the purchase-money. But, however this question may be, it is plain that the reasoning of the court proceeds upon grounds, which distinguish the case most essentially from that before this court. In the present case the sale was a cash sale, without the slightest intention of credit; and the bond was given, not as a substitution for the payment of the purchase-money in cash, but to secure it at the end of the fifteen days, asked, as a special indulgence from the court, by the purchaser. The very confirmation of the sale, and the very order to enlarge the time of the payment of the purchase-money for fifteen days, was upon the application of the purchaser himself, to save him from a forfeiture; and upon an express undertaking with his surety, that the money should then be paid. The court never intended to part with its own hold upon the purchase-money, or to discharge the purchaser from the due payment of it, according to the terms of purchase, but to take a security, as a double assurance, to make its authority effectual. If, indeed, the surety can now evade the process of the court, the whole proceeding will have been a mere mockery; and the order of the court granted under a delusion. What has such a case to do with circumstances, like those in Richardson v. Jones, 3 Gill & J. 164? Besides, this latter case came before the court under very extraordinary circumstances of fraud and collusion, or at least of meditated misconduct. And the bond itself was sought to be enforced on one side by a party to that fraud or misconduct, and on the other side to be escaped from by a participator in the same improper conduct. Such a case was well calculated, especially when an application was made for relief after the lapse and laches of ten years and more from the time of the sale, to meet with the pointed discouragement of the court. Here there is not the slightest pretence of any misconduct. The parties applying for the relief have acted with the greatest good faith—uberrimā fide.

In the next place, it is said, that here the decretal order was, that in case of the non-payment of the money in the fifteen days, there should be a resale by the master. But this constitutes no ground upon which the purchaser or his surety can found any right to refuse the performance of their undertaking with the court. It is a mere order by anticipation of the ordinary authority of the court to direct a resale, which is exercisable in all cases where a purchaser is in default; and does not obtain a respite from the court. It is an order essentially for the benefit of the other parties, and not for the purchaser. The latter has no right to demand, or to enforce it. It is a mere auxiliary security belonging to the plaintiff, seeking the benefit of the sale. The court was at liberty to rescind or suspend it at any time, as indeed has been done in the present case. If this had been an ordinary contract for a purchase, in which the seller had reserved a right to resell upon the failure of the purchaser to comply with the terms of the sale, such a reservation would not have justified the purchaser in insisting on a resale, or, upon his default, have set him adrift from his contract. That would be to give him an election to violate his own contract. The very point was decided by Lord Eldon in Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. 265, 276, where the contract embraced such a provision; and his lordship said: "If you make out that he (the seller) would have been at liberty to resell, that does not make out, that he lets the other off." The question here is not, whether the plaintiff has not a right to resell; but whether the purchaser and his surety have a right to violate the very terms of their contract, and to refuse to pay the very purchase-money, which, by their undertaking to the court, they were bound to pay in the fifteen days.

Then, again, it is suggested, that, upon the original conditions of sale, the purchaser, upon non-compliance with the conditions, was to forfeit his deposit, and the property might be resold by the master. But this provision obviously applied only to the case of the purchaser, refusing to comply with the conditions at the time of the sale, by signing an acknowledgment, that he was purchaser, etc.; upon which refusal the master was to be at liberty to put the same again up for sale, that is, at the same sale; and not at a resale under a new order of the court. At all events, Brown, by his subsequent application to the court to have his purchase confirmed, and time allowed for payment of the money, placed himself in an entirely new attitude before the court, and incurred other responsibilities. But if it were otherwise, it is by no means true, that a purchaser is to be let off from his purchase by a forfeiture, or submission to a forfeiture, of his deposit.

Then, again, it is said, that no inquiry has been had into the title, which is the common practice after a confirmation of the sale by the master. It is so. But then such an inquiry is not indispensable; it is merely for the benefit of the purchaser, that he may not be compelled to take a defective title. But, if the purchaser is satisfied, and makes no objection to the title, or waives the inquiry, it does not afterwards lie in his mouth to take any exception of this nature. And, a fortiori, his surety has no right to take any such exception; for he has nothing to do with the matter of the title. That is an affair wholly appertaining to the rights and duties of the principal. In the present case, Brown has never, even to this hour, asked any reference for inquiry into the title; neither has he shown any objection to it. And his petition to have the purchase confirmed to him, in lieu of Hewett, and his application for the indulgence of fifteen days to pay the purchase-money, without asking for any such inquiry into the title, is a complete waiver of it.²

Some suggestions also have been made in the affidavit of the surety, and also at the argument at the bar, that the surety was not aware, that, by his becoming so, he subjected himself to the summary power and process of the court. That is wholly immaterial. It was his duty to know, that, by becoming a surety for the due payment of the purchase-money under the proceedings of the court, he became liable to the fullest exercise of the jurisdiction of the court, founded upon those proceedings.

Upon the whole, my opinion is, that an order ought to pass, that the purchaser, and, upon his default, the surety do, within thirty days from the passing of this order, pay the amount of the purchase-money into court, and upon default of such payment, that an attachment do issue against them, and that they do stand committed until this order is performed. And in case the surety shall pay the money into court within the same period, then he shall be at liberty to have the aid of the court in prosecution of the said attachment against the principal to compel him, as primarily liable, to pay the same, with liberty also for the surety to apply for any further aid of the court within its competency, to assist his own rights in regard to his principal.

² See, as to the practice in regard to a reference of the title, and compelling the payment of the purchase-money by the purchaser, Benet's Proceedings in the Masters' Office, 167-170; 2 Smith, Ch. Prac. c. 19, pp. 182-193.

A further question was at a later day submitted to the court, to determine up to what time interest was to be calculated against the defendant, Adams. By the decretal order of the 29th of May, 1837, which was passed by the consent of all parties, it was ordered, that unless Adams should pay the $13,000, and interest thereon, on or before the 18th of October, then next, the premises should be sold to pay that sum, and additional interest upon the principal until payment thereof, and costs, &c. The sum not being paid, the premises were accordingly sold at public auction under the direction of the master; and afterwards, upon petition, the biddings were reopened, and another sale took place for a higher price, at which Brown became the purchaser; and upon his application for an enlargement of time to pay the purchase-money, Andrews became his surety for the payment thereof at the time prescribed by the court. The payment not having been complied with by Brown, the plaintiff, Wood, according to a reservation made in his favor, in the original decretal order opening the biddings, proceeded to advertise another sale of the premises. That sale, however, was stopped by the court upon the application of Adams, with the consent of the plaintiff; and payment of the purchase-money was enforced by a decretal order against Brown and his surety, Andrews, and the latter accordingly paid the amount under the decretal order on the 7th day of July, 1838. The court, upon hearing the matter as to passing the decretal order for the payment of the purchase-money, refused, under all the circumstances, to direct the payment of any interest by Brown and Andrews on account of their failure to comply with the terms of the order above mentioned for an enlargement of the time to pay the purchase-money. Adams now insisted that he ought not to be compelled to pay any interest upon the principal sum due under the decree of the 29th of May, 1837, after the time when Brown ought to have paid the purchase-money on the confirmation of the sale to him.

B. Rand, for plaintiff.

F. Dexter, for defendant Adams.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Unless something has occurred, which in equity and justice requires the court to alter the original order of the 29th of May, 1837, which was assented to by all the parties, there is no pretence to say, that Adams ought not to be decreed to pay interest according to the terms thereof, up to the time when the whole principal due to the plaintiff was paid. The plaintiff did not receive that sum until the 7th day of July, 1838; and he was in no default in not before receiving it. The opening of the biddings and resale to Brown were for the benefit of Adams, and the premises were actually sold at a much higher price. The subsequent stoppage of the resale, upon the default of Brown, was at the urgent petition of Adams himself; and the whole proceedings against Brown and Andrews, under which the payment of the purchase-money has been enforced, was at his instance, and for his benefit, and upon his own showing a great advantage to him; for the resale would have been at a great sacrifice. So that, whatever delay has intervened, has not been occasioned by any laches or delay on the part of the plaintiff; but has been for the benefit of Adams; and the whole proceedings against Brown and Andrews, prosecuted under his direction. It seems to me plain, therefore, under these circumstances, that the decretal order of the 29th of May, 1837, ought to be enforced against Adams, according to its terms; and that any alteration thereof would be inequitable and unjust to the plaintiff. I do, therefore, direct, that interest be calculated upon the principal sum of $13,000 against Adams up to the seventh day of July, 1838, when the purchase-money was paid.

It has been suggested, that Adams has been in the receipt of the rents and profits of the premises up to the time, when the conveyance was perfected to Andrews, at the time of his payment of the purchase money; and that, possibly, he may be compelled to account therefor to Brown and Andrews, or to the latter. But there is no pretence for that; for neither of them has any claim for such rents and profits, except from the time, when the conveyance to them was completed. If it had been intended by the court to give them or either of them the benefit thereof, they would have been decreed to pay interest on the purchase-money. It has also been suggested, that there has been about $3,000 in the master's hands, ever since January, 1838. But that sum was, in the first place, properly applicable to the costs and expenses of the sale, etc. And, at all events, as the plaintiff has never received any benefit therefrom, he is not to be prejudiced by the existence of a fund, over which he had no control. If Adams had desired any particular application to be made of that fund, consistently with the proper objects, for which it was retained, it was his duty to have made some motion to the court on the subject.

These are all the remarks, which occur to me to be necessary to make on the present occasion. And here, I trust, this tedious controversy is ended. "Sunt certi denique fines litium."

Case No. 17,955.

WOOD v. MATTHEWS.

[2 Blatchf. 370; 1 23 Vt. 735.]

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. May, 1852.

REMOVAL FROM STATE COURT—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURT—SEIZURE UNDER REVENUE LAWS—MOTION TO DISMISS.

1. When a cause is removed from the state court into the circuit court of the United States, under the provisions of the 3d section of the act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 633), as having been commenced against an officer of the United States, for an act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, the question whether the property for the taking of which the action was brought was seized by the defendant in the performance of his duty as an officer of the customs under the revenue laws, is a matter of fact involved in the merits of the case, and cannot be raised or determined upon a motion to dismiss the suit.

2. The act of congress gives the jurisdiction and right of removal "in any case" falling within the particular class of cases provided for, without any regard to the amount in controversy in the suit. Hence, no question can be raised in the circuit court based upon the trifling value of the property for the taking of which the suit was commenced.

[Cited in Galvin v. Boutwell, Case No. 5,207; Whelan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 35 Fed. 864.]

[Cited in State v. Circuit Judge, 33 Wis. 132.]

This was an action [by John Wood, Jr., against Philo A. Matthews] originally commenced in one of the subordinate courts of Vermont, held by a justice of the peace, and was removed into this court, at the instance of the defendant, by a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, under the act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 633, § 3). It was an action of trespass for taking and detaining a certain horse belonging to the plaintiff. After its removal, the plaintiff appeared and filed a motion to dismiss the case for want of jurisdiction, alleging that the cause of action did not proceed from, nor the action bring in question, any act or thing done by the defendant as an officer under the revenue laws of the United States, and that the damages demanded, being only ten dollars, were too small and inconsiderable to be the subject of adjudication in this court.

D. A. Smalley, for plaintiff.

C. W. Prentiss and L. Underwood, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

PRENTISS, District Judge. The removal of the cause to this court, and the jurisdiction of this court over it, are regulated by, and dependent entirely upon, the provisions of the act of congress of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 633, § 3), passed in pursuance of the clause of the constitution which declares, that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States. After giving, in general terms, juris-isdiction to the circuit courts in all cases arising under the revenue laws, the act provides that, "in any case where suit or prosecution shall be commenced in a court of any state, against any officer of the United States, or other person, for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof," &c., "such officer or other person may, at any time before trial, remove the cause into the circuit court for trial." The act prescribes the mode of removal and what shall be necessary to effect the removal. There must be a petition to the circuit court, setting forth the nature of the suit; an affidavit, verifying the petition; and a certificate, signed by an attorney or counsellor-at-law, stating that, as counsel for the petitioner, he has examined the proceedings against him, and has carefully inquired into all the matters set forth in the petition, and that he believes the same to be true. The petition, affidavit and certificate being presented and filed, "the cause," as the act declares, "shall, thereupon, be entered on the docket" of the circuit court, "and shall be thereafter proceeded in as a cause originally commenced in that court."

The clerk of the circuit court is, thereupon, to issue a writ of certiorari, or a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, as the case may require, which shall be served in the manner prescribed by the act. And the act then proceeds to say that, thereupon, it shall be the duty of the state court to stay all further proceedings in the cause, and that the suit, upon the service of such writ of certiorari or habeas corpus, shall be deemed and taken to be moved to the circuit court, "and any further proceedings, trial or judgment therein, in the state court, shall be wholly null and void."

The action, when thus removed here, is to be proceeded in as a cause originally commenced in the circuit court. But any action in this court, either original or removed, may be dismissed upon motion founded upon proper matter, and showing that the court has not jurisdiction of the case or that it was irregularly brought here. If the property sued for in the present action was of such a nature as not to be liable to seizure under the revenue laws of the United States under any circumstances, it might, perhaps, be said to be apparent, that the case does not come within the act of congress, and, on that assumption, supposing it to be well-founded, the cause might properly be dismissed on motion, and be remanded to the state court. But horses are not only property subject to duty, and liable to seizure on being imported contrary to the provisions of law, but become forfeited whenever employed as the means of transporting or bringing into the country any goods illegally imported; and, whether the horse in question was in truth seized and taken by the defendant in the exercise of his functions and performance of his duty as an officer of the customs under the revenue laws, as set forth in his petition for the removal of the cause, is a matter of fact belonging to and forming a part of the merits of the case. It is involved in the inquiry whether the taking and detention were lawful and justifiable, and must be determined, not in a summary way, on motion and affidavits, contradicting and denying the facts so stated and verified in the requisite form, but on trial of the merits in the usual course of proceeding.

¹ [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

As to the inconsiderable value of the property sued for, or the small amount of damages demanded in the action, it is sufficient to say, that jurisdiction and the right of removal are given "in any case" falling within the particular class of cases provided for, without any regard to the amount in controversy in the suit. We can, therefore, make no distinction between a suit involving much and a suit involving little, because the act makes none. Nor can we, for the same reason, go into any considerations of expense or inconvenience to the parties, as compared with the amount in controversy. These are all matters of legislative rather than of judicial cognizance. It may be observed, however, that, though the property be of small value, the principle or question of authority involved in the case may be important, and such as ought to be decided by the national rather than the state judiciary. It may also be added, that the jurisdiction of justices of the peace being, by the state law, final, where the sum demanded in damages does not exceed ten dollars, officers of the customs, unless cases so brought against them before these inferior local tribunals are liable to be removed into this court for trial, might, if not deterred from the performance of their duties, be made the victims of vexatious suits and unjust judgments.

The proceedings in removing the cause appearing to be in all respects in conformity with the act of congress, and the case consequently being regularly and rightly in court, the motion to dismiss must be overruled, leaving the plaintiff, of course, no alternative but that of prosecuting the action here or becoming non-suited.

Case No. 17,956.

WOOD v. MAY.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 172.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.

REPLEVIN FOR GOODS DISTRAINED — ACTION ON BOND—DAMAGES.

1. In replevin for goods distrained for rent-arrear, if the jury do not render such a verdict as will enable the court to render the statutory judgment in favor of the defendant, the court may render the common-law judgment for a return of the property replevied; and in an action upon the replevin bond, for not returning the property, the defendant may, in mitigation of damages, show that no rent was in arrear.

2. The value of the goods stated in the replevin-bond is prima facie evidence of the plaintiff's damages; and if the defendant should contend for a less amount, the burden of proof is on him to show it.

[Cited in Cyclone Steam Snowplow Co. v. Vulcan Iron Works, 52 Fed. 923.]

3. If the jury, in replevin, do not find the value of the goods distrained, their finding of the amount of rent in arrear is surplusage.

Debt, on the replevin-bond of Mrs. Arguelles and her sureties. The defendant, one of the sureties, pleaded three pleas: (1) That the plaintiff in replevin did prosecute her writ with effect; (2) that she did not make a return of the goods replevied; and (3) no such record of a judgment for a return. Upon these pleas issues were joined; and, upon the trial,

Mr. Hall, for plaintiff, contended that the value of the goods was the measure of the plaintiff's damages upon the issue on the second plea; and that the amount stated in the bond is evidence of the value.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, contra.

THE COURT (nem. con) said, that if the jury should find the issues for the plaintiff, the value of the goods stated in the bond is prima facie evidence of the amount of the plaintiff's damages; and that, if the defendant should contend for a less amount, the burden of proof is on him to show it. In the action of replevin of Arguelles v. Wood [Case No. 520], in which this bond was taken, the defendant avowed for rent-arrear, and upon that issue the jury found for the defendant, and one cent damages, and that the rent arrear was $140, but did not find the value of the distress, so that the court could not render judgment under the statute 17 Car. II. c. 7; but the court rendered the common-law judgment, for a return of the property. The present action is upon the replevin-bond given by Mrs. Arguelles in that case.

THE COURT having given the above opinion, Jones & Wallach, for defendant, offered to prove that the rent was all paid; to which Hall & Key, for plaintiff, objected, contending that the verdict rendered in the case of Arguelles v. Wood was conclusive evidence that $140 rent-arrear were due.

But THE COURT (THERUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion, that so much of the finding, namely, that $140 rent were in arrear, was mere surplusage, inasmuch as the jury did not also find the value of the distress, so as to make it a material finding under the statute, and to enable the court to render the statutory judgment; and that it was now competent for the defendant to show in mitigation of damages, that less rent was due; the question upon the issue of no rent-arrear being whether any rent be in arrear, and not whether any particular sum be due. See Starkie, Ev. pt. 4, p. 1297.

Verdict for the plaintiff $140, with interest from 25th July, 1823; and judgment accordingly.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 17,957.

WOOD v. MICHIGAN S. & N. I. R. CO.

[2 Biss. 62; 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 464.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. Nov., 1868.

RENEWAL OF PATENT—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. The assignee of a patent holding at the expiration of the first term a right during that term to "make, construct and use" the article patented, may, during the term of its subsequent extension, continue to use it and even repair it, but is not entitled to make it for use, or for any other purpose.

2. Section 18 of the act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 124], construed.

3. Whether this doctrine applies to a process, quære.

This was a bill in equity, filed to restrain the defendant from infringing letters patent for an "improvement on the mode of operating brakes for cars," granted to Nehemiah Hodge, October 2, 1849, re-issued March 1, 1853, extended to him for seven years from October 2, 1863, and by mesne assignments vested in complainant within and for the territory within which the defendant's road was operated.

F. L. Ketchum, for complainant.
Wing & Niles, for defendant.

McDONALD, District Judge. This is a proceeding in chancery, submitted to us for hearing and decree on the bill, answer, exhibits, depositions and certain admissions of the parties, made in open court.

The bill charges that on October 2, 1849, one Nehemiah Hodge duly became the patentee of a new and useful improvement in the mode of operating brakes for railroad cars; that by reason of an inadvertence in the description thereof, another patent for the same invention was issued to him, to take effect from the date of the first, for the term of fourteen years; that on September 16, 1863, the commissioner of patents renewed and extended to Hodge the same patent, for the further term of seven years; and that by the various assignments set out in the bill, the complainant, several years ago, became and now is the legal and equitable owner of so much of the patent right and extension as is included within the territory within which the defendant's railroad is situate. The bill further charges that the defendant, in violation of the rights of the complainant, has "for a long time heretofore manufactured, vended and used, and is still using, manufacturing and vending within said territory a large number of brakes for cars, each embracing substantially in principle, construction and mode of operation, said improvement."

The bill shows that by various litigations with other railroad companies the complainant has established his exclusive right to make, vend and use said improvement, and prays a temporary injunction and general relief.

The answer admits the issuance of the letters patent and the renewal as stated in the bill; that the defendant has manufactured and used on its road, and still manufactures and uses thereon, the brakes in question. But it denies that the defendant has ever manufactured for sale or sold any of these brakes. The answer claims that the defendant has the right to manufacture for the use of the railroad company, and to use on its road, the brakes in question. The answer founds this claim on two assignments, of which exhibits are filed. The first of these assignments is by Stephen M. Whipple, whom the bill alleges to have been the owner of so much of the patent right as relates to the state of Indiana. The other assignment is from Hodge, himself.

The assignment from Whipple is dated November 14, 1854. This assignment, after reciting that Hodge had conveyed to Whipple, on July 28, 1852, the right to his patent brakes for the state of Ohio, etc., purported to transfer to the defendant, in consideration of five hundred dollars, the right to construct and use these brakes on any and all cars belonging to the defendant, "to the extent following, viz.: from Toledo to Chicago, and branches; also the right of running their said cars, with the said improvement thereon, on and over other roads having purchased the like rights, for and during the term for which said letters patent are or may be granted."

The assignment from Hodge, dated January 17, 1854, after divers recitals, purports to assign to the defendant the right to construct, make and use said improvement on any and all cars belonging to said company and used on their said railroads, for and during the term for which said letters patent were granted.

There is the general replication. The existence and due execution of all the letters patent and assignments mentioned in the answer and bill are admitted in open court by all the parties. Nor does the complainant deny that by virtue of the said assignments to the railroad company the defendant had the right to make and use on the company's road these brakes during the first fourteen years of the existence of the patent right. Nor is it claimed in argument that the defendant has ever manufactured for sale or sold any of these brakes. But the complainant insists that said assignments to the defendant are no justification on the part of the company to make and use these brakes after the first fourteen years of the patent; and the defendant insists, on the contrary, that said assignments gave to the company the right to make and use the brakes as well during the period of the renewal as during the first fourteen years of the patent. And this is really the only question of any consequence in dispute between the parties.

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

In support of the ground thus assumed by the complainant, he argues that the words of the assignments to the defendant expressly limit the right of the company to make and use these brakes to the term of first fourteen years. As we have already seen, Whipple's assignment is "for and during the term for which said letters patent are or may be granted," and it was executed within the first fourteen years of the patent. Hodge's assignment was made to the defendant within the same period, and for and during the term for which said letters patent are granted.

Construing these two assignments without reference to the act of congress on the subject of patent rights, we should not hesitate to say that they convey no authority to the defendant to manufacture and use the brakes in question after the expiration of the first term of fourteen years of the patent; and that the subsequent making and using of them was a violation of the complainant's right. Indeed, the counsel for the defence seem to agree with us in this. But they argue that in construing the assignments we must take into consideration the eighteenth section of the patent act of July 4, 1836. That section provides that "the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented to the extent of their respective interests therein." 5 Stat. 124.

To every assignee or grantee of a patent holding the right at the expiration of the first term of it, to use the thing patented, this section of the act plainly gives the same right to use it during the term of the renewal of the patent, exactly to the extent to which he had the right to use it under the first term of the patent. And it is clear that he may not only use it, but repair it for use till it is worn out. So the supreme court has decided. Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646.

On the contrary, it is equally clear that this section does not authorize the assignee or grantee either to sell or to manufacture for sale the thing patented, for the terms of the section only embrace "assignees and grantees of the right to use."

But the case at bar occupies a middle ground. Here the assignee is not an assignee of the right to make for sale or to sell, nor an assignee of the right merely to use, but an assignee of the right to "make and use." And the defendant, disclaiming the right either to manufacture for sale or sell, insists merely on the right to make for use on the company's road, and to use on that road, the brakes in question.

Now it is conceded by the complainant that the defendant has the right to use any of these brakes during the renewal of the patent, which the company may have had on hand at the expiration of the first fourteen years, and even to repair them till they wear out.

But the complainant insists that the defendant has no right, by virtue of said eighteenth section, to proceed after the expiration of the first fourteen years to make brakes to be used on the company's road, and whether the defendant has this right is exactly the point in controversy.

There is no decision of the supreme court which seems to us to favor this claim of the defendant. On the contrary, several decisions of that court seem to be against it. The case of Wilson v. Rousseau, above referred to, certainly is unfavorable to it. Indeed, in that case several of the judges held that the right of an assignee, for the first term of the patent, to use the thing patented was not available under a subsequent renewal of the patent, unless such right under that renewal was plainly given by the terms of the assignment.

It is true that a majority of the court held otherwise, though with some hesitation. And in the opinion of the majority strong language is employed, strictly confining the assignee to the right to use the thing patented, and more than intimating a doubt whether he could make it. In referring to the eighteenth section of the patent act, the court says: "The clause is as follows: 'And the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented to the extent of their respective interests therein.' It will be seen that the word 'exclusive' used to qualify the right of a grantee, in the eleventh section, and, indeed, always when referred to in the patent law, and also the words 'to make' and 'to grant to others to make and use' are dropped, so that not only no exclusive right in the grantee, in terms, is granted or secured by the clause, but no right at all—no right whatever—to make or to grant to others to make and use the thing patented. * * * The clause, therefore, in terms, seems to limit studiously the benefit or reservation, or whatever it may be called, under or from the new grant, to the naked right to use the thing patented." Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 660, 681. This ruling in Wilson v. Rousseau was afterward approved in the case of Simpson v. Wilson, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 709.

The same doctrine was adhered to in Wilson v. Simpson, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 109. And Mr. Justice Wayne, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said that the decision in Wilson v. Rousseau "does not permit an assignee of the first term of a patent, after its renewal and extension, to make other machines."

The subsequent cases of Bloomer v. McQuewan, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 539; Chaffee v. Boston Belting Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 217; Bloomer v. Millinger, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 340—all recognize and approve the same doctrine.

The doctrine established in all these cases is that an assignee of a patent, holding at the expiration of the first term a right during that term to make and use the thing patented, may, during the time of its subsequent extension, continue to use it and even repair it for use; but that he cannot make it for use or for any other purpose.

It is true that in the cases in the supreme court referred to there was a remarkable diversity of opinion among the judges; but that diversity had no reference to anything favorable to the defense in this case. It seems to have arisen solely from an opinion on the part of a minority of the judges, that the assignee of a patent for its first term had no right even to use the thing patented, after the expiration of that term, unless the assignment by its terms gave him that right, and this circumstance may well admonish us not to extend this right to the thing patented.

Counsel for the defendant seem virtually to admit that if, in this case, there had only been the purchase of a right to make and use one of these brakes, the right would have been gone when that brake was worn out. But they earnestly argue that when, as in the present case, the right is granted to make and use an indefinite number of them, without any limitation except as to locality, it substantially amounts to a grant to use the invention in order to construct brakes, as well as the right to use the brake so constructed. There would be plausibility to this argument if applied to a process patented; for example, to a process by which several ingredients are so combined as to produce some valuable chemical result. For in such a case the right assigned would not be the right to make a machine and use it, but the right to use a process. A process is not made, but used. But the case at bar involves no question concerning process; it only touches the right to make and use machines. And we cannot see how the eighteenth section of the patent act, when applied to the right to make and use one machine, should receive a construction different from what ought to be given to it when applied to the right to make and use an indefinite number of machines.

Counsel for the defense called our attention to the case of Day v. Union India Rubber Co. [Case No. 3,691], as supporting their view. The things patented in that case were a process and machinery for the manufacture of India rubber goods—at least the learned judge held that it embraced both a process and machinery. And he decided that the assignee of the first term of the patent had the right to avail himself of the thing assigned during the term of the renewal of the patent, whether the patent was to be construed as being for a process and a machine to be used in such process, or for a process alone, or for a machine alone, and whether the machinery used by him was or was not in existence prior to the commencement of the extended term. In thus concluding, Judge Hall's argument is ingenious and able, although to us not very convincing. He concludes that "if the only right to use were one which resulted from the purchase and ownership of a machine, the right to use it is co-extensive with the existence of such machine, and necessarily expires with it." He admits that his view of the question is in conflict with the reasoning of the supreme court in Wilson v. Rosseau. But he insists that reasoning is mere dicta, and does not bind him. We are not sure that the reasoning in that case was dicta only. We can hardly regard the language of Mr. Justice Nelson, which we have cited from that case, and that of Chief Justice Taney in Bloomer v. McQuewan [supra], as mere dicta. But whether in this we are right or not, we regard the reasoning of these eminent judges on the point under consideration as sound, and adopt and follow it. Were there no precedents of the supreme court on the questions before us, we might be disposed, though reluctantly, to follow the decision in Day v. Union India Rubber Co. [supra]. But believing, as we do, that the supreme court has settled the very point in question, we must follow the decision. We think the construction given by that court to the eighteenth section of the patent act is plainly this: That every assignee of the right to use the thing patented has the same right to use it during the period of its renewal that he had during the first term of the patent; but that he had no right, after the expiration of the first term, to make the article patented, arising out of an assignment executed before the renewal, and not expressly giving him the right to make it after the renewal. The rule thus settled by the supreme court seems to us to be a reasonable one; and it has the advantage of being a very plain and practicable rule. We cheerfully follow it; and we are the more disposed to do so because Judge Story in Woodworth v. Sherman [Case No. 18,019], has decided that an assignee under an original patent does not acquire any right under an extension of it, unless such right is expressly conveyed to him by the patentee; and because it is well known that Justices McLean, Wayne, Woodbury and Thompson agreed with Judge Story on that point. [Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 688, 692, 693.]²

Upon the whole, therefore, we are of the opinion that in the making and using of the brakes, so made since the expiration of the first term of the patent in question, by the defendant, the complainant's rights have been infringed; and that for this infringement he is entitled to recover damages, and to have a perpetual injunction. But forasmuch as we are not able, from the data now before us, to determine accurately the amount of the complainant's damages, we refer the matter to the master to ascertain in the proper way, and to report the amount of damages which the complainant ought to recover.

In the investigation of the questions here decided, I have consulted Associate Justice Davis, and he fully agrees with me in the views above expressed.

² [From 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 464.]

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Hodge v. North Missouri & I. M. R. Co., Case No. 6,561.]

Case No. 17,958.

WOOD v. MORTON.

[See Case No. 17,962.]

Case No. 17,959.

WOOD et al. v. The NIMROD.

[Gilp. 83.]¹

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May 2, 1829.

SHIPPING ARTICLES — CONSTRUCTION — PORTS OF CALL — FORFEITURE OF SEAMAN'S WAGES — ABSENCE — CONFINEMENT FOR MISBEHAVIOR.

1. Where shipping articles authorise the master to touch at certain intermediate ports, "or as he may direct," it is no violation of his contract with the seamen to stop at a place not named, and affords no justification to them for leaving the vessel.

[Cited in The Moslem, Case No. 9,875; Magee v. The Moss, Id. 8,944.]

2. To justify the forfeiture of a seaman's wages for absence, under the provisions of the act of 20th July, 1790 [1 Stat. 131], it is indispensable that there be an entry in the log book of the fact, of the name of the seaman, and of his having gone without leave.

[Cited in The John Martin, Case No. 7,357.]

3. Where a seaman is appointed to act as mate of a vessel, by the master, during the voyage, he may be removed by the master for incompetency, and is not entitled to any other wages than those originally contracted for.

4. Where a seaman is imprisoned for misbehaviour, he does not forfeit the wages accruing during his confinement.

[Cited in The David Pratt, Case No. 3,597.]

HOPKINSON, District Judge. The libellants, [Thomas A.] Wood and [John] Riggin, in this case, shipped on the 5th October last, at New York, on board the brig Nimrod, to perform a voyage, as mariners, from the said port of New York to Darien; thence to St. Thomas; thence to New Orleans, or as the master might direct; and back to New York, her port of discharge, at the wages of ten dollars per month. The brig sailed from New York, proceeded to Darien, went from thence to St. Thomas, thence to Maricaibo, and from Maricaibo sailed for Philadelphia, not going at all to New Orleans, and arrived at this port on the 5th April, 1829. The brig at Maricaibo took in a cargo for Philadelphia, intending, as the mate swears, to proceed to New York after landing that cargo. On the arrival of the vessel at this port the libellants left her, alleging that their contract was broken by the master by bringing the brig here. They have now sued for the wages up to the 5th April, the time of their arrival here.

On the part of the owners of the brig this claim is resisted, on the ground that the libellants, by deserting the vessel before the termination of the voyage, have severally forfeited their wages. Whether this contract was broken and terminated, or not, by coming to Philadelphia, depends upon the meaning and construction of the shipping articles. The voyage of the contract is there described to be from New York to Darien, thence to St. Thomas, and thence to New Orleans, or "as the master may direct," and back to New York. The brig went from St. Thomas to Maricaibo, omitted New Orleans altogether, and sailed from Maricaibo for Philadelphia with a cargo, intending afterwards to proceed on to New York. The libellants contend that the captain [Neal], having substituted Maricaibo for New Orleans, was then bound to return directly to New York, and that his coming to Philadelphia was a violation of the contract, which discharged them from their obligations under it. The phrase is not to New Orleans, "and" as the master may direct, but "or"; it was not therefore compulsory on the master to go to New Orleans; and he did not. But was he restricted to one other port in the place of New Orleans, if he should not choose to go there? The contract does not say so. At St. Thomas the future prosecution of the voyage is left, under just and reasonable limitations, much to the discretion of the master; and there probably was good reason for doing so. We must give the terms of the contract their natural and obvious meaning, neither restraining them unreasonably, nor taking a latitude oppressive and unjust. At St. Thomas this brig is to be under the direction of the master; the libellants are to go with her to New Orleans, or "as the master may direct" them to go; and not to such other port as he shall direct. The terms are as broad as if it had been "or elsewhere." Under a phrase so broad, how can the libellants claim to limit the power given by it to the going to Maricaibo? Under the decisions that have been made on the meaning of "elsewhere," we will take care that these general expressions shall not have a construction obviously extravagant, unjust and impolitic, as was attempted in some of the cases that may be cited. Surely the respondent in this case does not ask for any such latitude, or unreasonable use of the liberty given to him in the contract. It is agreed that he might go to some other place than New Orleans; and there is no complaint of the substitution of Maricaibo. What further has been done by the master, under his power to proceed from St. Thomas as he might choose to direct? From Maricaibo, instead of sailing directly for New York, he stopped at Philadelphia to discharge a cargo taken in for that port; this would have been done in a few days, and the brig would have pursued her course to New York, if it had not been prevented by the desertion of the libellants. Is this such an unreasonable and oppressive use of the liberty given to the master, by the contract, as will justify these men in abandoning their duty, and leaving the vessel and her cargo to their fate; thereby preventing the very thing they affected so much to desire, that is, to be taken to New York, the place at which they shipped, and to which they were to return? I cannot but consider this as a mere pretext. They did not leave the vessel because she came to Philadelphia, and they wished to go to New York; but for some other reason and object not disclosed. This imputation upon their motives is much strengthened by the circumstance, that at Maricaibo they knew a cargo was taken in for Philadelphia, and that the brig was coming here: and no hint or objection was made to it by any of them. That was the time to speak if they thought the contract was violated; but they acquiesced; they came willingly here; and as New York was expressly stated to be the termination of the voyage, they could not have supposed the master intended to substitute Philadelphia for it; for indeed he had no right to do so. I have no hesitation in saying that there has been no violation on the part of the master, in coming to Philadelphia; and of consequence, that it affords no justification to the libellants for leaving the brig.

¹ [Reported by Henry D. Gilpin, Esq.]

The next question is, as to the consequences of this misconduct on their claim for wages. Are they forfeited? While courts of admiralty are vigilant to correct and punish the irregularities of seamen; and to keep them under subordination to the law, and to their contracts, they avoid, as far as they can, to visit them with the extreme penalty of a forfeiture of all their earnings. They are a strange race of men, and indulgence is given to the habits contracted by an irregular and changing life. Certain it is, that when this forfeiture is demanded, it must be shown to be strictly due. The statute, under which it is claimed, is highly penal: and the terms, upon which it is awarded, must be rigorously pursued. Has this been done in the case before the court? By the fifth section of the act of congress, of 20th July, 1790, it is enacted, that if a seaman shall absent himself from the ship without leave of the master, and the mate, or person having charge of the log book "shall make an entry therein of the name of such seaman or mariner, on the day on which he shall so absent himself," etc. On this statute it has been decided and settled, that the entry in the log book is indispensable to prove the absence or desertion of a seaman; that the entry must distinctly state whether the absence was with or without leave; stating that he left the ship is not sufficient. The act, too, expressly requires that the name of the absenting seaman shall be entered in the log book; and where a seaman whose name was Malone, was entered as Miller, Judge Peters doubted its sufficiency, although there was no doubt he was intended, and it was proved he had gone by different names. In this case the entries begin on the 5th April and are continued to the 13th, sometimes stating that "the people went ashore" and sometimes "the people still absent;" but in no instance giving the name of any one of them, or saying whether they were absent with or without leave. There can then be no forfeiture of wages in this case, and it need not be regretted, because, although these men left this vessel in a disorderly and improper manner, there seems to have been no disappointment to the owners, in not getting the brig on to New York; indeed from the prompt manner in which they advertised her for freight from this port, in three days after her arrival, one might presume they made the change without much reluctance and probably without any loss or inconvenience.

What wages are to be paid? To [Joseph] Hussey and [John] Monk from their shipment at St. Thomas to their arrival at Philadelphia, at the rate specified in the articles; deducting of course, whatever sums they are legally chargeable with, as payments or otherwise, which, I understand, will be arranged by the counsel. The claims of Wood and Riggins, are somewhat different. They shipped at New York at wages of ten dollars a month, and severally demand an increase of compensation for reasons they respectively urge.

1. As to Wood. It seems that on the arrival of the brig at Darien, the person, who had been shipped as mate, was turned off for gross misconduct, and the captain was compelled to endeavour to supply his place from the crew. This choice fell on Wood, who was announced by the captain as mate of the vessel, at the wages of twenty-five dollars per month. He continued in his new office about two weeks, when he was removed from it, and returned to his first position before the mast, where he remained doing duty as a seaman for the remainder of the voyage. The reason given for this degradation was, that he was found to be wholly incompetent to perform the duties of the station; that he was repeatedly drunk, and in other respects grossly misbehaved himself; all of which is testified by Marcus Nelson. Wood, pretending, but by no means proving, that he was degraded unjustly and without cause, insists upon holding the master to his second contract, by which he became mate of the brig, and entitled to twenty-five dollars per month. Setting aside at present, the cause of his degradation, I am inclined to think that these temporary appointments, made by the master of a vessel on an emergency, are held at his pleasure; they must necessarily be mere experiments of the success of which he is to judge. As-surely such an appointment stands on a very different footing from that of mate, originally shipping as such; making his contract for the office, and for the wages belonging to it. In such a case Judge Peters says (Atkyns v. Burrows [Case No. 618]): "The mate is a respectable officer in the ship, and generally chosen with the consent of the owners; he is under the orders of the master in his ordinary duty; but his contract is not subject to arbitrary control." Even, however, in that case, a mate may be displaced by the master for good causes, to be judged of by the court, which should "be evident, strong and legally important." In Wood's case there can be no question of the right of the master to return him to his first situation in the ship; under the circumstances of an attempt to elevate him, which his own incapacity and misconduct defeated. His pretension for mate's wages from the time of his appointment to the end of the voyage, is altogether untenable, and must be dismissed. I have no better opinion of his claim for mate's wages during the short period he nominally acted in that capacity. I say nominally, for he does not appear actually to have done any thing, he might not, and ought not to have done, as an ordinary seaman. He did not keep the log book; and he could not, being deficient in an important requisite; he could not write. For the same reason he did not and could not take an account of the cargo discharged or taken in. In short the experiment of making a mate of this man totally failed; which, added to his gross misconduct, by drinking and negligence, puts him justly back to his first contract as a common seaman on board the brig, and the wages thereby due to him; and no more. His account must be settled on these principles.

2. Riggins also shipped for ten dollars a month; he claims twelve dollars from a certain period of the voyage. He is not entitled to it. The promise of this increase was made on conditions of good conduct and additional services he never performed. On the contrary, his misbehaviour was so extreme as to make it necessary to imprison him at Darien. He must have his wages at the rate of ten dollars a month. At the same time he must not be charged with the sum paid for a hand in his place, while he was in prison. Judge Peters truly observes, this would be a double punishment for the same offence; a punishment by confinement, and also by a forfeiture of wages; for charging him with the wages of the substitute is the same in effect as forfeiting so much of his own.

Decree: The claim of Thomas A. Wood for mate's wages for part of the voyage is dismissed, and he is to be allowed wages only as an ordinary seaman according to the articles; the claims of Hussey and the other libellants to be settled on the same principles.

Case No. 17,960.

WOOD v. The NORTH.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 31.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1839.

SHIPPING—AUTHORITY OF MASTER—DEGRADATION OF MATE.

[A master has no right to degrade his mate in a foreign port for an alleged offense, and make him do seaman's duty; and if the mate refuse to do duty as a seaman, the master is bound to offer him a passage home.]

This was a libel claiming to recover from the brig wages alleged to be due the libellant from the 20th of March, 1840, to the month of October in the same year, for a voyage from New York to Hamburg and back, for which voyage he had signed the ship's articles for wages at the rate of $25 per month. The libellant was first mate, and the vessel arrived at Hamburg in the month of May, 1840, where the libellant alleged he was turned off by the master of the vessel. But, as it appeared in the evidence, the master did not turn him out of the vessel, but degraded him from the rank of mate to that of a man before the mast. It appeared, from the deposition of the American consul at Hamburg, that in July, 1840, Wood called at the consul's office, and complained that the captain of the vessel had ordered the cook not to give him any thing to eat, and that, in consequence, he left the vessel. The consul then summoned the master of the vessel before him, and he admitted that he had given the order complained of, in consequence of Wood's conduct. He also stated that he had ordered Wood to go back to the vessel, not in his capacity of mate, but as a man before the mast, and in such capacity to come home in the vessel. This Wood refused to do, and now claimed his full wages up to the time the vessel arrived at New York, and also $50 for his passage home, and $20 for his expenses at Hamburg while he was waiting to get an opportunity to return here,—being in all $178.

Counsel for the plaintiff contended that a master of a vessel has no right to thus degrade his mate in a foreign port, and leave him no choice but to submit to the degradation or come home in some other vessel.

Mr. Nash, for libellant.

Mr. Ellingwood, for respondents.

THE COURT (BETTS, District Judge) held that the master was bound to offer the mate a passage home, and that it was only in case of necessity, for instance, while a vessel is at sea, that the master had the right to degrade his mate for an alleged offense, and make him do seaman's duty; and that the master's right to do it then only grew out of the circumstances of the case, and the situation of the vessel. Decree ordered for the libellant.

WOOD (ORMSBEE v.). See Case No. 10, 579.

Case No. 17,961.

WOOD v. PLEASANTS.

[3 Wash. C. C. 201.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1813.

MARINE INSURANCE—DEVIATION ON VOYAGE—JUSTIFICATION.

1. An insurance was effected on the cargo of the Actress, from New York to New Orleans; and after she passed Havana, she returned to that port, on the plea of a deficiency of water, when, by order of the government, the cargo was landed and put into the custom-house stores; the vessel not being permitted to depart with her cargo. The American consul sold the cargo; and the plaintiff claimed, in this suit, to recover the amount of the loss sustained by the sale. The certificate of the collector of Havana, under the seal of his office, of the arrival of the vessel at that place for water, and that before permission to take it on board was given to the captain, he was obliged to stipulate that the cargo should be landed, the articles composing it being wanted for the use of the place, is not evidence, as the deposition of the collector to these facts should have been taken.

2. If the necessity produced by the want of water really and fairly existed, a sufficiency for the voyage having been taken on board at New York, and Havana was the nearest port, a deviation was justifiable.

Action on an open policy, dated 19th July, 1808, on the cargo of the ship Actress, at and from New York to New Orleans; 4,000 dollars subscribed; warranted American property. The plaintiff proved the neutrality of the ship and cargo, and the plaintiff's property in the same; that she sailed on the voyage insured, July 17th, with a sufficiency of provisions, and about 900 gallons of water, and in all respects well found. She passed the Moro Castle, in Havana, on the 9th of August, and had reached the 25th degree of north latitude, in the course to New Orleans, on the 19th; when it was discovered that the water of one cask had entirely leaked out, and so much of the other as to leave only 30 gallons remaining. In this situation, the captain, after a consultation with his officers and crew, determined to return to Havana, in order to obtain a supply of water; the distance to that place being shorter than to New Orleans, and the voyage more easily to be accomplished, on account of the current setting to the southward, and the wind being more favourable. They arrived at Havana on the 28th of August, when only two gallons of water remained. The next day, a government boat boarded the ship, and left an officer on board, who ordered the ship into harbour to be moored, declaring that she would not be permitted to sail, without discharging her cargo. The cargo was accordingly landed, by the orders of this officer, and placed in the warehouse of the custom-house, on the 5th of October. The cargo was sold by the American consul, and the proceeds remitted to the plaintiff, leaving a loss, which is claimed in this suit. In order to introduce a certificate of the collector general of the customs at Havana, under the seal of his office, a deposition was read, proving the seal and signature of this officer; that such certificate is a document usually granted at his office; that no other seal is used to certify his acts, than the one affixed to this certificate; and that no other officer is authorized to grant such certificates. The certificate states the arrival of this ship at Havana, for the purpose of watering, which was granted by the governor; but that to carry this into effect, the captain was obliged to present himself to the intendant general of the royal armies and treasury, by whom not only the unloading, but also the sale of the whole cargo was decreed, on the 1st of October, on account of the market being in want of the articles of which it consisted.

This certificate was objected to, by Mr. Binney, for defendant, because the decree itself should be produced, certified by an officer having authority to authenticate it; this certificate and seal, not relating to any acts of the officer giving it, but to those of a different department, those of the intendant.

BY THE COURT. All that we know respecting this certificate is, that the officer who gave it, is authorized, and can alone grant such a one, according to the laws which prevail in the Island of Cuba. But are we bound, on that account, to receive it as evidence? We admit, that it is an authentic instrument; but still, it is only an ex parte certificate of a fact, which the officer who gave it was authorized to certify. But it is not the best evidence which the case admits of, because the deposition of the officer might have been taken; and it was important for the defendant to have had the privilege of cross-examining, particularly for the purpose of eliciting the true cause of the order of sale.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, added, that although a witness had been examined to prove, that the Spanish verb, which in this certificate is translated "decreed," means also, "ordered, resolved, determined," and does not necessarily imply that it was in writing; yet, that the decrees of every civilized nation, in relation to the disposition or sale of property, must be presumed to be in writing, unless the contrary appears. If, however, it was proved, that this particular decree, or that the decrees of the government generally, in relation to American cargoes carried to Havana during the embargo, were not in writing, evidence of the purport of those decrees or orders, taken in a proper manner, might be received; or, if it appeared that the officer who gave this certificate, would not be permitted by the government, at Havana, to give a deposition, inferior evidence, in that case, would be received; but no such proof is made in this case.

PETERS, District Judge, gave no opinion

¹ Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

on this last point, and doubted whether the court ought to presume, that the decree was in writing. The certificate was rejected.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, (charging jury.) The plaintiff having committed an acknowledged deviation, by returning to Havana instead of pursuing his voyage to New-Orleans, he cannot expect to recover, in this action, without satisfying you by clear and unexceptionable evidence, that he had a justifiable cause for departing from the regular course of the voyage insured.

If the necessity produced by the want of water, which is stated by the mate, really and fairly existed, a sufficiency for the voyage having been taken in at New-York—if there was not enough remaining, to supply the wants of the crew to New-Orleans, and Havana was the nearest port, or one which could be most easily gained, at which water could be obtained, then, the deviation was excusable. But, it appears extremely difficult to account for the deficiency in this article, which occasioned the return of the vessel to Havana. The mate says, that the daily expenditure did not exceed five gallons, which, in thirty days, would amount to not more than about one-sixth of the quantity said to have been taken in at New-York; and adding to that the quantity which is proved to have been lost by leakage, more than one-half ought to have remained at the time when the deviation took place. Whether this quantity also leaked out, leaving only thirty gallons, or was unfairly disposed of, you must decide from all the circumstances of the case. But suppose the excuse for the return to Havana, sufficiently made out, still, it was the duty of the insured to pursue the voyage to New-Orleans, as soon as a supply of water was obtained at Havana, if it was in his power to do so. The mate has stated, that soon after the vessel arrived at that place, she was ordered into the port, and a custom-house officer was put on board, who said that the vessel would not be permitted to depart, without landing and disposing of her cargo. That the captain complained to the officer of his detention, and that the cargo was landed by the custom-house officers. But, it by no means appears, that the detention, the landing, and the sale of the cargo, were by the orders of the government, or that the captain applied for leave to depart, and was prevented. Such evidence, (for aught that appears to the court,) might have been obtained; and as it behooves the plaintiff to give you entire satisfaction that the stay at Havana was compulsory, it is for you to decide, whether this is afforded by the testimony of the mate. It is proved that this cargo, which consisted principally of paper, with some other articles, such as capers, olives, anchovies, vermicelli, raisins, almonds, soap, claret wine, butter, and boards, was equally well fitted for the New-Orleans and the Havana markets. Of course, this circumstance is entitled to some weight, in re-

PELLING a suspicion, that a deviation was originally contemplated by the owner. But, at the same time, it is not easy to discover any strong temptation in the Spanish government, to violate the rights of hospitality, due to a friendly nation, by detaining such a cargo; and this circumstance strengthens the claim of the defendants upon the insured, to make out this part of his case by unexceptionable evidence.

Verdict for defendants.

Case No. 17,962.

WOOD et al. v. The SALLIE C. MORTON.

[11 Chi. Leg. News, 377; 2 N. J. Law J. 301; 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 241.]

District Court, D. New Jersey. Aug., 1879.

GENERAL AVERAGE — LACHES — ENFORCEMENT OF CLAIM.

Libellants who might otherwise be entitled to contribution under general average, may lose it by laches in enforcing their claim, as against a mortgagee whose debt was a maritime lien before he waived it for the mortgage security.

[This was a libel by R. D. Wood and Walter Wood against the schooner Sallie C. Morton, for the non-delivery of freight.]

NIXON, District Judge. The libel is filed in this case against the schooner Sallie C. Morton to recover the losses sustained by the libellants for the non-delivery of portions of two several cargoes shipped on board of said vessel at different times in the fall of 1877. The libel alleges that the first shipment consisted of sixty-eight tons and 2,085 lbs. of iron pipe put on board at the port of Millville, in the state of New Jersey, on the fifteenth day of September, 1877, to be carried and transported by said schooner to the ports of Green Island and Troy in the state of New York, eight tons and 2,025 lbs. to be delivered to the Kingsboro Water Works at Green Island, and sixty tons and 60 lbs. to the water works commissioners at Troy, for the freight of $1.50 per ton; that the libellants received two bills of lading from the master of the schooner of like purport and contents, in which the said master covenanted to make safe delivery of said cargo (the damage of the sea only excepted), but that owing to the negligence and want of proper care on the part of the master and crew, a portion of the said cargo, to wit: eight tons and 1,234 lbs. of iron pipe became lost, and have not been delivered to the Kingsboro Water Works or to the Troy water commissioners, to the damage of the libellants two hundred and seventy-one dollars and sixty-seven cents. The libel further alleges that the second shipment consisted of one hundred and twenty tons of pig iron, which the libellants put on board at the port of Albany, New York, on the twenty-fifth day of October, 1877, to be carried to the port of Millville, New Jersey, for the freight of $1.50 per ton, but that owing to the negligence and want of proper care on the part of the master and his crew a portion of said cargo, to wit: twenty-eight tons and 2,144 lbs. of pig iron, became lost, whereby the libellants sustained damage in the sum of five hundred and six dollars and seventy-seven cents. The respondent, Nathan Pennell, intervenes as mortgagee of the schooner, and sets up in answer to the libel that the libellants are not entitled to recover, because portions of the two several cargoes had been loaded on the deck of the vessel with the consent of the libellants, and had been lost, if lost at all, by being cast overboard on the high seas on account of stress of weather, and charges that the said jettisons were necessary to secure the safety of the vessel and the balance of the said cargoes.

It will be perceived that the defense set up is that the jettisons were from a part of the cargo on the deck of the vessel, and which was loaded there with the consent of the shippers. It will also be observed that the master had given to the owners of the first cargo of iron pipe a clean bill of lading, but that the second cargo of pig iron was a mere parol shipment. It is a well settled rule that a clean bill of lading, i. e., a bill of lading which is silent as to the place of stowage, imports a contract that the goods shall be stowed under the deck. This was the precise question before the supreme court in the case of The Delaware, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 579, and it was held that under such a bill of lading parol evidence that they were to be stowed on deck was inadmissible. The court would not allow the written contract to be varied or contradicted by proof that the shipper consented to the stowage on deck; but at the same time it carefully limited the decision to the case where no usage or custom of a particular trade is shown sanctioning the stowage on deck, and a strong intimation being thrown out that if proof of such an usage had been offered it would have been admissible. It not being competent to contradict the bill of lading by parol testimony of the shipper's acquiescence or consent, has there been such proof of usage in this particular trade as to establish the presumption that the contract was entered into with knowledge of such usage? No witnesses have been examined upon the subject, except two of the witnesses of the libellants (a fuller examination would have been more satisfactory); one of these was James B. Pitts, who was the mate of the schooner; and in testifying as to the custom of the trade in loading iron, he says: "We always put a little iron on deck, when we are loaded with iron, to make the vessel easier at sea. It is always customary when loading a vessel with iron to load some portion of it on deck. I never knew a vessel loaded with iron entirely under deck, either pig iron or pipes. * * * Iron loaded partly on deck, and not at all in the hold, does not strain the vessel so badly, and makes her easier in a heavy sea. * * * I started to follow the sea in 1849, and have done nothing of consequence since." Mr. Cranshaw, in the employ of the libellants, testifies that "they had from time to time been chartering this schooner for the last five or six years; that the captain never took a full load in the hold of the vessel, and whilst the witness did not know in this particular instance who ordered any part of the cargo on deck, he did know from his three years' experience in the employment of the libellants at Millville, N. J., it was the almost universal custom to load such cargo part on deck and part in the hold." In the absence of any contradictory evidence it would seem to appear that the custom or usage of the iron trade was an excuse to the master for unloading in these instances a portion of the cargo upon the deck of the vessel, and the libellants are not entitled to payment for the full value of their loss, the jettisons being shown to have been necessary for the safety of the vessel and the residue of the cargo.

The advocate for the libellants, however, insists that if this be so, they, nevertheless, have a lien on the vessel for the contributory share due from the vessel on an adjustment of the general average, and he relies upon Du Pont v. Vance, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 162, as an authority to recover the same in these proceedings. That case undoubtedly justifies such relief if the facts of the whole transaction bring the case within the principles of average contribution. The court there say: "When a lawful jettison of cargo is made, and the vessel and its remaining cargo are thereby relieved from the impending peril and ultimately arrive in the port of destination, though the shipper has not a lien on the vessel for the value of his merchandise jettisoned, he has a lien for that part of its value which the vessel and its freight are bound to contribute towards his indemnity for the sacrifice which had been made for the common benefit." See Ben. Adm. § 295. But the jettisons in this case were from the deck, and the weight of authority in this country is, that in the case of a jettison of a deck load, to avoid the dangers of the seas, the owner is not entitled to the benefit of a general average. 3 Kent, Comm. 240; Smith v. Wright, 1 Caines, 43; The Paragon [Case No. 10,708]; Cram v. Aiken, 13 Me. 229; Hampton v. The Thaddeus, 4 Mart. (La.) 582; Wolcott v. Eagle Ins. Co., 4 Pick. 429; Taunton Copper Co. v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 22 Pick. 108; Barber v. Brace, 3 Conn. 13; Doane v. Keating, 12 Leigh, 391; Lawrence v. Mintum, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 100; The Milwaukee Belle [Case No. 9,627]. I say the weight of authority is in that direction, but there are cases where it has been urged and held that the custom of a particular trade, or the consent of a shipper to load on deck, makes an exception to the general rule, and allows contribution from the ship owner for a loss by jettison. Gould v. Oliver, 4 Bing. N. C. 134, and Johnson v. Chapman, 19 C. B. (N. S.) 563 (19 J. Scott, N. S.) in England, and Vernard v. Hudson [Case No. 16,921]; The Delaware, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 602; and The Watchful [Case No. 17,250],—in this country, afford strong support to the doctrine or principle last stated, and I should be inclined to follow these authorities, rather than the others, if the present case did not show such laches on the part of the libellants, in enforcing their claim, that they ought not now be allowed to prevail against a mortgagee, whose debt was a maritime lien before he waived it for the mortgage security. Beaves, in his Lex Mercatoria, in discussing the duties of parties claiming an average contribution for the loss of goods thrown overboard in a storm, warns them "to take care to have the loss valued before the ship's discharge, in which the master ought to assist and settle all averages before he unloads." Beaves, 159. The decision of the court of king's bench in Simonds v. White, 2 Barn. & C. 805, that the adjustment of the average should be made according to the law of the place of the ship's destination, on delivery of the cargo, is based upon the fact that whether the loss falls upon the owner of the vessel, or upon other shippers, it is the duty of the captain to retain control of the cargo until the average is ascertained and paid, and see 11 Johns. 323. The first jettison was in October, and the second early in November, 1877. The schooner was employed wholly by the libellants at the time in transporting freight and merchandise to and from the port of Millville. She continued in their employ and made several trips after the loss. Although the libellants had frequent opportunities of proceeding against the vessel, they refrained from taking any steps to enforce an average contribution for several months, and did not file a libel until after other parties having maritime liens arrested the vessel.

It would seem from the testimony of Mr. Cranshaw, the general manager of the libellants, that some arrangement was entered into between the captain, as owner, and Mr. Walter Wood, one of the libellants, by which proceedings against the vessel were waived or postponed, and also against the captain, who it is said "promised to make all right, and who wanted the delay, as he was hard up for the cash." The schooner was purchased at the marshal's sale by the libellants, who retained the captain for a while as master. He was not made a witness in the case, and has now disappeared from the scene, quite willing, doubtless, to be relieved from the personal responsibility which he had assumed, and to have his debt paid from the proceeds of the vessel, in which he has no further interest. I think it would be inequitable to allow the libellants, in view of other facts, to maintain their lien and take these proceeds from a bona fide mortgage creditor whose claim largely exceeds the remnants in the registry, after the payment of prior admiralty liens. The libel must be dismissed with costs.

Case No. 17,963.

WOODS v. SANDS.

[This was a suit by Enoch Woods against Obidiah Sands in the circuit court of Cook county, Ill., although sometimes cited as a federal case. See Codd. Trade-Marks, 50; Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 264.]

WOOD (SCHRIEFER v.). See Case No. 12,481.

WOOD (TAYLOR v.). See Case No. 13,808.

WOOD (TRACY v.). See Case No. 14,130.

WOOD (TROTT v.). See Case No. 14,190.

WOOD v. UNION IRON WORKS CO.
See Case No. 17,941.

WOOD (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 16,751–16,757.

Case No. 17,964.

WOOD v. VAN HOOK.

[Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

WOOD (VAN HOOK v.). See Cases Nos. 16,854 and 16,855.

Case No. 17,965.

WOOD v. WARD.

[24 Int. Rev. Rec. 180; 6 Am. Law Rec. 675.]
Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. April Term, 1878.

SLAVERY—PRESUMPTION OF FREEDOM—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—ABSENCE FROM STATE—DURESS—RES JUDICATA.

[1. Freedom, being the natural right of man, and the constitution of Ohio declaring that all men are born equally free, and that servitude shall not exist in the state, the presumption is that a person who has for several years resided in Ohio is free.]

[2. Where a cause of action arose in Ohio, and immediately afterwards plaintiff, while temporarily in another state, was seized and imprisoned, sold into slavery, and carried into another state, held, that if, upon emancipation, she returned to Ohio as soon as she could, and if, during her absence, she did not reside in the same states with the defendant, the statute of limitations did not commence to run against her until her return to the state.]

[3. Under the Ohio statute, if, when a cause of action accrues against a person, he is out of the state, the period of limitation does not begin to run until he comes into the state.]

[4. In order to set the statute to running in favor of a defendant, who was out of the state when the cause of action accrued, his coming into the state must either be of a permanent character, or, if not so, it must be brought to plaintiff's knowledge; or, if not, then his stay must be of such a nature that plaintiff by ordinary reasonable diligence can ascertain it.]

[5. The statute of limitations of a state does not run against one who, immediately upon coming within the state, is cast into prison, and detained there during her stay.]

[6. An adjudication by a court of one state against a plaintiff in an action to establish her right to freedom, after being imprisoned as a slave, does not preclude a court of another state, in a subsequent action for damages for abduction and the value of services while held as a slave, from examining the question whether the first suit was in fact brought by the plaintiff herself, or by some other persons in her name and without her knowledge or consent.]

Fayette Smith and H. G. Collins, for plaintiff.

E. M. Johnson, for defendants.

SWING, District Judge. The plaintiff [Henrietta Wood] in her petition alleges that in 1853 she was a free woman; that defendant deprived her of liberty, and caused her to be kidnapped and delivered to himself in the state of Kentucky, who, well knowing that she was a free woman, kept her in slavery for seven months, and then delivered her to a slaveholder, by whom she was taken into Mississippi, who did thereafter sell her to one Charles Brandon, who imprisoned her and forced her to labor for fifteen years. That by reason of her wrongful selling she was deprived of her time and labor for fifteen years, and her services for said time were worth at least $500 per year, and during all of said time was treated as a slave, with great hardship and oppression. That by reason of the premises she was prevented from returning to Cincinnati, and that she returned as soon as she could do so, and that she has sustained damages to the amount of $20,000, for which she asks judgment, with interest. The defendant, for answer, says: First, that he denies the allegations; second, that the cause of action did not accrue within one year; third, that it did not accrue within four years; and fourth, that it did not accrue within ten years; fifth, that when the cause of action accrued plaintiff was a resident of Kentucky, and defendant was, and ever since has been and still is, a resident of Kentucky; that the cause of action accrued in Kentucky; that by the laws of Kentucky the action was barred in one year if an injury to her, or for arrest of her person; if not for such injury, then it was barred in five years. The answer also sets up the record of the proceedings and judgment in a suit between plaintiff and defendant in the Fayette circuit court of Kentucky. The plaintiff, by reply, denies that she was a resident of Kentucky, but was a resident of Ohio, and denies that the cause of action accrued in the state of Kentucky; that she had no knowledge of the matter contained in the action; that she was held unlawfully in prison, and was not permitted to be present at, or be informed of said proceedings; that the petition claimed to have been filed by her was not filed by her, nor by her procurement; that she was kept in close restraint and in fear of personal injury, and had no control over, and took no part in, said proceedings, and that said judgment is not a bar to present action.

To entitle the plaintiff to recover the evidence must satisfy your minds that at the time of the alleged injury she was a free woman, and that the defendant caused her to be kidnapped from her home in Cincinnati and delivered to him in Kentucky, and that he sold her into slavery. Freedom being the natural right of man, and the constitution of the state of Ohio declaring that all men are born equally free, and that servitude shall not exist in the state, if the evidence satisfies you that the plaintiff at the time of the alleged violation of her rights was, and had been for several years a resident of Ohio, the presumption is that she was a free woman. This presumption would, however, be rebutted by showing that by the laws of Kentucky she was a slave and was in Ohio without the consent of her owner. If, however, she was by the laws of Kentucky a slave, and belonged to Mrs. Cirod, who brought her into Ohio and manumitted her, she thereby became a free woman. Or if she belonged to Mrs. Cirod for life, and after the death of Mrs. Cirod to the heirs of Mr. Cirod, and if by their consent she was brought to Ohio and a deed of manumission executed to her, and recorded, she became a free woman. If she came to Ohio without the consent of her owner, or was brought here without his consent, she did not thereby become free.

If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was a free woman, and the defendant caused her to be kidnapped or abducted, she will be entitled to your verdict, unless some of the defences set up by defendant defeat her recovery. If the plaintiff was not a free woman, or if the defendant did not cause her to be kidnapped, she will not be entitled to your verdict.

The view which I take of the law renders wholly unnecessary any extended remarks on these pleas. This action has, perhaps, more of the elements of false imprisonment than any other. It would seem, therefore, that the action is one under section 16, which requires the action to be brought in one year. The cause of action accrued to the plaintiff in Ohio. The 19th section of the statute provides that if any person entitled to bring an action except for penalty or forfeiture, be, at the time the cause of action accrued, imprisoned, such person shall be entitled to bring such action within the respective times after the disability has been removed. If upon her release from imprisonment she returned to Ohio as soon as she could do so, and if, during her absence, she did not reside in the same state with the defendant, the statute would not commence to run until she was in the state of Ohio.

There is also another saving in the statute which provides that, if when a cause of action accrues against a person, he be out of the state, the period limited for the commencement of the action shall not begin to run until he comes into the state; and if after the cause of action accrues, he departs from the state, the time of his absence shall not be computed as any part of the period within which the cause must be brought. If, therefore, you find from the evidence that at the time this right of action accrued the defendant was out of the state, the statute of limitation did not commence to run against plaintiff until after the return of the defendant into the state.

As to what constitutes coming into the state there is a diversity of opinion between judges who have been called upon to pass upon this question. The view that I take of it is this, that the coming into the state must have either been of a permanent character, or if not so, it must have been brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff, or if not brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff, the stay must have been of that nature that the plaintiff by ordinary reasonable diligence could have ascertained it. If, therefore, the defendant came into the state for the purpose of residing here, and making this his permanent residence, the statute began to run from the time he came; if he came in for temporary purposes, and it was brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff that he was in the state, then the statute would begin to run from that period; or if his stay in the state was of that general nature and character, that the plaintiff, taking into consideration all the circumstances that surrounded her ought to have ascertained that the party was in the state, then it would commence to run from that period.

But if on the other hand there was no permanent residence in the state, and the stay merely temporary, and was not brought to the knowledge of plaintiff and not of that open character which the plaintiff by reasonable inquiries could have ascertained the existence of, then the statute did not run against her. The allegation in the petition is that she came to the state of Ohio in 1869 and the action was brought in 1871.

The remarks I made apply to the party coming into the state. If the party was in the state at the time the action accrued, then the statute provides that if after that period he should move out of the state, or go out of the state, that the time which elapses while out of the state should not be counted in the time in which the bringing of the action is limited. If the action had accrued, and before the expiration of one year the party had gone or was out of the state, then such time as he was out of the state did not run against the plaintiff. As far as the statute of limitation of Kentucky is concerned, the party undoubtedly could have brought her action in the state of Kentucky, had she been there at that time and under no disability, and had she not done so, and the statute of one year had elapsed without her bringing suit, she would be barred from maintaining the action against the defendant. But if, on the other hand, she was under duress by the defendant's procurement, placed in prison, and kept in prison, the statute of limitation could not run against her. Particularly, as the right of action originated in the state of Ohio, it was a continued wrong, for which she might have brought suit in Kentucky.

The seventh and last defence by the defendant is that heretofore, to wit, on the 10th day of June, 1853, in Fayette county, Kentucky, the plaintiff filed her petition against this defendant, claiming therein that she was a free woman, that she had been induced by one Rebecca Boyd to visit the state of Kentucky, that said Boyd had sold her to this defendant . . . and prayed that her freedom might be allowed her, etc. The judgment in said case was for the defendant, and the court dismissed plaintiff's petition, which judgment was afterward affirmed by the court of appeals. The reply to that part of the answer is, that the defendant caused the plaintiff, by violence, to be abducted from her residence in Cincinnati, and brought into the state of Kentucky; that during the time said alleged proceedings were pending, plaintiff continued unlawfully in prison and in duress, at the instance of and by the procurement of defendant; that she was kept in close confinement; that she was not present at such proceedings and had no knowledge of them. The plaintiff, in her reply, further denies that she filed the petition, or that it was filed by her procurement. This raises the direct question of fact upon which you are called upon to pass, from the evidence in the case. If these proceedings were not instituted by her or by her procurement, then it is a nullity as far as she is concerned, and the recital of any fact in the record will not affect this record, and it goes for naught. So that the first question to be determined by you is, from all the facts and circumstances, was this action in the state of Kentucky instituted by this woman or by her procurement, or was it simply instituted by friends who volunteered in her behalf without her knowledge or consent?

These are questions for you to determine from the evidence in the case. If, as I said before, these proceedings were not instituted by her, then the record of that trial goes for naught. If, however, it should be found that it was brought by her procurement, and she was in such a condition that she could assent to it, and understood what was going on, then she would be bound by it. If you should find the latter, then the question arises, what is the force and effect of this record? Article 4, § 1, of the constitution of the United States, provides, "That full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state, and the congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records and proceedings shall be proved and the effects thereof." In Collins v. America, 9 B. Mon. 571, the court of appeals of Kentucky says: "If the law and courts of Ohio will determine the condition of the slave while in that state, they can not, by their own force, determine what shall be his condition when beyond their control. And when he returns to a state where he has been held as a slave, it is for the law of that state to determine whether he is entitled to the benefit of the foreign law and to the jurisdiction which he might claim. Then whatever may have been the effect of the decision in Ohio concerning the plaintiff's freedom, on said trial, it has no operation here except so far as our laws give them effect." The same doctrine is held by the same court in Maria v. Kirby, 12 B. Mon. 542. I would not have the slightest hesitation in saying that whether it be upon a question of freedom or slavery, if that question has been fully determined by a tribunal which had jurisdiction of the parties and subject matter I would be compelled to give that adjudication as full credit, as if made in a free state. If it shall be found that this proceeding was by this woman's procurement, what is the effect of this record and this adjudication? The question has been recently before the supreme court of the United States, and in two very clear and learned opinions delivered by Justice Field the question of the effect of the judgment between parties in another and different cause is clearly stated. Cromwell v. County of Sac [96 U. S. 51]; Russell v. Place [94 U. S. 606]. What, then, is this action? Is this action for the purpose of recovering or establishing the freedom of this party? It is not, certainly; it is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for personal wrongs and injuries inflicted, as she alleges, by him upon her, to wit: The abduction and the servitude of fifteen years. If that is so, it comes clearly under the doctrine of the second case cited. . . . Therefore the condition which the parties sustained before this tribunal, under the rulings of the supreme court, as to the facts that gave jurisdiction is open for investigation. For instance, as I said before, whether this person brought this suit, whether it was brought by her actually or by some one for her by her assent or by her procurement, are matters which are to be determined by the jury. If the jury find that the court had jurisdiction of the parties, what does the record show was determined by the court between them? What were, in fact, the issues? I think this record puts in issue the fact of her residing in Cincinnati, and also puts in issue the fact of the purchase. They all bear, however, upon the question of the freedom of this woman. The parties having been before that court, and the question having been determined by that court as to whether she was in fact a free woman, if she was properly before the court and brought this action, or had it been brought by her or by her procurement, or she knowing what it was, assented to it, then she would be bound by it, and the parties in this case would be concluded by the finding of that court. But if, on the other hand, as she claims, this was not brought by her or she did not assent to it, she would not be bound. Some question is made as to whether this decree is upon the merits of the case; there can be no doubt about it.

Gentlemen of the jury, if you find for the plaintiff you will assess such damages as you think the testimony warrants you in assessing against him. Fortunately for this country the institution of slavery has passed away, and we should not bring our particular ideas of the legality or morality of an institution of that character into court or the jury box in assessing penalties upon those who may have been connected with it. No doubt many of them regret its existence as much as any of us. But its history has been written, and it is never again to be reinstated upon this continent. While that is so, the plaintiff, if she has established her case, has the right to recover from the defendant a fair compensation for the injury sustained.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,500.

[For opinion on motion for new trial, see Case No. 17,966.]

Case No. 17,966.

WOOD v. WARD.

[2 Flip. 336; 8 Cent. Law J. 188; 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 64; 4 Cin. Law Bul. 42; 7 Reporter, 422.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Feb. 15, 1879.

ESTOPPEL BY RECORD — MUTUALITY — JUDGMENT AGAINST SLAVE — VALIDITY — SUIT FOR FREEDOM — LOSS OF JURISDICTION.

1. A slave could not sue, nor be sued, while slavery existed in the slave states. Where, therefore, the judgment of a court was against one who, being kidnapped into slavery, brought suit to regain liberty, the court holding that plaintiff was a slave and not a free person as claimed, such judgment will not estop plaintiff from a re-examination of the same question in a subsequent suit brought against the kidnapping party.

2. Mutuality is an essential ingredient in all estoppels; slaves are not answerable civilly; are subject to no suit; no civil liability can attach to them; they can neither be bound by covenant, nor hindered by estoppel, nor will the law allow them to claim the benefit of an estoppel against others.

3. A judgment rendered against a slave, where he appears in an action, is a nullity. No one can be concluded by a judgment or decree rendered in a judicial proceeding, which he had no legal capacity to prosecute or defend.

¹ [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 7 Reporter, 422, contains only a partial report.]

4. Suits for freedom were entertained in the slave states, but upon the idea that the party suing was free. If free, he had a right to sue, but when the court reached the conclusion that he was a slave, that was the end of the litigation for the want of a competent plaintiff, and the proceeding was dismissed without further inquiry.

On motion for new trial.

Lincoln, Smith & Stephens, for plaintiff.
Hoadly, Johnson & Colston, for defendant.

BAXTER, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff is a woman of color. For several years prior to her removal to Cincinnati, she resided with a Mrs. Cirode, in Louisville, Ky., as a slave. About 1847 Mrs. Cirode left Louisville, taking the plaintiff with her and settled in Cincinnati, where she executed and delivered to the plaintiff a formal instrument of emancipation. Thus the plaintiff became, so far as Mrs. Cirode, her apparent owner, could confer the boon, a free person, endowed with all the rights and immunities incident to freedom. And from that time until the restraint imposed by the defendant, to be hereinafter fully stated, the plaintiff remained in Cincinnati, in the undisputed and undisturbed enjoyment of personal freedom.

We infer, however, from the depositions given in another suit (but which are not evidence in this case), to be hereinafter mentioned, between these parties in Kentucky, that the children of Mrs. Cirode claimed some title to or interest in the plaintiff, as a slave, conjointly with or adversely to their mother's title; and that they repudiated their mother's action in the premises, and desired to regain possession of her. But no active steps seem to have been taken to effect that object until the spring of 1853. At or about this time they united in a conveyance, in and by which they professed and assumed to convey the plaintiff as a slave to the defendant in consideration of $300 to be paid in the event he succeeded in obtaining possession of her. The defendant then resided in Covington, Ky. Shortly after said conditional sale, the plaintiff was inveigled by one Rebecca Boyd, in whose service she was then employed, across the Ohio river and into the state of Kentucky, where by chance or pre-arrangement they were met by defendant, who claimed the plaintiff as his slave, forcibly restrained her of her liberty, and sent her back to Lexington, and had her there confined in a private slave prison belonging to one Lewis C. Robards.

Whilst thus imprisoned, to-wit: on the 10th of June, 1853, a petition was filed in the Fayette county circuit court in plaintiff's name for the purpose of regaining her liberty. In it she averred that she was a free woman. To this petition Lewis C. Robards, the proprietor of the prison in which she was detained, was made a defendant. But at defendant's instance an interlocutory order was soon after entered in the cause, substituting the defendant "Zeb. Ward as a defendant in the place of Lewis C. Robards," and dismissing her petition as to Robards.

The defendant Ward then answered, and in his answer alleged "that the plaintiff was not a free woman, but his slave."

Upon the issue thus made proofs were taken and the case regularly heard, when a final decree (24th June, 1854) was entered in the following terms: "This cause having been heard and the court advised, decrees and orders that the plaintiff's petition be dismissed."

From this decree the plaintiff appealed to the court of appeals.

There is no transcript of the record from the court of appeals, and consequently we are not advised of the action of that court, except in so far as the same is supplied by the record offered from the Fayette county circuit court. From this we see that, on the 13th day of February, 1855, the following entry was made in said last named court: "The defendant, Zeb. Ward, produced a mandate of the court of appeals, which is ordered to be recorded as follows: 'Court of Appeals, January 20, 1855. Henrietta Wood, appellant, vs. Zeb. Ward, appellee. Appeal from a judgment of the Fayette county circuit court. The court being sufficiently advised, it seems to them that there is no error in the judgment. It is therefore adjudged that said judgment be affirmed, which is ordered to be certified to said court.'"

Here the litigation between these parties in Kentucky terminated. Whereupon the defendant, soon after the termination, sold the plaintiff to one Wm. Pulliam. He caused her to be conveyed to Mississippi and sold to one Girard Brandon. Brandon continued to subject her to his service in the states of Mississippi and Texas until the latter part of 1865, and until she was emancipated by the thirteenth amendment to the national constitution. On being thus the second time emancipated from slavery, the plaintiff began preparations to return to her home in Cincinnati, but owing to various hindrances, not necessary to be enumerated here, she did not get back to Cincinnati until some time in the year 1869.

During all this time, from 1853 to 1870, the defendant resided in Kentucky and Tennessee. He visited Cincinnati in 1870, when this suit was instituted. Plaintiff's petition, which, under the practice in Ohio, is filed as a substitute for a declaration, embodies substantially the facts hereinbefore stated—except those connected with the Kentucky litigation.

The defendant's answer interposed three defenses: First, a general denial of the facts charged; second, the statutes of limitation; third, the adjudication of the Kentucky court hereinbefore referred to.

The plaintiff replied, and the issues thus made came on and were tried at the last April term, 1878, before the honorable the district judge and a jury, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff, and an assessment of $2,500 damages. [See Case No. 17,966.]

The defendant then moved for a new trial, and it is this motion that it now before us for determination.

Defendant's exceptions upon the trial were numerous. He excepted to the rulings of the judge on questions of admitting and excluding evidence, as well as to his instructions given in relation to the statutes of limitation, and in relation to the force and effect of the decree rendered in Kentucky, and pleaded and relied on as a defense to this action.

We have neither the time nor the inclination to discuss in detail all the exceptions that were taken, nor is it, in our judgment, necessary for us to do so. If the court fell into error, in the admission or exclusion of testimony, or indulged in instructions upon immaterial and abstract matters, the errors in no way affect the merits of this controversy, or prejudice the defendant's right. With the charge relating to the statutes of limitation we are entirely satisfied. The real contest, as we think, arises out of the defendant's third defense, to-wit: "Is the plaintiff, by reason of the decree rendered in her suit, by the Fayette county circuit court of Kentucky, precluded from a re-examination in this court of the same question decided in that case?" If she is, then that judgment is a full and complete defense to this action. The question is an important one, and deserves, as it has received, the most thorough consideration.

The facts, as we have detailed them, present a case of peculiar and complicated oppression. The plaintiff was quietly, and, as she believed, securely domiciled, under the protection of the laws, in a community friendly to her aspirations, and within a jurisdiction which prohibited slavery, and presumed everything in favor of freedom. But while thus reposing in confidence she was, by false pretenses, decoyed into Kentucky, and there enslaved by violence. It was a most grievous wrong to have been thus betrayed into a distant and unfriendly jurisdiction, in which her color was prima facie evidence of servility, and forced to submit to the deprivation of liberty, or litigate in a tribunal where the presumptions of law, supposed public policy and established prejudices of long standing, combined to defeat her claim. And when to these we add that, pending the controversy, the plaintiff was prima facie under the ban of slavery with all attendant disabilities, left in defendant's custody, subject to his unrestrained will and amenable to his punishment, and without the means necessary to defray the expenses of litigation, her wrongs appear more and more obvious, and appeal strongly to the sympathies of the court for redress.

But these considerations cannot prevail with the court unless a remedy can be found within recognized legal principles. A judge dare not know any code of morals higher than the constitution and the laws enacted in pursuance of that instrument. These, as they then existed, not only recognized, but protected the slave owner in the enjoyment of that species of property, and we must administer the law as it then existed, uninfluenced by the subsequent change in public sentiment on this interesting subject.

By the national constitution—the instrument under and in virtue of which we hold our office—we are required "to give full faith and credit to the records, public acts and judicial proceedings" of the several states. It follows that the decree of the Kentucky court is entitled at our hands to the same force and legal effect that ought, under the laws of Kentucky, to be accorded to it in that state. The question therefore narrows itself down to the single inquiry: Does the decree rendered by the court of Kentucky and here pleaded and relied on as a bar to this action forever preclude the plaintiff from a re-examination of the issue decided in that case? If it does, as we have already said, it is a complete defense to the plaintiff's present suit.

Judgments of courts are not always conclusive upon the litigant parties in collateral or other proceedings. The jurisdiction of the court is always open to inquiry. In order to confer jurisdiction the suit must be by and against parties competent to sue and be sued. But the plaintiff was repelled by the Kentucky court, on the ground that she was a slave. If a slave, she was a chattel, a mere piece of property, without civil rights, and incompetent to prosecute or defend a suit. 14 Am. Cyclopaedia, tit. "Slavery," p. 92. This status is inseparably connected with slavery, and has prevailed in the slave-holding states of the Union, including Kentucky, from the time slavery was first legalized to the abolition of the institution in 1865.

Their disabilities have been iterated and reiterated by the courts in a uniform current of decisions, covering almost every possible phase of the subject. Where a slave finds lost property, it inures to the benefit of the master until the true owner can be found. Brandon v. Planters' & Merchants' Bank of Huntsville, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 320. A special plea that either plaintiff or defendant is a slave is a good plea in bar. Amy v. Smith, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 326, and Bentley v. Cleaveland, 22 Ala. 814.

Slaves cannot appear as suitors, either in courts of law or equity. Bland v. Dowling, 9 Gill & J. 19. Nor can a master sue his slave. Catiche v. Circuit Court, 1 Mo. 608. Slaves are incapable of entering into valid contracts, or of taking property, by demise or otherwise, to themselves, directly or through the intervention of a trustee. Hall v. Mullin, 5 Har. & J. 190; Taylor v. Embury, 16 B. Mon. 340; Trotter v. Blocker, 6 Port. (Ala.) 269; Lamb v. Girtman, 26 Ga. 625; Graves v. Allan, 13 B. Mon. 190; Jones v. Lipscomb, 14 B. Mon. 239; Turner v. Smith, 12 La. Ann. 417; Hinds v. Brazeale, 3 Miss. 837; and Cunningham v. Cunningham, Cam. & N. 353.

Even a bond executed by a slave, with a free man as surety, is against public policy and void. Batten v. Faulk, 4 Jones (N. C.)

233. Money acquired by a slave by permission of his master, inures to the latter. Jenkins v. Brown, 6 Humph. 299.

Courts of chancery, with their ample powers, cannot enforce a contract between master and slave, though fully performed on the part of the slave. 1 Leigh, 72. And a conveyance of lands and slaves in trust, to allow the slaves to occupy and receive the rents of the land, and the profits of their own labor, is void. Smith v. Betty, 11 Grat. 752. It is not felony in Georgia, by the common law, to kill a slave. Neal v. Farmer, 9 Ga. 555. It is lawful to track runaway slaves with dogs, provided it is done with caution and circumspection. Moran v. Davis, 18 Ga. 722. They are recognized, in a restricted sense, as human beings, in this: Masters have no right to inflict such cruel and inhuman punishment, even to enforce obedience, as must result in death or loss of limb as a consequence of the punishment. Craig v. Lee, 14 B. Mon. 119.

But unconditional submission of the slave is due to the authority of the master; and the master may, therefore, use such force and means as may be necessary to enforce submission to his authority, even to the destruction of life or limb of the slave. Oliver v. State, 39 Miss. 526. The law of slavery is absolute authority on the part of the master, and unconditional submission on the part of the slave. And the master may punish the slave at will, in such manner and degree as his judgment and humanity may dictate, provided he does not maim or kill. State v. David, 4 Jones (N. C.) 353. The right of the master to obedience and submission in lawful things is perfect. The power to inflict any punishment not affecting life or limb, which the master considers necessary to enforce obedience to his commands, is secured to him by the law. Now, if in the exercise of his authority, the slave resists and slays the master, it is murder, and not manslaughter, because the law cannot recognize the violence of the master as a legitimate provocation. Jacob v. State, 3 Humph. 493.

Mutuality is an essential ingredient in all estoppels, and as slaves are not answerable civilly; as they are subject to no suit; as no civil liability can attach to them, and they can neither be bound by covenant nor hindered by an estoppel, the law will not allow them to claim the benefit of an estoppel against others. Bentley v. Cleaveland, supra. A judgment rendered against a slave, in an action in which he appeared, is a nullity. Stenhouse v. Bonum, 12 Rich. Law, 620.

From these authorities, which might be indefinitely extended, it will be seen that although slaves are protected as persons against the destruction of life and limb, they are in all other respects treated as property, and subjected to all the disabilities incident to that condition. They are without power to contract, to acquire, or hold property, sue or defend a suit. And being without capacity to sue or defend, no valid judgment can be rendered against them. It would be an anomaly to hold that any one could be concluded by a judgment or decree rendered in a judicial proceeding which he had no legal capacity to prosecute or defend.

It is true that such a suit was brought by the plaintiff, and prosecuted in her name, and that the Kentucky court did entertain, sit in judgment upon and decide it. Similar suits were not infrequent in the courts of the slave states. But these suits were always entertained upon the allegations that the plaintiff was free. If free, the plaintiff had a right to sue; but when the question of freedom was traversed, and put in issue, it was equivalent to denying the plaintiff's right to sue, and whenever the court reached the conclusion that the plaintiff was a slave, the litigation, whatever its scope, necessarily ceased for the want of a competent plaintiff. In other words, the courts held there was no suit pending, and dismissed the proceeding without further inquiry. In Bentley v. Cleaveland, supra, the court ordered the allegation that complainants were slaves to stand as a plea to be first disposed of before it would take cognizance of the other parts of the complaint. The same principle, as we understand the record, was applied by the Kentucky court to the proceeding instituted by the plaintiff against the defendant. Plaintiff alleged her freedom. This, prima facie, gave jurisdiction. But as soon as the court reached the conclusion that plaintiff was a slave, it found itself without jurisdiction for the want of a plaintiff competent to sue, and did the only thing which, under the circumstances, it could have done—struck the case from the docket. The decree simply dismisses plaintiff's petition. There is no declaration of facts, no special findings, no judgment for costs, and no execution awarded.

In the opinion of the court, the plaintiff was defendant's property. She, and all she had, and all that she might afterwards acquire, belonged to him.

To permit such a decree, obtained under such circumstances, against a human being, for the time treated as a chattel, and without legal capacity to sue, to operate as a bar, or an estoppel, and conclude the plaintiff in a matter of such vital importance as is involved in this case, would be a just reproach to the jurisprudence of any country.

On the trial of this case in this court, the plaintiff offered full and satisfactory evidence of her freedom at the time of the committing of the several grievances complained of, whilst defendant offered no opposing testimony. He rested his case wholly on the judgment pleaded and relied on by him. As this judgment does not, in our opinion, conclude the plaintiff, the verdict of the jury must stand. The damages are not excessive; the motion for a new trial will be disallowed, and judgment entered thereon in plaintiff's favor.

NOTE. The learned judge uses the present tense in making quotations from decisions in slavery cases, but the reader will understand them all in the past tense. In Tennessee, to maim a slave was felony. The writer remembers a case where a wealthy man was sent to the state prison for this offense. The master was liable to be indicted for cruel and inhuman treatment upon a slave. See Werley v. State, 11 Humph. 172. So exposure of slave by master to inclement weather with intent to injure him, was a felony. 2 Code, § 31, § 4620. Kidnaping, by section 4621, was, likewise, a felony. The owner of a slave, on a trial of his slave, could attend and aid in his defense, challenge jurors, etc. Section 2634. The law is correctly stated in the foregoing opinion as to his general disability.

This, as it obtained in the Southern States, was the same that has existed in most countries, ancient or modern. Yet it is curious to note that in the dependencies of the crown of Spain, it was and is much more liberal than in most states. If the reader will examine Las Leyes de las Indias, and the royal ordinances for the government of Cuba and Porto Rico, promulgated by the Spanish government, he will learn that a slave in those islands can contract with his master for his freedom. More than that, he may pay his master on account, any sum of money on hand, and have a credit therefor on his purchase of himself. Further, he may buy himself outright, and if his master will not agree to a reasonable price, he can compel him to go before the syndico, an officer who is a sort of trustee as well as judge, by whom the price will be settled. And should the slave be maltreated, he may complain to the same officer, and if the latter thinks a proper case has been made out, he will compel the master to make sale of the slave to another, the slave, in such case, being permitted to choose his master.

Case No. 17,967.

WOOD v. WELLS et al.

[6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 382.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. April, 1873.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—RESTRICTED LICENSE—CONSTRUCTION—FORFEITURE.

1. Restricted license under patent construed.

2. Where defendants held a license under complainant's patent, granting them "the right, license, and privilege to manufacture and vend landau carriages, with the said invention attached," containing the provision that "the right, privilege, and license hereby granted, is not, nor is any part of the same, to be transferred or assigned, or in any manner imparted, to any other person or persons whatsoever; but the same shall be exercised solely, and only, by the licensees personally, or by workmen in their employment, in their own manufactory or manufactories, warehouse or warehouses;" and the further provision, "nor shall this license authorize or empower said licensees to sell, exchange, or in any manner dispose of any part, parts, or portions of carriages with, or fitted, or adapted for the said invention, or any carriage or carriages with, or adapted for, the said invention, otherwise than in a finished state, and ready for market."—held, that these restrictions do not prohibit the defendants from procuring the patented fixtures to be made wherever they can be manufactured, and still less does it prohibit them from sending fixtures, already cast, to another establishment to be finished.

3. This license does not grant the right to deal in these fixtures as an article of merchandise.

¹ [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

4. If they sell them apart from the carriage, it is a violation of the patent, but not a breach of any condition of the license.

5. As a general rule, a violation of a patent does not work a forfeiture of a license under that patent. The exceptions to this rule are, where the licensee has assumed such a hostile attitude toward the patent as to amount to a repudiation of the right conveyed by the license.

6. When a license conveys a distinct right which has been once paid for, courts of equity, as well as courts of law, are bound to recognize it.

7. If this license had contained a condition, that the license should terminate if the licensee should in any wise infringe the patent, the court would give effect to it, subject to the influence of any special circumstances which might induce a court of equity to relieve against the forfeiture.

[This was a bill in equity by Charles B. Wood against Wells, Crittenden & Co.]

Final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Suit brought upon letters patent [No. 53,075] for an "improvement in landau carriage-doors," granted to Frederick Wood, March 6, 1866.

Henry T. Blake, for complainant.

John S. Beach, for defendants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The complainant is the assignee of a patent for a distinct and specific fixture applicable to the doors of landau carriages. The defendants procured from the patentee, prior to the assignment to complainant, a license to use the patented improvement in the manufacture of their carriages. Subsequently, one of the defendants, conceiving that he had made an invention applicable to the same purpose, obtained a patent therefor, which, it is conceded, for the purposes of this case, does not entitle him to make the patented fixture, either because it is substantially the same as that previously invented, or because it was simply an improvement upon it; so that, before the defendant could make or use it, he must procure the allowance of the owner of the prior patent.

In this condition of things, it appears that one of the defendants sold, to a person named Lines, one or more of these fixtures, constructed under his own patent. It also appears that the defendants have procured these fixtures to be finished, polished, and hinged by an establishment in Bridgeport. It was claimed that the castings also were procured by the defendants to be made by others for the defendants' use. I do not deem it to be material to the decision of the case, but I do not find any evidence in the proofs that the defendants did not cast the fixtures themselves, procuring them to be finished, as already stated, by others.

The bill charges that the sale of the fixtures to Lines, and the procuring of fixtures to be finished by others, was a violation of the license granted to the defendant; and the bill seeks a decree, declaring that the license is null and void, and has been forfeited by the defendants by the sales made by the defendants to Lives, and by their causing fixtures to be finished at a manufactory not their own, and seeks a further decree, restraining the parties, by injunction, from further making and selling fixtures, either under the license or otherwise, and for an account of profits.

It becomes material, therefore, to ascertain what the rights of the defendants are under the license, upon the construction and effect of which the whole question depends. This paper is, in brief, for a consideration in gross paid by the defendants to the patentee, a conveyance or grant of "the right, license, and privilege to manufacture and vend landau carriages, with the said invention attached thereto, under and according to the letters patent, for, during, and unto the full end of the term for which said letters patent are granted; but the right, privilege, and license hereby granted is not, nor is any part of the same, to be transferred or assigned, or in any manner imparted, to any other person or persons whatsoever, but the same"—i. e. the privilege of making and selling landau carriages, with the improvement attached thereto—"shall be exercised solely and only by the licensees personally or by workmen in their employment, in their own manufactory or manufactories, warehouse or warehouses." And then, to make this restriction more plain and definite, it is further stated, "nor shall this license authorize or empower said licensees to sell, exchange, or in any manner dispose of any part, parts, or portions of carriages, with or fitted or adapted for the said invention, or any carriage or carriages with or adapted for the said invention, otherwise than in a finished state and ready for market."

Now, in my opinion, the meaning of this license is this, and simply this: "You, the licensees, may make carriages and apply the patented fixtures thereto, but you shall only apply these fixtures in your own establishment, and you shall in no wise farm out this right to others; and, to secure this condition against evasion, you shall not make parts of carriages adapted to the use of this invention and sell them to others."

Neither by the terms nor the good sense of this paper, nor by anything implied therein, does it prohibit the defendants from procuring these fixtures to be made wherever they can be manufactured, and still less does it prohibit them from sending fixtures already cast to another establishment to be finished; so that I can not hold that the sending of such fixtures to the Bridgeport company to be finished, polished, and hinged, or jointed, is any violation of this license.

On the other hand, the license grants to the defendants the right to attach the invention to landau carriages, but does not grant the right to deal in the fixtures as articles of merchandise. As to this, the defendants stand in the same situation as persons having no license. If they sell, they sell in violation of the patent, but not in breach of any condition of the license. They stand as any other person does who violates the patent without authority. That brings me to the second question discussed before me, which is, whether, where a patentee has granted a license, a violation of the patent, by abuse of the patented privilege, outside of the license, works a forfeiture of the right conveyed. As a general rule, I have no hesitation in saying that it does not. I do not say that there might not be cases in which it might have that effect, but it could only be where the licensee has taken a stand against the patent, and has assumed such a hostile attitude toward it as amounts to a repudiation of the right conveyed by the license. The mere fact that, in the course of business, the licensee has infringed the patent, will not work a revocation of the license, and especially in a case where the license covers a distinct and specific privilege, which has been paid for, once for all, and conveys, without further fee or consideration, rights which are fixed and definite. Such a privilege, conveyed absolutely and for consideration paid, becomes a clear vested right, and to the extent to which it has become so vested, a court of equity, as well as a court of law, is bound to recognize it.

A case lately decided in Vermont (Steam Cutter Co. v. Sheldon [Case No. 13,331]) presented, in some of its features, striking analogies to the one before me. The defendant in that case had purchased, and paid for the right to use, one machine for cutting stone, and was licensed to use five other machines, upon paying to the patentee prices named in the license. He, however, did not do this. He procured the one machine, but thereafter, instead of claiming or exercising the right to use the other five machines, on paying the price of the privilege to the patentee, he bought five machines from an infringer in defiance of the patent. A suit having been determined against his vendor, in which it appeared that the machines were infringements, he became alarmed, and tendered to the patentee the sums named in the license. The court held that, while he was entitled to use the first machine, for which he had paid, he had repudiated the license as to the others, and had assumed such a position of hostility toward the patent, that he could no longer avail himself of his privilege of purchase.

The present license was paid for by a sum in gross, and was paid for once for all. If it had contained a condition, that the license should terminate if the licensee should in any wise infringe the patent, no doubt the court would give effect to it, subject of course to the influence of any special circumstances which might induce a court of equity to relieve against the forfeiture. But the license contains no such proviso. The grant is absolute in this respect.

Now, although the infringer has not been put upon the stand to testify as to his motives in making the sale to Lines, yet the explanation, as it appears in the proof, seems to be this, that one of the defendants, having procured a patent for an improvement upon this device, stated to the person to whom he made the sale, "I have a clean patent from the patent office, and have a right to sell my own fixture;" supposing, apparently, that his patent conferred the right to dispose of all that was described or shown in it. In this he was mistaken; but that sale, of some four or five fixtures, was his only violation of the patent. We can not pronounce that transaction of such a nature as to call for the interference of a court of equity, further than to enjoin the defendant from transactions of that character hereafter, and to order an account of the profits made upon the fixtures actually sold.

Decree accordingly.

Case No. 17,968.

WOOD v. WILLIAMS.

[Gilp. 517; 1 Robb, Pat. Cas. 717.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Dec. 9, 1834.

VALIDITY OF PATENT RIGHT—PARTIES TO CONTROVERSY—UNITED STATES AS PLAINTIFF.

1. A controversy, respecting the validity of a patent right, is one strictly between the parties immediately concerned, although the public may have an eventual interest in it.

2. Under the patent laws, the United States are not a party in a litigation respecting the validity of any rights claimed or denied by virtue of those laws.

3. Where the district court, under the provisions of the act of 21st February, 1793 [1 Stat. 313], orders a scire facias to be issued against a patentee, on the prayer of a petitioner, they will not permit the United States to be substituted as plaintiffs in the place of the petitioner.

[This was a suit by Benjamin Wood against William Williams.] On the 23d May, 1834, a rule was granted on the defendant, to show cause why process should not be issued to repeal his patent, for a certain machine for hulling and clearing clover seed; under the provisions of the tenth section of the act of congress of 21st February, 1793,—1 Story's Laws, 303 [1 Stat. 323].

Meredith, for plaintiff. The affidavit of the plaintiff, on which the rule was granted, was read. This affidavit was not received as evidence, but read, de bene esse, by consent. The depositions of several witnesses, taken under a rule of court, were also read to support the motion.

Kittera, for defendant. It is denied that either the deposition of the plaintiff, on which the rule was granted, or a subsequent deposition made by him, is any evidence on this hearing. If the other testimony of the plaintiff furnishes a probable case against the defendant, then the scire facias will be issued; otherwise the process will be refused. The facts of the case do not furnish such a one as will warrant the process prayed for.

Meredith, for plaintiff, in reply. The deposition of the plaintiff is evidence on this hearing. This is a prosecution, by the government of the United States, to repeal a patent improvidently issued by them; and the complainant is but the mover of the proceeding. The opinion of this court, in the case of Delano v. Scott [Case No. 3,753], shows that the original affidavit, on which the rule was granted, is good evidence at this hearing.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. No such thing was decided, or intended to be so, in that case. No such question was raised. In my opinion, I referred to the affidavit of the complainant, as exhibiting the ground of the application, and showing the allegations of the complainant against the defendant. I then proceeded to state the evidence by which the complainant had maintained his allegations; to wit: (1) A certain patent; (2) depositions of witnesses. The affidavit of the complainant is not mentioned as any part of the testimony. The paragraph quoted, towards the conclusion of the opinion, is a simple declaration, that the defendant had given no evidence to contradict the allegations of the complainant in his affidavit. From this it cannot be inferred that the affidavit was a part of the evidence on which the court acted. Whether, under the act of congress, this affidavit would be sufficient prima facie evidence, to call for some proof on the part of the defendant, and would be enough to grant the process upon, if not impeached or contradicted, is a question that remains open.

Meredith, in continuation. It is contended that, on a full examination of the depositions produced, they are sufficient to sustain this application without the complainant's affidavit.

HOPKINSON, District Judge, observed that there was sufficient cause on the other depositions, exclusive of that of the complainant, which he put out of the case, without giving any opinion on its competency. It was unnecessary. A probable case had been made out against the defendant.

Rule made absolute, and process in the nature of a scire facias ordered to issue.

Afterwards, the counsel for the complainant, previous to taking out the scire facias as above ordered, moved the court for an order, that the cause be recorded and docketed, as an action wherein the United States are plaintiffs and William Williams is the defendant, and that the process of scire facias be issued as between those parties.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. The petitioner, in this case, has so far sustained his complaint, in the manner prescribed by the act of congress, that process has been ordered to issue against the said William Williams to repeal his patent. This process is a scire facias, and, previous to taking it out, the complainant has moved for an order, that the cause be now recorded or docketed, as an action wherein the United States are plaintiffs, and the said William Williams is the defendant; and that the process of scire facias be issued as between these parties.

¹ [Reported by Henry D. Gilpin, Esq.]

No decision or practice, under the patent laws of the United States, has been adduced to support this motion; but a reliance is had upon the practice in the courts of England, in cases for the repeal of patents. The whole proceeding, both for obtaining a patent, and for revoking it, is so different in England from that prescribed by our law; the character and foundation of the right, are so dissimilar in the two countries, that we cannot look, for a rule on this question, to the courts of England; especially if, upon an examination of our act, we shall there find such an indication of the course of proceeding intended to be given, as will guide us through the present difficulty. In the case of Stearns v. Barrett [Case No. 13,337], Judge Story adverts to the difference between our patent laws and those of England. He says: "A scire facias is a process altogether confined to the crown, with the exception of the single case, where two patents have issued for the same thing, in which case the prior patentee may maintain a scire facias to repeal the second patent. But under our patent act, any person, whether a patentee or not, may apply for the repeal. There are other differences which it is not now necessary to enumerate."

I shall not find it necessary to go further than the act of congress, and the practice that has been adopted under it, so far as I have been able to obtain a knowledge of it, for the decision of the question now under consideration. This simply is, when process has been ordered and issued, by this court, for the repeal of a patent, and the allegations, upon which the process was ordered, are to be put in a shape for trial, who are the parties to the suit? By and between whom is the issue to be made? Are the United States to be introduced as the plaintiffs to maintain the issue, to prove the truth of these allegations against the patentee, who is, of course, the defendant? Is the petitioner or complainant, at whose instance and on whose affidavit of the truth of the cause of complaint, the proceeding was commenced, who called upon the patentee to answer the complaint, at whose prayer the process was granted, who, up to this point, has appeared alone as the adversary of the patentee, now to withdraw himself from the record and the case, and, at his pleasure, without the co-operation or assent of any officer or authority of the United States, to put them in his place to carry on the war which he has provoked; which he only has the means of sustaining, or ought to have had when he commenced it?

On a careful review of the patent laws of the United States, I have found no indication of an intention, that the United States are to be brought in as a party to a litigation, respecting the validity of any rights claimed or denied under those laws. On the contrary, these rights are considered as the private rights of the party who has duly obtained them, and are afterwards to be impeached and defended as such. The parties to every suit for the trial of the right are the petitioner, on whose complaint the inquiry was instituted, and the patentee who asserts the right. The first is bound to make good his allegations that the patent was obtained surreptitiously, or upon false suggestions, and the other to defend himself against them. It is a controversy strictly between these parties, although the public may have an eventual interest in it. They have the same interest in every suit, in which the validity of a patent is contested; for if it be defeated, the pretended invention becomes a common property, as fully as if the letters patent had been repealed by the proceeding here adopted.

The proceeding, now in progress before the court, was instituted under the authority and directions of the tenth section of the act of 21st February, 1793. Do any of the provisions of this section give any countenance to the motion of the complainant? The first step in the proceeding to obtain the repeal of a patent, is an oath or affirmation, made before the district judge by the petitioner for the repeal, that the patent was obtained surreptitiously, or upon false suggestions. Upon this the judge, if the matter alleged appear to him to be sufficient, shall grant a rule, that the patentee show cause why process should not issue against him to repeal such patent. If, on the return and hearing of this rule, the cause shown to the contrary shall not be sufficient, the judge shall order process to be issued against the patentee. This process is a scire facias, upon which an issue is made, of fact or law as the case may be, and, on the trial, the petitioner or complainant is bound to make good the allegations contained in his petition and verified by his affidavit. He must prove affirmatively that the patent was obtained surreptitiously or upon false suggestions. The issue being thus tried, what is the judgment which, by the directions of the act, the court must render, as it is determined, for the one party or the other? If it shall be against the patentee, the judgment is, that his patent be repealed; "and if the party, (so he is denominated,) at whose complaint the process issued, shall have judgment against him, he shall pay all such costs as the defendant shall be put to, in defending the suit, to be taxed by the court."

Is it not clear that the makers of this law considered the parties before the court, the parties to the suit commenced by the process of scire facias, to be the petitioner or complainant, now the plaintiff, on the one side, and the patentee, now the defendant, on the other? There is no meaning in the language of the act, on any other construction. The complainant is expressly called the party, against whom, if the complaint is not sustained, the judgment of the court is to be rendered; and who, by that judgment, is to be compelled to pay the costs of the patentee or defendant, as in other cases. Can the judgment in any suit be rendered against a person not a party to it? Is any one of these provisions consistent with the idea, that the United States are, at any stage of the proceeding, to be brought in by the motion of the complainant, and put upon the record as the plaintiffs in the suit, to have a judgment for costs rendered against them as "the party at whose complaint the process issued." The person or party, at whose complaint the process did issue, and who was bound to sustain the allegations upon which it was issued, withdraws himself, on his own motion, from the controversy, and puts the United States there in his place, to suffer the penalty of his failure to support his own cause of action or complaint. The judgment is to be rendered against the party at whose complaint the process issued, and this cannot be done, unless the same party is also the party to the suit when the issue is tried and the judgment upon it rendered.

The act of the 7th June, 1794 [1 Stat. 393], was passed to restore suits which had been commenced under the act of 10th April, 1790 [Id. 109], and had been suspended or abated by the repeal of that law. The enactment is, that such suits and process may be restored at the instance of the plaintiff or defendant, and "the parties to the said suits, actions, process or proceedings are entitled to proceed, provided that, before any order or proceeding, other than for continuing said suits, after the reinstating thereof, shall be entered or had, the defendant or plaintiff, as the case may be, against whom the same may have been reinstated, shall be brought into court by summons, attachment or such other proceeding, as is used in other cases, for compelling the appearance of a party." Assuredly this provision was never intended for a suit to which the United States are a party: nor could the court compel their appearance by summons, attachment or any other proceeding. The complainant and the patentee, are clearly considered by this act, to be the parties, plaintiff and defendant in the suit.

The practice of the courts, so far as I have obtained a knowledge of it, is in conformity with this view of the law. The case of Stearns v. Barrett [Case No. 13,337], stands on the docket, as reported, as a suit between the complainant and the patentee. Upon the return of the scire facias, the patentee, (that is, Barrett) as defendant, pleaded, "that his letters patent were not upon false suggestion or surreptitiously obtained, as set forth in the said writ, and thereof he puts himself upon the country; and the plaintiff (that is, Stearns) puts himself, as to this issue upon the country likewise." Upon the issue thus formed, the parties, that is, Barrett and Stearns, went to trial before a jury. A special verdict was returned, in which the complainant and patentee, and nobody else, are treated and spoken of as the parties, plaintiff and defendant. The jury find that the plaintiff has not supported his allegations, and therefore they find for the defendant: and, accordingly, the judgment of the court was rendered for the defendant. The learned judge, throughout a long examination of the case, on several controverted points, uniformly, as the jury in their verdict had done, speaks of the complainant and the patentee, as the plaintiff and defendant in the suit, and no other party is alluded to.

The clerk of this court has examined its records, and produced several actions for the repeal of patents. Some of them are upon motions for process, and some after the scire facias has issued. In all, the parties are stated on the record to be the complainant, as the plaintiff; and the patentee, as the defendant. Not an instance, in which the United States were introduced as the plaintiffs, or, in any other way, as a party to the proceeding or suit, has been shown by the counsel for this motion, or come to the knowledge of the court. The motion was overruled.

WOODBRIDGE (GAULT v.). See Case No. 5,275.

Case No. 17,968a.

In re WOODBURY.

[See 7 Fed. 705.]

Case No. 17,969.

WOODBURY v. CRUM.

[1 Biss. 284; 1 West. Law Month. 522.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. May Term, 1859.

NEGOTIABLE NOTE — LIABILITY OF INDORSER — NOTICE OF NONPAYMENT — WHEN DISPENSED WITH — PROPERTY TRANSFER BY MAKER TO INDORSER.

1. The transfer of property by the maker of a promissory note to the indorser for the express purpose of paying the debt will dispense with notice of non-payment, if the amount of property thus assigned be sufficient to satisfy the liability; not otherwise, although all the property of the maker may have been thus assigned.

2. If, however, the assignment to the indorser is in trust for general creditors, and sufficient only for the payment of a small portion of the debts of the maker, such transfer, although including all the debtor's property, is not sufficient to excuse the want of notice to the indorser.

This was an action on a promissory note for $1,144, bearing date May 23, 1853, made by

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

U. P. Coonrod, payable to Robert Crum, or bearer, thirty months after date, with interest after six months, and indorsed by the payee to the plaintiffs. The declaration contained, in addition to the common counts, a special count averring that the note was made by Coonrod to the defendant, and by him assigned to plaintiffs in payment of a debt due them from the defendant at the time, and that prior to the maturity of the note, the maker became insolvent, and assigned all his property to the indorser in trust for the payment of his debts generally. It also contained the usual averment of non-payment by the maker, with notice to the indorser.

[The second count omitted the averment of notice, but alleged that the indorser sustained no injury by reason of want of notice, because he had taken an assignment of all the property of the maker previous to the maturity of the note. To this second count the defendant had demurred, and his demurrer was sustained by Judge Wilson, at the April term, 1859.]²

The trial, with a plea of the general issue and notice of set-off, was had before a jury. The plaintiffs produced the note and proved its execution, and also that at or about the time it bears date the defendant, who had been a dry goods merchant in Tiffin, Seneca county, Ohio, and who had become largely indebted to plaintiffs and others, for goods purchased in New York, sold and transferred his stock of merchandize in Tiffin, to U. P. Coonrod, and received in payment his promissory notes, payable on long time; one of which—the note in suit—was transferred to the plaintiffs by defendant in payment of the debt due them at that time, to $1,225 or thereabouts.

On the 11th of November, 1854, U. P. Coonrod, the maker of the note, having become badly insolvent, assigned all his property to Robert Crum, the defendant, in trust for the benefit of his creditors. The amount thus assigned would pay the creditors on final distribution, no more than fifteen cents on the dollar.

On the 26th day of November, 1855, the note having matured, payment was demanded of the maker, then in Tiffin, where the defendant also resided, and notice of non-payment was made out in writing, placed in an envelope directed to the defendant, and lodged in the post-office at Tiffin, by the notary, on the same day.

Spalding & Parsons and W. F. Stone, for plaintiffs, contended that, under the circumstances, no notice to the indorser was necessary as he had no right to require the holders of the note to make demand of the maker, and to give notice of nonpayment after he had deprived him of responsibility, by taking from him "all his property." And they strongly contended that where the ability of the maker to pay, was entirely exhausted by the assignment of his effects to the indorser, in person, it made no difference in the law of the case, whether the assignment was made directly and exclusively to the indorser, to satisfy his liability on the note, or, whether, as in the case at bar, it was made to him in the character of a trustee for all the creditors of the insolvent debtor. In either case a notice of non-payment to the indorser, could be of no possible service. The following among other authorities were cited by plaintiff's counsel: Bond v. Farnham, 5 Mass. 170; Barton v. Baker, 1 Serg. & R. 334; Prentiss v. Danielson, 5 Conn. 480; Mechanics' Bank v. Griswold, 7 Wend. 165; DeBerdt v. Atkinson, 2 H. Bl. 336; Valk v. Simmons [Case No. 16, 815]; Corney v. DaCosta, 1 Esp. 302; Rhett v. Poe, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 457; Develing v. Ferris, 18 Ohio, 170; Watt v. Mitchell, 6 How. (Miss.) 131; Torrey v. Foss, 40 Me. 74; Commercial Bank of Albany v. Hughes, 17 Wend. 94.

S. B. & F. J. Prentiss, with whom was James Pillars, for defendant, maintained that, in no case, could notice of non-payment be dispensed with in a suit against the indorser, upon the ground that property had been assigned to him by the maker of the note, unless it appeared in evidence that the amount thus assigned was fully sufficient to satisfy the debt. They further contended that a substantial distinction could be taken between an absolute assignment of property to the indorser to pay the specific debt, though not sufficient in amount for the purpose, and an assignment of all the maker's property to the indorser, as a trustee for all the creditors; that in the former case notice might well be dispensed with without producing the like consequences in the latter. They cited several cases, but relied mainly on Creamer v. Perry, 17 Pick. 332.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice, charged the jury, that in case the maker of a note transferred property to the indorser for the express purpose of paying the debt, then subsequent notice of non-payment by the maker would be dispensed with, if the amount of property thus assigned was sufficient to satisfy the liability; not otherwise, although all the property of the maker may have been thus assigned.

The learned justice admitted the strength of the authorities referred to by plaintiffs, but said he was inclined, for the present, to rule that the assignment by Coonrod to Crum, being in trust for general creditors, and being sufficient in amount for the payment of no more than fifteen cents on the dollar of the debts, although it included all his property, was not sufficient in the law to excuse the want of notice to the indorser, or to show due diligence in the holder.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendant.

[Motion for a new trial was immediately filed by plaintiffs, and continued by the court, under advisement.]³

² [From 1 West Law Month. 522.]

³ [From 1 West Law Month. 522.]

WOODBURY (THOMAS v.). See Case No. 13,916.

Case No. 17,970.

WOODBURY PATENT PLANING MACH.
CO. v. KBITH.

[4 Ban. & A. 100.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan., 1879.²

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PLANING MACHINES—ANTICIPATION—ABANDONMENT OF INVENTION.

1. The question as to what constitutes an abandonment of an invention, considered.

2. The improvement in planing machines, by which flat bars are placed before and behind the cutters, to keep the stock firm during the operation, instead of rollers previously used, for which letters patent No. 138,462 were granted to Joseph P. Woodbury, April 29, 1873, was not new, having been anticipated by the Anson machine.

3. A feature in a machine, anticipating the invention described in the patent in suit, will none the less anticipate such invention, because the inventor of such anticipating feature had not in view or did not understand the particular advantage of, or function performed by the anticipating feature.

In equity.

E. N. Dickerson, S. A. Duncan, J. A. L. Whittier, and A. A. Strout, for complainant.
B. F. Thurston, D. H. Rice, and Charles E. Pratt, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. The patent in suit, No. 138,462, was issued to Joseph P. Woodbury April 29, 1873, and is for an improvement in planing machines, by which flat bars are placed before and behind the cutters to keep the stock firm during the operation, instead of the rollers which were used by Woodworth, the inventor of this class of machines. This change, though slight, has proved to be of great value, and is now in general use; and this suit is defended by an association of persons who are interested to continue such use. The patentee is dead, and the plaintiffs are a corporation to whom he had assigned his patent.

The history of this grant, which was made twenty-five years after it was first applied for, and twenty-seven years after the invention was completed, is remarkable. The inventor made application June 3, 1848, and appointed an attorney, but did not give him all the usual authority. The power was so worded as not to enable him to withdraw the application. The office rejected the application February 20, 1849, and nothing further was done until October, 1852, when the attorney withdrew the application, and received back $20, of which Woodbury had no notice. In February, 1854, Woodbury instructed Mr. Cooper, a well-known patent solicitor of Boston, who was acting for him in another case, to call up and prosecute this rejected application. There was a misunderstanding as to the invention referred to, and it was only in September, 1854, that Mr. Cooper learned exactly how the case stood. There was, at that time, a rule in the patent office, that an application which should not be renewed or prosecuted within two years after it had been rejected or withdrawn, should be conclusively presumed to have been abandoned. This rule was not always acted on, but Mr. Cooper says that it was very rigid, and that in all his experience, which is understood to have been large, he had not known it to be departed from. I think it a fair inference from the testimony, that Cooper instructed Woodbury that it was useless to attempt to reinstate his case at the patent office. There is evidence that Woodbury thought himself unjustly deprived of a patent, and that he often afterwards expressed a hope that something would be done by congress for his relief. He says, in an ex parte affidavit, which forms part of the record, that he heard in 1869 that Mr. Fisher, then commissioner of patents, had reversed the former rule of presumption arising out of neglect for two years, and that he then intended to apply again, but heard that congress was about to pass a law to meet such cases, and he waited for that.

When revising the patent laws in 1870, congress did enact: "That when an application for a patent has been rejected or withdrawn, prior to the passage of this act, the applicant shall have six months from the date of such passage to renew his application, or to file a new one; and if he omit to do either, his application shall be held to have been abandoned. Upon the hearing of such renewed applications, abandonment shall be considered as a question of fact."

Upon the question of abandonment, it is argued: First, that the decision of the commissioner was final, under section 35 of the statute of 1870 [16 Stat. 202]. But the same statute gives the commissioner, in all cases, jurisdiction of the question of abandonment, and, at the same time, makes the fact a defence upon the trial of the action. Sections 24 and 61 (16 Stat. 201, 208). And this thirty-fifth section was so construed by Shipman, J., in United States Rifle Co. v. Whitney Arms Co. [Case No. 16,793]. Second, that there was a conclusive abandonment by virtue of the statute of 1861, § 12 (12 Stat. 248), which required that all applications should be completed and prepared for examination within two years after the filing of the petition, or, in cases then pending, within two years after the passage of the act, unless it should be shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner of patents that the delay was unavoidable. This was not the case of an incomplete application in 1861, but of one that had been rejected. Third, that Woodbury had actually abandone this invention. Each case, of course, must be decided on its own circumstances; and I am inclined to think that Woodbury had not abandoned his invention. This is a somewhat difficult question to decide, especially as Woodbury cannot be cross-examined; but the general adoption of his improvement which would estop him, if he knowingly permitted it, without taking steps to enforce his rights, appears to have occurred later than 1854, when he had no means, or was advised that he had no means, for such enforcement. This appears to me the turning point upon the matter of abandonment; for that he had, in his mind, any actual intention of that sort, cannot be maintained. I am further of the opinion that the machine built by one Anson, at Norwich, Connecticut, anticipated the invention of Woodbury.

¹ [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Affirmed in 101 U. S. 479.]

The plaintiffs maintain that most of the evidence in respect of this machine is inadmissible, because the names of the witnesses called to prove this defence were not given in the answer. I was of that impression at the trial, and I think the practice here is to give all the names. The statute is substantially the same as it has been since 1836, excepting that the act of 1870, adopting the decisions of the courts, applied to cases in equity the rule of notice which the act of 1836 [5 Stat. 117] laid down for actions at common law. The rule is now found in Rev. St. § 4920, and declares that the defendant shall state in his answer the names and residences of the persons alleged to have invented, or to have had the prior knowledge of the thing patented, and where and by whom it had been used. I have examined, I believe, all the decisions, and while there are many which speak of notice of the names of "witnesses," yet this is an ambiguous term, which does not necessarily mean that all witnesses are to be mentioned. It was decided by Grier, J., after careful argument, that it was only those persons who had invented or used the machine, or improvement, and not those who were to testify to such invention or use, who must be pointed out. Wilton v. The Railroads [Case No. 17,857]. Nelson and Conkling, JJ., made a similar ruling. Many v. Jagger [Id. 9,053]. Mr. Justice Clifford, in giving the opinion of the supreme court, has twice cited the former of these cases, though not to this precise distinction; and in a third case he has adopted its language. See Teese v. Huntingdon, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 10; Agawam Co. v. Jordan, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 596; Roemer v. Simon, 95 U. S. 219.

The deposition of Anson, the inventor of the machine, may be read, because no objection was made at the time of his examination. See Graham v. Mason [Case No. 5,671]; Brown v. Hall [Id. 2,008]; Barker v. Stowe [Id. 994]. And there was notice of the name and residence of one witness to the use of the machine at Norwich.

If the rulings that I have above cited, and which appear to have been adopted or approved by the supreme court, mean that after notice of the name and residence of the inventor, and of the place of use, and of the name of some one who has used it, has been given or waived, all other witnesses may be examined without notice,—and I do not see that it can mean less than that,—then the evidence in this case is all admissible, because Anson invented and used the machine at Norwich, and notice of his name and residence was waived.

Another ground for admitting the depositions relating to Anson's machine, is taken by the defendant. As the evidence was offered, the objection was as follows: "Counsel for complainant objects to the testimony of this witness, for want of notice." It was stated at the argument, and not denied, though it does not appear of record, that when the defendant's counsel gave notice for taking this testimony at Norwich, he did not give the names of the witnesses he intended to examine, and that the complainant's counsel insisted that he was bound to do this by the practice in equity, and that there was correspondence upon this subject. Now, the objection for want of notice might mean, the want of this notice of the names of witnesses to be produced and examined at a particular time and place, according to an asserted practice in equity, a point not now insisted on. When it came to the Reynolds machine, the objection taken was that "neither the name nor residence" of the witness "appears in the answer," etc. Upon this point I do not pass.

The invention of Woodbury was made in 1846, and the machine of Anson was made in 1843. Of the date there is no doubt, for Anson applied for a patent on his invention in 1844. His machine was organized to mould or "stick," as the witnesses call it, sashes for windows, and similar articles, was adapted to planing, and was used for planing slats for blinds. There is no doubt that Anson's machine had bars instead of rollers, for he says so in his specification. The machine has been running ever since, and is in court at present.

Two points are taken against this machine: (1) That the bed is not sufficiently solid to answer the purpose of Woodbury's bed, which is to resist firmly, like an anvil, as he says, the blows of the cutter. Upon the evidence, and upon inspection, I think the bed is a solid bed, within the meaning and use of the Woodbury machine, for all purposes of planing such stock as was likely to be planed upon it. And if the machine were to be enlarged to do general planing work, I see no reason to suppose that a similar bed, modified only as any mechanic would modify it, would not answer the purpose. The solid bed was not new with Woodbury, but was part of the Woodworth organization, which was the starting point of all these machines, and its benefits were well known and likely to be adopted by Anson. (2) The other question is whether the bars which Anson made instead of rollers, had a yielding pressure. If not, they would not work on an ordinary planing machine, though they might possibly do in a small machine for special purposes. The machine in court has a yielding pressure, by means of weights, which allow the bar to give about three-eighths of an inch. Mr. Waters says about three-sixteenths of an inch; but he is considerably under the mark. To all appearance this organization is as old as the rest of the machine; but as the question of novelty on the part of Woodbury depends upon whether the weights were introduced thirty-five years or thirty-three years since, the appearance is of no great significance. The witnesses all think that the machine has remained unchanged in this particular from the beginning. It seems probable that any one who substituted bars for rollers would make them yield, because the rollers of Woodworth's machine were made in that way. It was not the yielding which was new, but the substitution of bars for rollers. The distinguished expert of the plaintiffs says: "I have never seen a Woodworth planing machine organized with either rollers or bars to bear down the rough stock upon the bed-piece, by acting upon the rough surface of the stock, that was not so constructed as to allow the roller or bar, as the case might be, to yield to the inequalities almost always existing in sawed lumber; nor do I ever expect to see such a machine in practical use." His meaning is, that the machine would stop whenever a board having the usual inequalities was attempted to be passed through it.

In a machine like Anson's, the difficulty might not present itself so often, or so soon, but I should suppose it would make itself felt sooner or later, and would need to be remedied before the machine had been run for a day.

The witnesses, sixteen in number, are all on one side, and include, apparently, all persons now living who ought to be called. They testify from their recollection, with more or less positiveness, and with apparent fairness. None of them points to any change, by which the pressure bars were made yielding, after the machine was finished in 1843, but, as I before said, they all think them unchanged.

Against this there is the evidence, which is entitled to much weight, that the drawings accompanying Anson's application for a patent do not show any opportunity for a yielding pressure, or but little. The model is somewhat damaged, and the suggestion is made that it may have been tampered with. As it appears to-day there is some play to the rods of the pressure bars.

I do not think this negative evidence sufficient to discredit the recollection of the witnesses. The patent which Anson asked for had nothing to do with the bars, and there is no reason to suppose that he understood that there was any such advantage in bars over rollers as Woodbury saw and made known. He was not concerned with the particular matter of a yielding pressure bar; but if he made it to yield, he made the thing which Woodbury is, by a very proper and indeed necessary fiction of the patent law, presumed to have had knowledge of; and, therefore, when Woodbury pointed out the great advantage of this organization, he was merely, in intendment of law, applying an old machine to a more extensive use. I believe him to have been an original and meritorious inventor, but of a change which was not difficult to make or to invent, and of which, as it turns out, he was not the first inventor.

Bill dismissed, with costs.

[This case was taken by appeal to the supreme court, and the decision was there affirmed. 101 U. S. 479.]

Case No. 17,971.

WOODCOCK v. PARKER et al.

[1 Gall. 438; 1 Robb, Pat. Cas. 37; Merw. Pat. Inv. 218.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May, 1813.
PRIORITY OF PATENT RIGHTS—ORIGINAL INVENTION.

1. The original inventor of a machine, who has reduced his invention to practice, is entitled to a priority of patent right, although subsequently the same machine may have been invented by another person.

See Bedford v. Hunt, Case No. 1,217; Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. (16 U. S.) 434; s. c., Case No. 4,559; Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 292; Dawson v. Follen, Case No. 3,670; Reutger v. Kanowes, Id. 11,710; Whitney v. Emmett, Id. 17,585.

[Cited in Dietz v. Wade, Case No. 3,903; Treadwell v. Bladen, Id. 14,154; Reed v. Cutter, Id. 11,645; Brooks v. Bicknell, Id. 1,944; Hudson v. Bradley, Id. 6,833; Johnson v. Root, Id. 7,411; Judson v. Bradford, Id. 7,564. Distinguished in Hill v. Dunklee, Id. 6,489. Cited in Christie v. Seybold, 5 C. C. A. 40, 55 Fed. 76.]

[Cited in Davis v. Bell, 8 N. H. 503.]

2. The inventor of an improvement cannot entitle himself to a patent more broad than his invention.

See Lowell v. Lewis, Case No. 8,568; Moody v. Fiske, Id. 9,745; Wyeth v. Stone, Id. 18,107. See, also, Brunton v. Hawkes, 4 Barn. & Ald. 541; Rex v. Else, Dav. Pat. Cas. 144; Phil. Pat. 223-231; Whitney v. Emmett, Case No. 17,585; Earle v. Sawyer, Id. 4,247.

[Cited in Re Fultz, Case No. 5,156.]

This was an action on the case for a violation of a patent right of the plaintiff for splitting leather. The cause was tried at this term before Story, J., in the absence of the district judge. The plaintiff [John Woodcock], at the trial, produced his letters patent, dated 8th May, 1809, securing to him the patent right of a machine for splitting leather. The defendants [David Parker and another] admitted the use of a similar machine, but contended that the machine was the invention of one Samuel Parker, (under whom they claimed, who had obtained his original letters patent for the same invention, dated the 9th July, 1808, and letters patent for certain improvements therein, dated the 26th of April, 1809. The principal questions between the parties were: (1) Whether Woodcock or Parker was the first inventor of the machine in controversy, and entitled to the patent. (2) Whether, admitting the plaintiff to be the original inventor of the machine, in its present improved state, his patent was not too broad, and did not include machinery previously invented and applied to the same purpose by the said Parker.

¹ [Reported by John Gallison, Esq. Merw. Pat. Inv. 218, contains only a partial report.]

George Blake and Mr. Dexter, for plaintiff.
Prescott & Otis, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice, in summing up the cause, directed the jury as follows: The first inventor is entitled to the benefit of his invention, if he reduce it to practice and obtain a patent therefor, and a subsequent inventor cannot, by obtaining a patent therefor, oust the first inventor of his right, or maintain an action against him for the use of his own invention. In the present case, as the defendants claim their right to use the machine in controversy by a good derivative title from Samuel Parker, if the jury are satisfied that said Parker was the first and original inventor of the machine, the plaintiff cannot, under all the circumstances, maintain his action; notwithstanding he may have been a subsequent inventor, without any knowledge of the prior existence of the machine, or communication with the first inventor. It is not necessary to consider, whether if the first inventor should wholly abandon his invention and never reduce it to practice, so as to produce useful effects, a second inventor might not be entitled to the benefit of the statute patent: because here there is not the slightest evidence of such abandonment. Parker is proved to have put his machine in operation; it produced useful effects, and he followed up his invention by obtaining a patent from the department of state.

As to the second question, if the machine, for which the plaintiff obtained a patent, substantially existed before, and the plaintiff made an improvement only therein, he is entitled to a patent for such improvement only, and not for the whole machine; and under such circumstances, as this present patent is admitted to comprehend the whole machine, it is too broad, and therefore void. It is not necessary, to defeat the plaintiff's patent, that a machine should have previously existed in every respect similar to his own; for a mere change of former proportions will not entitle a party to a patent. If he claim a patent for a whole machine, it must in substance be a new machine; that is, it must be a new mode, method, or application of mechanism, to produce some new effect, or to produce an old effect in a new way. In the present case, if all parts of the machine, except the spring plate, (which the plaintiff claims as emphatically his own invention,) existed before, and were applied to produce the same effects in the same manner; and the plaintiff has established the spring plate to be his exclusive invention, still his patent ought to have been confined to such improvement, and not to have comprehended the whole machine. Unless, therefore, the plaintiff establish his exclusive right to the whole machine, as now organized, as his own invention, he cannot be entitled to the verdict of the jury.

The jury found a verdict for the defendants; and a bill of exceptions was taken to the direction of the judge, but no writ of error has ever been sued to the supreme court.

WOODEN (PETERSON v.). See Case No. 11,038.

WOODFIN (KITCHEN v.). See Case No. 7,855.

Case No. 17,972.

In re WOODFORD et al.

[13 N. B. R. 575; ¹ 1 Cin. Law Bul. 37.]

District Court, N. D. Ohio. 1876.

INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION—NUMBER OF PETITIONERS.

1. Creditors whose claims are under two hundred and fifty dollars are not to be counted in computing the number who must unite in an involuntary petition, if one-fourth of the creditors whose claims are above that sum join in the petition.

2. In computing the amount, all the claims must be counted irrespective of the amount.

[Cited in Re Broich, Case No. 1,921; Re Lloyd, Id. 8,429.]

3. A party may purchase a claim in good faith, in order to join in an involuntary petition and make the necessary number.

4. If the sale of a claim is void for fraud or want of consideration, the claim is to be deemed to belong to the assignor.

WELKER, District Judge. Exception to report of commissioner to whom petition, etc., were referred, to ascertain number and amount of creditors.

Held: First. That in counting the number of creditors necessary to join in the petition, creditors under two hundred and fifty dollars are not to be counted, if one-fourth of the creditors above that sum join in the petition. If such number do not join, then creditors below two hundred and fifty dollars may be counted, to obtain the necessary number.

Second. That in counting the amount of claims of creditors, provable claims in all amounts are to be reckoned, those less than two hundred and fifty dollars as well as over that amount; and the aggregate of the petitioners' debts must be equal to one-third of all the debts provable, irrespective of amounts thereof. The cases In re Hadley [Case No. 5,894], decided by Judge Brown, and In re Currier [Id. 3,492], decided by Judge Lowell, approved and followed.

¹ [Reprinted from 13 N. B. R. 575, by permission.]

Third. That a creditor has a right to sell and a party a right to purchase, in good faith, claims against a debtor, with a view to enable the purchaser to join in a petition in bankruptcy, in order to make the necessary number to file a petition.

Fourth. That where a sale of such claims is void for want of consideration or fraud, and is set aside for that reason, the claims so attempted to be sold or transferred go back to the assignor, and in the count are to be reckoned as belonging to the assignor.

Fifth. If such assignee join in the petition, and such assignment is set aside, he is not to be counted in the number necessary to join, nor to be reckoned in the amount of provable debts, but the assignor is to be counted instead if he be a party to the petition, and the amount of such indebtedness reckoned to him—such assignee thereby dropping out of the proceedings as creditor.

WOODHOUSE (HODGSON v.). See Case No. 6,571.

WOODHOUSE (THOMAS v.). See Case No. 13,917.

Case No. 17,973.

Case of WOODHULL.

[Cited in U. S. v. Williams, 3 Fed. 486. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

WOODHULL (BEACH v.). See Case No. 1,154.

Case No. 17,974.

WOODHULL v. BEAVER COUNTY.

[3 Wall. Jr. 274; 1 20 Leg. Int. 76.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Nov. Term, 1859.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN PREVENTIVE AND REMEDIAL JUSTICE—COUNTY BONDS—DOUBTFUL VALIDITY.

1. A court will frequently issue process to prevent acts being done on the ground that they are unauthorized, which same acts, after they are done, the court will enforce as having been made in pursuance of authority sufficiently given.

2. Ex. gr. It will hold a county bound to pay bonds actually issued and negotiated by it under an authority assumed from an ambiguously and ill expressed statute—although had any citizen of the county applied for an injunction to restrain the issue on the ground of want of authority clearly given by the statute, the court would have granted such preventive remedy.

[Cited in Lewis v. Shreveport, Case No. 8,331; Memphis v. Brown, Id. 9,415.]

Motion for a new trial; the case being thus: A statute of Pennsylvania (Act April 7, 1853, p. 335) authorized the county of Beaver to subscribe to the stock of a railroad; "provided," such is the language of the act, "that the amount of subscription shall not exceed $100,000; the amount thereof shall be fixed and determined by one grand jury of the county, and upon report of such grand jury being fixed, it shall be lawful for the county commissioners to carry the same into effect by making, in the name of the county, the subscription so directed by said grand jury. Nothing was here said about the issuing of any bonds by the county; but a second proviso enacted that "whenever bonds of the county are given in payment of subscription, the same shall not be sold by said railroad company at less than par value." The grand jury, without either "fixing" or "determining" any amount, "recommended the commissioners to make the subscription in conformity to the act of assembly." The commissioners accordingly issued negotiable bonds, binding the county (to what extent did not here appear); and having given them to the railroad company, this last put them in the market and sold them bona fide for what they would bring; in most cases much below par. The present plaintiff having bought certain of the bonds, and the county not paying interest, he sued it and got a verdict here for the amount.

On a motion for a new trial, two questions were now presented: I. Had the commissioners authority to issue bonds by virtue of the above-mentioned act of assembly, authorizing it to subscribe to stock? II. Was the recommendation of the grand jury, which fixed no amount, sufficient to authorize the commissioners to make the subscriptions which they have made, and to execute the bonds issued thereon? This court having in a former case declared that when authority to do acts so far out of the ordinary range of county action was given, it ought to be given "in clear and unambiguous terms."

GRIER, Circuit Justice. This court has said that statutes conferring such doubtful and important powers on county or city officers as have here been exercised, should express the intention of the legislature "in clear and unambiguous terms." We do not intend to retract the assertion, and if the only question before the jury had been whether these powers were vested in these commissioners in terms such as we have declared they ought, in all cases, to be given in, we might well have instructed them, that such was not the case. But it does not follow as a consequence of what we have declared to be the proper sort of language in which to vest such powers, that courts and juries must treat the legislation as a nullity, which is not conformable to our rule. I am sorry to say that too many of the acts of the Pennsylvania legislature granting powers most dangerous to individuals and the rights of property, cannot bear this test. As an excuse for this criminal negligence in those entrusted by the people with the exercise of this sovereign function, it is said that all these acts of assembly are drawn up by the persons known as outside or lobby members, who are employed for "a consideration" to solicit legislation by which speculators may advance their interests at the expense of the community. Be the reason what it may, we can only say that the persons who have drawn many of the statutes about railroad subscriptions lately brought to our notice, have exhibited an astonishing obliquity of genius in their selection of the terms used to express the intention of the legislature. I will not say that it was the deliberate intention of these scribes to make the legislature speak in such ambiguous terms, that they might be used to give credit and currency to certain securities by one interpretation, and by another to disown the bond and defraud the community. In the case of the bonds issued by the city of Pittsburg to the Allegheny Valley Railroad, such has been the result. But in this case, the meaning of the legislature has not been so absolutely obscured by ingenious generalities of expression. Though not expressed in "clear and unambiguous language," this act is sufficiently capable of the construction that "the commissioners or a majority of them, are authorized to pledge the faith of the county by bonds drawn in the best approved forms to give them value in the money market, to such an amount, not exceeding $100,000, as the grand jury of the county may approve or direct;" and to provide for the payment of principal and interest of the same by taxation. And this interpretation we think it reasonable to give to it in the circumstances of this case.

¹ [Reported by John William Wallace, Jr., Esq.]

II. As respects the report of the grand jury. It cannot be denied that this report has been drawn by some blundering scribe who perhaps did not take the trouble to look at the statute under which he was acting. But if it requires charitable criticism to support the intention of the legislature, how much more should it be extended to the acts of a grand jury! While the report fixes no amount, it yet recommends a subscription in conformity to the act of assembly. If the commissioners have not yet subscribed to the full amount of $100,000, they can so far as the report gives them authority. If, indeed, this were an application to enjoin or suppress the issue of these bonds, I would say—(i.) As respects the language of the act of assembly, that we would be satisfied with nothing short of direct terms (which it would have been as easy to use as those that are used), and that we would not infer these great and dangerous powers from circumlocution and vague terms; and (ii.) as respects the grand jury's report, that it was insufficient, because it does not in "clear terms" fix and determine the amount. If any citizen of Beaver county had chosen to dispute the construction assumed by the commissioners both of the statute and of the report, the courts were open. He could have asked for an injunction and we would have granted it. But now, when all parties have given their construction to the act, and it can by its terms be made to include the power, the court will not exercise astutia to give it a stringent interpretation in order to enable a county to disown its obligations after having received their value. New trial refused.

WOODHULL (DUTCHER v.). See Case No. 4,204.

Case No. 17,975.

WOODHULL et al. v. WAGNER.

[Baldw. 296.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1831.

STATE INSOLVENT LAW—EXTRATERRITORIAL EFFECT —CONTRACT TO PAY MONEY—PLACE OF PAYMENT.

1. A discharge of a debtor under the insolvent law of Pennsylvania, does not protect him from arrest by a citizen of New York, for a debt payable in New York, or to a citizen of that state.

[Cited in dissenting opinion in Beers v. Haughton, 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 373.]

2. Insolvent laws of a state have no effect beyond the limits thereof.

[Cited in Babcock v. Weston, Case No. 703; Towne v. Smith, Id. 14,115; Mygatt v. Green Bay, Id. 9,998; Baldwin v. Hale, 1 Wall. (68 U. S.) 234; Von Glahn v. Varenne, Case No. 16,994; Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 141, 1 Sup. Ct. 116.]

[Cited in Brigham v. Henderson, 1 Cush. 432; Savoy v. Marsh, 10 Mete. (Mass.) 595, 596; Deering v. Boyle, 8 Kan. 535; Hawley v. Hunt, 27 Iowa, 308; Felch v. Bugbee, 48 Me. 14; Scribner v. Fisher, 2 Gray, 47.]

3. A residing in Philadelphia, consigned goods to B residing in New York, and drew his bill on B, promising to pay the balance which might be due after the sale of the goods, if the proceeds did not reimburse B the amount of the bill. B accepted and paid the bill which exceeded the amount of sales: Held, that A was bound to reimburse B at New York.

[Cited in Grant v. Healey, Case No. 5,696.]

4. The decisions of the supreme court on state insolvent laws collected and classed.

This was an application to discharge the defendant from custody under a capias ad satisfaciendum, and was submitted to the court upon a statement of the facts, as follows: William Wagner, residing in Philadelphia, drew a bill upon Woodhull & Davis, residing in New York. It was accepted and paid at maturity by the acceptors. The late firm of Snowden & Wagner had consigned to Woodhull & Davis a cargo of turpentine, which was not disposed of at the time of accepting the bill, at which time the firm was dissolved, and the defendant was carrying on business alone. After winding up the sales and crediting the net proceeds, a balance remained due on Wagner's bill, upon the New York house. Suit was brought against William Wagner for not indemnifying Woodhull & Davis for their acceptance on his account. The defendant being in custody on a ca. ad sa., applied for his release, on the ground of his discharge by the insolvent laws of Pennsylvania. This was opposed on the allegation, that the debt was contracted in New York, and therefore not affected by this discharge here.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Henry Baldwin, Circuit Justice.]

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. The statement of the case agreed on by the parties, presents only one question for the consideration of the court, which is, whether the defendant's discharge under the insolvent laws of Pennsylvania, entitles him to be discharged from the arrest made under a capias ad satisfaciendum, issued from this court in execution of a judgment obtained against him eleven months before his discharge. The power of the states of this union to pass bankrupt or insolvent laws, and the effect of the exemption of the person of the debtor, or property acquired after the discharge, have been the subject of much discussion and difference of opinion. In the supreme court, they have been so fully examined by counsel and the judges, as to make it necessary only to state the result of such cases as bear upon the present application.

In Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 122, 91, it was decided: 1st. That a state had a right to pass a bankrupt law, provided there was no act of congress in force establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy, conflicting with such state law; and provided it did not impair the obligation of a contract, within the tenth section of the first article of the constitution; 2d. That such state law, liberating the person of the debtor, and discharging him from liability on contracts made previously to the law, was unconstitutional and void, so far as it discharged the contract, or attempted to do so; but, 3d. That it was valid so far as it discharged the person of the debtor from confinement, as imprisonment was merely a remedy to enforce the obligation of the contract, but no part of the contract itself, a release from it did not impair the obligation. [Sturges v. Crowninshield] 1d. 200, 201. Though the court, in the latter part of their opinion (1d. 207), confine it to the second point, yet the first and third having been considered, and their judgment exercised on them, it has always been understood (and so we feel it our duty to view it), that the law is settled on these points, according to the reasoning of the court, if not their direct decision. The same principle on the third point was affirmed in Mason v. Haile, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 370, which was decided independently of any considerations arising from the locality of the contract or the parties. In that case the court declared, that a state law abolishing imprisonment for debt, would be valid as a measure regulated by the state legislature, acting on the remedy, and that in part only, and repeat the doctrine asserted in Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 378.

In M'Millan v. M'Neil, Id. 209, the court are said to have declared that the circumstance of the state law, under which the debt was attempted to be discharged, having been passed before the debt was contracted, made no difference in the application of the principle; and in Farmers' Bank v. Smith, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 131, they decided that the fact of both parties being citizens of Pennsylvania when the contract was made, made no difference between that and former cases.

From the opinion of all the judges in Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 213, 333, it seems that the point decided in M'Millan v. M'Neil [supra] was not correctly stated in the report, and that it was not interded to settle the question of the effect of the law upon contracts made subsequent to its passage. The question remained open till the case of Saunders v. Ogden, in which four of the judges gave their opinions that the contract could be discharged by a state law passed before the contract was made; putting the case on the distinction between bankrupt or insolvent laws which were retrospective, and those which were prospective in their operation. But these opinions led to no final judgment on this point, which in strictness may therefore be considered as not having been adjudicated, though it was the deliberate opinion of a majority of the court; but this point does not arise here, and it is therefore not necessary to the decision of this motion to notice it further. Another point of more immediate application arose in that case. The suit was brought on a bill drawn by Jordon in Kentucky, on Ogden, a citizen of New York, resident there, and accepted by him in favour of Saunders, a citizen of Kentucky. One of the judges who composed the majority on the first question, being of opinion that a discharge under the law of New York, was void as to a citizen of Kentucky, four judges concurred in giving judgment for the plaintiff, on the ground of the invalidity of the law. [Mason v. Haile] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 369. Judge Johnson was the only judge who gave an opinion on the second point, the three who concurred with him on the first dissented on this, the three who dissented on the first assented to the judgment which was entered for the defendant in error, but without assigning any reasons beyond those given in their dissenting opinion on the first question. If the case of Ogden v. Saunders had turned upon the mere point of citizenship of the plaintiff, it would be difficult to say what was the direct judgment of the court. Three judges thought the law of New York was valid, having been passed before the debt was contracted, and that it operated on the case, the contract having been made and to be executed there. Three gave no opinion on the locality; it was not necessary to do so, as they thought the plaintiff entitled to judgment on the first point. Thus considered, this case, standing by itself, directly adjudicates no definite question involved in the one now under hearing, as we are not informed whether the three judges who concurred with Judge Johnson in rendering judgment against the party claiming under the law, did it for the reasons assigned by them in their dissenting opinion on the first point, or those assigned by him on the second. No question arises here as to the right of the plaintiff to all remedies against the defendant's property. The law under which he has been discharged is not unconstitutional, as it attempts to discharge only the person. The only doubts are: (1) as to the effect of a discharge on a debt contracted in New York; (2) with a citizen of that state; (3) on process issued from this court. All the judges, in Ogden v. Saunders, stated that the point decided in M'Millan v. M'Neill was, that a discharge of the defendant under a law of Louisiana, could not discharge or operate on a contract made and to be executed in South Carolina, where both parties then resided. Thus affirming individually, if not in their collective judgment, the principle then settled. In several cases preceding that of M'Millan v. M'Neill, as well as in that, the supreme court have declared that the discharge by the bankrupt laws of a foreign country was no bar to an action brought on a contract made in this. [Barr v. Gratz] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 213; [M'Ilvaine v. Cox] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 298, 302; Robertson's Adm'rs v. Bank of Georgetown, January term, 1831 [unreported]; [Ogden v. Saunders] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 358 et seq.

In Buckner v. Findley, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 586, the court declared that "for all national purposes embraced by the federal constitution, the states and the citizens thereof are all united under the same sovereign authority, and governed by the same laws. In all other respects the states are necessarily foreign to and independent of each other; their constitution and forms of government being, although republican, altogether different, as are their laws and institutions." Id. 590. This principle appears to be directly applicable to the laws of the states, discharging the persons and future acquisitions of debtors. Such laws are wholly unconnected with the federal relations of the states to the general government, where they do not impair the obligation of contracts. Discharges under them are, in other states, to be considered as made under foreign laws, within the uniform decision of the supreme court, having no extra-territorial effect on contracts made beyond their jurisdiction, or with persons not subject to their laws at the time when it was to be carried into effect. In this light, and taken in connexion with these cases, the case of Ogden v. Saunders is important, as showing the concurrence of all the judges in the general principle as to the effect of discharges under foreign bankrupt laws. It is also important as connected with the case of Shaw v. Robbins, in a note to [Ogden v. Saunders] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 369, in which the court decided, that a bill of exchange, drawn by a citizen of Massachusetts on a citizen of New York, and accepted by him, being a resident there, could be recovered in a state court, though the defendant had been discharged under the insolvent laws of New York. The facts of the case were those of Ogden v. Saunders, the decision in which was held applicable, and governed the one before them. Thus connected with the preceding case of M'Millan v. M'Neill, and the subsequent one of Shaw v. Robbins, the case of Ogden v. Saunders must be considered, at least in the circuit court, as settling both principles; that a discharge by the law of a state operates only on contracts made between its own citizens, and to be executed within the state. The opinion of Judge Johnson may then be taken by us as that of a majority of the court on the effect of their decision of that case in pages 368, 369. He declares it to be an adjudication in that case, "that as between citizens of the same state, a discharge of a bankrupt by the laws of that state is valid as it affects posterior contracts; that as against creditors, citizens of other states, it is invalid as to all contracts." The learned judge maintains these propositions: (1) "That the power given to the United States to pass insolvent laws is not exclusive." (2) "That the fair and ordinary exercise of that power by the states, does not necessarily involve a violation of the obligation of contracts, a multo fortiori, of posterior contracts." (3) But when states pass beyond their own limits, and the rights of their own citizens, and act on the rights of citizens of other states, the exercise of such a power is incompatible with the rights of other states, and the constitution of the United States. In [Boyle v. Zacharie] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 643, this point was declared to be finally and conclusively settled.

In the next case which came before the supreme court on the effect of discharges by state bankrupt laws (Clay v. Smith, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 411) the plaintiff was a citizen of Kentucky, the defendant of Louisiana, who was discharged, "as well his person as his future effects, from all claims of his creditors," by a law of that state passed in 1811. The debt sued for was incurred in 1808. The plaintiff made himself a party to the proceedings under the law, and was thereby held to have abandoned his extra territorial immunity from the operation of the bankrupt law of Louisiana, which released the defendant from all demands on his person, or subsequently acquired property.

The result then of what we must consider in this court as the decision in the foregoing cases is, that a state law discharging the person of a debtor from arrest for debts contracted in the state between its own citizens as affecting only the remedy to enforce, not the obligation of the contract, is valid, and not within the prohibition of the constitution, whether the debt was contracted before or after the law. Sturges v. Crowninshield, Ogden v. Saunders, Mason v. Haile [supra]. So is a law discharging both the persons and future acquisitions of the debtor from contracts posterior to the law; or from anterior ones, if the creditor makes himself a party to the proceedings which lead to the discharge in the state court. Ogden v. Saunders, Clay v. Smith. But such laws have no operation out of the state over contracts not made and to be carried into effect within it, or over the citizens of other states. Harrison v. Sterry [5 Cranch (9 U. S.) 289]; M'Millan v. McNeill, Ogden v. Saunders, Shaw v. Robbins, Robertson's Adm'rs v. Bank of Georgetown [supra]. That it makes no difference whether the suit is brought in a state court, or the court of the United States; the rule is the same as to rendering judgment or issuing process. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Pennsylvania v. Smith, Shaw v. Robbins, Ogden v. Saunders. A state law not repugnant to the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States is, by the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act, a rule for the decision of all cases to which it applies in the federal courts; and we must decide on this precisely as the state courts ought to do. [Satterlee v. Matthewson] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 413, 414; [Wilkinson v. Leland] Id. 656; [Hinde v. Vattier] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 401.

With these settled principles to control our decision, it only remains to apply them to the contract, on which the plaintiffs have obtained their judgment. The defendant, residing in Philadelphia, consigned to the plaintiffs, residing in New York, a quantity of turpentine to be sold on his account. In anticipation of the sale he drew a bill on the plaintiffs, which was accepted and paid, the sales did not reimburse them, they brought their suit to recover the balance, and obtained the judgment on which the capias ad satisfaciendum was issued. By the nature of this contract the defendants undertook in law to pay this balance to the plaintiffs, were bound to reimburse them at the place where the money was advanced, and the plaintiffs had a right to draw for the difference between the amount of the bill so accepted and paid, and the proceeds of the sale. We can perceive no difference between this right in the plaintiffs to draw for this balance, and the obligation of the defendant to pay, which arose from the nature of the contract, and a letter expressly authorising the drafts for acceptance. The case comes within the principle settled in Lanusse v. Barker, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 101; where Lanusse having advanced money in New Orleans, on the faith of letters written by Barker in New York, it was held that the money was to be replaced at New Orleans, and Barker was adjudged to pay the balance at New Orleans interest of ten per cent. The undertaking then being to replace the money in New York, that was the place where the debt was payable; and the plaintiffs being citizens of that state, the discharge of the defendant by the insolvent laws of Pennsylvania can have no operation on the contract, or the remedies to enforce performance.

As the decisions of the supreme court are authoritative, we have not thought it necessary to go into detailed examination of those in the circuit courts. They will be found in accordance with the principles settled in the supreme court on all the points arising in the case. [Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co. of New York] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 404; [D'Wolf v. Raband] Id. 484; [Camfranke v. Burnell] [Case No. 2,342]; [Golden v. Prince] [Id. 5,509]; [Glenn v. Humphreys] [Id. 5,480]; [Fairchild v. Shivers] [Id. 4,611]; [Riston v. Content] [Id. 11,862]; [Babcock v. Weston] [Id. 703]; [Van Remsdyk v. Kane] [Id. 16,871]; [Shieffelin v. Wheaton] [Id. 12,783]; [Hinkley v. Marean] [Id. 6,523].

Defendant remanded to custody.

Case No. 17,976.

The WOODLAND.

[7 Ben. 110.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1874.²

LIEN ON VESSEL—ADVANCES IN FOREIGN PORT—LIMITATION OF MASTER'S AUTHORITY—JURISDICTION OF ENGLISH ADMIRALTY.

1. The barque W., a British vessel, bound from Montevideo to New York, put into St. Thomas, a Danish port, in distress. The master applied to N. & Co., merchants there, to do the business of the vessel. The cargo was discharged, some of it was found to be damaged and was sold, and the rest was reshipped on the vessel, after she had been repaired. Her repairs took about two months. For the balance of the amount claimed by N. & Co. for services and expenses for the vessel and her cargo, after deducting the proceeds of cargo sold, N. & Co. received from the master drafts on his owners, each containing on its face the words, "place to account of disbursements of barque W. and cargo, at this port, and recoverable against the vessel, freight and cargo." The owners of the vessel had written to the master, from St. John, New Brunswick, a letter containing these words: "As soon as H. & P. heard of the disaster, they wrote you to draw on them for funds to pay for your repairs, and sent letters to S. & Co. to show their standing. With these we doubt not you will be able to obtain your funds cheaply, and thereby avoid the great expense of a bottomry; or, if it could be done better, draw on us, either payable here or in New York, in gold." H. & P. were the agents in New York of the owners of the vessel. S. & Co. had refused to furnish the funds, and N. & Co. had agreed to raise them by bottomry and respondentia, before this letter arrived. On its arrival, the agreement for bottomry and respondentia was given up, and a conditional agreement to take the master's drafts on the owners of the vessel was made. N. & Co. then offered to sell the proposed drafts to F. & Co., showing them the above passage in the letter of the owners. F. & Co. thereupon declined to buy the drafts, unless the master would put in the clause making them recoverable against vessel, freight and cargo. This was done, and F. & Co. then bought the drafts of N. & Co., at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. discount, paying for them in cash. F. & Co., on the arrival of the vessel in New York, filed a libel against her to recover the amount of the drafts: Held, that the authority of the master to pledge the vessel to raise money for the repairs, was, by the letter of the owners, expressly limited to a pledge by way of bottomry; and that, as that letter was shown to F. & Co., they took the drafts with knowledge that the master was exceeding his powers in putting the hypothecation of the vessel into the drafts, and that F. & Co., therefore, had no lien on the vessel.

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Affirmed in Case No. 17,977. Decree of circuit court affirmed by supreme court in 104 U. S. 180.]

[Cited in The Columbus, Case No. 3,044; The Wexford, 7 Fed. 679; The William Cook, 12 Fed. 920; Stephenson v. The Francis, 21 Fed. 726; The Scotia, 35 Fed. 908; The Lykus, 36 Fed. 921; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co., 129 U. S. 450, 9 Sup. Ct. 475.]

[Cited in Mitchell v. Chambers, 43 Mich. 164, 5 N. W. 67.]

2. Whether the high court of admiralty in England would, under the 5th section of the act of May 17, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), take jurisdiction of a suit in rem against this British vessel to enforce a lien for necessities furnished her in a Danish port, quære.

[This was a libel by J. H. Fechtenburg and J. A. Lovengreen, trading as J. H. Fechtenburg & Co., against the British barque Woodland.]

J. Ridgway, for libellants.
T. Scudder, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libel in this case sets forth, in its first article, that this is an action founded upon contract, civil and maritime. It sets forth, in its second article, that, in January, 1871, the British barque Woodland being in the port of St. Thomas, in the West Indies, and standing in need of advances for repairs and supplies, disbursements and charges, J. Niles & Co., merchants in St. Thomas, advanced to the master of said vessel, for the purposes of said vessel, and on the credit of said vessel and owners, the sum of $4,606 24, for which the said master drew his two certain drafts or bills of exchange upon the owners of said vessel, dated January 25th, 1871, one for $2,000, in American gold coin, payable ten days after sight, and one for $2,606 24, in American gold coin, payable ten days after sight, whereby he pledged the said vessel, freight and cargo for the payment of the same, and gave to whomsoever might be the holders of said drafts a lien upon said vessel, freight and cargo; that said J. Niles & Co. took up said money, on said drafts, of the libellants, and duly assigned to the libellants the said drafts, and said demand for repairs and supplies, disbursements and charges, and advances, and the lien therefor upon said barque, freight and cargo; and that the libellants advanced said money on the credit of said vessel and cargo and freight, and are owners of said lien. The third article of the libel sets forth, that said advances, repairs, disbursements and charges were material and necessary for said vessel, without which she could not safely proceed upon her intended voyage and earn freight and passage money; and that the whole amount of said advances, in American gold coin, is due and unpaid to the libellants. The fourth article of the libel sets forth, that neither of said drafts has been accepted or paid, although duly presented to said owners; and that the libellants are the legal owners and holders thereof. The libel prays process against the vessel and freight.

The answer of the owners of the barque (being the same persons who were her owners at the time of the transactions set forth in the libel) denies the foregoing allegation of the first article of the libel. It admits that the barque was in the port of St. Thomas in January, 1871, and denies all the other allegations of the second article of the libel, except as afterwards admitted in the answer. It denies the allegations of the third article of the libel. It admits that, while the barque was at St. Thomas, her master drew three drafts on her owners, and delivered them to the firm of J. Niles & Co. It denies that such drafts created any lien upon either vessel or cargo, and denies that J. Niles & Co. took up the money, on said drafts of the libellants, or assigned to the libellants the drafts, or the alleged demand for repairs, supplies, disbursements, charges or advances, or the alleged lien therefor, and denies that the alleged advances for which the drafts were given were made for the purposes of the vessel, or on her credit. It avers that a large portion of the alleged advances, if made at all, were made for the pretended purposes of the cargo of the vessel, and on the credit of such cargo, and neither the vessel nor the freight is liable for the same; and that this court has no jurisdiction over the case, and neither vessel nor cargo should be held responsible.

The barque was a British vessel, owned by persons residing at St. John, in New Brunswick. In November, 1870, while on a voyage from Montevideo to New York, with a cargo, she put into St. Thomas, a Danish port, in distress, leaking badly and needing repairs. The firm of J. Niles & Co. had been established there for twelve years, as commission merchants and ship agents. The master of the barque, Captain Titus, applied to J. Niles & Co. to attend to the business of the vessel, stating that he had been instructed to do so by her owners, in the event of his having to call at St. Thomas. J. Niles & Co. took charge of the vessel and cargo. The cargo was discharged and stored, in order to ascertain the full extent of the damage to the vessel and to enable the repairs to be made. The vessel was taken out of water, the metal was stripped from her bottom, her bottom and her top sides were recalked, her spars and rigging were renewed or repaired, and she was put into a seaworthy condition to proceed on her voyage with her cargo. Some of the cargo was found to be badly damaged by sea water, and was sold at public auction, and the rest was reshipped on the barque for New York. This occupied about two months. For the balance of the indebtedness claimed by J. Niles & Co., for services and expenses for the vessel and her cargo, after deducting the net proceeds of the damaged part of the cargo that was sold at auction, J. Niles & Co. received from the master three drafts, drawn by him at St. Thomas, on the owners of the barque at St. John, New Brunswick (who are the present claimants of her), payable to the order of J. Niles & Co., in American gold coin, in New York, for the several sums of $2,000, $2,606 24 and $1,500. The drafts were dated January 25th, 1871, and were payable ten days after sight, and each contained, on its face, the words, "place to account of disbursements of barque Woodland and cargo, at this port, and recoverable against the vessel, freight and cargo." The draft for $1,500 was, as Mr. Niles testifies, "returned to Captain Titus, in accordance with agreement, for benefit of owners." J. Niles & Co. first endeavored, unsuccessfully, to obtain the necessary funds through the firm of G. W. Smith & Co., of St. Thomas. They then made an agreement with Captain Titus to raise the required funds by bottomry on the vessel and respondentia on the cargo. But that was not carried out, because it was superseded by a conditional agreement by J. Niles & Co. to take drafts drawn by the master on the claimants. On the 24th of December, 1870, the claimants wrote, from St. John, a letter to Captain Titus, at St. Thomas, to the care of J. Niles & Co., which letter reached St. Thomas on the 11th of January, 1871. In that letter, after acknowledging the receipt of advices from the master and from J. Niles & Co., in reference to the disasters to the vessel, the claimants say: "The vessel and freight are but partly insured, but, whether insured or not, you have simply to do your duty. We may say to you, however, that, unless the vessel is much worse than would appear from the vague information furnished us, you would not be justified in having her condemned. Should she be improperly condemned, we could not recover a penny of our insurance. The underwriters talk of sending out their agents, and will certainly do so, unless they think everything has been fairly and properly done. On the other hand, should it cost more to repair than the vessel will be worth when done (she is valued in the policies at $10,000), we would have trouble, at least, in collecting. As we are so entirely ignorant of the real facts of the case, we can give no positive advice in regard to the foregoing. It seems to us, almost, as if you were out of the world, the communication is so tedious. On receipt of Messrs. Niles' letter, this morning, we were greatly alarmed, and we telegraphed to Heaney & Parker, New York, as follows: 'Send following instructions to Titus, quickest manner, cable or otherwise, namely—make only such repairs as will bring vessel and cargo to New York, hiring extra hands; otherwise, proceed to St. John, under temporary repair, reshipping cargo on other vessel.' This explains itself. Of course, if you have to reship the cargo in another vessel, you will procure as low freight as possible, as the Woodland will receive the difference between what she was to have as per bills of lading and what you may have to pay from St. Thomas to New York. You will also have to retain a lien upon the cargo for its contribution towards the general average expenses. [As soon as Heaney & Parker heard of the disaster, they wrote you to draw on them for funds to pay for your repairs, and sent letters to G. W. Smith & Co., to show their standing. With these, we doubt not you will be able to obtain your funds cheaply, and thereby avoid the great expense of a bottomry; or, if it could be done better, draw on us, either payable here, or in New York, in gold.] We will merely add, that we hope you will use your best judgment, and your best exertions, for the interest of all concerned." G. W. Smith & Co. having declined to furnish the funds, and the agreement to provide them by bottomry and respondentia having been made, the letter from the claimants arrived, and, in consequence of their views expressed therein, the idea of bottomry was abandoned, and the conditional agreement to take drafts drawn on the claimants was made. To carry that out, J. Niles & Co. offered to sell the proposed drafts which were to be drawn to the libellants, at the same time showing to them the passage in the said letter from the claimants, authorizing the master to draw on them, and referring to bottomry, being the passage, above recited, embraced in brackets. After reading the passage, the libellants declined to purchase the drafts, on the ground that they were not acquainted with the standing of the claimants, unless the master would, in drawing the drafts, make them recoverable against vessel, freight and cargo. This was agreed to by the master and carried out. The libellants bought the two drafts mentioned in the libel, at 2½ per cent. discount, and paid for them in cash to J. Niles & Co. J. Niles & Co. indorsed the drafts in blank and delivered them to the libellants. The money and materials furnished, and the work done, were furnished and done on the recommendation of surveyors appointed with the approbation of the master, and by the authority of the master.

It is contended, on the part of the claimants, that, according to the law of Great Britain, as the law governing in dealings with a British vessel, no implied authority exists in the master of a British vessel, even when in a foreign port, to pledge his vessel for necessaries, by any other form of hypothecation than a formal bottomry; and that the master of this vessel had no such authority, either express or implied.

There is no doubt, that, from the time of Charles II. until the year 1840, it was the law of Great Britain, that no implied lien existed on a vessel, for necessaries supplied or repairs made, so as to enable the creditor to attach and sell her, to pay the debt. The rule established was, that an express, formal instrument of hypothecation was necessary to give a lien for necessaries or repairs; that such instrument must be one making the repayment of the money borrowed dependent on the arrival of the vessel at her destination; and that a master had no authority to hypothecate a vessel in any other manner. Stainbank v. Fenning, 11 C. B. 51; Stainbank v. Shepard, 13 C. B. 418. The high court of admiralty in England took no jurisdiction of a suit against a vessel, founded on such an implied lien. The Two Ellens, L. R. 4 P. C. 161, 166. But, by the general maritime law and the civil law, such implied lien existed, and it extended to all vessels, foreign and domestic; and the courts of admiralty of the United States always took cognizance of suits in rem founded on such implied liens for supplies and repairs, in the case of foreign vessels. The rule of the courts of admiralty of Great Britain operated to the prejudice of persons in Great Britain furnishing supplies and repairs to foreign vessels, and also to the prejudice of foreign vessels, in the ports of Great Britain, in circumstances of distress or necessity, whenever personal credit failed the master. It was, therefore, provided by statute (Act Aug. 7, 1840; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, § 6), "that the high court of admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever * * * for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county, or upon the high seas, at the time when the * * * necessaries were furnished in respect of which such claim is made." The courts of admiralty of Great Britain hold that this provision gives a maritime lien on a foreign vessel for necessaries supplied in a British port, which can be enforced in admiralty against the vessel. The Ella A. Clark, 8 Law

T. (N. S.) 119; The Two Ellens, L. R. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 345, 354, and on appeal, in the privy council, L. R. 4 P. C. 161, 167. But such provision only applies to foreign vessels. On the 17th of May, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10, § 5), it was enacted, that "the high court of admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it be shown, to the satisfaction of the court, that, at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales." This provision is held to extend to necessaries supplied in a British port to a vessel belonging to another British port. But, it has been held by the high court of admiralty (The India, 9 Jur. [N. S.] pt. 1, 417), that the 6th section of the act of 1840 does not apply to necessaries furnished in a foreign port, and that the 5th section of the act of 1861 does not apply to foreign ships. The latter clause of the 5th section of the act of 1861 is held to have the effect to prevent the ship from becoming chargeable with the debt for necessaries at the time the necessaries are furnished, so that all valid charges on the ship, to which any person other than the owner of the ship who is liable for the necessaries is entitled, must take precedence of such debt, as a charge on the ship; but, as against the owner of the ship, the debt for necessaries becomes a charge on the ship when a suit in rem therefor against the ship is instituted. The Pacific, Brown & L. 243; The Troubadour, L. R. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 302; The Two Ellens, L. R. 4 P. C. 161, 170.

I do not deem it necessary to inquire whether the high court of admiralty in England would, under the 5th section of the Act of 1861, take jurisdiction of a suit in rem against this British vessel, to enforce the lien claimed in this case for necessaries supplied to such vessel in the Danish port of St. Thomas. For, I am of opinion that the transactions above recited created no lien on this vessel. I do not mean to intimate that the jurisdiction of this court fails because the necessaries were furnished to a foreign vessel at a port foreign both to her and to the United States, or that jurisdiction in such cases, in rem, cannot be exercised by the admiralty courts of the United States.

The authority of the master of a vessel as to repairing her or supplying her with necessaries, whether abroad or at home, is limited by the express or implied authority derivable from the laws of the vessel's country, or the usage of the trade, or the business of the ship, or the instructions of the owner; and he cannot bind either the vessel, or her owner, beyond such limits. In respect of money advanced in a foreign port, for necessaries, the inquiry is not as to the authority of the master by the law of the foreign port, but as to whether the money was advanced for necessaries, or within the scope of the master's authority, according to the law of the vessel's country. The master has no power to bind the owner of the vessel, or the vessel herself, beyond the authority given to him by the owner; and the extent of such authority must be limited to the express instructions of the owner, or to instructions to be implied from the law of the country where the vessel belongs and the owner resides. Private instructions, unknown to the person who advances money for necessities, cannot affect the rights of such person, where he knows that the general maritime law of the country to which the vessel belongs imports authority in the master to make the contract relied on. But, even where such law, in the absence of instructions, would import such authority, instructions which limit such authority will, if made known to the party who contracts with the master, before the contract is made, operate to prevent such party from claiming against the owner of the vessel anything which does not fall within the scope of such limited authority. Abb. Shipp. (Am. Ed. 1829) pp. 190-192; Pope v. Nicker-son [Case No. 11,274].

In the present case, the libellants have put in evidence the letter of December 24th, 1870, from the claimants to the master. That letter was made known to J. Niles & Co. and to the libellants. It authorizes the raising of the funds by drafts on Heaney & Parker, or by drafts on the claimants, and states that the claimants have no doubt that the master will be able to obtain funds in that way. But it contemplates, as the alternative means, only a bottomry. It authorizes a bottomry if a resort to drafts fails. But it authorizes only drafts or a bottomry. It must be regarded as excluding the master from resorting to anything but drafts or a bottomry, and as excluding him from resorting to the creation of a lien on the vessel by any form of hypothecation other than a bottomry, or to the creation of such a lien as is asserted in this case, whether an implied lien to result from the transactions, or whatever lien the language of the drafts may be claimed to create. J. Niles & Co. and the libellants declined to take the master's drafts, as authorized by the letter, and insisted that the master should undertake to create a lien on the vessel by other means than a bottomry. They insisted that the master should exceed his authority, as defined and limited by the letter.

It is of no consequence to show that a resort to bottomry would have been more expensive to the claimants. They had a right to limit the authority of the master, and they did so. It is of importance to so administer the maritime law, that vessels in distress in foreign ports shall not be deprived of the means of obtaining relief, but it is no less important that masters of vessels, and persons dealing with them with knowledge of the instructions under which they are acting, shall keep within the limits of such instructions.

As this is not a case communis juris, and both parties are foreigners, and the contract was made with reference to the law of the vessel's country, it is a case where the question of the liability of the owners of the vessel can, with especial propriety, be determined by the tribunals of such country.

The libel must be dismissed, with costs.

[This decree was affirmed by the circuit court (Case No. 17,977), and the decree of the latter court was affirmed by the supreme court (104 U. S. 180).]

Case No. 17,977.

The WOODLAND.

[14 Blatchf. 499.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 13, 1878.²

LIEN ON VESSEL—DRAFTS BY MASTER—REPAIRS IN FOREIGN PORT—FRAUD.

A British vessel, in distress, put into the Danish port of St. Thomas. Repairs to her were necessary. N. attended there to the business of the vessel, and, with the connivance of T., the master, made out fraudulent accounts against the vessel, and T. drew three drafts on the owners of the vessel, for over $6,000, which were expressed, on their face, to be "recoverable against the vessel, freight and cargo." F., in good faith, and without knowledge of the fraud, discounted two of the drafts. They not being paid, F. libelled the vessel and freight, in rem, at New York: Held, that the fraud of N. and T. did not invalidate the drafts in the hands of F. Held, also, that the question of a lien on the vessel must be determined by the law of Great Britain, and that, by that law, the master had no right to create a lien on the vessel and freight by any other instrument than a bottomry bond.

[Cited in The Wexford, 7 Fed. 679; The Scotia, 35 Fed. 908; The Lykus, 36 Fed. 921; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 129 U. S. 450, 9 Sup. Ct. 475.]

[Appeal from district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

[This was a libel by J. H. Fechtenburg and another, trading as J. H. Fechtenburg & Co., against the British barque Woodland. There was a decree by the district court in favor of the vessel (Case No. 17,976), and libellants appeal.]

James Ridgway, for libellants.

George A. Black, for claimants.

HUNT, Circuit Justice. In this cause I find the following facts: "The British barque Woodland, owned by the claimants, who are residents of St. John, New Brunswick, in November, 1870, while on a voyage from Montevideo to New York, with a cargo, being in distress, put into the Danish port of St. Thomas, for repairs. Repairs were necessary before she could safely proceed on her intended voyage. On December 24th, 1870, the claimants wrote a letter, from St. John, to Captain J. H. Titus, the master of the barque, at St. Thomas, which he received on January 11th, 1871, and, before any advances had been made by the libellants, he exhibited the same to them. This letter is set forth in the apostles. J. Niles, who carried on business under the name of J. Niles & Co., attended to the affairs of the vessel at St. Thomas, landed the cargo, and sold a portion of it, on which he received an amount sufficient to reimburse all the moneys expended, and charged commissions and insurance amounting to $6,875. As to the insurance, none was actually effected, and the commissions are on an excessive valuation. Titus, the master, approved all the bills, drew drafts on his owners for the balance, $6,106.24, which were expressed, on their face, to be 'recoverable against the vessel, freight and cargo.' Two of these drafts the libellants discounted, and for them this recovery is sought. The third was given by Niles to the master, upon a corrupt understanding, that it was to be his share. The two drafts have not been accepted or paid, and the libellants are the owners thereof. By the law of Great Britain, the master of a British vessel has no implied authority, even when in a foreign port, to pledge his vessel for necessities, or create a lien thereon by any other form of hypothecation than a formal bottomry bond; and the master of this vessel had no such authority, either express or implied. The vessel and freight only were libelled in this action. The bills were received, and the money advanced upon them by the libellants, in good faith and without knowledge of the fraudulent acts of Niles and the captain of the Woodland."

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Affirming Case No. 17,976. Decree of circuit court affirmed by supreme court in 104 U. S. 180.]

Of the facts that the bark put into St. Thomas in distress, that repairs were there made upon her, that the drafts in question were made professedly on account of such repairs, and that the libellants advanced their money upon them, without knowledge of any fraud on the part of Niles and the captain, there can be no doubt.

The bills for the repairs were made out extravagantly, fraudulently and collusively. If the drafts were made by those having authority to act as the agents of the owners of the vessel in such an emergency, and to bind them by drafts given honestly and wisely, I cannot see that the frauds of such agents can be charged upon the bona fide holders of the drafts, so as to defeat their collection. The captain was not the agent, in any manner, of the libellants, but the agent of the owner and of the vessel, so far as his position gave him authority, and for his frauds the owner is the party responsible. It is proved, affirmatively, by the evidence of the libellants, that they paid their money for the drafts before their maturity, and without knowledge or suspicion of fraud or irregularity; and there is no evidence to contradict their statements. I, therefore, find and decide, that, so far as the fraud and irregularity are concerned, the drafts were not avoided in the hands of the libellants.

Neither am I able to concur in the conclusion, that the authority of the captain was limited and restricted by the letter of his owners, dated December 24th, 1870, and which was shown to the libellants. It is contended that this letter authorizes the captain to draw on Heaney & Parker for the expenses, or on the owners, if it can be better done, or to give a bottomry bond, and that it excludes the authority to create a lien on the vessel in any other form. The language of the letter supposed to have this effect, is as follows: "As soon as Heaney & Parker heard of the disaster, they wrote you to draw on them for funds to pay for your repairs, and sent letters to G. W. Smith & Co., to show their standing. With these, we doubt not, you will be able to obtain your funds cheaply, and thereby avoid the great expense of a bottomry—or, if it could be done better, draw on us, either payable here or in New York, (in gold)." The letter proceeds: "We will merely add, that we hope you will use your best judgment and your best exertions for the interest of 'all concerned,' and, inasmuch as you must have friends to advise and assist you, endeavor to select those who are honest and honorable, and have nothing to do with men who would counsel fraud, as too many are disposed to do when they think they have an opportunity to make money out of underwriters." This is a letter from the owners, at a distance, to their captain, in an emergency, giving their advice and counsel, and suggesting what appear to them the best modes of relieving himself and his vessel from the difficulties surrounding them. It advises, first, that drafts be drawn on Heaney & Parker, or that drafts be drawn on them directly, payable either at St. John, N. B., or in New York, and that the expense of a bottomry proceeding be avoided. There is not, however, anything that will bear the construction, that he may not resort to any legal method of obtaining the necessary repairs for his vessel. This is strikingly evident from the clause following, where the letter says: "We hope you will use your best judgment and your best exertions for the interest of all concerned." The sum of it is, that the writers suggest what to them, at a distance, appear to be the better modes of raising the money, but leave it, in the end, to the judgment and discretion of the captain. This left it with him to raise the supplies in any manner that the law would permit. If he had raised them by drafts on Heaney & Parker, or by drafts on the owners, there would have been secured the personal liability of the parties named; if by bottomry bond, with the formalities required by law, a lien would have been created upon the vessel. He took neither of these courses, but drew bills upon his owners at ten days' sight, concluding with these words, "which place to the account of disbursements of bark Woodland and cargo, at this port, and recoverable against the vessel, freight and cargo," and signed them as master; "whereby," (the libel alleges,) "he pledged the said vessel, freight and cargo for the payment of the same, and gave to whomsoever might be the holders of said drafts or bills of exchange, a lien upon said vessel, freight and cargo;" and the libel prays that the court may condemn the said vessel, her freight and cargo, to pay the said sum, with interest and costs.

The question here presented is—did the transactions described, or did the drafts thus given and thus expressed, create a lien upon the vessel and her freight? Had this English master of an English vessel authority to create a lien in the foreign port of distress, in any other mode than by a written instrument of hypothecation, which made the debt dependent upon the safe arrival of the vessel, to wit, by a bottomry bond? If the vessel had sailed under the flag of the United States, and her master had been a citizen of the United States, this question would be answered in the affirmative. The case of The Emily Souder, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 666, decides, that the furnishing of the supplies and materials in a foreign port of distress, itself creates a lien upon the vessel in favor of the person furnishing them, and that such lien is not destroyed by the acceptance of drafts on the owners, in the ordinary form, making no reference to the lien, and the departure of the vessel from the port of distress, and that the admiralty has jurisdiction to enforce this lien against the vessel.

But, it seems to be settled, that the question is to be determined by the law of the country or which the master was a citizen, and under whose flag the vessel sailed, and not by the law of the port where the supplies were furnished, or of the country where the lien is sought to be enforced. Lloyd v. Guibert, 6 Best & S. 100, 117.

On the point of the right to create the lien otherwise than by bottomry security, reference is made to Carrington v. Pratt, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 63, where Nelson, J., uses this language: "It has been recently held, in the court of exchequer, in England, that the master can pledge the ship for repairs, or loan of money for that purpose, in the foreign port, only by bottomry security; and that, in the absence of this, the merchant must look to the responsibility of the owner or master." The point was not decided in that case, but was expressly waived by the court. In Stainbank v. Fenning, 11 C. B. 51, the master borrowed money necessary for repairs, and gave a mortgage or hypothecation of the vessel for the amount, payable absolutely, and drew bills on the owner for the same, the payment not being made dependent on the arrival of the vessel. It was held, that the lenders could not proceed against the vessel in the admiralty court of England, and, therefore, had no insurable interest on which the suit could be maintained. Stainbank v. Shepard, 13 C. B. 418, was an action by the same plaintiff against different defendants, upon substantially the same facts, and it was held, that, there not being such an hypothecation as could be enforced in the court of admiralty, the payment of the money not being made to depend upon the arrival of the vessel, the merchant had no insurable interest in the ship. Both of these cases were decided upon the ground, that it is essential to the validity of hypothecation, that the sea risk should be incurred by the lender, and that the pledge on the ship should take effect only in the event of her safe arrival. The opinion in the latter case was delivered by Baron Parke, and in the former by Jervis, Chief Justice. In each case, as in the case before us, the instrument of hypothecation was accompanied by the drafts of the master upon the owners. Upon the authority of these cases, and from my high respect for the experience and learning of the district judge who decided this case below, I shall affirm the decree dismissing the libel [Case No. 17,976].

The amount in controversy, with the added interest, make this case one which can be carried by appeal to the supreme court of the United States, and I make the decision with the less hesitation, knowing that the party can correct the error, if there be one, by such appeal. Should I be mistaken in supposing that there is a right of appeal, I will entertain a motion for a rehearing, and confer with such of my brethren of the supreme court as I may be able conveniently to reach.

[This decree was affirmed on appeal to the supreme court. 104 U. S. 180.]

Case No. 17,978.

WOODMAN v. KILBOURN MANUF'G CO.

[1 Abb. (U. S.) 158; 1 Biss. 546; 6 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 238.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Wisconsin. Jan. Term, 1867.

ORDINANCE OF 1787—POWER OF CONGRESS TO REGULATE COMMERCE—NAVIGABLE STREAMS.

1. The ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwest Territory, has been superseded by the adoption of the constitution of the United States, and the admission to the Union of the states formed from that territory; and the provision of the ordinance declaring the navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and the Saint Lawrence "common highways and forever free," does not restrict the powers of congress, or of the states, to legislate respecting those waters.

2. In the absence of any conflicting enactment by congress relative to the use of a navigable stream, the state within which such stream lies has power to legislate respecting it.

3. The right of the public to use a navigable river as a highway, is paramount to every other use of the water; but it does not exclude or forbid the legislature of the state (where no conflicting enactment by congress exists) from authorizing the construction of public improvements upon the stream, although they may involve a partial obstruction or inconsiderable detention to navigation.

¹ [Reported by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and James H. Bissell, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission. The syllabus and opinion are reprinted from 1 Abb. (U. S.) 158, and the statement from 1 Biss. 546.]

[Cited in Benjamin v. Manistee R. Imp. Co., 42 Mich. 634, 4 N. W. 486.]

4. Under the constitution and laws of Wisconsin, any obstruction to the use of a navigable stream by the public for purposes of navigation, which is erected without a constitutional legislative authority, is a nuisance, and liable to be abated either at the suit of an individual or at the instance of the state.

[Cited in Ladd v. Foster, 31 Fed. 834.]

[This was a bill by one Woodman against the Kilbourn Manufacturing Company to enjoin it from constructing a dam across the Wisconsin river.

[I. Holmes, for complainant, cited Davis v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 14 N. Y. 526; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 927; Trustees of Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510; Corning v. Lowerre, 6 Johns. Ch. 439; Brown v. Chadbourne, 31 Me. 9; Moore v. Sanborne, 1 Gibbs, 519; Morgan v. King, 35 N. Y. 454.

[G. W. Lakin, also for complainant, cited City of Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 94; Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Ves. 617; Irwin v. Dixon, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 25; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 921-924; 9 Stat. 83, land grant to improve Fox and Wisconsin rivers; act of Wisconsin (Sess. Laws 1846, p. 16) accepting the grant; act of same session (p. 58) to provide for the improvement, etc.; memorial of legislature of Wisconsin territory approved January 20, 1846, to congress; Sess. Laws 1846, p. 229; memorial of legislature of Wisconsin to congress, approved December 18, 1843; appendix to Sess. Laws 1844; article 4 of ordinance of 1786; Laws 1839. Wis. T. p. 13; article 9, § 1, of the constitution of Wisconsin incorporating the same provision in the same language (Rev. St. Wis. 1853, c. 1, § 1, enacts the same); Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co., 9 How. [50 U. S.] 647, etc.; 13 How. [54 U. S.] 518; The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 555 (asserts the broad doctrine that the principles of admiralty jurisdiction, as conferred on the federal courts by the constitution, extend wherever ships float and navigation successfully aids commerce, whether internal or external); The Moses Taylor, Id. 411; The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 457; Jackson v. The Magnolia, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 296.]²

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for defendants.

MILLER, District Judge. It is alleged and charged in the bill, that the Wisconsin is one of the navigable rivers leading into the Mississippi river, and a common highway, free to be navigated and used as such highway by complainant and all other citizens of the United States. That said river is navigable from its source to its mouth, and capable of being used for rafting and for driving lumber, and also for steamboat navigation; and that it runs through a district of pine lands lying above the town of Newport. That the owners of said lands, including complainant, annually raft down said river large quantities of lumber and logs to saw mills and to market; and that they are dependent upon the unobstructed use of the river in this employment. The bill further charges, that in 1859 a dam was constructed in said river at the town of Newport, by a chartered company, for hydraulic purposes, which being an obstruction to navigation, was partly removed. And that the company defendant are building a dam at the same place, using a portion of the old dam; and that this company are doing so under color or in pursuance of an act of the state legislature, entitled "An act to aid in the development of manufacturing interests in this state," approved April 10, 1866, as follows: "The Kilbourn Manufacturing Company, whenever organized in pursuance of any law in this state, shall have power, and said company is hereby authorized to complete the water power in sections three, four, nine, and ten in township thirteen north, of range six east, in the counties of Columbia and Sauk, by raising the dam sufficient height for that purpose, not exceeding three feet above the usual low water mark in the Wisconsin river, and so forming the same that rafts of lumber can pass safely and conveniently, without hindrance or delay." The bill then charges that it is physically impossible to build a dam at that point, the town of Newport, in such form as that rafts of lumber can pass safely or conveniently, or without hindrance or delay; and that such dam would wholly obstruct the navigation of the river by steamboats and other vessels; and will entirely obstruct navigation up stream; and that the structure, as at present towards completion, has obstructed free passage to rafts, and caused to the owners thereof delay and damage. It is further charged, that the act authorizing the construction of the dam is contrary to the ordinance of 1787, the constitution and laws of the United States, and of this state. Defendants Anderson and Kilbourn are alleged to be agents of the company defendant in the work of building the dam. The bill prays an injunction restraining defendants from further proceeding in the building of the dam; and that at the final hearing the dam may be decreed to be abated as a common nuisance.

² [From 1 Biss. 546.]

Affidavits read on the part of complainant sustain the charges in the bill in regard to the obstruction of navigation by the proposed dam. Those on the part of defendants state that the dam will be an improvement to navigation at that point. It does not satisfactorily appear that the river above the site of the dam is navigable for steamboats employed in the ordinary business of commerce. It is conceded that rafts of logs and lumber can be floated down stream from several miles above the dam.

The ordinance of the confederate congress, for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, adopted July 14, 1787, created a temporary government; and also contained six articles, "to be considered as articles of compact between the original states and the people and states in said territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent." After the adoption of the constitution of the United States, an act of congress, passed August 7, 1789 (1 Stat. 50), continued the ordinance in force, and modified it in conformity to the conditions of the constitution, so far as it related to the temporary government of the territory.

That portion of the ordinance referred to in the bill is: "The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free as well to the inhabitants of said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other states that may be admitted into the confederacy, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor." The constitution of the United States, subsequently adopted, contains the provision that "new states may be admitted by the congress into this Union," which implies that new states shall be admitted into the Union on an equality with the original states. The ordinance directs that the territory may be divided into not less than three nor more than five states; but the territory has been divided into six states, including that portion of Minnesota east of the Mississippi river. The ordinance further directs, that in case of a division into five states, one boundary shall be an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan, which we know to have been entirely disregarded by congress in the acts admitting new states. If the ordinance were obligatory in every particular, and not altered by common consent, nor superseded by the constitution of the United States, the states embraced within the Northwest Territory could not have been admitted into the Union on an equality with the other states, which is a fundamental principle of the constitution, the basis of this Union. Each new state presented its constitution to the consideration of congress, with its application for admission into the Union under the federal constitution. Congress, composed of members from the original states, approved the constitution of the new state thus presented, and passed an act for its admission into the Union. By the act of congress admitting the new state upon its application, the several articles of the compact were not merely altered by the common consent required in the ordinance, but were superseded. "Whatever may have been the force accorded to the ordinance at the period of its enactment, its authority and effect ceased, and yielded to the paramount authority of the constitution of the United States from the time of its adoption." Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 212; Parmalee v. First Municipality of New Orleans, Id. 589; Strader v. Graham, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 82; Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 393, 490-492. It therefore follows that the act of the legislature authorizing the construction of the dam in question is not prohibited by the ordinance.

The general government, under the constitutional power of congress "to regulate commerce among the several states," has done no act prohibiting or interfering with this state in regulating the navigation of the Wisconsin river. No act of congress has been passed upon the subject of commerce on that river, which includes the navigation. Nor have boats or vessels been licensed, nor ports of entry established on said river by federal authority. The Wisconsin river being a domestic stream, rising, running, and emptying into the Mississippi river within the state, local legislation is unrestricted by federal authority, unless it is in conflict with the navigation laws, or some other enactments of congress. In the absence of action on the part of the United States in regard to the navigation of the river, as a stream bearing a necessary relation to commerce among the several states, the power of the legislature, under the state constitution, to pass the act authorizing the construction of the dam in question, is the next subject for consideration.

The Wisconsin river is a meandered stream according to the government survey of public lands. Although it is not navigable in its unimproved condition above the site of the dam for steamboats navigating the Mississippi river, yet it is navigable in the common sense of the term. The soil or bed of the river is not granted to riparian purchasers usque ad filum, but the body of the stream is reserved to the public. The river is therefore open and free to all persons for purposes of navigation; not a personal right, but subject to governmental authority. The right to unobstructed navigation of the river is to be regarded as a clear and undoubted right, paramount to every other use of the water. It is an inherent paramount right of the people, but not exclusive of a partial obstruction or inconsiderable detention by a dam constructed in pursuance of governmental authority for the development of the country, for the accommodation of public necessities, or of commerce, or travel upon the land. Partial diminution of the navigability of a stream for these purposes, unless restrained by the superior legislation or authority of the general government, has been within the established power of the states since the formation of the government. In the case of Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 245, it appears that the creek was a navigable stream flowing into the Delaware river; and that the legislature of the state of Delaware passed an act empowering the company to build a dam in said creek for the purpose of excluding the water from the surrounding marsh, and thereby enhancing the value of the property on its banks and probably improving the health of the inhabitants. The dam was a total obstruction of navigation. The court decided that the measure authorized by the act stops a navigable stream, and must be supposed to abridge the rights of those accustomed to use it. But this abridgment, unless it comes in conflict with the constitution or a law of the United States, is an affair between the government of the state of Delaware and its citizens. In Martin v. Waddle, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 410, the court say: "When the Revolution took place, the people of each state became themselves sovereign, and in that character held the absolute right to all the navigable waters and the soil under them for their own common use, subject only to the rights surrendered by the constitution of the general government." The admission of the new states into the Union on an equality with the original states gives them the same absolute rights, notwithstanding the title to the soil was originally in the United States. Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 212. See, also, Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co., 13 How. [54 U. S.] 519, and 18 How. [59 U. S.] 421, 430, 432; Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 713; and the opinion of Grier, J., in the Passaic Bridge Case, Id. 782.

It cannot be claimed that the complainant, a citizen of the state of Massachusetts, has a right to the navigation or use of the Wisconsin river superior to that of the inhabitants of the state. By the federal constitution "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states."

It is claimed, on the part of the complainant, that the act authorizing the construction of the dam in question is repugnant to the provision in article 9 of the state constitution, that "the navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free as well to the inhabitants of the state as to the citizens of the United States, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor." This article was incorporated into the constitution from the ordinance of 1787. The navigable waters, such as the Wisconsin river, running into the Mississippi river, shall be common highways, and their navigation, to the extent of their navigable capacity, cannot be materially obstructed. Such rivers may be considered navigable waters without any such constitutional provision, as congress has the power to regulate commerce between the states, which includes the navigation of navigable streams. The paramount right of navigation being in the people who may wish to use a navigable stream, any obstruction, however inconsiderable, without constitutional legislative authority, is a nuisance, to be abated at the suit of an individual or of the state.

This principle is prescribed in a general law of the state, "that all rivers and streams of water in this state, in all places where the same have been meandered and returned as navigable by the surveyors employed by the United States government, be declared navigable to such an extent that no dam, bridge, or other obstruction may be made in or over the same without the permission of the legislature." This law establishes by statute the inherent common law right of the legislature to investigate and ascertain the extent of the navigability of streams, and of the kind of proposed partial obstructions to navigation, for the general convenience and use of the people. In the Case of the Blackbird Creek, in the state of Delaware, navigation was totally obstructed by the dam built in pursuance of a legislative act; but whether such an obstruction could be built in one of the navigable streams of Wisconsin, this case does not require a decision. It is very clear that neither in Delaware nor in Wisconsin can even a partial obstruction be made without governmental authority. The legislature has the power to inquire into the necessity for a structure, such as a bridge or dam, over or in a navigable stream, and to prescribe the conditions and plans upon which the proposed improvement may be made. It is also the province of the legislature to inquire into the navigability of a stream and the uses to which surplus waters may be applied. The navigability of the stream is the subject of proof. The return of the surveyors, showing a stream to have been meandered, is not conclusive. Jones v. Pettibone, 2 Wis. 308. That case announced the principle that the effect of the statute is not to declare that meandered streams are navigable in fact, so as to dispense with proof of their navigability, when the fact is to be established, but only that they shall be regarded as navigable to such an extent that no obstruction shall be placed in them without the consent of the legislature. The statute declares that the legislature possesses the exclusive power to direct and control the municipal policy of the state in regard to improvements and partial obstructions of navigable streams. The constitutional provision is a declaration of a principle inherent in a sovereign state of the Union, and the statute is notice of such power.

It is not for an individual, but for the state to decide whether the whole of a public highway is necessary for the public accommodation or not; hence any partial obstruction of any navigable stream or highway, or any portion of it, without legislative authority, is a nuisance. The public have a right to the use of the entire highway; and no citizen can appropriate a portion, upon the principle that enough remains for public use. The legislature is no judge of that. The act authorizing the construction of the dam in question is in the nature of a public grant of the use of surplus water of the river for the improvement and development of the country, and for the accommodation of the people in the vicinity. In making this grant, the legislature probably were influenced by the consideration that the man who builds a mill or manufactory in a new country is a public benefactor. See People v. City of St. Louis, 5 Gilman, 351; Hart v. Mayor of Albany, 9 Wend. 571; La Plaisance Bay Harbor Co. v. City of Monroe, Walk. [Mich.] 155; Flanagan v. City of Philadelphia, 6 Wright [42 Pa. St.] 218. Several acts have been passed by the state legislature, from time to time, authorizing the construction of dams in meandered rivers, upon such plans, or in such forms, that rafts of lumber can pass safely and conveniently, without hindrance or delay. Such acts were also passed by the territorial legislature while the ordinance was considered in force in the territory. I have come to the conclusion that the act authorizing the construction of the dam in question is within the constitutional power of the legislature.

The bill complains of a prospective abridgment of complainant's right to the free navigation of the river. He has not been injured by the dam at present in process of construction. Defendants must be allowed a reasonable time to construct the dam, not exceeding three feet in height above low water mark, and in such form as rafts of lumber can pass safely and conveniently without hindrance or delay, according to the act. The work cannot be restrained by injunction, upon the theory that no dam can be constructed at that point that will not obstruct the navigable use of the river. The legislature have authorized defendants to make the experiment, if a dam can be constructed as required by the act, and the court will permit the practical test to be applied. If the speculations of complainant's bill should be realized, and defendants' efforts prove unsuccessful, the dam will have to be abated at their costs. Mere theoretical opinions are not sufficient in law for enjoining the progress of a work in the nature of a public improvement authorized by a legislative act.

If a dam shall be constructed according to the requirements of the act, the paramount right of those navigating the river with rafts of lumber is satisfied. They cannot complain if the dam should detain their rafts a few minutes, or should require caution in passing through or over it. The only question on final hearing will be whether the dam not exceeding three feet above the low water mark is so constructed that, with proper care and caution, "rafts of lumber can pass safely and conveniently without hindrance or delay." Since the year 1838 a dam with a lock for ascending and descending trade has stood in the Fox river, at Depere, in this state. The time required for passing the lock is no hindrance or delay. In the year 1840 a bill was brought before me, as territorial judge, to restrain the erection of a bridge over the Milwaukee river at Milwaukee, which is at that place an arm of the lake, navigable for all classes of boats and vessels. Being satisfied that the bridge was to be built with a draw, which could be opened or closed in fifteen or twenty minutes, I considered that the interests of commerce must submit to an inconsiderable delay or inconvenience for the accommodation and necessity of the people, and dismissed the bill. Since that day bridges with draws have been constructed, in pursuance of legislative acts, over almost every river in the land. Dams, too, are built by the same authority in navigable streams, with locks or sluices, for the accommodation of the whole people.

The injunction prayed for is refused.

NOTE [from 1 Biss. 546]. At the September term, 1868, this case came on for final hearing, upon the pleadings and proofs, before Justice Davis and District Judge Miller, and the bill was dismissed. As to enjoining a public work, see case of Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. City of Chicago [unreported]. The United States may enjoin a work of internal improvement conducted by state authority, if it interferes with improvements on navigable waters made by authority of congress. In such case the power of the federal government is exclusive. U. S. v. Duluth [Case No. 15,001]. See also, Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 421; Conway v. Taylor's Ex'r, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 603; Mississippi & M. R. Co. v. Ward, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 485; Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 713.

Case No. 17,979.

WOODMAN v. STIMPSON.

[3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 98; Merw. Pat. Inv. 665.]¹
Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. June, 1866.²

CONSTRUCTION OF PATENT—PRIOR INVENTION—COMBINATION—MACHINE FOR ORNA-MENTING LEATHER.

1. Patents are to be construed, if possible, so that the inventor shall have the benefit of what he has actually invented.

[Cited in Stover v. Halstead, Case No. 13,509.]

2. To ascertain what the patentee has invented, we look in the first place at the claim.

3. A new combination or arrangement is patentable, although each part, taken by itself, is old.

4. The inventor of a machine has made it for all the uses to which it is applicable, and no one can obtain a second patent for the machine by applying it to a new use.

¹ [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 665, contains only a partial report.]

² [Reversed in 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 117.]

[Cited in Stow v. Chicago, 104 U. S. 550; McComb v. Brodie, Case No. 8,708.]

5. The second patent, if good, must be for the improvement in the art in which the new application is made.

6. The true test of invention is not whether an ordinary mechanic can make the combination, if it is suggested, but whether he would make the combination without suggestion, by means of his ordinary knowledge.

7. The date of invention is the time when the patentee conceives the idea of doing the thing in substantially the way in which he patents it.

8. Prior machines relied upon to defeat a subsequent patent must have been working machines, which have either done work or been capable of doing it. They must not be mere experiments, afterward abandoned.

9. If a previous patent so far describes a machine covered by a subsequent patent that any mechanic of ordinary skill could, from the description in the first patent, construct or supply all the essential parts of the mechanism described in the second patent, the latter is void.

10. The value of an event, by which as aid to recollection, a witness attempts to fix the date of the use of a prior machine, depends, first, on the importance of the event itself, and next, on the closeness of its connection or association with the fact which is sought to be proved.

11. The patent of Woodman, dated March 29, 1864, for "improved machine for ornamenting leather," is not for "a pebbling roller, however it may be used," but for a combination of the short revolving roller with a figure engraved or sunk on its periphery, a radial arm to give pressure, and springs to equalize the pressure, moving over the table in such a manner that the rollers shall be properly pressed upon the leather and move over it in substantially the same line at each operation of the machine.

12. In considering whether one element of a combination is substantially the same as an element of another combination, the fact that one works better than the other, coupled with the fact that the change is not within the ordinary knowledge and skill of all mechanics, is highly important and often decisive.

This was an action on the case [by Charles T. Woodman against James C. Stimpson] tried by LOWELL, District Judge, and a jury, which was brought to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent for an "improved machine for ornamenting leather," granted to Charles T. Woodman, March 29, 1864. The invention consisted in producing a pebbled or boarded grain or finish upon leather, by subjecting it to the pressure of a short revolving cylinder or roller of steel or other metal, having the required design or figure engraved upon its periphery, and rolling over a table supported by springs on its under side, and so arranged as to be raised or lowered when desirable. The claims of the patent were as follows: "I. Boarding or pebbling skins or leather by means of a single short cylinder rolling over a table, with the requisite pressure, substantially as described. II. Raising and lowering the table A by means of the toggles Q, arm S, spring U, arm T, and cam P, or their equivalents, substantially as set forth and for the purpose described."

T. L. Wakefield, for plaintiff.

S. B. Ives, G. L. Roberts, and Causten Browne, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge (charging jury): I congratulate you that we have got so near the end of our labors in this case. The questions of law which apply to it have not been fully argued in your hearing, because it has happened to be more convenient for counsel to take them up at a time when you were not present, and when it was more for your convenience not to be present. I shall endeavor to explain my views in such a way that, whether right or wrong, they can not be misunderstood; because if they are wrong, either party can have recourse to the supreme court of the United States, by which any such points of law may be definitely and forever settled, so far as this case is concerned.

What the plaintiff says is his invention he is bound to describe and set out in what has been very properly called his "title deed." The law requires that the patent office shall, before a patent is issued, have a description from the inventor, of his machine—taking the case of a machine, which is this case—a substantial, full, and accurate description of the machine, so that anybody acquainted with the art to which it refers, should be able to make one by the description, accompanied with drawings and with a model, and, of course, we are to look to that description and to what is technically called "the claim," what he says he claims as new, to see what his invention is. If he had made a mistake in his claim by having imperfectly described his machine, that can be corrected by another process; that question does not, however, arise in this case.

Now, there is no dispute in this case that the machine is described with sufficient accuracy and fullness to enable anybody to make it; but there is considerable difference of opinion, as to the extent of the claim which the inventor makes. The general rule on the subject is, that patents are to be so construed, if possible, that the inventor shall have the benefit of what he has actually invented, if he has invented anything; and that is a rule which is beneficially applied to the advantage, undoubtedly, of patentees. Taking this whole description together, and the claim, I am reasonably satisfied and shall instruct you, though I think the specification is a little ambiguous, in some parts, that the plaintiff does not mean to say, "I claim a pebbling roller, however it may be used, whether by hand or by any combination of mechanism." If that were the claim, undoubtedly it would be defeated by showing that such a roller had been used in any way. I do not think that is the fair result of the whole patent, although there are some parts of it which look as though he thought he was the first inventor in that broader sense. I dare say he did think so; perhaps he was corrected by information from the patent office which was referred to here, though not directly by evidence. Taking it altogether, I think he does not claim that; and although on reading the patent you may think he does, still it is my duty to assume the responsibility of stating what his claim is, subject to correction hereafter.

What, then, does he claim? To find out that, we look in the first place at the claim. He says: "I do claim, first, boarding or pebbling skins or leather by means of a single short cylinder rolling over a table, with the requisite pressure, substantially as described." The phrase "substantially as described," is an important one; and so also I think the words "with the requisite pressure," are very important. I think that "substantially as described," and "the requisite pressure," entitle him to say: "I claim the combination of parts which I have shown, or the substantial combination of parts that I have shown, and the requisite pressure that I have shown." That is, including the springs. "The requisite pressure." Not merely pressure enough to make the figure, but the "requisite pressure" to make it properly. And it is on that ground that I overrule the prayer of the defendant, and instruct you that it is not simply a claim for any mode of pebbling leather by means of a cylinder, but it must be by the described means, or substantially those means. It is what is called, technically, a combination or arrangement of parts, and if the arrangement is new, there may be a patent for that, although each part, taken by itself, is old. I shall come more particularly to the points of law which bear upon that hereafter. What he claims, then, is a combination of those parts. They are, the short revolving roller, with a figure engraved or sunk on its surface (or its periphery, as he says), a radial arm to give the pressure, and springs to equalize the pressure (perhaps giving some part of it; I don't know how that may be expressed), moving over the table in such a manner that the rollers shall be properly pressed upon the leather placed upon the table, and shall move over it in substantially the same line at each operation of the machine. Then he describes certain means for giving motion. He describes a bed which is so contrived that it fits precisely to the curve described by the arm. I think he must have something which is substantially of that character. That is my impression.

Now I do not mean to confine myself to any particular cases. His mode of getting his roller off the table is different from the Green machine. There is no question made about that. What he says, in effect, as I understand it, applying the facts in this case is: "Granted that this Green machine existed, and granted that this pebbling roller, used by hand, existed, I have put the two together. The Green machine," he says, "is different from mine, because that machine is described in the patent, and was originally built to perform the operation of smoothing leather by a rubbing tool; mine is for the purpose of pebbling leather by an engraved tool which rotates." There is a difference, and no doubt, a very substantial difference, though that is a question for you. There is no question made that if it were entirely new, if nobody had heard of that roller before, that would be a substantial difference. He says: "My machine differs from the hand roller in several important particulars. This is merely a roller with a handle. Mine is the means which I have described, the radial arm, the springs, and the adapted bed; whereas, in the case of this hand machine, all those adaptations, both of pressure and equalizing the pressure, must be done by hand, by the will of the operator, and by his own strength; a much less complete machine than mine, and not having the elements of mine."

Now, to entitle a person to a patent he must be the original and first inventor of the arrangement, whatever it is, of the invention which he claims. If that invention is an arrangement of machinery by which he makes up a certain whole, he must be at least the inventor of the combination. He may have invented the parts or not, but if his claim is for a combination, he must at least have invented the combination. He must have been the first person to put those things together to effect the same result in substantially the same way. If it does not produce the same result in substantially the same way, that is evidence that it is not the same thing. He must be the first person who has put those things together to effect that result in substantially that way. It is not enough that he thinks he is original in his invention; it is not enough that he was not aware that anybody had invented it before, because the patent law is giving him an exclusive right; and to undertake to give him an exclusive right for what somebody else has really invented before, and perhaps gone to the patent office and patented, would be unjust. If it has been given to the public, it would be unjust; if it has been patented, it would be contradictory and absurd.

He must be the original and first inventor, and if the defendant in a case of this kind shows to your satisfaction that the patentee is not the first inventor of what he claims as his invention, then it is not his invention, and he is not entitled to a patent, and his patent will be void. The difficulty is in drawing the line and showing what is invention and what is mere construction, and it is on that point that I have been asked by the counsel, in various forms, to give instructions.

Now, there are some things that everybody knows. The common uses of common materials are supposed to be known. If a man merely makes a machine out of iron that has been made out of wood, and the jury find that that is the same machine, producing the same result in the same way, that is no invention, because everybody knows that any constructor can make a machine of iron instead of wood. It is not a question ordinarily left to the jury, because it is so clear, although, strictly speaking, it is a question of fact. And there may even be a discovery which is not an invention. For instance: after Green's machine has been invented for rubbing leather, a man may discover that that machine is equally good to rub pasteboard, or something else; still he can not have a patent for it, that is to say, for the machine, though he might perhaps for an improvement in the art of manufacturing pasteboard. The man who has made the first invention has made it for all the uses to which it is applicable.

In this connection I have been asked to rule in this case, and do hereby rule in favor of the defendant. That if you find a machine existed exactly or substantially like this machine of the plaintiff's, except that it was moved by hand power instead of water power or steam, and you find that to make the change is within the ordinary knowledge and skill of any constructor, then merely applying horse power, or water power, or steam power, would not be an invention, because that has come to be, in the progress of the arts, one of those matters of common knowledge that everybody is presumed to know, unless you find that there was some unusual contrivance applied to the apparatus. That may be explained in some other way. The mere means of giving motion to a machine would not ordinarily be a part of the essence of the machine. That is stating the same thing in a different way. But on the other hand, if the plaintiff has combined old parts in a new way, so that he gets a machine which operates differently and produces a different result in kind, then the law presumes that he has something that is patentable. The mere question whether any mechanic of ordinary skill could make the combination if it is suggested, will not do as a general test of the novelty of a machine. If the machines are similar—if they produce similar results, and the question is whether it is a new combination, whether it is a new arrangement of machinery, then it is very important to know whether any constructor acquainted with one machine could, by his common knowledge and skill, make the other, and work out that result in a somewhat more perfect manner. It is an important test in that sense; not a test whether an ordinary mechanic can make the combination if it is suggested, but whether he can make the combination without such suggestion; whether he can make the change by means of his ordinary knowledge, as a means of determining the question whether there is any new machine at all. That is to say, it is the ordinary knowledge and skill of the mechanic that are in question, not merely the ordinary skill of the mechanic.

Suppose, for instance, the man who invented gunpowder gets a patent for it. If it was nitroglycerine, perhaps it might not be useful, and so would not be the subject of a patent; but suppose it was gunpowder. There is no question but that gunpowder is useful, and it is an invention. Suppose he had said: "I combine saltpetre, sulphur, and charcoal, in a certain way, and produce a somewhat startling result." It would be no answer to the novelty of that invention to say that any chemist could do it after he had been shown how. The question is: Did every chemist have the knowledge as well as skill? Because, if not, there is invention, and it is a proper subject for a patent.

Another point which I have not before seen in the precise way in which I am about to put it, is the principle of law which is to govern you in determining the time when this invention was made. For the purposes of this case, I shall rule that the principle of law is, that he is the original and first inventor of a machine, or combination, or whatever it is, if it was not known or used by others before his discovery or invention; the man who has made an invention that was not known before he made it. That does not mean that he got his machine into the complete state in which you find it in the patent. Neither does it mean the first moment at which he conceived the idea that it would be a good thing to do that. It means not only when he conceived that such a thing would be a desirable thing to do, but when he had conceived the idea of how to do it substantially as he has done it. I shall not have occasion to refer to that again, perhaps. That is my view of the law.

Now, the defendant says that there were machines which were substantially like the plaintiff's invention before the date of his discovery. On that point there is this to be observed in the outset. They must have been working machines, not mere experiments. They must have done work, or been capable of doing work, and not been mere experiments, afterwards abandoned. Whether they were in fact operated for a greater or less time, is of no importance except so far as that may tend to make you believe that they were or were not mere experiments; in that view, the fact is of some consequence. But if you are satisfied that they were machines capable of doing work, substantially by the same arrangement as the plaintiff's, actual working machines, then the fact that they were operated but a short time, and then abandoned for other reasons than because they had failed as machines, is of no consequence.

The first in order of time is the English machine, described in a specification which, for the purposes of this case, it is admitted was published, the machine appearing to have been made in 1808, and the specification published in 1856, both dates anterior to the plaintiff's invention—admitted, so far as date is concerned, to be anterior.

Now, the question is: Did that machine contain substantially the combination and arrangement of parts which the plaintiff claims, and would it do the same work? That is, would it accomplish the same result in substantially the same way? You have heard both parties, and I do not intend to go over the arguments or the evidence. The defendant has pointed out wherein he thinks they agree substantially; the plaintiff has pointed out the differences. If you find that there are no differences that are material in the operation of the machine, as a machine for pebbling leather, then it supersedes the plaintiff's invention. If you find that it does differ essentially, that the parts are different, the combination different, and that it would not operate in the same way to produce the same result substantially, then they are different.

The plaintiff says there are no springs for the purpose of equalizing the pressure. I have not examined the patent since he made that suggestion, and it is for you to say what the machine is. If there was anything in the language that was ambiguous, of course it would be for me to construe it; but you are to say what the machine is. If it does not contain any springs to equalize the pressure, or if it does contain something called a spring, if it is a spring substantially different, and that would not operate to produce the same result in substantially the same way, then the plaintiff's combination is wanting.

Mr. Browne.—I understand your honor to leave that to the jury, to find on the description.

THE COURT.—Yes, taking the machine as described and drawn. So of the other parts. If it has not a bed which is substantially like that of the plaintiff, for the purposes of this arrangement and accomplishing this result, if it is not substantially an arm like that, it would be a different machine, a different combination.

But there is another point, a little closer, upon which the parties have asked more special instructions. That machine in the drawings, as explained by the experts, it is said (and that is a matter of fact), does not show any revolving roller. There is a passage toward the end of the patent in which it is suggested or said that a roller may be used in a certain way for "dicing or printing." Now, the plaintiff has pointed out, very forcibly, that that contradicts flatly the description of the machine given in the other parts of the specification. There is no doubt about that. It does, because when he describes it in other parts, at any rate in those passages which were cited, he describes the tool used distinctly as a rubbing tool. I mean the tool he was then speaking of. I do not think it necessarily follows that he may not afterwards have got the idea: "Well, after all, this may be used with a revolving tool." His language is ambiguous; it is doubtful; but, on the whole, I have thought and am still of the opinion that he meant to say in that passage, that a revolving tool may be used. I think that is the fair import of his language, even when it is considered that it is directly contradictory to the other parts of the patent.

Now, the defendant asks me to instruct you that if you find that the Hebert machine, as shown in the drawings and described in the descriptive parts of the specification, contains the plaintiff's combination of mechanism substantially, with the single exception that in that combination a tool, which is firmly held and rubs, is used, or is described, and that the Hebert specification suggests the substitution for such tool, if desired, of a tool which shall have an ornamental figure engraved upon it, and shall be revolved upon its own axis, so as to indent the leather, and if you find that such is substantially the tool used, and that that is the operation described by the plaintiff; and if you further find that the substitution required no change except such as is within the ordinary skill and knowledge of mechanics, involving no invention of the means of applying said revolving tool, then the Hebert patent anticipates the plaintiff's: the defendant of course assuming that all the other parts are substantially similar. I instruct you, that if the suggestion which he there makes is of itself such a description of the machine, that any mechanic of ordinary skill and knowledge could at that moment have made the substitution, there being such a tool in existence, and well known; that is to say, if it would be within the ordinary knowledge and skill, just as I ruled before, of a mechanic, who would know what tool was meant, and could make it by his ordinary skill, then it would anticipate the plaintiff's patent, but not otherwise.

Now, whether there was such a tool well known at that time, it is for you to say. The case has been fully argued upon this point as to the likeness or difference between these two machines, whether the Hebert machine has substantially the same combination as the plaintiff's, and whether, after all, it could do the work, and that is of great importance. I do not mean to express any opinion upon that point of fact, or any point of fact; if I do, you are to take it for nothing. But, would it do the work? Undoubtedly, that is a point for the defendant to prove. He is to prove a machine existing before the date of the patent, which would do the work. If your minds are balanced exactly on that question, you will have to find for the plaintiff on that point.

The other machine which has been principally relied upon by the defendant, if it may not be called two machines, is that which has been known in this case as the Garner, or Garner-Davis machine; first the Garner, and second, the Garner-Davis.

As I understand the arguments, the differences which the plaintiff finds between his machine and that of Garner, supposing you find, as matter of fact, that the Garner machine existed, with the pebbling roller, for the purpose of ornamenting leather, before the date of the plaintiff's invention, are, as I understand it, that the spring is different (and it is quite different in form), and that the bed is different, so that the coöperation, as he says, between the arm and the bed will be substantially different, and make the machine so much different that it will be substantially a different combination of machinery, and that the Garner machine does not have the advantages of his. A mere difference in form is not usually very important, if the work is done in substantially the same way. He says that the spring is different, because this spring gives an equal pressure throughout, and the elliptic spring gives a varying pressure throughout; and so of the bed; that the precise coöperation of this arm and this bed in his machine enables you to be certain that you get exactly the same pressure. You have the spring giving the same pressure; you have the bed in exactly the same as described by the arm, so that you get exactly the same pressure, both by the spring and the bed in the plaintiff's machine, while in the Garner machine you get a varying pressure throughout, not only because the spring varies in its pressure, but because the bed varies. I believe I have stated the proposition of the plaintiff correctly.

Now, the question for you is, if you find that that difference exists, whether it is a substantial difference in the operation of the machine. You have heard the experts upon that subject; you have heard to some extent, I do not know that it has been very fully gone into, the evidence as to the result in practice. It is for you to say, supposing you find that that machine existed as I have said, and was used as an actual working machine for pebbling leather, it is for you to say whether the differences are such that the plaintiff's combination is new. I do not know that I can help you much in that. If the change is not important; if it merely makes the machine work a little truer, but that degree of trueness is of no essential importance, then certainly you can not say that the combination is different. If it is of essential importance, then you can say that the combination is different. Now, in ascertaining whether it is of substantial importance, no doubt it is very useful to find out whether, as matter of fact, they would do the same work. The plaintiff says it is not shown that the Garner machine would work anything but sheepskin; that it is not calculated to give the amount and kind of pressure necessary for other work. I shall leave that matter to you, gentlemen, as a matter of fact. But on the matter of law, I wish to be understood that my ruling is distinct, that if they are not substantially different, and if the change that was made in that machine to get it into the plaintiff's machine was a change which any mechanic of ordinary skill, using skill and not invention, could have made, on finding that that machine did not operate quite so well as it should, if it was merely a difference in construction, which any mechanic could make, it would be no invention. But if the parts are substantially different, and were not within the common knowledge of constructors, and the plaintiff has made the new combination, it is no answer to say somebody else found out that bed, somebody else found out these springs. His patent is not for the bed or the springs alone. If he first combined them, the same parts not differing in themselves, if it was beyond the ordinary knowledge and skill of the mechanic to make the combination, then there is invention in the patent.

Passing from that, the defendant introduces what he calls the Garner-Davis machine, which, as I understand it, was substantially the Garner machine, up to the time when Mr. Davis put in a contrivance for allowing the arm to go back without touching the table. Up to that time it was substantially the Garner machine, as Garner himself describes it. And that machine; in any view, comes into the case properly enough, even if it is the Garner machine, because you may say that the Garner machine was never used, and you may think the Davis machine was. At all events it is brought in to show that the table and roller were used before the date of the plaintiff's machine.

Now, there has been a good deal of controversy upon that matter of date. The defendant insists that he has shown, with reasonable certainty, that it was six weeks or two months after August, 1860; the plaintiff says that on the evidence, it was probably 1861. The defendant's witnesses support their views of the date by reference to certain events, and you will remember what those events were, and how likely they are to enable them to fix one year rather than another. The value of these aids to recollection depends upon two or three circumstances. On the importance of the event itself, primarily, and next on the closeness of its connection or association with the fact it is adduced to support. If Mr. Perkins tells you: "I enlisted at such a time, and I did this job immediately before I went," there is a natural connection between the events, and he would be likely to remember them. If he went to the war, and knew that he did this job just before he went, he would be pretty likely to remember it. If he had not been to the war, and had been doing jobs for the defendant all along, it would be difficult for him to recollect in what year he did do it. You ask a farmer in what year he saw a new plow which his neighbor was using, but which he did not think much of, and which he did not think it worth while to buy. His neighbor is dead now, and you want to know when that plow was first used. Well, he thinks it was the year that he had a certain field sowed with rye. His wife thinks it was the year he had it sowed with barley. His head man thinks it was the year he had it sowed with clover. They talk it over, and finally settle that it was the barley year, and they all come and swear it was the barley year. They do not recollect the time, but that is the best they can do, and you have to take it with that qualification.

You are to inquire whether the Davis machine, with the pebbling roller, was used before the date of the plaintiff's invention, taking the date of that invention to have been such as you shall fix under the instructions already given; and if so, whether it is substantially the same combination. In that point of view, I do not know that it differs very much from the Garner machine, and the observations that I have made about the Garner machine would apply substantially to that.

The jury subsequently came into court and propounded the following questions: "The jury respectfully ask the following questions of his honor the judge: Query.—Supposing that parts of a machine taken from prior inventions, which parts existed separately beforehand, should be combined in a new machine which should work substantially better than any pre-existing machine, would said machine be a new invention, and therefore patentable? Edward N. Perkins, Foreman."

LOWELL, District Judge. A new combination of old parts is patentable. If the essential parts which go to make up a combination or arrangement of machinery have never been combined before, it is no matter that they existed separately in other machines, if by their combination a new and beneficial result is produced, or even an old result, in a better manner. The question is of the novelty of the combination of the essential parts. If, however, there are two combinations in which you find it difficult to decide whether they are the same or not, and you find they accomplish results alike in kind, the fact of an improved result and improved working is useful in aiding you to come to a decision; and the question in that case often is whether the changes are such as a mechanic of ordinary skill, from the knowledge and skill which competent mechanics have naturally, would make to improve the working of the machine. But if the combination is new; if you are satisfied of that, it is no matter that the parts are old.

In considering whether one element of a combination is substantially the same as an element of another combination, the fact that one works better than the other, coupled with the fact that the change is not within the ordinary knowledge and skill of all mechanics, is highly important and often decisive. This is to be taken in connection with what I have before instructed you.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing damages at $417.

[The judgment based on this verdict was subsequently reversed by the supreme court. See 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 117.

[For another case involving this patent, see note to Woodman Pebbling-Mach. Co. v. Guild, Case No. 17,981.]

WOODMAN PEBBLING-MACHINE CO. v. GUILD. See Case No. 17,981.

Case No. 17,980.

WOOD M. & R. CO. v. BROOKE.

[2 Sawy. 576; 19 N. B. R. 395.]

District Court, D. Oregon. March 17, 1874.

SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY—PASSING OF TITLE.

1. An agreement concerning the sale of specific or ascertained chattels is prima facie a bargain and sale, and transfers the property therein to the purchaser, in consideration of his becoming bound to pay the price therefor; but the intent of the parties is to govern, and the contract may provide that the property in the chattel shall remain in the seller until payment, although the possession thereof be given to the buyer in the meantime.

[Cited in Heinbockel v. Zugbaum, 5 Mont. 344, 5 Pac. 901.]

2. Where C. & Co. had the exclusive right to sell the agricultural implements manufactured by the W. W. Co., in Oregon and Washington, and during the year 1873 C. & Co. ordered and received certain machines, with the understanding that they were to pay for them if sold within the year, and if not, that they were "to take them for the next season," and the transaction appeared upon the invoices of the W. W. Co. and the books of C. & Co. as a sale: Held, that the property in the machines passed to C. & Co. upon delivery, and upon their being adjudged bankrupts, to their assignee.

[This was an action in replevin by the Walter A. Wood M. & R. Co. against Lloyd Brooke, to recover the possession of certain machines.]

T. V. Schaup, for plaintiff.

William Strong, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This is a petition asking that the plaintiff be adjudged the owner of thirteen reapers and five mowing attachments, now in the possession of the defendant as the property of the bankrupts, and for an order directing the defendant to deliver the same to the plaintiff.

From the petition, answer, stipulation and

¹ [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

evidence, it appears that the plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements at Hoosick Falls, N. Y., and that E. S. Whitcomb is and has been for some years past the agent of the company for the territory west of the Rocky Mountains, with a place of business at San Francisco; that Whitcomb agreed in writing with Comstock & Co., of Portland, Or., to sell, during the year 1872, within the limits of Oregon and Washington, the implements manufactured by the plaintiff, exclusively to said C. & Co., to be by the latter resold within said limits and paid for during the year, unless shipped without specific orders from C. & Co., in which case the machines were to be paid for when sold; that on September 9, 1872, said C. & Co., at the request of Whitcomb, sent plaintiff an order for one hundred and forty machines for the season of 1873, whereby it was understood between the parties that the agreement of 1872 was substantially continued in force between them, with the right on the part of the plaintiff to terminate it at the end of any year; that the one hundred and forty machines above mentioned were shipped to C. & Co., at Portland, Or., before June 1, 1873, to be paid for, as appears from the bills of sale on September 1 of the same year, but in shipping the reapers, unmatched parts of six machines were sent by mistake for three perfect ones; that to correct this mistake, Whitcomb, on June 10, shipped to C. & Co. the parts of six other reapers to match those, with a letter of advice of June 5, explaining the transaction, and saying, "We do not expect you to pay for the machines this season, unless sold"—that is, the three extra ones not ordered; that on May 12, 1873, Whitcomb shipped to C. & Co. a lot of mowing attachments complete, in pursuance of their order of September 9, 1872, together with five other like machines, without any special direction or understanding concerning the same; that on June 23, 1873, C. & Co. wrote Whitcomb to send them "ten more reapers, and if we sell them this season we will pay for them; if not, we will take them for the next season; if you think favorable, ship them by sail; not insure;" that on June 26, 1873, Whitcomb shipped ten machines to C. & Co., in pursuance of this order, and by letter of July 4 advised them of the fact, and added, "we would be glad to send you ten more (machines), as we shall probably have some to carry here this season, and should you wish more now we will ship them on terms proposed by you in your last letter"—that is of June 23d, aforesaid; that the bills sent to C. & Co., for all said implements were made out without qualification or reservation: "C. B. Comstock & Co., bought of Walter A. Wood Mowing and Reaping Machine Co.; terms September 1;" with this notice printed on the margin: "No goods sent on commission;" except the one of June 10th, for the parts of six reapers sent to match those before missent, which contained no date as to terms.

That on January 12, 1874, C. & Co. were adjudged bankrupts, and the defendant thereafter appointed assignee of their estate, to whom six of said reapers and four of said mowing attachments were delivered by the agents of said C. & Co. as the property of the latter; that the bankrupts returned these implements, and others not found, in their schedule as assets of the firm, but afterward, on February 12, amended the same, so as to state that all of said thirteen reapers and five mowing attachments, not included in the order of September 9, 1872, if not sold prior to September 1, 1873, "should be and remain the property" of the plaintiff; that all the implements received from plaintiff were kept together undistinguished from one another, and whether the implements in the possession of the assignee are the ones mentioned in said amended schedule does not appear, except one reaper; and that said reapers cost one hundred and forty dollars apiece, and said mowing attachments sixty dollars apiece, in San Francisco, with fifteen and five dollars apiece, respectively, freight to Portland, which freight was paid by C. & Co.

Upon these facts the plaintiff claims that as to the thirteen reapers and five mowing attachments, C. & Co. were simply the agents of the plaintiff with authority to sell the same, and until a sale, that the property in the machines remained in the latter. In support of this proposition, counsel cites Meldrum v. Snow, 9 Pick. 444, and Reed v. Upton, 10 Pick. 523.

I do not think that the cases are in point. In Meldrum v. Snow it was proven to be the usage for brewers to supply retailers with beer in the spring, to be kept on sale during the summer at the risk of the former, and paid for by the latter, as and when it was sold. As against the creditor of the retailer, the court held that the property in the beer did not pass to the latter on the delivery.

It is well settled, that where payment before delivery is waived by the seller, and immediate possession given to the purchaser, upon an express agreement that the title is to remain in the seller until payment on a future day, or contingency, that the payment is a condition precedent to the property in the thing sold, vesting in the purchaser, notwithstanding the sale and delivery. 1 Pars. Cont. 449. So in the case cited, the usage was equivalent, in the judgment of the court, to an agreement between the brewer and retailer, that the property in the beer should remain in the former until a resale by the latter. But in the absence of any such usage or agreement the sale and delivery of the beer, although upon a payment to be made at a future day or a contingency yet to happen, would have passed the property in the beer to the purchaser at once.

According to the evidence, these machines were all sold and delivered absolutely to C. & Co., without any agreement or reservation as to the title to the property. The only condition was the one in regard to the time of payment. That was a provision in favor of C. & Co., and amounted, in effect, to a stipulation that the machines were to be paid for when sold—whether in 1873 or 1874.

Beyond this there was no understanding between the parties, and probably the agreement should be so construed as giving the plaintiff the right to have payment at the end of the season of 1874, whether the implements were then sold or not.

In Reed v. Upton, supra, it was held that an agreement to sell a brick-pressing machine, upon payment therefor, on or before a future day, and also that the buyer should have the use of the machine in the meantime, followed by delivery under the latter stipulation, did not pass the property in the machine to the purchaser prior to the payment therefor.

But there was an express provision that the sale should not take effect until payment, and also that the delivery in the meantime was only to the use of the purchaser. An agreement concerning the sale of specific or ascertained chattels is prima facie a bargain and sale, and transfers the property therein to the purchaser, in consideration of his becoming bound to pay the price therefor; but the intent of the parties to the contract is to govern, and the agreement may provide that the property in the chattel shall remain in the seller until payment, although the possession thereof be given to the buyer in the meantime. Blackb. Sales, 147; 1 Pars. Cont. 440; Reed v. Upton, supra, 523.

The contract or transaction concerning these machines was a bargain and sale of them to C. & Co., and consequently transferred the property in them to the bankrupts, unless the parties thereto otherwise intended and agreed.

It is admitted that the one hundred and forty machines which C. & Co. first ordered for the season of 1873 were purchased outright, and that the property in them passed to the purchasers at the time of delivery on ship board at San Francisco. The machines in controversy were ordered and sent, or sent and received, upon the same terms as the others, except the time of payment. The invoices are all made out as absolute bills of sale. Nothing was said or done by the parties which indicates that the goods were merely sent on consignment to be sold on account of the plaintiff. On the contrary, the bills contain a notice that the plaintiff did not send goods on commission. C. & Co., when ordering the ten reapers direct, first, that they shall be shipped by sail, and then changed the order by telegraph, to steamer, and expressly direct the plaintiff not to insure. The plain English of all this is, that the parties understood that these machines were at the risk of C. & Co. as soon as delivered on board at San Francisco, and if destroyed by any casualty, the loss would be theirs. This is utterly inconsistent with the idea that it was intended and agreed that the property in them was to remain in the plaintiff, until a sale by C. & Co. Still further, the bankrupts, in their account with the plaintiff, credit it absolutely with all machines received in 1873, and enter those on hand on February 14, 1874, on their sworn schedules as assets of their estate; and the subsequent change of their schedule was not made until the arrival here of the plaintiff and his claim to the contrary.

Whitcomb also testified that the company never made a contract to sell their machines to any one for more than one year, and that they always reserved the right to change their agents, as he called them, every year, and effect was sought to be given to this testimony by counsel for plaintiff, as showing that machines sent by it to C. & Co., and not disposed of within the year, in some way reverted to the plaintiff at that time. Admitting this to be the general rule under which plaintiff did business, I do not see how it affects the question in this case.

If C. & Co. were not continued as the exclusive buyers and sellers of plaintiff's machines for Oregon and Washington in 1874, still by the terms upon which they received these machines, they had a right to keep them if not disposed of sooner, and sell them within the year 1874. In the meantime the machines would be at C. & Co.'s risk, and the plaintiff could not deprive them of the possession of them, although, as has been suggested, the right of the latter to have the price of them might become absolute at the end of the season of 1874, whether they were then sold or not.

On the other hand, it may be that C. & Co., if they were not continued as the exclusive buyers and sellers of the plaintiff's machines for 1874, would have a right thereafter to treat this sale as a conditional one of the class called "contracts of sale or return," and return the machines upon the ground that, as the plaintiff had materially deprived them of their opportunity to sell them, by withdrawing their exclusive right contrary to the implied understanding, their obligation to pay for them was at an end.

However this may be, I am satisfied that the transaction by which these machines were delivered to C. & Co. amounted to a bargain and sale, which, in the absence of any agreement or understanding to the contrary, transferred the property in them to the bankrupts.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider the question whether the plaintiff, in case he was entitled to the possession of the thirteen reapers and five mowing attachments, not included in the one hundred and forty machines, ordered September 9, 1872, could have judgment for the possession of any like number and kind of machines of its manufacture, in the hands of the defendant as the assignee of the bankrupts.

Although this proceeding is nominally a petition to the court for an order upon the assignee to deliver these machines to the petitioner, it has been heard and considered as an action of replevin tried by the court, without a jury.

This court has no authority to deprive the assignee of the possession of the property of the bankrupts without due process of law, which means in this case an action and trial by jury, unless the parties consent to a trial by the court. Smith v. Mason, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 429.

The rule in replevin is, that the thing sought to be recovered must possess indicia, or ear-marks, by which it may be distinguished from all others of the same description; therefore, replevin cannot be maintained for loose money, but may be for money tied up in a bag, and taken from the plaintiff in that state.

These machines are not very readily distinguished from one another by their mere appearance, if at all. But the thirteen reapers and five mowing attachments might be distinguished from the one hundred and forty machines if they had been so kept that the parties having the custody of them could satisfactorily testify to their identity. In this case, the evidence only shows that one of the machines in the hands of the assignee is one of the thirteen reapers.

But the claim of the plaintiff is, that there is a usage in this trade, to the effect that where machines are delivered, as in this case, and any number, not exceeding those sent without specific orders, or ordered to be paid for when sold, are left at the end of the season unsold, they revert to the company and become its property ex vi facti, for which it may maintain replevin. There was evidence tending to prove such a usage, but it was not sufficient. Besides, Comstock testified that he knew nothing of it, but purchased the machines to be paid for September 1, 1873, or when sold.

The plaintiff is not entitled to the possession of the property, and judgment must be given for the defendant for costs.

Case No. 17,981.

WOODMAN PEBBLING-MACH. CO. v.
GUILD et al.

[4 Cliff. 185.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term,
1872.²

PATENT FOR INVENTION.

This case was regarded as controlled by the principles of the decision in Stimpson v. Woodman, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 120, otherwise the court would have ordered a decree for the complainants.

¹ [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Reversed in 154 U. S. 597.]

Bill in equity [by Woodman Pebbling-Machine Company against Charles H. Guild and others] for infringement of letters-patent No. 42,136, date March 27, 1864, for ornamenting leather. The nature of the invention was stated to consist of producing the pebbled or boarded grain or finish on leather, by subjecting it to the pressure of a short revolving cylinder or roller, of steel or other suitable metal, having the desired design or figure engraved on its periphery; also of certain mechanical devices for managing the roller, and accomplishing the object with rapidity and cheapness.

The following is an extract from the descriptive portion of the schedule annexed to the letters-patent:—"A is a wooden table, about four feet and six inches long and five inches wide, the two ends of which slide up and down freely in vertical slots in the uprights, G and H, as shown in Fig. 1. The upper surface of this table, on which the leather to be 'boarded' or 'pebbled' is placed, is the arc of a circle whose centre is at J, at the top of the pendulum I. This table, when the roller Z is going back over it, is lowered, and rests on three strips of rubber W W W placed upon the stationary beam B, the extremities of which are framed into the uprights G and H. The rubber strips W are also designed to prevent noise and jar when the table descends." The claim was as follows:—"I do not claim embossing by means of two or more cylinders working together; but what I do claim as new, and desire to secure by letters-patent, is: First. Boarding or pebbling skins or leather by means of a single short cylinder rolling over a table, with requisite pressure, substantially as described. I also claim raising and lowering the table A by means of the toggles Q, arm S, spring U, arm T, and cam P, or their equivalent, substantially as set forth, and for the purpose described."

T. L. Wakefield, for complainants.

Geo. L. Roberts and B. R. Curtis, for respondents.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and LOWELL, District Judge.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Irrespective of the decision of the supreme court in the case of Stimpson v. Woodman, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 120, the court here would be of the opinion that the complainants are entitled to a decree that their patent is valid, and for an account and an injunction; but we are both of the opinion that the case is controlled by the principles of that decision, and that the bill of complaint must be dismissed with costs.

[The judgment in this case was reversed by the supreme court by stipulation of the parties. See 154 U. S. 597, 14 Sup. Ct. 1216. For other cases involving this patent, see Stimpson v. Woodman, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 117; Woodman v. Stimpson, Case No. 17,979.]

Case No. 17,982.WOODROW v. COLEMAN.[1 Cranch, C. C. 171.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1804.

ARTICLES OF APPRENTICESHIP.

The father of an apprentice who binds himself, is liable upon the indentures, by reason of his signature and seal, although there be no express words of covenant binding the father.

Covenant against the father on articles of apprenticeship of the son, the boy having run away. Oyer and general demurrer to the declaration.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, contended that the signature and seal of the father, is only evidence of his consent. As there are no words in the indenture to bind the father, no action can be maintained upon it against him. Co. Lit. 172; Evelyn v. Chichester, 3 Burrows, 1719; Old Rev. Code Va. c. 95, § 15; Maddon v. White, 2 Term R. 161; Rex v. Inhabitants of Hindringham, 6 Term R. 557.

Mr. Swann, contra. By the law of Virginia, a father may bind his child, and the father is liable if the son embezzles the master's money. It is upon the faith of this that the master takes the apprentice. A father has a right to bind the son without his consent. The father might have brought an action against the master upon this indenture. The words are, "the said parties bind themselves each to the other." 3 Bac. Abr. 547; Gylbert v. Fletcher, Cro. Car. 179; Whitley v. Loftus, 8 Mod. 191; Branch v. Ewington, Doug. 518.

Judgment for plaintiff on the demurrer.

[See Cases Nos. 17,983 and 17,984.]

Case No. 17,983.WOODROW v. COLEMAN.[1 Cranch, C. C. 192.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1804.

OVERRULING OF DEMURRER—PLEADING DE NOVO.

After judgment for the plaintiff on the defendant's demurrer, and writ of inquiry awarded, the court will not permit the defendant to plead de novo, unless he will withdraw his demurrer.

THE COURT, at last term, overruled the defendant's demurrer [Case No. 17,982], but the judgment was not entered until this term; and the jury being now called to be sworn to inquire of damages,—

Mr. Taylor, for the defendant, offered to plead a breach of covenant on the part of the plaintiff in bar of the action, and contended that the covenants were dependent.

THE COURT refused to suffer the defendant to file the plea offered.

Mr. Taylor then offered the general issue to the breach assigned.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT intimated that they would not permit the plea, unless the judgment on the demurrer should be struck out, and the demurrer withdrawn.

Mr. Taylor refused to withdraw the demurrer, and the writ of inquiry was executed.

[See Case No. 17,984.]

Case No. 17,984.WOODROW v. COLEMAN.[1 Cranch, C. C. 199.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1804.

Costs.

Full costs will be given in covenant.

Motion, by the defendant's counsel, that the clerk be ordered to tax only so much costs as damages. New Rev. Code, p. 109, § 17.

The action was covenant, and verdict for plaintiff, one cent.

Mr. Swann, for the plaintiff, contended that the section applies to actions of trespass. Gilb. Cas.; Bac. Abr. "Costs."

THE COURT gave judgment with full costs.

[See Cases Nos. 17,982 and 17,983.]

WOODROW (COOKE v.). See Case No. 3, 181.

WOODROW (JONES v.). See Case No. 7, 509.

Case No. 17,985.Ex parte WOODRUFF.

[3 App. Com'rs Pat. 233.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. 12, 1859.

PATENTS—COMBINATIONS—NOVELTY AND INVENTION.

[A combination, to be patentable, must disclose something new, either in the combination itself, or in the result achieved.]

An appeal from a decision of the commissioner of patents refusing to grant letters patent to Andrew Woodruff for an improvement in harrows.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The specification particularly describes the various parts of appellant's improved harrows. At the closing part thereof appellant says: "I claim as my invention, and as a new article of manufacture, the folding harrow above described, composed of two X shaped tooth frames supported and connected at their ends as described and shown." The acting commissioner adopts for his decision the report of the board of examiners, which states: "The applicant claims a folding harrow, composed of two X shaped frames connected together by iron straps, which serve not only as braces but hinges to effect the connection. The reference, Fig. g, g, plate X, in Mach. n, Verzee ss, &c., is a folding harrow connected together by iron straps which act not only as braces but hinges to effect the connection, and possess this advantage over the applicant's device, to wit: The parts can fold in two directions, and thus the harrow is enabled to accommodate itself to inequalities of ground which Woodruff's as constructed cannot do, as it only folds in one direction. It is true that the two parts which make up Woodruff's harrow are made in X form, but this is a difference in form merely, which the constructor chooses to have the parts assume, and unless there is something novel in the effect produced, due to such form, then the form cannot be considered as an element conferring patentability to the device. As to the question of cheapness of construction, there need be no more parts in the one than in the other; the draft in both is applied in the same direction, with regard to the body of the implement, and the effect produced by both is the same, with the exception of the advantage in favor of the reference above named. Aside from this, the reference to Wood's cultivator rejected May 19th, 1856, shows that the X form is old. We must therefore recommend the final rejection of this application." The acting commissioner's decision immediately follows, thus: "The foregoing report is confirmed, and the application for a patent finally rejected," dated March 18, 1859. From which decision the appellant filed the following appeal: "Inasmuch as the said Woodruff claims a harrow made up specifically of a certain combination of parts, and so claimed in his application for a patent, which combination of parts is not shown or described in either of the references given by the commissioner in this rejection of the said application, that the commissioner used in deciding the X form of harrow was old, and that as no hinges like those used by said Woodruff in his harrow had been used in connecting the parts of folding harrows before that, therefore the said Woodruff is not entitled to receive the patent as prayed for in view of the references given." The commissioner refers to the hereinbefore recited report of the examiner as stating all the grounds of his objection to the part or parts of the invention which he considers as not entitled to be patented. After due notice of the time and place of trial given, the commissioner laid before me all the original papers in the case, and the appellant, by his attorney, filed his argument, and the case was submitted.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The appellant, in his argument, says: "That, so far as the X form of harrow frame is concerned, so long as Mr. Woodruff does not claim this form, but only its combination with other features which are conjoined with it to make the article of manufacture, which he claimed as produced by such combination," &c., it should not be urged as a reason, &c. The rule of law is that there must be something new either in the combination itself, or in the result, neither of which appears to be the case in the present instance. If the result shows a new and valuable article of manufacture, so as to afford ground of itself to presume invention, then there ought to have been sufficient proof of the fact in the case laid before me, which there is not. My opinion therefore is that the decision of the acting commissioner is correct, and ought to be affirmed, and the same is accordingly therefore affirmed.

Case No. 17,986.

WOODRUFF et al. v. BARNEY et al.

[1 Bond, 528; 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 244.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Feb. Term, 1862.

COSTS IN PATENT CASES — MODELS AND COPIES — FEES OF WITNESSES.

1. The words "pursuant to law," in the act of February 26, 1853 [10 Stat. 161], are equivalent to the word "summoned" in the act of February 28, 1799 [1 Stat. 624], and, in both cases, import that witnesses who attend without being summoned, are voluntary witnesses, whose fees can not be taxed against the losing party.

[Cited in Spaulding v. Tucker, Case No. 13,-221; Haines v. McLaughlin, 29 Fed. 70. Disapproved in The Vernon, 36 Fed. 116; Dennis v. Eddy, Case No. 3,793; U. S. v. Sanborn, 28 Fed. 303.]

[Cited in Alexander v. Harrison, 2 Ind. App. 52, 23 N. E. 121; Meagher v. Van Zandt (Nev.) 2 Pac. 58.]

2. If a witness, whose residence is not at the place of holding court, is summoned at the place of trial, he is allowed mileage for returning to his home, but not for coming to the court; and by a liberal construction of the statute, return travel has been allowed, even beyond the limits of the district for which the court was held.

[Cited in Burrow v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co., 54 Fed. 282.]

3. Models of the invention described in the plaintiff's patent, and procured by the defendant in good faith, may be included in the taxation of costs, but not other models.

[Cited in Wooster v. Handy, 23 Fed. 62. Followed in Cornelly v. Markwald, 24 Fed. 187. Cited in Ryan v. Gould, 32 Fed. 754.]

4. Copies of patents, either that of the plaintiff or others, procured by the defendant, can not be taxed as costs to the plaintiff.

[This was a suit by Theodore T. Woodruff, John S. Miller, Orville W. Childs, and George R. Dykeman against Elam E. Barney, C. Parker, S. F. Woodsum, and J. A. Tenney. Heard on motion to retax costs.]

George E. Pugh, for plaintiffs.

T. D. Lincoln, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. On the part of the plaintiffs in this case, a motion is made to relax the costs, by striking from the cost-bill the charges for mileage to such of the defendants' witnesses residing out of this district, and more than one hundred miles from Cincinnati, as attended at the request of the defendants, and without service of process requiring their attendance. And the defendants move for a retaxation, by which they may be allowed for expenses incurred in procuring certain models and copies of patents deemed necessary in their defense.

¹ [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission.]

The plaintiffs' motion will be first considered. It presents simply the question whether a party, against whom a judgment for costs has been entered, is chargeable with the mileage of the witnesses who have attended without being summoned by legal process.

The facts necessary to notice, and about which there is no controversy, are, that the suit was brought for alleged infringements of four different patent rights for distinct improvements in railroad sleeping cars, of which the plaintiffs had the title by assignment from the patentee. The defendants, by their pleas, put in issue, not only the infringements charged, but also the novelty of the different patented improvements. The case was on the docket for trial at the last December term, and, by arrangement between the counsel, was continued to, and especially assigned for trial, on the first day of the last June term. When called for trial at that term the plaintiffs entered a discontinuance of the suit, and a judgment was rendered against them for costs, in the usual form. A large number of witnesses, residents of the city of New York, and perhaps other places outside of this district, were in attendance at the December and June terms, on behalf, and at the request of the defendants, without being summoned, either out of, or within the district. At each of those terms, these witnesses proved their attendance before the clerk; and in taxing the costs against the plaintiffs, mileage is allowed to them at both terms, for travel in coming to and returning from Cincinnati, the place of holding the court. There is no reason to doubt that these witnesses attended in good faith. It appears satisfactorily to the court, that their testimony was deemed material by the distinguished counsel for the defendants, by whose advice they were requested to attend.

The subject of costs in cases at law, in the courts of the United States, is wholly governed by statute, and is not dependent on the discretion of the judges of those courts. Section 6 of the act of congress of February 23, 1799 (1 Stat. 626), after providing that jurors shall receive a per diem compensation for their attendance, and fees for traveling at the rate of five cents per mile from their place of abode to the place of holding court and the like sum for returning, closes with this provision: "To the witnesses summoned in any court of the United States, the same allowance as is provided for jurors." In the case of Dreskill v. Parish [Case No. 4,075], it was held by this court, under the act of 1799, that the fees of a witness who voluntarily appeared without subpoena could not be taxed to the losing party in the case. Judge McLean, who gave the opinion of the court, says: "If he (a witness) attend voluntarily, or without summons, his fees can not be taxed against the losing party. The attendance, if not summoned, is voluntary." And again: "The service must be made by the marshal, or one of his deputies. As no such service was made on the witnesses above named, their per diem and traveling expenses can not be charged to the defendant, but must be taxed to the party summoning them." In a case between the same parties [Id. 4,076], the same question arose and was decided in the same way.

But it is insisted by the counsel for the defendants, that the above cases were decided under the old law, and that the act of 1853, under which the taxation in the present case was made, is different in its terms, and justifies a different construction. There can be no doubt that the latter act must control the question before the court. It provides, in section 1, that the fees which it allows to the various officers and persons named, shall be "in lieu of the compensation now allowed by law;" thus virtually repealing the act of 1799, so far as it regulates the fees and compensation of those referred to. The provision of the act of 1853, relating to witnesses' fees, is in these words: "For each day's attendance in court, or before any officer pursuant to law, one dollar and fifty cents, and five cents per mile for traveling from his place of residence to said place of trial or hearing, and five cents per mile for returning." Thus it will be seen that the diversity in the phraseology of the act of 1799 and the act of 1853 is this: by the former act, witnesses summoned to attend court were entitled to a certain per diem compensation, and mileage to and from the place of holding court; and by the latter act, they are allowed, "for each day's attendance in court, or before any officer pursuant to law," mileage at the rate of five cents per mile in going to and returning from court. But clearly, the language of the two sections is of the same legal import. In the one, is required expressly the service of a summons; in the other, the witness must attend "pursuant to law." Now, by every just rule of grammatical construction, these words must be held to apply, both to witnesses attending a court, and to those attending before an officer having authority to summon witnesses. In either case, to entitle them to compensation, they must attend, pursuant to law, and not merely on the request of a party without process. The words of the act of 1853 are more comprehensive than those used in the old law, and were adopted to supply an obvious omission in that law. The old law did not provide for the case of a witness attending before a master in chancery, commissioner, or other officer, authorized for any purpose to call witnesses before him; nor did it provide for a witness attending before a court, under a recognizance by which he was legally bound to attend. These cases are plainly embraced in the act of 1853. But clearly there is not a word in that act, from which, by any just reasoning, it can be inferred that a witness who voluntarily attends, can claim per diem compensation, or allowance for traveling.

The case of Whipple v. Cumberland Cotton Co. [Case No. 17,515], referred to by the counsel for the defendants, does not sustain the taxation of the witnesses' fees in the case before the court. The decision of Judge Story was to the effect, that if a material witness for a party residing in another state, or more than one hundred miles from the place of holding court is summoned to attend court, his travel may be allowed and taxed to his place of residence. This rule was also recognized by Judge Woodbury, in Hathaway v. Roach [Id. 6,213]. In these cases, however, the witnesses were actually served with process requiring their attendance, though it does not appear in the reports whether they were summoned within or without the district. And this accords with the practice in this court. If a witness whose residence is not at the place of holding court is summoned there, he is allowed mileage for returning to his home, but not for coming to the court. And, by a liberal construction of the statute, return travel has been allowed, even beyond the limits of the district for which the court was held. But it has never been held by this court or any other, that the fees of a witness attending merely by the request of a party, without subpoena, can be legally taxed against the losing party, as a part of the costs for which he is liable. Such a witness, under the act of 1799, is not "summoned," and under the act of 1853 does not attend court "pursuant to law."

The construction contended for by the defendants' counsel would not only conflict with the plain reading of the acts referred to, but would open the door to great abuses. If a party in any case could, by mere request, procure the attendance of any number of witnesses, from remote parts of the country, and tax their travel to his adversary in case the judgment was against him, he would not only be subject to a ruinous amount of costs, but might be taken wholly by surprise at the trial. No process having been ordered to procure the attendance of the witnesses, he could not anticipate their presence, and would have no means of contradicting or counteracting their evidence. There is no principle of public policy or justice justifying such a practice. If a witness resides out of the district in which the court is held, or at a greater distance than one hundred miles from it, the act of congress authorizes his deposition to be taken and used on the trial. It is undoubtedly true that it is often desirable to have the personal presence of a material witness, as the oral examination before the court and jury is more satisfactory than his testimony presented in the form of a deposition. But this is for the benefit of the party who wishes the testimony thus exhibited. He can not, however, avail himself of this benefit at the expense of his adversary. If he brings witnesses into court without process, he must pay them for their attendance. He may relieve himself from this burden in part at least, by causing them to be served with process after they come within the district. This, however, the defendants, for reasons best known to themselves, failed to do, and the witnesses, therefore, who attended, can be regarded only as mere volunteers, and their fees can not be taxed against the plaintiffs as a part of the legal costs. The plaintiffs' motion to retax is therefore sustained, and the fees of these witnesses will be excluded from the taxation.

I have yet to consider the motion by the defendants, to include in the taxation the expense of procuring models of sleeping cars, and copies of patents from the patent office. These, it is insisted, were necessary for their defense, and were obtained by them in good faith; and that they should be indemnified for this outlay. The issues presented by the pleadings were no doubt numerous and somewhat complicated, by reason of the number of distinct improvements, which were claimed as embraced in the four patents held by the plaintiffs. The novelty of all these improvements was in issue, under the various notices given by the defendants, and it was, doubtless, necessary, in sustaining their defenses against the alleged infringements, to exhibit these models to the jury. It would materially assist them in coming to a conclusion as to the novelty of the claims of the patents. The defendants allege that they procured these models at an expense exceeding six hundred dollars. Can this be taxed to the plaintiffs as a part of the legal cost in the case? There is no statutory provision by which such an expenditure is taxable as costs; and it is perhaps within the discretion of the court to tax them, if necessary to the processes of justice. It does not occur to me that this question has before been presented for the decision of this court. Nor are any authorities referred to, which sustain the claim of the defendants' counsel to the extent urged by them. It is obvious that it would subject litigants in contested patent cases to onerous burdens, if either party was permitted, ad libitum, to procure models, and tax his unsuccessful adversary in the case with the entire expense. I am not aware that any of the courts of the United States have given any sanction to such a principle. The case of Hathaway v. Roach [supra] is referred to by counsel, but clearly it does not sustain the claim of the defendants in this motion. That was an action for the infringement of the plaintiff's exclusive right to certain improvements in a stove, for which a patent had been granted. The defendant had procured several models of stoves, to be used on the trial, and the expense of these had been taxed in the bill of costs. Judge Woodbury held, that so far as these were models of stoves described in the plaintiff's patent, as the plaintiff was not bound to exhibit them, it was proper for the defendants to produce them to be used on the trial. To that extent he held, that the expense was properly carried into the taxation of costs. These models, the learned judge remarks, were likely to be beneficial in explaining the patent, and were competent evidence of its coincidence or difference compared with other stoves, as they related to the doings of the plaintiff himself on the subject of his patent. The judge proceeds to say: "If other models are taxed, I do not think them proper items for the bill of costs, any more than the drawings of other patents procured, or the books which describe them; they all being rather arguments than proofs."

I concur with Judge Woodbury in the case cited. It is reasonable and just, that so far as the defendants in this case have, in good faith, procured models of sleeping cars, or improvements therein, embraced in the four patents, for the infringement of which the plaintiffs have brought suit, they should be indemnified, and to that extent the expense of the models may be included in the taxation. The court is not informed how many, if any, of the models procured by the defendants, fall within the rule prescribed. If necessary, it can be referred to a competent expert to inquire and report, as to the number and cost of the models procured by the defendants, which correspond with the improvements described in the plaintiffs' patent, and are claimed by the patentee as his inventions.

As to the copies of patents obtained by the defendants from the patent office, I do not know of any principle or any precedent by which the expense can be taxed as costs in the case. I am not aware of any case in which it has been allowed in this court, nor of any authority which sanctions it. If the motion now made includes the expense of copies of the plaintiffs' patent, it can not be allowed, for the obvious reason that the plaintiffs are bound to exhibit these as a necessary part of their evidence, and there could be no necessity that the defendants should procure them. If they are copies of patents for other improvements, not included in the patents held by the plaintiffs, they are clearly within the decision of the court in the case of Hathaway v. Roach, before referred to, and the expense must be excluded from the cost-bill. If the defendants deemed these copies necessary in making their defense, the plaintiffs can not be held chargeable with their cost. It is possible that there may be circumstances, which being made known to the court before the trial of the case, an order would be made authorizing the procurement of copies of patents or other documents, the cost of which might be taxed in the case, to await the result of the trial. Without such previous order, I am clear, they can not be properly included in the taxation. This part of the defendants' motion is therefore overruled.

Case No. 17,986a.

WOODRUFF v. BENTLEY.

[Hempst. 111.]¹

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Jan., 1831.

DETINUE—WHEN LIES.

1. Detinue lies against a person who has quitted the possession of property prior to the institution of suit.
2. If a defendant has been legally evicted, or returned the property before suit, this will bar the action.

Appeal from Pulaski circuit court.

[Action by George Bentley against William E. Woodruff.]

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, CROSS, and BATES, JJ.

CROSS, J. This was an action of detinue brought by the appellee against the appellant, in the Pulaski circuit court, for the recovery of a negro boy. The suit was commenced on the 22d February, 1830, and at the following June term, a verdict and judgment were recovered by the appellee. From the bill of exceptions taken by the appellant during the trial, it appears that the judge of the circuit court instructed the jury, that if they found from the evidence that the negro slave in contest was the property of the plaintiff, and that the defendant had possession of said slave in December or January last, although he might not have been in his possession at the date of the writ, they ought to find for the plaintiff, &c. In giving these instructions, it is contended that the court erred: First, because the appellant had restored the negro to the person from whom he had received him, in whose power it was to have affected a legal eviction before the commencement of the suit; and second, that the relation of bailor and bailee existed between the appellant and a certain Thomas Mathers, to whom the negro had been returned. The evidence, as collected from the bill of exceptions, is, that the appellee sent the negro in contest to a certain Thomas Mathers, his son-in-law, on the 23d December, 1827, where he remained in his employ and possession until October, 1829, when he (Mathers) hired him to the appellant. The negro remained in the possession of the appellant, under this contract of hire, until the early part of January, 1830, when a man by the name of Harris came and demanded him, stating that he had purchased him from the appellee, upon condition that he could get peaceful possession of him. Appellant refused to deliver up said negro, declaring that he would deliver him to no person without an order from Mathers. A few days afterwards Mathers was seen in possession of the negro, on the way to his residence in Conway county. Two weeks thereafter he sent the negro to Little Rock, where appellant resides, with directions that the appellant would hire him, or that he should hire himself to some other person. The negro came to appellant's, and remained with him five or six days; when Chester Ashley put him in possession of the Messrs Elliots, under a previous contract of hire from said Mathers. In January preceding the commencement of the suit, the appellee called on Mathers, and told him to send home his negro, then in his possession. The question is, are the instructions given to the jury by the judge of the circuit court correct, when applied to the facts above detailed?

¹ [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

It is certainly a well-settled principle, that detinue lies against a person who has quit- ted the possession of the property prior to the institution of the suit. Com. Dig. tit. "Act," 364; Bastie v. Lambert, 1 Wash. [Va.] 176. When, however, the defendant has been legally evicted before the institution of the suit, it would operate as a bar, and a recovery could not be had in detinue. Id. 116. And so where the relation of bailor and bailee exists, a return of the property by the bailee would bar the action, and after a demand made by a person who had title. 1 Bac. Abr. tit. "Bailment," 375; Rolle, Abr. 607; 2 Bos. & P. 462.

This doctrine, as was justly remarked by the counsel for the appellant, is founded in the best policy. Were it otherwise, a door would be open placing it in the power of corrupt individuals, by combining, to practise incalculable frauds and impositions upon society. Besides, it would greatly impair the beneficial relations growing out of contracts of hire, or any other species of bailment. But does the evidence in this case show that the appellant was legally evicted, or that he stood in the attitude of a bailee and returned the property to Mathers, the bailor? We think not. His contract for the hire of the negro took place in October, 1829, under which he remained in possession until some time in January following. A demand was then made by Harris, who alleged that he had purchased from appellee. Shortly afterwards appellant returned the negro to Mathers. With this return the relation of bailor and bailee ceased; and if nothing further had appeared from the evidence, we would be disposed to reverse the judgment. But it did not close at this stage of the transaction. After the return of the negro, the appellee called on Mathers for him, and immediately afterwards he was sent back to appellant, without any contract or obligation on the part of Mathers to do so. He remained in the possession of, or, to use the language in the bill of exceptions, stayed with the appellant five or six days. The appellee, it seems, ascertained in the mean time where his property was, and, intent upon requiring it in specie, brings suit against the appellant. But before the writ was sued out, the negro is taken by Ashley, and by him placed in the hands of Messrs. Elliots. The appellant, therefore, had not been legally evicted prior to the institution of the suit; nor can he be regarded, under the circumstances, as having stood in the attitude of a bailee. Mathers himself appears to have held the negro only in that character under Bentley, as his bailor. And the appellant was apprised of his (Bentley's) claim before the negro came to his possession the second time. It is questionable whether he was not, under this state of case, equally responsible with Mathers to Bentley. We are, therefore, of opinion that the instructions of the circuit court given to the jury, when applied to the facts of the case, are substantially correct. Judgment affirmed.

WOODRUFF (BINNS v.). See Case No. 1, 424.

Case No. 17,987.

WOODRUFF v. The LEVI DEARBORN.

[4 Hall, Law J. 88.]

District Court, D. Georgia. July 17, 1811.¹

VESSEL IN PORT—LIEN FOR SUPPLIES.

Where cordage and other materials are furnished, at the instance of the owner, to a vessel not on a voyage, but lying within the body of a county, no lien on the vessel is created, so as to affect her in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, without notice.

In admiralty.

Mr. Charlton, for claimant, argued, (1) Whether the admiralty court has jurisdiction? (2) Whether, if a jurisdiction can be sustained, there can be a lien on this ship, under the particular facts and circumstances of the case?

First point. As to the question of jurisdiction: The admiralty proceeds in rem, and therefore, if these are not charges upon the ship in specie, the court has no jurisdiction. The most important matter under this head which presents itself for the consideration of the court, is, whether it is to proceed according to the principles and doctrines of the civil law, as it obtains in those nations, which have made it the foundation of their jurisprudence, or according to the maritime law, as it has been adopted and explained by the courts of Great Britain. If, according to the civil law, it is admitted that the ship is specifically liable. Abb. Shipp. (Story's Ed.), and the authorities there cited, 151-153. It is contended that the same doctrine has been adopted by the English courts in the case of Rich v. Coe, by Lord Mansfield. Cowp. 636. It is there laid down that the person supplying necessaries, has three remedies: 1st. Against the owner. 2d. Against the master. 3d. Against the ship. But this case appears not only to have been subverted by other decisions, but by a subsequent decision of Lord Mansfield, himself. Wilkins v. Carmichael, 1 Doug. 101, cited in Abb. Shipp. (Story's Ed.) 158.

¹ [Affirmed in Case No. 17,988.]

In this case, Lord Mansfield, after stating the reason why the master should not be permitted to retain the ship, adds that if "there was any lien originally, it was in the carpenter, and he, by giving up the possession, had parted with the lien, if he ever had one." Here is a strong doubt suggested whether even the carpenter, whose labour enables the ship to prosecute her voyage, can resort, specifically, to the ship; and it is impossible to reconcile this case with the opinion expressed in Rich v. Coe, because in the conclusion of this case his lordship observes: "Work done for a ship in England is supposed to be on the personal credit of the employer." The supplies in Rich v. Coe were furnished in England; the treble security was therefore as inapplicable in the one case as the other. Mr. Abbot considers this latter case subversive of the former. Abb. Shipp. 153.

In Westerdell v. Dale, 7 Term R. 312, Lord Kenyon questions the authority of Rich v. Coe, as establishing the principle upon too broad a basis. Abb. Shipp. 153. A shipwright who has taken a ship in possession to repair it, may retain that possession until he is paid, but if he parts with the possession, he abandons also his lien upon the ship itself. So it is with a tradesman furnishing supplies. Id. The master may hypothecate for supplies and repairs abroad; but if the ship is within port, infra corpus comitatus, they are not a lien or charge on the ship. Hoare v. Clement, 2 Show. 338; Abb. Shipp. 154. In Watkinson v. Bernadiston, the law is clearly laid down: "That if a ship be in the river Thames, and money is expended there, either in the repairing, fitting out, new rigging, or apparel of the ship, this is no charge upon the ship, but the person thus employed, or who finds these necessaries, must resort to the owner thereof for payment, and in such a case, in a suit in the court of admiralty to condemn a ship for the non-payment of the money, the courts of law will grant a prohibition." 2 P. Wms. case 107, p. 367. The law contained in this decree was considered to be so well established, that the reporter observes: "It was decreed by the master of the rolls, and seemed to be admitted by the counsel on both sides." See, also, Buxton v. Snee, 2 Ves. Jr. 521, in notes. The Scotch Case, Abb. Shipp. 159, and Ex parte Shank, 1 Atk. 234.

The doctrine of these cases does not appear to have been shaken by any of the later decisions in the admiralty of England. The case of The John, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 288, was an application by material men against the proceeds remaining in the registry. In this case Sir Wm. Scott observes: "I find, that it has continued to be the practice of this court to allow material men to sue against remaining proceeds in the registry, notwithstanding that prohibitions have been obtained on original suits instituted by them." This is a proceeding of material men, by original suit, against the Levi Dearborn, and if instituted in the admiralty of England would be a ground for prohibition, according to the admission of Sir William Scott and the authority of all the cases, with the exception of Rich v. Coe. In The Favourite, 2 C. Rob. Adm. (Am. Ed.) 232, it was said by Dr. Swabey, that material men, by the indulgence of the court, may be allowed to be paid out of proceeds in the hands of the court, although they would not be allowed to proceed originally against the ship. Sir Wm. Scott admits this to be true, where there remained an "undisputed surplus, after payment of the debt, which was the original cause of action," and no person objecting. (For the meaning of "material men," see the note a in the same page.) There has been no decision on the subject by the supreme court of the United States. There are two, however, one in the district court of Maryland, and the other in the district court of Pennsylvania, which are relied upon by the opposite counsel, as supporting the claim to jurisdiction. In the former it was decided by Judge Winchester that a shipwright has a lien on the ship for repairs in a port of the United States (Stevens v. The Sandwich [Case No. 13,409] note), and it is contended that a similar opinion is expressed in the latter, by Justice Peters (Gardner v. The New Jersey [Id. 5,233]). Anything that emanates from so great a man as was Judge Winchester, must carry with it a great weight of respect and authority, but the principles of this decision are founded upon the doctrines of the civil law, which cannot be received in our country; and it must also be remarked that Zouch, upon whose authority the learned judge principally relies, does not state correctly the practice of the English courts, which he brings in to the aid of the civil law opinions. Be this, however, as it may, we have only the isolated opinion of Judge Winchester in opposition to the whole current of English adjudications, and what the whole profession have been in the habit of considering the settled and established law and practice of this country. An opinion directly opposite to that of Judge Winchester is expressed in the case of Shrewsbury v. The Two Friends [Id. 12,819] (admiralty court of South Carolina), in which all the leading British decisions are cited, and commented on by the learned judge with considerable ability. It results, I think, from a view of all the cases, and the reasoning in support of them, that this court has no jurisdiction.

Second point. But if the court should be of a different opinion, then we contend that the peculiar circumstances and facts of this case will exempt the ship from any liability. The lien attempted to be imposed must be predicated upon the idea of there being an owner and a master: for the treble security is against the owner, the master, and the ship. Now we say that at the time these repairs were made and supplies furnished, there was not, legally and technically speaking, either owner or master. This will appear from a short history of the case, as it was presented to the court on a former occasion. This ship was formerly called the Little Sally, owned by British subjects, and condemned in the admiralty for an infraction of the non-intercourse law. At the sale, pursuant to the decree of condemnation, she was knocked off to a Mr. C. H. Fisher, who previous to the obtainment of a title from the marshal transferred his right to the purchase, to a Mr. A. W. Scribner, who was put in possession of the ship, and appointed Lightbourne as master, in contemplation of an intended voyage. During the period of this possession by Scribner, the repairs and supplies, the subject of the present litigation, were made and furnished, upon the contract of Scribner, or the master Lightbourne. Only a small part of the sum which Scribner had agreed to pay Fisher for his purchase, was actually paid, and he had no other title than the memorandum of an agreement between him and Fisher, and the possession which he had obtained. The balance being demanded by the custom-house, and no further payment having been made by Scribner, the marshal again took possession, and advertized a second sale. In the meantime, the present claimant, Mr. John H. Dearborn, agreed to pay into the custom-house, the amount of the sum for which Scribner had purchased the ship of Fisher. This proposal was acceded to by the marshal and the custom-house,—a bill of sale was given by the marshal to Mr. Dearborn, and a register by the collector, under the new name of "The Levi Dearborn." The register is dated on the 16th of June. From the day of sale then to the obtainment of the register, the ship was in custodia legis, it was vested in the United States, not as owners technically considered, but for the purposes of sale. The United States cannot be owners, nor, can the marshal, or officers of the customs be considered as owners, the latter by the express inhibition of the act of congress. Nor, to use the language of the civil law, could there be even a quasi ownership in the officers of the customs, because it would result from that doctrine, that the officers of the customs could give a bill of sale. Such a power would be inseparable from the character of ownership.

It is absurd to contend, that there could be an ownership without the power to transfer. Now the marshal only could give a bill of sale. If neither the government, or any officer representing it, can be considered as owners, or owner, there could be no master, and consequently no person whose contract could impose a specific liability on the ship for repairs and supplies. It must be admitted that all repairs are made, or supplies and necessaries furnished at the request of the owners, or master, and that the master derives his authority from the owners. Hence the law imposes a liability upon both. For what purpose is the master appointed? Why, to command a ship in the prosecution of a voyage. His functions have an extensive relation to the operations of a ship in the course of a voyage: all his contracts must bear upon that point. Now, if there were no owners, no master could be properly appointed where contracts can fix a lien upon this ship, because these contracts cannot be considered as furnishing the means for the employment of the ship in a voyage; and if the ship was in the hands of the officer of the government, they could not be considered as furnishing the means for the active employment of the ship, because the ship could not be employed by the government, or its officer. The liability of the ship (if she is liable at all) arises from the contract of the owner or the master. The corollary is, that there being in this case neither owner nor master at the time of the repairs and supplies, there is no foundation for this admiralty proceeding.

On the — day of June a bill of sale was given to J. H. Dearborn, the claimant, and his complete title is established by the exhibition of the register. He has paid all the expenses, which the collector admits to be due by the ship, antecedent to this transfer. The question then is, is this property, thus guaranteed to him under the faith of the United States, to be taken fettered with the burthens and contracts, imposed upon it by persons claiming an ownership, in direct opposition to a judgment of this court; or by the person acting as master by virtue of an appointment derived from the pretended owner? Did the government, the marshal, or the collector, previous to the sale to the claimant, recognize Mr. Scribner, as the owner, or — Lightbourne as his master? Mr. —, the officer, representing the government, contended, that this court decided on a former occasion, that the claim of Scribner was totally unfounded, and that the ship antecedent to the sale to Mr. Dearborn, was never out of the legal custody and possession of the marshal. Upon what ground of law, reason, or justice, then, can this ship in the possession of the present owner be made liable for antecedent repairs? By parity of reasoning, she could be charged specifically, for repairs and supplies in England, or any other contract previous to her condemnation, which operates as a lien. It results, that the remedy which these libellants have is confined to the persons who contracted with them, and that the ship is discharged.

Mr. Noel, for libellants.

Mr. Charlton, for claimants.

STEPHENS, District Judge. This ship is libelled for sundry articles, work done and for a claim of wages due several seamen; to avoid a multiplicity of suits several claims are consolidated so as to bring the demands of all or either before the court, against the jurisdiction of which a plea is interposed in the claims of J. H. Dearborn. It was necessary to have a full knowledge of this case, not only to hear argument as to the jurisdiction, but to have authenticated and proven the demands of such of the libellants as were principally before the court, and from which investigation the following facts appear. The ship Levi Dearborn was formerly called the Little Sally, a ship owned by British subjects, libelled by the United States for violating the non-intercourse law, and condemned as forfeited to the United States, in form, and decreed by this court to be sold: which was carried into effect. It appeared that Mr. A. W. Scribner was the first purchaser of this vessel, and had permission from the collector to proceed to lade her, but it also appeared that Scribner failed to comply with his contract, whereby the marshal re-advertised the ship, upon which some compromise took place between the parties interested, and John H. Dearborn became the purchaser, received the marshal's title and on the 19th of June last received a register for the said ship from the custom-house in Savannah. From the time Mr. Scribner undertook to be the owner of this ship he employs Captain W. Lightbourne as master, and proceeds to prepare the vessel for sea, under the name of the Franklin. An account is opened with Woodruff and Brant for ship's articles as appears by the exhibit, as also supplies of cordage by Fountain, and work and labour by Hewit, a shipwright. All these accounts were opened by express direction of Scribner, and they are admitted to be just by Lightbourne, the captain. It is also in evidence that at the time John H. Dearborn purchased this vessel he was apprised of some demands against her by the collector, which were satisfied, and hence became a fair bona fide purchaser. So far as the above relates to the libellants mentioned, it appears to be the summary of their case. The demands of seamen will form another subject of enquiry to see if they can proceed for their dues in this way.

The variety of authorities adduced to support the libel, and those opposed to it, it should seem have compressed all the reading on the subject, and which has been illustrated with great ability by the gentlemen on both sides; indeed, so much so as to leave very little research for the judge on a question of real importance taken in every point of view. It is to be understood that this court is of special jurisdiction and its exercise can only extend to maritime cases. All the transactions between these libellants were, with Scribner, the actual and reputed owner living in Savannah, the ship was on no voyage that caused the injury to repair her, or for the supplies to aid her, so as to create any lien on the vessel whatever: the whole was a contract within the body of the county, a part of a sovereign state, whose constitution and laws afford daily an opportunity to seek redress in the very many tribunals of justice in this city. Now as I cannot see this case to be of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction so as to work a lien on a ship lying in the river, because labour was bestowed and supplies furnished the person who exercised an ownership, and at his instance, I cannot sustain the libel and subject a vessel in the possession of a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, to claims which he never could have supposed to have attached to the ship.

The various opinions that have been afloat on the points before me, seem now to be very well understood and the reading and result well digested in the case before Judge Bee, of Shrewsbury v. The Two Friends [Case No. 12,819], in Charleston, a case very similar to the present, and therefore the redress to the libellants must be at common law. The libel is dismissed, each party paying his own costs. As to the seamen, I find there are no ship articles or agreement signed by them, but they were daily labourers. They must be referred also to those who employed them, as divers others, who exhibited demands for various supplies to this ship.

[The decree was affirmed by the circuit court on appeal. Case No. 17,988.]

Case No. 17,988.

WOODRUFF et al. v. The LEVI DEARBORNE.

[4 Hall, Law J. 97.]

Circuit Court, D. Georgia. Dec. Term, 1811.

ADMIRALTY LAW — MARITIME LIENS — REPAIRS — HOME AND FOREIGN PORTS.

[1. The admiralty law cognizable in the federal courts is not the civil law of the Roman government, but the admiralty law of Great Britain.]

[2. There is a maritime lien for material and labor furnished in repairing a vessel in a foreign port. The ports of the different states are foreign to each other within the meaning of the admiralty law in relation to liens.]

¹ [Affirming Case No. 17,987.]

[Cited in Jane v. The President, Case No. 18,201; The Jerusalem, Id. 7,294; Leland v. The Medora, Id. 8,237; Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 637.]

[3. Where a British ship was adjudged forfeited to the United States and was ordered sold by the marshal, but the purchaser failed to comply with his contract so that a subsequent sale was necessary, held that the vessel was subject to a maritime lien in the hands of the last purchaser for materials and labor expended in making repairs between the dates of the two sales.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Georgia.]

[This was a libel by Woodruff & Brant and others against the ship Levi Dearborne to enforce an alleged lien for repairs. From a decree of the district court dismissing the libel (Case No. 17,987), the present appeal was taken.]

The libel charges, that the ship is answerable specifically for materials furnished and work done, in refitting her, between the ninth of May and the seventh of June, 1811. That the ship Levi Dearborne, formerly the Little Sally, a British bottom, was forfeited to the United States, and a sale decreed to be made, on the eighteenth of April, 1811. That she remained unsold. That the materials and work were furnished by request of the master. The claim states that the ship was forfeited, for a violation of the non-intercourse laws, and sold on the 18th of April, 1811. That the terms of sale not being complied with, she was resold on the 18th of June last; when the claimant (Dearborne) became the purchaser, and received from the marshal a bill of sale, dated April 18th. That he purchased on the faith of the government and its officers, without being notified of the supplies and repairs alleged in the libel. That Captain L. did not take charge of the ship, by authority from the claimant, nor was he authorized by the claimant to direct the supplies and repairs, but received his authority from Scribner, who was in possession.

Mr. Noel, for the libellant.

It is alleged in the libel and proved by the testimony, that when the materials and repairs were furnished, there was no responsibility to the libellants, except that of the ship. There was no actual ownership or existing operative title. The right acquired by the government, by seizure and condemnation, before sale, was imperfect. Scribner was in possession for a short time, but without title; he had not paid the purchase money. The actors in this suit did not know, or treat with Scribner, as the owner. They furnished the materials and work on the sole credit of the ship. The claim admits that Scribner was not the owner, and it is not proved that Scribner had assumed payment. Captain Lightbourne did not call for the repairs and materials, on the credit of any other person, but as master of the ship.

2d. The appellants have a specific remedy against the ship, admitting the statement of facts made by the respondent. The district court has jurisdiction, as an instance court of admiralty, to make the ship liable for repairs and materials. This jurisdiction is derived from the civil law. In maritime cases the courts of the United States are governed (except in questions of prize) by principles of the civil law, or by positive statutes. Every man who has repaired or fitted out a ship, or lent money to be employed in those services, has by the civil law, a lien on the ship. Abb. Shipp. p. 151; Domat, Civil Law, B.

3d. It may be said that the maritime law is a part of the common law of Great Britain, and that the common law is the law of the United States, where not superseded by positive statutes. The correctness of these positions shall be considered, after having taken notice of the British adjudications, upon this subject.

There is no rule of the common law, which makes property subject to specific liability, or creates a lien by implication, as a security for the performance of a contract or payment of debt. This is a remedy peculiar to the civil law. The exercise of it by the courts of admiralty early became a source of jealousy, and produced the statutes 13th and 15th Richard II. Yet we find that even the courts of common law disregarded the restrictions intended by those statutes, for several centuries after they were enacted. It has uniformly since been held, that suit may be maintained in the admiralty for seamen's wages, though the agreement was made on land. Rolle, Abr. 533, 2 Bac. Abr. 181. In Hilary term, 8 Car. II., it was resolved by all the judges, that if suit be in the admiralty for building, amending, saving or necessary victualling of a ship, against the ship herself, no prohibition shall be granted, though this be done within the realm. Cro. Car. p. 296. The first case opposed to that decision is Watkinson v. Bernadiston, 2 P. Wms. 367, afterwards Buxton v. Snee, 1 Ves. Sr. 154. Notwithstanding these cases, we find Lord Mansfield declaring, in unqualified terms, that whoever supplies a ship with necessaries has a treble security: (1) The master; (2) the ship; (3) the owner. His lordship adds: "Suppose the owner in this case, had delivered the value of the goods in specie, to the master, with order to pay it over to the creditors, and the master had embezzled the money, it would have been no concern of the creditors, for they trust specifically to the ship, and generally to the owners." Cowp. 639; Rich v. Coe. Mr. Abbot has mentioned the decision by Lord Mansfield, in Wilkins v. Carmichael, 1 Doug. 101, as somewhat repugnant to the former. His lordship there is made to say, that "work done for a ship in England is supposed to be on the personal credit of the employer," the amount of which is, that work done where the owner is present shall be considered prima facie as done on his credit. From this review of the adjudged cases in England, it must be inferred, that the doctrine by which a lien upon the ship has been restrained to a foreign ownership is not so clearly settled, as stated by Abbot. Judge Winchester has remarked in Stevens v. The Sandwich [Case No. 13,409], that "the reports of decisions in that country, are perfectly irreconcilable. That no principle can be extracted from the adjudged cases in England, which will explain or support the admiralty jurisdiction, independent of the statutes, or the works of jurists who have written on the general subject."

But, however well settled the doctrine may be in the British courts, it cannot operate here, in repugnance to a principle of maritime law. From what source do we derive those principles? They do not take effect here, as a part of the common law of England. The state governments adopted the common law as to all cases to which it is adapted. But this is not the medium through which the maritime code has obtained operation in the United States. The courts of the United States are tribunals of special jurisdiction. Their powers are derived, exclusively, from the constitution and laws of the United States. Const. art. 3, § 2: "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties." Various classes of cases are specified. Among these are "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and controversies between citizens of different states, and between citizens and foreigners."

As to real and personal remedies, no principles of decision are designated by the constitution—they were left to be prescribed by the legislature. The legislature has not prescribed. The lex loci has therefore necessarily been resorted to by the courts, and in most cases which have arisen, the common law has prevailed, not as the law of the nation, but as the law of the place—not of the state where the court sits, but as the law of the place where the cause of action may have arisen, in whatever clime, or under whatever government. Respecting maritime cases, principles of decision were recognized and adopted by the letter of the constitution. The terms there used are "cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." These terms relate to a jurisdiction, peculiar in its operation, and in the principles by which it adjudicates. They essentially appropriate to that jurisdiction, those peculiar principles which characterize "admiralty and maritime cases," and by which alone they must be decided. Hence, if congress should by law enact, that a cause of action arising on the high seas, shall be cognizable by courts proceeding according to the course of the common law, would not such provision, by destroying the principle of decision, break down a jurisdiction created by the constitution? We infer, that the maritime code is the law by which the right of the libellants is to be decided. That this system operates, not as it does in England, as a set of customs, forming a part of the lex non scripta, but as a separate and distinct code.

Mr. Harris, for claimant, commenced his argument, and was stopped by the court.

JOHNSON, Circuit Justice. It must be conceded, that the question made in this cause, is one hitherto unsettled in the courts of the United States. The argument in support of this libel, has proceeded on the ground, that the admiralty law of the United States, is the civil law of the Roman government; but the civil law has undergone many changes and modifications, which we are not bound to trace. The admiralty law of Great Britain is the admiralty law here. The lien on vessels for material-men and ship-wrights, exists only in a foreign port. Where the owner is present and resident, the common law principle must govern. In such case, no lien on the vessel is created. In the case of an owner, who, though present, when the work and materials are furnished, is transient and non-resident, I am disposed to think otherwise, and that in such case, the lien attaches. It is proper also to state, what shall be deemed a foreign, and what a domestic port, as to this question: The seaports of the different states ought, in this respect, to be considered as foreign ports, in relation to each other. Charleston, for instance, is a foreign port, as to a claim of this nature, made in Savannah. In the present case, the ship must be considered as having become a domestic ship from the time of the marshal's sale. The decree of the district court is therefore affirmed.

WOODRUFF (McDONALD v.). See Case No. 8,770.

WOODRUFF (NELSON v.). See Case No. 10,117.

WOODRUFF (SARGENT MANUF'G CO. v.). See Case No. 12,368.

WOODRUFF (SPAFFORD v.). See Case No. 13,198.

WOODRUFF (TIERNAN v.). See Cases Nos. 14,027 and 14,028.

WOODRUFF (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,758.

Case No. 17,989.

Ex parte WOODRUFF and COBB.

[3 App. Com'rs Pat. 262.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Jan. 12, 1860.

PATENTS — PRIORITY OF INVENTION — EFFECT OF CAVEAT.

[1. When a caveat is not general enough in its terms to cover a principle or a class, but is precise and definite in every detail of an agreement and combination of parts, which are severally familiar, and the patentability of the invention depends on the particular combination alone, the caveator cannot, after applying for a patent not varying in any respect from the caveat, claim that the caveat protected anything more.]

[2. A caveat will protect only one of several distinct patentable subjects falling within its general scope, though in connection with other circumstances it may furnish strong proof of his claim to priority in another invention in the same line.]

MERRICK, Circuit Judge. The appeal in this cause is from a decision of the commissioner of patents awarding priority of invention to Zenos Cobb, patentee, over T. T. Woodruff, applicant for an improvement in convertible seats or couches for railroad cars. The only point presented by the reasons of appeal and the commissioner's response to those reasons is the question of priority of invention. Whether in the present state of the mechanic arts, in view of numerous contrivances for reclining seats and convertible couches as used in railroad cars or elsewhere, there be any patentable novelty in the devices now under consideration, I have not been directly called upon to determine, and therefore I prefer to pass over that question, which seems to have been conceded to the parties by the office, inasmuch as the conclusions I have reached upon the question of novelty will probably occasion a contest before the courts, when this enquiry can be more satisfactorily made than upon the record as now made up before me.

To prove the date of his invention, Woodruff relies upon a caveat filed by him in the office in the month of February, 1857, reversed in 1857, renewed in 1858, as containing the devices in question, and also upon the testimony of two witnesses. Cobb stands entirely upon the date of his application dated June 8th, 1858. The precise device caveated by Woodruff in 1858, was patented to him May 31st, 1859, in the very words of the caveat, and, if his present invention is so embraced by the caveat, it would seem to follow that the patent, being in the same words as the caveat, must necessarily cover and protect his present claim, and that it is therefore not the subject of a separate patent. To avoid this consequence, the applicant contends that a larger interpretation is to be given to a caveat than to a patent, in order to cover a party's claim to priority of invention if he subsequently matures anything patentable to which the caveat may be construed to apply. With whatever force such argument might operate where a caveat is in general terms, describing an object imperfectly contemplated and not yet reduced to precise shape, yet when the caveat is not general in its terms, so as to cover a principle or a class, but is precise, definite, and minute in all the detail of arrangement and combination of parts which severally are familiar, and for the accomplishment of a principle of no special novelty, and standing on the particular combination alone for its patentability, the office has no suggestion from the caveat of anything beyond what is described in it, and when the party follows up that caveat by a patent, without any variation therefrom, he himself would seem to be estopped from saying that the caveat protected anything more. Unless it should be held that one caveat may cover two or three or an indefinite number of distinct inventions, which I am not aware has ever been asserted successfully.

I presume the most that could be said for a caveat is that it will directly protect only one of several distinct patentable subjects falling within its general scope at the election of the party inventing them, although indeed, connected with other circumstances, it may furnish strong adminicular proof in favor of his claim to priority from the other over another invention in the same line. This leads me to consider the position taken by the office, that the caveat is proof that the party had invented nothing else than what he has described in his caveat. Standing by itself, of course, the caveat furnishes, as I have already intimated, no proof in favor of the caveator upon his other concurrent invention, but when that other invention is so very close to the first as to occasion a doubt whether it might not be considered as one of the several modes in which the inventor contemplated the application of the principle by which his machine may be distinguished from other inventions, this very small additional proof will be potential in determining the contemporaneous date of his second invention. In the present case I find in the testimony of the witnesses, considering the very close resemblance between the pending application and that described in the caveat, enough to satisfy my mind that Woodruff had developed fully in his own mind the invention covered by his present application as early as December, 1856, and that he fully described it to others in such manner that any one skilled in the business could from that description construct the device in question long before the invention of Cobb, and that he set about embodying that description in a working model certainly nearly as early as February, 1858, and that all the essential parts were completed before Cobb's, and the whole perfected, with reasonable diligence by the month of October, 1858, which perfecting with reasonable diligence being by relation carried back to the commencement of the model, if not to the very date of the proclamation of the matured idea, is sufficient to show that by many months Cobb was anticipated. I refer particularly to the answer of the witness Dykeman to 24th, 25th, and 26th interrogatories in chief, 9th and 10th cross and 28th direct, and the answer of George J. Woodruff to 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th interrogatories in chief. The suspicions to which this testimony would be obnoxious, standing alone, is relieved by the conclusive proof furnished by the caveat, and the two prior patents of Woodruff, of December 21st, 1856, that he already occupied a large space in this particular field of invention, and that he for this reason is not to be distrusted as a pirate of other people's ideas.

Now, for the reasons aforesaid, I hereby certify to the Hon. William D. Bishop, commissioner of patents, that having assigned the 15th of December for hearing said appeal, and having, at the request of both parties, postponed the hearing until the 6th of January, they were both present and argued the case by oral and written arguments, and having fully considered the premises, I am of opinion that there is error in the decision of the office in awarding priority of invention to Zenos Cobb, and said judgment is hereby reversed, and priority of invention is hereby adjudged in favor of T. T. Woodruff, and a patent is directed to be issued to said Woodruff as prayed.

WOODRUFF COUNTY (CULVER v.). See Case No. 3,469.

WOODRUFF, The F. See Case No. 6,763.

WOODRUFF, The J. W. See Case No. 5,770.

Case No. 17,990.

In re WOODS.

[7 N. B. R. 126; 29 Leg. Int. 236; 20 Pittsb. Leg. J. 21.]¹

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. 1873.

ACTS OF BANKRUPTCY—NEGOTIABLE PAPER—SUSPENSION OF PAYMENT—PROCUREMENT OF JUDGMENT.

1. The owner of oil lands, who divides it into leaseholds and receives the rent in oil, is not a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], inasmuch as he deals only in the products of his land. Hence, he does not commit an act of bankruptcy by any suspension of payment of his negotiable paper for a period of fourteen days, however multiplied the transactions of his business through the leases, and however extended his credits.

[Cited in Gardner v. Cook, Case No. 5,226.]

2. Although the assets of a debtor may be rightly estimated at four times the amount of his debts, yet he is insolvent if unable to meet his engagements as they accrue and become due.

3. The procuring or suffering a judgment to be obtained against him by a debtor, without giving any warrant of attorney, is not in itself an act of bankruptcy; yet, if he directly or indirectly assists or facilitates the obtaining of judgment on which an execution has followed, this may be evidence in support of an allegation that he has committed an act of bankruptcy by procuring or suffering his property to be taken in execution.

G. H. Vanzant and J. M. Moyer, for creditors.

L. R. Fletcher, G. W. Wollaston, G. S. Selden, and Mr. Woods, for debtor.

¹ [Reprinted from 7 N. B. R. 126, by permission. 20 Pittsb. Leg. J. 21, contains only a partial report.]

CADWALADER, District Judge (charging jury). We are living in an extraordinary age, and there has not often occurred a more striking example of the good or evil spirit of the age than this case. Here is a gentleman who seems to be unable to pay his creditors their dues, but who was in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-nine in such a condition that he paid an income tax on one hundred and sixteen thousand dollars. In less than two years we find his note for the small amount of one thousand four hundred dollars discounted for his own accommodation at two per cent. a month; and we find all his corporeal moveable effects at the place where he resides, sold by the sheriff for less than one thousand three hundred dollars. If he has committed an act of bankruptcy, there perhaps never was a case requiring more urgently the application of the salutary principles of the bankrupt law. The most salutary tendency of this law is to prevent overtrading. In this respect its operation will be gradual, but must be highly beneficial. When relations and friends of a debtor, and when capitalists who, without affection or friendship, would make profit from his embarrassments, learn that they cannot be secured a preference out of the wreck of his affairs, they will not furnish him the means of overtrading. So long as he could, by securing advances and accommodations, obtain them, the temptation to attempt to retrieve his losses, by doubling his investments, was, before the enactment of the bankrupt law, irresistible; and the system of business was that of mere gambling adventure. But when a debtor who suffers losses knows that he cannot prefer his relations and friends, and when capitalists know that they cannot, without risk, assist him to the injury of other creditors, he will stop his business in season to give a fair dividend to all his creditors, and thus make a fair settlement with them in the court of bankruptcy, or much oftener out of it. Thus, in the course of time, few judicial bankruptcies will occur. If this gentleman has been assailed by misfortune, or has suffered disappointment without any fault of his own, and if he rightly estimates the ultimate value of his assets at four times the amount of his debts, he nevertheless admits his inability to meet his engagements as they accrued and became due. He was therefore insolvent, within the meaning of the bankrupt law. It is true, as his counsel urge, that he was under no obligation to file a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. But if he has committed an act of bankruptcy he is liable to be made a bankrupt involuntarily, and it is, in that case, the right of his creditors that his estate should be administered in the court of bankruptcy. Either the bankrupt law should not exist, or it should be thus applied. Otherwise creditors may starve while their debtor is building castles in the air. This, and other general suggestions which I have made, may or may not be material to the decision of this case. It is for you, as men of business, to determine their materiality or immateriality.

One of the alleged acts of bankruptcy is, that this debtor has, within the meaning of the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt law of second of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, as amended by the act of congress of fourteenth of July, eighteen hundred and seventy, "suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days." It is admitted that he suspended payment of his negotiable paper, and that it remained unpaid more than fourteen days before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. But the laws on the subject have not made this an act of bankruptcy unless he was "a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner;" and the question discussed by counsel has been, whether he was a trader within the meaning of these laws. On this point, considering the magnitude, multiplicity, and commercial semblance of his transactions, I have had great difficulty; and, if I have mistaken the law, I hope that my opinion will be carefully revised hereafter. My first impression was, that he was a trader, or that there was evidence from which you might find him to have been one. He had divided fifty acres of oil land into fifty or more separate leaseholds, with fixtures put up by the lessees, and from these leases received at one time an immense income, through the factorage or agency of his son, who collected in oil, or in cash, one-half of the gross avails, and was, nevertheless, largely in advance to the father. My first impression, I say, was that a person who, in the course of such dealings, obtained a credit upon negotiable paper, whether discounted for his use or not, was, in respect of such paper, a trader, though the only source and subject of his dealings might be the products of his land in their crude state. But, on further consideration (reserving the question for my own revision or that of others) I instruct you that he was not a trader. I think that the word "trader" is to be interpreted according to its meaning in the English bankrupt law. When the interpretation of the word was, in this respect, established, lands were not liable in England to be sold for their owner's debts, and the products of land were not considered subjects of trade. Nor did the intervention of a factor, and the commercial disposal of the products by him, and the accommodations which he may have extended as a banker, make his principal a trader. On this question your verdict will therefore be for the alleged bankrupt.

The other alleged act of bankruptcy is, that he has procured or suffered his property to be taken in execution with a view to prefer one or both of the creditors who sued him during his visit to Pittsburgh. The proceedings in the suits at Pittsburgh were, in form, adversary. If they were wholly so in fact, and were neither directly nor indirectly promoted wilfully by him, or facilitated by him, with a view to an execution being issued, there was no act of bankruptcy. The only question to be considered is, whether he procured his property to be taken in execution. Here a point of law is pressed earnestly by his counsel. The creditors allege the act of bankruptcy to have consisted in procuring the executions to be levied. The point of law is founded upon an argument that the proof tends only to show that he procured the judgments to be obtained. It is objected that this is not an act of bankruptcy, and if it were one, is not the act of bankruptcy alleged. The act of congress does not make it, in itself, an act of bankruptcy for a debtor to procure a judgment to be obtained against him; but makes it an act of bankruptcy to procure his property to be taken in execution. This explains the form of the question. The answer to the objection is, that an execution is the legal purpose of a judgment, its end and fruit, as the old law books say. We can judge of men's motives and intentions only from the tendency of their acts. We cannot dive, say the books, into the secret recesses of men's hearts. But we may rationally believe that a man designs to do that to which his acts tend. Every ordinary person knows that a judgment is regularly followed by an execution; in other words, that the tendency of procuring the judgment is that the execution shall follow. If a man is tried for murder, the indictment may charge that he fired a loaded pistol at the person killed, and may not aver that the defendant was the person who loaded it. The latter averment cannot be necessary. But although there may be no direct proof that the defendant fired the pistol, yet if it was fired with fatal effect the evidence that he fired it may be circumstantial. In such a case, proof that he loaded it would not be immaterial to the question whether he fired it, and might, under some circumstances, be very material. I do not see much difference, between the tendency of the judgment to produce an execution, and that of loading the pistol to produce a shot from it, except that in the former case there can be no doubt who is the intended sufferer. The objection, as a mere point of law, is thus explained and answered. But I will not state it as an absolute legal inference, that a man who procures a judgment to be obtained against himself intends that an execution shall follow. I will leave it to you, whether, in fact, this debtor, directly or indirectly, brought about or facilitated the obtaining of the judgments at Pittsburgh, with a view to their being levied by execution at Philadelphia, and with a view to preferring these two judgment creditors, or either of them.

On such a question creditors can ordinarily prove such facts only as, if unexplained, fairly authorise a reasonable inference of the procurement and of its purpose. If such facts are proved, and the debtor, having the means of giving explanation, does not give it, the inference against him may sometimes be strengthened from the omission. If the legal proceedings appear to have resulted in anywise from arrangement between debtor and creditor who are near relatives, and the same lawyers appear to have been acting for both parties, a very full explanation from the parties who alone know the details of the transaction, has, in the course of proceedings under the bankrupt law in other cases, been thought necessary in order to rebut the inference of procurement. If the debtor goes to the creditor's lawyer, or the creditor goes to the debtor's lawyer, it is not easy to say of which of them he was counsel or attorney. Where he appears to have acted for both parties, or to have officiated between them without any distinct relation to either of them, this, if unexplained, may be evidence that the judgment was brought about by an understanding, and by the permission and connivance of the debtor. The debtor does not ordinarily go to the office of the creditor's attorney and allow service to be made on him there unless he means to promote the proceeding. These are matters for your consideration. There were two creditors, one a friend who had been for a long time very indulgent to him, the other a son. Pittsburgh was not the place of the debtor's residence, and not a place where he would, under ordinary motives, wish to be sued or would facilitate a suit against him, unless for some special purpose. It seems from the statement of his brother, who was counsel on this trial, which was received by consent as testimony, that a judgment by default can be obtained at Pittsburgh sooner than at Philadelphia, where this debtor resides, and in an easier manner. You will consider what counsel on both sides have said as to parties and certain of their companions finding their way concurrently from different places to Pittsburgh, while he was there, three hundred miles from home. I think it perhaps more important to consider what occurred there. The debtor and his son met at the law office of the debtor's brother; an account between the son and the father is there speedily adjusted, and is filed of record in the suit in which a judgment for the balance is speedily obtained. The processes were served, one in the office, and the other in the street in front of the office of the brothers, who were the lawyers. Well, gentlemen, it is for you, and not for me, to say whether all this requires explanation, and whether it has been satisfactorily explained. If you think, upon the facts, that explanation was necessary, I then say, that in law there is sufficient evidence to authorize you to think so, and to require such explanation as to satisfy you that there was no facilitation of the proceedings by the debtor amounting to the procurement alleged; that there was no facilitation intended and effected by him. If so, how are the facts explained, if explained at all? The son has not been examined as a witness. Now it is not for me to say which party ought to have produced him as a witness. The burden of proof was upon the creditors. If they have not succeeded without his testimony in establishing a case requiring explanation, they have no right to object that he has not been examined. But if they have made out such a case, it may be proper for you to consider whether he was not the proper person from whom to expect, in great part, the explanation required. You may desire to know what induced him to go back from Pittsburgh for his books of account and bring them to Pittsburgh, where the account was settled; who told him to go for them, and why he did it. The debtor himself does not supply the omission. He appears to be a pretty candid person, but careless in his recollection. In the short time of seven months he had forgotten an interview with his son at the Monongahela House, and would not now have recollected having seen the son there if he had not been reminded of it by being shown his former deposition. He does not profess to recollect all that occurred. On the whole, if explanation was reasonably requireable, has it been satisfactorily made?

There is only one question which you can find against the bankrupt. It is whether he procured or suffered his property to be taken in execution, that is to say, wilfully facilitated it, either directly or indirectly. The other facts are not material except as evidence of the alleged procurement.

The judge then read ten written points upon which he had been requested by the counsel of the alleged bankrupt to charge the jury, and answer each of them in succession. The answers were in writing. The substance of them is in the above note of the previous charge.

The jury found for the petitioning creditors on the question whether the alleged bankrupt had procured his property to be taken in execution; and on the other questions found in his favor.

Case No. 17,991.

WOODS et al. v. BUCKEWELL et al.

[2 Dill. 38; 7 N. B. R. 405; 6 Alb. Law J. 291.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. 1872.

ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY—APPOINTMENT BY DISTRICT COURT—REVIEW.

1. The district court has large discretionary powers in matters of bankruptcy, and the circuit court will not interfere with the exercise of such powers, and set aside the appointment by the district court of an assignee, in a case where it is only claimed that the district court erred in holding that no election had been made by the creditors, there being no allegation against the fitness of the person appointed.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 6 Alb. Law J. 291, contains only a partial report.]

[Cited in Re Adler, Case No. 82.]

2. Nature of the jurisdiction conferred upon the circuit courts by the second section of the bankrupt act [of 1867; 14 Stat. 517], considered by Mr. Justice Miller.

Petition for review of appointment of assignee in bankruptcy. O'Fallon & Hatch were adjudged bankrupts in the United States district court for the Eastern district of Missouri, on the petition of Archie Woods et al., creditors of said bankrupts. The usual warrant in bankruptcy was issued and a meeting of the creditors called thereunder for the purpose of electing an assignee. At that meeting there was a close contest among the creditors as to the person to be elected assignee. The register reported to the district court that twelve votes, representing debts amounting to $39,192.78, were cast for Leonard Matthews as assignee, and eleven votes, representing $33,456.43, were cast for Henry Overstolz, the other candidate for the assigneeship, and certified that Leonard Matthews had been elected. Several other claims, however, had been withdrawn, rejected, or postponed, and questions arose concerning the action of the register or of the claimants themselves thereon. The facts relating to such claims were also reported by the register to the district court. Exceptions to the register's report were filed by Robert A. Buckewell and other creditors, and upon a hearing thereof the district court adjudged that no election of assignee had been made by the creditors, and appointed Robert K. Woods as assignee. [Case unreported.]

The petitioning creditors in the original bankruptcy proceeding brought the present petition in the circuit court against those creditors who excepted to Mr. Matthews' election, alleging that Mr. Matthews had been duly elected, and asking the circuit court to review and reverse the action of the district court, to annul the appointment of Mr. Woods, and to declare Mr. Matthews duly elected.

Hendershott & Chandler, for petitioners.
Basil Duke and Dryden & Dryden, for respondents.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. This is a petition for review of the proceedings at the election of the assignee of the bankrupt's estate. The election was a close one. There were twenty-three or twenty-four votes cast, and the register decided in favor of Leonard Matthews as the assignee, and against Henry Overstolz, the other candidate for the assigneeship. The proceedings at the meeting of creditors were brought to the attention of the district court, which held that there had been no election by the creditors, and appointed Robert K. Woods as assignee. It is not claimed in the petition that any objection exists against Mr. Woods, but the quarrel seems to be among the creditors themselves. This court is asked to examine the details of the election, to count the votes, and to go into the qualifications of the voters. Now, I do not consider that the bankrupt act contemplates the bringing of this class of cases before the circuit court for review. The second section of the act provides "that the several circuit courts of the United States, within and for the districts where the proceedings in bankruptcy shall be pending, shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under this act; and, except where special provision is otherwise made, may, upon bill, petition, or any other proper process, of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the case in a court of equity." To decide upon the legality of the votes or the qualifications of creditors involves no principle of equity, unless fraud in the election is alleged. The district courts are vested with large discretionary powers, in reference to the appointment and approval of assignees. Section 13 of the act contains the following provisions: "The creditors shall at the first meeting held after due notice from the messenger, in presence of a register designated by the court, choose one or more assignees of the estate of the debtor; the choice to be made by the greater part in value and in number of the creditors who have proved their debts. If no choice is made by the creditors at said meeting, the judge, or, if there be no opposing interest, the register, shall appoint one or more assignees. * * * All elections or appointments of assignees shall be subject to the approval of the judge; and when in his judgment it is for any cause needful or expedient, he may appoint additional assignees or order a new election." The discretionary power thus vested in the district court could scarcely be in stronger terms. Assignees and registers are but officers of the court and subject to its orders. The chief difficulty complained of concerning district judges (and in saying this I am not to be understood as referring to Judge Treat) in connection with the bankrupt law has been that they do not hold a strong enough hand over the officers of the court, and see that they are prompt and efficient in the discharge of their duties. Such being the case, I shall not be the first to interfere with the discretionary powers of the district court in regard to the appointment and control of its officers. The petition is dismissed.

Petition dismissed.

Case No. 17,992.WOODS v. FORSYTH.

[2 West. Jur. 348; 16 Pittsb. Leg. J. 234.]

Circuit Court, D. Missouri, Oct. Term, 1868.

BANKRUPT ACT—JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURT.

The circuit court has not jurisdiction of suits brought by the assignee of the bankrupt, simply to collect the assets assigned.

[Cited in Goodall v. Tuttle, Case No. 5,533; Smith v. Crawford, Id. 13,030.]

Suit by the assignee of Tesson & Co., bankers, to collect a debt due by the defendant to the bankrupts prior to the bankruptcy. Pleas: general issue and set off. Demurrer to special pleas.

Before TREAT and KREKEL, District Judges.

PER CURIAM. The circuit court has not concurrent original jurisdiction given it by the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] for the collection of the debts due the bankrupt, and the settlement of his estate. The concurrent jurisdiction conferred by the second section of the act is confined to cases in which there is a disputed title or claim to property; to suits in which some title or claim to the property or assets adverse to that of assignee is set up. As this court has no jurisdiction, the suit will be dismissed without passing upon the demurrers. Suit dismissed.

WOODS (HYDE v.). See Case No. 6,975.

Case No. 17,993.WOODS v. JACKSON IRON MANUF'G CO.[Holmes, 379.]¹

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May 1, 1874.

STATUTE—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION—CONVEYANCE OF STATE LANDS—RECORD.

1. The provisions of a statute, so far as they are inconsistent with those of a subsequent statute relating to the same subject-matter, are by implication, if not expressly, repealed by the later statute.

2. Under the resolve of the legislature of New Hampshire, approved June 22, 1831, conveyances of state lands by a land commissioner may be recorded in the office of the secretary of state at any time, and take effect only on being so recorded.

At law.

Gilman Marston, A. A. Strout, and R. D. Smith, for plaintiff.

M. W. Tappan, William Heywood, and Henry Heywood, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This is a real action, brought for the recovery of a tract of land containing eleven hundred acres, situate in Bartlett, in the county of Carroll, and state of New Hampshire. A stipulation is filed that the case shall be heard and tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, saving to either party the right of exceptions, writ of error, or appeal, according to law.

¹ [Reported by Jabez S. Holmes, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Both parties claim title under grant from the state of New Hampshire. It is admitted that the title was in the state of New Hampshire prior to July 2, 1835. The following act of the legislature of New Hampshire was approved June 25, 1830:

"An act providing for the recording of deeds of state lands in the office of the secretary of state.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives in general court convened, that all deeds of land belonging to the state, which may hereafter be executed and delivered, by any officer or agent of the state authorized to make such conveyance, shall be recorded in the records of the state by the secretary; and no deed of conveyance, or lease of any lands, or of title or claim to any lands, in this state, shall be of any force or effect for the conveyance of the same, or for the release of any title or claim of the state, unless the same shall have been recorded, as aforesaid, within one year from the date of the same."

The following resolve of the legislature was approved June 22, 1831 (chapter 51): "Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives in general court convened, that his excellency the governor, by and with advice and consent of the council, be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to appoint some suitable person or persons, not exceeding two, as land commissioners, who shall be sworn to the faithful performance of the duties of their trust, and to continue in office during the pleasure of the executive for the time being, whose duty it shall be to advertise and expose to sale such public lands as he or they may think proper, for the interest of the state; and, upon application made to any such commissioner by any person or persons for the purchase of any lands belonging to this state lying south of the forty-fifth degree of north latitude, to sell and convey to such person or persons any such lands for such consideration as to such commissioner or commissioners the interest of the state may seem to require; and to execute deeds thereof, which deeds, being first recorded in the office of the secretary of state, shall be effectual for conveying all the right and title of this state to such land, saving the right of jurisdiction: provided, that all the expenses of surveying and conveying any such lands shall be paid by the person or persons to whom such lands shall be conveyed; and said commissioner or commissioners shall receive from the amount of all sums of money arising from such sales, and which sums he or they shall pay to the treasurer of this state, the amount of six per cent. in full compensation for his or their services. And be it further resolved, that it shall be the duty of each and every such commissioner so appointed to deposit all moneys by him received for such lands with the treasurer of this state as soon as may be after receiving the same, and shall annually in the month of June make report to the governor of this state of all lands conveyed and sold by him aforesaid, including the quantity and value thereof, where the same lies, and such other information as he may deem expedient."

At a meeting of the governor and council on the first day of July, 1831, James Willey, of Conway, was appointed land commissioner, and he was duly commissioned and qualified. On the third day of July, 1835, in consideration of $300 paid by Daniel Eastman, of Conway, "James Willey, of Conway, in the county of Strafford, and state of New Hampshire, land commissioner, remised, released, and forever quitclaimed unto said Daniel Eastman, and his heirs and assigns forever, all the right, title, claim, and interest which said state now has in and unto the following described tract of public land, viz." (Here followed a description of the demanded premises by metes and bounds.) After the usual habendum clause, and a special covenant of warranty against "persons claiming by, from, or under me in my official capacity as land commissioner aforesaid," the deed concludes as follows: "In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this third day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five. James Willey (Seal), Land Commissioner."

The deed was duly witnessed and acknowledged. The consideration was paid by the grantee to Willey, and by him paid over to the state of New Hampshire. This deed was not recorded in the office of the secretary of state for New Hampshire until June 28, 1837, nearly two years from and after date of the same. It was recorded in the registry of deeds for Coos county on the eighth day of July, 1835.

By sundry mesne conveyances through Jeremiah Eastman to Trickey and Meserve, and from them to one Odiorne, and from him to the Jackson Iron Manufacturing Company, whatever title Daniel Eastman had in the premises passed to the defendant on the twenty-sixth day of June, 1837.

The demanded premises have been taxed in the town of Bartlett to the grantees in the deeds under Daniel Eastman from 1836 to the present time, and from 1844 to the present time to the Jackson Manufacturing Company; and the defendant proved the payment of these taxes.

The tract is a mountain; some portion of it on the south side, where cattle can pasture; the rest is wild-land. Meserve and Trickey took a bond of the land Oct. 5, 1835, from Daniel Eastman, made a partial survey, and ascertained that iron ore was on the tract, and took out about one hundred pounds of the ore, which they took to Franconia and had tested. They then took their deeds of Eastman, and in March, 1836, surveyed the tract with compass and chain, and erected monuments. In May, 1837, Dr. Jackson went on to the tract with Odiorne, one of the grantees, and explored it. In June, 1838, Meserve and Odiorne and others employed twelve men on the tract in uncovering another and different vein of the ore, and took out about a ton of the ore, which they sent to Dover to be tested. In 1842 Meserve and others went on to the tract with a Mr. Lang, of Boston, and Sanderson, of Sheffield, England. In the succeeding autumn they took out a ton of the ore, which was forwarded to Sheffield, England. In 1844 Mr. Parrott, of Boston, an engineer in the employment of the defendant corporation, surveyed a road leading through the woods up the side of the mountain about two miles, and extending about one hundred rods on to this tract, which road was built about that time. Mr. Meserve was the agent for the defendant corporation, and went on the tract every year after the conveyance to the Eastmans three or four times a year, sometimes oftener. In 1847 he went on with Mr. Coe, who went on to examine as agent of the defendant; also in 1848, with Pingree and Cowes, who were interested in the corporation. Ore was also taken from the tract in 1870 by him.

There has never been any adverse possession or exercise of any acts of ownership on the tract by any other persons than those claiming under the title under which defendant claims.

Plaintiff read from the Public Laws of the state of New Hampshire:

"Chapter XLII., joint resolution in relation to the public lands.

"Section 1. Governor authorized to sell lands: proceeds to be added to literary fund.

"Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives in general court convened:

"Section 1. That his excellency the governor be requested to investigate the condition of all the public lands belonging to the state, and that he is hereby authorized and empowered, with the advice of the council, to sell and dispose of the same, together or in parcels, as may be by him deemed most advantageous to the state; the proceeds of such sale or sales to be placed in the state treasury, and constitute a part of the literary fund, to be divided among the several cities and towns, and by them applied to the maintenance of common schools, or to other purposes of education as now provided by law, and that the treasurer be empowered to make and execute conveyances thereof, in accordance with the contracts of sale entered into by the governor." Approved June 28, 1867.

Plaintiff also introduced in evidence the records of a meeting of the governor and council of the state of New Hampshire, held Oct. 15, 1867, in which record was the following entry:

"Sold all the public lands in Grafton, Carroll, and Coos counties, for the sum of $25,000, to Aurin M. Chase, of Whitefield."

Peter Sanborn was the treasurer of the state of New Hampshire for the year 1867, duly elected, qualified, and sworn. The plaintiff then offered in evidence, subject to the objection duly made by defendant, a deed acknowledged Oct. 21, 1867, from Peter Sanborn, treasurer, to Noah Woods, the plaintiff, and William H. Smith, quitclaiming and releasing to Woods and Smith, their heirs and assigns forever, "all and singular the lands belonging to the state of New Hampshire, or in which the said state of New Hampshire has or might have any right, title, interest, or claim in any way whatever, situate and lying within the limits of the counties of Grafton, Carroll, and Coos, in said state of New Hampshire, however located and bounded, estimated one hundred thousand acres, more or less, meaning and intending hereby to assign and convey to said Woods and Smith, their heirs and assigns forever, all and singular the land in said counties of Grafton, Carroll, and Coos, to which the said state of New Hampshire has or might have any claim or title in any way whatever, excepting and reserving from said grant the arsenal lot in Lancaster, in the county of Coos, and any gun-house lot owned by the state in said counties of Grafton, Carroll, and Coos aforesaid."

This deed was duly recorded in the office of the secretary of state Nov. 21, 1867. It appeared in evidence that this deed was made by direction of the governor, and at the request of Aurin M. Chase, to Woods and Smith; and that the sum of $25,000 was paid to the governor, and by him to the treasurer of state, and by him carried to the credit of the literary fund. The sum of $25,000 was the consideration of this and other conveyances, made at the same time to Aurin M. Chase, and to others under his direction and by his request.

By subsequent conveyances, Noah Woods obtained the interest of William H. Smith in the demanded premises.

The principal objection made by the plaintiff to the title of the tenant is, that the deed of Willey, the land commissioner, to Eastman, was not recorded in the records of the state, by the secretary of state, within one year from the date of the deed, in accordance with the provisions of the act of June 25, 1830, and therefore the plaintiff contends that the deed was for this reason absolutely null and void, and without force and effect. The act of June 22, 1831, under which Willey was appointed land commissioner, and by authority of which he sold the land and made the conveyance to Eastman, authorized him "to execute deeds thereof, which deeds, being first recorded in the office of the secretary of state, shall be effectual for conveying all the right and title of this state to such land, saving the right of jurisdiction." This deed was recorded, as we have seen, within two years of its date, and more than thirty years before the date of the deed under which plaintiff claims; and the state of New Hampshire retained in its treasury during all this time the consideration paid for the land, and the grantees exercised during all that period a possession as open, notorious, and exclusive, as is ordinarily exercised over lands of that description, in what was then a wild and uninhabited mountainous region. This possession, occupancy, and claim of title was well known to Aurin M. Chase, as he himself states; and from the evidence in the case there can be no reasonable doubt that the parties who took the deeds as his appointees had full notice of all the facts. Yet it is claimed by the plaintiff that the condition in the act of 1830 was a condition precedent; and, not having been complied with, the deed was null and void, and no entry was necessary by the state to reinvest the title. The cases of Greenleaf's Lessee v. Birth, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 302, Robinson v. Minor, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 641, and Easton v. Salisbury, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 426, would seem to support this view, if the act of 1830 is to be considered as applicable to the case. To the same effect is the opinion of the court in the learned opinion in Hill v. Dyer, 3 Greenl. 441, and of the supreme court of New Hampshire in Stone v. Ashley, 13 N. H. 38. But the true answer to this position is, that the act of 1830 did not apply to this conveyance. The act of 1831 was a distinct and independent piece of legislation. It furnished of itself a complete mode by which the conveyances of state lands sold under its provisions could be made. The provisions of that act are inconsistent with and repugnant to the act of 1830, and, so far as inconsistent with and repugnant to those provisions of the act of 1830, it repeals them. The deed to Willey was executed, delivered, and recorded in strict compliance with the act of 1831.

The grantee, in a deed executed under the provisions of the act of 1831, was notified, by the terms of the act under which he claimed title, that his deed was effectual only "when first recorded in the office of the secretary of state." Until that record was made, he had no title and no seisin. When recorded, the deed became operative. The plaintiff contends that the effect of the statute is as if it read, "when first recorded as provided in the act of June 25, 1830." It is not enough for his purpose to read, "when first recorded according to law," for the general law made deeds operative between the parties and persons having actual notice of them without record, and as to other parties after record. The rule in the act of 1830 was a special one, applicable to conveyances from the state alone. It required them to be recorded "in the records of the state by the secretary," and allowed one year's time from the date of the deed within which to make the record. The grantee under that statute paid his consideration, and took a valid, effectual, and operative deed, not requiring for its validity to "be first recorded," but one which ceased to be "of any force or effect, for the release of any title or claim of the state, unless the same shall have been recorded as aforesaid within one year from the date of the same." The difference in the phraseology used in the two acts with reference to the record shows also the intention of the legislature to make the provision in the act of 1831 complete in itself, without reference to the act of 1830.

The act of 1830 required the conveyance to "be recorded in the records of the state by the secretary." The act of 1831 provided, "which deeds, being first recorded in the office of the secretary of state, shall be effectual for conveying all the right and title of the state," &c. It is well settled, that where the subject of a former statute is embraced in the provisions of a later statute, if the later statute appears to be intended to prescribe the only rules which should govern that subject, the particulars of the old law in which they differ will be regarded as repealed by implication; but the old law is repealed by implication only pro tanto to the extent of the repugnancy. Dexter & L. Plank-Road Co. v. Allen, 16 Barb. 18; Goddard v. Boston, 20 Pick. 410; Davies v. Fairbairn, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 636; State v. Wilson, 43 N. H. 419; U. S. v. Tynen, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 92; New London R. Co. v. Boston & A. R. Co., 102 Mass. 389. The condition in the act of 1831 was fully complied with when the deed to Eastman was recorded, June 28, 1837. After that time the deed was "effectual for conveying all the right and title of the state." The view we have taken of the construction of the act of 1831 establishes the title of Eastman and the tenants claiming under him, and renders it unnecessary to decide whether the act of June 28, 1867, which authorized the governor to sell and dispose of the public lands belonging to the state, would authorize the sale of lands which the state had once conveyed by deed, and for which the state had received full consideration, and where the seisin of the tenants for thirty years and more had been under a delivery of seisin by the agent of the state, it is not a wrongful intrusion on the public lands.

The defendant did not disseise the plaintiff, and there must be judgment for defendant, with costs.

WOODS v. LAWRENCE CO. See Case No. 59.

WOODS v. OCEAN TOW BOAT CO. See Case No. 13,175.

WOODS (RITCHIE v.). See Case No. 11,865.

WOODS (TAYLOR v.). See Case No. 13,809.

WOODS (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 16,759 and 16,760.

Case No. 17,994.

WOODS et al. v. YOUNG et al.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 346.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1806.²

CONTINUANCE—ABSENT WITNESS.

The court will not continue a cause for the absence of a witness, who has been summoned, if no attachment has been moved for, if the witness resides within one hundred miles of this place, although he resides out of this district.

[Cited in Park v. Willis, Case No. 10,716; Lewis v. Mandeville, Id. 8,326.]

THE COURT refused a continuance, because the plaintiff had not taken or moved for an attachment against his witness, John Wood, who lived at Port Tobacco, out of the District of Columbia, and within one hundred miles of this place; not having decided yet that an attachment will not lie for a witness who resides out of the district, and within one hundred miles. See Voss v. Luke [Case No. 17,014]; Park v. Willis [Id. 10,716], November term, 1806.

[The judgment of the court was affirmed on appeal to the supreme court. 4 Cranch, 237.]

WOODSIDE (ALLEGHANY FERTILIZER CO. v.). See Case No. 206.

Case No. 17,995.

WOODSIDE v. BALDWIN.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 174.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1831.

PHYSICIAN'S LICENSE.

A physician, practising in Washington, D. C., without a license from "the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," may maintain an action at law for his services, if, during the time of those services, there was no existing "medical board of examiners of the District of Columbia."

This was an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace for the county of Washington in favor of the appellee [Ethan Baldwin] for $48, for the balance of an account for medical attendance and services from March, 1829, to March, 1830. Upon the appeal, one of the parties demanded a trial by jury, who found a verdict for the appellee for the amount claimed, subject to the opinion of the court upon the question whether the appellee had a right to maintain an action for his medical services without having obtained a license, or diploma, as required by the 5th section of the charter of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, granted by the act of congress of the 16th of February, 1819 (6 Stat. 221), entitled "An act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia." The 3d section of the charter provides: "That it shall and may be lawful for the said Medical Society, or any number of them attending (not less than seven), to elect by ballot five persons, residents of the District, who shall be styled 'the Medical Board of Examiners of the District of Columbia;' whose duty it shall be to grant licenses to such medical and chirological gentlemen, as they may, upon a full examination, judge adequate to commence the practice of the medical and chirological arts, or as may produce diplomas from some respectable college or society; each person so obtaining a certificate, to pay a sum not exceeding ten dollars, to be fixed on or ascertained by the society." By the 4th section, any three of the examiners shall constitute a board for examining candidates; and any one of the examiners may grant a license to practise until a board can be held. By the 5th section it is "enacted that after the appointment of the aforesaid medical board, no person, not heretofore a practitioner of medicine or surgery within the District of Columbia, shall be allowed to practise within the said District, in either of the said branches, and receive payment for his services, without first having obtained a license, testified as by this law directed, or without the production of a diploma as aforesaid, under the penalty of fifty dollars for each offence, to be recovered from the county court where he may reside, by bill of presentment and indictment, one half for the use of the society, and the other for that of the informer." By the 2d section the officers, namely, president, two vice-presidents, one corresponding secretary, one recording secretary, one treasurer, and one librarian, were to be appointed at the annual meeting in January, forever; but no time was designated for the election of the board of examiners by the society. It was proved or admitted that there had not been any election of the officers of the society for several years, nor any proceedings by the society; and that there was no existing board of examiners during all the time of the appellee's services for the appellant [James D. Woodside].

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Justice.]

² [Affirmed in 4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 237.]

Mr. Baldwin, for himself, contended, that the 5th section contained no prohibition of practice, and only gave a penalty to the society, which they only could recover by presentment or indictment; that his practice was not a malum in se, even if there had been a board of examiners to whom he could apply for a license. But there was no such board, and consequently he could not have offended against the 5th section of the charter, as it was impossible for him to obtain a license. Nobody has a right to interfere but the society. The act does not forbid any one to practise gratuitously, nor to receive fees without practising. The Maryland statute of 1798, c. 105, §§ 3, 4, 5, and 6, is exactly like the act of congress incorporating the society; and the Maryland act of 1821, c. 217, shows that plaintiffs could before that act, recover notwithstanding the act of 1798, c. 105. Berry v. Scott, 2 Har. & G. 92, in the year 1827. He contended also, that the society was not in existence. It had become extinct by nonuser. 2 Kent, Comm. 233; Head v. Providence Ins. Co., 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 127; De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 393.

Mr. Coxe, contra. The charter makes the practice and the receiving of payment therefor unlawful, and a contract to pay for such services cannot be maintained. The object of the 5th section of the act was the preservation of the public health; and although the corporation may not exist, yet that section remains in force. 2 Kent, Comm. 245-251. But the corporation has never ceased to exist; and, if it had, the board of examiners would still remain. It is not subject to annual election, as the officers are. But, if the corporation is extinct, the Maryland act of 1798, c. 105, is revived, and the practice is unlawful under that act. The act of 1821, c. 217, only guards against surprise, by the defendant's availing himself of the defence given by the act of 1798. It contains no prohibitory words.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge absent) affirmed the judgment, with costs.

Case No. 17,996.

WOODSON v. FLECK et al.

[Chase, 305; 1 3 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 97; 9 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 435; 2 Leg. Gaz. 230; 2 Abb. U. S. 15.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May, 1870.

DE FACTO GOVERNMENT—MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES —REMOVAL TO FEDERAL COURTS.

1. The government of Virginia organized at Wheeling, has been recognized by the United States as the rightful government of that state.

2. After all organized resistance to the national authority had ceased in Virginia, that government was established in undisputed exercise of its authority at Richmond. That government was thus established during the year 1865.

3. When the de facto government of Virginia was dispersed by the superior force of the United States, the civil authorities did not necessarily cease at once to exist.

4. They continued in being de facto, charged with the duty of maintaining order until superseded by the regular government.

5. Thus the common council of Harrisonburg, though elected under the de facto government, remained charged with the government of the town, notwithstanding the temporary occupation of the place by the United States forces.

6. It might have been superseded, for the government of the United States was not bound to recognize any authority which originated with the de facto government. But it was not superseded.

7. The mayor and common council, therefore, exercising their authority derived from their election, and not by virtue of a military order, have no right to remove a suit from the state to a federal court, when that suit has been brought for an alleged false imprisonment, and malicious prosecution thereon, charged to have been committed by them in the discharge of their municipal functions.

¹ [Reported by Bradley T. Johnson, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

8. The courts of the United States are not constituted guardians of the public peace under state laws.

9. These matters are left absolutely to the state courts.

10. These courts watch over personal rights and private security so far as these depend on state laws, and individuals who exercise local authority are responsible to them.

The town council of Harrisonburg in Rockingham county, Virginia, had been elected under the laws of the state at the regular town election during the war, and some time before its termination, the town and county being part of the recognized state of Virginia, and within the Confederate military lines of occupation. After the surrender of the Confederate army under General Lee, on April 9, 1865, the war in fact terminated in Virginia, and in a very short time all resistance to the Federal troops ceased. The town authorities of Harrisonburg, their town having been occupied by a garrison, ceased to meet or discharge any of their duties for a while, the military undertaking the entire police and management of affairs on themselves. On June 16, 1865, however, the post commander at Harrisonburg issued a general order which was published and promulgated to the citizens as general order No. 10, addressed to them and notifying them "that the mayor and council of the corporation last in office upon the resumption of their duties, will be sustained in all their acts consistent with existing laws and proclamations of the government." Upon this the local government reorganized itself and resumed the exercise of its functions; among other things electing as town sergeant one of the defendants. Some time after this a riot broke out which was quelled by the exertions of the mayor and town sergeant, and in the course of their efforts to maintain the public peace they arrested the plaintiff Woodson. It seems that Woodson was asserting, and may be proclaiming, that the mayor and town sergeant had no authority to act as officers; that they were mere usurpers; the government of the town having perished with the state government under which it was elected, and that general order No. 10 could not legally nor constitutionally recall into existence that power which had ceased to be, nor could it create them a new power ab initio. Be that as it may—the powers that be arrested Woodson for inciting to riot or aiding it, and Woodson on examination before a magistrate was discharged. Whereupon he brought his action for malicious prosecution against the mayor, some members of the town council, and the town sergeant. After much contention before the state courts, and several trials and removals from one county to another, the defendants brought the case here on the ground that they were acting by virtue of the authority of general order No. 10, and being sued for acts done under or by virtue of orders of military officers of the United States, they had the right to remove it into this court by virtue of the acts of congress of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 756], and May 11, 1866 [14 Stat. 46], and their supplements. The plaintiff appeared in this court, and moved that the cause be remanded to the court whence it came, because it had been improperly removed, this court having no jurisdiction.

W. W. Crump and Mr. Roller, for the motion.

Bradley T. Johnson, opposed.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. This is a motion to remand the cause described in the record to the circuit court of Rockingham county. In considering it we are not at liberty to look at the merits of the controversy between the parties. The only question which we have to examine is that of jurisdiction.

The suit was originally brought in the county court of Rockingham county, in the state of Virginia, by a citizen of the state against other citizens of the state for malicious prosecution, and involved, apparently, no question arising under the constitution and laws of the United States.

It was removed from the state court into this court by an order of the circuit court of Rockingham county, in supposed conformity with the acts of congress providing for such removal of certain suits for acts done in obedience to the orders of the national authorities during the recent war.

We are to inquire whether the suit thus removed is one of those for the removal of which provision has been made by congress. If not, it is clear that we have no jurisdiction of it, and it must be remanded to the court from which it came. The modes of removal were provided by the acts of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 756), and May 11, 1866 (14 Stat. 46),—one by transfer before verdict, another by appeal after judgment. It is not necessary here to consider the second. The first, under the act of 1863, was a proceeding by petition of the defendants filed after entering an appearance; or if appearance had been entered prior to the date of the act, then at the next session of the court. Under the act of 1866, the proceeding for removal might be resorted to at any time before the empaneling of a jury to try the cause.

The suits which might be removed in one or the other of these modes, according to the condition of the particular case at the time of the proceeding for removal, are fully described in the two acts already referred to. If the suit now under consideration comes within any description of these acts, it is certainly described by the first section of the act of May 11, 1866. That description includes suits for any act done during the Rebellion by any officer or person under any order issued by any military officer of the United States holding the command of any district or place within which such act was done by the person or officer for whom the order was intended, or by any other person aiding or assisting him therein. If this description does not sanction the act for which the suit in controversy was brought, it was not, as we think, within the meaning of either act of congress.

What, then, were the facts in relation to these suits?

Two of the defendants were members of the town council of Harrisonburg. The other was the sergeant of the corporation appointed by the council. The members of the council were elected during the war, while Harrisonburg was within the Confederate lines and under the control of the insurgent government of Virginia.

The sergeant of the corporation was elected after all organized resistance to the national authority had ceased in Virginia, and after the state government, which had been organized at Wheeling, and recognized by the United States as the rightful government of Virginia, had been established in undisputed exercise of its authority at Richmond.

This suit was brought by Woodson against certain members of the town council of Harrisonburg, and against the town sergeant, for malicious prosecution. The facts appear to be that he was arrested; that his case was examined with reference to further proceedings; and that he was discharged by the justice of the peace who conducted the examination.

The first question is, whether that arrest under the direction of the town council by the town sergeant was an act done in pursuance of any order of the officer in command of the district? We have been referred to general order No. 10, issued from the post head-quarters on June 16, 1865, by the military officers then commanding the district in which Harrisonburg was situated.

It is to be borne in mind that the members of the common council of Harrisonburg had been elected to that office while the insurgent government of Virginia was in entire control of that portion of the state. When that government was dispersed by the superior force of the United States, the civil authorities did not necessarily cease at once to exist. They continued in being de facto, charged with the duty of maintaining order until superseded by the regular government.

Thus the common council of Harrisonburg remained charged with the government of the town, notwithstanding the temporary occupation of the place by the United States forces.

Doubtless it might have been superseded. The government of the United States was not bound to recognize any authority which originated under the insurgent government. But it was not superseded. On the contrary, an order was issued, addressed to the citizens of Harrisonburg, Virginia, June 16, 1865, by which the citizens were notified "that the mayor and council of the corporation last in office, upon the resumption of their duties, will be sustained in all their acts consistent with existing laws and proclamations of the government."

Upon the promulgation of this order the council which had suspended its meetings, resumed its functions. It appointed a town sergeant, who was duly qualified. Shortly afterwards a riot broke out in the town, and the defendants, especially the mayor and the town sergeant, were very active in quelling the disturbance. We have no means of judging how great or how dangerous the disturbance was. It had no connection with the military occupation, nor any relation to the authority of the United States. It was an ordinary riot, and the mayor and town sergeant busied themselves in suppressing it. In doing so they arrested rightfully or unrightfully Woodson, the plaintiff in this suit.

Now, was that act done in pursuance of the order of the post commander? There was nothing in the order relating to any such matter. It was not addressed to the council. It did not require them to arrest anybody. It did not command them to suppress a riot. It simply declared that the council would be sustained in its legitimate action as the town government. It would be going too far, we think, to regard this arrest as an act done in pursuance of an order of any officer of the United States. On the contrary, it seems to us to have been an act intended, at least, as an ordinary exercise of authority by the town council and town sergeant under the laws of Virginia.

The courts of the United States have nothing to do with such matters. They are not constituted guardians of the public peace under state laws. On the contrary, these matters are left absolutely to the state courts. The state courts watch over personal rights and private security so far as these depend on state laws. Individuals who exercise local authority are responsible to them, and both are responsible to the people of Virginia.

We think, therefore, that this is not a case within the description of the act of congress. We are clearly without jurisdiction of it, and must remand it to the circuit court from whence it came.

A second question has been somewhat discussed, namely: Whether, if the order in question could be regarded as directed to the corporate authorities of Harrisonburg, and the arrest of Woodson as actually made under that order, the arrest so made would warrant the removal of Woodson's suit for malicious prosecution into the United States court, after the restoration of the state government at Richmond, in the spring of 1865? But the view which we take of the first question in this case makes the present consideration of this point unnecessary.

Case No. 17,997.

WOODSON v. FLEET.

[The case reported under above title in 2 Abb. (U. S.) 15, is the same as Case No. 17,996.]

WOODSON (LETCHER v.). See Case No. 8,280.

WOODSON (MURDOCK v.). See Case No. 9,942.

Case No. 17,998.

WOODSUM v. BRAY et al.

[5 Savy. 133.]¹

District Court, D. California. April 2, 1878.

PREFERENCE BY BANKRUPT.

A bill of sale by the bankrupt held, under the circumstances, to be a preference.

[This was an action by C. A. Woodsum, assignee in bankruptcy, against Frank Bray and Isaac N. Thompson.]

J. A. Yoel and D. L. Delmas, for plaintiff.
Moore, Lane & Leib, for defendants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This action is brought by the assignee of the bankrupt to recover the value of certain property conveyed by the latter to the defendants in fraud of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

The facts of the case are as follows: In the latter part of the year 1875 the several creditors of the bankrupt, having attached his property, he convened a meeting of his creditors to effect a settlement. They agreed to accept a payment of sixty-six and two-thirds per cent., in full satisfaction of their claims. The requisite funds were advanced by the defendants, who received from the bankrupt an absolute conveyance, intended as a mortgage, of his farm, already mortgaged for five thousand dollars. He appears at this time to have been indebted to the defendants in about four thousand dollars. He was also indebted to Woodsum, the present plaintiff, and to other creditors, to an amount somewhat over three thousand dollars. In 1877, it appears that another meeting of the creditors was held at the store of the defendants. The bankrupt testifies that Mr. Bray told him that he had heard he was getting into trouble, and that he had better call his creditors together, and they (defendants) would pay them. This proposition was accepted by the bankrupt and he thereupon gave them the security they demanded, viz. an assignment of a lease of the Martinez farm, and conveyance of his farming implements. He afterwards consigned to them the produce of the Martinez farm. The bankrupt swears that he never afterwards had the ready money to pay, and that they certainly knew the state of his affairs. About the last of July, 1877, the bankrupt again applied to Bray for money "to finish up his crop." Bray demanded more security which the bankrupt objected to giving, on the ground that if he gave them a bill of sale for the Martinez crop others would sue him "and the whole thing would be thrown into law." Bray then offered to deduct one thousand dollars from the amount of his claim if the bankrupt could raise five thousand dollars to pay the balance. Shortly afterwards the defendants obtained the bill of sale for the property which it is sought to recover in this action. It included all the property of the bankrupt not even excepting some articles exempt from execution. It was exacted of the bankrupt, as he states under the threat, that they would otherwise "throw the thing into bankruptcy at that time." "The bill of sale was made to cover everything I might possibly have."

The bankrupt also testifies that he refused to execute this bill of sale unless the defendants agreed to pay off his Mayfield debts, amounting to about twelve hundred dollars, to which they finally assented; whether they also agreed to pay off his Santa Clara debts, he is unable to say.

The account of the transaction given by Mr. Bray substantially agrees with that of the bankrupt. Among the reasons assigned by Mr. Bray for exacting the bill of sale from the bankrupt was the fact that Manning owed debts about Mayfield and Santa Clara, and he feared the creditors might attach and cause loss to the estate; that he expected a rise in the price of wheat and he desired to get Manning's crop into his hands to save it from attachments, and to hold for the expected rise. He also stated as an additional reason that he feared the bankrupt was becoming intemperate, and might cause him a loss through mismanagement. He differs from the bankrupt, however, in one particular; but the difference is certainly to his disadvantage. He states that he agreed with the bankrupt that if the crop produced six thousand dollars, they would defer their claim to the amount of one thousand dollars, and would pay the Mayfield creditors; but those creditors were to be paid only in case the crop produced that sum.

Mr. Thompson, his partner, makes the same statement: "My understanding was that if the crop, farming utensils, horses, etc., produced six thousand dollars, we were to pay the creditors one thousand two hundred dollars."

Antonio Martinez, who was present when the bill of sale was executed, testified that he told Bray that he had a bill against the bankrupt, and inquired if he thought he could collect it; to which Bray replied that he did not know. Martinez then said that he thought that Manning was about to be attached. Bray answered that he thought so too, and that he had come there to provide against it by making him sign a bill of sale.

¹ [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The above are all the facts it is deemed necessary to mention. A clearer case of an illegal preference could hardly be presented. That the bankrupt was hopelessly insolvent cannot be disputed; and that the defendants had reasonable cause to believe him so is equally plain. Mr. Bray swears that he believed him to be solvent; that is, that if his crops turned out well, and if his farm could be sold for a considerable sum in excess of the mortgage (which, under the testimony, seems to have been highly improbable), and if his horses, farming implements, etc., brought fair prices, enough might have been obtained to satisfy all the indebtedness which Mr. Bray supposed he owed.

It is unnecessary to dwell upon the fact, that even if there had been more grounds for this conjecture or estimate than appear to have existed, the condition of the bankrupt would nevertheless have been, in legal contemplation, that of insolvency. He was certainly then, and for a long time previously had been, unable to pay his debts. From the time that the defendants had advanced the funds to enable him to settle with his creditors at sixty-six and two thirds cents on the dollar, his indebtedness then had been constantly increasing. They had taken from him a deed for his farm, an assignment of his lease, and even of a policy of insurance on his life for one thousand dollars. He had also placed in their hands a large quantity of grain, and they had obtained from him a bill of sale of his horses, farming implements, etc., the possession of which does not appear to have been transferred.

Shortly before obtaining the bill of sale in question in this suit, they had offered to reduce their claim by one thousand dollars, provided he could obtain five thousand dollars to pay them; and when the bill was executed it was insisted on with the full knowledge and for the avowed reason that attachments by other creditors were impending. They were not aware, it is true, of the debt to Woodsum, amounting to some three thousand dollars, but they knew there were debts due to creditors in Mayfield and Santa Clara, and these they, according to their own statement, agreed to pay to the amount of one thousand two hundred dollars (although the bankrupt demanded one thousand five hundred dollars) only in case the crop and other property produced six thousand dollars, a condition wholly inconsistent with a belief in the solvency of a man whom they were compelling to convey all the property he possessed, of every kind and description, including some articles exempt by law from execution.

Their own avowal, that their reason for demanding the transfer was to save the property from attachments which were about to be levied, is a confession that they intended to make the bankrupt put the whole of his property beyond the reach of his other creditors, and to secure for themselves the means of appropriating it exclusively to the satisfaction of the debt due them. It is precisely such transactions that the provisions of the bankrupt act, with respect to preferences, were intended to prohibit and avoid. Of the property conveyed to the defendants, only the wheat and the spring wagon appear to have come into their possession, or to have been retained by them. The quantity of wheat seems to have been in all, ninety-eight thousand and seventy-four pounds, which at two dollars and seventy-five cents per cental, amounts to two thousand six hundred and ninety-seven dollars and three cents; spring wagon, two hundred and thirty dollars, making two thousand nine hundred and twenty-seven dollars and three cents.

I have taken these figures from the brief of the counsel for the plaintiff. Their accuracy is not controverted in the brief filed on the part of the defendant. If any error in them can be pointed out it will be corrected. But if no suggestion to that effect be made, judgment for the sum of two thousand nine hundred and twenty-seven dollars and three cents, in gold coin, will be entered.

Some conversation occurred at the hearing with regard to expenses incurred by the defendants after the execution of the bill of sale in preparing the wheat for market. No mention is made of this in the brief of the defendants. If any such expenses as for threshing, sacking, hauling, etc., were incurred, they should be allowed so far as they contributed to enhance the value of the property conveyed to them.

Case No. 17,999.

In re WOODWARD et al.

[4 Ben. 102; 1 3 N. B. R. 719 (Quarto, 177).]
District Court, E. D. New York. March, 1870.

PRIVILEGE OF COUNSEL—WITNESS.

A witness who claims to have acted as counsel for a bankrupt, cannot, on that ground, refuse to be sworn as a witness in the bankruptcy proceedings.

[In the matter of George Woodward and Julius C. Woodward, bankrupts.]

In this case, the assignee for the bankrupt, by his counsel, attended before the register, and one William McKeag attended as a witness, but refused to be sworn, on the ground that he had acted as counsel for the bankrupt, and was still his adviser.

The register decided as follows: "The right to refuse to answer a question on the ground of privilege, does not warrant a refusal to be sworn as a witness. The privilege cannot be interposed until a question is asked which invades the privilege."

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

On request the register certified the question to the court.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The decision of the register is correct.

Case No. 18,000.

In re WOODWARD.

[8 Ben. 112; 12 N. B. R. 297; 1 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 33; 7 Chi. Leg. News, 387.]¹

District Court, E. D. New York. May, 1875.

REGISTER IN BANKRUPTCY—SUMMONS OF WITNESS.

A summons to a witness to attend before a register in bankruptcy may be served outside the district but within 100 miles of the place where the witness is required to attend.

[Proceedings in the matter of William S. Woodward, a bankrupt.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. A proceeding in bankruptcy having been commenced in this court, the question of the discharge of the bankrupt being before the court upon specification filed in opposition to the discharge, it was referred to a register in bankruptcy of this district to take and report to the court the evidence to be adduced by the respective parties upon the said issue. Such reference being thereupon commenced, a summons in accordance with form No. 48 was issued, requiring one George S. Scott to attend as a witness in said proceedings before such register, at his office in the city of Brooklyn. The summons was served upon Scott in the city of New York, where he resides. Scott failed to attend in accordance with the summons, and thereupon application is made to the court to attach the witness for his failure so to attend.

The application is opposed, for the purpose of obtaining a determination of the question whether a witness is bound to regard a summons served upon him out of the district for which the register is appointed, requiring attendance before that register in a district where the witness does not reside.

The general rule undoubtedly is, that process does not run beyond the limits of the judicial district. But to this there is a well-known exception in the case of witnesses. Section 876 of the United States Revised Statutes expressly provides that subpoenas for witnesses who are required to attend a court of the United States may run into another district.

The provisions of the bankruptcy laws confer upon a register in proper cases "all the powers of the district court for the summoning and examination of witnesses." In the present case the register before whom the witness was required to attend in the city of Brooklyn had been duly directed in pursuance of section 5001 to take the testimony in the proceeding described in the summons; and therefore by virtue of section 5002 the register had all the power of this court for the purpose of summoning and examining witnesses in said proceeding.

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 1 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 33, contains only a partial report.]

The witness, Scott, was therefore liable to be subpoenaed to attend before the register in this district, notwithstanding the fact that he resided out of the district, as it is conceded that he did not live more than 100 miles from the city of Brooklyn. The summons served upon the witness had all the effect that would have followed due service of the ordinary subpoena in a civil case requiring that attendance of the witness before the court. Unless, therefore, the failure to attend is excused, the right of the parties to an attachment cannot be denied. Some facts, by way of excuse, are stated in the papers, and they are accompanied by expressions of entire willingness on the part of the witness to attend, if he could be legally required to do so. I shall not, therefore, at this time, consider the matters offered in excuse, but shall postpone the examination of that question, to give the witness the opportunity of demonstrating the sincerity of those expressions by attending before the register at such reasonable time as may be fixed by the register for the next hearing on the proceeding referred to.

[For subsequent proceedings, see Case No. 18,001.]

Case No. 18,001.

In re WOODWARD.

[8 Ben. 563.]¹

District Court, E. D. New York. Nov., 1876.

OPPOSITION TO DISCHARGE—SPECULATOR IN STOCKS NOT A MERCHANT—CONCEALMENT OF PROPERTY—ADMISSION OF FICTITIOUS DEBTS.

1. W., a speculator in stocks who failed for a large sum and went into bankruptcy, applied for his discharge. It was opposed on the grounds, that he was a merchant or tradesman and had not kept proper books of account; that he had concealed property—a horse and wagon—belonging to him at the time of filing his petition; and that he had admitted fictitious debts in making up his schedules and had falsely sworn thereto. Held, that a speculator in stocks is not a merchant or tradesman within the meaning of the statute.

[Quoted in Ex parte Conant, 77 Me. 278.]

2. As the only proof of concealment of property was a statement made by the bankrupt two years after filing his petition in these words: "I now have a horse and wagon," the court would not hold, in a case involving millions of dollars, that it was meant that he owned the property at the time of filing his petition, and that he had therefore concealed it.

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

3. As the debts alleged to be fictitious, while stated in the schedules and upon the books of the bankrupt, arose out of transactions in stocks, for the statement of many of which the bankrupt relied entirely upon his brokers and could himself furnish no information, it could not be said that such want of recollection, or even slight inaccuracies shown, warranted the belief that the bankrupt had wilfully sworn falsely or made false entries. A discharge must be granted.

[Proceedings in the matter of William S. Woodward, a bankrupt. For prior proceedings, see Case No. 18,000.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. This proceeding comes before the court upon an application for a discharge. The application is opposed by creditors upon various grounds set forth in several specifications. The principal question presented to me for my decision is whether the occupation of the bankrupt was that of a merchant or tradesman within the meaning of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]. If he was a merchant or tradesman a discharge must be refused, as it is conceded that he kept no proper books of account.

The evidence shows that the bankrupt was a speculator in stocks and had no other occupation. His contracts in respect to stocks were often made in his own name and often by brokers upon his order and for his benefit. His dealings in stocks were large and frequent, and he thereby acquired a credit which enabled him to make contracts in stocks to an enormous amount. The number of his creditors according to his schedule is 178; the amount of his debts $2,894,684.71. Of the 138 creditors who have proved claims amounting to $2,201,167.07, ninety-one whose debts amount to $1,345,991.76, have consented to his discharge. It is also insisted that the evidence shows that the bankrupt kept an office, and that he transacted the business of a broker in stocks. He was a member of the board of brokers. Upon these facts the court has been urged to hold that the bankrupt was a merchant or tradesman, and to refuse the discharge, because of his failure to keep proper books of account. But my opinion is that the bankrupt can not be held to have been a merchant or tradesman within the meaning of the bankrupt law. The words merchant and tradesman involve the idea of a dealing with merchandise in some form or other. In their ordinary and natural signification they do not include one who makes profits by buying and selling of shares on speculation, whether for himself or for others. Such a person would not in ordinary parlance be said to be engaged in trade. No case has been cited which furnishes authority for extending the meaning of these words, so as to include the occupation of this bankrupt. The adjudged cases look the other way. The Case of Marston [Case No. 9,142] is quite in point. It is supposed that the present case differs from the Case of Marston in that the dealings of this bankrupt were not casual, that he had an office, made contracts in his own name as well as for others, and acquired by his dealings a credit that enabled him to make extensive purchases of stocks. But these circumstances, assuming them to be proved, do not bring him within the statute, for they do not disclose the characteristic feature of the occupation of a merchant or tradesman, namely, a trading in goods, wares or merchandise. I am therefore of the opinion that the discharge of this bankrupt cannot be refused upon the ground that he kept no proper books of account.

A further ground of objection to the discharge is the omission from the bankrupt's schedules of claims against various parties named in the specifications, arising out of certain written agreements made in May and June, 1871, in relation to purchasing 60,000 shares of Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad stock, forming what is called a "pool."

In regard to this objection it is sufficient for the present case to say that the evidence fails to prove that there was any profit made, or that any claim arising out of those agreements exists, to be stated by the bankrupt in his schedules. It is in proof that the bankrupt made large contracts in Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad stock, in addition to the 60,000 shares, purchased by the agreement of the "pool," on which additional contract there was a large loss; and an effort has been made to show that these additional purchases were in fact made for the benefit of the parties to the pool agreement, so as to render these parties liable to share in the losses upon such additional purchases. But such a conclusion cannot properly be drawn from the evidence presented in this case. All the direct testimony is opposed to such a conclusion; and the circumstances, relied upon as conflicting with the direct testimony, are not sufficient to justify holding that the bankrupt has wilfully sworn falsely in his affidavit annexed to his petition, or has concealed claims of this character outstanding against parties who were interested with him in such additional contracts.

A remaining objection to the discharge is that the bankrupt omitted to mention in his schedules a horse and wagon, that it is contended the evidence shows him to have possessed. This objection is taken in a specification filed by consent of the bankrupt after the testimony had been closed, and rests entirely upon the testimony, given by the bankrupt on his examination.

The objection that property has been concealed by a bankrupt, whenever it is made, is entitled to careful consideration, and the validity of such an objection is not affected by the value of the property alleged to have been concealed. Still, in a case like the present, instituted by the bankrupt for the purpose of obtaining a discharge from debts amounting to some millions of dollars, the objection that the bankrupt has concealed a horse and wagon, and wilfully sworn falsely in his affidavit attached to his schedules because of the omission of a horse and wagon therefrom may well be held to require explicit proof. The advantage to be gained by such an omission is too slight to render its existence at all probable. It is but just, therefore, to take the statement made by the bankrupt in respect to the horse and wagon as he makes it. All that he says—and there is no other evidence—is “I now have one horse and wagon.” This statement was made nearly two years after the filing of the petition and does not show that the bankrupt had the horse and wagon when he made his schedules and affidavit. It was open to the creditors to examine fully as to the horse and wagon; and, having failed to elicit any other fact than that the bankrupt had a horse and wagon some two years after he filed his petition, they have no ground on which to contend that the bankrupt has concealed any part of the estate possessed by him at the time of filing his petition.

The observations already made dispose of all the specifications that the evidence requires should be noticed, unless it be the additional propositions numbered 4 and 5. In specifications 4 and 5, the charge is that the bankrupt has falsified his books and made false and fraudulent entries therein with intent to defraud his creditors, in this, that certain persons are named as creditors when in fact they were not indebted to him, and that certain debts set forth as due by the bankrupt had no existence in fact. The main support of these specifications is the fact that with regard to some considerable debts mentioned in the schedules and stated in his books, the bankrupt is unable to give any information as to the transaction out of which the indebtedness arose. In one or two instances it seems that a debt mentioned as the debt of one person was in fact owing to another. But when the nature of the bankrupt's transactions is considered, and the method of conducting these transactions between brokers acting for principals at the time undisclosed, and when it is remembered that the most of the bankrupt's indebtedness, amounting to some millions, arose in the space of four days out of a gigantic speculation in stocks, conducted through various brokers, and of which in very many cases the bankrupt kept no memorandum, but relied upon the brokers' statements sent to him and which were subsequently collected and arranged in books, it will be deemed no strained conclusion to say that mere want of recollection on the part of the bankrupt of some of these transactions, and the few inaccuracies which have been disclosed in the accounts so made up, do not prove that the bankrupt has wilfully sworn falsely in his affidavit or has admitted false and fictitious debts against his estate.

I have now considered all of the specifications that appear to require consideration, and, finding none of the specifications to be supported by evidence, it is my duty to grant the application of the bankrupt for a discharge.

Case No. 18,002.

WOODWARD v. CALHOUN COUNTY.

[2 Cent. Law J. 396.]¹

District Court, N. D. Mississippi. Dec. Term, 1874.

COUNTY BONDS—VALIDITY—AIDING RAILROAD CONSTRUCTION—CONSENT OF ELECTORS—SECOND ELECTION—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION—NEGOTIABILITY OF BONDS.

1. It is now too well settled to be controverted, that the legislature may authorize a county or other municipal corporation to aid in the building of a railway in which the inhabitants are interested; and that such authority may be given with or without the assent of the qualified electors of such municipality, unless there be some provision in the constitution denying or limiting this power.

2. The legislature of Mississippi authorized the board of police of Calhoun county to subscribe for stock in a railway company, provided, that there should be an election first held in that county, at which the question should be submitted to the qualified electors. And the act provides that, in case said election should result favorably, the subscription should be made; and in case a majority of the votes be cast against the subscription, the same shall not be made. Under the act, an election was held in 1860, and a majority voted against subscription. In 1869, the board of police again submitted the question to the voters; and at that election, a majority voted for subscription. Held, that the first election did not exhaust the power of the board to subscribe; that the manifest meaning of the act was to authorize the subscription on an approving vote whenever it should be had; that the voters of the county, in this matter, like individuals in making similar contracts, were not bound finally by a rejection of the proposition; that circumstances might change so as to justify a change in their action; and that in acting on a proposition to subscribe, the voters might deliberate, reject at one time, and accept at another. Citing Society for Savings v. New London, 29 Conn. 174; Smith v. Clark Co. [54 Mo. 58]; Woods v. Lawrence Co., 1 Black [66 U. S.] 386.

3. Nor did it affect the validity of the second election, that by the constitution in force in 1860, only whites were allowed to vote, and that when the last election was held freedmen were legal voters.

4. Nor is it any objection to such second election, that nine years had passed since the power to hold it was granted. Whatever might have been the effect in times of peace, the civil war which ensued soon after the power was granted, and the consequent disorganization of business, etc., in the state, justified the delay.

5. The act authorizing Calhoun county to subscribe for stock in the railroad company was passed in 1860; an election was held in October, 1869, at which a majority of the voters assented to the subscription. The new constitution of the state, which prohibits the legislature from authorizing cities, counties, and towns from giving such aid unless upon assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters, was ratified by a popular vote under the reconstruction laws of congress, on the 1st of December, 1869, and the subscription of the stock for the county was actually made on the books of the railway company, on the 1st of January, 1870; and the state was admitted to representation in congress on the 17th of February, 1870. Held, that the new constitution did not apply, because, (1) it did not abrogate prior authorities already granted by the legislature, but only prohibited the granting of such authority thereafter; (2), because the new constitution had not on the 1st of January, 1870, taken effect, as to that clause of it which prohibits the granting of such authorities except on terms prescribed. Citing Cass v. Dillon, 2 Ohio St. 607; State v. Union Tp., 8 Ohio St. 394; State v. Sullivan Co., 51 Mo. 531; Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. Alderman, 47 Mo. 349; State v. Nodaway Co. Ct., 48 Mo. 330; State v. Macon Co., 41 Mo. 453.

¹ [Reprinted by permission.]

6. The said clause of the constitution in relation to municipal subscriptions, does not apply where a debt has already been created for subscription to a railway company; and the legislature might, after the new constitution went into effect, authorize a county to issue its bonds in payment of such debt, and that without submitting the question to the people.

7. The act of 1871, which authorized the issuance of the bonds to pay the county subscriptions to the railway company, directed that the bonds so issued should be made payable to "the president and directors of the railroad company, and their successors and assigns." The bonds issued were made payable to "the railroad company, or bearer." Held, that the power granted was sufficiently pursued, and that the bonds so issued were valid; that it was the intention of the legislature to authorize the issuance of bonds which were negotiable, and which, in the hands of innocent holders, for value, would not come under the operation of the statute which subjects innocent holders to the equities existing between the maker and the payee.

8. When negotiable municipal bonds are issued, payable out of the state, or to bearer, they are unimpeachable in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, if there be a law authorizing their issuance. And if the act giving the authority annexes to its exercise certain conditions, and the bonds on their face recite that these conditions have been complied with, then the municipality, on being sued on the bonds by an innocent holder for value, is estopped to deny the truth of the recital.

At law.

Mr. Mayes and Harris & George, for plaintiff.

H. A. Barr, for defendant.

HILL, District Judge. This is an action of debt brought by the plaintiff [Amos Woodward] against the defendant, to recover the amount due upon 218 coupons, upon certain bonds, issued by said board in payment of a subscription of capital stock in the Grenada, Houston & Eastern Railroad Company, which had been subscribed by said board on behalf of said county, and which coupons it is claimed are held by plaintiff as the bona fide owner thereof. Among other pleas pleaded to said action, are five special pleas, to which plaintiff has filed his demurrer and upon which the questions now for decision arise. These pleas taken together, in substance state: That these bonds and coupons were issued on the 1st of September, 1871, in aid of the said railroad company, under the provisions of an act of the legislature of this state, approved on the 25th of March, 1871, and in payment of a subscription for $100,000 as capital stock, subscribed by said board on behalf of said county on the 1st of January, 1870, under the authority of an election, held by the voters of said county on the 25th of October, 1869, in pursuance of an order made by the board of police of said county, on the 22d of September, 1869, and under which order said election is claimed to have been authorized by an act of the legislature of this state, approved the 10th of February, 1860. That on the 1st Monday in August, 1860, the proposition to subscribe for said capital stock, was submitted to the qualified voters of said county, at an election held in pursuance of the act of 1860, and the order of the board of police of said county, made in pursuance thereof, and was then rejected by a majority of said voters. That said rejection exhausted all authority in said board to submit said proposition to said voters, or to make any subscription of capital stock in said company. That when said act of 1860 was passed, none were intended to vote upon said proposition but white persons, who alone were the qualified voters of said county. That when said vote was taken the enfranchised freedmen had become qualified voters of said county. That before said subscription was made the present constitution was adopted, which prohibits the legislature from authorizing counties to subscribe capital stock in, or give aid to railroad companies, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the county; and that the subscription of capital stock and the issuance of the bonds and coupons were made and issued in violation of this provision of the constitution, and void, and conferred no authority therefor. That the act of 1871, authorizing the issuance of bonds and coupons in payment of the capital stock subscribed for in said company, required that they should be made payable to the Grenada, Houston & Eastern Railroad Company, their successors and assigns, but that they were made payable to said company or bearer. That by reason of the said several causes, the subscription for said stock and the issuance of said bonds and coupons were without authority of law, void and not binding on the defendant.

The question to be determined is whether any or all of the facts alleged in these several pleas, and admitted by the demurrer to be true, constitute a valid defence to the action. The question is not now whether it is wise or unwise, just or unjust to compel a citizen or owner of property to become a stockholder in a corporation, and to contribute his means for its support, because a majority of the voters of the county or other municipality have by vote so determined, as it is now well settled that such may be done when authorized by the legislature. The question is, did the legislature in this case authorize it, and were the bonds, the coupons for the interest on which the suit is brought, issued and put in circulation in pursuance of that authority? The declaration alleges that they were, and the pleas deny it. The pleas admit that there was an act passed in 1860, authorizing the board of police to subscribe for $100,000 of capital stock in the Grenada, Houston & Eastern Railroad Company, upon condition that a majority of the qualified voters of said county, at an election to be held for the purpose, should vote in favor of said subscription, but allege that the election provided for was held and the proposition rejected, which exhausted the power conferred; the demurrer admits the election and the vote adverse to the proposition, but does not admit the effect, that is, the exhaustion of the power; and this is the first question to be determined, as this is the only act of the legislature under which it is claimed the subscription was authorized. This question and indeed all the questions which have been raised, and ably argued by the distinguished counsel on both sides upon these pleadings, are of first impression in this court, and so far as I am informed in any court in this state, are important to the holders of the bonds and coupons issued and first put in circulation, to the tax-payers of Calhoun county, and to those interested in this railroad enterprise, and should be considered with all the care, aided with all the lights attainable, so as to arrive at a correct conclusion as to the rights of the parties.

The legislature might have authorized the subscription without a vote of the citizens, as there was then no constitutional inhibition, but it wisely provided that it should not be done without the assent of a majority of the voters, who should vote in the election to determine the question. That majority was not then obtained, and had the act contained any provisions either in positive terms, or from which it could reasonably be inferred that that vote should be final and conclusive, then any subsequent vote would be without authority. In construing all statutes, the true intent of the legislative mind is the thing to be ascertained, and in the ascertainment of which resort must be had to the purpose of the enactment, the benefits to be secured, and the evils to be prevented. The purpose of this legislation was to give pecuniary aid to the construction and operation of a railroad which was to pass through Calhoun county, which it was supposed would afford facilities to its citizens and develop their resources. The circumstances of the citizens might greatly change in even a short time, their ability to pay depending very much upon the amount of their marketable productions, and their price. Also the necessity of the aid which was sought might be greater at one time than at another; at one time it might have been thought the enterprise could be successful without resorting to this means; at another it must fail without it. It was authority given to the board of police to make a contract for the taxpayers of the county, provided a majority of the qualified voters assented to it, and, unless restricted like individuals, a proposition might be rejected at one time and accepted at a future time. There is no express provision that the vote taken should be conclusive, and when looking to the purpose of the act, I find nothing in it from which that inference can necessarily be drawn. I am of the opinion that the proper construction to be given to this statute is, that authority was given to the board of police to make the subscription whenever a majority of the qualified voters of the county should assent to it, by the vote of a majority of the qualified voters who should vote on the question at an election to be held, to decide upon the acceptance or rejection of the proposition. This construction is sustained by the numerous adjudicated cases in other states upon like propositions, in some of which the proposition for subscription was made and rejected repeatedly, and then accepted, and its acceptance held binding. See Society for Savings v. New London, 29 Conn. 174; Smith v. Clark Co. [54 Mo. 58]. See, also, Woods v. Lawrence Co., 1 Black [66 U. S.] 386.

Another objection to the validity of this election insisted on by defendant's counsel, is that when the act was passed, none but white persons were qualified voters, and that when the election was held, those formerly slaves, then freedmen, were made voters. The plea does not aver that any of them voted in the election, and as the present constitution by which they were made voters, did not take effect until after that time, I take it that they did not vote. All the votes which they had before that time cast were under the act of congress, and confined to the special elections provided by the act; and were it otherwise, this objection is not maintainable. The act of 1860 evidently intended to embrace all the qualified voters who were such at the time the election was held. The voters constantly change by death and removals, by new accessions, by becoming of lawful age, and by immigrations at all times. And by the addition of the lately enfranchised, under the present constitution, another class was added, but when added, became as much entitled to vote as any who had preceded them. Still another objection urged, is, that more than nine years had elapsed from the passage of the act before the election was held. Whatever force there might have been in this objection, had the war not intervened and the consequent disorganization of civil government ensued, and which continued up to the time, or nearly so, when the election was held, these circumstances must be held sufficient to avoid this objection.

After a careful consideration of all the objections urged against the validity of this election, I am of the opinion that none of them are maintainable. And it must be held that the board of police was authorized to make the subscription, unless prevented by some subsequent obstacle, and which it is insisted did intervene by the adoption of the constitution submitted to the vote of the qualified electors of the state in November thereafter, and before the subscription was made, one provision of which inhibits the legislature from authorizing any county, city or town to become a stockholder, or to lend its credit to any company, association or corporation, unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city or town, at a special or general election to be held therein, shall assent thereto. The subscription was made January 1, 1870, after the election was held by which the constitution was ratified by the electors of the state, but it was nugatory until the state government created by it was authorized by congress, which was not done until after that time, on the 17th of February, 1870. So that it can not be held that this subscription is in any way affected by this provision of the constitution. But I am of opinion that this inhibition, being placed upon the legislature, was intended only to apply to the action of that body afterwards to be had, and not to any authority theretofore given, and for a very good reason. Others upon the faith of this subscription might have been induced to subscribe for stock under the belief that the enterprise would be thus rendered successful. Contracts might have been entered into upon the faith of the subscription; but not so with regard to subscriptions of stock afterwards authorized, which will further appear from the following (the fifteenth) section of the constitution which inhibits the sale of lottery tickets and further inhibits the drawing of any lottery theretofore authorized, or the sale of lottery tickets. This section is self-executing; the fourteenth section is not. If it had been intended to apply to subscriptions before that time authorized, no reason can be perceived why it was not expressed. I am satisfied that this provision can not be made applicable to this subscription; and this conclusion is sustained by a number of adjudications by the supreme courts of our sister states. See on this point, Cass v. Dillon, 2 Ohio St. 609; State v. Union Tp., 8 Ohio St. 398; State v. Sullivan Co. Ct., 51 Mo. 531; Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. Alderman, 47 Mo. 349; State v. Nodaway Co. Ct., 48 Mo. 339; and State v. Macon Co., 41 Mo. 453. I am, therefore, compelled to the conclusion that no valid objection is shown against this subscription. The next, and not less important question, is, were these bonds and coupons authorized by law to be issued, and are they of binding force upon the defendant as the representative of the taxpayers of Calhoun county? To make them so obligatory they must have been issued by legislative authority. This authority is claimed to have been given by the fourth section of an act passed March 20, 1871, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of the Grenada, Houston and Eastern R. R., approved February 10th, 1860,'" which reads as follows: "That it shall and may be lawful for the board of supervisors of any county which shall have voted a tax as provided by this act or of an act to which this act is amendatory, to issue bonds due and payable at such time or times as said board of supervisors may deem best for the taxpayers of their respective counties, not to extend beyond ten years from the date of their issuance, for such sums as said boards of supervisors may deem necessary to meet, pay off and discharge the subscriptions of said counties, respectively, for capital stock in the Grenada, Houston and Eastern Railroad Company, which have been, or which may hereafter be subscribed by said boards of supervisors, or by the boards of police (as the case may be) respectively, not to exceed the total sum of such stock subscriptions, which said bonds shall be signed by the president of the board of supervisors issuing the same, and be made payable to the president and directors of the Grenada, Houston and Eastern Railroad Company, and their successors and assigns, and may be assigned, sold and conveyed with or without guarantee of payment by the said president and directors, or may be mortgaged in like manner, at their discretion, as they may think best for the company." The defendant's counsel insists that the issuance of these bonds and coupons under this act was a pledging the credit of the county of Calhoun to the company, which, by the provisions of the constitution above stated, could not be made binding upon the tax-payers of the county, unless assented to by a majority of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the county, which, it is admitted, was never procured. This was but a means provided for the payment of an obligation already incurred. The act limits the amount to be issued to a sum sufficient to pay off and discharge this obligation, and unless it changes the amount and time of payment, can work no hardship upon the tax-payers, and the plea does not allege any such change; therefore without further comment or reference to authority, I must hold this objection not well taken.

But it is insisted on behalf of defendant that the bonds and coupons were not issued as directed by this act, in this that they were directed to be made payable to the president and directors of the Grenada, Houston & Eastern Railroad Company, their successors and assigns; whereas, they were made payable to the Grenada, Houston & Eastern Railroad Company, or bearer, and that this departure created them different obligations from those directed and intended, and renders them void and of no binding obligation. So far as the mere name of the payers, or payee of this obligation is concerned, it is sufficient if substantially the same. It was not intended to vest the president and directors of the company, as individuals, with any interest whatever; they were the mere agents of the corporation; the corporation was intended to be the payee, and such being the case, they could be sold, transferred and assigned as though made payable to the company by its corporate name. For authority to sustain this position, see Maddox v. Graham, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 78, and authorities therein referred to.

It is next insisted that it was the intention of the legislature that these obligations should be governed by what is known as the "anti-commercial statute" of this state, first passed in 1822 and continued in the Codes of 1857 and 1871, by which the holder of the obligations, therein made assignable so as to vest the legal title in the assignee and allow him to sue in his own name, holds the same, subject to the same infirmities and equities as existed against the payee when the assignment was made, and that these bonds being made payable to bearer, made them commercial paper, unimpeachable in the hands of a bona fide holder for value and without notice of such infirmities or equities, and hence different in their effect and binding obligation, and therefore void. This question has never before been presented to me, but questions arising under this anti-commercial statute are not new either to this court or to the supreme court of the state. The act is as follows: "All bonds, obligations, bills single, promissory notes and all other writings for the payment of money, or any other things, shall and may be assigned by endorsement, whether the same shall be made payable to the orders or assigns of the obligee or payee or not; and the assignee or endorser may sue in his own name and maintain any action which the obligee or payee might or could have sued or maintained thereon previous to assignment; and in all actions commenced or sued upon any such assigned bond or obligation, etc., the defendant shall be allowed the benefit of all want of lawful consideration, failure of consideration, payments, discounts and sets-off made or had against the same previous to the notice of the assignment, etc., in the same manner as if the same had been sued and prosecuted by the payee or obligee, and the assignee or endorsee may maintain an action against the person or persons who may have endorsed the same, as in case of inland bills of exchange."

I have, heretofore, decided, in construing this act, that it was intended to embrace such instruments only as were not before that time assignable under the laws in force in this state, so as to vest the holder with the legal title, and authorize suit thereon in the name of the assignee or endorsee, and not such instruments as before that time were negotiable and vested the legal title in the holder, with the right to sue in his own name, and in justice to the makers of such instruments reserved such equities which they might have before notice of such transfers. The obligations, the transfer of which are authorized, are such as are usually only transferred in the vicinity of their creation, and where it is an easy matter for the party desiring to take the transfer to enquire and ascertain whether there are any equities or off-sets against it. I am satisfied with this construction, and am not aware of a materially different construction having been given by the courts of the state obligatory upon this court. The high court of errors and appeals in the case of Craig v. City of Vicksburg, 2 George, 216; Stokes v. Winslow, Id. 518; Mercien v. Cotton, 5 George, 64; and Winstead v. Davis, 40 Miss. 785,—hold that bills, bonds and promissory notes payable to bearer, were negotiable at common law and not within the statute. So is a note made payable to the order of the maker, and endorsed in blank, not embraced within this anti-commercial provision. So is a note or other obligation made payable within another state, not so embraced, but is governed by the laws of the state where payment is to be made. As a general rule obligations made for the purpose of being thrown upon the market and becoming a portion of the circulating medium of the country in commercial transactions, are usually held as unimpeachable commercial obligations. These rules, I am satisfied, will be found sustained by the elementary books and adjudicated cases. The purpose of the issuance of these bonds and coupons must be ascertained from an examination of the powers given in the act itself, and the custom of the country with reference to similar obligations issued by other corporations and municipalities. The company was authorized to sell, transfer, assign and mortgage the same as the discretion of the president and directors might deem best for the company, thus giving them an unlimited power of disposition over them to raise money, or to be used in any other way deemed most to the interest of the company.

No restriction is placed upon the board of supervisors as to the time or place of payment, except that all shall be payable within ten years from their issuance. There being no restriction as to the place of payment, no reason is shown why they should not have been made payable in the city of New York, the great money centre of this country. At the time of their issuance, as now, there was but little money in this state for such investment; consequently the bonds, to subserve their purpose, had to be sold where there was a market for them. If these obligations were properly made payable in the city of New York, where commercial law prevails, and where obligations of this character are unimpeachable in the hands of a bona fide holder, then the objection under consideration must fail. Or if to carry out the purpose of their issuance by making them payable to bearer, the same result must follow.

I am satisfied, after a careful consideration of the act authorizing the issuance of these obligations, and the purpose for which they were issued, that no such departure from the provisions of the statute has been made as to invalidate them. Other reasons might be stated, but those given are deemed sufficient. According to the conclusions reached, these obligations could not be impeached if they were now held by the company, or that which has succeeded to the rights of the former company, the payees of these obligations. But being payable in the city of New York, and payable to bearer, they are unimpeachable in the hands of a bona fide holder without notice, the holder being only required to know that there was legal authority for their issuance, the bonds reciting upon their face that all the acts had been substantially performed that the act of the legislature, authorizing their issuance, required. To sustain this position I refer to many decisions made by the supreme court of the United States upon similar obligations, from the case of Commissioners of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 543, up to the present time, embracing one or more cases at every term of that court of last resort in the nation, and binding on this court at least.

Admitting that the objections insisted upon in these pleas were sufficient to have justified the defendant or the tax-payers to have restrained by injunction the board of supervisors from issuing these bonds, or the company from using or transferring them after issued, had it been done in time, yet having acquiesced for so long a time in their issuance and transfer into the hands of bona fide purchasers without notice of any objection, and until after contracts had been made and labor performed, I am inclined to the opinion it is now too late to raise the objection, but upon the other grounds stated, I am satisfied the demurrer to all these special pleas must be sustained, with leave to plead over. Sixty days allowed in which to plead.

NOTE. The act of 1860, is as follows: "The board of police of the several counties, Yallobusha, Calhoun, etc., through which the G. H. & E. R. R. may pass, may, for their respective counties, open (sic) such conditions as they think proper, subscribe for capital stock not to exceed in amount two hundred thousand dollars, for any one county. Provided, however, that an election shall be held in the county for and on account of which stock is proposed to be subscribed by the qualified electors thereof, at the regular precincts of said county, twenty days notice of the time of holding such election, and of the amount proposed to be subscribed, and in what number of installments, being first given by the board of police; and if at said election a majority of the qualified electors voting shall be in favor of such subscription, then said board shall make such subscription for and in behalf of the county, for the amount specified by the president of said board of police, subscribing the amount so specified to the capital stock of said company, but if a majority of those voting shall be opposed to such subscription, the same shall not be made." Section 1.

The clause of the new constitution, referred to, is as follows: "The legislature shall not authorize any county, city, or town, to become a stockholder in, or to lend its credit to any company, association, or corporation, unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city or town, at a special election, or regular election, to be held therein, shall assent thereto." Section 14, art. 12.

Section 4 of the act of 1871 is as follows: "That it shall and may be lawful for the board of supervisors" (former board of police) "of any county which shall have voted a tax as provided by this act, or of the act to which this act is amendatory" (i. e., act of 1860, supra), "to issue bonds due and payable at such time or times as said boards of supervisors may deem best for the tax-payers of their respective counties, not to extend beyond ten years from the date of issuance, for such sums as said boards of supervisors may deem necessary to meet, pay off and discharge the subscriptions of said counties, respectively, for capital stock in the G. H. & E. R. R. Co., which have been or which may hereafter be subscribed by said boards of supervisors, or by the boards of police (as the case may be), respectively, not to exceed the total sum of such stock subscriptions, which said bonds shall be signed by the president of the board of supervisors issuing the same, and be made payable to the president and directors of the G. H. & E. R. R. Co. and their successors and assigns, and may be assigned, sold and conveyed with or without guarantee of payment by the said president and directors, or may be mortgaged in like manner at their discretion, as they may deem best for the company."

WOODWARD (CORBETT v.). See Case No. 3,223.

Case No. 18,003.

WOODWARD v. DINSMORE.

[4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 163; Merw. Pat. Inv. 430.]¹
Circuit Court, D. Maryland. Feb., 1870.

PATENT FOR INVENTION — SOLAR CAMERA — REISSUED PATENT—NEW COMBINATION.

1. Under the doctrine of Battin v. Taggart, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 85, as in a cause in equity, the court passes on the facts as well as on the law, the original and reissued patents are for the court to construe and reconcile or declare to be irreconcilable.

2. It is immaterial whether or not the patentee could or did describe the rationale of his invention, if he gave the invention itself to the public.

3. Being the inventor of the device, he might subsequently, when he had it in his power to make fuller explanation of it, reissue and modify his claims.

4. An original and sole claim for the combination of a condensing lens, a photographic lens, a negative and an inclined mirror, might be amended on reissue by dropping the mirror from the combination.

5. Although the only change in an apparatus might consist in the substitution in the solar microscope of a photographic lens for a microscopic lens, yet if the latter did not produce the effect or perform the function of the former, it is a new and patentable combination.

¹ [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 430, contains only a partial report.]

[Cited in Rodebaugh v. Jackson, 37 Fed. 886; Consolidated Roller-Mill Co. v. Coombs, 39 Fed. 34.]

6. Even if the elements are unchanged, yet if with one arrangement they are incompetent to an end for which a different arrangement makes them competent, such new arrangement becomes patentable, unless it is such as would naturally suggest itself to persons skilled in the art to which the subject makes it akin.

7. The novelty of the Woodward solar camera examined and sustained.

This was a bill in equity filed to restrain the defendant [Christopher Dinsmore] from infringing letters patent [No. 16,700] for an "improvement in solar camera," granted to complainant [David A. Woodward] February 24, 1857, and reissued July 10, 1866 [No. 2,311]. The invention consisted in an apparatus for producing enlarged copies of photographic pictures, and consisted of the adaptation to the camera obscura of a lens for condensing the sun's rays, and focussing them at or near the achromatic lens.

The claim of the original patent was as follows: "Adapting to the camera obscura a lens and reflector in rear of the object glass, in such manner that it is made to answer the twofold purpose of a camera obscura and camera lucida, substantially as and for the purposes specified."

The claims of the reissued patent were: "(1) Adapting to the camera obscura a lens, or lenses, and reflector, in rear of the object glass, in such manner that it is made to answer the twofold purpose of a camera obscura and a camera lucida, substantially as and for the purposes specified. (2) The arrangement and combination of the condensing lens H, or lenses D', and E, negative slide or holder N, and achromatic lens or lenses B, made adjustable with regard to each other for condensing the sun's rays upon and through the negative, and focussing them upon prepared paper, canvas, or other suitable material for photographic purposes substantially as described."

Henry Stockbridge, H. L. Emmons, Jr., and J. H. B. Latrobe, for complainant.

Constant Guillon and Benjamin Price, for defendant.

GILES, District Judge. This case has been carefully and deliberately tried, after the fullest preparation, and with great ability. It involved matters altogether new to the court,—the principles of optics and the instruments and practice of photography,—and has received at the hands of the court the most attentive consideration.

The first question has been the validity of the reissued patent of 1866. Formerly, it seems to have been held, that the reissue was conclusive as to its own validity, except in cases of fraud and collusion; and it has been supposed that this was laid down in Stimpson v. Westchester R. Co., 4 How. [45

U. S.] 380. Whatever may be the construction given to the opinion in that case, I do not regard such doctrine to be law at this time, as the supreme court say, in the case of Battin v. Taggart, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 85, "the jury are also to judge of the novelty of the invention, and whether the reissued patent is for the same invention as the original patent." And as in a cause in equity, the court passes on the facts as well as on the law, therefore the original and the reissued patents are for the court to construe and reconcile, or to declare to be irreconcilable: and although the decision of the patent office is entitled to great weight, yet the reissue is but prima facie evidence, and the duty devolves on the court, as it has done in this case, to determine, whether the reissue claims more than the original specification shows the patentee to have invented.

Limited to the claim made in the original patent, the complainants would not be able to recover in the present case, because the reflector is there one of the elements of the combination claimed, and the defendant's apparatus is without one. In the reissued patent, while the patentee retains the first claim, he adds a claim, omitting the reflector, and claiming "the arrangement and combination of the condensing lens, the negative slide or holder, and achromatic lens or lenses made and adjusted, in regard to each other for condensing the sun's rays upon and through the negative, and focusing them upon prepared canvas or other suitable material for photographic purposes, substantially as described."

Now, while this is an addition to the claim of the original patent, it is fully warranted by the description contained in the specification and the drawings connected with it; and this being so, the complainant's case is exactly that which is provided for by the thirteenth section of the patent act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 122].

I am, by no means, sure that the complainant was, himself, aware of the rationale of his own invention, when he took out his patent in 1857. He did what never seems to have been done before. He made a great improvement, the value of which was at once recognized by the photographic world. But whether he was able, in his original specification, to give the rationale of his invention or not, he nevertheless gave the invention itself to the public. He was the first and original inventor in the eye of the law, and was entitled to a patent; and subsequently, when he had it in his power to make a fuller explanation, and more efficiently protect himself, he had a right to a reissue, and to claim the combination which made the sun's rays effective to produce the result, whether they were brought to bear directly upon the condensing lens, or were reflected by a mirror, for convenience sake, upon it. I hold the reissue, therefore, to be valid.

The next question was the originality of the invention; and here the opposing evidence was of two kinds: First, publications in printed works; second, oral testimony in regard to what was alleged to have been done before. Of the first kind, the publication in the Photographic Journal for 1856, was relied on, and, at first sight, the drawing looks very much like the patented invention. But it is only necessary to examine the same in connection with the references, to see that a most important element of the combination, a condensing lens, is altogether omitted. The French instruments were also relied on: but here, although these instruments have a condenser, the illustrative drawings show that the great principle of the Woodward camera does not exist in them. The rays from the condensing lens, instead of being focussed in the achromatic lens, including the negative within the cone of light formed by them, are focussed either before or behind the negative, and not at or near the achromatic lens, and the light in the camera being a diffused light, is wholly incompetent to produce the effect of the solar camera of the complainant. The other publications referred to by the defendants were even less like the patented invention than those just mentioned. The great principle of the solar camera is, in my opinion, altogether unaffected by the fact that the negative is moved, while the condensing and achromatic lenses are stationary. It comes to the same thing as though the negative were stationary and the two lenses were moved, provided they retained their relative positions. On referring to the testimony of the witnesses examined to prove the existence of a solar camera in Philadelphia, as far back as 1849, and in Cincinnati, at a later date, but anterior to Woodward's patent, with every possible disposition to accord to parties under oath, at all times, full credit in their sworn statements, I find it impossible to believe, that either the Philadelphia or Cincinnati instruments were solar cameras competent to do the work of the Woodward invention. To me, it seems that the Philadelphia invention was nothing more than a copying box, and the specimens of its work that have been exhibited are far from favorable. It is admitted to have been thrown aside and abandoned, and it did not make its appearance again until the success of Woodward and litigation brought it forward as a defense. I do not dwell upon the fact that there is evidence that shows, that whatever was done with it was done in private, because, as already stated, I have not been able to convince myself, that it was ever used except as a copying box. In regard to the Cincinnati invention, about whose date there is a good deal of uncertainty, the evidence shows that Hall sold the two instruments he made, one to Grob and the other to Sickendorff, and they have both been seen and described, and they never seem to have been competent to produce satisfactory results, and were considered by the purchasers worthless.

As I said before, in a case of this description, the court has, not only to pronounce the law, but to determine questions of fact in the capacity of a jury. It is thus that I am called upon to deal with the evidence before me, after its more careful elaboration by the respective counsel, and to state the impressions it has made on me. There is a fact connected with it, however, that I can not altogether pass without remark. Both the Philadelphia and Cincinnati alleged inventors were themselves experienced opticians, and one a photographer; and it is difficult to believe, that, if they had made an invention which is admitted by all parties, both in Europe and America, to be so valuable and important, neither would have claimed it. Nor can I well understand how, if the discovery had been made seven or eight years before the date of Woodward's patent, it would not have become known among the photographers of the country,—of whom some seven or eight of the most experienced have testified in this case,—and not one of whom knew any thing of the invention until after the date of the Woodward patent. As already said, with an habitual leaning to give the fullest credit to parties under oath, I am obliged to determine the question of originality in favor of the complainant.

A prominent feature of the defense, that was ably urged, was that the solar microscope was the same, in principle and mode of operation, as the solar camera; and it was insisted, that here, as well as in the solar camera, the rays that passed through the condenser were focussed at the enlarging lens. Still, in my judgment, this does not make the solar microscope the equivalent of the solar camera. The microscope, like the magic lantern, produces enlarged images of objects; but neither are competent to print the image on the screen on which the images are thrown, without development. In the microscope, this is owing, in part, to the want of that combination of the actinic and visual rays which is due to the photographic lens employed in the solar camera; and in answer to the argument, that a person wishing to employ a solar microscope for photographic purposes, on an enlarged scale, would only have to substitute a photographic lens in place of the microscopic lens, with a suitable arrangement to accommodate it and the negative,—and the only lenses used for photographic purposes being achromatic lenses,—it is to be said, that this changing of one of the elements of a combination that will not produce a desired effect, and substituting another that makes it effective, is to produce a new and patentable combination, and even if the elements are unchanged, yet if, with one arrangement they are incompetent to an end for which a different arrangement makes them competent, such new arrangement becomes patentable, unless it is such as would naturally suggest itself to persons skilled in the art to which the subject makes it akin.

That the substitution and arrangement, made by the complainant, did not naturally suggest themselves to the photographers in America or Europe,—although in both countries there were attempts made in this direction, beginning with such as may have been made in Philadelphia in 1849, and by Mr. Waldack in Belgium,—may be taken as sufficient proof, that they were not so used as to deprive the complainant of a patent for making them. The solar microscope and the photographic camera doubtless gave to the patentee the materials that he subsequently contrived and arranged in the solar camera. His merit consisted in being the first to combine the elements there taken from the two.

The last question is that of infringement. About this there can be no difficulty. It is settled by my decision sustaining the reissued patent. Whether the sun's rays are brought to bear directly upon the condensing lens, or through the agency of a mirror, can make no difference. The result is the same, and the mode in which the sun's rays are introduced, or made to strike upon the condenser at right angles to its plane, whether directly or by reflection, is immaterial. I sustain, therefore, the reissue, decide the question of originality in favor of the complainant; as well as the fact of infringement, and will sign a decree for a perpetual injunction.

WOODWARD (GARRETT v.). See Case No. 5,253.

Case No. 18,004.

WOODWARD v. GOULD.

[Cited in Brooks v. Jenkins, Case No. 1,953. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

WOODWARD (GRIFFIN v.). See Case No. 5,818.

Case No. 18,005.

WOODWARD v. HALL.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 235.] ¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1821.

DEPOSITION—SUFFICIENCY OF CERTIFICATE—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. The magistrate who takes a deposition under the act of congress must certify the reasons of its being taken.
2. The amount of the costs of a suit in New York may be proved by parol.

This was a suit brought to recover the amount of costs in an action in New York, for which the defendant had agreed to be responsible.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Law, for plaintiff, offered the deposition of Richard Riker, prothonotary of the court in New York, stating the amount of the costs taxed, and a copy of the bill of costs as taxed.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, objected that the judge who took the deposition had not certified the reasons of its being taken.

Mr. Law, contra. The judge certifies that the deponent is of New York, and a counselor at law, and that the deposition was taken at New York. The fact thus appears that the deponent resided more than one hundred miles from the place of trial, which is a good reason for taking the deposition.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) decided that the certificate was not sufficient, and for that reason rejected the deposition. But it was afterwards read, by consent, subject to the question as to the competency of the matter thereof.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, objected that the existence of the suit in New York, and the amount of the costs taxed, were matter of record, and could only be proved by an exemplification of the record; so, also, that the plaintiff was attorney in the cause. This is not a suit for the attorney's fees only, but for costs paid by the attorney.

Mr. Law, contra. The defendant, by his letter to the plaintiff, admits the existence of the suit in New York, which is equivalent to record evidence. Mr. Riker is the officer whose duty it was to tax the costs. When a cause is settled by the parties as this was, it is not necessary or usual to tax the costs.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the parol evidence was competent to prove the bill of costs.

WOODWARD (HUNT v.). See Case No. 6,901.

Case No. 18,006.

WOODWARD v. ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO.

[1 Biss. 403.] ¹

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. July Term, 1863.

BILL OF LADING—THROUGH CONTRACT—LIABILITY OF CARRIER—EXCEPTIONS IN BILL OF LADING—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—PORTION SAVED FROM FIRE.

1. A steamboat bill of lading for the delivery of goods at a certain point, specifying the rate of freight to a more distant point, is a through contract, and binds the carrier to deliver at the latter point.
2. Although common carriers generally contract for safe transit only over their own lines, there is no valid reason why they cannot contract for the safe conveyance of freight over the different lines of communication to its place of destination.
3. The exception from fire liability inserted in a bill of lading, does not excuse the carrier in all cases of destruction by fire; he is, notwithstanding, bound to use reasonable care and vigilance, such as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise over his own property.

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[Cited in brief in Gray v. Missouri River Packet Co., 64 Mo. 48.]

4. Fire having caught, the carrier is bound to do all that reasonable and prudent men could, to prevent the entire destruction of the property; otherwise he is responsible for so much as could have been reasonably saved.

5. Measure of damages is the net value of the property at its point of destination, deducting freight. Interest may also be added.

6. A portion of the goods having been saved from a car, loaded in part with plaintiff's property, and in part with property of other parties, the carrier, in the absence of proof that the portion saved had been delivered to the owners, is liable for that portion in any event.

In the fall of 1862, the plaintiffs, who were merchants in Baltimore through their agent, Mr. Meyer, purchased and forwarded to that and other eastern cities from Memphis, Tennessee, considerable quantities of cotton, the transit being over the road of the defendant. At that time Dan. Able & Co. were the agents of the defendant in Memphis, for the purpose of making contracts for the shipment of merchandise, and Graham, Able & Co. were the transfer agents of the defendant at Cairo, in the shipment of property from the railway to the river, and from the river to the railway. On the 24th of October, 1862, Mr. Meyer, as agent of the plaintiffs, shipped on the steamboat John H. Dickey, fifty bales of cotton, and took a bill of lading from Dan. Able & Co., as the agents of the defendant, in the following form—the words printed in italics being written—the remainder the ordinary printed form:

"Shipped by Dan. Able, (for account E. Meyer) forwarding and commission merchant, Bradley Block, foot of Jefferson street, in good order and condition, on board the good steamboat called the John H. Dickey, whereof — is master for the present voyage, the following articles being marked and numbered as below; and are to be delivered without delay in the like good order and condition at the port of Cairo, (fire and unavoidable dangers of the river only excepted), unto Graham, Able & Co., or to their assigns, he or they paying freight at the rate of two and 97-100 dollars per 100 lbs. through to Baltimore, and charges. In witness whereof the owner, master, or clerk of said boat hath affirmed to five bills of lading all of this tenor and date, one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void.

"Dated at Memphis the 24 day of Oct., 1862.

Marks.	Articles.	Weight.
L. D. from 1 to 50	(50) Fifty bales cotton.

"Not accountable for condition, hoops off or bagging torn, and owner assumes all risk of fire and unavoidable accidents en route to destination.

"W. G. Cirode,
"For Dan'l Able & Co.,
"Agents Ills. Central R. R.
"For Woodward, Baldwin & Co.,
"Baltimore, Md."

A few days thereafter, the cotton, having arrived at Cairo, was placed on what are called platform cars on the railway, and on the 30th of October, while the train which carried the cotton was proceeding from Prairie Green to Ashkum, a station about seventy miles from Chicago, the cotton took fire, from a fire on or near the railway, and was almost entirely consumed. The plaintiffs thereupon brought an action upon the case against the company as common carriers. The bill of lading was introduced by the defense, the company claiming that under the exception as to fire they could not be held liable.

Gookins, Thomas & Roberts, for plaintiffs.

McAllister, Jewett & Jackson, for defendant.

DAVIS, Circuit Justice (charging jury). There is no question that the agents of the Illinois Central Railroad, at Memphis, did contract with the agents of the plaintiffs for the safe delivery of this cotton, either at Cairo or Baltimore. It is contended by the plaintiffs' counsel that the bill of lading, given in evidence, was only the contract of the parties as far as Cairo; and that from Cairo the general responsibility of common carriers must attach. The court is of a different opinion, and holds that the bill of lading in this case, which is the contract between the parties, and by which their rights are to be determined, binds the defendant to deliver the cotton safely at Baltimore, unless it should be destroyed by fire. Common carriers, whether steamboats or railroads, generally contract for the safe transit of freight only as far as their railroad or steamboat route extends. But there is no valid reason why the Illinois Central Railroad Company, if it chooses to employ agents at Memphis to feed the road, cannot make a contract there for the safe conveyance of freight, over the different lines of communication, to its place of destination.

Evidence has been given tending to show the existence of a custom, at Cairo, for the railroad company to give the steamboat a receipt for goods delivered, and in the absence of such receipt in this case, it is argued that the cotton could not have been received on this bill of lading.

This is a question of fact for you to determine. If it was the intention to send the cotton by way of the Illinois Central Railway, and the jury find that the cotton was actually received on the road, and transported over it in pursuance of the bill of lading in evidence, then the bill of lading is the contract between the parties, and it is immaterial whether the usual receipt was given at Cairo or not. A bill of lading usually particularizes the articles carried as freight, but it frequently specifies the terms on which the freight is carried, and by those terms the parties are bound. Common carriers, in the absence of express contracts, are insurers of the freight carried by them, and are only exempt from liability, when the injury is the result of the "act of God," or open public enemies. But common carriers have a right to restrict their liability, especially when so inflammable an article as cotton is offered to them for transportation. And in this case, if the jury believe that the cotton was shipped over the Illinois Central Railroad on this bill of lading, then the clause exempting the road from liability for loss or damage by fire, is operative, and binds both shipper and carrier.

It is proved, that on the 30th day of October last, this cotton was burned near Ashkum station, on the Illinois Central Railroad, while on the cars of the road on its way from Cairo to Chicago. The exemption from fire liability, inserted in a bill of lading, does not excuse the carrier in all cases of destruction by fire. A carrier, notwithstanding that objection, is bound to use reasonable care and vigilance in the transportation of freight, such care and vigilance as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise over his own property; and if, for the want of them, loss occurs, the liability attaches. If loss results from a fire that could not have been prevented by any reasonable degree of vigilance, and could not have been foreseen by care and prudence, the carrier is discharged.

It is for you, gentlemen, applying the rule of liability to the facts, to determine whether blame attached to the servants of the defendant. You must first decide upon the origin of the fire. If the fire originated on the east of the road, was smouldering there when the train of cars passed by, and was blown into a flame by the wind caused by the motion of the cars, and could not have been foreseen or guarded against by reasonable care and watchfulness on the part of the employes of the road, then you should find for the defendant. But if, on the contrary, the cotton was destroyed by a fire which was burning the prairie on the west, running directly to the road, in full view of every one, then it is for the jury to say whether it was not an act of gross negligence to run a train into the fire, or across it. And whether a conductor, who had a proper consideration for the value of the property entrusted to him, should not have stopped his train until all danger from fire had passed.

The evidence is conflicting. It is for you to reconcile it. There is no artificial rule of evidence to control your belief. You should, in weighing testimony, regard the appearance of the witness on the stand, his manner of testimony, the readiness with which he answers cross interrogatories, as well as direct ones; the consistency of his statements with any of the admitted facts of the case, and the intelligence with which he testifies. If you should come to the conclusion that the fire was communicated to the cotton, without any fault of the servants of the defendant, then you will consider whether, after the fire ignited the cotton, they did all that reasonable men could have done to prevent its entire destruction. After the cotton caught fire they were bound to exert themselves, as fair and prudent men should, to save as much of the cotton as possible. If they did not put forth the necessary efforts to save the burning cotton, then the defendant is responsible for so much of the cotton as could have reasonably been saved. If the jury should find that the fire was communicated to the cotton by means of such negligence as would be inexcusable in a prudent man when managing his own property, then they will find for the plaintiffs the net value of the cotton at Baltimore, which was its market value there at the time of its loss, deducting freight. The jury will also add interest.

There is evidence that there were two bales of cotton saved from a car loaded in part with cotton for a firm in New York, and which were not delivered either to the plaintiffs or the New York firm. The plaintiffs having entrusted cotton on that particular car, to the defendant, the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that the two bales saved from the fire did not belong to the plaintiffs. Having offered no evidence on that point, the jury will, in any event, find for the plaintiffs, the value of those two bales.

The jury failed to agree.

For report of next trial and citation of authorities, see [Case No. 18,007].

Case No. 18,007.

WOODWARD v. ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO.

[1 Biss. 447; 1 5 Leg. Op. 92.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. May Term, 1864.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIER—DUE CARE AND DILIGENCE—PRECAUTIONS AGAINST FIRE—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—THROUGH BILL OF LADING.

1. Under a contract exempting a carrier from liability in case of fire, he becomes an ordinary bailee, and is held only to that kind of care and diligence applicable to a bailee under the circumstances of the case. He is still held to due care and diligence as to the kind and quality of cars, the running and management of trains, the proper precautions against fire, etc., having reference to the season of the year, the character of the property, the country through which it was to be carried and the nature of the transit.

2. Though the property catches fire without the negligence of the carrier, if his agents do not make all proper and necessary efforts to save it, he is still responsible for all that might have been saved. For any portion saved, the carrier is responsible, no matter what afterwards becomes of it.

3. The measure of damages is the value of the property at the contracted destination, at the time when it should have arrived there, deducting freight. The jury may also allow additional damages by way of interest.

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

4. A steamboat bill of lading for the shipment of goods at Memphis, to be delivered at Cairo, specifying the rate of freight through to Baltimore, and signed by the agents of the connecting railroad company, is a contract for through shipment, and the railroad company are entitled to the benefit of the exceptions contained in the bill of lading.

Action against the defendant as a common carrier, to recover the value of one-hundred bales of cotton burned on the cars in transit. The statement of the case will be found in [Case No. 18,006.]

Gookins, Thomas & Roberts, for plaintiffs.
McAllister, Jewitt & Jackson, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge (charging jury). Under the uncontroverted facts of the case, the true construction of the bill of lading is that it was a contract for the shipment of the cotton from Memphis to Baltimore, and that the rights of the parties are to be controlled by it. There is no evidence of any other or different contract at Cairo concerning the transit of the property.

By the terms of this contract, therefore, the defendant was not to be held responsible in the case of a loss by an accidental fire, if the defendant used due care in transporting the cotton. When the defendant has shown that the cotton has been destroyed in whole or in part by fire, then he is prima facie relieved from responsibility for such destruction, and the shipper must show that the carrier has been guilty of negligence or of a want of due care in relation to it.

Where property is transported by a carrier, under a contract exempting him from liability in a case of fire, he in that respect becomes an ordinary bailee and is held only to that kind of care and diligence applicable to a bailee under the circumstances of the case.

Notwithstanding the clause of exemption in the contract, the defendant was required to use due care and diligence in transporting the cotton, as to the kind and quality of the cars, as to the running and management of the trains, as to the proper means of extinguishing fires caused by a spark from the engine or otherwise, and as to the train hands;—having reference to the season of the year, the character of the property, of the country through which it was to be carried, and the nature of the transit, viz: by railroad.

An illustration often given of the kind of care and diligence required, is that care and diligence which a prudent person, under similar circumstances, would exercise over his own property.

Did the defendant use such care in this case? It is to enable the jury to answer this question that the evidence on both sides has been principally directed. It is contended on the part of the plaintiffs, that there was a want of proper care in many, or all, of these respects, and particularly in running the train, under the circumstances in proof, from Prairie Green to Ashkum. It is insisted on the part of the defendant, that all due care was used in every respect.

Before you can determine as to one point,—the prudence of running the train then and there,—you must ascertain, if possible, what appeared on the face of the prairie and on the line of the road to those who had the management of the train. By what they saw, or by what they could have seen by the exercise of proper diligence, it is to be determined whether, or not, they acted prudently. The position of the plaintiffs is that there was a fire on the prairie, on the track, or so near as to indicate to the managers of the train great danger and risk in proceeding. The position of the defendant is, that there was no such fire on or near the track as to show a reasonable probability of danger, but that there was a smoldering fire, so slight as not to attract attention, which was wafted into a flame by the wind created by the motion of the train. What was the condition of the track and its immediate vicinity at the time? Was it prudent, under the circumstances, to run the train as it was run,—that is, did it seem prudent to those having the management of the train, they exercising due care and diligence; because you must bear in mind you are not to judge by the event, but by what appeared at the time.

If there was a want of due care and diligence on the part of the defendant in any respect, and thereby the cotton was destroyed, then the defendant should be held responsible for the loss, otherwise not. If you shall find that the burning was not occasioned by the want of due care and diligence on the part of the defendant, then the next question is, did the agents of the defendant make all proper and necessary efforts to save the property, and was any of it destroyed in consequence of the want of such efforts. If so, then the defendant ought to be held answerable for all that could have been so saved. But you will determine this by the actual circumstances surrounding them, and with the means and appliances at their command. It was not, of course, necessary that they should incur actual danger to their persons by fire, but only that they should do all in their power to preserve the property, having reference to the rapidity of the fire and the means at their disposal.

The only ground upon which the defendant can escape liability under its contract is by showing that the cotton was destroyed by fire; for whatever was not destroyed by fire, no matter who took it or what became of it, the defendant is answerable. In addition to what was taken by the persons who came to the train, there were two bales saved. For all this the defendant must be held accountable in any event, because, I think, it was incumbent on the defendant to show to whom the cotton saved belonged, if it did not belong to the plaintiffs. If there were two fires on the prairie, the want of diligence must have been in reference to that fire which destroyed the cotton.

Whether the jury shall find for the plaintiffs for the whole or a part of the loss, the measure of damages in either case will be the value of the cotton at Baltimore when it should have arrived there, but for the loss, deducting the freight; and the jury may, if they choose so to do, allow additional damages by way of interest.

Verdict for plaintiffs of $10,000.

NOTE. As to measure of damages in loss, see Krohn v. Oechs, 48 Barb. 127; Adams Express Co. v. McDonald, 1 Bush, 32; Rice v. Ontario Steamboat Co., 56 Barb. 384; Bazin v. Steamship Co. [Case No. 1,152]. That carriers may limit their liability, but not as against their own negligence, Seller v. The Pacific, 1 Or. 409; Merriman v. The May Queen [Case No. 9,481]; Beck v. Evans, 16 East, 244; Birkett v. Willan, 2 Barn. & Ald. 356; Brooke v. Pickwick, 4 Bing. 218; Parsons v. Monteath, 13 Barb. 353; Stoddard v. Long Island R. Co., 5 Sandf. 180; Western Transp. Co. v. Newhall, 24 Ill. 466; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Adams, 42 Ill. 474; Goldey v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 30 Pa. St. 242; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Morrison, 19 Ill. 136; Ashmore v. Pennsylvania Steam Towing Transp. Co., 4 Dutch. [28 N. J. Law] 180. For a similar case of loss of cotton by fire, see Levering v. Union Transp. Co., 42 Mo. 88.

Common carrier, undertaking to deliver at a certain point, is liable, though the loss occur beyond its line. Barter v. Wheeler, 49 N. H. 9; Perkins v. Portland R. Co., 47 Me. 573; Peet v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 19 Wis. 118; Morse v. Brainerd, 41 Vt. 550; Tuckerman v. Stephens Transp. Co., 3 Vroom [32 N. J. Law] 320; Mosher v. Southern Exp. Co., 38 Ga. 37; Southern Exp. Co. v. Shea, Id. 519; Nashua Lock Co. v. Worcester & N. R. Co., 48 N. H. 339; Fatnam v. Cincinnati R. Co., 2 Disn. 248; Schneider v. Evans, 25 Wis. 241. Receiving payment for the whole route is evidence of the undertaking and liability. Muschamp v. Lancaster & P. J. R. Co., 8 Mees. & W. 421, which is the leading English case, and followed in Crouch v. Great Western R. Co., 2 Hurl. & N. 491, and 3 Hurl. & N. 183; St. John v. Van Santvoord, 25 Wend. 660 (reversed in 6 Hill, 157); Wilcox v. Parmelee, 3 Sandf. 610; Willey v. West Cornwall Ry. Co., 2 Hurl. & N. 703; Noyes v. Rutland & B. R. Co., 27 Vt. 110; Kyle v. Laurens R. Co., 10 Rich. Law, 332; Hart v. Rensselaer & S. R. Co., 8 N. Y. 37; Scothorn v. South Staffordshire R. Co., 8 Exch. 341; Wilson v. York, N. & B. R. Co., 18 Eng. Law & Eq. 557; Webber v. Great Western R. Co., 3 Hurl. & C. 771.

The court of appeals of New York, have lately laid down the important distinction, that where a common carrier under a special contract, limiting his common law liability, undertakes to carry to the terminus of his line, and there deliver to another carrier, he has no authority on behalf of the owner to contract with the second carrier limiting his liability; the full common law liability attaches to the latter at once. Babcock v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 491. Effect of receipting for goods marked to a point beyond terminus, Id.

A carrier receiving goods marked for a certain place, undertakes to deliver at that place, and is liable for a loss beyond his line. Illinois Cent.

R. Co. v. Johnson, 34 Ill. 389; Angle v. Mississippi & M. R. Co., 9 Iowa, 489; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Frankenberg, 54 Ill. 88; Watson v. Ambergate N. & B. R. Co., 3 Eng. Law & Eq. 497; Coxon v. Great Western Ry., 5 Hurl. & N. 274.

A railroad company selling tickets over its own and other roads is liable for the safety of baggage to the point of destination. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Copeland, 24 Ill. 332; contra, Straiton v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 2 E. D. Smith, 184; Wilcox v. Parmelee, 3 Sandf. 610; Quimby v. Vanderbilt, 17 N. Y. 315; Candee v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 21 Wis. 582; Cary v. Cleveland & T. R. Co., 29 Barb. 35. This is the English rule. Thomas v. Rhymney Ry. Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 266; Great Western Ry. Co. v. Blake, 7 Hurl. & N. 987; and in Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Merriman, 52 Ill. 123, the carrier was held liable for a loss beyond his line on a through contract under the bill of lading; even though it limited the liability to loss on the line of the company. Nor does "privilege of reshipping" affect his liability for safe delivery at destination. Little v. Semple, 8 Mo. 99.

Consult also Jenneson v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co., 4 Am. Law Reg. 234; Rome R. Co. v. Sullivan, 25 Ga. 228; Brintnall v. Saratoga & W. R. Co., 32 Vt. 665; Johnson v. New York Cent. R. Co., 33 N. Y. 610. But in Naugatuck R. Co. v. Waterbury Button Co., 24 Conn. 468, it was held that a railroad company could not contract to carry beyond its own limits, and in Northern R. Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co., 6 Allen, 254, the first company was considered as a forwarding agent. Also in Briggs v. Boston & L. R. Co., Id. 246, and in Connecticut and Massachusetts, the courts have refused to extend liability beyond the carrier's line. Hood v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 22 Conn. 1; Elmore v. Naugatuck R. R., 23 Conn. 457; Converse v. Norwich & W. T. Co., 33 Conn. 166; Nutting v. Connecticut River R. Co., 1 Gray, 502; Darling v. Boston & W. R. Co., 11 Allen, 295; Gass v. New York, P. & B. R. Co., 99 Mass. 220; Burroughs v. Norwich & W. R. Co., 100 Mass. 26; Hill Manuf'g Co. v. Boston & L. R. Co., 104 Mass. 122. The tendency of the courts, however, and the weight of authority, as well as the better reason, seems to be to hold common carriers liable to the destination to which they profess to convey.

Case No. 18,008.

WOODWARD v. MORRISON et al.

[Holmes, 124; 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 357; 2 O. G. 120; Merw. Pat. Inv. 126.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. March 22, 1872.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — FLOUR PASTE — INFRINGEMENT — SUBSTITUTION OF CHEMICAL EQUIVALENTS.

1. An invention of a flour-paste containing corrosive sublimate to prevent putrefaction, but in such small quantities in proportion to the flour that its poisonous and corrosive qualities are neutralized by the flour and the paste thus rendered innocuous, is not anticipated by a flour-paste in which a larger proportion of corrosive sublimate was used for the purpose of making the paste poisonous and corrosive.

2. A patent for a compound is infringed by the manufacture of a compound in which known chemical equivalents are substituted for one or more of the elements of the compound.

¹ [Reported by Jabez S. Holmes, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 126, contains only a partial report.]

3. The use of chemical equivalents in place of one or more of the elements of a patented compound may infringe the patent for the compound, although in some respects the substituted equivalents are improvements.

4. A specification in a patent of the mechanical parts or chemical ingredients of the patented invention, includes known mechanical or chemical equivalents of the parts or ingredients named.

5. If there are equivalents existing, but previously unknown to ordinarily skilful mechanics or chemists, these are not included in the specification, unless expressly stated therein.

6. The complainant's patent was for a paste having as one of its ingredients chloride of sodium. The defendant, in the manufacture of paste, used chloride of zinc, a known chemical equivalent of chloride of sodium, for such purpose, the other ingredients being the same as complainant's. Held, that the defendant infringed; it appearing that in the process of manufacture, chloride of zinc produced practically the same result, in the same way, as chloride of sodium.

Bill in equity [by Joseph Woodward against L. P. Morrison and others] to restrain alleged infringement of letters-patent [No. 52,779] for a paste for bookbinders, granted the complainant Feb. 20, 1866.

James B. Robb, for complainant.

B. C. Moulton, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This suit is founded on letters-patent of the United States granted to the complainant on the twentieth day of February, 1866, as the inventor of a new article of manufacture, "an improved prepared paste for bookbinders;" that is, paste deprived of its tendency to putrefaction and fermentation, and made a standard article of commerce.

To a proper understanding of the case it is necessary at the outset to give a construction to the claim in the complainant's patent. The claim is substantially for, "as a new article of manufacture," a new and improved prepared paste, consisting in the addition of ingredients to the common article of paste used by bookbinders and others, and usually formed of wheat-flour and water, which ingredients shall have a chemical action upon the flour or equivalent substance, so as to preserve it in condition for use for any desired length of time,—the preparation to consist of the following ingredients, in substantially the following proportions: flour, two pounds; chloride of sodium, one ounce; alum, one quarter ounce; bichloride of mercury, six grains; and so made and compounded as to obviate the objection which would naturally arise from the use of the rank poison, corrosive sublimate, in this composition, by the well-known fact in chemistry, that the gluten of the flour acts as an antidote to the poisonous qualities of the bichloride of mercury, thus rendering the compound innocuous and harmless. The paste in common use is usually formed of wheat-flour and water. The wheat-flour contains vegetable albumen, fibrine, gluten, and other albuminous or nitrogenous bodies; also, starch, sugar, gum, and other non-nitrogenous bodies. While the non-nitrogenous constituents have intrinsically no power or tendency to pass into decay or change in composition, the other albuminous or nitrogenous constituents, when exposed to moderately heated air in a moist condition, begin to putrefy and decompose, and when in that state they are brought in contact with the starch, sugar, gum, and other non-nitrogenous constituents, they cause them also to change into other compounds, and it is this process that constitutes fermentation. The object of this invention was to prevent this fermentation, by which the common flour-paste soon becomes unfit for use, and to produce that effect by means which should not impart to the paste corrosive or poisonous properties, and thus to prevent the great waste which necessarily resulted from the souring of the paste, and thus to make flour-paste a standard article of commerce.

We proceed now to consider the state of the art prior to the date of the complainant's invention. Flour-paste had been made with an admixture of alum and water, with an admixture of salt, and with the addition of corrosive sublimate, long before the date of complainant's patent. In fact, preserved paste had been made containing every ingredient that Woodward's patent contains, separately, and every ingredient in combination except salt; but from the evidence in the case it does not appear that any prepared paste had been previously made containing in combination every ingredient that Woodward's patent contains, in substantially the same proportions, for substantially the same purposes, or effecting substantially the same results.

Corrosive sublimate, or bichloride of mercury, had been used by Dr. Turner in the year 1847, and subsequently mixed with alum and water, in a paste by which he secured paper-labels to wooden boxes; but he used corrosive sublimate and other poisons in his paste, because the boxes contained pills manufactured to be sold in the Southern markets, and the paste was purposely made poisonous to prevent insects from destroying the labels, boxes, and contents. When, therefore, he used corrosive sublimate, it was not in such small quantities, or in such proportions to the flour, that the poisonous or corroding qualities were neutralized by the chemical action of the albuminous bodies in the flour, but in such quantities and proportions as were intended to leave, and did leave, the prepared paste corroding, poisonous, and destructive to animal life. Noah, one of the respondents, who manufactured from scraps of leather inner-soles and layers of leather to be pasted together for heels and stiffenings, had also used corrosive sublimate in his paste to kill the rats that trouled him by eating the paste between the layers of the leather. In "Cooley's Cyclo-pedia of Practical Receipts," London, 1856, it was stated, on page 938, that the addition of a few drops of creosote, or oil of cloves, or a little powdered camphor, colocynth, or corrosive sublimate (especially the first two and the last), will prevent insects from attacking it (paste), and preserve it in covered vessels for years; and on page 216 of the same book, "the addition of a few grains of corrosive sublimate or a few drops of creosote will prevent it turning mouldy, and is said to preserve it for years." Salt, or chloride of sodium, had also been used in paste long before the complainant's invention.

What, then, remained to be discovered in the art of making a prepared paste as a standard article of commerce? It was known that corrosive sublimate and other poisonous substances might be used for the purpose of arresting or preventing spontaneous decomposition of the paste, and also for preventing the attacks of vermin or insects on the paste. It does not appear to have been known that paste could be preserved by means of these substances, without making a corrosive and poisonous composition, unsafe to handle, and to a certain extent unfit to use. The desired result which remained to be attained was to arrest the fermentation and prevent the spontaneous decomposition and consequent great waste of the paste without making a composition corrosive or poisonous. The complainant, who was a paper-hanger, and whose attention was therefore constantly directed to the necessity of attaining this new and improved result in the manufacture of paste, seems to have devoted much time and study to the investigation of the theory of fermentation, and to experimenting with various substances known to possess the property of arresting the different kinds of fermentation to which the different ingredients or constituents of flour were subject. He did not discover that the poisonous qualities of corrosive sublimate were neutralized by albumen, but he does appear first to have discovered that by the use of a quantity of corrosive sublimate, so small that its poisonous qualities were neutralized by the albuminous bodies in the flour, a comparatively large quantity of paste could be preserved from putrefactive decomposition. He also appears to have ascertained, and practically to have demonstrated by experiment, that in the manufacture of the article of common paste, as previously made with flour-water and alum, a practically useful and beneficial result and improvement in the manufactured product was attained, beyond the use of the few grains of corrosive sublimate with each pound of flour, by the addition of chloride of ammonium, or chloride of sodium, or some salt or substance (equivalent to these for the desired result) which was soluble in the aqueous solution of corrosive sublimate, or in the same solution in which that was soluble. Of these, for this purpose, equivalent salts, he selected for the formula in his patent the chloride of sodium, because it was attainable at a less price than the others. The experts examined by the respective parties differ widely in some respects as to the chemical or other actions of the chloride of sodium in the composition of the complainant's product. Professor Babcock, examined by the complainant, testifies that, first, "it tends partly to preserve the paste;" second, "it is useful also in raising the boiling-point of the water of which the paste is made, enabling the paste to receive a higher temperature without burning;" and, third, that "it is of advantage in increasing the solubility of the bichloride of mercury so as to carry it more thoroughly into the body of the paste." Dr. Adams, an expert examined by the defendants, says the "salt may increase the solubility of the corrosive sublimate, but it has little or no preservative action on the constituents of the flour." Mr. Merrick, also examined by the defendants, is "not aware that it has any effect, unless it may possibly tend to raise the boiling-point of the paste." Upon this evidence the court could not be expected to decide that in the process of manufacture as described in the complainant's patent, there was no practical advantage or utility in the admixture of the chloride of sodium with the other ingredients; and, for the purpose of determining the question of the novelty and utility of the invention, it is not necessary to decide between the conflicting theories of scientific experts as to the exact extent of its utility or the precise nature of its chemical or other action. We see no reason from the evidence in this case to doubt that the complainant was the original and first inventor of a new and useful prepared paste, as claimed in his patent, and that the letters-patent issued to him therefor are good and valid.

The question whether the defendants by the manufacture of the paste made by them, and which in their answer they admit to be made according to the specifications of the patent granted to George G. Noah, one of the defendants, more than four years after the grant of the letters-patent to complainant, infringe upon the rights of the complainant, is one a solution of which is much more difficult and intricate. The defendants make a paste possessing the same properties as complainant's paste in its freedom from tendency to putrefaction and fermentation, and from being corrosive and poisonous. The ingredients of the defendants' paste are the same as those of complainant, except the substitution of the chloride of zinc in the defendants' for the chloride of sodium in the complainant's, and the addition in the defendants' of two or three drops of the oil of cloves. The ingredients and the proportions thereof in their respective formulas of manufacture, as stated in the respective patents, are as follows:

Complainant's.	Defendants'.
Flour, 2 pounds.	Flour, 100 pounds.
Common salt (chloride of sodium, Na. Cl.), 1 ounce.	Chloride of zinc, 5 pounds.
Alum, $\frac{1}{4}$ ounce.	Alum, 5 pounds.
Corrosive sublimate (bichloride of mercury, Hg. Cl.), 6 grains.	Bichloride of Mercury, 1 ounce.
	Oil of cloves, $\frac{1}{2}$ ounce.

Although the proportions of these ingredients differ, as stated in the formulas in the respective patents, yet taking into consideration these two facts,—first, that the defendants use the solution of chloride of zinc instead of the dry salt, five pounds of the former being equal to three pounds of the latter; and the other fact, that the corrosive sublimate is so acted upon by the oil of cloves that a portion of it is changed to calomel, which is not proved to have any antiseptic or otherwise beneficial effect on the paste, and therefore may be rejected,—it will be found that, when the formulas in the respective patents are applied to the same aggregate quantities, the proportions of the essential ingredients will be substantially identical in both.

Regarding the invention or subject-matter of the complainant's patent as an entirely new manufacture, it might perhaps be sufficient in this case to find, what we think the evidence discloses, that the defendants make substantially the same thing, whether by the same or a different process. The defence is put substantially on the ground, that, in the manufacture of the defendants' paste, the substitution of one class of ingredients in the place of another described in the complainant's specification renders their process substantially different from the process of complainant. It is necessary, therefore, to determine whether in this composition of matter the defendants have or have not substituted in the place of one or more elements, known chemical equivalents; for by such substitution of chemical equivalents, patents may as well be infringed as by mechanical equivalents. When a new composition of matter or process of manufacture is invented and patented, it is easy for the chemist, with the aid of the specification in the inventor's patent, to suggest changes in the process by the substitution of chemical equivalents which may produce similar or better results. It does not necessarily follow that such a use of chemical equivalents would not infringe the patent, even if in some respects they were improvements on the original process patented.

Four classes of ingredients are common to the two patents. The first class of substances common to both is found in the material which gives the adhesiveness and forms the paste; viz., the flour. The second class is the bichloride of mercury, which arrests the putrefactive decomposition of the flour by its antiseptic action. The third class is a metallic chloride, which increases the solubility and assists in the diffusion through the mass of the paste of the bichloride of mercury, and perhaps performs another function in preventing the fermentive action of the glucose on the starch. The fourth class is alum, a substance added to give greater body to the paste. The materials used in the first, second, and fourth classes are identical in the process of the complainant and the defendants. In the third class, the material in each is a metallic chloride,—in one the chloride of sodium, in the other the chloride of zinc. Is the metallic chloride which the defendant uses in his process a known chemical equivalent for the metallic chloride which the complainant uses,—not a chemical equivalent in every respect and for every purpose, but an equivalent in this particular process, contributing to produce the same composition of matter by substantially the same chemical action in combination with the other ingredients of the product? Such chemical equivalents are referred to in both patents, the complainant's patent claiming in terms the use of substantially the same or equivalent articles, if they accomplish the same purpose in substantially the same manner, and the respondents' specifying the other salts of zinc, such as the sulphate and acetate, and also the chloride and the sulphate of copper, as equivalents to be used in place of the chloride of zinc.

Now, it is obvious that, for all purposes and in combination with all other substances, the chloride of zinc is no more a chemical equivalent for the chloride of sodium than, under all possible conditions, the sulphate of copper referred to in the specification of defendants' patent would be a chemical equivalent for the chloride of zinc; but it is equally obvious from the testimony in this case that, for the purposes of manufacturing the product of a preserved and innocuous paste, the chloride of sodium and the chloride of zinc are, when used as described in the respective patents, practically the equivalents of each other, because in the process of manufacture they practically produce the same results. Starting from the platform of the complainant's patent, with the advantage of his discoveries, it is plain that the defendant could, by inquiring of any chemist, have learned that the one could be used in this process in place of the other, with like results. This information he appears to have obtained of Dr. Jackson. From him or some other chemist, he obtained the information that the other salts of zinc and the other salts of copper would for this purpose be the chemical equivalents of each other, and of the chloride of zinc. His knowledge in either case was not the result of discovery or experiment. He appears to have started with an appropriation of the complainant's invention, and to have proceeded in precisely the same way as a person who, after having examined a patent for a machine containing several well-known mechanical contrivances in combination, should go to a mechanical expert to substitute some one or more mechanical equivalents for the contrivances in the patented machine, hoping thereby to take his machine out of the monopoly of the patent.

Every specification is to be read as if by persons acquainted with the general facts of the mechanical or chemical science involved in such inventions. The specification of the parts in a mechanical or chemical process is a specification to ordinarily skilful mechanics or chemists of the well-known mechanical or chemical equivalents. If there are equivalents, mechanical or chemical, existing, but previously unknown to ordinarily skilful mechanics or chemists, these are not included in the specification, unless expressly stated therein. These are, in fact, new discoveries in themselves, independent of the specification, and may be used by all persons without infringing the patent.

It is further claimed that, by the action of the oil of cloves in the defendants' formula upon the corrosive sublimate, calomel is produced; and therefore the corrosive sublimate does not act upon the albumen in the flour, forming an albuminate of mercury, as in the complainant's process. But it is evident from the proofs in the case, that only a portion of the bichloride of mercury is thus acted upon by the oil of cloves, leaving sufficient for the action upon the albuminous portion of the flour, which the defendant describes in his specification, by stating, that "the objection to the use of corrosive sublimate in this composition is met by the fact that the gluten of the flour neutralizes the poisonous effect of the corrosive sublimate." The practical effect of the addition of the oil of cloves in the defendants' process, upon the bichloride of mercury, seems only to convert a portion of it into a substance of little or no use in the process, and to leave the chemical action of the residue upon the nitrogenous portions of the flour identical, substantially, with that in the complainant's patent, both as to the compound formed and the proportions of the elements effectually operative in forming it. If the preservative action in the defendants' paste results from the action of the chloride of zinc, and is not due to the action of the bichloride of mercury upon the albuminous portions of the flour, defendants can omit the use of the corrosive sublimate, or any well-known chemical equivalent of it, and make a paste which would not infringe upon the rights of the complainant. The essence of the complainant's discovery was, that the use of a very minute quantity of corrosive sublimate (in the proportion of about three grains to a pound of flour) would, in combination with another chloride or equivalent salt, arrest the tendency to fermentation in the paste, without imparting to it any poisonous properties.

The conclusion, therefore, to be deduced from the evidence in the case is, that, so far as the ingredients in the two pastes are different, they are substantially the equivalents of each other, and, if there be any slight difference in the specific action of any of the ingredients upon each other, yet that the general results produced by the action upon each other of the several ingredients are alike, and the two pastes are substantially the same.

Decree for complainant.

WOODWARD (SMITH v.). See Case No. 13,129.

Case No. 18,009.

WOODWARD et al. v. SUTTON et al.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 351.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1806.

PLEADING AND PROOF.

It is not incumbent upon joint plaintiffs to prove that they are joint partners.

Assumpsit [by James Woodward and others against Sutton & Mandeville] for goods sold and delivered. The plaintiffs' witness deposes that the goods were sold to the defendants by Woodward & Co.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, having required proof that the plaintiffs were the persons who constituted the firm of Woodward & Co., and having referred to the case of Tibbs v. Parrott [Case No. 14,023],—

Mr. Swann had leave to argue the point again, and contended that the plaintiffs have made a record acknowledgment that they constitute the firm. That it could only be proved by their acknowledgments. Articles of copartnership are only an acknowledgment of the parties. Wats. Partn. 36.

Mr. Youngs, contra. This declaration would not be conclusive evidence against the plaintiffs in an action against them. If it is a record acknowledgment, it binds them in all cases. The proof is in the power of the plaintiffs, not of the defendants; and the allegations in a declaration must be proved. James Woodward's declaration cannot be evidence to prove the others to be partners. If the plaintiffs are not bound to give evidence of the partnership, every man who chooses may bind others to a partnership by bringing an action in their names.

PER CURIAM. As the only evidence of the partnership must be either the declarations or the acts of the plaintiffs themselves, and as each of the plaintiffs has come into court, and averred upon the record (by the allegation in the declaration) that he is one of the partners, trading under the firm of Woodward & Co., no further evidence of that fact can be required.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT in the case of Tibbs v. Parrott [supra], gave a naked opinion, that the allegation in the declaration must be proved, but did not say what would be sufficient prima facie evidence of the fact.

The defendants took a bill of exceptions.

Case No. 18,010.

WOODWORTH v. BARBOUR.

[Cited in Gibson v. Gifford, Case No. 5,395. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

WOODWORTH v. CHEEVER. See Case No. 18,019.

Case No. 18,011.

WOODWORTH et al. v. COOK.

[2 Blatchf. 151; 1 Fish. Pat. Rep. 423.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Nov. 21, 1850.

PATENT FOR PLANING MACHINE—CONSTRUCTION OF LICENSE—RESTRICTIONS AS TO SALE—MISTAKE IN CONTRACT—DEFENSES—SUIT FOR SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. A license given by W., the patentee, to C., to use six patented planing machines, recited that C. desired a license to use the machines in a certain county "on the conditions hereinafter mentioned," and then granted to C. permission to use the six machines within the county, "and also, within said limits, to dispose of the plank or other things dressed and prepared on the said machines;" it further provided that W. should not permit any other person than C. to use the machines within the county, and that C. should not use more than six machines there, "nor use any such machines, nor sell and dispose of any plank or other thing dressed and prepared in such machines, any where else within the United States;" and it concluded thus: "It is understood that said C. has all the rights I (W.) have in said county, under said patent, to use six machines, and no more." Held, that the sale of the products of the machines was restricted within the county, and that there was nothing in the prior clauses of the license necessarily repugnant to the last one.

2. But, where it appeared that the actual agreement between W. and C. at the time was, that C. was not to be restricted as to place in selling the dressed plank, and that the last clause in the license was especially inserted for that purpose, a court of equity would, probably, on a proper application, direct the contract to be reformed by the insertion of a clause to the effect claimed.

3. If so, it seems to be an established rule in equity, that the matter entitling the party to an amendment of his contract may be set up by way of defence to a proceeding to enforce a specific performance of the contract, where the clause omitted through mistake or accident would, if found in the instrument, constitute a ground of defence.

[Cited in Steam Cutter Co. v. Sheldon, Case No. 13,331.]

¹ [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

4. But such a defence cannot be set up where the rights of a bona fide purchaser have intervened, which would or might be seriously prejudiced by giving effect to the defence.

[Cited in Cohn v. National Rubber Co., Case No. 2,968.]

5. Under the license in this case, W., on a breach by C. of the condition as to the sale of the products of the machines, had a right to avoid the contract, and to be remitted to his original rights, and to prosecute C. for an infringement of the patent.

6. But C. also is remitted to his original position and rights; for the contract must be avoided altogether, if at all.

[Cited in brief in Union Manuf'g Co. v. Lounsbury, 41 N. Y. 367.]

7. And C. may set up any right he had prior to the license, to use the machines; as, for instance, where the right granted by the license was for an extension of the patent under section 18 of the patent act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 124], he may set up a right, under the decision in Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646, to use the machines as having been in use when the first term of the patent expired.

8. In a suit in equity against C. to take advantage of a breach of said condition of the license, W. is properly joined as a plaintiff with G., although the latter owns the whole of the beneficial interest in the subject-matter; because W. was a party to the license, and, for aught that appears, is yet the owner of a portion of the interest in the patent, and, as such, interested in upholding it, and may be interested indirectly in the infringement itself.

[Cited in Whiting v. Graves, Case No. 17,577.]

The bill in this case was filed in June, 1847, and set forth the granting of the Woodworth patent, its extension for seven years from the 27th of December, 1842, and its re-issue on the 8th of July, 1845. See Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646. It also set forth that, on the 25th of November, 1845, the plaintiff [William W.] Woodworth, the patentee of the re-issued patent, conveyed to the plaintiff Gibson the exclusive right to the patent during the extension, for the city and county of Albany, N. Y., except the right to use two machines in Watervliet in that county; that on the same day, James G. Wilson, who, on the 9th of July, 1845, had become the assignee of the right under Woodworth for the territory specified in the conveyance next mentioned, conveyed to the plaintiff [John] Gibson all the right to the patent, during the extension, for the state of New York, excepting the exclusive right to run seven machines, in six specified places (none of them, however, in the county of Washington, N. Y.), in addition to the two machines in Watervliet, before excepted; that the defendant had had in operation for some time three Woodworth machines at Whitehall, Washington county, N. Y., and dressed large quantities of lumber with them, and sold it in Albany and Troy, and had had and still had depositaries in those cities and elsewhere, for the sale of such dressed lumber; that the plaintiff Gibson had a large and expensive establishment at Albany for running and making the Woodworth machines and selling them and the lumber dressed by them, and his licensees had large establishments of the same kind at Troy and other places in the state of New York, the whole being of the value of not less than $200,000; that the operations of these establishments had been materially injured by the defendant's acts, and that the defendant claimed the right to do as he had done, under a license from the plaintiff Woodworth, given on the 4th of July, 1843.

The license, which was set forth in the bill and was under seal, was executed by both Woodworth and the defendant, recited that the defendant desired a license to construct and use the Woodworth machines in the county of Washington, "on the conditions hereinafter mentioned," and then gave the defendant permission to construct and use six of the planing machines in the county of Washington, N. Y., and not elsewhere, during the extension, "and also, within said limits, to dispose of the plank or other things dressed and prepared in the said machines." The license then provided that Woodworth should not permit any other person than the defendant to construct or use the machine within the county of Washington, and further, that the defendant "shall not, nor will, during the term aforesaid, construct or use more than six machines as aforesaid within the limits above mentioned, nor construct or use any such machines, nor sell and dispose of any plank or other thing dressed and prepared in such machines, anywhere else within the United States and the territories thereof." The license concluded as follows: "It is understood that said Cook has all the rights I have, in the county of Washington, under said patent, to use six machines, and no more."

The bill claimed that the defendant [William W. Cook], by vending the products of his machines out of the county of Washington, had violated the conditions and covenants of his license and forfeited all his rights under it. The bill further set forth that, on the 20th of August, 1846, the plaintiff Woodworth, by an instrument in writing, authorized and empowered the plaintiff Gibson, in the name of Woodworth or otherwise, to prosecute the defendant for the violation of the covenant and condition in the said license contained, and to recover from him such damages as he was liable to pay therefor, and to restrain him from further violating his covenant, and to receive to his own use all damages that might be recovered. The bill prayed for an account of profits, and an injunction against the further use of the machines, and that the license might be annulled. The answer admitted the running of three Woodworth machines by the defendant at Whitehall, and the sale by him, out of the county of Washington, of the lumber dressed by them. It insisted that the plaintiff Gibson could not have been injured by the defendant's operations, unless the lumber dressed by the defendant would otherwise have gone to the machines of Gibson to be dressed; that the defendant had a right to sell his dressed lumber wherever he thought proper; that, in March, 1838, he and his brother acquired a right, through several mesne conveyances, by deed from William Woodworth, to use two of the Woodworth planing machines in Washington county, for the residue of the original fourteen years, and that they at the same time bought two of the machines and put them in use at Whitehall, and had used them there ever since; that, at the time the license of the 4th of July, 1843, was executed, it was actually agreed between the plaintiff Woodworth and the defendant, that the latter should possess the right to vend the products of the six machines without any restriction as to place, and the parties intended that the license should so provide, and understood that it did, and the last clause in it was inserted to effect that object; that the defendant had a right, at all events, to use the two machines so purchased by him and his brother, and to sell anywhere the lumber dressed by them; that the restriction insisted on by the plaintiffs was in restraint of trade, and void; that the patent did not grant to the patentee the exclusive right of selling the products of the machines, and he had no right to restrict their sale; that this court had no jurisdiction of the case; that the bill did not show any joint interest of the plaintiffs in the relief prayed for; and that they had a perfect remedy at law. There was a replication to the answer, and the case was heard on pleadings and proofs. The material parts of the evidence are stated in the opinion of the court.

Azor Taber and Rodman L. Joice, for plaintiffs.

I. The objections to the bill, as set forth in the answer, are untenable. (1) This court has exclusive jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the bill. The objection taken is that, if the bill is founded on the forfeiture or the breach of any covenant, this court has no jurisdiction. The answer is, that we are to consider the covenant as broken and set aside, and the bill as a bill for infringement, founded on the patent. Of a bill complaining of the unauthorized use of a patent right, and praying an account and injunction, a state court has no jurisdiction, even by consent. Act July 4, 1836, § 17 (5 Stat. 124); Dudley v. Mayhew, 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 9. (2) Woodworth, the patentee, is properly joined as plaintiff with Gibson, his assignee for the territory where the injury is alleged to have been done; the lumber dressed by the defendant's machines having, contrary to the license from Woodworth, been sold in Gibson's territory. Act July 4, 1836, § 14;

Whittemore v. Cutter [Case No. 17,600]; Woodworth v. Wilson, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 712, 716. (3) The plaintiffs have not an adequate remedy at law. They pray that the defendant's license be declared void, and for an account and an injunction; for all of which they have a manifest right to come into a court of equity.

II. The planing of lumber in Whitehall, for sale elsewhere, was contrary to the terms and true meaning of the license. The last sentence of the instrument does not contradict the prior explicit restriction as to disposing of the dressed lumber. Whatever was authorized to be done by the last sentence, was to be done "in the county of Washington." It expressly relates to using the machines, and was inserted for abundant caution, to show that Woodworth reserved no rights to himself in the county. To allow such a general expression to overrule an explicit condition not mentioned or referred to in it, would violate the fundamental rules of construction. Co. Litt. 147a; Story, Cont. (2d Ed.) § 639.

III. The allegation in the answer, that the parties intended by the contract something different from what is expressed in it, is nugatory, and the oral evidence given in its support should be rejected. (1) Parol evidence is inadmissible to add to, defeat or vary the terms of a written instrument, especially where, as in the present case, an instrument in writing is required by law to give effect to the contract. Act July 4, 1836, § 11; 3 Starkie, Ev. pt. 4, pp. 100-102; 1 Phil. Ev. (C. & H. Ed.) 559; Rich v. Jackson, 4 Brown, Ch. 514; Sherman v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 1 Comst. [1 N. Y.] 316; Norton v. Woodruff, 2 Comst. [2 N. Y.] 153. (2) The construction of a written contract, or the presumption arising from it, can no more be varied by parol evidence, than can its terms. Creery v. Holly, 14 Wend. 26, 30; Hull v. Adams, 1 Hill, 601. (3) There is no pretence of any latent ambiguity in the instrument. If there be any ambiguity, it is patent, and cannot be explained by oral evidence. Story, Cont. (2d Ed.) § 677. (4) If there was any mistake or fraud in the license, Cook should have filed his bill against Woodworth, to be relieved from his contract, or to reform it according to the intention of the parties. He cannot be permitted to claim under it as it is, and then, when sued for its violation, alter some of its provisions by parol evidence. (5) Especially can he not be permitted to do this against Gibson, an innocent third person, who, on the faith of the records of the patent office, has for years conducted his business under the patent, and has incurred the expense of this prosecution.

IV. The license was, by its terms, granted on certain conditions, one of which has been violated by Cook. The violation of this condition was a forfeiture of the license. Story, Cont. §§ 28, 29; Com. Dig. "Condition," B. C.

Samuel Stevens, for defendant.

I. The defendant had a right to use, without restriction, the two machines bought by him in 1838; and the plaintiffs can, in any event, reach only the third machine.

II. The license does not restrict the defendant as to the place of selling the lumber dressed in the machines. And, even if it does, it is not a condition on which his title depends, but merely a covenant, for a breach of which the parties injured must obtain relief by damages. Courts will not create a condition by construction, when the consequence is to be a forfeiture; but will sometimes construe a condition to be a covenant, in order to avoid a forfeiture.

III. But, if the license does restrict the place of sale, the proofs show that there was a mistake in the contract, and that the agreement was, there should be no restriction.

IV. The court will, therefore, in a suit in equity, give such a construction to the license as the parties intended it to receive; especially will they do so where a different decision will work a forfeiture. Hunt v. Rousmaniere, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 174.

V. The bill is defective for the reasons set forth in the answer.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. 1. The evidence is very strong in this case to show that, according to the actual agreement between the patentee and the defendant at the time of the assignment of the 4th of July, 1843, the latter was to possess the right not only to construct and use the six machines within the territory mentioned, but also to vend their products, without any restriction as to place. The deposition of Mr. Boyd is very particular and explicit on this point. It was the subject of discussion in the negotiation, and was deemed a very material part of the contract on the part of the defendant; so much so, that he refused to become the purchaser if restricted in the exercise of this right, as provided for in one of the clauses in the assignment. To remove the objection and give the unrestricted right of sale, the last clause was interlined at the bottom of the instrument, as follows: "It is understood that said Cook has all the rights I have in the county of Washington, under the said patent, to use six machines, and no more."

Upon this evidence, assuming that the clause thus inserted has not the effect, when taken in connection with other parts of the contract, to give the unrestricted right of sale, according to any legal interpretation of the instrument, a court of equity would probably, on a proper application, direct the contract to be reformed, by the insertion of a clause to the effect claimed; and, if so, it seems to be an established rule in equity, that the matter thus entitling the party to an amendment of his contract may be set up by way of equitable defence against a proceeding involving the rights of the parties under the instrument, and which would not be maintainable if the clause in question had formed a part of the contract. In other words, it may be set up by way of defence to a proceeding to enforce a specific performance of the contract, where the clause omitted through mistake or accident would, if found in the instrument, constitute a ground of defence. Com. Dig. "Chancery," 2, C, 16; Joynes v. Statham, 3 Atk. 388; Pitcairn v. Ogbourne, 2 Ves. Sr. 375; Legal v. Miller, Id. 299; Mason v. Armitage, 13 Ves. 25; Flood v. Finlay, 2 Ball & B. 15; Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 585; Price v. Dyer, 17 Ves. 357; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 161.

I am inclined to think, notwithstanding the insertion of the last clause in the agreement, that, taking the whole instrument together, and giving to each and all of its provisions a consistent interpretation, the sale of the products of the machines was restricted within the limits of the county within which their operation was confined; and that there is nothing in the restrictive clause necessarily repugnant to the one relied on by the defendant as qualifying it. It is not to be denied, however, that unless the view taken by the defendant as to the effect of the qualifying clause is the correct one, it is difficult to perceive its object or materiality, as that clause, if confined simply to the number of machines to be used, would be but a repetition of what had already been fully provided for. The defendant's view, therefore, though not sustainable upon any proper legal interpretation of the instrument, tends to confirm the evidence as to the mistake or misapprehension of the effects of it, claimed in the answer.

Upon the whole, I should be disposed to acquiesce in the ground and principle of the defence thus set up, were it not for the consideration that the rights of a bona fide purchaser have intervened, which would or might be seriously prejudiced by allowing the contract to be reformed at this late day, or by giving effect to the defence, which would be the same thing. Wilson and Gibson having purchased all the right of the patentee within the state of New York, subject to certain previous grants, and, among others, the one in question, and paid for the same a valuable consideration, the enlargement of the defendant's contract beyond what appeared upon the face of it, to the prejudice of these subsequently acquired rights, would be unjust and inequitable, and constitutes ground that must prevent the interference of the court. In the aspect of the case in which the relief is prayed for against the terms of a written instrument, these assignees are to be regarded as bona fide purchasers, and as presenting at least an equal equity against the correction of the mistake, to their prejudice, with that presented by the defendant in favor of it. The authorities on this point were referred to in the case of Gibson v. Cook [Case No. 5,393].

That the unrestricted sale of the products of the machines operated in the territory in question would not be prejudicial to the rights of these assignees, is a proposition I cannot assume or admit. It is manifest that a right to vend the products in the markets at the cities below on the Hudson river, would seriously affect the value of the machines in operation in those cities, and, of course, the price of the rights under the patent. If so, then the rights of the assignees, as bona fide purchasers, intervene, and, upon the principles above stated, forbid the interference of the court.

2. I am inclined to think that the assignment from Woodworth to Cook, according to the fair import of its terms, was made upon the express condition that he should observe strictly the limitation in regard to the sales of the products of the machines; and that, on a breach of the condition, the patentee had a right to avoid the contract and to be remitted to his original rights. This would seem to be not only the intention of the parties in inserting the condition, but also the legal effect and operation of the stipulation; and upon this view the bill has been framed.

It is to be observed, however, that the defendant is also remitted to his original position and rights under the Woodworth patent, as the contract must be avoided altogether, if at all. It cannot be obligatory upon the one party and not upon the other. The bill assumes, and properly, as its foundation, that the contract has been rendered null and inoperative by the breach of the condition; and that, since the breach, the defendant has been running the machines in violation of the patent. In this view of the case, he may well set up, as he has done in the answer, any right belonging to him, as it respects the use of the said machines, prior to the assignment in question.

It seems that two of these machines were constructed and used under a right acquired from the original patentee during the first term, and were in use at the expiration of that term. According, therefore, to the case of Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646, the defendant had a right to continue in the use of them, notwithstanding the first extension. This ground affords a complete answer to the charge of infringement as it respects these two machines.

3. Woodworth, the patentee, is, we think, properly joined with Gibson as a plaintiff. He being a party to the assignment, it was, perhaps, necessary to make him a party to the suit, in order to take advantage of the breach of the condition, notwithstanding the whole of the beneficial interest is in Gibson. Besides, for aught that appears, he is yet the owner of a portion of the interest in the patent, and, as such, interested in upholding it; and he may be interested indirectly in the infringement itself.

There must be a decree for the plaintiffs, and a reference to a master to take proof of the loss of profits sustained on account of the infringement, upon the principles above stated.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Bicknell v. Todd, Case No. 1,389.]

Case No. 18,012.

WOODWORTH v. CURTIS.

[Cited in Gibson v. Gifford, Case No. 5,395, note. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 18,013.

WOODWORTH v. CURTIS.

[2 Woodb. & M. 524; 1 2 Robb, Pat. Cas. 603.]
Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1847.

PATENT FOR PLANING MACHINE—LICENSE TO USE.

1. Where A. owns the patent right to a planing machine, and conveys to B. the authority to use one in a certain county, B. may erect as well as use that one, so he may build and use another instead of it, but not both at one time.

[Cited in Steam Cutter Co. v. Sheldon, Case No. 13,331; Hamilton v. Kingsbury, Id. 5-984; Morgan Envelope Co. v. Albany P. W. P. Co., 152 U. S. 425, 14 Sup. Ct. 630; Illingworth v. Spaulding, 43 Fed. 831.]

2. When the term expires, that machine, then in use under the conveyance from A., may, without any new license or grant, be employed till it wears out or is destroyed, either by B. or his assigns, notwithstanding A. has obtained an extension and renewal of his patent right.

This was a bill in equity, praying for an injunction against the use, by the respondent, of the planing machine invented by William Woodworth. The plaintiff claimed to be possessed of Woodworth's rights, and also Emmons's under a like patent. The answer of the respondent [Hiram Curtis] admits the use of one of said machines in Boston, in the county of Suffolk, but insists on his authority to do it under a license from the proprietors of the patents for said machine. Several assignments were given in evidence to sustain his authority, and several affidavits on both sides were filed, tending to prove that the present machine used by the defendant was not the first one that had been put in operation under the license, and that this and another had at times been run together, and that the respondent purchased this machine of Tothill after the first patents expired.

B. R. Curtis, for complainant.

Charles L. Woodbury, for respondent.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. It is conceded that Richard Urann, May 26, 1840, had become proprietor of the patent right to use the Woodworth planing machine in the county of Suffolk. On that day he granted to

¹ [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

Thomas H. Holland, under his hand and seal, as follows: "I do license and empower the said Thomas H. Holland and his assigns, to use one machine in Boston aforesaid, constructed according to the specification under either of said patents," etc. "during the continuance of the term for which the said letters patent were respectively granted," etc. On the 13th of March, 1846, Holland assigned his rights, under that conveyance or power, to "William Tothill, his heirs and assigns forever;" and Tothill, on the 8th day of August, 1846, assigned the same to the respondent, "Hiram Curtis, his heirs and assigns." It is not to be doubted, that the intention of the parties to these instruments was to convey a right to use one of these machines in Boston, during the continuance of the patents which were in being, May 26, 1840.

The first question is, did this involve the right to make or procure to be made, the machine thus permitted to be used? I think it did. Otherwise the whole license might be defeated, if the grantor refused to make for him at all, or to make at any but an exorbitant price, or demanded another consideration for a right in the grantee to make for himself, under a license like this, to use one machine. From the nature of the transaction and the subject matter, as well as the terms in the conveyance about the machine, being "constructed according to the specification under either of said patents," it is probable both parties contemplated that the grantee should construct as well as use one. In respect to some patents, the rights to make, vend or use may be distinguishable from each other, yet they all are united in this patentee; and he may so convey the right to make, as to involve or include the right either to sell or use what the grantee makes. And he may so convey the right to use, as to imply the right to sell within the same limits, as well as to make machines within them. The circumstances, nature, and words of each grant must decide the construction, which is just and legal. This point is not without difficulty; but the contemporaneous construction put on the grant, by the purchaser proceeding at once to make, or cause to be made, a machine to use under his grant, and he and his grantees continuing to use at least one so made, without complaint from either the grantor or owner of the patent, for several years and till the term expired, inclines the scales in favor of the respondent's view.

The next question is, did the grant include the use of a machine during the term, though changed or amended, within the time? The first one built might wear out, or, what was very likely, be destroyed by fire, or be constructed erroneously in some important respects, or be disused entirely for some time from want of repair. Could a different one be run in such events? My opinion is, it could, as the license to use one machine covered the whole term, and was not limited to any particular machine then sold, but merely to what must be considered one machine in number at one time.

The next question is, whether this right to use could be assigned to a third person. I think the license must be considered assignable. But much more is a machine, and the right to use it, personal property rather than a mere patent right; and much more has it all the incidents of personal property, making it subject to pass by sale, as in this case, to Curtis.

Here, that Curtis bought the machine itself, is manifest from the affidavits of Tothill and Loring; and, beside this, the right to use it was conveyed also in the written assignment to him. The injunction, for these reasons, cannot be granted, as the sale extended the use not merely to the original grantee, as a personal privilege, and limited to him alone, but to him and his assigns; because the word "assigns" is expressly inserted in the instrument, and as the grantor was paid for the use during the whole term or continuance of the patent, and as the grantee might die or become insolvent, or wish to remove or change his business, it would be natural and useful to the grantee to stipulate for the right to assign the use, and this would be no injury to the grantor.

The next inquiry is, did the respondent use more than one machine at any one time, so as to come within the scope of the prayer for this injunction? It is certain that the conveyance would authorize the grantee and his assigns to use only one machine, at any one time, in Boston or the county of Suffolk; and though the evidence here is contradictory, some of it showing an old machine to have been used at times after a new one was procured and put in operation, and some contradicting this; yet it is clear, from the proof on both sides, that the old machine was sold by the respondent long before the filing of this bill, and not used in Boston for three or four years past, and was removed to another town and county. It went away, Loring swears, before July, 1846, and Lord swears it was in the spring of 1844. It is not, then, such an old use of that in Boston which must be regarded as now complained of, but a use of the new machine, and the new one for the work done on it since Woodworth's original patents expired on the 29th of December, 1842.

The next question left is, whether a use like this, since the expiration of the old patent, conflicts with the rights of the plaintiff under the extension of the patent which has been granted to Woodworth's representatives by the board of commissioners, November 16, 1842, for seven years longer; and whether it is or is not permissible, by the construction given to that extension by the supreme court, under the eighteenth section of the patent law of July 4, 1836. 5 Stat. 125. The leading and controlling decision upon this question is that of Wilson v. Rouseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 682. The majority of the court there held, that where a machine or right to use a machine, had been sold before the original terms expired, the use might be continued till the machines then in operation under the grant wore out, or were destroyed. The reason assigned for this was, the expression used in the eighteenth section, extending the benefit of the renewal to "assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented to the extent of their respective interests therein." 5 Stat. 125.

Some plausibility exists in the idea, that where the right to use a machine till the end of the then existing term, had been paid for, there was an implied understanding on both sides, that the use of it afterwards would be free and undisturbed; but the assignment being only for one term, and the plaintiff having obtained another term from the board, my own views differed in that case from the majority. I feel bound, however, to carry theirs into effect, to their full extent, as they are to be understood from the printed opinion of the court, and the reasons applicable to the subject. The respondent then having paid for the right to use one machine in Boston till the original term expired, and having a machine in operation, which existed and was in use under that right, both when the above renewal took place and the old term expired, he must, by the decision of the supreme court, be allowed to continue the use of the same machine, till it is worn out, unless a fact, which will soon be adverted to, alters or impairs that right.

The decision seems meant for and founded on a case where the grantee had a "right to use," in the broadest terms. No distinction is taken between the acquisition of that right by purchasing a particular machine, or by purchasing the right to use a machine while the term lasted, and under this creating one which continued to be in use when the original term expired. I do not therefore feel warranted in weakening or impairing the force of their decision by a discrimination not made by the supreme court itself, and perhaps not required by any very conclusive reasons. My opinion refers only to the first renewal, and has no regard to what is proper under the second renewal made by congress. But a fact just referred to requires me to consider one other question before closing. When the term expired, December 27, 1842, this machine was owned and used by Holland and those employed under him, having, according to the testimony of Coolidge, been framed and set up the summer previous; and his right to continue that use, it is argued, could not afterwards be further assigned as it was to Tothill in 1846, and the same year by him to the respondent. The assignees and grantees of the right to use it, who are by the eighteenth section to have the benefit of the renewal, are doubtless those holding the right, at the time of the renewal.

But what is their right, then, obtained and confirmed by the opinion of the supreme court? Not, as before remarked, in relation to the interest or license under the conveyance from Urann, in May, 1841; not a mere personal privilege. It is a right of property. The value of it is attached to the machine used, when it is the last one used at the time the term expires. The right might be assigned, separately as before; but under the decision of the supreme court the right could not be exercised after the term closes, except in the particular machine then in use. In this respect it is unlike the right which exists before the term of the patent expires, having become fixed and limited to that machine alone. It has become like a patented medicine bought by a patient. The right to use the particular quantity sold passes with the medicine itself.

There being then this property in that machine, when the term expires, like any other property, the machine and the right attached to it may pass by sale, devise, or levy of execution, or assignment of an insolvent's effects. As to the last, see 3 Bos. & P. 565; 5 Barn. & C. 169; Phil. Pat. 357; Hind. Pat. 242, 327; Sawin v. Guild [Case No. 12,391]. In those cases in 4 How. [45 U. S.] before cited, the patent right had been considered property, and even deemed assets in the hands of the administrator, and the renewal had been in his name.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Bicknell v. Todd, Case No. 1,389.]

Case No. 18,014.

WOODWORTH et al. v. EDWARDS et al.
[3 Woodb. & M. 120; 1 2 Robb, Pat. Cas. 610.]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Sept. 18, 1847.

PATENT FOR INVENTION—EFFECT OF EXTENSION—BILL IN CHANCERY—OMISSION OF OATH —SUIT FOR INJUNCTION.

1. The omission to make oath to a bill in chancery, praying for an injunction, is not here a cause of demurrer, after a hearing and order to file evidence. But it should be objected to by motion when the respondents appear, and the oath will then be directed, unless good cause is shown to the contrary. There is no rule of the court, requiring an oath here to be filed with the bill.

[Cited in brief in National Hay Rake Co. v. Harbert, Case No. 10,044.]

2. After a special demurrer to a bill, the allegations of fact must, on the hearing of the demurrer, be considered as true. When a special statute extends a patent for seven years, the original patent must be treated as in law for seven years longer. So must a patent be, which is extended seven years by the board of the patent office. An original patent, extended in both of these ways, must be considered as a patent for twenty-eight years.

3. The specification for both extensions is the original specification. If all are surrendered and an amended one issued, the new letters should be for twenty-eight years. If the old specification had been adjudged good, but was still questioned and litigated, and appears to be in some degree inoperative from certain defects, supposed to have happened by mistake, the commissioner, on its surrender, may issue new letters for twenty-eight years, with an amended specification, and if he does, they will be presumed—till the contrary is shown—to be for invention, and for a defect rendering the old letters, in some degree, inoperative, and which happened from inadvertence or mistake.

¹ [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

[Cited in Hussey v. Bradley, Case No. 6,946.]

4. When a demurrer for these causes is overruled, the respondents may have leave to answer further by the payment of costs, and they may further contest a temporary injunction, though after an order to file testimony in it none was filed, but merely a demurrer.

5. But after such neglect of the order and the overruling of the demurrer as bad, the case will not be opened for further hearing as to the temporary injunction, but be treated as if the facts were confessed, unless an affidavit is filed that the course pursued was not for delay, and indemnity is also filed against any damage caused by the delay and the use of the machine against which an injunction is desired.

6. Where one respondent run a planing machine and two others owned it, the injunction was issued as proper against the three.

7. After the supposed inventor of a machine, in a contest with these plaintiffs in another circuit, had been enjoined not to use that machine, because an infringement on the plaintiffs', those purchasing it of the supposed inventor, so enjoined, cannot be allowed to use it while that injunction remains in full force and the grounds of that decision are in no way overturned.

8. But where the respondents deny the validity of the patent of the plaintiffs, the court will dissolve the injunction at the next term, if the suit at law is not by that time brought against them to try that validity.

[Cited in Brooks v. Norcross, Case No. 1,957.]

9. The terms imposed on the suit are, that the trial be confined to the objections set up by the respondents in their answer and affidavit against the validity of the patent, and that the action may be in the name of any one claiming an interest in this district, which is supposed to have been violated by the respondents.

This was a bill in chancery, praying for an injunction against the respondents [James Edwards and others] for using a planing machine, the patent for which was alleged to be vested in the plaintiffs [William W. Woodworth and others]. The allegations were as usual in this class of cases, several of which, in this circuit, have been before tried and reported, stating, among other things, the original invention to have been made and patented in December, 1828, by William Woodworth, since deceased—his rights to have become vested in the plaintiffs—an extension to have been granted of the original patent for seven years, by the board of commissioners, in 1842—another, for a like term, by congress, in a special law in February, 1845—and a surrender of them all made afterwards, on account of mistake in the specification—and new letters of patent issued for the whole twenty-eight years, on the 8th day of July, 1845. The bill was filed 16th July, 1847, and a subpoena and notice given that day. On the 23d July, 1847, a hearing was had before Judge Sprague, on a motion for a preliminary temporary injunction, and, after listening to both parties, an order was made by him that the plaintiffs, within twenty days, file their evidence in support of it, and the respondents file theirs within ten days. Before this last period expired, viz. 2d August, 1847—the last day to file evidence by the respondents—instead of complying with the order, they filed a special demurrer to the whole bill, setting out the following causes: (1) That no oath or testimony to the truth of the bill had been put on file with it. (2) That the letters patent, now relied on, of July, 1845, should have been issued for twenty-one years instead of twenty-eight years, and consequently were void.

B. R. Curtis, for complainants.
J. T. Tasker, for respondents.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. We have requested the demurrer in this case to be argued first, as a demurrer may affect both a temporary and permanent injunction. In the natural order of things, such an objection, by demurrer, which may turn out to be one of form merely, ought to be considered before the merits of the application. In a prayer for an injunction and a demurrer filed, it has been adjudged that the demurrer should be first heard and disposed of. 6 Madd. 299; 1 Smith, Ch. Prac. 214.

The first ground assigned for this demurrer, is the want of an oath to the bill, or any evidence in its support. But this is a ground more properly to be taken at a hearing on the merits against proceeding further, till such oath or such evidence is put in. It is a matter in pais and affecting the trial of the facts rather than a defect in the bill itself. Of course, at the trial, or hearing, whether a case is made out, or not, if the facts which the bill alleges are denied by the respondents, the plaintiffs must furnish evidence of them before succeeding. Generally they must do it by their oath to the truth of the bill, and always by other testimony, prima facie satisfactory, before the respondents are obliged to rebut it by evidence on their part. But sometimes this need not be done by the complainant, where the respondents do not appear and are defaulted; or, after an appearance and order, do not comply with it, and the allegations in the bill are taken pro confesso; or, if after such an appearance the respondent virtually admits the truth of the facts, by demurring merely on account of the want of law in the bill.

The only precedent cited of a different character is that of Lansing v. Pine, 4 Paige, 639. But that decision seems to be founded on the special rules of the New York court of chancery and its peculiar practice, requiring an oath to the truth of some bills to be filed with them, such as in that case, for discovery and other matters as to the contents of a writing, without any evidence accompanying the bill as to its loss. See the rule stated in 1 Barb. Ch. Prac. 44. Here no such rule exists as to bills of injunction or any others. The practice here is usually for the complainant to make oath to his bill when it is signed, but this is not imperative nor uniform. It is not then done, if he is absent or indisposed, though it should be done probably before the hearing, unless it be a bill by a corporation, or unless an answer under oath is not asked, or unless an oath to the bill is waived, or its absence is not objected to by the respondents when first heard. And if the principal is not in a situation to swear to it, the oath may be made by an agent. 1 Barb. Ch. 41. When this case was before my associate at a former hearing, and when the order was made as to filing other evidence, no exception was taken to the absence of an oath to the bill, and we both concur in the opinion that afterwards, if at all, a demurrer is not good for that cause in this court.

The only remaining ground for a demurrer assigned in it, is, that the last letters patent, set out in the bill as for twenty-eight years, should have been issued for only twenty-one. Thus, after reciting the surrender and issue of new letters for twenty-eight years, the demurrer says: "Whereas the defendants are advised that by law the said last mentioned letters patent should have been granted for the term of twenty-one years from the said 27th day of December, 1828," etc. This would seem to have been stated under an impression that the bill contained no averment of a second extension of the original patent for a second seven years; and hence that from the bill on its face, the renewal, in order to cover all the terms alleged in the bill, should have been for only twenty-one years instead of twenty-eight. But, on examination, the second renewal for seven years appears to have been alleged in the bill, saying it was made by congress by a special act in February, 1845. To be sure it is not inserted immediately following the averment of the other renewal, and hence may have been overlooked by the respondents; but it is there. The bill then, on its face, contains allegations of an old patent of fourteen years and two renewals of seven years each and hence the last letters, to cover them all, are properly for twenty-eight years instead of twenty-one.

But in argument another position is taken, viz. that the renewal could not by law be made to cover the last extension of seven years by congress, as that extension had not been evidenced by any letters patent which might be surrendered. But on turning to the eighteenth section of the act of congress of July 4, 1836, concerning patents, it will be found that when the board made the first extension of seven years, and it was certified on the original letters of fourteen years, it came within the enactment which existed in express terms, that "thereupon the said patent shall have the same effect in law as though it had been originally issued for twenty-one years." 5 Stat. 125. And when the second extension was granted by congress for seven years more, making, in all, twenty-eight, from December, 1828, the act, proprio vigore, merely extended the patent seven years longer than before. The original patent, in this way, had in law become one for twenty-eight years. The act imposed, next, an obligation on the commissioner to give a certificate as to the last extension, if desired by the administrator of the patentee, but not without. Next, the original patent had not only thus in law, de jure, as well as in common parlance, become one for twenty-eight years from December, 1828, instead of the original fourteen, or that and the next seven, but it had become a patent for twenty-eight years under one and the same original specification. There was no other in existence. But the administrator became satisfied from repeated trials, and numerous exceptions taken to his specification, that it was in some respects defective; that this cast a shade over its validity, and rendered it less operative and successful and profitable than it would be if the defect was removed, and, believing that this defect had arisen from inadvertence or mistake when the original specification was filed, he applied, as the law permits in such case, for leave to surrender his patent, as it then stood, and to receive instead of it one with an amended specification. It is difficult to conceive, then, why, when this patent was afterwards surrendered under the thirteenth section of the patent law, and new letters were obtained with an amended specification, it should not be for the whole twenty-eight years, and should not be as valid for the whole twenty-eight as it would be for twenty-one years. The demurrer seems to admit the renewal to be valid for the term of twenty-one years, but not for the twenty-eight years. But it being as valid for the latter as the former, the demurrer, with such an admission, cannot properly be sustained on this account.

There is another difficulty in sustaining this demurrer, on the ground now taken by counsel—that the old specification has been, by some courts, pronounced valid and not defective or insufficient, and therefore that it must be considered to have been valid. But it is questionable whether the defendants can now be permitted to argue that the patent was good in form at first, after the allegations in the bill of its defective character, and which the demurrer virtually admits. "On the hearing of a demurrer the courts are bound by the plaintiffs' allegations of facts," etc. Cuthbert v. Creasy, 6 Madd. 189; 1 Smith, Ch. Prac. 211; Balls v. Strutt, 1 Hare, 148. But supposing these objections to go rather to what must be considered matters of law than fact alleged, how does the case in this respect stand? The reasoning being that the renewal is not valid for even twenty-one years, on the ground that the first letters patent and first specification had been upheld as good by judicial decisions, the respondents, therefore, are right in contending that those letters and specification could not be considered "inoperative or invalid," in the language of the thirteenth section, so as to justify the commissioners in issuing new letters with an amended specification. 5 Stat. 122.

But it would be a sufficient answer to this position, were it proper to be taken under the form of this demurrer, and after admitting the renewal to be good for twenty-one years, that the supreme court has, in the cases under this renewed patent for twenty-eight years, in 4 How. 646, proceeded on the ground that these identical renewed letters were valid. And though I have no recollection that this question in relation to these was discussed in those cases, yet the letters must necessarily have been considered good in order to authorize the judgments in their favor, which were then and there rendered on them. Woodworth v. Hall [Cases Nos. 18,016 and 18,017]. And though this would not preclude the supreme court from hearing their validity debated in another case upon this objection, yet it would be hardly decorous for a circuit court to decide differently on their validity, till the supreme court had reconsidered and changed what is involved in its former decisions. Towne v. Smith [Case No. 14,115]. Nor would these be of much use to the respondents, if this court, or the supreme court, should make a different decision. Because, if the renewal was not valid at all, neither could the surrender be valid, which led to it, assuming the ground of the respondents, that the old patent surrendered was, and had been pronounced by the judiciary to be good. The old letters, and the extension under them, would be considered in full force, and good also, if the surrender was by mistake, supposing new letters could be validly given instead of them, when they could not be, avoiding thus both the new letters and the surrender. All violators of the patent could be prosecuted under the old and valid patent, in the old form and with the old specification, as well as under the new letters and new specification. If these were vacated, bills and writs could be amended and would declare on the old instead of the new letters, and this done with little or no terms, under such circumstances, not altering the merits but affecting merely forms. This was intimated in Woodworth v. Hall [supra].

But the present respondents have not been satisfied on suggestions like these to abandon this objection, or to refrain from asking a decision by this court on the force of it. Hence, to oblige them, I would state frankly, that my impressions are strongly in favor of the validity of the new letters, independent of what has been done on them in the supreme court. I think, by law, the original patent had become one for twenty-eight years instead of fourteen or twenty-one. I think the old specification applied to the patent for the whole term of twenty-eight years; that the surrender was of all for the twenty-eight years; the renewal for all; and that the right to renew by the commissioner probably existed, although some courts had decided in favor of the old patent. Because their decision, if right, might still rest in some doubt, might not be acquiesced in generally, and, without amendments in the specification, might be constantly open to new and prolonged litigation, so as to render the patent valueless, and, in many respects, "inoperative." If the decision was wrong—as judicial opinions by state courts and circuit courts, and even by supreme courts, sometimes are wrong—surely these amendments would be prudent and proper, in order to save the patent from becoming, ere long, entirely both "inoperative" and "invalid." The act of congress makes the commissioner the judge in relation to the allowance of an amendment, on the ground that the patent is inoperative or invalid so as to justify it, and that the error, to be corrected in the specification, has happened from "inadvertency, accident or mistake." If he permits an amendment, after a hearing on these matters, it is at least prima facie proof that the state of things in these respects warranted it, as well as that the amended specification relates to the same patent. For he is not by law allowed to permit any other than the old patent to be described in the amendment, and he must be presumed to have done his duty in all these particulars, till the contrary is shown. Allen v. Blunt [Case No. 217]. Nor is this a great or dangerous power to be entrusted to that officer; but a salutary, remedial authority, necessary often to insure justice to useful inventors, and protect the sacred rights of genius and property. But whenever there is any just ground to suppose this power has been fraudulently or corruptly abused, the door is open to prove it, and visit its consequences on the guilty, not only by avoiding the renewal, but by inflicting condign punishment for the guilt.

Viewing this objection as imputing neglect or error to a public officer, rather than the plaintiffs, it is to be considered, also, with favorable inclinations not to let individuals suffer, except in clear cases of wrong, by the neglect of such officers—persons other than the inventors, or those in their private employ—persons in official station, and to whom they are, by the laws of the constitution, and not always by their own choice, compelled to confide portions of their business. Woodworth v. Hall, supra. Much less should they suffer by others, when their error is one more of form than substance to third persons, and if to a certainty not sustainable in law, this change would work no injustice to others, and would leave the plaintiff still entitled to redress in an amended form of the bill, relying on the old letters.

Deciding against this demurrer, the next inquiry is, whether this decision must operate as final in favor of the application for a preliminary and temporary injunction. Because the order of the court, in July last, to file testimony by the respondents, in ten days, has not been complied with, and no excuse is offered for this omission except a demurrer put in on the last day of the time granted, and which has led to several weeks' further delay, and been overruled. Under the twenty-fourth rule of this court, where a demurrer is to a bill as here, and it is overruled, the party making it can still—on paying costs—have a trial on the merits or principal matter in dispute—which is here a permanent injunction. In England, without a specific rule: "If the demurrer is overruled, the defendant pays to the plaintiff the taxed cost occasioned thereby, unless the court make other order to the contrary." 1 Smith, Ch. Prac. 213.

The respondents, then, may still have a hearing as to a permanent injunction, and I am willing to allow a hearing on that, after the proper pleadings and proofs are put in, and the costs paid. But how stands the right to proceed further in the preliminary hearing and motion for the temporary injunction, after having once appeared and an order made, which has been neglected, and a demurrer put in, which has created much delay, and finally has been overruled? My impression is that the former order should not be renewed and extended after all this, unless the party, by affidavits, will satisfy the court that the order was not omitted to be complied with for purposes of delay, and will put security on file for any damage done by running the machine in dispute, during the delay to comply with the order. If this is done in a reasonable time—say forty-eight hours—I would extend the order longer; but if not done, issue the temporary injunction on account of the neglect to comply with the first order, and the virtual confession of a violation of the plaintiffs' patent by the demurrer, if the present letters are valid—as we are inclined to hold them to be. In either case—though the respondents by their course seem to admit the truth of the facts alleged in the bill—the plaintiffs, if they can conscientiously, had better file their oaths to the truth of the bill; and file any collateral evidence which has been taken on their part under the order.

The respondents then moved for leave to answer to the bill, which prayed for a permanent injunction, and were allowed to do it on payment of costs. They moved next for leave to contest the temporary injunction further, and be excused from the non-fulfillment of the first order, and were allowed to do it on filing an affidavit that their course had not been adopted for the purpose of delay, and on giving indemnity for any damages by running the machine since the non-compliance with the order.

This case came on at an ensuing day in the term, for a further hearing as to a temporary injunction. The respondents, in the meantime, had filed an affidavit that the demurrer was not for delay, and had filed a bond that any damages during it would be indemnified against. The plaintiffs had also filed an affidavit as to the truth of the matter in the bill. Some evidence was submitted on both sides; and among that on the part of the respondents were some answers which had been prepared to the bill, as for a permanent injunction, and which had been sworn to, and were here offered as affidavits of the parties, in respect to their contents. The substance of the exceptions taken in them to the validity of the patent set up by the plaintiffs, was, that it was not original with Woodworth, several persons being named who had discovered and used it before, and that the renewals of it afterwards were obtained by misrepresentations and fraud; and that it was improperly surrendered, and improperly re-issued, with a new or amended specification. It was admitted that the machine used by Smith, one of the respondents, was owned by the Edwards's, and was the same which Rogers was, the last spring, enjoined from running. There was no evidence or admission which charged Bancroft, one of the respondents, and the motion as against him was dismissed. The evidence offered did not change the case on either side, from what has been reported in Woodworth v. Rogers [Case No. 18,018]. Several propositions were made for disposing of the motion by amicable arrangement, which were not acceded to, and need not therefore be repeated. An application was also made by the respondents to have the injunction, if imposed, continue no longer than the next term; and that the plaintiffs, in the meantime, should institute an action at law to try the validity of the patent denied by the respondents. The plaintiffs also moved to have the respondents make certain admissions as to evidence and points in respect to the suit at law, if ordered, and file security for the damages and costs which might be recovered.

THE COURT, after hearing the same counsel, at another day in the term, expressed by WOODBURY, Circuit Justice, its opinion in favor of the temporary injunction against the two Edwards's and Smith. THE COURT observed, that one runs the machine and the other two own it, and all hold under Brown, the supposed patentee. But in a bill against him, by Woodworth's assignees in Vermont, in the circuit court, after a full hearing, Brown has been enjoined against the farther use of this very machine. It would be sporting with the faith and confidence due to judicial proceedings in our own tribunals, to permit that machine to be used by any person claiming from Brown, while that injunction against him remains in full force, and the grounds of it in no way overturned. At the same time, as stated in the similar case between these complainants and Rogers at the last session here, these defendants are not prevented, and should not be, from trying their legal rights in their own appropriate cases. And though the plaintiffs, by former repeated recoveries on this patent, by extensive sales and long possession of it, and especially by succeeding in obtaining an injunction against Brown from using this very machine—are entitled to a temporary injunction against these respondents, yet it should, in the first instance, be only till the validity of the plaintiffs' title—which they deny—can be tried with them at law.

As the counsel for the respondents, who is also the counsel for Rogers, prefers that the trial be had in this case instead of that,—let that one stand continued to abide the event of this, if not in the meantime otherwise arranged. And let a suit at law be brought, before the next term, against the two Edwards's and Smith for their infringement; and if not done, the injunction now ordered against them must be then dissolved. In respect to the terms and conditions attached to this suit, the most natural and appropriate one, that the trial shall be of the validity of the patent in the present bill, under the objections set out against in the before-mentioned answers, used here as affidavits by the respondents. Let this be one condition; and another, that the suit may be in the name of any assignor or assignee, claiming an interest in this district which the respondents are alleged to have infringed. Various other conditions and restrictions are asked; and it is not unusual for courts to impose many others required by the nature of the case. See 2 Smith, Ch. Prac. 90; 2 Ves. Jr. 519; 1 Ves. Jr. 284; 2 Hare, 13, 14. But some of those asked here, as to taking a model, and as to confessions of the use of the machine, etc., are easily accomplished or obviated, as the case now stands; and too minute interference in these matters, by the court, is to be avoided if possible. Nor do I think it a case for requiring collateral security to cover damages and cost, after the oath of one of the respondents to his property being worth several thousand dollars.

It is to be hoped, on account of public considerations, that some amicable adjustment may, in the meantime, without further litigation, be effected of the controversies in respect to the validity of this patent in this district—controversies, which, after numerous decisions, still seem to multiply and require great attention to them at each term of this court, to the delay and injury of other business. We do not profess to know, or state, which of the parties are most blamable for this:—but to enjoin both to a sincere spirit of compromise, forbearance, and peace. The rights of inventive genius, and the valuable property produced by it, all persons in the exercise of this spirit will be willing to vindicate and uphold, without colorable evasions or wanton piracies; but those rights, on the other hand, should be maintained in a manner not harsh towards other inventors, nor unaccommodating to the growing wants of the community.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Bicknell v. Todd, Case No. 1,389.]

Case No. 18,015.

WOODWORTH v. FENNELL.

[Cited in Dustin v. Murray, Case No. 4,201. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 18,016.

WOODWORTH et al. v. HALL et al.

[1 Woodb. & M. 248; 1 2 Robb. Pat. Cas. 495.]
Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1846.

USE OF PATENTED MACHINE—INJUNCTION—EXTENSION AND RENEWAL OF PATENTS.

1. An injunction will not be issued against a respondent's using a machine, unless it is proved, that he has used it himself, or employed others to use it for him, or at least has profited by the use of it.

2. Where long possession of a patent has existed, and frequent recoveries under it, an injunction will be issued, the originality of the invention by the patentee not being denied, unless the letters appear for some cause illegal or void.

[Cited in Woodworth v. Edwards, Case No. 18,014; Woodworth v. Rogers, Id. 18,018.]

3. Where congress granted an extension of the term to an administrator, it was held to be legal, and that the letters of administration need not be produced after such a grant.

[Cited in Goodyear v. Hullihen, Case No. 5,573.]

4. A signature to the patent, and the certificate of copies, by a person calling himself "acting commissioner," is sufficient on its face in controversies between the patentee and third persons, as the law recognizes an acting commissioner to be lawful.

5. A patent surrendered and renewed operates as from the commencement of the original patent, except as to causes of action, arising before the renewal.

[Cited in Potter v. Holland, Case No. 11,329; Parham v. American B. O. & S. M. Co., Id. 10,713.]

6. If a mistake occurs in a copy of a patent, it can be corrected without causing any injury, but if it exists in the original patent, it cannot be corrected, so as to avail without the assent or re-signature of the secretary of state.

7. But the commissioner, if correcting it, need not re-sign or re-seal the letters, he being the same officer here who did it before.

8. If the mistake corrected be a material one, the letters cannot operate except on cases arising after it is made. But if a mere clerical one, quære.

9. Where a renewal of patents surrendered is void, perhaps the surrender itself becomes also void, and the original patents remain in force.

[Cited in Woodworth v. Edwards, Case No. 18,014.]

10. Mere technical objections to letters patent are not to be encouraged or construed liberally, for him making them.

This was a bill in chancery, filed July 28, 1845, praying for an injunction against the defendants [Isaac Hall and another] not to use longer the planing machine invented and patented by William Woodworth; and for an account of profits from the use heretofore. The letters patent were alleged to have been issued to him as the inventor of that machine, December 27, 1828, for the term of fourteen years. It was further alleged, that he died on the 9th of February, 1839, and that on the 14th of the same month administration on his estate was granted to William W. Woodworth aforesaid. That the administrator applied to the commissioner of patents for an extension of the term of the original patent for the machine, and that it was duly granted to him, after proper proceedings, on the 16th of November, 1842, for seven years after the end of the first term of fourteen years. That about the 2d of January, 1843, he disclaimed the circular saws described in the schedule to said patent; and, on or about the 10th of the same month, he conveyed to Washburn and Brown, two of the complainants, the exclusive use of said machine in the county of Suffolk and some other enumerated places, with certain reservations to himself; and on the 11th of January, 1844, assigned to Wilson, the other plaintiff, all his remaining interest in the patent, except in the state of Vermont. It is then stated, that the respondents are now using a machine like his substantially; and are thus infringing on the patent owned by the complainants, and the bill prayed a discovery how long it had been done, and an answer to several interrogatories. In aid of the prayer for an injunction, and for the account before named, the bill further averred, that said Washburn and Brown prosecuted, and in May, 1844, recovered judgment in the county of Suffolk for a violation of this patent, and soon after they instituted a similar suit against the respondent Isaac Hall, who settled the same without trial, and paid damages, and received from them a license to use one of their machines for a specified term and for a certain rent, which he had neglected to pay. It was further averred in a subsequent amendment to the bill, that William W. Woodworth, as administrator, finding the specification in the patent open to certain objections and doubts as to its sufficiency, did, on the 8th of July, 1845, surrender the patent, and procure new letters with an amended specification; and that the said Washburn and Brown approved the surrender, and agreed to accept the same rights under the new patent as had been conveyed to them under the extension of the original one.

¹ [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

An answer was filed by Clement Hall on the 18th of September, 1845, which disclaimed any knowledge of most of the averments in the bill, and of the matters about which he was interrogated specifically; though a belief in the truth of most of them is expressed, except that he denied Woodworth to have been the original inventor of this planing machine, or that it is in other respects valid; and the answer further asserted that the new patent was for a different machine from the old one; and that the old one was not surrendered within the fourteen years of its term; and that Woodworth, before he died, had assigned to others all his interest in it; and that Washburn and Brown possessed no interest in the new patent, and wished an issue framed by the court to try these matters before a jury. In the course of the answer he admitted the use by himself alone, and not jointly with others, of a machine for planing, similar in some respects to Woodworth's, but unlike in others. The answer of Isaac Hall was in most respects similar, except that he denied any violation of his former agreement with Washburn and Brown, or any use of the planing machine, either severally or jointly with others, since the expiration of a certain license to him to use it.

Some papers and affidavits were then submitted to the court by the counsel, and an agreement made to have a hearing on the prayer for an injunction before an issue was completed and tried on the originality of the patent, and in this hearing to waive any objections to the originality of the patent in Woodworth.

B. R. Curtis, for complainants.
Giles & Dehon, for respondents.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. There has been no evidence whatever offered in this case of any use of the planing machine by Isaac Hall since his license expired, except what is contained in the affidavit of Aaron Pratt. This witness did not see him use it; but made a bargain with him about the 15th of July, 1845, to plane for the witness certain boards at the ordinary price, intending to set off the amount against rent due from said Isaac. Clement Hall, however, was present, and said, "We can plane them for you," and the work was done, but the witness does not say by whom, nor whether in fact the compensation for it was made to Isaac. Against this is the answer of Isaac, responsive to the bill, and sworn to, denying that he had ever used the machine since his license expired; and this agrees with Clement's assertion in his answer, that the machine was used by him alone. The facts testified to by Pratt might, standing alone, be sufficient to justify an inference that Isaac had planed the boards and used the machine.

In such cases, it may be, that any workman on the machine, though not interested in it, is liable to be restrained in order to prevent evasions, by treating all as principals who are aiding. It is a common case, also, that if one does not in person perform the work, but procures another to do it for his advantage on a machine owned by himself, he can still be restrained, and is estopped from denying, qui facit per alium, facit per se. Possibly, too, if one hires another to do work on such a machine, he may be restrained. 4 Man. & G. 179. But it is not necessary to give a decisive opinion on this, after comparing the evidence with the denial in Isaac's sworn answer.

After that answer thus testified to as true, the probability is, and it is a construction not inconsistent with the veracity of both Pratt and Isaac, that the boards were planed by Clement alone, and on his own contract, or his own assent to the arrangement, and for his own profit. It would seem, also, very easy to produce further evidence of the fact of Isaac's using the machine, or receiving the profits from it, if such was the truth. Until it is produced, the fairest construction of the affidavits and answer are, that Isaac did not work the machine or profit by it. If this construction were not the most reasonable, and did not reconcile what is sworn to in the affidavit and answers, the court would still be compelled to refuse to issue an injunction against Isaac, on the affidavit of Pratt alone, for the want of evidence in it to overcome Isaac's answer. Because something more must be produced than the evidence of a single witness to overcome an answer under oath, and responsive to the bill. Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 185. Certainly something more than the evidence of one witness, and he not testifying explicitly that Isaac either owned or worked the machine, or received any of its profits.

But in respect to the liability of Clement to an injunction, the testimony is very different; and, notwithstanding the several ingenious objections that have been urged, I have come to the conclusion that one ought to be issued against him. He admits that he uses a machine for planing, which is, in some important respects, similar to that described in Woodworth's patent. He waives, also, any opposition in this hearing to its having been originally invented by Woodworth. It is shown, moreover, that this patent has been possessed by Woodworth and others under him for something like eighteen years. It is well known, too, that, during this period, numerous recoveries have been had against persons for infringements upon it in several states in the Union; and that the sales of it by Woodworth and his assignees have been very extensive. Furthermore, two of the plaintiffs, Washburn and Brown, are admitted to have obtained verdicts in its favor against persons in this city; and a settlement and recognition of their title by the other defendant, Isaac Hall, brother of Clement, is a conceded fact in this case.

The various questions of law which have been started in this litigation, whether technical or on the merits, have mostly been carried up to the supreme court of the United States; and after full argument and patient scrutiny have, in almost every instance, been decided in favor of the patentee and those claiming under him. But still, if objections are now taken in favor of Clement Hall, new or otherwise, which ought on sound principles to prevail, the injunction should not issue against him. Hence it becomes necessary to examine all the objections which have been urged on the present occasion; but I shall not decide on any occurring to me but not urged, presuming that they are waived till the future trial on the merits.

The first objection taken is to the new letters patent, because they are issued to the administrator of the original patentee. But that objection was overruled in the case on this patent from New York, in Wilson v. Rosseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646. The renewal in the name of the administrator by the board of commissioners, for seven years, was considered good, on the ground that an invention was personal property. An invention possesses value beyond the first patent on it; being valuable for purposes abroad as the ground for a patent there, and also for a renewal at home, independent of any unexpired period of the original term, which might go as assets to an administrator. And congress has confirmed this view of the right, by extending the patent, through a special law, to the administrator even seven years longer, after the time given by the board expires.

The next objection is, that no letters of administration are now produced. But in the Kentucky case (Woodworth v. Wilson, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 712), this objection, among others, was urged, and the court did not sustain it, because the patent, being renewed to the plaintiff as administrator, was proof that he had satisfied the board at the patent office of the fact of his being administrator, and it was not now competent to go behind their decision in respect to it.

The third objection taken here is, that the patent is not certified by Mr. Burke, who was the commissioner at that time, but by H. H. Sylvester, as acting commissioner. This point was also made in the New York case. Wilson v. Rosseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646. But on my suggestion to the counsel that there were two early acts of congress, which authorized the president to appoint acting heads to the different departments and bureaus, though the offices were not vacant de jure, but the incumbents were absent from the seat of government or indisposed; and that the law conferred on those so acting all the powers which belonged to the officers they represented; and that this might, on the face of it, be legal, on the presumption it was such an appointment, unless the contrary was shown, the point was no further argued; and the court, in their opinion, held the patent to be good, which could not have been if this objection was deemed valid, under such a state of the facts. The laws mentioned may be seen in the eighth section of the act of congress of May 8, 1792, c. 37 (1 Stat. 281), and the act of February 13, 1795, c. 21 (Id. 415). If the provision in the patent act of 1836, that the chief clerk may perform certain duties when the office of commissioner is vacant, alone governed the present question, as was formerly supposed, then the ingenious argument of the respondents' counsel might apply. But it is an appointment of acting commissioner which may have been under the other general laws in the absence or illness, and not a technical vacancy of the head of the bureau, and whose powers, when so acting, are as full as those of the commissioner himself, and his appointment under that law by the president alone being authorized expressly by congress, it must be presumed to have been made here, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, and to have been duly made where drawn in question incidentally or collaterally, if it be shown that the person certifying is in the public discharge of those duties. In such cases, as acting appointments may be legal, he will be presumed to be acting legally till the contrary is shown. Potter v. Luther, 3 Johns. 431; Berryman v. Wise, 4 Durn. & E. [4 Term R.] 366; 3 Durn. & E. [4 Term R.] 635. Even in cases of murder. Dalmer v. Barnard, 7 Durn. & E. [4 Term R.] 248, 251; McNal. Ev. 487, 488. In such case, too, as the laws recognize acting officers at the heads of bureaus, whose appointment is not in the hands of the secretaries alone, like the patent office since 1836, the signatures of persons as acting commissioners carry as much verity and legality on the face of the certificates themselves, as those by the commissioner himself. They meet, then, the requisitions of the past as well as the following cases (Bleecker v. Bond [Case No. 1,534]; U. S. v. Burr [Id. 14,693]), until it be shown, if it can be properly shown, in contests between third persons, that the acting appointment was not in truth made in the manner authorized by law.

There are some other objections, however, taken here, which were not decided in [Wilson v. Rosseau] 4 How. [45 U. S.] 647, and [Woodworth v. Wilson] Id. 716, and which it is proper to examine. One of them is this. The original patent for fourteen years, given in December, 1828, expired in 1842, and though it was extended by the board for seven years more, which would last till 1849, and by congress for seven more, which would not expire till 1856, yet all of these patents were surrendered July 8, 1845, and a new one taken out for the whole twenty-eight years from December, 1828. This was done, also, with some small amendments or corrections, in the old specification of 1828. After these new letters patent for the whole term, no assignment having been made to Washburn and Brown, but only one previously on the 2d of January, 1843, the plaintiffs contend that all the previous letters being surrendered, and a new specification filed, and new letters issued, any conveyance of any interest under the old letters is inoperative and void under the new ones; and hence that Washburn and Brown possess no interest in these last, and are improperly joined in the bill. But my impression, as at present advised, is, that when a patent has been surrendered, and new letters are taken out with an amended specification, the patent has been always considered to operate, except as to suits for violations committed before the amendment, from the commencement of the original term. The amendment is not because the former patent or specification was utterly void, as seems to be the argument, but was defective or doubtful in some particular, which it was expedient to make more clear. But it is still a patent for the same invention. It can by law include no new one, and it covers only the same term of time which the former patent and its extensions did.

In the present case, these are conceded to have been the facts; and it is an error to suppose that on such facts the new letters ought to operate only from their date. By the very words of those letters, no less than by the reasons of the case, as just explained, they relate back to the commencement of the original term, and for many purposes should operate from that time. I do not say for all, as an exception will hereafter be noticed. This is in strict analogy to amended writs and amended judgments, which, for most purposes, have the same effect as if the amended matter was in them originally.

Again, if such were not the result, generally, the new letters would be treated as taking out a new patent, or an old one in a form then first valid; and, in such a view, would, of course, run fourteen years from the date of the new letters, instead of only fourteen from the issue of the original letters; or if they have been extended as here, fourteen longer, they would not run only twenty-eight years from the beginning of the original term, i. e. December, 1828, as here, but twenty-eight years from July, 1845, the date of the new letters. Besides these considerations, it has been held, that recoveries under the original patent are evidence after the new letters and new specification, to strengthen the title of the plaintiff so as to obtain an injunction; thus treating the patent as one and the same, and a conveyance of it once therefore for a specified term, as good for the term, whether an amended specification be filed or not before the term closes. See Orr v. Littlefield [Case No. 10,590]. Also Orr v. Badger [Id. 10,587], before Justice Sprague, February, 1845. It would be a little strange, that a recovery under the new and amended and corrected specification should be, as is another argument for the defendant, any stronger evidence of right than a recovery, even when the specification was more objectionable.

Independent of these circumstances, it is averred in the bill as amended, that Washburn and Brown have adopted and approved of the new specification; and that they claim under their contract, and to the extent of it, all the rights conferred by it on the patentee. There is, moreover, a clause in the act of July 4, 1836, c. 357, § 13, which seems to have been designed to dispose of such objections; and though it does not mention contracts or assignments, it is quite broad and comprehensive enough to cover them. It is: "The patent, so re-issued together with the corrected descriptions and specifications, shall have the same effect and operation in law on the trial of all actions hereafter commenced for causes subsequently occurring, as though the same had been originally filed in such corrected form before the issuing of the original patent." It would be very doubtful, also, whether a misjoinder of parties as plaintiffs in an application of this kind, could defeat a prayer for an injunction not to use a machine in which any of them were interested. At law, such a misjoinder could be objected to only in abatement, as the act sounds ex delicto (1 Chit. Pl. 75); and probably it could not be objected to at all in equity, though in the final judgment, of course it would be entered up in favor of those alone who appeared to have some right and interest to be protected. As the claims of two of the plaintiffs, however, have been already proved and established in several recoveries before the new letters; and the contract now offered, under which they claim, confers on them a right to use fifty planing machines within certain territory, including this city; and there is a covenant by the grantees of that right not to sell to different persons liberty to use others within those limits, during the time of Washburn and Brown's contract, their interest within them would seem to be sufficiently exclusive to make them properly plaintiffs, and entitled to judgment. The strongest doubt with me is in relation to the interests of the others in this city, so as to justify joining them; but as that objection has not been taken, and all the facts are not known to me concerning them, I pass it by for the present.

But there is one more exception in this case; and it is of a character causing some difficulty, if the evidence in respect to it was more clear, and accorded with what is supposed by the counsel for the respondent to have been the truth of the transaction. The original patent is not put in evidence here, but a certified copy from the patent office. That copy now reads, that the term is one of twenty-eight years from December, 1828; but when produced at a former opening of the cause it is admitted that it read fourteen years from December, 1828. A letter from the commissioner is offered by the respondents, stating, as I understand it, that the change has since been made in order to correspond with the truth, the new letters patent being for twenty-eight years from 1828, and the record being so, but the forms for copies having been printed fourteen, some were filled up without altering the printed term from fourteen to twenty-eight. The respondents infer from this explanation, that the letters patent themselves, as issued in July, 1845, and not merely the copy of them, contained the same mistake, and that the record of them did also; and supposing that both have been altered since, as well as the copy, the respondents object to the legality of such amendments, and likewise contend, that if legal at all, it is so only in respect to suits and other matters arising subsequently to the alteration. But I do not understand the letter of the commissioner to go beyond the copies; and if only the copies were erroneous, and they have been corrected, he undoubtedly had the power, and ought to make them conform to the patent itself and the record.

On the contrary, if the new letters patent themselves were by mistake for only fourteen years from December, 1828, when they were intended to be twenty-eight, and thus to cover not only the original term, but both the renewed terms; and the commissioner has amended them since this bill was filed, I doubt whether, on the testimony now before us, they could be received in evidence to sustain this bill, considering its allegations to go on a patent for twenty-eight years, and one so issued on the 8th of July, 1845. It would probably be his duty to correct the letters patent in such a case, when applied to, and to minute the correction on or in them; as these matters are between him representing the government and the patentee. Nor would it be necessary for him in such case to re-sign or re-seal the letters, as is urged on English precedents. See Sharp's Case and Nickels' Case, in Webst. Pat. Cas. 645 and 658. For those do not apply here when the signing and sealing are by the same officer, and by the same also as he that makes the correction. For he adopts them as his own acts by re-delivering the patent after it is amended, as much as he adopts the writing of it on the paper or parchment. But it would seem to be necessary to have the secretary of state sign anew, or assent to the amendment, as he is a distinct officer, and without signing anew, or assenting, has never examined and authenticated the letters as amended.

The record or enrollment must also be made to correspond with the letters as amended, if it does not already. As to the effect of such alteration, I entertain an impression, resting on general principles and the grounds of some of the precedents abroad, and in the absence of any statute here, to allow amendments of this kind, or to prescribe their effect in such cases, that a patent after thus amended in a material mistake, could not operate as to third persons against whom prosecutions were pending, but only for causes accruing after the correction. See Webst. Pat. Cas. 664. It may be different if the mistake was entirely clerical. If the mistake was not clerical, or one made by the patentee himself, it is quite clear that the law abroad makes it operate only from that correction, and it is so here in respect to defective specifications, when they are allowed by statute to be amended in certain cases. See Act July 4, 1836, c. 357, § 13. They are not good as to suits pending, but only as to actions for causes subsequently accruing.

But in cases like this, if it should turn out, on clear evidence, that the new letters themselves had been altered so as to be wholly void, a different and equally difficult question may arise. It is this, it might be that the surrender of the original letters, and of the extensions of them, so that all might be renewed in one, would become also void; and the party might then, perhaps, be allowed to amend his bill, and enjoin and recover on the former letters patent, if the old specification was not too defective for that purpose. On this I give no opinion at this time; but if evidence be obtained, that the new letters patent themselves have been altered as to the term in them since this action was commenced, as the respondents' counsel apprehend, it may then become necessary to decide it. The mode adopted in this case, of issuing one set of new letters patent for the three different terms before existing, when the old specification was sought to be corrected, is likewise open to some question concerning its legality. The most obvious mode would be to renew each separately, or renew only the old letters and their specification; and let the others be cured or aided by relation back to the original one. But as no such objection is pressed now, I forbear comment upon that also.

It may not be improper to add before closing, in relation to technical objections, as most of them are when urged against injunctions generally, that though they are to be weighed and examined, and allowed to prevail, as they must in other cases in equity, if legal, yet they ought to be treated with no particular indulgence. In all inquiries in equity, the leaning in doubtful points must certainly be rather against than in favor of them; and more especially must it be so in preliminary injunctions, where the decision is only temporary, and may be dissolved on motion at any time, on showing fuller proof as to any thing affecting the merits of the controversy. The injunction as to Clement Hall is allowed till the further order of the court, but not against Isaac Hall.

[For further proceedings in this case, see Case No. 18,017. For other cases involving this patent, see note to Bicknell v. Todd, Case No. 1,389.]

Case No. 18,017.

WOODWORTH v. HALL et al.

WOODWORTH v. STONE.

[1 Woodb. & M. 389; 1 2 Robb, Pat. Cas. 517; 6 Pa. Law J. 178; 16 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 66.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept. 21, 1846.

VALIDITY OF LETTERS PATENT—SIGNATURE OF "ACTING COMMISSIONER"—CLERICAL MISTAKE—INJUNCTION.

1. Where evidence is offered to prove, that the "acting commissioner," who signs a patent, was not appointed by the president, it is questionable whether it be competent to admit it in controversies where he is not a party.

2. Under the patent law of 1836 [5 Stat. 117], the chief clerk is held to be the "acting commissioner," as well in the necessary absence of the head of the office, as in case of a vacancy de jure.

3. The sanction of the secretary of state, to a correction of a clerical mistake in letters-patent, may be given in writing afterwards; and he need not re-sign the letters themselves.

4. If the correction be of only a clerical mistake, it operates back to the original date of them, unless perhaps as to third persons, who have acquired intervening rights to be affected by the alteration.

[Cited in Woodworth v. Edwards, Case No. 18,014.]

5. If a new patent, issued on a surrender of old ones, be void for any cause connected with the acts of public officers, it is questionable whether the original patents must not be considered in force till their terms expire.

[Cited in Woodworth v. Edwards, Case No. 18,014; French v. Rogers, Id. 5,103.]

6. An injunction once granted will not be dissolved on account of any doubts, as to the validity of a new patent in such cases, caused by the errors of such officers, if measures are pending in congress to remove them by legislation.

[Cited in Woodworth v. Edwards, Case No. 18,014; Woodworth v. Rogers, Id. 18,018.]

In these cases, injunctions were granted at May term, 1845, and at May term, 1846; a motion was made, in the first-named case, to dissolve the injunction. An opinion was given at the same term, stating the facts, and retaining the injunction as to one of the defendants, but dissolving it as to the other, for reasons applicable to the merits. [Case No. 18,016.]

Among the objections which were then urged against the validity of the patent, on which the claim of the plaintiff was founded, were these: Because it was signed by H. Sylvester, as acting commissioner, rather than by Edmund Burke, Esq., the commissioner; and because the patent had been altered at the patent office since it originally issued. For further particulars in relation to these objections, and the detailed facts on which they rested, reference can be had to the opinion and case, as drawn up.

At an adjourned session of the same term, held at Boston, in September, 1846, the motion to dissolve the injunction was renewed as to the first case, and the like motion made as to the second case, both of which are now to be disposed of. They were founded on the same grounds, accompanied by new evidence, offered under the first objection, to show that Mr. Sylvester, at the time of signing this patent, was not acting under any appointment made by the president, by virtue of the 8th section of the act of congress passed May 8, 1792, c. 37 [1 Stat. 281]; but, being then chief clerk in the patent office, claimed to be authorized to sign it in the necessary absence of the commissioner, under the power conferred by the 2d section of the act of July 8, 1836, c. 357 (5 Stat. 117), reorganizing the patent office.

In respect to the second objection—the alteration of the patent—it was further proved that a mistake, as to the time it was intended to run when renewed, occurred in the patent itself, as well as the record and copy of it; the proof, at the first hearing, extending only to the copy. Thus, it was issued for fourteen years, but was meant to be for twenty-eight, and was afterwards altered to twenty-eight. In answer to this, it was now shown that the secretary of state subsequently expressed in writing his assent and sanction to the correction of the mistake, though he was not consulted at the time it took place.

Mr. Giles, in support of motion.

B. R. Curtis, against it.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. It is not necessary to go into many of the facts and principles considered in the former motion in this subject, and then disposed of; but the new and material facts since obtained are to be examined, so far as they may weigh upon the objections, and affect the principles before settled.

The first inquiry now is, whether the chief clerk in the patent office, not having been in fact specially appointed to be acting commissioner by the president, in the absence of the commissioner himself, could legally sign this patent, under the general provision in the 2d section of the patent law of 1836 (chapter 357). The words of that section, bearing on this question, are: "The chief clerk, in all cases, during the necessary absence of the commissioner, or when the said principal office shall become vacant, shall have the charge and custody of the seal, and of the records, books, papers, machines, models, and all other things belonging to the said office, and shall perform the duties of commissioner during such vacancy."

It is contended by the defendant that this clause empowers the chief clerk to act as commissioner only when his office is entirely, or de jure, vacant; and not when he is merely absent from sickness, or other necessary cause, constituting a de facto vacancy, only, or a want of the commissioner present to discharge the duties arising from some such cause. It is certain that the words here used, looking no farther, appear to countenance the more narrow and limited view of the word "vacancy;" but if we look to the object of the clause, to other sections of this and the succeeding patent act, to the contemporaneous construction placed upon it, to the long acquiescence under that construction, and the great public as well as private interests which have grown up in conformity to it within the last ten years, a broader meaning to the term seems fortified by the whole spirit of the act, and by the analogies of the case. It is proved as a fact, that the chief clerk, since July, 1836, has been accustomed to perform, under this section, all the duties of commissioner during his necessary absence, and without any new special authority being obtained from the president, under the law of 1792. It has been uniform in the office to consider the word "vacancy" here as meant to cover an actual, or de facto vacancy, by a necessary absence from the city; and the act has been construed so as to include as a vacancy, for this purpose and object, the inability of the commissioner at the seat of government to discharge his official duties, arising from any necessary cause, as well as a vacancy arising from his death or resignation. It is conceded, also, that many patents during that period have been signed, and many records certified, by the chief clerk, as acting commissioner, under the 2d section of the patent law, and which must become invalid if this one be so pronounced, for that cause.

¹ [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

It is further apparent, from the fourth section of the same law, that, unless this broad construction be correct, the chief clerk is not empowered to certify copies of the original records and papers, in the necessary absence of the commissioner, however urgent may be the necessity for them, in the protection of public or private rights. But, by a subsequent act, passed March 3, 1837, c. 45, § 2 (5 Stat. 191), the chief clerk is expressly empowered, in the absence of the commissioner, to give copies of former records supplied where formerly burned. And hence it would follow, if necessary absence in the first law is not covered by the term "vacancy," he is not authorized to give copies of original records in the absence of the commissioner, though he may of records burnt, and supplied again afterwards. This would be a distinction most groundless, and hardly presumable to have been intended. It would likewise follow, that, in the absence of the commissioner, the chief clerk was to have charge of the seal and records, but could not use them for some of the most common and necessary and urgent business connected with them. Furthermore, he is placed under oath, and also under bonds, so as to secure the community when he does act; and is, indeed, more safe for the public than a temporary commissioner selected by the president, as such a one may be under no bonds, whatever; yet, though under this security, a construction is urged that he has not been trusted by congress to act, in the very cases where a person is trusted by them to act, without security, if selected by the president. And this is the reasoning, too, though he is selected to be chief clerk, rendering him eligible to perform these duties, virtually by the president, in all cases, and often by his express wish. Nor is it any stretch of confidence, extraordinary or unnecessary, for congress to confer on a clerk such a power as the signing of a patent. It is done clearly, and is conceded to be properly done, when the commissioner dies or resigns, and a technical vacancy exists; and in case of his absence it is done, not for personal favor, but for public convenience; so that citizens are not to be delayed in getting patents till a successor is appointed, and arrives, perhaps from some remote place. So it is conceded to have been done for more than half a century, by a grant to the president from congress, by the 8th section of the act of May 8, 1792 (chapter 37). The danger from the broad construction here, is then no greater than from other powers, admitted already to exist in other ways, in relation to this same subject. But to guard against long absences, without a regular and more responsible head to a department or bureau, it is wisely provided, by the act of February 13, 1795, c. 21 [1 Stat. 415], that the temporary appointment by the president shall not continue over six months at one time, because a regular successor could in that time be procured, and the sanction of the senate should be asked for filling the office during a longer time; and by the section now under consideration it is contemplated that the temporary head of the bureau shall act only during the "absence" of the commissioner which is "necessary," or a vacancy happening in any way; both of which are, of course, not likely in any case to last longer than six months, in an age when such offices are so much sought after as in this. Again, in respect to the meaning of the word "vacancy" as used in like cases, it is obvious that the act of February 13, 1793, looked to it as covering absence and sickness, as well as death or resignation of the regular incumbent, because it speaks of a vacancy when referring to the former act, and a temporary appointment for only six months under it, and when that previous act authorized such appointment as much in case of absence and sickness as of death. All of them, then, seem to be covered by the reference, as each constituting a vacancy, de facto, to be sure, in case of absence and sickness, but still referred to under the generic term of a "vacancy."

There is another circumstance of some importance, not yet noticed, bearing on this question. It is well known to all who have been familiar with the departments and bureaus at Washington, that the delay and inconvenience to the public in obtaining temporary appointments from the president, if absent far from the seat of government, as he sometimes is, when the head of a department or bureau, by sickness or accident, is obliged to be away from his office, has led sometimes to complaints of a suspension or postponement of business of an important character; and it has been contemplated, either by a general law, or as the department and bureaus become from time to time reorganized, to provide that the chief clerks in each should temporarily exercise the duties of the heads thereof, while they were necessarily absent. It is obvious that the public would often be much benefited by such a provision, in cases like the president's being away, so that he could not at once make a temporary appointment; and it is equally obvious that the public can never suffer by such an appointment, and by operation of law, more than it does now, when made by the president, if not away; nor would such a general provision be either novel or dangerous, considering that in the case of most ministerial offices under the government, such as collectors of the customs and marshals, their deputies, appointed by themselves, can now act for them in their absence, and do constantly perform most important duties at such times. Hence, when the land office was reorganized, 4th July, 1836, the same day the bill passed reorganizing the patent office, containing the provisions now under consideration, clauses were inserted in both bills, with a view to confer such a power or appointment on the chief clerks in both bureaus. The clause in respect to the patent office I have already quoted, and have been examining its spirit, and other analogies, in order to see if the broad one covering the present case is not the proper construction of its language and intent. The other clause, in respect to the land office, is on the same subject; but, by a different arrangement of the sentence, is too clear to admit of any different construction from that I have applied to the patent office. In the last, the language is: "And in case of a vacancy in the office of the commissioner of the general land office, or of the absence or sickness of the commissioner, the duties of said office shall devolve upon, and be performed, ad interim, by the clerk of the public lands." This clerk of the public lands was the chief clerk in the office. Undoubtedly the object to be attained was alike in both; the inconvenience to be remedied was the same; the risks similar; and it was probably only by inadvertence that less precise language was employed in the patent act than in the act as to the land office.

It is a sound rule, in the construction of statutes generally, that "every thing which is within the intent of the makers of the act, although it be not within the letter, is as much within the act as if it were within the letter and intent also." Walker v. Deveaux, 4 Paige, 252, cites 1 Plow. 366; Dwar. St. 691. It is conceded, however, that the intent must be ascertained by the words that are used, coupled with the mischief to be remedied. But it is a mistake to argue that because ministerial officers can do only what they are specially empowered (1 Mass. 281-283) they cannot do what, on a fair and liberal and useful construction of the words used by congress, they are specially empowered to do. The intent of an act of congress, as to such offices, is to be gathered from the whole spirit, no less than the letter of the act, as much as it is in other cases.

In both of the provisions we have just been considering, the intention of congress, seeming to have been the same, the action of the chief clerks, or heads of their respective bureaus, in their absence, is not an action without pretence of justification by any express act of congress, without countenance of any law, and a mere usurpation, as it would be, if done under an idea that they can so act, and transcend limited powers by mere construction, as being clerks, and their superiors absent; or as being more convenient, at times, to the public. But they equally rely here, and for ten years have relied, on explicit and special provisions by congress to authorize their action in both cases; both provisions being made at the same time, with a like view, though one uses language not susceptible of a different construction, while the other does not; but language which, at the same time, will fairly bear a construction in conformity with the spirit of the law, and similar to that which must confessedly be put on the other act.

Besides this reasoning and these analogies on the present question, the conclusions which I have formed in favor of the validity of these letters-patent, under this objection, are strengthened by some other considerations. Here a patent is offered in evidence, valid on its face, and objected to only on account of matter dehors, that the acting commissioner who signs it was not in fact one so acting by appointment of the president. If he had been, it is conceded, the patent is valid; and this was virtually decided by the supreme court in Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646, 663, where this very patent, signed by Mr. Sylvester as acting commissioner, was objected to, and upheld. No proof was offered there, that he had, or had not, received any such appointment; but, in such cases, it being legal to have an acting commissioner, it was presumed he was duly appointed so, and his acts therefore valid. So, in this case, such a presumption would be enough, provided it be not competent to go further, with evidence on the subject, in a proceeding between third persons; the power of the officer himself not being here put directly in issue in a proceeding where he is a party. That a person is an acting officer is enough in most cases, even in that of murder, see the cases collected at the last session of this court, in the case of U. S. v. Peterson [Case No. 16,037]. For like reasons, probably, Justice Story, in this case, when the injunction was granted, intimated that the patent must be bad on its face, in order to sustain an objection about the officer, and Judge Kane countenances, to some extent, the same idea in his opinion in Smith v. Mercer [Id. 13,078], connected with this same patent, August, 1846, Penn. D. Ct.

These reasons and opinions make it very questionable whether the evidence is competent, or admissible at all in this action, that the acting appointment of the chief clerk was not made by the president himself; and if it is not, the patent on its face, as in 4 How. [45 U. S.], must be deemed valid. I should, however, do injustice to the intrinsic difficulties of this question, and the different reasonings and analogies which have been and may be fairly brought to bear on it, were I not to add that some doubt remains in respect to the results I have reached, though the inclination of my mind is decidedly to sustain the validity of the letters.

The second objection to the patent, on account of its alteration, has been fully considered before, on some different facts, when the motion to dissolve one of the injunctions was made last spring. The correction of a mistake, though committed clerically, yet as here in a matter material, was then supposed not to be valid, though made by the commissioner, unless approved by the secretary of state. It was not thought necessary by me that the patent, after such a correction, should be re-sealed or re-signed by the commissioner, he being the officer who did both acts originally. But, as the secretary of state must by law sign it, as well as the commissioner, should the patent be altered after he signs it, he must, by analogy, be made aware of any such subsequent alteration, and sanction it, before his signature can be regarded as verifying the amended patent. No evidence was produced before of his knowledge, and his sanction of this change; but such evidence is now offered, and is probably sufficient, without any entry of the same on the letters-patent themselves. That would certainly be a convenient mode of perpetuating the evidence of his sanction; but, no law requiring it, the principles seem to demand nothing beyond his assent or ratification of it; both of which exist here in writing. Independent of form, it is in substance very seldom that he interferes at all with the issue or correction of patents; but the commissioner practically discharges all such duties.

There is still another question connected with this point which might arise, but has not been now pressed. It is, whether a patent so amended could operate, except as from the time of the amendment; and, if not so, then those letters, being altered since the bill was filed, cannot avail the plaintiff in support of it. If new matter was inserted not originally contemplated, or corrections made not clerically, it is questionable whether they could relate back to the date of the letters-patent; but here it seems they ought to, as much as any like clerical amendments of declarations, or pleas, or judgments, under the statutes of jeofails. A different conclusion might be formed, on a fuller examination of the subject, as to third persons who had acquired rights as the patent stood before it was corrected, unless by its being in a mistaken form as to length of time, the new patent must be considered void; and the surrender of the former patents for twenty-eight years, on which it was to be founded, would be considered void, also, till a new patent in proper form issued, instead of the old ones. I merely glance, however, at these last considerations, without deciding on what has not been presented nor argued, and without going into the subject of the amendments that might then become necessary in the bill.

There has a third question been suggested, but not argued, as not being included in the notice of the motion, and will, therefore, not be examined at this time. It is, the power of the commissioner to consolidate all the terms of fourteen, seven, and seven years, into one patent for twenty-eight years. I shall merely say, that in the case of 4 How. [45 U. S.], before referred to, this patent, thus consolidated, was upheld; though it does not appear that this objection was taken and discussed by counsel or the court, though the counsel were numerous, and very astute to raise all objections appearing plausible. The point may still be found a tenable one; but, if so, a like conclusion may follow as in the other case just referred to—that if such renewal is void, the surrender of the former patents is likewise void, and recoveries can be had on them as if never attempted to be consolidated.

Finally, it is contended that if any doubt exists as to the validity of a patent, as some assuredly does here, as before stated, the injunction should be dissolved. This may, with some qualification as to other matters connected with the subject, be true in granting an injunction, as laid down in Ogle v. Edge [Case No. 10,462], if the doubt relate to the merits—that is, the originality or usefulness of a patent, or a patentee's own error in his specification. But, when the objection relates to the technical form or signature of papers connected with the letters, and the doubts arise from acts of public officers, and not any neglect or wrong of the patentee, the position seems to me not sound. More especially should an injunction, once granted, not be disturbed for such doubts, when, as in this case, the term for trial of the merits is near; and the allowing such doubts to prevail, even to the extent of dissolving an injunction, might not merely affect the present patent and present parties, but operate injuriously on all other patents and parties where, for the last ten years, by a cotemporaneous and continued construction of the patent law, chief clerks have, under its authority, signed patents or other important papers as acting commissioner, in the necessary absence of the commissioner, or made mistakes of a clerical character in the form of the letters.

In my opinion, so far from its being proper, under such circumstances, to dissolve an injunction for doubts on such technical objections, it is rather the duty of the court if, as here, mischievous consequences are likely to ensue to others from interfering, and if, as here, legislative measures have been recommended by the public officers, which are pending, to remedy or obviate the possible evil from any public mistakes, not to dissolve an injunction already granted, unless required to do it by imperative principles of law, showing the letters-patent to be clearly void. [Grant v. Raymond] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 244.

The motion in these cases, therefore, is not granted.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Bicknell v. Todd, Case No. 1,389.]

WOODWORTH (MONCE v.). See Case No. 9,706.

Case No. 18,018.

WOODWORTH et al. v. ROGERS et al.

[3 Woodb. & M. 135; 1 2 Robb, Pat. Cas. 625.]
Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1847.

PATENT FOR INVENTION—INJUNCTION AGAINST USE
—VIOLATOR IN CONTEMPT—MOTION TO DIS-SOLVE—EVIDENCE—TRIAL BY JURY.

1. A party who has been enjoined against the use of a patent, is guilty of a contempt if he afterwards use another patent similar in principle, when the author of the last had previously been enjoined by the owner of the first patent.

2. He can purge himself of such contempt only by satisfying the court that he was not aware that the last patent had been enjoined.

3. If one makes an improvement in a prior patent, obtained by another, it gives him no right to use what had before been patented, without license, while the term of the prior patent continues.

[Cited in Star Salt Caster Co. v. Crossman, Case No. 13,321.]

¹ [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

4. Where a special injunction against the use of a patented machine has been imposed when a bill is filed, motions to dissolve it will not be heard on the same evidence, or new evidence improperly neglected to be offered before; but will be on new and material testimony.

[Cited in Hussey v. Whitely, Case No. 6,950; National School Furniture Co. v. Paton, Id. 10,050.]

5. When an answer is filed to the bill denying the validity of the patent, and evidence supporting the answer, prima facie, is offered, the injunction will be dissolved, unless the other side file counter-evidence sustaining the validity of the patent. What generally is proper evidence on that point, considered.

6. It is the duty of the court to weigh the evidence, and if the balance seems in favor of the plaintiff, to continue the injunction till a trial of the right can be had at law, by an issue out of the chancery side of the court, or by an action at law. If the parties cannot agree on an issue, the court will direct an action at law to be brought speedily, to settle the conflicting title; and if not done, will dissolve the injunction.

[Cited in Earth Closet Co. v. Fenner, Case No. 4,249.]

7. The remedy by injunction, used in this way, does not impair any right to a trial by jury, as secured by the constitution, but merely aids the party appearing to have the legal title, till such a trial, if desired, can be had.

This was a bill in equity, filed September 8, 1846. It averred, that the plaintiffs possessed the title to the patent rights of William Woodworth, Senior, to the planing machine alleged to have been invented by him. That the defendants were using one of said machines, or one substantially like them. That the plaintiffs had before recovered a verdict and judgment against one J. Gould, for the use of a like machine; and had requested the defendants to desist from infringing on the rights of the plaintiffs therein, but they refused to comply. The bill prayed for a discovery how long the defendants had used the machine, and after asking replies to several interrogatories, requested that the defendants be made to account for the profits derived from the machine, and be enjoined from any further use of it; and for such other relief as might seem meet. The respondents, in November, 1846, filed answers to the bill. That of [Lawrence] Rogers, which is the only one now under consideration, answering the interrogatories, set out, that some months before May, 1846, he used a machine similar to that claimed by said Woodworth as his, but has not done it since, nor used, since, any similar machine; and hence, considers himself not bound to answer further. Rogers then proceeded to deny that Woodworth was the original inventor of the machine patented by him in December, 1828; and that he well knew that fact, and thus obtained his letters, therefore, fraudulently. He further averred, that the surrender of the patent, July 8, 1845, and the taking out a new specification for the same machine, instead of for one before defective, was for a new and different thing from what had been before claimed; and this being known to Woodworth, made the last patent void. Rogers then prayed that an issue be ordered by the court, and sent to a jury, to try the question of fraud in obtaining the patent in 1828, and the amended specification in 1845.

On the 19th of January, 1847, after a hearing before Sprague, District Judge, a special injunction issued against Rogers not to use the planing machine patented by Woodworth, or any one of similar construction. In February, 1847, a motion was filed to punish Rogers for a contempt in violating that injunction. At the hearing for this contempt, it was proved, that a planing machine like the plaintiffs' was used in Rogers' shop; but, on his affidavit that it was run by others who leased the shop from him for hire, and the court considering it doubtful whether his connection with it was such as to render him responsible for its use, he was exonerated from the supposed contempt, on the payment of the costs of that motion. On the 17th April, 1847, the plaintiffs filed another motion against the respondent, Rogers, for another contempt in violating said injunction, since the previous hearing. On the 27th May, 1847, he put in an answer, denying his breach of that injunction, and adding, that since the 18th of February, 1847, he had used a machine in his shop like that invented and patented by Benjamin Brown, of Vermont, on the 9th of November, 1845; and the right to use which Rogers bought of James H. Edwards, assignee of Brown; and that it is not substantially like any machine said to have been invented and patented by Woodworth, 27th December, 1828, as heretofore described by the plaintiffs in their original bill. The answer adds, that if the plaintiffs claim, under their patents, any such machine substantially as that used by Rogers, William Woodworth was not the original inventor thereof; and if any such one is described in his letters of July, 1845, they were obtained on false representations and fraud. That there was no defect in his specification of December, 1828, and if any existed, it arose from design and fraud, and not from mistake. And that the letters patent of July, 1845, if purporting to cover such a machine, were obtained corruptly and falsely, and made to embrace what he knew belonged to others. On the 1st of June, Rogers filed amendments to the above answers, denying again the title of the plaintiffs to the Woodworth patent within the limits of Boston, and restating, with formal variations, his charge of fraud in the new letters patent, issued July 8, 1845, and the want of identity between the subject of them and the letters of December, 1828, and also charges of fraud committed on congress in procuring the extension made by it. The amendments not only repeated these matters, but set up Daniel Dunbar, of South Boston, to be the earliest and true inventor of the planing machine used by Woodworth. They next averred, that the pressure rollers, named in his patent, had been well described in a patent to Samuel Bentham, in 1783, and other parts in a patent to J. Bramah, in England, in 1802. They further alleged, that Daniel N. Smith, of Warwick, Mass., invented and patented a machine similar to Woodworth's, in 1826, and that James Hill, of Lynn, and Joseph Hill, and several others, had knowledge of a like machine made by said James and Joseph, prior to Woodworth's first patent—and similar allegations were made as to the invention of such a machine by John Hale, of Oakham, Mass., and that the rollers were known and used by James Baldwin, of Westford, Mass., as early as 1818.

At the first hearing of this case, to punish Rogers for a contempt, by violating the injunction, another motion was made by the counsel of Rogers to dissolve the original injunction imposed by Sprague, District Judge. It was agreed, that these two motions be argued together; and it was further agreed that time should be allowed to Rogers to procure and file testimony, pertaining to both motions, and the plaintiff have further opportunity to procure testimony in reply. Various affidavits and other evidence were accordingly put into the case on both sides at the times mutually agreed. Reference will be made in the opinion of the court to such portions of them as seemed important under each motion.

B. R. Curtis, for plaintiffs.
Mr. Tasker, for defendant.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. The first question to be disposed of, is the motion against Rogers, for punishment for a contempt in violating an injunction which was granted in this case against him in favor of the plaintiffs. That injunction was against the use of the planing machine invented by Woodworth, or any machine substantially the same. It was in these words: "You shall not use or vend any one, or more of the machines substantially the same in construction as the machine of the said Wm. Woodworth, patented as mentioned in the said bill of complaint, on the 18th day of July, A. D. 1845."

The first inquiry is, what are the matters of fact and law which are properly to be examined on this motion? They are—not the originality of Woodworth's machine, not any fraud in the renewals of it, not the propriety of the original injunction. Those questions were all passed on, so far as made and as material in this motion for a contempt, at the original hearing before my associate. They are for the present inquiry, therefore, res judicata.

But it is important here to ascertain whether Rogers—and that is the next step in the inquiry—while under the injunction not to use any machine, substantially like Woodworth's, has disregarded the rights of the plaintiffs and the authority of the United States, as existing in the circuit court, so as to violate the order given to him? Has he, after a full hearing, and in contempt of that order, proceeded to use a planing machine similar in principle to Woodworth's? As to this, it is admitted by Rogers, that since the 15th of February, 1847, about the time he paid the costs on the previous motion to punish him for contempt, he has used a planing machine invented by Benjamin Brown and patented in November, 1845. But he denies that this machine is substantially like the planing machine patented by Woodworth. The plaintiffs contend, it is in principle the same, and its use is therefore a breach of the injunction. This, then, is the point controverted, which is to be settled. What is the evidence on this question? and how is the balance of it?

Various witnesses on the part of the plaintiffs, and among them some highly intelligent machinists and experts, testify unqualifiedly, that this machine, now used by Rogers, is the same in substance and principle as Woodworth's. On the contrary, several witnesses testify in his behalf, that they consider this machine as differing in substance or principle from the plaintiffs'. But some of these last describe this difference to consist in certain specified improvements made by Brown on the original machine of the plaintiffs, rather than as containing parts, all of which vary from Woodworth's, or which are independent and different from his. Thus, Isaac Adams, for one instance, speaks of Brown's machine being different, but still containing "a combination claimed in the Woodworth patent." And others, like J. E. Andrews, admit that Brown's machine uses, substantially, two parts of Woodworth's own, "the cutting cylinder and a small guide roller."

In the examination of this evidence, as well as of Brown's own letters patent, which are put into the case, and in which he claims to have "invented a new and useful improvement in planing machines," it hardly can be doubted that his machine contains some of the most important parts of Woodworth's, but is in other respects different, and perhaps an improvement on it. It is well known, however, as sound law, that where a machine has been invented like that of Woodworth's, in 1828, no one can make an improvement on it, and use important portions of the original invention, while the original term, or the renewals of it, exist, without the license of the original patentee, or a purchase from him of the right so to use what belongs to him. Hovey v. Stevens [Case No. 6,745]; Washburn v. Gould [Id. 17,214]. See Act Cong. Feb. 21, 1793 (1 Stat. 323). For the same reason, if the improvement by a succeeding inventor be genuine and important, no one can use that improvement without a license or purchase from him, although they have obtained the right to use the original machine on which the last invention is an improvement.

In this view of the evidence and law, therefore, Rogers is using a machine, which in its substance and principle contains important portions of Woodworth's patent, though it may in other respects have some qualities or parts which are new or improved, and, in thus using what is material in Woodworth's invention, he certainly violates the injunction. But I can conceive, if the case stopped here, that some apology might exist in the apprehension of the party, that because Brown's machine was considered by several as an improvement on Woodworth's, he might use it without violating Woodworth's rights, or paying him for such parts of his as are included in Brown's. To see then whether a designed evasion of the order, or, in other words, a contempt was committed, it is proper to look further into the testimony on the part of the plaintiffs. They proceed to show further, that the question, whether Brown's machine is original and independent of Woodworth's, so as to entitle him to make and use it, or license others to, without Woodworth's permission, is a question which has already been settled. It has been settled, too, against Brown himself, and in favor of Woodworth, after a full hearing in the circuit court of the United States, in the Vermont district, where Brown resides.

The evidence is direct and plenary as to this, and furthermore that Brown has been put under an injunction, in behalf of Woodworth, not to use without Woodworth's license, the machine for which Brown took out a patent in 1845, and which Rogers is now using. The proceedings were commenced May 7, 1846, by Hickok, an assignee of Woodworth, against Brown and others, alleging that Brown's machine in all material parts was substantially the same as Woodworth's, and asking an injunction against it; and, after hearing affidavits and arguments on both sides, at the May term of the circuit court for Vermont, in 1846, an injunction was issued against the further use of Brown's machine without a license from Woodworth, or his assignees, on the ground that it was an infringement on their rights. It can hardly be tolerated after this, happening as long ago as May, 1846, that a person, under injunction not to use a machine substantially like Woodworth's, should proceed to purchase and use one, which had, after a public hearing in an adjoining circuit, been enjoined against as substantially alike,—and that in a legal proceeding against the patentee himself.

On all this evidence the court would be blind to the facts, and unfaithful to the rights of parties and the public, to allow such evasions of their orders and decrees; and it feels compelled to say on this evidence, unexplained, not only that their injunction has been violated, but in a manner highly culpable. We would not, however, bar the respondent from any exculpation which truth may warrant. If he can show that he was entirely ignorant of this injunction against Brown during the time he has been using Brown's machine, it would go far in extenuation. This he can do, presumptively at least, by the affidavit of Edwards, his vendor, showing that Edwards was ignorant of that injunction; or if not so, did not communicate the fact to Rogers; and also by his own affidavit, purging himself of all knowledge of the proceedings in Vermont, from either Edwards or others, and all design to evade the orders of this court in the use of Brown's machine.

The other motion to dissolve the injunction, imposed on Rogers by my associate, presents a different question, and is to be governed by several rules and considerations entirely dissimilar. The main point in that is not whether an injunction should be imposed at all, for that has already been done, and after a full hearing—and till the contrary is shown it is to be presumed it was done rightly. Woodworth v. Hall [Cases Nos. 18,016 and 18,017]; Maxwell v. Ward, 11 Price, 17. "Omnia presumuntur rite esse acta." The burthen, then, is on the respondent to overcome that presumption. It is open to be overcome by new matter or evidence arising since the injunction was imposed, though very seldom by matter then existing, which the party neglected to present to the consideration of the court. If this were not the rule, the same matter might be offered anew, or matter before neglected offered on new motions to dissolve injunctions, weekly, the year round, and the court be entirely occupied either in virtual rehearings of like facts and like arguments in one and the same cause, or in considering what the petitioner had before improperly neglected to introduce. The new matter, usually relied on in cases of this category, is a subsequent answer, denying the originality of the patent or its validity in other respects and supporting the objection, if contested by the plaintiff, with prima facie proof not rebutted. Poor v. Carleton [Case No. 11,272]. Or⁶ it is by showing a trial at law, since had between these parties, and at times between others, involving like questions, and a judgment rendered against the validity of the patent.

The ground chiefly relied on here is, therefore, a subsequent answer, which not only denies the originality of Woodworth's patent in 1828, but the validity of the succeeding renewals of it, both by the board for the patent office and by congress, through gross frauds, alleged to have been practised on them by Woodworth and his assigns. This denial of legal title in the plaintiffs, made by the respondent, under oath, is not without some weight, when standing alone. Once it was deemed sufficient to dissolve an injunction, already specially granted on a hearing, and not a mere common injunction, issued of course. See the cases, collected in Poor v. Carleton [supra], and Orr v. Littlefield [Case No. 10,590]. But such is not the law or the practice now, either in England or this country. See cases last cited, and 16 Ves. 49; 19 Ves. 183; 11 Price, 17; Perry v. Parker [Case No. 11,010]. The presumptions arising from the answer, may now be disproved by evidence on the part of the plaintiffs, and then counter testimony is admissible by the respondent to sustain his answer. After this, it becomes the duty of the court to balance these allegations and proofs, and decide how the weight of them is; and whether in the exercise of a sound discretion upon them the injunction ought to be dissolved or not. 2 Ves. Sr. 19; 2 Johns. Ch. 204; Poor v. Carleton [supra].

Here the plaintiffs have offered a variety of evidence to countervail and disprove the answer, and also the testimony introduced by Rogers. (1) They show not only the letters-patent themselves, to Woodworth, which are public records and acts of public officers, that are alone prima facie evidence for the patentees of the validity of their claim, but next (2) the oath of the patentee, when they were obtained, that he was the original inventor. Alden v. Dewey [Case No. 153]. (3) Next a subsequent confirmation of his claim as inventor, by the renewal of those letters by the board of the patent office. (4) Next, such a confirmation by congress itself, in granting a further term for the patent. (5) Next, the possession and a use and sales of this patent and numerous machines over the whole country, and for large sums of money, as if rightfully entitled to it, for nearly twenty years past. Hind. Pat. 305; Drury, Register, 320-322; Orr v. Littlefield [supra]. The doctrine in England, as to this alone, is very strong. In Bickford v. Skeeves, 4 Mylne & C. 500, the lord chancellor says: "If the patentee has been long in possession, the court will not look into the title, but will give credit to it, until displaced by a trial at law." It is stated that in the adjoining circuit, one of my brethren on the bench of the supreme court (Nelson, J.) has recently held this circumstance alone to be sufficient to retain an injunction. Next, (6) by a recovery of damages in a court of law for an infringement on it, after a severe contest in this circuit, under my predecessor. Woodworth v. Sherman [Case No. 18,019]; Washburn v. Gould [Id. 17,214]; Woodworth v. Stone [Id. 18,021]. This involved the originality of his invention as against Evans and all others then set up. (7) Next, the recovery in courts of equity in several cases where his rights were contested, not only in the different circuits of the United States, but in several cases, fully heard and considered in the supreme court of the United States, and some of them involving the originality of this very invention. [Woodworth v. Benjamin] 4 How. [45 U. S.] 712, 716. (8) Next, special injunctions, that have been obtained in great numbers, many of which are still pending, and none of which are shown ever to have been dissolved on a hearing upon the merits, .

as to the validity of the patent. (9) And, finally, a special injunction obtained, after resistance, against this very defendant.

Such facts, in these preliminary inquiries into the legal title, as connected with the propriety of imposing or dissolving an injunction, are proper and legal ones to influence the decision of the court, are paramount in their character over all individual opinions of witnesses, and should usually be conclusive till parties contest these claims in some issue in a court of law and disprove or rebut their force. See Orr v. Littlefield [supra], and the cases cited there. Their great strength, when united as here, is entirely superior to any evidence offered against them by the respondent. It is true that the matters in the answer are attempted to be sustained by Rogers by evidence and documents. But some of them relate to mere hearsay statements; some are from persons under injunctions against the use of this same machine of Woodworth's, and some are open to various other objections, soon to be explained, and decisive against them. It deserves special notice, that among several instances named, where the planing machine is supposed to have not been sustained, that not a single case is shown for Rogers, by proper proof, of a recovery at law or in equity against Woodworth's patent. The cases referred to rest on hearsay, or are apocryphal. Again, where in some instances, after special injunctions have been obtained, it is shown by him that the plaintiffs became nonsuit, the evidence or rebuttal is, that the respondents were irresponsible and not able to pay the cost of further proceedings; or they were cases in which some assignee, and not Woodworth and his immediate representatives, conducted the prosecution, and were not nonsuits or dismissals made by order of the court on a hearing. In the case cited from Maryland, where an injunction was dissolved, it does not appear to have been from want of title. The respondent was still required to keep an account, thus recognizing for some purposes the prima facie right as to the patent, but deeming the remedy by injunction unsuited to the circumstances there existing, or unjust, or unnecessary, as it is at times when the defendant is in large business and amply responsible for any damages. Bramwell v. Halcomb, 3 Mylne & C. 739. Or, what seems most probable, it was a case of a common, and not a special injunction. The former is usually dissolved as a matter of course, on the coming in of an answer denying merits, or a legal title in the plaintiffs, and without any inquiring into the truth of the allegation. See Orr v. Littlefield, supra; 3 Mer. 622; Poor v. Carleton, supra; Eden, Inj. 88.

Notwithstanding these exceptions to this evidence, when coupled with the denials and allegations in the answer—they all standing alone, and not rebutted by the plaintiffs, would probably be a sufficient ground for dissolving the injunction. They would furnish this, because making, probably, when standing alone, a prima facie case, that the plaintiffs had no legal title; and an injunction is intended to aid or protect what seems to be a legal title. It is granted for this purpose, when issued before a trial, on presumptive evidence offered of such a title; and it stands on that till the probabilities furnished by the plaintiffs of their having a legal title are overcome by answers and counter oaths, and proofs of a stronger character by the respondents than those adduced by the plaintiffs, or by a subsequent trial at law in which such counter proofs have been examined and been successful. 3 Mylne & C. 739. But being, as the respondent's answer is, as well as his evidence, counteracted by the strong and numerous facts offered by the plaintiffs to rebut them, the probabilities seem to me wholly changed, and to be decidedly in favor of the validity of Woodworth's patent. His proofs are of a character entirely to overcome what might otherwise be inferred from the defendants. Take Dunbar's affidavit, for one instance, as to the material point concerning the originality of the invention. He testifies as to what transpired before the patent, and it has been slept over for a generation, and till Woodworth (senior) is in his grave, and till the originality has been not only sworn to by the patentee, but when attacked frequently since has been sustained triumphantly in the supreme court of the United States, as well as in several circuits, and before congress itself. Leading circumstances, like these, should also overcome the statements of the defendant from mere hearsay as to fraud—an imputation, which, above all others, is to be proved clearly or not at all. Roberts v. Anderson, 2 Johns. Ch. 202. And they outweigh all loose and general impressions as to no differences in principle existing between Woodworth's and other old machines, when this has been so often tested in courts where witnesses were cross-examined, and what is meant by principle has been often found and explained, to be only such changes in form as turn out to be immaterial, or a substitution of only what are well known to experts to be mere mechanical equivalents.

Another consideration has been urged against the continuance of this injunction which deserves some notice. It is the alleged illegality or oppression of this remedy and its great encroachment on the trial by jury, and consequently the propriety of dissolving it in this instance. But the power exercised under injunctions has existed from the early ages of chancery jurisdiction, and is remedial and useful as a preventative of injury and a multiplicity of lawsuits, when it is properly exercised. It is also a power conferred on this court in one of the earliest acts of congress, passed after the adoption of the constitution. 1 Stat. 81, §§ 13, 14; Id. 334. It has constantly been used by it since for more than half a century. It is a mistake, likewise, to suppose that this power, in its legitimate use, impairs, supersedes, or prevents the trial by jury where it has ever existed. In most questions pending in courts of chancery, or on the equity side of courts of law, a trial by jury has never been usual in this country or abroad. The seventh amendment to the constitution secures that trial only in cases "at common law." But still chancery may order an issue to be tried at law to help itself as to facts, and retried, if dissatisfied with the verdict. 2 Price, 314, note; Id. 416, note. Or it may decide facts for itself in all cases, except, perhaps, in England, in the case of an heir-at-law disputing a will, and a rector suing for tithes. Bullen v. Michel, 2 Price, 423. So a jury trial can always be had, and is cheerfully allowed in cases like this, connected with injunctions, where the rights and titles of parties are doubted in law and facts are supposed to exist which are disputable and proper to be settled by a jury. Bramwell v. Halcomb, 3 Mylne & C. 737. An injunction is never issued in hostility to what seems to be the legal rights of the parties, but in the aid and protection of them. At first, it is as those rights appear before trial, and only till a trial by jury can be had, if desired. Ridgway v. Roberts, 4 Hare, 108; 17 Ves. 422. And whenever a trial is had, before a jury or otherwise, which shows that the rights at law are with the party enjoined, the injunction is, as a matter of course, dissolved. Bickford v. Skewes, 4 Mylne & C. 498. Nor does the injunction delay or retard a trial by jury, but makes the prima facie title prevail till then. Harman v. Jones, 1 Craig & P. 299; Hilton v. Granville, 1 Bail. Cas. 120 [Craig & P. 283].

In the present case it was imposed in favor of the party appearing on the evidence to possess the legal right to the patent and machine. It was done only the last winter, and after full hearing, and has been no obstacle since to the respondent having a jury trial as soon as he was sued in a court of law, where such trials can alone be had, or as soon as he put in an answer here which denied the legal title of the plaintiffs and requested a trial at law, and that trial can in due course be had. This he has not done till the last month; and now having had a hearing on this request, and the injunction being still retained to aid and protect what still seems to be the legal title till the contrary is fully shown, he can have a jury trial of the title to this patent whenever issues can be found by the parties and the case prepared for a hearing upon them; or, if preferred, as soon as an action at law can be instituted and prepared. The bond which he voluntarily offers, to secure the damages and costs which may be recovered, obviates the objection which is sworn to have existed in going on further with some other cases and having a trial on them.

On the last circuit, where an answer like this was put in and the parties did not agree to form an issue to be tried by a jury, out of the equity side of this court, I directed that unless a suit at law was brought at the next term to try the legal title, the injunction should then be dissolved. See Orr v. Merrill [Case No. 10,591]; Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 418; 9 Jur. 717; 3 Mylne & C. 739; 6 Jur. 269; Caswell v. Bell, 2 Railway & Can. Cas. 782; Clarence R. Co. v. Junction R. Co., Id. 763. I am ready to do the same here, but see no sufficient grounds for ordering it to be dissolved at this time, when there appears so decided balance of testimony in favor of the plaintiffs' legal rights to this patent.

Case No. 18,019.

WOODWORTH v. SHERMAN.

SAME v. CHEEVER et al.

[3 Story, 171; 7 Law Rep. 279; 2 Robb, Pat. Cas. 257.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1844.

PATENT FOR PLANING MACHINE — INJUNCTION AGAINST INFRINGEMENT—EXTENSION OF TERM—GRANT TO ADMINISTRATOR—PREVIOUS ASSIGNMENT—SECURITY FOR COSTS.

1. Where a bill in equity was brought for an injunction against the defendants, to restrain them from using and selling a planing machine, constructed according to the specification in the plaintiff's patent—it was held, that, after the lapse of time which had occurred, since the patent was granted, taken together with the other circumstances of the case, the affidavit of a single witness was not sufficient to outweigh the oath of the patentee, and the general presumption arising from the grant of the letters-patent.

[Cited in Allen v. Blunt, Case No. 217.]

2. The patent act of 1836 [5 Stat. 117] authorizes the granting of an extended term of a patent to an administrator, as well as to the patentee.

[Cited in Pierpont v. Fowle, Case No. 11-152.]

3. The assignee or grantee, under the original patent, does not acquire any right under the extended patent, unless such right be expressly conveyed to him by the patentee.

[Approved in Wilson v. Rousseau, Case No. 17,832; s. c. 4 How. (45 U. S.) 704; Wood v. Michigan South. R. Co., Id. 17,957; Jenkins v. Nicholson Pav. Co., Id. 7,273; Johnson v. Wilcox & Gibbs S. M. Co., 27 Fed. 690.]

4. In this circuit the practice in patent cases has not been to require the plaintiff to give security for costs.

These were bills in equity, filed in the circuit court of the United States, in this district, to obtain injunctions against the defendants [Abraham P. Sherman, William A. Cheever, and eighteen others] in twenty suits, to restrain them from using or selling any planing machine, constructed substantially according to the specification under William Woodworth's patent. See the case of Washburn v. Gould [Case No. 17,214]. The complainants produced affidavits, stating that the several defendants were using a planing machine, substantially the same in its construction and mode of operation as the machine of James Gould of Charlestown, and the bill, among other things, averred, that the plaintiffs had already recovered a judgment in an action at law, against the said Gould, for the use of his machine. Various points were relied on in answer to the motion for an injunction. It was contended: (1) That Woodworth was not the sole inventor, but that one Dunbar was a joint inventor with him. (2) That the act of congress did not authorize the granting of the extended term of the patent to an administrator, but only to the patentee. (3) That some of the defendants had purchased rights under the original patent, and that, by virtue of the act of congress, the same interest that they had in the original patent enured to them in the extended patent.

¹ [Reported by William W. Story, Esq. 7 Law Rep. 279, contains only a partial report.]

B. R. Curtis, for plaintiff.

J. Giles, Mr. Buttrick, and William D. Sohier, Jr., for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice, granted the injunction prayed for in each case. As to the first point, he said, it had been before him in another case, and he then declared, that the affidavit of a single witness, after the lapse of so much time, and after the occurrence of some other circumstances, which were in proof, was not sufficient to outweigh the oath of the patentee, and the general presumption arising from the grant of the letters patent. As to the second point, he said, that, on the fullest reflection, he had come to the opinion, that Mr. Justice McLean was right in his decision (Brooks v. Bicknell [Case No. 1,944]) that an administrator was competent to apply for and receive this grant. That to hold otherwise, would be going contrary to the whole spirit and policy of the patent laws. As to the third point, he said, that he had already decided, after full argument and great consideration, in a case tried in Maine, and not yet reported, that the assignee or grantee, under the original patent, did not acquire any right under the extended patent, unless such right was expressly conveyed to him by the patentee.

In the course of the case, the judge remarked, that he observed that the bills contained a charge of an actual combination to resist the patent. That it was a question of much importance, what would be the legal effect of such a combination. That he did not intend to express any opinion on this part of the case, but that in a former case he had occasion to declare, that it seemed to him that it approached very near, if it did not actually reach, a criminal conspiracy. That, in many cases, it was lawful for individuals to do what could not lawfully be done by a combination. That an individual patentee might successfully resist an individual, but it was much more difficult to resist the combined force of a great number of persons united to oppose a patent.

In the course of the case a question having arisen whether the plaintiff, in patent cases, was required to furnish security for costs,

STORY, Circuit Justice, said: In my circuit the plaintiff in patent cases has never been required to give any security for costs. But I do not recollect any reported case, in which that point was decided.

The following opinion was afterwards written out:

STORY, Circuit Justice. When these cases were heard before me at chambers, I expressed my opinion briefly on the three points made at the argument, not then having time to go into them at large. I do not desire to say any thing further upon the first two points. But the last point involves a question of so much general importance, that it has appeared to me a duty, which I owe to the public, as well as to the parties, to give at large the reasons which influenced my opinion, and governed the decision. I do this the more readily, because I have not been able to find among my papers any statement, reduced by me to writing, of the particular circumstances attending the case in Maine, to which I have already alluded, or any report of the grounds on which that decision was made. If I prepared, after the term, any written opinion (of which I am not certain), it has been mislaid, and after considerable search, I have not been able to find any. I rather think, from my general recollection, that the question arose incidentally upon a renewed patent, granted by a special act of congress, after the first patent had regularly expired, and before the passage of the patent act of 1836 (chapter 357). It may, perhaps, have been in a case involving the validity of the renewed patent, granted by the act of congress of 3d March, 1835 [6 Stat. 613], to Eastman, for "a new and useful improvement, called the 'Circular Saw Clapboard Machine.'" But of this I am not quite sure, and I have not within my reach, at this moment, the means of verifying the conjecture. The doctrine, however, which I then held, was, that every license and assignment under the old laws, before the patent act of 1836, expired with the limitation of the original patent, unless it was expressly, in terms, so granted as to be applicable to any renewal of the patent afterwards; for, otherwise, the licensee's or assignee's right was necessarily bounded by the same limits as that of the licensor or assignee, that is to say, by the original term granted by the patent to the licensor or patentee. The doctrine proceeded upon the plain ground, affirmed by the common law, that a man can pass by a grant or assignment only that which he now possesses, and which is in existence, at the time, either actually or potentially. His grant or assignment is, therefore, by its natural interpretation, limited to the rights and things which are then in existence, and which he has power to grant, unless he uses other language, which imports an intention to grant what he does not now possess, and what is not now in existence. In the latter case, the language does not even then operate strictly as an assignment or grant, but only as a covenant or contract, which a court of equity will carry into full effect, when the right or thing comes in esse. Thus, it is laid down in Comyn's Digest ("Assignment," cc. 1-3; Id. "Grant" D), and better authority could not be, for, as was well observed by Lord Kenyon, he was the greatest lawyer of his day in all Westminster hall, that an assignment or grant cannot, at law, be of a chose in action, bare right, or possibility. And in a case in Lord Hobart's Reports, it was said, that although a man may, by grant or assignment, assign all the wool then growing on the backs of the sheep owned by him; yet he cannot grant or assign the wool that shall grow upon the backs of the sheep which he shall hereafter buy. Grantham v. Hawley, Hob. 132. And this doctrine was fully recognized by Lord Eldon in the case of Curtis v. Auber, 1 Jac. & W. 526, 532. But I need not dwell on this point, because it came under the full consideration of the court in Mitchell v. Winslow [Case No. 9,673], where the principal authorities were collected and commented upon at large; so that the only remedy for the licensee or assignee, where a grant or assignment has been made to him and his heirs, of a right to a thing not then in existence, but which is to operate in futuro, when the thing is created or comes in esse, is in equity, by way of specific enforcement of a covenant or contract. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) §§ 1040, 1041.

Now, it appears to me, that this doctrine is expressly applicable to licenses and assignments under the patent act of 1836, and, indeed, as I think, a fortiori applicable, because the whole design of the 18th section of the act, providing for renewed patents, is, in terms, exclusively confined to the original inventor, and to be for his sole benefit, and not for the benefit of his licensee or assignee; and, therefore, that section is to receive a correspondent construction in favor of the inventor alone, unless the particular clause of the section, which I shall presently consider, does, by natural or necessary implication, confer the right upon the licensee or assignee.

Let us then, for this purpose, examine the 18th section of the patent act of 1836. It enacts, that, whenever any patentee (not any assignee) shall desire an extension of his patent beyond the term of its limitation, he may make application therefor to the commissioner of the patent office, setting forth the grounds thereof; and then, after prescribing the notice, &c. to be given of the application, it provides, that the secretary of state, the commissioner of the patent office, and the solicitor of the treasury, shall constitute a board to hear and decide upon the evidence produced before them for and against the extension; and the patentee is required to furnish to the board a statement in writing, under oath, of the ascertained value of the invention, and of his receipts and expenditures, sufficient to exhibit a true and faithful account of loss and profit accruing from or by reason of the said invention. The section then proceeds to declare, that "if, upon a hearing of the matter, it shall appear to the full and entire satisfaction of the board, having due regard to the public interest therein, that it is just and proper that the term of the patent should be extended, by reason of the patentee (not the assignee,) without neglect or fault on his part, having failed to attain from the use and sale of his invention a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity and expense bestowed upon the same, and the introduction thereof into use, it shall be the duty of the commissioner to renew, and extend the patent, by making a certificate thereon of such extension, from the term of seven years from and after the expiration of the first term, &c.; and therefore the said patent shall have the same effect in law as though it had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years." Now, bearing in mind that, at this time no patent could by law issue except to the inventor, and that it was only by the subsequent act of 3d of March, 1837, c. 45, § 6 [5 Stat. 193], that it could be issued to the assignee, we have, at once, a perfect key to the true object and purpose of this 18th section of the act of 1836, that the word "patentee" is used therein as equivalent to "inventor," and that the law looked to him as the sole object of its bounty, and meant to reward him, and him alone, for his time, ingenuity and expense in perfecting his invention.

Another consideration is also important to be borne in mind; and that is, that the 18th section refers solely to applications to be made before the original patent has expired. Indeed, the very proviso to the section contemplated, that the application not only may be, but must be made while the term of the original patent is yet running, and before it has expired; for it expressly declares "that no extension of a patent shall be granted after the expiration of the term for which it was originally issued." Now, keeping this in view, we see, at once, the object of the clause of the same section immediately preceding the proviso. It is in these words: "And the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented to the extent of their respective interest therein." The clause does not mean to enlarge the right of the assignees or grantees to use the thing patented beyond the extent of the interest originally granted to them. If that interest was, from its nature, or character, or just interpretation, limited to the original term, for which the inventor held the patent, then the assignees and grantees were to have no benefit ultra in the renewed patent. But if the original assignment or grant had expressed in terms, or by just implication conferred on the assignees or grantees a right or interest in the renewed patent, then that interest was to be protected; for it was a possibility, for the benefit of which the assignees or grantees had originally stipulated, and for which they must be presumed to have paid a valuable consideration. In this view of the matter, there would be good sense in the clause, founded upon the actual intentions of the parties to the original assignment or grant, upon a just interpretation of the language used by them. But what is the consequence of adopting a different interpretation of the clause, and applying it indiscriminately to all cases of grants and assignments of or under the original patent, where no such auxiliary intentions can be deduced from the language of the assignment or grant? Let us suppose the case, where an assignment has been made by the inventor of his whole patent right under his patent for a small, and (comparatively speaking) an utterly inadequate compensation, considering its real value, and this has been forced upon him by embarrassment, or poverty, or public indifference, or his own mistaken estimate of its value (a case by no means uncommon in the history of inventors), could it be for a moment imagined, that the 18th section intended, contrary to its professed object, to benefit, not the inventor himself, but his assignee? That the latter and not the former was to receive the whole profits accruing from the renewed patent? Or, that, in such a case, the inventor would not be entitled to take out a renewed or extended patent? And yet, if the argument be worth any thing, the 18th section applies, as fully to such a case, as it would apply to any other case; and we cannot except it from the pressure of the section, unless we look broadly into the objects, which it purports to accomplish, and limit the language to cases, where the inventor has intended to part, not merely with all his present rights, but prospectively with all the future rights and possibilities which he might acquire by a renewed or prolonged patent. Now, the words of the clause extend to the assignees and grantees of the right, (that is, of the patent right,) the benefit of the renewal "to the extent of their respective interest therein," that is, of the patent right, and no more. Now, what is the extent of their interest therein? Clearly, upon the principles of the common law, neither more nor less than the assignor or grantor then possessed, and was capable of assigning or granting at the time of the assignment or grant, for to that the language of the grant or assignment must, in reason and good sense, be limited, unless the grantor or assignor has by express words or necessary implication shown a broader intention, an intention not merely to grant or assign the right, which he now possesses, but the possibilities, which he may hereafter acquire. And these are the best grounds to support such a limitation and interpretation of the grant or assignment.

In the first place, the grantor or assignor cannot be presumed to have received any compensation or consideration except for the very thing, and to the very extent, which the language properly indicates. In the next place, no court is at liberty to add to the terms used any meaning beyond their ordinary import, unless there are some supplementary expressions to justify such a construction. In the present case, there is no ground to suppose, that either party contemplated, that the grant, or assignment, or license was to be prolonged beyond the term of the original patent, and there are no words requiring a more expanded interpretation. In the next place, to give such an expanded interpretation, for which the inventor has received no consideration, would be to transfer the bounty intended by the government for the benefit of the inventor, whose genius had brought it out, and brought it to perfection, and who had not received a reasonable remuneration therefor, to the grantee or assignee, who had paid nothing and done nothing to deserve it, but had simply given the quid pro quo to the extent of the right or interest conferred upon him under the existing patent. The inventor may, from necessity or expediency, or otherwise, (as has been already suggested,) have conveyed his whole right and interest under the original patent, for a sum utterly unworthy of its intrinsic value. The grantee or assignee may have grown rich by the success of the inventor, and the inventor himself may be now languishing in poverty. Can it be, that the section, professing to intend a remuneration and bounty to the inventor, should, at the same time, have intended to sweep from him the future profits of the renewed invention? That if he should have parted with the half, or two thirds, or the whole of his rights and interests, under the original patent, he shall be narrowed down to a corresponding part, or excluded from all the profits of the renewed patent? If so, it would be but another sad illustration of the fate of genius, Sic vos non vobis. Besides; we are to recollect, that this section of the act of 1836, is not limited to cases of future patents, or to future grants or assignments thereof; but it applies to past also; and that the language, if applicable at all, reaches to both classes, the past, as well as the future; and the present case is one of the prolongation of a patent issued long before the act of 1836. So that the section is thus made to apply to a case, where neither party could have contemplated any right of renewal, or any possibility of a future interest therein. The patentee had no right of renewal either in esse or in posse. The whole vested in the exercise of a sound discretion by congress, which it would or might apply singly to the merits of each particular case, as it should be presented to them for consideration.

Now, if we construe the language of this clause with reference to the scope of the antecedent language, and the professed objects of the section, however loose and general it may, at first view, seem to be, it admits of an easy and satisfactory exposition. The rights of assignees and grantees to use the thing patented, and to have the benefit of the renewal, is to be to the extent of their respective interests therein, and no more. If that interest was short of the whole of the original term, for which the patent was originally issued, it is not to reach the renewed term. If it was limited to the extent of the original term, it is still to be bounded by it. But if it is an interest in terms, designed to be coextensive with all the interest, which the patentee now has, or may hereafter acquire, not merely to his present rights in esse, but with his contingent rights in posse, then the section makes that a legal interest, which, otherwise, would be but a mere potential, equitable interest, to be enforced in equity, as a mere right under contract, and not as a fixed, present, vested interest. In this way, the whole structure of the section becomes harmonious with its professed objects, the benefit and remuneration of the inventor, and it saves only those rights in the renewed patent for which the inventor has already secured a compensation, and to which he has voluntarily extended his original grants, and assignments, and licenses to the very terms and intent thereof. Interpret the section in any other manner, and it speaks an intention in one part, which it contradicts or controls in another. It takes from the inventor, what he never intended to part with, and may deprive him in part, or in the whole, according to circumstances, of the reward, which the section seemed so studiously to hold out to encourage his genius and skill, and to reimburse his expenditures.

These are some of the reasons, which have influenced my mind in arriving at the conclusion which I have before stated. If they are erroneous, it will belong to the supreme court to correct the errors, and to adopt a rule, which, adhering to a literal interpretation of the clause, may, at the same time, deprive the inventor of all motives to renew the patent, or make the renewal worthless to him, and injurious to the public.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Bicknell v. Todd, Case No. 1,389.]

WOODWORTH (SMITH v.). See Case No. 13,130.

Case No. 18,020.

WOODWORTH v. SPAFFORD et al.

[2 McLean, 168.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1840.

JOINT NOTE—MERGER—JUDGMENT AGAINST ONE PROMISOR—JUDICIAL NOTICE—COURTS OF GENERAL JURISDICTION.

1. A judgment obtained against Earl, in a suit against him, and the other two defendants, merges the instrument on which the action was founded.

[Cited in brief in Rose v. Comstock, 17 Ind. 6. Cited in Maghee v. Collins, 27 Ind. 85.]

2. And such judgment may be pleaded in bar to an action on the instrument against one or all of the defendants.

3. This court is presumed to know the laws of the respective states, and, consequently, that the circuit court of Wayne county, in Michigan, is a court of general jurisdiction.

[Cited in Bennett v. Bennett, Case No. 1,318.]

4. It is not necessary, therefore, in the plea setting up the judgment of the circuit court of Wayne, to aver that it had jurisdiction.

[Cited in Earl v. Raymond, Case No. 4,243.]

5. Where the note is joint the suit must be brought against all, and a joint responsibility must be shown, unless one or more of the promisors has been discharged by infancy, or by operation of law.

Mr. Swayne, for plaintiff.

Mr. Wilcox, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. The declaration in this case is in assumpsit, and contains four special counts. The first sets out a note for $500, dated December 6, 1836, drawn by Saltmarsh and Boardman, and Hugh Gillis & Co., partners, &c., payable to Benjamin Woodworth, or order, in ninety days from date. The notes described in the second, third and fourth counts, are for $1,000, each, drawn by the same parties, bearing the same date, and payable, respectively, in six, nine and twelve months. The fifth count is general, for goods sold, &c.

The defendants have put in a plea of the general issue, and, also, a special plea in bar. The matter set up in the latter plea, is as follows: "That, on the 24th of March, 1838, the said Benjamin Woodworth sued out of the clerk's office of the circuit court of Wayne county, in the state of Michigan, his certain writ of capias, in a plea of trespass, on the case upon promises, against the said Amos Spafford, Jarvis Spafford, and Williard Earl; and, afterwards, to wit: on the 9th day of July, in the year aforesaid, filed his declaration; and afterwards such proceedings were had in said suit, that at the December term of said court, viz: on the 28th of December, 1838, judgment was rendered therein, in favor of the said Benjamin Woodworth, against the said Amos Spafford, for the sum of $4,006.33, and costs." The plea concludes with an averment, that the said judgment is unreversed, and remains in full force; and that the notes described in the declaration, in the present action, are the same on which the said judgment, in Michigan, was obtained. To this plea the plaintiff has put in a general demurrer.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

It is contended, on several grounds, that the special plea is insufficient as a bar to this action. The objection, mainly relied on, and which will first claim the attention of the court, is: that the judgment set forth in the plea does not extinguish the original cause of action, and that a suit may be sustained on it against all the parties.

In the consideration of this point, as the case is presented upon the demurrer, it is to be assumed, that the notes set forth in the declaration, on which it is sought to charge the defendants, have originated in a partnership transaction, with which they are connected, and which create, on their part, a partnership liability. And, therefore, in considering the question, whether the judgment set out in the plea has extinguished the right of action against these parties, it is important to settle, in the first place, the nature and character of their liability, as partners. If that is to be regarded as joint and several, it would clearly result, that a suit prosecuted, and a judgment recovered against one, without an actual satisfaction, would be no bar to a subsequent suit against the other parties. On the other hand, if their undertaking, and consequent liability, are to be viewed as joint, then, upon the authority of the cases which will be referred to by the court, a suit and judgment against one, is a bar to a subsequent suit against the other joint promisors.

It would seem to be consistent with the current of authorities, both in this country and in England, to consider partnership contracts as joint, and not joint and several. It is true, that the assertion of Lord Mansfield, in Rice v. Shute, 5 Burrows, 2611, has often been relied on, as sustaining a contrary doctrine. It is there said: "That all contracts with partners are joint and several; every partner is liable to pay the whole. But it has been remarked by an eminent American judge, in reference to this position: "That it would be straining Lord Mansfield's opinion unreasonably, to say, that he meant, technically, that all contracts with partners were joint and several." 13 Johns. 451. It seems very obvious, by reference to the facts in the case of Rice v. Shute, and the circumstances under which the question, before the court, was presented, that the principle asserted by Lord Mansfield must be understood with some modification. In that case it appears that the plaintiff, with a knowledge that Shute and Cole were partners, brought suit against Shute alone; and without having pleaded the nonjoinder in abatement, the defendant, Shute, on the trial, proved that fact, and the plaintiff was, thereupon, nonsuited. And it was upon a motion to set aside the nonsuit that the opinion of the court was given. The object had in view by the court, seems not to have been the settlement of the law, as to the nature of partnership liabilities, but the establishment of a rule by which the defendant should be compelled to plead in abatement the nonjoinder of a party who ought to have been joined; and that he should not be permitted to take the plaintiff by surprise, on the trial, by proof of the nonjoinder. To this extent the doctrine laid down by the court is undoubtedly correct, and promotive of the purposes of justice.

Taking it to be a principle which is universally sanctioned by courts, at the present day, that partnership contracts are joint, and not joint and several, the inquiry is, whether the judgment against the defendant, Spafford, is a bar to the present action. The affirmative of this proposition is very fully sustained by many decisions of high authority in this country; some of which will be adverted to.

The case of Ward v. Johnson, 13 Mass. 148, has some close points of resemblance to the one now under consideration. The declaration in that case averred that Henry Johnson, in the name and behalf of the partnership of Henry and Thomas Johnson, executed the note in controversy. The defendants pleaded, in bar, the recovery of a former judgment against Henry Johnson, in a suit prosecuted against him alone. To this plea there was a replication of nul tiel record; and the existence of the judgment, set out in the plea, being proved, the court held it to be a good bar to the action against both of the partners. In the opinion of the court, in this case, these principles are maintained: That, in a joint action, to support the declaration, a joint subsisting cause of action must be shewn against both defendants; and, that, if one of the defendants can plead a sufficient bar, as it respects himself, it shall avail the other defendants also; for it shews that, at the time of the commencement of the action, no just cause of action remained, thereby falsifying a material averment in the declaration.

The same principle is recognized by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in the case of Smith v. Black, in error, 9 Serg. & R. 142. The facts were that Black, the defendant in error, had sold goods to Nathan Smith, (one of the plaintiffs in error,) who gave his promissory note therefor; on which suit was brought, and a judgment obtained, against him. Subsequently, on the discovery that Newberry Smith was a secret partner of Nathan Smith, a suit was instituted against both; and the former judgment against Nathan Smith was held to be a good bar to that action.

In the case of Downey v. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Greencastle, 13 Serg. & R.

288, it was held, that where a joint suit was brought against two obligors in a joint and several bond, on one of whom the writ was served, and as to the other returned non est, and the plaintiff proceeded to judgment against the obligor, on whom process had been served, without making the other a party, he thereby elected to consider the contract as joint, and could not afterwards sue the other obligor, in a separate action. The judgment against his co-obligor was viewed as an extinguishment of the bond, as to him, and being extinguished as to him, was extinguished as to both.

A very decisive authority on this subject is found in 18 Johns. 459. The case is that of Robertson v. Smith. The material facts may be thus briefly stated: Robertson held two promissory notes, drawn by Soulden, Smith & Co., on which suits were brought, and judgments recovered, against Soulden and Smith, the ostensible partners. Failing to obtain satisfaction on his judgments, and believing there were two other persons connected with Soulden, Smith & Co., as partners, the plaintiff instituted another suit against Soulden, and Smith, and the two other partners. One of the points, arising in the case, was, whether the plaintiff, having made the two partners, against whom judgment had been recovered, parties in the pending suit, it can be sustained against the other defendants, in consequence of the extinguishment of the simple contract debt, as to two of the defendants, by the judgment against them. The opinion of the court, as given by Chief Justice Spencer, evinces great learning and research, and may well be regarded as conclusive on the point just stated. The results, to which he is conducted, are—that in case of joint debtors, they must be jointly sued; that if a less number than the whole be sued, that is matter that can be pleaded in abatement only; that it is necessary to show a joint subsisting indebtedment, in all the defendants; and in cases of assumpsit, it is necessary to show a subsisting liability, on the part of all the promisors, except one or more of them may have been discharged by operation of law, as in the case of a release under an insolvent or bankrupt law, or where a release has been effected under a plea of infancy. And, moreover, where, as it respects any of the defendants, the right of action is gone or suspended, their joint liability being at an end, the other defendants may avail themselves of this suspension or discharge.

In the present case, the judgment against the defendant, Spafford, in the state of Michigan, must be viewed as a merger of his liability, on the simple contract set forth in the declaration; and, upon the authorities referred to, the plaintiff having, by his own act, put it out of his power to prove that there is a subsisting joint contract, on which all the defendants are liable, he can not recover against any of them.

The only case referred to by the plaintiff's counsel, as opposed to the principles settled by the cases already noticed, is that of Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 233. That case came before the supreme court of the United States, on error, to the district court, sitting at Alexandria, in the District of Columbia. It was an action of assumpsit against the defendants, on a promissory note, drawn by Jameson alone. It was alleged that the note, though thus executed, was, in fact, a partnership note, on which the defendants were both liable. In that case there was a special plea, similar to, if not identical with, the plea in the present case, both as to form and substance. It averred that Jameson had been previously sued, and that judgment had been recovered against him, in the circuit court of the District of Columbia, on the same note, and that the judgment was in full force and unreversed. The defendant, Jameson, having been discharged under the insolvent law of the District, soon after the institution of the suit, the plea was interposed by Mandeville alone, and no further notice was taken of the other defendant during the progress of the suit. Chief Justice Marshall, who delivered the opinion of the court, held, that the prior recovery of the judgment against Jameson was no bar to the action against Jameson and Mandeville, jointly.

From an examination of the opinion of the chief justice, in that case, it will be seen that he lays great stress upon the fact that the original action, in which judgment was recovered, was brought against but one of the parties, and upon a sole contract. He admits that, "had the action, in which judgment was obtained against Jameson, been brought against the firm, the whole note would, most probably, have been merged in the judgment." This language is understood, as equivalent to the assertion, that if the original action had been brought against both the partners, on a joint contract, and a judgment recovered against one only, the right of action against the other might have been extinguished. This is clearly inferable from what follows: "The doctrine of merger (even admitting that a judgment against one of several joint obligors would terminate the whole obligation, and that a distinct action could not afterwards be maintained against the others, which is not admitted) can be applied only to a case in which the original declaration was on a joint covenant; not to a case in which the declaration in the first suit was on a sole contract." The principle laid down by the chief justice is not, therefore, applicable to the present case. The persons originally sued in Michigan are the defendants here. That was an action on a joint, and not on a sole, promise; and, therefore, according to the position of the chief justice, the present is a case in which the doctrine of merger may be applied, since both the original and present suits are against the same parties, and for the same cause of action. It would be doing injustice to the reputation of that great jurist, to assume that he intended to lay it down as a sound principle of law, that separate judgments can be recovered on a contract, joint in its terms and character, except where such a course may be authorized by express legislative enactment. Such a doctrine would destroy the well settled distinction between joint and joint and several contracts; and would, in effect, vest in courts a power to change by construction, the contracts of parties, and give them an operation, not within their contemplation or design.

There is another exception taken to the plea in this case, namely—that it does not contain an averment that the court in Michigan, in which the judgment is alleged to have been entered, had jurisdiction of the case. On this point it will be only necessary to observe that, by the settled practice, both of the state and federal tribunals, they take notice of the general and public laws of a state, without requiring them to be specially presented by plea. And as the circuit court of Michigan is created, and its jurisdiction and practice regulated by law, it must be regarded as a court of general jurisdiction, proceeding according to the course of the common law, and, therefore, it is not necessary that the plea should contain an averment of its jurisdiction. The court will take judicial notice of the fact, that the case, set out in the plea, is within its legal jurisdiction.

The only remaining exception to the plea is, that it does not alledge satisfaction of the judgment which is set up in bar of this action. As to this exception, the only remark called for, is—that in the view in which the judgment in Michigan is held to be a bar to the plaintiff's right to recover in this case, it is wholly immaterial, whether the judgment is satisfied or not, and the averment of satisfaction is not, therefore, necessary.

The demurrer to the special plea is overruled.

Case No. 18,021.

WOODWORTH et al. v. STONE.

[3 Story, 749; 1 2 Robb, Pat. Cas. 296.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1845.

SURRENDER OF PATENT—EFFECT—INJUNCTION—ISSUE OF NEW PATENT—DECISION OF COMMISSIONER—REVIEW.

1. An injunction granted on an original bill, before the surrender of a patent, cannot be maintained, upon the new patent, unless a supplemental bill be filed, founded thereon.

2. A patentee cannot, by a surrender of his patent, affect the rights of third persons, to whom he has previously assigned his interest in the whole or a part of the patent, unless the assignees consent to the surrender.

[Cited in Potter v. Braunsdorf, Case No. 11,321; Potter v. Holland, Id. 11,329.]

3. To support an action at law for the breach of a patent, it is indispensable to prove a breach before the action is brought; but, if the patent right be admitted or established, a bill in equity quia timet will lie for an injunction upon well grounded proof of any apprehended intention of the defendant to violate it.

[Cited in Woodworth v. Rogers, Case No. 18,018; Goodyear v. Providence R. Co., Id. 5,583; Potter v. Crowell, Id. 11,323; Wheeler v. McCormick, Id. 17,498; Celluloid Manufg Co. v. Arlington Manufg Co., 34 Fed. 325; Sherman v. Nutt, 35 Fed. 150; California Electrical Works v. Hengel, 48 Fed. 377; Page Woven Wire Fence Co. v. Land, 49 Fed. 935.]

[Cited in McBurney v. Goodyear, 11 Cush. 571.]

4. The decision of the commissioner of patents in respect to accepting a surrender of an old patent, and granting a new one, is not re-examinable elsewhere, unless it appear on the face of the patent, that he has exceeded his authority.

[Cited in Smith v. Mercer, Case No. 13,078; Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 545; Allen v. Blunt, Case No. 217; French v. Rogers, Id. 5,103; Potter v. Holland, Id. 11,330; Hussey v. Bradley, Id. 6,946; Blake v. Stafford, Id. 1,504; Jordan v. Dobson, Id. 7,519; Chicago Fruit House Co. v. Busch, Id. 2,669; Combined Patents Can Co. v. Lloyd, 11 Fed. 151.]

This was the case of a bill in equity, brought [by William W. Woodworth, administrator] for an infringement of what is commonly called "Woodworth's Planing Machine." The bill prayed for an injunction and other relief. Upon an interlocutory hearing a temporary injunction was granted by the district judge. Pending the proceedings, the patent was surrendered on account of a defect in the specification, and a new patent was granted; and upon this new patent a supplemental bill was filed against the defendant [Joel Stone] for the continuance of the injunction and other relief.

Mr. Giles, for defendant, now moved to dissolve the original injunction; and contemporaneously, B. R. Curtis, for the plaintiff, moved for the continuance of the injunction upon the supplemental bill.

Various objections were urged for the defendant against the motion for the continuance of the injunction on the supplemental bill, and the surrender of the old patent was relied upon in support of the motion to dissolve the injunction granted on the original bill. These objections were replied to on behalf of the plaintiff, and the propriety of continuing the injunction insisted on.

STORY, Circuit Justice. If the present case had stood merely upon the original bill, it appears to me clear, that the motion to dissolve the injunction granted upon that bill, ought to prevail, because, by the surrender of the patent, upon which that bill is founded, the right to maintain the same would be entirely gone. I agree that it is not in the power of the patentee, by a surrender of his patent, to affect the rights of third persons, to whom he has previously, by assignment, passed his interest in the whole or a part of the patent, without the consent of such assignees. But, here, the supplemental bill admits, that the assignees, who are parties to the original and supplemental bill, have consented to such surrender. They have, therefore, adopted it; and it became theirs in the same manner as if it had been their personal act, and done by their authority.

¹ [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]
30 Fed. Cas.—38

The question, then, is precisely the same, as if the suit were now solely in behalf of the patentee. In order to understand with clearness and accuracy some of the objections to the continuance of the injunction, it may be necessary to state, that the original patent to William Woodworth (the inventor), who is since deceased, was granted on the 27th of December, 1828. Subsequently, under the eighteenth section of the act of 1836, c. 357 [5 Stat. 117], the commissioners of patents, on the 16th of November, 1842, recorded the patent in favor of William W. Woodworth, the administrator of William Woodworth (the inventor), for seven years from the 27th of December, 1842. Congress, by an act passed at the last session (act of 26th of February, c. 27 [6 Stat. 936]), extended the time of the patent for seven years from and after the 27th of December, 1849 (to which time the renewed patent extended); and the commissioner of patents was directed to make a certificate of such extension in the name of the administrator of William Woodworth (the inventor), and to append an authenticated copy thereof to the original letters patent, whenever the same shall be requested by the said administrator or his assigns. The commissioner of patents, accordingly, on the 3d of March, 1845, at the request of the administrator, made such certificate on the original patent. On the 8th day of July, 1845, the administrator surrendered the renewed patent granted to him "on account of a defect in the specification." The surrender was accepted, and a new patent was granted on the same day to the administrator, reciting the preceding facts, and that the surrender was "on account of a defective specification," and declaring that the new patent was extended for fourteen years from the 27th of December, 1828, "in trust for the heirs at law of the said W. Woodworth (the inventor), their heirs, administrators or assigns."

Now, one of the objections taken to the new patent is, that it is for the term of fourteen years, and not for the term of seven years, or for two successive terms of seven years. But it appears to me that this objection is not well founded, and stands inter apices juris; for the new patent should be granted for the whole term of fourteen years from the 27th of December, and the legal effect is the same as it would be, if the patent was specifically renewed for two successive terms of seven years. The new patent is granted for the unexpired term only, from the date of the grant, viz: "for the unexpired period existing on the 8th of July, 1845, by reference to the original grant in December, 1828. It is also suggested, that the patent ought not to have been in trust for the heirs at law of the said W. Woodworth, their heirs, administrators or assigns." But this is, at most, a mere verbal error, if indeed it has any validity whatsoever; for the new patent will, by operation of law, enure to the sole benefit of the parties, in whose favor the law designed it should operate, and not otherwise. It seems to me that the case is directly within the purview of the tenth and thirteenth sections of the act of 1836, c. 357, taking into consideration their true intent and objects.

Another objection urged against the continuation of the injunction is, that the breach of the patent assigned in the original bill can have no application to the new patent, and there is no ground to suggest, that, since the injunction was granted, there has been any new breach of the old patent, or any breach of the new patent. But it is by no means necessary, that any such new breach should exist. The case is not like that of an action at law for the breach of a patent, to support which it is indispensable to establish a breach before the suit was brought. But in a suit in equity, the doctrine is far otherwise. A bill will lie for an injunction, if the patent right is admitted or has been established, upon well grounded proof of an apprehended intention of the defendant to violate the patent right. A bill, quia timet, is an ordinary remedial process in equity. Now, the injunction already granted (supposing both patents to be for the same invention) is prima facie evidence of an intended violation, if not of an actual violation. And the affidavit of James N. Buffum is very strong and direct evidence to this same effect.

But the most material objection taken is, that the new patent is not for the same invention as that which has been surrendered, and certainly, if this be correct, there is a fatal objection to the prolongation of the injunction. But is the objection well founded in point of fact? It is said, that the present patent is for a combination only, and that the old patent was for a combination and something more, or different. But I apprehend that, upon the face of the present patent, the question is scarcely open for the consideration of the court; and, at all events, certainly not open in this stage of the cause. I have already, in another cause, had occasion to decide, that where the commissioner of patents accepts a surrender of an old patent and grants a new one, under the act of 1836, c. 357, his decision, being an act expressly confided to him by law, and dependent upon his judgment, is not re-examinable elsewhere; and that the court must take it to be a lawful exercise of his authority, unless it is apparent upon the very face of the patent, that he has exceeded his authority, and there is a clear repugnancy between the old and the new patent, or the new one has been obtained by collusion between the commissioner and the patentee. Now, upon the face of it, the new patent, in the present case, purports to be for the same invention and none other, that is contained in the old patent. The avowed difference between the new and the old, is, that the specification in the old is defective, and that the defect is intended to be remedied in the new patent. It is upon this very ground, that the old patent was surrendered and the new patent was granted. The claim in the new patent is not of any new invention; but of the old invention more perfectly described and ascertained. It is manifest that, in the first instance, the commissioner was the proper judge whether the invention was the same or not, and whether there was any deficit in the specification or not, by inadvertence, accident, or mistake; and consequently, he must have decided that the combination of machinery claimed in the old patent was, in substance, the same combination and invention claimed and described in the new. My impression is, that at the former trial of the old patent before me, I held the claim substantially (although obscurely worded) to be a claim for the invention of a particular combination of machinery for planing, tonguing, and grooving, and dressing boards, etc.; or, in other words, that it was the claim of an invention of a planing machine or planing apparatus such as he had described in his specification.

It appears to me, therefore, that prima facie, and, at all events, in this stage of the cause, it must be taken to be true, that the new patent is for the same invention as the old patent; and that the only difference is, not in the invention itself, but in the specification of it. In the old, it was defectively described and claimed. In the new, the defects are intended to be remedied. Whether they are effectually remedied is a point not now properly before the court. But as the commissioner of patents has granted the new patent as for the same invention as the old, it does not appear to me, that this court is now at liberty to revise his judgment, or to say, that he has been guilty of an excess of authority, at least (as has been already suggested) not in this stage of the cause; for that would be for the court of itself to assume to decide many matters of fact, as to the specification, and the combination of machinery in both patents, without any adequate means of knowledge or of guarding itself from gross error. For the purpose of the injunction, if for nothing else, I must take the invention to be the same in both patents, after the commissioner of patents has so decided, by granting the new patent.

Upon the whole, therefore, I do order and direct, that the injunction do stand continued, as to the new patent, stated in the supplemental bill, until the hearing or farther order of the court.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Bicknell v. Todd, Case No. 1,389.]

WOODWORTH v. STONE. See Case No. 18,017.

Case No. 18,022.

WOODWORTH v. WEED.

[1 Blatchf. 165; 1 Fish. Pat. Rep. 108.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1846.

PATENTS—SALE OF LICENSE—FORFEITURE FOR NON-PAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY—INJUNCTION.

1. W. granted to J. a license to use a patented machine, for which J. gave his five promissory notes, payable at different times, and J. agreed, in writing, that if any one of the notes should become due and be unpaid, the license should be void and should revert to W. Held, that the license was forfeited the moment one of the notes became due and was unpaid, and that it was optional with W. to resort to his remedy at common law to enforce the collection of the unpaid note, or to treat the rights of J. as forfeited, and apply for an injunction against the further use of the machine.

[Cited in Goodyear v. Congress Rubber Co., Case No. 5,565; Cohn v. National Rubber Co., Id. 2,968. Approved in Abbett v. Zusi, Id. 7; McKay v. Smith, 29 Fed. 296; Hat Sweat Manuf'g Co. v. Porter, 34 Fed. 747; Washburn & M. Manuf'g Co. v. Cincinnati Barbed Wire Fence Co., 42 Fed. 677.]

2. The stipulation as to forfeiture is to be considered as a double security given by J. to W. for the consideration money.

3. Where, in such a case, W. applied for a provisional injunction, an order was made granting it, unless J. should within 60 days pay to W. the amount of the due and unpaid note, and his costs.

[Cited in Goodyear v. Union India R. Co., Case No. 5,586.]

The plaintiff [William W. Woodworth] filed his bill setting forth that as patentee under the Woodworth patent, as extended for seven years from December 27, 1842 (see the letters patent, etc., in Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 658-668), he, on the 3d of July, 1843, entered into an agreement with the defendant [Joseph Weed] under seal, whereby he granted to him a license to construct and use one of the Woodworth planing machines in the town of Ticonderoga, Essex county, for which the defendant agreed to give his promissory notes, in all amounting to $400, two for $50 each and three for $100 each, to be payable at different and specified times; the defendant further agreeing "that in case said notes were not paid when they or either of them fell due, then the said license and permission should be void and the same should revert to said Woodworth." The bill also set forth, that the defendant, soon after making the agreement, constructed one of the machines in the town of Ticonderoga and had ever since had it in use; that he executed and delivered his notes for the several amounts, and payable at the several times specified in the agreement; and that four of the notes, amounting to $300, were due and unpaid. The bill charged that the license and permission to use the machine had become void, and that, according to the terms and conditions of the license, the defendant had no longer any right to use it, and prayed for an injunction to restrain its use. The plaintiff now applied, on the bill, for a provisional injunction. The defendant opposed the application, on affidavits setting forth that he was the owner of a large amount of real property in Essex county, and was worth $10,000 over and above all his liabilities.

¹ [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

William H. Seward, for plaintiff.

David Buel, Jr., for defendant, urged that the plaintiff ought to exhaust his remedy at common law to enforce payment of the notes, before an injunction could issue under the stipulation of forfeiture contained in the agreement.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. From the terms of the agreement the license was forfeited the moment one of the notes became due and was unpaid, and it was optional with the plaintiff to resort to his remedy at common law to enforce the collection of the notes, or to treat the rights of the defendant as forfeited under the stipulation in the agreement. The stipulation is to be considered as a double security given by the defendant to the plaintiff for the payment of the consideration money. An order must be entered granting an injunction, as prayed for in the bill, unless the defendant, within sixty days from the service upon him of a copy of the order, pay to the plaintiff the principal and interest due upon the notes mentioned in the bill, which have already fallen due, and the plaintiff's costs.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Bicknell v. Todd, Case No. 1,339.]

Case No. 18,023.

WOODWORTH v. WILSON.

[Cited in Smith v. Mercer, Case No. 13,078. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

WOOD & LIGHT MACHINE CO., In re.
See Case No. 4,534.

WOODY (O'BRIEN v.). See Case No. 10,398.

WOOLBRIDGE (WEBSTER v.). See Case No. 17,340.

Case No. 18,024.

WOOLCOCKS v. MANY et al.

[9 Blatchf. 139; 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 72.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 20, 1871.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT—SPEAKING-TUBE WHISTLES.

The first claim of the letters patent granted, May 24, 1870, to Thomas J. Woolcocks, for an "improvement in speaking-tube whistles," namely, "in combination with the cylindrically formed barrel A, the stem F, having the reacting spring G attached to it, and operating on the outside of the barrel, as hereinbefore described, and for the purposes set forth," is infringed by a combination consisting of the barrel, stem and spring, the spring being attached to the stem, and operating on the outside of the barrel, and the barrel being octagonal instead of cylindrical, the combination being, in all other respects, the same, and the octagonal form possessing all the advantages of, and being the equivalent of, the cylindrical form, as contradistinguished from the previous square form.

[This was a bill in equity by Thomas J. Woolcocks against Francis Many and others.]

[Final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Suit brought upon letters patent [No. 103,406] for an "improvement in speaking-tube whistles," granted to complainant May 24, 1870. A description of the invention and the claims will be found in the opinion of the court, and will be readily understood by reference to the engravings. In the infringing device, the barrel marked A was octagonal in form, but the spring, G, was placed on the outside; while, in the tubes made prior to the complainant's patent, the barrel was square, and the spring was placed within it.]²

Charles F. Blake, for plaintiff.

Jonathan Marshall, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is founded on letters patent granted to the plaintiff, May 24, 1870, for an "improvement in speaking-tube whistles." The patentee in his specification, says: "My invention relates to certain improvements in the manufacture of speaking-tube whistles, for which a patent was granted to myself and partner, May 4, 1852, and extended for the term of seven years, from and after the 4th of May, 1866. In the invention thus patented, the barrel was made square, and the spring attached to the rod operating the whistle secured to the inside of the barrel, thus making it difficult to get at the whistle to repair, should the spring break, and at the same time requiring a large unsightly barrel, or box (more properly) to admit of the working of the spring thus arranged within it." He states, that his invention consists, "first, in applying the spring to the rod or stem, for operating the whistle, on the outside of the cylindrical barrel, so as to be accessible at all times for repairing, without taking the whistle barrel to pieces; second, in forming a solid flange or hinge to the edge of the valve or top plate of the whistle, for supporting or holding the spring, rod or stem, when attached thereto, in contradistinction to the old method of making the valve plate of the whistle by soldering an independent flange or hinge thereto." Figures of drawings accompany the specification, and it gives a description of the construction of the parts of the apparatus which embody the improvements. The barrel or box which contains the whistle is stated to be cylindrical in form, in contradistinction to being square. The invention covered by the patent of 1852 is the introduction of an alarm valve or whistle into the speaking tube. This valve closes the mouth of the tube, when the tube is not in use, being held to its place by a spring. There is a mouth piece at each end of the tube. Immediately behind the mouth piece is a chamber containing the valve. The valve is a hollow disc, formed so as to produce a whistling noise by means of an orifice through it, whenever a strong current of air is impelled through. The valve is attached to a spindle, which has a handle worked from the outside, so as to raise the valve against the action of the spring, when it is desired to use the tube. The person desiring to speak raises the valve, and blows through the tube, and thus sounds the whistle at the other end, and attracts the attention of the person to be spoken to, who, by raising the valve at his end, enables a conversation to be held through the tube. The patent of 1852 represents the barrel or box containing the valve as being square in form, and the spring as being coiled around the spindle inside of the barrel. In the patent of 1870, the upper one of the two concave perforated discs which form the valve-whistle, has around it a marginal flange, which, at one side, is doubled in width, so as to form a solid hinge piece, to which the stem or spindle for operating or raising the valve may be attached. The specification states, that, previously, the hinge piece had been formed separately and soldered to the edge of the flange, and that then the stem or spindle was soldered to the hinge piece. In the patent of 1870, the spring for keeping the valve shut, is a spiral spring, coiled around the stem on the outside of the barrel, and thus accessible at all times for repairs. The claims of the patent of 1870 are as follows: "(1) In combination with the cylindrically formed barrel A, the stem F, having the reacting spring G attached to it, and operating on the outside of the barrel, as hereinbefore described and for the purposes set forth. (2) The disc B, having a solid flange D and hinge piece E attached thereto, as hereinbefore described, and for the purposes set forth."

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Samuel T. Fisher, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission. The syllabus and opinion are from 9 Blatchf. 139, and the statement is from 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 72.]

² [From 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 72.]

The speaking tube sold by the defendants, and alleged to infringe the patent, has, in combination with a barrel containing the valve, the stem, having attached to it a reacting spring, operating on the outside of the barrel, such combination being, in all respects, the same as that covered by the first claim of the patent, except that, in the defendant's tube, the barrel or box is octagonal, instead of cylindrical. But, in the combination, the octagonal form, as contradistinguished from the previous square form, is the equivalent of the cylindrical form, as contradistinguished from the previous square form. The evidence shows that the octagonal form possesses all the advantages which the cylindrical form has. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the defendant's tube infringes the first claim of the plaintiff's patent.

The infringement of the second claim is not established. The mode used by the defendants, of attaching the stem to the valve, appears to be a mode that was used for that purpose in making tubes under the patent of 1852, before the plaintiff made his inventions covered by the patent of 1870, and not to be the mode described by the plaintiff in that patent.

The defence that the plaintiff abandoned his inventions is not made out. There must be a decree for the plaintiff, for a perpetual injunction, and an account of profits, as respects the first claim of the patent.

Case No. 18,025.

WOOLDRIDGE v. THOMAS.

[Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

WOOLDRIDGE (THOMAS v.). See Case No. 13,918.

Case No. 18,026.

WOOLEN et al. v. NEW YORK & BRIE BANK.

[12 Blatchf. 359.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. 13, 1874.
LIABILITIES OF BANK—COLLECTION OF DRAFT—DELIVERY OF BILLS OF LADING.

1. W., a banker at Indianapolis, sent to a bank at Buffalo a draft drawn on B., who resided in Buffalo, and bills of lading for some lumber, in a letter stating that he inclosed, for collection and remittance of proceeds, the draft and the bills of lading. The draft was drawn by C. on B., and was payable 15 days after date, and was endorsed by M., and then, by special endorsement by W., to the cashier of the bank, "for collection." By the terms of the draft, the drawer, endorsers and acceptor waived presentment for payment and notice of protest and non-payment. The bills of lading set forth C. as the shipper of the lumber, and were dated at times two or three days prior to the date of the draft, and were endorsed by C., by M., and by W. The draft was accepted by B., and the bank delivered the bills of lading to him. B. failed before the maturity of the draft. The lumber had been sold by C. to B., and the draft was for the purchase price, and was discounted by W. for C. on the security of the bills of lading, as collateral. By ordinary course, the lumber would reach Buffalo eight days before the maturity of the draft. W. brought suit against the bank to recover the amount of the draft, on the ground that the defendant violated its duty by delivering the bills of lading before the collection of the draft. Held, that the bank was not liable.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. The drawee was entitled to the bills of lading, on accepting the draft, as the draft was drawn on time.

[Cited in Walters v. Western & A. R. Co., 63 Fed. 392.]

[This was an action by William W. Woolen and Willis S. Webb against the New York & Erie Bank to recover the amount of a draft.]

William H. Gurney, for plaintiffs.
Edward R. Bacon, for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. This action was tried before the court, without a jury. The plaintiffs, bankers at Indianapolis, Indiana, sent to the defendant, a bank at Buffalo, New York, on the 28th of October, 1872, a letter, stating that they enclose, for collection and remittance of proceeds, a draft upon one Bugbee, and bills of lading for eight car loads of lumber. The draft enclosed is dated October 26th, 1872, is drawn by Coder & Co. upon Bugbee, is payable fifteen days from date, and is endorsed by one Mayhew, and then, by special endorsement, by the plaintiffs, to the defendant's cashier, "for collection." By the terms of the draft, the drawers, endorsers, and acceptor severally waive presentment for payment and notice of protest and non-payment. The bills of lading respectively set forth, that Coder & Co., at times two or three days prior to the date of the draft, have shipped, at places therein specified, certain car loads of lumber, to be delivered to them at Albany, New York, and are severally endorsed upon the back by Coder & Co., by Mayhew, and by the plaintiffs. No business dealings had ever taken place between the plaintiffs and the defendant prior to this transaction, except a few days previously, when the plaintiffs had sent to the defendant a similar draft, drawn by and upon the same parties, with similar bills of lading and endorsements, with instructions, by letter, to "deliver the shipping bills on acceptance of the draft." Bugbee, the drawee, resided at Buffalo. Upon receiving the draft first mentioned, the defendant presented it for acceptance to Bugbee, he accepted it, and thereupon, at his request, the defendant delivered to him the bills of lading. Bugbee failed before the maturity of the draft. It is admitted, that the lumber mentioned in the bills of lading had been purchased by Bugbee, of Coder & Co.; and that the draft was drawn for the purchase price of the lumber, and was discounted by the plaintiffs for Coder & Co., on the security of the bills of lading, as collateral. It is also admitted, that, by the ordinary course of transportation, the lumber was due at its destination eight days prior to the maturity of the draft. The plaintiffs insist that the defendant violated its duty by delivering the bills of lading before the collection of the draft, and bring this action to recover of the defendant the amount of the draft.

Bills of exchange are negotiated upon the security of bills of lading appended to them, so frequently, and the rights and obligations of parties thereto constitute such an important subject of consideration in commercial communities, that it seems remarkable that the questions involved in this case have not been settled by numerous adjudications. Such, however, does not seem to be the fact, and the case must be determined as res nova. By receiving a draft for collection, the bank receiving becomes the agent of the owner, and, in the discharge of its obligations as such, is bound to present the same for acceptance without unreasonable delay, and to present the same for payment at its maturity; and, if not accepted, or not paid when presented, it must take such steps, by protest and notice, as are necessary to charge the drawer and endorser. While, ordinarily, it is not necessary to present a draft for acceptance, presentment and demand of payment at maturity, with due notice and protest, if not paid, being sufficient to hold the drawer and endorser, this rule does not obtain as to a collecting agent, but prompt presentment for acceptance is required, so that, in case of non-acceptance, the owner can resort immediately, and before maturity, to the drawer. Allen v. Suydam, 17 Wend. 368, 20 Wend. 321. Upon failure to discharge this duty, the receiving bank becomes liable as for negligence, for any damages resulting from the default.

In the present case, the defendant was absolved from the duty of presenting for payment, and of protesting and giving notice of non-payment of the draft, these steps having been waived by the express terms of the draft, to which waiver the plaintiffs, as endorsers, were parties.

The rights and obligations of the parties, if the draft alone had been forwarded, having been ascertained, it remains to consider how far they are changed by the instructions contained in the letter, and those implied from the transmission of the bills of lading in conjunction with the draft. As between the parties here, the facts, that the lumber had been sold by Coder & Co. to Bugbee, that the draft they had drawn on Bugbee was for the purchase price of the lumber, and that the plaintiffs had discounted it for Coder & Co., upon the bills of lading as collateral security, are not material, except so far as notice of these facts was furnished to the defendant by the letter and its contents, because, except from this source, the defendant had no knowledge of them.

The instruction in the letter, to collect the draft and remit its proceeds, is not controlling. Had the draft alone been enclosed with such instructions, the duty of collecting it would not have devolved on defendant. Its duty would only have been to present it for acceptance, and, if acceptance was refused to protest and give due notice, and, if paid, to remit its proceeds. If its duty in the premises had not been restricted by the terms of the draft, it would not have been obligatory upon the bank to enforce collection by legal proceedings, but only so to fulfill its trust as to enable the owner of the draft to enforce promptly and completely his cause of action against the drawer and endorser. And if, instead of delivering them to Bugbee, it had retained the bills of lading until default in payment of the draft, its whole duty in regard to them would have been discharged by returning them to the plaintiffs. That some duty in reference to the bills of lading was imposed on the defendant, which would not have been required had the draft alone been sent, is evident; otherwise, their transmission is deprived of all significance; but, whether that duty was to retain them until payment of the draft, or only until it was accepted by Bugbee, cannot be determined from the language of the letter. The direction to collect is, in legal effect, not one to enforce collection, but to return the bills of lading to the plaintiffs; and upon what contingency is not specified. Resort must, therefore, be had to the instruments enclosed in the letter, to ascertain the rights of the parties and the duty of the defendant in regard to them. These instruments are to be read and construed together.

The draft is drawn by a person who has consigned lumber to himself at Albany, and transferred his title to it by endorsing the bills of lading to another, who has likewise endorsed the draft and bills of lading to the plaintiffs, who have endorsed both instruments to the defendant. The drawee resides at the city where the defendant transacts its business, and the lumber, by ordinary course of transportation, will reach a distant market several days before the draft matures. It is evident that the draft originated from the shipment of the lumber, was negotiated on the credit of that shipment, and that the parties to it intended that the defendant should deliver the bills of lading to the drawee upon his compliance with the conditions of the agreement under which the lumber was shipped. What those conditions were must be determined by the draft and bills of lading only, and must resolve themselves into one of two alternatives. Either the drawer had consigned the lumber on his own account, to be sold for him by the drawee, and drawn upon the latter for an advancement on the consignment, or the drawer had sold the lumber to the drawee, and drawn upon him for the purchase price. On the first supposition, the drawee was under no obligation to accept the draft until he received the property consigned; on the second, the fact, that the draft was payable fifteen days after date, indicated that the sale was on a credit of that time. If the sale was on credit, the drawee was entitled to a delivery of the property, and to require him to pay for it on delivery would be to repudiate the agreement for credit. Upon either hypothesis, the drawee was entitled to the property as the consideration of his acceptance of the draft. If such was his right, evidently, the drawer, endorser, and owners of the draft had no interest in the bills of lading, except so far as they were security for the acceptance of the draft; and it was reasonable to infer that they were forwarded to the defendant to retain or return, in case acceptance was refused.

To sustain a recovery here, it must be held, that the facts implied that the plaintiffs were the owners of the lumber, and proposed to transfer it to Bugbee on payment of the draft, and had constituted the defendant their agent to consummate this transfer. If the draft had been payable at sight, this theory would seem reasonable. But, the circumstance, that the draft was on time, is a very material one. It is difficult to appreciate why time was to be given to the drawee, unless to enable him to realize funds for its payment from the property on account of which it was drawn. If it had been payable at sight, there would be no room for the inference that the lumber was sold on credit, or that the drawee was entitled to the property in order to realize from it. If the draft had been payable ninety days after date, surely it would not be reasonable to infer, that, for nearly that length of time, the property was to remain at its destination, with charges for storage or demurrage accumulating upon it, and the legal title to it controlled by a corporation in a distant city, which, awaiting the payment of the draft, was under no duty to protect, and possessed no right to dispose of, the property. The cogent inference would be, that the drawee was to have possession upon acceptance, for the purpose of using the property and meeting his acceptance. If such would be the legal presumption had the draft been payable in ninety days, would the presumption change if it had been payable in sixty days, in thirty days, or in a shorter time? If so, where is the line of distinction to be found? Unless it can be ascertained, by some test capable of certain and general application, any such distinction must be rejected. Such a test is found, if the distinction depends upon the consideration whether the draft is on time or at sight; and the only reasonable and certain rule must be held to be, that, if the draft is on time, acceptance by the drawee is conditioned upon a transfer of the property against which it is drawn.

My conclusion, therefore, is, that the defendant had a right to assume that the duty confided to it was to procure acceptance of the draft, and, upon acceptance, to deliver the bills of lading to the drawee, or, if acceptance was refused, to protest and give notice thereof to the plaintiffs, retaining the bills of lading until the maturity of the draft, unless instructed before then to return them. This conclusion is sustained by the case of Lanfear v. Blossman, 1 La. Ann. 148. It is there held, that, where the holder of a bill of exchange which had been negotiated with a shipping bill appended to it, payable at a specified time after date, refused to deliver the bill of lading to the drawee on his accepting the draft, and, for that reason, the drawee refused to accept, a protest was made without reason, and the drawer of the draft was discharged. This is the only reported case which I have been able to find, except one at nisi prius, in the first circuit, where a verdict was ordered for the plaintiffs, upon facts similar to those here. The opinion in Lanfear v. Blossman is an elaborate and very able one, and is entitled to greater weight, as an authority, than a decision upon first impression at circuit. I, therefore, hold, that the defendant was guilty of no negligence in delivering the bills of lading to Bugbee, and order judgment for the defendant.

Case No. 18,027.

WOOLF et al. v. The ODER.

[2 Pet. Adm. 261.]¹

District Court, D. Pennsylvania. 1802.

SEAMEN'S WAGES.

Voyage broken up by seizure for debt. Extra wages claimed, and also the expenses of the mariners on shore demanded. One month's extra pay allowed.

[Cited in Phillips v. The Thomas Scattergood, Case No. 11,106; Nippon's Crew, Id. 10,277; Nevitt v. Clarke, Id. 10,138; The Maria, Id. 9,074; The Esteban De Antunano, 31 Fed. 925; The Frank and Willie, 45 Fed. 490.]

[Cited in Van Beuren v. Wilson, 9 Cow. 164.]

A voyage was broken up by a seizure for the debts of the owner. A claim for the wages, pro tanto, to the time of seizure was brought forward and allowed. Two months' pay in addition were also claimed, under a practice in such cases: damages for the seamen's boarding and expenditures were also demanded.

¹ [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

THE COURT not being satisfied entirely with the allegation, that the seamen were about returning to Europe, granted only one month's additional pay, it appearing, that although they were foreigners by birth, they had for some time past sailed out of America. THE COURT held, that the granting this additional pay, was discretionary, both in quantum and principle. It varies in amount, according to distance from home, or the customs of different nations, and must entirely be controlled by circumstances. There have been frequent claims for damages, including boarding, loss of time, &c. while suits for seamen's wages were depending; but the judge said he had not been in the practice of giving damages; he perceived it was often done in foreign admiralty courts, and in many cases it would be just and proper; but it should be gone into with caution, and only where unwarrantable delay was produced by the fault of the owner or master. Seamen are often stimulated to litigation by landlords, who would, in such cases, be the only gainers, by damages allowed on account of boarding, &c. Suits for mariner's wages are seldom protracted. When they are legally and necessarily delayed, it will be most beneficial, both for commerce and the seamen, that they should leave their affairs in the hands of an agent, and prosecute their employment at sea.

Case No. 18,028.

WOOLFOLK v. MURRAY.

BRYAN v. SIMS.

[10 N. B. R. 540.]¹

District Court, D. Georgia. 1874.

BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDING—OUSTER OF STATE COURT'S JURISDICTION—HOMESTEAD AND EXEMPTION RIGHTS.

1. When the United States courts, under the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 517], have acquired jurisdiction of the estate of a bankrupt, the state courts lose jurisdiction of all claims against him provable under the bankrupt act, except specific liens upon his property, and legal or equitable claims of title thereto; and the homestead and exemption provisions of the constitution of 1868 of Georgia do not create such a specific lien upon, or title to his estate, in favor of his family, as may be heard and adjudicated by the state courts pending the proceedings in bankruptcy.

2. Whether said claim is such a debt in favor of the family, as may be proven before the bankrupt court, independently of the exemption granted by the bankrupt law to the bankrupts, it is for that court alone to decide.

The following are the material facts in these two cases:

No. 1: Mrs. [Gertrude J.] Woolfolk applied for an exemption of her husband's land

¹ [Reprinted by permission.]

as a homestead for herself and children, and the cause came before the superior court by appeal. [Joseph E.] Murray, as trustee for her husband's creditors, and certain of the creditors below, and on the appeal, objected to the setting apart of the homestead, upon the following grounds: First. Prior to her application, the husband was adjudged a bankrupt in the district court of the United States, and all his property, including this sought to be set apart as a homestead, by order of said United States district court, passed into the hands of the United States marshal, and he had it when this application was filed; and before the hearing before the ordinary, said property had been, according to the bankrupt act, conveyed to Murray, as trustee as aforesaid, which conveyance, by relation back, is older than this application, and therefore the ordinary had no jurisdiction over the matter. Second. Because the husband claimed the exemption allowed him under the bankrupt act, and had been allowed the same. These objections were demurred to. The demurrer was overruled, and that is assigned as error.

No. 2: This was ejectment by [C. C.] Sims against Benjamin D. Bryan, for certain land in said county. It was admitted that defendant was in possession of the premises when the suit was begun, and yet that William Bryan was in possession and owned the premises on the 19th of December, 1868, and filed his petition to be adjudged a bankrupt on that day, and put this property in his schedule; that his wife knew that he intended making his application in bankruptcy when she filed her petition for exemption of homestead, and that the premises would rent for four hundred dollars per annum. Plaintiff read in evidence a deed of assignment from Hasselton, register in bankruptcy, to Holtzclaw, made the 25th of January, 1869, conveying to Holtzclaw, as assignee, all William Bryan's property, which he owned on the 19th of December, 1868. He then read in evidence a deed from Holtzclaw, assignee, to plaintiff, for said premises, made on the — day of —, 1869, and here the plaintiff closed. Defendant showed that, on the 16th of December, 1868, William Bryan's wife applied for a homestead, etc., which was granted to her by the ordinary of said county, on the 28th of December, 1868. It was admitted that Holtzclaw and Sims (the purchaser at this sale) had actual notice at the time of the sale, that these premises had been set apart to Mrs. Bryan and her children as a homestead; that Benjamin D. Bryan was but her tenant; that she was the real defendant, and that William Bryan was not yet discharged in bankruptcy. Holtzclaw testified that he was not appointed assignee till after the 28th of December, 1868, and gave notice at the sale of this homestead, but stated also that the purchaser would get a good title, and plaintiff bid off the property at one thousand dollars. He further testified that William Bryan had two hundred and two and a half acres of land, including his dwelling and outhouses and personalty, worth in the aggregate two thousand six hundred dollars, allowed to him as exempt by the bankrupt register. Defendant's counsel asked the court to charge the jury, that the judgment of the ordinary was conclusive as to Mrs. Bryan's rights; that the deed of assignment to Holtzclaw conveyed only the right, title, and interest in the property which William Bryan had at the date of his application for bankruptcy, subject to, and affected by all the equities and incumbrances existing against it in the bankrupt's hands, and this rule applies to purchasers at his sale. If this property had been set apart as a homestead before said assignee's sale, the verdict should be for defendant. The court charged the jury, that the voluntary taking of the exemption by the bankrupt, under the bankrupt act, defeated the wife's right to a homestead; that the petition in bankruptcy being filed first, the ordinary had no jurisdiction in the premises, and the purchaser, at the assignee's sale, got a good title against the wife and children. The jury found for the plaintiff, for the premises in dispute, and one thousand two hundred dollars for mesne profits.

Lyon, De Graffenreid & Irving and Phil. Cook, for plaintiff in error.

Lanier & Anderson, Hunter, Jemison & Nesbit, Nesbits & Jackson, and S. Rogers, for defendant in error.

Prior petition in bankrupt court ousted ordinary's jurisdiction. Bankrupt Act 1867 (by Rice) p. 43; General Clause 34, p. 45; Clause 46; Code Ga. 1873, tit. "Homestead & Exemption," § 2013; Act 1868. All bankrupt's property passed to assignee from date of application. Rice, Manual, p. 49, cls. 63, 64. Bankrupt law paramount to homestead provisions. Const. U. S. art. 7, § 2; Const. Ga. art. 11, § 1; James, Bankr. Law, 13; Am. Law T. (Jan., 1871) 14; In re Barrow [Case No. 1,057]; In re Black [Id. 1,457]; Scofield v. Moorhead [Id. 12,510]; Phipps v. Morrow [49 Ga. 37], last term. He elected his exemption. 41 Ga. 180; In re Askew [Case No. 585]. Ordinary had no jurisdiction. [Taylor v. Carryl] 20 How. [61 U. S.] 601; James, Bankr. Law, 13; Gay. 66; 30 Ga. 69; 13 Ga. 10; 7 Ga. 362; 12 Ga. 424; [Den v. Turner] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 541; 11 Ga. 453; Lumpkin v. Eason [44 Ga. 339], this term.

McCAY, District Judge. Very clearly, the rights of the bankrupt to an exemption, or rather the quantity of his property that he is permitted to hold exempt from the claims of the assignee, is to be determined by the bankrupt law and the bankrupt court. The jurisdiction of the United States over the subject of bankruptcy, is plenary. Const. U.

S. art. 1, § 8, par. 4. The only doubt there can be, on the facts of this record, is whether our law does not give the wife and family such a specific interest in and lien upon the property of the bankrupt—not for his but for their sake—as is saved by the bankrupt law itself. That law does not pretend to take, as the property of the bankrupt, anything which is not legally and equitably his; nor does it contemplate interfering with specific liens third persons may have, under the laws of the state, upon property included within the schedule.

Our constitution, on the subject of homesteads, and the act of 1868, indicates, very clearly, that something more is meant by the homestead provisions than a mere exemption of the debtor's property from levy and sale. The constitution provides that the general assembly shall enact laws for the full and complete protection and security of the same, to the sole use and benefit of the families aforesaid. Const. art. 7, § 1. And the act of 1868, to carry this provision of the constitution into effect, provides for the application, by a next friend of the wife, apart from the husband. The act, too, clearly contemplates that, after the laying off of the homestead, it shall become the property of the wife. She is authorized to sue for trespasses upon it, and, at her death, provision is made for its disposition, as though it were not the property of the husband at all. Act 1868 (Pamph.) p. 27.

But it is very clear that until it is laid off, there is no property, or right of property in the family. The right of the wife and family to a homestead does not stand on the footing of an equitable title or lien, which follows the property into the hands of a purchaser with notice. It is a right which depends for its existence upon the judgment of the court. We have held in the case of Blivins v. Johnson [40 Ga. 297] December term, 1870, that when the application had been made, when there was a lis pendens, a purchaser at sheriff's sale, under notice, bought subject to the judgment. But we have not held that any purchaser, at any time, who bought the property with the notice that the wife had no homestead, bought subject to it. It follows, from the very nature of the thing, that the wife can have no title or lien, because not only her right to it, but the number of acres, and the location of it, are dependent upon the judgment of the court. Indeed, her right depends largely upon her application. Thousands of wives and families do not apply for it. Indeed the main and only object of the law is to interfere for the protection of the family against creditors who, if they were permitted full sway, would render the family homeless, and often throw them upon the public for support. It is clear to us, therefore, that this right of the wife is no title, lien, or incumbrance upon the husband's property, until it has been appropriated by a judgment. If this be so, the jurisdiction over it passes, in case of the bankruptcy of the husband, to the federal court. We have, in the case of Hardeman v. White (unreported), analogized this right of the wife to the case of a preferred or prior debt, and we have spoken of the proceedings as a mode provided by law for its recovery. Perhaps this is the correct view of it.

In my judgment, the true course for these wives is to present the claims before the bankrupt court, not as an exemption of the husband's property, but as a claim of their own against it, having, by the laws of Georgia, a preference over other claims against him. We have in this case allowed the decision made at this term, in the case of Lumpkin v. Eason [44 Ga. 339], to be expressly questioned, and the questions argued without reference to that decision. We abide by the decision in that case. For myself, whilst I may not put the case upon the same ground as my brethren, I abide by the written brief statement then made of the ground of my concurrence. Judgment affirmed.

Case No. 18,029.

In re WOOLFORD.

[4 Ben. 9; 1 3 N. B. R. 444 (Quarto, 113).]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1870.

EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPT'S WIFE.

A bankrupt's wife must attend before the register and submit to an examination, the same as any other witness, under section 26 of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 529)], and may be punished for contempt, under section 7, if she refuses to answer.

² [At a court of bankruptcy, held at the court-house in Catskill, in said district, on the 17th day of January, A. D. 1870, before Mr. THEODORE B. GATES, register of said court in bankruptcy:

[On the 23d day of November, A. D. 1869, Edwin H. Crandell, the assignee in the above entitled matter [of Staats D. Woolford, a bankrupt], filed with the undersigned a written application for the examination of one George Titus, and Olive Woolford, wife of the said bankrupt, which said application was filed, with other papers, in the district clerk's office, on the 2d day of December, A. D. 1869, and to which reference may be had. Such proceedings were thereupon had that an alias order was granted, returnable before me at the court-house in Catskill, on the 7th day of January, 1870, which said order is hereto attached.

[On the return day of said order, said Olive Woolford appeared by James B. Olney, her attorney, and filed the certificate and affidavit, upon which the examination of said Olive Woolford was adjourned to the 17th day of January instant, when the said Olive Woolford appeared by her said attorney for the purpose of taking the objection, and did take the objection, that the bankrupt law does not give the register authority, nor does it vest in the court any power to require the wife of the bankrupt to appear and be examined, and that there were no sufficient grounds for such examination set out in the application for her examination. And her said attorney requested that such question might be certified to his honor the district judge, for his decision. And I do so certify it.]

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

² [From 3 N. B. R. 444 (Quarto, 113).]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The wife of the bankrupt must attend and submit to an examination, the same as any other witness, under section 26. If she does not attend, on being summoned, her attendance may be compelled by a warrant to the marshal, under which she may be brought before the register and detained until her examination is concluded. If, when she comes or is brought before the register, she refuses to answer, she may, under section 7, be punished for contempt.

WOOLHEIM (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,761.

Case No. 18,030.

WOOLLEN v. BANKER.

[2 Flip. 33; 17 Alb. Law J. 72; 5 Reporter, 259.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. May 23, 1877.

OHIO PATENT RIGHT NOTE LAW — CONSTITUTIONALITY.

By act of May 4, 1869 (state of Ohio), it is provided that "any note the consideration for which shall consist in whole or in part of the right to make, use or vend any patent invention or inventions claimed to be patented, shall have the words 'given for a patent right' prominently and legibly written or printed on the face of such note or instrument above the signature thereto, and such note or instrument in the hands of any purchaser or holder shall be subject to the same defenses as in the hands of the original owner or holder." Such a law impairs the value of patent right property, created by the constitution and laws of the United States, and is unconstitutional.

[Cited in brief in Bell Tel. Co. v. Com. (Pa. Sup.) 3 Atl. 829. Disapproved in Herdic v. Roessler, 109 N. Y. 131, 16 N. E. 199. Cited in State v. Lockwood, 43 Wis. 405.]

[Action by W. W. Woollen, administrator, against Peter P. Banker upon a promissory note. Upon a trial before Swing, J., and a jury, a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff (case unreported). A motion for a new trial was heard by Mr. Justice SWAYNE.]

James R. Challen, for plaintiff.

Armpit Bros. and Chas. F. Gunckle, for defendant.

SWAYNE, Circuit Justice. The plaintiff brought his action upon a promissory note of $500, containing the words "given for a patent right." The defendant set up failure of consideration, for that the patent right was void for want of novelty, and of no value, relying upon the statute of Ohio, passed May 4, 1869 (section 66, Ohio Laws, 93), which provides that "any note the consideration for which shall consist in whole or in part of the right to make, use or vend, any patent invention or inventions claimed to be patented shall have the words 'given for a patent right' prominently and legibly written or printed on the face of such note above the signature, and such note or instrument in the hands of any purchaser or holder shall be subject to the same defenses as in the hands of the original owner or holder."

The reply sets up that the plaintiff's intestate purchased said note for value, without notice, before maturity.

Upon a trial by a jury the defendant offered evidence to show that when the note fell due, and demand was made, he offered to return the patent right and cancel the obligation. The court refused to admit the evidence, and defendant's counsel excepted. An exception was also taken to the refusal of the court to admit evidence that the patent was void for want of novelty, and of no value, and also to the charge of the court, because the jury were not instructed that the defendant was entitled to the same defenses against the plaintiff, although an innocent purchaser for value before maturity, as he would have against the original payee.

These exceptions raise the question of the constitutionality of the statute of Ohio above quoted, and how much soever it may be disagreeable to this court to pronounce upon the unconstitutionality of a state statute before the supreme court of that state has done so, the merits of this case require such duty of us, and we cannot shrink from it.

A construction has been given to the statute in one of its bearings by the supreme court of Ohio in State v. Peck, 25 Ohio St. 29, in which the court say: "To construe the phrases 'patent right,' 'patented invention,' and 'inventions claimed to be patented' as used in the act to mean machines manufactured under letters patent by the patentee or his assigns, would give to them not only an unusual, forced and unnatural import, but would seriously interfere with and injure the manufacturing interests and commercial prosperity of the state, which cannot be presumed to have been intended by the general assembly in the passage of the act."

That the constitution of the United States has conferred upon the congress the power "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, by securing for limited time, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries," by section 8, art. 1, is no more certain than that such power has been exercised by the enactment of patent laws, and that no state can limit, control, or even exercise the power.

¹ [Reported by William Searcy Fliprin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 5 Reporter, 259, contains only a partial report.]

Congress has not only regulated the manner in which a patent may be obtained, but it has prescribed the manner in which such right may be sold and conveyed, and has imposed the penalties for the infringement thereof. The national government has, therefore, made a patent right, property. The patentee has paid the government for the monopoly, and it is bound to protect him and his assignee in the use and enjoyment of it. Any interference whatever by any state, that will impair the right to make, use, or vend any patented article, or the right to assign the patent or any part of it, is forbidden by the highest organic law. The statute in question is such an interference, and is unconstitutional.

We are supported in this opinion by every court that has had occasion to pass directly upon the question. Davis, J., in Re Robinson [Case No. 11,932], pronounced the Indiana law, similar in terms to the Ohio law, clearly unconstitutional. The supreme court of Indiana, in Helm v. First Nat. Bank, 43 Ind. 167, held that as the federal government has continuously, from the adoption of the constitution down to the present time, legislated on the subject of patents, and as, from the nature and subject of the power, it cannot conveniently be exercised by the state, it must necessarily be exercised by the national government exclusively, and add: "We are of the opinion that the legislature of Indiana possessed no power to pass the statute under consideration, and it must, therefore, be held unconstitutional and void." And so in Hereth v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 34 Ind. 380, it was held that a maker of a promissory note in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value before due, could not be heard to plead fraud, or failure of consideration, although "given for a patent right" was in the body of the note, and that these words did not put the purchaser on his guard, or convey any notice whatever; being equivalent to "value received." And so in Hascall v. Whitmore, 19 Me. 102; Smith v. Hiscock, 14 Me. 449.

There is no error in rejecting the evidence offered, nor in refusing to charge the jury as requested. The decision of the court below is sustained, and judgment may be entered on the verdict. Leave to have the cause certified to the supreme court refused.

Case No. 18,031.

WOOLLY v. The PERUVIAN.

[3 Ware, 154; 1 21 Law Rep. 153.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1858.

LIEN ON VESSEL—LABORERS AND MATERIAL MEN—EXCAVATION OF TRENCH FOR LAUNCHING.

1. A trench excavated in front of the launching ways of a ship, for the purpose of deepening the water, does not make a part of the launching ways, within the meaning of the act of the legislature of Massachusetts of 1855 (chapter 231).

2. And though this was necessary for the launching of the vessel, yet as the trench remains to be used for other vessels, this was not, within the meaning of the act, labor performed in launching the vessel.

3. The general objects of the act are to give to material men, mechanics and laborers, a lien for all the materials and labor which go into the ship, constitute any part of it, and make up its entire cost.

[Cited in Young v. The Orpheus, 119 Mass. 184.]

4. For this the law constitutes the ship a debtor, and it is what she naturally owes, and it would require the most express and unequivocal language to extend the lien beyond this natural limit.

In admiralty.

S. J. Thomas, for libellant.

J. A. Andrew, for claimants.

WARE, District Judge. This is a libel in rem against a new ship, the Peruvian, for labor performed in launching her. The libellant alleges that "by virtue of a contract with the builders he performed labor in the launching of said ship to the amount of $150, according to the schedule annexed to the libel, and that this labor was indispensable to the launching of the ship;" and after deducting all credits, there remains due to him $129, for which he claims under the law of the state a lien on the ship.

The answer of the claimants, who are purchasers of the ship, without admitting the labor and services alleged in the libel, denies "that the same, if done, was of a kind or character entitling him to any lien or privilege on the ship." The actual performance of the labor was proved at the hearing, and the amount claimed was not contested, if any thing can be recovered in this suit. The ship was built at a yard in East Boston, and the water was so shoal in front of the yard where she lay, that it was necessary to excavate the earth so as to give a greater depth of water to prevent her grounding as she left the ways. The amount of excavation or dredging charged is fifty square yards at three dollars a yard. This lien is claimed under a statute of Massachusetts of 1855 (chapter 231). The material portion of the act is the first section: "Whenever by virtue of any contract, expressed or implied, with the owners of any ship or vessel, or with the agent, contractors or sub-contractors of such owner or any of them, or with any person having been employed to contract, repair or launch any ship or vessel, or to assist them,—money shall be due to any person for labor performed and materials furnished in the construction, launching or repairs of, or for constructing the launching ways for, or for provisions or other articles furnished for, or on account of any ship or vessel in this commonwealth,—such person shall have a lien on such ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel and furniture, to secure the payment of such debt; which lien shall be preferred to all others thereon, except for mariners' wages, and shall continue until the debt be satisfied." The other parts of the act directing the measures to be taken to secure or perpetuate the lien, do not affect its nature or character.

¹ [Reported by George F. Emery, Esq.]

Whether the lien can be maintained, depends on the construction of the act. The claim is set forth in the words of the law. It is for money due by virtue of a contract for labor performed in launching the ship, with an allegation that it was a service indispensable for that purpose. The statute gives the lien for labor performed in the launching, and for labor or materials in constructing the launching ways. On a strict criticism of the words of the law, this labor cannot, perhaps, with entire propriety, be said to be labor done in the launching of the vessel. It was rather a service performed preparatory to the launching, and whether it was a preparatory work of a kind that can justly be considered as contemplated by the legislature, seems to me to admit of a doubt. It is further argued by the libellants' counsel, that this dredging and excavation of the earth may be considered as labor performed on the launching ways. But it seems to me to be an unnatural and forced meaning put on the words, to consider an artificial channel made in front of the ways, where the ship is received into the water, as part of the ways themselves. The lien is given for labor and materials for the ways, apparently contemplating only the wooden frame-work or cradle in which the ship rests. There appears to me, therefore, to be some difficulty in maintaining that the service claimed in this libel was of such a character as fairly comes within the meaning of the law.

The statute is evidently drawn with care, and the manifest intention, I think, was to give to material-men and laborers, who have contributed by labor and materials to the construction of a ship, a lien for the price of every article which goes into and makes a part of her, and for every kind of labor that is performed upon or for her, until she passes into the element for which she is destined; in a word, for all, whether of labor or materials, which constitutes the proper cost of the ship. The statute creates a legal hypothecation of the thing, and makes the ship herself a debtor; and when the precautions are taken required by the other sections of the law, the lien adheres to her as a jus in re until the debt is paid, into whosoever hands she may pass. But this, I think, is generally the whole intent of the law. The debt, for which this nexus is given, is the proper debt of the res, and is a property in the ship. To that extent the lien creditor is a quasi proprietor or owner. It is his own property, which he has never parted with, whether it is due for materials or labor. But it is his property in a qualified sense. The claimant or general owner has his rights also. He may pay the debt, or tender the pay, which will have the same legal effect, and then by operation of law, without any form of transfer, or the consent of the creditors, this special and qualified property passes to him in full and unqualified ownership. The lien does not necessarily or naturally extend to every thing furnished or done for or in reference to the ship, as for the price of tools supplied to mechanics and workmen, and used in doing the work. The legislature will not easily be supposed to have intended a lien for the price of these; because in that case the payment would operate as a transfer of these tools to the owner as appurtenant to the ship. But the ship has had only the use of them, and for this use has paid in the price of the labor. Such things, though in a loose sense they may be said to be furnished for the vessel, constitute no part of the ship, nor, like a boat or an anchor, are they a natural appurtenance to the ship. They will not, therefore, be supposed to be within the intention of the legislature, unless that intention is clearly expressed. But if such a purpose is unequivocally expressed, I do not see why courts are not bound to carry that intention into execution, whatever their own opinion may be of the utility of the law.

I should feel no difficulty in giving this interpretation as expressing the general intention of the legislature, that is, that the lien extended to all the materials and all the labor that made up the entire cost of the ship, and no farther, but for a single clause in the law. That gives a lien for labor and materials "for constructing the launching ways." Yet the launching ways constitute no part of the ship, nor are they in any way appurtenant to her after she is afloat. They are necessary, it is true, for the launching, and so, in some sense, may be said to be furnished for the ship and to make a part of her cost. But the same may be said of the tools of the workmen, and for a like reason the lien may be claimed as extending to them. The Kearsarge [Case No. 7,634]. But in each case, on the other hand, the ship has had only the temporary use of these things. The tools remain for further use, and the timbers, of which the launching ways are made, are preserved to be used for launching other vessels. The price of these does not go into the cost of the vessel. All that the ship naturally owes to the launching ways is for their temporary use and the labor of putting up the frame-work. This being for the special benefit of the ship, is a proper charge against it, and a proper subject of the lien. Yet, the words of the law are express, and in a statute drafted with such evident care, I find some difficulty in determining that the legislature did not mean what they have said.

But another question remains, whether this service comes within the descriptive words of the law in their fair and ordinary meaning. It is giving a forced and unnatural meaning to them, to call this trench a part of the launching ways. It is more easy and natural to consider the work as part of the labor of launching, and if the trench was made exclusively for this ship, if the whole use of it was consumed when this ship was launched, it might fairly be considered as part of the cost of the launching. But after it is used for this ship, the trench remains as a permanent improvement of the ship yard. If the claimant and owner pay for it, it does not become his as an appurtenance of the ship. It continues the property of the owner of the ship yard. It would require the most express and unequivocal language to extend the lien so as to include such work. This would be an infringement of the general principles of law and justice. "Quod vero contra rationem juris receptum est, non est producendum ad consequentias." Dig. 1, 3, 14.

Upon the whole, my opinion is that this trench formed in front of the ship-yard cannot be considered as part of the launching ways, nor can the making of it be considered as labor performed in the launching, within the meaning of the law.

The libel must be dismissed with costs.

WOOLMAN v. The RICHARD DOANE. See Case No. 11,765.

Case No. 18,032.

WOOLSEY v. DODGE et al.

[6 McLean, 142.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1854.²

ILLEGAL BANK TAX—COLLECTION—INJUNCTION BY STOCKHOLDER—CONSTRUCTION OF STATE STATUTES—FOLLOWING STATE DECISIONS.

1. The tax law of 1852, against banks, incorporated under the act of 1845, having been declared to be unconstitutional, it can afford no justification to the treasurer of the county in collecting the tax.

2. A citizen of Connecticut, being a stockholder, may file his bill for an injunction against the collection of the tax, making the directors of the bank defendants, which will enable the court to give relief, the same as if the directors were plaintiffs.

3. A remedy by injunction will be given where there is no adequate relief by law.

4. A continual grievance will be enjoined.

5. An action of trespass is not an adequate remedy for the bank, when its funds are annually and unlawfully abstracted.

6. The state cannot be sued. Its officer may not be responsible.

7. The credit of the bank is impaired.

8. The courts of the Union follow the rule of construction of state statutes, established by the supreme court of the state.

[Cited in Griffing v. Gibb, Case No. 5,819; Mitchell v. Lippincott, Id. 9,665.]

9. The supreme court of the United States, under the federal constitution, give the rule of construction of that instrument.

[This was a bill by John M. Woolsey against George C. Dodge and the directors of the Commercial Bank of Cleveland to enjoin the collection of a certain tax.]

Mr. Ewing, for complainant.

Mr. Spaulding, for defendants.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. The complainant, a citizen of Connecticut, filed his bill, representing, substantially, that he is a stockholder in the Commercial Bank of Cleveland, to the amount of thirty shares of stock, which are worth forty per cent. above par, making an aggregate value of four thousand two hundred dollars; that an illegal and unconstitutional tax has been imposed on said bank exceeding eleven thousand dollars, and to the injury of the complainant more than five hundred dollars; and the bill alleges that the continuance of the tax will impair and substantially destroy the franchises of the bank. And the complainant alleges that orders have been given to the defendant who is treasurer of Cuyahoga county, to proceed to collect the tax, under the tax law of 1852, which authorizes the defendant, if the tax shall not be paid on demand on notice being given, to enter the vaults of the bank by force, and take therefrom the amount of the tax in gold and silver coin, etc. And the complainant avers if the tax be levied and paid over to the state, he is without remedy, as the state cannot be sued, and that his recourse on the treasurer would be inadequate, etc. He therefore prays that an injunction may be granted, there being no adequate remedy at law. There are many other averments in the bill which it is unnecessary to state.

The defendant demurs to the bill on the ground that there is no jurisdiction. Two positions are assumed in the argument against the jurisdiction of the court: (1) "That the charter of the bank contains a provision, that its affairs shall be managed by the directors." (2) That "upon any other hypothesis, than an abuse of the trust by the directors, a court of equity has no jurisdiction."

The authorities referred to in support of the above positions are undoubtedly law, but they are considered as having no application to the case before us. This is not a writ against the bank. No relief against it is prayed for in the bill. The directors are made parties, having an interest in the matter not hostile to the complainant, but in accordance with his interest, in order that, the directors being named on the record, the entire interest of the bank may be protected from the illegal exaction threatened. This is a common proceeding in chancery, which in its decree protects the rights of parties on the record, whether named as complainants or defendants. In 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 630, it is said, "In equity, it is sufficient that all parties in interest are before the court as plaintiffs or as defendants; and they need not, as at law, in such a case, be on opposite sides of the record." And in 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 742, he says, "In courts of equity, persons having very different and even opposite interests, are often made parties defendants." And in Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 177, the court say, "It is within the undoubted powers of a court of equity to decree between co-defendants, on evidence between plaintiffs and defendants." So in 2 Schoales & L. 712. In the case of Platt v. Oliver [Case No. 11,116], the complainant being a citizen of Kentucky, filed his bill against Oliver and others, praying a decree against them, and also made defendants several other persons whose interests rested on the same grounds, as the rights asserted by the complainant; and the circuit court decreed, as between the parties defendants on the record, who, being citizens of Ohio, could not be made complainants, and that case being carried to the supreme court, the decree was affirmed. 3 How. [44 U. S.] 333.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

² [Affirmed in 18 How. (59 U. S.) 331.]

No further reference to authorities on this point can be necessary. It is sustained in the reports, and in elementary treatises. Has the complainant made a case in his bill, which gives jurisdiction to the court? He alleges that he has an interest in the bank, exceeding four thousand dollars; that an illegal tax has been laid on the bank exceeding eleven thousand dollars, and to his injury more than five hundred dollars; and that the collection of the tax will impair, if not destroy the franchise of the bank. The sixtieth section of the charter is relied on as containing a contract, that the bank should not be taxed more than six per cent. upon its dividends, which tax the bank has heretofore paid, and is now ready to pay to the treasurer of state. The complainant also alleges, if the tax demanded be paid over to the defendant he would not be responsible, and if by him paid to the state, he would be without remedy, as the state cannot be sued. It has recently been held, by the supreme court of the United States, that the law under which this tax was imposed impairs the contract made by the state in the sixtieth section of the bank charter of 1845, and that the law was passed in violation of the constitution of the United States, and is consequently void.

It has been suggested, rather than argued, by the counsel in this case, that the adoption of the new constitution, which took effect the 1st day of September, 1851, contained provisions, in regard to taxation, inconsistent with the sixtieth section of the act of 1845, and that consequently, that act was modified by the constitution. I say this was rather suggested than argued, as I would not do so great an injustice to the counsel, as to suppose that any one of his learning and ability could bring himself to the conclusion that the constitution of the state is not a law of the state. It is indeed the fundamental and paramount law of the state; but it is only a law of the state, and the constitution of the United States declares that "no state shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts," etc., and the supreme court of the United States at its last term, having before it, by writ of error, the judgment of the supreme court of Ohio, enforcing the tax law against banks, reversed the judgment, on the ground that the tax law which imposed higher tax on the banks incorporated under the act of 1845, than six per cent. on their dividends, impaired the obligation of the contract in regard to taxation, contained in the sixtieth section of that law.

That the supreme court of the Union had jurisdiction of the case in which the above judgment was pronounced, is not controverted, and it is equally clear that the decision is final and conclusive. If indeed a state, by calling a convention, could modify or abrogate any part of the federal constitution, that great palladium of our rights would be of no value. The founders of this government were too wise and patriotic to countenance such a principle in the fundamental law of the Union. Such a power, it is believed, has never been asserted by any authority entitled to respect. In the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 868, which was a case in several of its aspects similar to the one before us, the supreme court say, the act of Ohio "is repugnant to a law of the United States, made in pursuance of the constitution, and therefore void. The counsel for the appellants are too intelligent, and have too much self respect, to pretend that a void act can afford any protection to the officers who execute it." There is no axiom of the law better established than this. A void law can afford no justification to any one who acts under it; and he who shall attempt to collect the illegal tax, under the law referred to, will be a trespasser. He will proceed, it is true, under the color of law, an act standing on the statute book, but a void act. If he open the vaults of the bank by force, and abstract a portion of its specie, under a pretense of collecting the tax, he, though the treasurer of the county, will stand without justification or excuse. He has no more right to do this than any other person, who can set up no pretense of authority. And this trespass is to be repeated annually. What a spectacle! What a spectacle to a law-abiding people! Is there no preventive remedy? What stronger ground than this can be imagined for an injunction? The action of trespass comes too late. The state cannot be sued. Its officer may be insolvent. At best, such a remedy is wholly inadequate. The money of the bank is annually abstracted, its credit shaken, and for years the money may not be recovered. It would be a mockery of justice as well as of law, to say to the bank, your only remedy is by an action of trespass.

It is a settled principle in chancery, that an injunction will be granted against a single trespass, if in its nature, it would be irremediable at law. But the case before us is a trespass to be repeated so long as the act laying the tax shall remain unrepealed. And there can be no question, that a collection of the tax after the decision of the supreme court, declaring the tax law void, will be continued until the law shall be repealed. This will in effect, not only disregard the highest judicial authority, on the question involved, in the Union; but it will nullify the constitution of the United States, which is declared to be the supreme law of the Union. This remark is not only justified but called for as two applications for injunctions have been made against the collection of the illegal tax at the present term. In the bill it is stated that orders have been given to the treasurers of the counties in which these banks are situated to proceed, under the law, to collect the tax. And this is to be done, if the tax be not paid on demand, by what, in common parlance, is called the crowbar operation. In all the bills praying for injunctions in these cases, the complainants state that the banks have offered to pay the legal tax under their charter, and are ready, at any time, to pay it.

In the Case of Osborn above stated, the supreme court say, "The circuit court of the United States have jurisdiction of a bill brought by the Bank of the United States, for the purpose of protecting the bank in the exercise of its franchises, which are threatened to be invaded, under the unconstitutional laws of a state; and as the state itself cannot, according to the eleventh amendment of the constitution, be made a party defendant to the suit, it may be maintained against the officers and agents of the state, who are entrusted with the execution of such laws." And the court further say, "In the case at bar, the tribunal established by the constitution for the purpose of deciding ultimately, in all cases of this description, had solemnly determined that a state law imposing a tax on the Bank of the United States, was unconstitutional and void, before the wrong was committed for which the suit was brought." "We think then," the court say, "there is no error in the decree of the circuit court of the district of Ohio, so far as it directs restitution" of the money taken unlawfully from the bank. The court say in effect, as stated in the synopsis of the case, "A state cannot tax the Bank of the United States, and any attempt on the part of its agents and officers to enforce the collection of such tax against the property of the bank, may be restrained by injunction from the circuit court."

It is said that the tax on the Bank of the United States was intended to destroy its franchises. The exaction on each of the two branches of that bank, was the sum of fifty thousand dollars, while the illegal tax on the Commercial Bank of Cleveland was about eleven thousand dollars. This is a difference in degree, rather than in principle. But the court say a tax on the Bank of the United States is illegal, and may be enjoined by the circuit court. Is not the tax complained of by the Commercial Bank of Cleveland illegal, and may it not be enjoined? What higher and more conclusive authority than this can be cited in favor of this remedy by injunction.

In the case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How. [54 U. S.] 567; the court say in reference to granting injunctions, "There must be such an injury, as from its nature is not susceptible of being adequately compensated by damages at law, or such as, from its continuance or permanent mischief, must occasion a constantly recurring grievance, which cannot otherwise be prevented than by an injunction." The character of the trespass threatened and complained of, is not only an annually recurring grievance, but if continued must be fatal to the bank. The tax, and the penalty for non-payment, together with the costs of collection, would impair the credit and destroy the usefulness of any bank.

It has been stated that the mode of giving jurisdiction in this case is merely colorable; or in other words, that it is a fraud upon the law. Is this so? The second section of the third article of the constitution declares, that the judicial power shall extend to controversies "between citizens of different states." The framers of the federal constitution were wise and sagacious men. They were profoundly acquainted with human nature in its individual and aggregate action. They were instructed in no ordinary school; and in nothing was their sagacity more eminently shown, than in establishing a judicial power to carry out and maintain the federal powers, and provide against the effects of local excitement. For these purposes were the courts of the United States chiefly established. An option is given to citizens of other states than those in which suits are brought, to sue in the courts of the Union. The complainant is a citizen of Connecticut. He has stock in the bank, which he apprehends will be forcibly and unlawfully seized and abstracted. And if so seized, for the reasons stated in his bill, the law will afford to him no adequate means of redress. Under such circumstances, is he guilty of a legal fraud, or of claiming a colorable right only, by suing in the circuit court? He claims the exercise of a constitutional right, to sue in this court. And if a suit thus brought, makes the directors of the bank defendants in the suit, and being parties on the record, brings the bank within the relief prayed, the fault is in the law, rather than in the complainant, and the reproach, therefore, should not be thrown on him.

This court brings into a state no novel principles. It administers the law of the state. In giving effect to the statutes of the state, where there is no conflict with the federal constitution, the courts of the Union follow implicitly the rule established by the supreme court of the state. This is done, not on the ground of authority, but of policy. It would be injurious to the citizens of a state, to have two rules of property. Such a course, by the courts of the Union, would produce unfortunate conflicts and encourage litigation. To avoid this, as a matter of policy, the courts of the United States follow the state courts, in the construction of their statutes. So far has this been carried, that the supreme court of the United States has reversed its own decision, made in accordance with the state decisions, in order to conform to a change of decision in the supreme court of the state, in the construction of its statutes; and I trust that no circumstances will ever induce the supreme court of the Union to reverse this course of decision.

There are but few cases in which, under the federal constitution, the supreme court of the Union establishes the rule of construction for the state courts. Where one such case occurs, there are more than five hundred cases where the courts of the Union follow the state courts. If individuals and courts shall disregard judicial authority, and carry out their own peculiar views of our constitution and laws, the harmony of our system of government must be destroyed, and the law of force must become the arbiter of rights. We think that there is jurisdiction in the case before us, and that the injunction has been rightfully granted, and that it should be made, so far as the illegal tax is demanded, perpetual. The demurrer is overruled.

[The above decision was affirmed by the supreme court on appeal. 18 How. (59 U. S.) 331.]

WOOLSEY (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 16,762 and 16,763.

Case No. 18,033.

WOOLSTON v. The JOHN A. WARNER.¹
Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 29, 1860.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—CONTRACT TO CARRY PASSENGERS.

[A contract to carry passengers from Philadelphia to Cape May, and then to visit a ship at a certain point in the Atlantic Ocean, and back again to Philadelphia, is a maritime contract, and within the admiralty jurisdiction. The fact that the passenger is to be returned to the place of starting, or that the trip is called an "excursion," does not affect the admiralty jurisdiction.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania.]

Appeal in admiralty.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. I see no deficiency in the statements of the libel to bring this case within the jurisdiction of the court of admiralty. It is not disputed that a contract to carry passengers on the high seas is as much a maritime contract as that to carry freight, and that the vessel is bound by the contract of the master, as soon as the passenger has been received on board, and the voyage commenced. In Minturn v. King, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 469, it was taken for granted. The voyage in this case was from the port of Philadelphia to Cape May, and thence to the Great Eastern, and thence back to Philadelphia. This was not a mere contract for transportation from one place to another in the same state, or from one part of the port of Philadelphia to another. It is a contract to carry on the high seas to a town in another state, and thence to a certain point in the Atlantic Ocean. It is as much a maritime contract as one to carry a passenger to England or China. Nor is it less a maritime contract because the vessel is bound to take the passenger to a certain place and bring him back again. Nor is it material to the definition of a maritime contract to show in the libel whether the passenger was traveling for amusement or on business. On a charter party of a vessel to sail for the Banks of Newfoundland to catch mackerel, it would hardly be seriously averred that, because the ship was chartered, not only to carry out, but to fetch back again, the contract was not maritime, or that the man who went to catch fish to sell could have his remedy in admiralty, while he who went to fish for pleasure or amusement could not. Nor is there any magic in the word "excursion," which will take the contract out of this category. If a number of gentlemen were to charter a vessel to take them on an excursion to the Mediterranean Sea and back again, it would be making a distinction where there was no difference to say such a contract is not maritime, while a charter party to go to Sicily for a load of oranges would be. I am of opinion that the libel exhibited a case sufficient to give the district court in admiralty jurisdiction, and that process should be awarded as prayed for in the libel. The clerk will return the record with certificate of the decree of this court to that effect.

Case No. 18,034.

In re WOOLUMS et al.

[1 N. B. R. 496 (Quarto, 131).]¹

District Court, D. Kentucky. 1873.

BANKRUPT—APPLICATION FOR DISCHARGE.

Bankrupt may apply for a discharge within sixty days after adjudication in bankruptcy where debts have been proved, but no assets have come to the hands of the assignee.

[Cited in Re Sloan, Case No. 12,945.]

[In the matter of B. W. & J. H. Woolums, bankrupts.]

¹ [Not previously reported.]
30 Fed. Cas.—39

¹ [Reprinted by permission.]

BALLARD, District Judge. The register certifies that on the day fixed by the court for the "creditors and other persons in interest" to appear at a court to be held by the register, and show cause, if any they had, why the prayer of the bankrupts' petition for a discharge should not be granted, Moore, Bre-maker & Co., creditors of the bankrupts, who had proven their debt, appeared and moved that the said petition be dismissed; that this motion was based on the ground that six months had not elapsed from the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy before the filing of the petition, and that the petition did not allege that "no debts have been proven against the bankrupts," but only "that no assets have come to the hands of the assignee;" that the bankrupts resisted this motion, and that the motion was overruled by the register, and that thereupon the creditors requested that the question "thus presented" be certified to the district judge for his opinion.

I more than doubt whether "the question presented" could properly arise in the course of the proceedings before the register. The petition was pending in the district court, and it seems to me that the question here raised ought to have been made in that court, before the judge thereof, by motion or demurrer or other proper pleading, and not before the register. It is true that it is the office of the register to "assist the judge of the district court in the performance of his duties under this (the bankrupt) act;" but he can dispose of no contested matters, and the question whether the petition of a bankrupt for his discharge should be dismissed on the motion of a creditor is in its very nature so obviously a contested matter that it would seem it could be raised only in the district court itself. But, waiving this question and the irregularity of the register's overruling the motion, and thus deciding a contested matter, I have no objection, as the parties desire to have the question raised disposed of, to treat the motion as regularly made. The 29th section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 531)] provides, "that, at any time after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, or if no debts have been proved against the bankrupt, or if no assets have come to the hands of the assignee at any time after the expiration of sixty days, * * * the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge from his debts."

I see no difficulty in determining the meaning of this provision. It seems to me clear that it allows the bankrupt to apply for his discharge after the expiration of sixty days from the adjudication, and within six months, either when no debts have been proved, or when no assets have come to the hands of the assignee. It is only when both debts have been proved and assets have come to the hands of the assignee, that the discharge cannot be applied for until after the expiration of six months.

It is a little singular that Mr. James, in his notes, and Messrs. Avery and Hobbs, in their notes to this section, after stating correctly that the bankrupt may apply for his discharge after the expiration of sixty days if no debts are proved, or if, within that time, no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, state inadvertently, and incorrectly, that "if debts are proved or if assets are received by the assignee he cannot apply until after the expiration of six months from the date of adjudication." It is manifest that these authors have not given critical attention either to the language of the statute or to that employed by themselves.

As the petition sets forth the facts contemplated by one of the alternatives of the statute, that is, "that no assets had come to the hands of the assignee," it was properly filed within six months after the adjudication. The motion to dismiss is therefore overruled.

Case No. 18,035.

WOOSTER v. CALHOUN et al.

[11 Blatchf. 215; 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 514; Merw. Pat. Inv. 197.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 30, 1873.

PATENT FOR RUFFLE—IMPROVEMENT IN MANUFACTURE.

1. A patent for a ruffle, to be made by machinery, cannot be sustained, where the ruffle is identical, in mechanical construction, with a ruffle before made, although the machinery, or the process it works, performs at one operation what before required more than one.

[Cited in Excelsior Needle Co. v. Union Needle Co., 32 Fed. 224; Blumenthal v. Burrell, 43 Fed. 670; Risdon Iron & L. Works v. Medart, 158 U. S. 83, 15 Sup. Ct. 751.]

2. The product of a machine is not patentable merely because the machine makes an already known article more perfectly than it has been, or can be, made without a machine.

[Cited in Holliday v. Pickhardt, 29 Fed. 860.]

[This was a bill in equity by Emma C. Wooster against John C. Calhoun and others. Final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Suit brought on letters patent [No. 42,403] for "improvement in band-ruffles," granted Thomas Robjohn, April 19, 1864, and assigned to complainant. The claim of the patent is "a banded ruffle, whether crimped, fluted, ruffled, or shirred, when said ruffle is made of two thicknesses of goods, substantially as herein described."] ²

Frederic H. Betts and Clarence A. Seward, for plaintiff.

Edwin W. Stoughton, for defendants.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission. The syllabus and opinion are from 11 Blatchf. 215, and the statement is from 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 514. Merw. Pat. Inv. 197, contains only a partial report.]

² [From 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 514.]

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. My conclusion in this case is, that the bill of the complainant, upon the proofs herein, cannot be sustained.

1. Irrespective of the specific question, whether the alleged inventor, Thomas Robjohn, was the first to make the precise ruffle described in the patent, or whether, on the other hand, it was made at an earlier date by the defendants, I am of opinion, that, in the state of the art at the time when the complainant claims that Robjohn invented the ruffle in question, it was not the subject of invention. It embodied no new idea whatever. In mechanical construction, it was identical with what had been made by hand long before. If it possessed greater beauty, greater evenness and regularity of its plaits, than the ruffling made by hand, that was due to the machinery by which it was made, and not to the invention of the maker in suggesting any novelty but such as pertains to quality or degree of perfection in what was old. If it be conceded that such evenness, regularity of plaits, beauty, and finish, exceeding anything which it is possible to produce by hand, made it a patentable article of manufacture, notwithstanding it is, in other respects, like ruffling before made, still, it was not new in such sense as to be patentable. Just such even, regular, beautiful, finished plaits were made and on sale before. Just the same wavy edge of the ruffle was exhibited in all finely plaited ruffling, whether done by hand or by a machine. Ruffling with two rows of stitches along what is called the band, or substitute for a separate band, was in use before. Machine-made ruffling, with very narrow plaits, had all the regularity and evenness and the wavy edge. The point of difference most insisted upon is, that none had, at that time, the edge of the band hemmed or turned up. I cannot agree, that, if there be ruffling known and in the market, which requires to be hemmed before being used, or when put to use, one who hems it before offering it for sale has made a patentable invention, and can monopolize the business of hemming ruffles. The mistake of the complainant is, in confounding a process, or a machine for performing, at one operation, what before required more than one, with the product of the operation. The former may be patentable; the latter is not. There is no just pretence that there were not other ruffles, made by machinery, with like plaits, like double stitching, like construction generally; or that ruffles made before would not, if the edge of the band be turned up or hemmed, be, in every material respect, the same. If the complainant had invented a machine by which the whole process of plaiting, stitching, hemming, &c., could be done at a single operation, that might be secured to her. But, because the product is the result of one operation, instead of two or more, is no ground for a patent for it as a product.

Nor am I prepared to assent to the proposition, that the product of a machine is patentable on the mere ground that it makes an already known article more perfectly than it has been, or can be, made without a machine. The idea being old, men strive to embody it perfectly. Human skill is exhausted in the effort. Human hands, less exact and unvarying in their movements, only approximate perfection. A machine is devised which makes it better than it has ever before been made. Another machine is invented which approaches more nearly. Still another machine is invented which performs, it may be, better, it may be, not so well. Is the product of the best human skill, in such case, patentable? Is the product of each successive machine patentable? If all the makers are not entitled to a patent for the article as a product, which of them is entitled? Surely, improvements in degrees or quality are not the subject of a patent.

2. The preponderance of the evidence is, that the alleged inventor, Robjohn, was not the first to make the ruffle claimed. Laying out of view hand-made ruffles, and, for the present, the machine-made ruffles above alluded to, the proof shows, that ruffles embracing all the features of the ruffle claimed to have been invented by Robjohn, were made at New Haven, by machine, and at the manufactory of the defendants, before Robjohn made them. If the testimony of the witness Kellogg be credited, this is most distinctly proved. If the criticisms upon his testimony be deemed to impair his credibility, I am of opinion that the testimony of the witness Robjohn, in behalf of the complainant, is, certainly, not less subject to distrust. Without the testimony of either, the defendants must be deemed to have made ruffles embodying all of the peculiarities of the ruffle in question, earlier than the complainant. If the defendants' ruffle, which has a separate strip stitched upon, or made a part of, the band, be deemed a mere addition to the ruffle claimed by the complainant, and, as such, an infringement, if the complainant were entitled to the monopoly, then, clearly, if the defendants made that ruffle before the complainant made the same, with or without such added strip, the complainant cannot become entitled to a monopoly of the ruffle without the strip, unless it be held, that, without the strip, the ruffle is a distinct manufacture. Upon all the proofs, I am constrained to find that the complainant's assignor was not the first inventor of the ruffle claimed.

Upon either or both grounds, therefore, the bill of complaint must be dismissed.

[For another case involving this patent, see Wooster v. Blake, 23 Fed. 49.]

Case No. 18,036.

WOOSTER v. CRANE et al.

[5 Blatchf. 282; 1 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 583; Fent. Pat. 19.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 7, 1865.

PATENT FOR REEL DESIGN—VALIDITY.

Under the eleventh section of the act of March 2, 1861 (12 Stat. 248), a patent for a design for a reel, consisting of the making of the reel in the shape of a well known mathematical figure, the reel itself, as an article of manufacture, being old, is not valid.

[Cited in Perry v. Starrett, Case No. 11,012; Western Electric Manuf'g Co. v. Odell, 18 Fed. 322; Foster v. Crossin, 44 Fed. 64.]

This was a final hearing in equity, on a bill [by Emma C. Wooster against Jason Crane and others] founded on letters patent, issued October 20, 1863, for a design for a reel to contain ruffles, ladies' dress trimmings and other goods, and consisting of two parallel discs of pasteboard connected by four bits of wood, on which the ruffle was wound between two pasteboard sides. The pasteboard was cut in the form of a rhombus with the angles rounded, and what the patentee claimed was "the design and configuration of the reel."

Thomas P. How, for plaintiff.

Samuel T. Freeman, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The statute relied on, as giving to the plaintiff the right sought to be enforced, is the eleventh section of the act of March 2, 1861 (12 Stat. 248), which provides "that any citizen or citizens, or alien or aliens, having resided one year in the United States, and taken the oath of his or their intention to become a citizen or citizens, who, by his, her, or their own industry, genius, efforts and expense, may have invented or produced any new and original design, or a manufacture, whether of metal or other material, * * * or any new and useful pattern or print or picture, to be either worked into or worked on, or printed, or painted, or cast, or otherwise fixed on, any article of manufacture, or any new and original shape or configuration of any article of manufacture not known or used by others before his, her or their invention or production thereof, and prior to the time of his, her or their application for a patent therefor, and who shall desire to obtain an exclusive property or right therein to make, use and sell and vend the same, or copies of the same, to others, by them to be made, used and sold, may make application in writing to the commissioner of patents, expressing such desire, and the commissioner, on due proceedings had, may grant a patent therefor, as in the case now of application for a patent."

I am not aware that any judicial construction has been given to this section. No authorities were cited on either side, showing any adjudication upon the question involved. There seems to me, however, little doubt as to what should be the construction to be put upon it, when sought to be applied to a case like the present. In this case, the reel itself, as an article of manufacture, is conceded to be old, and not the subject of a patent. The shape applied to it by the plaintiff is, also, an old, well-known mathematical figure. Now, although it does not appear that any person ever applied this particular shape to this particular article, I cannot think that the act was intended to secure to the plaintiff an exclusive right to use this well-known figure in the manufacture of reels. The act, although it does not require utility in order to secure the benefit of its provisions, does require that the shape produced shall be the result of industry, genius, efforts and expense, and must, also, I think, be held to require that the shape or configuration sought to be secured, shall, at least, be new and original, as applied to articles of manufacture. But here the shape is a common one in many articles of manufacture, and its application to a reel cannot be said to be the result of industry, genius, efforts and expense. No advantage whatever is pretended to be derived from the adoption of the form selected by the plaintiff, except the incidental one of using it as a trademark. Its selection can hardly be said to be the result even of effort. It was simply an arbitrary, chance selection of many well-known shapes, all equally well adapted to the purpose. To hold that such an application of a common form can be secured by letters patent, would be giving to the act of 1861 a construction broader than I am willing to give to it.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The decree must, therefore, be for the defendant.

Case No. 18,037.

WOOSTER v. HOWE MACH. CO.

[4 Ban. & A. 319; 1 16 O. G. 314.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 24, 1879.

EQUITY PRACTICE—INJUNCTION.

Where a complainant moves for an injunction, and it is denied on defects pointed out, it is too late to renew his motion, on papers designed to cure such defects, if he wait until after the defendant has closed his proofs for final hearing.

[This was a suit by George H. Wooster against the Howe Machine Company. On motion for injunction.]

Frederic H. Betts, for complainant.

Benjamin F. Lee, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This suit, like the suits against Thornton, Blake, and

¹ [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Handy, is, so far as the Johnston ruffler is concerned, substantially a suit against the Johnston Ruffler Company, as the four suits are all defended by that company. The fact that since the motions for injunctions in the suits against Thornton and Blake were denied, and before the present motion in this suit was brought, the proofs for final hearing on the part of the defendants in the Thornton and Blake suits were taken and the cases made ready for final hearing, so far as the defendants are concerned, is a sufficient reason for not now granting the motion for a preliminary injunction. Where a plaintiff moves for an injunction, and it is denied on defects pointed out, it is too late for him to wait until after the defendant has closed his proofs for final hearing, before renewing his motion, on papers designed to cure such defects. This view requires that the present motion be denied, without considering the question whether such defects are now cured.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Wooster v. Blake, 8 Fed. 429.]

WOOSTER (McKAY v.). See Case No. 8, 847.

Case No. 18,038.

WOOSTER v. MARKS et al.

[17 Blatchf. 368; 1 5 Ban. & A. 56; 9 Reporter, 201.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 22, 1879.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT.

A man worked for the defendants by the piece, in the defendants' manufactory, and there used, in the defendants' business, folding guides, his own property, which infringed the plaintiff's patent. Held, in a suit in equity, that the defendants had infringed the patent.

[This was a bill in equity by George H. Wooster against Marcus Marks and others to enjoin the infringement of a patent.]

Frederic H. Betts, for complainant.
William A. Coursen, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. Folding guides, for which the orator has a patent, have been used in the defendants' manufactory. The only question in this case is, whether they have been so used there as that the defendants are themselves liable for the infringement. They were procured and used by a man, whom one of the defendants, in his testimony, calls "our man," and who worked for them there and was paid for his labor by the piece, furnishing his own tools of this sort. They knew of this use of the guides, but not that they were patented, and stopped the use when they were informed of that fact. Under these circumstances, he was using the guides for them, in their business. The mode of payment made it none the less so; and they, at least, participated in the tort which constituted the infringement. An action at law would lie for this participation, and this bill in equity, which rests upon the same foundation, although, in some respects, for different relief, will lie also. The question is not at all as to the extent of infringement, but only as to the fact of infringement at all. Upon the evidence as to that, although it was fairly debatable, it is found that the defendants have infringed to some extent.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, reprinted in 5 Ban. & A. 56, and here republished by permission.]

Let a decree be entered for an injunction and an account, according to the prayer of the bill, with costs.

Case No. 18,039.

WOOSTER v. SIDENBERG et al.

[13 Blatchf. 88; 10 O. G. 244; 2 Ban. & A. 91.]¹
Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 3, 1875.

EXTENSION OF PATENT—RIGHTS OF LICENSEE.

W., during the first term of a patent for a folding guide for sewing machines, and while he was the sole owner of such patent, and was also interested in the sale of certain sewing machines, publicly authorized all purchasers of such sewing machines to use such folding guides without compensation. S. owned and used, during such first term, 125 of such sewing machines, and owned and was using, when such first term expired, 56 of such folding guides. The patent was extended. Held, that S. had a right to continue to use, during the extended term, such identical 56 folding guides.

[Cited in Black v. Hubbard, Case No. 1,460. American Tube Works v. Bridgewater Iron Co., 26 Fed. 336.]

In equity.

Frederic H. Betts and William D. Shipman, for plaintiff.

Solomon J. Gordon, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity [by George H. Wooster] praying for an injunction and an account, and is founded upon letters patent for a folding guide for sewing machines. The patent was issued to Alexander Douglas, on October 5, 1858, and was extended for seven years from October 5, 1872. In August, 1863, said Douglas conveyed an undivided half part of said patent to Samuel S. Sherwood. Douglas and Sherwood conveyed the patent to Nathaniel Wheeler and William Whiley, partners by the name of Wheeler & Co., on May 5, 1864, and said Whiley conveyed his interest therein to said Wheeler on May 29, 1868. The assignments to Sherwood and to Wheeler & Co. were respectively for the unexpired portion of the original term of the patent. In September, 1872, Mr. Douglas, the patentee, assigned all his interest in the invention and letters patent to the complainant to whom, as assignee, the patent was reissued on December 10, 1872.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The answer of the defendants admits the grant, extension and reissue of the patent, denies the novelty of the alleged invention, and further alleges, that, at the time the bill was filed, the defendants "had in use fifty binders, substantially such as are described in the reissue, and no more, all of which binders they had in lawful use at the expiration of the original term of said patent, which lawful use they acquired in three independent ways"—First, by a license, in 1863, from Douglas and Sherwood to Gustavus Sidenberg; second, by a free license from Nathaniel Wheeler to all users of Wheeler & Wilson sewing machines; third, by a dedication of the patent to the public, by Douglas, the patentee. Upon the trial, the validity of the patent was admitted, and the defendants solely relied upon the right which they had obtained by the two licenses, to continue the use of those binders which were in use at the expiration of the original term of the patent.

The defendants commenced business as manufacturers of ladies' linen collars and similar articles, about January 1, 1863. On October 5, 1863, Gustavus Sidenberg obtained a license from Douglas and Sherwood to use the folding guide for which Douglas had obtained a patent. By the provisions of this license, the licensee agreed to pay, in addition to his original payment of fifty dollars, the sum of five dollars for each guide which he should use, and, if he used, at any time, any guide without having first paid said five dollars, as an additional compensation for the right to use the same, the license should be null and void, and the licensee should also be deemed guilty of infringing said patent. Gustavus Sidenberg paid Douglas and Sherwood fifty-five dollars, on or about October 5, 1863. Nothing more was paid to them, or their assignees, by either of the defendants. On October 5, 1872, the defendants were using in their factory fifty-six Douglas guides, of which number forty-six had been made by William Pries, an employee of the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company, and ten had been made by William Brockmann, an employee of the defendants. The guides which Brockmann made were destroyed in a few days after the date of the reissue. Prior to 1864, Nathaniel Wheeler was president of the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company, a corporation for the manufacture of sewing machines, and, in May, 1864, the firm of Wheeler & Co., of which he was a member, became the owner of the Douglas patent. During his ownership of this patent, he authorized all persons who used the Wheeler & Wilson machine to use the Douglas guide, whenever they had occasion to do so, without compensation. The patent was apparently held by Wheeler & Co. for the benefit of the Wheeler & Wilson Company, and to promote its interests, and, with that object in view, Mr. Wheeler gave a parol and general authority to all users of the Wheeler & Wilson machines to procure, use and continue to use the Douglas attachment, if they chose so to do. The complainant urged, upon the trial, that this permission of Mr. Wheeler was limited to a permission to the owners of Wheeler & Wilson machines, to obtain, without royalty, the Douglas guide from some one of the employees of the company. It is true, that, upon cross-examination, in reply to the following question, "You say, in your direct examination, that you authorized those using the Wheeler & Wilson machine to use said patent, whenever they had occasion to do so, without compensation. Can you name any person to whom you gave such permission? If so, name all you can remember,"—Mr. Wheeler said, "I gave permission to the employees of our company to make the binders, on their own account, for such customers using our machines as might require them. I cannot call to mind the names of any such customers at this time." I do not understand from this portion of Mr. Wheeler's testimony, that he intended to say that he confined the use of the patent to those customers only who should procure the guides from the employees of the Wheeler & Wilson Company. He had previously said that all those who used the machines had authority to use the guides, and, upon being requested to give the names of all persons to whom he had given such permission, replied that he could not recall the names of the customers, but he did remember that he specifically permitted the employees of the company to make binders for all such customers as might require them. The witness did not intend to restrict the comprehensive character of the language which he had previously used. The defendants owned and were using in their business prior to October 5, 1872, about one hundred and twenty-five Wheeler & Wilson sewing machines.

The material question, which arises upon the foregoing facts, is, have the defendants a right, by virtue of the authority conferred by Mr. Wheeler, to continue the use of the guides which were in use at the expiration of the original term of the patent?

The license of Douglas and Sherwood affords the defendants no protection. By the terms of that license, they had a right to use only such guides as had been previously paid for, and, in respect to the use of all other guides, had declared themselves to be infringers. They had paid Douglas and Sherwood for one binder only, and were in the lawful use under those licensors, of no binder except the one for which they had paid. The right to use additional binders never existed. Steam Cutter Co. v. Sheldon [Case No. 13,331].

But, the right of the defendants which was obtained through Mr. Wheeler is of a different character. He had publicly authorized all purchasers of the sewing machines in the sale of which he was interested, to use these guides without compensation. The consideration which moved him to give this permission was one with which he was satisfied. Prior to the date of the expiration of the original term, he would not have been allowed to prevent the defendants from the use of the binders which they had theretofore purchased. Probably all the guides which they then had in their possession were made after the assignment to Wheeler & Co., and, if a few were in existence prior to that date, the use of these few, which was originally unlawful, had become lawful by the license of Mr. Wheeler, the assignee.

But, it is said, that, admitting that Mr. Wheeler could not have stopped the use of those fifty-six binders, it does not follow that the defendants have the right to their continuing use after the expiration of the original term of the patent, for the following reasons: The statute (section 4928, Rev. St. U. S.) provides, that "the benefit of the extension of a patent shall extend to the assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented, to the extent of their interest therein," and the right granted by Mr. Wheeler was a mere license, and neither an assignment nor a grant, within the meaning of this section, nor a sale of the binders, and a party seeking the protection of the act must be a purchaser of the patented article, or be protected by some agreement of sale which the owner of the original patent had a right to make, who, in this case, had not a right to license the use of the binder during the extended term.

The supreme court had occasion, in Mitchell v. Hawley, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 544, to consider this clause of the patent act, and to point out the "distinction between the grant of the right to make and vend the patented machine, and the grant of the right to use it." They say: "A patentee, when he has himself constructed a machine, and sold it, without any conditions, or authorized another to construct, sell, and deliver it, or to construct, and use, and operate it, without any conditions, and the consideration has been paid to him for the thing patented, the rule is well established, that the patentee must be understood to have parted, to that extent, with all his exclusive right; and that he ceases to have any interest whatever in the patented machine so sold and delivered, or authorized to be constructed and operated. Where such circumstances appear, the owner of the machine, whether he built it or purchased it, if he has also acquired the right to use and operate it during the lifetime of the patent, may continue to use it until it is worn out, in spite of any and every extension subsequently obtained by the patentee, or his assigns." Mr. Wheeler had authorized these defendants, being customers of the Wheeler & Wilson Company, to construct, and use, and operate, without any conditions, fifty-six binders. The consideration for this grant was paid to the owner of the patent by the purchase of Wheeler & Wilson sewing-machines. The defendants thus became owners of the guides which they used, and, by such ownership, and the right which they acquired from Mr. Wheeler, they acquired the right to use and operate the machines until they were worn out. They were not simply licensees of the right to use a machine of which they were not the owners, but the machines had become their "private, individual property." "Complete title to the implement or machine purchased becomes vested in the vendee by the sale and purchase, but he acquires no portion of the franchise, as the machine, when it rightfully passes from the patentee to the purchaser, ceases to be within the limits of the monopoly." Mitchell v. Hawley, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 548.

I perceive no substantial difference between the case of these defendants and the case of the complainant against Gilmour, which was an application for a temporary injunction against the use of certain Douglas guides, and was decided by Judge Blatchford, April 29, 1873. Gilmour, prior to the expiration of the original term, was in the use of four Douglas guides, upon as many Wheeler & Wilson sewing-machines. It is true, that Mr. Wheeler's affidavit in the Gilmour case contained a more detailed statement of the character and extent of the license, than was given in his deposition in the present case; but the facts which he stated are the same in each case. In the Gilmour affidavit he says: "I intended that all patrons of the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company should be at liberty to make and use Douglas binders whenever and wherever they wished, without charge or liability of any kind, to anybody. * * * All parties were told to make their own binders. I permitted the employees of the company, for the convenience of parties using Wheeler & Wilson machines, to make Douglas binders for them, and retain to themselves the prices paid. Full liberty and license was given all persons using Wheeler & Wilson machines, to use, in their business, without charge, all the Douglas binders they had in use when I became an owner in the Douglas patent before named, and to procure where they pleased, and continue to use, until worn out, all additional Douglas binders that their business required." Upon these facts, Judge Blatchford held, that, "within the principle laid down in Wyeth v. Stone [Case No. 18,107], it is quite clear, that, as against Wheeler, who was the sole owner of the Douglas patent for more than four years before it expired, the defendant was in the lawful use, before and at the time the first term of the patent expired, of the four binders he was using when such first term expired. Wheeler could not have been heard to stop the defendant from the use of such four binders. The defendant was, within the meaning of the sixty-seventh section of the act of July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. 209), a grantee of the right to use such four binders, and, therefore, has a right to use, until they are worn out, the identical four binders which he was using when the first term of the patent expired. As to all other binders, the injunction is granted."

After the réissue, and before the filing of the bill, the defendants caused to be made, and used in their business, from fifteen to eighteen

"two-line" binders, which were supposed not to have been included in the reissue. Upon ascertaining that these binders were Douglas binders, the defendants caused them to be destroyed, in March or April, 1873. For the use of these binders the defendants are liable.

Let there be a decree, without costs, for an account of damages and profits for the use of these last named binders prior to their destruction, and an injunction against the use of binders described in the reissued patent, other than the identical forty-six binders which are now in lawful use.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Wooster v. Taylor, Case No. 18,040.]

Case No. 18,039a.

WOOSTER v. SINGER MANUF'G CO.

[15 Reporter, 524; 1 23 O. G. 2513.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 10, 1883.

PATENTS—REVOCAION OF LICENSE—SUIT FOR INFRINGEMENT—COVENANT NOT TO CONTEST.

The defendant took a license from plaintiff and agreed not to contest the validity of the patent. Subsequently plaintiff revoked the license and sued defendant as an infringer. Held, that the commonly expressed judicial opinion is that in such a case the defendant is at liberty to avail himself of any defence ordinarily open to any defendant who is charged with infringement.

Bill in equity founded upon infringement of letters patent. Defendant pleaded a license to make and sell the articles embodying the inventions described in the patent. In the agreement for a license defendant covenanted that it would not contest the validity of the patents. Plaintiff revoked the license on account of defendant's breach of the conditions of the agreement. Defendant since that time has sold articles which embodied the inventions described in the letters patent and has kept them in stock for sale.

F. H. Betts, for plaintiff.

B. F. Lee and J. F. Dillon, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

² [There are two corporations, each called the "Singer Manufacturing Company,"—one, a joint stock corporation, incorporated in 1863, and located in the city of New York; the other, incorporated in 1873 by the legislature of the state of New Jersey, and a citizen of that state. Mr. George Ross McKenzie, general manager of the New Jersey corporation, testifies that that company was an incorporation of the same persons who composed the New York company; that since the organization of the New Jersey company it is the one under which entirely the business of the Singer Manufacturing Company has been done; that all the property of the New York corporation has been transferred to the other company; that the officers of each company are the same; and that the principal financial office of the New Jersey corporation is at the same place in New York City where the office of the New York corporation was before the new company was formed. The New York company has a distinct legal existence, and is apparently a legal person, and these two corporations have not become a unit; but the property which was formerly owned, and the business which was formerly done, by the old corporation have been transferred to the new organization.

[On July 2, 1875, the plaintiff, who was about to apply for the two reissues which were afterward obtained, and which are the subject of this bill, entered into two written agreements with the New Jersey corporation for licenses when the reissues should be granted. These agreements were evidently intended to be memorandum agreements, and to be the basis upon which formal licenses, "with the usual clauses, and provisions of licenses of such character," were to be subsequently drawn, and such formal licenses were to be the fulfillment of the preliminary agreements.

[On October 8, 1875, and after the reissued letters patent had been issued, a carefully drawn agreement of license (which was the completed contract contemplated by the agreements of July 2) was entered into between the plaintiff and the New Jersey corporation. The seal of the New York corporation was attached to this agreement, I presume, by inadvertence, for the testimony of Mr. McKenzie, and the fact that the agreements of July 2 were undoubtedly with the New Jersey corporation, leave, in my mind, no room for doubt that the agreement of October 8 was in fact with the same corporation.

[Great stress is laid by the defendant upon the testimony of the plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, that he had never granted licenses to the New Jersey corporation, and upon the change of front which the plaintiff's counsel made after the testimony had been taken. It is evident that, until Mr. McKenzie testified, the relations between the two corporations and the fact that the younger corporation alone was in active business, were not well understood by the plaintiff and Mr. Comstock, his attorney, and it may very well be that Mr. Wooster supposed that he could properly say that his contracts were with the New York corporation; but Mr. McKenzie's knowledge of the part which that company had in the business which was done under the name of the "Singer Manufacturing Company" must be much more intimate than that of any other person, and his testimony is convincing that the New Jersey corporation was the licensee.

[In the contract of October 8, 1875, the defendant admitted the "force and validity of said letters patent, and all reissues thereof," and covenanted that it would not contest, not aid, or assist, or advise others to contest, in law or equity, the validity of said patents, or any reissue thereof. It was also provided that, "upon the failure of the party of the second part at any time faithfully to carry out and perform any or either" of the conditions of the contract, the plaintiff could revoke and annul the agreement, in which case the agreement, and all right and privileges of the defendant, should cease and determine.

¹ [Reprinted from 15 Reporter, 524, by permission.]

² [From 23 O. G. 2513.]

[On November 28, 1879, the plaintiff, on account of the defendant's breach of the conditions of this agreement, revoked and annulled the license, and gave written notice of this revocation to the defendant. Since November 28, 1879, the defendant has sold articles which embodied the inventions, and described and claimed in said letters patent, and has kept such articles in stock for sale. No examination was had in regard to the infringement, and I suppose that that fact is conceded.]²

The plea must be overruled, but an important question which has been discussed in the elaborate briefs of counsel is whether the customary permission to answer shall be granted with or without restrictions upon the contents of the answer. The defendant was a licensee of sundry patents, and by its contract of license has bound itself not to contest the validity of the named patents or of any reissue thereof, and had enjoyed the benefit of the license for a time. The plaintiff revoked the license on account of the defendant's breach of its agreements therein, and now sues the licensee as a naked infringer. The point is whether, such facts appearing on the record, the defendant is remitted to all its former rights, and, being sued as an infringer, can defend as an ordinary infringer. I have heretofore shared the doubts which are expressed by Mr. Curtis (Curt. Pat. 4th Ed.) whether the language of Justice Nelson in Woodworth v. Cook [Case No. 18,011] is to be understood as deciding that a defendant, who had made a definite agreement in his contract of license not to contest the validity of the patent, was, when sued as an infringer after a revocation of the license, remitted to all the rights which he enjoyed before the license, and have doubted, when the fact of a license and of a covenant not to deny the validity of the patent and of an enjoyment of the benefit of the license were found by the court to exist, whether the defendant was in a proper position to deny the validity of the patent. But the more commonly expressed and presumably therefore better judicial opinion is to the effect that when the license has been revoked by the plaintiff and the bill treats the defendant as a naked infringer, he is at liberty to avail himself of any defence ordinarily open to any defendant who is charged with infringement.

² [From 23 O. G. 2513.]

Burr v. Duryee [Id. 2,190]; Pelham v. Edelmeyer, 15 Fed. 262; White v. Lee, 14 Fed. 789. I have, therefore, contrary to the opinion expressed after the hearing, determined to draw the decretal part of the order in the ordinary form, without deciding either in favor of or against the claim of the plaintiff, that the answer ought not to contest the validity of the patent, so as to have the question of the extent of the defendant's answer to be decided upon a motion or hearing in which the question shall be directly at issue. Ordered accordingly.

Case No. 18,040.

WOOSTER v. TAYLOR et al.

[12 Blatchf. 384; 1 Ban. & A. 594; 8 O. G. 644.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 19, 1874.

PATENT FOR INVENTION—ACCEPTANCE OF LICENSE
—ESTOPPEL TO ATTACK PATENT.

1. A patent was extended, and assigned, as extended, to W., who entered into an agreement in writing, under seal, with T., which set forth that T. was "desirous of obtaining" a license to use the improvements covered by the patent, to the extent of the use of the article necessary to his business, and that, in consideration of the performance by T. of the covenants in the agreement, W. granted to T. the license to use the improvement to said extent for one year, at a specified place, "and not longer, otherwise or elsewhere, without written permission of W., and that T. agreed to pay a specified patent fee, and to stamp each article with the dates of the patent and of the extension, and the words "Licensed to T. only," and that W. might revoke the license on the failure of T. to perform any of said conditions, in which case it should cease, and that the license was a personal privilege to T. and no right to use the article should, under it, be vested in any purchaser or user of it, other than T. After the expiration of the one year, T. continued to use 19 of the articles, claiming that he had them lawfully in use at the expiration of the first term of the patent, and that, by virtue of section 67 of the act of July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. 209), he had a right to continue the use of them so long as they remained capable of use. W., on bill filed, applied for an injunction to restrain such use. Held, that, as T. knew all the facts relied on, when the first term expired, and when such license was given, under the extension, he waived, by taking such license, any rights which he then had to use the 19 articles; that a mistake of the law could not avail to destroy the force of the covenants in the license; that, although the term of the license had expired, T. was bound and estopped by the recitals and covenants in it; and that the injunction must be granted.

2. As the license was granted at a nominal sum, for special reasons, it would be inequitable to allow T. to evade the force of the terms of the license, when he did not set up, at the time it was granted, any then existing right to use the article.

[This was a bill in equity by George H. Wooster against Edmund W. Taylor, Jr., and Margaret Woodbury, to enjoin the infringement of letters patent No. 21,659, granted to

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

A. Douglas October 5, 1858, and reissued December 10, 1872,—No. 5,180.]

William D. Shipman and Frederic H. Betts, for plaintiff.

L. E. Chittenden, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The plaintiff is the owner of reissued letters patent granted to him, December 10, 1872, for an "improvement in folding guides for sewing machines." The original patent was granted to Alexander Douglas, as inventor, October 5, 1858, and was extended to him for seven years from October 5, 1872. The patent, as extended, was assigned to the plaintiff, and the reissue was granted to him, as assignee. The plaintiff now applies for a preliminary injunction to restrain the defendants from using folding guides, or binders for sewing machines, in violation of the patent.

The defendants have nineteen of such guides which embody the invention covered by the patent. They claim the right to continue their use, on the alleged ground that the nineteen guides were lawfully in use when the first term of the patent expired. The lawful use set up is an alleged verbal permission or license given by Douglas, the inventor, during the first term, in pursuance of which it is claimed the nineteen guides were made and put into use. The giving of the permission is denied, and it is further claimed on the part of the plaintiff, that, at the time when the permission is alleged to have been first given, and during all the time thereafter until the expiration of the first term, the title to the patent for the first term had passed out of Douglas, and was held by one Wheeler, so as to make such permission invalid for want of power in Douglas to grant it. But, in the view I take of the case, it is not necessary to consider any questions arising out of the foregoing matters, for the reason that another aspect of the case is controlling against the defendants.

The right to use, set up by the defendants, is claimed, as matter of law, under the provision of section 67 of the act of July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. 209), which declares, that "the benefit of the extension of a patent shall extend to the assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented, to the extent of their interest therein." The alleged facts set up as constituting a lawful use of the nineteen guides at the time the first term of the patent expired, were known to the defendants at the time such first term expired. After the extension had been granted, and after the patent, as extended, had been assigned to the plaintiff, an agreement in writing, under seal, was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants. This instrument, which is dated October 5, 1872, after reciting the granting of the patent, and its extension, and its assignment to the plaintiff, sets forth, that the defendants "are desirous of obtaining a license to use the improvement secured by said letters patent, to the extent of the use of binders necessary to their business," and that the plaintiff, "for and in consideration, and in case of, the due and faithful keeping and performing of each and all of the conditions, agreements and admissions hereinafter contained to be kept and performed by the" defendants, has granted to the defendants the license "to use the said improvement to said extent, for and during the space of one year from the date hereof, at their place of business, No. 55 Hudson street, in the city of New York, and not longer, otherwise or elsewhere, without written permission of" the plaintiff. The instrument then proceeds to say, that the defendants agree to pay to the plaintiff, as a patent fee, the sum of $100, and agree to stamp on each folding guide used, the words: "Patented October 5, 1858; extended September 24, 1872; licensed to Taylor & Woodbury only." There are agreements by the defendants not to contest the validity of the patent, and not to refuse to pay the license fee, although other parties contest the patent, and then the instrument provides, that, on the failure of the defendants to perform any of said conditions and promises, the plaintiff may revoke and annul the license, "in which case, this license, and all rights and privileges hereunder, shall forever cease and determine." The instrument further provides, that the license is "to be considered solely as a personal privilege" to the defendants, "and no folding guide licensed hereunder is to be considered as lawfully made, so as to vest any property for sale of the same in the user, or so as to permit the said guide to be transferred, so as to vest in the purchaser or user other than" the defendants "any right to use the same."

It is contended for the defendants, that the taking of this license to use an unlimited number of guides for one year was no waiver of any right which they had, because the license was taken under a mistake of law, they not having at that time been advised that they could set up, in law, the right to use which they now set up, and because the license covered more guides than the nineteen then in use; and that, when the license expired, the defendants were remitted to all rights which they had at the time the license was taken.

These views, it seems to me, are not sound. On the contrary, whatever rights the defendants had, when they took the license, in respect of the further use of the guides, they waived and surrendered by taking the license, containing the provisions it does contain. The defendants expressly show that they have never used any guides but the identical nineteen. The license sets forth that they are desirous of obtaining a license to use the invention patented, to the extent of the use necessary to their business, which includes the further use of the nineteen guides. This is inconsistent with their then having a right to use the nineteen, without the new license. The license is not limited to guides in excess of the nineteen. Then, the license is to use the guides to the necessary extent (and which necessity is shown to have extended to the use of no greater number than the nineteen), for one year "and not longer" or otherwise, without written permission of the plaintiff, and the keeping of the agreements made by the defendants is declared to be the consideration and condition of the granting of the license by the plaintiff. Then, each one of the guides used (which includes the nineteen) is to be stamped as "licensed," and the form of stamp given means a license under the extension and a license under such written license. The further provisions of the license, as before recited, confirm this view. No mistake of fact is alleged nor any fraud on the part of the plaintiff. Mistake of law furnishes no ground for escaping the force of the covenants in the license. Although the term of the license has expired, the recitals and covenants in it bind and estop the defendants. One of those covenants is, that, in consideration of the license for one year, the guides are to be used for no longer than one year.

It appears, by an endorsement on the license, and it is shown to be the fact, that the license was granted for the sum of $100, as a nominal sum, at the special request of Douglas, and that such sum was not to be considered as a sum to govern the price of any other license. The defendants not having set up, when the license was granted, any existing right to use the nineteen guides, and the plaintiff having licensed such nineteen guides for a nominal sum, for a special reason, it would be inequitable to allow the defendants to evade the force of the terms of the license, for the plaintiff has allowed them to enjoy for one year, without molestation and for a nominal sum, the use of the nineteen guides, when it is manifest that he would not have allowed such use under the claim now set up, without resistance.

The motion for an injunction must be granted.

[For subsequent proceedings, see Case No. 18,041. For other cases involving this patent, see Wooster v. Seidenberger, Case No. 18,039; Thomson v. Wooster, 114 U. S. 104, 5 Sup. Ct. 788.]

Case No. 18,041.

WOOSTER v. TAYLOR et al.

[14 Blatchf. 403; 3 Ban. & A. 241.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 15, 1878.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT—RECOVERY OF PROFITS.

Where the profits made by a defendant from the unlawful use of a patented invention amount to more than the license fees for such use would amount to, the plaintiff, although exercising his monopoly by the granting of licenses, is entitled to recover such profits, on an accounting for profits, and is not limited to such license fees.

[This was a bill in equity by George H. Wooster against Edmund W. Taylor, Jr., and Margaret Woodbury, to enjoin the infringement of letters patent No. 21,659, granted to A. Douglas October 5, 1858, and reissued December 10, 1872,—No. 5,180. The motion for an injunction was granted (Case No. 18,040), and the cause is now heard on exceptions to the master's report.]

Frederic H. Betts, for plaintiff.

James M. Townsend, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. This cause has been heard on report and supplemental report of the master filed therein, exceptions thereto and argument of counsel. The reports show that the orator does not manufacture or sell his patented articles, but relies on license fees for his income from his patent; that such license fees, for the unlicensed use made by the defendants, paid at the beginning of each year, according to his rule, would amount to fourteen hundred dollars; that they were stopped soon after the commencement of the second year, by an injunction issued in this cause, on motion of the orator; and that the profits actually realized by the defendants, from the use they had, amounted to nineteen hundred sixteen dollars and twenty-eight cents. Among other exceptions, the defendants have filed some that raise the question whether the orator is entitled to recover anything beyond the amount of what his license fees would have been; and, if not, whether those should not be apportioned to the time they were suffered to use the invention. No other exceptions, besides those raising these questions, are insisted upon.

If the defendants had yielded to the orator's claims, and taken and paid for the licenses, the profits realized would have been theirs, and the orator would have had no just claim upon them. As they did not, the use they had of the invention was not theirs, but was the orator's, and what they realized from it, by force of the law, became his, and was not their own. By the express provision of the statute on this subject, the plaintiff is "entitled to recover, in addition to the profits to be accounted for by the defendant," the damages sustained by the infringement. Rev. St. U. S. § 4921. This shows, that, in contemplation of law, the profits actually realized by the infringer belong to the patentee, and, that, when the profits would not compensate for the damages sustained, as they might not, in many cases, he is entitled to the damages beyond.

When it comes to the measure of damages, as distinguished from profits, in cases like this, the loss of the license fees might be the limit of the patentee's loss. But they are not, in any such case, the measure or limit of the infringer's gain. So, on many questions of damages strictly such, the license fees are evidence of damage, and, sometimes, the limit of recovery of damages, but cannot be evidence, and, much more, not a limit, of profits to be accounted for.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

If the question of damages beyond profits was reached, and of any importance, it may be that the stoppage of the use of the patent by the injunction would make an apportionment of the license fees lawful and proper. But, as the profits exceed the damages, in any mode of reckoning the license fees, it is not necessary to consider the question made in that respect.

The exceptions are overruled, and the reports accepted and confirmed for the larger sum.

WOOTEN (VINING v.). See Case No. 16,949.

Case No. 18,042.

WOPE et al. v. HEMENWAY.

[1 Spr. 300; 1 18 Law Rep. 390.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. July, 1855.²

SHIPPING ARTICLES—CONSTRUCTION—DESCRIPTION OF VOYAGE—IMPRISONMENT OF SEAMEN.

1. If a clause in shipping articles is ambiguous, or susceptible of two constructions, one favorable and the other unfavorable to the seamen, the construction favorable to the seamen shall be adopted, it not being their fault that the owners did not make the articles clear.

[Cited in Goodrich v. The Domingo, Case No. 5,543; The Quintero, Case No. 11,517; The Samuel Ober, 15 Fed. 622.]

2. In a shipping paper, the words, "voyage from Boston to Valparaiso or other parts of the Pacific Ocean, at and from thence home direct, or via ports in East Indies or Europe," do not describe a voyage with sufficient certainty within the United States statutes, for the protection of seamen, and do not bind the seamen to service after arrival at Valparaiso.

[Cited in The Gem, Case No. 5,304.]

3. If seamen, from an honest mistake of their right to a discharge, peacefully refuse labor, it will not justify their imprisonment on shore.

³ [This was a case for seamen's wages. Libellants were respectable men, natives of Sweden, were going to California, and had partly engaged a direct passage to San Francisco. A shipping master from Mr. Hemenway called at their boarding house in Boston, and offered them wages to go to Valparaiso in the ship Loo Choo, as seamen. He told them they had better earn wages to Valparaiso, and they could always easily get a passage from Valparaiso to San Francisco. Libellants went and looked at the ship and her accommodations, and after conferring together, concluded to go in her. Upon returning to the boarding house, the shipping master produced the shipping paper for them to sign. The men hesitated, and refused to sign unless a stipulation should be put in that they should be discharged upon arrival at Valparaiso. The shipping master told them that they were green; that they would be discharged there. They replied they knew they were green, but they feared difficulty if the articles did not express the agreement. The shipping master then said he would write it in the articles if that would satisfy them, and taking a pen he wrote upon the paper, when they signed it, joined the vessel, and continued on board till her arrival at Valparaiso. In the meantime, there was mutual good feeling and satisfaction in every particular between the officers and these men. Having moored the ship, and made everything snug on board in the harbor of Valparaiso, they packed up their clothes, dressed themselves, and asked (as the chief mate said) respectfully to be discharged and paid off. The captain refused to discharge them. They reminded him that such was their agreement, and referred him to the articles. The captain produced the articles, and the seamen pointed out to him the clause (against these six seamen's names) to which they had alluded, which was discovered to read thus: "Monthly 14, and to have $15 if he perform the voyage and return in the ship to Boston." But the captain finally decided that he would not discharge them. The seamen asked to see the consul. The captain went and brought to them the consul's clerk, the consul being absent, who read the articles to the men; and when he came to this clause he said, "Captain, I can do nothing with these men; you have got two rates of wages in the alternative on your articles." Yet, he said, the captain had power to discharge them if he would. After declining to do anything officially, he told the men they had better continue with the ship; but they refused, and the captain refused to discharge them. The clerk then asked the captain if he could be of any service to him, and what he was going to do with the men, and the captain asked the clerk to get them put in prison for him. The seamen, persisting in refusing further duty on board, were committed to prison without being allowed to take any change of clothes. They were kept in prison thirty-five days,—one day each in solitary confinement in separate cells, and thirty-four days in a prison room about thirty feet long and twenty feet wide, having two grating windows, besides a grating door, its only passage for air and light. Here they were incarcerated thirty-four days, in company with all sorts of criminals, afflicted with various and loathsome diseases, numbering never less than one hundred, and part of the time over two hundred, crowded into the same room so thickly as to be unable part of the time to lie down, and having no berths, beds, nor bedding. The food consisted of bread,

¹ [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Affirmed in Case No. 13,149.]

³ [From 18 Law Rep. 390.]

and a peculiar mixture of Chili beans, peas, barley, and Chili pepper, etc., mixed up together. Once a day, each morning, each seaman was served with bread, equal to a sea biscuit in quantity, with water, and nothing else. And once a day, each evening, the pepper mixture was served out in little iron kettles, holding about a gallon each. One of these kettles full was allowed to ten prisoners, and nothing else. Nothing to eat with but their hands, nor anything else with which to scoop it out of the kettle. The Chili pepper mixture was perfectly unpalatable to the libellants, who abstained from eating it until they found the allowance of bread alone insufficient to sustain life; and as soon as they did eat the said Chili pepper mixture, all but one of libellants became sick, two of them prostrated with sickness for days, and swelled up, and unable to rise up at all. They were not able to get an interview with the consul while in prison, and no interview with the captain till a day or two before they were taken out, when the captain called for a moment at the grating and spoke to one of them, but left before the others could make their way to the grating. At the expiration of thirty-five days the libellants were taken out of prison, and put on board the vessel. They were then covered with vermin. They asked to see the consul himself, who was then at home, but were refused; and, still refusing to go in the vessel, three of them were put in irons, with arms suspended above a span around a stanchion between decks, and deprived of food about thirty-six hours, when they consented to turn to, and thence they continued faithfully at service until the vessel arrived in Boston, submitting to perform their duty to the entire satisfaction of the officers during the remainder of the voyage. As to the aforesaid clause in the articles on which the seamen relied, as providing for their discharge at Valparaiso, the defendant produced his shipping master, who swore that he wrote that clause in one set of the articles in Mr. Hemenway's office, by the special direction of Mr. Hemenway, and that this was so written on the articles over the seamen's names, after they had signed the same articles, and had gone aboard the vessel. It further appeared in evidence from the articles that the voyage therein described was in these words: "Voyage from Boston to Valparaiso and other ports in the Pacific Ocean, at and from thence home direct or via ports in the East Indies or Europe."³

C. G. Thomas, for libellants.

William Delion, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This is a libel for seamen's wages on a voyage from Boston to Valparaiso and back. That the services were rendered is not denied. But the defendant insists that deduction should be made for the expenses of the imprisonment of the libellants at Valparaiso. The libellants contend that the imprisonment was unlawful, and they present three distinct grounds of illegality: (1) That by the express agreement made at the time they shipped, they were to be discharged at Valparaiso. (2) That the shipping articles do not describe the voyage as required by the laws of the United States, and the master had no right to detain them after arriving at Valparaiso. (3) That even if the master had a right to detain them, he had no right to imprison them on shore, in a foreign country.

1. What was the contract, when these men shipped at Boston? Six witnesses swear positively that the contract was, that the libellants should be discharged at Valparaiso, and that when the shipping articles were signed, they insisted that an entry of that fact should be made upon them, and that the shipping master then wrote something upon the articles, which he said would show their right to such discharge. Against this there is only one witness, the shipping master himself, who denies that there was any such agreement.

In weighing this testimony, it is to be considered that five of the witnesses for the libellants are seamen, having an interest in this question, and swearing for each other; and their testimony is to be closely scrutinized, and received with great caution; but, upon the strictest scrutiny, they have testified with great consistency, with apparent frankness, and more than ordinary intelligence for men of their class. The other witness for the libellants was a landlord, with whom they boarded at the time they shipped. He may have sympathy for the libellants, but does not appear to have any interest to bias his testimony.

The sole witness for the respondent is his agent, the shipping master. His conduct is in question, and his explanation of an entry made by him, on the shipping articles, is not satisfactory. His testimony would not outweigh that of the landlord alone. But, beside this, there are two circumstances that go to corroborate the testimony of the libellants' witnesses.

The first is, that, after having fully and faithfully performed their duty, until the arrival of the ship at Valparaiso, they at once confidently claimed their discharge, as a matter of right, which being refused, they immediately referred to the shipping articles, then in possession of the master, as showing their right to be discharged. These articles they had never seen after they were signed, and yet instantly and confidently appealed to them, as decisive in their favor.

The other circumstance is the unusual entry which is found on the articles, upon their production. These articles were prepared by the shipping master for the officers and the rest of the crew, as well as for the libellants. In the usual column, against the names of the seamen, were the figures "14," as their monthly wages, and opposite to their names, in the blank space, was made this entry: "To have $15 per month, if he performs the voyage in the ship and returns to Boston." That entry is a part of the written contract. It contains a condition, "if he shall perform," &c.

³ [From 18 Law Rep. 390.]

The respondent insists that the contract was absolute. If so, why was this condition written upon the articles? The entry was made by the respondent's agent, in such language as he chose to adopt. It was made for the purpose of satisfying the seamen that they would be discharged at Valparaiso, and if the shipping master did not intend that it should express that right, it was a fraud upon them. He might have made it in language clear and explicit. If he has not done so, but left it ambiguous, the seamen are not to be prejudiced by such ambiguity. Upon the whole evidence, it is satisfactorily shown that the seamen were entitled, by contract, to their discharge at Valparaiso.

2. As to the second ground, viz., the insufficiency of the articles. The description of the voyage is as follows. "From Boston to Valparaiso or other parts of the Pacific Ocean, at and from thence home direct, or via ports in East Indies or Europe."

This description is not sufficiently definite. It gives to the owner and master of the vessel, such a power over the seamen, as is inconsistent with the provisions of the statutes of the United States, intended for their protection; and, for that reason, the seamen would not have been bound by the articles to any service after arriving at Valparaiso. On both these grounds, therefore, any coercion of the master to compel the performance of duty at Valparaiso was illegal.

3. But even if the seamen had mistaken their right, and were bound to perform duty, the master had no right to send them to a prison on shore, and especially to such a prison. These men merely claimed their discharge, and refused further labor, on the ground of right. They did so peacefully and respectfully; there were no threats or intimations of force; if it was necessary to restrain or imprison them, it should have been done on board of the vessel, as it might have been, without danger, and where they would have been under the eye of their own officers. In such case, the law does not allow the master to thrust his men into a foreign jail, and there expose them to all the privations, sufferings, and hazards of disease. Upon all these grounds, the imprisonment of the libellants was unlawful, and they cannot be required to pay the expense of such imprisonment.

Decree for the libellants.

After the decision of the above libel for wages, six suits by the libellants against the master, for the unlawful imprisonment were tried, and an opinion was pronounced by the court in favor of the libellants; and, the defendant having stated that he should take an appeal therefrom, the libellants' counsel said that, as to one of them, he would ask for a decree of only $50, because his client was unable further to litigate, and a decree for that amount only was rendered for that libellant, and an appeal in that case refused. As to the others, the appeal was allowed.

The decree was affirmed upon appeal. See Snow v. Wope [Case No. 13,149]. That any ambiguity, uncertainty or obscurity in the articles, is construed most favorably to the seamen, see Jansen v. The Theodor Heinrich [Id. 7,215]; The Hoghton, 3 Hagg. Adm. 111. As to imprisonment of seamen in foreign gaols, see The Mary [Case No. 17,823]; Gardner v. Bibbins [Id. 5,222.]

WOPE (SNOW v.). See Case No. 13,149.

WORCESTER (DUNKLE v.). See Case No. 4,162.

Case No. 18,043.

WORCESTER et al. v. TRUMAN et al.

[1 McLean, 483.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1839.

BREACH OF INJUNCTION — ENFORCEMENT OF PENALTY.

1. A rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue, for breach of an injunction, is not the mode of proceeding in this court.

[Cited in Fanshawe v. Tracy, Case No. 4,643; U. S. v. Anonymous, 21 Fed. 767.]

[Cited in Hawkins v. State, 126 Ind. 296, 26 N. E. 44.]

2. A motion should be made that the defendant stand committed for a breach of the injunction, and this motion is made on notice being given to the defendant.

3. No notice having been given in this case, the court overruled the motion for an attachment.

Chase & Fox, for complainants.

Wright & Vaughan, for defendants.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. Chase & Fox, who appear for complainants, move for attachment against the defendants, on the ground that they have violated the injunction heretofore granted in this case, restraining the publication of certain school books. The allowance of the injunction at the last term is shown, and also a summons with an order indorsed, enjoining the publication of the works, which was served on the defendants. And several affidavits were read which prove that the publication of the books had been continued after notice of the injunction had been served.

Wright & Vaughan objected to the attachment, because no notice had been served on the defendants of this motion; and they insisted that a rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue is the proper mode of proceeding for a disobedience of the injunction.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

By a rule adopted by the supreme court, to regulate proceedings in chancery, it is provided that "in all cases where the rules prescribed by that court, or by the circuit court do not apply, the practice of the circuit courts shall be regulated by the practice of the high court of chancery in England." No rule has been adopted by this court to regulate this motion, and we must look to the precedents established in the English courts. "The practice in England formerly was that upon affidavit of the service of the injunction, an attachment issued for the breach of it. If the defendant was arrested on the attachment and entered his appearance, and answered interrogatories under oath, &c., if he denied the service of the injunction, it was required to be proved, &c." Har. Ch. Prac. 552. But in Eden on Injunctions, 56, it is stated, that the modern practice where a contempt for a breach of the injunction is charged, is to give notice of a motion, not that the defendant should show cause why he should not be committed; but that he may stand committed for breach of the injunction, which is moved upon affidavit of the service of the injunction.

In the case of Angerstein v. Hunt, 6 Ves. 487, Mr. Romilly, for the plaintiff, moved that the defendant should show cause why he should not stand committed for breach of the injunction, &c. And the lord chancellor said: "It is not the practice in this court for a man to show cause why he should not stand committed. The motion ought to be, that he shall stand committed for breach of the injunction; and it ought to be made upon personal service upon him, that the court will be moved for that purpose. When the injunction is to do a thing, the course is to move for an order that he shall do it by a particular day, or stand committed. But this is not to do a thing. The proper mode therefore will be to serve him with notice, that the court will be moved, that he shall stand committed." And in the case of Schoonmaker v. Gillett, 3 Johns. Ch. 311, on a motion having been made for an attachment to bring up the defendant; the chancellor, on the authority of the above case, and on the due service of the affidavits and notice, ordered that an attachment issue to the sheriff to bring the defendant into court, to answer for the contempt.

On these authorities, it is clear that it is not the English practice to issue a rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue for a breach of the injunction; and it is equally clear the motion that the defendant should stand committed for the contempt is made after personal service of a notice that such motion would be made. The case in Vesey is on the very point, and also the authority in Johnson.

In the present case, this rule has not been observed. No notice whatever has been given to the defendants that the counsel for the plaintiffs would move that they stand committed for a breach of the injunction. Verbal information was communicated to the counsel at Cincinnati, that a motion for an attachment would be made at the present term; and a motion to this effect was entered on the minutes of the court, two days before it was called up and argued. This, although in the nature of a criminal proceeding, is not in fact strictly of that character. It is instituted and carried on by the counsel for the plaintiff, and not, necessarily, by the attorney for the government. The object of the proceeding is, to enforce obedience to the process of the court, by punishing an intentional disregard of it. The mode is summary and rigorous, and the party who thus invokes the aid and power of the court, should bring himself strictly within the rule which entitles him to the redress sought, and subjects the defendant to the punishment which must follow. He must show the allowance of the injunction, that it has been issued on the terms specified and within the limitations imposed. That it has been duly served, and that notice has been given to the defendant, of the time and place of the motion, "that he stand committed for a breach of the injunction." On this motion the court will not investigate the title of the complainants. That was considered on the allowance of the injunction, and will be again investigated on a motion to dissolve, or on the final hearing. But the court will look into the case to ascertain how far the defendants are restrained, and whether the writ of injunction extends beyond the allowance. And there are other points made in the argument which it may be proper to examine, when the defendants shall be properly brought before the court. But until the notice shall be served of the usual motion, for a breach of the injunction, no other question except that of notice is before the court.

Under the circumstances of this case, the court feel bound to consider the preliminary objection of want of notice, as wholly disconnected with the facts and arguments adduced on what may be termed the merits of the motion. In requiring the defendants' counsel to argue the preliminary objections, in connection with the other branch of the case, the court subjected them to no waiver of any legal objection. The appearance of the counsel, therefore, is not a waiver of notice, and such appearance is only considered for the purpose of objecting to the want of notice.

The motion for an attachment is overruled.

WORCESTER BANK (HOLBROOK v.). See Case No. 6,597.

Case No. 18,044.

In re WORK et al.

[30 Leg. Int. 361.]¹

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. May 12, 1873.

BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDING—REVIEW BY CIRCUIT COURT—DISSOLUTION OF FIRM—SUBSEQUENT BANKRUPTCY OF PARTNER.

1. Revisory jurisdiction of the circuit court, under the second section of the act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 517], over the proceedings in bankruptcy in the district court. Within what time relief must be sought.

2. The 36th section of the same act only applies to partnerships existing at the time of petition filed. Where a partnership had dissolved, made a general assignment in trust for creditors, the members residing in different districts, and more than a year afterwards, one of the partners filed his individual petition in bankruptcy, praying an adjudication of bankruptcy, against himself and his late copartners, no partnership assets appearing upon the schedules. Held, that this was not a case for a joint proceeding, as though the copartnership still continued.

[In review of the action of the district court of the United States for the Western district of Pennsylvania.]

In bankruptcy. The copartnership of Work, McCouch & Co., of the city of Philadelphia, bankers and brokers, consisting of Samuel Work and William McCouch, of said city, in the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, and Allen Kramer, Florence Kramer, and Edward Rahm, of the city of Pittsburgh, in the Western district of the same state, failed in the month of May, 1866, heavily indebted; on the 9th day of June, 1866, the partners in Pittsburgh made a general assignment of their copartnership and individual property in trust for their creditors, to one Thomas Moore, and on the 14th day of the same month, the partners in Philadelphia executed a similar deed to George Sergeant, Esq. On the 25th day of July, 1867, Florence Kramer filed his petition in the district court of the United States for the Western district of Pennsylvania, in bankruptcy, praying that himself and his copartners in the firm of Work, McCouch & Co. might be adjudged bankrupts. No partnership assets appeared in the schedules annexed. His copartners appeared upon the orders to show cause, submitted to an adjudication of bankruptcy, and the matter was so proceeded in that Florence Kramer obtained a discharge from his debts on July 3, 1868, and Edward Rahm, Samuel Work and William McCouch obtained theirs on December 23d, of the same year. Allen Kramer died without having applied for a discharge. On September 5, 1870, Henry W. Hook, a creditor to the amount of $30,200, who had unsuccessfully resisted the discharge of the said bankrupts in the district court, presented his petition under the second section of the act of March 2, 1867, to the circuit court, setting forth the foregoing facts, and praying that the discharges granted to the said bankrupts might be annulled. The court allowed said petition to be filed and ordered the bankrupts to appear and plead answer or demurrer thereto in thirty days. To this petition a special demurrer was filed, raising the question of the application being in time, and also meeting the case made by it upon its legal merits.

Nathan H. Sharpless and D. C. Watson, for petitioner. (1) That the petition was filed in time. The cases under this section holding that it need not be filed within the ten days allowed for an appeal from the district to the circuit court (In re Alexander [Case No. 160]), but that it must be filed within a reasonable time. Upon the question of what is a reasonable time in this case, the act itself furnishes an analogy in the 34th section, allowing the creditor two years in the district court to contest the validity of his debtor's discharge. (2) The proceedings in the district court were entirely irregular, and so far as Samuel Work and William McCouch were concerned, without jurisdiction. At the best they can only be supported as individual proceedings on behalf of Florence Kramer. The 36th section of the act under which they were had, only applies to partnerships existing at the time of petition filed, or at all events to those where there are partnership assets to surrender to the assignee in bankruptcy. The words of the act are, "where two or more persons who are partners in trade shall be adjudged bankrupts," &c. Here the firm had been dissolved more than a year when the petition in bankruptcy was filed. The two assignments to Messrs. Moore and Sergeant worked a dissolution of the copartnership by operation of law. Moddewell v. Keever, 8 Watts & S. 63; Cochran v. Perry, Id. 262; Horton's Appeal, 1 Harris [13 Pa. St.] 67.

Upon the making of the assignments all dealings of the copartnership ceased, and at the time of the petition filed in bankruptcy, there were no assets of the firm to be administered in that forum. Under the circumstances, the joint proceeding was unwarranted by the act of congress, and as to Messrs. Work and McCouch, the bankrupt court was without jurisdiction over their persons, and acquired none by reason of their relations to the subject matter of the proceedings before it on the petition of Florence Kramer. Citing Bump, Law & Prac. Bankr. p. 53 et seq.; In re Crockett [Case No. 3,402]; In re Penn [Id. 10,927]; In re Winkens [Id. 17,875].

Hopkins & Lazear (with whom were John C. Bullitt and Samuel Dickson, for Work & McCouch) contra.

Before McKENNA, Circuit Judge, and McCANDLESS, District Judge.

The court, after consideration by McKENNA, Circuit Judge, delivered a verbal opinion, and directed the entry of the following decree. "And now, May 12th, 1873, the de-murrer and bill of review having been argued by counsel pro and con, and duly considered by the court, the demurrer is overruled and the decree of the district court is reversed as to Edward Rahm, Samuel Work, and William McCouch.

¹ [Reprinted by permission.]

WORK v. BAILEY. See Case No. 2,814.

Case No. 18,045.

The WORKMAN.

[1 Low. 504.]¹

District Court, D. Massachusetts. 1870.

DAMAGE TO TOW—LIABILITY OF TUG.

1. A tug, in towing a ship, brought her against a wharf. Held, that the tug was liable in damages, although the ship was rotten and unseaworthy, unless the condition of the vessel was the sole cause of the injury.

[Cited in The M. J. Cummings, 18 Fed. 183.]

2. The damages in such a case are the natural and necessary consequences of the collision to the vessel in her actual state of repair.

The steam tug Workman was hired to tow the bark White Wing from Fiske's wharf in Boston into the stream, and farther if required. The master of the tug made his boat fast to the port side of the ship, ordered the lines of the latter to be cast off, and steamed ahead. Presently the starboard side of the bark's stern came in contact with the wharf, but was soon cleared, and after they had proceeded a short distance it was found that the stern of the vessel had come off. The master of the tug had the control and charge of the navigation of both vessels. Several of the timbers of the stern were rotten, and a very considerable proportion of the repairs put on the vessel would not have been necessary but for this state of her works.

T. H. Russell, for libellant.
J. C. Dodge, for respondent.

LOWELL, District Judge. The libellant contends that, however rotten his ship may have been, the tug had no right to hit her against the wharf, and is justly responsible for the natural consequences of the act. On the other part, this general proposition is not denied; but it is maintained that the state of the timbers was the sole cause of the damage, and the blow only such a slight touch as every vessel is liable to receive in coming to or going from her wharf, and that no negligence, therefore, can be argued from the result, and that none has been proved. That the mere act itself had no naturally injurious consequences. The vessel was not old, and had been taken good care of, but dry rot had attacked her stern, without the knowledge of the owner. The unexpected discovery of her actual state was said by one of the witnesses to be a very fortunate circumstance for her owner, because it may probably have saved her from a worse disaster. It seems clear that the bark was not sound, staunch, and seaworthy, as alleged by the libellant; and if this is a material and traversable averment it must be found against him. But there is no warranty of seaworthiness in a contract of towage, and the claimants cannot prevail upon this point, taken by itself, unless the evidence shall go the full length of showing that the whole damage was due to the state of the vessel. As, for instance, in any ordinary cause of collision, it would be immaterial that the injured vessel was insufficiently manned, or in any other respect unseaworthy, or even badly navigated, unless the defect caused or contributed to the disaster. Still less if a vessel were run into, would it be a defence that a stronger vessel would not have been injured. The undisputed fact that the tow was brought against the wharf with greater or less violence calls upon the tug for an explanation. The explanation given is that the motion of the vessels was very slow, and the blow very slight, such as ought not to injure a seaworthy vessel. The difficulty I have found with this defence is that it does not account for the blow itself. If it were shown that, by the usual and necessary course of navigation, a vessel must be expected to touch the ground or any other object at a certain point, a tugboat could not be held to guarantee her against touching there. And, of course, any sudden squall or other accident may be shown. But there is nothing of the sort shown here under either alternative. It is said that vessels often touch the wharf, but not that they usually strike it as this vessel did. She was swung round in such a way as to bring her stern against some part of the wharf, and, although the evidence is conflicting concerning the respective parts of vessel and wharf that were struck, and the force of the blow, I am not satisfied that it was a mere touch, to be overlooked as being one of the ordinary and necessary incidents of towage, like wear and tear. It is a hard case, undoubtedly, because it will be very difficult to draw a perfectly just and equitable line in the award of damages. I shall endeavor to do this as far as possible. My decision at present merely is that I cannot deprive the libellant entirely of damages, because I cannot be assured that the fault is wholly to be found in the defective character of his vessel.

Interlocutory decree for libellant. Damages to be assessed.

WORKMAN (DURKEE v.). See Case No. 4,195.

WORKMAN (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,764.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]
30 Fed. Cas.—40

Case No. 18,046.

WORKS v. JUNCTION RAILROAD.

[McLean, 425; 1 10 West. Law J. 370.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. April, 1853.

INJUNCTION—PUBLIC NUISANCE— OBSTRUCTION OF NAVIGATION — DRAW-BRIDGE OVER NAVIGABLE WATER—CONSENT OF SOVEREIGN POWER—CHARTER OF RAILROAD—LINES AUTHORIZED.

1. A citizen of another state owning property in this state, has a right to come into the circuit court of the United States, asking for an injunction to restrain the acts of a corporation, incorporated under the laws of Ohio, which, if consummated, would do irreparable injury to his property situated here.

2. A private person cannot apply to a court of chancery to prevent or remove a public nuisance, which does him no special injury. But he may, if the nuisance is immediately injurious to himself, although it may also affect the public. A private person owning a tannery, flour mill, saw mill, stores and warehouses, a wharf and water lots, and stock in a plank road leading from the town where they are situated, which is upon a river navigable for steamboats, schooners, and other vessels, and from which trade is carried on with other ports, in which he participates, may join a railroad company from obstructing the navigation of the bay into which that river empties, when such obstruction will materially injure the trade of that town.

[Cited in People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 478, 46 N. W. 737; Ballentine v. Webb, 84 Mich. 47, 47 N. W. 488.]

3. From the nature of such an injury, its extent cannot be ascertained with precision. It is permanent; consequently suits at law for relief must be endless. To establish a wrong of this nature, it need not be measured by dollars and cents. It must be shown to exist; it must be material; but the particular amount of damages can not and need not be shown. In such cases, adequate relief can be given only by injunction.

4. Where the termini of a railroad are fixed by its charter, and an amendment is made thereto authorizing the company "to extend its line of railroad to a point on a river" named, which is beyond the original terminus and not in a direct line with the termini, the company are not authorized in departing from one terminus named, and constructing a direct line between the other terminus and the point designated on the river, which will leave the original point of termination entirely out of the line of the road. The extension of a line does not authorize a departure from it in the middle or any other part of it, except from its terminus.

5. Where a railroad company was authorized by its charter "to construct branched roads from the main route, to other towns or places in the several counties through which the road might pass," they are limited to the construction of branch roads, which leave the main route and terminate at some town or place within the same county as that in which the other terminus of the branch is situated. The construction of a line of road, commencing in one county and terminating in another, is not authorized by such a provision.

6. A railroad company was authorized to construct a railroad, making S. and P. points in the main line. They proceeded to put under construction a line from S. to P., which lies thirty-eight degrees north of a direct line from S. to P., and which, if brought down to that line, would not be half way between S. and P.

7. The court considered that this was manifestly intended to be the main line, and could not be called a branch.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

8. A right to change a location, "either for the difficulty of construction, or of procuring a right of way at a reasonable cost, or whenever a better and cheaper route can be had," does not authorize a company to relocate, because a particular town, on the selected route, will not contribute to the road. Nor will it authorize a departure from the points named in the charter.

9. The right to cross a navigable water by a railroad bridge, must be given by the sovereign power, by a special or general act. Where this is not done, neither the board of public works, nor an acting commissioner of that board, can approve of the structure of a bridge over it. No such power is given by the twentieth section of the act of Ohio of May 1, 1852, to provide for the creation and regulation of incorporated companies. 3 Curwen's Rev. St. p. 1882.

10. By the twentieth section of that act (3 Curwen's Rev. St. 1882), either the acting commissioner of the board of public works, within whose territorial jurisdiction the work is to be erected, or the board of public works may approve of the plan or structure of a proposed bridge over a navigable water; and as the law has provided for no appeal from the decision of the acting commissioner, his favorable decision is final. A reversal of that decision by the board is a nullity, they having no jurisdiction over the subject.

11. The expression, "the acting commissioner having charge of the public works where such crossing is proposed," in the twentieth section of the act alluded to (3 Curwen's Rev. St. 1882), means nothing more than that such place shall be within the territorial jurisdiction of the commissioner. It does not mean that the water over which the bridge is proposed to be erected, should be a portion of the public works of Ohio. The words "navigable waters" are used in no such restricted sense; they embrace and were intended to embrace, all waters within the state, which are navigable by the works of art or nature.

12. Where a company is authorized to construct a railroad between two points, "over" a navigable water, a right to construct a bridge over that water is implied, as a necessary means of carrying into effect the power granted.

13. Under the power to regulate commerce, congress have power to prevent the obstruction of any navigable river, which is a means of commerce between any two or more states. The exercise of this great public right is not incompatible with the enjoyment of local rights. The public right consists in an unobstructed use of a navigable water connecting two or more states. The local right is to cross such water. The general commercial right is paramount to all state authority.

14. A public nuisance can not be tolerated on the ground that the community may realize some advantages from its existence. The doctrine on this subject, as it is stated in the Wheeling Bridge Case, 9 West. Law J. 535, adopted and followed.

[Cited in People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 478, 46 N. W. 737; Ballentine v. Webb, 84 Mich. 47, 47 N. W. 488.]

15. A draw-bridge over navigable water, although it unavoidably occasions some delay in passing it, is not necessarily such an obstruction to the navigation as to amount to a nuisance. The delay is submitted to in consideration of the benefits conferred.

16. In considering whether a draw-bridge is an obstruction, the unskillfulness of the seamen, and the probability of men not being ready at the draw to open it, are to be laid out of consideration. The law presumes that what ought to be done will be done, and that since seamen should be skillful, they will be so.

17. When the chancellor is asked to restrain the erection of a bridge, on the ground that it will be an obstruction to the navigation, and the testimony offered to prove it so, is so nearly balanced as not to incline the scale on either side, the extraordinary and preventive power of an injunction, which may be ruinous to one of the parties, ought not to be exercised.

In equity.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. The complainant [Samuel Works], a citizen of New York, states that he owns a large amount of real estate at and near Fremont, on the Sandusky river, in the county of Sandusky, state of Ohio, which comprises a tannery, half of a flouring mill, saw mill, a store and warehouses, a wharf and water lots; that the Sandusky river from Fremont is navigable for steamboats, schooners and other vessels, and that a commerce is carried on from it, down the river and bay to different ports on the lakes; that he has plank-road stock which pays a profit by the transportation of produce to and from Fremont; and that shipments are made of flour and lumber from his mills, and leather from his tannery, etc. He represents that the defendants are about constructing a railroad from Sandusky City to Toledo, crossing the Sandusky Bay by a bridge on a line to Port Clinton, in Ottowa county; that the bridge, if made, will materially obstruct the commerce of the bay to his individual and irreparable injury, and he prays for an injunction to restrain the defendants from the construction of their proposed bridge.

The Junction Railroad Company answers that it is engaged in building a railroad between Cleveland and the Maumee river, connecting with Toledo, and extending from that city to the west line of the state, under various charters which authorize them to prosecute the work.

The Port Clinton Railroad Company demurs generally to the complainant's bill, and answers, denying the fraud and collusion with the Junction Railroad, as charged in the bill. It denies that it has any connection with the Junction Railroad, either to aid it or receive aid from it. The navigableness of the Sandusky Bay above the proposed bridge, and also of the Sandusky river to Fremont, is admitted by the parties and the pleadings. The general government has recognized this fact by making Fremont a port of entry, and the state of Ohio, by appropriating funds in removing certain obstructions in the Sandusky river.

Has the complainant a right to prosecute this suit? If the proposed bridge shall be an obstruction, as charged in the bill, it will be a public nuisance. No individual can complain of such a structure, unless his interests are injuriously affected by it. In such case it is a private nuisance to him, and if at common law he can obtain no adequate remedy, he may seek relief by injunction.

The complainant's citizenship gives him a right, in ordinary cases, to prosecute a suit in this court. But to maintain this suit, he must superadd a private injury which is irremediable at common law. Has this been shown? I think it has. From the property owned by the complainant, from the different kinds of business in which he is engaged, it appears that any material obstruction to the commercial outlet from Fremont must injuriously affect his interests. The product of his mills, his wharf, his grounds on the river, are enhanced in value by an unobstructed commerce. His road stock is more or less affected by the transportation of freight to and from Fremont. The injury from the obstruction, if it be material, affects directly the articles shipped, and indirectly tends to lessen the value of the operating means through which these articles are produced or acquired. If such injury exist, no adequate remedy can be found by an action at law. From the nature of the injury, its extent can not be ascertained with precision. It is permanent; consequently the suits at law for redress must be endless. In such a case, adequate relief can be given only by injunction. It prevents the wrong. To establish this wrong, it need not be measured by dollars and cents. It must be shown to exist; it must be material; but the particular amount of damage can not and need not be shown. A mischief being proved, which can not be redressed at common law, connected with the citizenship of the plaintiff, establishes his right prima facie to prosecute this suit. The right to prosecute being shown or admitted, the nature and extent of the nuisance may be examined. The extent of the commerce obstructed may be proved, and also the dangers and probable losses to which it will be subjected.

The complainant having maintained his right to sue, the defendants are thrown upon their defense. This they have attempted to make, by giving in proof the act incorporating the Junction Railroad Company, with its various amendments, and also the incorporation of the Port Clinton Company.

The charter of the Junction Railroad Company was granted the 2d of March, 1846. The second section authorizes it to construct a railroad, "commencing at such point on the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati Railroad as the directors may select, either in the county of Cuyahoga or Lorain, and within thirty miles from Cleveland; thence to Elyria, in Lorain county, unless the junction with the Cleveland and Columbus road should be made at Elyria; and from thence on the most feasible route to intersect the Mad River and Lake Erie Railroad at Bellevue, or at such other point as the directors shall choose, and thence to Lower Sandusky; and the said corporation shall have power to construct the said railroad or a branch of the same, from Elyria to Sandusky City, and from thence to Lower Sandusky." Under this provision the road has been constructed from Cleveland by Ohio City, Elyria, to Sandusky City, and is now being constructed thence nearly on a straight line to Port Clinton, crossing the Sandusky Bay, and extending, on the shortest route to the Maumee. This route is alleged to be some eight or nine miles shorter than any other. By the amendatory act of the 2d of March, 1846, the Junction Railroad Company, was authorized to extend its line of railroad to some point on the Maumee river, with the privilege of transporting goods and passengers, transported on the road of said companies, across said river, by ferry or otherwise, as the directors thereof shall elect, to the city of Toledo; provided, the said company shall in no wise obstruct or hinder the navigation of said river. The sixteenth section of the original charter gave power to the corporation to locate and construct branched roads from the main line to other towns or places in the several counties through which said road may pass. And by the seventeenth section the company was authorized to commence, complete, and put in operation, any part of said road, or any branch thereof, aforesaid, at any point on the route of said railroad which the interest of the company may require to be first commenced and completed.

The point where the Junction Railroad was to commence on the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati Railroad was left to the discretion of the directors, within the limitation of thirty miles from Cleveland. The road was commenced at Ohio City, near to Cleveland, and to the Columbus road, but not on it. Admitting this to be within a liberal construction of the charter, the road was extended by Elyria, Amherst, Vermillion and Huron to Sandusky City, connecting with the Mad River railroad at that point. Instead of extending the road from Sandusky City to Fremont, the last point named in the original charter, a survey has been made to cross the bay a few miles above Sandusky City, on nearly a straight line to Port Clinton and the Maumee river. And this, it is contended, can not be done under the original charter or the first amendment. That amendment "authorized the company to extend its line of railroad to some point on the Maumee river." The extension of a line does not seem to authorize a departure from the line at the middle, or any other part of it, except from its terminus. Had the extension commenced from this point, no navigable water would have been crossed by the line of the road to the Maumee, except Sandusky river. That this was the direction the legislature intended to give the road, appears by the words used, and also by the provision that in crossing the Maumee its navigation should not be obstructed—there being no such provision for crossing the Sandusky Bay.

It is supposed that the branching power from the main road, as provided in the sixteenth section, and the authority given in the seventeenth section to make and complete any part of said road, or any branch thereof, as the company may direct, authorized the diversion of the road to Port Clinton, crossing the Sandusky Bay. The power to make branches is limited to towns or places, in the several counties through which the main road shall pass. Now, although the branches may be made before the main road, yet they must proceed from the line of the main road, and terminate at towns or places in the same county. The branch is an incident to the main road, and whether made before or after the construction of the main road, the termini of the branch is the same. By the direction given to the road from Sandusky City, it is clear it was not intended to run to Fremont, but to cross the bay in the direction to Port Clinton, leaving the direct route to Fremont several miles south. As an excuse for this departure, it is said in the answer that the people in Fremont, by subscriptions or otherwise, gave no encouragement to the company to run the road to that place; and that the route selected is better, and several miles shorter than the one by Fremont. Under such circumstances it is difficult to say that the road now in progress from Sandusky City to the Maumee, over the bay and by Port Clinton, is a branch of the original road within the charter. Neither its commencement nor termination is within the sixteenth section. It does not branch in the county of Ottawa, nor terminate at some town or place in that county. It is in fact the main road from Sandusky City to the Maumee, and was avowedly intended to be so, from the time the route was surveyed. The charter requires the company to organize in five years, and to complete twenty miles of the road in ten years from the time its structure was commenced; and under this provision it is said the company having made more than twenty miles of the road, may, at its own convenience, extend the road to Fremont from Sandusky City, and the road, if extended to the Maumee from Fremont, must pass through Ottawa county; and then the road now in course of construction may be considered as a branch or branches from it. It can not be within the purpose of the company to make the road to Fremont, and thence to the Maumee. No benefit could result to the company or the public from such an expenditure. There is now a road in progress from Fremont to Toledo, and also the Port Clinton road, running in the same direction. There is no admitted latitude of construction, it seems to me, which can bring the Port Clinton road within the charter of the Junction Railroad as amended. It would sanction a principle which would enable chartered companies to disregard the limits prescribed, and give such a direction to roads as their interests may dictate. By the tenth section, "if the corporation, after having selected a route for said railway, find any obstacle in continuing said location, either by the difficulty of construction or procuring the right of way at a reasonable cost, or whenever a better and cheaper route can be had, it shall have authority to vary the route and change the location." This does not authorize the company to abandon and disregard the points named in the charter, but to change the route which they have selected, for the causes stated.

Upon the deliberate consideration which I have given to the Junction Railroad charter, I am brought to the conclusion that it does not authorize the route selected, and without authority it is presumed no one could contend for the right of crossing the Sandusky Bay. The amendment extending the road gives no such authority. The act of the 1st of May, 1852 (3 Curwen's Rev. St. 1877), provides, "that any number of natural persons, not less than five, may become a body corporate, with all the rights, privileges and powers conferred by, and subject to all the restrictions of that act." The second section declares, "that any number of persons as aforesaid, associating, to form a company for the purpose of constructing a railroad, shall, under their hands and seals, make a certificate which shall specify as follows: 1. The name assumed by such company, and by which it shall be known. 2. The name of the place of the termini of said road, and the county or counties through which such road shall pass. 3. The amount of capital stock necessary to construct such road. Such certificate being acknowledged before a justice of the peace, and certified by the clerk of the court of common pleas, and recorded by the secretary of state, shall confer corporate powers."

On the 6th of October, 1852, Ebenezer Lane and five others applied, under the above law, to be incorporated as the "Port Clinton Railroad Company," beginning the road at Sandusky City, and extending it by Port Clinton, over the Sandusky Bay, to Toledo; and all the requisites of the act having been complied with, they became a corporate body. This body, on the 11th of January, 1853, submitted to James B. Steadman, acting commissioner, the plan of a bridge for crossing the bay, which he approved, and which approval was notified to the company.

Two objections are made to this act of the commissioner: (1) That it was contrary to the decision of the board of public works. (2) That the acting commissioner had no jurisdiction of the matter. It appears that on the 5th of July, 1852, the Junction Railroad applied to the board of public works, "to obtain leave, if it be necessary, to construct a draw-bridge across Sandusky Bay," which was refused by the board for want of jurisdiction. The decision of the board, on the application of the Junction Railroad for leave to cross the bay by a bridge, was a very different application from that decided by Steadman. He approved of the plan of the bridge; the right to cross the bay was not submitted to him. But on the 17th of February, 1850, the board of public works did reverse the decision of Steadman in relation to the Port Clinton bridge. And I will now consider the effect of this reversal.

The twentieth section of the above act (3 Curwen's Rev. St. 1852) gives the power to the acting commissioner, the same as to the whole board. Either may approve of the plan or structure of a proposed bridge over a navigable water; consequently, they act independently of each other, and no provision having been made for an appeal to the board from the decision of the acting commissioner, his favorable decision is final. And this power to the acting commissioner being given by law, can not be controlled or reversed by the board. The procedure of the board, therefore, in the reversal of the approval by Steadman of the plan of the bridge presented by the Port Clinton Company, was void. It was an exercise of power which did not belong to the board. If the application had been made to the board by the Port Clinton Company, for the approval of the plan of their bridge, and the board had decided against it, having jurisdiction of the matter, the acting commissioner could not in form or in effect reverse the decision. But the application was, as above stated, by the Junction Railroad, "for leave to cross the bay," and this power did not belong to the board; it, therefore, very properly held that it had no jurisdiction. But it had jurisdiction, and so had the acting commissioner, to approve the plan of the bridge. An appeal, under the statute, from the decision of the board, by the Junction Railroad, would have been ineffectual, as the board was asked to do that which the law did not authorize it to do.

The right to cross a navigable water by a railroad bridge, must be given by the sovereign power, by a special or general act. Where this is not done, neither the board of public works, nor an acting commissioner, can approve of the structure of a bridge over it. For the reasons above stated, I have been brought to the conclusion, that the charter of the Junction Railroad, original and amended, does not authorize the company to construct a railroad bridge over Sandusky Bay at the place designated.

But the act of approval by the commissioner, on the application of the Port Clinton Company, is objected to, on the ground that the Sandusky Bay was not a public work, "under his direction," within the meaning of the statute. The words of the statute are, "Whenever the line of any railroad company now existing, or which may hereafter organize under this act, shall cross any canal, or any navigable water, the said company shall file with the board of public works, or with the acting commissioner thereof, having charge of the public works where such crossing is proposed, the plan of the bridge, and other fixtures for crossing such canal or navigable water, designating the place of crossing; and if the said board, or acting commissioner thereof, shall approve of such plan, he shall notify such company, in writing, of such approval." A corporation, formed under this general law, is vested with all the ordinary powers to accomplish the purpose intended. It may appropriate private property, and do all other things necessary in the construction of a railroad. The general act is as specific in its details of the rights and duties of the company as can be found in special acts of incorporation. The legislature of Ohio has been cautious, as all other legislatures have been, in passing special acts for bridges and railroads, to guard against obstructions on navigable waters. And this twentieth section of the general law, was intended to preserve this great public right. The plan of a bridge over any navigable water must be approved by the board of public works, or by an acting commissioner. This duty was more appropriate to the general business of the members of that board, than to any other association under state organization. To limit the application of this provision to the crossing of canals, and waters made navigable by the state, would strangely disregard the policy of the act, and the necessities of the public. The language of the section does not authorize so narrow a construction. It was known, that in every part of the state, railroads would be projected which necessarily cross navigable waters. Special provision is made for the crossing of canals. Our best rivers are navigable by nature; and on the theory stated, no provision is made in the act for crossing them. They are navigable waters, and are embraced by the terms of the act. The acting commissioner, it is said, must "have charge of the public works, where such crossing is proposed;" and that where there are no public works, his approval can not be given. "Having charge of the public works, where such crossing is proposed," means nothing more than that such place shall be within the territorial jurisdiction of the commissioner. Any other construction would involve this absurdity: However a navigable river might be improved by the public works, yet if there were not public works at the place of crossing, the commissioner can not act. The legislature can not be charged with acting so unwisely. By the law of 1852, a new system was introduced, suited to the enterprise of the age, and it was intended to cover the whole ground of ordinary legislation on the subject. The words "navigable waters," were used in no restricted sense; they embrace, and were intended to embrace, all waters within the state, which are navigable by the works of art or nature. The plan of the bridge over the Sandusky Bay having been approved by Steadman, the acting commissioner, and the place of crossing being within his jurisdiction, it is not doubted, that under the "Port Clinton Charter," a bridge may be constructed as proposed, if it cause no obstruction to commerce.

Whether we look into the ordinance of 1787, the Acts of congress of the 13th July, 1787, of the 7th of August, 1789, of the 7th of May, 1796, or the constitution, which declares that congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several states, we find the power to protect the commercial interests of the Union. But, as was observed by the court in the Wheeling Bridge Case, the exercise of this great public right is not incompatible with the enjoyment of local rights. The public right consists in an unobstructed use of every navigable water, connecting two or more states; the local right, in crossing such water. The general commercial right is paramount to all state authority.

The question of obstruction remains to be considered. Numerous affidavits have been read, made by persons acquainted with the navigation of the Sandusky Bay, who think the bridge with the draws proposed, in a high wind and also in a dark night, would obstruct the navigation. When the wind is strong, it is said by some, that sail-vessels require the whole width of the bay to beat against the wind, and that at such times no sail-vessels could pass the draw. The draw proposed is 144 feet, to be opened and closed on a pivot in the center. It is admitted that steam vessels could pass the draw with less difficulty than vessels with sails. This class of witnesses suppose that all vessels not propelled by steam, in a strong wind could pass the draw only by the aid of ropes, working up by the side of the piers; and that this would cause considerable delay, and some expense. Other witnesses, of equal experience, differ from the above. They think vessels can pass the draw with little or no difficulty, and that in time of wind, not so high as to force them to anchor, they could pass by working round the piers with ropes, which would take up a very short space of time. And that in good weather the boats would sail through the draw without loss of time. Several witnesses speak of draws in bridges over arms of the sea, of less width than proposed, where vessels are constantly passing without complaint or delay. The witnesses from the sea-board, when added to those from the lake, are greater in number than those who think the bridge would obstruct the navigation of the bay.

Against the bridge it is urged that considerations of public advantage can not be weighed against any appreciable obstruction. That a public nuisance can not be tolerated, on the ground that the community may realize some advantages from its existence. Such is admitted to be the general principle on this subject; and yet there can scarcely be a draw in a bridge which does not, to some extent, delay vessels; but this is submitted to from public necessity. The draws in the bridges over Charles river, which is an arm of the sea, must be subject to the winds and waves, and also to the flowing of the tides; and yet through these draws more than ten times the number of vessels pass daily that would pass through the draw in the proposed bridge. The unskillfulness of our navigators and seamen on the lakes is referred to, as an argument against the bridge. But men who undertake the navigation of vessels are presumed to have the necessary skill, and all regulations of commerce are founded on this hypothesis. Nor is an argument admissible, that proper attention would not be paid to the draws, by necessary lights, and hands to open them. All such regulations are founded on the supposition that proper attention will be paid, as less than that would expose the bridge to damage. The commerce of the bay above the bridge, including the Sandusky river, is not large; but it is of sufficient importance to bring it under the regulation of the commercial power of the Union, and to require its protection. In the Wheeling Bridge Case the court held, if a draw should be constructed in the bridge over the western channel, so as to admit of a safe and an unobstructed passage to steam-boats that could not pass under the eastern bridge, it would be considered as removing the nuisance complained of. To pass through a draw on a river, when its banks are full and its current rapid, is attended with much more difficulty and danger than where the draw is over a water agitated only or chiefly by the winds.

Nothing is more common than for witnesses, who are called as experts, to differ in opinion. And where this difference is so nearly on a balance as not to incline, the scale on either side, however strong the testimony may be, when viewed on one side only, yet when both sides are considered, the parts neutralize each other, so as to produce no very decided effect on the mind. This is the character of the evidence in the case under consideration. In such a case the preventive and extraordinary remedy invoked ought not to be given. It is a remedy which may be ruinous to one of the parties, when the basis of the action is doubtful.

The prayer for an injunction is refused.

Case No. 18,047.

WORMELELEY et al. v. WORMELELEY et al.

[1 Brock. 330.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Nov. Term, 1817.

VIOLATION OF TRUST—POWER OF SALE AND REINVESTMENT—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—RIGHT TO PROFITS AND IMPROVEMENTS.

1. A deed of marriage settlement, executed on the day of the marriage, which conveys to a trustee a tract of land, and some slaves, principally for the wife and children, has in it this uncommon clause: "That whenever, in the opinion of the said T. S., the trustee, the said landed estate can be sold and conveyed, and the money arising from the sale thereof, laid out in the purchase of other lands, advantageously for those concerned or interested therein, then the said T.

S. is hereby authorized and empowered to sell and convey the same; and the lands so by him purchased, shall be in every respect subject to all the provisions, uses, trusts, and contingencies, as those were by him sold and conveyed." Per curiam: The power thus granted is great, but not unlimited. The trustee is to exercise, not his will, but his judgment. He can only sell and make a re-investment, when, in his opinion, both of these acts can be done advantageously to the parties interested.

2. If the trustee sells the land worth $10,000, and re-invests it in land not worth $1,000, or if there is no re-investment of the money at all, in either case, the power is not executed. The sale and purchase are part of one operation; and the operation is incomplete if either be wanting. Nor can the judgment be fairly exercised on the advantage of a sale and purchase, without comparing the tract to be sold with the tract to be purchased.

3. Therefore, where the trustee sold the trust lands to one of his own creditors (who held a mortgage on a tract of land owned by the trustee, which was foreclosed), and the creditor discounted the balance due on the mortgage, in part payment of the trust estate, although this sale was with the approbation of the husband and father of the cestuis que trust, and placed the cestuis que trust on another tract of land, which was not, however, conveyed to the same uses with the trust land, held, that this is not a correct execution of the trust; and as to the trustee himself, the whole transaction is vitiated, and if he had taken a re-conveyance of the land to himself, he would have held it subject to the trusts of the original deed, for a trustee cannot bargain with himself.

4. A purchaser of the trust property, with notice of the trust and its violation, is himself a trustee, and holds the lands subject to the claim of the cestuis que trust.

5. In this case, the trustee sold to V., his creditor. That creditor had notice of the trust, for that appeared on the face of the deed, under which his vendor held. He must be considered as having notice of the violation of the trust—First, because part of the proceeds of the sale were applied to the payment of the trustee's individual debt; and, secondly, because he had a right to see the deed by which the exchanged lands were settled to the same uses with the first, and its non-production was equivalent to its non-existence. V., therefore, held the land subject to the trust.

6. C. and M. were sub-purchasers from V. They had the same notice of the trust that V. had, and they also knew, that the trustee had not settled other lands to the same uses as the original trust deed, and that part of the proceeds of the trust lands had been applied to the trustee's individual debt. They, therefore, were purchasers with notice of the violation of the trust, and held the lands subject to the trust.

7. It is no excuse to them, that the trustee may have "given credit to the cestui que trust for all that he received from V.," for that was not all that the trustee was bound to do. He was bound to lay out the proceeds advantageously in other lands.

8. It is not sufficient for the purchasers, C. and M., to deny all fraud in themselves, and all knowledge of fraud, in V. and the trustee, unless they deny a knowledge of the facts, from which fraud is inferred by the law.

9. To constitute a purchaser without notice, it is not sufficient that the contract should be made without notice, but that the purchase-money should be paid before notice.

10. These purchasers, although they are to be held as trustees for the cestuis que trust, are not, however, to be viewed as mere squatters. They believed their title to be good. They are entitled (1) to the encumbrances from which they have relieved the land; (2) to the permanent improvements which they have made on the land; and (3) for the advances they have made for the support of the wife and children. They are chargeable with profits. The advances are to be set off against the profits; and the encumbrances and improvements to be a charge on the land, unless absorbed by the residue of the profits.

¹ [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough, Esq.]

This was a bill in chancery, exhibited by Mary Wormeley, the wife of Hugh Wallace Wormeley, and her infant children, John S., Mary W., Jane B., and Anne B. Wormeley, by their next friend, against the said Hugh Wallace Wormeley, Thomas Strode, Richard Veitch, and David Castleman, and Charles McCormick, for the purpose of enforcing the trusts of a marriage settlement (executed by the said Hugh and Mary, previous to their marriage, in which the said Strode was the trustee), for setting aside a sale, made of the trust property, by the said Strode, to the said Veitch, and by him, to Castleman and McCormick; and for obtaining an account and other relief. The bill charged the sale to have been a breach of the trusts, and that the purchasers had notice. The facts are as follows:

In contemplation of a marriage between Hugh Wallace Wormeley and Mary Strode, an indenture of three parts was executed on the 5th of August, 1807, by way of marriage settlement, to which the said husband, and intended wife, and Thomas Strode, her brother, as trustee, were parties. The indenture, after reciting the intended marriage, in case it shall take effect, and in bar of dower and jointure, conveys all the real and personal estate, held by Hugh W. Wormeley, under a certain indenture, specified in the deed, as his paternal inheritance, to Thomas Strode, in fee upon the following trusts, viz., "for the use, benefit, and emolument, of the said Mary, and her children, if any she have, until the decease of her intended husband, and then, if she should be the longest liver, until the children should, respectively, arrive at legal maturity, at which time each individual of them is to receive his equal dividend, &c., leaving, at least, one full third part of the estate, &c., in her possession, for, and during her natural life; then, on her decease, the landed part of the said one-third, to be divided among her children, and the personal property, according to the will of the said Mary, at her decease. But if the said Mary should depart this life before the decease of the said Hugh, then he is to enjoy the whole benefits, emoluments, and profits, during his natural life, then to be divided amongst said Hugh's children, as he, by will, shall see cause to direct, and then this trust, so far as relates to T. Strode, to end, &c.; and so, in like manner, should the said Mary depart this life without issue, then this trust, to end, &c. But should Wormeley depart this life before the said Mary, and leave no issue, then the said Mary to have and enjoy the whole of said estate, for, and during her natural life, and then to descend to the heirs of the said Wormeley, or as his will, relative thereto, may provide." Then follows this clause: "And it is further covenanted, that, whenever, in the opinion of the said Thomas Strode, the said landed property can be sold and conveyed, and the money arising from the sale thereof, be laid out in the purchase of other lands advantageously for those concerned and interested therein, that then, and in that case, the said Thomas Strode is hereby authorized to sell, and, by proper deeds of writing, to convey the same; and the lands so purchased, shall be in every respect subject to all the provisions, uses, trusts, and contingencies, as those were, by him sold and conveyed. And it is further understood by the parties, that the said Hugh W., under leave of the said Thomas Strode, his heirs and assigns, shall occupy and enjoy the hereby conveyed estate, real and personal, and the issues and profits thereof, for, and during the term of his natural life, and after that, the said estate to be divided agreeably to the foregoing contingencies."

The property conveyed by the settlement consisted of about 350 acres of land, situated in Frederick county, in Virginia. The marriage took effect on the day that the deed of settlement was executed, and four children were the fruits of the marriage, who, with their mother, suing by their next friend, George F. Strother, were the parties plaintiff in this cause. For a short time after the marriage, Wormeley and his wife resided on the Frederick lands, and a negotiation was then entered into between Wormeley and Strode, the trustee, for the exchange of the Frederick lands, for lands belonging to Strode in the county of Fauquier, in Virginia. Various reasons were suggested for this exchange, the wishes of friends, the proximity to the trustee and the other relations of the wife, and the superior accommodations for the family of Wormeley. The negotiation took effect; but no deed of conveyance or covenant of agreement recognising the exchange, was ever made by Wormeley; and no conveyance of any sort, or declaration of trust, substituting the Fauquier lands for those conveyed by the marriage settlement, was ever executed by the trustee. Wormeley and his family, however, removed to the Fauquier lands, and resided on them for some time. During this residence, to wit, on the 16th of September, 1810, the trustees sold and conveyed the Frederick lands, to the defendant Veitch, for the sum of $6,500; and to this conveyance, Wormeley, for the purpose of signifying his approbation of the sale, became a party. The circumstances of this transaction were as follows: Strode, the trustee, had become the owner of a tract of land in Culpepper county, in Virginia, subject to a mortgage to Veitch and one Thompson, upon which more than $3,000 were then due, and a foreclosure had taken place. To discharge this debt, and relieve the Culpepper estate, was a leading object of the sale, and so much of the trust money as was necessary for the extinguishment of this debt, was applied for this purpose. At the same time, Strode, as collateral security to Veitch for the performance of the covenant of general warranty contained in the indenture, executed a mortgage upon the Fauquier lands, then in the possession of Wormeley. In 1811, Veitch conveyed the Frederick lands, to the defendants, Castleman and McCormick, for a large pecuniary consideration, in pursuance of a previous agreement, and by the same deed, made an equitable assignment of the mortgage on the Fauquier lands. About this time, Wormeley, having become dissatisfied with the Fauquier lands, a negotiation took place for his removal to some lands of Strode, the trustee, in Kentucky; and, upon that occasion, a conditional agreement was entered into between Strode and Wormeley, for the purchase of a part of the Kentucky lands, in lieu of the Fauquier lands, at a stipulated price, if Wormeley should, after his removal there, be satisfied with them. Wormeley, accordingly, removed to Kentucky, with his family; but, becoming dissatisfied with the Kentucky lands, the agreement was never carried into effect. Afterwards, in April, 1813, Castleman and McCormick, by deed, released the mortgage on the Fauquier lands, in consideration, that Veitch would enter into a general covenant of warranty to them of the Frederick lands; and on the same day, Strode the trustee executed a deed of trust to one Daniel Lee, subjecting the Kentucky lands to a lien as security for the warranty in the conveyance of the Frederick lands, and, subject to that lien, to the trusts of the marriage settlement, if Wormeley should accept these lands, reserving, however, to himself, a right to substitute any other lands upon which to charge the trusts of the marriage settlement. At this period, the dissatisfaction of Wormeley was known to all the parties, and Wormeley was neither a party, nor assented to the deed; and Castleman and McCormick had not paid the purchase-money. In August, 1813, the trustee sold the Fauquier lands to certain persons, by the name of Grimmer and Mundell, without making any other provision for the trusts of the marriage settlement.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. The plaintiffs in this cause, are a wife and a mother, with her three infant children. They apply to this court for its aid, to restore them to the possession of property conveyed in contemplation of marriage, by a deed of which they are the principal objects. The defendants are the husband, the trustee (and that trustee a brother), and the purchasers of the trust estate. The defendant, Hugh Wallace Wormeley, being about to intermarry with the plaintiff, Mary, executed a deed, dated the 5th of August, 1807, the day on which the marriage took effect, by which he conveyed, in lieu of dower, his paternal estate, consisting of a small tract of land, in the county of Frederick, and some slaves, to Thomas Strode, the brother of his intended wife, in trust, principally for her and her children. This property is gone, the trust is totally defeated, and the first inquiry is, whether this effect has been produced by the regular execution of any power inserted in the deed. The deed contains this uncommon clause: "And it is further covenanted, bargained, and agreed, by and between the said contracting parties, that whenever, in the opinion of the said Thomas Strode, the said landed estate can be sold, and conveyed, and the money arising from the sale thereof, laid out in the purchase of other lands, advantageously, for those concerned, or interested therein; that then, in that case, he, the said Thomas Strode, is hereby authorized, and by these presents, fully empowered to sell, and by proper deeds of writing, convey the same; and the lands, so by him purchased, shall be, in every respect, subject to all the provisions, uses, trusts, and contingencies, as those were by him sold and conveyed." I term this, an uncommon clause, because it authorizes the trustee to sell on his own judgment, without consulting those who are to be benefited by the trust. The power thus granted is great, but it is not unlimited. The trustee is not to exercise his will, but his judgment. Whenever, in his opinion, the trust estate can be sold, and the money invested in other land, advantageously for the parties interested; then, and then only, may he sell and make this reinvestment. The standard by which he is to act is invisible. Yet it is an actually existing standard, and one by which the conduct of the trustee must be measured. To determine, whether he has been regulated by it or not, his actions must be examined.

In inquiring, whether a party has acted according to his best judgment or not, allowance must be made for the fallibility of the human mind, and for difference of opinion. But there are strong cases, in which all will unite in saying, that the judgment has not been fairly exercised. If, under such a power, as is in this deed, a tract of land, notoriously worth $10,000, should be sold, and invested in a tract not worth $1,000, it would be in vain for the trustee to say, that in his opinion, the sale and reinvestment was an advantageous operation. He could not have entertained such an opinion. The case is certainly not less strong, where he makes no reinvestment whatever. He could not be of opinion, that it was advantageous to the parties, to sell the land and get nothing for it. But further. Where there is no reinvestment of the money, the very letter of the power is disregarded. He is to sell only, when the money can be advantageously laid out in the purchase of other lands, "and the lands so purchased, are to be held in trust, for the same objects with those sold." There must be other lands purchased, or the power is not executed. The sale and purchase are different links of the same chain; though the parts are distinct, they seem to be parts of one operation, which is incomplete, if either be wanting. These parts, too, it would seem, must be in execution at the same time. I do not well comprehend, how the judgment can be fairly exercised on the advantageousness of a sale and purchase, without comparing the tract to be sold, with the tract to be purchased. The words of the power, and the situation of the parties, are equally opposed to the idea of selling first, and then searching for other lands, on which to place the Wormeley family.

Having premised these general observations, on the nature of the power, under which the trustee acted, the court will proceed to consider more particularly, the facts of the case, in order to decide, whether the cestuis que trust have still a remedy against the land, or only against the person of the trustee or purchaser. Wormeley, with his wife, resided, for a short time, either on the trust estate, or with his mother. Their situation appears not to have been comfortable; and in little more than a year after the marriage, both the father and brother of Mrs. Wormeley expressed a strong desire to remove her into their neighbourhood; and an agreement was made between the defendants, Strode and Wormeley, with the approbation, as it appears, of the friends of Wormeley, for the exchange of the trust land, for a tract lying in the county of Fauquier. To this tract, Wormeley removed, and soon afterwards, Thomas Strode sold the land, in Frederick, to Richard Veitch, one of the defendants in this cause, and conveyed it to him by deed, dated in September, 1810, to which deed Wormeley was a party. Veitch was the holder of a mortgage on the estate of Strode, in Culpepper, which had been foreclosed, and on which something more than $3,000 were due. This sum was discounted in part payment of the trust estate. The Fauquier lands were never conveyed to the same uses with the Frederick lands, nor have any others been substituted in their place. In about twelve months, Wormeley became dissatisfied with this estate, and some arrangements were made for furnishing him with lands in Kentucky, which are not further noticed, because they have terminated in nothing, and do not affect this part of the case. Subsequently to these arrangements, Strode sold the land in Fauquier.

Excluding from our view the rights of the purchaser, and considering the case as between the plaintiffs and the trustee, can it be doubted whether this transaction would, in any manner, affect the Frederick lands? We will not inquire into the relative value of the two tracts: we will not inquire whether the approbation, given by the friends of Wormeley to this exchange, arose from a knowledge of this relative value, or from the hope that he would derive other advantages from living in the neighbourhood of his wife's father, which would more than compensate for any small loss in the exchange; we will not inquire, whether, at the time, Strode intended to execute the contract; we will suppose this transaction to have originated in the causes which have been assigned for it; still the policy, and the wise policy, of courts of equity, forbids trustees to bargain with themselves. In the execution of trusts, especially such as this, no unworthy ingredient, respecting self, ought to be intermingled. It is wisely held to vitiate the whole transaction. A trustee, conscious of the utmost purity and fairness of intention, who makes a contract with himself, for the trust property, performs a most perilous act. He exposes himself to every hazard which can befall the estate. It does not, in point of law, alter the case, that Wormeley assented to this exchange. He had no power to assent. The deed was executed to secure the land against him and his indiscretions. If, then, the Fauquier lands had been actually settled in trust, the title of Strode, to the Frederick land, could not be secure. But the Fauquier land has not been, nor can it be, settled on the Wormeley family. That part of the power, which respects the reinvestment of the money in other lands, remains totally unexecuted. Can it, then, be doubted, that Strode, if he now held the Frederick lands, if he had conveyed them, and taken back a re-conveyance to himself, would hold them under the trusts created by the deed of 1807?

Believing this point to be perfectly clear, the court will proceed to inquire, secondly, whether the land, in the hands of purchasers, remains liable to the same trusts? It is believed to be unquestionable, that, by conveying the land in Frederick, to his own purposes, without selling other land to the same trusts, the trustee committed a breach of trust. It is equally clear, that a purchaser of the trust property, with notice of the trust, and its violation, is himself a trustee. This principle is too familiar with the profession to require that cases should be cited in its support. Had the purchasers, in this case, notice? And, first, had Veitch notice? I do not mean to inquire, merely, whether he had notice of the trust, because, claiming title under the trust deed, he is, of course, acquainted with its contents; but, also, whether he had also notice of the breach of trust? Strode violated his duty as a trustee, probably, in bargaining with himself, or with Wormeley, whom he knew to be incapable of making a contract respecting this property; and in selling the Frederick land for his own purposes; certainly, in not immediately executing a proper deed for the Fauquier lands. He ought not to have permitted this duty to remain a day unperformed. He ought not to have exposed the Fauquier lands to the hazard of remaining apparently his property, without any deed declaring the trusts by which he held them. Had he purchased other lands for the Wormeley family, and taken a conveyance to himself, without specifying the trusts, his conduct, certainly, would not have comported with his duty. As little did it accord with his duty to hold this land without a declaration of trust. I speak of the state of things at the time of the sale to Veitch, not of the state of things afterwards.

Were these facts known to Veitch? With the application of the purchase-money in discharge of his own decree, he was of course acquainted. That Wormeley relied on receiving the Fauquier land instead of the Frederick land, was, probably, equally well known to him. The character of the title, and the situation of the parties, Wormeley, no longer residing on the Frederick land, and having removed to Fauquier, would lead to inquiries which must explain the transaction. Wormeley's certificate, too, given a few days before the deed to Veitch was executed, shows that some specific land was substituted for that in Frederick; and shows further, that the tract so substituted was acquired by an exchange of property with the trustee. Veitch then knew from this certificate, that the land was not to be sold to him by Strode in execution of his power, but that Strode had already appropriated the trust estate to his own use, and was selling for himself. Whether he knew that the tract in Fauquier was the land alluded to or not, he knew the character of the transaction, and took upon himself the risk of its validity. But it is not to be believed, that he did not know every thing which it was material to know. The certificate itself points to the tract, for it is dated at Roseville, in Fauquier. He must, also, be considered, in this court, as having notice, that a deed was not executed, declaring the trusts on which the newly acquired land was held. He had a right to see this deed, and was bound to see it. Its non-production was proof of its non-existence. But this is not all. If he knew that the Fauquier land was substituted for the Frederick land, as we think he did, then the deed he received of those lands, as collateral security, proves his knowledge, in fact, that no conveyance of them in trust had been made. He probably relied on the certificate of Wormeley as his security, and, certainly, that certificate would go far in protecting him from any claim made by Wormeley. But he ought to have been advised, that Mrs. Wormeley and her children could not be affected by it.

There is a circumstance growing out of the deed from Strode to Veitch, not entirely unworthy of notice. That deed is apparently drawn by counsel before whom the papers were laid. We should expect it to state the transaction truly, was there nothing in the transaction which there was a wish to conceal. We should expect it to refer to the exchange between Wormeley and Strode, if that exchange was believed to be a fair execution of the trust. Such a reference would have secured the land from many casualties. But the deed declares, that Strode sold the trust land to Veitch, "with an intention of investing the proceeds of such sale in other lands of equal or greater value." This untruth, which was known to Veitch, betrays a consciousness that the transaction required some other shape than its own. But could Veitch even have supposed, that the money was to be invested in other lands to be purchased in future; he knew that a large portion of it was directed to his own debt, and he must have known, that a trustee, whose embarrassments could induce him to seize a trust fund in order to relieve his own estate from being sold under a mortgage that was foreclosed, could not come into market without money, to purchase other lands, under very advantageous circumstances. Add to this consideration, that the power given by the deed of trust to Strode, was not to sell with the intention of investing the money in other lands at some future time, but to sell and invest when, in his opinion, it could be done to advantage. Veitch, then, had notice of all the material facts which constituted the breach of trust committed by Strode, and is, consequently, to be considered, in this court, as holding the land subject to the trusts created by the deed of August, 1807.

Are Castleman and McCormick in a different situation? The answer to this question depends on their having notice of the transactions which constitute the breach of trust. Purchasing a title depending on the deed of August, 1807, they would of course inspect that deed, and would perceive that Strode's power to sell was coupled with the duty of investing the money in other lands. They would perceive that this was not a case where a sale is the object of the trust; where it is the duty of the trustee to sell in any event, and afterwards dispose of the trust money; but a case in which the great object of the trust was the security of the estate; and the power to sell was limited to the case where, "in the opinion of Strode, the land can be sold and the money laid out in the purchase of other lands, advantageously for those interested, and that in such case, the lands so purchased were to be held for the same trusts, &c." The very deed under which they claim, then, informed them that their title originated in a trust, and that it behoved them to inquire how that trust had been executed. The parties were all within the reach of inquiry, and the difficulty of making it was inconsiderable. The deed to Veitch was dated the 16th of September, 1810, and the deed to Castleman and McCormick was certified for the purpose of being recorded on 25th of June, 1811. They say in their answer that they purchased in 1810. Previous to this time, Wormeley had become dissatisfied with the Fauquier land and they knew it. Had they not been informed of this, they must have known that the title to those lands still remained in Strode, and, consequently, that he had not performed his duty as a trustee. With this knowledge, they enable Strode to sell the Fauquier land.

If the case rested on these facts, the court would feel much difficulty in allowing to these defendants the protection they claim as purchasers without notice. But the case does not rest on these facts. In their answer these defendants say, that they cannot doubt the fairness of the transaction, "because they are well satisfied that Strode never received more from Veitch, than he has given the cestui que trust credit for." Is it a fair execution of this trust and power, to sell the trust estate, and give the cestui que trust credit for the amount of sales? The defendants proceed to deny all fraud in themselves and all knowledge of fraud in Strode or Veitch. This is not sufficient. Fraud is an inference of law from facts, and this answer denies no fact alleged in the bill, nor does it deny a knowledge of those facts, with which knowledge they are charged, but states their opinion that no fact which has come to their knowledge, is fraudulent. The answer then, though it does not confess, does not controvert notice of the facts which prove a breach of trust. Is that notice otherwise proved?

Benjamin Barnet deposes that they were in treaty with Strode for the land before the sale to Veitch, and were to have paid a part of the purchase-money to Veitch in discharge of a debt due to him from Strode, and that they endeavoured to make an arrangement with Veitch, but failed; when afterwards this land was sold to Veitch, these defendants must have known that it was sold not for the purposes of the trust, but on Strode's own account. Their answer avers the opinion that such a sale was lawful. George Tacket proves that in May, 1811, prior to the execution of the deed from Veitch, while the Wormeley family were in Frederick on their way to Kentucky, when some doubt was expressed of continuing their journey, the defendant Castleman expressed great uneasiness, lest the journey should not be prosecuted, because he expected they would receive lands in that country, in lieu of the lands he had purchased from Veitch. Still further. It is well known that to be a purchaser without notice, not only the contract must be made, but the purchase-money paid before notice, and this should be averred in the answer. See Garnett v. Macon [Case No. 5,245]. Now there is no such averment, and the fact is otherwise. It is proved by Mrs. Powell, that upwards of $3,000, part of the purchase-money was paid in the fall of 1813, and spring of 1814, not only after the full notice, acknowledged in May, 1811, but after the institution of this suit. What material fact, then, was unknown to these defendants? Not one. They were not ignorant of the facts, but of the law arising on those facts. Either there has been no breach of trust, and the original contract is valid, or the defendants are trustees. The court is of opinion that they are trustees. But though trustees, they are not to be considered as mere squatters; the light in which they are viewed by the counsel for the plaintiffs. They believed their title to be good and acted on the conviction that it was so. They trusted to the full power of Strode. They do not appear to have placed Veitch between them and danger, but, probably, could not raise the money. While compelled to do equity, they are entitled to equity. They are entitled to the benefit of the encumbrances from which the land has been relieved, and of the permanent improvements which they have made on it, and to the advances to Wormeley for the support of his family. At the same time they are accountable for the profits. The advances are properly chargeable against the profits, but the encumbrances which have been taken up, and the improvements, if not absorbed by the profits, constitute a charge upon the land.

Decree: This cause came on to be heard on the bill, answers, exhibits, and depositions of witnesses and arguments of counsel, which being fully considered, the court is of opinion, that the exchange of land made between the defendant, Hugh Wallace Wormeley and Thomas Strode, is not valid in equity, and that the defendant, Thomas Strode, has committed a breach of trust, in selling the land conveyed to him by the deed of the 5th of August, 1807, for purposes not warranted by that deed; in misapplying the money produced by the said sale; and in failing to settle other lands to the same trusts as were created by the said deed; and that the defendants, Richard Veitch, David Castleman, and Charles McCormick, are purchasers, with notice of the facts which constitute the breach of trust committed by the said Thomas Strode, and are, therefore, in equity, considered as trustees; and that the defendants, David Castleman and Charles McCormick, do hold the land conveyed by Hugh Wallace Wormeley to Thomas Strode, by deed, bearing date the 5th day of August, 1807, charged with the trusts in the said deed mentioned, until a court of equity shall decree a conveyance thereof. The court is further of opinion, that the said defendants are severally accountable for the rents and profits arising out of the said trust property while in possession thereof, and that the said defendants, Castleman and McCormick, are entitled to the amount of the encumbrances from which the land has been relieved by any of the defendants, and of the value of the permanent improvements made thereon, and of the advances which have been made to the said Hugh Wallace Wormeley, by any of the defendants, for the support of his family; the said advances to be credited against the rents and profits, and the value of the said permanent improvements, and of the encumbrances which have been discharged, and which may not be abated by the rents and profits, to be charged on the land itself; and it is referred to one of the commissioners of the court to take accounts according to the directions herein given, and report the same to this court in order to a final decree.

NOTE. In pursuance of the interlocutory decree above recited, the commissioner to whom the accounts were referred, made a report, which was partially confirmed; the court reserving some questions for its future decision. "And it being represented on the part of the plaintiffs, that they have removed to the state of Kentucky, and are about removing to the state of Mississippi, and that it will be highly advantageous to them to sell the trust estate, and to invest the proceeds of sale in other lands in the state of Mississippi, to the uses and trusts expressed in the deed of August 5, 1807; and it appearing, also, that there is no fund other than the trust estate, from which the sums due to the defendants, Castleman and McCormick, can be drawn, this court is further of opinion, that the said trust estate ought to be sold, and the proceeds of sale, after paying the sum due to the defendants, Castleman and McCormick, invested in other lands in the state of Mississippi, to the same uses and trusts, &c." The sale was accordingly decreed, commissioners were appointed to make it, and the proceeds directed to be first applied in satisfaction of the sums found due by the report, and the balance to be paid to the trustee, to be invested by him in Mississippi lands, "for which he shall take a conveyance to himself, in trust for the uses and trusts expressed in the deed of August 5, 1807, &c.": and the court proceeded to revoke the powers of Thomas Strode, he being an unfit person to act longer in that capacity. Other orders and decrees were subsequently made in this cause, which it is unnecessary to detail further. Finally, the court set aside so much of the decretal order of a previous term, as directed the land to be sold to the highest bidder; and until the appointment of a trustee, the marshal was directed to receive propositions for the purchase of the land, and to report the same to the court, which would give such further directions respecting the sale of the land as should then appear proper. Whereupon the defendants appealed from all the decrees pronounced in the cause.

The supreme court held (1) That the exchange of the Frederick lands for those in Fauquier, was invalid, because it was in contravention of the letter and spirit of the power of the trustee, and because the "stubborn rule of equity" which forbids a trustee from bargaining with himself, was peculiarly applicable to this case; (2) that Veitch was a purchaser with notice of the breach of trust; and that the sale was, consequently, invalid as to him, and he must be considered in a court of equity as a mere trustee; (3) that Castleman and McCormick were in no better situation, and must also be considered as purchasers with notice, and consequently, as trustees; (4) that a bona fide purchaser, without notice, must be so, not only at the time of the contract, but at the time of the payment of the purchase-money. Decrees affirmed with costs, Johnson, J., dissenting.

An objection to the jurisdiction of the court was taken in the supreme court on the ground that Wormeley, the husband, was made a defendant, and so, all the parties on each side of the cause were not citizens of different states, since he had the same citizenship as his wife and infant children. Strawbridge v. Curtis, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 267; Corporation of New Orleans v. Winter, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 91. But the court said that Wormeley was a nominal defendant, joined for the sake of conformity in the bill, against whom no decree was sought, that he appeared voluntarily, though perhaps, he could not have been compelled so to do; that the court would not suffer its jurisdiction to be ousted by the joinder or non-joinder of mere formal parties, but would rather proceed without them, and decide upon the merits of the case between the parties who have the real interests before it, whenever it could be done without prejudice to the rights of others. Wormeley v. Wormeley, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 421.

WORMS (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,765.

Case No. 18,048.

WORMSER et al. v. DAHLMAN et al.

[16 Blatchf. 319; 57 How. Prac. 286; 7 Reporter, 740.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 14, 1879.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE — NONRESIDENT DEFENDANT — NOTICE OF APPLICATION.

1. W. brought suit in a state court of New York against D. and K. and R., as copartners, to recover on a promissory note. Process was served on D. alone. He alone appeared. W. and K. were, at the time the suit was commenced, citizens of New York. D. and R. were, at that time, citizens of California. D. took proceedings, under subdivision 2 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes, to remove the suit, so far as it concerned him, into this court, without notice to the attorney for W. The petition for removal was not signed or verified by D., but by D.'s attorney in the suit. W. moved to remand the cause to the state court. Held, subdivision 2 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes was not repealed by the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470).

2. The suit was one in which there could be a final determination of the controversy, so far as concerned D., without the presence of K. and R., as parties.

3. Any rights which W. would have had as against K. and R., from serving process on D., remain to W. in this court.

4. Notice of the application for the removal was not necessary.

5. The petition was sufficiently signed and verified.

[This was a suit by Isadore Wormser and Simon Wormser against Charles Dahlman, Arthur A. Kline, and Adolph B. Roth.]

D. M. Porter, for plaintiffs.

R. S. Newcombe, for defendant Dahlman.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This suit was commenced in the superior court of the city of New York. Process was served on the defendant Dahlman alone. He appeared in the state court in the suit, and the complaint was put in and he answered it. No other defendant has appeared or answered either in the state court or in this court. The plaintiffs and the defendant Kline were, at the time the suit was commenced, citizens of the state of New York, and the other defendants were, at that time, citizens of the state of California. The suit is one against the three defendants as copartners, to recover on a copartnership liability, on two promissory notes, made by the defendants as copartners. Dahlman presented to the state court a petition, verified April 1, 1879, setting forth, "that there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as it concerns your petitioner, without the presence of the other defendants as parties to the cause," and "that your petitioner is desirous, so far as concerns him, of removing the cause to the United States circuit court," and praying, "that, so far as it concerns him, the cause may be removed to the next circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York." The necessary bond was given, and was approved by a judge of the state court. It does not appear that the plaintiffs' attorney had notice, in the state court, of the proceedings for removal, or that any order of removal was made by the state court. The defendant Dahlman has filed in this court papers certified by the clerk of the state court, as a copy of the record in the suit, and of all process, pleadings and other proceedings in it, which consist of the summons, notice to the plaintiffs' attorneys of Dahlman's appearance, complaint, answer of Dahlman, petition for removal and bond on removal. On filing such papers in this court, the defendant Dahlman entered a rule in this court, continuing the cause therein, and noting his appearance therein by an attorney, and served on the plaintiffs' attorney a copy of such rule with notice of its entry. The plaintiffs now move to remand the cause to the state court.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 7 Reporter, 740, contains only a partial report.]

It is plain that the proceedings for removal were taken not under the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470), but under the second subdivision of section 639 of the Revised Statutes, which is a re-enactment of the provisions of the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306). Under the act of 1875, nothing less than the whole suit can be removed into this court. Under the act of 1866 and subdivision 2 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes, the suit may be removed only as against the defendant who petitions to have it removed only as against him.

It is contended for the plaintiffs, that subdivision 2 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes, is repealed by the act of 1875, as being in conflict with the provisions of that act. I am not referred to any case in which it has been distinctly held, in a federal court, in a case involving the point, that said subdivision 2 is repealed by the act of 1875. On the contrary, in Girardey v. Moore [Case No. 5,462], it was held by Mr. Justice Bradley, in a case involving the point, that said subdivision 2 is not repealed by the act of 1875; and Judge Dillon (Rem. Causes, 2d Ed., p. 28), observes, that it is, probably, the better view, that, if a case is brought within the provisions of the act of 1866, it may still be removed thereunder; that cases may arise of such a nature that they would fall within the act of 1866, and not within that of 1875; and that, in such event, the latter act should not be held to repeal, by implication, the former. This is, I think, the proper view. The act of 1875 does not expressly repeal said subdivision 2 of said section 639; and, as the act of 1875, in section 2, only relates to the removal of the whole suit, while said subdivision 2 of said section 639 relates to the removal of the suit as against one of two or more defendants, if the suit is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as concerns such one defendant, without the presence of the other defendants as parties in the cause, I concur with Mr. Justice Bradley in the view that there is no conflict between the provisions, and no reason why both should not stand, and that said subdivision 2 of said section 639, so far as it authorizes a defendant to remove a cause as to him, is not repealed by the act of 1875.

It is also contended, for the plaintiffs, that this suit is not one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as concerns Dahlman, without the presence of the two defendants sued with him as copartners, as parties in the cause. The view urged is, that, as the three are sued as copartners, no recovery can be had against Dahlman unless the copartnership shall be established, and that, in such event, the determination must be against the three. The plaintiffs, as part of their causes of action on the two notes, set forth, in their complaint, that they signed a composition of such notes, and surrendered them, because of fraudulent representations made by the defendants, inducing such signing and surrender. The plaintiffs contend, that, as such composition was one with the defendants jointly and as copartners, the controversy cannot be determined without the presence of all of them.

The language of subdivision 2 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes is not that the suit must be one in which there can be a final determination of the whole controversy instituted by the plaintiff, as regards all the defendants, without the presence of all, but is only that the suit must be one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy so far as concerns the defendant petitioning for removal, without the presence of the other defendants as parties in the cause. I do not see why this controversy cannot be determined finally, so far as concerns Dahlman, with him alone served or appearing as defendant. He cannot now be heard to allege that the others must be served or appear in this court. The plaintiffs have the right to proceed at the same time with this suit in the state court as against the other two defendants. As this is a suit at law, and the state practice governs it, if the plaintiffs, serving process only on Dahlman, would, if the suit had all of it remained in the state court, and it had been tried there on the present pleadings, and they had recovered judgment, have been entitled to a judgment against all the defendants as composing the copartnership which made the notes, so far as to be able to enforce such judgment against the joint property of all such defendants, and against the separate property of Dahlman, they will be entitled to a like judgment, with like effect, in this court. The words in the statute, "the presence of the other defendants as parties in the cause," means their presence by being served with process or by appearing. Any rights which the plaintiffs would have had in the suit as against the other two defendants, not served or appearing, by reason of the service on or appearance of Dahlman, still remain to the plaintiffs, and are brought into this court by the coming of the plaintiffs and of Dahlman into this court.

It is objected by the plaintiffs, that the petition for removal is not signed or verified by Dahlman, but is signed and verified by the attorney for Dahlman in the suit. I think the petition is sufficiently signed and verified.

There is no force in the objection that notice of the application for removal was not given to the plaintiffs' attorney. The motion to remand the cause is denied.

WORMSER (SEGDWICK v.). See Case No. 12,626.

Case No. 18,049.

WORMSLEY v. BEEDLE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 331.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1822.

EXONERATION OF BAIL—PRINCIPAL IN PENITENTIARY.

After scire facias returned, the bail will be exonerated if the principal be confined in the penitentiary of one of the states before any execution returned against him, and so continue to be confined until the return of the scire facias.

Mr. Mason, after the return of the scire facias, moved the court to exonerate the defendant, who was special bail for one J. B. Rice, on the ground that the principal is now in prison in Virginia on a sentence for an offence against the United States, and cited the following authorities: The case of the bail of Peter Vergen, 2 Strange, 1217, where a prisoner under sentence of transportation was brought up to be surrendered in discharge of his bail; Sharp v. Sheriff, 7 Term R. 226 (S. P.), and Lord Chief Justice Kenyon said, it is what the bail are entitled to ask ex debito justitiæ; Wood v. Mitchell, 6 Term R. 247, where the court permitted an exoneration on the bail-piece because the defendant was under sentence of transportation and actually on board ship, ready to sail; Merrick v. Vaucher, 6 Term R. 50 (S. P.), where the principal was an alien out of the kingdom under the alien bill; Trinder v. Shirley, 1 Doug. 45 (S. P.), where the principal had become a peer, and it was no longer in the power of the bail to surrender him; Fowler v. Dunn, 4 Burrows, 2034 (S. P.), where the principal was sentenced to the state prison for life; and Cathcart v. Cannon, 1 Johns. Cas. 28, where the principle is admitted by Lord Mansfield.

THE COURT (nem. con.) ordered the exoneration to be entered, the principal being confined in the penitentiary of Virginia before any execution returned against him, and continuing therein until the present time.

WORRALL (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,766.

Case No. 18,050.

WORTENDYKE v. WHITE.

[2 Ban. & A. 25.]¹

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. March, 1875.

OWNER OF PATENTED MACHINE—RIGHT TO USE MACHINE—INJUNCTION AGAINST INFRINGEMENT—LACHES.

1. Complainant sold to McP. a patented machine for cutting paper for paper twine, for $225, and gave him a personal license to use it upon payment of a royalty of five cents per pound. Monthly statements were to be made, and on failure to pay the license fee for thirty days after it became due, the complainant could revoke the license. McP. died, and parts of the machine were subsequently sold at auction as scrap iron to N., who reconstructed it out of the old parts and sold it to the defendant. Held, that such a purchase by N. gave him no right to reconstruct and use, from these loose parts, a working machine embodying the complainant's invention.

2. The difference between the ownership of a patented machine and the right to use it, considered.

3. Where the complainant's suspicions of the infringement are allayed by the direct misrepresentations of the defendant, the court cannot give to such defendant any advantage resulting from the lapse of time before applying for injunction.

4. Where a motion for a preliminary injunction is resisted on the ground of complainant's laches, the burden of proving complainant's previous knowledge of the infringement is upon the defendant, and must be proved by him.

[This was a bill in equity by John B. Wortendyke against James White, for the infringement of letters patent No. 44,249, granted to complainant September 13, 1864; reissued November 22, 1864,—No. 1,825.]

E. Q. Keasbey, for complainant.

A. J. Todd, for defendant.

NIXON, District Judge. The bill of complaint was filed in this case February 4, 1875, alleging an infringement of reissued letters patent, No. 1,825, for "machine for cutting paper for paper twine," and granted to the complainant November 22, 1864. The matter is now before the court on an application by the complainant for a provisional injunction. The infringement is substantially admitted by the defendant, and two questions are presented by the affidavits in the case for consideration: (1) Whether the defendant has exhibited such a satisfactory title to the machine in use by him, that he should be allowed to continue its use, as against the exclusive rights of the complainant under the patent, until the final hearing. (2) Whether there has been an acquiescence by the complainant in the infringement of the defendant to the extent that he should not now be protected by a preliminary injunction.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

¹ [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

1. The affidavits presented by the complainant on the hearing, disclose, that a few weeks after he obtained his reissued letters patent, to wit, in the month of December, 1864, he caused to be built three machines embodying his invention, one of which he sold to Elijah Rosencrantz, and the remaining two to a Dr. McPherson, of Paterson, New Jersey; that these were delivered to McPherson, at the price of $225 each, which was the cost of their construction; that a personal license was given to the said McPherson to use them in the manufacture of paper twine; that monthly accounts were to be rendered to the patentee of the quantity of paper twine manufactured and sold, on which he was to pay a royalty of five cents per pound, upon every pound sold during the month; that on every package of twine made, should be marked the words, "Wortendyke's Patent Manilla Twine." That on his failure to pay the said license fee, for thirty days after it became due, the complainant should be at liberty to revoke the license to manufacture and sell; that McPherson undertook the manufacture of twine with the machines, but after a few months' trial abandoned the business, as not remunerative; that he paid nothing to complainant as a royalty for their use, and upon his death in January, 1866, the complainant made a settlement with the representatives of his estate, took back one of the machines in part payment of his claim, and did not take back the other, because he was informed, that it had been broken up, and was worthless for further use.

This statement is not controverted by the defendant. He admits that he saw the machine while it was in the hands of McPherson, who told him that he had bought it of complainant. He claims, that in the month of June, 1871, he purchased it of one John Nichols for a valuable consideration, without notice of any restriction or condition annexed to the absolute ownership of the said McPherson, and that Nichols bought the machine of McPherson. But Nichols' affidavit hardly sustains the defendant's claim. He swears that he sold the machine to the defendant about the month of May, 1870, for about two hundred dollars; and that he had never heard and had no reason to believe, that there was any condition or reservation of royalty attached to it while it was owned by McPherson, or at any other time. He does not say of whom, or under what circumstances, he purchased it. He probably meant to suggest by the cautious phraseology used, that he had something to do with McPherson in regard to it; and if so, it is feared he was suggesting what was not true. Other affidavits in the case tend to show, with reasonable certainty, that McPherson sold the machine, a short time before his death, to one John Dean, of Paterson, for $65 or $70; that in 1868, Hindel & Allen, auctioneers in the city of Paterson, made public sale of a lot of machinery and scrap iron, belonging to Dean, and that among the iron were parts of this dismantled machine; that they were bought, as scrap iron, by the firm of P. V. H. Van Reiper & Son, who, in the year 1869, made sale of the parts of the machine thus purchased, to John Nichols for $25.30. Mr. Geo. P. Van Reiper, one of the members of the firm, testifies that the entry of the sale in their books is as follows: "John Nichols, Dr. To 23 lbs. (part of paper-cutting machine), $25.30." It is hardly necessary to observe that such a purchase gave no right to Nichols to reconstruct from these loose materials a working machine, embodying the complainant's invention. Confusion on this subject, has, doubtless, arisen from not distinguishing between the ownership of a patented machine and the right to use it. The one does not always include the other. Thus, it was held by Mr. Justice McLean, in Wilson v. Stolley [Case No. 17,839], that where a person, licensed to run a patented machine, sold it to another, the license to run the machine did not necessarily pass to the grantee. And so, where a suit was brought against a sheriff for the infringement of the patent rights of the plaintiffs, and the proof was that he had levied upon and sold three completed patented machines, belonging to the plaintiffs, by virtue of an execution against them, Justice Story held that such sale was no violation of the patent act, which imposed a penalty upon any one for selling the thing whereof an exclusive right is secured to a patentee, without the patentee's consent, because it did not follow that the sale of the materials of which a machine was composed, carried with it the right to use the machine without a license. Sawin v. Guild [Id. 12,391]. The affidavits in the case tend to prove, that all McPherson got from the complainant was a personal license to use the machine, upon the payment of a certain royalty. If that were an equitable right which was assignable—which I am far from asserting—there is no proof that McPherson ever attempted to assign it.

2. But the defendant claims that the complainant has so long delayed his application as to be cut off from the right to a preliminary injunction. Courts of equity do not look with favor upon those who slumber over their rights. Bovill v. Crate, reported in L. R. 1 Eq. 388, and quoted by defendant's counsel, is just in point. That was an application to restrain the defendant from the use of a patented article, by an interlocutory injunction. The bill was filed in July, 1865; and as soon as it appeared in the case that the complainant had written to the defendant in the preceding November, complaining that he had been infringing for upwards of a year, the vice chancellor stopped the proceedings by inquiring, how it was possible, after that correspondence, to ask for an interlocutory order? He subsequently remarked, in refusing the injunction, "It is very important to the practice of the court, not to have it cited as authority hereafter, that the court will grant such relief as is here asked, upon an application made in July, 1865, when it is informed that the plaintiff, certainly as early as in August, 1864, and probably in July, 1864, knew what he knows now of defendant's proceedings." But there must be satisfactory proof of knowledge, or means of knowledge, before laches can be imputed. The only evidence here, that complainant was aware of the defendant's infringement, is the affidavit of the defendant himself. He says, that about two years ago he had a conversation with complainant on the cars coming from New York, and then stated to him that he was using the McPherson machine and claimed the right to use it. On the other hand, the complainant swears that the first knowledge he ever had of the defendant's infringement was in the month of January last, when he was informed of the fact by one Terhune; that the only conversation on the subject he had with the defendant was on the cars, and was referred to in the defendant's affidavit; that he then informed the defendant that he had understood that he had constructed and was using a machine for cutting paper twine, which was an infringement of his patent; that the defendant replied that he was not, but that he was using the same machine that one Gilmore had used in making paper twine in Lee, Massachusetts; that affiant knew that Gilmore had gone out of business, some time previously, and inferred that he had bought and was using a Gilmore machine. If it be true that the suspicions of the complainant, in regard to the defendant's infringement, were allayed by the direct misrepresentations of the defendant, the court cannot give to him any advantage resulting from the lapse of time. But whether this be true or not, the allegation of the defendant in regard to knowledge is unequivocally denied by the complainant, and in such an issue the burden is on the defendant.

A preliminary injunction must issue against the defendant, until the further order of the court.

WORTH (ESSLER v.). See Case No. 4,533a.
30 Fed. Cas.—41

Case No. 18,051.

In re WORTHINGTON.

[7 Biss. 455; 16 N. B. R. 52; 1 N. W. Rep. (O. S.) 109; 9 Chi. Leg. News, 346; 4 Law & Eq. Rep. 78; 16 Alb. Law J. 63; 23 Int. Rev. Rec. 233; 2 Cin. Law Bul. 189.]¹

Circuit Court, W. D. Wisconsin. June, 1877.²

NON-JURIDICAL DAY—ENTRY OF TRANSCRIPT OF JUDGMENT.

The act of the circuit clerk in filing the docket transcript of a judgment, is a ministerial act, and not void, though done on a non-judicial day, and the judgment creditors thereby acquired a lien upon the real estate of the judgment debtor the same as if done on any other day.

[Cited in Re Boyd, Case No. 1,746.]

[Cited in Whipple v. Hill (Neb.) 55 N. W. 228.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Western district of Wisconsin.]

In bankruptcy.

Cottrill & Cary, for assignee.

Jenkins, Elliot & Winkler, for judgment creditors.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. On the 24th of December, 1874, Charles E. Storm and Robert Hill recovered a judgment against the bankrupt [R. C. Worthington] in the circuit court of Milwaukee county, for $3,464. On the following day a transcript of the docket was filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court in Wood county, where the bankrupt had, at the time, real estate. Several months after this, proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, and Worthington was adjudged a bankrupt in July, 1875.

The judgment creditors made an application to the district court to direct the assignee to sell the real estate of the bankrupt, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the judgment, and to permit them to prove their claim for any balance that might be found due. This application was denied by the district court, on the ground that the act of filing the transcript by the clerk in Wood county was void, and gave the judgment creditors no lien upon the property, as it was done on Christmas day—a holiday under the laws of this state. [Case No. 18,052.]

By the law of this state, the clerk of the circuit court was required to keep a book for the entry of judgments, and immediately after entering the judgment the clerk was to file certain papers which were to constitute what was called the judgment roll, which was to contain a copy of the judgment; and after this was done he was to enter in an alphabetical docket, in books to be provided and kept by him, a statement of the judgment, and containing certain particulars as set forth in the statute, namely: the names of the parties, the amount of the debt or damages recovered, with the costs, the hour and day of entering in the docket, etc., and then the judgment became a lien upon the real estate of the debtor. And when it was sought to cause the real estate of the debtor to become bound by the judgment in any other county than that where it was rendered, it became necessary to file with the clerk of the circuit court of that county a transcript of the original docket, and from the time of filing it constituted a lien on the property of the debtor in that county.

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 4 Law & Eq. Rep. 78, and 16 Alb. Law J. 63, contain only partial reports.]

² [Reversing Case No. 18,052.]

The question then to be determined in this case, is, whether the act of the clerk in filing the transcript of the original docket in his office on Christmas day, was a nullity under the laws of this state.

The statute declares that no court shall be open, or transact any business on the 22d of February or the 4th of July, unless to instruct or discharge a jury or to receive a verdict, and the 25th day of December and the 1st day of January are declared to be holidays. If the act of the clerk was void, it was so under the common law, or these statutes.

At common law, Sunday was deemed a non-judicial day, during which no courts could transact any business or render any decree. Of course, at common law, some of the days which, under our practice, are deemed non-judicial, were unknown as such; and when they are so declared, the inference would be that the prohibition extends no farther than is named in the statute. It is hardly to be presumed that ordinary business cannot be transacted in this state, and binding contracts entered into, on the 22d day of February or the 4th of July, and the question is, whether because the 25th day of December and the 1st of January are declared to be holidays, that, therefore, no ministerial act can be performed on those days by an officer of this state. It may be conceded that on those days a clerk could not be required to perform any duty connected with his office, because the state has declared it a holiday; but that is a very different thing from asserting that every ministerial act done by the clerk voluntarily on those days is necessarily void. The statute in relation to the 22d of February and 4th of July was passed in 1861; but when there was legislation in 1862 as to the 25th of December and 1st of January there was no prohibition in relation to the courts, except what might be inferred from the fact that they were declared holidays. It was not till afterwards (1869) that it was declared that when the day for the meeting of the court should fall on a legal holiday, it should be adjourned to the following day.

While at the common law no judicial act could be done on Sunday, the authorities seem to agree that mere ministerial acts could be performed, and the service of the process was regarded as a ministerial act, and therefore valid, although performed on Sunday, and the act of 29 Car. II. became necessary in order to render it invalid, and in the case of Van Vechten v. Paddock, 12 Johns. 178, which is relied upon, by the district court, the supreme court of New York, in order to decide that the issuing of process on a Sunday was void, insisted that the awarding of the process was a judicial act, done whilst the court was in actual session, being thus obliged to resort to an acknowledged fiction to sustain its opinion.

If ministerial acts performed on Sunday were not invalid at common law, for a stronger reason those performed on Christmas day would not be invalid. It is a curious fact that while the judge of the court who gave the opinion in Van Vechten v. Paddock, seems inclined to hold that the service of process on Sunday was illegal at common law, the judge who delivered the opinion in Johnson v. Day, 17 Pick. 106, declares that an arrest on civil process on Sunday was legal at common law, and that is the opinion of the judge who decided the case of Pearce v. Atwood, 13 Mass. 324, where the subject is thoroughly discussed. The district court relied upon the case of Lampe v. Manning, 38 Wis. 673, as deciding that the act of the clerk here in question was void. But in fact that case only decided that a trial and judgment rendered by a justice of the peace on the 23d day of February, and which, under the statute, as coming on Monday, was to be treated as the 22d—and, therefore, a holiday—were invalid, and should be regarded as a nullity, and the court says nothing about the effect of ministerial acts done on a holiday. The natural conclusion would seem to be, that when the state legislature in 1861, legislated in relation to the 22d of February and 4th of July, and made prohibitions, and then again legislated in 1862 as to the 25th of December and 1st of January, the prohibitions should not, by construction merely, be enlarged.

It may be admitted that the entry of a judgment by which a man's property is to be bound, or, as it is termed in the statute of this state, the docketing of the same, is a very important act. The entry of the judgment is judicial, but is the docketing of the judgment by the clerk anything more than a ministerial act? There is no exercise of discretion or of judgment, but the language of the statute to him is mandatory. He shall do certain things, and they are particularly described, and in relation to them he can have no discretion; and it would seem that they were mere ministerial acts. And while this is true of the act of the clerk who docket the judgment in the court where it is rendered, it would seem that where it is transferred to another county and docketed there, that there could be, if possible, less doubt of the character of the act to be performed by the clerk of that county; because all that the statute requires is, that a transcript of the original docket shall be filed with the clerk of the circuit court of the county, so that all that is necessary for the clerk to do is simply to receive the transcript which is brought to him, and file it, and mark it with the date when it is filed. This certainly can be considered nothing more than a ministerial act, not void at common law, and, I think, not rendered so by any statute of this state.

There does not seem to be any statute of this state, which when fairly considered, declares that no official act shall be performed on a holiday. In referring to holidays I do not intend to include Sundays, as to which there is considerable prohibitory legislation by this state, affecting business, public and private, labor, amusements and the service of civil process.

I think, therefore, the act of the clerk of the circuit court of Wood county, in filing the docket transcript was not void, but that the judgment creditors acquired a lien on the real estate of the bankrupt in that county.

The order of the district court will therefore be reversed; but as the judgment of this court cannot be reviewed in this case, I shall authorize the district court, if it shall consider it best, to permit the judgment creditors to proceed on their judgment, and sell the real estate of the bankrupt in Wood county; and then if the other creditors of the bankrupt desire, the right of the purchaser to the property can be tested by the assignee.

Case No. 18,052.

In re WORTHINGTON.

[14 N. B. R. 388; 3 Cent. Law J. 526; 8 Chi. Leg. News, 362; 14 Alb. Law J. 153.]¹

District Court, W. D. Wisconsin. July 15, 1876.²

HOLIDAY—DOCKETING OF JUDGMENT—APPEARANCE—SUMMARY PROCEEDING.

1. The docketing of a judgment on a day that is declared a holiday by statute is void, and confers no lien, for the term holiday imports dies non juridicus.

2. When a party voluntarily appears and moves for the enforcement of a pretended lien, the district court thereby acquires jurisdiction to proceed and dispose of the whole matter in a summary way.

In bankruptcy.

Jenkins, Elliot & Winkler, for judgment creditors.

H. M. Lewis, and Cary & Cotrell, for assignee.

HOPKINS, District Judge. This is an application of Charles E. Storm and others, judgment creditors of the bankrupt, for an order directing the assignee to sell certain real estate of the bankrupt, situate in the county of Wood, and to apply the proceeds upon their judgment, and for leave to prove, as unsecured creditors, any balance that remains upon the judgment after applying said proceeds thereon. They show in their petition that on the 24th of December, 1874, they recovered judgment against the bankrupt for three thousand four hundred and sixty-four dollars and eleven cents in the circuit court of Milwaukee county, and that on the 25th day of December a transcript was filed, and the judgment docketed in Wood county, and they claim that thereby it became a lien upon the real estate of the bankrupt situate in that county. They represent that the real estate in Wood county, which they want sold, is not of sufficient value to pay their judgment, and pray that the assignee may be directed to sell it free of the lien, and to pay the proceeds to them, and that they be allowed to prove up the deficiency as an unsecured debt. The assignee opposes the granting the order, on the ground that the judgment is not a lien on the bankrupt's real estate in Wood county, for the reason that it was docketed there on the 25th day of December, which is, by the statute of this state, declared to be a legal holiday. Laws 1862, c. 248.

This raises the question as to the operation of a statute declaring a certain day a holiday. The act does not in terms prohibit any act from being done on that day; it simply declares that the day shall be a holiday. Does that make the official act of the clerk in docketing the judgment on that day void? For only upon that ground can this court consider the question. If it is voidable, the party must go to the state courts for redress. The question is settled in Lampe v. Manning, 38 Wis. 673. It seems to me that the clerk had no authority to docket the judgment on that day, and, if not, the entry was void, and no lien was created thereby. The court there holds that the term "holiday" imports dies non juridicus, and that no authority exists on that day to do any official act, although no express prohibition is contained in the act. That a prohibition is implied in the term holiday. This is a decision of the state court upon the effect of the statute, and it may be unnecessary for this court to go further in search of authorities to support it. If declaring the 25th of December to be a legal holiday, ipso facto, made it no day in law, we are to look to the common law to see what acts, if any, could be performed on such days.

Sunday, at common law, was regarded as a dies non juridicus. In Bedoe v. Alpe, W. Jones, 156, the court says that Sunday was not a dies juridicus for the awarding of any process, nor for entering any judgment of record. Van Vechten v. Paddock, 12 Johns. 178. Lord Coke, in Mackalley's Case, 9 Coke, 66a, took a distinction between judicial and ministerial acts, performed on that day; but in Hoyle v. Cornwallis, 1 Strange, 387, that distinction was overruled, so that, at common law, both ministerial and judicial acts were prohibited on such days. Now, by adopting the decision of the supreme court as the authoritative interpretation of the act, it follows that the entering of the judgment on that day was void, and hence no lien was created thereby. See, also, for a further discussion of this question, Story v. Elliot, 8 Cow. 27; Hoghtaling v. Osborn, 15 Johns. 119; Butler v. Kelsey, Id. 177.

¹ [Reprinted from 14 N. B. R. 388, by permission. 14 Alb. Law J. 153, contains only a partial report.]

² [Reversed in Case No. 18,051.]

If the judgment was a lien, it is preserved by the bankrupt law [of 1867; 14 Stat. 517], and it is the duty of this court to protect it as such. But, in determining that question, we have to look to the state statutes, and the construction placed upon them by the state courts, and if by those the judgment is a valid lien, it is our duty to give it its full force and operation. The filing of the transcript and docketing of the judgment in Wood county were necessary to give a lien on the bankrupt's real estate in that county (2 Taylor's St. p. 1509, §§ 61, 62), and such filing and docketing having been on the 25th of December, they were not legally done, and must be regarded a nullity, which leaves the petitioners, as to those lands, in no better situation than any other creditor of the bankrupt. As the entry constitutes an apparent cloud on the title they should cause a cancellation of the docket entry, so as to remove the colorable lien created thereby. The assignee is therefore ordered to sell the real estate in Wood county free of any lien of the petitioners, by virtue of the said judgment, and to hold the proceeds for distribution among all the unsecured creditors; and, in order to further protect the purchaser or purchasers thereof from the assignee, I shall direct that an injunction issue out of this court perpetually enjoining and restraining the petitioners, and their attorneys and agents, from selling or offering to sell such real estate, or any portion, by virtue of said judgments, or from enforcing, or attempting to enforce, the same upon said real estate.

The petitioners having voluntarily appeared and moved the court to enforce the pretended lien, the court thereby has acquired jurisdiction to proceed and dispose of the whole matter in this summary way, which it could not have done upon summary petition of assignee. But the authorities hold, that although a party claiming an adverse interest cannot be brought in by petition by assignee, in a summary way, to have the claim determined, that such claimant may voluntarily come in by petition, and submit his claim to the decision of the court, without resorting to the form of a plenary action. The petitioners have leave to prove for the full amount of the judgment being valid, for aught that appears to the court now, the lien on real estate in Wood county alone being void. An order and injunction will be issued in accordance with this opinion.

[This decision was reversed by the circuit court in Case No. 18,051.]

Case No. 18,053.

WORTHINGTON v. ETCHESON et ux.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 302.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1837.

EJECTMENT—PLEADING AND PROOF—DEATH OF PLAINTIFF'S LESSOR—EVIDENCE OF POSSESSION—NOTICE TO QUIT—DEATH OF LIFE TENANT—DISSEIZIN BY HEIR.

1. In ejectment, the death of the lessor of the plaintiff cannot be taken advantage of upon the general issue.

2. To show possession in the lessor of the plaintiff, who was a purchaser at a sale under a decree of foreclosure, it is sufficient to show that the mortgagor was in possession until his death; and a lease for life, made by the mortgagor, is evidence of his possession, although the lease be not recorded.

3. When the defendant is a disseizor and intruder, he is not entitled to notice to quit.

4. If the tenant for his own life, die, and his heir enter, the heir is a disseizor and intruder.

The plaintiff [lessee of Charles Worthington] was a purchaser of the property at a sale under a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage made by John Threlkeld, who had made a lease for life to one Riffle, but the lease was not recorded, and therefore operated only as a lease from year to year, at the will of the parties. Riffle died, and the defendant Margaret was his daughter and heir at law, and upon the death of her father, entered upon the property.

Mr. Redin, for defendants [John and Margaret Etcheson], contended that the plaintiff could not recover because his lessor, Charles Worthington, is dead.

THE COURT, however, said that the death could not be taken advantage of, upon the general issue.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, giving no opinion) said that in order to show possession in the lessor of the plaintiff, it was sufficient for the plaintiff to show possession in Threlkeld, and his death.

The counsel for the defendants contended that the plaintiff could not recover without showing notice to the defendants to quit; but—

THE COURT decided that the defendants were to be considered as intruders; and therefore not entitled to such notice.

Verdict for plaintiff.

Case No. 18,054.

WORTHINGTON et al. v. JEROME.

[5 Blatchf. 279.]²

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 28, 1865.

DISCHARGE UNDER STATE INSOLVENT LAW—EFFECT—CREDITOR RESIDING IN ANOTHER STATE.

1. A discharge of a debtor, under a state insolvent law, does not discharge a debt due by him to a person who resides in another state at the time the insolvent proceedings take place, and who does not become a party to such proceedings.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

² [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. That the debt has passed into a judgment, before the proceedings, makes no difference.

3. Nor does it make any difference, that the indebtedness rests on a contract payable at a place within the state in which the insolvent proceedings take place.

This was an action on a judgment. The defendant [Leonard W. Jerome] pleaded an insolvent's discharge, and the plaintiffs [Lew- is Worthington and others] demurred to the plea.

James K. Hill, for plaintiffs.

William H. Anthon, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The plaintiffs, who are citizens of Ohio, recovered a judgment against the defendant, in the superior court of the city of New York, in 1851, for the sum of $1,147.05. In 1855, the defendant obtained the benefit of the insolvent act of the state of New York, the discharge under which is now set up as a bar to this action on the judgment. The plaintiffs were citizens and residents of Ohio at the time of the insolvent proceedings, and took no part in them. It has been repeatedly held by the supreme court of the United States, and as late as the case of Baldwin v. Hale, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 223, that a discharge under a state insolvent law does not affect the obligations of the debtor to foreign creditors, to which class the plaintiffs belong, they being residents of the state of Ohio, unless they make themselves parties to the insolvent proceedings. This seems to be conceded by the counsel for the defendant; but it is supposed, that the circumstance that the indebtedness had passed into a judgment before the proceedings, takes the case out of the principle. I think not. The insolvent court acquired no jurisdiction over the plaintiffs, or over any indebtedness, whether resting in judgment or in contract, due to them by the debtor. The discharge was coram non judge as to the foreign creditor, and would have been so, even if the indebtedness had rested on a contract payable at a place within the state in which the insolvent proceedings took place. Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Case No. 18,055.

WORTHINGTON v. PRESTON.

[4 Wash. C. C. 461.]¹

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1824.

FUGITIVE SLAVE—POWER OF MAGISTRATE—CERTIFICATE OF OWNERSHIP—COMMITMENT TO JAIL—ESCAPE—LIABILITY OF JAILER.

1. Under the act respecting fugitives from service, passed February 12, 1793 [1 Stat. 302], the judge or magistrate has no power to issue a warrant to arrest the fugitive, or to commit after the examination is over, and the certificate is granted; though in practice the judge commits de die in diem, pending the examination. The whole power is to examine, decide, and grant or refuse the certificate.

¹ [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

2. If after the certificate is granted the owner of the slave delivers him to the gaoler, who receives him, he is not officially liable for an escape, even though the commitment were under a warrant of the examining magistrate.

3. Neither is the gaoler liable for an escape as bailee, if there was no contract to pay him a reward for safe keeping, unless gross negligence be proved.

This was an action on the case for not keeping in safety Tom, a fugitive slave, the property of the plaintiff, who was delivered to him by the plaintiff's agent and attorney, to be safely kept in the gaol at Doylestown. Upon the plea of the general issue, it was proved that the defendant was the clerk or deputy of the sheriff of Bucks county, in which the gaol was, at the time of the transaction which forms the subject of this suit. It was proved by the person who acted under a regular power of attorney from the plaintiff, that on the 19th of September, 1822, he, with the plaintiff's son, seized the said slave in Bucks county, and took him before a state judge, who, after examining witnesses as to the plaintiff's property in Tom, gave to the attorney a certificate for the removal of the slave to the state of Maryland, whence he had before escaped. That he and the son of the plaintiff carried him, the same afternoon, to the gaol at Doylestown, and delivered him to the defendant, who locked him in the gaol yard, which is surrounded by a high wall (nineteen feet high, as proved by another witness), and that the defendant at the same time undertook to keep him safely. Mr. Worthington, the son, deposed to many of the above facts, and that he went with the other witness to the gaol to deliver the slave there, which was done; but that he knows nothing of the agreement of the defendant stated by the other witness, as to the safe keeping of the slave. Two witnesses, one the turnkey of the gaol, proved that the slave was brought by the persons above mentioned, and delivered to him, and that he was conducted by them into the gaol yard. That upon the agent being informed by him that the prisoners were all locked up in the evening, he requested that the slave should not be locked up until he had eaten his supper. That the slave was then left by the turnkey and the agent in the yard, where all the other prisoners were, and the door communicating with it was locked, and so continued till after the escape, which took place, over the wall, whilst the turnkey went to the kitchen to procure the supper; and that the defendant was not present at any time whilst the persons who brought the negro to the gaol were there, nor until after the escape. No proof was given that any reward was to have been given for the safe keeping of the slave.

C. J. Ingersoll, for plaintiff, insisted that the defendant, or deputy of the sheriff, was bound to receive and safe keep the fugitive; and is liable, as in other cases of escape, by virtue of an act of the assembly of this state, passed in 1789, which directs that all sheriffs and gaolers of the state, and their deputies, to whom any person shall be sent or committed by virtue of any legal process issued under the authority of the United States, shall receive such prisoner into his custody, and keep him safely till discharged by due course of law, and shall be subject to the same penalties, and the parties aggrieved entitled to the same remedies against them, as if such prisoner had been committed by virtue of legal process, issued under the authority of the state. See 2 Smith's Laws, 513. But if the defendant be not answerable officially, he is so as a bailee, upon his promise to keep the fugitive safely.

Mr. Binney, for defendant, denied the application of the act referred to on the other side, there having been in fact no commitment by the magistrate, nor had he a power to commit, under the act of congress concerning fugitives from service. As to the other ground, he insisted that the weight of evidence proves that the undertaking, whatever it was, was made, not by the defendant, but by the turnkey, for whose acts the defendant, in a case of this kind, is not answerable. But even if it had been made by the defendant yet, as no reward was to have been given for the safe keeping, nothing but gross negligence could charge him, which, in this case, cannot be alleged. 2 Ld. Raym. 913.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). If the defendant be liable for the escape which forms the ground of this action, it must be either (1) in his official capacity, or (2) upon a contract of bailment.

1. The first is a question of law, and depends upon the construction of the act of congress respecting fugitives, and the act of assembly of this state, which has been read. The former authorises the owner of a fugitive from service, escaping from one state into another, or his agent, to seize him, and to take him before any federal or state judge, or magistrate of the county, &c., where the seizure is made, and upon proof to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate that the person so seized doth, under the laws of the state from which he fled, owe service or labour to the person claiming him, it is made the duty of such judge or magistrate to give a certificate thereof to such claimant, or his agent, which is to be a sufficient warrant for removing the fugitive to the state from which he fled. This act confers only a limited authority upon the magistrate to examine into the claim of the alleged owner, and being satisfied on that point, to grant him a certificate to that effect. This is the commencement and termination of his duty.

He has no authority to issue a warrant to apprehend the fugitive in the first instance, or to commit him after the examination is concluded, and the certificate given. Pending the examination, whilst the fugitive is in custodia legis, the judge of this district and myself have always considered ourselves at liberty to commit, from day to day, till the examination is closed, or else the fugitive could not safely be indulged with time to get his witnesses to disprove the claim of the asserted owner, should he have any. An attempt has been made in congress to correct these glaring defects in the act, without which correction the act is found to be practically of little avail; but the attempt has not as yet succeeded. As it now stands, the magistrate had no authority to command the gaoler in this case to receive and safe keep the fugitive, and consequently, it is not a case provided for by the act of assembly of this state, which is confined to commitments under the authority of the United States. But even if the magistrate had been authorized to commit, it would be a conclusive objection to the plaintiff's demand, under this head, that no warrant of commitment was in fact granted.

2. Is the defendant liable as bailee? And the first inquiry under this head is, whether any contract of bailment is proved to have been entered into by the defendant with the plaintiff's agent? Two witnesses, one of them the turnkey, have stated, that at no period, from the time the negro was brought to the gaol to that of the departure of the agent and son of the plaintiff who brought him there, was the defendant present, and that the directions to keep him, and not to lock him up till he had received his supper, were given exclusively to the turnkey. The agent has sworn positively that the promise to keep the man safely was made by the defendant in person. The son, who was present the whole time, knows nothing of the alleged promise by the defendant. You must therefore say, upon the evidence, how this fact is. It is all important to the case of the plaintiff, and the burthen of proving it to your satisfaction lies upon him. But admit the fact to be proved, would the defendant, under all the circumstances of this case, be liable? No reward for the required service was promised, and, according to the doctrine laid down in Coggs v. Bernard [2 Ld. Raym. 909], the bailee is answerable in such a case, only for gross neglect. Now, when a man promises to keep safely property, either animate or inanimate, be the former a rational being or otherwise, he must be free to exercise his own judgment as to the mode, and must depend upon his own vigilance to effect the object. But if the bailor restricts him in these particulars, by prescribing the mode and degree of confinement, the bailee can not be charged with negligence of any kind, much less with gross negligence, if, notwithstanding an honest and strict fulfilment of the special contract of bailment thus entered into, an escape should happen, or a loss be sustained. Now, in this case, the slave was left in the yard of the gaol, with the knowledge and consent of the agent, and with an order not to lock him up, until he had received his supper. The door communicating with the yard was carefully locked when they left the yard, and the only way by which an escape could be effected, was over the wall. Before the supper could be brought to the negro, he had made good his escape over the wall. How then can the bailee, admitting the defendant to have been such, be chargeable with negligence under circumstances like these? But would he have been liable, even if the order not to lock him up till after supper, had not been given? We think not. The charge of gross negligence could not have been imputed to the bailee, who kept this man in the same place, and with the same precautions, that he kept all the other prisoners under his charge.

Verdict for defendant.

=====
 WORTHINGTON (SMALLWOOD v.). See Case No. 12,963.

WORTHINGTON (TUNSTALL v.). See Case No. 14,239.

=====
 Case No. 18,056.

WORTMAN v. CONYNGHAM.

[Pet. C. C. 241.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1815.

EXECUTION SALE—RETURN BY MARSHAL—PURCHASER'S FAILURE TO COMPLY—DISTRIBUTION OF FUND.

1. The court will not dictate to the marshal, what return he shall make to process in his hands. He must make his return at his peril, and any person injured by it, may have his legal remedy for such return.

[Cited in The Circassian, Case No. 2,721.]

[Cited in brief in McMicken v. Com., 58 Pa. St. 218.]

2. It is not a sufficient return to a venditioni exponas, "that A. B., to whom the property was struck off at the sale, has neglected and refused to comply with the terms of sale." It is the duty of the marshal, to offer the property at sale again, if he had time to do so; and if not, by a proper return, enable the plaintiff to take out an alias venditioni exponas.

[Cited in Dazet v. Landry (Nev.) 30 Pac. 1067.]

3. After the marshal is commanded by the writ, to bring the money, the proceeds of a sale, into court, he may pay it to the plaintiff on the execution, on his responsibility, for the right of the plaintiff to receive it.

[Cited in brief in Mather v. McMichael, 13 Pa. St. 302; Watmough v. Francis, 7 Pa. St. 212.]

4. The court will not interfere, in a summary way, to distribute money, the proceeds of an execution, or decide on the rights of those who claim it, unless the money be paid into court.

5. Quære, if the purchaser of property, sold under a venditioni exponas, may pay the plaintiff in the execution.

This was a rule upon the marshal, to show cause, why he should not return the property to the following effect, viz. "that the property levied upon, has been sold, and the purchaser retains the money in his hands, by virtue of a prior lien."

After argument, WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, discharged the rule; THE COURT not thinking it proper, to dictate to the marshal, what return he should make, to process put into his hands to execute. He must make his return at his peril; and if false in fact, or insufficient in law, any person injured thereby, has a legal remedy for any injury he may sustain.

After this decision, the following rule was obtained, viz.: "Rule upon the marshal, to show cause why he should not execute a deed to F. West, for the land by him purchased, at the sale of the defendant's property, under a venditioni exponas, at the suit of the plaintiff." The return made by the marshal on the venditioni exponas, was as follows: "By virtue of the annexed writ, I exposed to public sale, on the 29th day of November, at the coffee house in the city of Philadelphia, all the right, &c., of David H. Conyngham, in the hereafter described property; when the same were struck off to several persons, whose names are annexed to the description of the property, being the highest and best bidders, at the prices opposite to their names." Then followed the description of the lands, and the names of the purchasers, and amongst them F. West, a purchaser to the amount of twenty-eight thousand nine hundred and twenty-five dollars. "But the said F. West, has neglected and refused to comply with the terms of sale, and pay the purchase money aforesaid, &c." Annexed to the return, but forming no part of it, or referred to in the return, was the following paper, viz.: "Wortman vs. Conyngham. Circuit Court, Venditioni Exponas. Sir: Francis West became a purchaser at the marshal's sale, under the above venditioni exponas, to the amount of twenty-eight thousand nine hundred and twenty-five dollars. You are hereby authorised to credit said Francis West, with the amount above specified, out of the judgment in favour of the plaintiff above named; which is the earliest lien, and amounts to a sum greatly exceeding the purchase by F. West; and so far as the plaintiff's right extends, you will consider this credit, a payment by F. West. (Signed) J. R. Ingersoll, Attorney for the Plaintiff." Directed to the marshal.

In support of the rule, it was contended by Jared & Joseph R. Ingersoll that the return was tantamount to a return that the purchase money had been paid to the plaintiff, and, therefore, the marshal ought to be directed, to execute a deed to F. West, the purchaser.

¹ [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The rule was opposed by Mr. Wallace, who contended: That even if the court ought to interfere in this summary way, still it would be improper to order a conveyance to be made to the purchaser, in the face of the return, which states that the purchase money has not been paid. The order of the plaintiff's attorney forms no part of the return, and cannot therefore be noticed by the court.

Jared & J. R. Ingersoll, for the motions.
Mr. Wallace against the rule.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The return made to this writ, taken by itself, is unquestionably an insufficient one; in as much as it amounts to saying, that the exigency of the writ has not been complied with, and yet it assigns no legal reason for the failure. If the purchasers refused to comply with the terms of sale, it was the same thing as if the land had not been struck off to them; and the marshal might, and it was his duty to offer the property again to sale. If he had not time to do so, he might have made a proper return to that effect, and an alias venditioni exponas would have issued. But all that appears by this return is, that no effectual sale has been made, and if so, how can this court order the marshal to make a conveyance? Although the writ commands the marshal to bring the money into court, and in strictness he ought to do so, yet he may pay it to the plaintiff if he chooses; and this would be a sufficient return to the writ. If he has any doubt as to the right of the plaintiff to receive the money, he may pay it into court, and discharge himself from all responsibility; or, if a third person claims a right to the money, he may obtain a rule upon the marshal, to show cause why the money should not be paid into court; and when this is ordered, such person may assert his superior right to the money or any part of it, over that of the plaintiff under whose execution the money was levied; and the court will, in its discretion, hear and determine these contested claims, upon a rule to show cause. But this court, or the court of the state, have in no instance, to my knowledge, interposed in a summary way to distribute the money or to decide the rights of the claimants to it, or in any incidental question, in relation to the money; unless it has first been brought into court; and great inconveinency, perhaps injustice, might arise, if such a practice were to be introduced.

This opinion is founded upon the marshal's return. But he has annexed to the writ, though the return has no reference to it, a paper signed by the plaintiff's attorney, addressed to the marshal; which, in substance, directs him to credit the execution with the sum bid by F. West, as if it had been paid. It is contended, in support of the rule; that this paper amounts to an acknowledgment that the plaintiff has received the purchase money from West, and consequently that he is entitled to a conveyance. But, the short answer to this argument is, that this paper forms no part of the return, and is, in fact, at variance with it. The return is, that the purchaser has refused to comply with the terms of sale, and to pay the purchase money; and this paper states, that he has satisfied the plaintiff. But has the purchaser a right to pay the money to the plaintiff, against the will and without the consent of the officer? I am by no means clear that he ought to do so; since the marshal may pay off prior mortgages and executions, which he would have been prevented from doing, if the purchaser might pay the purchase money immediately to the plaintiff. Upon this point however I give no decided opinion, further than to state, that in a contested case, where such payment has been made, I should not feel disposed to interfere, in a summary way, to compel the marshal to make a conveyance to the purchaser. Rule discharged.

Case No. 18,057.

WORTMAN v. GRIFFITH et al.

[3 Blatchf. 528; 13 Leg. Int. 361; 19 Law Rep. 376.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 24, 1856.

REPAIR OF VESSEL—LIBEL FOR SERVICES—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

1. Where the owner of a ship-yard hauled up a vessel on his ways, charging for that service, and also a per diem for the time she was on the ways while being repaired by another person, held, that the service was one rendered in the repair of the vessel, and that the admiralty had jurisdiction of a libel in personam to recover for the service.

[Cited in The Vidal Sala, 12 Fed. 209.]

2. The nature of a contract or service, and not the question whether the contract is made, or the service is rendered, on the land or on the water, is the proper test in determining whether the admiralty has or has not jurisdiction.

[Cited in The Vidal Sala, 12 Fed. 209; Florez v. The Scotia, 35 Fed. 917.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in personam, filed in the district court, to recover compensation for services rendered by the libellant in repairing a steamboat. The district court decreed for the libellant [case unreported], and the respondents appealed to this court.

Erastus C. Benedict, for libellant.

Cornelius Van Santvoord, for respondents.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The libellant is the owner of a ship-yard, together with apparatus, consisting of a railway-cradle and other fixtures and implements, used for the purpose of hauling up vessels out of the water, and sustaining them while they are being repaired. Certain rates of compensation are charged, regulated by the tonnage of the vessel, for hauling her up on the ways, and a per diem charge is made for the time occupied while she is under repair, in cases where the owner of the yard and apparatus is not employed to do the work, but the repairs are made by other ship-masters, as in the present instance.

¹ [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The main controversy in the court below related to the terms upon which the service was to be rendered. Judge Hall, who heard the case, settled the amount, upon his view of the evidence, at $631.97, and I am not disposed to interfere with his conclusion. The proofs are conflicting, and not very clear either way in respect to the agreement.

The doubt I have had in the case is upon the objection raised to the jurisdiction of the court—a point not taken in the court below. It is claimed by the counsel for the respondents, that the agreement for the service rendered is to be regarded simply as a hiring of the yard and apparatus; and, certainly, if this be the true character of the transaction, there would be great difficulty in upholding the jurisdiction. On the other side, it is contended that the service rendered was a service in the repairs of the vessel, and was as much a part of them as the work of the ship-master, or the materials furnished by him.

There can be no doubt, that in cases where the ship-master owning the ship-yard and apparatus, is employed to make the repairs, the service in question enters into and becomes part of the contract, and is thus the appropriate subject of admiralty jurisdiction. And the question is, whether any well-founded distinction exists between a transaction of that character and the present one. The owner of the yard and apparatus, together with his hands, superintends and conducts the operation of raising and lowering the vessel, and also of fixing her upon the ways, preparatory to the repairs. The service requires skill and experience in the business, and is essential in the process of repair. I do not go into the question whether this is a contract made, or a service rendered, on the land or on the water. It undoubtedly partakes of both characters. But, I am free to confess, I have not much respect for this and other like distinctions that have sometimes been resorted to, for the purpose of ascertaining when the admiralty has, and when it has not, jurisdiction. The nature and character of the contract and of the service have always appeared to me to be sounder guides for determining the question.

Although a distinction may be made between this case, in the aspect presented, and the case where the ship-master is employed to make the repairs, I am inclined to think that it is not a substantial one, and that, to adopt it, would be yielding to a refinement which I am always reluctant to incorporate into judicial proceedings. A distinction, to be practical, should be one of substance, and one which strikes the common sense as founded in reason and justice. I must, therefore, overrule the point of jurisdiction, and affirm the decree.

WOULLUISE (GRUTACAP v.). See Case No. 5,854.

Case No. 18,058.

WOVEN WIRE MATTRESS CO. v. WHITTLESEY et al.

[8 Biss. 23.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. July, 1876.

PATENT—SPIRAL SPRING BED—PRIOR USE OF ARTICLE—VALIDITY OF PATENT—DESCRIPTIONS IN FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—BEDSTEAD FRAME.

1. A claim or device for making a bed bottom of spiral coils, or wire coils interlaced or interlocked, so as to form a fabric, fastened in any form to the sides of the bedstead frame, held not patentable, because the same device was in general use for analogous purposes prior to the application for the patent.

2. Though it is the settled law in this country that the description in foreign publications, in order to defeat a patent in this country, should be sufficiently definite for a person of ordinary skill to construct the machine from such description in the foreign publications, yet where such descriptions are fully as definite as the specifications in the application for the patent in this country, that will be sufficient to defeat the patent.

3. The Farnham patent for a new and improved bedstead frame, sustained.

[Suit by the Woven Wire Mattress Company against John E. Whittlesey and others.]

Goodwin, Offield & Towle, for complainant. Coburn & Thacher, for defendants.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is a bill for injunction and damages upon an alleged infringement of patents owned by the complainant company. The patents are: First, a patent issued November 5, 1861 [No. 33,685], to Herman Stube, as assignee of O. A. Rouillion, for an improvement in bed bottoms, and by Stube duly assigned by legal conveyance to the complainant. The second is for a patent issued to the complainant as assignee of J. M. Farnham, dated November 30, 1869 [No. 97,375], for an improved bedstead frame.

The answer denied that Rouillion was the inventor of the improvement described in the patent of November 5, 1861, and sets forth various prior devices and prior knowledge and use of the same device, and also denies the infringement of either of the complainant's patents.

The Rouillion patent, which is the foundation of the complainant's claim, is, broadly, for making a bed bottom of spiral coils, or wire coils interlocked, so as to form a fabric, fastened in any form to the sides of the bedstead frame. The patentee sets forth in his specification that he has invented a new and improved spring bed bottom. "The invention consists in constructing a bed bottom of a series of spiral springs, connected together and forming one or more layers."

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The claim in the patent is "for an elastic bed bottom, constructed of a series of spiral springs interlocked or connected together to form one or more layers one over the other, and attached to a suitable frame, substantially as shown and described."

It will thus be seen that this patent is, broadly, for the device of making a bed bottom of this elastic fabric—these spiral coils interlocked or connected together so as to make a fabric. The method of fastening or adapting it to the frame forms no part of the patent, but it is, broadly, for this simple device of using this fabric for a bed bottom.

The Farnham patent is for a new and improved bedstead frame. The invention, as the inventor says, relates to a new frame for single or double bedsteads, which are provided with elastic and flexible sheets for the support of the bed, with suitable bed bottoms. The invention consists in the use of double inclined end-bars, to which the end of the fabric is clamped, and in the employment of longitudinal and adjustable standards to which the end pieces are secured. By this arrangement the fabric is securely held, and can be stretched and slackened at will.

These end pieces, it will be seen, incline so that the fabric does not rest upon the end pieces at all, but strains continuously from the point where it is fastened without binding, so to speak, across the end pieces. The end piece is beveled or sloped. The standards referred to are provided with slots, so as to permit the stretching of the fabric as occasion may require.

The patentee was allowed two claims: First. "The inclined double end-bars of the bedstead, arranged substantially as and for the purposes herein shown." Second. "The standard 'B' arranged longitudinally, and adjustable on the side-bars to the bed frame, to permit the inclined side-bars to be set a suitable distance apart, as set forth," so that by these ears or standards, as he calls them, the position of the end-bars can be changed so as to tighten the bed bottom.

It will be seen that the first patent broadly claims, as I have stated, an elastic bed bottom consisting of a series of spiral springs interlocked or connected together, and attached to a suitable frame. It does not specify any particular mode of attaching the fabric to the frame, but the idea is, a patent for using a fabric made of spiral springs interlocked or connected together for a bed bottom. The specification states that more than one thickness or layer of the fabric may be used, but that does not vary the main feature, which is for a bed bottom formed of this elastic fabric.

The proof shows that this fabric has been known and in use in this country since 1852. In 1851 or 1852, John T. Wickersham, then of New York City, made a fabric of this kind, and used it for the bottoms and backs of chairs, and subsequently used it for the bottom or bed part of sofa beds, and that continuously, from the time this fabric was introduced by Wickersham, forward, the fabric formed by these elastic or spiral coils, interlocked so as to make a sheet or fabric, was well known in the art of wire working in this country. Mr. Wickersham, at page 25 of the defendants' testimony, says: Q. "How was this coiled wire work made?" A. "The coiled wire was wound upon a mandrel with a handle at one end of it, and four or five wires, more or less, were placed side by side and wound around the mandrel, and the mandrel turned and the wire wound around that. After the coils were completed, the coils were cut in continuous lengths, and the wires were slipped off the mandrel and separated after the coils were taken off the mandrel. After the coils were separated, the coils being in a screw shape, one coil was screwed into the other, according to the length or size of the mandrel. I experimented with machinery, but never made much progress from the hand way of making it, and gave it up as to making it with machinery."

The proof also shows that Wickersham published pamphlets or catalogues containing descriptions of his manufacture, from time to time, and also containing cuts or illustrations of chairs and sofas made of this coiled fabric, copies of which are put in evidence.

So, too, the witnesses, Thomas Robinson, and J. Armstrong, who were workmen for Wickersham, and Walker, who was subsequently a manufacturer in Philadelphia, of the same class of goods, all testify not only to the manner of the manufacture of the fabric, but also to the use of it as described by Mr. Wickersham and by Mr. Walker. So, also, Mr. Walker of Walker & Sons, Philadelphia, shows that this fabric was from 1851 or 1852 known as a fabric in the art of wire working and making of wire furniture. It had never been used exactly for a bed, but it had been used, and was used before 1861, for the making of a cot bedstead, not like complainant's exactly, because the coils were larger, but the idea was a cot bedstead, of this fabric with these coils for the bed bottom. In 1851, 1852 or 1853, Wickersham made sofa bedsteads, the back and ends of which were of this fabric. One end was so adjusted that it could be let down and form part of a bed bottom, so that when this sofa was made into a bed, part of the bottom was constructed of a series of spiral springs "interlocked and connected together." So that we have the history of the art up to the time this inventor entered the field, showing this fabric used for many analogous purposes to that of a bed bottom—that is, it was used for chair bottoms, and it was used for chair backs; it was used for cot bedsteads, and it was used for the back, ends, and part of the bottom of a sofa bedstead. At about the same time, other inventors had been experimenting to some extent, in the same direction. In 1853, Demure & Mauratz had obtained a patent for a bed bottom constructed by a combination of longitudinal and transverse wire coils, with vertical coil springs in the manner shown in the drawing attached to their patents. In 1854, one Mereweather had obtained a patent for constructing a bed bottom of bent wire—that is, wires bent into short kinks so as to give them a certain degree of elasticity and running parallel across the bottom of the bed frame, making a bed bottom of elastic material. In 1856, one Lysander Spooner obtained a patent for a bed bottom constructed of spiral coils run transversely across the frame, parallel to each other, but not interlocked; that is, he makes his coils large enough and strong enough, and puts them close enough together to bear whatever weight is intended to be borne by the bed bottom. He does not give any specific directions as to how many coils are to be used, but his plans show that they are strung across the bed transversely, nearly touching each other, but the coils are not interlocked. We have then the use of elastic coils fabric by Wickersham and Walker for purposes analogous to that called for by the Rouillion patent; then from 1853 up to 1856, other inventors had made bed bottoms of elastic wire, used longitudinally and transversely across the bedstead frame so as to make an elastic bed. They did not use the coiled wire fabric which was used by Wickersham and Walker. It will be remembered that Wickersham states that he called his furniture French furniture, because he made it like certain French furniture which had been imported about that time into this country.

This is all the evidence we have of any French device like this for the purpose of furniture. There is no evidence taken from any of the publications of France, or any evidence of any public or notorious use there. But there is evidence taken at a late stage in the history of this case, which shows that from 1855 forward, one Spyer, doing business in Berlin, Germany, made a bed bottom, which he was at that time engaged in introducing, and advertising for use in hospitals and places where sick people were being treated, made of the same interlocked woven wire—he calls it “spiral weaving,” in his description, and the evidence from public documents, books and publications made in Germany in July and August, 1861, the same year that this patent was issued or applied for by Rouillion, shows that Mr. Spyer was exhibiting his invention, and making it public in every method that he could by advertising throughout Germany, showing the advantages of this kind of a bed as an invalid bed. We find in the proof various cuts and drawings, exhibitions and advertisements of it taken from German publications of that date showing that this fabric was well known and in use as a bed bottom there at that time.

We then have, so far as the Rouillion patent is concerned, what I have already said in reference to the art in this country up to the time that Rouillion entered the field, and the further facts that this fabric had been made and used in Germany, and had been described in printed publications in that country prior to the time that the Rouillion invention is claimed to have been made in this country.

The proof in the case also tends strongly to show that the idea of making and patenting this fabric in this country for the purposes of a bed bottom was suggested to Rouillion by Stube, who was Rouillion's father-in-law, and that Stube had then but lately emigrated to this country from Germany, where he might have seen the Spyer bed or published descriptions of it.

I am, therefore, fully satisfied, from the testimony in the case, that the broad claim of Rouillion in this patent for the idea of making a bed bottom of elastic wire fabric made from spiral coils interlocked with each other, can not be allowed, and that this patent for the fabric must be held void for want of novelty.

It is objected by the plaintiff, that the manufacture by Wickersham and Walker of the sofa-bed and cots was only an experiment. Both these witnesses testify that they made these cots and made the sofa bedstead, but they did not sell any. I think, perhaps, the weight of testimony shows that they sold, or gave away one. They were for sale—exposed for sale in their stores; they were publicly exhibited and advertised, but no one was inclined to buy them. I think from the proof one was used by the family in Philadelphia, for a servant's bed or cot. The use, however, was not very general. It is contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that this was, therefore, only an abandoned experiment; and, were it not for the foreign testimony in regard to the foreign use, it might be possible that the court would feel compelled to sustain the Rouillion patent upon the ground that these were mere experiments approximating towards the use which Rouillion finally adopted for this fabric; but when this testimony of Wickersham, Walker and Robinson is supplemented by the testimony of Spyer, I think there can be no doubt but this was an old art at the time of the Rouillion patent.

There is one further objection that is urged to the foreign testimony which I ought to notice, and that is, that the law requires that the description in foreign publications in order to defeat a patent in this country should be sufficiently definite so that a person of ordinary skill could construct the machine from the descriptions in the foreign publications.

That is, undoubtedly, the settled law in this country. But it will be noticed that Mr. Rouillion gives no description of how to construct the fabric. He seems to accept the fabric as old. Spyer, in his advertisements of his bed bottom in Germany, describes it as made of "spiral weaving." It seems to me as though that is about as definite a description as the description given in the Rouillion patent of spiral coils interlocked with each other. One is "spiral weaving" and the other is "spiral coils interlocked or connected." Rouillion seems to assume that the fabric was well known, or that the method of making the fabric by interlacing or interlocking spiral coils was known, and does not deem it necessary to describe how to do that, but accepts the art as already accomplished up to that point. So, that, I think, when the writer in Germany tells us to make an elastic wire bed bottom of "spiral weaving," he has given us as good a description, and given us as much information as Rouillion did in his patent obtained in 1861.

We come now for a moment only, to the consideration of the Farnham patent. There is no evidence of any prior use of the inclined end pieces in the construction of any kind of a bed bottom, nor is there any evidence of any prior use of this standard "B"; and the evidence in this case shows conclusively that the defendants do use the inclined end pieces, and have used the standard. So far, therefore, as they have used the end piece, and the standard described in the Farnham patent, they have infringed and should be so far enjoined.

The conclusion then is, that the defendants are not liable for using the coiled wire fabric for making the bed bottom, but they do infringe so far as they use the specific elements in the frame patented by Farnham.

[For other cases involving patent No. 97,375, see Whittlesey v. Ames, 13 Fed. 893; Woven Wire Mattress Co. v. Wire Web Bed Co., 1 Fed. 222; Id., 8 Fed. 87; Woven Wire Mattress Co. v. Simmons, 7 Fed. 723; Woven Wire Mattress Co. v. Palmer, 8 Fed. 812; Hartford Woven-Wire Mattress Co. v. Peerless Wire Mattress Co., 23 Fed. 587.]

WRAPPE (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,767.

Case No. 18,059.

WRAY v. REILLY.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 513.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1808.

STATE INSOLVENT ACT—DISCHARGE.

A discharge of a debtor under the Maryland insolvent act of January 3, 1800, is a bar to an action for a debt contracted in Georgia, although the creditor always resided in South Carolina.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Debt upon a judgment of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Georgia, obtained in April, 1796. Among other pleas, the defendant pleaded a discharge under the insolvent law of Maryland, passed on the 3d of January, 1800, setting forth all the proceedings, and the final discharge by the chancellor. By the fifth section the debtor is to be "discharged from all debts, covenants, contracts, promises, and agreements, due from, or owing, or contracted by him before the date of his deed of assignment," upon his complying with the terms of the act: To this plea the plaintiff replied that on the 2d of December, 1793, the plaintiff dwelt in South Carolina, and the defendant in the state of Georgia, where he made his promissory note, upon which the plaintiff recovered judgment, upon which this action is brought. That the cause of action therefore arose in Georgia. That the plaintiff never resided in Maryland, and took no benefit from the surrender of the defendant's effects in that state. To this replication the plaintiff demurred.

E. J. Lee, for defendant, contended that the discharge of a debtor, upon a fair surrender of all his effects according to the laws of the country of his domicile is, by the comity of nations, good all over the world. That the act of the chancellor is the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, and everywhere conclusive; as in the cases of marriage and divorce. That this court ought to decide upon the validity of this discharge in the same manner as a court of Maryland would decide; and cited the following authorities: Hunter v. Potts, 4 Term R. 192; Hughs v. Cornelius, T. Raym. 473; James v. Allen, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 188; Miller v. Hall, Id. 229; Thompson v. Young, Id. 294; Gorgerat v. McCarty, Id. 366; Emory v. Grenough, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 370; Cooke, Bankr. Law, 34; Coop. Bankr. Law, Addenda, 10, 27, 28; Sill v. Worswick, 1 H. Bl. 665; Phillips v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 402; Davis v. Marshall [Case No. 3,641], in this court, at Washington, July term, 1804.

Mr. Swann, contra, admitted that contracts may be discharged by the laws of the country wherein they were made, but contended that they could not by the laws of any other country, and cited Coop. Bankr. Law, 361, tit. "Cessio Bonorum"; Smith v. Buchanan, 1 East, 6; [James v. Allen] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 188; [Miller v. Hall] Id. 229; [Thompson v. Young] Id. 294; [Gorgerat v. McCarty] Id. 366; [McKimm v. Riddle] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 100; [Harris v. Mandeville] Id. 256; [Emory v. Grenough] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 369; Pedder v. McMaster, 8 Term R. 609; Van Raugh v. Van Arsdaln, 3 Caines, 154; Davis v. Marshall [supra], in this court, July Term, 1804.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, did not sit in this cause.

FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court, that the plea of discharge under the insolvent act of Maryland was a good bar to the action.

[See Case No. 18,060.]

Case No. 18,060.

WRAY v. RILEY.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 361.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1806.

FOREIGN JUDGMENT—MOTION TO DISCHARGE—SPECIAL BAIL.

In Virginia, special bail in an action of debt upon judgment rendered in one of the other states, cannot be required by the indorsement of an attorney.

Motion by E. J. Lee to discharge the special bail which had been required by an indorsement of the plaintiff's attorney. The action was debt on a judgment recovered in the state of Georgia.

E. J. Lee. The case of judgment is not provided for by the Virginia statute of December 12, 1792, p. 78, in which bail may be required by an indorsement of an attorney. Ruffin v. Call, 2 Wash. [Va.] 181; Bidleson v. Whytel, 3 Burrows, 1548; Belither v. Gibbs, 4 Burrows, 2117; Bowen v. Barnett, Sayer, 160.

Exoneretur ordered.

DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent.

[See Case No. 18,059.]

Case No. 18,061.

The WREATH.

[29 Leg. Int. 284; 2 9 Phila. 467.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Aug. 30, 1872.

ADMIRALTY—COMPENSATION OF COUNSEL—ALLOWANCE OUT OF FUND.

[In cases in which a common interest has been promoted by services of counsel which a mere selfish consideration of his client's interest would not have induced him to render, a part or even the whole of his compensation may occasionally be allowed from the general fund arising from the sale of the vessel.]

Allowance of counsel fee under special circumstances.

Samuel S. Hollingsworth, Esq., for libellants.

J. Hill Martin, Esq., for owners of cargo.

BY THE COURT. The questions which are the subject of disagreement having been argued by counsel, the court unhesitatingly allows the costs, amounting to $334.01. As to the so called charges of counsel, they are not, in this judicial district, allowable in ordinary cases. In cases in which a common interest has been promoted by services which a mere selfish consideration of the client's interests would not have induced an advocate or proctor to render, the charge of a part or even the whole of the compensation of counsel, may, however, sometimes be proper. [The Apollon] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 379. The allowance, when made, is on exceptional and extraordinary reasons. In this case the reasons exist, and are sufficient. The only doubt is, whether the whole or a part only of the amount in question should be allowed. As it is extremely moderate, and an apportionment would be difficult, I allow the whole. The proceeds of the vessel and amount of the freight not being sufficient to reach any part of the demand of S. C. Loud & Co., whose libel of intervention was filed on the 6th of July last, the validity of this demand as against any present subject of litigation has not been considered. Bills for towage, $4; surveyor of port, $28; hire of chronometer, $33; H. L. Gregg, $36.76, having been presented to the clerk, the freight appearing to have been sufficient for their discharge, they are disallowed as claims upon the fund in court, with leave, however, to the respective parties to move the court at any time before final distribution. The clerk is directed to advertise in two daily papers of general commercial circulation in Philadelphia, and one such paper in New York, that any person having claims upon the proceeds of sale of the vessel must present the same within ten days from the first publication or they will be debarred, &c., such publication to be made twice a week in each paper.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

² [Reprinted from 29 Leg. Int. 284, by permission.]

Case No. 18,062.

WREN v. SPENCER OPTICAL MANUF'G CO. et al.

[5 Ban. & A. 61; 1 18 O. G. 857.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1879.

EQUITY PRACTICE—ANSWER AS EVIDENCE—REPLICATION—NEW MATTER.

1. According to English equity practice, as adopted in the U. S. circuit courts, an answer is evidence in favor of the defendants, so far as it is responsive to the bill.

2. An answer is not evidence of special facts, alleged in it as a defence, not responsive to the allegations of the bill.

3. Where such an answer had been replied to and new matter inserted in the replication, to meet such special defence in the answer, held, that such new matter might be treated as surplusage, and that the replication was not thereby rendered void, as contravening the 45th rule of the supreme court, but that the excess might be treated as surplusage merely, leaving the regular part of the replication standing as a traverse.

[This was a bill in equity by William C. Wren against the Spencer Optical Manufacturing Company and others for the infringement of letters patent No. 36,065, granted to W. P. Battice, August 5, 1862.]

¹ [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

B. E. Valentine, for complainant.
Blatchford, Seward, Griswold & Da Costa and Steele & Boyd, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. This cause has been heard upon bill, answer, replication, proofs and argument. According to English equity practice, as adopted here, the answer was evidence in favor of the defendants so far as it was responsive to the bill. By the forty-first rule, as amended in 1871, it was provided that, if an answer under oath should be waived in the bill or an answer under oath to certain specified interrogatories only should be required, the answer, though under oath, should not be evidence in favor of the defendants, except such parts as should be directly responsive to the interrogatories.

This bill charges the defendants with infringement of certain patents of the orator, and requires an answer on oath to specific interrogatories in regard to doing the acts constituting infringement. The defendants in answer admit the acts, and set up that the orator before procuring this patent assumed to and did sell to the grantor of the defendants other patents, standing in the name of another person, covering the same invention. The answer is traversed in the usual form, and then new matter is added to meet the special defence in the answer. The proofs and the answers to the interrogatories make out a prima facie case of infringement.

The evidence on the part of the defendants shows the existence of the other patents, but does not show that the orator sold or undertook to sell them. It is argued by the defendants that the replication, being special, is contrary to the forty-fifth rule and irregular and void, so that the case in effect stands for hearing as upon bill and answer only. But the excess may be treated as surplusage merely, leaving the regular part of the replication standing as a traverse. Dupont v. Mussy [Case No. 4,185]. Then, under the rules which are adopted pursuant to statute, and are binding upon this court as statutes, the answer is not evidence of the special facts alleged in it not responsive to the interrogatories, and there is no evidence of the essential fact of the defence set up—viz., the assuming by the orator to sell, which would include a warranty that he had a right to sell, not only a right, but an exclusive right, to the inventions, which would probably estop him from afterward claiming that he had not such rights or draw after it in favor of his grantee his after-acquired rights. So this defence, however meritorious it might be, if it existed, must fail for want of proof.

Let there be a decree for the orator, according to the prayer of the bill, with costs.

WREN, The (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 16,768.

Case No. 18,063.

In re WRENTHAM MANUF'G CO.

Ex parte SOUTHWICK.

[2 Low. 119.]¹

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1872.

CORPORATE TREASURER—POWERS—ACCOMMODATION
INDORSEMENTS—NONNEGOTIABLE RECEIPT.

1. The treasurer of a manufacturing company, who signs and indorses promissory notes for the company in the usual course of business, does not by such usage acquire, nor is he held out as having, the right to sign or indorse notes, for the accommodation of third persons.

2. A receipt, not negotiable, and intended as a memorandum of indebtedness by the maker thereof to the holder, does not come within the rule of law in Massachusetts, that one who indorses a note, not being a holder of it, is an original promisor.

3. Whether the indorsement of such a receipt by a third person creates any contract between him and the holder, quære?

4. Where a firm gave such a receipt to A., and at his request one of the firm, who was treasurer of a manufacturing company, indorsed the paper in the name of that company, without any consideration moving to the company, held, the amount was not provable against the estate of the manufacturing company in bankruptcy.

Royal Southwick offered for proof, against the estate of the Wrentham Manufacturing Company in bankruptcy, a certain instrument, of which this is a copy: "$2,000. Boston, Jan. 21, 1870. Received of Royal Southwick, two thousand dollars, on account. Loan. J. H. Jones, Jr., & Co." Indorsed: "Waiving demand and notice. Wrentham Manufacturing Co., J. H. Jones, Jr., Treas." The evidence tended to show that Jones was the treasurer of the company, and had been accustomed to sign and indorse notes for the corporation, in the course of the business, though not for the accommodation of third persons; that the $2,000 was borrowed by Mr. Jones, for the use of his firm, and that the petitioner asked him if he could not give him the name of the Wrentham Company, and upon this request the indorsement was made. The firm were, at the time this money was borrowed, indebted to the manufacturing company.

A. Hemmenway, for petitioner. By the law of Massachusetts, one who indorses a note before its delivery, not being the payee, is an original promisor. Jones had authority to sign notes for the bankrupts, and his signature binds them.

B. F. Bowles, for assignees. The evidence shows that the promise of the corporation, if it be one, was given for the accommodation of Jones & Co., and that the petitioner so understood it. The power to sign notes in the ordinary course of business will not extend to such a signature, excepting when third persons have been misled.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

LOWELL, District Judge. The doctrine is firmly established in Massachusetts, that an indorsement of this sort, made by one who is not the payee of a note, and made before the note is negotiated, binds the indorser as an original promisor. The cases are reviewed in Union Bank v. Willis, 8 Metc. [Mass.] 504; and the court, while regretting that the law had been so settled, yet were unwilling to change it, after so many decisions had fixed it. Most of the cases are of negotiable notes; but I do not see why the rule is not equally applicable to notes which are not negotiable, because it is on the very ground that the signature on the back of a note, by one who is not payee or indorsee, is not a strict indorsement, that they give it effect as a promise. But I am not aware that any case has gone so far as the petitioner desires me to go in this case. The contract given in evidence is not a note, but a receipt, and is hardly to be understood without explanation. It might mean that Southwick was paying money to Jones & Co., which he already owed them, and taking their receipt on account of that loan. When it is proved that he did not owe them, the receipt can be understood as a memorandum, which would be evidence of money had and received by them of him, and the promise to repay it is implied by law. Now, if such a memorandum is signed by two persons, it is evidence that they have both received the money, and they may be prima facie liable to repay it jointly, or jointly and severally; but that an indorsement of such a receipt, waiving demand and notice, means that the indorser undertakes to pay as a promisor what the other party is impliedly bound to pay as having received the money, seems to be stretching the language of the parties beyond reason. Perhaps it was the intent of the parties that the manufacturing company should be either a surety or a guarantor; but they do not appear to me to have expressed any such legal intent by the indorsement of this receipt. A receipt is not intended for currency: it does not pass by delivery, nor by indorsement, but is merely a memorandum between the parties; and the indorsement of such a paper is a mere nudum pactum, or mere evidence of a right by the indorsee to sue in the name of the indorser.

Granting, however, that the analogy of the law of notes held good, the Wrentham Company would be only sureties for the accommodation of the principal debtors; and though this would be no defence for an individual who lent his name, because the very purpose of his act was to give credit to the principal, nor to a trading corporation against a purchaser of negotiable paper before due without notice, yet when we come to a contract of this kind, the lender had no right to assume that the agent had authority to pledge the credit of the corporation.

There was no by-law nor practice to sanction this proceeding; and the petitioner seems to have understood, and the form of the paper tends to prove that he must have understood, that the name of the manufacturing company was given only for the accommodation of Jones & Co. For these reasons, the proof must be limited to the undisputed note for $1,690, and interest, rejecting the other. Order accordingly.

Case No. 18,064.

Ex parte WRIGHT.

[1 West. Law J. 143.]

District Court, D. Missouri. 1843.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—EMBEZZLEMENT.

[One who, as register of the land office, converted to his own use money deposited with him by private parties for the purchase of public lands, and returned the names of the depositors in the schedule of his debts, held not entitled to a discharge, the same being forbidden by the clause of the act which denounces any defalcation in "any other fiduciary capacity" (Act 1841).]

One Wright had filed his petition for a discharge. Various objections were made, but the one which excited most attention, and elicited a lengthy and able opinion from WELLS, District Judge, was a charge against Wright which involved his integrity as an officer of the government. It was charged that while acting as register of the land office at Palmyra, large sums of money were deposited with him, to be used in the purchase of public lands, and that instead of fulfilling his written receipt and promise, the money was perverted to his own use and benefit,—the names of the depositors being returned in the schedule of his debts. The whole case was argued by Mr. Hickman for the petitioner, and Mr. Buckner for the objector, when an opinion of great force and length was pronounced by the judge against Wright. It was not stated by WELLS, District Judge, whether the register could be made responsible under his official bond, or that his defalcation was one which involved him in the technical sense of a "public officer," but he expressly pronounced his guilt under that clause of the act which denounces a defalcation in "any other fiduciary capacity" than those enumerated. A petitioner, the judge remarked, must come into court an honest man, and prove himself such when assailed, or fail in his application. A "fiduciary trust" was a pledge of faith, and when broken by a strictly private citizen, by the violation of a special deposit for a certain purpose, or in any other manner which would prove a dishonest purpose, would be fatal to an application. In fact, the broadest meaning was given to the term "fiduciary," and a strong moral denunciation pronounced against all violators of public and private faith.

Case No. 18,065.

In re WRIGHT.

[2 Ben. 509; 1 2 N. B. R. 142 (Quarto, 57); 36 How. Prac. 167.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 7, 1868.

EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPT—FRAUD IN CONTRACTING A DEBT—EFFECT OF DISCHARGE.

1. Where creditors had filed proof of debt in a bankruptcy proceeding, alleging that the debt was contracted by fraud, and, on the examination of the bankrupt, proposed to inquire as to the facts constituting the alleged fraud, held, that the inquiry was irrelevant.

2. That a debt fraudulently contracted is not discharged by a discharge in bankruptcy, and that the question whether such discharge affects a debt can only be raised and determined in a suit to collect the debt, in which the discharge shall have been set up as a bar to the recovery.

[Cited in Re Herzberg, 25 Fed. 700.][Cited in brief in Fuller v. Pease (Mass.) 11 N. E. 695; Poillon v. Lawrence, 77 N. Y. 215.]

3. That section 21 of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 526)] does not apply to debts which, by section 33, are excepted from the operation of a discharge.

[In the matter of John S. Wright, a bankrupt.]

By JOHN FITCHE, Register: 2 [This cause is now pending before me in this court of bankruptcy. The petitioner sets forth in his schedules an indebtedness as a member of the firm of Wright, Maxwell & Co. to Knowles & Forster, creditors. The petitioner sets out the cause of indebtedness as follows: "The said Knowles & Forster made a claim in Rio de Janeiro, as creditors of Wright, Maxwell & Co., and Maxwell, Wright & Co., on the failure of the latter firm, which claim, the petitioner believes, was admitted by the court at Rio. The petitioner believes the claim was for acceptances and advances made and given by said Knowles & Forster for said Maxwell, Wright & Co. and Wright, Maxwell & Co., but has no knowledge of the amount of said claim or how much is due thereon; all the papers and accounts relating thereto having been kept at Rio de Janeiro."

[On the 29th day of April, 1868, Knowles & Forster appeared before me at a court of bankruptcy, by attorneys Weeks & Forster, and proved their claim. On application and motion of Weeks & Forster, counsel for Knowles & Forster, I granted an order for the examination of the petitioner, who is now under examination on the part of Knowles & Forster; his examination on behalf of Knowles & Forster not having been concluded, the respective counsel submit in writing the following question pertinent to the issue:

["Counsel for Knowles & Forster, creditors, propose to examine the bankrupt to prove

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

² [From 2 N. B. R. 142 (Quarto, 57).]

the nature of the transaction out of which the indebtedness of one hundred and thirty-four thousand and thirty-four dollars and sixty-one cents and interest thereon to said creditors arose, and that the indebtedness was created by the fraud and false representations of said bankrupt and his late partnership, for the purpose of showing that this debt cannot be discharged under these proceedings. Weeks & Forster, Attorneys for Knowles & Forster."

["The bankrupt, John S. Wright, objects that such inquiry is irrelevant; that the question of fraud in the creation of the debt cannot be litigated in these proceedings; that a debt fraudulently contracted is not affected by a discharge in bankruptcy, and can be collected notwithstanding such discharge, and that such question can only arise when it is undertaken to collect such debt after discharge is granted. Chapman, Scott & Crowell, Attorneys for Bankrupt."

[It is conceded that the debt referred to was contracted in the year 1864. The action of the respective counsel places the petitioner in a singular and anomalous position. The creditors had a right to prove their claim in the manner and form they did, it being a provable claim. The petitioner has a right to controvert or contradict such proof, and show that the indebtedness was not founded upon fraud, and was free from fraud, or that the creditors have effected a settlement thereof with some member of the firm of which petitioner was a member, or that the debt was contracted in the usual course of trade in a mutual, open, current and running account, running through a series of years, and that the petitioner was not present at the making of the contract, and that his only information on the subject was subsequently derived from others, and that the petitioner, personally, was entirely free from any fraudulent act or intent, or show in any way or manner that the debt was not fraudulent. This, as yet, he has not done, and as the case now stands, the allegation of Knowles & Forster, as per their proof of debt, stands admitted: therefore, section 33 of the bankrupt act governs this case. The bankrupt cannot be discharged from the debt proven by Knowles & Forster, but is entitled to a discharge from his other debts, and brings this case within the rule laid down by Register Dayton, and affirmed by the court (In re Tallman [Case No. 13,739]), in which case the register says: "The fact that the debt was created in fraud does not therefore constitute a ground of opposition to the discharge of the bankrupt, and as the examination of the bankrupt is for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the bankrupt is entitled to a discharge under the act, evidence of fraud in the creation of the debt is not admissible."

[A suit is now pending in one of the courts of this state between Knowles & Forster and the petitioner and others as defendants, for the recovery of the claim proven by Knowles & Forster. The petitioner has been adjudged a bankrupt; therefore all proceedings against him in the suit in the state court must stop, if enjoined by this court, as the subject matter of the suit has been proven against the estate of the petitioner in bankruptcy. The district court has full, complete and original jurisdiction, in this action, of the bankrupt, and of the assets of the bankrupt, and can, by its injunction, restrain and control the action of Knowles & Forster in their action in the state court, or stay the issuing of an execution or any judgment therein, as this court is competent and has the legal right to relieve the bankrupt from arrest or process from a state court, and also prohibit his arrest or prosecution in any other court, provided the debt is founded upon a contract—a debt from which a discharge in bankruptcy would relieve or release him—and also to decide the question of fraud; as it was evidently the design of congress that this court should do by the passage of the bankrupt act, as the form of the discharge clearly contemplates that the discharge should be a full, complete and final discharge, free from all reservations. In order to effect this the whole question should be passed upon by the court in bankruptcy. This court must necessarily inquire into the question of fraud, and also decide it, which decision will be final and binds all the state courts.

[The committing of a fraud in the contracting of a debt is a question of fact, and should not be decided on ex parte testimony, as it must be if decided on the testimony as it now stands. In re Glasser [Cases No. 5,474 and 5,475]; In re Borst [Case No. 1,665]; In re Frear [Id. 5,074]; Id., 3 How. [44 U. S.] 245. The judgment of the court upon all the proceedings in the cause, as well as upon the testimony setting forth all the facts that make up the fraud, is conclusive, and if the bankrupt is not discharged by the decision of the court upon the question of fraud, the bankrupt cannot contest that question in any other court, as he is estopped by the record of this court as the proceedings in bankruptcy, all the testimony must be filed. Section 5, Bankrupt Act; In re Patterson [Case No. 10,817]; In re Seymour [Id. 12,684]; In re Puffer [Id. 11,459]. The injunction or order of this court operates as a stay of proceedings or a release throughout the United States, and would compel the discharge of a person arrested or imprisoned by order of a state court. Hazleton v. Valentine [Id. 6,287].

[The petitioner, at this stage of the case, in order to obtain a discharge from the debt, as proven by Knowles & Forster, may do one of two things: First, he may, by affidavit showing the pendency of the action in the state court, of the pendency of these proceedings in this court in bankruptcy, of the adjudication of bankruptcy, of the fact that this claim is set forth in the petitioner's schedules of liabilities, and that he admits the amount claimed by Knowles & Forster in their suit to be due. The district court will, on motion ex parte, grant an injunction restraining Knowles & Forster from all further proceedings in their action against the petitioner. Knowles & Forster would then be at liberty to move to vacate the injunction on the ground that the debt was contracted by fraud, and was provided for by section 33 of the act. The issue thus raised would be referred to a register to take testimony as to the fact, and the decision of the motion upon the testimony would conclude the proceedings. The United States district court has the power and can issue an injunction to stay, prohibit or restrain proceedings in a state court. But if the debt sought to be enforced is one founded upon fraud, such injunction will be vacated on motion. In re Reed [Id. 11,637]; In re Jacoby [Id. 7,165]; In re Metcalf [Id. 9,494].

[Second. The petitioner may consent that Knowles & Forster examine him as to the way and manner in which the debt was contracted, in accordance with the request of their counsel; he may also give evidence in regard to the same subject, also controvert the proof, as given in the proof of Knowles & Forster. The petitioner may apply to your honor upon all the proceedings and testimony in the case for an injunction as above stated; but if the petitioner suffers and permits the case to be decided by the court as it now stands, the decision of the court becomes res adjudicata as between the parties and privies to the action, the proof of Knowles & Forster becomes part of the record, and can be given in evidence on the trial in a state court; the petitioner will then be estopped from controverting it. I hold that a debt created by fraud can be litigated in these proceedings, and this court is the proper forum in which such questions should be passed upon. Any other course would tend to endless litigation in the state courts. If the petitioner chooses he can contradict or disprove the proof in this case, as given by the creditors, Knowles & Forster; but as the testimony now stands, the claim of the aforesaid creditors stands proven as a debt founded on fraud which cannot be discharged or affected by any discharge granted the petitioner, as the specification on that point is fully sustained by the proof, which is a re-statement of the specifications. In re Clarke [Case No. 2,844]; In re Elliott [Id. 4,391]; sections 32, 33, Bankrupt Act.

[The questions to be propounded by the counsel for Knowles & Forster are not admissible at this stage of the proceedings, but will be as soon as the petitioner, by testimony, controverts the proof made by Knowles & Forster. It is a well settled rule of law that whenever a matter in controversy has been once litigated, between the parties, including all who have a right to appear and contest the proceedings before any tribunal of competent authority and jurisdiction, then such adjudication, whether in form of a judgment, decree, order, report, decision or verdict, is final and conclusive as to such parties, and becomes a matter of res adjudicata as between the parties and privies thereunto. It works an estoppel, not only as respects the matter specifically litigated and determined thereby, but also as to all other matters fairly involved in the issues arising upon the same questions, although the subject matter of the second controversy, or the grounds upon which the second adjudication is sought may be different, and the questions passed upon may be proved by parol. Demarest v. Darg, 32 N. Y. 281; Gardner v. Buckbee, 3 Cow. 120; Bouchaud v. Dias, 3 Denio, 238; Birkhead v. Brown, 5 Sandf. 134; Doty v. Brown, 4 N. Y. 71; Embury v. Conner, 3 N. Y. 522, and cases cited; Castle v. Noyes, 14 N. Y. 329; Ehle v. Bingham, 7 Barb. 494; Supervisors of Onondaga v. Briggs, 2 Denio, 33; Burt v. Sternburgh, 4 Cow. 559; Bangs v. Strong, 4 N. Y. 315; White v. Coatsworth, 6 N. Y. 137; Dwight v. St. John, 25 N. Y. 203; Foster v. Milliner, 50 Barb. 385.

[The manner in which the creditors proved their claim (which thereupon at once became a part of the proceedings in the case, by section 5 of the bankrupt act has to be filed with and become part of the proceedings in the cause), at once created an issue of fact in the case as to whether the debt was or was not fraudulent; the creditors' proof shows it to have been a debt created in fraud. Of this proof the petitioner, by law, is bound to take notice; he cannot ignore it, as it has been duly filed and is now part of the proceedings in this case. The petitioner is now under examination as a witness, and knows the nature of the testimony given by Knowles & Forster. He may contradict it if he can; he must do it during the pendency of the trial of this cause, or the law will prohibit his doing so in any other court. In the state court the defendant, Wright, after his discharge, may plead it as a defence, and the plaintiffs reply that in the record of the defendant, Wright's, proceedings in bankruptcy this claim was proven to have been a debt fraudulently contracted and created, consequently, Wright would be estopped from showing that said debt was not fraudulently contracted. It is settled law that when a fact, appearing in the proceedings of a cause, is determined by the court, it operates, if properly pleaded, as an estoppel in any other suit between the parties. The rule holds good whether the fact arises directly from the pleadings, or collaterally in the case, as it works an estoppel as to the facts which it decides or the rights which it establishes. Manny v. Harris, 2 Johns. 24; Rice v. King, 7 Johns. 20.

[The fact that the petitioner submitted in silence to the proof given by Knowles & Forster, after he had knowledge of the fact, and he not contradicting, controverting or denying the same, he cannot now impeach the record of this court, but is estopped by the same. This principle is fully sustained in the cases of Jackson v. Hoffman, 9 Cow. 271; Etheridge v. Osborn, 12 Wend. 399; Stevens, Pl. 239. In the suit in the state court, Knowles & Forster could justly allege that the district court was the proper place to have the question decided; that it had original jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy, as well as of the petitioner and creditors named in the petitioner's schedules; that testimony was given in the cause showing the debt to have been fraudulently contracted; that the question of fraud became an issue in the cause; that Knowles & Forster took the affirmative of the issue; that the petitioner did not negative or deny the same, and by failing to do so admitted the same. All of which will have then become a matter of record in the district court, and Wright will be forever precluded from contesting that fact in any subsequent or other suit with Knowles & Forster (Com. Dig. "Estoppel," art. 1) as they will claim that this is an estoppel by matter of record. 4 Mass. 625; 10 Mass. 155; 4 Munf. 466; 3 East, 354; 2 Barn. & Ald. 662; 17 Mass. 365; 5 Esp. 58; 1 Shaw, 47; 3 East, 316. In Mason v. Anthony, 35 How. Prac. 477, a case where a note had been made usurious in its inception and was purchased by a third party, the fact of usury was concealed from the purchaser, and the note was represented to have been valid business paper. In an action on the note the defendants set up the defence of usury; the court of appeals held the defendant was estopped by his representations from setting up the defence of usury.

[The specifications filed by Knowles & Forster are a mere transcript of the facts alleged and set forth in their proof of claim, so far as they relate to the contracting of the debt by fraud, consequently the creditors must be governed by the rule laid down in Re Clarke, and in Re Elliott [supra], which is decisive upon the point. I hold, as a matter of law, that as the claim now stands proven (as the testimony now stands) it is a claim founded in fraud, and by section 33 of the bankrupt act cannot be affected by any discharge under the act; that it is not competent for the creditors, Knowles & Forster, now to inquire into the question of fraud in the creation of the debt; that until the petitioner in some way contradicts the proof as given by Knowles & Forster as to the fraudulent contracting of the debt the evidence sought to be given by them is inadmissible, but should the petitioner contradict, controvert or explain the testimony given by the creditors, then the creditors will be entitled to the examination asked for.]²

BLATCHEFORD, District Judge. The creditors, Knowles & Forster, cannot be allowed to examine the bankrupt, to prove the nature of the transaction out of which the indebtedness

² [From 2 N. B. R. 142 (Quarto, 57).]

due to them arose, and that such indebtedness was created by the false and fraudulent representations of the bankrupt and his late partnership, for the purpose of showing that the debt cannot be discharged under the proceedings in bankruptcy. The examination proposed is wholly irrelevant. The question of fraud in the creation of the debt cannot be litigated in these proceedings. A debt which is, by section 33 of the act, excepted from the operation of a discharge, as is a debt created by the fraud of the bankrupt, can be collected notwithstanding the discharge. The question whether the discharge affects the debt in question can only arise and be determined between the parties in a suit prosecuted to collect the debt, in which the discharge, after it shall have been granted, shall be pleaded or set up as a bar to a recovery. There is nothing in the proof of debt in this case which can in any manner conclude or prejudice either party in any suit pending in any other tribunal, so far as regards the issue of fraud in the contracting of the debt. The creditors cannot be prejudiced by proving their debt, if it was in fact a debt created by fraud, for section 33 of the act expressly saves all their rights, even though they prove their debt. Nor, e converso, can any thing in the proof of debt affect or conclude the bankrupt on any issue as to the creation of the debt by fraud. Section 21 of the act, in so far as it declares that a creditor who proves his debt shall be deemed to have waived thereby all right of action and suit against the bankrupt, and that all proceedings already commenced, or unsatisfied judgments already obtained thereon, shall be deemed to be discharged and surrendered thereby, cannot be held to apply to or include a debt which is by section 33 excepted from the operation of a discharge; otherwise, sections 21 and 33 would be directly repugnant to each other, and while section 33 declares that such a debt shall not be discharged under the act, even though the creditor proves it, the creditor would, by section 21, be deprived forever of bringing any suit against the bankrupt to recover the debt, and would be held to have discharged any unsatisfied judgment for it already obtained. The provision referred to in section 21 applies only to a debt which will be discharged by a discharge.

=====
Case No. 18,066.

In re WRIGHT et al.

[10 Ben. 14.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1878.

LIMITATION OF LIABILITY OF SHIP-OWNER — VESSEL REPAIRED AFTER COLLISION—FREIGHT — SAILING ON SHARES.

1. A collision occurred between two schooners, the S. and the A. T. on May 6, 1878. On the 11th of June, 1878, the owners of the S. filed a libel against the A. T. to recover their damages. The A. T. had been in the meantime repaired. On the 14th of June her owners filed a petition to limit their liability. A reference was had to fix her value, and the commissioner reported that her value after the collision was $500, and that the interest of the owners in her pending freight was $139.25, and the owners of the S. excepted to the report: Held, that the value, to which the liability of the owners of the A. T. would be limited, was the value of the vessel after the collision and before she was repaired; that, as the vessel was sailed on shares by a master who was not an owner, the interest of the owners in the freight was one-half of it after deducting port charges, which the commissioner had reported.

2. The exceptions must be overruled.

[In the matter of the petition of John G. Wright and others for limitation of liability in respect to damages alleged to have been caused by their schooner, the Adeline Townsend.]

E. L. Owen, for petitioners.
Coudert Bros., for libellants.

CHOATE, District Judge. The petitioners are the owners of the schooner Adeline Townsend. June 11, 1878, the schooner was attached and a libel brought by the owners of cargo of the schooner Sophia Wilson, for damage sustained in consequence of a collision between that vessel and the Adeline Townsend, alleged to have been caused by the fault of the Adeline Townsend. June 14, 1878, the petitioners filed their petition, to obtain the benefit of the act of 1851, limiting the liability of ship owners. Rev. St. § 4233 et seq. The collision happened on the 6th of May, 1878. The Townsend was badly injured, and afterwards and before she was so attached she was repaired by the petitioners.

A reference was ordered to ascertain and report the value of the Townsend after the collision, and the interest of her owners in her pending freight. The commissioner has reported that the value of the vessel after the collision was $500, and the interest of the owners in her pending freight was $139.25. To this report the libellants have excepted as to the value of the vessel, claiming that the act, limiting the liability of the owners, limits their personal liability only, and does not limit or impair the remedy which parties may have against the vessel; that therefore, if the owners repair after the collision, the lien for the damages still attaches to the vessel; and that they are entitled to have her valued as she is at the time of the attachment.

It is well settled that the value, which is the measure of the owners' liability, is the value of the vessel immediately after the collision. Norwich Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 104. Whenever, therefore, under the statute and the rules made for carrying it into effect, the owners apply in proper form to have this limit of their liability determined, it must be fixed by the measure of the value of the vessel just after the collision. When this value is so determined and the amount secured in due form or paid into court, all pending actions whether in personam or in rem are to cease and be stayed. This claim of the libellants has no support either in the statute, the rules or the decisions under them.

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

There is also no equity in their claim. The additional value, which the owners have put upon the vessel by repairing her, constituted no part of her at the time the damage was sustained. To allow this claim would seriously embarrass owners of vessels against which a claim for damage might be made. They could not safely repair till a libel was brought, and yet they could not compel the bringing of a libel. It is obvious that this would seriously impair the value of their property and prevent the use of it. But clearly the act fixes a liability, whether the injured party seeks to enforce it in personam or in rem, measured by the value at a time certain and not a shifting and moveable value.

The libellants also except to the report of the commissioner as to the freight. The vessel was sailed by the master, who was not one of the owners, on half shares. The interest of the owners in the freight was one-half of the freight after deducting port charges, and so the commissioner has found.

Report confirmed.

Case No. 18,067.

In re WRIGHT.

[3 Biss. 359; 1 8 N. B. R. 430.]

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Oct. Term, 1872.

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION.

1. An insolvent merchant, having sold his homestead for cash, cannot, by moving his family into his store, hold that as his homestead, exempt.

[Cited in Re Boothroyd, Case No. 1,652; Re Lammer, Id. 8,031; Re Parker, Id. 10,724; Re McKenna, 9 Fed. 29.]

[Cited in Comstock v. Bechtel, 63 Wis. 658, 24 N. W. 466.]

2. Though his right to sell his homestead is undoubted, he cannot shift it, to the prejudice of his creditors.

3. In such case the court will order a delivery of possession to the assignee.

In bankruptcy. George C. Wright had for several years been the owner and occupant of a comfortable house and lot in Fond du Lac, occupying said premises with his family until about two weeks before proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against him. He had been doing a small business as a boot and shoe dealer and manufacturer, and a short time before being put into bankruptcy he purchased, on credit, an unusually large amount of goods. The notes for said purchases about becoming payable, he sold his homestead and removed his family into his store. This was a two story building, constructed solely for business purposes, and occupied by him exclusively as his store and shop. Adjoining this building was a one-story frame structure, which had been under rental for some considerable time. Wright, about the time of removing his family into the store, removed the addition, for the reason, as he alleged, that the foundation wall rested on the adjacent lot, and the owner demanded the occupancy of his ground to the division line. About the same time he put up a temporary partition of boards, placed on end, and not extending to the ceiling, thereby dividing his store from the apartments occupied by his family. Wright having been adjudged a bankrupt on creditors' petition, his assignee filed this petition for a surrender of this property, Wright claiming it as exempt under the homestead exemption clause.

Jenkins & Elliot, for assignee.

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for bankrupt.

MILLER, District Judge. Wright, with full knowledge that his notes were maturing, sold his homestead, removed his family of six persons into one side of his store, and removed the one-story addition then drawing rent, within three weeks of his bankruptcy, and after he had greatly reduced his stock, without appropriating the proceeds of sales towards the payment of his debts. The homestead and the store property were unincumbered. He sold the homestead for cash, less a debt of about $250 he owed the purchaser. And he mortgaged another lot to secure a debt of $900, thereby giving that creditor preference over his other creditors.

I have no doubt that George C. Wright committed a fraud on his creditors and also on the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]. He was doing business in a building constructed solely for business purposes, and not having the appearance of a dwelling, with an adjoining building under rent, open to the view of his creditors when he was purchasing their goods on credit, and occupying at the same time with his family a comfortable homestead, and at the time his notes for an unusually large increase of stock were maturing, within three days he made all these changes as to his property. His creditors no doubt gave him credit on the faith of his unincumbered lot on which his store was built, and also of his other property and his stock of goods. They had a right to be paid, if necessary, out of that property.

The adjoining structure might have been reduced in size. The removing of this building has the appearance of a plan to bring the lot and premises within the homestead exemption. I do not believe that Wright now occupies the premises as his homestead with due faith to his creditors. His whole operation has the appearance of a scheme to defraud creditors by forcing a compromise from them. His answer to the petition removes all doubt on this subject. He admits that he was embarrassed in his circumstances, and was unable to pay his debts as they became due, and he hoped to be able, by the change he made in his property, to make some arrangements with his creditors which would enable him to continue his business. He did sell his homestead for cash, and he did greatly reduce his stock within a short time without paying his creditors. He delivered to the assignee about $800, which is a small sum compared with the amount of his sales. He committed a fraud on the bankrupt act by mortgaging a lot to secure an old debt, when he knew he was insolvent. The bankrupt act prohibits preferences to creditors. It is said that the homestead had been in market through a land agent for some time, but that is not material in this issue. He had a lawful right to sell his homestead, but that did not give him the right to shift his homestead, under the circumstances, to the prejudice of his creditors and in violation of principles of fair dealing.

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

An order will be made that George C. Wright, the bankrupt, convey to the assignee the said premises, and surrender possession to the assignee.

Case No. 18,068.

In re WRIGHT.

[6 Biss. 317.]¹

District Court, N. D. Illinois. March, 1875.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—SUSPENSION ON DEBTOR'S BANKRUPTCY—RIGHT TO RETURN OF ASSETS.

1. Where a debtor had filed a petition in bankruptcy, his only debts being apparently barred by the statute of limitations, his widow and heirs cannot procure a withdrawal of the property from the bankruptcy court, even though no debts had been proved against the estate. They may have been taken out of the statute, and if provable at the time of filing the petition they would not be barred subsequently. The statute ceases to run on the filing of the petition.

2. The heirs of the bankrupt cannot profit by delay of creditors in proving their debts; and the widow of an intestate has no possible standing in court, her dower claim not passing to the assignee.

In bankruptcy.

Van Arman & Felch, for petitioners.

J. E. Lockwood, assignee, pro se.

BLODGETT, District Judge. In this case the widow and children of the bankrupt have filed their petition, setting forth that the bankrupt filed his petition in this court and was duly adjudicated a bankrupt on the 2d day of March, 1868; that he scheduled interests in certain real estate of which he claimed to be seized at the time of filing his said petition in bankruptcy; that an assignee was appointed to whom all his estate was duly conveyed; that no debts have been proven against said estate, and no sale or disposition of the property assigned has been made by the assignee; that the bankrupt was duly discharged from his debts pursuant to the provisions of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]; that said John S. Wright, died intestate in September, 1874, leaving petitioners his widow and heirs-at-law.

It is further stated in the petition that all the debts contracted by the bankrupt, and from which he sought to be discharged by this proceeding in bankruptcy, were contracted more than sixteen years ago, and are barred by the statute of limitations of this state. The petitioners then pray that the assignee may be required to reconvey the property of the estate to them as the proper representatives of the bankrupt.

On filing petition, a rule was entered, requiring assignee to show cause why the prayer should not be granted. The assignee answered stating in substance, that the extreme paucity of assets at the time said proceedings were prosecuted was such that there was no good reason to expect any dividend from said estate to creditors; that the bankrupt had at times prior to his bankruptcy, been possessed of large and varied interests in real estate in Cook county, Illinois, and elsewhere, all of which had, however, at the time of such bankruptcy, been conveyed away or mortgaged, or otherwise incumbered to their full value, and if for any reason such interest should at any time be found valuable, the benefit thereof should be given to the creditors.

It is contended on the part of the petitioners that, inasmuch as no debts have been proved, and as all the debts against the bankrupt's estate are now barred by the statute of limitations, therefore no debts can hereafter be proved, and the heirs of the bankrupt are entitled to a return of the property; in other words, that the estate stands precisely as though all the debts had been duly proved and paid, and there was a remnant or surplus of assets left in the hands of the assignee.

The argument seems to me more specious than sound. It does not follow that because sixteen years have now elapsed since the debts were contracted, they are therefore barred by the statute of limitations. Many or all of them may be in judgment, or on specialty, or a new promise to pay them, or an acknowledgment of their being unpaid, made just on the eve of bankruptcy proceedings, all which would take them out of the statute. And of existing debts to which the statute could not have been pleaded by the assignee if the creditors had sought to prove them at the time the proceedings were commenced, I apprehend they have not been barred by any time that has elapsed since the schedule was filed. If barred by the statute when proceedings were commenced, the assignee could probably have pleaded the bar, but if valid debts at that time, I think they must remain so as against the assignee, although I cannot find that this precise question has ever been determined. The case is analogous to a trust. Here is property placed in the hands of a trustee for the benefit of certain persons. When the assignee has converted it into money and is ready to distribute it, he is to call a creditors' meeting for the purpose of making a dividend. Until that time the beneficiaries are not required to act. They need not prove their debts until there is something to divide, and their status in regard to the right to a dividend is fixed by this right at the time the proceedings commenced.

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Suppose, for instance, a bankrupt schedules a claim which is within one day of being barred by the statute, and suppose the whole term to have elapsed when the creditor comes forward to prove his claim, could the assignee be heard to allege that the bar which commenced to run before bankruptcy had ripened afterwards? I think not, but that if the claim is provable when the proceedings are commenced it must remain provable. True, creditors may forfeit their rights as against each other by their neglect; that is, those who have proven their claims may come in and share all the dividends as against those who neglect to prove. But the bankrupt or his heirs has no right to profit by the delay of the creditors in proving their claims. As long as there are creditors unpaid the bankrupt has no right to demand the property. It is true that the mere statement of a debt by a bankrupt in his schedule, does not make it provable nor take it out of the statute of limitations. If there is any defense to a claim, the assignee or another creditor can assert it, although the bankrupt has in one sense admitted it by his schedule.

So, too, no person can be recognized as a creditor, except one who has proved his claim, but this rule is only applicable to the relations of creditors to each other, and the assignee and not to the bankrupt.

Cases may readily be imagined where creditors, by waiting longer than those of this bankrupt have waited, may be paid in full from the proceeds of property which was apparently valueless at the time the schedule was made.

The bankrupt has accomplished the main purpose for which he came into the court. He has obtained his discharge, and it does not befitt his heirs to dictate what creditors shall do about proving their debts, nor when the assignee shall convert the property. That is a matter entirely between the creditors and the assignee. They can put him in motion at any time, or they can allow him in the exercise of his own judgment to await events.

The counsel for the petitioner ask how long they must wait for these debts to be proven? I answer This is not a matter in which they have any concern, and the time they must wait is of no consequence to creditors.

I do not see what standing Mrs. Wright, the widow, has in any event on this petition. Her husband died without a will. She is only entitled to dower, and that will not pass to the assignee. She is not delayed, and therefore has no right to relief here.

Case No. 18,069.

In re WRIGHT.

[1 N. B. R. 393 (Quarto 91).] ¹

District Court, D. Kentucky. 1873.

REGISTER IN BANKRUPTCY—CERTIFICATE OF QUESTION.

A question, in order to be properly certified to the judge, must arise regularly in the course of proceedings before the register, and between the parties having the legal right to raise it.

[Proceedings in the matter of J. W. Wright, a bankrupt.]

BALLARD, District Judge. I do not see how the "point or matter" certified in this case under date of January 29, 1868, could have arisen "during the proceedings before the register," or "in the course of such proceedings, or upon the result of such proceedings." If the assignee should move the court for an order requiring the bankrupt to surrender to him the yoke of cattle owned by the bankrupt at the adjudication in bankruptcy, or if the assignee should sue the bankrupt for the cattle, then it is possible the question of title might arise before the register sitting in chambers to dispose of "uncontested matters" under the fourth section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 519)] and rule 28 of this court, which it might be his duty to cause "to be stated by the opposing parties in writing," and to "adjourn the same into court for decision by the judge." But it does not appear that any such motion has been made, or that any such suit has been brought, or that the assignee is even a party to or is cognizant of this proceeding. If any one is entitled to the possession of the yoke of cattle in question against the bankrupt it is the assignee, and not the creditor. The question of title can be decided only in some direct proceeding between the assignee and the other party claiming.

I have already suggested two modes by which the question certified might properly have arisen. Section 6 of the act prescribes another, and doubtless there are still other modes. Section 6 provides that, "in any bankruptcy, or in any other proceedings within the jurisdiction of the court under this act, the parties concerned or submitting to such jurisdiction may at any stage of the proceedings, by consent, state any question or questions in a special case for the opinion of the court," &c. The provision contemplates a submission to the court of any question by a proceeding in the nature of an agreed case. The mode of proceeding in such a case is well understood by all lawyers, and need not be here stated. I wish to state, once for all, that it is not every question made by parties in the presence of a register that is to be certified by him for decision by the judge. It must be a question arising properly in the course of the proceedings before him,—that is, it must arise regularly in the course of the proceedings before him, and between parties who have the legal right to raise it,—otherwise, the judge might be called on to decide innumerable abstract questions, when his decision would, of course, conclude nothing and bind no one.

¹ Reprinted by permission.

I decline to decide the question certified in this case, because it was not made by parties having the right to make it, and because it does not seem to have arisen in any proceeding before the register. I do not wish to be understood as saying that creditors of a bankrupt cannot, under any circumstances, nor in any way, raise such a question as is here certified. Possibly, upon their suggestion that the assignee was acting in bad faith and refused to raise such question, or upon some similar suggestion, they might be heard. But there is no such suggestion here.

Case No. 18,070.

In re WRIGHT et al.

[2 N. B. R. 41 (Quarto, 14);¹ 15 Pittsb. Leg. J. 553.]

District Court, W. D. Michigan. 1868.

BANKRUPTCY — DISCHARGE — FRAUDULENT DEBTS.

The creation of a debt by fraud is not a ground upon which to oppose the discharge of a bankrupt. Such debts may be proved, and the dividend thereon shall be payment on account of said debt. Where a bankrupt contracted a debt through fraud he continues liable notwithstanding his discharge.

In this case, on the return day of the order to show cause why the bankrupts [Wright & Peckham] should not have a final discharge, Messrs. O. P. Ramsdell & Co., creditors, of Buffalo, N. Y., by their attorneys, appeared before the register, H. E. Thompson, Esq., in opposition thereto, and filed a specification of the grounds of their opposition, substantially as follows: That immediately prior to the purchase of the goods from the said O. P. Ramsdell & Co., by the said bankrupts, the said bankrupts represented and claimed to said Ramsdell & Co., that they were then worth twenty thousand or thirty thousand dollars, and obtained credit for said goods from said Ramsdell & Co., upon such representations; and that the same were false and fraudulent, and were made by said bankrupts with the intent to defraud said Ramsdell & Co. This specification was excepted to by the counsel for the bankrupt, for the reason (among others) that the facts set forth in said specification constitute no ground for opposing the discharge of said bankrupts.

¹ [Reprinted from 2 N. B. R. 41 (Quarto, 14), by permission.]

WITHEY, District Judge. The exception, "first," to the specification presented by creditors of grounds of opposition to the bankrupts' discharge, is sustained. The creation of a debt by fraud is not a ground upon which to oppose the discharge of a bankrupt. Section 29 [of the act of 1867 (14 Stat. 531)] declares the several things which constitute grounds of opposition. The specification filed covers no ground therein declared, and there can be no ground of opposition presented nor prescribed by section 29. The thirty-third section of the bankrupt act provides that no debt created by the fraud of the bankrupt shall be discharged under this act, but the debt may be proved and the dividend thereon shall be payment on account of said debt. Wisely was this provision made, and equally wise to exclude it from the grounds of opposition to a bankrupt's discharge. As to a debt contracted by fraud, there is and should be, no discharge; the bankrupt continues liable to the creditor on whom the fraud was committed.

Case No. 18,071.

In re WRIGHT.

[2 N. B. R. 490 (Quarto, 155).]¹

District Court, D. New Jersey. 1869.

JUDGMENT AGAINST BANKRUPT—VALIDITY—WARRANT FOR CONFESSION—NOTICE OF INSOLVENCY—KNOWLEDGE OF ATTORNEY.

1. Where a debtor, not being insolvent, borrowed money and gave bond with warrant of attorney to the creditor to confess judgment, and he took judgment with notice of subsequent bankruptcy and levy made, held, the judgment was good against and should be paid out of the assets in court of the proceeds of sale of bankrupt's property.

[Criticised in Re Lord, Case No. 8,503.]

2. Judgments obtained against a debtor at the time insolvent, by creditors not shown by the evidence to have had reason so to believe him, held, to be good against assets.

3. Semble, that knowledge of such insolvency is not necessarily to be presumed of the creditors because of such knowledge by their attorney.

[Cited in Graham v. Stark, Case No. 5,676; Singer v. Sloan, Id. 12,899.]

In bankruptcy.

FIELD, District Judge. This is a case of involuntary bankruptcy. The petition was filed on the 5th day of January, 1869. On the 30th of December, 1868, judgments were obtained against the debtor, by James Van Deventer, for two thousand six hundred and eighty-six dollars and forty-four cents, by Susan D. Brown, for two hundred and seventy-eight dollars and ninety-seven cents, and by George C. Parker & Brothers, for one hundred and ninety-nine dollars and forty-six cents. On the same day executions were sued out upon these judgments, directed to the sheriff of the county of Mercer, and a levy made upon all the property of the debtor. Upon filing the petition in bankruptcy, an injunction was granted, restraining the sheriff from selling under these executions. The property of the debtor consisted chiefly of dry-goods and groceries in a store at Princeton, where he had been carrying on business. This property being perishable and liable to deterioration in value, upon the adjudication in bankruptcy, an order was made, on the application of the petitioning creditor, and with the consent of the judgment creditors, that the marshal should sell the goods in the store, and bring the money into court. This was done, and thereupon the counsel for the judgment creditors applied for a rule to show cause why the amount of their respective judgments should not be paid out of the proceeds of the sale. The application was granted, and leave given to all parties in interest to take testimony and produce evidence before the register. This evidence and the arguments of counsel, have been submitted to me, and the motion now is to make the rule absolute. This motion is resisted by the petitioning creditor upon the ground that as to the judgment of James Van Deventer, it was a judgment on a bond with warrant of attorney to confess judgment, and that at the time when the warrant was given, and also at the time when judgment was confessed, [J. B.] Wright was insolvent, and that Van Deventer had reasonable cause to believe that such was his condition, and that a fraud upon the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], was intended; and as to the other two judgments, which were judgments by default, upon which executions were issued and a levy made, it is insisted, that Wright thereby suffered his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference, and to defeat or delay the operations of the act, and that at the time of doing so he was insolvent, and that the judgment creditors had reasonable cause to believe that he was so.

¹ [Reprinted by permission.]

Some question was raised by the counsel for the judgment creditors, as to whether, admitting these judgments to be liable to the objection stated, they come within the letter of the last clause of the thirty-ninth section of the act. That clause is in the following words: "And if such person shall be adjudged a bankrupt, the assignees may recover back the money or other property so paid, conveyed, sold, assigned, or transferred contrary to this act, provided the person receiving such payment or conveyance had reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on this act was intended, and that the debtor was insolvent; and such creditor shall not prove his debt in bankruptcy." It is not denied, of course, that the matters charged were acts of bankruptcy on the part of the debtor, but were they payments, conveyances, or transfers made by the debtor, and could these judgment creditors be said to have received a payment or conveyance within the meaning of this section of the act? I am satisfied there is nothing in this objection. A debtor who suffers his property to be taken on legal process, and sold for the payment of a debt due to a creditor, does thereby make a transfer and conveyance of his property within the meaning of the act. Such was the opinion of Judge Blatchford, in Re Black [Case No. 1,457], and there can be no doubt about the correctness of that opinion. If this were not so, the provisions of the thirty-ninth section would become practically inoperative in respect to all property of the debtor levied upon or sold under a judgment and execution, no matter how obtained; and as the confession of a judgment, or the suffering of his property to be taken on legal process is a frequent and well-known mode of preferring a creditor, one of the principal objects of the bankrupt act would be defeated.

Let us now proceed to the examination of these judgments; and as that in favor of Mr. Van Deventer stands upon a different footing from the others, it will be considered separately. The bond, with a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, was given by Wright, on the 7th of March, 1868, but the judgment was not entered up until the 30th of December following. Was Wright at the time this bond was executed, or at the time when judgment was confessed, insolvent, and had Van Deventer reasonable cause to believe that such was his condition? But before looking at the evidence bearing upon this point, let us endeavor to ascertain the meaning of the word "insolvent" as used in this act; for I suspect a good deal of misapprehension exists upon this subject in the public mind, and it is very important that it should be corrected. By the bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], all transfers of property made by the bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving a preference to one creditor over others, were deemed utterly void, and a fraud upon the act. What was meant by the words "in contemplation of bankruptcy," was a subject of a good deal of discussion. Different interpretations were put upon them in different circuits. By some judges they were held to mean contemplation of insolvency—of a simple inability to pay as debts should become payable. By other judges it was held that the debtor must contemplate an act of bankruptcy, or a voluntary application for the benefit of the bankrupt law. But it was decided by the supreme court, in the case of Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 150, that the words "contemplation of bankruptcy," did not mean contemplation of insolvency—of a simple inability to pay as debts should become due and payable—but meant that the debtor must contemplate the commission of what was declared by the act to be an act of bankruptcy, or must have contemplated an application by himself, to be decreed a bankrupt. In short, it was held that the word "bankruptcy" meant something more than "insolvency"—something less restricted. It is a little singular that this question should have been presented to the supreme court for the first time in 1851, years after the bankrupt act had been repealed.

Having thus ascertained that "bankruptcy" means something more than "insolvency," let us see what "insolvency," as used by the act, means. The language of the thirty-fifth and thirty-ninth sections of the bankrupt act is almost identical with that of the insolvent law of Massachusetts, and the decisions of the court of that state as to what was meant by the word "insolvency" are entitled to much consideration. "By the term 'insolvency,'" says Shaw, C. J., in the case of Thompson v. Thompson, 4 Cush. 127, "we do not understand an absolute inability to pay one's debts at some future time, upon a settlement and winding up of a trader's concerns; but a trader may be said to be in insolvent circumstances, when he is not in a condition to pay his debts in the ordinary course, as persons carrying on trade usually do." And in the case of Lee v. Kilburn, 3 Gray, 594, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, after speaking of the extreme difficulty of giving a definition of insolvency that would be applicable to all classes of persons who may avail themselves of the benefits of the insolvent laws, proceeded to say: "But it is clear, a trader may be insolvent, and may be known to be so, to the creditor seeking a preference, though he is not compelled to stop business. Men often continue to carry on business upon the credit they have before acquired, long after they were actually and hopelessly insolvent; sometimes with the view of better enabling themselves to make payment to preferred creditors, contracting new debts to pay old ones; sometimes with a view of living upon the property in their hands. These are among the evils which it was the policy of the insolvent laws to prevent. * * * We do not understand that an absolute inability to pay one's debts at a future time, upon the winding up of his concerns, is necessary to constitute insolvency in a trader. What is meant by the insolvency of a trader, as an abstract proposition, can be stated only in general terms. A trader may be said to be insolvent, when he is not in a condition to pay his debts in the ordinary course, as persons carrying on trade usually do. This is but a general abstract rule, modified more or less by the habits and usages of the place where the debtor resides, and of the particular business in which he is engaged." The very same definition is given to the term "insolvency," by Judge Nelson in the case of Merchants' Nat. Bank of Hastings v. Traux [Case No. 9,451]. "Insolvency" within the meaning of the bankrupt act, when applied to traders, means inability to pay debts in the ordinary course of business, as persons carrying on trade usually do." And the same view is taken of it by Judge Blatchford, in Re Black, to which I have before referred.

In this sense of the word "insolvency" then, had Van Deventer reasonable cause to believe that Wright was insolvent, when the bond with warrant of attorney was executed? A good deal of evidence has been taken. Both Van Deventer and Wright were examined at great length. All the dealings and transactions of Wright, from the time the bond was given, up to the time when the judgment was entered up, have been minutely enquired into. I will not go into a detailed examination of this evidence. It is not necessary, as will be seen from the view which I feel constrained to take of this case. I will only state the conclusions to which I have come after a careful examination of the evidence. I do not think there is any sufficient proof, that at the time when the judgment bond was given, Wright was insolvent, or that Van Deventer had reasonable cause to believe that he was so. He had difficulty in meeting his engagements. And his object in applying to Van Deventer for a loan of money was, that he might relieve himself from these embarrassments. Van Deventer required him to make a statement of his debts and liabilities. He did so, and the statement showed a balance in his favor to a large amount. He assured Van Deventer that if he would let him have the amount required, it would relieve him from all his difficulties. I think there is no evidence that Wright was insolvent at this time, or that Van Deventer had reasonable cause to believe that he was so. But as to his condition when the judgment was entered up, the conclusion to which I have come is very different. At that time, the evidence clearly shows, that not only was Wright insolvent, in the sense in which I have explained that term, but that Van Deventer had reasonable cause to believe that such was his condition. He certainly was not able to pay his debts in the course of business, as persons carrying on trade usually do. And it is hardly possible that Van Deventer could have been ignorant of this fact. He knew enough at least to put him upon enquiry. And if he had made that enquiry, he would have been satisfied that such was Wright's condition.

These are the conclusions to which I have arrived. And now, what is the legal result? If a creditor takes a bond, with warrant of attorney to confess judgment, at a time when he has no reason to believe that the debtor is insolvent, will the fact that the debtor was insolvent when the judgment was entered up, and that the creditor knew him to be so, vitiate that judgment, and render it a fraud under the bankrupt act? This is an interesting and important question, and one which seems to have escaped the attention of counsel. And yet it is one upon the solution of which the determination of this case very much depends.

This question came before the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Buckingham v. McLean, before referred to. In that case the question was, whether the giving of a power of attorney to confess judgment was an act of bankruptcy, under the act of 1841. The court held, that if the debtor did not contemplate the act of bankruptcy, at the time the power of attorney was executed, it was of no consequence what his condition was when the judgment was entered up. The court says: "It would seem that if the intent of the debtor is to give a legal quality to the transaction, it must be an intent accompanying an act done by himself, and not an intent or purpose arising in his mind afterwards, while third persons are acting; and that consequently, we must enquire whether the debtor contemplated bankruptcy when he executed the power. It is true, this construction would put it in the power of creditors, by taking a bond and warrant of attorney, while the debtor was solvent and did not contemplate bankruptcy, to enter up a judgment and issue execution, and by a levy, acquire a valid lien, down to the very moment when the title of the assignee began. But this was undoubtedly so under the statute of James, which, like ours, contained no provision to meet this mischief; and it became so great that, by the one hundred and eighth section of the revising act of Geo. IV., it was enacted that no creditor, who shall sue out execution on any judgment obtained by default, confession, or nolle prosequi, shall avail himself of such execution, to the prejudice of other fair creditors, but shall be paid ratably with such creditors." If the bankrupt act of 1841 had continued to exist, a similar addition to its provisions would doubtless have become necessary.

Is there any provision in our bankrupt act to meet this mischief? It is suggested, that by permitting the judgment to be entered up, Wright thereby suffered his property to be taken on legal process. But how could he have prevented the judgment from being entered up? There is nothing to show that he was aware of Van Deventer's intention to enter up the judgment at the time when he did. But it may be said, that as soon as he found himself insolvent, he ought to have prevented any judgment from being obtained against him by going into voluntary bankruptcy. But although insolvent, in the sense of not being able to pay his debts in the ordinary course as they became due, yet the evidence shows that he had no intention of breaking up business, and fully believed that he had ample means for the payment of all his debts. This is a condition in which country traders very often find themselves, and to hold that it is their duty always under such circumstances to go into voluntary bankruptcy, would be to lay down a harsh rule, and one that might work a good deal of injustice. We must not press this doctrine too far. It is not wise to do so. It might bring discredit upon the act itself. At all events, in this case, I am not prepared to say that Van Deventer, although he knew when he entered up his judgment that Wright was insolvent in the sense in which I have explained that term, had any reasonable cause to believe that a fraud upon the act was intended. Let the judgment of Van Deventer then be paid out of the money in court.

With regard to the other two judgments, one in favor of Susan D Brown, and the other of Parker & Brother, I have already stated, as my conclusion from the evidence, that at the time they were obtained, Wright was insolvent; but there is not the slightest evidence to show that these judgment creditors were aware of his insolvency. Van Deventer's business relations with Wright were of such a character that he could not very well have been ignorant of the fact. But Mrs Brown is a retired lady, and Parker & Brother reside in New York, and there is nothing to bring home to either of them a knowledge of Wright's insolvency. It is said, however, that Mr. Hageman was their attorney, and as he was aware of the insolvency of Mr. Wright, they must be presumed to have had knowledge of it also. But although parties are, in many cases, no doubt, bound by the acts of their attorney, I am not aware of any rule of law, in virtue of which they are presumed to know all that he knows. Suppose that he does not communicate his knowledge to them. But where is the evidence that Mr. Hageman had any knowledge of Wright's insolvency? I can find none. But it is further insisted, that in the case of these two judgments, the service of process was acknowledged by Wright, and that this is evidence of a design upon the part of the plaintiffs to obtain an undue advantage over other creditors. Nothing is more common when a suit is commenced, than to have the service of the summons acknowledged by the defendant. It saves the trouble and expense of having it served by the sheriff. The sheriff is the only one who has a right to complain of it. But it is said, the object of it was to gain time, so that a judgment might be obtained sooner than if the summons had been served by the sheriff. That this was not the object of it, however, is apparent from the fact that these judgments were not obtained until some twenty days after the plaintiffs were entitled to them. Let these judgments also be paid out of the fund in court. Rule made absolute.

Case No. 18,072.

The WRIGHT.

[See Case No. 17,115.]

WRIGHT (ANDREWS v.). See Case No. 382.

WRIGHT (BAILEY v.). See Case No. 749.

WRIGHT (BANK OF COLUMBIA v.). See Case No. 883.

Case No. 18,073.

WRIGHT v. BLAKESLEE.

[13 Blatchf. 421.]¹Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June 20, 1876.²

SUCCESSION TAX.

Under section 127 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 287), where, under the will of a testator who died before the act was passed, a person became beneficially entitled in possession, after the act was passed, to real estate, upon the death of another person who died after the act was passed, and who had by such will a life estate in such real estate, held, that such beneficial interest in possession was a "succession" conferred by such will, and was subject, under section 133 of said act, to a succession tax.

This was an action of assumpsit [by B. Huntington Wright against Levi Blakeslee] to recover the amount of a succession tax, paid under protest, assessed upon the assignors of the plaintiff. It was tried by the court without jury.

Risley, Stoddard & Matteson, for plaintiff.
Richard Crowley, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. Section 127 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 287), provides, "that every past or future disposition of real estate, by will, deed or laws of descent, by reason whereof any person shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectancy, to any real estate, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the passing of this act, shall be deemed to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition a 'succession,' and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled; and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the grantor, testator, ancestor, or other person, from whom the interest of the successor has been or shall be derived." Section 133 declares, that "there shall be levied and paid to the United States, in respect of every such succession as aforesaid, according to the value thereof, the following duties, viz.: Where the successor shall be the lineal issue, or lineal ancestor, of the predecessor, a duty at the rate of one dollar per centum upon such value." The assignors of the plaintiff were the children of Henrietta Huntington, a devisee under the will of her father, by reason of a provision in his will substantially as follows: "In case my daughter Henrietta shall, at the time of my decease, be feme covert, I give and devise unto my executors one other of the said equal parts or shares of the residue of my estate, in trust to receive the rents and profits, and apply the same to her sole and separate use during the term of her natural life, and, at her decease, if she shall leave issue her surviving, I devise the said share to her issue, their heirs and assigns, in full and absolute possession." The testator died in 1846, said Henrietta being a feme covert. She died after the passage of the act. These being the facts, the assessor insisted upon payment of a tax of one dollar per centum on the value of the succession.

It seems very clear, that, by a past disposition of real estate by will, the assignors of the plaintiff had a vested estate in expectancy during the life of their mother, and, upon her death, after the act was passed, became "beneficially entitled in possession" to the real estate. The concurrence of these conditions conferred on the issue a succession, and made them successors, within the plain definition of section 127. The argument for the plaintiff is, that the person creating the estate, or from whom it is derived, must die after the passing of the act, to confer the succession defined. Such is not the language of the section. It suffices, if, by the death of any person dying after the passing of the act, the devisee becomes beneficially entitled in possession to the estate. By the death of the mother, the children, who theretofore had an estate in expectancy, became beneficially entitled in possession. It seems equally clear, that, if the testator had died after the passage of the act, the mother and children living, a tax as upon an estate in expectancy would have accrued against the children. In such case, under section 129, the tax would have been apportioned between the mother and children, and, if she had subsequently died, the act being still in force, a new succession tax upon the value of her interest would have been payable by the children. The act is carefully framed, and the most comprehensive terms are employed, to meet every case where a beneficial interest, either expectant or in possession, devolves upon a devisee. The language is so clear, and the conditions which constitute the definition of a "succession" and a "successor" are so plain and exact, that argument drawn from other sections of the act is unavailing. The duty of one dollar per centum was due to the United States. The assessor properly added a penalty of fifty per centum, as a penalty for refusal to make return. Such penalty is imposed by the amendment made to section 118 by the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 479), where the person who should make return wilfully neglects, or where such person refuses, to make return. A neglect to make return is not necessarily wilful; a refusal is, or, at any rate, is, by the statute, made equivalent to, a wilful neglect.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Reversed in 101 U. S. 174.]

These conclusions are decisive against the plaintiff, and judgment is ordered for the defendant.

[The judgment was reversed by the supreme court. 101 U. S. 174.]

Case No. 18,074.

WRIGHT et al. v. COGSWELL.

[1 McLean, 471.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. June Term, 1839.

AFFIDAVIT TO HOLD TO BAIL—SUFFICIENCY.

1. An affidavit to hold to bail must be positive, and the indebtedment must be stated from the knowledge of the affiant.

[Cited in Postley v. Higgins, Case No. 11-304; Nelson v. Cutter, Id. 10,104.]

[Cited in Quarles v. Robinson, 2 Pin. 99.]

2. An affidavit that the affiant was informed and verily believes the defendant is indebted to the plaintiffs is insufficient.

3. The affiant must state more than the mere legal import of the instrument on which the action is brought.

At law.

Mr. Johnson, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Logan, for defendant.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This action is brought on a promissory note of $4,044.44. Before the writ was issued, James H. Sanford made an affidavit that he was informed and verily believed the defendant [William R. Cogswell] was justly indebted to the plaintiffs [James Wright and others] in the just and full sum of $4,281.71, the same being the amount, including interest, of a certain promissory note, &c., and that unless the defendant shall be held to bail, the amount of the judgment will be in danger of being lost. The statute of Illinois concerning bail provides "that in all actions to be commenced in any court of record in this state and founded upon any specialty, bill or note in writing, or on the judgment of any court, foreign or domestic, and in all actions of covenant, &c. in which the plaintiff or other credible person can ascertain the sum due or damages sustained, and that the same will be in danger of being lost, as that the benefit of whatever judgment may be obtained will be in danger unless the defendant or defendants be held to bail, and shall make affidavit thereof, the defendant shall be held to special bail," &c.

A motion is made by the defendant's counsel to quash the bail bond, on account of the insufficiency of the affidavit. The statute prescribes the terms on which a plaintiff is entitled to special bail. An affidavit is required, though the action may be founded on a judgment, or an instrument of the highest solemnity; and this affidavit must state the amount due or the damages sustained. A very strict rule has been observed in regard to affidavits to hold to bail in the king's bench. The rule has been somewhat less strict in the common pleas. 1 Sell. Prac. 104. In the case of Pomp v. Ludvigson, Burrows, 655, the court held that the affidavit must be as positive as the nature of the case admits. And in 3 Term R. 575, that the affidavit of indebtedment is not good if made, "as appears by the account annexed." In Strange, 1226, it was decided that swearing to a belief of indebtedment is not sufficient. In the common pleas (3 Wils. 154) it was decided that an affidavit which stated the circumstances of the cause of action, without specifying the amount due, was sufficient.

The affidavit in this case was not made by the party to whom the debt was due, but by a stranger to the original transaction, who swears that "he is informed and verily believes the defendant was justly indebted," &c. This oath was, probably, made by the affiant, from an inspection of the note on which the action is founded; and, perhaps, a correspondence with the plaintiff. Now it is fair to infer that the statute, in requiring an affidavit to hold to bail, intended more than a statement which any one could make, on an inspection of the instrument on which the action is brought. And the affidavit filed in this case is nothing more than this. The affiant is informed and believes, that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff. His information may have been acquired from the plaintiff or from reading the note; and as indebtedment is the legal inference arising from the face of the note, the affiant might well say that he believed the defendant was justly indebted, &c. If any effect be given to the statute, the affidavit must contain something more than the belief of the affiant, founded upon the legal import of the obligation. The sum due must be stated positively and by a person who can swear from his own knowledge. The bail bond is set aside, on the ground that the affidavit is insufficient.

WRIGHT (CONSOLIDATED FRUIT JAR CO. v.). See Case No. 3,135.

Case No. 18,075.

WRIGHT v. CURTIS.

[See Case No. 17,628.]

WRIGHT (DARBY v.). See Case No. 3,574.

WRIGHT (DAYTON v.). See Case No. 3,693.

¹ [Reported by Hon John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

Case No. 18,076.

WRIGHT v. DEKLYNE.

[Pet. C. C. 199.]¹

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. April Term, 1816.

DISMISSAL OF BILL—CONCLUSIVENESS—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF WITNESS—PAROL EVIDENCE
—CONTRADICTION OF WRITING.

1. The dismissal of a bill in chancery, is not conclusive against the complainant, in a court of law, although the bill may have been brought for the same matter.

[Explained and limited in Smith v. Kernochan, 7 How. (48 U. S.) 217.]

[Cited in Cramer v. Moore, 36 Ohio St. 350; Tucker v. Harris, 13 Ga. 1.]

2. The decision of a court of competent jurisdiction, directly upon the same point, is conclusive, whenever it may again come in question.

[Cited in Sarchet v. The General Isaac Davis, Case No. 12,357.]

[Cited in White v. Coatsworth, 6 N. Y. 143; Wyman v. Campbell, 6 Port. (Ala.) 219. Cited in brief in Gardner v. Buckbee, 3 Cow. 126.]

3. Declarations of a witness, cannot be given in evidence, except only, in answer to evidence of other declarations of the witness, inconsistent with what he had previously sworn to.

[Cited in Coffin v. Anderson, 4 Blackf. 399. Cited in brief in Shaw v. Emery, 42 Me. 61.]

4. Parol evidence of the declarations of an auctioneer, contrary to the written terms of sale, is not admissible; but such evidence, as to the property intended to be sold by him, is proper.

[Cited in Chouteau v. Goddin, 39 Mo. 249.]

This was an action of ejectment, brought to recover a moiety of certain islands and flats in the river Delaware. The property was, in the year 1752, granted to three persons, of the name of Watson, Bond and Salter; who held separate tracts of land, on the main land opposite to it. In 1765, Salter conveyed one half of his main land, containing 357 acres, and one half of his share of those islands and flats, to a man by the name of Pidgeon; and in 1768, he conveyed the other half, to Samuel Meredith. In April, 1767, Watson conveyed to his son, his share of the islands and flats; who in 1772, conveyed the same, to the aforesaid Samuel Meredith. In 1778, Meredith conveyed to the defendant the above mentioned tract of land, purchased from Salter, by the name of his plantation, by certain bounds; confining it on the side of the Delaware, by that river; also a lot, containing twelve acres, adjoining; and also, all his share of the islands and flats, purchased from Salter and Watson. In 1785, the defendant conveyed to Philip Nicklin, by way of mortgage, all the above property described, and bounded as in Meredith's deed to him. Sundry judgments having been obtained against the defendant, executions issued against him; which were returned by the sheriff, "levied on a plantation called 'Meredith's Farm,' containing 350 acres, and three other plantations adjoining," described by certain names and quantities of land, contained in each. The sheriff advertised the plantation, called "Meredith's Farm," for sale to the highest bidder; and the same was knocked off to the aforesaid Philip Nicklin; to whom the sheriff made a deed for the same; and also for the aforesaid islands and flats. In 1792, Nicklin conveyed the said property, to the lessor of the plaintiff.

The only question as to the title was; whether the islands and flats in dispute, were levied upon, under executions, and were advertised and sold; it being admitted, by the defendant's counsel, that if they were, he had no title; and this question depended upon another, which was, whether the islands and flats, were to be considered, upon the evidence, to have been parcel of the plantation called "Meredith's Farm," when the levy was made. To prove the affirmative of this proposition, the plaintiff examined a number of witnesses, who stated; that the islands and flats were so considered, and that in one or two instances, where the defendant had offered Meredith's farm for sale, he had spoken of this property, as constituting much of its value. It was also proved, that previous to the issuing of the executions, under which this property was sold, the defendant had sent to Nicklin, to whom he was indebted, a list of his property, in order to satisfy him, that his debt was safe; in which, Meredith's farm, but not the islands, was mentioned. Other witnesses, on part of the defendant stated; that the islands and flats, were never considered as parcel of, or attached to the farm. That the farm was generally rented to one person, and the islands to another; and in no instance, were they ever leased to the same tenant. It was further proved by two witnesses, that after Meredith's farm was put up for sale, the sheriff was asked, whether the islands and flats were included; when he answered, that they were not, that he sold to low water mark; that this was publicly said, so that Nicklin might have heard it; although the witnesses could not swear that he did. It appeared by record, which was given in evidence, that the defendant had filed a bill, in the court of chancery of this state, against Nicklin and the lessor of the plaintiff; alleging that the property now in dispute, had not been taken in execution by the sheriff; that it was not sold to Nicklin; and that the deed, so far as it included the same, was procured by fraud; and praying, that it might be reconveyed. Upon a hearing of the cause, the court of chancery decreed a reconveyance of the property now in dispute; which decree, upon an appeal, was reversed, and the bill dismissed. The petition of appeal, stated amongst other reasons for a reversal, that the complainant had an adequate remedy at law, and consequently, that he was not entitled to the aid of a court of equity; and that even, if that court could entertain the cause, an issue should have been directed. The court of appeals assigned no reasons for the decree of reversal, and dismissal of the bill.

¹ [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

It was contended by Williamson, Ewing & Wall, for the lessor of the plaintiff, that the decree of reversal was conclusive in this cause, against the title of the defendant; and that it is not now competent for him to contend, that the property in dispute was not levied upon and sold; those points having been completely in issue, in the former suit, and decided against him by the court of appeals. They cited the cases noted below.²

Stockton & Griffith on the other side, cited a number of cases.³

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The decree of dismissal, is not conclusive. The rule is admitted, that the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction, directly upon the same point, is conclusive; where the same point comes again in controversy, directly or collaterally. But what is the point directly decided by dismissing a bill in equity? nothing more than this, that the case is not fit for the decision of that court; that the complainant, who must rest entirely upon the equity of his case, has not supported that claim, and therefore has not shown himself entitled to the aid of a court of equity; for which reason, he is turned out of that court. This dismissal would be a bar to a new bill; because the same question must arise, viz. whether his case is such, as to entitle him to the relief of a court of equity. But in relation to a strictly legal title, the dismissal proves nothing for or against it. If the complainant seeks in a court of equity, to enforce a strictly legal title, when his remedy at law was plain and adequate, the dismissal of his bill amounts to a declaration, that he has no equity, and the court no jurisdiction; but it casts no reflection whatever, upon his legal title; it decides nothing in relation to it, and consequently can conclude nothing against it. If this be so, in ordinary cases, the doctrine acquires additional strength, in a case like the present; where the want of jurisdiction in the court of chancery, was one of the grounds for a reversal, stated in the petition of appeal. This petition, together with the answer which was filed by the opposite party, constitutes the pleadings (if the term may be applied to such proceedings) of the appellate court; more properly perhaps, it is the assignment of errors, and the plea to it. Now, if the court gives no reason for dismissing the bill, and the case stated in the pleadings, is to be resorted to, to ascertain what was the point directly decided by the court; how can this court say, that the title of the present defendant was decided; when another ground for a reversal was stated, which would have warranted such a decision? With a view to this principle, the sentence of a foreign prize court, which is ambiguous on the face of it, as to the ground of condemnation, is not regarded in an action on a policy of insurance, on a question of warranty of neutrality. The reason is, that if the sentence may have proceeded, on any other ground than that of enemy's property, it establishes with certainty, no fact, inconsistent with the asserted neutrality of the property insured.

² Amb. 756; Peake, Ev. 34, 36; 1 Salk. 290; 3 Term R. 129; Cowp. 322; 2 Strange, 960b; 1 Johns. Cas. 492; [Croudson v. Leonard] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 436; 3 Hen. & M. 140; 2 Bay, 454; Coop. Eq. 270; 1 Vern. 310; 2 Munf. 162; Bull. N. P. 244; 3 Atk. 626; 2 Brown, Parl. Cas. 396, 425, 443, 445; 9 Johns. 614; 5 Johns. 430.

³ 1 Atk. 571; Park. 353; [Maley v. Shattuck] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 488; 11 State Tr. 261; Peake, Ev. 71; 3 Term R. 639; Phil. Ev. 236.

In the course of the trial, the defendant offered evidence to prove declarations of the sheriff, made prior to the sale, that he did not mean to sell the property now in question; and that the same had not been levied upon. The plaintiff admitted, that he meant to offer a deposition, to contradict some circumstances stated by the sheriff, in his deposition, which occurred when the deed was executed. The particular declaration of the sheriff, now offered to be proved, was made a few days before the sale, in answer to enquiries made by a person, who intended to become a bidder, in case the islands should be offered for sale. This evidence was objected to. 1 Esp. 357; 5 Ves. 700; 5 Johns. 426; 1 Mass. 69; Phil. Ev. 212; Bull. N. P. 294; 2 Esp. N. P. 519.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Declarations of a witness, cannot be given in evidence, except in answer to evidence of other declarations of the witness, inconsistent with what he had before sworn to. The evidence, which the plaintiff intends to offer, to contradict what the sheriff has sworn to, is not of this nature. It relates to a different transaction, and does not import a contradiction of what that witness has sworn to, by declarations inconsistent with it. The declarations offered to be proved, by the defendant, relate to the sale, and the opposing evidence, proves no more, than that the two witnesses disagree as to some circumstances, which passed when the deed was executed. The evidence is therefore improper.

It was contended by the plaintiff's counsel, in summing up: First, that upon the evidence in the cause, it appeared, that the property in dispute, was parcel of Meredith's farm, and as such, was levied upon and sold; second, that the evidence of the two witnesses, in relation to the declarations of the sheriff at the sale, that the property in dispute was not to be sold, were not to be regarded, in opposition to the written terms of the sale, which stated, that Meredith's farm was to be sold. That such parol declarations should not be admitted, to control the import of the written advertisement and terms of sale. Sugd. 21; 1 H. Bl. 289; Peake, Ev. 55; 2 Atk. 97.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). As to the second point, the general rule of law is, that parol evidence of declarations of an auctioneer, to contradict the written terms of the sale, ought not to be admitted; as it might introduce great uncertainty as to titles, derived under sales at auction. But the parol evidence given in this case, is perfectly consistent with the written notice, and the terms on which the sale was to take place. The advertisement states, that Meredith's farm was to be sold; but it does not state, that the whole tract would be cried off, at one time; and if the property in dispute be in fact, parcel of Meredith's farm, the sheriff had certainly a right, at the time of sale, to sell a part only, if he thought such part would be sufficient to satisfy the execution. If one thousand hogsheads of sugar are advertised to be sold, surely the auctioneer may sell them in such lots, as he is directed. But, if the purchaser should insist that he had purchased the whole, how can this fact be ascertained, except by evidence of persons at the sale; and in the absence of other evidence, what reason can exist why it may not be proved in that way? Such evidence, does not contradict, but is perfectly consistent with the written terms of sale. This is very different from the case where, for instance, the sale is advertised to be with warranty, and evidence offered of declarations by the auctioneer, that the sale was to be without warranty.

As to the case upon the merits, it depends upon a single fact, to be decided by the jury; which is, whether the property in dispute was parcel of what was called "Meredith's Farm," at the time the levy was made by the sheriff. There are various ways, by which one parcel of land is distinguished from another; sometimes by names given to it, or by boundaries or situation. When the distinction is once made, the parcels continue separate, whether they belong to different persons, or are owned by the same person. It is true, that the owner may destroy the distinction, and consolidate both parcels in one, under one name. By his acts, the two parcels may gain by reputation a common name, so as to pass by deed or will, consistently with the intention of the grantor or deviser. But the mere act of cultivating the two parcels by the same owner, is not sufficient of itself to make one parcel part of the other.

What then have been the acts of the different persons, who have become successively owners of Meredith's farm, and of the property in dispute? Watson, Bond and Salter, were originally separate proprietors of a farm in this state, adjoining each other, and extending to the river Delaware. They afterwards appropriated to themselves, as tenants in common, certain islands and flats, containing about 90 acres in front of their farms, in the river, and separated by an inconsiderable flow of the river from their farms. Salter conveyed one half of his plantation to one Pidgeon, and the other half to Samuel Meredith, by certain boundaries, extending to the river, and containing a certain number of acres. In the same deeds, he also conveys one half of his share of the islands and flats to Pidgeon, and the other to Meredith; describing this property by its only appropriate names, as "islands" and "flats." Watson, afterwards, conveyed his third part of these islands and flats, to Meredith. Thus, Meredith became entitled to a tract of land, distinguished as a plantation, as containing a certain number of acres, and separated from the islands, by a line running to low water mark. He conveyed the whole to the defendant, distinguishing in like manner, the plantation and the islands. In the year 1786, the defendant mortgaged the whole of this property to Nicklin, the purchaser at the sheriff's sale, in which the same distinction is preserved. It is also to be remarked, that the defendant always kept them distinct, renting the farm to one tenant, and the islands and flats to another to be used as a fishery. The sheriff, in the year 1788, levied his execution on Meredith's farm, and the jury are to say, whether, at that or at any other time, the islands had become parcel of that farm. So far as the documentary evidence goes, there is not the slightest ground for asserting, that they had. Throughout, Meredith's farm, has been described as a plantation, bounded by certain lines, excluding the islands, and containing a precise number of acres. The property in dispute, was in like manner described, as islands and flats.

As to the parol evidence offered by the plaintiff, to prove that the islands were considered as parcel of Meredith's farm, which is contradicted by evidence of the same nature, on the other side, the court give no opinion. But they will remark, that all such evidence, when opposed to the written documents, which have been laid before the jury, should be listened to with caution; the one may be founded upon conjecture and misapprehension, the other cannot deceive.

Verdict for defendant.

WRIGHT (DUVALL v.). See Case No. 4-212.

Case No. 18,077.

WRIGHT v. FILLEY.

[1 Dill. 171; 1 4 N. B. R. 610 (Quarto, 197); 5 West. Jur. 212; 3 Leg. Gaz. 230.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. Oct. Term, 1870.

BANKRUPTCY — INTENT TO PREFER — CONSENT TO JUDGMENT AND LEVY.

Where an actual intent to give a preference is negatived, mere honest inaction on the part of an insolvent debtor who is sued on a just debt, and who allows judgment to go against him, and his property to be levied on, is not an act of bankruptcy within the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 536)].

[Cited in Wilson v. City Bank of St. Paul, 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 480.]

Wright was proceeded against in the district court for the Eastern district of Missouri, by Filley, a creditor, under the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act. The act of bankruptcy charged was, that Wright had "suffered his property to be taken on legal process with intent to give a preference." To establish this the creditors relied on the fact that Wright was indebted to one Carr on two promissory notes, had been sued by Carr on one of them, had made default and allowed judgment to pass against him, and certain land to be seized and sold on the execution issued thereon. The testimony of Wright on the hearing in the bankruptcy court showed that he had no defence to the note. He says, inter alia: "I did not see Carr before he brought suit. I forgot the suit, being out of town the time it was to come off. After he got judgment I endeavored to settle the matter with Carr. He brought suit on the other note, to which I put in a defence and which is still pending. After judgment I tried to get Carr to wait on me, and to effect a compromise with him to prevent my property from being sold under his execution, but he would not consent. I had no desire or intention to give Carr any preference, or to prevent my property being distributed under the bankrupt act." The evidence fairly negatived any actual design on the part of Wright to give Carr a preference or to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act. Wright was not a banker, merchant, trader, or manufacturer. The district court (Judge Krekel sitting in the place of Judge Treat) adjudged Wright to be a bankrupt. To reverse the order Wright filed the present bill in this court under the second section of the bankrupt act, and the matter was argued before MILLER, Circuit Justice, at the October term, 1870.

Dryden, Lindley & Dryden, for Wright.
Samuel S. Boyd, for Filley.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

MILLER, Circuit Justice This is a bill in chancery filed in the circuit court for the districts of Missouri to obtain a review and reversal of the order of the district court declaring the complainant to be a bankrupt. The parties waived all question, whether this is the proper mode of obtaining a review of such an order, and desire the circuit court to pass on the merits of the case.

The complainant was declared a bankrupt at the suit of his creditors, and the only ground on which the order can be sustained is, that he suffered a judgment for a small amount to be obtained against him, on which an execution was issued and levied on some of his property.

It seems clear that the complainant was quite poor, and that it might have given him serious inconvenience to have paid a lawyer to prepare his papers for voluntary bankruptcy or to have given security for the fees in such a proceeding. The debt on which the judgment was procured was a real debt, was due and unpaid, and he had no defence against it. There is not the least reason to suppose that he desired to give the creditor who got the judgment any preference or advantage over his other creditors, or that he in any manner whatever suggested or encouraged the suit or the levy of the execution. It is therefore clear that the order of bankruptcy can only be sustained on the ground that he did not go into voluntary bankruptcy when he was sued, and that his failure to do so when he was unable to meet his debts was itself an act of bankruptcy.

I have read the opinions of several eminent district judges asserting this doctrine as essential to the due administration of the bankrupt law, and have the highest respect for these judges and especially for the one who made this order, and I have held up this case to see if I could bring my mind to its adoption. But I cannot satisfy myself that mere honest inaction in a poor man, when his creditor seeks to make by law a just debt, is itself an act of bankruptcy, and if congress means that, they must so far as I am concerned, say it in plainer terms than are to be found in the present law.

Let a decree be entered reversing the order of bankruptcy rendered in the district court. Ordered accordingly.

NOTE. In the opinion delivered by the district judge in this case, he placed his judgment upon the ground that it was the legal duty of a debtor, who knows himself to be insolvent, when sued upon a just debt, which will result in a judgment, that if enforced will give that creditor a preference, to go into voluntary bankruptcy, and that if he fails to do so and his property is seized, this is "suffering it to be taken on legal process," and the intent to give a preference, or to defeat the bankrupt act will or should be inferred from the mere failure to comply with his legal duty, or from the circumstances connected with his situation. See Vanderhoof's Assignee v. City Bank of St. Paul [Case No. 16,842]; Linkman v. Wilcox [Id. 8,374]; Giddings v. Dodd [Id. 5,405].

Case No. 18,078.

WRIGHT et al. v. FIRST NAT. BANK.

[8 Biss. 243; 18 N. B. R. 87; 6 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 543; 18 Alb. Law J. 115; 2 Nat. Bank Cas. (Browne) 138; 10 Chi. Leg. News, 348; 6 Reporter, 229; 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 11.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. July 15, 1878.

USURIOUS INTEREST — RECOVERY BY ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY.

1. An assignee in bankruptcy is the "legal representative" of the borrower within the meaning of the thirtieth section of the national banking act [13 Stat. 108], and as such can maintain an action to recover back usurious interest paid, as provided for by said act.

[Cited in brief in Lafountain v. Burlington Sav. Bank, 56 Vt. 334.]

2. The right of action given by said section is a "claim" or "debt" which passes to the assignee.

3. Though such action is to recover a penalty, it is distinguishable from actions for damages growing out of mere torts to the bankrupt's person.

[Action to recover the penalty for taking usurious interest, brought by Arthur L. Wright and Henry H. Woollery, assignees of Francis J. Randolph, Frank Wright, and Ebenezer Nutting, bankrupts, against the First National Bank of Greensburg.]² Coffroth & Stewart, Baker, Hord & Hendricks, and Dye & Harris, for plaintiffs.

McDonald & Butler, for defendant.

GRESHAM, District Judge. The declaration alleges that the defendant has reserved, taken and received usurious interest from the bankrupts. The action is brought to recover double the amount of interest thus paid, and is based upon the thirtieth section of the national banking act, which reads as follows: "Every association organized under this act may take, receive, reserve and charge on any loan * * * interest, at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more; except that where by the laws of any state a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such state, under this act. And when no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum. * * * And in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back, in any action of debt, twice the amount of interest thus paid, from the association taking or receiving the same." 13 Stat. 108.

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 6 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 543, and 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 11, contain only partial reports.]

² [From 18 Alb. Law J. 115.]

The defendant demurs to the declaration, on the ground that the plaintiffs, as assignees in bankruptcy, have no legal capacity to prosecute the action. This is the only question presented by the demurrer.

The right of action given by this section is penal. Tiffany v. National Bank, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 409. In the absence of a statute authorizing it, a right to a penalty cannot be assigned, nor, a right of action for a tort. Gardner v. Adams, 12 Wend. 297. The defendant exacted and received usurious interest. Had the bankrupts remained solvent, they might have prosecuted an action for double the amount of interest paid. Unless the right of action has been barred, it yet exists, either in the bankrupts or their assignees. It is insisted that because the bankrupts could not have sold or transferred the right of action, if they had remained solvent, that, therefore, their assignees have no legal capacity to prosecute the suit. Tiffany v. National Bank, supra, was an action by a trustee, to recover the penalty given by the statute. The plaintiff recovered, but his capacity to maintain the action seems not to have been directly raised. In the case of Crocker v. First Nat. Bank [Case No. 3,397], the precise question raised by this demurrer was considered, and it was held by Dillon, J., that the assignee was the "legal representative" of the borrower within the meaning of the banking act, and as such could maintain the suit whether the right of action vested in the assignee under the bankrupt law or not.

In Tiffany v. Boatman's Institution, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 375, the assignee in bankruptcy was allowed to recover usurious interest, which had been paid by the bankrupt in violation of the statutes of Missouri.

In Meech v. Stoner, 19 N. Y. 26, it was held that an assignee could maintain an action to recover money lost at faro, under a statute which gave the right of action to the loser. See, also, Carter v. Abbott, 1 Barn. & C. 444, and Gray v. Bennett, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 522. In this last case, the assignee of the insolvent debtor was allowed to recover three-fold the amount of usurious interest paid to the defendant, that being the amount allowed by the Massachusetts statutes. This is a well-considered case.

In Bromley v. Smith [Case No. 1,922], it was held by Miller, District Judge, that the assignee could not maintain an action to recover the penalty given by the statute. And it seems to be conceded that in the case of Barnett v. Muncie Nat. Bank [Id. 1,026], in the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of Ohio, a similar ruling was made by Justice Swayne, and the late Circuit Judge Emmons, in an oral, but unreported opinion. To the same effect is Nichols v. Bellows, 22 Vt. 581.

The bankrupt act (Rev. St. §§ 5044-5047) vests in the assignee for the creditors the entire estate of the debtor—everything of beneficial interest passes by the deed of assignment, except certain necessary exemptions which are intended to protect the bankrupt and his family from temporary distress.

It is true that rights of action for torts to the debtor's person, such as assault and battery, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, libel and slander, do not pass to the assignee. While it must be conceded that under the decision of the supreme court, this is an action, in part at least, to recover a penalty, yet there are reasons why claims of this kind should vest in the assignee which do not apply to rights of action for damages growing out of mere torts to the debtor's person. In the right of action given by the banking act the bank exacts and receives from the borrower more than the law allows as a fair compensation for the use of its money. In this illegal way, the bank gets into its possession part of the borrower's estate, money which should go to the creditors of the bankrupt borrower. This demand and receipt of illegal interest by the bank may have materially contributed to the bankrupt's downfall. The recovery allowed by the thirtieth section of the act is "in any action of debt."

If the assignees are not the "legal representatives" of the bankrupt within the meaning of the thirtieth section of the banking act, and the right of action never passed to them under the bankrupt act, then, unless the suit has been barred, the bankrupts may sue for and recover the money for their own benefit, when, perhaps, they have already received their full exemptions and have been discharged from all their obligations.

As between the bankrupts and their creditors, this would be unjust, and such a result is not easily reconciled with the chief object of the bankrupt law, which is the equal distribution of the insolvent debtor's entire estate amongst all his creditors.

In Gray v. Bennett, supra, "it is very clear," say the court, "that if a creditor of the insolvent debtor should attempt to prove a note under the commission, it would be the duty of the assignee to reduce the amount, if usurious interest had been taken on it, or was reserved in it, and in this manner the creditors would be benefited by such reduction. Why should they not have the advantage of it where the debtor was paid the usurious demand, prior to the insolvency and within the time limited by the statute for recovering it?"

I think the assignees are the "legal representatives" of the bankrupts within the meaning of the thirtieth section of the banking act; and that the right of action given by that section is a "claim" or "debt" which passed to the assignees under the provisions of the bankrupt law. Demurrer overruled.

Case No. 18,079.

• WRIGHT v. FULLERTON.

[2 Biss. 336; 1 3 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 124; 2 Chi. Leg. News, 301.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. June, 1870.

BOND TO CONVEY LAND — LACHES IN ENFORCEMENT.

1. A bill in equity cannot be maintained upon a bond for the conveyance of real estate executed and delivered more than twenty years previously, the obligor having soon afterwards repudiated its obligation and thenceforth treated the land as his own and the complainant having in the meantime made no effort to enforce his rights.

2. The fact that he considered the bond worthless, did not suppose that he could collect anything from the defendant, and was not aware that he had any rights under it until advised by counsel, do not form a sufficient excuse for his laches.

3. Seymour v. Freer, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 202, distinguished: in that case both parties continued their relations under the contract, whereas, in this case one of them denied the claim of the other.

This was a bill filed by the complainant to enforce his equitable rights under a bond made by the defendant to one Albert Shephard, dated October 31, 1835, in the penal sum of \$441, with a condition concerning the conveyance of three certain tracts of land therein described. The bond was assigned by Shephard to the complainant on the 4th of March, 1836. The controversy covered two tracts of land in Cook county, Illinois: The E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of Sec. 32, T. 38, N. R. 14, E. of 3d P. M., entered by Abner Lane; and the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the same section, entered by Albert Shephard; the certificates for each having been assigned to the defendant in June, 1835. Also one tract of land in Milwaukee county, Wisconsin, the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of Sec. 17, T. 7, N. R. 22, E. of 4th P. M., entered by Shephard, and conveyed to defendant by deed October 31, 1835. Patents were duly issued by the United States on each of these entries, the purchase money being paid by defendant. The condition of the bond was as follows: "Whereas said Shephard has executed three notes to said Fullerton, as follows, to-wit: one dated June 27, for \$100, payable one year from date, with interest at the rate of twelve per cent.; one for \$100 dated August 22, 1835, payable one year after date, with like interest; and one for \$70.50, dated July 1, 1835, payable one year from date, with like interest, it being one-half the purchase money advanced by the said Fullerton for the purchase of (the foregoing tracts of land). Now, upon the payment of said notes as aforesaid, the said Fullerton agrees to execute to said Shephard a conveyance of one undivided half of said lots of land, or in case said lots of land shall have been sold, to pay said Shephard one-half the proceeds."

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

This bond was signed and duly acknowledged by the defendant. On the 24th of June, 1836, the defendant sold one undivided half of the Milwaukee land for four drafts on New York for $1800, each payable at four, nine, twelve and eighteen months, respectively. Only one of these drafts—the first—was ever paid. When the first note named in the bond became due, the defendant said the amount was tendered by the complainant, and refused. After the last note fell due—some time in the fall of 1836—the complainant declared that tender was made of the whole amount due, and refused. The defendant denied this. The only reasons given why the tender was refused on the part of the complainant were, because the defendant demanded twenty-five per cent. interest; on the part of the defendant, because the whole amount was not paid at maturity. The only other transaction the defendant and the complainant appear to have had with each other afterwards, was this: In 1835 they and one Royal Stewart and Grant Goodrich, for the sum of $35,000, purchased block 1 of the original town of Chicago. They paid one-fourth of the purchase money, and gave a mortgage on the block for the balance. They then sold lots, and made considerable improvements on the property. They were unable to pay the balance, and the mortgage was foreclosed, and the property lost. Those who had purchased lots from them made reclamations for the money, etc., they had paid. Stewart and the complainant left Chicago, and the defendant and Goodrich had to compromise and settle these claims. A litigation of several years standing grew out of the failure of the parties to make titles to lots which they had sold, and this was maintained and finally settled by the defendant and Goodrich alone—Stewart and the complainant being residents of other states. In the meantime the complainant never moved in the matter of this bond, nor made any claim in relation to it until the bill was filed on the 22d of August, 1836, just twenty years from the maturity of the last note named in the bond. During all this time the defendant exercised control and ownership over the land, and paid the taxes. The reasons stated by the complainant for this long delay in prosecuting the claim set forth in his deposition as follows: He considered the bond worthless; he was told nothing could be collected from the defendant in 1840, 1841, and “along in those years;” that the defendant had put his property out of his hands; that the bond did not set out the state in which the lands were situate, and he did not know he had any rights till advised by counsel just prior to filing the bill.

Doolittle & Morris, for complainant.
Beckwith, Ayer & Kales, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. Perhaps the fair inference from the facts is, that Shephard had attended the sales of the lands, and had made selections, or had done something else in relation to the land, or for the defendant, in consideration of which, while the latter had paid all the purchase money, he agreed that the complainant might have one-half of the land, on reimbursing him one-half of the purchase money, with a certain interest. Shephard himself, though he appears to be living, was not a witness in the case, and the proof as to the particular circumstances of the arrangement between Shephard and the defendant seems to be confined almost entirely to the documentary evidence, viz.: the bond itself, and the assignments and conveyances affecting the land.

Giving to these documents the construction most favorable to the complainant, I am of the opinion that he has slept too long upon his rights to permit him now to call upon a court of equity to enforce them. He was clothed with the equities of Shephard under the bond, on the 4th of March, 1836, more than twenty years before he filed his bill. Conceding that he stood in all respects in the place of Shephard, then upon payment of the notes as they fell due, he was entitled to a conveyance of one-half of the land, or if sold, to one-half of the proceeds. Taking either aspect of the case, as presented in the evidence, the result must be the same. If it be true that when the first note fell due payment was tendered by the complainant and refused, that was a denial of the right of the complainant pro tanto, under the contract. If, in the fall of 1836, the whole amount due on the three notes of Shephard was tendered and refused, that was a denial of the whole contract. Then, if we take the statement of the complainant, denied by the defendant, as true, in the fall of 1836 he knew that the defendant, from some cause, repudiated the obligation of the contract. Whether, on this hypothesis, the first and only payment on the sale of the undivided half—which the defendant claims was his own half—of the Milwaukee land, was at that time made, we do not know, but the complainant then had notice that the defendant repudiated his claim under the contract. Being thus met by the defendant, he submitted to that repulse without a motion to enforce it, for nearly twenty years. It is a fair inference, I think, that he acquiesced in the action of the defendant. Whatever view, therefore, we may take of the legal status of the parties under the facts, in 1836 a claim was made on one side, and refused or resisted on the other, and so, without a word further, the matter rested till Aug. 22, 1856.

The inference becomes irresistible when connected with circumstances already mentioned, and with others which may be referred to. The defendant treated the land thenceforth as his own, paid the taxes, disposed of some portion, has always retained a part of it down to the present time, and during all the time has been a resident of Cook county, Illinois, while the complainant in 1835 and 1836, and for a few years afterwards, was also a resident of Cook county, and then removed to Racine, Wisconsin, where he has ever since resided. Shortly after 1836, real estate greatly depreciated in value here, and so continued for several years. In 1856, when the bill was filed in this case, land had greatly risen in value. In addition to all this, the purchasers of block one in the original town of Chicago, of whom the complainant and defendant were two, had sold several lots of that block, and had received considerable sums of money, amounting to some thousands of dollars—a large part of which had been put in improvements on the block, and when, having lost all under the mortgage given to secure the three-fourths of the purchase money, they were called on to refund sums that had been paid them, the complainant was not here, and therefore, as years passed by, and nothing was said or even hinted by him of the bond of October 31, 1835, it is not impossible that his non-action may have been the result, in part at least, of the complications growing out of the liabilities incurred in relation to block one, and of the fear, if any claim were made under that, he might be met with a counterclaim. However this may be, the complainant rested till the statute of limitations had run against the notes to Shephard and the bond of the defendant, and having been silent so long, he cannot be heard now.

It has been said by the complainant's counsel, that this case is similar to the case of Seymour v. Freer, decided by this court [unreported], and afterwards affirmed by the supreme court of the United States (8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 202). In some respects this case is like that, but if it were conceded that in substance the nature of the contract was the same, it must be borne in mind that the supreme court put the decision in Seymour v. Freer on the ground that nothing had ever been waived or lost by Price under the original contract. The language of the opinion of a majority of the court is: "The devisees might have held the property, and denied that, under the circumstances, the trust subsisted any longer. If Price acquiesced, his rights would have been at an end. Price might also have expressly or tacitly abandoned his claim. This would have worked the same result. Both parties might have concluded to continue their existing relations. * * * Was either of the alternatives adopted, and if so, which one? This is the turning point in the case." And because the court was of opinion that both parties continued their existing relations, the original contract was held to govern their rights. If that were true here, the decision would necessarily be the same, but it is because one of the parties here signified his purpose to deny the claim under the original contract, and the other submitted thereto for nearly twenty years, that this court must treat the contract as the parties themselves treated it—as obsolete.

I have not referred to the circumstance of the case having been permitted to stand in court for so many years without action, even after the bill was filed, because this may have been with the acquiescence of the defendant or his counsel.

The bill will be dismissed.

NOTE. This case was appealed to the supreme court, and the decree below affirmed by a divided court, no opinion being filed, and the case not reported. Courts of equity will not aid in enforcing stale claims where the party has slept upon his rights. Platt v. Vattier, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 405; Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cow. 717; McKnight v. Taylor, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 161; Bowman v. Wathen, Id. 189. The lapse of twenty years ordinarily operates as a bar to a suit in equity connected with the recovery of land. Varick v. Edwards, 1 Hoff. Ch. 382; Pipher v. Lodge, 4 Serg. & R. 310. As to when a vendee may bring his bill for specific performance, and what laches will stop him, consult Peters v. Delaplaine, 49 N. Y. 362.

Case No. 18,080.

WRIGHT v. GEORGETOWN.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 534.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1835.

CHANGE OF STREET GRADE—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—DEFENSES—PROCEEDINGS BY INQUISITION.

A subsequent inquisition is no bar to the plaintiff's special action upon the case for a cause of action which accrued before the inquisition. The power to regulate streets, given by the act of 1805, applies only to streets opened or extended by virtue of that act. The inquest must be taken before a magistrate or officer. The justice must certify that he summoned the jurors, and that they were sworn. The jurors must certify that they made the inquest. The party to be affected by the inquest must be notified.

[Cited in City of Topeka v. Sells, 48 Kan. 520, 29 Pac. 609.]

This was a special action upon the case [by Matthew Wright] for damages to the plaintiff's dwelling-house, by graduating the street and raising the earth so as to obstruct the plaintiff's entrance, &c. The declaration, which was drawn by Mr. Jones, consisted of two counts; the first of which stated, in substance, that the plaintiff was seized in fee of a messuage and tenement, in Georgetown, D. C., fronting on Causeway street, which, long before the injury now complained of, had been regulated and improved, so as to admit of convenient access, ingress, egress and regress to and from the said messuage and tenement and the said street; and to leave the ground-floor of the dwelling-house on a convenient level above the level of the street; the regulation and level of which street, the defendants, at the time aforesaid, and before and always since, had no lawful right to change and alter, so as to obstruct such access, &c.; yet the defendants afterward, unlawfully and wilfully, against the will of the plaintiff and without any lawful warrant, power, or authority, caused the regulation and level of the said message and tenement to be changed and altered and the said street all along the front of said message and tenement, to be raised and filled up and embanked with earth, to a great height, namely, fifteen inches above its proper level as before laid out, regulated, and levelled by public authority and the acts of said defendants, so as to impede and obstruct all access, &c., and to render the dwelling-house untenable and uninhabitable for one year and upwards, to the great nuisance, &c., of the plaintiff and his tenants; by reason whereof the plaintiff was obliged to raise the ground-floor fifteen inches above its former level, and to make other works and repairs, &c., at the expense of $600, and lost the rents and profits, &c., to the damage of the plaintiff $2,000, &c. The second count stated that the damage was done without compensation as required by the act of congress.

¹ [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The defendants pleaded 1st. In substance, that the plaintiff is concluded by the verdict of the jury, held under the town charter, and that the sum, there awarded, was tendered to, and refused by, the plaintiff. 2d. That the plaintiff's house was built before the street was graduated, and therefore no injury. 3d. Not guilty.

Mr. Jones, for plaintiff, prayed the court to instruct the jury that the matter of the plea is no defence to this action.

Mr. Dunlop, for defendants, contra, contended that the inquisition is conclusive, and cited the Maryland charter of Georgetown (1797, chapter 6); Act Cong. March 3, 1805 (2 Stat. 332); Davis' Laws D. C. 171; Act Cong. March 3, 1809 (2 Stat. 537); Davis' Laws D. C. pp. 195-197, § 4; and the case of Gozler v. Georgetown, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 596.

Mr. Jones, contra. The act of congress of March 3, 1809, § 4 (2 Stat. 537), authorizes the regulation only of those streets which, either under the powers given by that act or by previous acts, the corporation might thereafter open or extend. This was an old street (Water street), and had been twice regulated, and had been built upon for many years. The justice and the jury had no authority in this case under that act. It is said that if they had, this court has not. But in Pritchard v. Georgetown [Case No. 11,437] (December, 1819), it was decided that this court had the jurisdiction; therefore the justice and jury had not. There is no law that ousts this court of its jurisdiction. This is not taking private property for public use. The damage was done before the inquisition, and therefore the plaintiff has not lost his common-law remedy. By the fourth section of the act of 1809 (2 Stat. 537), the justice and twelve jurors are to be corporators and the authority is confined to the precise case mentioned in that section. The act of Maryland of 1797 (chapter 6) did not give the right to open and extend streets, but only to make by-laws for the graduation and levelling of existing streets. The act of Maryland of 1789 only gives the corporation the power to survey and ascertain the streets, lanes, and alleys of the town and its additions, and they could not survey, lay out, or alter any new street except upon the application and at the expense of the proprietor through whose ground it should run; and no street was to be extended through the ground of any person without his consent. The act of congress of March 3, 1805, § 12 (2 Stat. 332), authorizes the corporation, "to open, extend, and regulate streets within the limits of the said town; provided they make to the person or persons who may be injured by such opening, extension, or regulation, just and adequate compensation, to be ascertained by the verdict of an impartial jury, to be summoned and sworn by a justice of the peace of the county of Washington, and to be formed of twenty-three men who shall proceed in like manner as has been usual in other cases where private property has been condemned for public use."

Mr. Jones contended that the acts of 1805, and 1809, are applicable to the same cases; and that the compensation was to be ascertained before the street could be regulated; and therefore that the plaintiff was not bound by the inquisition. In all cases of ad quod damnum, the damages are to be first ascertained; and it is usual to give notice to the party to be affected by the condemnation; and in the warrant to describe the property intended to be taken. In the present case, the warrant is not directed to anybody. The jury was sworn to ascertain what damage has been done to the property holders on Water street between Congress and Washington streets. There is no certificate of the justice that this is the inquisition. The certificate of the jurors is not sufficient.

Mr. Key, in reply. No warrant was required by law. The justice might have summoned the jury ore tenus. But he issued a blank summons, and the inquisition states that "We, A, B, C, &c., jurors duly summoned, as appears by the warrant hereto annexed," &c. The jury describe particularly the property to which the damage was done which they assess. It was not necessary to describe it more specifically. It was not necessary that there should be a separate warrant for each proprietor whose property was damaged. The law does not require the justice to certify anything; and his certificate would have been good for nothing if he had certified. The amount of the damage could not be as well ascertained before, as after, it was done.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) was of opinion, and instructed the jury that the inquisition, and the proceedings thereon, were no bar to the plaintiff's action: (1) Because the compensation should be ascertained before the defendants could lawfully raise the level of the street. (2) Because the power to regulate, given by the act of 1805, applies only to the streets opened or extended by virtue of that act. (3) Because the inquest was not taken before any magistrate or officer. (4) Because it is not certified by the justice that he summoned the jurors. (5) Because he has not certified that the jurors were sworn by him, nor that they made an inquest; nor that the plaintiff had notice, &c.

Verdict for the plaintiff, $160.

WRIGHT v. GLICK. See Case No. 18,083.

Case No. 18,081.

WRIGHT v. GREEN.

[Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

WRIGHT (HARTSHORN v.). See Case No. 6,169.

WRIGHT (HEATH v.). See Case No. 6,310.

WRIGHT v. HICKEY. See Case No. 18,083.

Case No. 18,082.

WRIGHT v. JOHNSON.

[8 Blatchf. 150; 1 4 N. B. R. 626.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Jan. 17. 1871.

BANKRUPTCY — SUIT BY ASSIGNEE — SUFFICIENCY OF DECLARATION.

1. Where an assignee in bankruptcy, in the declaration in an action of trover brought by him, undertakes to set out in detail the manner in which he claims to have become the owner of the property which is the subject of the suit, by alleging the proceedings in bankruptcy, he must allege an adjudication of bankruptcy, or his declaration will be held bad, in substance, on demurrer.

2. An adjudication of bankruptcy is an essential prerequisite and precedent condition of the power of the register, under section 14 of the bankruptcy act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 522), to make an assignment of the estate of the bankrupt to an assignee.

[Cited in Hampton v. Rouse, 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 276.]

[Cited in Roberts v. Shroyer, 68 Ind. 67.]

[This was an action by Isaac H. Wright, assignee in bankruptcy of Lyman K. Hitchcock and Samuel K. Place, against James Johnson.]

Starbuck & Sawyer, for plaintiff.

Bernard Bagley, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The action herein is trover. It is brought to a hearing upon certain demurrers of the defendant to some of the plaintiff's replications to the defendant's special pleas, and upon demurrers of the plaintiff to some of the defendant's rejoinders to other replications of the plaintiff.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

These pleadings and demurrers, and the particulars thereof, it is not necessary to notice further or to express any opinion thereon.

The plaintiff correctly insists, that, "as a settled rule of pleading, judgment on demurrer will pass against the party guilty of the first error in substance." This rule is fatal to him, in the present case. He has seen fit to set out in detail the manner in which he claims to have become the owner of the property for the conversion of which the action is brought. I express no opinion upon the question whether it was necessary that he should do so, or on the question whether, if he attempted to allege the proceedings in bankruptcy, he should have stated the contents of the petition to the district court, or of the schedule and inventory annexed thereto, with greater particularity. Not being advised to aver property in the goods generally, and rely thereon, he alleges the presentation of a petition by Hitchcock and Place, with schedule and inventory, (with so much of particularity as the pleader deemed necessary,) and then avers the issuing of a warrant by a register in bankruptcy, notice to creditors, a meeting of creditors, the choice of the plaintiff as assignee, and the execution, by the register in bankruptcy, of an assignment of the property of Hitchcock and Place to him as such assignee. It is not averred that Hitchcock and Place have been adjudged bankrupt.

I am not called upon to deny, that the jurisdiction of the district court in bankruptcy is general over that subject, so that, (when it is necessary to state and rely upon its proceedings,) after the allegation of such facts as give to that court jurisdiction of the parties, it is sufficient to allege, taliter processum fuit, as to all intermediate steps, down to the particular act of the court which it is material to aver. But, if the plaintiff undertakes to set out the proceedings to sustain the act of the register in making an assignment of the property of other persons to the plaintiff, he must state such proceedings as authorized the assignment. Here, the plaintiff makes title, not by transfer from the former owners, Hitchcock and Place, but by a transfer made to him by a register in bankruptcy, without averring that Hitchcock and Place have ever been adjudged bankrupt. Section 11 of the bankrupt law provides, that the filing of the described petition, schedule and inventory shall be an act of bankruptcy, and that the petitioner shall be adjudged a bankrupt. Then, and not until then, the warrant issues, notice to creditors is given, an assignee is chosen and qualified, and, when there is no opposing interest, the register, by section 14, is authorized, and directed to assign the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt, to the assignee.

I am of opinion, that the adjudication that the petitioners are bankrupt, is an essential prerequisite and precedent condition of the power of the register to make any such assignment. True, the filing of the petition is an act of bankruptcy, but the adjudication is the judicial ascertainment and declaration of the fact, that the petitioners are legally bankrupt, upon which all the subsequent proceedings are founded. It is the act by which the court takes hold of the subject-matter, applies to it its jurisdiction, and gives legal effect to what the statute declares to be an act of bankruptcy. Until that adjudication, I perceive no doubt that the petitioner may withdraw his application, and nothing further be done therein, as a voluntary application.

The plaintiff's endeavor herein to show actual ownership of the goods by setting out the proceedings on which he relies to establish title, therefore, fails. If he choose to set out the manner in which he acquired title, his declaration should show that the proceedings are such as make the transfer to him legal and valid. Judgment must, therefore, be ordered for the defendant, but with leave to the plaintiff to amend his declaration, on the usual terms.

WRIGHT (LENOX v.). See Case No. 8,249.

WRIGHT (LE ROY v.). See Case No. 8,273.

Case No. 18,083.

WRIGHT v. McMILLAN. SAME v. HICKEY. SAME v. SMITHPETER. SAME v. GLICK.

[13 O. G. 47.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri. Nov., 1877.

PATENTS—FARM GATES.

[The Teel reissue, No. 2,667, for an improvement in farm gates, held invalid, the evidence failing to show that Teel was the original and first inventor.]

[This was a bill in equity by Ethan B. Wright against Roland McMillan, Lewis Hickey, William Smithpeter, and Henry Glick.]

Suit was brought in all four cases for infringement of letters patent (reissue) No. 2,667, granted to A. C. Teel, July 2, 1867, for "improvement in farm gates." [Original letters patent No. 40,777 were granted December 1, 1863.] In delivering an oral opinion, the judge stated that it did not appear from the evidence that Teel was the first and original inventor of the improvement described and claimed. It was specially ordered that the decree should go no farther than dismissing the bill with costs.

KREKEL, District Judge. This cause came on to be heard at this term, and was argued by counsel; and thereupon, on consideration thereof, it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the complainant's bill be dismissed, and that said defendant, Roland McMillan, recover against the complainant, Ethan B. Wright, and Isaac R. Brown, his security, for costs, his costs and charges herein expended, and have thereof execution.

Case No. 18,084.

WRIGHT v. MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK.

[1 Flip. 568; 2 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 539; 3 Cent. Law J. 351; 1 Thomp. Nat. Bank Cas. 321; 2 Law & Eq. Rep. 638; 1 Cin. Law Bul. 198; 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 248.]¹

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. May 19, 1876.

NATIONAL BANK—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

The general banking law has provisions for winding up banks under the direction of the comptroller of the currency. These are not exclusive, and were not intended to put it out of the power of the courts to appoint receivers upon a judgment-creditor's bill.

Demurrer to bill of judgment creditor. Bill alleged, in substance, that complainant had recovered a judgment for $10,000 against defendant in the state court; that he was unable to have the same satisfied; that the bank discontinued business, and in contemplation of bankruptcy had transferred and conveyed all its property to one creditor, which was a large stockholder in defendant's corporation; and that this creditor was appropriating all the assets to its own use, etc.; and praying for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver. Demurrer went upon the ground that the comptroller of the currency alone could appoint a receiver.

Mr. Welch, T. W. Brown, and W. Y. C. Humes, for complainant.

W. D. Beard, for defendant.

BROWN, District Judge. The power and duty of a court of equity to appoint a receiver upon the application of a judgment-creditor, is too well established to admit of doubt. Edw. Rec. 396; Hadden v. Spader, 20 Johns. 554; Taylor v. Jones, 2 Atk. 600; Edgell v. Haywood, 3 Atk. 352; Candler v. Pettit, 1 Paige, 168; Weed v. Pierce, 9 Cow. 722; Lewis v. Zouche, 2 Sim. 388; Bloodgood v. Clark, 4 Paige, 574; Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 380; Parkhurst v. Kinsman [Case No. 10,760]. There is no allegation in the bill that execution has been issued and returned unsatisfied, but as no demurrer is interposed upon that ground, and as the point was not made upon the argument, I shall notice it no further. Indeed, it was practically conceded that a case for a receiver was made out, unless the power of appointing receivers of national banks was exclusively vested in the comptroller of the currency. Title 62 of the Revised Statutes relating to the organization of banks, provides for the appointment of a receiver by the comptroller of the currency to wind up their affairs, only in the following cases: First, for not keeping good its surplus. Section 5151. Second, for not keeping stock at minimum. Section 5141. Third, for not keeping good its reserve. Section 5191. Fourth, for not selecting a place for the redemption of its notes. Section 5195. Fifth, for holding its own stock over six months. Section 5201. Sixth, for non-payment of its circulating notes. Section 5234. Seventh, for improperly certifying a check. Section 5208. Eighth, for failing to pay up capital stock, and to allow the same to become, and to remain, impaired by losses. Section 5205.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 2 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 539, and 2 Law & Eq. Rep. 638, contain only partial reports.]

If a judgment creditor may not invoke the aid of a court of equity he is powerless to enforce his claim, unless he can persuade the comptroller of currency to interfere in his behalf. Section 5242 provides that a "transfer of notes, bills of exchange, bonds or other evidences of debt owing to any national banking association, or of deposits to its credit, all assignments of mortgages, sureties on real estate, or of judgments or decrees in its favor, all deposits of money, bullion, or other valuable thing for its use, or for the use of any of its shareholders or creditors, and all payments of money to either, made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof, made with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this chapter, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void." No method, however, is provided of winding up a bank guilty of any of the acts mentioned in this section, nor is the power given to the comptroller of currency apparently designed to reach these cases. It is at least doubtful whether he would have power, upon the application made by this bill to interfere and appoint a receiver. That the winding-up provisions of the act were not designed to be exclusive, it seems to me, is fairly to be inferred from section 5241, which provides, that "no association shall be subject to any visitatorial powers other than such as are authorized by this title, or are vested in the courts of justice." There is certainly an implication here that the courts may exercise a visitatorial power, and as this power is usually if not always exerted through the agency of a receiver, I should regard the language of this section as justifying the appointment of one.

But even if the power had been given to the comptroller of the currency to appoint a receiver in cases like the present, in the absence of restrictive language, it is at least doubtful whether it should be regarded as forestalling the jurisdiction of the courts.

The general rule with regard to the election of remedies is stated in Sedg. St. Const. Law, pp. 93-401: "Where a right originally exists at common law, and a statute is passed giving a new remedy without any negative, express or implied, upon the old common law, the party has his election either to sue at common law or to proceed upon the statute; the statutory remedy is merely cumulative." A clause in a railroad act authorizing the directors to exact a forfeiture of the stock and previous payments, as a penalty for non-payment of installments, does not, before forfeiture has been declared, impair the remedy of the directors to enforce payment by action at common law. Northern R. Co. v. Miller, 10 Barb. 260. These principles have been applied to the winding-up act of English corporations, and have uniformly been held as not exclusive of the ordinary remedies provided by law. Lindl. Partn. 861.

In Jones v. Charlemont, 16 Sim. 271, a bill was filed for the purpose of winding up the affairs of a railway company. The defendant demurred upon the ground that plaintiffs might have obtained their object under the special act of 9 and 10 Vict., to facilitate the dissolution of railway companies, and that that act had ousted the court of its jurisdiction in cases clearly within its operation. The vice-chancellor, however, declined to hear counsel for the complainant, and overruled the demurrer.

The same question again came before the court in the case of Clements v. Bowes, 17 Sim. 167, which was a bill by a shareholder in a company, on behalf of himself and others, praying an account of receipts and payments of defendants on behalf of the company. Defendants were members of a finance committee who were alleged to have exclusive control over the money affairs of the corporation. They demurred on the ground that the legislature having provided a method of winding up and dealing with the affairs of a railway company, the court ought to refuse a party the right of coming in to have the accounts taken. The court observes: "To oust the jurisdiction of a court of chancery in such a case, the legislature should have so declared. It is plain where a court of equity has jurisdiction in such a case, an act of giving further relief does not by that oust the title of the court of equity, without express terms being used to put an end to the jurisdiction which is inherent in the court." Similar views were expressed by the court of chancery in 1853, in the case of Fripp v. Chard Ry. Co., 21 Eng. Law & Eq. 53, which was an application by a mortgagee for the appointment of a receiver. A provision in the act that any mortgagee whose interest was in arrear for twenty-one days might have a receiver appointed, upon application to two justices, was held to oust the jurisdiction of the court to appoint a receiver with the usual powers. Counsel for defendant cited to the court upon the argument the case of Smith v. Manufacturers' Bank [Case No. 13,076], in which Judge Blodgett, of the Northern district of Illinois, held that the bankrupt act was not intended to apply to national banks, and that the provision made by congress for their winding up, when insolvent, was exclusive. Although the two cases are not exactly analogous, the reasoning of the court in that case undoubtedly applies to the one at bar. Having intimated an opinion upon the argument before this case was cited, that the winding-up provisions were not exclusive, I felt bound on hearing the case, in deference to the views of the learned judge, to withhold my decision until I had made a more careful examination of the law. From correspondence with him I am informed that he has modified, to some extent, the views expressed in that opinion, and that in the subsequent case of Irons v. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank [Case No. 7,068], he appointed a receiver of the same bank upon the application of a judgment-creditor. He there observes: "It would seem that the comptroller only has the right to appoint a receiver upon the existence of the facts which clothe him with that power, and that he rightfully declines to act in this case. I can see nothing in the law itself, nor in the decisions of the courts upon the law, so far as they have gone, to exclude the idea that a corporation created as this is, under an act of congress for certain specified purposes, does not come within the general provision of the law regulating the remedies of creditors the same as any other corporation, except where there are specific provisions to the contrary."

It is not intended in this case to decide whether the court would be authorized to appoint a receiver upon the happening of the contingencies authorizing such appointment by the comptroller of the currency. I am clearly of the opinion, however, that when the act does not provide for the introduction of the comptroller, a judgment-creditor is entitled to the aid of a court of equity. I see nothing in the case of Gibson v. Kennedy, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 498, which conflicts with these views. Nothing was decided in that case, except that it is for the comptroller to determine when it is necessary to institute proceedings against the stockholders to enforce their personal liability, and whether a whole or part, and if a part, how much shall be collected. It is true there are certain dicta in the opinion which, literally construed, would indicate that creditors must, in all cases, seek their remedy through the comptroller in the mode prescribed by statute, but I am satisfied the court did not intend that language to be of universal application, and that it should be limited to the facts of the case before it.

Nor is there any force in the objection that a receiver appointed by this court would be powerless to obtain possession of the surplus of bonds on deposit in Washington, for the redemption of its circulating notes. I cannot assume that the comptroller of the currency would refuse to comply with the order of a court having jurisdiction of the case.

On the whole, I am of the opinion that in the absence of action on the part of the comptroller of the currency, this court has the power to appoint a receiver upon the application of a judgment-creditor, subject, possibly, to his being superseded by the action of the comptroller.

The demurrer must be overruled.

Case No. 18,085.

WRIGHT v. MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK.
[See Case No. 18,084.]

WRIGHT (MOTT v.). See Case No. 9,883.

WRIGHT (NICHOLLS v.). See Case No. 10,236.

Case No. 18,086.

WRIGHT et al. v. NORWICH & N. Y. TRANSP. CO.

[1 Ben. 156.]¹

District Court, D. Connecticut. May, 1867.²

COLLISION—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—PROCEEDINGS TO APPORTION LIABILITY—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT.

1. Where, in a collision between a steamer and a schooner, both vessels were sunk, and the steamer was afterwards raised and repaired, and this suit was brought by the owners of the schooner against the owners of the steamer, in which a decree was rendered for the libellants, with an order of reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damage, and his report, fixing such damage, was confirmed by the court. And where the respondents, thereupon, applied to the court on motion to reserve the final decree, that they might take "appropriate proceedings" to apportion the sum for which they might be liable among the parties entitled thereto, under the provisions of the act of congress of March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 635], offering to the court proof of the value of their vessel and her freight, and that such value was exceeded by the amount of the claims for property destroyed in the collision. Held, that the liability of owners of vessels for damages done by their own to other craft in cases of collision, is limited by the third section of the act to the amount and value of their interest in the vessel at fault and her pending freight.

2. This limitation of liability is not confined to damages done to property on board the faulty vessel, but embraces all damages.

3. The respondents are, under the circumstances of this case, entitled, by the fourth section of the act, to take proceedings to have the amount for which they are liable apportioned among the parties entitled to it.

4. But that this court has no power to give them such relief in any form of proceeding. That power does not belong to its jurisdiction in admiralty, certainly not in a suit in personam, where neither the faulty ship and freight, nor their amount or value, is within the control of the court, and where the court can render no judgment that will bind parties not before it, and cannot make parties of such as reside and remain out of the district. And the court has no equity powers adequate to granting such relief.

¹ [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Affirmed in Case No. 18,087. Decree of circuit court affirmed by supreme court in 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 104.]

5. The evidence must be rejected and the motion denied; and as the value of the steamer and her freight, at the time of the collision, was greater than the amount of the report, the libellants must have a decree for that amount.

In admiralty.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. On the 18th of April, 1866, the schooner S. Van Vliet, owned by the libellants [W. A. Wright and others], and the steamboat City of Norwich, owned by the respondents, collided in Long Island Sound. The collision sunk the schooner, and both she and her cargo were lost. The steamboat was greatly damaged by the blow, and soon after took fire and sunk. She had on board a valuable cargo, which was lost. The steamer was subsequently raised and repaired at great expense.

A libel in personam against the owners of the steamboat was filed in this court, and after answer and full hearing, she was held in fault, and a decree entered against her owners, with an order of reference to a commissioner to compute the damages to the owners, both of the schooner and her cargo, and report the same to the court. The commissioner heard the parties and made a special report. Upon motion that the court confirm the report, counsel were heard upon the questions of law raised pertaining to that branch of the case. The report was confirmed upon principles set forth in the opinion of the court, and the damages of the owners of the schooner were fixed at $19,975, and those of the owners of the cargo at $1,921.13.

Thus far the case presented only the ordinary features of a suit for collision, and was free from all embarrassing questions. If nothing further now appeared, the libellants would be entitled to a decree against the respondents for the full amount of the above damages.

At this point, however, the respondents move the court to reserve the final decree, that they may "take appropriate proceedings," and offer evidence to this court "for the purpose of apportioning the sum for which the owners of the steamboat may be liable, among the parties entitled thereto." The object of the respondents is to avail themselves of the benefits of the provisions of the act of congress of March 3, 1851, limiting the liability of ship owners for the consequences of the torts of the master and others on board. The respondents insist that they have laid the foundation for this proceeding in their answer, by averring that the damages resulting from this collision to third parties greatly exceed the value of their boat and her freight then pending. No formal steps have been taken by way of presenting evidence to this court of the amount of the claims of those whose property was on board of the faulty boat, and was injured or destroyed by her taking fire and sinking, but, upon suggestion of the court, and by consent of counsel, such evidence was considered as offered under this motion and objected to, and the general question of the right of the respondents to relief, and the power of the court to grant it, was argued at length.

The points discussed at bar may be condensed into the following questions: (1) How far the original liability of ship owners for the faults of their vessels in cases of collision is limited by the act of March, 1851? (2) What relief the respondents are entitled to under that act? (3) How far this court can grant such relief as the act intended to provide?

I see no reason to doubt that the liability of owners of vessels for damages done by their own to other craft in cases of collision, is limited by this act to the amount and value of their interest in the vessel at fault, and her pending freight. The third section of the act is too explicit to be explained away by any comparison of its provisions with the history of British legislation on the same general subject. The direct language of this section coincides with the plain and well known object of the whole statute, which was to encourage commercial enterprises in the building and sailing of ships, by relieving the owners from any liability for losses beyond the value of their interest in the vessel and freight pending. The argument of the libellants' counsel is that the liability limited by the act, so far as it relates to collision, is confined to damages done to property on board the faulty vessel—in other words, that the sole object of congress, was to relieve the owners whose vessel may be in fault, from the unlimited liability to which they would otherwise be held as common carriers. The attempt is made to support this construction by arguments drawn from the history of the various English acts on this subject, and by a comparison of the language of those acts with that of our own. But, as already intimated, I regard this section as too explicit to admit of any such construction. It would not be plainer if the other words were left out, and it read simply "the liability of the owner or owners of any ship or vessel * * * for any loss, damage, or injury by collision * * * without the privity of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners respectively, in such ship or vessel and her freight then pending."

The reasons for limiting the liability for injuries resulting to other vessels and their cargoes are just as weighty as those for limiting it for injuries done to the cargoes of the vessels in fault. Collisions are frequent, their hazards great, and the injuries inflicted upon other vessels and cargoes often far exceed the value of the faulty ship and her pending freight. The disaster out of which this controversy has sprung, presents an instructive lesson on this point.

Had the libellants' vessel been condemned as in the wrong, her owners, according to their present argument, would have been liable for the whole amount of damages done to the city of Norwich and her cargo, exceeding by many times over the amount or value of their interest in the Van Vliet. The owners of the latter would not only have lost their vessel and her pending freight, amounting to over $20,000, but would have been responsible to other parties for probably $100,000 more. It was against just such calamities, out of all proportion to the magnitude of the capital invested, that I understand this act to provide. I apprehend that this construction of the third section of this act would never have been doubted, but for the singular provisions of the fourth section. But I do not think they seriously affect the question.

This brings us to the consideration of our second point—what relief the respondents are entitled to under this act. They have alleged in their answer, and now offer to prove, that the injuries resulting from this collision, including not only those which these libellants are seeking indemnity for, but also those suffered by owners of property on board the City of Norwich, greatly exceeded in amount or value their interest in the latter boat and her freight then pending. They propose to prove her value, and the value of her freight, and the extent of the losses to the owners of the property on board, in order to enable the court to apportion the sum for which the owners of the boat are liable, among the parties entitled thereto, to wit: these libellants and the owners of goods destroyed on the respondents' boat. This, they claim, they are authorized to do by the fourth section of the act in question, which is as follows: "If any such embezzlement, loss, or destruction shall be suffered by several freighters or owners of goods, wares, or merchandise, or any property whatever, on the same voyage, and the whole value of the vessel and her freight for the voyage shall not be sufficient to make compensation to each of them, they shall receive compensation from the owners of the ship or vessel in proportion to their respective losses; and for that purpose, the said freighters and owners of the property, and the owner or owners of the ship or vessel, or any of them, may take the appropriate proceedings in any court, for the purpose of apportioning the sum, for which the owner or owners of the ship or vessel may be liable, among the parties entitled thereto. And it shall be deemed a sufficient compliance with the requirements of this act on the part of such owner or owners, if he or they shall transfer his or their interests in such vessel or freight, for the benefit of such claimants, to a trustee to be appointed by any court of competent jurisdiction, to act as such trustee for the person or persons who may prove to be entitled thereto; from and after which transfer all claims and proceedings against the owner or owners shall cease."

It was undoubtedly foreseen by congress, that in cases of embezzlement and kindred torts, and in cases of collision, there would arise instances where several different parties would have claims for damages against the owners of a vessel, exceeding her value in the aggregate, and would very likely endeavor to enforce them in separate suits and in different tribunals, and in order to protect the interest of all parties, it was necessary that there should be some way provided by which the amount to which the liability of the owner is limited, should be distributed among those entitled to recover, in proportion to their respective claims. This state of things would exist, or at least might exist, whenever property on board either one or both colliding vessels, belonging to parties other than such owners, was destroyed or injured, and the whole amount of damage should exceed the value of the faulty vessel and her pending freight. Indeed, it might occur where one vessel strikes two others in the same collision, as has more than once happened, and the owners of each injured vessel should bring a separate suit. The language of this fourth section is, therefore, very broad, and extends the power of taking proceedings for an apportionment to the owner of the faulty vessel, and to the several owners or freighters of any property whatever lost or destroyed by the tortious act of those on board. Whenever, therefore, there are several claimants for damages arising out of the same tortious act, who have brought, or may be entitled to bring, separate suits, the necessity for apportioning the amount, for which the owners of the vessel in fault are liable, arises. The respondents in the present suit find themselves in that condition. In addition to the claims of these libellants, upon which large damages have been awarded against them, they are liable, assuming the judgment of this court as to the cause of the collision to be correct, to freighters or owners of goods on the City of Norwich for a much larger amount; and they aver that the whole sum for which they are thus liable exceeds the value of their interest in their boat and pending freight at the moment preceding the collision. They are entitled therefore to take proceedings to have the amount, for which they are liable, apportioned among the parties entitled thereto. This is one species of relief which the act intended to provide. The other, the transfer of the ship and freight to a trustee, they have not resorted to, and therefore nothing need be said on that subject.

Just here we enter upon the most embarrassing questions which arise under this act. The power given to parties, to protect their rights by an apportionment of the sum for which the owners of the vessel are liable, is expressed in vague and uncertain terms, both as to the nature of the proceedings to be taken, and the court which is to administer them. We are, therefore, brought to the consideration of our last question, how far this court can grant the relief which this act intended to provide. The language of the act is, that the parties authorized, or any one of them, "may take the appropriate proceedings in any court for the purpose of apportioning the sum," &c. What is here meant by "appropriate proceedings?" It is reasonable to suppose that congress, by this language, referred to some course of legal procedure already known to the law, and administered by some distinct tribunal, according to a settled practice. As this act was framed with full knowledge of the various English acts, relating to the same subject, and was intended to accomplish substantially the same result, we may infer that the appropriate proceedings contemplated were substantially such as have been employed in the enforcement of the English act. These were equity proceedings, administered by the high court of chancery. That tribunal was empowered to entertain suits of this character, and to draw the whole controversy within its jurisdiction, by stopping actions in all other courts relating to the same subject matter. The most ample powers were conferred on that court to enable it to make a complete, effectual, and final disposition of the litigation, so as to bind all parties in interest. These powers were transferred to the high court of admiralty in 1861. (See Judge Benedict's opinion in the case of Place v. The City of Norwich [Case No. 11,202]. Some such powers as those exercised by the English courts must be possessed and employed by whatever tribunal effectually administers this act of congress. It must be able, by a binding decree, to settle the whole controversy, and conclude the parties in interest. Now our present inquiry is, whether this court possesses powers commensurate with such a task. Waiving now the question whether, if it had the power at all, it could proceed to exercise it in connection with, and as a part of, the present suit, I pass to the inquiry whether it can do so under any form of proceeding, unless its jurisdiction is first enlarged. It is true that this section says that the parties, or any of them, "may take the appropriate proceedings, in any court for the purpose of apportioning, &c." Of course these words, "any court," are not to be taken in their literal sense. From necessity we must restrict and qualify them at the start. A court whose jurisdiction is exclusively criminal, cannot be deemed within their meaning. No one will doubt that civil as distinguished from criminal tribunals, alone were indicated. Nor can we suppose for a moment that it was intended by this act to authorize a resort to all civil courts. Tribunals of limited and inferior jurisdiction, like probate, surrogate, or local city courts, are not within the meaning of these words, although within their literal expression. They undoubtedly refer, as the latter clause of this section, when providing for the transfer of the vessel to a trustee, designates, to courts of competent jurisdiction,—tribunals having a range of authority and a mode of procedure adequate, or at least adapted to accomplish the purposes the act had in view. Now, the only courts of a character at all resembling this description, are courts possessing a general equity jurisdiction. Whether even such courts, as constituted in this country, are, without the aid of special legislation, adequate to this task, I do not now stop to inquire. Nor do I pause to ask the question whether the equitable jurisdiction of any other court of the United States, as the law now stands, is equal to the work. It is sufficient for me here, to determine whether this court has any such power. I answer unhesitatingly, that it has not. It does not pertain to its jurisdiction in admiralty; certainly not in a suit in personam, where neither the faulty ship and freight, nor their amount or value, are within the control of the court. In a suit in personam, it can render no judgment that would bind parties not before it. None of these freighters are parties to this suit, and it is doubtful if this court has power to make them parties. Certainly, it has no power to make parties of such as reside and remain beyond the limits of this district.

It is hardly necessary to add that this court has no equity powers adequate to the exercise of the duty supposed to be conferred upon some court by this section of the act. Its jurisdiction depends upon the acts of congress, and with the exception of a single subject matter, no equity jurisdiction has ever been conferred upon it. I presume it will hardly be contended that, because congress has authorized, in terms, appropriate proceedings to be taken in any court, it has, by implication, conferred upon every court powers adequate to the work of effectually administering this act. And if it has not, this court is without jurisdiction, without rules of practice, and without the power to make such rules, adapted to accomplish the object of the statute, and give effectual relief to the parties interested in the sum for which these respondents are liable as damages for this collision.

The conclusion is, that the court has no power to grant the relief asked for on this motion, or under any form of proceeding that could be instituted. The evidence offered is therefore rejected, and the motion denied. And as it is conceded that the value of the City of Norwich and her pending freight, at the time of the collision, was much greater than the damages assessed in this case, a decree must be entered for the libellants for the sum fixed by the court on confirming the commissioner's report.

[The decree of the district court was affirmed by the circuit court, Case No. 18,087, and the decree of the latter court was affirmed by the supreme court in 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 104. For other cases growing out of the same collision, and involving some of the same questions, see Cases Nos. 11,202 and 2,760-2,762.]

Case No. 18,087.

WRIGHT et al. v. NORWICH & N. Y.
TRANSP. CO.

[8 Blatchf. 14.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Sept. 20,
1870.²

COLLISION — LIMITATION OF LIABILITY OF VESSEL OWNER.

1. Where a lookout, whose duty it is to report a vessel which he sees, does not report her when he sees her, that fact leads to the belief that he was not performing his duty as a lookout in any respect.

2. The 3d section of the act of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 635), entitled, "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners and for other purposes," by which such liability is, in certain cases, limited to the amount or value of their interest in the ship and her freight then pending, does not limit or affect the liability of the owner of a vessel for loss, damage, or injury resulting, through the fault of such vessel, to another vessel and her cargo, from a collision between the two vessels.

3. Whether this court, as a court of admiralty, has power or jurisdiction adequate to give full effect to the limitation of liability provided by that act, quere.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Connecticut.

[This was a libel by William A. Wright and others against the Norwich & New York Transportation Company to recover for damages resulting from a collision. From a decree of the district court in favor of the libellants (Case No. 18,086), the present appeal was taken.]

Richard H. Huntley and Charles R. Ingersoll, for libellants.

Edward H. Owen, John S. Beach, and Jeremiah Halsey, for respondents.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. This suit is brought in personam against the respondents as owners of the steamboat, the City of Norwich, to recover for a loss caused by a collision between that steamboat and the schooner General S. Van Vliet, in Long Island Sound, shortly before four o'clock in the morning of the 18th of April, 1866. The injury to both vessels was such that the schooner soon sank, with all her cargo. The steamboat took fire and also sank, with her cargo. Since this action was commenced, the steamboat has been raised. Some of the libellants were owners of the schooner, and the others were owners of her cargo; and they charge that the collision was caused by the negligence of those in the management of the steamboat. The respondents, on the other hand, deny all fault on their part, and allege that the schooner was in fault in not exhibiting at the time sufficient lights, as required by the act of congress. They further state, in their answer, that the steamboat had on board a large and valuable "freight" belonging to various parties, much larger in value than the whole amount of the interest of the respondents in the said steamboat and in her freight then pending, all of which "freight" was lost.

On the trial in the district court, an interlocutory decree was made, charging responsibility for the loss upon the respondents, and ordering a recovery by the libellants, with the usual reference to compute, upon which the amount of the loss by the owners of the schooner and the owners of her cargo respectively was ascertained and reported. Thereupon, by agreement of the parties, and as a part of the record of said cause prior to the final decree, a motion was filed and allowed or entertained by the court, wherein the respondents reiterated their statement that the City of Norwich, at the time of said collision, had on board a large and valuable cargo of merchandize, on freight, belonging to various parties, and much larger in amount than the whole amount of the value of the interest of the respondents in said steamer and her freight then pending, and alleged that the damages sustained by all of said parties by said collision, including the libellants, were much greater in amount than the value of the interest of the respondents in said steamer and her freight then pending, and, also, that proceedings had been commenced in behalf of said parties, against the said steamer, in the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of New York, for the recovery of said damages. The respondents thereupon prayed, that they might be permitted to show, by proper evidence, the whole amount of damages sustained by all of said parties, and the value of said steamer and her freight then pending, and that the decree of this court be so framed as to give to the libellants such part or proportion of the amount of damages sustained by them, as the said value of the said interest of the said respondents should bear to the whole amount of damages sustained by all parties by said collision. The district court denied the motion, and gave a final decree for the libellants, that they recover from the respondents the whole amount of the damages sustained, as fixed by the court, and their costs, without any regard to the value of the respondents' interest in the steamer and her freight, or to the amount of loss sustained by other parties by the collision. [Case No. 18,086.]

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

² [Affirming Case No. 18,086. Decree of circuit court affirmed by supreme court in 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 104.]

Two questions, therefore, are raised and discussed upon the appeal, the case having been heard in this court upon the same proof, and on the record as it existed in the district court: (1) Upon the proof, was the collision caused by the negligence or fault of those in the management of the City of Norwich? (2) Should the respondents have been permitted to show the whole amount of loss caused by the collision to all parties affected thereby, and the value of the interest of the respondents in the vessel found in fault and in her freight then pending, with a view to reduce the recovery of the libellants to an amount duly proportioned to such value?

Upon the question first mentioned, the testimony is very voluminous, and the discussion has been very able, and the claims of the parties respectively have been sustained by a most minute and careful analysis, comparison and criticism of the testimony, and with an ingenuity, skill and force which I have rarely seen equalled. In the testimony of the various witnesses examined on behalf of the respective parties there is very much in support of either view of the question. But, after a most painstaking study of the proof, aided by the oral argument and by the elaborate, written and printed, briefs of the counsel, I am constrained to say that the preponderance of the evidence is with the libellants upon this question. In a case of great doubt, if I were inclined to a conclusion, upon a mere question of fact, at variance with the court below, I should hesitate in reversing, where the witnesses were examined in the presence of the court. Here, however, while it must be conceded that the proof on both sides presents a serious conflict, the final conclusion, from which I cannot escape, is in concurrence with that of the district judge. I have examined the testimony in the light of the searching criticism of each witness contained in the brief of the respondents' counsel, and yet I conclude that the schooner was without fault. Those in charge of the steamer were not in the exercise of due diligence. The discussion of the evidence has been so full on both sides, that I should do nothing serviceable to either party were I to reproduce the evidence tending to the result stated. The opinion of the learned district judge presents a just and impartial review of the evidence, and, in my opinion, it gives the true solution of the question in dispute. The schooner had her proper lights. It is not possible that the lookout on the City of Norwich was in the actual exercise of diligence, or he would have sooner discovered her. Indeed, when he did see her he did not report her. This neglect of duty he seeks to excuse by his belief that the pilot had himself then discovered her. It was his duty to report; and not to trust to his supposition or surmise; and this circumstance tends very strongly, in my mind, to the belief, founded on his own testimony, that he was not performing his duty in any respect. While on the other hand, as forcibly shown in the opinion, if the actual state of the weather just before the collision rendered it impossible to see the schooner, the steamer was in like fault in not proceeding at a speed so moderate that, when she did discover the schooner, she could better control her own motions.

Upon the second question I find no little embarrassment. The claim of the respondents arises under the third section of the act of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 635), which reads as follows: "The liability of the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, for any embezzlement, loss or destruction by the master, officers, mariners, passengers, or any other person or persons, of any property, goods, or merchandise shipped or put on board of such ship or vessel, or for any loss, damage or injury by collision, or for any act, matter or thing, loss, damage or forfeiture, done, occasioned or incurred without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners respectively, in such ship or vessel and her freight then pending."

1. The manner in which the question was raised below seems to me novel. Assuming, for the moment, that the statute applies to the case, and that the respondents have, by virtue thereof, a right to reduce the libellants' recovery by proving that the whole loss by the collision exceeds the amount or value of their interest in the ship or vessel found in fault and in her freight then pending, and that the proof in reduction of damages may be given in the action brought to charge the owners, it would seem to follow that such proof should be given on the trial, or that, if the court sees fit to try the question of liability and settle the rule or measure thereof in the first instance, such proof should be offered before the commissioner to whom it is referred to take proofs of the amount of the damages for which a recovery is to be awarded. The motion made in the district court seems, however, to have been in the nature of an application to open the proofs in the cause after they were closed, and to let in testimony which, if of any avail, must have operated to modify the interlocutory decree already pronounced, which awarded to the libellants a recovery of all the damages by them sustained; and, if the motion contemplated a further hearing before the commissioner, a modification of such interlocutory decree would have been necessary. In this view, the motion was plainly addressed to the discretion of the court, and its denial, as an exercise of discretion, cannot be claimed to have been erroneous. Again, if proofs on the subject were offered in the district court and rejected, (on whatever ground and in whatever stage of the trial or proceedings,) inasmuch as they would go not merely to a question of amount or a matter of computation, but to a rule governing the recovery when and after all the material amounts were computed and ascertained, I perceive no reason why such proofs might not be offered in the circuit court on the appeal, which has, if the appellant sees fit, many of the characteristics of a new trial. Doubtless, the issue must be made below, and the question of law should appear to have been in some form before the court below; but if, in the circuit court it appears that the testimony ought not to have been rejected, the respondents would and must be permitted to give the proof in this court. The construction of the act of congress is, however, in a degree, unsettled. The practice under it, in cases to which it applies, appears not to have been prescribed, nor is it established by any usage of the court. It can hardly be deemed a fault if counsel, under such circumstances, failed to select the most orderly mode of raising the question. Besides, I think the record shows that the course pursued had the sanction of the district court, and, although the granting of the motion would have required a modification of the interlocutory decree, and probably a further reference to take proofs of amounts, the court, no doubt, had power first to settle the question of liability, next the amount of the libellants' loss, and then, if any other fact necessary to fix the amount of recovery was wanting, to make a further reference. The precise order of proceeding in this respect which that court saw fit to pursue, would not be interfered with on an appeal, which would raise the whole question and all the questions which were raised and passed upon in the district court. Nor was the question disposed of there as a question of practice or a matter of discretion. The agreement of counsel, the allowance of the motion there, and the opinion of the court, show that it was intended as a disposition of the subject on other grounds, and it was so disposed of. And finally, on this point, I have no doubt of the power of this court on appeal, in view of the fact that the question was distinctly raised below, to entertain it here, and to deal with it as freely, according to what may be found due to the rights of the respondents, as it could if the testimony had been offered on the trial in the first instance, and been there rejected. True, on the appeal the proofs were not formally offered, but the question of their admissibility, and their influence upon the recovery, were argued at great length, and the right of the respondents to give such proof and take the benefit thereof was most earnestly insisted upon. If, therefore, such proofs were proper, and would avail to reduce the liability of the respondents in this suit, the court can give relief and ought to do so. I must, therefore, treat the question as open, and as fully as it was considered in the district court.

2. It is very strongly argued, that the act of congress has no application to the claim of the owners of another vessel, or of the cargo of another vessel, injured by a collision with a ship which is in fault in producing it; that the claim of the libellants in this case is not within the statute; and that, therefore, the proofs proposed to be given, and the facts they would establish, are irrelevant, and cannot affect the amount of the recovery.

The special circumstances which led to an effort by ship-owners to procure an act of congress in modification of their common law liability, which resulted in the passage of the act in question, are of some significance. They were, to some extent, within my own personal knowledge. They were very notorious, and are referred to in the debates in the senate of the United States on the passage of the bill. Shortly before the subject was brought to the attention of congress, the packet ship Henry Clay, a large, costly and nearly new ship, lying at the wharf in the port of New York, having nearly completed her lading and being bound for Europe, took fire from some cause and was burned, with a cargo already laden amounting in value, according to my recollection, to half a million of dollars. Her owners, being losers to a very large amount by the burning of the ship, were proceeded against by owners of cargo, to compel payment to them of its value. In one of the actions I was myself of counsel, and it was strenuously insisted, that even without any such statutes as exist in England, the owners could not be charged upon the usual rule of the liability of common carriers at common law. No proof of actual fault or negligence, except so far as the occurrence of the fire in the ship might warrant such inference, was given or attempted. The owners were held liable. Pending that action I was aware, through the distinguished counsel for the then defendants, that an effort was being made to procure some legislation from congress to soften the rigor of the rule declared in that case.

Some years before the burning of the Henry Clay, and on the night of the 13th of January, 1840, the steamboat Lexington was burned upon Long Island Sound, and the disaster was accompanied by a painful loss of life and the destruction of a large amount of property. Litigation ensued, and the liability of the owners was declared in the case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, in the supreme court of the United States (6 How. [47 U. S.] 344), decided in 1848.

Both of these disasters, and the alleged hardships of the law against ship-owners as common carriers, were commented upon in the debates which were had upon the act now in question. An examination of those debates shows, that it was the stringent rule of the common law which made common carriers of property liable for all losses, (except such as were caused by the act of God or the public enemy), however free from actual fault or negligence, that was the subject of comment; and the apparent purpose, so far as it may be gathered from those debates, was to relax that rule. It is, therefore, a further significant circumstance, that, in those debates, nothing was said of injuries to other vessels, or the liability of ship-owners, as principals, for the tortious negligence of their ship-masters, officers or crews, as their servants, by which the property of persons in no wise entrusted to them receives injury. Nor was the rule of the common law which makes the master liable for the negligence of his servant in his business, the subject of review, criticism or comment. These circumstances, by no means controlling, are, nevertheless, appropriately referred to in reviewing the act, and may throw light upon its meaning, if otherwise such meaning and the intent of the legislature be doubtful.

The act itself begins with a declaration, that a ship-owner shall not be liable for loss or damage by fire to any goods or merchandise whatever, shipped, taken in, or put on board, unless such fire is caused by the design or neglect of the owner. This has no other operation than to affect his relations as a common carrier. The proviso to that section, that "nothing in this act shall prevent the parties from making such contract as they please, extending or limiting the liability of ship-owners," is some indication that congress believed that they were dealing with a question of liability which might be the subject of a contract, not with a liability for tortious negligence to parties who stood, and who could stand, in no relation of contract whatever with such owners. The proviso is annexed apparently to the first section, but it is noticeable that the language is not, "nothing in this section," but "nothing in this act," indicating that the proviso was intended to apply to the whole act. The proviso was introduced as an amendment after the act was reported to the senate, and the inference that a relation which might appropriately be the subject of a prior contract was the subject of the entire act, is by no means unwarranted.

The second section appertains solely to the duty of shippers to the master and owners of the ship, in the relation of the latter to the former as carriers, and the liability affected thereby is expressly described as their liability "as carriers thereof."

The third section is in the terms already above recited. It must be conceded that it contains terms which, viewed apart from the residue of the act, are broad enough to include injury to other vessels by collision. This fact is not conclusive. In the construction of statutes as well as private instruments and contracts, general words are restricted in their meaning by the subject-matter of the statute or instrument, the context, and the apparent intent; and, in an enumeration of particulars followed by general terms, a restriction of the latter to cases or things ejusdem generis is according to settled rule. Moore v. American Transp. Co., 24 How. [65 U. S.] 1, 36; Reg. v. Reed, 28 Eng. Law & Eq. 133; Reg. v. Nevill, 8 Q. B. 452; Sandiman v. Breach, 7 Barn. & C. 96; Ryegate v. Wardsboro, 30 Vt. 746; Simonds v. Powers, 28 Vt. 354.

In construing any particular clause or words of a statute, it is especially necessary to examine and consider the whole statute, and gather, if possible, from the whole the intention of the legislature. Now, it has already been seen, that the first and second sections have sole reference to the relations of ship-owners as common carriers. The fourth section as clearly affects them in that relation only. Thus, it provides, "that if any such embezzlement, loss, or destruction, shall be suffered by several freighters or owners of goods, wares, or merchandize, or any property whatever, on the same voyage, and the whole value of the ship or vessel, and her freight for the voyage, shall not be sufficient to make compensation to each of them, they shall receive compensation * * * in proportion to their respective losses; and for that purpose the said freighters and owners of the property, and the ship-owners, or any of them, may take the appropriate proceedings in any court, for apportioning the sum to which the ship-owners are liable; * * * and the ship-owners are authorized to transfer their interest in the vessel or freight, for the benefit of such claimants, to a trustee, to be appointed, &c., * * * from and after which transfer, all claims and proceedings against the owner or owners shall cease." Here, the terms, "goods, wares or merchandize or any property whatever," are equivalent to the words in the third section, "any property, goods or merchandize," and to the words, "goods, wares, merchandize or other property," in the sixth section, in each of which they relate solely to property of some kind put on board of the vessel. The phrase is added, "on the same voyage," to confine the participation in the apportionment to the freighters for a single voyage, and not to permit the ship-owners to bring into the compensation losses sustained on prior or other voyages. This limitation of the application of the fourth section is very important in its bearing upon the question in another aspect, but here I state it simply in order to show that such is its proper construction. It may be possible to select a portion of the words to give color to a more comprehensive meaning; but "freighters or owners of goods, wares or merchandize, or any property whatever, on the same voyage," could not include the owner of another ship pursuing a voyage in another direction, sunk by collision. And a loss suffered by several freighters or owners of property on the same voyage, is wholly inapt to include the loss sustained by the owner of another ship on another voyage. This limitation of the application of the fourth section to property on board of the ship, or for which the ship-owners would, by the common law, be liable as common carriers, has been affirmed by Mr. Justice Grier in Barnes v. Steamship Co. [Case No. 1,021], and by the decision of Judge Merrick in Walker v. Boston Ins. Co., 14 Gray, 288, in Massachusetts.

The fifth section places charterers in the same situation as ship-owners, when the former man, victual and navigate the ships.

The sixth excludes the idea that the act was intended to exonerate the master, officers and mariners from liability for their own fraud or negligence.

The seventh relates solely to persons shipping dangerous or inflammable articles on board of a vessel taking a cargo for various persons on freight, without giving a notice describing their nature and character, and imposes a penalty; and the last section exempts certain craft from the operation of the act.

A perusal of the entire act, and a consideration of its apparent design, its general purport being applicable to ship-owners as common carriers only, compels me to conclude that it was only their relation as such carriers which congress had in view. If it is asked, what, then, do the words, "for any loss, damage, or injury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing, loss, damage or forfeiture, done, occasioned, or incurred," mean? I answer, that, having the responsibility of a carrier at the common law in view, a responsibility which subjected the ship-owner to liability for every loss not caused by the act of God or the public enemy, some such words were necessary to cover all the grounds of his liability as a carrier. It was not enough to specify "embezzlement, loss, or destruction by the master, officers, mariners, passengers or any other person or persons." Collision and many other acts and things might occasion loss or injury to property entrusted to the ship-owner as a carrier, for which but for these words he would be responsible to the full amount. The collision in the case now under consideration furnishes an illustration, for, the City of Norwich having on board a very valuable cargo, that cargo was lost by the collision, and that loss would be within the terms of the section. Not only so, collision and many other acts, matters, things, losses, damage and injury might happen, and be "done, occasioned or incurred" without any fault or negligence either of the ship-owners or of their masters or mariners, and be due solely to the fault or negligence of other persons, or be an accident in such sense that faulty negligence could be imputed to no one, and yet the ship-owners would be liable. These classes of cases are, therefore, provided for, and are clearly within the design and object of the statute. There is, therefore, a large field for the operation of all the words of the third section, without extending their meaning to an injury to another vessel or goods on board thereof.

There is, also, great force in the argument of the counsel for the libellants, founded upon the provisions of the English statute in relation to ship-owners. The statute of 53 Geo. III. c. 159, was before the congress of the United States when this act was passed. It not only so appears by the debates, but it would reasonably be so inferred. The discussion proceeded largely upon the policy of England and of this country, in their relations to other maritime nations, of encouraging the building and employment of ships, by relaxing the severe rule of the liability of carriers at the common law. The English statute in terms extended beyond that, and applied the limitation of responsibility, in very terms, to any loss or damage, which "may happen to any other ship or vessel or to any goods, wares, merchandize or other things being in or on board of any other ship or vessel;" and congress rejected this sentence altogether, and employed general expressions, almost identical with the previous English statute, which related solely to the liability of ship-owners as carriers. It is inconceivable that if this liability for injury to another ship or vessel, or to goods on board of another vessel, was intended to be embraced in the act, those clear and explicit terms employed in the English act should have been discarded. The rejection of those words cannot be otherwise accounted for, except it be upon a supposition dishonorable to the framers of the law, and which the court cannot for a moment indulge, namely, that there was a covert design to employ words which might have a similar operation, and their meaning be so concealed that the bill might be passed by congress in ignorance of the design. The words, "loss, damage or injury by collision," and the general words that follow, have, therefore, by just construction, the same meaning and effect as they would if the word "thereto" had been used in connection therewith, namely, "for any loss, damage or injury thereto by collision," &c.

Again, if I am right, or if Mr. Justice Grier and the supreme court of Massachusetts are right, in holding that the fourth section of the act applies only to freighters and owners of goods and property on board of the ship, and, therefore, applies only to the relation of the ship-owners to those whose goods and property they assume to carry, it seems to me inevitable that the whole act, the third section included, applies only to the same relation, and for this reason: Congress was in the act of limiting the responsibility of ship-owners, and, by the third section, had declared that limitation for all the cases to which it should apply. They fixed its extent, namely, "the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners respectively in such ship or vessel and her freight then pending." To provide for carrying this limitation into effect, and to make it operate equitably among all parties suffering losses within the act, they declare, first, that each shall receive in proportion to his loss, and that proceedings for apportioning the amount may be taken by either party. It is not possible that it was intended to include in the limitation of the amount to be recovered, owners of another vessel injured by a collision, and yet exclude them from the benefit of the apportionment provided in the fourth section. Again, the fourth section provides, that the ship-owners may transfer their interest in the ship and freight to a trustee, and that, after such transfer, all claims and proceedings against such owners shall cease. How, then, shall the limitation be made to operate in their favor as against the owners of another ship, (if they are included in the third section), when such owners are not to become beneficiaries under the trust created pursuant to the fourth section? A construction which makes the third section apply to an injury done to another vessel, or the goods on board of another vessel, by a collision, cannot stand with the fourth section so construed, or with any view of justice or equity, or in any consistency with the principle of the act itself, namely, the limitation of the ship-owner's liability to the amount of his interest.

I have not been unmindful that dicta are found in some cases cited by counsel, which assume that the statute in question does include a case of injury to another vessel by a collision therewith. But in none was that the point in judgment, or, if incidentally involved, was the question raised or discussed. Those dicta are chiefly in the words of the statute itself, and in truth furnish no aid to its true construction, nor do they decide the question I have considered.

Without protracting the discussion, already too prolix, I am constrained to say, that the act of congress relied upon by the counsel for the respondents has no application to the injury received by the libellants in this case, and, therefore, that the proofs proposed to be given were wholly irrelevant, and could have no influence upon the decree which it was the duty of the district court to make.

3. The conclusion which I have reached leads to an affirmance of the decree, though upon different grounds from those which led the district court to reject the evidence offered. It is, therefore, not necessary that I should express an opinion upon the question whether this court, as a court of admiralty, has powers or jurisdiction adequate to give full effect to the act of congress referred to.

If congress had declared that the respondents should not be liable for losses sustained by the collision except to the amount of their interest in the vessel in fault and her freight then pending, no court, whether of admiralty or law or equity, could properly make a decree which in terms would subject them to a larger liability and thereby practically nullify the statute. Under the similar English statute, even the courts of law have regarded this limitation as prescribing the rule or measure of damages in actions on the case when the liability to a single plaintiff was before the court, though no such case is cited where losses were sustained by other parties which were sought to be brought into the computation. Canman v. Meaburn, 1 Bing. 465; Wilson v. Dickson, 2 Barn. & Ald. 2; Brown v. Wilkinson, 15 Mees. & W. 391. It cannot be doubted that, in a case to which the statute applies, if several libels are filed in the court of admiralty by different claimants for losses sustained, or one bill is filed on behalf of several such claimants, that court has ample power to give full effect to the statute as against such libellants, so far at least as to refuse a decree which shall subject the respondents to a larger liability to all those libellants than the act of congress declares. The Richmond, 3 Hagg. Adm. 431; The Benares, 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 637; The Dundee, 1 Hagg. Adm. 109; Gale v. Laurie, 5 Barn. & C. 156. In England, in Dobree v. Schroder, 2 Mylne & C. 489, and 6 Sim. 291, after two separate actions at law had been separately prosecuted to verdicts, the court of chancery entertained a bill for the apportionment of the value of the vessel, &c., between the two plaintiffs and the limitation of the owners' responsibility to that value.

A resort to a court of equity may be necessary under this act of congress, to make such an apportionment, if the party seeking it desires to bring into view losses sustained by all; and yet a libellant in admiralty would have no ground of complaint, if, having chosen to go into that court, the respondent were permitted to prove any facts, which as matter of law, operated to reduce the amount of the recovery. As between him and the respondent, such proof might furnish a measure of the amount to which he was entitled, and an assessment made in conformity therewith might be conclusive between the parties, although no third person would be affected thereby. If, in this view, the statute could be held to warrant the application of the statute in each case and between any parties, it might not concern a particular libellant to have other parties before the court, provided he were himself willing to take the hazard of such proofs as the respondent might give of the aggregate amount of the losses, and the same might be true of the respondent, if he should prefer to try the question as to each claimant.

It must, of course, be conceded, that, whatever rights a party may have, and whether given by statute or otherwise, they are to be asserted in due and proper form and before the proper tribunal. But it cannot, I think, be true, that a defendant must be made to bear a liability to which a valid statute declares he shall not be subject, upon any idea that there is no court which can administer the statute. It were better to say—if there is no court which can give a judgment or decree in favor of the claimant without violating the statute, then no decree or judgment can be rendered. And, if it were clear, by reason of the number of claimants who have sustained losses and their residence in various states, that there is no tribunal which can obtain jurisdiction of all, it would be plausible, at least, to say, that the court is compelled to proceed with the parties of whom they have jurisdiction, and render justice as between them, upon all the proofs either may offer bearing on the liability according to the limitation which the statute has declared:

The decree must be affirmed.

[The decree of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 104. For other cases growing out of the same collision, and involving some of the same questions, see Cases Nos. 11,202 and 2,760-2,762.]

WRIGHT v. ORIENT MUT. INS. CO. See Case No. 18,095.

Case No. 18,088.

WRIGHT et al. v. OWNERS OF THE FRANCESCA CURRO.

[5 Wkly. Notes Cas. 104.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Dec. 21, 1877.

SHIPPING—SIMULTANEOUS CHARTERS FOR SUCCESSIVE VOYAGES—BREACH OF FIRST—EFFECT ON SECOND.

[A vessel was, by separate charter parties, chartered to the same parties for two successive voyages. On arrival for the first voyage, the charterers refused to accept her, claiming that she had not sailed as agreed. She was thereupon let to them for the same voyage, for a less rate; and suit was brought by her owners for the difference, and a decree was obtained by them, which was paid. Held, that this breach, by the charterers, of the first charter party, did not release the ship from the second charter party, and she was bound to make the second voyage on the terms agreed.]

In admiralty. Libel for breach of charter party. The libellants had chartered the bark Francesca Curro, then at Genoa, to sail from Philadelphia to a port in Great Britain, it being expressly stipulated that she should sail from Genoa (for Philadelphia) during the month of December, 1876. Upon her arrival here in February, 1877, the libellants refused to receive her under the charter, alleging that she had not sailed during December. Freight having fallen, they re-chartered her for the same voyage on exactly the same terms, except at a lower rate of freight, and an action brought to recover the difference was decided by this court in favor of the vessel. [Case No. 5,029.] The decree was paid by the present libellants, and the voyage performed under the re-charter. Upon the same day that the original charter had been made, a second one was also made, of the same vessel, by the same parties. This charter was headed "Second Voyage," and in the margin were written the following words: "It is agreed and understood that the vessel, being already chartered for a previous voyage, has after completion of same to return to Delaware break-water for orders, without delay, and in ballast, to enter upon this charter." After the completion of the voyage under the re-charter, the vessel returned to Delaware break-water, and the master telegraphed his arrival to his agents in Philadelphia, who notified the libellants, and asked for orders. The libellants thereupon ordered the master to Philadelphia, and he came and laid up at a dock. The libellants then ordered the vessel to Girard Point for loading, but the master refused to go, alleging that the libellants, having broken the first charter, were not entitled to the benefits of the second. Freights having advanced, this action was brought upon the second charter to recover the difference.

Henry Galbraith Ward, for libellants.

The contracts made in this case were to be performed or paid for. The dependence of the second on the first was merely to secure two consecutive voyages, which could only be secured by referring in the second charter to the first. The first voyage was really performed, though not under the original charter, and the respondents were bound, therefore, to perform the second; there being nothing but the rise in freights to prevent it. Only so far as the conduct of one party prevented the performance of the contract will the other be excused. Dubois v. Canal Co., 4 Wend. 285. In this case the conduct of the libellants did not prevent performance, and the ship reported to the libellants on her return from the first voyage for orders. In the first suit the ship complained only of the breach of the first charter, damages were only awarded for that, and those damages have been paid.

Henry Flanders, for respondents.

The contract was, in substance, a single one, providing for two voyages. The first was never performed, through the acts of libellants; therefore the second was impossible of performance.

THE COURT dismissed the libel, with costs.

WRIGHT (PAGE v.). See Case No. 10,669.

WRIGHT (PAINE v.). See Case No. 10,676.

Case No. 18,089.

WRIGHT v. PENNSYLVANIA R. CO.

[This is a state case, reported in 3 Pittsb. R. 116, and 16 Pittsb. Leg. J. 144.]

WRIGHT (POTTER v.). See Case No. 11,343.

WRIGHT (RICKETSON v.). See Case No. 11,805.

Case No. 18,090.

WRIGHT v. ROGERS.

[3 McLean, 229.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1843.

BANKRUPT AS WITNESS—COMPETENCY—SET OFF.

1. A set off must be in the same right.
2. A witness may be competent to prove some facts, and incompetent to prove others.
3. The bankrupt is a competent witness where his assignee is a party, as he can have no legal interest in the decision of the case.

Mr. Wright, for plaintiff.

Mr. Jones, for defendant.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This action is brought by an assignee in bankruptcy, to recover a sum admitted to be due. Foster & Brothers having been once in business, and the defendant having an account against them exceeding one hundred dollars, the defendant offered to prove it, as a set off. But the court held that it could not be so received, as it was not a debt in the same right. That it might be received if Foster the plaintiff had expressly assumed to pay it; but no such evidence being offered, the account was rejected. Charles Foster, a brother of the bankrupt, who formerly was a partner in the house of Foster & Brothers, was offered as a witness. He was objected to, on the ground of interest. The court held that he was a competent witness generally; that he would not be permitted to speak of facts, in which his own interests were involved. William R. Foster, the bankrupt, was admitted as a witness, though objected to. He has no interest in this suit, as his liability can neither be increased nor lessened by any decision in the case.

The jury found for the plaintiff. Judgment.

Case No. 18,091.

WRIGHT v. SCHROEDER.

[2 Curt. 548.]²

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1855.

ACTION FOR SLANDER—EVIDENCE OF PLAINTIFF'S CHARACTER.

1. In an action of slander, the plaintiff cannot offer evidence of his general good character, to disprove the truth of the words, nor to support his own character, until it is attacked by the defendant. The defendant may attack the general character of the plaintiff in respect to the subject-matter of the charge, in order to reduce the damages.

[Cited in Press Pub. Co. v. McDonald, 11 C. C. A. 160, 63 Fed. 243.]

[Cited in Clark v. Brown, 116 Mass. 509.]

2. Where the nature of the charge is such, that the evidence given by the defendant, in support of the plea of justification, though insufficient to prove that, has, if believed in part or in whole, a legitimate tendency to affect the general character of the plaintiff, on the subject of the charge, he may reply by evidence of general good character in that particular.

This was an action on the case for slanderous words spoken of the plaintiff [John Wright] in his trade as a master calico-printer and manager of print works. It was alleged in the declaration, that the plaintiff, being a master calico-printer and manager of print works, and having ever sustained a good reputation in that trade; and never having been guilty or suspected to be guilty of the vice of drunkenness, and having earned and received large compensation in his said trade, was employed by the defendant [Theodore Schroeder] as the manager of his print works; and while so employed, the defendant, speaking of him in reference to his said employment, said, "he has been drunk on the works often, and he was drunk on the day of the reference"—innuendo, that the plaintiff had been often drunk while engaged in his occupation of manager of the defendant's print works, and particularly on the day when a certain arbitration was had, &c. The defendant justified, by a plea of the truth of the words alleged.

At the trial, the defendant gave evidence tending to show, that the plaintiff had been intoxicated on many different days, while at the print works; and he offered evidence to prove, that he kept and drank ardent spirits at his lodgings and elsewhere, and also of the effects produced on him by so doing at his boarding-house and other places off the works. This last species of evidence was admitted by the court as tending to prove the charge, circumstantially.

In reply, the plaintiff offered evidence of his good general reputation for temperate habits, prior to and at the time when the words complained of were spoken. This was objected to by the defendant, but admitted by the district judge, who presided at the trial, not as bearing on the question of the truth of the words, but as having some legitimate tendency to affect the damages. The jury having found for the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a new trial, assigning as cause, the admission of this evidence of general reputation.

Jenckes & Cozzens, for the motion.

Hazard & Blake, contra.

Before CURTIS, Circuit Justice, and PITMAN, District Judge.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. Many apparently conflicting decisions have been made, concerning the admissibility of evidence of general reputation in actions like this. Generally, they can be reconciled with each other and with what I conceive to be the true rules on the subject, by attending to the party by whom, and the purpose for which, the evidence was offered. Though, undoubtedly, some conflict will still remain.

¹ [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

² [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

1. In my opinion, this species of evidence is not admissible, when offered by the plaintiff in answer to evidence of the defendant tending to prove the truth of the words. It has not a legitimate tendency to disprove the truth of the charge made by the defendant. Matthews v. Huntley, 9 N. H. 146, and the cases there cited.

2. The defendant may offer such evidence to reduce the damages; because the degree of injury sustained by the plaintiff, depends upon the reputation, in respect to the matter of the charge, which he possessed, at the time the words complained of were spoken. If that was generally bad, he was not injured by the slander to the same extent as he would have been if it had been good. It is proper therefore for the jury, to take into consideration the general reputation of the plaintiff, upon the point of the charge; and if so, it is proper for them to be informed concerning that general reputation by evidence. In Stone v. Varney, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 86, many of the cases are reviewed, and a result, satisfactory to my mind, arrived at. The American cases are collected in 1 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 198.

3. At first view, it might seem to follow, that this would warrant the introduction by the plaintiff of evidence of his previous good character in chief, before any attack on his character; and so are some of the authorities. See 1 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 207; 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 275, 424. But I think the better rule is, that the plaintiff must rest on the presumption of good character, which the law makes, until evidence touching it is offered by the defendant. See the cases collected in 1 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 208, and cited by Dewey, J., in 7 Metc. (Mass.) 86.

4. The remaining inquiry, upon which the decision of this motion depends is, whether the general good character of the plaintiff for temperance had been so attacked by the defendant, that he was properly allowed to support it, by evidence that before and at the time of the speaking of the words complained of, his general reputation for temperance was good. The charge was, that the plaintiff had been drunk on the works often, and that he was drunk on the day of the reference. In support of this charge, the defendant had been allowed to offer evidence, tending to prove the intoxication of the plaintiff on many days at the print works, and while engaged in his trade as their manager; that is, while on the works. And also, that before coming to and after leaving the works, on many different days, he was intoxicated. And also, that he kept at his boarding-house ardent spirits of different kinds. And the instances spoken of by the witnesses, occurred during a period of about four months, before the words were spoken.

Now, it is apparent, the jury might come to the conclusion, that though the defendant had failed to prove that the plaintiff had been often intoxicated on the works, and so some damages must be found for the plaintiff, yet enough had been proved to satisfy them that the plaintiff's reputation, as a manager of print works, could not be good, and so, that the degree of injury inflicted on the plaintiff being small, he should be compensated by small damages. Upon this state of the evidence, I think counsel would have been warranted in so arguing to the jury.

This was a peculiar case. Ordinarily, if the evidence given in support of the plea of justification fails to prove that, it fails to prove any thing material. But here it was otherwise. And my opinion is, that though no direct evidence of general bad character be offered by the defendant, if the proof he does offer may be insufficient, in the opinion of the jury, to sustain the charge, and still have a legitimate tendency to prove the general character of the plaintiff bad in the particular in question, and so to reduce the damages, the plaintiff may encounter it by proof of good general character in that particular. It may sometimes be difficult to draw the line of distinction, and say on which side of it, a particular case falls; but the same difficulty may exist in any case, where the judge is required to determine, whether there is any evidence having a legitimate tendency to prove a matter in issue. Yet this is always a question of law. Greenleaf v. Birth, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 292; Bank of U. S. v. Corcoran, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 121.

Where evidence has been given, either on cross-examination or otherwise, which tends to impeach the general character of a witness for truth, it is allowable to support his credibility by evidence of general good character, though no witness has been called to speak to his general bad character. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 469; 3 Starkie, Ev. 1757; 4 Phil. Ev. 763 (Cow. & Hill's note). A proper qualification is made in Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. 154, that the evidence, on the cross-examination, must not only tend to affect the credibility of the witness in the particular case, but must touch his general character. And so in actions of slander, the evidence given by the defendant must have a legitimate tendency to affect the general character of the plaintiff, in reference to the subject-matter of the charge for which damages are demanded.

The district judge, who presided at the trial, concurs in this opinion. The motion for a new trial is overruled.

Case No. 18,092.

WRIGHT v. SCOTT (two cases).

[4 Wash. C. C. 16.]¹Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. April Term, 1820.CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—ESTATE TAIL—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

1. P. F. being seised of 1705 acres of land, devised the same as follows: "Unto my well beloved and only daughter, E. F. alias W. and her husband J. W. all the remaining part of my estate, not sold in my life time, both real and personal, to them, their heirs begotten of their bodies, or assigns, for ever; or for want of such heirs or assigns, then to the heirs begotten by, or either of them, and to their assigns for ever; all which estate is given as a portion to my dear and only daughter aforementioned." The will clearly intended to give, and does give to J. W. and wife, an estate tail; and in the event of their death without issue, then it was given to the heirs of the body of the survivor.

2. Construction of the act of limitations of New Jersey, passed in 1799 (section 10).

[Cited in Croxall v. Sherrerd, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 268.]

[3. Cited in Pritchard v. Spencer, 2 Ind. 486, to the point that the legislature may enact retrospective limitation laws, where they do not deprive parties of a reasonable time for prosecuting their claims before being barred.]

These causes came before the court upon the following case agreed. Peter Fretwell, being in his life time and at the time of his death, seised of a tract of land containing 1705 acres, including the premises in question, by his last will bearing date in January, 1718, devised the same as follows: "Unto my well beloved and only daughter Elizabeth Fretwell, alias Wright, and to her husband Jonathan Wright, all the remaining part of my estate, not sold in my life time, both real and personal, to them, their heirs begotten of their bodies, or assigns for ever, or for want of such heirs or assigns, then to the heirs begotten by, or of either of them, and to their assigns for ever; all which estate is given as a portion to my dear and only daughter aforementioned." After the testator's death, Wright and his wife entered upon, and were possessed of the premises so devised. They had issue, Fretwell, their eldest son, besides other children; and on the 31st of August, 1742, the said Jonathan Wright, who survived his wife, died. Fretwell Wright had several children, lawful issue, some of whom survived him; but his eldest son, Peter, died in the life time of his father, having several children, of whom Fretwell, lessor of the plaintiff, was his eldest. Fretwell, the father, died on the 29th of December, 1797. On the 5th of August, 1721, Jonathan Wright, and Elizabeth his wife, being seised and possessed, as abovementioned, of the aforesaid 1705 acres of land, conveyed the same to

Joseph Reckless in fee simple, by a deed of bargain and sale; and on the 19th of the same month and year, Reckless, by a like deed, conveyed the same land to the said Jonathan Wright in fee simple. Jonathan Wright being seised of the above estate, by deed of bargain and sale dated the 6th of May, 1741, conveyed 225 acres, part thereof, to Henry Scott, who entered on, and retained possession of the same to the time of his death. Jonathan Wright, by his will, dated the 11th of August, 1742, devised 700 acres, other part of the aforesaid 1705 acres, to his two sons Jonathan and Ebenezer in fee, as tenants in common. After his death, his said sons, the said devisees, entered upon the said 700 acres of land; made partition of the same between them, and afterwards, the said Jonathan the second, by deed of bargain and sale, bearing date the 2d of February, 1754, conveyed to the aforesaid Henry Scott, in fee simple, 125 acres of the said 700 acres, so held by him in severalty, other part of the premises in dispute in this case; and in the other ejectment against Abraham Scott, now also for judgment. On the 29th of August, 1743, the said Fretwell Wright, eldest son of the aforesaid Jonathan Wright, executed an instrument under his hand and seal, reciting that his father, in his life time, and his executors since his death, by virtue of his will, had sold lands which he had derived under the will of Peter Fretwell, for confirming the title of all such purchasers, as well as of the devisees claiming under the will of his said father, and for divers good causes and considerations, he releases unto all and every such purchaser and purchasers, and to his brothers and sisters claiming as devisees aforesaid, and to their heirs respectively, all such right, title, interest and estate, as he the said Fretwell had, or ought to have in and to the said premises so sold and conveyed. This deed was afterwards acknowledged and duly recorded.

Henry Scott being seised at the time of his death, as well as from the times when the two deeds aforesaid were made to him, of the lands therein mentioned, made his will, dated the 17th of November, 1773, whereby he devised the said lands to his two sons, Jonathan and Abraham, (defendants in these actions) in fee, equally to be divided; and died on or before the 26th of November, 1773. Abraham and Jonathan Scott entered upon the land after the death of their father, made partition of the same, and have continued to hold possession of their respective parts ever since. Fretwell, the son of Jonathan Wright the elder, was twenty-nine years of age at the death of his father, and resided in this state till his own death. He died intestate, leaving issue six children, besides Fretwell Wright his grandson, then aged twenty-one years, the lessor of the plaintiff, who was the son of Peter F. Wright, the eldest son of the said Fretwell Wright the intestate, who died in his father's life time. This ejectment was commenced on the 26th of September, 1816. It is then agreed that if the opinion of the court upon the above case, should be in favour of the lessor of the plaintiff, judgment to be entered for him; if in favour of the defendant, judgment to be entered as in case of non-suit, &c.

¹ [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The counsel for the lessor of the plaintiff, made the following points: (1) That by the will of Peter Fretwell, an estate tail passed to Jonathan Wright and Elizabeth his wife. (2) That that estate was not afterwards barred by the operation of the acts of New Jersey, passed in the years 1784 and 1786.² Patt. Laws, 54, 78. The conveyances stated in the case, passed only an estate for life. The release of Fretwell Wright was void for want of parties. (3) That the lessor of the plaintiff is not barred by the act of limitations.

1. In support of the first point, were cited Cowp. 410, 234; 3 Leon. 5; Plow. 541; 2 Ld. Raym. 1146; Cowp. 841; 5 Term R. 337.

2. To prove that the estate tail was not discontinued, was cited Co. Litt. § 613. And it was contended that the case was not within the operation of the acts referred to; as the tenant in tail was not in possession of the premises in dispute, at the time those acts passed.

3. The act of assembly passed in 1799

² The act of 1784 enacts: "That all land or other real estate which hath heretofore been devised in tail of any kind, and hath, agreeably to such devise or intail, passed through one descent since the death of the testator, and is now in the second, or more remote descent from the testator; all such land or other real estate shall be deemed, taken, and adjudged to be the proper estate in fee simple of the present possessor, provided the testator under whom the same is held, had an absolute estate in the same; and also provided the person in possession holdeth the same in the line of descent mentioned and directed in and by such devise in tail; and all devisees heretofore made in tail as aforesaid, which have not already passed through one descent since the death of the testator; and also all such devisees which shall hereafter be made in tail of any kind, shall be deemed, taken and adjudged to vest in, and entitle the person to whom the same may be descended, agreeably to the devise or intailment, after the decease of the first devisee, to all the estate in the devised premises, which the testator was entitled to, and might or could have devised; and that no intailment of lands, or other real estate shall continue to intail the same in any case whatever, longer than the life of the person to whom the same hath been, or shall be first given or devised by such intailments."

Supplement to the above act was passed in 1786. It enacts: "That the words 'passed through one descent since the death of the testator, and is now in the second or more remote descent from the testator,' contained in the second section of the above recited act, shall be deemed and construed to mean 'been possessed by the first devisee in tail, and is now the property of the next devisee in tail, after the decease of the first devisee, in the line mentioned in the devise in tail under which they may claim;' and that the words 'the line of descent' contained in the above section shall be construed to mean 'the line of intailment;' any matter or clause in the said recited act bearing a different construction, to the contrary notwithstanding."

(Patt. Laws, 353, § 10) gives twenty years from the time the title accrued to bring the ejectment in. The title of the lessor of the plaintiff did not accrue till the death of Fretwell Wright in 1797, and this action was brought in 1816. If the release of Fretwell was good to bar his right, then he could not bring an ejectment in his life time. But it could not affect the estate of his issue, whose right accrued after the death of the tenant in tail. The act of limitations did not begin to run against Fretwell Wright himself, because the possession of Scott was not adverse to his title, as he claimed under this release; and even if the time did begin to run against the said Fretwell, still it did not run on against his issue; but stopped at his death, and a new series commenced in relation to the issue.

The counsel for the defendant insisted as to the first point, that Jonathan & Eliza Wright took a fee simple estate under the devise to them, not only by virtue of the words "or assigns forever," but from other parts of the will in which the testator declares his intention to dispose of all his estate, which, together with other expressions scattered through the will, show that it was his intention to give a fee to his daughter and her husband. There is, besides, a clause in the will, which directs his debts to be paid, thus creating a charge on his real estate, which has always been considered as sufficient to enlarge the estate into a fee. [Williamson v. Kincaid], 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 21; 1 Term R. 411; 2 Term R. 356, 656, 762; 3 Wils. 298, 302; Ibbetson v. Beckwith, Cas. t. Talb. 157; Cowp. 355; 1 Wils. 333; 3 Burrows, 16, 18; Lofft, 96; 4 East, 495; 5 East, 87; Willes, 140; 1 Burrows, 38; 2 Burrows, 770, 1112; 1 Wash. (Va.) 102. The words "all which estate is given to my daughter as a portion," are sufficient to pass a fee.

Second. To prove that if this be an estate tail, it was discontinued, and the remedy by ejectment was taken away, were cited Co. Litt. 325a; Patt. Laws, 6. A bargain and sale operates like a feoffment, to work a discontinuance. 2 South. [5 N. J. Law] 713; Salk. 619; 3 Burrows, 1703; 1 Atk. 3; Runn. 10, 11; 3 Bl. Comm. 206; Patt. Laws, 135. To show that the former one still continues, Co. Litt. 355; 3 Bl. Comm. 171. The estate tail, if it be one, was barred by the acts of assembly of 1784 and 1786. 2 South. [5 N. J. Law] 713.

Third. The act of limitations began to run against Fretwell Wright in 1742, on the death of Jonathan; and run on after his death against the issue, so that more than sixty years were out before this action was brought; and a possession for that length of time, or even for thirty years, under the circumstances stated in the second section of the act of 1787 (Patt. Laws, 81), all which exist in this case, not only bars the estate of him who has title, but vests an absolute estate in the possessor. 1 Cruise, Fines, 255;

2 Cruise, Fines, 563; Sugd. 267; Shep. Touch. 21, 27, 29, 31; 6 Mass. 328; Wheat. Dig. 233. To prove the release a valid deed, 2 Com. Dig. 170; Co. Litt. 3.

Ewing & Wall, for lessor of plaintiff.

Griffith & L. H. Stockton, for defendant.

