PREFACE.

This volume, the last of the Federal Cases, concludes the regular series of Reports, and contains besides certain ADDITIONAL CASES, comprising charges to the Federal grand juries, rulings of a general nature concerning costs and fees, and a number of miscellaneous opinions from the appendices of the United States Circuit and District Court Reports, including the opinion of John Sergeant, Esq., of the Philadelphia bar, as arbitrator in the Pea Patch Island case (Case No. 18,311), a controversy between the states of Delaware and New Jersey concerning jurisdiction over the Pea Patch Island in the Delaware river. There are also included several cases received too late for alphabetical classification, territorial decisions from Hempstead, and certain cases from Hayward & Hazleton's Reports necessary to complete the representation of those volumes in the Federal Cases. Although necessarily arranged in a separate alphabetical order, these additional cases are numbered consecutively with those in the main series.

It was a part of the original design of the publishers to include in the Federal Cases all the miscellaneous matter contained in the original Circuit and District Court Reports, as well as all the cases, so that the series might absolutely supersede those Reports by giving all their contents in the most convenient form for reference. Most of this material is given in this volume in the form of an APPENDIX.

The Appendix contains the old Maritime Laws of Oleron, the Laws of Wisbuy, the Laws of the Hanse Towns, and the Marine Ordinances of Louis XIV. so frequently referred to by courts of admiralty, and a table of land claims and other miscellaneous matters from Hoffman's Land Cases; also bibliographical notes concerning the United States Circuit and District Court Reports, reprinting in each case the Prefaces to the respective volumes.

The Appendix also contains all of the resolutions and other proceedings upon the decease or retirement of the Federal judges found in the old Reports, and brief biographical notes of all of the Federal judges appointed prior to January 25, 1894, setting forth in each case the principal facts of the judicial or public life of the judge, and the more important dates, when they could be obtained. In this connection it should be remembered that no authentic record of the Federal judges had been published prior to the publication of the chronological lists contained in the first volume of the Federal Cases. The data upon which these lists and also the biographical notes are based were obtained by an exhaustive examination of all published works accessible in the larger libraries, including general histories, histories of states, of counties, and of smaller communities, biographical and other encyclopedias, and publications devoted exclusively to Genealogy. The information thus secured was duly compiled and submitted in proof form to the judges and also the clerks of the various courts for correction. Special efforts were made in every instance to secure additional information by correspondence, and to verify and correct the information already obtained. An extensive correspondence was carried on for a period of nearly two years with all persons presumed or known to be interested in such matters. In this way many living representatives of judges long since deceased were found, and from them the information was secured for the biographical notes.

This Appendix, together with the miscellaneous matter in the first book of the Federal Cases, contains a great quantity of valuable matter of literary and biographical character, pertinent to this Series, as follows:

IN BOOK ONE:

1. A chronological table showing the constitution of the several circuits.
2. A list of the Federal judges, arranged chronologically by circuits and districts.
3. A list of the Federal judges arranged alphabetically.
4. A table of Reports by circuits and districts.
5. A list of Reports, periodicals, digests, text-books, etc., examined for reports and citations of the Federal Cases.

IN BOOK THIRTY:

6. Laws of Oleron, of Wisbuy, of the Hanse Towns, the Marine Ordinances of Louis XIV., a table of land claims, etc.
7. Bibliographical, biographical, and miscellaneous matter reprinted from the Circuit and District Court Reports.
8. Biographical notes of all the Federal judges appointed prior to January 25, 1894.

With the publication of the Index Digest of the Federal Cases, now in preparation, we shall have completed the undertaking begun many years ago, of making available for the use of the bench and bar of the country the great mass of decisions written by the able jurists who have since the foundation of our government given the Circuit and District Courts of the United States such high rank among the judicial tribunals of the world. How great has been the labor involved can be only partially shown by the results. But the comments of subscribers have given gratifying evidence that the work has been amply appreciated; and the editors and publishers are satisfied with the numerous assurances that they have performed a useful office in rescuing from partial oblivion, and putting into general use, a great number of valuable authorities which can now be cited and quoted to advantage by general practitioners as well as lawyers specially concerned with questions of law and practice arising in the United States Courts.

FEDERAL CASES.

BOOK 30.

A COMPREHENSIVE COLLECTION OF DECISIONS OF THE CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE BEGINNING OF THE FEDERAL REPORTER, (1880,) ARRANGED ALPHABETICALLY BY THE TITLES OF THE CASES.

N. B. Cases reported in this series are always cited herein by their numbers. The original citations can be found when desired through the table of cases.

Case No. 17,747.

WILLIAMSBURG FERRY CO. v. The CHELSEA.

[29 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 74.]

District Court, D. Connecticut. 1853.

COLLISION—VESSEL AT DOCK—TUG AND TOW.

[A ferryboat was lying at a bulkhead on the Williamsburg side of the East river, protected by the long south pier, and undergoing repairs. On the outside of her lay a float upon which workmen were standing. The steamer C., in an eddy outside of the current near the navy yard, took in tow a schooner lashed to her starboard side, and started down the river against a strong flood tide. When she struck the tide, not being under strong headway, the current turned her head up the river; and, to bring her back to her course, her wheel and that of the schooner were put hard a starboard. But the tide was too strong, and was rapidly carrying them upon the pier above the ferryboat, to prevent which the C. ported her helm to wear round and pass the pier on her port side; but, in attempting this maneuver, the two vessels were carried directly upon the ferryboat, causing the damage complained of. Held, that the C. was in fault for starting out with her tow in the condition of the tide, and also for want of prudent and skillful navigation thereafter.]

[This was a libel in admiralty by the Williamsburg Ferry Company against the steamboat Chelsea to recover damages resulting from a collision.]

JUDSON, District Judge. The libellants are an incorporated company, under an act of the general assembly of the state of New York, and their steam ferryboats ply between Williamsburgh and Peckslip, New York; they were the owners of the steam ferryboat Oneota, which, on the 20th June, 1851, was made fast to the bulkhead, on the Williamsburgh side of the East river, at or near the foot of South Eighth street, in the village of Williamsburgh, undergoing necessary and needful repairs; that directly above the Oneota she was protected by the long South pier which guards the Jackson street ferryboats as they enter their dock on the Williamsburgh side of the river; on the outer side of the Oneota lay a float or stage, made fast to the Oneota, upon which the men were standing while the repairs were being made; the pier immediately above the Oneota extends more than one hundred feet into the East river, at right angles with the bulkhead or wharf to which the Oneota was made fast; and, at the time of the collision, a plank ran from the pier to the stern of the Oneota, upon which the workmen passed and repassed while the repairs were going on. There was no controversy about the facts thus far. The answer of the respondents admits that they are the owners of the steamboat Chelsea, and, by way of defense, the answer alleges that, at the time of the supposed collision, the tide was running strong flood, and, from the formation of the docks, vessels bound up the East river would set in to where the Oneota lay. They alleged further, and made it a prominent part of the defense, that the Oneota was in an improper place, and that she had and detained alongside a stage or float, which could and should have been removed. It appears in evidence that, at twelve o'clock at noon, the steamboat Chelsea was at or near the navy yard, and in an eddy outside of the current of the river, where she took in tow the schooner Louisa of two hundred tons burthen, and making fast this tow upon the starboard side of the Chelsea, put on steam for pier No. 9, down East river at flood tide running up East river, that when the Chelsea with her tow struck the tide, she was heading on her proper course down East river, but not being on strong headway, the tide struck her, turning her head up East river, out of her proper course; and to bring her back, the wheels of the Chelsea and the Louisa were put hard a-starboard. The flood tide proved too strong, and was rapidly carrying the Chelsea and the Louisa upon the long pier above the Oneota; and to prevent this, and to save the Chelsea and Louisa from this disaster, the Chelsea ported her wheel to wear round, and pass the pier upon her larboard side. But the scanty room and the strong tide, operating together, the Chelsea with her tow, were taken directly upon the Oneota, and her float produced the damage set forth in the libel. Substantially these are the facts, and the case is to be decided by the law arising on these facts. It is a controversy regarding the law, rather than a controversy as to the facts of the case. Then, according to the rules of law, where is the fault? The only fact about which there can be said to be any serious dispute, is as to the position of the Oneota at the time of the collision. The answer alleges, as has already been stated, that her position was an improper one; but the weight of the evidence establishes beyond doubt that she was in a proper place, a usual place for steamboats to be made fast for repairs and for other purposes, and the court so finds the fact. The Oneota then was not in fault. The damage was incurred by the Chelsea, but whether she is responsible depends on another inquiry. Was the collision the result of inevitable accident, or the force of the tide, without any want of skill or mismanagement on the part of the master of the Chelsea? If so, then there can be no claim for damage in this case. This is the principal inquiry, and, in order to dispose of this question satisfactorily, it will be necessary to recur to the position of the Chelsea before she weighed her anchor, to the state of the tide and current, the knowledge of their power upon a vessel at its full strength, and then the manœuvring of the Chelsea up to the time of the collision.

The Chelsea was at anchor in the Wallabout Bay, with the schooner Louisa made fast upon her starboard side. She was destined with her tow down East river to pier No. 9. The master of the Chelsea was an experienced pilot, accustomed to pilotage on the East river, and must be presumed to know the course and power of the tides and currents in the immediate vicinity of his steamboat. And the court is not left in doubt as to this knowledge, because, in the answer, it is alleged, and sustained by the oath of the party, "that at the time the tide was running strong flood, and from the formation of the docks there, setting vessels bound up the river into where the Oneota lay." On this point the evidence stands uncontradicted; that the Chelsea left her moorings at about twelve o'clock at noon, at flood tide, with her heavy tow on her starboard side, and pushed into this strong flood tide running up the East river; and heading the Chelsea down the river, this strong flood tide struck her bows, and sheered her up the river in spite of her steam, and her helm hove hard to starboard. From the knowledge which every skillful pilot should possess of these influences, it must be deemed imprudent and unskillful in the master of the Chelsea to have left her moorings at that time, and in that state of the tide, particularly with so little headway on his boat. His boat thereupon became unmanageable. Sound judgment should have dictated a much safer course in waiting for a change of the tide, or of adopting the other alternative of getting up more steam and headway before throwing his boat into this strong flood tide. Then it is quite evident that the Louisa should have been taken in tow on the larboard side of the Chelsea, where the tide would have had much less power upon her, driving both out of their course. The next error committed by the Chelsea was in attempting to wear around by putting his wheel apart, after coming into the strong flood tide, setting his boat up the river. A much more safe and judicious movement should have been ordered by the master of the Chelsea, and that was, to have steered his boat up the river until she could have reached an easy point in the river, where he might have wore the ship to the larboard. Had this been adopted, the master would have sufficient headway on his boat to have regained his intended course in the direction of pier No. 9. But this was not done, and the master of the Chelsea ported his wheel to wear round to regain his intended course down the river. He assigns as a reason for this manœuvre, that he might have run foul of the end of the long pier, and injured, and perhaps sunk, his own boat. This was an insufficient reason; first, because by any proper skill, the Chelsea might have been carried up the river past the pier; and if his wheel had been kept hard a-starboard she would have gone clear, with very little loss of time; and second, the reason was insufficient, because no man has a right to destroy his neighbor's property in saving his own.

It is not only illegal, but immoral, to avoid an impending disaster, and throw it upon another. Suppose the Chelsea had, in that critical moment, yielded to this law of morality, and permitted herself to run foul of the pier, when, according to the convictions of her master, this was inevitable, what would have been the consequences? The Oneota would have been saved, and the Chelsea would have received the damage. It is believed that such a result might have been quite as consistent as to have shifted the misfortune from the wrongdoer to an innocent party. To save the Chelsea from this disaster, she is rounded to, by order of the master, for that avowed object, when the consequences of a collision with the Oneota were even to him certain. It would have been more magnanimous, and I think much more just, for the Chelsea to have taken the risk of running foul of the pier herself; but even that might have been avoided if the master, instead of rounding to, had kept up the river, and saved both. But there is still another error, too manifest to be passed over. The moment the Chelsea found herself unmanageable, with these difficulties in her way, she should have let go her anchor, and that of the schooner also, and remained until the tide should favor her escape from hazard to herself and danger to others. This was neither done nor attempted. But it is said on the defense, that these were only errors in judgment, and that by the laws of the sea, a master is not required absolutely to adopt such course as to avoid the danger, but will be justified in doing that which at the time he honestly believes will be best; and to sustain this position, the case of Crocket v. The Isaac Newton [18 How. (59 U. S.) 531] has been cited. The steambot Isaac Newton in that case was justified, because the master of the schooner pushed her out into the tide without any wind to fill her sails, so that being entirely helpless, through the unskillful and imprudent conduct of the master of the schooner, the collision took place. That case, in principle, is like the present, and so far from aiding the defense, sustains most fully the libel in this case. As in that, there was want of prudence and skill in the master when she left a place of safety at such a time of tide, and no wind to give his vessel steerage way, so in this there was want of prudence and skill in going into the tide at such a time. This was the first great error of the Chelsea, and as this was followed up by the subsequent errors, which, in my judgment, were palpable errors, she must be deemed in fault, and the decree must be for libelants with an order of reference.

Case No. 17,748.

WILLIAMS MOWER & REAPER CO. v.
RAYNOR.

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Aug., 1876.

CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS — REMOVED CASE — ENFORCING PREVIOUS DECREES OF STATE COURT — APPEAL.

1. Where, in an action in a state court, an order was made for the production of sworn copies of books and papers, which was disobeyed, and contempt proceedings instituted and an order made therein, and subsequently the cause was removed to the United States court, the latter court will recognize and enforce the order of the state court in the contempt proceedings as appertaining to the action removed.

2. But if an appeal from the order in the state court has been taken to the supreme court, the United States court will hold in abeyance proceedings for the enforcement of the order in question until the appeal is disposed of.

3. The fact that the contempt proceedings in the state court were not entitled in the cause removed, but in the name of the people of the state, will not prevent the United States court from reviewing the proceedings, if such proceedings were in reality in aid of the civil suit.

This action was commenced originally in the state court. On the 26th day of December, 1874, an order was entered in the action requiring the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff sworn copies of entries in certain books kept by the defendant, and of certain notes, contracts and other writings alleged to be in his possession, the purpose of which proceeding was to enable the plaintiff to prepare a complaint in the action. On appeal to the supreme court of this state, this order was affirmed. On the 6th day of January, 1876, the state court made an order that an attachment be issued against the defendant as for a contempt in not complying with the order of December 26, 1874, and pursuant thereto, an attachment was issued. Upon issue formed, an inquiry was instituted as to whether the defendant was guilty of the misconduct alleged; the result of which proceeding was that on the 12th of February, 1876, the defendant was adjudged guilty of contempt, in not obeying the aforesaid order of December 26, and he was ordered to forthwith deposit with the clerk of Milwaukee county court, where the action was then pending, the books mentioned in said previous order, and to pay to the Williams Mower and Reaper Company its costs in said proceedings, amounting to $110.80, and it was directed that he be committed to the jail of Milwaukee county, there to remain until the said costs should be fully paid and this order of February 12th should be fully complied with. These contempt proceedings were entitled, "The State of Wisconsin ex rel. The Williams Mower and Reaper Company v. Wm. C. Raynor." On the 23d day of February, 1876, and within thirty days from the entry of the last mentioned order, but subsequent to the filing of a petition by the plaintiff for the removal of the cause to this court, an appeal was taken from the order of February 12, to the supreme court of Wisconsin, an undertaking for stay of proceedings was at the same time filed pursuant to the state statute, and that appeal is now pending. On the fourth day of March, 1876, the state court, on application of the plaintiff in the action of the Williams Mower and Reaper Company v. Raynor, made an order removing that cause to the United States circuit court, and the entire record including that of the contempt proceedings, is now in this court.

H. M. Finch, for plaintiff.
Jas. G. Jenkins, for defendant.

DYER, District Judge. Application is now made for an order requiring the defendant Raynor to forthwith file with the clerk of this court all of the books, papers, notes and writings mentioned in the order of the state court dated February 12, and that he pay to the plaintiff the money mentioned therein, and in all things comply with that order, or in default thereof that he be punished as in said order provided.

This application is made under that provision of the statute of the United States, relating to the removal of causes into the courts of the United States, passed March 3, 1875, which declares that all injunctions, orders, and other proceedings had in a suit prior to its removal, shall remain in full force and effect until dissolved or modified by the court to which such suit shall be removed. 18 Stat. p. 471, § 4.

Resistance is made to the application upon the general ground that the proceedings which culminated in the order of February 12, adjudging the defendant guilty of contempt, were not proceedings in the action of the Williams Mower & Reaper Co. v. Wm. C. Raynor, but were in their character essentially independent of that action, and had for their object the vindication of the defied authority of the state court; that they were not taken in the civil action nor properly entitled in that action, but were proceedings in the name of the state, and were not transferred to this court with the removal of the main action.

I was strongly impressed with this reasoning upon the argument. Reflection upon it, however, has led me to doubt its correctness. While the proceeding in question, as argued, had as one object the punishment of the party for disobedience of a previous order of the court, it at the same time enforced a civil remedy in behalf of the plaintiff in the main action. Though it was a proceeding entitled in the name of the state on the relation of the plaintiff in that action, and was in a certain sense independent of the action as a proceeding involving punishment for an alleged neglect or violation of duty, it was also, I think, a step taken in the original action to secure the production of the books and papers in question for the benefit of the plaintiff. It was a special proceeding in the action, and its connection with the action does not, as it seems to me, rest wholly in the defiance of the authority of the court which was exercised in that particular action. It necessarily involved the enforcement of a civil remedy to which it had been adjudged the plaintiff was entitled in the action, and the protection of an alleged right of the plaintiff for the purpose of enabling him to proceed therein. The intimacy of connection between the main action and the special proceeding is so great, that I am not prepared to admit that, if the former were to be dismissed or discontinued, the latter would still stand for prosecution as an independent proceeding. The sole object of the proceeding was not to vindicate the defied authority of the court. The argument of counsel would be complete as addressed to a case of purely criminal contempt, where the sole object was to support and maintain such authority. There is a well recognized distinction between those proceedings for contempt which are merely in the nature of civil remedies for the benefit of the party injured and those aimed at conduct which tends directly to interrupt the proceedings and impair the authority of the court. Like the case of State v. Brophy, 38 Wis. 424, where the supreme court of this state discuss this subject, the proceeding resorted to in the present case had not for its primary object the vindication of the authority and dignity of the court, but was to enforce a civil remedy and to protect the alleged rights of a party in a civil action. It was for the benefit of the party injured, and so not to be confounded with a prosecution for a criminal contempt. The last mentioned proceeding would be "one intended to punish conduct which impairs the authority of the court, and impedes the due administration of justice, and the other is one calculated to indemnify a party for the loss or injury produced by the misconduct alleged." The order which this court is now asked to enforce, substantially repeated the previous order of the state court in its requirement that the defendant produce or deposit for examination by the plaintiff the books and papers in question. It also required the payment to the plaintiff of the costs of the special proceeding, and ordered the defendant committed until he should comply with these requirements.

From these views it follows that the order in question is one which under the statute of the United States, may be recognized and enforced by this court, as appertaining to the action removed. I however regard the appeal from that order taken by the defendant to the supreme court of this state and now pending in that court, as a fact that this court ought to regard in its action which is now invoked, and will hold in abeyance proceedings for the enforcement of the order in question, until that appeal is in some manner disposed of.

[This was a libel for salvage by Augustus Williamson against the brig Alphonso and cargo. The district court decreed in favor of libellant (case unreported), and claimant appeals.]

F. C. Loring, for claimant.
Dana & Parker, for libellant.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a cause of salvage. The material facts are as follows: On the 29th day of August, 1852, the schooner Fawn, whereof the libellant was chief mate, sailed from the harbor of St. Thomas, in the island of St. Thomas, bound for Turks Island, in company with the brig Alphonso, bound for Rum Key. The courses of the two vessels being the same, till their arrival off Turks Island, there was an understanding between their masters that they would keep company up to that point. The Alphonso was a brig, of about 240 tons burden, and had a master, two mates, five fore-most hands, a cook, and cabin-boy. The wife and infant child of the master, and a young servant girl, were on board as passengers. Her cargo consisted of salt, tamarinds, and specie to the amount of about $6,000; and the vessel and cargo were of the value of about $15,000. The second mate of the Alphonso, who was shipped at St. Thomas, was able to do duty when he came on board, but he was suffering under an affection of the eyes, which disabled him, so that he did no duty after the first day out. About six o'clock of the evening of Sunday, the day of sailing, the first officer of the Alphonso was taken sick. His disease was yellow fever; and during the residue of the passage, he was unable to leave the cabin, and, with some lucid intervals, was deranged in mind. The wife of the master was seized, about the same time, with the same disease, and either on Monday night, or Tuesday morning, the master also; so that, after he went below on Monday night, he does not appear to have been on deck. Some time during the morning of Tuesday, the master ordered the crew to set the colors, union down, as a signal of distress. About four o'clock, p. m., this signal, having been observed on board the schooner, she lay to, and waited for the brig; and when the latter came up, the master of the schooner went on board in his boat, found the master and first officer of the brig very sick with the fever, and was requested by the master of the brig to lie by, close to the brig, during the night. The master of the schooner declined to do this, considering it somewhat hazardous; but proposed to send his mate, the libellant, on board, and that both vessels should run into Turks Island, then about twenty-three miles distant. This was assented to; the master of the schooner returned to his vessel, told the libellant to go on board the Alphonso, and keep the light of the schooner in sight during the night; and gave him the course, distance, and bearings of the two vessels from Turks Island. The libellant made no objection, went on board, and took the command. During the night, both vessels lay to, probably because the land being low, and the navigation, in approaching Turks Island, somewhat dangerous, it was not prudent to run for the harbor in the night. The next morning, the vessels were in sight of each other; they made the land between seven and eight o'clock, a. m., and came to anchor in the harbor about one o'clock, p. m. The weather was fine and clear during the whole time. The master of the brig was taken on shore, and soon after died. The consul of the United States came on board, and took charge of the vessel; and the next day after her arrival, placed a person in command of her.

The libellant entered his action in behalf of himself, the owners, officers, and crew of the schooner; but the owners and master having disclaimed the suit, the libel was amended, so as to go for a salvage compensation to the libellant alone. The district court decreed five hundred and fifty dollars to the libellant; the claimants appealed, and assigned three reasons of appeal; upon which the cause has been argued here. The first is, that the libellant did not render a salvage service.

It is strongly urged, that both the peril and the service were too slight to bring the case within the technical definition of salvage. But I am not of this opinion. The relief of property from an impending peril of the sea, by the voluntary exertions of those who are under no legal obligation to render assistance, and the consequent ultimate safety of the property, constitute a case of salvage. It may be a case of more or less merit, according to the degree of peril in which the property was, and the danger and difficulty of relieving it. But these circumstances affect the degree of the service, not its nature. That such a peril of the sea was impending over the brig, I think appears. She was out of sight of land. Her master and both officers were disabled. A deadly, infectious, or contagious disease had seized two of them and a passenger. It does not appear that any one on board was able to navigate the vessel. There is no presumption that any one before the mast understood navigation, and there is some direct negative evidence that no one was a navigator. The master, judging upon the actual facts, ordered a signal of distress to be made. Under these circumstances, I cannot say that this vessel was not in distress, nor that the peril was so slight that a relief from it cannot rise to the dignity of a salvage service. It is true, she was but a short distance from a port. But the land was not in sight, and the proof shows that there were dangerous shoals in the neighborhood; and it does not appear that the crew, unassisted, knew the bearings of the land, or the course to be steered. It is urged, that the schooner was in company, and therefore there was no real peril. That does not show that the peril, arising from the condition of the officers and crew, was not real; but only that the means of relief from it, by others, who were under no legal obligation to render assistance, were at hand. But in considering the nature of such a service, we must look to the peril which impended, if assistance were not given; not to the ease or difficulty of giving it, or the certainty that it could be obtained from salvors.

It was not argued, that there was any such contract of consortship between the brig and the schooner, as would repel a claim for salvage, upon the ground of a mutual legal obligation to give assistance, if either should fall into distress. Nor is there any thing in the evidence upon which to rest such a position. There was an understanding that the vessels would sail in company, and they did so; but undoubtedly, this meant no more than that they would sail out of port at the same time, and keep along together so far as both should deem it best to do so, without any legal obligation upon the subject. Independent of some usage of the trade, or of some special circumstances, it may well be doubted whether masters have a right to go further than this; and there is no reason in this case to suppose that either intended to go further.

My opinion therefore is, that the schooner rendered to the brig technical salvage service, to be compensated as such. It is, however, but one service, rendered by the owners, officers, and crew of the schooner, in lying by, sending on board the brig to ascertain her distress, and putting on board the libellant, to navigate and command her; and through this assistance, bringing her safely into port. As against these claimants, it must be viewed as one enterprise, to be paid for by one sum of money; though inasmuch as only the libellant makes a claim, it is also necessary to ascertain, as against the claimants, what is his distributive share of the salvage compensation.

And this brings me to consider the second reason of appeal, which is, that the amount awarded to the libellant is excessive. I do not consider that the schooner was subjected to any appreciable danger, in rendering the salvage service. She lay by during the night; but I think she would have done so for her own safety, it being sworn that it is dangerous to approach Turks Island in the night. Certainly it does not appear, that her lying by was on account of the brig. In the morning, she sailed into her destined port, and the brig followed her. The master of the schooner carried one of the foremost hands from the brig to the schooner, so that the number of his crew was not diminished by the absence of the mate. In such a case, I consider the owners of the schooner not entitled to any large proportion of the salvage, though, from reasons of public policy, they cannot be altogether excluded therefrom. The master, who was the author of the enterprise, acted with promptness, discretion, and humanity. He went into the cabin among the sick, ascertained their condition and that of the brig, administered medicines, and exposed himself to some danger of infection. If he had chosen to make a claim, I do not perceive how I could have awarded to him less than to the mate, who, though longer on board the schooner, was acting under the responsibility of the master, and by his order. He does not appear to have been in the cabin at all, and consequently was exposed to but little actual danger, until after the salvage service was completed. But, on the other hand, the mate could not certainly know, when he went on board, how long it might prove necessary for him to remain, nor to what extent he would be exposed to the disease. It was suggested, that it did not appear, he knew the yellow fever was on board. It is not stated in terms by any witness. But I cannot suppose that the master of the schooner suffered him to go on board the brig in ignorance of the nature of the disease existing there, or that the boat's crew who brought the master back to the schooner, did not bring with them information of the cause of the distress of the brig, so that it became known to the mate. It is also urged, that he went by the order of the master, and not voluntarily. But the master had no power to compel him to go; and when a master orders either an officer or a man to perform a salvage service to another vessel, and he does it without objection, I think it must be taken, that he goes both by the order of the master and voluntarily. The order sanctions the act, and conveys the assent of the master and of the owners, whose agent he is; but it does not deprive the inferior officers, or the crew, of the merit of voluntary exertion. These are some of the considerations which have been relied on, as bearing on the quantum of compensation.

Considering the amount of the property at risk, which, though considerable, was not very large, the immediate proximity to the port, the presence of the schooner, which was bound to Turks Island, and lay by during the night, as I think, for her own safety; the state of the wind and weather, and the degree of danger to life, actual or reasonably to be apprehended, my opinion is, that the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars is a liberal salvage compensation for the actual service. Indeed, aside from the element of danger to life, I should view it as merely technical salvage compensation, and calling for slight compensation. That element is one of great importance; but under the circumstances of this case, it does not seem to me, that the danger, reasonably to have been apprehended by the mate, was considerable. Doctor Stedman, the only medical witness examined, says, it would depend upon the frequency and length of visits to the cabin. Before the completion of the voyage, it does not appear that the libellant had occasion to go into the cabin, and of course, the actual danger of infection was very small. Still, salvage compensation is greatly affected by motives of public policy; by the expediency, for the general good, of bestowing a liberal reward upon those who interpose in circumstances of trial and difficulty; and, speaking generally, there are few occasions more trying to the fortitude and courage of seamen, than those in which they are called upon to commit themselves to an infected ship upon the ocean. When this is done promptly, humanely, and successfully, the public interest requires that the reward should be liberal; and, as I have said, I consider the sum named, upon the actual facts, to be so. Of this sum, I consider the mate entitled to two fifths, or three hundred dollars. The evidence of payment of his claim is not sufficient. The small sum paid to him was neither offered nor received as a salvage compensation. It is highly probable, the libellant had not then thought of claiming salvage, having acted simply from motives of humanity. But this would not deprive him of a legal right, for which he has not received satisfaction. The sum actually paid to him should, however, be deducted from the sum decreed to him. The decree of the district court must be reversed, and a decree entered here, in conformity with this opinion. I do not allow costs to either party in this court. The costs incurred in the district court are to be paid by the claimant.

WILLIAMSON v. The BETSY.

District Court, D. South Carolina. March 23, 1795.

NEUTRALITY LAWS—FITTING OUT PRIVATEER.

[Where a privateer was illegally fitted out, and commissioned in this country by the French minister, but was afterwards dismantled, and her register canceled, then sold to a foreigner, and fitted out and commissioned in a foreign port, held, that her proceedings under the latter commission were not in violation of the neutrality laws.]

BEE, District Judge. The actor was master of this brig, belonging to British subjects. On the 23d of November, 1794, she was captured on the high seas by the defendant, who commanded a privateer called the Port-de-Paix. The libel states that this privateer was armed and equipped for war, wholly or in part, in this port; and that J. P. Sarjeant is a citizen of the United States, or British subject; and, therefore, could not be legally commissioned, as a French citizen, to take prizes. That this brig having been brought into the neutral port where the armed vessel was unlawfully fitted out, ought to be restored to the original owners.

The plea to the jurisdiction sets forth that the privateer is owned by Sarjeant and Olmstead, both French citizens. That the crew are also French citizens, or, at least, shipped as such. That their vessel is a French bottom, equipped at Port-de-Paix, and not in any port of the United States, and that she was duly commissioned by General Laveaux on the 23d August, 1794. That she arrived here in September, and sailed in November following, with no additional equipment whatsoever. That no American citizen entered on board during her stay, though several British seamen did. The capture is admitted, far without the jurisdiction of the United States, and the 17th article of the treaty with France is relied on in support of the plea. It appeared in evidence that this vessel was formerly American, that she fitted and armed in this port in 1793, and was commissioned by Genet. That she was in the number of those proscribed by the president of the United States; and that in consequence of such proscription, she was stripped and dismantled in Wilmington (N. C.) and lay there a considerable time in that condition. Her American register was given up, and the bond for the same cancelled at his office. It appeared that, some time afterwards, this vessel arrived here from North Carolina with a clearance and manifest, as the Dolphin, and a bill of sale to one Gibson, of the island of St. Bartholomew. That she cleared and sailed from hence on 5th August last, as a foreign vessel, at which time, as well as on her arrival from North Carolina, she was unarmed, and in no manner equipped for war. Upon this evidence I am of opinion, that although the original fitting out here as the Vainqueur de la Bastille, under Genet's commission, was contrary to neutrality, and all acts done by the vessel, illegal and within the jurisdiction of this court, yet that the subsequent dismantling, change of property, and cancelling of her register, occasion a total difference; and that her subsequent proceedings cannot be questioned here. Let the libel be dismissed with costs.

REINSTATEMENT OF CAUSE.

When an action of replevin has been discontinued by the non-appearance of either party, the court will not, at a subsequent term, reinstate the cause, unless it appears to be the fault of the clerk that the appearance was not entered.

[Cited in French v. Venable, Case No. 5,105; Reiling v. Bolier, Id. 11,671.]

Replevin. This cause had been discontinued at the last term, because the defendant had not appeared.

Mr. Dawson, defendant's counsel, made affidavit that he was desired by the defendant, before the last term, to enter his appearance for the defendant in all his causes, and thought he had done so, but now finds that his appearance was not entered in this case, and that the cause was discontinued for want of an appearance. Whereupon he moved the court to direct the cause to be reinstated, and brought forward upon the docket, and the continuance entered.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said that the only cases in which they had granted such a request were those in which it appeared to be the default of the clerk that the appearance had not been entered.

Motion overruled.

WILLIAMSON v. BUZZARD.

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. July, 1834.

BOND FOR COSTS—SUFFICIENCY—TIME OF GIVING.

1. A bond for costs which omits the name of the non-resident plaintiff about to institute suit, is defective, and the suit should be dismissed.

2. Nor can bond be given after the institution of suit, so as to prevent dismissal.

Appeal from Hempstead circuit court.

[This was an action by Polly Williamson against Jacob Buzzard.]

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, and LACY, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of detinue brought by the appellant, a non-resident, against the appellee, which was dismissed at the cost of the appellant, on the motion of the appellee, on the ground that the bond for costs filed by the plaintiff in the court below was defective and insufficient. The condition of the bond, which is alleged to be defective, is in the following words: "The condition of the above obligation is such, that whereas a non-resident of the territory of Arkansas is about to commence an action of detinue in the circuit court," &c., and omitting to insert the appellant's name as the non-resident about to bring the suit. After the judgment dismissing the suit was rendered by the circuit court, the appellant, by her attorney, presented to the court a new bond for costs, and moved the court for permission to file the same and to reinstate the cause upon the docket, which motion was overruled by the court.

The counsel, for the appellant, contends that the court below erred—First, in dismissing this suit for want of a sufficient bond for costs; and, secondly, in refusing to receive a new bond when tendered, and reinstate the cause on the docket. The statute (Geyer's Dig. 244) provides that "any person who shall not be a resident within this territory shall, before he institutes any suit in the courts of this territory, file or cause to be filed, a bond with sufficient security, with the clerk of the court wherein his suit is instituted, for the payment of all costs which may accrue in said suit." It has been repeatedly held by this court, that unless a bond for costs is filed by a non-resident before he commences his suit, he shall not be permitted, after the suit is brought, to file the bond, but the court, on motion, will dismiss the action at the plaintiff's costs. We are still satisfied that this is the sound and correct construction of the statute, and feel no inclination to disturb the long and well settled practice. The counsel for the appellant, however, maintains the propositions, that the bond for costs filed by the appellant before the institution of the suit is a good and valid bond. He admits that there is a latent ambiguity in the bond, but contends that this ambiguity can be explained by averment and proved by parol evidence. Admitting the correctness of this position, which we are not disposed to controvert, still we are of opinion that the bond in question was not such a bond as was required by the statute. The plaintiff, before he institutes his suit, is required to file his bond with sufficient security for the payment of all the costs which may accrue in the suit. What description of bond is here required? Will a bond containing a latent ambiguity upon its face, which may be enforced by averments and parol proof, be sufficient? We think not. It should be a bond in which there is neither a latent nor patent ambiguity; one requiring neither averment nor parol evidence for its explanation and support; a bond clear and explicit in its terms, and free from any substantial defect. We are, then, clearly of opinion that the bond originally filed by the plaintiff in the court below, was not such a bond as is contemplated by our statute, and that the judgment of dismissal was properly rendered on that ground.

The second point presented in this case is, whether a non-resident plaintiff, having filed a defective bond for the costs, shall be permitted after the commencement of the suit to file a good and valid bond. We have reflected much upon this question, and the conclusion at which we have arrived is, that the best and soundest construction on the statute is to require a good, sufficient, and valid bond anterior to the institution of the writ, and permit no amendment after the suit is brought. The statute requires the bond before the suit is instituted, and a defective and imperfect bond cannot be said to be a strict compliance with the law. Neither justice nor sound policy, in our judgment, calls upon the court to relax the requisitions of the statute. There is no difficulty in preparing and filing a valid and legal bond, and to permit any other kind to be available might lead to consequences highly pernicious. Judgment affirmed.

District Court, D. Maine. Dec., 1875.

ASSIGNMENT IN BANKRUPTCY — WHAT PASSES — CLAIM UNDER GENEVA AWARD — PAROL GIFT TO WIFE — EFFECT.

1. An assignee in bankruptcy takes the property of the bankrupt, subject to all legal and equitable claims of others.

2. A gift bona fide by parol prior to the Geneva award of a claim for the destruction of a vessel by the Confederate cruiser Florida, if proved, would be upheld in equity against subsequent creditors.

3. A parol promise, by a husband to his wife for love and affection to make such gift, does not work a gift and cannot be enforced.

4. A claim for the destruction of a vessel by a Confederate cruiser passes to an assignee in bankruptcy.

[Cited in Leonard v. Nye, 125 Mass. 463.]

In equity. Bill by [Joseph Williamson and others] the assignees of a bankrupt against [Josiah A. Colcord] the bankrupt and his wife, seeking to have a claim of the bankrupt, for the destruction of his vessel by the Confederate cruiser Florida, about to be paid from the fund arising from the Geneva award to the wife on her petition, adjudged to be a part of the bankrupt's estate that passed to his assignees. The respondents answered that in September, 1863, after the destruction of his vessel in March of that year, the bankrupt, having no creditors, actuated by love and affection, gave the claim to his wife, and that it thereby became her separate property and did not pass to his assignees in bankruptcy. Replication was made and proofs were taken.

FOX, District Judge. This cause arises from the depredations committed on our commerce by the rebel cruiser Florida in March, 1863. At that time the bankrupt, Josiah A. Colcord of Stockton, in this district, was master and a part owner of the barque M. J. Colcord, which was destroyed by the Florida on the 27th of March while on her voyage from New York to Cape of Good Hope. The interest of said Colcord as master and owner is stated to have been something over $11,000, for the recovery of which sum, under the Geneva award, a petition in behalf of Mrs. Colcord is now pending before the proper tribunal at Washington.

Capt. Colcord, sometime after his return to the United States, became a member of the firm of Colcord, Berry & Co. The firm proved insolvent, and having been adjudged bankrupts, the complainants were chosen and qualified as assignees in bankruptcy of said estate, and they have also filed their petition at Washington for the allowance to them of this claim for damages, for the benefit of said Colcord's estate, and have instituted this bill to have the respective rights and interest in the award, which may be made in this behalf, ascertained and determined between them.

The respondents in their answer allege that in Sept., 1863, Capt. Colcord "in consideration of love and affection and for other good and sufficient considerations did give, assign, transfer and set over to his wife, said Martha J. Colcord, said claim, arising from the loss of said barque, and that he has not since that time had or pretended to have any ownership or control over said claim, but that said Martha J. Colcord has exercised such ownership and control, and has always represented and held herself out as the owner of such claim."

Under the laws of this state, husband and wife may contract directly with each other; but when payment was made for property conveyed to her from the property of her husband, or it was conveyed by him to her, without a valuable consideration paid therefor, it may be taken as the property of her husband to pay his debts contracted before such purchase. Rev. St. 1857, c. 61.

In Mitchell v. Winslow [Case No. 9,673], Mr. Justice Story decided that the assignee takes the property of the bankrupt, subject to all legal and equitable claims of others, and is affected by all the equities which can be urged against the bankrupt. This principle has since been reaffirmed scores of times, by the various courts administering the bankrupt law, including the supreme court of the United States. Cook v. Tullis, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 332. And if the bankrupt is estopped, his assignee is also estopped.

In 1863 the bankrupt was free from debt. I am therefore brought to the consideration of this cause, as if the parties were husband and wife, each claiming the benefit of the award, and the rules of equity, which would be applicable, if the case was pending between those parties must govern and control my decision in the present suit.

The subject matter of this controversy is of that uncertain and indefinable character, that the researches of neither counsel nor court have discovered any authorities directly applicable, and which are decisive of the questions here presented. The claim was not against a foreign government for indemnity for damages occasioned by its authority, as was the case of Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 193; but it is one degree more remote and contingent, being for recompense for injuries suffered from this rebel cruiser, which, as our government contended, had been permitted, through the negligence of the British authorities, to be constructed and equipped and to depart from British territory to accomplish its piracies, and by reason of such negligence indemnity was demanded from the government of Great Britain for the damages thus inflicted on our commerce.

Our own government was not responsible, and no valid claim could be made upon it for redress by the sufferers. Great Britain had not directly committed or authorized these depredations to be made, and it was only on the ground of her failure to comply with her obligations under the rules of international law, that any redress could be sought against her, for the wrongs thus sustained. It is difficult therefore to imagine a claim of a more precarious nature, wholly dependent on the willingness of Great Britain to acknowledge and make satisfaction for the consequences of her misdoings, or submit the same for decision to the arbitration of others, by which latter court her accountability was subsequently established.

It is claimed that, being of this character not manifested by any evidence whatever of a documentary nature, but the whole claim resting and being in mere expectancy and possibility, it was not susceptible of a donation, and therefore, that there could be no valid gift of the same to Mrs. Colcord by her husband. It is certain that there was nothing in his control or possession, which could be so given and delivered as to constitute, at law, a complete and perfect gift and confer a legal valid title to the donee; but equity recognizes many rights, expectancies and possibilities, as being the subject matter of a gift or transfer, so far as to confer an equitable interest therein, which a court of equity will acknowledge, sustain and protect as sufficient to divest the donor of any rights thereto, provided he has done all that was requisite to perfect and carry out his intentions.

In the light of the authorities referred to and commented upon in White & T. Lead. Cas. [Eq. 307, 308, 343, 344, 3d Am. Ed.],² I am inclined to hold that the subject matter of the present controversy was such that equity would sustain and protect the rights and claims of the wife thereto, if all was done that was requisite to accomplish the purpose of the husband to vest the same in his wife.

It is necessary therefore to critically examine the evidence and see what was said and done between the parties, at the time of this alleged gift, as it is not claimed, that any writings of any kind were executed by either party, or that there was then or at any subsequent time any symbolical delivery of any thing whatever, either documentary or otherwise.

The answers of both the bankrupt and his wife state, that this transfer was made in consideration of love and affection, and for other good and sufficient considerations; there is no averment, that there was any valuable consideration for the transfer, and although the wife and some of the other witnesses state, that she mentioned at the time, as a reason for the gift, that she had let her husband have some money to go into this barque, it is evident from all the testimony, that whatever he may have received from her was his own property, which had been remitted by him to her for the support of his family, and that the balance which remained unexpended was received and paid out by him on the barque's account; this money, never in any way became her property, and at the argument, her counsel properly abandoned all claim or right thereto in her behalf, and conceded that no advantage or support could be derived therefrom, and that the only consideration for the gift was that growing out of the relation existing between the parties, which, although not, either at law or in equity, deemed a valuable consideration, yet is always recognized both as of a good and meritorious nature.

Captain Colcord in his deposition taken in this case, testifies that in September, 1863, he was offered for his claim twelve per cent. of the amount. That he consulted with his wife in relation to accepting this offer, to which she was much opposed; that she remarked, that as the vessel was named for her, and she had let him have some money to put into the vessel, he had better give it to her; and his further statement is as follows: "I told her that I would give the claim to her cheerfully, and that she was welcome to all she could get from it." On being asked by his counsel to state further what was said, his language was, "I give you cheerfully all the claim, and you are welcome to every dollar you can get for the claim." The difference between these two statements is, that the latter imports a present gift, while the other is rather of a promissory nature of what he would do for her in the future. Mrs. Colcord's statement is substantially in accordance with the latter statement of her husband, and she adds that her two daughters were present in the room at the time, and she said to them, "Girls, remember that your father has given me these claims." The testimony of the daughters, who were then quite young, one who has since married being then only fifteen, substantially agree with the mother's statement, and they also testify that Capt. Colcord frequently

Opposed to this testimony is the statement of Capt. Colcord in his deposition given before the register, in July, 1873, in which he says "I gave the claim to his wife shortly after the vessel was burnt, but I do not recollect whether it was done in writing or not." The evidence of Mrs. Berry, a sister-in-law of Mrs. Colcord, tends to establish, from the admissions of Mrs. Colcord, that her husband, long subsequently to this alleged gift, undertook to manage and control the disposal of this claim, and that the wife made no objection thereto. Mrs. Berry testifies that at one time Mrs. Colcord told her that her husband had sold the claim; at a subsequent time Mrs. Colcord said that they had had a talk of selling but did not sell. In the last conversation Mrs. C. said that the witness was mistaken about hearing her say that Capt. Colcord had sold the claims positively, that he talked of selling them or had an idea of it. Alexander Staples states in his deposition that Capt. Colcord told him, in the presence of Mrs. Colcord, that he had sold out his claim—sold to Western parties. Mrs. Colcord then said, "You have just owned up," and seemed to express some surprise that he had not told her before.

When we consider the failure of memory of Capt. Colcord, in his not being able in 1873 to remember whether he had or not executed any writing to perfect this gift, and also that his first statement in his deposition was that he told his wife he would give her the claim, and the subsequent admissions of both him and his wife, that he had exercised acts of ownership over it, by claiming that he had sold it, or talked of selling it, it may not be an unreasonable conclusion for the court to draw, from all the evidence, that all that was in fact declared by him at that time was a purpose and intent on his part to give to his wife whatever he might thereafter realize from this claim, and that he was still to retain his control over it, and enforce it in such manner as circumstances might subsequently render proper, and that it was not his intent to cast upon her the whole responsibility of prosecuting and maintaining the claim in the future as might be requisite. All the facts to sustain the claim were peculiarly within his own knowledge, and it would be much less difficult for him to procure the required proof when wanted.

The language then employed, without any great restraint, may be considered of a promissory nature simply, as he first expressed it that he would give the claim to her, instead of an actual present gift, as it is quite evident, the examining counsel understood was important should be established. If the fair import of what then took place was a mere agreement and promise on his part that when he should realize the amount, he would give it to his wife, it would remain simply a prom-issory arrangement, and would not constitute a complete and perfect gift, and would not be obligatory on him or his assignee in bankruptcy, in a court of equity.

The well known case of Jones v. Lock, 1 Ch. App. 25, is certainly a much stronger one than the present, as establishing a gift. In that case, a father put a check of £900 into the hands of his son, nine months old, saying to his nurse, "Look you here; I give this to baby; it is for himself, and I am going to put it away for him, and will give him a great deal more along with it." His wife said, "Don't let him tear it;" and he answered, "Never mind if he does, it is his own, he may do what he likes with it;" he then took it away, saying to the nurse, "I am going to put this away for my son," and he locked it in his iron safe. Shortly after, he died, and the check was found amongst his effects. It was held by Lord Chancellor Cranworth that there had been no gift to, or valid declaration of trust for the son.

Waiving this view of the evidence, and conceding that the intention of Capt. Colcord at the time was to divest himself of all right of redress which he might have for these losses, and to vest the same in his wife, I am nevertheless of the opinion that as there was no valuable consideration therefor, and no delivery of any written transfer or document of any kind, all resting on mere words on his part; he had not by what then took place perfected and accomplished his purpose; there was still remaining the locus penitentiae, and he might at any time afterwards, before the wife had received the fruits of the intended gift, convey or transfer the same to any other party, or could enforce his claim before the courts created for that purpose, in his own behalf and for his sole benefit, and I think that such right passed to his assignee in bankruptcy.

Where the assignment from its own nature or that of the subject matter assigned does not pass the legal title, it can only be good as an executory contract, and requires the assent of both parties and the support of a consideration. In the present case the only consideration arose from the relation of the parties, husband and wife, which is a good and meritorious, but not a valuable one. Edwards v. Jones, 1 Mylne & C. 226. In Ellis v. Nimmo, Lloyd & G. t. Sugd. 333, Lord Chancellor Sugden held that the meritorious consideration of providing for a child was sufficient to authorize a court of equity to enforce an executory contract for that purpose against the donor; but this decision was subsequently abandoned by him, and was not approved by other equity tribunals, and "it is now the settled law of England that an executory agreement, founded on a meritorious consideration, will not be enforced against the donor." Perry, Trusts, § 86.

"At the present day, it seems to be established that even as against volunteers claiming under the settlor, whether with or without any provision aliunde, a voluntary agreement, whether under seal or not, whether coupled with a valid trust of other property settled at the same time or not, cannot be enforced on the mere ground of meritorious consideration." Lewin, Trusts, 99.

Mr. Perry, in Perry, Trusts, § 109, says: "The tendency in the United States is to sustain and carry into effect an executory trust in favor of a wife or child, founded on a meritorious consideration, if the instrument is under seal, though the rule is not fully established, and perhaps upon thorough consideration would not be acted upon."

Mr. Perry says (section 111): "The courts say, that they will not execute a voluntary, executory agreement, unless it is under seal." He cites in support of this, Kennedy v. Ware, 1 Barr [1 Pa. St.] 445, in which it was decided "that an equitable assignment of a chose in action to a daughter by her father, in consideration of love and affection was void," and Caldwell v. Williams, 1 Bailey, Eq. 175, opinion of Harper, Ch., who says: "Some agreements which are termed voluntary, are executed in this court, when made in favor of a wife or children, but these are always agreements by deed or covenant, agreements under seal, which imports a consideration and renders them valid at law. There is no instance of an agreement being enforced, which is not only voluntary in the equity sense of the word, but is also nudum pactum at law."

In Pennington v. Gittings, 2 Gill & J. 208, it was held, that a mere executory contract cannot be supported on the consideration of love and affection, and a gift under such circumstances cannot be made good in equity. See, also, Dennison v. Goehring, 7 Barr [7 Pa. St.] 175.

[In 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 332] the doctrine appears to be, that there must exist a valid and obligatory contract at law, as a preliminary basis to any equitable interference, and then, that equity grants its extraordinary aid, only when there is an actual consideration, valuable or meritorious. When instead of a present gift or transfer, there is a promise or covenant to give, or a mere expression of an intention that the donee shall have that subsequently, which the donor reserves to himself, or keeps within his control or disposition for the time being, the question becomes one of contract, and a consideration becomes essentially necessary to give force to that which would otherwise be an uncompleted gift; hence the assignment of a debt, not sustained by a consideration or by the delivery of the instrument by which the debt is evidenced, will be invalid both at law and equity, unless an instrument of gift be executed and delivered as a substitute for the delivery of the evidence of the debt. Hitch v. Davis, 3 Md. Ch. 266; Whittle v. Skinner, 23 Vt. 534. In the Maryland case there was a meritorious consideration, the alleged gift having been made by the father to the daughter, and sought to be enforced against his estate. In Dilts v. Stevenson, 17 N. J. Eq. 407, the marginal note is: "In equity where a widow seeks to establish a gift from her husband in his lifetime, she must adduce evidence beyond suspicion, and nothing less will do than a clear irrevocable gift, either to some person as trustee, or by some clear and distinct act of his, by which he divested himself of the property, and engaged to hold it as trustee for the separate use of his wife. To constitute a perfect gift, the donor must part with the possession and dominion of the property, and if the thing be a chose in action, the law requires an assignment or some equivalent instrument, and the transfer must be actually executed." This being an imperfect gift, it cannot, to carry out the intention of the parties, be construed as a declaration of trust so as to make the donor a trustee for the donee. This was so decided by Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst in Meek v. Kettlewell, 1 Phil. Ch. 342, and he declares the authorities are conclusive on this question. It is but simple justice to state, that nearly all the authorities on these subjects of voluntary trusts and equitable assignments will be found collected in notes to the cases of Ellison v. Ellison, and Row v. Dawson, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 245; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 731. They are carefully analyzed by the learned authors, and the court has been greatly assisted in its examination of this cause by their labors. The objection was taken to this transfer that it fell within the provisions of chapter 81 of Acts of 1853 (10 Stat. 170), by which transfers of claims against the United States are made absolutely null and void, unless made and executed in the presence of two witnesses after the allowance of the claim, etc. It is a sufficient answer to this objection that at the time of the alleged transfer there was no claim against the United States to be assigned, and the case here is not within that act. And it has been also decided by the court of claims in Lawrence and Crowell's Case, 8 Ct. Cl. 253, that the purpose of the act must be restricted to matters before the treasury, and not to matters coming within the jurisdiction of other courts. Decree for complainants.

Case No. 17,753.

WILLIAMSON v. NEW ALBANY, ETC., R. CO.

[1 Biss. 198; 2 Redf. Am. Ry. Cas. 682.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. Oct. 26, 1857.

APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER—TRUSTEE UNDER RAILROAD MORTGAGE—DUTIES—DEFAULT IN INTEREST—APPLICATION OF INCOME.

1. The appointment of a receiver of the property of a railroad company in the foreclosure of a mortgage, is not a matter of course, on default of payment of interest, but is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court.

[Followed in Union Trust Co. v. Railroad Co., Case No. 14,402; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Kansas City, W. & N. W. R. Co., 53 Fed. 196, note; M'George v. Big Stone Gap Imp. Co., 57 Fed. 270.]

2. A railroad corporation had given a deed of trust of all its property present and to be acquired, to secure certain bonds, which were negotiated. By the provisions of this deed, the trustee, on default of payment of either principal or interest of said bonds, or any part thereof, might take possession of said property, or, on the written request of the holders of at least one-half of the then unpaid bonds, might sell the same at public auction. Default was made in the payment of interest, but the trustee did not exercise his powers in the deed. The company issued their bonds and made their mortgages upon its property, and became indebted upon current expenses. The proceeds of the sales of the bonds having become insufficient to complete and operate the road, the president, on consultation with a large number of the bondholders, and by their advice, made other loans and applied the earnings in completing and operating the road, and meeting the most pressing claims. No mismanagement was shown. Held: Such an application of the income of the road was not a misapplication of the funds, but on the contrary greatly to the security of the bondholders.

3. Although the trustee might have taken possession of the property, or have sold under the powers in his deed, he may waive this right and file a bill to foreclose.

4. The court of equity, its jurisdiction being thus invoked, will look into the facts and exercise an equitable discretion; it will not enforce the strict penalties of the deed.

[Cited in Cline v. Libby, 46 Wis. 129, 49 N. W. 833.]

5. The action of the officers of the company with the consent of the trustee and part of the bondholders in the expenditure of its income, will be respected and sustained so far at least as to relieve the company from any penalty or charge of misapplication of the funds of the road.

6. Under the circumstances of this case, ordered, that the officers of the company set aside one-half of the net earnings of the road for the payment of the interest on the bonded debt; the other half for the payment of the floating debt, and a full monthly report be made to the court,—the complainant having the right to renew his application for the appointment of a receiver upon a new statement of facts.

In equity. In his bill, the plaintiff states that the defendant owns, and has in operation, a line of railroad, commencing at New Albany, on the Ohio river, extending thence to Michigan City, on Lake Michigan, two hundred and eighty-eight miles; also a branch of said road, not yet in operation, extending from Gosport, in Owen county, to Indianapolis, of the length of forty-three miles; that in connection with the road and branch, the company has in use a large amount of rolling stock, consisting of locomotive engines and cars of various descriptions; also various machine-shops for making and repairing engines, cars and machinery; also various other property necessary to equip said road for a successful operation, in the transportation of passengers and freights; with corporate powers to regulate the same, charge freight and passage money; which machinery in its operations is so combined as not to admit of a separation, on which account the complainant prays that the same may be sold or otherwise disposed of as an entirety, and in such manner that all of said corporate franchises may pass and vest in the purchaser or purchasers, as a body corporate.

The complainant further states that the said company, on the eighth day of February, 1851, being engaged in constructing that part of its railroad which lies between New Albany and Gosport, one hundred and twelve and seventy-one one hundredth miles, and being in need of money to build the road and properly equip it, resolved to borrow five hundred thousand dollars, to be secured by certain bonds, of one thousand dollars each, payable semi-annually in the city of New York, at ten per cent. per annum, subject to a clause that the holders thereof should have the right to exchange them at par for stock; that, to secure the payment of said bonds, a deed of trust was executed, which the complainant holds, whereby the company granted, bargained and sold to the complainant and his successors in the trust created, all the following then present, and then in the future to be acquired property of said company, pertaining to that part of the road which lies between New Albany and Gosport, to wit: the road made and to be made, including the right of way, and every description of property which pertained to the road, and which the company might acquire, on the following trusts.

If the company should fail to pay the principal or any part thereof, or the interest or any part thereof on the bonds when the same might become due, when demanded, then, after sixty days from such default, upon request of the holder of such bond, the complainant or his successor in the trust, should enter into and take possession of all and every part of said premises and property, and as the attorney in fact or agent of the company, by himself and agents or substitutes duly constituted, have and employ the same in making all needful repairs, alterations, and additions thereto; and after deducting expenses of such use, repairs, alterations, and additions, apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of the principal and interest of all said bonds remaining unpaid; or the complainant, his successors in said trust, at his or their direction, might on the written request of the holders of at least one-half of the bonds then unpaid and unconverted into stock, cause the same premises, or so much thereof as should be necessary to pay the principal and interest of all the bonds then unpaid, to be sold at public auction in the city of New Albany, in the state of Indiana, or in the city of New York, giving at least forty days notice, &c. The bonds were duly executed, and the money loaned on the faith of the security, &c.

And the complainant says that the company paid the interest which became due prior to the 1st of February, 1857. That the interest which became due on that day, they failed to pay, and that the whole of the coupons for the installment of interest which fell due on that day are unpaid, amounting to the aggregate sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, more than sixty days after the maturity of said coupons having transpired. After this, the holders of a large number of said bonds required the complainant, as trustee, to enter upon and take possession of said mortgaged premises; and other holders of said bonds, to an amount exceeding one-half thereof, requested the complainant in writing, to proceed according to the terms and conditions of said deed of trust, to make sale of the mortgaged premises. But he deemed it inexpedient so to do.

And the bill states, that several other loans were made of large amounts, at different rates of interest, by issuing and selling bonds, secured by deeds of trust on the property of the road on the same conditions as those specified in the first mortgage. On all of which subsequent loans the interest has become due and remains unpaid. He has not entered upon the property as above requested, to sell the same as authorized by the deeds of trust, because he says the company is much embarrassed in its affairs, being largely insolvent and owing a large floating, unsecured debt. That many of that class of creditors have prosecuted suits and judgments against the company, and are seeking to enforce satisfaction by the seizure and sale of the property on the road, &c.

That by reason of the premises, it is indispensably necessary to sell and dispose of said mortgaged premises, to the end that the proceeds may be applied as contemplated by all the deeds of trust.

All interest due prior to the 1st of February, 1857, has been paid; but that which became due on that date has not been paid, and for this default the bill was filed.

Stanberry, Ketchum & Lane, for complainant.

Smith, Crawford & McDonald, for defendant.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. It is objected that as the complainant, under the trust deed, has power to take possession of the property, this proceeding in chancery is unnecessary and ought not to be sustained.

If this exercise of power under the deed be admitted, it is not perceived that it may not be waived.

To strengthen the application for a receiver, the affidavits of Mr. Lane, the counsel, and Mr. Williamson, the trustee, are filed, and the last report of the railroad company.

Mr. Lane states, that he lately visited New Albany in Indiana, where the principle office of the company is established, and he found the financial condition of the company exceedingly poor; that the laborers on the road had not been paid their wages for a long time, and that there had been a strike, &c., and he proposed to the company that the laborers should be paid out of the first net earnings; and that the property of the road should be given up to the trustee, &c., but the president of the company rejected the proposal.

The affidavit of the complainant corroborates, in some degree, the facts stated by Mr. Lane, in regard to the embarrassed condition of the company, founded upon the representations made to him; he says that the interest has not been paid, as alleged in the bill; and that the bill is true. And he says that the company, in his opinion, are by no means able to pay the amounts due and to fall due on their various issues of bonds; that the property of the company is jeopardized by a large and constantly increasing floating debt; and that a very large number of those holding bonds of the company, issued under the various mortgages, of which this deponent is trustee, have served on him a written request according to the conditions of the mortgages, requiring him to cause the said road and its various appurtenances to be sold according to the terms of the mortgage. In the deed of trust it was required that at "the written request of the holders of at least one-half of the bonds then unpaid, he shall cause the premises to be sold." The words used in the above affidavit are not equivalent to the requirement of the deed. But the bill alleges, in the words of the deed, that the request was made, by at least one-half of the bond-holders, and the complainant swears to the truth of the bill.

James Brooks, president of the railroad company, filed an affidavit which admits the execution of the mortgages, and the issue of the bonds as stated by the complainant; but he says the proceeds of the sale of the bonds, the stock subscriptions and other means of said company, were insufficient to finish and equip the road for business; and it became necessary to have other means to finish the road, and put it in such condition as would enable the managers to earn the necessary amount of money to pay the principal and interest of its debt.

At that time the railroad securities had got in such bad repute, that it was impossible to borrow on the sale of bonds, except at such a sacrifice as would be ruinous to the company. The company was reduced to the alternative of abandoning the road in an unfinished state, which would have caused an almost total sacrifice to the bond-holders, or to state the difficulty frankly to such of the bondholders as could be seen, and go on and use the net earnings of the road with such other means as the company could command, and finish and equip it.

He further says that he saw a large number of the bond-holders from time to time, in his visits to New York, and with whom he was in correspondence, who were fully advised of these difficulties; and they uniformly advised him to go on by all means and finish the road, and relay the flat bar track in good order for running, so as to pay the debts of the company. The deponent believes, and the complainant and bond-holders expressed to him the belief that, but for an unlooked for loss, by the failure of the crops of 1854 and 1856, the road could not only have been finished and put in good order, but the floating debt paid off, and the interest paid on the bonds. He denies that there has been the misapplication of a dollar of the funds of the road.

There are some judgments against the road for claims of damages for right of way, where the parties refused to abide by the awards made; but with the exception of this class of claims, there are few, if any, judgments against the company; and there never has been two hundred dollars worth of property of the road sold on execution. The net earnings of the road for the present year have been expended in paying for labor and materials, and in constructing and operating said road, and repayment of money thus expended.

He says and believes, that the road and appurtenances are more than sufficient to pay all of its debts, and that the security in the bonds has been increased nearly fifty per cent. since the first three millions of its bonds were negotiated. The deponent states that many of the bond-holders and others competent to judge, who have examined the work, expressed the opinion that more work had been done, in the construction of this road, than on any other road for the amount of money.

The United States engineers and the engineers of the state of Indiana estimated the cost of this road from New Albany to Crawfordsville, a distance of one hundred and sixty miles, at sixteen millions of dollars, which has been built by the company for less than five millions. And the entire road from New Albany to Michigan City, two hundred and eighty-eight miles, has been constructed for about seven and a half millions of dollars.

The managers of the road felt safe in assuring the laborers on it that they would be paid, as the work was not only done with the knowledge, but at the repeated and urgent request of the complainant, as well as a large number of the bond-holders, with whom deponent from time to time came in contact.

The floating debt of the company on the 1st of October, 1857, was about the sum of $235,000, which shows a reduction of $45,000 since the 1st of July last.

In the year 1855, the net earnings of the road amounted to the sum of $372,402.25. This paid $315,256.59, the interest on bonds, and left a surplus of $56,125.36. The gross earnings of the six months preceding the 1st of January, 1857, amounted to the sum of $413,666.66, which left a balance, after deducting all expenses during the same time, of $190,531.70.

The gross earnings of the road ending June 30, 1857, amounted to the sum of $686,818.72, which, after deducting the expenditure for the same time, left the net earnings $263,090.95; and this, the president of the road says is $200,000 less than the sum estimated, which was caused by the failure of all the great staples of the country in the year 1856, reducing the amount of transportation, as is supposed, to that amount.

The interest now due is about $273,000, which sum, together with the floating debt, and the accruing interest, may be provided for and paid, under prosperous circumstances, in a reasonably short time. After the payment of the floating debt, it is not doubted that the accruing interest will be punctually discharged, if no untoward circumstance should occur.

The case made in the bill is, the failure to pay the interest on the bonds in February last, and the embarrassed condition of the railroad company.

It seems to be considered that a receiver will be appointed, as a matter of course, under the mortgage where a default has occurred in the payment of any part of the interest or principal. If this be so, the chancellor, in such a case, can exercise no discretion. He can do nothing less than carry into effect the conditions of the bond.

It is not the province of chancery to enforce penalties, but to relieve against them. It is asked, may the court disregard the contract of the parties? Certainly not. But where there is a hard and an unconscionable contract, a court of equity will withhold its aid, and leave the party to his remedy at law. An individual promises to pay on a certain day, a thousand dollars, and, in default thereof, to pay two thousand. Would not a court of chancery relieve from this penalty? And the payment of the penalty is the contract of the party. What penalty could be more disproportionate to the default, than the one under consideration? A failure to pay any part of the installment of interest, subjects the company to the immediate payment of several millions of dollars, not payable except under the default for many years; and the same default subjects property to the amount of several millions to a sale at auction, on a short notice.

The appointment of a receiver, when directed, is made for the benefit of all the parties interested, and not for the benefit of the plaintiff, or of one defendant only. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 829. It is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court.

In such cases courts of equity will pay a just respect to such legal and equitable rights and interests of the possessor of the fund, and will not withdraw it from him by the appointment of a receiver unless the facts averred and established in proof show that there has been an abuse or a danger of abuse on his part. For the rule of such courts is not to displace a bona fide possessor from any of the just rights attached to his title, unless there be some equitable ground for interference. Tyson v. Fairclough, 2 Sim. & S. 142; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 835.

It is true the parties in the contract, under consideration, agreed that a default in the payment of any part of the interest or principal, when payable and demanded, should incur the penalty sought to be enforced. Yet, when the aid of a court of equity is invoked it will look into the facts and exercise an equitable discretion. And if the party claims and attempts to exercise the powers given him in the contract, which, under the circumstances, are unjust and ruinous, he may be enjoined.

Has there been any abuse of their powers, or a misapplication of their funds by this company, which authorizes the appointment of a receiver?

This step is to be taken by the bill, with the view of selling the entire road, and all its appurtenances, for the benefit of the bondholders.

The interest due in February last has not been paid, and since that time another installment of interest has become due, which has not been paid. All previously accruing installments of interest were paid or satisfactorily arranged. And the late large outlay for the completion of the road and its equipment, was not only approved by the complainant and many of the bondholders, but they urged the president of the company to go on with the work by all means, and finish and equip the road, so as to increase the revenue, and they agreed to receive bonds in payment of the interest then due.

Under the influence of this encouragement it seems the company prosecuted the work and completed the road, which is now in successful operation. In this way, as appears from the affidavits, was every dollar of the floating debt, complained of, created. It went to increase the securities of the bondholders by adding to the value of the road, and increasing the tolls for the payment of the interest and principal. But this is now insisted on as a misapplication of the funds of the road, which not only authorizes, but requires the appointment of a receiver.

But this does not, in my judgment, evince bad faith on the part of the company, but, on the contrary, showed a laudable desire to save the bondholders and all the parties interested from loss.

Had the road been in the hands of a receiver, no chancellor fit to deal with these subjects, it appears to me, could have hesitated to order the receiver to do, in this respect, what the company has done. In the deed of trust it is specially provided that the trustee, if he take possession of the road, shall make repairs, additions, &c., and an offer is now made to pay this floating debt, so far, at least, as laborers are concerned, if the road be given up by the company. Whether the debt be due to laborers on the road or to others, is not material, seeing it was incurred under the urgent request of the trustee and several of the bondholders, and for the preservation and life of the road.

When property is purchased and placed upon the road, no lien being taken by the seller, it becomes subject to the mortgage lien on the road, so that it is not liable to an execution, except under the mortgage; and existing liens on the road, under the mortgages, can only be adjusted by a court of equity.

But it is said, the complainant, and a part of the bondholders, had no power to authorize the new expenditure in the completion of the road. Such an authority as was exercised will be respected and sustained by any chancellor, at least so far as to relieve the company from any penalty or charge of misapplication of the funds of the road.

By what authority does the complainant sue in this case and claim a right to have equities adjusted between parties who claim conflicting interests? But in a matter of this kind, so essential to the interests of the bondholders, there can be no difficulty in sustaining the company, as above stated. But still the default is admitted, and the failure to pay occurred under the circumstances stated; and the question now is whether this default requires the appointment of a receiver and a discontinuance of the agency which now controls the road; and this is to be done preparatory to the sale of the entire property of the road.

The bonds will not be due and payable for many years. They who made the loans looked to the interest, and the ultimate payment of the principal.

This procedure involves some fourteen or fifteen millions of property; the property of the railroad and of the bondholders. Care should be taken in this case, as in all others, to administer equity, without, if possible, a sacrifice of property.

From the exhibits in this case, there is a reasonable probability that, in the course of a short period, a vigorous operation of this road may enable its directors to pay the deferred interest and their floating debt; and the discharge of these will make the payment of the current interest on its bonds easy, out of the net profits.

If there were no other interests involved than that of the bondholders, such a course is so strongly recommended by equitable considerations, that no intelligent holder of such securities could object to it. The floating debt has accrued under circumstances which give a strong claim to the company for some indulgence in the payment of the deferred interest, seeing the completion has added so much value to the security of the bond-holders, and increased the profits of the road; and, especially, as the work was done on the recommendation of the complainant, and a part of the bondholders.

So far as the conduct of the company has been developed in this somewhat informal examination, it is entitled to the highest commendation for its firmness, energy and success, in the accomplishment of this great work.

There is a strong probability that, in a very short time, the road will be in a condition to meet its engagements under the mortgages, which is all the bond creditors have a right to demand.

No change of agency could increase, I am convinced, the efficiency of that already employed on the road. A sale of the property would in all probability, sacrifice the stock of the road amounting to between two and three millions of dollars, and more than half if not two-thirds of the property of the bondholders. It might enable some one or more persons to purchase the road at an almost nominal consideration. These consequences, I admit, are not to stand in the way of an equitable right, enforced under circumstances of fairness and justice. But if such results may be avoided by a short postponement of the interest, and under a prospect of a speedy payment, I hold myself authorized to do so, under the facts above stated.

But I will afford to the bond-holders every reasonable assurance that can be required. I will admit an order to be entered that the motion of the complainant for the appointment of a receiver be denied, and that the said company, from and after the 1st day of January next, set aside one-half of the net earnings of the road, for the payment of the interest of the bonded debt of said company, —the other half to be applied to the payment of the floating debt of the company, a report of the gross and net earnings to be made to the court monthly by the secretary of the company; that is for the month of January, and at the close of the succeeding months, so soon as the returns can be received and made out, half of the net earnings to be paid into court for the bondholders. The company will report, also, in the court how the net earnings have been expended from the 1st of November to the 1st of January aforesaid.

But nothing in this order is to be understood as preventing the plaintiff from renewing his motion for a receiver at any time prior or subsequent to said 1st of January, upon any new statement of facts which he may be able to present.

The interest is payable on demand. If the bringing of the action be considered a sufficient demand, the coupons must be presented and filed, if payable to bearer, before payment will be ordered.

Case No. 17,754.

WILLIAMSON v. RICHARDSON.¹

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. May 27, 1867.

SPECIAL AND GENERAL AGENTS—COLLECTION OF MONEY—REVOCATION OF AUTHORITY—BONDS—PAYMENT—USAGE.

[1. An attorney employed, not to attend to all his client's legal business, but to collect a particular debt, is a special, as opposed to a general, agent; and those dealing with him are bound to ascertain the extent of his authority.]

[2. The appointment of a second attorney or agent to collect a debt is a revocation of the authority of the first one, and persons knowing of the second appointment are held to a knowledge of the revocation.]

[3. A bond given in 1869, payable in "dollars" generally, was payable in gold and silver only; but, after the passage of the legal tender acts, it could lawfully be discharged by legal tender notes.]

[4. A custom or usage of paying debts in Confederate notes in the insurrectionary states during the war of the Rebellion was illegal, and cannot be sanctioned as of any binding force.]

[This was an action at law by Madeline J. Williamson against John Richardson.]

ERSKINE, District Judge (charging jury). This is an action of debt on bond for twelve thousand dollars principal, and containing a penalty in like sum if conditions of the bond be not performed. At the date of the bond, the plaintiff was not a citizen of Georgia, and at the commencement of this suit she was a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania. The defendant made the bond to the plaintiff in the city of Savannah on the first of January, 1859, to secure the purchase money of a house sold to him by plaintiff, and situate in this city. It is stipulated in the bond that the interest, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, on the twelve thousand dollars, shall be paid in the manner following, namely: The interest thereon on the first day of January of each and every year from the date of the instrument until the first day of January, 1863, inclusive, and upon which day there shall also be paid six thousand dollars, part of the principal sum. And on the first day of January in each and every year thereafter the interest as and at the rate aforesaid, on such part of the twelve thousand dollars as shall then remain unpaid, together with one thousand dollars, part of the principal sum, until the whole principal with the interest shall be paid. Such, I believe, is the substance of the bond. It is admitted that the interest up to the first of January, 1864, is paid. So, there is no question for you, gentlemen, on that.

ty, six thousand dollars and the interest, less ($50), is still unpaid. Therefore the main question may be said to resolve itself into the inquiry whether the six thousand dollars falling due on the first of January, 1863, has or has not been paid.

The declaration contains two counts, the first having several branches. To these counts defendant has pleaded three pleas. Plaintiff has replied, and the parties at controversy came to issue. These pleadings have been read; but they are not for your consideration; it being the exclusive province of the court to pass upon the pleadings, while your appropriate duty is to weigh the facts presented, and a true verdict give, according to the evidence adduced before you. This being understood, and the whole testimony having been heard by you, I must trouble you with even a brief résumé of it, necessarily familiar with it in all its phases as you are.

Plaintiff offered the bond in evidence. Defendant objected, unless certain credits thereon indorsed should then also go to the jury. To this plaintiff objected, because, as she said, she was not bound to prove these credits, that being the duty of defendant. The court sustained the plaintiff, and she closed her evidence. If you find, gentlemen, that Gen. A. R. Lawton was the agent of the plaintiff to collect and receive payment of the bond sued on, then he was, in contemplation of law, a special, and not a general, agent, upon the proofs in the case. Although it be true that one may be a general agent who is put in the place of the principal to transact all his business of a particular kind, as a factor to buy and sell all goods, and a broker to negotiate all contracts of a certain description, an attorney to transact all his legal business, a master to perform all things in relation to the usual employment of his ship, and so in many other instances,—such one is a general agent in the line of business in which he is employed. And, in the case of a person employed specially in one single transaction, the rule is directly the reverse. The party dealing with such a one must ascertain the extent of the agent's authority, and, if he does not, he must abide the consequences. A general authority arises from a general employment in a specific capacity, such as a factor, broker, attorney, &c. I charge you that an attorney to transact all legal business of a man is his general agent in that capacity; while an attorney to collect a particular debt is a special attorney. Therefore, if you find that A. R. Lawton's authority to collect was limited to a particular debt, he was the special agent of the plaintiff, not the general agent.

If you find, gentlemen, that A. R. Lawton was a special agent, then it was the duty of Mr. Richardson, the defendant, to ascertain, by inquiry, the nature and extent of Lawton's authority; and, if he departed from or exceeded it, the defendant must bear the loss.

And if you find that A. R. Lawton was the attorney at law of the plaintiff to collect this bond, in this particular instance, and not her general attorney to transact her law business, and make collections generally, then he was a special agent; and, if his authority be departed from, the person dealing with him must be content to abide the consequences. An attorney at law is the agent of his client, and, when a claim is placed in his hands to collect, the only power granted to him is to receive the money, if the debtor will pay, or to enforce payment by suit; and consequently he cannot accept anything in discharge of the liability but cash. 12 Ala. 342. If you find that a second agent was appointed to perform the same duties, as to the same contract, as were intrusted to the previous agent, and this fact was known to the debtor, it is, in law, a revocation as to him of the powers of the first appointed agent. And, I may add, a power of attorney may be revoked by implication as well as by express declaration.

It is a principle well established that an attorney at law cannot commute or compound the debt for anything other than money without the assent of his client; and, if he does, the client is not bound. Nor can an attorney in any matter of trust, confidence, discretion, or judgment delegate his authority. The bond in evidence before you, gentlemen, is, as we have seen, for twelve thousand dollars principal, and was made on the first day of January, 1859,—some two years before the inauguration of the Rebellion, and about three years anterior to the passage of the law of congress known as the "Legal Tender Act" [Act Feb. 25, 1862; 12 Stat. 345]. When this bond was entered into, all contracts for the payment of dollars generally were payable in gold and silver; for, by the laws then in force, coin from these metals could alone be lawfully tendered in payment. "Dollars," in the bond, was of the same import as if the words "gold and silver" were therein mentioned. Upon the falling due of the six thousand dollars on the first of January, 1863, it could have been discharged in legal-tender notes, because prior to this time the paramount authority of the United States had declared the legal value of these notes.

You will doubtless recollect, gentlemen, that, during the progress of this case, counsel for defendant asked a witness, whether Confederate money was not received about that time (1863 or '64) generally in payment of debts, and whether it was not exclusively in general use? Counsel for plaintiff objected. Argument followed, and numerous authorities were cited on either side. When learned counsel will present questions of this nature, it is becoming that they be answered by the court. I expressed it then as the opinion of the court—an opinion strengthened by further reflection—that if such was the usage, it was wholly illegal, and could not be recognized.

No usage of any class of men can be supported in opposition to the established principles of law. To suffer a usage or custom of this sort to be set up would be sanctioning disobedience, and giving to disloyalty its unhallowed fruits. Yet here, in this court, it was attempted to be shown that in the year 1863, or 1864, in one of the states in insurrection, a usage or custom existed to pay monied obligations in a pretended currency, which had its origin in treason and rebellion against the lawful government of the United States. Besides, this alleged usage or custom is wanting in every requisite to make it valid; for, to be valid, it must be ancient,—of long standing and known; it must be peaceable, certain, continued, reasonable and compulsory.

It may not be wholly unnecessary to say to you, gentlemen, that it is a general principle of established law, that one owning property may, where no fraud, misrepresentations, or circumventions is put upon him, or in any wise enters into the transaction, alienate it absolutely, or qualifiedly for what currency or thing he pleases, or even give it away; but the case before you, for your present consideration, is of an entirely different character. Here a contract was made in 1859,—six thousand dollars of the principal debt to be paid some three years thereafter; and the question for your determination is, has this six thousand dollars been paid or not? I leave it with you to say.

Gentlemen: This has been a tedious case; and, although at first it seemed intricate, I think it no longer appears so. It has been most thoroughly argued by counsel; and it was a pleasing satisfaction to the court to observe how directly you gave your attention to the testimony, and to arguments presented to you. You will now retire and consider of your verdict.

Verdict: We find the bond declared upon to be the bond of the defendant, and assess damages to the plaintiff in the sum of twelve thousand dollars, with interest from the 1st day of January, 1864, two thousand dollars of the principal not yet due, one thousand to become due on the 1st day of January, 1868, with interest and one thousand dollars to become on the 1st day of January, 1869, with interest and costs of suit.

Case No. 17,755.

WILLIAMSON v. RINGGOLD.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 39.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1830.

REPLEVIN — WRONGFUL EXECUTION — TITLE OF PLAINTIFF—BURDEN OF PROOF—BILL OF SALE—FRAUD.

1. Replevin will lie for the goods of a stranger taken in execution as the goods of the debtor, if taken out of the actual or constructive possession of the plaintiff.

2. Upon the plea of property in the defendant, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff.

3. An absolute bill of sale is fraudulent as to creditors, unless accompanied and followed by possession.

Replevin for the plaintiff's goods taken in execution by the defendant [Tench Ringgold], as marshal of the District of Columbia, at the suit of Thomas Carberry v. John Wells, Jr.

Mr. Morfit, for defendant, moved the court for a return of property, on the ground that it was in the custody of the law under a fieri facias against Wells at the suit of Thomas Carberry, and cited Cromwell v. Owings, 7 Har. & J. 55, 60, 61; Meany v. Head [Case No. 9,379]; Pritchard v. Stephens, 6 Term R. 522; Thompson v. Button, 14 Johns. 84; Mills v. Martin, 19 Johns. 7; Ilsley v. Stubbs, 5 Mass. 280; and 6 Com. Dig. 490.

Mr. Coxe, contra, cited Clark v. Skinner, 20 Johns. 465.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, dissenting).

This is a replevin for the plaintiff's goods, taken on a fieri facias, against John Wells, Jr., at the suit of Thomas Carberry, issued out of this court. Mr. Morfit, for the defendant, has moved the court for a return of the goods under the act of assembly of Maryland, 1785, c. 80, § 14 (and also for a venditioni exponas), because the goods were, as it is said, in the custody of the law, and therefore could not lawfully be replevied, whether the plaintiff in replevin [James Williamson] was, or was not, the owner of the goods at the time of the taking, and whether they were taken by the marshal out of the actual possession of the plaintiff in replevin, or out of the actual possession of Wells, the debtor in the execution.

It is understood to be admitted in argument, that the goods were the property of the plaintiff in replevin, at the time of the taking by the defendant, and that the defendant took them to satisfy the execution against Wells. It is not stated whether they ever had been in the possession of the plaintiff, nor whether they were taken from the actual possession of Wells, or from the actual or constructive possession of the plaintiff. If the goods never had been in the possession of the plaintiff, they must be returned to the defendant under the act of assembly of 1785, c. 8, § 14, upon a retorno habendo bond being given by the defendant; for that act strongly implies that the return to the defendant is to be ordered of course, unless the defendant obtained the possession "forcibly or fraudulently"; or that the possession having been first in the plaintiff, "was got, or retained by the defendant, without proper authority or right derived from the plaintiff;" in which case the court is authorized "to refuse to order a return to the defendant, until a judgment is given in the action." But, upon such return, when ordered, the defendant must give bond and security to restore the goods to the plaintiff, if such should be the judgment of the court. If, therefore, the plaintiff cannot show that the defendant took the goods out of his actual or constructive possession, the return must be ordered, of course, to the defendant. Cullum v. Bevans, 6 Har. & J. 471.

The motion for a return, upon the ground, that goods in the custody of the law are not to be replevied, is, in effect, a motion to quash the replevin; for if the return should be ordered, it must be without bond; and such an order would be of course, if the plaintiff in replevin were the debtor in the writ of fieri facias; for the law, in that respect, is well settled in this country as well as in England. But it is not well settled, either there or here, that a man cannot maintain replevin for his goods taken out of his actual or constructive possession by an officer, to satisfy an execution against a third person. In some of the states it is well settled that he can. But in Maryland, the court of appeals has lately delivered a solemn opinion, that he cannot, in the case of Cromwell v. Owings, 7 Har. & J. 60, 61. In England, it will be found that every case adduced in support of the rule, that replevin will not lie for goods in the custody of the law, are cases where the plaintiff in replevin was the debtor himself. It is said to be a rule founded upon the policy of the law; and the reason given by Gilbert on Replevins (161), in the very passage relied upon in support of the rule, is, that "it would be troubling the execution awarded, if the party on whom the money was to be levied should fetch back the goods by a replevin; and, therefore, they construe such endeavors to be a contempt of their jurisdiction; and upon that account commit the offender." Goods seized and held by a trespasser, cannot, surely, be said to be in custody of the law, except as against the trespasser himself, when they are seized in execution. The policy of the law refuses him the right to question the validity of the judgment, or to deny his interest in the property, by any means that would defeat or delay the execution; but it does not refuse a third person the means of protecting his rights from illegal violation. The general rule is, that replevin will lie wherever trespass will lie for taking the plaintiff's goods. There is, however, this difference between trespass and replevin, that trespass will lie upon possession alone; but replevin requires property in the plaintiff. All that is necessary to support the action, is property in the plaintiff, either general or special, and a wrongful taking from the plaintiff's possession, either actual or constructive. The idea suggested by Blackstone, and repeated by several other elementary writers, that replevin will only lie for goods taken by distress, has no foundation.

I have not found it supported by a single adjudged case. On the contrary, the cases are abundant, from the time of the Year Books to the present moment, in which replevin has been supported for goods not taken by distress. Blackstone (3 Comm. 145b) says: "The wrongful taking of goods being thus most clearly an injury, the next consideration is, what remedy the law of England has given for it. And this is, in the first place, the restitution of the goods themselves, so wrongfully taken, with damages for the loss sustained by such unjust invasion; which is effected by action of replevin." "This obtains only in one instance of an unlawful taking, that of a wrongful distress." For this assertion, he cites no authority whatever; and it is believed none can be found. Baron Gilbert, whose Treatise upon the Law of Replevins was published some years before Blackstone's Commentaries, defines the writ of replevin thus: "A replevin is a justicial writ to the sheriff, complaining of an unjust taking and detention of goods or chattels, commanding the sheriff to deliver back the same to the owner, upon security given to make out the injustice of such taking, or else to return the goods and chattels." Gilb. Repl. 58. 2 Sell. Prac. p. 153, following Blackstone, says: "Replevin is a remedy grounded upon a distress; for goods are only replevisable when they have been taken by way of distress." But he cites no authority, except Co. Litt. 145, which gives no countenance to such a doctrine. It only shows that replevin is the proper remedy in cases of distress for rent; but not that replevin will not lie for goods not distrained. On the contrary, Lord Coke says, that when the defendant claims property, although upon the plaint the sheriff cannot try the question, "yet the plaintiff may have a writ, de proprietate probanda, directed to the sheriff, to try the property; and if, thereupon, it be found for the plaintiff, then the sheriff to make deliverance, (for so be the words of the writ); and if for the defendant, he can no further proceed. But that is but an inquest of office; and, therefore, if thereby it be found against the plaintiff, yet he may have a writ of replevy to the sheriff; and if he return the claim of property, &c., yet it shall proceed in the court of common pleas, where the property shall be put in issue and finally tried." This passage shows, that replevin will lie to try the title to goods, which have been wrongfully taken from the possession of the plaintiff.

In the action of replevin, neither the writ nor the declaration says any thing of the goods being taken as a distress. The injury complained of is, that the defendant took and unjustly detains the plaintiff's goods, not that he took them for any particular purpose. In the case of Shannon v. Shannon, 1 Schoales & L. 327, Lord Redesdale says: "Mr. Justice Blackstone's definition of the action of replevin is certainly too narrow. Many old authorities will be found (in the books) of replevin being brought where there was no distress." "It is an action founded on a taking, and the right which the party from whom the goods were taken has to have them restored to him, until the question of title to the goods is determined." In the case of Meany v. Head [Case No. 9,379], Mr. Justice Story said: "At common law, a writ of replevin never lies, unless there has been a tortious taking, either originally or by construction of law, by some act which makes the party a trespasser ab initio." In Ilsley v. Stubbs, 5 Mass. 283, Mr. Chief Justice Parsons said: "The defendant, to support his plea, has argued, that replevin at common law does not lie, unless where goods are taken by distress as a pledge. It is true, that anciently, replevin was generally sued out to replevy cattle taken by distress as a pledge; but, in fact, replevin lies for him, who has the general or special property in chattels, against him who has wrongfully taken them." So, in Shearick v. Huber, 6 Bin. 2, which was replevin against the purchaser of the plaintiff's goods, at the sheriff's sale, under a fieri facias against a stranger, Mr. Chief Justice Tilghman said: "No doubt but replevin is the proper form of action; for although, in England, this form of action has been generally confined to cases of goods distrained for rent, yet, with us, it has been used in all cases where chattels, in the possession of one person, have been claimed by another." So, in Woods v. Nixon, Add. 134, the president of the court of common pleas said: "The practice, in Pennsylvania, has been to issue replevin in all cases where a man claims property detained from him." So, in 2 Wheat. Selwyn, N. P. 896, Selwyn says, "that Blackstone's definition is too narrow;" and Mr. Wheaton, in his note, says, "that replevin lies for any tortious taking of goods from the possession of the plaintiff, and not in case of a distress only, is well settled in England, and has been recognized and adopted as sound doctrine, by the supreme court of New York." Dane, in his Abridgment (volume 5, p. 515), speaking of Blackstone's definition, says: "It has been truly observed, that this definition is too narrow." "The writ is founded on a taking, and the plaintiff's right to have the goods restored to him until the question of title to them is determined." And Daniel Dulany, in his opinion given in the year 1771, in the case of Coursey v. Wright, 1 Har. & McH. 396, says: "The case supposed, would exemplify the very definition of replevin; 'a remedy, provided by the law, for the specific recovery of personal property unjustly taken and detained;' though Blackstone says, very erroneously, that replevin is only in one instance of unlawful taking, that of a wrongful distress." In the case of Hopkins v. Hopkins, 10 Johns. 373, Mr. Chief Justice Kent said: "The action of replevin is grounded on a tortious taking, and it sounds in damages, like an action of trespass, to which it is extremely analogous, if the sheriff has already made a return (of the goods) and the plaintiff goes only for damages for the caption."

Comyns (Dig. "Replevin," A) says: "Replevin lies of all goods unlawfully taken." So, in the case of Pangburn v. Patridge, 7 Johns. 143, Mr. Justice Van Ness, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of New York, said: "The opinion I expressed, on the trial of this cause, that replevin lies only in the case of an unlawful distress, was a mistaken one. The passage to that effect in Blackstone's Commentaries, is not warranted by the books. This action is usually brought to try the legality of a distress; but it will lie for any unlawful taking of a chattel. Possession by the plaintiff, and an actual, wrongful taking by the defendant, are the only points requisite to support the action; and none of the cases, defining the nature of the action, confine it specially to the case of a chattel taken under pretence of a distress. The old authorities are, that replevin lies for goods taken tortiously, or by a trespasser, and the party injured may have replevin or trespass, at his election. This is so laid down by Gascoigne, J., 7 Hen. IV. p. 28b; and by Danby, J., 2 Edw. IV. p. 16; and by Brian, J., 6 Hen. VII. g; and these dicta are cited as good law, in Brooke, Abr. tit. 'Replevin,' pls. 36, 39, and in Rolle, Abr. tit. 'Replevin,' B. The same rule was admitted by the judges in Le Mason v. Dixon, 1 W. Jones, 173, and in Bishop v. Montague, Cro. Eliz. 824. Similar language is held in many of the modern authorities, and particularly by Baron Gilbert, Baron Comyns, and Lord Redesdale. The opinion of the latter is reported by Schoales and Lefroy, in which he lays down the law with peculiar accuracy and precision." The case from 6 Hen. VII. p. 9, is thus stated by Brooke ("Replevin," pl. 36): "A man takes my goods as a trespasser, I may have replevin, although the trespasser has property by the tort, for this is of the property which I had at the time of the caption; but I cannot have detinue, for that is of the property which is in me at the time of the action brought. (Per Brian.)" The case from the Year Book, 7 Hen. IV. p. 28b, is abridged by Brooke, tit. "Replevin," pl. 15, where he says: "By some, replevin will not lie for beasts taken contra pacem; but, per Gascoigne, he may have replevin or trespass." The case from 2 Edw. IV. p. 16, is thus abridged by Brooke, tit. "Replevin," pl. 39: "Per Danby: When a trespasser takes my goods, I may have replevin, for I may affirm the property in me, or I may have trespass, and disaffirm the property. Note. That by him, where a man delivers his goods to W. N., and a stranger takes them, yet the bailor may give them to another, and the gift is good. Littleton, contra, for the property is in the stranger; and he said well, as it seems; and yet, that replevin lies, is good law, for this is of the property which was in him at the time of caption; but in the other case, the property was not in him at the time of the gift." These cases are also cited by Rolle, in his Abridgment, tit. "Replevin," B, 2, as good law. He also says (tit. "Replevin," c. 1): "If the cattle of a man are manuring and agisting my land, levant et couchant, and are taken by strangers, I may have replevin. 42 Edw. III. p. 18; 21 Hen. VIII. p. 14b; 11 Hen. IV. p. 17, and 2 Edw. III. p. 44." The case of Leonard v. Stacy, 6 Mod. 68, was replevin for goods, of which the plaintiff had been cheated.

It is admitted, on all hands, that "property in the defendant," or even "in a stranger," is a good plea. It follows, therefore, that when the property is taken by the defendant, from the possession of the plaintiff, under the claim of title, replevin is the proper action to try that title. But the plaintiff in replevin cannot be supposed to know, beforehand, what pretence the defendant may set up as an excuse for the taking; and whether that excuse be true or not cannot be known until the trial, so that it cannot be said, in any case where the taking of the plaintiff's goods has been from the possession of the plaintiff himself, that replevin will not lie. It is true, that in many such cases of taking, replevin cannot be maintained, because, upon the trial, it may turn out that the taking was lawful; but still, in those cases, replevin is the proper action to try the lawfulness of the taking, and the court will not quash the writ before that question is decided, unless the writ shall have been issued under such circumstances as to be a contempt of the court. Gilb. Repl. 161. This happens when the improper interference of one of the parties in the cause obstructs the execution of the judgment of the court. In such a case, it is considered as a constructive contempt. The general rule, then, is clearly established, that replevin will lie for every wrongful taking of the plaintiff's goods out of his possession. But there is said to be an exception to this general rule, and that is, where the goods are in the custody of the law.

It may be well here to inquire, in what cases goods are said to be "in the custody of the law."

1. When cattle are justly seized for rent arrear, or for damage feasant, and impounded, but not before they are impounded. Thus, Gilbert on Replevins (Ed. 1757, pp. 61, 62) says: "'Tis to be observed that there are two things complained of in this writ, viz., the taking and detention of the pledges, as the words of the writ express it, quæ cepit et injuste detinet; but what is principally controverted in replevin is, whether the taking be just or not. For there are but two cases wherein a distress, justly taken, whether for rent or damage feasant, can be unlawfully detained. The first is, where the arrears of rent, or amends for the damage, are tendered to the party distraining; and this tender must be made before the beasts are impounded; for, when the beasts are in the custody of the law, the person distraining cannot be said unlawfully to detain what is in the custody of the law."

2. When goods are distrained for fines, or taxes, or by way of execution upon convictions before inferior tribunals, they are in the custody of the law; as in Rex v. Burchet, 8 Mod. 208; Marriott v. Shaw, Comyn, 274; and Rex v. Monkhouse, 2 Strange, 1184, which were convictions under the game laws. Winard v. Foster, 2 Lutw. 1191, where goods were taken by attachment, to enforce payment of the judgment of an inferior court. Aylesbury v. Harvey, 3 Lev. 204, where a silver cup was seized, upon a condemnation by justices of the peace, under the excise acts, for the non-entry of strong waters. Gins v. Dams, 2 Lutw. 1179, where cattle were taken by a warrant of two justices, for a poor rate; Clift, Ent. 636, for a militia fine; Lev. Ent. 152, on a conviction of fraud upon the excise; Lukin v. Eve, Moore, 89, for amercement in a court leet; Co. Ent. 570b, 572a, 573a; Fletcher v. Ingram, 5 Mod. 124; Stephens v. Haughton, 2 Strange, 847; Tott v. Ingram, 1 Brownl. & G. 185; Id. 189. So, for breach of a by-law, Winch. Ent. 90; 3 Wils. 155. So, for a poor-rate, Milward v. Caffin, 2 W. Bl. 1330. So, for a judgment of commissioners of sewers. Pritchard v. Stephens, 6 Term R. 522. These were all cases where the goods were clearly in the custody of the law, and yet there was no question that replevin would lie. In many of them the plaintiff recovered, and in all of them the causes appear to have been tried upon their merits, except the case of Rex v. Monkhouse, 2 Strange, 1184, where the court granted an attachment against the undersheriff for granting a replevin for goods seized under a conviction, by an inferior tribunal, for deer-stealing. It is a very short note of a case, and it does not appear whether the replevin was quashed, nor whether the officer was punished for the contempt. But in a preceding case (Rex v. Burchett, 1 Strange, 567), which was replevin for goods taken upon a distress, under the game laws, the court discharged the rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue against the officer who issued the replevin, and refused to set aside or quash the replevin (s. c. in 8 Mod. 208). The reason given for discharging the rule was, "that it was only a contempt to the inferior jurisdiction of the justices, and, in that case, the B. R. never interposes."

3. A third case, where goods are said to be in the custody of the law, is, where they have been seized in execution, upon a writ of fieri facias, or attachment issuing from a superior court. In this case, it is admitted, on all hands, that the debtor himself will not be permitted to replevy them out of the hands of the officer; but this cannot be on the ground that the goods are in the custody of the law, for they are equally in the custody of the law when distrained and impounded for rent arrear, or for damage feasant, or for taxes, or for fines, or by way of execution of the judgments of inferior tribunals; and yet the books are full of cases of replevin for goods thus seized, and in custody of the law. It is only upon the ground of constructive contempts of court, out of court, that the superior tribunals in England have restrained the issuing of a replevin, where the debtor, or any party to a suit in those tribunals, has attempted to obstruct the execution of their judgments.

Thus, Gilbert on Replevins (161) says: "If a superior jurisdiction award an execution, it seems that no replevin lies for the goods taken by the sheriff by virtue of the execution, and if any person should pretend to take out a replevin and execute it, the court of justice would commit them for a contempt of their jurisdiction, because, by every execution the goods are in the custody of the law, and the law ought to guard them; and it would be troubling the execution awarded, if the party on whom the money was to be levied, should fetch back the goods by a replevin; and therefore they construe such endeavors to be a contempt of their jurisdiction, and, upon that account, commit the offender. But if any inferior jurisdiction issues an execution, a replevin will lie for the goods taken by that execution; because the inferior jurisdiction, being restrained within particular limits, the officer who took the goods is obliged to show that he took the goods within those limits; and that the inferior court, which issued the execution, did not exceed their authority in issuing it. Besides, an inferior court cannot commit for contempt out of the court; and hence it is that the officer of an inferior court is to show by what authority he took the goods. Thus, in a replevin the defendant was put to justify by a condemnation before a justice of peace for not entering of strong waters; and a warrant, on that, for levying 20s. fine on the plaintiff." Aylesbury v. Harvey, 3 Lev. 204.

The distinction here taken, between the proceedings of courts of superior and inferior jurisdiction, is very just, because every thing is presumed to be within the cognizance of a court of superior jurisdiction which is not clearly shown to be out of it; and nothing is presumed to be within the cognizance of the inferior tribunal unless clearly shown to be within it. Hence, prima facie the proceedings of a court of general jurisdiction are right; but those of a court of limited jurisdiction are wrong unless every thing appears upon the face of the proceedings which is necessary to give jurisdiction to the tribunal. Therefore, as the debtor is not bound to admit more than appears on the face of an execution issuing from a court of limited jurisdiction, and as such executions do not, on their face, show all that is necessary to support the jurisdiction, he is permitted to put the officer or the creditor upon the proof of that jurisdiction; and the means afforded him is a writ of replevin, to try the lawfulness of the distress, or of the caption of the goods. It is true that the judgment and the execution of an inferior or limited tribunal, are as valid, in all matters within its jurisdiction, as those of a court of general jurisdiction; but the question, of jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal, is always open; and he cannot be "construed" to be guilty of a contempt, who only takes the usual legal means of trying the lawfulness of that seizure of his goods which has been made under the process of a court of doubtful jurisdiction. It is only where the issuing or the service of the writ of replevin can be punished as a contempt of the court from which the execution issued, that the books show that replevin will not lie for goods taken in execution. The books, however, are incorrect in saying that in such cases replevin will not lie. They only mean to say that the party serving the writ will be liable to attachment for his contempt in obstructing the execution of the judgment of the court, and that the court will, perhaps, quash the writ which is the means of that obstruction. The additional reason, therefore, given by Gilbert, is a sound one, why the rule is only applicable to goods taken by execution from the superior courts; to wit, that they only can punish for constructive contempts out of court. The ideas of Gilbert upon this point are strongly supported by Chief Baron Eyre, in giving his opinion in the case of Cawthorne v. Campbell, cited in Anstr. 206, 212. The question was upon the authority of the court of exchequer to remove into that court, from another court an action of trespass brought against the commissioners of excise. The chief baron placed the authority to remove the cause upon the ground of the action being a contempt of the prerogative of the king in relation to his revenue; and, in page 212, speaking of a case decided in the time of Henry the 7th, he says: "In this, they evidently proceeded upon a general analogy to the proceedings in other courts; for there is no court that suffers its process, either to be insulted, or to be materially interrupted; and whenever this is attempted, it is a contempt, upon which the court proceed to grant attachments in the first instance." "But that this jurisdiction is not a very novel thing, nor this a single instance, we may collect from other cases that are very clearly established; namely, that if a man, at this day, there being a seizure in order to condemnation, was to presume to replevy the goods, it would be a contempt of the court for which an attachment would be granted instantly." "So if a distress is taken for a fee-farm rent, or other duty to the crown, it is considered a contempt to replevy; and an attachment will issue upon it, as appears by the case of Rex v. Oliver, Bunb. 14." "Originally, therefore, it seems to me, that to call into question, or in any manner to interrupt the course of the prerogative jurisdiction, was treated as a contempt of the process of the court, and proceeded against immediately as such."

The only cases cited in support of the rule, that goods taken in execution cannot be re-plevied, are cases of contempt; unless the loose dictum of Bacon in his Abridgment, tit. "Replevin," C, respecting Bradshaw's Case, and the dictum of Mr. Justice Powell, there referred to, can be called cases, when none of the facts of the cases are stated, nor any book referred to in which they can be found. Bacon says, upon his own authority, that "it was ruled, in the case of one Bradshaw, (T. 12, W. 3, in C. B.) that when an act of parliament orders a distress and sale of goods, this is in the nature of an execution, and replevin does not lie; but if the sheriff grants one, yet it is not such a contempt as to grant an attachment against him. And Powell, Justice, said, he remembered a case in the exchequer, where a distress was taken for a fee-farm rent due to the king, yet, upon debate in the court, no attachment was granted, though it was the king's case." In these cases there was neither an actual nor a constructive contempt of the authority of any court; for the first case supposes a distress and sale under an act of parliament; and the other was a distress for rent; when, therefore, it is said, that in such cases replevin will not lie, I understand the expression to mean no more than that replevin cannot be maintained. Thus, it is said generally, that replevin lies only for a wrongful taking; meaning that it can be maintained in such case only; not that it will not lie to try the question whether wrongful or not.

In the note in the new edition of Bacon's Abridgment (Phila. 1811, vol. 6, p. 56), it is said: "A replevin does not lie for goods seized by warrant of a justice of the peace upon a conviction for destruction of the game, &c. Semb: 2 Mod. Cas. 208, 209." This reference is, no doubt, to the case of Rex v. Burchet (B. R. 10 Geo. 1724), reported in 1 Mod. Cas. (8 Mod.) 208, 209, which was this: "One Burchett was convicted by a justice of peace for keeping dogs, nets, and ferrets to catch conies, not being qualified, &c. And by a warrant from the said justice, his goods were distrained for the forfeiture; and whilst they were in possession of the constable, and before they were sold, the town-clerk granted a replevin to take them from the constable. And now it was moved to set the replevin aside, because goods, thus taken by distress on such convictions, are irrepleviable; and for an attachment against the town-clerk. The court would not set aside the replevin; but made a rule to show cause why an attachment should not go." This case appears again in 1 Strange, 567, under the name of Rex v. Burchett, thus: "The court ordered an attachment nisi against the town-clerk of Guilford, and a defendant convicted on the game act, for granting and issuing out a replevin for goods distrained for the penalty; but on showing cause at the next term when Eyre, Justice, only was present, he discharged the rule, because it was only a contempt to the inferior jurisdiction of the justices, and, in that case, B. R. never interposes." This case, then, is a direct authority against the principle which it is cited to establish; for the court both refused to quash the replevin and to issue an attachment of contempt for issuing it. There is also in the same edition of Bacon's Abridgment (volume 6, p. 56) this other note (a) to the Case of Bradshaw, there cited: "But now, in such cases, it is considered as a contempt for a party to replevy; and an attachment will issue upon it. Rex v. Oliver, Bunb. 14." I have not seen Bunbury's report of that case; but it is a case of a fee-farm rent due to the king, cited by Chief Baron Eyre, in the case in Anstruther, before mentioned. It was a prerogative case in the exchequer, and therefore gives no support to the rule respecting goods taken in execution from an inferior court; except, that it shows that contempt, and not mere custody of the law, is the ground of the rule. The note goes on further to say, that "replevin does not lie for goods distrained on a conviction for deer-stealing; and if a sheriff grants it, an attachment shall go against him. Rex v. Monkhouse, 2 Strange, 1184." The whole case in Strange is in these words: "The court granted an attachment against the under-sheriff of Cumberland for granting a replevin of goods distrained on a conviction for deer-stealing." This is the whole case; and yet it seems to be the principal authority upon which all the books rely to support the principle, that goods taken under an execution from an inferior court cannot be replevied; although in many preceding cases of that kind, as we have before seen, replevin was maintained. Mr. Durnford, in his note to the case of Pearson v. Roberts, in Willes, 672, in controverting the position of Chief Baron Gilbert, that replevin will lie for goods taken by an execution issued by an inferior jurisdiction, says, that "the two reasons given by Gilbert, by no means warrant it." "His first reason," says Mr. Durnford, "falls, if the officer took the goods within the limits of the particular jurisdiction, and if the inferior court did not exceed their authority in issuing the execution; in short, if it be a legal execution regularly executed." Surely Mr. Durnford could not mean to say that this is a reason why replevin should not lie to try the question, whether the goods were taken within the limited jurisdiction, and whether the court did not exceed its jurisdiction in issuing the execution. If he did, it is a petitio principii. As well might he say, that for goods lawfully taken as a distress for rent replevin will not lie, in order to try the question, whether lawfully taken or not.

The question which Gilbert was discussing, was not whether replevin could be maintained for goods lawfully taken in execution, but whether it will lie for goods taken in execution, whether lawfully or unlawfully; that is, whether the plaintiff will be permitted to commence that sort of action to try the lawfulness of the taking, and to get back his goods while that question shall be pending. Mr. Durnford's argument only goes to show, that the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover upon the trial, not that he might not commence the suit. "And with regard to the second reason," Mr. Durnford says, "it does not follow, because an inferior court cannot commit for a contempt out of court, that therefore a replevin will lie; the want of authority to inflict one particular (and that an extraordinary) punishment for doing the thing, does not prove that the thing itself may be legally done."

Here is the begging of another principle; to wit, that the rule is not grounded, as Gilbert supposed, upon the doctrine of constructive contempts. If the rule be grounded entirely upon that doctrine, then the rule does not apply to those tribunals towards which there can be no constructive contempt. Mr. Durnford observes: "The only authority cited by Gilbert in support of this opinion, is the case of Aylesbury v. Harvey, 3 Lev. 204, of which," he says, "it is sufficient to observe, 1st, that this question was neither agitated at the bar nor decided by the bench; and 2d, that the judgment of the court was against the plaintiff in replevin." Now, it was because the question was not agitated nor decided by the bench, that Gilbert cited it as authority, that whenever the defendant in replevin justifies under the authority of a tribunal of limited jurisdiction, he must show that he took the goods within the limits, and that the inferior court did not exceed its jurisdiction; and that replevin will lie for goods taken under the authority of such a limited jurisdiction. For it will be seen, by the pleadings in that case, which are given at full length in Lev. Ent. 152, that the defendants had able counsel, and that their plea sets forth every particular necessary to give jurisdiction to the court, and to justify the caption of the goods; which particularity would have been unnecessary, if it were sufficient merely to show that the goods were taken under an execution issued by such a court. That such a point should not have been suggested, either by the bar or the bench, is strong evidence that such was not then the law. Mr. Durnford proceeds:—"But in opposition to this opinion" (of Gilbert) "may be placed Bradshaw's Case, 6 Bac. Abr. 55; Rex v. Sheriff of Leicestershire, 1 Barnard. 110; Rex v. Monkhouse, 2 Strange, 1184; and Rex v. Burchet, Id., note 1." The Case of Bradshaw has been mentioned before, as being very loosely reported. It merely states, "that a distress and sale, under an act of parliament, is in the nature of an execution, and replevin does not lie; yet the issuing of it is no contempt." The particular circumstances of the case, and the grounds of the decision are not stated, nor what effect the decision had upon the cause; whether to quash the writ, or to guide the jury in their verdict, or to arrest the judgment. So loose a case cannot be considered as entitled to any authority. The next case arrayed against the chief baron, is Rex v. Sheriff of Leicestershire, reported, as it is said, in 1 Barnard. 110. This case I have never seen. Mr. Durnford has not given us the substance of it; but it is sufficient to say, with Lord Kenyon (1 East, 642), "that Barnardiston was a bad reporter;" and with Lord Mansfield, (2 Burrows, 1142,) that "it was marvellous to those who knew the serjeant, and his manner of taking notes, that he should so often stumble upon what was right; but yet that there was not one case in his book which was so throughout."

The next case, which is to put down the authority of Gilbert, is Rex v. Monkhouse, before mentioned, and reported in two lines and a half. These, and the Case of Burchet, said to be in a note to the case of Rex v. Monkhouse, in Strange, 1184, but which is not in my edition, and which, no doubt, is the case which I have already cited from 8 Mod. 208, 209, and Strange, 567, constitute the whole array, in opposition to the deliberate opinion of Gilbert, in a well considered treatise upon the subject, supported by the large number of cases already cited, and many more, which I have omitted to notice, in which replevin has been maintained for goods taken by way of execution of the judgments of inferior tribunals. Mr. Durnford, indeed, cites two cases which are against him, and endeavors to avoid their force. The first is Milward v. Caffin, 2 W. Bl. 1330, which was replevin for goods taken under a warrant of distress, by two justices of the peace, for poor-rates. The defendant justified under the statutes of 43 Eliz. and 17 Geo. II. as overseers of the poor; and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. Mr. Durnford supposes he evades the force of this case, by saying that the justices exceeded their authority; and that "the goods were not, in contemplation of law, taken under an execution." But that could not be ascertained until the trial; and it was to try that very question that the writ was issued and held to lie. If the justices had jurisdiction, the goods were taken under an execution; if they had not jurisdiction, they were not. This was the very point tried in the cause, and to try which the writ was issued; so that replevin will lie, whether the justices have jurisdiction or not, because it must lie before that question can be decided. The other case cited by Mr. Durnford is Pritchard v. Stephens, 6 Term R. 522, which was a rule to show cause why a replevin for goods taken under a warrant of distress, granted by commissioners of sewers, should not be quashed. The counsel in support of the rule, contended that the goods in question could not be replevied at all, and cited the following passage from Callis, 220, (a book which I have never seen:) "If, upon a judgment given in the king's court, or upon a decree made in this court of sewers, a writ or warrant of distringas ad reparationem, or of that nature, be awarded, and the party's goods be thereby taken, these goods ought not to be delivered by replevin, to be taken either out of this court, or out of any other court of the king; because it is an execution out of a judgment." And the counsel stated, that Callis, in page 197, takes a distinction between those goods that remain in the custody of the officer under the seizure, and those that afterwards come into the hands of a purchaser, saying that the former are not replevisable; and that Callis also, in page

195, in distinguishing inferior from superior courts, says of the former, "a replevin doth not lie, and ought not to be granted from the sheriff, or any of his deputies, for that the sewer is a judicial court of record, and of greater authority than the power of the sheriff, which, in these cases, is but ministerial."

The counsel, on the other side, said, "It is not necessary to controvert the opinions of Callis, which have been relied on by the defendant; (though it might be shown, if necessary, that those opinions are not tenable,) because no judgment was in fact given by the commissioners of sewers." The court said, that, "at all events, this was a reason why they ought not to interfere in this summary way, by quashing the proceedings, but should leave it to the defendant to put his objection on record in a formal manner; and in the course of the argument, Lorn Kenyon, C. J., expressed very strong doubts respecting the opinions cited from Callis." The rule was discharged, and we have heard no more of the cause. These opinions of Callis, respecting which Lord Kenyon expressed such strong doubts, are the very opinions which Mr. Durnford attempts to support, in his note to the case of Pearson v. Roberts.

But it is not true, as Mr. Durnford alleged, that the only authority cited by Gilbert was the case of Aylesbury v. Harvey. He cited also the case of Winnard v. Foster, Lutw. 1191; Rast. Ent. 275, (probably a misprint for 553;); Brooke, Abr. "Replevin," pl. 22; 38 Eliz. III., 3; Lev. Ent. 152, all strongly supporting his opinion. The case of Winnard v. Foster, Lutw. 1191, was replevin for a cow, a stack of hay, and a pike of hay. The defendant made cognizance as bailiff of the sheriff, and set forth, in his cognizance, that the cow and hay were in the possession of one Nathaniel Day. That one William Dawson, at a county court of the said county, produced a writ of justices to the sheriff, by which he was commanded to justice the said Nathaniel Day that he render to the said William Dawson £14, which he owed him, &c., &c., stating, in a minute manner, all the proceedings in the county court; the levying the plaint; the summons delivered to the bailiff, and his return; the failure of Day to appear; the order for attachment by his goods, and the service thereof upon the goods in question as the goods of the said Nathaniel Day. The plaintiff replied, that, at the time of the caption, he was in possession of the cow and hay as of his own goods and chattels, and denied that Nathaniel Day was possessed of them as his goods and chattels at the time of caption; upon which traverse the issue was joined; and the jury found the issue for the defendant as to the cow, and for the plaintiff as to the hay: and the plaintiff had judgment for the damages and costs as to the hay, and the defendant had judgment for the return of the cow, and for his costs. This case shows that replevin will lie for goods taken by attachment from an inferior court; and that it was supposed, at least by the defendant's counsel, necessary to set out, in the plea, minutely, all the circumstances which gave jurisdiction to the court under whose process the defendant justified the caption. The ancient forms of entries and pleadings are evidence of the law.

Gilbert referred to Rastell's Entries, although the page (275) cited, is evidently a mistake, yet in folio 553, we find the form of an avowry for an amercement, or fine in the leet, hundred, or torn, in which everything necessary to show the jurisdiction is minutely set forth with all the circumstances of time, place, &c. He also referred to Lev. Ent. 152, which contains the pleadings at large in the case of Aylesbury v. Harvey, cited by him from 3 Lev. 204. He also referred to Brooke, Abr. tit. "Replevin," pl. 22, which contains an abridgment of the Year Book, 28 Eliz. III. 3, in these words (translated): "Replevin: the defendant avowed for this, that he had recovered 38s. in the court baron, by plaint there, and these beasts were delivered to him in execution of the judgment, and issue taken that they were not delivered to him in execution." These authorities, cited by Gilbert, are, to my mind, much more satisfactory in favor of his opinion than those cited by Mr. Durnford are against it.

It seems to me, very clearly, that the rule contended for, (to the extent to which it has been actually carried by adjudged cases,) is not founded upon the fact alone that the goods are in the custody of the law; but upon the right and duty of the court to enforce its judgment against the parties to the suit, and upon its power to punish, as for a contempt, any endeavor, by a party, to obstruct or defeat the execution. And I find my opinion strongly corroborated by that of the celebrated Maryland lawyer, Daniel Dulany, in the case, already alluded to, of Coursey v. Wright, in 1 Har. & McH. 394. The question, which he was discussing, was, whether Thomas Coursey could have brought replevin against T. Wright, while he, T. Wright, had possession of the property under his replevin against John Coursey. Mr. Dulany said, "I have little doubt but he might." "The transaction being inter alios, as it cannot affect the right, so neither can it affect the remedy, which is inseparable from the right. The cases in 5 Mod., Gilbert and Strange, proceed on a peculiar principle. When goods belonging to a defendant are taken in execution on fieri facias, or by distress on conviction, they being in the custody of an officer, acting under the mandate of authority, are in the custody of the law for the very purpose that justice may be done; but if the replevin, by the defendant, were allowable, the views of justice might be disappointed, and the very object of the judgment destroyed; but if the property of a stranger should be taken, it would be a wrong, and consequently the thing taken would not be in custody of the law. In the first instance it would be incongruous for the law to allow a process to defeat its ends; but in the second, very agreeable to its principles that a man should not suffer an injury from the act of a stranger. Execution authorizes the officer only to make, or levy the debt or penalty, out of the chattels of the defendant; but in taking, for the purpose, the chattels of another person, he acts without authority. If the sheriff, on a fi. fa. against the effects of A, takes and sells the goods of B, the owner may sue him. 1 Burrows, 31. In replevin, if the plaintiff shows the cattle of a stranger for the cattle of J. D. and the officer takes them, he is a trespasser. 2 Rolle, Abr. tit. 'Replevin,' 431." "In case of distress for rent arrear, the goods, from the first taking, are in the custody of the law, and not merely in the distrainer (3 W. Bl. 146); but their being in this custody does not prevent the suit by replevin; on the contrary, the suit is most proper in the very instance. When replevin is brought, the defendant may defend his possession, if he has property, by the writ of de proprietate probanda. As he has the means to secure his possession, and as if the defendant in replevin should fail, the defendant may be entitled to a retorno habendo, it might be reasonable, (as full justice might be obtained without it,) to say that the defendant in replevin should not, during the pendency of the suit, bring replevin on his part, as it would tend to infiniteness. But the case of a stranger is very different. He cannot make himself party to the suit; entitle himself to the writ de proprietate probanda (2 Rolle, Abr. 431), or to a return, in any event of the suit. Not being provided for, or having the means of security afforded him on the suit, he consequently has a remedy by action against the possessor; for there cannot be an irremediable right; and it would shock the first principles of justice to allow that what A. B. may do shall deprive C. of his right. The true legal ground of replevin is the unjust taking and detaining of personal property; and of the remedy, that the owner may be specifically restored to it, and compensated for the injury from the unjust detention." "A denial of justice is injustice; suspension is deprivation for the time. Injury is not denominated from its degree." In Maryland, the opinions of Mr. Dulany, when deliberately given, have ranked almost, if not quite as high in the scale of authority, as cases adjudged in the highest tribunals of the state during his time. That which I have cited recommends itself to every reflecting mind by its sound sense combined with its sound law.

In the present case it is not necessary to decide whether replevin will lie for goods taken in execution issued by a court of limited or inferior jurisdiction, because the execution against Wells was from this court, which is a court of general jurisdiction. It became important, however, to investigate that doctrine, with a view to ascertain the ground upon which the rule rests, that goods taken in execution cannot be replevied, and the extent of that rule. It is with that view only that the note of Mr. Durnford has been so minutely examined. With regard to the extent of the rule, I have found no adjudged case, except that of Cromwell v. Owings, 7 Har. & J. 55, in which the rule has been extended to a third person, whose goods have been taken out of his actual or constructive possession, to satisfy the debt of another person. All the cases of replevin cited in support of the rule, are cases in which the debtor himself was plaintiff in replevin. Such was Pearson v. Roberts, Willes, 672; Milward v. Caffin, 2 W. Bl. 1330, cited in Pearson v. Roberts, and all the cases cited in Mr. Durnford's note to that case, namely: Aylesbury v. Harvey, 3 Lev. 204; Bradshaw's Case, Bac. Abr. "Replevin," c.; Rex v. Sheriff of Leicestershire, 1 Barnard. 110; Rex v. Monkhouse, 2 Strange, 1184; Rex v. Burchet, Id. note 1; and Pritchard v. Stephens, 6 Term R. 522. So, also, were the other cases of replevin cited by the defendant's counsel in the case of Cromwell v. Owings, except the case of Ladd v. North, 2 Mass. 514, which was replevin by a third person; but no question was made whether it would lie. The case of Thompson v. Button, 14 Johns. 84, is decidedly against the rule in the extent contended for; because the replevin was sustained and judgment rendered for the plaintiff. But there the plaintiff was not the debtor in the execution, and the goods were taken out of the possession of the plaintiff. The case of Eaton v. Southby, Willes, 136, was a replevin by the vendee of the sheriff for corn sold under an execution against a former tenant, and distrained by the landlord for arrears of rent due from a subsequent tenant, the corn having been sold before it was reaped, and distrained after it was cut, and before it was fit, in the course of husbandry, to be carried away by the vendee. The question was, whether the corn could be distrained under those circumstances; and the court was of opinion that it could not, even if it had not been taken in execution, because the former tenant, being tenant at will, and his tenancy determined by his death, he had a right to keep the corn on the ground until, in the usual course of husbandry, it was fit to be carried away. The only part of that case applicable to the present, is the dictum "that goods taken in execution, or distrained for damage feasant, are in the custody and under the protection of the law, and therefore cannot be distrained for rent," which dictum, in regard to goods taken in execution, is not supported by the reference to Co. Litt. 47a.

The case of Alexander v. Mahon, 11 Johns. 185, cited in Cromwell v. Owings, was an action of trover, and was probably cited for a similar dictum, that goods, seized under execution, are in the custody of the law, and therefore not distrainable; and for the reason assigned. "For it is repugnant, ex vi termini, that it should be lawful to take the goods out of the custody of the law." In that case the goods were lawfully taken in execution, and therefore were in the custody of the law; but it would be equally repugnant, ex vi termini, to say that goods unlawfully taken and detained, were in the custody of the law. The case of Palgrave v. Windham, 1 Strange, 212, was an action upon the case by a landlord against the officer who took the tenant's goods in execution, and removed them from the premises without paying one year's rent to the landlord; and I do not find in it any point or dictum applicable to the case of Cromwell v. Owings, in which it was cited. The case of Buxton v. Home, 1 Show, 174, was debt upon a judgment. The defendant pleaded that he was taken in execution and permitted to escape with the consent of the plaintiff, which plea was adjudged bad on demurrer. There seems to be nothing in that case applicable to the case in which it was cited, or to the present. The next case cited in Cromwell v. Owings, is Farr v. Newman, 4 Term R. 640, 651. The question, in that case, was, whether the sheriff, upon a feri facias against the executor, for his own proper debt, could make the money out of the goods of the testator in the hands of the executor to be administered; and so force him to a devastavit, after notice by a creditor of the testator that he had judgment against the executor, de bonis testatoris, and an execution which he was about to levy on the same goods. It was an action upon the case against the sheriff for a false return of nulla bona testatoris upon that execution. The judgment of the court, (Buller, J., dissenting,) was for the plaintiff. The page 640, referred to in Cromwell v. Owings, contains a part of Mr. Justice Buller's argument against the opinion of the court; and probably the following passage was cited: "How is the sheriff to try any one of these questions? It should be enough for him that the goods are in the possession of the debtor, and used by him as his own. When the plaintiff's execution came to the sheriffs' hands they could not take these goods under it. The writ commanded the sheriff to levy the debt of the goods and chattels of the testator in the hands of Reid and his wife to be administered. These goods were not then in their hands, but they were in the hands of the sheriff, and in custodiâ legis; and in Holt, 643, and 1 Show, 174, it was resolved by Holt, C. J., that goods being once seized and in custody of the law, could not be seized again by the same or any other sheriffs." "So the sheriff cannot take goods which have been distrained. Tulley v. Peachey, Hill, 23; Geo. III." But to this Lord Kenyon, C. J., answered, in page 651: "As to the expression cited from Shower to show that goods once seized cannot be seized again, it must mean, when they are legally seized; for if any thing happen to disaffirm the first seizure, and to show that it was not legal, it is considered as no seizure in law; and the word seizure, is, in such a case, misapplied."

The case of Turner v. Fendall, cited from 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 117, does not seem to have any bearing upon the case. Nor do the other cases of Ball v. Ryers, 3 Caines, 84, and Sturtevant v. Ballard, 9 Johns. 337. The case of Ilseley v. Stubbs, 5 Mass. 230, was replevin against a defendant who had obtained possession of the goods by replevin against a third person. The defendant pleaded that fact, and that his suit against the stranger was still pending. This plea was adjudged bad on demurrer. If there was any thing in that case applicable to the case of Cromwell v. Owings, it was against the party who cited it; for the judgment was in favor of the plaintiff in replevin against the defendant, who claimed protection under the rule, that the goods were in custody of the law, they having been delivered to him by replevin, and he having given bond to return them in case it should so be adjudged. But it is probable that it was cited for the dictum of Chief Justice Parsons, that "replevin lies for him, who has the general or special property in chattels, against him who has wrongfully taken them; but chattels, in the custody of the law, cannot, at common law, be replevied; as goods taken by distress upon a conviction before a justice, or goods taken in execution." "But if the goods are wrongfully taken by virtue of legal process, the remedy of the owner was by action of trespass or trover against the officer. For the common law would not grant process to take, from an officer, chattels which he had taken by legal process already issued; but the common law has, in this respect, been altered by the statute of 1789 (chapter 26, § 4). This statute authorizes the suing of a replevin against the officer for chattels which he has attached, or seized in execution, provided the plaintiff in replevin be not the debtor. This alteration of the common law has been productive of much practical inconvenience, but it must rest with the wisdom of the legislature to decide whether the common law, in this respect, should or should not be restored. As a general principle, the owner of a chattel may take it, by replevin, from any person whose possession is unlawful; unless it is the custody of the law; or unless it has been taken by replevin from him, by the party in possession." All this is mere dictum, not at all necessary to the decision of the question before the court. It has already been shown that goods, in the custody of the law, may be replevied; as in the case of goods distrained and impounded for rent, or damage-feasant, or for poor-rates, or for fines upon convictions before justices of the peace, and other inferior tribunals; and that in every case where it has been adjudged that goods taken in execution could not be replevied, the debtor himself was the plaintiff in replevin. But the chief justice, (for whom while living I had the highest respect, and whose memory I revere,) proceeded to say: "If goods are wrongfully taken by virtue of legal process, the remedy of the owner was by action of trespass or trover against the officer." No goods can be taken by virtue of process which does not authorize the taking of them; nor can the process authorize a wrongful taking. Burnley v. Lambert, 1 Wash. [Va.] 308, 310, 312. If then the goods were wrongfully taken, they could not be taken by virtue of the process. The execution only authorizes the officer to take the goods of the debtor. If he take the goods of a stranger, he may take them under color of the execution, but not by virtue of the execution. If he took them by virtue of the execution he would not be a trespasser, which the chief justice admits he would be. Again, the chief justice says: "For the common law would not grant process to take from an officer, chattels which he had taken by legal process already issued." If the word "by" means "by authority of," then the taking by the officer was rightful; and if so, the proposition is correct as a proposition; but not as a reason why the owner of goods, wrongfully taken by the officer, should be confined to his action of trespass or trover. The chief justice further states that the common law in that respect was altered by the statute of Massachusetts which authorizes the suing of a writ of replevin against the officer for chattels seized by him in execution, provided the plaintiff in replevin be not the debtor. Of the correctness of that proposition I doubt. (1) Because it was never a rule of the common law, that goods, in the custody of the law, could not, for that reason alone, be replevied; as has been already shown. (2) Because no adjudged case has been found in the English books in which it has been decided, that a stranger to the execution could not maintain replevin against the sheriff for wrongfully taking his goods for the debt of another. (3) Because, at the time of the passing of the first colonial statute of Massachusetts, in 1641, the law was well settled in England, that, in many instances, where goods were in the custody of the law, they might be replevied; as in case of goods distrained and impounded, either with or without good cause. Co. Litt. 47b. Goods distrained for an amercement in a court-leet. Lukin v. Eve, Moore, 88, 10 Eliz., Anno 1567; Joyner v. Skype, Co. Ent. 570b; Pasc. 36, Eliz. Anno 1593, in communi Banco, Rótulo, 1260. And Lord Coke, in his preface, says: "That for thy further satisfaction, learned reader, every precedent hath a true reference to the court, yeare, term, number, roll, and record where the precedent is to be found." And Ashhurst, J., in Farr v. Newman, 4 Term R. 648, says that the form of proceedings and judgment "is of greater authority than even adjudged cases; because the writs and records form the law of the land." So, in Kingston v. Bayly, Co. Ent. 572a, Trin. 30, Eliz., Rot. 1012, C. B. Anno 1588; Hassell v.

Wilkes, Co. Ent. 573a, Mich. 8 Jac.; Rot. 2119, Anno 1610; Godfrey's Case, 11 Coke, 43, Mich. 12 Jac., Anno 1614; Freeman v. Abbot of Ramsay, cited in 11 Coke, 43a, from the Year Book 10 Edw. III., fols. 9, 10, Anno 1336; Griesley's Case, 8 Coke, 38, Trin. 30, Eliz., Anno 1588; Porter v. Gray, Cro. Eliz. 245, Mich. 33, 34, Eliz., Anno 1591; Tott v. Ingram, 1 Brownl. & G. 185, 4 Jac., Anno 1606; Godfrey v. Builein, 1 Brownl. & G. 189, 8 Jac., Anno 1610; Aylesbury v. Harvey, 3 Lev. 204; Lev. Ent. 152, S. C. 36, Car. 2, Anno 1684, for goods taken upon a conviction under the excise acts. Winnard v. Foster, 2 Lutw. 1190, Trin. 3 Wand. M. Anno 1691, for goods attached for a debt in the county court. Gins v. Dams, 2 Lutw. 1179, Hill, 9, Wm. III., Anno 1697, for goods taken under a warrant of two justices of the peace for non-payment of a poor-rate. Fletcher v. Ingram, 5 Mod. 127, Trin. 7 Wm. III., Anno 1695, for an amendment by a court-leet, for not serving as constable. Clift, Ent. 636, for goods taken by distress for a militia fine. And even as late as 4 Cro. 1, Anno 1718, in the case of Marriott v. Shaw, Comyns, 274, replevin was maintained for goods taken for a fine upon a conviction by a justice of the peace under the game acts. All these were cases of replevin for goods in the custody of the law, and yet no question was made whether replevin would lie, although brought by the debtors themselves. These cases, (and many more might be cited,) extend from the Year Book of Edward III., in 1336, to 4 Geo. I., in 1718, more than three and a half centuries.

The first case, which I find, in which the question was started whether replevin would lie in such cases, is that of Bradshaw, mentioned in Bac. Abr. "Replevin," C, as having been decided Trin. 12 Wm. III., in C. B., where "it was ruled, that when an act of parliament orders a distress and sale of goods, this is in nature of an execution, and replevin does not lie; but if the sheriff grant one, yet it is not such a contempt as to grant an attachment against him." But, as before observed, it does not appear whether the court quashed the replevin, or whether judgment was given upon demurrer to the avowry, or whether it was an instruction to the jury upon the trial. At all events it was a rule applicable only to one of the many cases in which goods may be in the custody of the law; and was a case in which the debtor was plaintiff in replevin. This case, however, was ruled in the year 1700. The first statute of Massachusetts on the subject of replevin, was passed in 1641; and as the law then was that replevin would lie in cases of distress by way of execution of the judgments of inferior tribunals, the statute of Massachusetts of 1641 was rather in restraint of the common law, than in enlargement of it, when it authorized replevin in all cases of "cattle or goods impounded, distrained, seized, or extended, unless it be upon execution after judgment, or in payment of fines." The act of 1720, which excepts distress made by a proper officer for any tax, fine, or forfeiture, was but an affirmation, in that particular, of the statute of 1641. Whether the statute of 1641 was construed, by the courts, to except the case of goods of a stranger taken in execution, does not appear. From the words of the act itself, it would seem to be the most natural construction to confine the exception to goods of the debtor, taken on execution; because it says, "after judgment." Against whom? The most obvious answer is, against the plaintiff in replevin. The 4th section of the act of 1789 (chapter 26) seems to corroborate this construction, for it takes for granted the right of the third person to replevy his goods wrongfully seized by the officer, and only regulates the manner and process, and designates the tribunal by which it shall be done. It says, "that when any goods or chattels shall be taken, distrained, or attached, which shall be claimed by a third person, and the person, thus claiming the same, shall think proper to replevy them," he may sue replevin from the common pleas, in the county where taken, distrained, or attached, and in a form prescribed in the act. 5 Dane, Abr. 517, 519. For these reasons, with great deference to the profound learning of the late chief justice of Massachusetts, I must doubt whether the statute of 1789 (chapter 26, § 4) altered the common law, in regard to the goods of a third person wrongfully taken in execution. It may, perhaps, be said that no such case is to be found in the English books, in which replevin has been maintained against the sheriff; and that, if "laid, as per schedule, and replevied," was a good return to a fieri facias, it would be found in the "Retorna Brevium." One answer, however, will serve for both those objections. In England, under the statute of Marlbridge (53 Hen. III. c. 21), the application for a replevin is to be made to the sheriff himself, who has the goods in his possession, under the fieri facias, and who, if a third person claims the property, has the power of summoning a jury of inquest to inquire to whom the property belongs. Dalton, 146; Gilb. Ex'ns, 21, cited in Farr v. Newman, 4 Term R. 633. If, upon that inquest, it be found for the third person, the sheriff will restore it to him, and be justified in his return of nulla bona upon the fieri facias, so that the whole purpose of replevin is thereby answered. If the jury should find that it is the property of the debtor, he may go on to sell it, and the finding will mitigate damages, in an action of trespass, if the goods seized should happen not to be the defendant's. Farr v. Newman, 4 Term R. 633. But, in this country, it has not been the practice of the marshal to summon a jury to try the question of property; if he has any doubt, he may require a bond of indemnity from the plaintiff. If the marshal here has no power to summon a jury to inquire of the property, justice seems to require that the owner should have his writ of replevin, if there be no positive rule of law to the contrary.

I have examined the dictum of the chief justice, in the case of Ilsey v. Stubbs, with the more minuteness, because it seems to be relied upon by the court of appeals in Maryland, as the main support of the dictum, in the case of Cromwell v. Owings, "that, in no case whatsoever, will replevin lie against an officer, for goods taken in execution under lawful process." This proposition extends to the case of a stranger's goods wrongfully taken out of the possession of the stranger himself, by an officer, to satisfy the execution against the debtor. The case of Cromwell v. Owings was that of a stranger's goods taken out of the possession of the debtor, and that was the only case decided. The general proposition, so broadly laid down by the court, was mere dictum. It is not authority, further than it was applicable to the case then before the court. That very respectable tribunal has taken the proposition to be universally true, that goods, in the custody of the law, cannot be replevied; and that goods, wrongfully taken by an officer of the law, under color of lawful process, are in the custody of the law, although the officer, in taking them, was guilty of a trespass, and although he is liable for damages for every moment that he detains them in that supposed custody of the law. This would, indeed, be an incongruity. There cannot be a wrongful custody of law. When goods are seized in the possession of the debtor, it may well be doubted whether replevin can be maintained; yet there does not seem to be any reason why it should not lie, (that is, be sued out,) to try the question of possession, at the time of the caption, as well as of title to the property. The possession may be equivocal, as in the case of Clark v. Skinner, 20 Johns. 465, where actual possession was in the debtor, but the right of possession was in the third person, the owner, the plaintiff in replevin. So, in Thompson v. Button, 14 Johns. 84, the goods were supposed by the court, to have been taken out of the possession of the plaintiff in replevin, and not of the debtor; and the court intimated a strong opinion, that if they had been taken out of the possession of the debtor, the replevin could not have been maintained. In the case of Clark v. Skinner, 20 Johns. 465, Mr. Justice Platt, who seems to have considered the case well, and who gave the reasons of his opinion very fully, said: "I am of opinion that replevin lies in favor of any person whose goods are taken by a trespasser. As to John Clarke, (the debtor,) the goods were in the custody of the law, and therefore irreplevisable; but, in my judgment, the law does not deny the remedy, by replevin, to any person whose goods are taken from his actual or constructive possession, by a wrongdoer." "The rule, I believe, is without exception, that wherever trespass will lie, the injured party may maintain replevin." "Baron Comyns says, replevin lies of all goods and chattels unlawfully taken;

(Com. Dig. 'Replevin,' A); though ('Replevin,' D) he says replevin will not lie for goods taken in execution." "This last proposition is certainly not true without important qualifications. It is untrue as to goods 'taken in execution,' when the fieri facias is against A., and the goods are taken from the possession of B. By 'goods taken in execution,' I understand, goods rightfully taken, in obedience to the writ; but, if through design or mistake, the officer takes goods which are not the property of the defendant in the execution, he is a trespasser, and such goods never were taken in execution, in the true sense of the rule laid down by Baron Comyns." "By constructive possession, I mean a right to reduce the chattel to immediate possession." And in page 470, he says: "The general rule is that the plaintiff must have a general or special property in him at the time of the unlawful taking, of which he complains; that is, he must either have the actual possession, or the right of reducing it to his actual possession, at the time of the tortious taking. If goods be taken on a fieri facias, as the property of the defendant named in the execution, and the writ is from a court of competent jurisdiction, and not void from any defect on its face, the officer, as against such defendant, is never a trespasser nor a wrong-doer. As to such defendant, the property is in the custody of the law, and he is precluded by the judgment against him." "But such reasoning has no application to the rights of a stranger whose property has been wrongfully taken on an execution against another person." "In every adjudged case that I have found, where it was held that goods 'taken in execution,' or goods 'in the custody of the law,' could not be replevied, that doctrine has been applied to cases where the defendant in the execution was plaintiff in the replevin."

In the case of Mulholm v. Cheney, Add. 301, the president of the court of common pleas in Pennsylvania, expressed the same opinion. In the above case of Clark v. Skinner, Spencer, C. J., and Woodworth, J., concurred with Mr. Justice Platt, but they rested their decision solely on the ground that the goods were to be deemed as taken from the actual possession of the plaintiff in replevin, who was not the defendant in the execution. The general rule, as before observed, is, that replevin will lie wherever trespass will lie for taking the plaintiff's goods. The facts necessary to maintain the suit, are, property in the plaintiff, either general or special, and a wrongful taking of the goods out of the plaintiff's possession, either actual or constructive. The possession must be such as would maintain trespass. If the original taking be lawful, or if the possession never was in the plaintiff, an unjust detention alone will not maintain replevin (Gardner v. Campbell, 15 Johns. 401; 2 Wheat. Selwyn, 896), unless attended by some act which would make the defendant a trespasser ab initio (Meany v. Head [Case No. 9,379]; 4 Bac. Abr. "Replevin," F). I am aware of the cases of Badger v. Phinney, 15 Mass. 359, and Baker v. Fales, 16 Mass. 147, but am not satisfied that they can be supported upon principles of common law, however correct they may be, under the statutes of Massachusetts. "The whole personal property is liable to execution, except wearing apparel." "But the absolute property of those goods must be in the debtor; and therefore, if the sheriff takes the goods of a stranger, though the plaintiff assures him they are the defendant's, he is a trespasser, for he is obliged, at his peril, to take notice whose the goods are; and, for that purpose, may impanel a jury to inquire in whom the property of the goods is vested; and this, it is said, shall excuse him in an action of trespass. 2 Bac. Abr. C, 4; Keilw. 119, 120; Brooke, Abr. tit. "Trespass," 99; Dalt. Sher. 146; Brooke, Abr. tit. "Pledges," 28; Dyer, 67b, in margin. When no other person has the right of possession, the property draws after it the possession in law, and possession is implied in him who has the right of possession. Gordon v. Harper, 7 Term R. 12, 13; Ward v. Macauley, 4 Term R. 489. The books are full of authorities that trespass will lie against the officer who takes a stranger's goods in execution, either out of the actual or constructive possession of the plaintiff. Hallett v. Byrt, Carth. 381, where Lord Holt says: "There is a difference between replevin and other process of law, with respect to the officers; for, in the first case, namely, in replevin, they are expressly commanded what to take in specie; but in writs of execution the words are general, namely, to levy of the goods of the party, and therefore 'tis at their peril if they take another man's goods; for in that case, an action of trespass will lie." So, in the Year Book, 11 Hen. IV. 91, cited in 2 Rolle, Abr. 552: "If a bailiff of a court attach the party by the goods of another man, trespass lies against him, for he ought to take notice of the goods of the party." "So, if he attach the servant, by the goods of his master, being in possession of the servant. 11 Hen. IV. 90b, 91b. The law is the same, if the sheriff, upon an execution, takes the goods of a stranger." Wale v. Hill, 1 Bulst. 149; Cootte v. Lighthworth, Moore, 457; Thurbane's Case, Hardr. 323; Saunderson v. Baker, 3 Wils. 309, 2 W. Bl. 832; Bloxham v. Oldham, 1 Burrows, 26, note; Cooper v. Chitty, 1 Burrows, 30; Brooke, Abr. "Trespass," 135; 19 Hen. VI. 80; Ackworth v. Kempe, 1 Doug. 40; Cole v. Hindson, 6 Term R. 234; Shadgett v. Clipson, 8 East, 328; and Farr v. Newman, 4 Term R. 633.

In the present case of Williamson v. Ringgold, the simple question submitted to the court is, whether the mere fact that the defendant took and detained the goods of the plaintiff, under color of an execution against Wells, is sufficient ground to justify the court in quashing the replevin. The court must suppose the strongest case against the defendant, namely, that he took the goods from the possession of Williamson, the plaintiff in replevin. Being of opinion that it is a general principle of the common law, that replevin can be maintained in all cases where the plaintiff's goods have been wrongfully taken from his possession, and that the exception of goods taken in execution applies only to the debtor himself, I think that the motion to quash the replevin, on the ground that the goods were in the custody of the law when the replevin was served, and also the motion for a venditioni exponas, ought to be overruled.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, concurred.
THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, dissented.

NOTE. See Cullum v. Bevans, 6 Har. & J. 469. See, also, Burnley v. Lambert, 1 Wash. 308, where the court of appeals of Virginia say: "But if an execution issue against the goods of A, and the sheriff seize and sell the property of B, will it be said that this is done by lawful authority? Surely not." See, also, D'Wolf v. Harris [Case No. 4,221]. Since the above opinion was delivered, the supreme court of New Jersey has decided in the same way, at May term, 1830, in the case of Bruen v. Ogden [6 Hal. 370], which was replevin by a third person against the United States marshal of the district of New Jersey, for the plaintiff's goods taken in execution for a debt due by the defendant in the execution; which was issued out of the district court of the United States for that district. This matter being pleaded by the defendant in replevin, in the state court, the plaintiff demurred, and the court held that, as the plea contained no averment that the vessel taken in execution, was the property of the debtor, or seized in his possession; and as the goods of a person in his actual or constructive possession, if seized under color of an execution against another person, are replevisable, the matters set forth in the plea were no bar to the action; and that the cause of action, as exhibited in the declaration and plea, was within the jurisdiction of the state court, and not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. See the National Gazette of Thursday, 27 May, 1830. See, also, Buffington v. Gerrish, 15 Mass. 156, replevin of goods attached.

In this case of Williamson v. Ringgold, after the motion to quash the replevin was overruled, the cause came on for trial, at the same term, (May 19, 1830,) upon the plea of property in the defendant; "without that, that the property was in the plaintiff;" upon which traverse the issue was joined. The court decided that the affirmative was on the plaintiff to prove his property in the goods, and, at the prayer of the defendant's counsel, instructed the jury, that the bill of sale from Wells under which the plaintiff claimed title, was fraudulent as to Carberry, the creditor of Wells, the defendant in the execution, unless the possession accompanied the bill of sale and continued in Williamson the vendee.

CASE MADE—CHANGE TO BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where, on a trial, in an action at law, a verdict was given for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court on a case to be made, and a case was then made containing the questions of law, and a reservation to either party, of the right, after the decision of the court on the case, to turn the case into a bill of exceptions, and a motion for a new trial was then denied, and judgment entered for the plaintiff, and the defendant then sued out a writ of error to the supreme court, but, through inadvertence, the case was annexed to the record without changing it into the form of a bill of exceptions, and neither party observed the defect, and the case was argued in the supreme court on its merits, but that court noticed the defect and affirmed the judgment below, because there was no bill of exceptions and no error on the face of the record, this court afterwards allowed the defendant to turn the case into a bill of exceptions, on payment of the costs in the supreme court.

[Distinguished in Herbert v. Butler, Case No. 6,397.]

This was a motion, in an action of ejectment, to allow the defendant [James H. Suydam] to turn into a bill of exceptions a case which had been made setting out the exceptions taken by him on the trial. The verdict was for the plaintiffs [William H. Williamson and others], subject to the opinion of the court, on a case to be made. A case was made, containing the questions of law, and a reservation to either party of the right, after the decision of the court on the case, to turn the case into a bill of exceptions or a special verdict. The court denied the motion for a new trial on the case, and judgment was entered for the plaintiffs. The defendant then sued out a writ of error to the supreme court, but, through inadvertence, the case was annexed to the record, without changing it into the form of a bill of exceptions. The cause was argued in the supreme court on the real questions involved, and no notice was taken by the counsel for either party of the irregularity in the form of the record; but the supreme court felt bound to notice the defect (see Suydam v. Williamson, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 427); and the judgment of this court was affirmed, because there was no bill of exceptions, and no error on the face of the record, without the expression of any opinion by the supreme court on the real merits involved in the case. The defendant then made this motion, so as to be in a position to sue out another writ of error.

David Dudley Field, for plaintiffs.

N. Dane Ellingwood, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The questions involved in this case are deemed very important to the rights of the defendant, and have become interesting, for the reason that the decisions of the highest courts of New York are in direct conflict with the ruling made in this case at the trial. As the omission to change the case into a bill of exceptions was an inadvertence, and was, apparently, not discovered by the counsel for either party, and as both parties supposed that the questions were properly raised on the record, I am inclined to grant the motion, but it must be on payment of the costs in the supreme court.

[NOTE. Another writ of error was sued out, and the judgment reversed. 24 How. (65 U. S.)

BILL OF LADING—NONDELIVERY—BARRATRY—DAMAGES—PRESUMPTION OF LAW—SALVAGE.

1. Where cotton was shipped at Galveston, on a vessel bound to New York, and bills of lading were given therefor, and, on the voyage, the vessel was barratrously run ashore, and part of the cotton was lost, and a part of it, which had been saved in a damaged condition, was libelled for salvage, and the owners of the cotton paid the amount of salvage decreed, and libelled the vessel on the bills of lading: Held, that the vessel was liable to the owners of the cotton for the value of the cotton lost, and for the injury to that which was saved, and for the money paid by them as salvage.

[Cited in The Albany, 44 Fed. 435.]

2. In case of loss or damage to goods covered by a bill of lading, the presumption of law is, that such loss or damage was occasioned by the act or default of the carrier.

In admiralty.

J. H. Choate, for libellants.

C. A. Peabody and W. H. Peckham, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel filed by six several parties, owners of cotton in bales, shipped by the steamship William Taber, from Galveston, Texas, via Key West, in Florida, to New York, in March, 1867. The cotton was shipped under bills of lading, signed by the master of the vessel, and given to the agents of the several owners of the cotton. The claim made by the libel covers two grounds of action: (1) A claim for the nondelivery of cotton covered by the bills of lading, and for damage to cotton covered by the bills of lading, that was delivered; (2) a claim that the vessel should refund to the libellants a sum of money, which they were compelled to pay, as salvage on the cotton covered by the bills of lading, by the decree of the district court of the United States for the Southern district of Florida, sitting in admiralty, at Key West, in Florida, on the ground that the salvage was made necessary by the willful and tortious act of the master of the vessel, or some other person in charge of her, in running her ashore near Key West.

The nondelivery of some of the cotton, and the damage to some that was delivered, are clearly proved, and the claimants have entirely failed to show that the loss or damage was by a peril of the sea, or by any cause for which the vessel is not liable. On the contrary, the evidence is entirely satisfactory to show that the loss and damage were caused by the willful act of the master or the engineer of the vessel, in letting water into her just after she had left Key West, on her way to New York, as a consequence of which she was run ashore. The running of her ashore made the salvage necessary, and, as against the salvors, the owners of the cotton were defenceless in the salvage court, and were obliged to pay the salvage money. The payment of this money being caused directly by the barratrous act of some person in charge of the vessel, the vessel is liable to refund it to those who paid it. The carrier created this lien on the cotton, while lawfully charged with its custody. The lien was a valid one, as between the owners of the cotton and the salvors, although the act by which it was created was a tortious act on the part of the carrier, as between such owners and the carrier. Indeed, the liability of the vessel to refund the salvage money on the cotton may be properly considered as a liability arising on the bills of lading, as the transaction amounts, in effect, to a loss of so much of the cotton by what is, in fact, held to be the default of the vessel. For, if the libellants had not paid the salvage money on the cotton in accordance with the decree of the court, enough of the cotton to pay the salvage would have been sold. This view brings the entire case within the well settled principle, that, in case of loss or damage to goods covered by a bill of lading, the presumption of the law is, that such loss or damage was occasioned by the act or default of the carrier, and the burden of proof is upon the carrier to show that it arose from a cause for which he is not responsible. The answer neither admits nor denies the averments of the libel as to the barratrous acts of the master, but states that the claimant leaves the same to be proved, and that there is no liability on the part of the vessel to the libellants for such acts, and that the reason why there is not is, that such acts are alleged to have been willful, fraudulent, and barratrous. But the law is well established, that where the owner of a vessel is under an obligation imposed upon him by virtue of his office as carrier, he is liable for the willful tort of his servant, if it was committed while in his employ, and in the management of the vessel or conveyance under his control; and this even though the wrong was done in direct opposition to the express commands of the owner. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, bk. 1, p. 394, c. 11. There must be a decree for the libellants, with costs, and a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages caused by the loss or damage to the cotton, and by the payment of the salvage money on the cotton.

LIEN—PRIORITY—REPAIRS—MORTGAGE.

The lien given by the law of the state of New York, for repairs to a domestic vessel, has priority over a mortgage on the vessel given before the repairs were made.

Scott's Case [Case No. 12,517] disapproved.

Williams & Potter, for libellant.
Thad. C. Davis and Mr. Clinton, for claimants.

WALLACE, District Judge. This cause involves the single question whether title, acquired under the foreclosure of a mortgage on the vessel, is subject to the lien, for repairs subsequently bestowed upon the vessel, given by the laws of New York. The mortgage was duly recorded, pursuant to section 4192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and thereafter, while the vessel was in possession of the owner, the engine of the propeller was repaired by the libellant on the credit of the vessel at her home port in Buffalo. The laws of New York confer a lien for such repairs, which is to take preference of all other liens upon the vessel except seamen's wages. After the repairs were made the mortgage was foreclosed, and the vessel was purchased by the claimant upon the foreclosure sale. Subsequently this libel was filed, and process in rem issued to enforce the lien for repairs.

The question thus presented is of great practical importance. Since the 12th admiralty rule was modified in 1872, vessels, upon which there are mortgages, are daily seized upon process in rem issued from this court to enforce liens for supplies or repairs, conferred by the laws of New York; and doubtless a similar practice prevails in the other courts of admiralty, sitting within states where such liens are given by the local law. These laws exist in nearly all the states having navigable waters within their borders, or contiguous thereto, and the question now presented, with modifications arising from the terms of the local laws, has arisen in other courts of admiralty exercising jurisdiction over the lakes and the navigable waters connecting the same. The precise question was decided adversely to the priority of the lien for repairs, in the district court of the United States for the Northern district of Ohio. Scott's Case [Case No.

12,517]. I regret to be unable to concur in the conclusion there reached. The intimate commercial relations between the citizens of the several states upon the lakes, subjecting them of necessity to the contingency of adjudications in different courts of admiralty, render it highly important that these courts should apply a uniform rule of decision upon a question of this kind. Investments are made, securities taken, credit given, and commercial transactions conducted in reliance upon the legal rights of the parties, to them as declared by the decisions of the courts. The uncertainty introduced into these transactions, if the rights of the parties depend upon the adjudication of different tribunals which entertain different views, is so discouraging and depressing to commerce between the citizens of these states, as to render applicable the remark of Lord Ellenborough (2 East, 202), "It is often more important to have the rule settled than to determine what it is."

But the importance of the question involved, the expediency, in the interest of commerce, of protecting claims for supplies and repairs to vessels, the strong natural equity of such claims, and the hope that what I conceive to be the true rule, may be determined before precedents give stability to what I deem an error, have induced me to disregard the Case of Scott, and assign briefly the reasons which lead me to defer the mortgage to the claim for supplies.

No doubt exists as to the competency of state legislation to determine the rank of liens upon domestic vessels when it does not invade the jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty, or the legislation of congress concerning such liens; and courts of admiralty will enforce the lien given by the local law by process in rem where the cause of action is maritime in its nature; and where the claim is not maritime, they will recognize the lien in the distribution of proceeds in the registry of the court. The St. Lawrence, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 522; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 321; The Orleans v. Phœbus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 275. In enforcing the lien given by local laws, courts of admiralty are governed by the terms of these laws where they are explicit, and not by the general doctrines of maritime law. 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 324. It follows that, inasmuch as the statute of New York gives preference in rank to the lien for repairs over all other liens, except for seamen's wages, the important inquiry is, whether the rule thus prescribed is repugnant to the rules which control courts of admiralty in assigning rank to liens, or repugnant to any legislation of congress over vessels of the United States.

The legislation does not trench upon any of the rules of the admiralty regulating priorities between liens, because neither of the liens involved are maritime liens. As to other liens, in dealing with questions of priority courts of admiralty are governed by equitable principles. Thus in accordance with the equitable rule which favors diligence in asserting a lien, when several claims of the same rank exist and a decree has been obtained on one, that claim is accorded priority over the others. The Globe [Case No. 5,483]. And following the equitable rule that equality among creditors is equity, claims of the same rank will be discharged rateably if all cannot be paid in full, where no priority has been acquired by diligence. The Wm. F. Safford, Lush, 69. But it is a controlling rule in admiralty that priority between claims depends not upon precedence in date, but upon the favor due to the nature of the claim; priority in time must yield to priority in rank; the claim of the material man must give way to that of the seaman, and both to that of the salvor; and as between holders of bottomry bonds, the last in point of date is entitled to priority of payment, because the last loan furnished the means of preserving the ship, and without it the former lenders would entirely have lost their security. Abb. Shipp, 163.

Applying this rule in determining the question of priority between a mortgage and a claim for repairs, it seems very clear that the latter should be regarded with the highest favor, and should outrank the mortgage. "There is nothing," says Emerigon, "which is regarded with so much favor as debts for work and labor furnished to a vessel." If the repairs are done upon a foreign vessel, the claim constitutes a maritime lien, to which, of course, an earlier lien not maritime must give way. If they are done upon a domestic vessel, the same lien is conceded to the claim by the civil law, the particular maritime codes and the general maritime law of all nations, except in Great Britain and the United States, where the maritime lien, elsewhere universally acknowledged, has been displaced by the encroachments of the common law courts of England upon the jurisdiction of the admiralty.

It has been strenuously contended by many of the ablest jurists of our own country that the maritime lien still exists in the admiralty jurisprudence of the United States, and many learned judges have concurred in the opinion; but the question is now finally at rest, and the maritime lien is denied where the repairs or supplies are furnished to domestic ships. The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [83 U. S.] 558.

The high favor with which the claim is regarded, and the strong natural equity which sustains it, is evidenced by the local laws enacted in England and in more than twenty of the states of this Union to place the claim upon the same footing with maritime liens.

If, however, the argument, that priority between liens not maritime is to be determined upon analogies derived from the law of maritime liens, should be deemed unsatisfactory, another reason exists why the lien here should rank side by side with maritime liens, and that is found in the complete assimilation in the character of the liens which is effected by the local law. When it is considered that the true meaning and efficacy of a maritime lien is simply that it renders the vessel liable to the claim without a previous judgment of sequestration or condemnation, and without establishing the demand as at common law, and that the action in rem carries the lien into effect (Ingraham v. Phillips, 1 Day, 117; Barber v. Minturn, Id. 136), it will be seen, that no practical distinction exists between a maritime lien and a claim for repairs for which a lien is given by the local law, and that no reason exists why courts of admiralty should not treat the latter as a maritime lien. When the cause of action is of maritime cognizance, the action in rem may be prosecuted in the courts of admiralty, the vessel seized without a previous condemnation, and without establishing the demand, to enforce the lien given by the local law, precisely as in the case of a maritime lien.

It remains to inquire whether the lien given by the state law contravenes any legislation of congress concerning ships and vessels. As is said in White's Bank v. Smith, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 646: "Congress having created, as it were, this species of property, and conferred upon it its chief value under the power given in the constitution to regulate commerce, we perceive no reason for entertaining any serious doubt but that this power may be extended to the security and protection of all persons dealing therein." The only statute of congress, bearing upon the present question, is that, by which mortgages on vessels are required to be recorded in the office of the collector of customs where the vessel is registered or enrolled, in order to be valid as against any person having no notice of the mortgage. It has been held that by force of this statute a mortgage is valid, notwithstanding state legislation, which requires additional formalities calculated to give notice to creditors or subsequent purchasers. Aldrich v. Aetna Ins. Co., 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 491. It has been argued that the states can pass no laws which can affect the validity of mortgages so recorded. That congress could invest mortgages on vessels with such invulnerability is probably true, but no such intent can fairly be implied from the language of the act. It is a registration act, and as such, excludes all state legislation upon the same subject; and this was the only point decided by the supreme court in Aldrich v. Aetna Ins. Co. [supra.] It has been held that liens given by the laws of a state for supplies furnished a domestic vessel take preference over a mortgage subsequently recorded. Francis v. The Harrison [Case No. 5,038]. This conclusion of necessity involved the proposition that the states are competent to create liens which will take preference of the lien of a mortgage recorded pursuant to the act of congress, and I see no reason to doubt their competency to determine the conditions of priority, so long as they do not infringe upon the legislation of congress by imposing additional requisites in the recording of mortgages.

My attention has been called to the cases of

The Skylark [Id. 12,928], The Grace Greenwood [Id. 5,652], and The Lady Franklin [Id. 7,983], where the mortgage was held to have priority. These cases are not applicable here, because the local law did not give a lien paramount to the mortgage.

A decree is ordered for the libellant.

MARITIME LIENS—PRIORITIES—REPAIRS—MORTGAGE.

A mortgage was given on a vessel and was recorded in pursuance of section 1 of the act of congress of July 29, 1850 (9 Stat. 440), now section 4192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Afterwards, and while she was in the possession of her owner at her home port in Buffalo, New York, repairs were there done to her, on the credit of the vessel. The statute of New York gave a lien on the vessel for such repairs, in preference to all other liens, except seamen's wages. After the repairs were made the mortgage was foreclosed and the vessel was sold, and was purchased by the claimant, on the foreclosure sale. Afterwards a libel in rem was filed against the vessel to enforce such lien for repairs. Held, that such lien had priority over the title acquired under the foreclosure of the mortgage.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The question presented in this case is one of interest and importance. After a careful examination, I am satisfied that it has been correctly decided by Judge Wallace, and that the arguments which his opinion presents ought to control the disposition of the cause. It would be quite useless to restate them, and I only desire to add a few words, in further elucidation of the force of the act of July 29, 1850 (9 Stat. 440), which provides for recording the conveyances of vessels. It enacts (section 1) "that no bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance of any vessel, or part of any vessel, of the United States, shall be valid against any person other than the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof, unless such bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation or conveyance be recorded in the office of the collector of the customs where such vessel is registered or enrolled; provided, that the lien by bottomry on any vessel, created during her voyage, by a loan of money or materials, necessary to repair or enable such vessel to prosecute a voyage, shall not lose its priority, or be in any way affected by the provisions of this act." The obvious purpose of this proviso was to make it entirely clear that a bottomry bond did not come within the statute requiring certain instruments to be recorded. It might otherwise have been contended that it was, in some sense, a hypothecation of the vessel, and, therefore, required to be recorded. It will be observed, that the proviso is confined to liens by bottomry. If this proviso be construed to mean that such a lien only is out of the purview of the statute, and that all other liens are postponed to that of a mortgagee, then the claims of salvors, and all those having other strictly maritime liens, would be thus postponed, to the subversion of the whole principle upon which efficacy is given to such claims, and the overthrow of the best settled and most salutary principles of the maritime law. Indeed, any principle upon which this statute can be expounded to give such a priority to a recorded mortgage, would also extend to bills of sale and other conveyances recorded under the same law, and thus practically overthrow the whole scheme of the maritime law, upon the subject of maritime liens. This statute, I conclude, therefore, has no relation to the question involved; and the lien of the libellant is left to stand upon the statute of New York, which the courts of the United States do enforce in the courts of admiralty.

Judgment must be given for the amount recovered in the district court, with the costs of that court, and of the appeal in this court.

COLLISION—STEAMER AND SAILING VESSEL—BURDEN OF PROOF—CHANGE OF COURSE.

1. In an action for damages to a sailing vessel by collision with a steamer, the burden of proof lies in the first instance on the libellant.

[Cited in The New Champion, Case No. 10, 146; Messena v. The Neilson, Id. 9,493a.]

2. If the collision is occasioned by an alteration of the course of the sailing vessel, it devolves upon her to prove the propriety or necessity of such movement.

3. Each vessel is bound to observe the rules of navigation applicable to their respective positions.

4. The steamer is culpable in crowding upon the sailing vessel so as to render a danger probable in her situation, but is not required to protect her against the consequences of her own mistakes or negligences.

5. In this case, the two vessels being navigated in opposite directions, and approaching each other on lines nearly parallel, and spread wide enough apart to leave a passage safe to each from the other, and the sailing vessel changing her course, without necessity, to cross the bows of the steamer, so near to the latter that stopping and backing the engine did not avoid a collision, she cannot support an action for the damages thereby incurred.

G. A. Bucknell, for libellant.

H. B. Scoles, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. This was a case of collision, by occasion of which the sloop Charlotte was lost. The following facts are made to appear upon the pleadings and proofs: The sloop Charlotte was well equipped, and of sufficient strength for the safe navigation of the North river; was on a trip down the North river, a short distance below West Point; came in collision with steambot William Young, going up the river, with a tow attached to her, when opposite Buttermilk Falls. When the two vessels neared each other, the steambot was standing in close to the east shore, and running up along it, and the sloop was holding a straight course down near the middle of the river, with the wind N. W. and tide ebb, the breeze being free and sufficient for steering, so that she was enabled to hold that course, or to have placed herself further west, with facility and safety. The channel of the river was half a mile wide at that place. Supposing the steambot to be varying her direction more westward, the pilot of the sloop changed her course, heading off towards the east shore, beyond and inside of the steambot. The steambot had, at the time, the barge Union in tow on her larboard side; she was in the usual channel and route of steamboats ascending the river, and was passing through the water at about five miles an hour. The sloop was running at about the same rate. The steambot had met other vessels in the vicinity, all of which passed her to the west in safety. The position and course of the steambot would have carried her one hundred yards east of the sloop, if the latter had not changed her direction and veered eastward. On observing that movement, the pilot of the steamer rang the bell to slow her speed, and hailed the sloop in a loud call to luff, stopping the engines and ringing, also, to back her: and whilst the engines were working backwards, the sloop, heading directly east, crossed athwart her bows, and the collision occurred. There was not room between the steambot and the east shore for the sloop to have passed safely in that track, if she could have got around the bows of the steamer. Every practicable effort was made on board the steamer by the pilot and men to avoid the collision, after they discovered the purpose of the sloop. The collision was by a slanting or glancing blow, the starboard side of the sloop, forward of the main chains, came in contact with the larboard bow of the barge, which was in tow by the steambot on her larboard side. The position and course of the two vessels in relation to each other on their near approach, and before any movement was made on either side in apprehension of a collision, afford a strong presumption against the allegations of the libellant and in support of the defence. The master of the Convoy, another sloop in the wake of the Charlotte, proves that the latter was a safe distance to the westward of the steamer, running down the river on a N. W. wind, on a line parallel with that pursued by the steamer. It is palpable that her starboard side could not, in that mode of their approach, have been reached by the larboard side of the steamer, had the latter, as is charged, suddenly altered her course and bore off to the west. The sloop, after the blow, passed directly ahead of the steambot, and struck her bowsprit on the shore, and receding back from the shock, sunk two or three hundred feet from the place of collision.

None of the witnesses impute any blame to the movement of the steambot. Some called by the libellant, who alleged the steamer was bearing more westward, admit that if she had kept her way after the sloop changed her course, the collision might not have occurred. The weight of evidence supports the testimony of the pilot of the steambot, who testifies that he did not change his course, which was to keep close along the range of the east shore. He was steering for North Point off West Point, in order to keep that position for the steamer. Several witnesses state that he was a skilful and careful pilot—that he was on the proper course, and it was easily within the power and the clear duty of the sloop to have luffed; and had that been done, all danger and difficulty in the navigation of the two vessels would have been avoided. The counsel for the libellant, upon this state of facts, insists that the case of Hawkins v. Duchess & Orange Steamboat Co., 2 Wend. 452, is in point, and conclusive against the defence of the claimant. But it is to be observed that the evidence in that case established a want of reasonable precaution, and indeed showed positive, if not gross negligence on the part of the steamer, in holding her own headway, and compelling the sailing vessel to depart from her proper course, or abide the risk of a collision, when she might have prevented it by stopping and backing—the steamer, in that case, being held culpable for omitting to do what was promptly done by the steamer in this.

It is not to be assumed without evidence, even between a steamer and a sailing vessel, that in case of a collision the fault is necessarily with the steamer. Each vessel is bound to observe the established and notorious rules of navigation applicable to their respective positions. In a cause of damage, the party seeking compensation must sustain the burden of proving the vessel proceeded against was blamable and in fault. That alone founds a complaint for compensation. 2 Dod. 85; 8 Law Rep. 295. Although a higher degree of responsibility is cast upon steamers, and they are bound, as a general rule, to keep out of the way of sailing vessels, yet the latter cannot justify a departing from their course on a probability of encountering an approaching steamer, unless she is crowding so much upon the track as to create an imminent danger of collision. The law requires that there should be preponderating evidence to fix the loss on the party charged. The Ligo, 2 Hagg. Adm. 356. In suits for collisions occasioned by a mischance imputable chiefly to the want of proper care and precaution on the part of the vessel damaged, the action will be generally dismissed with costs. The Catherine of Dover, Id. 154; Bay-by, Baron, 2 Crompt. & M. 22; 11 East, 60; 3 Car. & P. 528. I am of opinion the libellant has failed to establish the facts requisite to a judgment in his favor. He does not prove that the collision happened by means of any fault or negligence on the part of the steamboat. It was brought about by an attempt of the sloop unnecessarily to run across the bows of the steamer, and get between her and the shore, where there was not in fact room for her, and where, under the circumstances, she could not rightfully go. The libel must be dismissed, with costs.

WILLIAR et al. v. IRWIN.

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. Nov., 1879.²

AUTHORITY OF PARTNER — MILLING BUSINESS — PURCHASES FOR FUTURE DELIVERY — WAGES — CONTRACTS — CUSTOM AMONG COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

1. If one member of a firm of millers permits his co-partner to hold the firm out to the world as dealers in grain, and knowingly allows cards and letter heads to be used indicating such business, he will be liable with his co-partner on contracts for the sale or purchase of grain for future delivery, though such contracts are made without his actual knowledge, by his co-partner in the firm name.

2. A contract for the sale or purchase of grain for future delivery, legitimate on its face, cannot be held void as a wagering contract, merely by showing that one of the parties so understood it. To render it void it must be proved that both parties regarded it simply a wager on differences.

[Cited in Wall v. Schneider, 59 Wis. 359, 18 N. W. 446.]

3. If a purchase or sale of grain for future delivery made in the form of a contract, is in fact simply a bet or wager on differences, the form it assumes does not affect its invalidity.

[Cited in Ward v. Vosburgh, 31 Fed. 13.]

4. A custom among commission merchants on a board of trade by which, if A sells for one of his customers a certain quantity of grain for future delivery to B, who buys the same for one of his customers, and B then for another customer sells the same quantity for like delivery to C, who buys for one of his customers, and C afterwards for another customer sells the same amount for same delivery to A, who buys for another one of his customers—the commission merchants A, B and C can reciprocally surrender or cancel the contracts themselves, adjusting the differences in price, and returning margins, and each substitute his buyer customer and seller customer as parties to the contract, himself guaranteeing the performance of such contract—such a custom is founded in commercial convenience and is valid.

Gover*, 40 Md. 102.

GRESHAM, District Judge (charging jury). This is an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant as surviving partner of the firm of Irwin & Davis to recover an alleged balance due from said firm to the plaintiffs. The transactions out of which it is claimed this balance grew were certain sales of wheat for future delivery claimed to have been made by the plaintiffs as commission merchants at Baltimore for Irwin & Davis on the order of this firm.

The defenses are: First—That the alleged sales of wheat were not within the scope of the partnership business of Irwin & Davis; that they were the individual transactions of Davis with the plaintiffs; and, second—That the sales were wagering contracts and void.

And first, were the transactions out of which grew the alleged balance due to the plaintiffs, within the scope of the partnership business of Irwin & Davis? Irwin & Davis were partners in the purchase and manufacture of wheat into flour. To this extent the defendant Irwin admits that there was a partnership. He testified that the partnership was limited to this, and that his partner, Davis, who managed and carried on the business, had no authority to buy and ship grain to Baltimore or elsewhere on the firm account. The firm of Irwin & Davis was formed, Irwin says, as early as March, 1873, and it existed under the active management of Davis until his death in October, 1877. It is not denied that during all this time Davis did buy and ship grain to some extent in the firm name. Necessary conveniences existed in connection with the mill, for the loading of grain into cars for shipment. The letter and bill heads of the firm during all this time were "Irwin & Davis, Millers and

Grain Dealers, Brazil, Indiana," and Davis regularly entered upon the books of the firm, transactions in the purchase and shipment of grain.

If you believe that the purchase and sale of grain was within the apparent scope of the partnership, and the parties dealt with Irwin & Davis in good faith, believing they were dealing with the firm, then the firm became liable for such transactions. If Irwin permitted Davis to hold himself and Irwin out to the world as partners in the business of dealing in grain, he became liable with Davis on contracts for the sale and purchase of grain for future delivery, and in that case it is not material that Irwin should have actual knowledge of particular sales or purchases in the firm name. And if Irwin knew that Davis was holding the firm out as dealers in grain, and did not protest or give public notice to the contrary, he is responsible as partner for all contracts made by Davis in the firm name, within the apparent scope of the business of dealing in grain. If Davis, as partner, did in fact buy and sell grain, and if in his correspondence with customers and others, including the plaintiffs, he employed printed letter heads or cards representing the firm of Irwin & Davis as grain dealers; this was a holding out of that firm as a partnership engaged in that business, and if before or at the time of the dealings with the plaintiffs, Irwin knew that the firm was thus held out as grain dealers, he is liable as a partner. If therefore, you believe from the evidence, that Irwin & Davis held themselves out as dealers in grain, as well as in flour, and that plaintiffs dealt with Davis, supposing they were dealing with the firm, and in so doing advanced them any money in fulfilling such contract, you should find for the plaintiffs in whatever sum the evidence may show them to be entitled to on account of such advancements, unless you think the defendant has shown that the transactions between the plaintiffs and Irwin & Davis were gambling transactions.

If you find that the dealings with the plaintiffs were within the scope of the partnership, you will next consider whether the dealings were gambling transactions. The burden of showing that the parties were carrying on a wagering business and were not engaged in legitimate trade or speculation rests upon the defendant. On their face these transactions are legal, and the law does not, in the absence of proof, presume that parties are gambling. A person may make a contract for the sale of personal property for future delivery which he has not got. Merchants and traders often do this. A contract for the sale of personal property which the vendor does not own or possess but expects to obtain by purchase or otherwise, is binding if an actual transfer of property is contemplated. A transaction which on its face is legitimate cannot be held void as a wagering contract by showing that one party only so understood and meant it to be. The proof must go further and show that this understanding was mutual—that both parties so understood the transaction. If however at the time of entering into a contract for the sale of personal property for future delivery, it be contemplated by both parties that at the time fixed for delivery the purchaser shall merely receive or pay the difference between the contract and the market price, the transaction is a wager and nothing more.

It makes no difference that a bet or wager is made to assume the form of a contract. Gambling is none the less such because it is carried on in the form or guise of legitimate trade. It is not sufficient for the defendant to prove that Irwin & Davis never understood they were to deliver wheat in fulfillment of the sales made for them by the plaintiffs. The presumption is that the plaintiffs expected Irwin & Davis to execute their contracts—expected them to deliver the amount of grain sold, and before you can find that the sales were gambling transactions and void, you must find from the proof that the plaintiffs knew or had reason to believe that Irwin & Davis contemplated nothing but a wagering transaction, and acted for them accordingly. If the plaintiffs made sales of wheat for Irwin & Davis for future delivery, understanding that these contracts would be filled by the delivery of grain at the time agreed upon, Irwin & Davis are liable to the plaintiffs, even though they meant to gamble and nothing more.

The testimony tends to show that a general custom obtained among grain commission merchants in Baltimore to the following effect: When one commission merchant upon the order of a customer, sells to another commission merchant a quantity of grain for future delivery, and it occurs that at some other time before the maturity of the contract the same commission merchant receives an order from another customer to purchase the same or a larger quantity of the same kind of grain, for the same future delivery, and he executes this second order by making the purchase from the same commission merchant to whom he had made the sale in the other case, that then in such case the two commission merchants meet together and exchange or cancel the contracts as between themselves, adjusting the difference in the prices between the two contracts and restoring any margins that may have been put up; and that from that time forth, the first commission merchant holds for the benefit of the customer for whom he sold the order or contract of the purchaser for whom he bought, so that the grain of the selling customer may, when delivered, be turned in on the order or contract of the purchasing customer, and that the commission merchant is held responsible as guarantor to his customer.

The evidence also tends to show a custom obtaining among commission merchants in Baltimore to the further effect that though the second transaction may have been had with a different commission merchant from the one with which the first transaction was had, yet where it can be found that a series of contracts are in existence for the sale of like grain, for like delivery, so that the seller owes the wheat to the buyer to whom he sold, and he to another, who owes like wheat for like delivery to the first commission merchant, that then, in such case they settle by what they call "a ring"—that is, they all reciprocally surrender or cancel their contracts, adjust differences in price between themselves, and surrender all margins that have been put up; that in all such cases the commission merchant substitutes the contract of another customer in place of that with the commission merchant whose contract has been cancelled or surrendered; and that he guarantees to his customer the performance of the contract originally made in his behalf.

I say to you gentlemen that these customs are founded in commercial convenience; that they are not in contravention of the law, and that they are valid. In determining what the intention of the parties was in these transactions, you will carefully weigh all the evidence. Henry D. Williar, one of the plaintiffs, testifies that the plaintiffs expected Irwin & Davis to execute their contracts by delivering the amount of wheat sold. It seems that the plaintiffs sold for Irwin & Davis, for delivery in about two and a half months, 165,000 bushels of wheat. Did Irwin & Davis expect to deliver this amount of wheat within this time? Did the plaintiffs expect Irwin & Davis to enable them to deliver this amount of wheat within the time fixed for delivery? In this connection you will consider the previous dealings between Irwin & Davis and the plaintiffs, the ability of Irwin & Davis to engage in transactions of this magnitude, and the opportunity which the plaintiffs had had to know the extent or character of the business of Irwin & Davis and their financial standing and ability, and the importance of Baltimore as a grain market.

There remains a set-off, gentlemen, and if you find that, in legitimate dealings between the firm of Irwin & Davis and the plaintiffs, there was a balance in the hands of the plaintiffs, which balance was exhausted by Davis in keeping up margins in gambling transactions, the set-off will not avail the defendants. A man cannot recover back money which he loses in gambling transactions any more than he can enforce a gambling contract.

If you find that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendant, then it will be in your discretion to allow the plaintiffs interest. If you think, under all the circumstances, they are entitled to interest on all sums advanced for Irwin & Davis, it is in your discretion to allow interest or not.

Verdict for plaintiffs for $17,622.78.

Case No. 17,762.

The WILLIE G.

[1 Hask. 253; 1 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 117.]

District Court, D. Maine. Feb., 1870.

VIOLATION OF REVENUE LAWS—IMPORTATION OF LIQUOR—FORFEITURE OF VESSEL—FISHING LICENSE.

1. Whether the importation of more than thirty gallons of distilled spirits in bottles, contained in a cask, is an importation in packages containing less than thirty gallons under the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 98], quære.

2. A vessel, sailing under a fishing license, may touch at a foreign port and procure supplies, without incurring forfeiture under the acts of congress.

3. Taking on board in a foreign port and bringing into this country two barrels without hire or reward, but as a favor to a friend, supposed to contain crockery, but really containing liquors, is not engaging in trade within the meaning of § 32 of the act of Feb. 18, 1793 [1 Stat. 316], and does not subject the vessel and cargo to forfeiture.

In admiralty. Libel in rem by the United States, claiming a forfeiture of the schooner Willie G. and cargo, for a violation of the revenue laws: (1) Because she brought into this country distilled spirits in packages containing less than thirty gallons. (2) Because goods of the value of $400 were unladed from her not in open day, and without a permit. (3) Because whilst under a license for the fisheries, she engaged in another trade or employment by importing goods into the United States. William Decker made claim to the vessel and cargo, and answered, denying the allegations of the libel.

George F. Talbot, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Wales Hubbard and Josiah H. Drummond, for claimant.

FOX, District Judge. This schooner was seized, with her fishing outfits on board, in the harbor of Portland on the 23d day of April last by the collector of the port, for certain alleged violations of the revenue laws in Oct., 1867.

There is some conflict of testimony, but the following facts are proved to my satisfaction, viz.: The vessel in 1867 was, and still is, the property of the claimant, Wm. Decker of Southport, in this district. She was licensed for the fisheries, without any permit to touch and trade at a foreign port or place. Having taken her fare in the Gulf, on her homeward voyage she touched at Pirate Cove, in the Straits of Canso, for wood and water, and for no other object. Whilst engaged in getting these articles on board, an acquaintance of the skipper requested him to take on board a couple of barrels of crockery for John Topham, a sailmaker, residing at Wiscasset, who was well known to the skipper. He at first demurred, but on being again applied to and informed that the barrels were on the wharf all ready to be put into the boat, consented, and they were received on board and brought in the schooner to Southport; and there landed in open day. One of the barrels was taken away by Topham, the other remained some time in Decker's storehouse and was afterwards given by Topham to Decker. It contained twenty to thirty bottles of gin, packed in bran. The barrels were marked "John Topham, Wiscasset, crockery." The skipper was not aware of their contents, and he received them as a favor for the party, without accepting or expecting any compensation for what he did. Decker did not know that the barrels were brought in the vessel until they were landed, and never claimed any freight therefor.

The libel contains three counts. The first, charges this vessel with having brought into this district a quantity of distilled spirits, in casks or packages of a less capacity than thirty gallons. By the act of the 13th of July, 1866, in force at the time this vessel arrived, "brandy and other spirituous liquors may be imported in casks or other packages, not less than thirty gallons." In the present case the liquor, gin, was in bottles, packed in barrels, which, it is admitted, were of a capacity of more than thirty gallons.

I certainly entertain some doubt as to the true construction of this act, and have reason to know that some of my judicial brethren share with me in the doubt, which is, whether it was the intention of congress, that distilled spirits should not be imported in less quantities than thirty gallons, or whether a less quantity may be imported, provided its exterior cask or covering would have contained thirty gallons. It does not become necessary for me to determine what is the true construction of this provision, as the treasury department, by a letter of the assistant secretary, under date of June 20, 1867, to be found in Internal Revenue Record, 1867 (volume 6, page 3), has declared: "That any quantity of spirituous liquors may be imported in packages, the outside envelope or covering of each of which is of sufficient capacity to contain not less than thirty gallons."

Upon being advised that such had been the construction given by the department to the law, and such construction not appearing to have been in any respect subsequently altered or modified, the first count in the libel was very properly abandoned and withdrawn by the district attorney, as it would be the grossest injustice for the government to claim a condemnation for an importation which had been previously authorized by the secretary of the treasury and by his sanction communicated in the most public manner to all persons interested in navigation, and which is not known or understood to have been revoked or modified.

Before passing to the other counts, I would suggest, that the act of 1790 prohibited the importation of distilled spirits in packages less than ninety gallons, under forfeiture of the liquors and the vessel in which they were imported. [1 Stat. 145.] The act of 1866 authorizes the importation of spirits in packages not less than thirty gallons, under a penalty of a forfeiture of the liquors if imported in smaller packages, and this is the only penalty specified in the act. The act of 1790 is not in terms expressly repealed, but the provisions of the act of 1866 are to some extent inconsistent with it, authorizing much smaller packages, and declaring as a penalty the forfeiture of the liquors, if imported in packages less than those allowed. Congress having thus stated in distinct terms what shall be the penalty if distilled liquors are imported in lesser packages, when the question is fairly presented, it will require very careful examination and consideration to decide whether a vessel thus importing liquors in the prohibited packages, is therefor any longer liable to forfeiture; if the double forfeiture of both liquors and the vessel bringing them, provided for by the act of 1790, still remains, there seems to have been no necessity for expressly enacting in the act of 1866 that one of them shall continue; from this provision, it would rather be inferred that it was the intention of congress that there should be but a single forfeiture, that of the liquors thus illegally imported; the point does not here arise for decision, but I have made these suggestions that it may not be understood that it has entirely escaped the attention of the court.

The second count charges an unloading of goods of the value of four hundred dollars, not in open day, without a permit. This count cannot be sustained. The goods were unladen between 8 and 10 a. m., and were not of the value of four hundred dollars.

The real contest in the cause arises upon the third count, which charges this vessel whilst under license for the fisheries, with being employed in another trade, viz: importing goods into the United States, from a foreign port or place, whereby the vessel and cargo found on board at the time of her seizure are forfeited. This claim is under the 32d sec. of act of 28th Feb., 1793, by which it was enacted "that if any licensed ship or vessel shall be employed in any other trade than that for which she is licensed, every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the cargo found on board of her, shall be forfeited." In the case of The Two Friends [Case No. 14,289], Judge Story decided, that the cargo found on board at the time of the seizure shall be forfeited, not merely that which was on board at the time of committing the offence. In some cases, this construction of the law might prove detrimental to the public interest, as it holds out an inducement to officers not to seize the vessel at the time the forfeiture is incurred if the cargo then on board is but of little value, but the rather to postpone proceedings until she is found laden with a valuable cargo, belonging to her master or owners, and in the meantime, the vessel may be lost, or never return within reach of process, or the testimony against her vanish away, and thereby the government lose what it might have otherwise secured. In the present case, the seizure was made in April last, whilst the illegal importation was in Oct., 1867. During this period, the vessel had been engaged in fishing, and at times, without doubt had on board large and valuable cargoes of fish, none of which were seized, but only her fishing outfits for a new voyage. This delay, I am advised, was not from any negligence of the customs' officers, but was from their not having any information upon the subject until about the time of the vessel's seizure, which was then communicated to them by one Joseph R. McKown, who had for a number of years been in the employment of Decker the claimant, as skipper of the schooner Silver Moon, which vessel has at the present term, upon the information and procurement of said McKown, been condemned and forfeited to the United States.

Was this vessel employed in a trade, other than that for which she was licensed? I have heretofore decided, that a licensed fishing vessel does not incur forfeiture, by calling at a foreign port in the course of the fishing voyage for wood and water. I am not aware of any act of congress which forbids her so doing, or imposes on her any penalty therefor. In truth, it could hardly be thought possible, that congress would undertake to prohibit a vessel's touching at a foreign port for these articles, the very prime necessities of life, the want, or even the contraction of the usual supply, of which, to the crew, creates the greatest distress, and if destitute of them for any considerable period of time, all on board must perish. No one ever supposed that a vessel dismasted or leaking badly was not at liberty to make and enter the nearest port for repairs, whether a domestic or foreign one. Under ordinary circumstances it is the duty of the master so to do, and it is much more his duty, thus to proceed, when the very existence of his crew may depend on obtaining forthwith these necessities of life. In fact, there is nothing voluntary under such circumstances on his part. He is compelled by the very exigencies of his condition so to conduct, and he in so doing but yields to and obeys the law of necessity and self-preservation. Necessity knows no law, but prescribes the law.

In my opinion, it is not requisite that an imperative necessity for supplies of this description should be shown, in order to justify a fishing vessel's obtaining them at a foreign port, if they are suitable for the voyage, and the port is convenient of access, and the vessel procures only a sufficient quantity for the accomplishment of her fishing voyage. I hold that the obtaining of such supplies by her is not being engaged in another trade than that for which she is licensed. All that she has thus done is only in aid and furtherance of her legitimate business, and she is justified in doing that. This vessel was not prohibited from going into Pirate Cove for these supplies. The only purpose for which she stopped there was to procure them to aid in the completion of, and entirely as auxiliary to, the fishing voyage she was then prosecuting, and not with any design or purpose to undertake any new trade or employment. But whilst there she received on board and afterwards transported into this district two barrels, which it appears were filled with bottles of gin, although the skipper at the time was informed and supposed they contained crockery. The vessel was not detained an instant to receive these barrels on board; the business of her fishing trip was not for a moment in any way interrupted or interfered with; she did not proceed out of her regular course by reason of receiving or bringing these barrels; they were not taken for gain or profit, but merely as an act of favor and neighborly kindness exclusively from motives of friendship and good will, entirely a gratuitous service, without reward, or promise or expectation of any, in any way.

In the case of The Nymph [Case No. 10,388], the vessel was employed in the mackerel fisheries whilst licensed for cod fishing, and it was decided that she was thereby liable to forfeiture. Judge Story, had occasion to define the word "trade" as used in the 32d section of act of 1793. His opinion was that it is not there used, in a restrictive sense, as equivalent to traffic, but was rather intended as equivalent to "occupation, employment, or business for gain or profit." Admitting this to be the proper meaning of the word in this act, the claim of forfeiture here fails at the outset, as these barrels were not transported for gain or profit, or any expectation thereof. All the cases which I have examined, where a condemnation has been had under this section, are cases, where the vessel had been employed as a carrier of merchandise in the expectation of profit, in the usual and ordinary course of navigation, and they show that a single act of trading, not within the license, is ground of forfeiture. The Active, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 100, was licensed for the cod fishery and received on board a cargo of provisions with intent to proceed to some foreign port. The Two Friends [Case No. 14,289] was also licensed for the cod fisheries, and was found with a cargo of flour on board, intended for a foreign voyage. The Three Brothers [Id. 14,009] was also a fishing vessel, which went into a port on the Labrador coast, and there purchased a quantity of fish of considerable value which were brought in her to Boston.

In all of these cases, either a new voyage for profit or gain was commenced, or the prosecution of the voyage, in which the vessel was employed, was for the time being delayed and interrupted, by the purchase and reception of merchandise to be transported in the vessel for the profit and advantage of her owners. In the language of Judge Ware, in The Swallow [Case No. 13,666], in his comments on these cases: "They are all clearly cases of engaging in a trade in the usual meaning of the word, and they undoubtedly show, that a single act of trading beyond the authority of the license is fatal." The present case differs from them in many essential particulars, and bears a strong similarity to The Swallow [supra], in which it appeared that the vessel, while licensed for the fisheries, on her way to the fishing grounds touched at the Green Islands and took on board twelve or thirteen sheep and carried them to Matinicus, and when returning, she took from Matinicus four or five neat cattle and carried them to Thomaston. She did not go out of her way and was detained not more than an hour or two in the business, and it was not done for hire or profit, but was an act of good neighborhood, which fishermen were in the habit of doing for each other. Judge Ware held this vessel was not thereby made liable to forfeiture, and in his opinion, that learned judge says: "Can it in propriety of language be said, that if a small fishing vessel, employed in the coast fisheries, while on her way to or from the fishing grounds, takes a few articles of provisions or a few cattle at one place and drops them at another without being diverted from her course or occupation, and without any contract of hire or compensation or expectation of compensation, except that of a reciprocation of the same offices of good neighborhood on another occasion,—can a vessel, under such circumstances, be said to be engaged in a trade, within the meaning of the law? This would be extending the restrictions of the law further than any decision has yet carried them. I cannot think that this kind of interchange of neighborly acts falls within the words or policy of the law."

This reasoning is quite applicable to, and should control the present case. The government is not without redress for the acts of the parties concerned in this illegal importation of the gin, but I do not think the vessel and her cargo, considering fishing outfits as cargo, which question is not free from doubt, are liable to forfeiture under the circumstances here developed.

I decree a restoration of the vessel and property seized on board, and a discharge of the stipulation given in the cause; but shall certify probable cause of seizure.

Case No. 17,763.

WILLIMANTIC LINEN CO. et al. v.
CLARK THREAD CO. et al.

[4 Ban. & A. 133.]¹

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. March, 1879.

PATENT FOR INVENTIONS—THREAD WINDING MACHINE—COMBINATION OF OLD INSTRUMENTALITIES—ANTICIPATION.

1. A foreign patent is not admissible as evidence to anticipate an American patent of a date anterior to the enrolment of the foreign patent.

2. Old instrumentalities are patentable when combined for the first time in such a manner as to produce new and useful results.

3. The rule, that, a claim for a combination of old instrumentalities, in a machine, is not anticipated by a prior invention in which the combination of equivalent instrumentalities appears, when the inventor of the second patent has changed the mechanism so as to produce new and valuable results, stated.

4. The first and third claims of letters patent No. 26,415, granted to Hezekiah Conant, December 13th, 1859, and extended for seven years June 21st, 1873, for an "improvement in machines for winding thread on spools," held valid.

F. Adams, for complainant.

George Gifford, for defendant.

NIXON, District Judge. The pleadings in this case show, that an original bill of complaint was filed against the defendants on the 13th of July, 1872, for an infringement of the original patent; and that an extension of the same having been obtained, pending the suit, on application to the commissioner of patents, the supplemental bill was filed February 5, 1874, setting forth the fact. The bills charge, that the defendants have infringed the said letters patent, originally granted to Hezekiah Conant, for "improvement in machines for winding thread on spools," numbered 26,415, dated December 13, 1859, and ante-dated June 22, 1859, and extended June 21, 1873, for seven years from and after the expiration of the first term thereof.

The defendants in their answer deny: (1) That the threading machines used in their manufactory contain the inventions recited in any of the claims of the complainants' patent. (2) That Conant was the original and first inventor of what is claimed in his patent, having been anticipated by certain enumerated English patents. And (3) they claim that the thread-winding machines used by the defendants were the invention of one William Weild, to whom English letters patent were granted January 22, 1858; that said invention was prior to Conant's; and that the defendants paid royalty to the owner of the Weild patent.

At the hearing no stress seems to have been laid upon the third defence, to wit, the alleged older invention of Weild—it appearing in the proofs that the patent, although granted on the 22d of January, 1858, was not enrolled until the 22d of July following, and foreign patents are not admissible as evidence against an American patent, anterior to the date of their enrollment.

The complainants' patent has reference to an improvement in machines for winding thread on spools, and exhibits six claims. Two models were produced on the argument marked "Complainants' Exhibits 5 and 6," and the counsel admitted that the defendants had used and were using machines containing the features represented in these models. The complainants insist that these machines contain the invention set forth in the first, third and fourth claims of the Conant patent. In the specifications of the patent, Mr. Conant says, that the object of his invention is to wind thread upon spools, with regularity and precision, layer upon layer, and each filling the whole length of the spool, without any attention on the part of the operator, further than to remove and replace the spools; to cut the thread and to fasten it when the spool is full; and to attach the thread to a fresh spool and set the machine in motion; and he thus describes the mechanism, which is claimed to be infringed by the defendants: "The nature of the first part of my invention consists in combining a pattern cam or traverse charger with nuts and right and left-hand screws or their equivalents for the purpose, the operation of the combination being such, that a thread guide shall have its motion reversed and its length or distance of motion regulated automatically," etc. "The nature of the third part of my invention consists in combining with a pattern cam, and right and left-hand screws and traversing nuts, a stop motion, substantially such as is hereafter specified, so that the whole apparatus shall be brought to rest when the bobbin is completely filled. The fourth part consists in making the lips of the levers that actuate the screw nuts or their equivalents, for the purpose they serve, adjustable, so that different lengths of spools may be wound properly by the same traverse charger."

He states his claims as follows: "(1) The combination, in the manner set forth, of a traverse charger, with right and left-hand screws, and with nuts which are alternately in gear with such screws, the combination operating as a whole substantially in the manner and for the purpose described." "(3) A stop motion, substantially as described, for causing the machine to come to rest when a spool is filled, in combination with automatic apparatus, substantially such as set forth, for regulating the length of motion and change of direction of motion of a guide, through which thread is delivered on to a bobbin or spool. (4) Adjustable lips, substantially such as set forth, in combination with a traverse charger, whereby spools of different lengths may be wound by the use of the same traverse charger."

The claims are all for combinations of mechanism for the production of specific results in the winding of thread upon spools. The elements of the first, are right and left-hand nuts, right and left-hand screws, and a traverse charger. The prior use of such nuts and screws, and of a traverse charger is admitted. The two former are found in the Wibberly patent, and the latter in the Young patent, both of which are English patents and antedate the complainants'. The question here is whether their combination is new. Old instrumentalities are patentable, when combined for the first time, in such a manner as to produce new and useful results.

The defendants insist that this claim is anticipated both by the Wibberly patent and the Young patent; inasmuch, as in the former, the spool itself, when the machine is in operation, performs all the functions of a traverse charger, and, in the latter, there is an independent traverse charger, with which the thread guides are connected, so that each thread guide is caused to move to and fro, or traverse along its respective spool or bobbin.

It is not necessary to stop to inquire whether the spool in the Wibberly invention, is an equivalent for the traverse charger in the complainants' patent; for a specific traverse charger, in connection with right and left-hand nuts and screws, appears in the Young patent. If we should give the broad construction to the claim, insisted upon by the complainants, it is clearly anticipated by the Young invention, where the combination of equivalent instrumentalities appears. But it does not thence follow that the claim is void. The inventor has changed the mechanism so as to produce new and valuable results. His shaper or traverse charger is of peculiar construction, whereby the length of each succeeding traverse is not determined by the diameter of the barrel of the spool, or by even the presence of the spool upon the spindle, as in the Wibberly and Young machines, but by the varying lengths of the ribs on the periphery of the wheel. Whether the defendants' machines infringe the claim as thus construed will be considered hereafter.

The constituents of the third claim are the several elements of the first claim, in combination with automatic mechanism for a stop motion, which, by moving the belt from the driving pulley to a loose pulley, when the bobbin is nearly filled, brings the whole apparatus gradually to rest by its own friction. If this claim should be construed to include every stop motion, or means of stopping the machine with automatic apparatus, it would be void for want of novelty. The stop motion is not new per se, nor was Conant the first to combine a stop motion with a traverse charger, so as to stop the machine automatically. Wibberly does this, not by the shifting of the belt, but by means of a brake; which is brought suddenly to bear upon the parts of the apparatus connected with the winding spindle.

Avoiding, then, the construction which renders the claim invalid, let us inquire what is the scope or purpose of the invention, as exhibited in the claim. It is a combination with a combination, and the patentee sets forth in the specifications of his patent, the methods which he employs, and the results he obtains, by their union. "It is important," he says, "that the winding should be stopped at the instant that the spool is filled, and the last course completed. First, for the reason, that the latter will then present a smooth surface from end to end of the spool. Second, because the machine will then have all its parts in the right position to commence winding another spool, and for this purpose, I have contrived a stop motion"—two modifications of which he then describes. To accomplish this result, he has mechanism for shifting the belt from the driving pulley to a loose one. Both the loose pulley and the brake are devices known in mechanics, to produce a stop motion in machinery. Being equivalent, there is no invention in substituting the one for the other. Wibberly used the brake; the complainants the loose pulley; and the defendants the brake, for the same purpose. It is quite as permissible for the defendants to substitute the brake for the loose pulley of the complainants, as it was for the latter to substitute the loose pulley for the brake of the Wibberly patent. That combination being common to the three machines, it follows that whether the defendants have infringed the third claim, depends upon whether their machine infringes the other combination of the claim, to wit, the first claim of the complainants' patent.

The fourth claim of the complainants is also a combination, and its three elements are adjustable lips so combined with right and left-hand screws and a traverse charger, that spools of different lengths may be wound by the use of the same traverse charger.

The attention of the court has not been called to any machine devised before the Conant, that possessed this adjustable quality. The defendants' expert Waters is of the opinion that its insertion required no invention, for the reason that there is no combined action between the adjustment of the lips and the other parts, while the machine is in operation. In this opinion, we think, he is mistaken. The result is new and useful, and Conant is entitled to be protected in the combination of the instrumentalities, or their equivalents, which he employs to obtain it. The defendants' machine, Exhibit No. 6, has, to some extent at least, the same capacity of adjustment, but their counsel insists that it is produced by substantially different means. In their machine the adjustability is in the traverse charger, while in the complainants' it is in the pallets or lips. The shaper of the defendants is of such peculiar construction, that adjustability is brought about by the direct action of the screw with its nuts, without the intervention of the lips,—the defendants thus dispensing with one of the parts of the combination of the complainants' fourth claim. They accomplish the same result, to wit, adjustability; but the patent is not for the result. It is for the means whereby it is secured; and if their means are essentially different, there is no infringement.

The invention pertains to a machine, and the case falls in that class, where all the elements are old, and where the invention consists in a new combination whereby a new and useful result is obtained. A party guilty of infringing this claim, must be shown to have used all the necessary parts of the combination. It is clear from the inspection of the models exhibited, that there are great differences in form. But differences in form will not excuse the defendants, unless they construct and operate their mechanism in a substantially different manner.

The leading case of Gould v. Rees, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 187, is authority for nothing that the omission of one of the ingredients of the complainants' combination, takes the defendants out of the category of infringers of the claim in the present case.

The only remaining question is, whether the traverse charger in the defendants' machine is substantially identical with the traverse charger in the complainants'. It has long been settled, that the identity or diversity of two machines, depends, not in the employment of the same elements, or powers of mechanics, but upon producing of the given effect by the same mode of operation, or the same combination of powers. Odiorne v. Winkley [Case No. 10,432]; Union Sugar Refinery v. Matthiesson [Id. 14,399]. Or, to adopt the language of Mr. Justice Washington, of this circuit, in Evans v. Eaton [Id. 4,560], the rule is, "that if the two machines be substantially the same, and operate in the same manner, to produce the same result—though they may differ in form, proportions, and utility, they are the same in principle." The characteristic mode of operation, claimed for the Conant machine, and which, it is alleged, existed in no prior machine, is a traverse charger, and the half nuts and their fellow screws, so combined, that the thread guide is made to move through an exact distance in one direction and then in the opposite direction, with a certain definite increase of distance, until the spool is filled, without any regard either to the dimensions of the thread, or to the size of the spool. The defendants' machine produces the same result. Is it done by substantially the same mechanical means, or by the same law of action?

All, or nearly all, of the witnesses, are experts, on one side or the other. A case is rarely presented where there is a more substantial agreement as to the facts, or a more radical difference in the conclusions from them. The defendants have such advantage of the opinion of professional experts, as a majority in numbers gives. Messrs. E. S. Renwick, Hervey Waters, and J. Boyd Elliot, scientific witnesses of deserved reputation, agree that the shapers in the two machines are entirely different in their structure, functions and mode of operation; while Mr. H. S. Renwick, of like reputation, supports Conant, the patentee, that they are essentially the same. They all swear with equal confidence and with apparently equal intelligence, to their respective opinions. The traverse chargers are certainly different in appearance. The complainants' revolves, while the defendants' slides. The one is, in form, a wheel, and the other, a plate, shaped like a truncated wedge, or isosceles triangle with its point cut off parallel to its base. The gradually increasing length of the teeth or ribs on the periphery of the wheel, determines the length of the traverse in the Conant machine. The same is determined in the defendants' machine, by projecting forward the plate for each successive course of thread, so that longer sections of the shaper shall be successively traversed.

But, turning from any further consideration of these mere variations in form, is not this the true test of infringement in this case: One machine with its peculiar mechanism being given, does it require invention to produce the other with its peculiar mechanism? Let a skilled mechanic, for instance, take the Conant machine, and watch it when in operation. He soon ascertains that its distinguishing feature is a shaper, furnished with a series of lips or steps, of gradually increasing length, and that the mechanism of the apparatus—and not the size of the spool or the dimensions of the thread, fixes and determines the number and length of the traverses. He substitutes for the steps around the periphery of the cylinder, a plate of a truncated wedge shape; or, in other words, he unrolls the cylinder until he gets a wedge shaped plate, like Fig. 5 of the second page of the drawings in Conant's original patent. He also observes another office performed by the Conant traverse charger, to wit, bringing the proper parts of the machine, after a traverse is made, into a relation that it can act again, by engaging the next step upon the wheel, and that this office is lost by the above-described change of form. He supplies the loss, by substituting the device of a spring, or some other mechanical contrivance, to furnish the necessary actuating force. In our judgment there is no invention in such substitutions. A machine thus reorganized and actuated, embodies the vital principle of the complainants' mechanism, and, inasmuch as the Conant patent, by the provisions of the laws of the United States, is entitled to priority over the English patent of Weild, under which the defendants claim to act, it must be held that the complainants are entitled to a decree for infringement of the first and third claims of their patent, and it is ordered accordingly.

[NOTE. Subsequently damages were awarded complainants to the amount of $159,035.22.]

Exceptions filed by defendants were overruled, and a final decree for the amount awarded. 27 Fed. 865. An appeal was then taken to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill of complaint. 140 U. S. 481, 11 Sup. Ct. 847.

WILLING et al. v. UNITED STATES.

[4 Dall. 374; 1 Wash. C. C. 125.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. May 7, 1804.²

SALE OF AMERICAN VESSEL—NECESSITY OF NEW REGISTRY.

An American registered vessel, while at sea, sold in part to resident citizens of the United States without a bill of sale reciting her registry, and without a new registry until her arrival at her home port, does not lose her privileges as an American vessel.

Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania.

Upon the record it appeared that this was an action upon a bond, dated the 16th of November, 1802, given by Willings and Francis and J. Miller, in the penal sum of 15,442 dollars to secure the payment of 7,720.41 dollars, being the amount of one half the duties payable on the cargo of the ship Missouri, on the 16th of May, 1803. The defendants pleaded (1) that the duties on the goods in question amounted only to 14,036.73 dollars, on account of one half of which (7,018.36 dollars) the bond was given; and (2) payment. The plaintiff replied: (1) That the ship was an American registered vessel, owned by the defendants, when she sailed from Philadelphia to Canton on the 1st of December, 1800; that after her departure she was in part sold to Jacob G. Koch and others, on the 12th of February, 1801; that on making the sale the ship was not registered anew, nor was there any bill of sale executed reciting her register; that the goods were imported into the port of Philadelphia subsequent to the sale, on the 16th of November, 1802; that the amount of the duties was 15,440.92 dollars, for one half of which, payable in six months, the bond was given. (3) Non solverunt.

The defendants rejoined that they admit the sale to Koch and others, and the importation of the goods after such sale; but they aver that the ship was at sea at the time of the sale, having her register on board, and that it was not, therefore, in the power of the defendants to deliver it up at the time of the sale; that on her arrival, the 15th of November, the defendants did execute a bill of sale to Koch and others, reciting the register, and the captain delivered up the register to the collector, whereupon the ship was registered anew, as the joint property of the defendants, and Koch and others; that on the 7th of January, 1803, Koch and others resold to the defendants, and executed a bill of sale reciting the register, last mentioned; and that thereupon the ship was registered anew as the property of the defendants, whereby she continued an American registered vessel, not liable to foreign duties, and that the domestic duties only amounted to 14,036.73 dollars, &c.

The plaintiffs sur-rejoined that they admit the ship was at sea when she was in part sold to Koch and others, but aver that she was not registered anew, nor was there a bill of sale, reciting the register, at the time of the sale, nor at the time of her arrival; that they, also, admit that the captain delivered to the collector, the register of the ship at the time of his arrival, but they insist that it was long after she had been in part sold, without being registered anew, &c.; that the registry of the ship, on the 22d of December, 1802, in the name of Koch and others and the defendants, was made after the resale by Koch and others to the defendants, when Koch and others had ceased to own any part; and that they admit that Koch and others, having previously resold, did, on the 24th of January, 1803, deliver up the register in their names, and the ship was then registered anew, as the exclusive property of the defendants, but they insist that at the time of the actual resale by Koch and others (15th November, 1801), she was not registered anew, nor did they then execute a bill of sale reciting the register; that the registry of the 24th of January, 1803, was made, under colour of a bill of sale executed by Koch and others to the defendants, long after the resale, and they had ceased to have any interest in the ship; and that at the time of the sale in part to Koch and others, of the resale by them to the defendants, of the arrival of the ship in the port of Philadelphia, and of her entry, she had ceased to be deemed a ship of the United States. The defendants demurred, generally, to the sur-rejoinder; and the plaintiffs joined in demurrer.

The general question, upon the demurrer, was whether a registered vessel of the United States, being sold, in part, to resident citizens of the United States, while she was at sea, without a bill of sale reciting the register, and without being then registered anew, was liable, with her cargo, to the payment of foreign, or only to the payment of domestic, tonnage and duties, on her return to a port of the United States? And the argument rested chiefly upon the terms and meaning of the 14th section of the registering act, which is, in these words: "And be it further enacted, that when any ship or vessel, which shall have been registered pursuant to this act, or the act hereby, in part repealed, shall, in whole or in part, be sold, or transferred to a citizen or citizens of the United States; or shall be altered in form or burthen, by being lengthened or built upon, or from one denomination to another, by the mode or method of rigging or fitting, in every such case the said ship or vessel shall be registered anew, by her former name, according to the directions herein before contained, (otherwise she shall cease to be deemed a ship or vessel of the United States) and her former certificate of registry shall be delivered up to the collector to whom application for such new registry shall be made, at the time, that the same shall be made, to be by him transmitted to the register of the treasury, who shall cause the same to be cancelled. And in every such case of sale or transfer, there shall be some instrument of writing, in the nature of a bill of sale, which shall recite at length, the said certificate, otherwise the said ship or vessel shall be incapable of being so registered anew. And in every case, in which a ship or vessel is hereby required to be registered anew, if she shall not be so registered anew, she shall not be entitled to any of the privileges or benefits of a ship or vessel of the United States. And further, if her said former certificate of registry shall not be delivered up as aforesaid, except where the same may have been destroyed, lost, or unintentionally mislaid, and an oath or affirmation thereof shall have been made, as aforesaid, the owner or owners of such ship or vessel shall forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered, with costs of suit." In the district court, judgment was rendered for the United States. [Case No. 16,727].

Mr. Dallas, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Rawle & Lewis, for plaintiffs in error.

For the United States. The general question is, whether the cargo of the ship Missouri was liable to the payment of foreign duties, on the 15th of November, 1802, when she returned to the port of Philadelphia. It will be attempted to maintain the affirmative on two grounds: (1) That she had not a register in force. (2) That she was not then entitled to be registered anew.

(1) The discussion does not turn upon the fact of American ownership, but upon the legal existence of an American register. The object of the law was to secure to American citizens, the exclusive benefit of American tonnage and navigation. The means employed were directed, to ascertain, first, the fact that the vessel was American built; and, secondly, to trace every change of ownership, in whole or in part. And the means being suited to the object, all theories, all arguments ab inconvenienti, must yield to the positive terms of the law, in this instance, as in numerous other instances of forfeiture under the navigation and revenue laws. In order to ascertain the changes, or transfers, of property, considerations respecting the transfer to an alien, whether the vessel was in port or at sea, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, respecting the transfer to a citizen, whether the vessel was in port or at sea, naturally occurred. Now, no American vessel, wherever she may be, if sold to an alien, can be registered anew. In England a bill of sale to an alien is void, without the consent of three fourths of the owners endorsed upon the certificate. In America there is no such provision, but still, upon a clandestine sale of a part owner, the innocent owners are protected to the amount of their interest in the vessel. 4 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 11 [1 Stat. 523]; Abb. 45; 13 Geo. III. c. 26; 2 Laws [Bior. & D.] p. 131, §§ 7, 16, 17 [1 Stat. 145]; Abb. 30; 26 Geo. III. c. 60, § 15. Again, an American vessel, if sold even to a citizen, must, upon every sale, in whole or in part, be registered anew, the old register must be surrendered, the bill of sale must be in writing, containing a recital of the register, and on every entry at a port of the United States the mesne transfers must be disclosed. 2 Laws [Bior. & D.] 131, §§ 14, 17 [1 Stat. 145]. In England a distinct provision is made for cases in which vessels are sold, when in port, and for cases in which they are sold while at sea. For the former it is required that an endorsement shall be made on the register, or that the vessel be registered anew, at the option of the remaining owners, without which the sale is void. 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 22, § 21; 34 Geo. III. c. 68, §§ 15, 21. And for the latter, it is required, in order to render the sale valid, that the bill of sale shall recite the register; that a copy of the bill of sale be delivered to the commissioners; that notice of the transfer be given at the ship's port; and that the endorsement be made on the register, when the ship returns. Id. But in America, the only provision in the case of a sale of a vessel at sea is contained in the 14th section of the law. 2 Laws [Bior. & D.] 131 [1 Stat. 145], while the sale of a vessel in port is anxiously guarded as well by that section, as by the 14th, 11th, and 12th sections. The registering bond does not embrace the case of a sale while the vessel is at sea; the 17th section only requires a disclosure of the fact, without declaring any consequence; and, in short, it is only in the 14th section that any provision is made for a formal bill of sale, for a surrender of the old register, or for the taking out of a new one. And yet the policy which prescribes such guards against unlawful transfers, while a vessel is in port, operates more forcibly in the cases of a transfer, while a vessel is at sea. The legislative jealousy of sales abroad is manifested, indeed, by the provision, which disqualifies citizens, resident in foreign countries (with a few exceptions), from being holders of American registered vessels. 2 Laws [Bior. & D.] 132, § 2; Id. 134, § 4 [1 Stat. 145]. Then, if the policy of the law is general, so are the words of the 14th section of the act, embracing every sale of a vessel, in whole or in part, at home or abroad; and, to preserve the American privileges of the vessel, the requisites of the section are a new register on the sale, a surrender of the old register, and a bill of sale, reciting the register. On the sale of the Missouri to Koch and his associates, her old register ceased to be in force. A new one might be obtained, provided, at the time of applying for it, the old one was surrendered, and a bill of sale, in due form, was produced: but, after vacating the old register by a sale, the ship ceased to be privileged, until a new register was obtained. A formal bill of sale is a sine qua non, in every case; and, emphatically, it is necessary in the case of a sale, while a vessel is at sea, as the act of congress provides no other guard against an unlawful transfer. Besides, why should the 17th section merely require, upon the entry of a vessel from abroad, a disclosure of the fact, whether there has been any antecedent change of ownership, if it was not to bring the case within the 14th section of the act? And if a vessel sold at home is subject to the rigor of all the regulations of the 14th section, on what principle can a vessel sold abroad pretend to an exemption? Is it not more within the policy, spirit, and language of the law to say that the vessel sold abroad shall, like the vessel sold at home, lose her privilege upon the sale; and, as the danger of unlawful sales is greater abroad than at home, she shall remain unprivileged, until the actual renewal of her register? In illustration of the argument on this point, the following authorities were cited: 3 Term R. 406; 3 Brown, Ch. 571; s. c. 5 Term R. 710; 7 Term R. 306; 2 East, 399; 1 Bos. & P. 484.

(2) Nor was the Missouri even entitled to be registered anew, at the time of her return to the port of Philadelphia. There did not then exist a bill of sale, reciting the register; and the recital might as easily be made from the record at the customhouse as from the certificate of registry carried with the vessel.

The construction now contended for has uniformly prevailed in the treasury department, and contemporaneous construction ought to be regarded in deciding upon a doubtful law. Parker, Exch. 215. Legislative construction is, also, in favor of the United States, for the very case of a vessel sold while at sea has been specially introduced into the system. 6 Laws [pub. by authority] 223, § 3 [2 Stat. 209]. The power to remit the foreign duties incurred by such sale has been vested in the secretary of the treasury, and legislative construction of a legislative act, where the words are doubtful, ought to be conclusive. Parker, Exch. 217.

For Willings and Francis. In the present case there is no suggestion of alien ownership, or mala fides of any kind. The meaning of the legislature, should, therefore, be perfectly clear, before a decision inflicting, in effect, a heavy penalty, on the plaintiffs in error, is pronounced. The general policy of the law is to give an advantage to the American citizen; and, if its language is at all obscure, he is entitled to the most beneficial interpretation. In this view of the controversy, the recapitulation of a few plain rules will lead to a favourable result. (1) A vessel can have but one register at the same time. (2) The certificate of the registry is delivered to the master of the vessel, when he leaves the port, and must be deposited at the customhouse upon his return. (3) The register remains in force, until it has been legally vacated or cancelled. (4) On a change of property, whether in whole or in part, a new register must be taken out; but no new register can be granted until the old one is surrendered. (5) The execution of a bill of sale, reciting the register, will not authorize the granting of a new register, without such surrender of the old one; but both must concur for that purpose. In no part of the law is a particular time prescribed, either for the execution of a bill of sale, or for the application for a new register. The 14th section amounts to nothing more than a declaration that a vessel, which has been sold, in whole or in part, shall not enjoy the American privileges, until she is registered anew; but the word "when" is not used as an adverb of time, nor does the section require that the vessel shall be registered anew, at the moment of the transfer. If, therefore, the bill of sale is executed, and the old register surrendered, when an application is first made for the enjoyment of American privileges, the words and policy of the law are satisfied; nor will the court go beyond the words of a law to create a forfeiture. 1 Bos. & P. 483; 19 Vin. Abr. 512, pls. 8, 9; 3 Term R. 401; 2 East, 399. The 17th section of the act, however, seems to fix the sense of the legislature; for, it obviously contemplates the disclosure of a transfer, while the vessel was at sea; and if the oath, which it prescribes, is truly taken, there is no forfeiture of her American character.

The doctrine contended for, on behalf of the United States, would introduce the greatest mischiefs. Could congress mean (in an act too, for the benefit of American tonnage, and navigation) so to tie up the property in ships, that while they are at sea, they could not be sold, without incurring a forfeiture of their privileges? And is it consistent with justice and reason that the innocent shippers of a cargo on board an American vessel should be taxed with the payment of foreign duties, in consequence of successive transfers, to which they were neither parties nor privies? To these inconveniences the claim of foreign duties, in this case, adds the reproach that congress has required an impossibility; to wit, the immediate surrender of the register at the customhouse, while, in fact, it was on board of the vessel, at sea. As to a contemporary construction, it is not clearly and uniformly shown, in favour of the adverse doctrine; nor, if it were, could it prevail against the plain words and obvious meaning of the law. And, as to a supposed legislative construction of the act of the 2d of March, 1803 (6 Laws [pub. by authority] 223, §§ 3, 4 [2 Stat. 209]), the act is merely affirmative; and even if it were declaratory of the legislative opinion, upon the previous state of the law, it could not be binding upon the judges, who must exercise their own judgments upon the law itself, independent of legislative exposition.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Although the pleadings, in this case, are lengthy, it has been agreed by both parties that the only question to be considered and decided, upon the whole record, is, whether the cargo, imported in the ship Missouri, is subject to the payment of foreign, or of domestic, duties? By the first section of the "Act concerning the registering and recording of ships, or vessels," passed on the 31st of December, 1792 [1 Stat. 287], it was provided that all vessels, registered pursuant to that law, should be denominated and deemed vessels of the United States; and all vessels of the United States are entitled, by law, to certain benefits and privileges denied to foreign vessels; so long as they shall continue to be wholly owned, and to be commanded, by a citizen or citizens of the United States. The ship Missouri was a duly registered vessel of the United States, and has always continued to be owned and commanded by citizens. She was, therefore, entitled to the benefits and privileges of her American character, when she arrived at the port of Philadelphia, in November, 1802; unless the partial sale made to American citizens, while she was at sea, deprived her of that character. Whether the transaction referred to produced such an effect, may, I think, be decided upon a joint consideration of the fourteenth and first sections of the registering act alone; though other sections will afford fair ground for reasoning and illustration. The fourteenth section is composed of several sentences, which must be distinctly, as well as collectively, considered, to ascertain the general meaning and result. The first sentence declares, that when a registered vessel is sold to a citizen, she shall be registered anew, by her former name, or she shall cease to be deemed a vessel of the United States, and that her former register shall be delivered up, at the time of applying for a new one. The second sentence declares; that in every such case of sale or transfer, there shall be a bill of sale, reciting at length the certificate of registry, otherwise the vessel shall be incapable of being registered anew. And the third sentence declares, generally, that in every case in which a vessel is required to be registered anew, she shall not be entitled to the privileges of a vessel of the United States, if she is not so registered.

It is difficult to conjecture, why, in the first sentence, the want of a new register should be declared, within a parenthesis, to deprive a vessel of her American character; and that, in the third sentence, the same effect should be again declared, for the same cause. The latter declaration, however, is obviously tautology, for, if the former declaration can be said to have destroyed the privilege, eo instanti, when the sale was effected, it was useless and superfluous to repeat that the vessel should not, at any subsequent period, be entitled to enjoy it. The clear meaning, however, of both sentences, appears to be that the vessel should lose her American privileges, not simply upon the sale, but upon the neglect to obtain a new registry, after the sale. It is here, then, material to inquire in what manner, and on what terms, a new registry can be obtained? A bill of sale, reciting the old certificate of registry, must be produced to the collector. The old certificate of registry must, also, be surrendered. Now, though a bill of sale might be formally executed, in the absence of the ship, yet, the ship is bound, by law, to carry the certificate of her registry with her; and, consequently, it is impossible for her owner to surrender that instrument to the collector while she is herself at sea. If, however, the surrender of the certificate must be made, or the privilege must be lost, it is manifest that the law either requires the performance of an impossibility (which is not hastily to be imputed to the expression, and never to the intention of a law), or it prohibits, in effect, the sale of a ship at sea by one of our citizens to another.

There is no part of our navigation system that expressly avows this to be the intention of the legislature; and from what principle of public policy can it be inferred or presumed? The cargo is not liable to the claim of foreign duties, until an actual sale of the ship; and why should the owner of the cargo lose his privilege on account of the sale, which is an act of the owner of the ship alone? or be punished as for a fault, on account of the neglect of the owner of the ship to take out a new register; an omission which the owner of the cargo can neither prevent nor supply? Even, however, with respect to the ship, why, I repeat, should the privilege be lost, and her owner punished as for a fault, in omitting to deliver an instrument to the collector on shore, which the law directs to be kept on board her at sea? A consequence more injurious would not proceed from a sale to an alien; and yet, in the case of a sale to an alien, the act of congress declares the forfeiture of the American privilege in express words, as being incurred, eo instanti, on the sale; but no such declaration is made in the case of a sale to a citizen.

It appears to me that the 4th sentence of the 14th section of the act is also important, for it declares that "if the former certificate of registry shall not be delivered up as aforesaid, the owner, or owners, of the ship, or vessel, shall forfeit and pay the sum of $500." And thus, if the construction contended for by the attorney of the United States is correct, the law not only prohibits the sale of a vessel at sea by one citizen to another, on pain of forfeiting, at the moment of sale, the privileges of the vessel; but subjects the owner to a penalty, although it is physically impossible that he should do the thing, for the omission of which he is to be punished.

But an American vessel does not cease to be entitled to her privilege any more by the act of sale than by the act of altering her form or burthen; both cases being embraced by the provisions of the 14th section. Let us suppose, therefore, that the construction of the vessel should be altered, either in the port to which she belongs, or in any other port; would she lose her privilege before the owners could have an opportunity to apply for a new registry? And, if not, why should the privilege be lost before the opportunity occurs to make the application for a new registry, in the case of a sale? I can perceive no reason for a distinction.

As to the provisions of the 17th section, they are designed to compel a discovery of any transfers of a vessel, which may have been made during her absence from the port; in order that it might appear whether she continued to be a privileged vessel of the United States. If it appeared that she had been transferred to a foreigner, her privileges were forfeited from the moment of transfer; and if it appeared that she had been sold to a citizen, the officers of the customs were enabled, by a knowledge of the fact, to exact the foreign duties in future, should no application be made for a new registry.

I am, upon the whole, of opinion that the appellants are not liable for higher duties than are payable by vessels of the United States; and, consequently, the judgment of the district court must be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

This judgment was affirmed by the supreme court, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 48.

2. Major part, in value, may fit out against consent of the minority; though they must communicate the design.

[Cited in Davis v. The Seneca, Case No. 3-650; The Annie H. Smith, Id. 420.]

This was a petition to permit the majority of owners to proceed with the brig Amelia on a voyage, after giving stipulation for value of the recusant owner's share. In this case the proceedings will shew the course originally taken by the parties.² The court was clearly of opinion that the cause was one of admiralty jurisdiction; and that it had power to authorize the majority of owners to fit out and expedite the vessel on a voyage to be designated in the stipulation, and it directed accordingly. The question of freight was accommodated; and the court gave no final judgment. An opinion was however intimated that no freight was legally demandable by a recusant owner, who would neither sell at a reasonable appraisement, nor make advances for outfit; but his share of the vessel should be secured to him, that as he gains no profit, he may incur no loss. It appeared unreasonable, that those who were prepared, and desirous to put their property into a ² To the Honorable Richard Peters, Judge of the District Court of the United States, in and for the Pennsylvania District: The petition of Willings & Francis, and Samuel S. Cooper, respectfully sheweth: That your petitioners are owners of three-fourth parts of the brigantine Amelia. That your petitioners are desirous of sending the same vessel on a voyage to St. Sebastians in the kingdom of Spain, and from St. Sebastians back to Philadelphia. That the remaining one-fourth part of the same vessel belongs to Peter Blight of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, who refuses to join in the said voyage, or to suffer the same vessel to sail on your petitioners' own account. Your petitioners therefore respectfully pray, that this honorable court conforming to the established law and usage of the admiralty, will grant a citation returnable at the next court day to the said Peter Blight, to shew cause, if any he hath, why your petitioners should not be admitted to give security for the safe return of the same vessel, and thereupon proceed with her on the said intended voyage. Willings & Francis, Samuel S. Cooper. August 16th, 1800.

The words "and from St. Sebastians back to Philadelphia," inserted in the libel on motion.

In the District Court of Pennsylvania. Willings & Francis, versus Peter Blight. The answer of Peter Blight of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, to the petition of Willings & Francis and Samuel Cooper, respectfully sheweth, that the respondent admits that the said petitioners are owners of three-fourths parts of the brigantine Amelia; but this respondent avers that before the filing of the said petition he had assigned all his property, real and personal, whatsoever and wheresoever, to George Blight, Thomas Murgatroyd, and William Cole, in trust for the benefit of his creditors, and therefore he is no longer owner of the remaining one-fourth part of the same vessel, nor entitled without the directions, authority and approbation of his said trustees to join in the voyage in the said petition mentioned, or to suffer the said vessel to sail on the said petitioners' own account. And this respondent further answering saith, that he believes his said trustees would be willing, as he himself would be, to join in sending the said vessel on any voyage state of activity, should use their funds disproportionately for the benefit of a delinquent owner.

During the progress of the cause the following opinion was given by the court.

Whether the minority shall or shall not be compelled to sell, has not, in the opinion of the court, been here judicially determined. It is asserted (Beawes, Lex. Merc. 49) that if the majority of owners refuse to fit out, they are compellable to sell at a valuation; and so are part-owners, deficient and unable to fit out the vessel. This majority or minority, means those who hold the greater or less proportion of property. In the Sea Laws (3d Ed. 442), it is said, that "upon any probable design, the major part of the owners may, even against the consent, though not without the privity and knowledge of the rest, freight out their vessel to sea." "If it should so fall out that the major part, in number, protest against the voyage, and but one left that is for the voyage, yet the same may be effected by that party, if there be equality in partnership." "If it falls out that one is so obstinate, that his consent cannot be had, the law will enforce him either to hold or to sell his for the general benefit of the owners, provided such voyage was truly and fully made known to them; but the said petitioners have not set forth to what place or places it is intended to send the said vessel after her arrival at St. Sebastians; and this respondent has been informed and avers that it is not intended that the said vessel should return from St. Sebastians immediately to the port of Philadelphia, but that she should be employed by the said petitioners in a long, hazardous and circuitous voyage, not mentioned or described in the said petition. And this respondent further answering saith, that the petitioners have not in their said petition offered to purchase the late share of the respondent in the said vessel assigned as aforesaid to his said trustees; nor have they offered to sell the said vessel and distribute the money among the owners in proportion; nor have they offered to give security for paying any part of the profits of the voyage or freight of the said vessel, to this respondent or his said trustees, nor have they offered to give security for the return of the said vessel within a limited time. Wherefore and because this court has not jurisdiction of the case, the same not being a civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, inasmuch as the said vessel was at the time of filing the said petition and now is within the body of the district of Pennsylvania, and not upon the high seas. The respondent prays that the said petition may be dismissed with costs. &c. A. J. Dallas, Proctor for the Respondent.

And now this twenty-second day of August, 1800, it is ordered by the court that the petitioners be permitted to send the brigantine Amelia in the petition mentioned on a voyage from Philadelphia to St. Sebastians, and back to Philadelphia, upon their entering into stipulation in the sum of six thousand dollars with approved security, as well for the safe return of the same vessel to Philadelphia, as for the payment to the said respondent, his heirs, executors and administrators, of one-fourth of the freight* of the same vessel for the said voyage out and home, deducting all reasonable and just mercantile charges.

proportion; but if he will set no price, the rest may rig her out, at their own costs and charges, and whatsoever freight she earns, he is not to have any share or benefit in the same. But if such vessel happens to miscarry, or to be cast away, the rest must answer him his part, or proportion, in the vessel. But if it should fall out, that the major part of the owners in value, refuse to set out the vessel to sea; there by reason of the inequality, they may not be compelled; but then such vessel is to be valued and sold: the like, whether part of the owners become deficient, or unable to set her forth to sea." The sixth article of the twenty-third section of the ordinances of Louis XIV. of France, enacts, that "no person may constrain his partner to proceed to the sale of a ship, except the opinions of the owners be equally divided about the undertaking of the voyage." Here "equally" means equality of property.

It is a principle discernable in all maritime codes, that every encouragement and assistance should be afforded to those, who are ready to give to their ships constant employment; and this, not only for the particular profit of owners, but for the general interests and prosperity of commerce. If agriculture be, according to the happy allusion of the great Sully, "one of the breasts from which the state must draw its nourishment," commerce is certainly the other. The earth, the parent of both, is the immediate foundation and support of the one, and ships are the moving powers, instruments and facilities of the other.—Both must be rendered productive by industry and ingenuity. The interests and comforts of the community will droop, and finally perish, if either be permitted to remain entirely at rest. The former will less ruinously Lear neglect, and throw up spontaneous products; but the latter require unremitted employment, attention and enterprise, to ensure utility and profit.³ A privation of freight, the fruit and crop of shipping, seems therefore to be an appropriate mulct, on indolent, perverse, or negligent part-owners. The drones ought not to share

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1815.

SALE OF TEAS—INFERIORITY IN QUALITY—DAMAGES—HOW SETTLED—INTEREST.

1. The public sales of teas, in Holland, by the Asiatic Company, furnish evidence, but not conclusive, of the quality and value of teas disposed of at such sales; and the average price, brought by teas of the same quality and description, and not of that brought by all the teas of the same kind, affords this evidence.

2. Quære, if the usage in Canton is, that when teas are sold by samples, the examination and receipt of teas, delivered to a supercargo, after the samples have been furnished, discharges the Hong merchant from responsibility for quality. If this is the usage, the purchaser, in order to sustain a claim for damages, should prove that the teas furnished, are worse than the samples.

3. The rule of law, as to damages, is, that the sales of the plaintiff's teas, compared with those of similar teas, should be considered as ascertaining the rate of damages to be applied to the first cost of the teas in Canton. This rule is similar to that in case of insurance, where the rate of loss is ascertained from the prime cost of the articles lost.

[Cited in Youqua v. Nixon, Case No. 18,189; Cheongwo v. Jones, Id. 2,638.]

4. The adjustment of a claim for damages, in a particular case, upon other principles, does not exclude the Hong merchant from the benefit of the general rule; but such an adjustment may be opposed to the evidence of witnesses, to settle claims by damages on different principles.

5. It is generally in the discretion of the jury to give interest, in the name of damages.

6. Interest ought not to be allowed on unliquidated and contested claims, sounding in damages.

and Francis. In the latter suits there was no dispute. The other suits in which Consequa was defendant, were brought for breaches of parol agreements, made at Canton by Consequa; to deliver to the agents of these plaintiffs, cargoes of teas of certain denominations, and of the best qualities; one of the cargoes, viz. that shipped in the Bingham, to be suited to the Dutch markets. Two of the cargoes; viz. those of the Bingham and Ganges, were sold at Amsterdam by the Asiatic Company, at their public sales; and the third cargo, sent in the Asia, was sold in Philadelphia. To prove the inferior quality of the teas, or of some of them, which were sold at Amsterdam, the same kind of evidence was given, as in the case of Gilpins v. Consequa [Case No. 5,452]. As to the cargo of the Asia, the evidence of persons acquainted with the teas, who examined them, was relied upon to prove their bad quality. Other evidence was given, upon which the points of law in this case arose, and which is stated, in the charge of the court.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The contracts upon which these suits are brought, have been fully proved; that they have not been fulfilled by Consequa, can hardly be denied. As to the cargo of the Asia, in addition to the acknowledgment of Consequa, that it was not of good quality; it was examined thoroughly, at Philadelphia, by unexceptionable judges, who have stated to you its quality and relative value, to other teas, then in market. As to the cargoes of the Bingham and Ganges, sold at Amsterdam by the Asiatic Company, at their public sales; it cannot be denied, that the prices at which those teas were sold, compared with the prices of other cargoes of good quality, sold at the same periods; furnish, at least, some evidence of their quality. It appears, that from the time of the arrival of a cargo of tea, in the Texel, it is taken under the care of the East India Company; is kept in their warehouses; samples of each chest are taken out and examined, and finally that those sales are attended by merchants, from different parts of Europe, amongst whom there are no doubt many competent judges of the article sold. It would seem reasonable therefore to conclude, generally, that the prices bid at those sales, for different parcels of teas of the same denomination, must bear some proportion to their quality; and consequently afford some evidence of that fact. In addition to this evidence, the jury have the testimony of a distinguished tea broker, who speaks very unfavourably of those teas, and considers them to be only of second or third quality.

But, although sales at auction may, in general, afford some evidence of the comparative value of the article sold, still as a standard of quality, they may not always be satisfactory, much less conclusive. The prices bid, may frequently depend upon the state of the market, or the age of the teas, either positively or relatively, to other teas, sold at the same time, of superior quality and fresher. In forming their opinion of the disproportion between the plaintiffs' teas, and the best teas of similar denominations, sold at the same time; it will be proper for the jury to take all these circumstances into consideration, and, after duly weighing them, to fix the standard, by which the qualities of the teas delivered by the defendant to the plaintiffs ought to be estimated. This may be either the average of the highest prices, or something below it, as the jury may think just. If teas originally of good quality, do not injure by being kept as long as those were in the warehouses of the Asiatic Company then that circumstance will not merit their regard. One thing will be recollected, which is, that in comparing these teas with others of like denominations, sold at the same time; the average of the highest prices of these teas, or of such as do not greatly vary from each other, should be taken; except, so far as may be thought necessary to fix upon a lower sum, from the considerations before mentioned. The reason of this is, that if the average of the various prices bid for these teas, is taken; in comparing the plaintiffs' teas, which, by the contract, ought to have been of the first quality, with teas confessedly inferior, so far as the inferior teas composed the quantity from which the average is taken, and such must necessarily have formed a part of the quantity; it would not be a test of quality.

The next question is, whether the plaintiffs, by the conduct of their agents, dispensed with a strict performance of these contracts, on the part of Consequa. It is contended by the counsel for Consequa, that those agents, instead of relying upon their contracts, selected teas as their own judgment dictated, after trying the different samples sent to them: and that by the usages at Canton, the Hong merchant is, in such cases, only bound to provide a cargo, corresponding with the samples so approved of by the purchaser. This usage is attempted to be proved by the testimony of three American gentlemen, who have resided at different periods at Canton; and, if they are correct, it would follow, that whenever the purchase is made by samples, the purchaser, to maintain his action against the Hong merchant, must prove that the cargo was of an inferior quality to the selected samples. But, if the usage be as stated by these witnesses, it is difficult to account for the settlement made by Consequa in relation to the cargo of the Ganges; samples of which, were examined and approved of by the supercargo of that vessel. In this settlement, he gave up nearly nineteen thousand dollars, which the plaintiffs had no right to claim from him, according to the alleged usage. May not this conduct of Consequa, be considered as evidence of the usage upon this point, equal if not superior, to that of the witnesses who have testified respecting it? No man ought to be better informed than Consequa, in relation to the usage, in a case so frequently occurring in the particular business in which he was engaged. If the jury should consider the subject in this light, and that it is better evidence of the usage, than that given by the three witnesses; then the circumstance of the plaintiffs' agents having purchased by samples, ought not to operate against the plaintiffs. But if, on the other hand, they are of opinion, that Consequa's conduct amounted to nothing more than a waiver of a legal right, in that particular case; then it cannot affect his rights in any other case, and the rule of law, which has been stated, must apply. It is however to be recollected, that that rule, however well established, does not apply to the cargoes of the Bingham or of the Asia, both of which were taken, exclusively, upon the judgment and selection of Consequa.

The last question is, what ought to be the rule by which the damages for the breaches of those contracts should be assessed? The rule laid down in the case of Gilpins v. Consequa, was, that the sales at Amsterdam of the plaintiffs' teas, compared with those of other teas of similar denominations, were to be considered as furnishing, not the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiffs, but the rate of the damages, to be applied to the first cost at Canton. Thus, if the difference between those sales was 20 or 50 per cent., to the disadvantage of the plaintiffs' teas, Consequa would have to pay, after that rate, as applied to the first cost at Canton. With this rule the court finds no cause to be dissatisfied; the reason of it is obvious. The contract is, to deliver teas of the best quality at Canton. If it be not complied with, the price of such teas, at that place, is the just measure of the damage sustained by the plaintiffs. For the seller has nothing to do with the foreign market, to which the article may be sent: he has no control over the property or its destination; and receives no premium or compensation whatever, to induce him to run any risque in relation to such a market.

The question is not varied, by the circumstance of the Holland market being referred to in the contract. This did not confine the plaintiffs to that market, but they were at liberty to sell where they pleased; and still the question would be, were the teas of the best quality, and were they fitted for the Holland market? These questions could as well be settled at Copenhagen or Philadelphia, as at Amsterdam. This case certainly is not as strong, as that of insurance, in which, if a loss takes place, it is settled according to the prime cost and charges; although the understanding of the insurer is, that the goods shall go safely to the port of destination, and to indemnify the insured in case of loss. The cases stated by the plaintiffs' counsel, to prove the incorrectness of the rule laid down in this case, are entirely dissimilar from it. The case of general average, proceeds upon a principle entirely different. The claims for compensation by the person whose goods have been thrown overboard, for the safety of the residue of the cargo, is a charge upon the cargo so saved; and consequently upon its value at the place of destination. The owner of the goods saved, ought not to gain, nor ought the owner of the goods thrown overboard to lose, by an act performed for the benefit of all; which would certainly happen, if the former received the full value of his goods, at the port of destination, and paid the loss according to the prime cost of the articles thrown overboard: for this reason, the whole cargo is valued at the price it would bring at the port of discharge, and the nett amount, after deducting charges, including also the nett value of the ship and freight, furnishes the sum which is subject to contribution. The other cases put by the counsel, are those of the carrier of goods, who, it is said, must pay the value of the goods at the place of destination, in case they are lost, or of a failure to deliver goods contracted to be delivered at a certain time and place; in which case the price of the articles at the time and at the place of delivery, is to be the rule of compensation.

Admit, for the sake of the argument, that the law, in relation to the carrier, is as the plaintiff's counsel contended for; still it differs from the present, in this essential circumstance; in that case, the delivery is to be made abroad, and in this it was to be made at Canton. If in both the supposed cases, the price is to be regulated, by the foreign market, where they were to be delivered, it would follow, that the teas in this case, should be referred to the value at Canton, where they were to be delivered.

But although the general rule is such as has been stated, still the question ought to be decided, according to the law, or usage at Canton, so far as we have any information respecting it; but no evidence has been given, directly upon this subject. In such a case, is it not fair, to consider Consequa's conduct, as evidence of the usage? It is reasonable to conclude, that no person can be more familiar with the usage at Canton, in relation to this subject, than a Hong merchant, who is in the constant habit of making contracts of this kind; and who, no doubt, has been frequently called upon, to settle claims for the breach of them. If in such cases, the usage at Canton be, to apply the rate of loss, ascertained by the sales at the foreign market, to the first cost; it is inconceivable, that Consequa would have waved the benefit of that rule, and settled as he did, the loss on the congo teas, part of the cargo of the Ganges, by paying the difference between the sales of those teas, and the average of the high priced congo teas, sold at the same time and place. Yet he did so, without objection, and voluntarily promised to settle the loss upon the cargo of the Asia, by the same rule. It is certainly possible, that this conduct might proceed from an excess of liberality, or from ignorance, but neither is probable.

If this supposition, however, be well founded, and the law at Canton, be similar to what I take to be the general law, then, the waving of a legal right, by Consequa, in one case, cannot bind him in any other case; whatever promises he may have made on the subject. But if the jury should consider his conduct, as evidence of the law, and usage at Canton; then it is obligatory upon him, and they ought to decide accordingly. It may be proper to observe, that the usage which has been proved, of returning a box of tea which has been imposed upon the purchaser, in violation of the contract, and recovering two boxes of good tea, in lieu of it, seems strongly to countenance the presumption, that a higher rate of compensation is allowed, than would result from the application of the general rule, laid down in the case of Gilpins v. Consequa [Case No. 5, 452].

As to interest upon the claims of the plaintiffs, I can only repeat, what the court stated, in the case just mentioned; that it is generally, in the discretion of the jury, to give interest in the name of damages; although it is not conformable to legal principles, to allow it on unliquidated and contested claims, sounding in damages.

The jury found verdicts favourable to the plaintiffs' claims in all the cases, from which resulted a balance of five thousand dollars, upon the whole account against Willings and Francis.

1. K. and another, as the agents of W. and F., gave a note for 22,000 dollars, to C. for merchandize, in which K. was interested. C. brought a suit against W. and F. on the note, stating it to be given by the procurement of their agents K. and another. It was agreed, that whatever damages might be recovered in a suit brought by W. and F. against C. should be set off against the note. It was alleged, that K., as a dormant partner of W. and F., might be sued, as such, by C., if the note should not be discharged by a recovery of damages from C., in the suits of W. and F., and if W. and F. should be unable to pay the note; and that he was therefore interested to increase those damages. The interest of K., in the event of the suits between W. and F. and C., is too remote to exclude him from being a witness; the objection is to his credit, and not to his competency.

4. The general rule of law is, that a party to a suit, cannot be a witness. This rule is founded on the interest the party has in the suit, and when that interest is removed, the objection ceases to exist.

[21. Cited in Taylor v. Carpenter, Case No. 13,785, to the point that a person from abroad suing in this country is to enjoy no greater nor less rights than citizens.]

These causes, having been tried at the October sessions of the court, in 1815 [Case No. 17,766], and new trials having been ordered at the last sessions (Consequa v. Willings [Id. 3,128]), again came on for trial. In addition to the evidence given at the former trial, Mr. Kuhn was offered as a witness, and was objected to on the ground of interest, he being one of the plaintiffs in the suit of Willings and Francis and Kuhn, which the jury were charged to try. To get rid of this objection, the plaintiffs produced an assignment executed by the witness, dated a few days past, to Willings and Francis, his co-plaintiffs, of all his part and interest in their claim against the defendant in the suit wherein he is a party, and of whatsoever sum may be recovered in that action, with a power to the assignees, to use his name in the action. They also produced three releases to him, bearing date on the same day with the assignment, one from the Messrs. Willings, and the other from the administrator of Mr. Francis, who had died since the last trial, from his liability for the costs which had accrued, or might thereafter accrue in the said action, and from all claim for contribution to any sum, which the defendant might recover in his actions against the releasors; the last release was given by Mr. Thomas M. Willings to the witness, from all claims and demands against him, by reason of the aforesaid assignment, or in case the claim against the defendant should not be established or recovered; and from all costs, charges, and damages which have accrued, or may accrue, in prosecuting the said suit or claim, with a covenant to indemnify him against the same. The costs of the suit up to this time, including those of this trial, and more than the amount thereof, were stated by the clerk to have been paid to him by Messrs. Willings; and the counsel for the plaintiffs, Messrs. Willings, offered on their behalf, to pay to the clerk any additional sum, which the defendant's counsel might require, and further, to give satisfactory security, for payment of all the costs of this suit. This deposit of the costs, was made before the jury were sworn, and the action was marked, in the clerk's docket, to be for the use of the Messrs. Willings.

It was contended, by the defendant's counsel, that the witness is still incompetent: first, on the ground of interest, and secondly, as being a party on record, in the suit in which he is to testify.

As to the first point, it was argued, that even if the witness had not signed the note to Consequa, upon which one of his suits against Willings and Francis is founded, yet as he was jointly interested in the credit, as a dormant partner with them in the loan of which the note is evidence, he is interested so to increase the damages claimed by Willings and Francis, as that thereby the claim on the note may be extinguished, or its amount diminished as much as possible. Because, if Consequa should recover the whole or any part of the note, in his present action against Willings and Francis, and not be able to obtain satisfaction from them, he might afterwards sue the witness for the money, as a dormant partner. If, on the other hand, Willings and Francis should recover damages, so as to extinguish or in part discharge this note, their release would discharge the witness from their claim for contribution.

Second. It was contended, that Mr. Kuhn, who is on record a party to the suit, cannot be a witness, and that no assignment of his interest can make him competent; not only because he still remains a party on the record, but because he is liable to the defendant, Consequa, for costs, notwithstanding the deposit which has been made. The costs of this court, cannot be ascertained, as it is impossible to say when the cause may end; and if it should go by writ of error to the supreme court, the witness will be liable to Consequa for the costs of that court, which the clerk of this court cannot ascertain. 2 Hen. & M. 467; 3 East, 7.

On the other side it was answered: First, that the suit on the note for 22,000 dollars is brought against Willings and Francis only, and whether the plaintiff succeed or fail in his action, the judgment will be a bar to another suit against them united with the witness, and he may plead it in abatement, if he is sued alone. Second, Kuhn is a nominal party, since the assignment and deposit of the costs, and the offers which have been made, remove his interest in relation to that subject. 3 Bin. 306, 478, 481, 600; 1 Phil. Ev. 57; 2 Bay, 93.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The objections to the competency of this witness, are—first, that he is interested in the event of the suit; and secondly, that he still remains a party to the suit, notwithstanding the assignment.

First. The facts which form the basis of this objection, are as follows: Kuhn and Wharton, as supercargoes of the Asia, gave their note to Consequa, for 22,000 dollars, on which note one of these actions is brought, as upon a note given by Willings and Francis, by the procurement of their agents. The parties have agreed that these five suits should be tried by one jury, and that whatever damages shall be recovered by Willings and Francis, shall be set off against the sum due by them to Consequa, for which his two suits are brought. The argument then is, that as Kuhn is a dormant partner with Willings and Francis, in relation to the 22,000 dollars, and consequently may be hereafter liable to be sued as such for that sum, unless it should be discharged by a recovery of damages sufficient to extinguish the claims in the suits against Consequa, it is the interest of Kuhn to shelter himself against Consequa, by increasing the damages so as to discharge the note altogether, or at least to diminish its amount as much as possible.

Now there are two sufficient answers to this argument. The first is, that the interest of this witness, as stated by the defendant's counsel, is too remote and contingent to furnish an objection to his competency, whatever weight it may have to his credit. If Willings and Francis should not recover damages to extinguish this note, then a judgment must go against them, for its full amount, or for so much of it as the damages may not discharge; and if they should then be unable to satisfy that judgment, then Kuhn may be exposed to the chance of an action as a dormant partner with Willings and Francis. There are too many contingencies in the way, before Kuhn can be called upon, to make this a valid objection to his competency. But, secondly, if these contingencies should all happen, and Consequa should bring an action against Kuhn separately, he may be defeated by a plea of abatement, and the judgment in this action, for or against Consequa, would be a bar to any suit that he might bring against Willings and Francis and the witness. The judgment would as completely extinguish the original debt, as if Willings and Francis had given a bond for it, which it would clearly have done, the rule that a bond given by a stranger, is no extinguishment of the simple contract of the real debtor, not applying to a case where it is given by one of two or more joint contractors.

But it is said, that though Consequa might have no remedy at law against Kuhn, he might be relieved in equity, by showing his ignorance that he was a dormant partner when he took the note or instituted the suit. I by no means admit that he could be relieved in that court. If the difficulty I am about to mention were out of the case, it would still depend upon a variety of circumstances, not known to this court, whether Consequa could make out a case fit for equitable interposition. By his own shewing it is certain that he did not give credit to Mr. Kuhn, and whether he knew that he was jointly concerned in that transaction or not, is unknown to this court. At all events, it was in his power to have dismissed this suit, though at the time it was brought he may have been ignorant of the partnership, and have instituted another against all the partners, after he was informed who they were; and his failing to do so, would indispose a court of equity to open its doors to him, after he had permitted those of a court of law to be closed against him. Where a release is given to one of two joint obligors, the obligation is extinguished at law as to all, and although it is most apparent that such was not the intention of the obligee, yet equity will not relieve. At all events, the liability of the witness to a claim, to be asserted by Consequa in a court of equity, is under all the circumstances of this case, too remote to affect the competency of the witness.

Secondly. It is objected, that he is a party plaintiff on the record. The general rule of law certainly is, that a party to a suit cannot be a witness. But it is equally so, that the interest which that party has in the event of the suit, both as to costs and the subject in dispute, lies at the foundation of the rule, and when that interest is removed, the objection ceases to exist. In this case, the assignment of Kuhn to Willings, has terminated his interest in the subject for which the suit is brought. As to the costs, they are paid by the assignee, now the only real plaintiff on record. But it is said Kuhn is still liable to an execution for the cost should Consequa recover; that the sum paid to the clerk, may be misapplied by him; and the quantum of costs, to this time, to future times to which this cause may continue in this court, and the costs of the supreme court, should it go there, cannot be now ascertained. To these objections it may be observed, that the clerk is a competent judge of the quantum of costs which can be recovered at this time, and the money paid to him is in the safe keeping of the court, and subject to its disposal. Should future costs be incurred here, by another trial taking place, and this witness should then be offered, it will be time enough to inquire what further advance will be necessary. As to the costs of the supreme court upon a writ of error, which may be incurred in case such proceedings should take place, the court cannot look to such remote possibilities in order to disqualify the witness to give evidence.

It is always to be remembered that this opinion is given upon these facts: that more than the legal costs of this suit have been deposited by Mr. Willing, with the clerk; that Mr. Willing has offered to deposit any further sum which Consequa's counsel may require, and further to give satisfactory security to pay all the costs which have, or may be incurred. If after all this, the opposite party chooses to reject offers made with a view to remove all objections, it would ill become the court to allow the mere phantom of an objection, to prevent the examination of a witness who is substantially divested of all interest. The case of Steele v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 3 Bin. 306, is in point, and I yield my entire consent to the principles there laid down. I shall not be afraid of adding another precedent, leaving it to the supreme court, where I perceive this cause is likely to go, to correct this court, if I am wrong.

A few words as to the policy of the doctrine on which this decision is founded. It is said that a plaintiff, knowing the injustice of his cause, and hopeless of success, may be induced by tempting offers to assign his interest to his co-plaintiff in order to qualify himself to be a witness, and after all, the consideration may be only feigned, and he may still continue a party in expectancy; and at all events he will testify under impressions long made and not easily to be eradicated by such an operation. All this may be true, but might not the very same reasons be urged against the competency of every witness, who has once been interested though not a party to the suit, but whose competency is restored by a release? If there be mala fides in the one case, may it not as well exist, in as strong force, in the other? May not interest make equally strong impressions in the one case, as in the other, and yet the objection come only to that of a bias in the mind, which may affect the credit of a witness, but not his competency? After all, the only safeguards in either case are, an examination of the witness on his voir dire, to test the reality and good faith of acts which rendered him disinterested, and the right which still rests with the jury to judge of his credit. The witness therefore is to be admitted.

The deposition of Mr. Miller, taken under a commission to five persons at Buenos Ayres, or to any one of them, three nominated by the plaintiffs and two by the defendants, was offered in evidence. It was objected to, because it was taken by one of the persons named in the commission, in conjunction with the American consul at that place, who certifies that all the persons named in the commission but one were dead or removed, that the commission was delivered to him, and that he convoked the remaining commissioner and the witness before him, and that the examination of the witness was taken by himself and that commissioner.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This deposition is inadmissible, because the examination was taken in conjunction with a person not named in the commission, who voluntarily and unnecessarily obtruded himself into the business. The deposition of Mr. Voute, the tea broker at Amsterdam, which was read at the former trial without objection, was now objected to on the ground of interest. This was the witness relied upon by the plaintiffs, in part, to prove the qualities of the teas of the Ganges and the Bingham, which were sold at that market by the Dutch Asiatic Company, and the prices at which those, and other teas of the best quality were sold. The evidence given in support of the objection, was a letter from Hope & Co. to the plaintiffs, dated 18th of April, 1809, inclosing the certificates of this witness as to the qualities and sales of these and other teas. In this letter the writers say, that "Mr. Voute might charge you one per cent., on the amount of the sales of these cargoes, but he is willing to receive at that rate on what you may recover on these certificates, of which you will advise us, that we may settle with him for the same." Another witness, L. Estapre, states in his deposition, that these certificates were sent to the plaintiffs on their request, made in 1807. It was contended that the witness was interested on the event of the cause, to increase as much as possible the damages which may be recovered, because that would increase his compensation. Gilb. Ev. 124; Phil. Ev. 34-57; [M'Veaugh v. Goods] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 62; [Innis v. Miller] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 50; 4 Mass. 518. It was answered, first, that no evidence was given that the offer of Voute mentioned in the above letter was accepted; second, that the compensation spoken of is one per cent., not on what the plaintiffs might recover in an action, but what they might recover on the certificates, which have not and could not have been given in evidence in this action. Besides, this witness acted as a broker at the sale of the teas referred to in his deposition, and that in that character he is not disqualified to give evidence, though his commissions are to depend on the sum to be recovered. 2 H. Bl. 590; 2 Burrows, 497; 1 Phil. Ev. 100.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. I shall consider Hope & Co. as the agents of the plaintiffs, and authorised to make this contract with the witness; intending to decide this question upon the objection of interest, I shall not stop to inquire, whether the principle of law in relation to sales made by a broker, as between vendor and vendee, is or is not applicable to a case between vendor and warrantor. If the contract then was, as the defendant's counsel have contended for, there can be no doubt but the objection would be well taken; because, if, in consideration of furnishing the certificates, the plaintiffs were to pay one per cent. on the sum to be recovered, the witness would be interested in the event of the cause, since he might in a suit against the plaintiffs, give the verdict in evidence to show how much was recovered, on which his commission was to be charged. But this was not the contract. It was to pay a commission on the amount which the plaintiffs might recover on the certificates. These certificates cannot be given in evidence in this cause, and of course nothing can be recovered upon them. It follows, that the contract is not obligatory on the parties. In an action on the contract, it would be necessary to state it specially, and aver that so much was recovered on the certificates, in which, the evidence of a recovery in this action, would be insufficient to prove the breach. There can be little doubt as to the intention of the parties, which was, that the certificates should and would be used as evidence to induce Consequa to pay without a suit, or to be used, if coercion was necessary, if by law they could be. The deposition therefore is admitted.

The same points were made by the counsel, as on the former trial, and the evidence was nearly the same, except that the correspondence between the plaintiffs and their supercargoes was not read at this trial by the counsel for Consequa, although notice had been given to the plaintiffs to produce it, they declined however to read any part of it, and of course the plaintiffs could not read it. The material parts of the evidence are stated in the charge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. As the debts claimed by Consequa, are not disputed, I shall notice only the cases in which he is defendant. These actions are founded upon verbal contracts, for breaches of which the jury are called upon to give such damages as they may think the plaintiffs justly and legally entitled to. Our enquiries are naturally directed to the following points. What are the contracts laid in the declaration? How are they proved? How have they been fulfilled? And if not fulfilled, what damages are the plaintiffs entitled to? The court has already declared, that no evidence of fraud could be given in these actions, and none has been given, and if from the evidence, the jury should be disposed to infer it, it ought not, in any shape, to influence their verdict. Gilpins v. Consequa [Case No. 5,452].

The jury are charged with three actions for damages, and these respect the cargoes of the Asia, the Bingham, and the Ganges. I shall consider them in their order.

The Asia. The contract laid in the declaration is, that the defendant agreed to furnish for this ship, a cargo of teas of the first quality fitted for the Philadelphia market. This is precisely proved by Mr. Kuhn and Mr. Wharton, the supercargoes of this vessel. They state, that this contract was made in 1806, and that they were to pay for the teas, as much as other security merchants were to receive for similar teas that season. That muster chests were, according to custom, sent to their factory to examine, which they rejected; and, that after many repeated but vain attempts to make a selection, they were persuaded by the defendant to rely upon him, and that he would furnish a cargo of teas of the best quality. A cargo was accordingly put on board, without examination, which arrived at this place the following spring. A large proportion of this cargo was paid for in cash, and a credit of 16 months was given for the balance to the amount of 60,000 dollars, which credit, it was stated by the witnesses, was offered by Consequa not solicited by them.

The claim made in this action, is on account of the bad quality of 628 quarter chests of young hyson, and 309 of hyson tea. The former were examined in September, 1808, by a person acquainted with this article, who states that they were as indifferent as any teas he had ever seen, that they were worth no more than eighty-five cents per pound, at which he purchased them, but not suiting this market, he was obliged to send them to New York. He further states, that first quality teas of that denomination, were worth at the same time from one dollar ten cents to one dollar fifteen cents per pound. The 309 chests, were examined by competent judges in May, 1809; and they state, that 280 of them were inferior to fair market teas by ten cents per pound, and the remainder by five cents; and that fair market teas, are in value, fifteen per cent. below teas of the first quality. In addition to the above evidence, the acknowledgment of the defendant has been proved, made in 1807, that these teas were not so good as he agreed they should be.

The Bingham. The contract laid and fully proved as to this vessel, is, that the defendant promised to furnish a cargo of teas of the first quality, fitted for the Amsterdam market. The cargo, except 600 chests of congos, was selected by the supercargo, from samples sent to him to examine, and this selection was approved of by the defendant. This cargo was brought first to Philadelphia, and without being unladen was dispatched to Amsterdam. The evidence to prove the inferior quality of the 1,917 quarter chests, and 800 boxes of congos, for which damages are sought in this action, is derived from the deposition of Mr. Voute, the tea broker at Amsterdam, and the printed list of the sales of these teas by the Dutch Asiatic Company, compared with the sales of other teas made at the same time. The deposition states, that they were of very inferior quality and that the inferiority of price, compared with the price of other teas, is to be attributed to that cause. It appears in evidence, that whenever the East India Company at Amsterdam, permit the importation of teas by others they are taken possession of by the officers of the company, on their arrival in the Texel. They are then conveyed in lighters to Amsterdam, and deposited in the warehouses of the company; samples of each chest are taken out by the broker, some weeks previous to the sale, for the purpose of being shown; printed lists of the teas to be sold, are issued, and by the merchants there, are distributed through the north of Europe. It is highly probable, therefore, that these sales are attended by competent judges of the qualities of this article, and that the prices given, are in a great degree apportioned to those qualities.

The Ganges. The contract laid in the declaration, as to the cargo of this ship, is the same as that of the Bingham, but the proof of it is not equally strong. The jury have not the testimony of Mr. Miller, the supercargo, and the plaintiffs are therefore obliged to resort to other evidence, in order to prove this contract. It is for the jury to judge, whether the proof is sufficient to satisfy their minds.

The first piece of evidence relied upon is that given by Mr. Wilcocks, who states, that Consequa agreed with Miller, to deliver him a cargo for this vessel of good teas; but good teas, and teas of the first quality are very different, and consequently, this proof is wholly insufficient to support the allegation of the declaration. In the next place, it is proved by Mr. Kuhn, that in 1807, he carried with him a statement made out by the plaintiffs, of their claim on account of the inferior qualities of the congo tea of the Ganges, in which Consequa was charged for the difference between the sales of those teas, at Amsterdam, and the sales of other teas of the best quality and of like denomination, made at the same time. That Consequa required a day or two for consideration, and for the purpose of consulting a friend, and he afterwards agreed to allow 19,000 dollars on account of this claim and another for cassia, sent in the same vessel. The claim for the teas and cassia amounted to about 22,000 dollars, and it does not distinctly appear, whether the deduction from that sum was made from the teas, which was stated at about 17,500 dollars, or from the cassia, or from both. If it was made from the cassia, then the inference derived from allowing the claim for the teas, as for those of the first quality, is strong, that the contract was to furnish congos of that quality; and if so, in relation to the congos, the presumption is almost inevitable, that the like contract was made as to the Campoy teas, for which this suit was brought.

It is contended by the defendant's counsel, that this settlement by Consequa, was nothing more than a concession made from motives of friendship for Messrs. Willings and Francis, and with a view to promote his own interest, not only by securing the consignment of the Asia's cargo, then in the Tigris, but their future consignments. If these were his motives, the evidence would certainly lose much of its weight; and yet they will not account for his surrendering his rights, and submitting to injustice in silence. Interest or friendship may induce a person to acquiesce in a claim which he believes to be unfounded; but in order to give value to the concession, he ought at least to appear, to the other party, sensible that he is making it. It would therefore have been perfectly natural for Consequa, to have stated to the gentleman who presented him with the statement, that the claim was not well founded, because those teas were compared with others of the best quality, whereas, he had not agreed to deliver such, because they were selected by the supercargo from samples, and because he was charged the difference between the sales of those teas, and others of the best quality, instead of making that difference, the rate of compensation applicable to the first cost. Instead of this, he made the settlement without objection, and lost of course all credit for making it. The jury will judge, under all the circumstances attending this transaction, how far this conduct of Consequa ought to be considered, as evidence of an acknowledgment made by him of a contract to deliver a cargo for this ship of teas of the first quality.

The last piece of evidence, relied upon by the plaintiffs to prove the contract as laid, is, the price paid for those teas, being that of teas of the first quality. All the witnesses have stated, that where the highest cash price is paid, it is the uniform understanding at Canton, that the best teas are to be delivered.

But it is contended by the defendant's counsel, that this proves nothing in relation to the cargo of this vessel, because a credit was allowed to Willings and Francis of 70,000 dollars; and that in a country, where the interest of money is twelve per cent., the difference must be considerable between credit and cash sales.

On the other side it is answered, that Consequa does not appear to have contemplated a difference in cases where large cash payments were made in part, because in other cases, particularly in that of the Bingham, he did not wait for a credit to be solicited, but freely offered it to any amount. Upon the whole, the jury will judge what weight there is in the circumstance of the highest price having been paid for these teas. If they should not be satisfied that the contract to deliver teas of the first quality was made, their verdict of course must be for the defendant, in the action respecting the cargo of the Ganges. If on the other hand the jury are satisfied with the proof, they will find the breach proved by the same evidence which is relied upon in respect to the cargo of the Bingham. Whether the sales at Amsterdam furnish a satisfactory criterion of quality, they must decide. If not influenced by particular circumstances, such as the state of the market, which may produce an unnatural difference between the best and indifferent teas, or the ages of the teas, which are compared together, those sales would seem to afford as safe a test of quality as any other. Thus stand the contracts upon which these actions are brought, and the breaches of them, for which the jury are called upon to give damages.

But the defendant insists that though the jury should be satisfied that such were the contracts, originally entered into by Consequa, yet they were afterwards changed into contracts of sale by samples, and that the plaintiffs have not proved that the cargoes did not correspond with those samples, without which they cannot recover. It is not pretended that the original contracts were waived, and new contracts substituted by any express agreement; but that the usage of Canton, operating upon the acts of the supercargoes in selecting the cargoes from samples, produced this effect.

In the first place, it is to be observed, that this argument, however sound it may be in itself, is inapplicable to the cargo of the Asia, and to 600 chests of congos of the Bingham's cargo, the whole of which were received without examination. We are then to enquire, whether in relation to the other teas this usage has been proved? If it has, it must govern our decisions. The laws and usages of foreign countries where contracts are made and to be executed, which respect their validity, construction, and discharge, are regarded here as rules of decision. This usage however ought to be clearly proved; not merely because it is entirely at variance with the general principles of law, but because it is absurd and irrational. A contract of sale, may be made in various ways. It may be made without a warranty of the quality of the articles sold, in which case, if there be no fraud on the part of the seller, he is not answerable to the purchaser, although he should be disappointed; for it was his own fault if he did not examine the articles, and satisfy himself of their quality, or if he did, then it is his misfortune that his judgment deceived him. If he is unwilling to trust his own judgment, he may insist upon a warranty of the quality, in which case the vendor is bound to deliver articles of the stipulated quality, and the examination of the articles by the vendee, and his selection of such as he approves, does not amount to a waiver of the contract. If the vendee cannot examine the articles, but purchases from an examination of samples, there is an implied warranty on the part of the seller, that the articles shall correspond with the samples. But an examination of samples, like the former case, will not amount to a waiver of an express warranty that the articles shall be of a particular quality. It is true, that in both cases a selection and acceptance by the vendee, may in some instances according to the circumstances, amount to performance or to evidence of performance of the contract. But the difference in the two cases is all important. If the original contract be waived, and a new one substituted, the vendee must prove a breach of the new contract, and consequently must prove that the articles delivered did not correspond with the samples. But if the original contract continues, and the vendee prove that the articles were not of the stipulated quality, the vendor must prove performance, by showing that the articles delivered did correspond with the samples. Neither party has or probably could prove any thing as to this matter, in the case before the jury; and the defendant, being aware of the above distinction, has insisted, that by the usage at Canton the original contract is changed into a contract of sale by samples.

The asserted usage is not only contrary to the principles of general law, but is irrational in itself. It is to be recollected, that it is in proof that the American supercargoes, as well as the East India Company, always select their teas by samples sent to them to examine. It is entirely a matter of course. Now we behold this supercargo and the Hong merchant, entering into a solemn agreement one day, by which the latter engages to furnish a cargo of teas of the first quality, which they both know at the time, is to be annulled the next day, and to be converted into a perfectly different contract. The samples are sent, not to be rejected, but to be accepted; for if the former, why send them? and if they are accepted, then the above consequence is to follow. Instead of calling this a solemn contract, it deserves the appellation of a solemn farce. What then is the proof of this usage? Cushing, Bull, and Ross, depose, that it is the usage for the Hong merchant to furnish samples for the supercargo to examine, and unless the supercargo rejects all, the Hong merchant is released from any further responsibility than that of furnishing teas according to samples chosen. Now this proves nothing to the point we are considering, because neither of these witnesses state that this is the usage in the case of a special contract to deliver teas of a particular quality; nor does it appear that this subject was in the minds of the witnesses, inasmuch as the interrogatories make no enquiries in reference to such a case. If the contract is general, or if it be in fact a sale by samples, the usage is rational, and is not at variance with our law. Mr. Hossack is very positive, that this usage is applicable to the case of a sale with a warranty of quality; so says Mr. Blight, generally; and yet, when speaking of the usage, as applicable to the East India Company, he states, that where the sales in England show the inferior quality of the teas, documents are sent to Canton stating their quality; and if they were inferior to the quality contracted for, they are charged back according to their quality; that is, if they appear to have been third instead of first quality, the Hong merchant is charged the difference between first and third quality, in reference to the prime cost. He does not know if the samples are returned, but he has heard they are. Now, as that company always select by samples sent to their factory, and for this purpose retain in their service a skilful taster, this practice would rather seem to contradict the usage; unless it appears that samples are always returned to Canton, to be compared with the sample chests, which are always marked and retained at the factory.

But, admit that this is the usage in relation to the East India Company, is it applicable to a different trade, carried on in a different way? The two witnesses last mentioned, Mr. Hossack and Mr. Blight, confine it to that company, and state that they always mark and retain the muster chests, by which they make their selection at their factory. On the other hand, they state that the American supercargoes return the muster chests to the Hong merchant, without any mark whatever on them, and that they go, undistinguished, into the general mass of the cargo. Neither of the parties then expect that the quality of the cargo is to be tested by the sample; and does not this afford a strong reason for believing, that a usage, which depends on that test, cannot apply to a trade so circumstanced?

In support of this idea, the plaintiffs rely upon the conduct of Consequa, in the settlement of the claim for the Congo tea of the Ganges, and argue, with at least a great deal of plausibility, that as those teas were selected by samples, he would not have made that settlement if the usage had been in his favour. Upon the whole, the jury must judge if this usage is sufficiently proved. If the contracts laid in the declarations, and the breaches of them, are proved to the satisfaction of the jury, and the asserted usage is not proved, the next question for the consideration of the jury, is, what ought to be the rule for assessing the damages to which the plaintiffs are entitled?

The rule laid down in this court, in former cases, was (Gilpins v. Consequa [Case No. 5,452]) that the difference between the sales of these teas, at the foreign market, and others of the first quality, is no otherwise to be regarded, than as it furnishes a test of the quality and the rate of loss to be applied to the prime cost. But a contrary usage is attempted to be proved by the plaintiffs, and I think they have not been more successful than the defendant has been in proving the usage which has just been considered and disposed of. The evidence principally relied on to prove this usage, is the settlement made by the defendant of the loss claimed in respect to the congos of the Ganges, and his promise to settle the loss, in respect to the cargo of the Asia, which has been mentioned, and I refer the jury to the observations before made upon the weight to which this act is entitled, in the scales of evidence. Two other witnesses, Mr. Simms and Mr. Jones, have given testimony, and although they prove instances of settlements made, or give slight evidence of a usage existing different from the rule established by this court, yet the usage attempted to be proved by them, is different from that asserted by the plaintiffs, and upon the whole, terminates in disappointment. Mr. Hossack and Mr. Blight agree on the other hand, that the usage corresponds precisely with the rule before stated. The jury will therefore govern themselves by this rule, adding of course to the sum paid for the teas, premium of insurance, duties, and other expenses which are usual, and of which they are the proper judges. As to interest, I shall leave that question to the jury upon the evidence of Mr. Hossack, who states that the usage at Canton is to add interest to the other charges.

The claim of the plaintiffs, to disallow to Consequa interest upon the debts acknowledged to be due to him, in consequence of their attachments, cannot be admitted. Where an attachment is laid in the hands of a third person, interest is stopped until it is dissolved, because the garnishee, being liable to be called upon at any moment to pay the debt, it is presumed that he had not used it. But, where a debtor who is also a creditor, lays an attachment in his own hands, there is no such necessity existing, and of course no presumption can arise that he had not used the money. If he did use it, it is but just that he should pay interest for it.

The jury brought in a verdict in favour of Consequa for the amount of his debt, with full interest; they gave damages to the plaintiffs, against Consequa, in the cases of the Bingham and Asia, allowing interest against him; and found a verdict for him, as to the cargo of the Ganges. The balance found in favour of Consequa amounted to about 71,000 dollars. A compromise was afterwards made, in which Consequa allowed a compensation for the cargo of the Ganges, and these cases were finally adjusted.

WILLINK v. MILES.

[Pet. C. C. 429.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1817.

EJECTMENT — EVIDENCE — ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEED — AUTHORITY OF OFFICER — EQUITABLE TITLE.

1. It is not necessary to produce the deed poll, from the person in whose name the application was made for a tract of land, in order to support the title of the plaintiff in an ejectment for the land; the plaintiff having obtained the warrant and paid the purchase money. [Cited in Herron v. Dater, 120 U. S. 472, 7 Sup. Ct. 624.]

2. The acknowledgment of a deed, before a person who styles himself a justice of the court of common pleas, is prima facie evidence that he was such; and it is not necessary to produce the commission of the justice, until some evidence is given to render the fact questionable.

[Cited in brief in Com. v. Gearing, 1 Allen, 595. Cited in Piland v. Taylor (N. C.) 18 S. B. 72. Cited in brief in Wright v. Waters, 32 Pa. 516; Spear v. Ditty, 9 Vt. 283.]

3. An agreement signed by the agent of the lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment, for the sale and conveyance of the land to the defendant, cannot be given in evidence in a trial at law; it is, at most, only evidence of an equitable title.

4. A warrant, survey, and payment of the purchase money, are sufficient to give a legal right of entry in ejectment.

Ejectment for land on the north and west of Ohio and Alleghany rivers, and Conewango creek. The only question which was raised as to the plaintiff's title, was, whether the deed poll from the person in whose name the application was made, to the plaintiff, who obtained the warrants and paid the purchase money, was sufficiently proved; it having been acknowledged before a person who styles himself a justice of the common pleas of the county where the land lies.

THE COURT observed, that a conveyance in this case need not be shown, as was laid down in the case of the lessee of Brown v. Galloway, at the last term [Case No. 2,006]. But, if it were necessary, still the acknowledgment before a man who styles himself a justice of the common pleas, is prima facie evidence that he was such; and it is not necessary for the person who offers a deed so acknowledged, to produce the commission of the justice, or to give any further evidence to prove him to be a justice of the common pleas, until some evidence is given on the other side to render that fact questionable.

The plaintiff proved, that, in 1813, the defendant claimed the land in controversy, resided on it, and had erected valuable mills at the place of his residence. That the year before this suit was brought, the defendant demanded from the agent of the plaintiff's lessor, a deed for this land, still stating it to be the land on which he resided. But there was no positive evidence given of the defendant's possession at the time this ejectment was brought.

The defendant offered in evidence, an agreement signed by the agent of the lessor of the plaintiff, for the sale and conveyance of this land to him; and he relied upon the case of Simm's Lessee v. Irvine, to show that this vested in the defendant a legal title.

THE COURT refused to permit this paper to be given in evidence, as, at most, it was only evidence of an equitable title. The case relied on, falls very far short of this case. It was decided there, that as a warrant, survey and purchase money paid, gave a legal right of entry in ejectment, by the law and practice of this state, it was sufficient to maintain an ejectment in the circuit court of the United States. And even in that case, the compact between Virginia and Pennsylvania was made use of to strengthen the point there decided. This court, however, upon the authority of that case, has uniformly decided that a warrant and survey, and payment of the purchase money, are sufficient to give a legal right of entry in ejectment. But the line of demarkation between legal and equitable titles, has been uniformly observed and strictly enforced in this court. As to the question of the defendant's possession at the time this suit was brought, the court submit it to the jury on the evidence.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

WILLIS v. BUCHER et al.

[3 Wash. C. C. 369.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1818.

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—ESTATE TAIL—PATENT FOR LAND—EVIDENCE OF ISSUE—EXECUTED CONVEYANCE.

1. A devise to A, and if he die without heir or issue, the estate to go to B, his brother, gives an estate tail to A, by implication.

2. Certain expressions in a will, showing an intention to dispose of his whole estate, may often enlarge an estate, which would otherwise be for life only, into a fee; as a devise to A, "freely to be possessed and enjoyed;" for here the implied intention is not inconsistent with the declared intention. But if real estate be given to A, expressly for life; or in tail, either expressly, or by a clear implication; there are no instances where such estates have been converted into a fee simple, by words of doubtful import, used in either.

3. The law never unnecessarily creates an executory devise; unless where the testator's intention would otherwise be defeated.

4. The entry in the books of the land office, that the balance of the purchase money was paid by the person "to whom the patent had issued," is evidence that a patent did issue; although the patent is not produced.

5. A deed to A, in consideration of a sum of money paid, or secured to be paid, in the usual form of a deed of bargain and sale, is to be considered as a conveyance executed; notwithstanding a covenant by the grantor, "to make a patent," which can only mean, to obtain one, and deliver it to the grantee.

6. The provisions of the insolvent laws of Pennsylvania, passed in 1799, do not extend to estates tail, so as to make a conveyance, executed according to that law, operate as a bar to an estate tail.

This was an ejectment for an undivided moiety of a tract of land, in York county, Pennsylvania. The title of the plaintiff was derived under a license dated in 1734, to David Priest, under which the land was surveyed, in 1737; and in the year 1746, William Priest, son of David Priest, had credit in the books of the land office, for the whole of the purchase money paid, with the following memorandum annexed, "to whom the land is patented in full." On the 4th of August, 1747, William and Susannah Priest, conveyed this land, 200 acres, to Henry Willis; who, on the 13th of August, 1764, duly made his last will, and disposed of the land between his two sons, William and Henry, in the following words, to wit:—"As touching such worldly estate, wherewith it has pleased God to bless me, I give, demise, and dispose of the same, in the following manner and form," &c. After providing for his wife, the will proceeds;—"also, I give to my son William Willis, whom I constitute my sole executor, seventy acres of land, (by certain bounds,) to be taken off the plantation I now live on," &c.; "also ten acres of meadow ground," (particularly described:) "if the said William Willis should chance to die without heir or issue, the above said land must fall into the possession of his brother, Richard Willis." He then gives to his son William, a moiety of his horses and cattle, and adds a bequest to his daughter Mary, of £40, to be paid by his son William; and of the like sum to his daughter, to be paid by his son Richard; the will then proceeds to dispose of the whole of the remainder of his plantation, to his son Richard;—"and if the said Richard should chance to die without heir or issue, the above said lands and effects shall fall into the possession of my son William, by them freely to be possessed and enjoyed." In November, 1783, William Willis took out a patent for the eighty acres so devised to him, which recites that a patent had been issued for this land, which was lost or mislaid; nor did it appear, whether it had passed the seal or not. In 1794, William Willis conveyed a part of the land to Mr. McKenny and his heirs, under whom some of the defendants claim title; and on the 2d of April, 1796, he conveyed the residue of the tract to others, in fee, under whom the other defendants claim. On the 20th of November, 1800, William Willis died, leaving one child, Henry, who arrived at the age of twenty-one, on the 24th of April, 1799. Henry became insolvent, and took the benefit of the insolvent law of Pennsylvania, on the 20th of September, 1799. He made a general assignment to his trustees of all his estate, real and personal; and on the 8th of April, 1805, the surviving trustee conveyed all the right of Henry Willis, in and to the land which William Willis had conveyed on the 2d of April, 1796, to Jacob Wayne. Henry Willis died in the year 1806, leaving issue the lessor of the plaintiff, and one other daughter.

Binney & Tilghman, for lessee of plaintiff, contended, that William Willis took, under his father's will, only an estate in fee tail, by implication, with a remainder to his brother Richard, notwithstanding the introductory words in the will, the charge on William, of the £40 to his sister, or any other expressions in any other parts of the will. They cited T. Raym. 426, 452; Willis, 369; Cro. Jac. 695; Ld. Raym. 568; 3 Wils. 244; Cowp. 234, 410; 8 Mass. 3; 11 Sandf. 388, to prove, that the words of a will are never construed to pass an estate, by way of executory devise, if the limitation can take effect as a contingent remainder. To show that tenant in tail, cannot, by agreement, bar the issue, Plow, Cont. 125. In answer to a point stated by the defendants in their opening, that Henry Willis permitted the defendants to make expensive improvements on the land, without discovering his title, which bound him and his issue, they cited 2 Ch. Cas. 108. To prove that a warrant, survey, and purchase money paid, constitute a legal right of entry, 2 Binney, 465.

Hopkins & Ewing, for defendants, contended: 1. That William Willis took a fee simple, by force of the introductory words of the will; the charge on the devise of £40 to his sister, and the expression "freely to enjoy and possess," which ought to be applied to the devise to William, with an executory devise to Richard, by force of the words "must fall into the possession of Richard;" which are equivalent to a limitation over, upon the happening of the contingency in the lifetime of Richard. They cited 7 Durn. & E. [7 Term R.] 589; 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 143, 256; 8 Durn. & E. [8 Term R.] 1; 2 Mass. 56, 562; 2 Fearne, Rem. 245; 3 Burrows, 1618; 6 Johns. 190; Cowp. 352; 1 Johns. 443; 3 Johns. 394. 2. That the lessor of the plaintiff has only an equitable estate for want of a patent; and that the estate in William Willis, under his father's will, was only an equitable estate, for want of a patent; and that the estate in William Willis, under his father's will, was only an equitable estate; and therefore, might be barred by a common deed of conveyance. See 7 Bac. Abr. 185; Amb. 510; cases cited, 2 Ch. Cas. 63; 1 Vern. 440; 2 Vern. 344, 131, 225; 1 Fonbl. 293. This was contended to be an equitable estate, in Henry Willis, the testator, and his issue; not only for want of a patent, but because the deed from William and Susannah Priest to Henry Willis, of the 4th of August, 1747, amounted to no more than articles of agreement, notwithstanding it contains words of grant. They referred to 3 Johns. 388; 1 Yeates, 393, 327. As to the nature of an estate where no patent has issued, 4 Binney, 145.

The defendants' counsel were about to offer evidence, in the opening, to prove, that Henry Willis was guilty of a fraud, in not disclosing his title to the purchasers of his father, at the time they did purchase, and in looking on, while the defendants were putting valuable improvements on the premises, without making any objection; which fraud, they contended, was sufficient to bar him and his issue. But the court stopped the counsel, stating, that if their conclusion was even well founded, yet, such questions were not to be examined on the law side of the court.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The first question is an unmixed one of law. What estate did William Willis take, under his father's will? The rule to which the counsel on both sides have appealed, and which is a landmark never to be lost sight of, is, that in the construction of wills, the intention of the testator is to be sought for and carried into execution, if it can be done without a violation of some established principle of policy or law. Thus, a devise to A and his heirs, gives a fee simple estate; but if the testator add, that upon the death of A, without issue, the estate shall go over to B, A takes an estate tail; because the limitation shows, that by the word heirs the testator meant heirs of the body, and not heirs general. In this case, the devise is to William Willis generally; and if he die without heir or issue, the estate to go over to Henry. As to the testator's intention, so far as it is to be discovered from this clause of the will, there can be no doubt; as the limitation over to Henry was not to take effect, so long as William had issue, he clearly intended that such issue should take the estate in the mean time. But this they could not do as purchasers, because there is nothing given expressly to them; and therefore, in a deed, William Willis could only have taken an estate for life. But in a will where the intention of the testator is to govern, the court will so construe the devise, as to vest an estate tail by implication, in William Willis, so that his issue may be enabled to take by descent. This, as a general principle, is not understood to be denied by the defendants' counsel; but the argument is, that there are expressions in other parts of the will, which show that the testator intended to give a fee simple estate to William, with a remainder over to Henry; which may well be supported as an executory devise, inasmuch as the expressions used in the limitation to Henry show, that the contingency was to happen in his lifetime, else the estate could not fall into his possession.

The parts of the will, principally relied upon to show an intention to give a fee to William Willis, are the introductory clause, expressive of his intention to dispose of all his estate; the charge upon William, of the legacy of £40 to his sister; and the words "freely to be possessed and enjoyed," subjoined to the limitation to William, upon the death of Henry without issue. There is no doubt, but a declaration of the testator's intention to dispose of all his estate, or the charge of a gross sum upon the estate devised, or annexed to the devise as a condition, have frequently been held to convert an estate into a fee, which, for want of words of inheritance being added, the court would have considered as nothing more than an estate for life. So a devise of an estate to A, "freely to be possessed and enjoyed," will be construed to pass a fee simple. It is remarkable, that in all these cases, the implied intention of the testator, collected from this and similar expressions, is perfectly consistent with his declared intention. But if the estate be given to A for life, expressly; or to A in tail, either expressly or by clear implication; there is no instance where such estates have been converted into a fee simple, by words of doubtful import, like those noticed before, in other parts of the will.

Such a construction in this case, would defeat the obvious intention of the testator in two particulars: (1) By giving the estate to William and his heirs general, where the intention was to confine it to the heirs of his body;—and (2) to annex a condition to the limitation over to Henry, and thus to leave the estate to descend to the heirs of the testator, in case William should die without issue, after the death of Henry; when it is plain, that the testator intended the estate for Henry, in exclusion of the daughter, whenever the estate of William should be spent, by a failure of issue. Another objection to the construction is, that it unnecessarily creates an executory devise, which will never be done, except in a case where the intention of the testator cannot otherwise be carried into effect. If the limitation to Henry Willis, must depend upon the contingency of a failure of issue, during his life, as is strongly contended for by the defendants' counsel; there is still no necessity for construing the devise to William, to be an estate in fee simple; since William might, in that case, take an estate tail, with a contingent remainder to Henry, upon the event of William's dying without issue, during the life of Henry. But there is no necessity even for this construction. It was obviously the intention of the testator, to give to William an estate in tail, with a remainder to Henry, in fee; which intention, as to the quality of the estate given to the remainderman, may fairly be collected from the introductory words, relied upon by the defendants' counsel, for increasing the estate to William, as well as from the words, "by them freely to be possessed and enjoyed," in the devise to Henry, showing very clearly that the testator intended to divide this tract of land between his sons and their issue, respectively, with cross remainders in fee.

The argument of the defendants' counsel is, that William took an estate in fee simple, with a remainder over to Henry, by way of executory devise. If so, it may fairly be asked, what was the contingency, upon which the estate was to go over to Henry? If it be said, upon his dying without issue, then the answer is, that this is no contingency at all; because, the word "issue," explaining what heirs were meant by the testator, William took an estate tail, in like manner as if the devise had been to him and the heirs of his body. If the word "heir" be relied upon, then the argument admits of the same answer; because William could not die without heirs general, during the life of his brother; and therefore, the word heir or heirs, would be construed to mean issue. There is therefore no contingency upon which an executory devise can be raised.

2. The next objection is, that no patent from the state of Pennsylvania, to William Priest or to Henry Willis, has been given in evidence, and that therefore the lessee of the plaintiff cannot maintain this ejectment. There are two answers to this objection. The first is, that the entry on the books of the land office, that the balance of the purchase money had been paid by William Priest, to whom a patent had issued, ought to be considered as evidence that a patent did issue, although it is not produced; and secondly, that a warrant and survey, and purchase money paid, gives a legal right of entry in Pennsylvania. This was decided in the case of Simms v. Irwin [3 Dall. (3 U. S.) 425]; and this decision has been always regarded and acted upon in this court.

3. The next objection is, that the deed of the 4th of August, 1747, was merely executory, and ought not to be considered as a grant of the estate to Henry Willis. This deed has all the requisites and the form of an absolute conveyance, by way of bargain and sale in presenti. It is stated to be made in consideration of a certain sum of money, the whole of which is either paid or secured. The covenant to make a patent, which constitutes the greatest difficulty in the case, may fairly be construed to mean, that the grantor should procure a patent, to be made out and delivered to the grantee. Taken literally, the covenant has no legal meaning, as the grantor could not himself make or grant a patent. But as the meaning of this word is perhaps as well understood by landholders as any other that can be used; it can scarcely be supposed, that the parties had in their minds any other conveyance than one which amounted technically to a grant from the state. This case differs materially from that of Jackson v. Myers, 3 Johns. 388. The covenants are different. In that, the consideration was not only not paid or secured, but the grantee covenanted, in consideration that the grantor should make him a good and sufficient deed, by a certain day, to assign to him certain bonds. In short, all was executory; besides which, deeds of bargain and sale were not used, at that time, in New-York, to pass lands, as the general opinion was, that they required enrolment; and this circumstance was considered, by the court, as a strong evidence of the understanding of the parties to that deed. This reason does not operate in this case. We are, therefore, of opinion, that this deed operated as a conveyance of the land to Henry Willis. But, if the court had any doubt as to the law of this point, we think the jury, after about 70 years of uninterrupted possession, under that deed, ought to presume a conveyance.

4. As to the effect of the insolvent law of Pennsylvania, of 1799, we are of opinion, that it will not bear the construction put upon it by the defendants' counsel, which would render the land in question liable to Henry Willis's debts. The assignment, therefore, by Henry Willis, under this law, did not bar his issue.

We are, upon the whole, of opinion, that the law is in favour of the lessor of the plaintiff, and that such should be your verdict.

Verdict for defendants.

THE COURT, on motion, granted a rule, to show cause, why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial allowed.

Ewing, for defendants, opposed a new trial: 1. Because there had been three verdicts for the defendants, for the land in question; and the justice of this case is in favour of the defendants. The title of the plaintiff was supported by strict principles of law, and they will not be enforced by courts, on a motion for a new trial in an ejectment. 'It has only been of late, that courts grant new trials in ejectment, when the verdict is for the defendant; as the plaintiff may resort to a new action. Cases cited, Salk. 646; 1 Bos. & P. 338; 6 Bac. Abr. 662; 1 East, 583; 2 Binney, 129; 4 Term. R. 468; 1 Burrows, 11, 54; 2 Burrows, 664, 673, 674; 3 Burrows, 1306; 2 Term. R. 4; 1 Mass. 237; Cowp. 601; 2 Binney, 333; 3 Binney, 317. 2. That if the court grant a new trial, they will impose terms on the plaintiff, and oblige him to pay the costs of all the former ejectments, none of which have been paid. Bull. N. P. 111; Hurst v. Jones [Case No. 6,933]. 3. That Hannah Willis, the plaintiff, is an infant, and was born in the state of Pennsylvania, and was, for the purpose of having this suit instituted, removed into the state of Maryland. As a minor she could not change her domicile, so as to give the court jurisdiction; and that having, since the suit was instituted, returned to the state of Pennsylvania, the court will not aid the imposition which has been practised, by ordering a new trial. Maxfield v. Levy [Id. 9,321]; [Bingham v. Cabot] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 384; [Milligan v. Milledge] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 220; [Logan v. Patrick] 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 288.

An affidavit, taken ex parte, was read; stating the facts of the birth of the plaintiff in Pennsylvania; her infancy and removal to Maryland, and subsequent return, and present residence in this state.

Binney & Tilghman, contra, contended, that the verdict was against both law and justice, and the whole community are interested in the preservation of the rights of courts to decide the law in civil cases. In the supreme court of the state of Pennsylvania, a new trial had been granted in an ejectment for this land; and the court said, they would grant new trials, where the verdict of the jury was against law. The case was, on both sides, considered as a question of law; the jury paid no attention to the argument; and some of them went out of the court-room while it was going on. 1. That this is the first suit instituted by the present plaintiff; and this case differs from that brought in the court of Pennsylvania, in which an allegation of fraud was a part of the defence. The plaintiff claims under the will of her grandfather, and not under her father, to whom fraud was imputed. 2. The court will not impose the costs of suits, to which the plaintiff was not a party, and which were decided in another court. 3. As to the citizenship of the plaintiff, it was not objected to at the trial, and cannot now be brought into question, on an ex parte affidavit. There is nothing illegal in removing to another state, to give jurisdiction to this court; and a return to the state, after suit brought, does not change or affect the rights of the plaintiff. The only course the defendants' counsel could adopt, in reference to the jurisdiction of the court, would be, to move to dismiss the suit; and the affidavit could not be read to support the motion, although it might be the foundation of a rule to show cause.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. When the motion in this case was made, it was considered that a new trial was a matter of course, as the verdict of the jury was in direct opposition to the express charge of the court, upon a plain matter of law. It gives us great satisfaction, that, during the sixteen or seventeen years, in which we have presided in this court, this is the second case, where, upon a dry point of law, a jury has given a verdict against the opinion of the court. It is not on the ground of dissatisfaction at the conduct of the jury, who are respectable men, and no doubt thought they were doing right, that the court will set this verdict aside. It is important that the law should be adhered to, and that the rights of courts should be preserved. We should sit here for a very poor purpose indeed, and should disregard our duty and our oath, if we should submit to verdicts against law. The safety, and happiness, and prosperity of every one, are deeply interested, that if a jury undertake to decide, and does decide against the law of the land, their verdict should be corrected; for if they err, and the court has no control over their decision, where is the remedy for any injury or wrong an individual may sustain by their verdict? But if we make a mistake, the court above will correct our errors.

We never interfere with the facts of a case, and always leave them to the jury, as proper for their examination and decision; stating such of them only as are necessary to apply the law, and expressing our opinion upon the law, so that either party may take an exception to it, and have the benefit of such exception. As to ejections, there may be cases, where courts, after two or three verdicts, will not interfere, and where the justice of the case is clearly with the verdict. But in this case, every thing is in favour of the plaintiff,—both the law and justice are with her. The only thing claimed by the defendants, was founded on facts, which the court would not allow to be given in evidence on a trial at law; as the relief of the party upon them should be asked on the equity side of the court. The plaintiff here claims under the bounty of her grandfather, and not under her father, to whom these facts relate. The court, as at present advised, will not hesitate to set aside a verdict in ejectment, when against law.

With respect to the affidavit, it is not evidence for any purposes, either to continue the motion, or in reference to a new trial. If the case goes off to another court, the party will have all the advantage of the facts relative to the jurisdiction. The court would give the defendants leave to enter a special plea to the jurisdiction; or, upon notice, they might have the benefit of all the facts upon the trial; or a motion may be made to dismiss the suit, and they may bring forward proper evidence.

Rule made absolute.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept. 1, 1876.

ESTOPPEL—OCCUPYING INCONSISTENT POSITIONS——INSTRUCTIONS—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Where a person, by his words or conduct, willfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time.

2. If a party who took a bill of sale as security, deliberately proves a debt which assumes that he is the absolute owner of the goods, and persists in such false claim in an action by the assignee to recover the goods, and attempts to support it by his own oath, he is estopped from claiming them as security.

3. Instructions are entitled to a reasonable construction, and if correct, when applied to the facts submitted to the jury, they will be sustained in an appellate court, even though, if standing alone, or without any explanation, they would be incomplete in respect of some matter sufficiently explained in the evidence.

without objection, to sell the property to an innocent third person for a valuable consideration. Defenses of the kind have often been made with success, until it may be said that the rule of law is clear, that where one, by his words or conduct, willfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time. Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & E. 469; Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Exch. 654; Swain v. Seamans, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 254. Process was issued in this case in the name of the plaintiffs, as assignees of the estate of Edgar C. Merrill, duly adjudged a bankrupt, in which they allege that the defendant, on the 1st day of February preceding the date of the writ, unlawfully, and without any justifiable cause, took the goods and chattels therein described, which belonged to the plaintiffs; and the charge is, that he unlawfully detains the same, to the damage of the plaintiffs in the sum of six thousand dollars. Service was made, and the defendant appeared and filed an answer, in which he denied every allegation contained in the writ and declaration. Pursuant to that issue the parties went to trial, and the jury, under the instructions of the district court, returned their verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, assessing the damages at one dollar. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, and the defendant excepted and sued out the present writ of error.

Enough appears to show that Merrill—who was at the time, and for several years previously had been, a manufacturer of emery wheels, and who was also the patentee of an invention for the manufacture of artificial stone—employed the defendant to act as his selling agent; and that the defendant, in pursuance of that business, subsequently leased and occupied the store in Boston, more particularly described in the record; that the bankrupt, on the 26th of March, 1873, gave to the defendant a bill of sale of the emery wheels then in that store, for the sum of five hundred and ninety-eight dollars and ninety cents; and the parties agree that this suit is brought to recover the wheels conveyed by that bill of sale, or a large part thereof. Willis continued to act as the selling agent of Merrill till December 22, 1873, when he became bankrupt, and was so adjudged by the bankrupt court. It also appears that the defendant was present at the first meeting of the creditors, and that he proved a claim against the estate of the bankrupt amounting to five thousand seven hundred and eleven dollars and ninety-one cents, consisting of a promissory note and the annexed accounts. In that claim he credited the estate of the bankrupt with five hundred and ninety-eight dollars and ninety cents, for the emery wheels in the said store, and which are described in the bill of sale. On petition of the assignees, and due notice to the defendant, the claim was subsequently expunged and rejected as false and fraudulent, the defendant failing to appear pursuant to the notice. Testimony was also given, by one of the plaintiffs, that the defendant told him, that he (Willis) owned the emery wheels, and that he held them by virtue of the said bill of sale. Opposed to that are the statements of the defendant, who testified that the bill of sale was given by the bankrupt to him as security for money which he loaned to the bankrupt at various times, and the expenses which he incurred in renting and fitting up the store, and in carrying on the business of selling the emery wheels and the artificial stone. All such pretenses were denied by the plaintiffs, and they gave evidence tending to show that the bill of sale was intended as a cover to protect the goods from attachment by the creditors of the bankrupt.

Evidence having been introduced by both parties, the district court instructed the jury, that if the defendant knowingly, willfully, and with intent to defraud the creditors of the estate of the bankrupt, swore to and proved a claim which contained a credit based upon the statement that he had bought the goods in question for five hundred and ninety-eight dollars and forty cents, when in fact they were worth about five thousand dollars, and when in fact he held the same only as security, he is now estopped from claiming to hold them as security. Beyond all question it is necessary to establish an equitable estoppel, to show that the party seeking to avail himself of that defense was misled by the acts, conduct, or declarations of the opposite party. Much discussion of that proposition is unnecessary, as the authorities are all one way. Jewett v. Miller, 10 N. Y. 402; Turner v. Waldo, 40 Vt. 51; Andrews v. Lyons [11 Allen] 93 Mass. 349; Langdon v. Doud [10 Allen] 92 Mass. 435; Cole v. Bolard, 22 Pa. St. 431. Suppose that is so, still it by no means follows that there is any error in the record, as the evidence reported shows not only that the defendant claimed the absolute title to the property, but that he actually proved a claim against the estate of the bankrupt, in which he gave a credit to the estate for the same at the sum specified in the bill of sale. Standing alone, the charge would be objectionable, for the reason that it does not in terms set forth the condition that the assignees were misled by deceptive acts and fraudulent conduct and declarations of the defendant. But the charge of the court does not stand alone, nor would it be correct to separate it from the rest of the bill of exceptions of which it forms a part. Instead of that it should clearly be construed in respect to facts to which it was applied when it was given to the jury; and when so applied, it is manifest that it was sufficient to enable the jury to come to a just conclusion, both as to the law and the facts of the case. Sufficient appears to show that the defendant deliberately proved a claim which assumed that he was the absolute owner of the goods, and that his claim was false and fraudulent; nor was the defendant relieved from the consequences of his false conduct and deed—as shown by the fact that the truth was subsequently discovered by the assignees—for it appears he persisted in the false claim at the trial, and attempted to support it by his oath. Viewed in that light, it is clear that the evidence presented all the essential elements of an equitable estoppel, and that it was amply sufficient to justify the instruction of the court when applied to the facts given in evidence. Bigelow, Estop. 480; Horn v. Cole, 51 N. H. 287; Knights v. Wiffen, L. R. 5 Q. B. 660. Fraudulent acts of the kind find no countenance in any adjudged case within the knowledge of the court. On the contrary the rule of law is well settled that where a bailee fraudulently retains goods from the general owner, on grounds wholly different from any right which he possesses, he thereby waives a tender of his rightful claim to the same, by virtue of the principle of estoppel. Boardman v. Sill, 1 Camp. 410, note; Jones v. Tarleton, 9 Mees. & W. 675; Weeks v. Goode, 6 C. B. (N. S.) 367; Everett v. Saltus, 15 Wend. 474; Adams v. Clarke, 63 Mass. [9 Cush.] 215.

Instructions given by a court to the jury are entitled to a reasonable construction, and if correct when applied to the facts submitted to the jury, they ought to be sustained in an appellate court, even though if standing alone, or without any explanation, they would be incomplete in respect of some matter sufficiently explained in the evidence. Tested by these considerations, I am of the opinion that there is no error in the record. Judgment affirmed with costs.

WILLISON v. HOYT.

[4 Law Rep. 35.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April, 1841.

CUSTOM DUTIES.

Necessity of stating in a protest at the customs every charge objected to.

This was an action against the defendant as ex-collector of New York, to recover an amount of duties alleged to have been improperly charged on goods imported by the plaintiff. The goods consisted of eight bales of silk striped Lama handkerchiefs, imported by the ship Liverpool, January 5th, 1841. The article was composed of silk, worsted, and cotton, and the collector charged it with the reduced woolen duty of 41 per cent., which the importer paid under protest. It was admitted, that the woolen duty was improperly charged.

Mr. Winthrop, for claimant, contended that the article was free, as silk was the most valuable component part of it, and therefore it was not subject to duty on the cotton, which formed another component part.

Mr. Butler, for defendant, said it might be a question whether, in order that an article should be free on account of the most valuable part of it being silk, the silk should not only be more valuable than any other component part of the article subject to duty, but also more valuable than each and all of the other component parts taken together. But in the present case he thought this question did not necessarily arise, as the claimant had entered the article as a manufacture of cotton, subject to a duty of 25 per cent., and in his protest made no objection to that duty, but simply protested against the article being charged the woolen duty of 41 per cent. He therefore contended, that the claimant was bound to pay at least the duty of 25 per cent. on the article, as in manufactures of cotton.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, said that, when making a protest, the party should clearly state in it what he objected to, and if he considered the article a different one from what the collector alleged it to be, he should so inform him, in order that the collector might be on his guard, and know what it is that the merchant objects to. In the present case the merchant did not protest against the duty of 25 per cent., and therefore the court thought a verdict should be rendered only for the difference between 25 per cent. and 41 per cent., which was all the merchant objected to at the time of the protest. Verdict accordingly.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—VALUATION.

The value of an import is determined by the appraisal, and the duty fixed by law must be assessed by the collector upon the value so determined.

Action [by R. A. Wills and others] against [Thomas Russell] the collector of Boston to recover duties paid by the plaintiffs under protest.

C. L. Woodbury, for plaintiffs.

George P. Sanger and P. Cummings, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Plaintiffs imported into the port of Boston one hundred and thirty bales of gunny-cloth, subject to the duty provided by the twenty-first section of the act of July 14, 1870 [16 Stat. 262]. This section imposed a duty of two cents per pound on gunny-cloth valued at seven cents or less per square yard, and three cents per pound when valued at more than seven cents per square yard. The gunny-cloth was invoiced and entered at a value less than seven cents per square yard. In due course, and in conformity with law and treasury regulations, the invoice was sent by the collector to the United States appraiser for his report. The appraiser returned his report that the invoice was correct, and valued the gunny-cloth under seven cents the square yard. By order of the collector it was reappraised with a like result. The collector not being satisfied with the appraisal, acting upon other information which he supposed would justify his action, exacted a duty of three cents per pound; this duty the plaintiffs paid, duly protesting against the payment, and in due time, and in accordance with law, brought this action to recover the extra one cent per pound.

The statute gives the collector the right to order the appraisers to make a re-appraisal. It gives the importer the right to appeal to a new board of appraisers. The appraisement determines the value of the import. The collector determines the rate of duty fixed by law, and assesses it upon the value as found by the appraisement.

The collector cannot substitute his own appraisal in lieu of the one found by the legislative referees, the appraisers. The excess of duty exacted in this case was on an assumed value, which the collector was not authorized by law to make the basis of the duty. The importer was entitled to his goods on the payment of the duty on the appraised value; and, according to the agreed statement of facts, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount of the excess in gold, with interest and costs.

WILMARTH v. MOUNTFORD et al.

[4 Wash. C. C. 79.]¹

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1821.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—PROBABLE CAUSE—LARCENY—SALE—TRANSFER OF PROPERTY—EFFECT OF NONPAYMENT.

1. When goods have been purchased, to be paid for on delivery, and instead of payment in money, a promissory note, which has been dishonoured, given by the owner of the goods, is offered in payment; the property of the original owner of the goods is not changed; although he might have taken them to the place where they were to be delivered, and there laid them down, expecting immediate payment in money for them.

2. Even the delivery of goods to a pretended purchaser, who makes off with the goods, does not change the property.

3. It is not necessary for the defendant to fix the crime of larceny on the plaintiff. If by his folly or his fraud he exposes himself to a well grounded suspicion that he was guilty, this prosecution was founded on probable cause, which is a sufficient defence.

4. There not being the slightest evidence against two of the defendants, the court directed the jury to find them not guilty, that they might be examined as witnesses for the other defendants.

Action for a malicious prosecution. The plaintiff produced the record of the indictment in the mayor's court of this city for larceny, which the grand jury returned ignoramus. The plaintiff proved that the defendant, Mountford, put into the hands of a constable of the city a warrant to arrest the plaintiff on a charge of larceny, issued by Mr. Badger, one of the aldermen. A search warrant for the goods supposed to have been stolen had previously been delivered to him, which proved ineffectual in the search. Upon the first mentioned warrant the plaintiff was arrested, and taken before Mr. Badger, and, upon the examination of Mountford and Wentz, he was bound over to appear at the mayor's court, to answer to a charge of larceny; and it appeared by the alderman's docket that these two witnesses were held in fifty dollars each to prosecute. The plaintiff having arrested his case upon the above proof, the defendant's counsel moved that the jury should be directed immediately to find a verdict in favour of Wentz and Crowley, against whom there was not the slightest evidence given; with a view to their being examined as witnesses for the two other defendants. This motion was opposed upon the ground that there was some evidence against those defendants, particularly against Wentz, who appears, by the alderman's docket, to have been bound over to prosecute; and that the court never charges the jury to find an immediate verdict for a co-defendant, that he may be examined for the other defendants, if any, even the slightest evidence is given against him. Cases cited in favour of the motion, Peake, Ev. 152. Mr. Badger was called upon to explain the short entry in his docket, who stated, that the two witnesses were, in fact, bound over to appear as such, and not to prosecute; and that it has been his uniform and unvarying practice to bind over the witness to prosecute, instead of to testify.

BY THE COURT. There is no evidence against Crowley of any kind; and after the explanation given by Mr. Badger of the entry in his docket, the other defendant, Wentz, appeared as a witness merely, and as such was recognized to appear in the mayor's court. In that character, this action cannot be maintained against him. There is no evidence that he was a prosecutor, or that he voluntarily took any part in the prosecution. There is no evidence then, not the slightest, against this defendant, upon which the jury can possibly find him guilty. The jury therefore may at once find these defendants not guilty.

The jury found according to this direction, without leaving their seats, and Wentz was examined as a witness for the remaining defendants.

The following were the circumstances proved on the part of the defendants: F. Read, one of the defendants, becoming embarrassed in his circumstances, assigned over all his estate to the defendant Mountford and to Crowley, for the benefit of such of his creditors as should sign a release within sixty days; and possession was immediately delivered to the assignees. This assignment bears date the 16th of June, 1819, notice of which was published in Relf's Gazette, on the 18th. On the 21st of the same month, one Scholfield came to the store of Mountford, where the goods were kept for sale, and pretending that he was commissioned by a Mr. White of Virginia, to purchase for him goods of the description of those in the store; selected as many of them as amounted to about $480, and requested Mountford to pack and send them to his lodgings at Judd's tavern, where he would pay the cash for them. The goods, accompanied by a bill, in which White is made debtor to Mountford and Crowley, assignees of F. Read, were, on the same day, taken to Judd's tavern by Wentz, an apprentice of Mountford, with orders to receive the money or to bring back the goods, if the money should not be paid. Upon entering the room where Scholfield was, at the tavern, Wentz was desired to lay down the box on the ledge of the bar, which he did; Scholfield at the same time taking out his pocket book and opening it, as if to pay the money. At length he observed to Wentz, that there was a gentleman in the adjoining room who would settle with him for the goods, and that he would introduce him. Upon going into this room, the plaintiff was found sitting alone, to whom the bill was presented. In the mean time the goods were removed by the order of Scholfield. The plaintiff offered to the young man as payment, a note of F. Read's to himself, for rather a larger amount than that of the bill, and asked if that was not good? Wentz informed him that it was not; and that Read had nothing to do with the goods, having failed, and having assigned his estate to Mountford and Crowley for the benefit of his creditors. Scholfield soon left the room, and Wentz was unsuccessful in obtaining either a return of the goods, or payment for them. About this time, Mountford passed the tavern, and being informed by Wentz of the above circumstances, he called upon an attorney for advice, and was informed by him that the case amounted to larceny; upon which Mountford obtained from Alderman Badger a search warrant, which was put into the hands of a constable. The search proving ineffectual, a warrant was obtained for arresting the plaintiff upon a charge of larceny, by virtue of which he was taken, and bound over as before mentioned. When asked by the alderman his reason for having acted as he had done, the plaintiff replied that Read was indebted to him, and that he had resorted to this scheme to obtain payment. On a subsequent day, the assignee and the plaintiff called upon an attorney in order to arrange the business, when the plaintiff stated that he knew where the goods were, and that he could get them at any time. No arrangement however was made, as the plaintiff refused to return the goods except upon the terms of being permitted to come in under the assignment with the other creditors. The proposition the assignees could not accede to, without the assent of the creditors who had executed the release, the sixty days having then run out.

The defendant's counsel insisted that there was not only probable cause for the prosecution, but that the transaction amounted in law to larceny. That the property was not changed, and that the possession was obtained by an artifice, with intent to convert the goods to the use of the plaintiff against the owner's consent. Esp. 132; 2 East, P. C. 553, 671. They also denied that there was any evidence of malice.

C. J. Ingersoll and Mr. Phillips, for plaintiff.
Brown, Peters & Page, for defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). This is an action for a malicious prosecution, and it is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove, not only that the prosecution was malicious, but that it was instituted without probable cause. Whether there was in this case probable cause or not, is a question for the court to decide; dependent, nevertheless, upon the opinion of the jury, whether the facts stated by the court as constituting probable cause have been proved or not. If there was probable cause for the prosecution, then the jury may presume malice, though no express evidence of it be given. In the case of Munns v. Dupont [Case No. 9,926], in this court, it was stated to the jury, that by probable cause is meant a reasonable ground of suspicion, founded on circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in believing that the accused is guilty of the imputed crime. To the definition given in this case, the court adheres.

The prosecution on account of which this action is brought was larceny, which is the wrongful taking and carrying away of the goods of another, with a felonious intent to appropriate them to the use of the taker, without the owner's consent. It will be proper in the first place to inquire, how far this definition is applicable to Scholfield? He commenced his operations with falsehood and artifice, with a view, as his subsequent conduct proves, to obtain the wrongful possession of the goods for his own use, or for the use of some other person, without accounting to the owner for the agreed value of them. It is not true, as was argued by the plaintiff's counsel, that the property in these goods was at any time changed, which by the contract was only to take place on the payment of the money. It was, by the express terms of it, a cash sale. The cash was not paid or tendered; and, consequently, the right of property was never divested out of the assignees. Neither was there a change of possession, with the assent, or by the act of the assignees, or of Wentz their agent. When at the request of Scholfield he laid down the goods, with the expectation, well warranted by Scholfield's actions, of receiving the money for them, they remained, constructively, in his possession; and to every legal intent they were as much in his possession as if he had placed them in his pocket. If a person go into a shop to buy a particular article, which is handed to him by the shopkeeper to examine, and he makes off with it, the delivery of the article would not constitute a change of property or possession; and the carrying away of the goods would, in such a case, be evidence of a felonious intent, formed at the time, or before, to convert the goods to the use of the taker, and would amount to larceny. It is true, that in this case, the possession of the goods was lost by Wentz; but it was taken, not transferred by him, which constitutes one of the ingredients in larceny. In short, here was a wrongful taking and carrying away of the goods of another, with a felonious or fraudulent intent to convert them to the use of the taker, or of some other person, against the consent of the owner; and if, upon the trial of Scholfield, the opinion of the jury, as to the intent, should be as I have stated it, it would not have been an easy matter to extricate him from the charge of larceny. How then stood the case as to the plaintiff? He and Scholfield boarded at the same house. That they were acquainted, and had, previous to the pretended purchase for White, made some arrangement which they were subsequently to carry into effect, is obvious, not only from the circumstance of Scholfield's referring Wentz to the gentleman in the next room, as the person who would settle with him, but from the acknowledgement of the plaintiff himself to the alderman, that the scheme was resorted to for the purpose of getting payment of the debt due to him by Read. The plaintiff did not offer to pay for the goods; because the offer of a note of an insolvent debtor was no compliance with the contract made by Scholfield; and besides, it was refused.

It was contended for the plaintiff, that the transaction resolves itself into a claim of property; a creditor obtaining possession of the goods of his debtor, to compel the payment of a just debt. This argument is not supported by the facts of the case. Before this transaction took place, the goods in question had been assigned by the plaintiff's debtor to Mountford and Crowley, for the benefit of his creditors. The contract was made with the assignees. The bill which was presented to the plaintiff so stated it, and Wentz informed the plaintiff that the goods did not belong to Read, who had failed, but to his assignees. Suppose then that a creditor might legally seize his debtor's property, or get possession of it by artifice, and so pay himself, which cannot be admitted; still the argument would lose all its weight in this case, inasmuch as the property in these goods was completely changed, and that fact known to the plaintiff.

Again, it is insisted that the assignment was void by the act of assembly of this state, on account of its not having been recorded within thirty days. To this argument there is this conclusive answer given by the defendant's counsel. The assignment was valid at the time when this transaction took place, the thirty days not having run out; and on the 21st of June, 1819, the assignees were the owners of the goods, and might have sold and transferred a legal right to them, which the subsequent failure to record the deed could not set aside. Besides, the possession had passed from Read to the assignees, and was vested in them at the time when this transaction took place. If then the evidence is sufficient to connect the plaintiff with Scholfield, in the original concoction of a scheme founded in deceit, and contrived for the purpose of feloniously or fraudulently obtaining the possession of the goods of the assignees, and appropriating them to his own use, without paying the sum at which they were agreed to be sold; it would be difficult to distinguish the plaintiff's case from that of Scholfield's. But it is not necessary that the crime of larceny should be fixed upon the plaintiff. If, by his folly or his fraud, he exposed himself to a well grounded suspicion that he was guilty of that offence; the prosecution had, at least, probable cause for its basis, and this is sufficient to defeat the present action.

Verdict for defendant.

[2 Woods, 409; 3 Am. Law T. Rep. (N. S.) 29.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Georgia. Dec. 7, 1874, and May 25, 1875.

RAILROAD COMPANY—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER—DEFAULT IN INTEREST—CONFLICTING JURISDICTIONS—STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS.

1. A railroad company having its residence and principal office at Atlanta, Ga., conveyed to trustees, by one deed, all its line of road extending from Atlanta through South Carolina to Charlotte, N. C., and other property to secure the payment of the principal and interest of 4,248 bonds of $1,000 each, issued by the railroad company. The railroad was an indivisible and inseparable piece of property, which could not be divided without injury to its value. The trust deed conferred authority on the trustees, and made it their duty, in case the railroad company failed to pay either the interest or principal of the bonds, to take possession of the property conveyed by the trust deed, and advertise and sell the same (or such part as might be necessary) at Atlanta to pay the sum in default. Held, that on default made in the payment of interest, and a demand upon the trustees by the bondholders that they should take possession of the trust property, and a failure of the trustees to do so, the court, on a bill filed by the bondholders to require them to execute the trust would compel them to take possession of the trust property or appoint a receiver for that purpose.

[Cited in Taylor v. Life Ass'n of America, 3 Fed. 470; Central Trust Co. v. Chattanooga, R. & C. R. Co., 62 Fed. 953.]

2. Such appointment would be made even though there was no probable deficiency of the trust property to pay the debts secured by the trust deed.

3. When it was represented that the trust property had fallen into the hands of two different receivers, accountable to three different courts to the manifest detriment of the trust estate, that fact of itself was considered a sufficient reason for the appointment of a receiver for the whole property, if the court had jurisdiction to make such appointment.

[Cited in Corning v. Dreyfus, 20 Fed. 428.]

4. The circuit court of the United States for the Northern district of Georgia has jurisdiction to appoint a receiver for the entire line of said company's road and other property included in the deed of trust, whether within or without the state.

5. Two states may, by concurrent legislation, unite in creating the same corporate body.

6. Where a bill was filed, the prayer of which was, that this court would construe a trust deed executed by a railroad company, and compel the trustees to execute the trust or appoint a receiver to take possession of and administer the trust property, and service of subpoena had been made on the railroad company, which was the principal defendant, and a restraining order had been allowed and also served on the railroad company, enjoining it from delivering possession of the trust property to any one except a receiver appointed by this court in the case thus commenced: Held, that by these proceedings the court acquired constructive possession of the trust property, and that possession thereof, taken under color of process from another court, in a suit commenced after the proceedings above mentioned, was in contempt of the process and jurisdiction of this court, even though the other court first obtained actual possession of the property. Per Woods, Circuit Judge.

[Cited in Howlett v. Central Carolina Land & Imp. Co., 56 Fed. 162; Reinach v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 58 Fed. 45; Wheeler v. Walton & Whamm Co., 65 Fed. 722. Approved in Adams v. Mercantile Trust Co., 15 C. C. A. 4, 66 Fed. 620.]

7. Contra, service of process gives jurisdiction over the person; seizure gives jurisdiction over the property; and, until the property is seized, no matter when the suit was commenced, the court does not have jurisdiction over it. Thus, when two suits between different parties, raising different controversies, and having different purposes in view, are commenced in courts of coordinate jurisdiction, and the possession of the property, which is the subject of the suit, is necessary to the relief asked in each case, that court which first seizes the property acquires jurisdiction over it, to the exclusion of the other, no matter when the suits were commenced or process in personam was served. Per Bradley, Circuit Justice.

This was a cause in equity which was first heard at chambers in Savannah, on the 5th and 7th of December, 1874, by WOODS, Circuit Judge, on the motion of complainants for the appointment of a receiver.

A. T. Akerman and L. E. Bleckley, for the motion.

P. L. Mynatt and H. H. Marshall, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The complainants, Skipwith Wilmer and August Richard, allege that they are the owners and holders of certain of the bonds known as first mortgage eight per cent. bonds of the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, which are secured by a deed of trust on all the property and franchises of the defendant company, and they file this bill in behalf of themselves and all other holders of similar bonds who shall be entitled to avail themselves of the benefit of the suit. The purpose and prayer of the bill is, that the trust deed, given to secure said bonds, may be so construed that the trustees therein named, or their substitutes to be appointed by the court, may be compelled to execute the trusts created by the deed of trust, by taking possession of said railway and appurtenances, and all property granted by the deed of trust, and selling the same at public auction for the payment of the principal and interest of all the bonds secured by said trust deed, and that pending the suit, some suitable person may be appointed receiver to take possession of said railway and all its property conveyed by the trust deed, with power to operate and manage said railway, and receive all its earnings and income during the pendency of the suit, and with such other power as to the court shall seem right and proper.

The cause now comes on for hearing upon the motion of the complainants for the appointment of a receiver as prayed in the bill. It is alleged in the bill that the defendant company is a corporation created by, and existing under the laws of the states of Georgia, South Carolina and North Carolina, and having its principal office and place of business in Atlanta, in the state of Georgia. It further appears from the bill that, by an act of the legislature of Georgia, approved March 5, 1856, a railroad company, to be known as "The Georgia Air Line Railroad Company," was incorporated and authorized to build, equip and enjoy a railroad from Atlanta to the South Carolina state line, in the direction of Anderson court house. By an act of the general assembly of South Carolina, approved December 20, 1856, the Air Line Railroad Company of South Carolina was incorporated, with authority to construct a railroad from the line of the state of Georgia, in the direction of the city of Atlanta, to Anderson court house, and thence to some point of connection with the Charlotte and South Carolina Railroad, in the direction of Charlotte, North Carolina, and to equip and enjoy the same. The seventh section of this act of incorporation provides that it shall and may be lawful for the said company to combine or unite with any other railroad company having the right so to do, and to consolidate the management of the companies so combining, if they shall deem it necessary, and to make any regulations for the use of or combination of the interest or management of said roads as the public good may require, or to them may seem meet. By an act of the legislature of North Carolina, approved August 3, 1868, it was provided that the Air Line Railroad Company in South Carolina was authorized "to extend, construct, equip, and operate its road within the limits of North Carolina, from any point on the South Carolina line to the town of Charlotte, in North Carolina." These three acts being in force, the legislature of Georgia, by an act approved September 7, 1868, declared "that the Georgia Air Line Company be and they are hereby authorized to consolidate, combine, or unite with any other railroad company or companies directly or indirectly connecting therewith, or to unite the management of said companies, upon such terms, conditions, and provisions as shall be agreed upon by and between such companies so consolidated or uniting, and thereupon such consolidated or united companies shall be invested in this state with all the rights and privileges conferred upon, and be subject to all the restrictions imposed by, the original charter of the said Georgia Air Line Railroad Company, and the amendments thereto, with the right to adopt such other or modified corporate name, and to increase and diminish the number of directors now provided, or as shall be determined on and agreed upon by such companies." And the legislature of South Carolina, by an act approved September 18, 1868, entitled "an act to amend an act entitled an act to incorporate the Air Line Railroad Company in South Carolina," declared, sec. 2, "that if said company shall, as authorized by its charter, consolidate or unite with any other company or companies, it may adopt such other or modified corporate name and increase or diminish the number of directors now provided for as shall be deemed best and agreed upon by such companies."

In pursuance of the authority granted by these acts of the legislatures of Georgia and South Carolina, it is alleged that, on June 20, 1870, the Georgia Air Line Railroad Company, and the Air Line Railroad Company in South Carolina, by an agreement in writing, duly executed between said companies, were consolidated and united into one corporation under the name of the "Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company," and from thenceforward became one body corporate under that corporate name, and the owner of all the property and entitled to all the rights, privileges and franchises which had belonged to the two companies out of which it was formed. It is further alleged that the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, having thus become the owner of all the property which had belonged to the two companies named, and being in need of a large sum of money to complete and equip its road, conveyed to trustees by deed of trust "the entire railway of said company, extending from the city of Atlanta, in the state of Georgia, to the city of Charlotte, in North Carolina, together with all its franchises, lands, buildings, machinery, rolling stock, materials and other property, real and personal, wherever situated, and however held, and whether now owned or hereafter acquired; and also the annually accruing net income of said company," the purpose of which said deed of trust, and it so declared, was to secure the payment of 4,248 coupon bonds of $1,000 each, to be issued by the company, with interest payable semi-annually at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. It was made the duty of the trustees named in the deed of trust, upon default of payment of either the principal or interest of the bonds, to take possession of the trust property and its revenues and administer the same, and to sell the property or such part thereof as might be necessary to pay the sum of money in default. The bonds secured by the deed of trust were duly executed and issued and negotiated by the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company. The bill further states that on the 1st of January, 1874, the company made default in the payment of its interest that day due, that the interest coupons were presented for payment at the offices of the company in New York and Atlanta, and payment thereof was refused. More than sixty days having elapsed from the time of such default, the complainants, together with the holders of other 2,342 of said bonds, gave notice to R. A. Lancaster and Alfred Austell, the surviving trustees under said deed of trust, of the default in the payment of interest, and requested them to proceed and execute the trusts created by said deed, and take possession of the trust property and the revenues of the company, as authorized and required by the deed of trust, to sell the property and apply the net proceeds of the entire trust property to the payment of the principal and interest on the bonds secured by said deed of trust, as therein provided. Although five months have elapsed since the said request, the trustees have taken no steps towards the execution of said trusts or the enforcement of the bondholders' rights under the deed of trust, but have utterly failed and neglected so to do. It is further alleged that the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company is managed not so much in the interest of its bondholders and stockholders as in the interests of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, whose president is also the president of the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company; that it has been made subservient to the interests of the Richmond & Danville Company, greatly to its own injury and the damage of the complainants and other bondholders. It is also alleged that the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company claims to have some interest in the property covered by the deed of trust, and to have a lien thereon on said property, and that the complainants apprehend that the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Company, and the Danville & Richmond Company are acting collusively in regard to said lien, and that it is their intention to undertake to enforce it to the great wrong and injury of complainants and other bondholders. It is unnecessary here to notice further the allegations of the bill. The motion is for the appointment of a receiver, to take possession of the entire line of the defendant company's road, running from Atlanta, Georgia, to Charlotte, North Carolina, over portions of three states.

The first question which presents itself for solution is, should there be a receiver for the property of the defendant company or any part of it? The rules which govern the discretion of courts in the exercise of this power are well settled. Where there is a trust fund in danger of being wasted or misapplied, a court of equity will interfere upon the application of any of the creditors, either in his own behalf or in behalf of himself and the other creditors, and, by the appointment of a receiver, or in some other mode, grant relief. Jones v. Dougherty, 10 Ga. 274. The appointment of a receiver is not necessarily predicated upon the apprehended loss of the debt. It would be sufficient to allege that the trustee appointed refused to perform the trust. McDougald v. Dougherty, 11 Ga. 586. Where there has been negligence or improper conduct on the part of a trustee, and the fund is in danger, the appointment of a receiver upon the application of the cestui que trust is a matter of right. Jenkins v. Jenkins, 1 Paige, 243. The rule in courts of equity in regard to appointing a receiver of mortgaged property is, that it will be granted in all cases where the income is required to meet the incumbrance, and is at the present time being so applied as not to be legally applicable to reduce the incumbrance. 2 Redf. R. R. 361.

To apply these well settled rules to the question in hand: As already stated, the trustees have, for more than five months, neglected, although requested, and although the deed of trust made it their duty to do so, to take possession of the property of the defendant company. The bondholders have as clear a right to have executed that power of the trust deed, which requires the trustees to take possession of the property upon default in payment of interest as any other covenant in the deed. If the trustees refuse to perform this duty, the cestui que trust has the right to apply to the court to compel them to do it, or appoint some one who will. And this right is independent of any probable deficiency of the trust property to pay the debts secured by the deed of trust. The application for a receiver in such a case is simply a demand by the beneficiaries of the deed that the trust be executed according to its terms.

It has been made to appear upon the hearing that the interest for January and July last is in default, amounting to $339,840. It is also shown that upon an execution issued on the judgment of a court of the state of Georgia for little more than $1,000, the railroad of the defendant company has been sold piecemeal in the several counties of the state of Georgia through which it runs. It is also shown that since the filing of the bill and the service of process in this case, and since the allowance of a restraining order, a suit has been instituted in the superior court of Fulton county, Georgia, in which a receiver has been appointed for so much of the property of the defendant company as lies within the state of Georgia; that suits have been instituted in the United States circuit court for North Carolina, and in the United States circuit court for South Carolina since the service of process in this action, in which receivers have been appointed for the property of the company in these states respectively. It is true that the same person has been appointed receiver in North and South Carolina, but a different person is the receiver appointed by the state court in Georgia. Here are three distinct and independent courts claiming possession of different portions of the railroad and other property of the defendant company, and it is in the actual possession of two independent receivers, living in different states and accountable to different tribunals. The averment of the bill is, that this railroad property from Atlanta, Georgia, to Charlotte, North Carolina, is one inseparable and indivisible piece of property; that it is a portion of a great through route, and derives its chief value and business from that fact. The legislation already cited, of the three states through which it runs, shows that it was intended to be one undivided and unbroken line, and the deed of trust, which is the basis of this proceeding, covers the whole line of the road from one terminus to another. It is obvious that it would be a most unfortunate case that such a property should be held by two different receivers, accountable to three different courts. In fact, when we consider that a large part of the property of the company consists of rolling stock, which must necessarily pass from one end of the road to the other, and which must be used on the three divisions into which the road is divided by its administration in three different courts, it appears to be well nigh impossible to administer the affairs of the road and render accurate and satisfactory accounts. It is evident that such a divided control must result in crippling the operations of the road, destroying its business and reducing its receipts, and placing in jeopardy the security of its creditors.

This unfortunate condition of affairs, resulting from the action of three independent courts, would of itself be, as it appears to us, sufficient ground for the appointment of a receiver for the entire property by this court, if the power and jurisdiction of this court to do so is clear. First, then, has this court the power to appoint a receiver for real property outside the limits of the state? Involved in this question is another, to wit: Is the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company one corporation in Georgia, and another and distinct corporation of the same name in South Carolina, or is it the same corporate body in both states? It seems to me quite clear that the purpose of the legislation of Georgia and South Carolina, in reference to this corporation, already set out in this opinion, was to create a single corporate body. Pursuant to the provisions of the acts of these two states, the two original companies did consolidate and combine, they took a new name, and organized a new and single board of directors. Having done this, the new consolidated company, under its new name, and acting by its one president, has executed a single deed of trust, covering the entire line of railway from Atlanta to Charlotte, and including all the personal property, which formerly belonged to the two companies that united to form the new one. It is clear that the legislation of the two states was passed to authorize the making of one corporate body out of two, and that the two corporate bodies so authorized have united, and have, ever since the 20th of June, 1870, the date of the consolidation, been acting as one company.

The only remaining question in this branch of the inquiry is, could the legislatures of two different states unite to create one corporate body? This question is distinctly answered by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Railroad Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. [78 U. S.] 82. The court says: "We see no reason why several states cannot, by competent legislation, unite in creating the same corporation, or in combining several preëxisting corporations into a single one. The Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore Railroad Company is one of the latter description. In the case of that company against Maryland, Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of this court, said: 'The plaintiff in error is a corporation composed of several railroad companies which had been previously chartered by the states of Maryland, Delaware and Pennsylvania, and which, by corresponding laws of the respective states, were united together, and form one corporation under the name and style of the Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore Railroad Company. The road of this corporation extends from Philadelphia to Baltimore.'" We reach the conclusion then that the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company is one and the same corporate body in Georgia and South Carolina, and the legislation of North Carolina hereinbefore referred to shows that it has the same rights and functions in that state that it has in South Carolina. The bill avers, and the proof shows, that this corporate body, existing in two states and owning property in three, has its residence and principal office at Atlanta, Georgia.

The inquiry then recurs: Can this court, having obtained jurisdiction over the person of this corporate body, exercise jurisdiction over its real and personal property outside the limits of the state, by the appointment of a receiver to take possession of the entire property, both within and without the state? There is a precedent for the exercise of such jurisdiction. In Ellis v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co., 107 Mass. 1, the court appointed a receiver for the entire line of the defendant company's road, which extended from Boston, in Massachusetts, to Fishkill, in New York. It is well settled that realty out of the state may be reached by acting on the person. Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, 606; Ramsay v. Brailsford, 2 Desaus. 587, note. In the case in Paige, it was held that if the person of the defendant is within its jurisdiction, the court has jurisdiction as to his property situated without such jurisdiction. When the property is situated outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court, the court may require assignments to be made by the defendant to the receiver. Chipman v. Sabbaton, 7 Paige, 47; Cagger v. Howard, 1 Barb. Ch. 369; Story, Conf. Laws, § 463; Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 15 How. [56 U. S.] 243.

As the property of the defendant company is one entire and indivisible thing, and as it is all covered by one deed of trust, there seems to be no good reason why this court should not appoint a receiver for the whole, even though a part of the property may extend into another state. The court having jurisdiction of the defendant can compel it to do all in its power to put the receiver in possession of the entire property. If other persons outside the territorial jurisdiction of this court have seized the property of defendant, the receiver may be compelled to ask the assistance of the courts of that jurisdiction to aid him in obtaining possession, but that is no reason why we should hesitate to appoint a receiver for the whole property. We think the courts of other jurisdictions would feel constrained, as a matter of comity, to afford all necessary aid in their power to put the receiver of this court in possession.

Finally, it is objected that the superior court of Fulton county, Georgia, and the United States circuit courts of South Carolina and North Carolina, respectively, have taken jurisdiction of the property of the company within their respective states, and their receivers are in possession, and this court ought not to interfere by the appointment of a receiver of its own. The record shows that the bill in this case asking this court to undertake the administration of this trust property, and to take possession of it by its receiver, was filed on the 30th of October, 1874. It is shown that service was made upon the defendant corporation on the 31st of the same month, and notice of the motion now on hearing was served on the same day. It further appears that on the 5th of November, upon the application of the complainants, and upon the showing that there appeared to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, a judge of this court directed that, upon the execution of a bond by complainants with sufficient sureties in the sum of five thousand dollars, conditioned according to law, a restraining order issue enjoining and restraining the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, its officers and agents, from handing over or delivering possession of said railway or its appurtenances, or any of its other property, to any person except a receiver appointed by this court in this suit. The bond was given by the complainants as required by the court, and the restraining order was issued, and on the 9th of November served on the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company. The case in Fulton superior court was not filed until November 10th, and no prayer was made for a receiver until Garner, a defendant in that case, applied for one in his answer, which was filed on November 20th. The suits in the United States circuit courts of South and North Carolina were not commenced until the 16th of November.

Upon this state of facts, which court first acquired jurisdiction of this trust property? Is actual seizure of the property necessary to the jurisdiction of the court? In my judgment it is not. In this case I think the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court for the Northern district of Georgia first attached to the property, because the suit in that court was first commenced and service of subpoena made, and because, (1) one of the main objects of the suit was to obtain possession of the property, and such possession was necessary to the full relief prayed by the bill; and (2) because, by the service of the restraining order enjoining the defendant company from delivering possession of the trust property to any person except a receiver appointed by this court in this cause, the court acquired constructive possession, and from the moment of the service of the restraining order the property was in gremio legis. I think these positions are sustained by the authorities.

I subjoin a reference to a number of cases, in all of which the subject under consideration is discussed, and in some of which the precise point is decided and the views above expressed are sustained: Smith v. McIver, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 532; Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 151; Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 624; Williams' Adm'x v. Benedict, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 107; Wiswell v. Sampson, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 52; Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 533; Green v. Creighton, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 90; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 457; Chittenden v. Brewster, 2 Wall. Lyman* [Id. 10,780]; Stearns v. Stearns, 16 Mass. 171; Conover v. Mayor of New York, 25 Barb. 513; Clepper v. State, 4 Tex. 242; Thompson v. Hill, 3 Yerg. 167; Bank v. Rutland & B. R. Co., 28 Vt. 478; Merrill v. Lake, 16 Ohio, 405; Ex parte Bushnell, 8 Ohio St. 601; State v. Yarbrough, 1 Hawks. 78; Gould v. Hayes, 19 Ala. 448; High, Rec. 38-41, and note. Especial attention is called to the cases of Wiswell v. Sampson, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 52; Chittenden v. Brewster, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 191; and Bill v. New Albany R. Co., supra.

An examination of the cases cited will show that actual seizure of property has not been considered necessary to the jurisdiction of the court in a case where the possession of the property is necessary to the relief sought. The commencement of the action and service of process, or according to some of the cases the simple commencement of the suit by the filing of the bill is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction, to the exclusion of all other courts. In this case, not only was the suit begun and process served before the commencement of any other suit, but the defendant railway company was actually enjoined by the order of this court from yielding possession of the trust property to any one except a receiver appointed by this court in this case. In my judgment, this restraining order gave this court constructive possession of the trust property, and a subsequent seizure of the same by any person on the order of any court whatever, in a suit subsequently begun, was a contempt of the process and jurisdiction of this court. If this court, upon the bill filed in this case, has the power to take possession of the entire property granted by the trust deed, as we have already decided it has, then the filing of the bill asking this court to take possession of and administer the trust property, and the service of process, excluded the jurisdiction of all other courts to take possession of and administer the same property or any part thereof.

Other questions than those noticed in this opinion have been argued at the bar, but it is not necessary to decide them in passing on this motion. I am of opinion that this court has jurisdiction to appoint a receiver for the entire property covered by the trust deed, and to administer the property for the benefit of all persons interested in the trust; that the jurisdiction of this court over the entire trust property attached before that of any other court; that all parties necessary to the hearing of this motion are before the court; that the bill and the evidence submitted establish a proper case for the appointment of a receiver, and the facts brought to the knowledge of the court imperatively demand its intervention; the interest of all parties requires that our jurisdiction, being thus exclusive over the subject matter, should be exercised, and that the motion for the appointment of a receiver for the whole trust property should be sustained.

In pursuance of the foregoing opinion, the court on the 19th of December, 1874, appointed John H. Fisher, Esq., receiver for the entire property covered by the deed of trust executed by the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company. Fisher gave bond, as required by the order of the court, but was unable to get possession of that part of the trust property lying in Georgia. On the 24th of May, 1875, he applied to the United States circuit court, from which he received his appointment, then being held by Mr. Circuit Justice BRADLEY, and Mr. District Judge ERSKINE, for a writ of assistance to enable him to get possession of so much of the trust property as lay within the Northern district of Georgia.

Upon this application the following opinion was delivered:

A. T. Akerman and L. E. Bleckley, for the motion.

P. L. Mynatt and N. J. Hammond, contra.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. This is a bill filed on behalf of first mortgage bondholders of the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, praying for a sale of the railway and appurtenances, and for a receiver to take possession of the property pending the suit. A receiver, Mr. John H. Fisher, was appointed by Circuit Judge WOODS, on the 9th of December last. On proceeding to take possession of the property, the receiver found a large and important portion of it, to wit: the depot and terminus in Atlanta, and the railway line in Fulton, and some other counties in Georgia, in the possession of one Lemuel P. Grant, as a receiver appointed by the superior court of Fulton county, a court of the state of Georgia having equity jurisdiction. Grant refused to surrender possession, and Fisher, under an advisory order of ERSKINE, District Judge, applied to the superior court of Fulton county for an order directing its receiver to surrender the property. This application was also refused. Fisher, the receiver appointed by this court, now applies by petition for a writ of assistance to put him in public possession of the property, and for an attachment as for a contempt against Grant, and other officials and directors of the railway company, for conspiring to keep the property out of the possession of the officers of this court. To this petition several answers have been filed by the parties implicated, and the question is thus presented whether this court can, and if it can, whether it will take the property in question out of the possession of a receiver appointed by a state court. Under ordinary circumstances, such a proposition would not be listened to for a moment. But the complainants and the receiver of this court rely on the special circumstances of the case as taking it out of the ordinary rule. Those circumstances may be briefly stated as follows:

The bill in this case was filed October 30, 1874, and a copy and notice of motion for injunction and receiver were served on the railroad company the next day. On the 5th of November, Judge ERSKINE granted a restraining order, which, on the 9th of the same month, was served on the company, and on Grant, then a director of the company, appointed on behalf of the city council of Atlanta, of which he was a member. On the 11th it was served on Buford, the president, and on Sage, the general superintendent, and was brought to the notice of Garner, a director. As before stated, the application for a receiver was not decided until the 9th of December, 1874. Meantime other proceedings had taken place in the state courts, and especially in the superior court of Fulton county, which produced the complications that have arisen. In December, 1866, one Samuel B. Hoyt recovered a judgment in the Fulton county court against the Georgia Air Line Railway Company, of which the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company is the legal successor by change of name, for the sum of $1,000 and costs, and fieri facias was duly issued under the laws of Georgia, not only in Fulton county, but Gwinnett, Habersham and Hall counties, and several levies were made on the railroad line in April, August and September, 1874, and the road was sold in distinct parcels to one William A. Russell. The sales were severally made in June, September and October, 1874. On the 5th of November, Russell transferred his interest to Garner, a director, as above stated, for the whole line of railroad in Fulton, Gwinnett, and Hall counties. Garner was put into possession by the sheriff on the 9th of November, 1874. On the next day, the 10th, the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, by its managing director, P. A. Welford, filed a bill in the superior court of Fulton county against Hoyt, the judgment creditor, Russell, the purchaser at sheriff's sale, Garner, the assignee, etc., to prevent their proceeding to take possession of the road. On the 20th of November, Garner filed a cross-bill in the same court, asking for the appointment of a receiver, which resulted in the appointment of Grant, on the 21st, and his taking possession on the 26th of the same month. Grant had resigned his position as director of the company on the 11th of November.

It thus appears that the bill in this court was filed before that in the superior court of Fulton county, but that a receiver was first appointed by that court, and that he was in possession when the appointment of receiver was made by this court. It also appears that the object of the two suits was different; in this court, it being the foreclosure of the mortgage and the sale of the property to satisfy the same, the possession sought being auxiliary to the main purpose; in the state court, the object was to set aside the proceedings and sale under the judgment of Hoyt, and to prevent Garner from keeping possession of the road. On the 2d of January, 1875, the complainants in this court filed an amended bill, making parties of Hoyt, Russell, Garner and Sage, and alleging that the proceedings in the superior court of Fulton county were collusive, and intended to frustrate the proceedings of this court. But suppose that the allegations of the amended bill are true, can this court arrest proceedings in a state court on the ground of their collusiveness? Must not the state court itself be applied to? We cannot assume or entertain the proposition that the state court will not do justice in matters within its jurisdiction. We are bound to suppose that it will not allow a collusive use of its process to be made by parties, but that it will set aside and declare null all such fraudulent proceedings.

Then the question remains pure and simple: Does the priority of commencing suit in this court for the foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises give the court constructive possession of the property, so as to nullify the subsequent possession taken by the state court, the respective objects of the two suits being different? It is too well settled to admit of controversy, that where two courts have concurrent jurisdiction of a subject of controversy, the court which first assumes jurisdiction has it exclusive of the other. But where the objects of the suits are different, this rule does not apply, although the thing about or in reference to which the litigation is had is the same in both cases. Thus an action of debt on a bond, an action of ejectment on the mortgage given to secure it, and a bill in equity to foreclose the equity of redemption, may be pending at the same time unless prohibited by some statutory regulation. The land mortgaged may be seized in execution by the sheriff in an action at law, even while the ejectment or the bill to foreclose is pending. A bill to foreclose is a personal proceeding, although it has reference to a specific thing. Its object is to put an end to an existing equity, and to procure a sale of the mortgaged premises. Possession may be taken in the course of the proceeding, but until it is taken, can it be said that the property is sacred from the touch of other persons or courts? The present case, then, is resolved to this: Had the Fulton county court power to appoint a receiver, and place him in charge of the property, whilst a bill to foreclose was pending in this court; or was it an interference with the jurisdiction of this court? It is perfectly evident that the controversy before that court is a different one from the controversy before this court. There it is a question of the validity of a sale under execution, and of the possession given by the sheriff in pursuance thereof; and that question arises between the Atlanta & Richmond Railway Company and the assignee of the purchaser. Here it is a question of the rights of bondholders, under a mortgage given by the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company and the company, and arising between the bondholders and the company, and its officers and employes.

The controversy not being the same, nor the parties the same, there is no conflict of jurisdiction as to the question or cause. But, inasmuch as both controversies have ultimate respect to the possession of the railroad of the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, there has arisen a conflict of jurisdiction as to the thing or subject matter. It is important to know, therefore, whether this court had jurisdiction over the subject matter, namely, the railroad, when taken possession of by the receiver of the Fulton county court, so as to make that taking an invasion of the jurisdiction and powers of this court. If it had, it will enforce that jurisdiction and assume the actual possession to which it gives the right. If it had not, then it will not interfere with the actual possession of the receiver of that court, though the rights represented by the litigants in this court be superior to those of both litigants in the state court, as those rights can be asserted when the possession of the state court has ceased. The reason that it will not interfere in such case is, that interference might create a collision between the two courts, which would be unseemly and contrary to the comity which should exist between them. The two courts are coördinate in jurisdiction, neither being superior to the other, and both being charged in the respective cases before them with the due administration of the laws of the state of Georgia. The test I think is this: Not which action was first commenced, nor which cause of action has priority or superiority, but which court first acquired jurisdiction over the property. If the Fulton county court had the power to take possession when it did so, and did not invade the possession or jurisdiction of this court, its possession will not be interfered with by this court; the parties must either go to that court and pray for the removal of its hand, or having procured an adjudication of their rights in this court, must wait until the action of that court has been brought to a close, and judicial possession has ceased. Service of process gives jurisdiction over the person. Seizure gives jurisdiction over the property; and until it is seized, no matter when the suit was commenced, the court does not have jurisdiction. The alleged collusion and fraud of the parties cannot alter the case. It is a question between the two courts; and we must respect the possession and jurisdiction of the sister court. We cannot take the property out of its hands, unless it has first wrongfully taken it out of our hands. This, as we have shown, has not been done. The application for a writ of assistance and for an attachment must be denied.

Our views may be somewhat variant from those of Judge WOODS, as expressed by him when the receiver was appointed. That question was different from the one now before us, which relates to the powers of that receiver to interfere with the possession of a portion of the road, in the hands of another receiver. Our decision does not necessarily conflict with his order, although our views may differ from his as to the power of the receiver. And in differing from Judge WOODS, we do so with much respect for his opinion. The question must be admitted to be one of some nicety; but we prefer that course which avoids collision with a state court when it coincides with our own convictions as to the law.

The authorities on the subject have been somewhat carefully consulted, especially the

Case No. 17,776.

WILMER v. ATLANTA & R. AIR LINE RY. CO. et al.

[2 Woods, 447.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. Georgia. Sept. Term, 1875.

RAILROAD FORECLOSURES—BONDHOLDERS' BILL—PARTIES—DEFAULT IN INTEREST—JURISDICTION OF COURT—APPEAL BOND.

1. Where certain bondholders whose bonds were secured by a deed of trust filed in behalf of themselves and all other bondholders whose bonds were secured by the same deed, who chose to come in as complainants and bear their share of the expenses of the suit, a bill against the trustees named in the deed, to have the trust administered and the trust property sold and its proceeds distributed, and the other bondholders were numerous and some of them unknown: Held, that it was not a valid objection to the making of a decree in accordance with the prayer of the bill, that all the bondholders were not made actual parties; they might be allowed to come in as complainants, or might propound their claims before the master.

[Cited in McFadden v. May's Landing & E. H. C. R. Co., 49 N. J. Eq. 185, 22 Atl. 935.]

2. A trust deed, executed by a railroad company to secure bondholders, construed.

3. Where a railway is conveyed by a trust deed or mortgage to secure bonds, and it cannot be divided and sold in pieces without manifest injury to its value, the whole may be sold before the principal is due, on default in the payment of interest.

4. If two railroad corporations, created by different states, join in making a trust deed conveying their joint property to secure bonds issued by them jointly, and suit is brought to enforce the trust in the district where one of the corporations resides, and it is served with process, and the other corporation, being a non-resident of the state or district where the suit is brought, enters its appearance and files an answer jointly with the other, both will be bound by the decree of the court.

5. The Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company conveyed to trustees by a single deed all its line of road extending from Atlanta, Georgia, through South Carolina to Charlotte, North Carolina, to secure the payment of a series of bonds issued by the railway company, and the railroad was an indivisible and inseparable piece of property which could not be divided without injury to its value: Held, that the court had jurisdiction to decree that the trustees should sell the entire line of road, according to the terms of the trust, notwithstanding a large part of the road lay beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the court; and that a sale and deed under such decree would convey a good title to the whole property.

6. Penalty of bond for appeal fixed under rule 32 of the supreme court.

See Wilmer v. Atlanta & R. Air Line Ry. Co. [Case No. 17,775]. Before the final hearing, the receiver appointed by this court succeeded in obtaining possession of so much of the trust property as lay within the state of Georgia without the aid of the court. At the September term, 1875, the cause came on for final hearing before WOODS, Circuit Judge, upon the pleadings, evidence and report of the master. In the meantime, Mr. L. E. Bleckley, who was originally of counsel for complainants, had been appointed a judge of the supreme court of Georgia. His place was supplied by Mr. H. R. McCay.

Mr. McCay, A. T. Akerman, and O. A. Lochrane, for complainants, with whom appeared P. H. Butler, as of counsel.

H. H. Marshall, John Collier, and P. L. Mynatt, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The substance of the bill having been stated in the opinion given in this case upon the motion for the appointment of a receiver [Case No. 17,775], it is unnecessary here to recapitulate its averments. The company known as the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, and the same which is made defendant to the bill of complaint, answers the bill and admits the averments thereof as to the legislation of Georgia, South Carolina and North Carolina; admits the union of the said "Georgia Air Line Railroad Company" and "The Air Line Railroad Company in South Carolina," under the corporate name of the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, which is the name of this defendant, and that this defendant now possesses and has since said union possessed all the property of the said two railroad companies, including the line of road extending from Atlanta, in Georgia, to Charlotte, in North Carolina. The defendant company exhibits what it calls the "agreement of union or consolidation," and prays that it may be taken as a part of its answer. The answer of the defendant company also admits that, under the name of the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, it issued the bonds mentioned in the bill, and to secure the same, principal and interest, executed upon its entire property and line of road extending from Atlanta to Charlotte, the deed of trust mentioned in the bill of complaint, and a copy of which is appended thereto as an exhibit. The answer of the defendant company further admits the averments of the bill to the effect that "said railroad with all its appurtenances is in the nature of an entirety; that it constitutes one and a continuous line of railway from Atlanta to Charlotte; that its unity and continuity are the most important elements of its value, and that to separate it from its appurtenances, or those from it, or any part from any other part, would greatly impair the whole." Answers have been filed to the bill by the trustees, Austill and Lancaster, admitting generally its averments. An amendment has been filed to the bill making Samuel B. Hoyt, Wm. A. Russell, B. Y. Sage and T. S. Garner parties defendant, and making certain allegations and charges against them which it is unnecessary, particularly, to state. These new defendants have also answered the bill. The Richmond & Danville Railroad Company and the United States Security Company were also made defendants, and it was alleged that they claimed to have some lien upon the property of the defendant railroad company, but that the same was inferior to the lien of the complainants. A decree pro confesso has been taken against these last named defendants for want of an answer. At the March term, 1875, of this court, Julius M. Patton was appointed a special master to report, among other things, the number, character and description of the outstanding bonds of the defendant, the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, the amount of interest due on the same, the names of the present holders, and description of the bonds held by each. The master has filed his report, in which he states that 4,248 first mortgage bonds of $1,000 each were issued and negotiated by the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company. He reports that twenty-one of these bonds are held and owned by the complainants Wilmer and Richard, 4,095 by other persons, whose names and the number held by each he gives. All these bonds were presented to and counted by the master. On the first day of July, 1875, there was due for interest on the 4,116, so presented to and reported by the master, the sum of $658,565, not including any interest on the coupons due and unpaid. This report was filed on the 16th day of August, and has not been excepted to.

The complainants produce the original deed of trust, and the report of the master, and pray for a decree, declaring that by the true construction and intent of said deed of trust the trustees therein named have the right and power, and it is their duty under the facts set forth in the bill, to take possession of the entire trust property and sell the same for the purpose of paying off the principal as well as the interest of the bonds thereby secured, and that they may be compelled to execute said trust accordingly, and according to the directions of the deed of trust, by taking possession of and selling all the property covered thereby, at public outcry, in the city of Atlanta, for the purpose of paying off both the principal and interest of said bonds.

Objection is made to any such decree by the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, and other defendants.

1. It is objected that the decree moved for cannot be made until all the persons entitled to participate in the fund raised from the sale of the property are made parties to the proceedings, and that such persons so interested have not yet been made parties. The answer to the objection is found in the 84th equity rule, which provides: "Where the parties on either side are very numerous, and cannot, without manifest inconvenience and oppressive delays in the suit, be all brought before it, the court in its discretion may dispense with making them all parties, and may proceed in the suit, having sufficient parties before it to represent all the adverse interests of the plaintiffs and the defendants, in the suit properly before it. But in such case the decree shall be without prejudice to the rights and claims of the absent parties." This case is the very one provided for by this rule. Here are four thousand bonds payable to bearer, secured by the deed of trust, to enforce which is the purpose of the suit. Necessarily the parties interested in the fund to be recovered by a sale must be very numerous, and many of them must be unknown. To require all of them to be made actual parties, and in case of the death of any, that the suit should be revived in the name of the personal representative of the deceased party before any final decree could be rendered, would be to deny the bondholders any relief in this court. The course and practice of courts of equity are not so exacting and oppressive. The rule and the general equity practice provide that the case may proceed when the court has sufficient parties before it to represent all the adverse interests of the plaintiffs and defendants. There is no complaint here that any interest except that of the bondholders who are not parties is not represented. But the interests of all the bondholders are represented: 1st by those who are actual parties complainant; and 2d by the trustees of the trust deed who are made the defendants. The trustees were expressly appointed to represent the bondholders, and if the suit had been brought by them, it would not have been necessary to make all the bondholders complainants or defendants. The course is to file the bill in behalf of all who choose to come in as complainants and bear their share of the costs of the suit, or allow them to propound their claims and interest before the master. 2 Redf. R. R. 486; 2 Redf. Am. R. Cas. 692, 630; Campbell v. Railroad Co. [Case No. 2,366]. This has been the course pursued in this case, and I am clear that all the parties necessary to the decree asked are before the court.

2. The next objection to the decree prayed for is, that there can be no sale of the trust property or any part of it, to pay either the principal or interest of the bonds, until the year 1900, when the principal of all the bonds is due. One of the solicitors for the defendants, however, admits that there may be a decree for interest in default and a sale of so much of the property covered by the deed of trust as is necessary to pay the interest due, but insists that no more can be sold.

The terms of the deed of trust ought to be very clear to justify the court in holding that there could be no sale, even for interest, until the year 1900. Here are bonds to the amount of $4,248,000, bearing eight per cent. interest, payable semi-annually, and due as to principal in thirty years. The property covered by the deed of trust to secure these bonds is not estimated to have cost over $7,000,000. If no interest were paid until the maturity of the bonds, the principal and interest would then amount to over $20,000,000, calculating interest on the coupons as they mature. For this vast sum the bondholders would have a security on property which only cost $7,000,000. In the mean time, during nearly the life of a generation, the railway company would hold the money of the bondholders, and, although it had agreed to pay interest semi-annually, could refuse to comply with its contract, and the bondholder would be without any effectual remedy. I do not believe there is a railroad company so bold, as to ask a loan of money on a deed of trust which could bear such a construction, or a capitalist so foolish as to grant the loan.

There are certain expressions in the deed of trust which give some faint color to the theory under consideration, but there are other clauses which indicate a contrary purpose most unmistakably. The trust deed declares explicitly that, "should default be at any time made in the payment of any part, either of the accruing interest or of the principal sum secured to be paid by any bond or bonds issued under the authority aforesaid," the trustees shall take possession of the property mentioned in the deed of trust, and proceed to sell the same at public auction in the city of Atlanta, and shall apply the net proceeds of the sale in the payment of the interest due on the bonds, and to the extinguishment of the principal of such of the bonds as may then be due. It seems to me that this provision of the trust deed completely overturns the idea that there can be no proceeding for a sale of the trust property, or any part of it, until the maturity of the principal of the bonds. One of the solicitors of defendants, while not agreeing with the construction of that deed just noticed, insists that until the bonds mature there can only be a sale of so much of the trust property as may be necessary to discharge the interest due and unpaid. But in the view I take of the case it is unnecessary to pass upon this dispute. It is clear to my mind, and it is conceded by one of the solicitors for defendants, that there may be a sale of trust property sufficient to satisfy the interest due and unpaid.

On the other hand, complainants insist that a default in the payment of interest makes both principal and interest due, and that the court should order a sale for the whole amount of both principal and interest. Without going into a critical examination of the language of the deed of trust, I content myself with saying that it seems very clear that when the interest is in arrear, the trustees may sell the entire trust property. The trust deed seems to contemplate but one sale, and on such sale, a full and complete settlement of the trust.

Conceding, then, that there must be a sale to pay the interest due and unpaid, the question arises, Should there be a sale of the entire trust property, or only a part of it? I think this question is settled by the averment of the bill admitted by the answer of the defendant railroad company, and nowhere in the pleadings denied, that the railroad with its appurtenances is in the nature of an entirety, and constitutes one and a continuous line, and that its unity and continuity are the most important elements of its value, and that to separate any part from any other part would greatly impair the whole. This averment of the bill is not only admitted by the answer of the defendant company, but there is not a scrap of evidence in the record to show that it is not entirely true. And, as a general rule, it must be evident that to cut up a railroad and sell it piecemeal would destroy its value. While a sale of a particular part might be made, in some cases, without serious detriment to the part sold; yet from that fact, it would by no means follow that the residue would remain uninjured. That where a mortgage or deed of trust is given to secure the interest and principal of notes or bonds, and the mortgaged property cannot be sold in parts without injury to its value, the whole may be sold on default of the payment of interest before the principal is due, is sustained by the following authorities: Salman v. Clagett, 3 Bland, 125, and other cases there cited; Seaton v. Twyford, L. R. 11 Eq. 591; Dunham v. Railway Co., 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 254; Olcott v. Bynum, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 44; Pope v. Durant, 26 Iowa, 233.

Upon the case as presented, I am therefore of opinion, if any part of the road is sold, the whole may and should be sold. If a sale of the whole is made, it will be then time to consider what shall be done with the proceeds. That is a question which, it seems to me, does not, under the practice of courts of equity, present any grave difficulty.

It is objected to a sale of the whole property of the defendant railroad company that the property is owned by two distinct corporations, one of which, a resident of South Carolina, owns the property of the railroad in that state, and that there can be no merger of railroad corporations extending through several states which will so destroy their individuality as to confer on the united corporation all the franchises of the several parts; that a corporation cannot be chartered by two states so as to have a common individuality in both. The inference drawn from this proposition is, that this court can only order a sale of the railroad property in Georgia which is owned by the Georgia corporation, which alone is a party defendant to the bill, and that the court cannot order a sale of the property in South Carolina, which is owned by a distinct corporation which is not before the court. It would seem to be a sufficient reply to this proposition to say that the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Company has answered, admitting the union and consolidation of the two companies into one company, has contracted as one and not as two companies, has issued bonds and secured them by a deed of trust as one company, covering its entire line of road and property, and has agreed that the whole might be sold by one sale, at Atlanta, in the state of Georgia. Even if this proposition of defendant's solicitor were true, we think the facts would estop the South Carolina company from setting up its separate existence and separate property, and we think that it has, by the answer of the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Company, entered its appearance in this cause. But is it true that a corporation cannot be chartered by two states so as to make one and the same corporate body? When this case was up on motion for the appointment of a receiver, I passed upon this question, and held that two states might, by concurrent legislation, unite in creating the same corporate body. It is unnecessary to repeat what I then said. See Railroad Co. v. Maryland, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 376; Railroad Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 92.

Counsel for defendants refer to the following cases as establishing the doctrine upon which they rely: Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 286; Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 16 How. [57 U. S.] 325; Railway Co. v. Whitton, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 270; Tomlinson v. Branch, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 460; Railroad Co. v. Jackson, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 262; Delaware Railroad Tax Case, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 206. I have examined these cases and cannot find in them anything to overturn the positive declaration of the court in Railroad Co. v. Harris, supra. On the contrary, Delaware Railroad Tax Case, supra, strengthens the view of the court in that case. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company is one and the same corporation, both in Georgia and South Carolina, and that this one corporation is properly before the court.

But concede that there are two corporations under the name of the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, one created by and residing in Georgia, and the other created by and residing in South Carolina. It is made perfectly clear by the pleadings and evidence that these two corporations, if there be two, have joined under their common name in executing the bonds and deed of trust in the bill mentioned, over the common property of the two corporations. Now the Georgia corporation has been served with process and is before the court, and the South Carolina corporation has entered its appearance, and both the corporations have united in a common answer to the bill. The court, therefore, has jurisdiction over both; for while the South Carolina corporation, if it exists as a distinct corporate body, has the right to demand that it shall be sued only in the district where it resides or is found, it may waive this right and enter its appearance as a defendant in any district it pleases. Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 15 How. [56 U. S.] 242. It has appeared in this court in this cause as a defendant, and it therefore may be bound by its decree.

It is further insisted by the defendants' counsel that as a large part of the property covered by the deed of trust is beyond the territorial jurisdiction of this court, we are without power to order the sale. The paper executed by the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company is a deed of trust to trustees, conveying to them all the railway and other property of the company, with power to sell the whole at the city of Atlanta, in the state of Georgia, if default should be made in payment of interest or principal. Now it cannot be seriously contended that these trustees could not without the aid of this court, by following the direction of the deed of trust, have sold the entire line of the defendant company's road and have conveyed a good title to the whole, extending as it does from Atlanta to Charlotte. Is the power of the trustees any less, because this court has been asked to construe the deed of trust and to order them to execute the trust? If the trustees, under the direction of this court, sell the whole road, they do so by virtue of the power vested in them by the deed of trust. We are not asked to foreclose a mortgage. We are not asked to confer on the trustees any power which they do not already possess, by virtue of the deed of trust, or to impose upon them any new duties, but simply to tell them what their powers are under their deed, and require them to exercise their powers for the benefit of the cestui que trust. The complainants may, by reason of obstacles existing in the other states through which the railroad runs, be compelled to file ancillary bills in those states; nevertheless, I think it is proper and that this court has jurisdiction to order in this case a sale of the entire line of road.

I think what has just been said is an answer to the argument, that under the Code of Georgia, a mortgage can only be foreclosed when the entire principal or an installment of it is due. No foreclosure is asked here. The complainants seek only to exercise what they think to be their rights under the deed of trust, by a sale according to the terms of the trust deed. The conclusions I have reached are the following:

1. That the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, whether it is a single corporation or two corporations of that name, is properly before this court.

2. That it is the meaning of the deed of trust, that the road of the company, or so much as may be necessary, may be sold to pay interest coupons due and unpaid, without waiting for the maturity of the bonds.

3. That the road is an entirety and cannot be sold piecemeal without injury to the value of the road, and therefore the entire road may and should be sold.

4. That the trustees, by virtue of their power under the deed of trust can, by the direction of this court, sell the entire road lying in three states, and convey a good title to the whole.

5. That the trustees ought to be required to make the sale in accordance with the directions of the deed of trust.

6. When the proceeds of the sale are brought into the court, the court will direct how the residue, remaining after the payment of the interest due, shall be disposed of.

In accordance with the foregoing opinion, a decree was made by which there was a finding of the amount of interest due and unpaid, and the trustees were ordered to sell at Atlanta, Georgia, in the manner, and after the notice prescribed by the trust deed, the entire line of the defendant company's road, extending from Atlanta to Charlotte, North Carolina.

The Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company prayed an appeal from this decree to the supreme court of the United States, which was allowed, and the penalty of the appeal bond was fixed at $800,000. This sum was arrived at as follows: It was made to appear that the property conveyed by the deed of trust would not probably sell for more than the principal and interest owing upon the bonds at the date of the decree, and that the cause would remain pending in the supreme court at least two years before final hearing, and that the interest which would accrue upon the bonds during that time would amount to a little more than $798,000. Under rule 32 of the United States supreme court (6 Wall. [73 U. S.] v.), the penalty of the bond was therefore fixed at $800,000, and it was ordered that upon the execution by the appellant of a bond in that sum, with sureties to be approved by the clerk, the appeal should supersede the execution of the decree.

[The bottomry lien attaches from the date of the bond, although the ship, by reason of the default of the parties procuring the loan, never performs the voyage described in the bond, but undertakes a different voyage; and the principal of the loan may be recovered in an action in rem. after the completion of that voyage, and as against a claimant who purchased the ship with knowledge of the facts.]

The libel in this cause was founded on a bottomry bond for two thousand dollars, hazarded on a specified voyage, which voyage was never performed; but instead thereof, the vessel performed a different voyage, and was afterwards sold by Smith (who executed the bottomry) to Grace, the claimant, who alleged himself to be a bona fide purchaser, claiming an exemption from the bottomry, on two grounds—1st, that the bottomry never attached; and, 2dly, if it did attach, that the remedy thereon could not be pursued in rem. after an intermediate voyage, to injure a fair purchaser. The claimant wholly failed in the proof of his being a fair purchaser: indeed the evidence produced, afforded strong ground to presume that the sale set up was nominal and fraudulent; but his counsel strongly pressed the opinion that the bottomry never attached, as the contemplated risk was never run, and especially if it did, that not pursuing the remedy in time, that is, when the vessel returned to port, but permitting her to go a second voyage it could not now be pursued—there was no question raised as to maritime interest.

BY THE COURT. Your argument amounts to this—that if a mortgagee, does not instantly on his debt falling due, take possession of the mortgaged premises, he loses his security. The hypothecation of a ship by the maritime law, is on the same footing as a mortgage of chattels on land is by the common law. And the plain distinction in cases of this kind, is between liens arising by implication of law, and those which result from express pledge: the former may be lost by parting with possession, on which they depend, or evidence of other equivalent circumstances, but the latter depend on very different rules. The bottomry stipulates, that the vessel shall, with all convenient speed, proceed upon the voyage on which the money was taken up, and if lost during that voyage, that the obligee shall lose his money. The objection that the bottomry did not attach is founded upon the defendant's own allegation, of the breach of his own contract and duty. I cannot conceive that that circumstance can alter the nature of the contract. It was originally a contract of bottomry, or it was not. If it was, the act of one of the parties, cannot alter its nature. The written contract is plainly a contract of bottomry; and it can never be permitted to a defendant, to rely upon his own default, to injure the rights and diminish the security of a fair creditor.

The libellant's counsel considering this case, like the case of an insurance, which does not attach where the contemplated risk has not been run, again pressed it on the court. I did not see sufficient cause to change my opinion. On mature deliberation and revision of that opinion, I can see no reason to think it erroneous. The contract of bottomry, has probably been in use from the earliest periods of foreign commerce, and its long recognition stands in the place of all reason, as it respects public policy. In questions resulting from that contract, as constituting the ius pignus vel hypotheca, the interest of individuals is more to be regarded than that of the public. And it is not to be doubted, that he who takes upon himself the hazard of loss for the benefit of another, will adopt the best method of securing himself, and look to all the securities the law allows, and in aid of that personal responsibility and sufficiency which the law creates by the very act of a loan, will rely on the thing. "Quia plus cautionis in re est, quam in persona." Dig. c. 106. The contract of bottomry may be either for a limited time, or upon a whole voyage; and in both, the lender has the same securities, to wit, the person of the borrower, and the thing on which it is loaned: and runs the same risk, to wit, a total loss, if his money is effectually hazarded. I say effectually, for it must be out of his own separate power to recall the hazard and rescind the contract; and I hold it to be effectually hazarded when the contract is once completed, and the employment of the money depends upon the sole volition of the borrower.

The general analogy between this species of contract and that of insurance is very striking, but there are some differences very material to be attended to. The insurer parts with no funds or property until the misfortune arrives. The lender on bottomry deprives himself of his funds and property from the moment of the contract, and risks their entire and total loss—he hazards his money too, to a person who by the application to borrow on bottomry, announces a decline or embarrassment of his affairs. The contract of insurance by its terms imports, that the obligation on the underwriters to make good a loss arises only when that loss happens. The contract of bottomry, on the other hand, implies an immediate pledge and security defeasible upon a future event; the first is a personal contract simply—the latter a contract of pledge, as well as personal security; in cases, therefore, between the insurer and the lender upon bottomry, the latter is preferred. There has not been, to my knowledge, any judicial decision upon the immediate question whether a bottomry in such a case attaches. Nor can I find such a question ever stirred by English elementary writers. A strong evidence that the objection is not solid, since the very term "bottomry" imports hypothecation by the maritime law; but there is much stronger evidence than any which results from the silence of jurists, to be drawn from principles which must be admitted to apply between insurers and lenders upon bottomry. I will suppose in this case for a moment, that the brig Smilax was insured for the voyage she actually sailed; and that upon her return voyage she was so materially injured by perils of the sea as to warrant an abandonment to underwriters as for a total loss, and a contest arose between the lender on bottomry, who should have the benefit of the salvage goods. If the insurer, in this case, must give way, I think it will not be contended that the owner can stand against the bottomry creditor. That the insurer in such case, is to be postponed to the creditor on bottomry, is I think, very clear. By an abandonment, the insurer is placed in the situation of the insured whom he represents, and can have no greater right than the insured had. The lender upon bottomry loses remedy only when the ship, &c. is wholly lost; and where a part is preserved, they are esteemed as his proper goods, being presumed to be the product of his money. He therefore takes preference of the insurer. See 1 Valin, Comm. 262, iii. But in this case it is admitted, that if the voyage on which the money was intended to be hazarded, was not proceeded on, it resulted from the voluntary determination of the borrower. It cannot be denied, that when he undertook to perform that voyage, he virtually promised not to go on another, or exercise the lender's hazard. Good faith and common honesty required, at least, that he should not do any act to injure the lender, or increase his risks. The lender on bottomry looks for this integrity, and to the security so pledged. He is deceived in the honesty of the borrower, who may be insolvent, and upon that failure to discharge a moral duty, is attempted to be bottomed a principle which shall go to the further length of depriving the creditor of his security, on which he must be supposed principally to have relied. Thus by fraud, in the only act in his power, a foundation is laid to erect a more extended superstructure of iniquity, that the fraud which cannot be directly perpetrated, may nevertheless form a legal stock, on which to engraft other frauds, and produce more extensive injuries. Is there any case, or principle, or opinion, in any system of law, which will warrant a claim of protection, founded on an admitted violation of duty? Can there be any colour for such doctrine in a court of equity, and against a fair and equitable creditor?

Does the underwriter, or the lender upon bottomry insure the honesty of the man with whom he deals, or does the law hold out a temptation to him to commit iniquity that he may reap its fruits? The only hazard or peril which the insurer or lender upon bottomry runs, is the perils of the sea. They are answerable for no act of fraud or misconduct of the insured on the borrower. If they were at any time to be so affected, I can see no reason why at every period of the voyage they should not equally be affected. The true rule is, that the lender upon bottomry loses all remedy, if the vessel does not return to port, by perils of the sea, &c. or is lost without the fraud or fault of the owner. If a declining to proceed on the stipulated voyage at all destroys the hypothecary right of the lender, it would equally be destroyed, if when she performed one half of the voyage, the borrower changed her route and destination, for in such case the whole risk, according to arguments of the claimant's counsel, was not run; and the same reason would apply with equal force, in any case where the route was changed by the misconduct of the borrower, as carrying enemies' goods, being captured, taken out of her course, &c. or in any similar case. That the lender on bottomry has his remedy from the time of his contract, is not only proved by general principles—by the decisions that the borrower cannot insure his interest—that the lender may insure his principal—but by express decisions on the point.

On the 5th of September, 1754, Captain Candole borrowed of Mr. Barratier one thousand livres on bottomry of the polacre St. Estienne, giving his brother Francis Candole security for a voyage to the Levant, at the interest of ten pounds per cent. for six months, and so pro rata until her return, not exceeding three years. After navigating one year, the captain died at land, and the command of the vessel devolved on Faudon, his mate. In January, 1756, the vessel arrived at Cypress, the 20th of the same month, the crew presented a request to the French consul that the vessel might be examined, offering to re-embark if she was judged navigable. The examiners reported, that the vessel might sail many years, if refitted: the expense of a proper refit was estimated at from eleven to twelve hundred piastres. On the 23d, the consul ordered Faudon to proceed without delay to repair his vessel—he remonstrated that he had no money—the consul renewed his order. On the 3d of February, Faudon not being able to obtain the money necessary for repairing the vessel, declared that he abandoned the vessel to be sold by the consul, for the most advantage, to those interested. In consequence, the consul sold the vessel for nine hundred piastres, out of which he paid the crew. The purchaser refitted the vessel and employed her in commerce. On the 22d of June, 1756, the assignee of Barratier, the lender of bottomry, brought a suit against the heir of Captain Candole and his security, for the whole sum lent, together with the maritime interest up to the time of the sale. The defendant alleged that the vessel being unnavigable, the plaintiff could only recover the amount of sales, deducting the amount of wages, &c. The plaintiff replied, that the vessel was not found wholly unfit for sea, but only required repairs; and that if the captain had not found money to refit, it was a matter which concerned them only, and not the lender on bottomry or insurers. Upon this statement of facts, the admiralty of Marseilles, on the 19th of July, decreed for the whole sum lent, and the whole maritime interest.

This case is very peculiar—the length of time the vessel had been employed in navigation afforded strong presumption that the reparation which had become necessary was from the ordinary perils of the ocean. The original captain was dead; the substitute was at a very remote place, out of all probable correspondence with his owner—where credit might naturally be supposed difficult to obtain—and where there was no imputation of fraud or wilful misconduct. But it was a duty imposed by law on ship-owners who take up money on bottomry, or insure them, to keep them sea-worthy, from port to port. Going to sea when not properly provided, is an increase of the risk of the lender or insurer, which the owner has no right to produce. And, says Valin, in observing on this case, I have no doubt of the correctness of the judgment upon the facts stated. Such excuses are always suspicious; but if the insufficiency of the ship really arose from perils of the sea and was fully proved, it would justify the defendant.

Let this decision, and the facts on which it rest, be compared with the case before the court, and who will say that there is a pretext to support the claimant's defence? On this point Zouch is explicit (Elem. 398): "Item quæsitum est an fœnoris nautici præstatio evitanda sit, cum navigatio impedita est, culpa nautæ debitoris? Responsum. Quod ex præcipite debitoris audacia contingebat; creditori ascribi, publici juris rationem non permittere." And this is a consequence drawn from a rule of maritime law, derived from the civil law, which is a full answer to every argument of the risk not having been run, in consequence of the voluntary change of the voyage by Smith. "De conventionem præstandi periculi quæritur, an id damnum præstandum sit, quod cui culpa sua contingit? Et visum quod qui navigationis periculum in se suscepit, intellegitur periculum quod casu, non quod culpa domini contingit in se suscipere." Z. B. 428. So in case of freight unladen before the voyage commenced. These principles are so strongly supported by all the considerations of equity, justice and moral rectitude, that I should reluctantly embrace a contrary rule—I feel very confident in their legal correctness, but even laying them out of the case, I think there is enough to support the decree.

The only ground taken to deprive the libellant of his lien, is, as before noticed, that the risk contemplated was not run. The evidence upon which the argument rests will not, on strict legal principles, warrant the inference deduced—What is the contract? The libellant loans to the owner of the Smilax, for her outfit to sea, the sum of two thousand dollars, on two conditions—one, that she shall with all convenient dispatch proceed to sea upon a specified voyage; and the other, that if lost in the prosecution of that voyage, the money loaned is not to be reimbursed.

The contract of pawning, or pledging, by way of bottomry, must necessarily precede the right to take possession of the ship, since that relates to future acts and events, which must take place before the ship can be seized or taken possession of. The right to exercise the power of reducing into possession, is necessarily contingent, but the right is not the less perfect when the contingency happens; the vessel must therefore be considered as mortgaged and bound from the date of the bottomry bond, to take effect in possession, like any other contingent interest, when the contingency happens. It is an interest which he might lawfully insure, and would not be open to the objections of a wagering policy—I speak of the principal sum only. If the vessel had duly proceeded upon the stipulated voyage and performed it, it is not doubted but the libellant's claim would be sustainable. I cannot conceive a reasonable ground of discrimination between a case, where a right is admitted upon the happening of two contingencies upon which it is limited to take effect, and the case of a right limited to take effect upon the happening of one, out of two alternative events, on which it is limited to take effect, and which is the case before the court. The lender only authorized his money to be put at hazard upon a particular voyage, in the event that that voyage was proceeded upon with all convenient dispatch; but she did not proceed agreeably to the contract, on that voyage, but prosecuted another and different voyage. The right of the lender then, by the terms of the contract, to call for his money back, was complete the moment the vessel sailed upon the new voyage. But from the moment of the loan, until the time the vessel commenced her new voyage, the money was risked by the lender, and at least during that time, being at hazard, it was embraced by the contract.

It is to be remembered, that this opinion is applicable to the case of a libellant claiming a return of his loan, and does in no shape involve the consideration of the question of interest, or the power of this court to moderate maritime interest—agreeably to the circumstances, and in proportion to the actual hazard incurred by the lender.

HALL, District Judge. The application of the bankrupt for his final discharge, presented this day, Oct. 19, 1868, bears date on the 15th inst., and sets forth that the applicant was duly adjudged a bankrupt on the 29th day of September, 1867. The motion for the usual order of the creditors of the bankrupt, and all others in interest, to appear and show cause against such discharge, was made ex parte; and, without any opposition or argument upon the question, the court is called upon to decide whether it is proper to grant the order upon an application made after the expiration of one year from the adjudication in bankruptcy. The right of a bankrupt to apply for and obtain a discharge is expressly given by the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and it must rest entirely upon the provisions of the statute. The act provides: "That at any time after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, or if no debts have been proved against the bankrupt, or if no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, at any time after the expiration of sixty days, and within one year from the adjudication of bankruptcy, the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge from his debts," &c. This provision would seem to require that the application for a discharge should be made within the year after the adjudication in bankruptcy, and such is the interpretation given to it by Avery and Hobbs in their work on Bankruptcy (page 210), where they say: "The bankrupt must apply for his discharge within one year from the date of the adjudication in bankruptcy." The order to show cause will not be made upon the present motion, but it may be renewed if the bankrupt's counsel can furnish authority for a different decision.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT—DISCHARGE.

The court will not, on motion, discharge a prisoner for debt, who has the benefit of the bounds, because the creditor refuses to pay the daily allowance.

Motion by Mr. E. J. Lee, for W. Wilson, to order the marshal to discharge him from the prison-bounds, the creditor having failed to furnish him with his daily allowance, according to the act of congress of 3d March, 1803, § 5 (2 Stat. 237). The allowance was demanded by the marshal on the 25th of June, 1810, and refused. The daily allowance for prisoners in execution for debt, was fixed by a general order of the court, on the 13th of June, 1803.

THE COURT refused to make such an order for the discharge of Mr. Wilson in this summary way, because if he has a right to depart the prison-bounds he is at liberty so to do; if he has not, the order of the court would not justify the marshal in discharging him.

BANKRUPTCY—SUSPENSION OF PAYMENT—SINGLE NOTE—SOLVENCY—PRIMA FACIE CASE.

1. The non-payment by a merchant for fourteen days, without legal excuse, of a single piece of commercial paper, is an act of bankruptcy, without reference to whether he is actually insolvent.

[Cited in Marble v. Jamesville Manuf'g Co., 163 Mass. 171, 39 N. E. 1002.]

2. It is no answer to a petition in bankruptcy that the respondent is solvent, and the only justification for non-payment of commercial paper is a legal one, as that he was not liable upon it.

3. One of the objects of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] was to compel merchants to pay their commercial paper as it fell due, under penalty of being adjudged bankrupt, if non-payment was continued without legal excuse for fourteen days.

4. In an involuntary petition it is not necessary to negative all the circumstances which might excuse the non-payment. For a rule to show cause it is sufficient that a prima facie case be made. And where the petition alleged that the debtor had suspended payment on his commercial paper for more than fourteen days and had not yet paid the same, that he was a merchant, and that the petitioners knew of no reason for the non-payment except the neglect or inability of the debtor, held, it was prima facie an act of bankruptcy.

[Cited in Re Hadley, Case No. 5,894.]

In bankruptcy. Petition for review.

The original proceeding was a petition in bankruptcy filed by P. Vanvalkenburg & Co. against Guy Wilson, a merchant doing business in Chicago, alleging as an act of bankruptcy, that on the 2d of June, 1873, he suspended payment of his commercial paper, and had not resumed payment of the same within a period of fourteen days thereafter, nor at any time since. The commercial paper referred to was a promissory note for $509.79, due June 2, 1873, and held by petitioners. The petitioners stated that they knew of no cause for the non-payment of this note except neglect or inability of the said Wilson. The affidavit accompanying the petition did not show any other act of bankruptcy, or that the respondent was actually insolvent.

On this petition the district judge made the following order:

"There being no sufficient evidence of actual insolvency, I do not deem it proper to enter a rule to show cause on this petition. I hold that suspension of payment for fourteen days on a single piece of paper does not alone show insolvency. Petition dismissed." [Case unreported.]

The petitioners thereupon filed this petition for review.

McClellan & Hodges, for petitioners.

The application for the rule is ex parte, and the only question for the court to pass upon is, are the petition and accompanying depositions in due form, and do they properly allege an act of bankruptcy?

All matters of defense or in explanation can only be offered by the debtor in response to the rule, and any possible excuse the debtor may have need not be anticipated and negatived by petitioner, and the suspension of a single piece of commercial paper by a merchant, and non-resumption for a period of fourteen days, is prima facie an act of bankruptcy. *Katzenberg v. DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. The 39th section of the bankrupt law as amended by the act of July 14, 1870 [16 Stat. 276], declares that any one who "being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner, has fraudulently stopped payment, or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days," has committed an act of bankruptcy, and may be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors.

The 39th section sets forth various acts which constitute bankruptcy, one clause of which has just been cited. There was a difference among judges as to the true construction of the original clause of the 39th section, and to remove this doubt it was amended by the act of 1870, and the question is now presented whether the petition brings the parties, both creditor and debtor, within this amended clause of the 39th section.

It has in several cases been stated that there may be a suspension of payment of commercial paper for a period of fourteen days, which does not of itself constitute an act of bankruptcy. For instance, the paper may not be valid, or there may be a set-off against it; or, from some cause, the party may not be legally bound to pay it. In such cases the courts have held that the suspension of payment does not constitute an act of bankruptcy, because in point of fact there is actually no indebtedness, or if there is, it is offset by an indebtedness on the other side, so that there is no legal obligation to pay.³

The ground upon which the district judge decided the case was that the fact of one piece of commercial paper being unpaid was no sufficient proof of insolvency. The question then arises, whether on that ground can be based the refusal of a rule to show cause.

The point, it will be observed, is, whether a party has, prima facie upon the papers as they appear, committed an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the 39th section, and whether insolvency is an indispensable element entering into and constituting the act of bankruptcy. I think it is not.

The real question is, whether, being a merchant or trader, he has suspended payment of his commercial paper for fourteen days, within the meaning of the law. Of the various acts which the 39th section declares to constitute acts of bankruptcy, most of them do not refer to insolvency at all. For instance, the departure from the state, district or territory of which the debtor is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors, is an act of bankruptcy. Where a debtor conceals himself to avoid the service of legal process in an action for the recovery of a debt or demand provable under the bankrupt act, he commits an act of bankruptcy. The concealing or removing any of his property to avoid its being attached, taken, or sequestered on legal process, is an act of bankruptcy. So with many other acts declared to constitute bankruptcy, as where the debtor has been actually imprisoned for more than seven days in a civil action founded on a contract for the sum of one hundred dollars or upward. In all these cases insolvency is not an element.

Then comes the further definition which the district judge has apparently applied by analogy to the particular circumstances of this case: "Or who being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, shall make any gift, grant, sale, conveyance," etc.

Some of the courts have intimated that "suspension of payment" means a general suspension of payment, and not the suspension of payment of a single piece of commercial paper; and it is in carrying out that view that the district judge has held there must be an allegation of insolvency.⁴ But the question is, whether it is competent for a man, being a merchant, to suspend payment of any of his commercial paper and bid a creditor defiance, and then to turn round and allege in answer to an application to declare him a bankrupt, that he is solvent and therefore a proceeding in bankruptcy can not be instituted against him.

I hold that allegation to be no answer to a petition in bankruptcy under such circumstances. It is not enough for him to show as a reason why a decree in bankruptcy should not go against him, that he is solvent, and because of spite or caprice, or some other similar cause, he does not choose to pay his commercial paper. The reason which alone can prevent the non-payment of commercial paper and its continuance for fourteen days, from constituting an act of bankruptcy, must be a legal reason, such as to enable a court to say that it is not within the scope and meaning of the bankrupt law, because the debtor was legally justified in not making payment.

Upon the face of this petition no legal reason appears for the non-payment of this commercial paper within fourteen days after maturity, and the petitioners say they know of none. If there is any legal reason, it is for the debtor to show it before the bankrupt court. Prima facie a case is made out against the respondent, and the question of solvency or insolvency is not material.

A solvent merchant cannot, therefore, refuse to pay his commercial paper, and then defend himself from a petition in bankruptcy on the ground that he is solvent. One of the very objects of the bankrupt law was to compel merchants to pay their commercial paper as it fell due, by holding over them the consequences of its non-payment, if continued for fourteen days.

Possibly there should be a different rule, because if a man is solvent he can be proceeded against in the ordinary way, but the bankrupt law has not so provided. Insolvency does not constitute an element of the act of bankruptcy in this case, as it does not in most of the cases set forth in the 39th section.

If it be said that we can suppose a suspension of payment of commercial paper for fourteen days which does not constitute an act of bankruptcy, the answer is that it is not possible for the petitioner to recapitulate all the various circumstances which might negative any supposed case, and thereby exclude it from the operation of the bankrupt law.

The district judge has required an allegation of insolvency. Something else might be required to be negatively set forth in the petition, which, if it existed in point of fact, would show that the act was not one of bankruptcy.

We cannot, therefore, require that the petitioner should set forth by negative allegations, all the particular circumstances which by possibility might show the non-payment to be within the meaning of this clause of the bankrupt law. It is sufficient that a prima facie case is made upon the petition.

It is for the debtor to make explanation or defense.

Again, if it be said that the non-payment for the given period must be a "general" suspension, where is the line to be drawn? On how many pieces of commercial paper must payment be suspended in order to constitute an act of bankruptcy? The statute has not declared that suspension of payment on any particular number of notes or bills of exchange shall constitute an act of bankruptcy, but the language is, "his commercial paper," and it will be found impracticable to adopt a rule which limits the non-payment to some certain number of notes or bills of exchange in order to constitute an act of bankruptcy.

For these reasons I think the order of the district judge was erroneous and must be reversed; and that the petitioners are entitled to a rule to show cause.

By section 12 of the amendment to the bankrupt act passed June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 178], section 39 of the original act is so changed as to require a suspension of payment of commercial paper forty days to constitute an act of bankruptcy.

BANKRUPTCY — MANUFACTURERS — ACT OF BANKRUPTCY — PAYMENT OF WAGES.

1. The publishers of a daily paper and proprietors of a book and job printing office are manufacturers, within the meaning of the bankrupt act.

2. Payment of wages to employes, though made in the regular course of business, is an act of bankruptcy if done in contemplation of insolvency; for although the law prefers an employe to the amount of fifty dollars, this preference must be secured by and through the proceedings in bankruptcy, and not outside of them, or independent of and in spite of the act. The negotiable paper of a firm of manufacturers is commercial paper within the meaning of the act, regardless of the purpose for which it was given.

The question before the court arises upon two separate demurrers filed by said several alleged bankrupts to the said petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against them.

The said petitioner, among other things, alleges that said firm are publishers of a daily paper in Salt Lake City, in said territory, known as the "Salt Lake Daily Review," and have also conducted a book and job printing office connected therewith, in which are manufactured cards, notes, billheads, blank books, posters, show bills, and other articles, &c.; that said firm, within six months, to wit, on the twenty-sixth of December, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, in said territory, being manufacturers, have suspended and have not resumed payment of their commercial paper within a period of fourteen days, which paper is therein set forth; and that being in contemplation of insolvency said Kenyon executed a mortgage or transferred all his right, title and interest in the business, material, effects and assets of the said Daily Review and the said job office to said Fenton, with the intent to delay the operation of said bankrupt act; and that being in contemplation of insolvency, and within six calendar months, to wit, on the seventeenth day of November, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, and at sundry other times since then, made payments of money to sundry persons therein named, with the intent to give a preference to their creditors; and that within six calendar months, to wit, on the second day of November, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, the said firm being manufacturers, suspended, and have not resumed payment of their commercial paper within a period of fourteen days, therein describing the same and showing it to be negotiable paper.

The said demurrers substantially charge that said petition is not sufficient in law, and in this: First. It does not aver that the alleged bankrupts are manufacturers within the meaning of the bankrupt act. Second. It does not aver that the notes mentioned in said petition were the commercial paper of said bankrupts nor that they were made in the course of their trade as manufacturers within the meaning of said act. Third. There is not a sufficient allegation that said mortgage, and the said payments made by said bankrupts, were made with the intent to prefer any of their creditors. Fourth. That there is no allegation that said mortgage and payments were made in the contemplation of bankruptcy, etc. Fifth. That there are not sufficient facts alleged to entitle the petitioner to the relief prayed for under the said act.

Charles G. Loeber, for Kenyon.
D. Cooper, for Fenton.
James L. High, petitioner, pro se.

McKEAN, C. J. The respondents must be regarded as manufacturers, and the promissory notes set forth in the petition as their commercial paper. The petition contains all necessary averments, and, therefore, the demurrers should be overruled.

HAWLEY, J. To understand the questions raised by said demurrers, it becomes necessary to enquire into the nature and extent of the character of a manufacturer and trader within the meaning of the bankrupt act. The character of a trader embraces a wide field of operation. It is of no consequence in what one may trade, the only question is, does he buy and sell articles which are subject to trade and commerce? In re Cowles [Case No. 3,297]. Selling horses or other stock or the products of a farmer does not constitute him a trader within the meaning of the act. But if a farmer buys horses or other stock or products of a farm to sell again, and this constitutes a part of his business, he then becomes a trader, and subjects himself to this provision of the bankrupt act. In re Chandler [Case No. 2,591]. The term "manufacturer," under the bankrupt act, has a legal meaning; and this legal meaning must be governed by legal rules. It is true, that every one who manufactures, is not to be embraced within the legal phrase. A farmer is not to be considered a manufacturer in the commercial sense, when he confines his business to the manufacture of the milk of his cows into butter and cheese; nor when he converts the products of his farm into beef and pork. But it does not follow, that when he makes it a part of his business to buy milk and manufacture the same into butter and cheese, or to purchase the products of other farms and other stock than those of his own, and manufactures the same into beef and pork, that he is not a manufacturer within the meaning of the act. When the manufacturing becomes the principal part of even a farmer's business, which requires him to buy articles or products and to manufacture them for sale, he thereby becomes a manufacturer and trader within the meaning of the act. A buyer of leather, who makes it his business, or a part of his business to manufacture the same into boots and shoes, or harness, and sells the same, though he be a nursery-man or a gardener or a farmer, is a manufacturer and a trader within the meaning of the act. If other construction than this should be given to the act, the spirit and letter of the same could be destroyed by assumptions the most frivolous as well as those the most false. If it should be admitted that the publishers of a weekly or daily paper were not manufacturers within the meaning of the act, yet if they should buy paper, ink, and other material, and make the same into cards or billheads, or blanks and blank books, and conduct a business of this kind, as in this case it is averred the bankrupts have done, they are manufacturers and traders within the meaning of the act; for these articles so manufactured are not necessary parts of the business of publishing a newspaper. The petitioner avers that said alleged bankrupts are publishers of said newspaper, and manufacturers of books, cards, billheads, etc. Though it is not necessary to decide that the printing and publishing of a daily newspaper is manufacturing in the strict sense of the law, yet my brother judges have expressed the opinion it would be, and I am inclined to the same conviction. A newspaper publication is as much the result of manufacture as that of books or cards or billheads. To make a distinction between them, when in fact there is no distinction, would seem to be an utter disregard of the objects as well as the legal intentment of the law; for they buy, manufacture, and sell.

The second cause of demurrer, to wit, that there is no allegation that said notes set forth were the commercial paper of the said firm, certainly has no foundation; for the averment of the petitioner is explicit that said firm within six calendar months, to wit, on the second day of November, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, being manufacturers as aforesaid, suspended, and have not resumed payment of their commercial paper within a period of fourteen days. This allegation is in the language prescribed by the thirty-ninth section, and fully sets forth the making and suspension and non-resumption of their commercial paper for a period of fourteen days. What other or further averment is necessary is not comprehended, and we must therefore hold this averment sufficient.

The third cause of demurrer in part is that the averment that said Kenyon mortgaged his said interest in the property named to his co-partner, Fenton, who is made a party defendant in the proceedings in bankruptcy, with the intent to prefer his said partner, seems to be well taken; for a transfer of one partner to another, of a firm, is not such a transfer that puts the property out of the firm in the strict sense. The removal of the property by mortgage out of the hands of one and into the possession and ownership of the other partner does not remove the same in legal contemplation from liability to the firm's creditors. But the other clause of this specification, that said payments were made by said firm within six calendar months with intent to prefer creditors, is a sufficient charge under the act. Therefore, this cause of demurrer, being good only in part, and not obnoxious to the petition in another material point, it cannot be sustained. The fact that said payments were made to the employes of said firm, in their said business, while other employes, with the petitioner, were not paid, does not relieve against this act, or cause for proceedings in bankruptcy against them. They have no right to prefer one of their employes against the rights of other creditors, whether employes or otherwise. The law prefers an employe to the amount of fifty dollars, but this preference must be secured, if at all, by and through the proceedings in bankruptcy, and not outside of them, or independent of, and in spite of the act. Whenever a person or a firm find they are unable to pay his or their debts in full, or his or their commercial paper at maturity, it is his or their duty to apply to the court in due form of law under the bankrupt act, to distribute his or their assets among his or their creditors equally, without other preference than the said act provides.

But counsel insist that, because the petitioner has embraced certain elements of section thirty-five with those of section thirty-nine of the act, therefore his petition in these respects is obnoxious to the demurrer. The petitioner manifestly has a right so to do. These two sections must, as they uniformly have been, be construed by the courts together: for in effect section thirty-five so provides, as follows: "And if any person, being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, within six months before the filing of the petition by or against him, makes any payment, sale, assignment, transfer, conveyance, or other disposition of any part of his property to any person who then has reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, or acting in contemplation of insolvency, and that such payment, sale, assignment," etc., "is made to prevent the same from being distributed under this act, or to defeat the object of, or in any way impair, hinder, impede or delay the operation and effect of, or to evade any of the provisions of this act," etc., the same "shall be void," etc. The thirty-ninth section provides "that any person residing," etc., "and owing debts," etc., "being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, shall make any payment, gift, grant, sale, conveyance or transfer of money or other property, estate, rights or credits, or give any warrant to confess judgment, or procured or suffered his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors, or to any person or persons who are or may be liable for him as endorser, bail, surety or otherwise, or with the intent, by such disposition of his property, to defeat or delay the operation of this act; or who, being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner, has fraudulently stopped payment, or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy," etc. From the recital of these parts of the said two sections, it is manifest that they must be construed together, particularly in proceedings in voluntary bankruptcy. To decide otherwise would be a violation of the letter as well as the spirit of the act.

The fourth cause of demurrer assigned that there is no sufficient allegation that the said payments were made in contemplation of insolvency, with intent to give a preference, etc., cannot be sustained; for the averments in the petition are that the said firm, within the period of six calendar months, within said territory, to wit, on the seventeenth day of November, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, being in contemplation of insolvency with intent to give preference, did make payments to sundry persons (naming them) and at sundry other times therein named, within said territory, and also averring that they were manufacturers, etc. A more specific compliance with the provisions of the act could not be made than is made by the petitioner.

The fifth cause of demurrer is a general one and goes to the whole petition; it, therefore, follows, from what has already been said, that it cannot be sustained.

The assertion by counsel that the notes in said petition set forth were given by said firm as publishers of said daily paper, and not as manufacturers as aforesaid, is not borne out by the allegation and averments in said petition contained. The petitioner avers that the said firm were manufacturers of books, blank books, cards, billheads, etc., as well as publishers of said paper, and also avers that said firm made said notes and delivered them, etc.; that is, they put them in circulation as commercial paper. Thereby the same became their commercial paper under the act and under the law merchant, and cannot be restricted in its character by the appliance of a technical construction such as counsel have sought to give it. Whether it was uttered by said firm as the publishers of said daily paper, or as manufacturers of books, blank books, cards, billheads, etc., it matters not, for the same being negotiable and put into circulation, either as publishers as aforesaid or as manufacturers as aforesaid, or as publishers and manufacturers as aforesaid, it becomes their commercial paper within the meaning of the bankrupt act, as well as under the law merchant. A more restricted construction would be an utter disregard of the spirit and letter of the law, and do violence to the best interests of the business community. In re Chandler [Case No. 2,591]; In re Nickodemus [Case No. 10,254]; In re Hollis [Case No. 6,621]. The term "commercial paper," within the meaning of the bankrupt act, includes negotiable notes, bills of exchange, negotiable bank checks, certificates of deposit used in commercial transactions known as the "law merchant." In this sense congress used the term in the act, and not in the restricted sense of counsel in the argument of this case. By usage and by statute, negotiable paper is to be regulated by custom and the law merchant. If a "banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner" allows his paper to go to protest and suspends payment for fourteen days, or if he has fraudulently stopped payment, in either case he has committed an act of bankruptcy. A fraudulent stoppage of payment is an act of bankruptcy, and his creditors may proceed against him at once, without waiting fourteen days. But when there is only stoppage or suspension of payment, without fraud, then the same must continue without resumption, fourteen days before the act of bankruptcy is complete. This provision in the thirty-ninth section is so clear that it seems strange that counsel should insist upon a different construction. In re Jersey City Window-Glass Co. [Case No. 7,292]; In re Ballard [Case No. 816]; In re Lowenstein [Case No. 8,574]; Doan v. Compton [Case No. 3,940]; Davis v. Armstrong [Case No. 3,624]; Heinsheimer v. Shea [Case No. 6,328]; In re Hollis [Case No. 6,621]. Paper not given in the ordinary course of the business of a banker, merchant, manufacturer, trader or miner, it has been held, is not commercial paper within the meaning of the act. In re Lowenstein [Case No. 8,574]; In re McDermott Patent Bolt Manuf'g Co. [Case No. 8,750]. But In re Chandler [Case No. 2,591], holds the contrary doctrine. It is sufficient, however, if the debtor's commercial paper was incurred in his character of banker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner. It does not matter whether the same was given for a loan of money, for goods, or to his or their employes, or otherwise, nor whether the maker, acceptor or endorser, as principal debtor or otherwise, is liable thereon, if it appear in the petition that it is the debtor's commercial paper of the class enumerated in section thirty-nine of the act. In the case at bar it so appears with sufficient averments. We must, therefore, overrule the demurrer and grant leave to the bankrupts to reply to the allegations contained in the petition.

STRICKLAND, J. The petition appears to be sufficient upon its face, and the paper is negotiable paper. Then the only question remaining is, are these parties within the purview of the law,—are they manufacturers? If so, the paper as a matter of course is their commercial paper. I believe them to be manufacturers. The demurrer is not well taken.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. March 26, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY—COMPOSITION PROCEEDINGS—OBJECTIONS—REVIEW IN CIRCUIT COURT—DISCRETION OF REGISTER AND DISTRICT COURT.

1. Under the statute in regard to compositions in bankruptcy (Act June 22d, 1874, § 17, 18 Stat. 182), a debtor may be excused by the creditors from answering inquiries, even though he is present at the meeting of creditors.

2. On a review in bankruptcy the circuit court cannot consider objections to a proceeding in composition, that were not taken in the district court.

3. It is no valid objection to a composition, that it is unsecured and payable in instalments, and that the property of the debtor is restored to him, to be dealt with at his pleasure.

4. When questions of policy and expediency have been fairly before the creditors and disposed of by them, and their action has been approved by the register and the district court, such action will not be interfered with by the circuit court, on review.

[Cited in Re Joseph, 24 Fed. 138.]

5. The provisions of the composition in this case considered and held not to violate the statute or to be improper.

Alexander Blumenstiel, for Brigg, Entz & Co.

Gershon A. Seixas, opposed.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The record shows, that, at the first meeting of creditors in regard to the composition, on April 24th, 1878, it was stated, by the counsel for the debtors, that Mr. Greig was prevented, by sickness, from attending the meeting, and that Mr. Greig's physician was in attendance to testify to facts in support of such statement. The physician was then examined and was cross-examined by five counsel for various creditors, and, among them, by the counsel for Brigg, Entz & Co., the creditors who bring this petition of review. During such examination, Mr. Greig appeared. The meeting was then adjourned to April 25th, 1878, at 9.30 a. m. On that day, between 9.30 and 10 a. m., Mr. Greig appeared, but he retired before 10 a. m., and before the opening of the meeting, and was not present at its opening. A resolution was then moved that Mr. Greig be excused from further attendance at such meeting and at any adjournment thereof, and from submitting himself to any examination at such meeting. The counsel for Brigg, Entz & Co. objected to the resolution. The vote in its favor was 40 creditors, representing $75,613.75, out of a total of 46 creditors, representing $94,487.30. The resolution was declared to be passed. Mr. Wilson, the other debtor, was then examined, and, among others, by the counsel for Brigg, Entz & Co. The resolution of composition was then presented to be voted on, and the counsel for Brigg, Entz & Co. objected to the taking of a vote on it, because Mr. Greig was not present to answer inquiries. The objection was overruled by the register. The resolution of composition was then put to vote, and was passed by 34 creditors out of 36 whose claims exceeded $50 each, and who were represented or assembled at the meeting, and by an aggregate indebtedness, including claims under $50 each, of $75,613.75. Two creditors, representing $13,376.27, voted in the negative. It was then agreed that the counsel for Brigg, Entz & Co. might raise, on the final hearing, any objections which he could raise on the application for the second meeting.

At the second meeting, held on the 8th of May, 1878, the counsel for Brigg, Entz & Co. presented the following objections to the confirmation of the resolution of composition: (1) That, although Mr. Greig was present at the first meeting, he did not answer any inquiries made of him, and it did not appear that he was prevented from being at such meeting by reason of any satisfactory cause, and the resolution passed, purporting to excuse him from further attendance at the first meeting, was without authority of law, under the circumstances above set forth; (2) that it appeared that the resolution of composition was not for the best interest of all concerned, and that the resolution could not proceed without great injustice and undue delay to the creditors. On the 8th of May Mr. Brigg and Mr. Entz were examined by their counsel and Mr. Wilson was examined. On the 9th and 10th of May Mr. Wilson was further examined, and a witness was examined. On the 11th of May Mr. Wilson and Mr. Greig were examined by counsel for creditors other than Brigg, Entz & Co. On the 13th of May Mr. Wilson and a witness were examined. On the 29th of May Mr. Wilson was further examined. On the 13th of June Mr. Brigg was further examined. The record shows that the counsel for Brigg, Entz & Co. was present on the 8th of May, but it does not show that he was afterwards present except on the 13th of June.

In regard to Mr. Greig it is contended, that, even though the debtor might be excused from attending, when absent, he could not be excused from answering, when present. The provision of the statute is, that "the debtor, unless prevented by sickness or other cause satisfactory to such meeting, shall be present at the same and shall answer any inquiries made of him." The good sense of this provision is, that the debtor may, for a cause satisfactory to the meeting, be excused from answering inquiries. Of course, he cannot answer inquiries then and there made, unless he is present. But, even if he is physically present, he may be unfit to answer inquiries. The present is a case of that kind. While the physician was testifying as to the propriety of examining Mr. Greig, Mr. Greig came in. The creditors and their counsel had an opportunity of seeing him, in connection with the testimony of the physician, and thereupon they voted to excuse him from attending and from being examined at the first meeting. He was examined sixteen days afterwards, at the second meeting. The testimony of the physician showed satisfactorily that Mr. Greig was not in a fit mental condition to be examined at the time the resolution excusing him was passed. But, he was only excused from being examined at the first meeting. He was present and was examined at the second meeting. If the counsel for Brigg, Entz & Co. had applied for leave to examine him, the privilege, doubtless, would have been granted. Although such counsel may not have been aware that Mr. Greig was being examined, yet he was present before the register on the 13th of June, and the proceedings before the register were kept open until the 6th of August. The objections filed in the district court by the counsel for Brigg, Entz & Co. in respect to Mr. Greig are wholly confined to what took place at the first meeting, and the record shows no objection in the district court in respect to the non-examination of Mr. Greig at the second meeting by the counsel for Brigg, Entz & Co. This court cannot, on review, consider objections that were not taken in the district court.

The views of this court, expressed by Chief Justice Waite, in Re Wronkow [Case No. 18,105], are applicable to the objection above considered. In that case, one objection taken in this court to the resolution of composition was, that one of the bankrupts was, at the first meeting of creditors, excused from attendance, without sufficient cause. This court said: "The law itself does not make it obligatory upon the bankrupt to be present except at the first meeting. He is to be present unless prevented by sickness or other cause satisfactory to the meeting. Of the sufficiency of the cause the creditors themselves are to decide in the first instance, and their decision should not be disturbed by the court, except for good cause shown. It must in some form appear that wrong has been done to the minority creditors, by reason of the vote which was given. After the district court has affirmed the action of the majority, this court, in the exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction, ought not to interfere except in a very clear case. While the rights of the minority creditors should be carefully watched and protected against all unreasonable acts of the majority, the judgment of the requisite majority should always be allowed to prevail, unless obtained without sufficient consideration, or by some unfairness or undue influence. In this case, the excuse presented for one of the debtors was his absence in California, where he resided. This was fairly submitted to the meeting. It seems to have been fairly considered. The meeting was well attended. All the objections made were fully presented and duly deliberated upon. The result was a vote in favor of the sufficiency of the excuse." In that case, the objecting creditors did not attend the first meeting. Here, they were present at it and took part in the proceedings in reference to excusing Mr. Greig. The objection is overruled.

The composition was 35 per cent. in money, without interest, payable in 5 instalments, of 7 per cent. each, in 3, 6, 9, 12 and 15 months respectively, to be evidenced by the promissory notes of the debtors. The resolution contained the following provision: "The injunction heretofore granted in these proceedings, restraining the debtors from disposing of their property, shall be vacated and annulled." The proceedings in bankruptcy were not to be discontinued until the entire 35 per cent. had been paid. By the 8th clause of the resolution it was provided, that one Jones be appointed custodian and special receiver of the property of the debtors, by the bankruptcy court, but subject to the restriction, that he should not take any of said property into his custody or possession, until the debtors should have defaulted in the payment of one or more of the composition notes. Security in $10,000, to be given by Jones, was provided for.

The petition of review sets forth, as reasons why the composition was not for the best interest of the creditors: (1) That it was in deferred payments, and wholly unsecured, and provided for the return of all the property to the debtors on the delivery of the notes, without any security, either that the composition would be paid, or that the debtors would not dispose of all the property before the maturity of any of the notes; (2) that the debtors were not proper custodians of their assets, because they had fraudulently contracted their debt to Brigg, Entz & Co.; (3) that the delivery of the property to the debtors placed the composition at the risk of their future business, and compelled the creditors to give up the assets in hand and trust them to the debtors without security; (4) that, in addition to the dishonesty of Mr. Greig, it appeared that he was mentally unfit to take charge of said property; (5) that the 8th paragraph of the resolution is in violation of the provision of the statute, and deprives the creditors of the right, in case of default in the payment of any of said instalments, to enforce their original claim, or to have recourse to the other provisions of the statute, in the enforcement of the composition, and compels them to assent to the appointment of Jones as receiver, and substantially compels the court to make such appointment, upon Jones giving a bond in the fixed sum of $10,000, irrespective of the real amount of the assets which may be on hand at the time of such default.

The point of the objections is, that, the composition being unsecured and payable in instalments, and the property being restored to the debtors, to be dealt with at their pleasure, the composition ought not to be confirmed. The construction of our statute, and of the English statute, which is the same in this respect, has always been, that there is no inhibition against the confirmation of such a composition. Ex parte Burrell, 1 Ch. Div. 537, 552; In re Reiman [Case No. 11,673]; In re Van Auken [Id. 16,328]; Ex parte Hamlin [Id. 5,993]. The question is, whether the composition is "for the best interest of all concerned." It may be, although it is unsecured and is payable in instalments, and the property of the debtors is left free to be managed and disposed of by them.

The objection to the composition, taken on the record in the district court, was, that the composition was "not for the best interest of all concerned," and that it "could not proceed without great injustice and undue delay to the creditors." This general objection is, in the petition of review, formulated under these heads: (1) Deferred payments; (2) unsecured; (3) property left in the control of the debtors; (4) the debtors not proper custodians of the property, because they had fraudulently contracted their debt to Brigg, Entz & Co.; (5) mental unfitness of Mr. Greig to take charge of the property. This is the substance of the first four objections stated in the petition of review. The questions involved in them were all questions of policy and expediency, and were all fairly before the creditors. It must be presumed that they considered the objections and yet voted in favor of the composition, by the requisite vote. The register and the district judge approved of the composition, and of its terms. The district judge, in his decision,—Hudson v. Adams [Case No. 6,832],—considered all the questions in detail, except those relating to the debt to Brigg, Entz & Co., and to the mental unfitness of Mr. Greig, and arrived at the conclusion that the composition was for the best interests of all concerned. In regard to the review of such a decision, it was said, in Re Wronkow, before cited: "It is next insisted that the compromise is not for the best interest of all concerned. The requisite majority of the creditors, at the first meeting, thought it was. The same thing occurred at the second meeting, called specially to consider that very question. The register coincided in the opinion of the creditors, and so reported. The district court, upon full argument, has decided in the same way.

This court ought not to interfere under such circumstances, unless specific errors in the action of the creditors, or the court below can be pointed out, which, if sustained, would change the judgment. Mere general questions of expediency must ordinarily be considered as settled, when the requisite majority of the creditors, the register, and the district court all agree. Nothing short of fraud or gross error in judgment should call into exercise the jurisdiction of this court in such a case. That does not appear here. This court is simply called upon to decide, upon the whole case, that the creditors and the district court have come to a wrong conclusion as to what is for the best interest of all concerned." These views are the law of this court and cover the present case.

The question as to the contracting of the debt to Brigg, Entz & Co., and the question as to the mental fitness of Mr. Greig, were questions arising out of the evidence taken before the register. They were points which either were, or were not, urged before the district judge, under the general objection filed with the register. If they were urged, they were questions of expediency, and were passed upon. If they were not urged, they might have been, and must, on this review, be regarded as having been waived in the district court, so that, because not passed upon by the district court, they cannot be passed upon by this court, in review.

As matter of fact, however, I am, on consideration of the evidence, of opinion that the debt to Brigg, Entz & Co. was not fraudulently contracted.

As to Mr. Greig's mental condition, the physician testified, on the 24th of April, that Mr. Greig was not then in a fit mental condition to be examined; that the probabilities of a change of his condition were good, if he had a proper amount of rest; that he was not then fit to carry on business; but that freedom from business anxieties, rest and proper treatment, would be very improving, with a fair prospect, in time, of a restoration of his capacity to attend to business. Seventeen days after that Mr. Greig was examined. No creditor, after that, took any objection as to the mental condition of Mr. Greig, although adjourned meetings were held on seven different days after the 11th of May, and the proceedings were not closed before the register until August 6th.

The entire 8th paragraph of the resolution is in these words: "And, for the purpose of better securing the payment of the several instalments of composition, according to the tenor of the preceding resolutions, we do hereby further resolve, that James W. Jones, of the city of New York, be appointed custodian and special receiver of all the property and estate of the debtors, shown in the statement of debts and assets filed by them at the meeting of creditors at which these resolutions are passed, together with the increase and the profits and the avails thereof; and we do hereby request his appointment by this court as such receiver; provided, however, and such appointment shall be made subject to this limitation and restriction, that said Jones shall not take any of said property into his custody or possession until the said alleged bankrupts shall have defaulted in the payment of their composition notes, or any of them, as hereinbefore provided to be given; and it is further provided, that the said James W. Jones, before entering upon the duties of his trust as such receiver as aforesaid, shall execute and file in this court a good and sufficient bond, in the penalty of ten thousand dollars, with one or more sureties, to be approved by the court, conditioned for the faithful performance by said Jones of his duties as such receiver as aforesaid." The 7th paragraph of the resolution provides as follows: "The injunction heretofore granted in these proceedings, restraining the debtors from disposing of their property, shall be vacated and annulled. In all other respects, the proceedings in bankruptcy shall remain as they are now, and shall be deemed to be pending until the composition is completed, for the purpose of any application which the creditors, or any of them, may see fit to make, upon the default of the debtors in the payment of any of the composition notes so to be given as aforesaid." I do not think the 8th paragraph of the resolution violates any provision of the statute, or works any of the results set forth in the 5th objection contained in the petition of review. The provisions of the 8th paragraph are stated therein to be for the purpose of further securing the payment of the several instalments of the composition. Taking the 7th and 8th paragraphs in connection, the creditors are not, in case of default in the payment of any instalment, deprived of any right which they would have had if the 8th paragraph had not been contained in the resolution, nor is the court prevented from appointing some other person than Jones as receiver, nor from requiring from Jones, or from any other receiver, a bond in such sum as it may deem proper. The 8th paragraph purports to relate only to what shall be done with the property, after default in the payment of some one of the notes. In that regard it looks toward security. Before default, the property is to remain with the debtors, in consonance with the plan of the composition. It would remain with the debtors even without the 8th paragraph. Whether the property be in the hands of the debtors, or in the hands of Jones, or whatever becomes of it, the creditors are not, by the 8th paragraph, deprived of any of the rights which the petition of review alleges they are deprived of. The case of In re Jane-way [Case No. 7,207] is cited. In that case, the composition provided, that, as soon as the resolution should be recorded, all the property should revert to the debtors, the same as if no proceedings in bankruptcy had taken place, and that an order of discontinuance might be entered, at the option of the debtors, without further notice to the creditors. The notes were to be deliverable within ten days after the order of confirmation, and, before any note should be given, the property might revert to the debtor, and the proceedings be out of court. The court refused to sanction such a composition, on the ground that it was no composition. The present case is not like that. The construction given to the terms of the composition by the petition of review is, that it provides "for the return of all the property to the debtors, upon the delivery of the notes." Such is the proper construction.

The provisions of the 8th paragraph are not of the substance of the composition. They request certain action to be taken by the court in case of default. The court is not compelled to comply with the request. It is still free to enforce the composition, or proceed with the bankruptcy, in like manner as if the 8th paragraph were not part of the resolution. These were the views of the district court, and they are approved. The prayer of the petition of review, for the reversal of the order of August 20th, 1878, is denied, with costs.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—SUFFICIENCY OF ASSETS.

1. Under section 33 of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)],—section 5112, Rev. St.,—the assets coming into the hands of the assignee in bankruptcy, exclusive of exemptions, must be equal to thirty per cent. of the claims proved against the bankrupt's estate, to entitle him to a discharge.

[Cited in Re Waggoner, 5 Fed. 917.]

2. Assets in bankruptcy are the proceeds of the bankrupt's property which come into the hands of the assignee, and are applicable to the payment of his debts.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Virginia.]

In this case nearly all the estate of the bankrupt [N. F. Wilson] was covered by the exemptions allowed him by law, and was decreed to him as such. But it was more than equal to thirty per cent. of the debts proved against him. Many cases had arisen presenting this state of things in a partial degree. This case, however, presented clearly the question, whether or not the estate surrendered by the bankrupt should be estimated in gross in determining his right of discharge under the thirty per cent. clause; and the district court, by agreement, made a pro forma decision, in order that the question might be finally settled on appeal by the circuit court.

BOND, Circuit Judge. Wilson, a voluntary bankrupt, seeks his discharge, which is resisted by the creditors, because, as they allege, his assets are not equal to thirty per centum of the claims proved against his estate. It seems that the bankrupt returned in his schedule property in amount equal to the debts proved against him, but he claimed its possession as a homestead exemption under the statute of Virginia, which claim was allowed him by the district court. Assets, within the meaning of the 33d section of the bankrupt act, are the proceeds of the bankrupt's property which come into the hands of his assignee, and are applicable to the payment of his debts. Here manifestly nothing came into the assignee's hands available for that purpose. If the bankrupt was entitled to hold this property exempt from liability for his debts, as the district court determined he was, how can it be considered assets applicable for the payment of those debts? If a stranger had been entitled to the possession of it, certainly it could not be regarded as assets in the hands of the assignee. How does the case differ when the bankrupt is entitled to hold it exempt from liability for the payment of his debts? Can that be said to be available for the payment of debts which the law says shall be exempt from liability for such payment? The district court allowed the bankrupt's discharge, but we think as the assent of creditors is not alleged, and no assets whatever came into the hands of the assignee applicable to the payment of his debts, the decree of the district court granting the bankrupt his discharge must be reversed with costs.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—CONCEALMENT OF PROPERTY.

[The omission by the bankrupt of any notice, in his schedule, of property which had been attached, and a receipt given for its value, in a suit still pending, will not bar his discharge under the act of 1841 (5 Stat. 440), unless the omission was with a willful intent to conceal his property.]

In bankruptcy. This was the case of a petition by [George Wilson] a bankrupt for his discharge, a majority of his creditors having objected thereto, the bankrupt obtained a trial by jury. The objections filed by the creditors were: 1. That the bankrupt had been guilty of fraud and of wilful concealment of his property and rights of property contrary to the provisions of the law. 2. That he had preferred some of his creditors contrary to the provisions of said act. 3. Because he wilfully omitted and refused to conform to the requisitions of said act. 4. Because he had admitted false or fictitious debts against his estate. The principal ground relied on by the creditors, was, that in March, 1842, all the stock of the bankrupt, except groceries and furniture, was attached by the Kinderhook Bank, when a receipt was given on a valuation of $900, and the suit is now pending. The receptor took the property, and the bankrupt took no notice of it in the schedule annexed to his original petition. There was considerable testimony upon this and other points, the bankrupt taking the ground that he acted under a mistake as to his duty in this particular.

Mr. Fiske, for creditors.

Mr. Gray, for bankrupt.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, in his charge instructed the jury, that they must be satisfied that the bankrupt wilfully concealed his property. If he acted in good faith, but under a mistake, his discharge ought not to be withheld.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the bankrupt.

BANKRUPTCY—PETITION OF PARTNER AGAINST COPARTNER—INVOLUNTARY PROCEEDING—DISCHARGE.

1. A proceeding in bankruptcy by a partner against his copartner is not an involuntary proceeding, within section 9, Act 1874, c. 390 (18 Stat. 180).

2. Therefore, a partner, who is in bankruptcy upon the petition of his copartner, cannot obtain his discharge without the assent of creditors or the amount of assets required in voluntary proceedings.

[Cited in Re Duncan, Case No. 4,132; Re Austin, Id. 662.]

W. F. Wilson was adjudged bankrupt upon the petition of one Harrington, alleging himself a partner with Wilson, and that the firm was insolvent. Wilson denied the partnership, and a jury trial was had, which resulted in a verdict for the petitioner. Wilson now applied for his discharge, but filed no assent of creditors, and had not paid a sufficient dividend to enable him to dispense with the assent, if any is required. A creditor objected on this ground, and alleged certain frauds besides.

E. Avery, for the bankrupt, cited Act 1874, c. 390, § 9 (18 Stat. 180); In re Penn [Case No. 10,927].

N. B. Bryant, for the creditor.

LOWELL, District Judge. An able argument has been addressed to me, that section 9 of the new statute absolves the defendant from obtaining the consent of his creditors, on the ground that, as to him, the proceedings are compulsory.

It is true that this defendant did not consent to be adjudged bankrupt in connection with one whom he denied to be his copartner, and that rule 18 requires, in such cases, notice and other proceedings, including jury trial, if demanded, precisely as if the petition were by creditors; and that the discharge of each partner is separate and distinct from that of any other. Still I am of opinion that these are not involuntary or compulsory proceedings under section 9 of the act of 1874. That statute requires a considerable number of creditors to join in a petition, and, as has been pointed out by Judge Blatchford, precisely the number required to assent to the discharge of a voluntary bankrupt; so that the theory of the statute appears to be that those creditors who have chosen to put a person into bankruptcy against his will are presumed to assent to his discharge, if he has committed no actual fraud or misdemeanor against the meaning of the statutes. That presumed assent is not given when one partner petitions.

Again, creditors can only proceed for certain acts of bankruptcy; but a partner may petition on the ground that the firm is insolvent. Rule 18, indeed, seems to imply that a partner may allege acts of bankruptcy against the firm; but the statute speaks only of insolvency as the ground for a voluntary petition; or rather it says that, partners may petition or be petitioned against like individuals; and an individual can only petition on the ground of his insolvency. I apprehend it would be very difficult to find any case in which a partner would not be estopped to petition for joint acts of bankruptcy. No such petition has ever been brought in this court.

If, then, partners are insolvent, either has a right to insist that the firm shall go into bankruptcy, and the statute does not even say the other shall be notified; but the court very wisely has adopted notice as a rule of practice to prevent fraud and surprise. If the insolvency is proved, the case is made out. No involuntary case, of the ordinary kind, can be made out by such evidence. In truth, the verdict in such a case as this simply establishes that the recusant partner ought to have joined in the voluntary proceedings.

Then look at the consequences. One partner, disposed to do his whole duty by his creditors, brings the petition; the other resists it, and is rewarded by a gift of his discharge; or the partners put forward one to take the burden, and compensate him in some way for the risk; or they take in a partner for the very purpose of playing this part.

It was argued that the words "compulsory" and "involuntary" describe two classes of cases: one by creditors, and one by partners. But it is plain that the words are used throughout this statute as strict synonymes. See especially section 6, where "compulsory" is evidently so used. Upon the whole, I am satisfied that section 9 refers only to the ordinary case of petitions in invitum.

If this case should be taken to the circuit court, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have not passed upon the allegations of fraud. Discharge refused.

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 15, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY — COMPOSITION PROCEEDINGS — EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPT—SECURITY FOR COMPOSITION NOTES—TIME OF PAYMENT.

1. In composition proceedings, the debtor, though present, may, by a vote, of the creditors present, be excused from examination on account of illness.

2. The fact that security provided for a composition does not certainly secure the full payment of the composition, does not make the composition uncertain.

3. The circumstance that there is no security given for the payment of the composition notes is merely one of the facts in the case to be considered with, and in the light of, all the other facts on the question whether the composition is for the best interests of all concerned.

[Cited in Re McNab & H. Manuf'g Co., Case No. 8,906.]

4. On the question whether, the composition being in other respects fair and just, the debtor should be allowed to keep his property, the principal element is his personal and business character.

5. The question as to the time within which, and how rapidly, the debtor can pay the composition is one for the creditors to consider, and their judgment will not be reversed, unless valid reasons for so doing are shown.

[In the matter of Samuel Wilson and Thomas Greig, bankrupts.]

G. A. Seixas and W. B. Winterton, for the motion.

B. F. Foster, Foster & Adams, and A. Blumensteil, contra.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a motion for the confirmation of a composition. There has been no adjudication, and the proceeding is upon creditors' petition. Thirty-four creditors out of forty-six have voted in favor of the composition. Two creditors oppose the composition. Their debts amount to about thirteen thousand dollars. The creditors who have voted for it represent about seventy-six thousand dollars of debts. The total debts are ninety-five thousand dollars.

Several objections are urged.

1. It is objected that one of the debtors (Greig), though present at the first meeting, was, by a vote of the creditors present, excused from examination on account of illness. The statute provides: "The debtor, unless prevented by sickness, or other cause satisfactory to such meeting, shall be present at the same, and shall answer any inquiries made of him." It is now insisted that, though the creditors may excuse his attendance, they cannot excuse his answering questions, if present, though disabled by sickness. Mr. Greig's inability to proceed with the examination fully appeared. It is claimed that this is a fatal irregularity. This objection is frivolous. The statute is clearly broad enough to sustain the action of the creditors in this respect.

2. The composition proposed and accepted was thirty-five cents on the dollar in the debtors' promissory notes at three, six, nine, twelve, and fifteen months from the date of the order of confirmation, each for seven cents on the dollar. It provided that the injunction restraining the debtors from disposing of their property should be vacated; that "in all other respects the proceedings in bankruptcy shall remain as they are now, and shall be deemed to be pending until the composition is completed, for the purpose of any application which the creditors, or any of them, may see fit to make upon the default of the debtors in the payment of any of the composition notes;" that upon payment of said notes the proceedings should be discontinued. It contained also the following clause: "And for the purpose of better securing the payment of the several instalments of composition according to the tenor of the preceding resolutions, we do hereby farther resolve that James W. Jones, of the city of New York, be appointed custodian and special receiver of all the property and estate of the debtors. * * * And we do hereby request his appointment by this court as such receiver, provided, however, that such appointment shall be made subject to this limitation and restriction, that said Jones shall not take any of said property into his custody or possession until the said alleged bankrupts shall have defaulted in the payment of their composition notes, or any of them." The resolution then goes on to require a bond in ten thousand dollars from Mr. Jones, with sureties to be approved by the court, to secure the faithful performance of his duties as receiver. It is objected to this composition that it is fatally indefinite; that the security provided for is not certain in its character; that Jones as receiver or trustee would be obliged only to pay such sum as he should realize from the assets; that the provision for a receivership does not really secure the thirty-five per cent. This objection cannot be sustained. The terms of the composition are definite and certain; thirty-five per cent. in money secured by the promissory note of the debtors. The further provision for a receivership in a certain case is not of the substance of the composition. It is simply a request for certain action to be taken by the court in case of default. It may or may not be acted on without affecting in any way the composition. Even, however, if it were regarded as something to which the creditors were certainly entitled, it is not obnoxious to the objection of uncertainty. If Jones should be appointed receiver in precisely the form prescribed in the resolutions, his powers and duties as such receiver would be well defined and certain. The fact, if it be so, that security provided for a composition does not certainly secure the full payment of the composition, does not make the composition uncertain. It may make the security or the composition notes less valuable than they would be if fully and beyond all question collaterally secured. The case of In re Reiman [Case No. 11,673], cited in support of this objection, is not in point. There the composition notes were to be "satisfactorily endorsed," without providing by whom they were to be endorsed, or how or by whom it was to be determined whether the endorsement was "satisfactory." This was of the very substance of the composition, and very properly it was held to be too indefinite. The difference between the two cases is too clear to need further comment.

3. But the principal objection taken is, that this composition is not for the best interests of creditors, because under it the whole property of the debtors is surrendered to them, and nothing is given to the creditors except promises to pay thirty-five cents on the dollar, with no security whatever, except the debtors' promises. Neither the language of the bankrupt law, nor the construction that has been put upon it by the courts, prevents the acceptance of a composition merely because the assets are still in the possession of the debtor, or are restored to him by the terms of the composition, and the composition is wholly promissory in its character and without security. See In re Van Auken [Case No. 16,828]; Ex parte Hamlin [Id. 5,993]. The court must be satisfied that it is "for the best interest of all concerned." Rev. St. § 5103 A. The circumstance, therefore, that there is no security given for the payment of the composition notes is merely one of the facts in the case to be considered with, and in the light of all the other facts on the question to be determined, whether the composition is for the best interests of all concerned. In Van Auken's Case above cited, it was said that the arrangement must be "judicious and reasonably safe to all the creditors." In this case it does not appear, nor is it urged, that the debtors are not proper persons, in character and business ability, to manage their own affairs, except so far as such incapacity may be necessarily inferred from their present insolvency, and there is no evidence impeaching their integrity. The overwhelming vote of the creditors that it is for their best interests that the debtors should continue to manage and dispose of their stock of goods, and go on with business in order to enable them to pay the promised composition, deserves very great weight with the court on this question.

It does not appear that the debtors are able to give any security except upon their stock of goods. To mortgage or pledge this might seriously impair their ability to realize on it, and to pay the composition. It is not claimed that more than sixty-five cents on the dollar could be realized on the property of the debtors if wound up in bankruptcy. It is urged that the creditors are giving up sixty-five per cent., and getting nothing for it; that, therefore, the creditors are getting no equivalent for what they surrender, and that such an arrangement cannot be for their best interests, however it may be as to the best interests of the debtors. But it is not true that the creditors are giving up the sixty-five per cent. That is irrecoverably gone already. The debtors are admitted to be insolvent with assets insufficient to pay more than thirty-five cents on the dollar. What the creditors are giving up, or rather what is taken from them by this composition, is the right to have those assets administered by an assignee in bankruptcy, instead of being administered by the debtors themselves for the purpose of realizing their value. It cannot be said either that the creditors do not get any advantage by the composition besides that of having the debtors administer the estate, if that is one, as from the action of the creditors it may be inferred that the large majority of them believe it to be. For a possibility of dividends uncertain in amount and time of payment, but very certainly not worth more than thirty-five cents on the dollar, represented in their hands by dishonored notes, they get paper for all that their claims are worth in a form in which they can negotiate and use it in their business, and with a reasonable certainty that it will be paid at maturity because backed up by property in the possession of the makers. Thus the composition, if reasonably safe and judicious in what the debtors undertake to do, and fair in amount, is for the best interest of creditors in that it gives them liquidated and negotiable promises in place of unliquidated and unmerchantable claims.

On the question whether, the composition being in other respects fair and just, the debtors should be allowed to keep their property, the principal element is their personal and business character, and on this point I am entirely satisfied. In case of default either by the mode suggested by the creditors or by the issue of a warrant and the appointment of an assignee, the creditors still have the security of the assets. I think the composition is for the best interests of all concerned, and this objection of want of security is in this case not sustained.

4. It is also objected that there is unreasonable delay in this case, the debtors having fifteen months to pay thirty-five per cent.; whereas, it is said that the greater part of the value of the assets could be realized by an immediate sale. It was a question for the creditors to consider within what time and how rapidly the debtors could pay the composition, and I see no reason to reverse their judgment. As to an immediate sale, that may well have been thought unwise, and likely to defeat the purpose in view, of enabling the debtors to go on with their business in order to pay the stipulated composition.

5. The objection that this being an involuntary case, and there being no adjudication, the proceedings may be at any time discontinued on the motion of the petitioning creditors, and thus the court be left powerless to enforce the composition in case of default, is not well founded. It is based on an imaginary danger.

Objections overruled, and composition confirmed.

FEIGNED ISSUE—PRACTICE.

Where a feigned issue for trial of a fact is directed by the court, no declaration of any sort is requisite. The case is put on the trial list and the jury sworn to try the issue, in the words of the order of issue itself.

The court having directed from its equity side, an issue of fact for trial by a jury, Mr. St. G. T. Campbell and Mr. S. V. Smith for the plaintiff, filed a formal declaration, in the old fashioned way, setting forth a fictitious conversation that had been moved between the parties, a consequent dispute, wager, &c.

Mr. Hirst and Mr. W. W. Hubbell made an objection to the declaration as not embodying, in a full and issuable way, the matter directed to be tried. After some argument on both sides, as to whether the declaration did do this or not, the discussion was cut short by the opinion of the court thus given.

GRIBER, Circuit Justice. The old fashioned and cumbrous machinery by which these issues of fact have been hitherto managed is entirely useless; and the matter to be tried is only involved by it in a mass of words signifying nothing. Now, especially, since wagers of all sorts, have been discontinued as illegal by the supreme court of Pennsylvania (Edgell v. McLaughlin, 6 Whart. 176), there is no propriety in the old form; and it may as well be swept away at once, as the relic of a barbarous age. In the present issue, and in all future ones in this court, the matter can be put on the trial list at once, and the jury be sworn to try in the form and in the words set forth in the order of issue. There is no necessity of a declaration or pleading of any sort.

VALUE OF GRANT OF PATENT—INJUNCTION—SECOND TRIAL—DIVIDED COURT.

1. The grant of a patent at the patent office, is not of itself, or in virtue of section 7 of the act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 119], a bar to an interlocutory injunction in favour of a person claiming to be a prior patentee of the same thing; such person not having received notice at the patent office to appear and be heard, and the court on a hearing before it, being well satisfied that the last patent is an interference with the one granted before.

[Cited in Morse Fountain Pen Co. v. Estebrook Steel Pen Manufg Co., Case No. 9,862.]

2. The district judge sitting for the circuit court, and being himself well satisfied of an infringement,—although, of numerous experts examined, a majority thought differently from him on that point,—may grant an interlocutory injunction to restrain the use of a patented machine as an infringement of a prior one; the machine last patented not having been granted after notice from the patent office to the complainant, to appear and be heard.

3. Where a jury has had a case before it and disagreed, a second trial cannot be had by another jury from the residue of the panel. The case must go over in order that it may be tried on a new venire.

4. Where the district judge, sitting for the circuit court, and being satisfied of an infringement, had granted an interlocutory injunction till trial, to restrain the use of a machine, and the president judge, after hearing the evidence before the jury on the trial, differed from his brother, who after hearing the same evidence, still retained his former opinion, and the jury could find no verdict; the full court, in its subsequent action on the injunction, need not consider itself either as bound or as unable to dissolve it: but the action upon it may be modified; the modification being largely regulated by what probably would have been the original action of a full court.

This was a bill for an interlocutory injunction, to restrain the defendant from using a patented machine which it was said interfered with another machine previously patented to the complainant. The defendant did not deny the originality of the complainant's invention, but asserted his own to be no infringement of it. The complainant's patent was an ancient one. The defendant's had been granted under the act of July 4, 1836 (section 7), which directs, that whenever a person applies for a patent, an examination shall be made by the commissioner of patents into the originality of the alleged invention; and allows the issuing of a patent only in case the commissioner is satisfied that the invention is original. If, on examination, the commissioner thinks that there is an interference, he then gives (Act July 4, 1836, § 8) notice to the patentee with whose invention he supposes that the interference takes place, and lets him be heard. In this case the commissioner did not consider that there was an interference, and of course the complainant had no notice of the intended issue to the defendant.

Mr. Hirst and Mr. Stoughton of New York, relying, among other grounds, including those of fact, upon this first provision of the act, opposed the grant of an injunction. The defendant, they contended, has a patent which gives him a prima facie case everywhere. He has a right to trial by jury. It was impossible to regard his machine as so palpably or so probably an infringement, as to warrant the summary process of injunction, when the commissioner of patents, who has every means at command for ascertaining originality, and employs them all, has regarded it as too manifestly original to cause a question. The act of the commissioner may not have been a judicial decree in form; nor have the technical conclusiveness of a precedent, and a res adjudicata. But it deserves every respect short of that, and will receive the highest respect as the investigation and a decision on the matter by an officer of state, to whom the investigation and decision are primarily and particularly intrusted. It is quasi judicial, at least.

Mr. W. H. Seward of New York, Mr. St. G. T. Campbell and Mr. S. V. Smith, mentioned several cases where the commissioner had issued patents, after notice to prior patentees who came in and defended their rights, which patents had been afterwards pronounced, judicially, to be infringements. In this case there had been no notice to the complainant or to any body. The commissioner issued the patent upon first impressions. He had not perceived any infringement, only because none had been shown to him. His act was extra-judicial; and if it were not, would be at best but a judgment without either writ, plea, issue or argument. Even if there had been a hearing, the grant could not be a legal objection. It could not be pleaded nor put in evidence. It would at best be an extra-judicial opinion of more or less weight. If this court—after a judicial examination—is thoroughly satisfied of the interference, it will not regard such an act as conclusive on its conscience.

KANE, District Judge, sitting for the circuit court. There are cases under the present laws, in which the court would enter reluctantly upon the discussion of the validity of a patent. Some of the provisions of the act of 1836, give a quasi-judicial character to the action of the commissioner of patents; and it has accordingly been held, I believe generally, as well as justly, that the patent itself is to be taken as prima facie evidence of the novelty and usefulness of the invention specified in it. There are other cases, in which the official action of the patent office claims properly, a still higher degree of consideration. Whenever antagonist patentees, or third persons generally, have been first called in, it is reasonable to consider the action as a preliminary adjudication upon their rights. And this for the obvious reason, that they have been parties, or but for their own fault might have been parties, to the proceeding on which the adjudication was based. But this is the limit, beyond which comity cannot be required to go. It cannot be asked, that a third person shall have his legal rights impaired, or his legal remedies impeded, by any proceeding to which he was not, and could not have made himself a party. To hold ourselves concluded by the action of the patent office, where that action has been without notice, would be as perilous to the interest of inventors as to that of the publick. We had a case in our own court not long since, where an injunction was sought against the real inventor, on the faith of a patent granted to a surreptitious claimant. The grant of a patent to the defendant can therefore have no other effect on the present discussion, than as it indicates the opinion, which highly respectable and skilful officers have formed, on an ex parte examination of the case.

² [We come then to the principal question: Does the machine, now in use by the defendant, embody the principle of the complainant's patent? The judicial definition of a patent, or of the principle it involves, in a case under trial, is properly, if not necessarily, a limited one. It regards primarily, and as a matter of course, the circumstances of the pending controversy. The identity or the difference between two machines is sought, in the first place, by a comparison of them either in their elements or as a system; and we are commonly said to define their mechanical principles, when, after making such a comparison, we indicate the essential particulars in which they are alike, or otherwise. A new comparison of the patented machine with another, not before the subject of adjudication, as it presents new points of similarity or variance, calls for a different expression of the principle of the patent. The aspect of the invention changes as we approach it in a new direction, and parts become prominent that were subordinate before, and that involve perhaps important relations to the question in dispute. For this reason, the cases upon the Woodworth patent, which are found in the Reports, as well as those which have been determined in this court, give, for the purposes of the present inquiry, an imperfect definition of the principle of the invention. In all of those cases, the machine complained of carried the planks through it on an unvarying plane, which was tangential to the revolving motion of the planing knives, and the planing knives were set on the periphery of the revolver; in both of these particulars resembling the Woodworth machine. In Mr. Barnum's, the cutting tool is set on the face of a rotating disc, and the plank advances in a plane parallel, it is said, with the disc, till the operation of planing is completed, and is then deflected from the machine; thus, at the first glance, differing throughout, as well from the Woodworth machine, as from other machines, with which the Woodworth has been compared on former occasions.

[What then shall we regard as the principle of the Woodworth invention, when viewing it in connection with the machine of the defendant? We shall, perhaps, be led to the answer by tracing the history of this important class of labor-saving machines. Before the present century, it had been deemed an object of much interest to adapt some combination of machinery to the work of smoothing the surface of boards. The mechanical difficulties in the way were these: (1) That the cutting tools, if made to work parallel to the external surface of the plank, encountering all the sand and grit that adhered to it, soon lost their edge, and became incapable of producing a uniform surface; (2) that if the tools were made to cut otherwise than parallel to the surface, so as to pass through the gritty exterior, instead of along it, the plank would be alternately driven down as the tools struck it, and lifted up as they left it, and would thus have a constant and rapid vibration under the action of the machine.

[The engine devised by Mr. Bramah, in 1802, was so contrived as to get rid of the first of these difficulties. His cutting knives were placed on the side or surface of a circular rotating disc; but beyond them, at the extreme periphery, he placed a set of projecting rough cutters, which struck the plank as it advanced in the same plane with the disc, and before it reached the planing knives, and removed the outer surface to which the grit adhered. His machine was imperfect, however, for, in consequence of the elasticity of the plank, as well as of the machinery, and the vibration due to the rapid but intermitting action of his tools upon the plank, his cutters, after completing their work, would, as they revolved, come in contact again with the finished surface, and score it irregularly.

[Woodworth's machine was the next which I need to refer to. He affixed his cutters to the periphery of a revolving cylinder, and advanced the plank towards them, under strong pressure, in a plane tangential to their motion; thus making the cutters describe a curve upwards from the finished surface, through the rough surface of the plank, and preventing the plank from vibrating sensibly during the operation. This machine did its work effectively and well. The plank, moving firmly along the tangent plane of the rotating cylinder, passed beyond the reach of the cutters, and was disengaged from the action of the machine at the moment the work was perfected.

[This was imitated in the Gay and the MacGregor machines, in which a flattened cone or dished plate wheel was substituted for the cylinder. By this change the corrugated surface, which is left by the Woodworth machine, was avoided; the action of the cutters being very nearly in a line parallel to the surface of the plank, and therefore producing shavings, instead of the chips which are thrown out by the Woodworth cutters. But as the curve in which the cutters acted became one of a larger circle, the deflexion between it and the plane of the plank's motion was, of course, less rapid than in the Woodworth machine, thus increasing, in some degree, the liability of the finished part of the plank to receive the same injury from vibration which was the characteristic defect in the action of the Bramah machine. Nevertheless, when the Gay and MacGregor machines were before this court some three years ago, it was held that they infringed upon the Woodworth principle, inasmuch as they contained the revolving cutter acting upon a plank in the tangent plane of the revolver.

[The next machine to be described is that of the defendant. Its appearance is in many respects similar to Gay's, though it differs materially in others. It has the Bramah disc, with its two sets of rough and finishing cutters; but the plank is made by a very ingenious contrivance to advance along a metallic guide, either in a straight or slightly curved line, till it comes beneath the axis of the disc, when by a turn in the guide it is bent outwards over a small roller, and thence passes from the machine in a line similar to that by which it approached it. The finishing cutters begin to act upon the plank in a line very nearly parallel to its surface, and complete their work as the plank turns over the roller. We have thus a machine that cuts in a right plane upon a curved surface; the revolving disc, at the moment of finishing the work, forming a tangent plane to the curve of the advancing plank. We have, too, a roller, over which the plank is forcibly bent, and which, by its resisting pressure against the elasticity of the plank, holds it steady under the action of the cutters. That is to say, we have a machine just the converse, as well as the equivalent, of that invented by Woodworth. One general expression may include them both,—a planing machine, in which the cutters and the material move against each other in a curve and in its tangent plane, respectively; the material being kept from vibrating by roller pressure. It is true that in one machine it is the cutter which follows the curved path, while the material moves along the plane, and that in the other the cutter moves in a plane, and the material is acted on in the curve; but there is no other difference.

[Is this then, a difference of principle? Can it be said that the essential character of a machine is varied by a mutual interchange of form and direction between the two elements of which it is a combination, while both object and effect remain as before? Does not the question, in its very terms, suggest Lord Tenterden's illustration in the Percussion

Lock Case [Minter v. Wells], Webst. Pat. Cas. 128, of those analogous contrivances, the bringing up of an anvil against the hammer, and the bringing down of the hammer against an anvil? We may recognize differences of details in the defendant's machine, both as to the means and the effect; and these may properly be patented as improvements upon the Woodworth invention, perhaps highly meritorious ones. But, considered as independent combinations, I cannot escape the conclusion, that, whether the plank or the cutter have the curvilinear motion, if the other moves in a plane, and the two are made to act and react upon each other, for the same object, and with the same effect, the machines are in principle identical.]²

My only embarrassment in awarding an injunction, has been owing to the fact, that of the highly educated mechanics whose affidavits have been taken in the cause, the greater number have expressed an opinion different from that expressed by me. The consideration which was pressed in the argument, that the responsibility of deciding this question, might with propriety be devolved on a jury, has had no influence with me. That judicial morality might be impeached for infirmity, which could shrink from awarding to a party his remedy after ascertaining his rights. "The right of a party to the most speedy and effectual protection against a meditated wrong, is as complete as his right to redress for wrongs already inflicted; and the accident of position confers no right on one party, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, at the expense of the other. The special injunction in equity, like the arrest on mesne process at law, may be abused to the injury of an opponent; but it is no less on that account the duty of the judge to further them both, when, in the exercise of his best discretion, he believes that they are called for by the merits and the exigency." This was the language of the court when on a former occasion this patent was before us, and my experience since has not taught me that it ought to be modified. The preventive interposition of equity, is very often the only effective resort of a meritorious patentee, and where the facts of the case are not controverted, I am by no means satisfied that it is not the safest for both parties. There is no conflict of evidence here; the question is one of deduction and opinion. Were the case at this time under trial at bar, it would be the office of the judge to interpret the specification, and define the principle of the invention. This is the only point of difficulty, and it must be encountered by the judge, when he sits on one side or other of the court. To send the cause to a jury, would be to delay its adjudication for many months, leaving the complainant in the meantime with his legal rights suspended, and swelling the measure of the defendant's liabilities. I should do injustice to both parties, were I, with my present views of the merits of this controversy, to refuse the injunction. Injunction awarded.

At the following sessions, the validity of the patent came on to be tried upon an issue directed to a jury; but after a thorough examination and argument, the jury could not agree and were discharged.

Mr. Hirst and Mr. W. W. Hubbell, having now shewn that a great number of licenses, about to expire within a fortnight, were waiting for renewal upon the decision of the right, and that it was otherwise very important to their client and the publick, that the right should be decided at once; moved for a second trial at this same term, by a new jury selected out of the existing panel, instead of waiting as they would otherwise have to do, until the next session, a term of six months.

Mr. St. G. T. Campbell opposed the application.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. An application of this same sort was made to me in a case while I presided in the district court at Pittsburgh, where the case went off by withdrawing a juror. A decision from one of the Ohio or Indiana courts was then cited in support of the motion. In consequence of that decision, I looked thoroughly into the matter at the time, and was satisfied that the decision was not founded in principles of the common law and was wrong. I have no doubt that a settlement of this patent right, at once, is important, but it cannot be tried now except by consent. There must be a second venire. Motion refused.

On a subsequent day, it having appeared by a communication from the bench that the court, after full argument on the evidence, were divided on the question of infringement, and the jury having been unable to find a verdict, Mr. Hirst and Mr. W. W. Hubbell, moved to dissolve the injunction absolutely. It had been granted by the district judge, they argued, in the absence of his brother, who now after full examination, came to the conclusion that there was no infringement. Had the latter judge been present when the injunction was applied for, the court being divided, would not have granted it; and if it could, would not. A jury had moreover refused to pronounce that there was any infringement. This, supported by the action of the patent office, which regarded the invention as original, and by the patent which gave a prima facie right, made a clear case for a jury alone.

W. H. Seward, St. G. T. Campbell, and S. V. Smith, in favour of continuing the injunction, argued that the act of either judge, sitting for the circuit court, was the act of the court. As a circuit court, each judge is of absolute equality. It is impossible to say, what the circuit judge's opinion would have been, had he heard the argument for the injunction. That is a matter past and gone, and of which no judicial cognizance could now be taken. Each judge was satisfied of the correctness of his own opinion: and whether each chose to rely on his own, or each to defer to his brother's, the court would still be equally divided. In that state of things, what could be done? Simply nothing. The injunction would stand of its own force. The inability of the jury to find a verdict, Mr. Seward argued, was of no significance. They had been summoned to settle the matter, and they had not settled it, but left it where it was. Had they even found a verdict it would have been of little value unless approved by the court, who, if disapproving of it, would have set it aside. No verdict was of no value.

GRIER, Circuit Justice, expressing the high respect he entertained for the opinion of his Brother KANE, particularly upon questions relating to patents, and KANE, District Judge, stating that from the time he found that a difference of opinion existed between him and the presiding judge upon the question of infringement, his inclination was to have the matter disposed of, as if the court had been full when the injunction was applied for; and both members of the court—in the difference of opinion which existed between them, and which it seemed could not be removed—being desirous of protecting both parties to the suit from any errors which might exist by either dissolving absolutely, or absolutely continuing the injunction, made an order to this effect: That the injunction should be dissolved if the defendant in ten days should give security in $10,000 to keep an account, &c. and pay, &c. in case of a final decree being entered against him. On his failure to give such security, then in case the complainant should in ten days afterwards give security in $20,000, the injunction to stand; and in default of his giving such security, to be dissolved without condition.

JUDGMENTS—EQUITABLE RELIEF—INJUNCTION.

A general allegation of difficulty in procuring vouchers, or of unavoidable delay in settling an administration account without stating from what circumstances that difficulty and delay arose, is not sufficient ground of equity to enjoin a judgment at law.

[See Cases Nos. 1,097 and 17,788.]

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The bill states that the defendant commenced a suit at law against the plaintiffs as administrators of Cumberland Wilson, deceased, upon a promissory note for £100, to which action the plaintiffs pleaded plene administraverunt, "but from the difficulty and unavoidable delay they met with in getting vouchers for those to whom they had paid money for the estate, and getting the estate account settled, they were not able to produce evidence at the trial of the said suit, that they had fully administered, by reason whereof a verdict and judgment were had against them for the debt aforesaid and 40 dollars damages and 13 dollars 33 cents costs." That since the judgment they have settled their administration account with the Dumfries district court, "by which it will appear that they had fully administered the assets which had come to their hands, and that the estate was indebted to them on the 24th of October, 1801, $17,566." That since the said settlement they have received $896, which reduces the balance to $16,570. That at the time the judgment was obtained in October, 1800, there was due to them for money paid by them for the estate more than $17,566. That they have paid the $40 damages and the $13.33 costs, "and that the defendant owes the said Cumberland $60." That the defendant brought suit in this court on the judgment and obtained judgment thereon, without allowing credit for the $40 damages and $13.33 costs, and will proceed to issue execution thereon, unless prevented by a court of equity;—they therefore pray an injunction, and general relief.

An injunction was granted by one of the judges of this court. The answer of the defendant states that his action was founded on an accepted bill of exchange of Cumberland Wilson. That the trial at law was fair, and contends that the plaintiffs are not entitled to relief in equity; it neither admits nor denies the settlement of the administration account, nor the plaintiffs' allegation of difficulty and unavoidable delay in obtaining vouchers and settling their accounts. But it insists that the defendant's claim was among the first to be preferred in marshalling the assets. It neither admits nor denies the payment of $40 damages and costs; but says he is ignorant on that subject, and is willing to admit it, if paid. At March term, 1805, this court ordered the master to state the administration account of the plaintiffs, noting the times of the respective payments, and certifying the vouchers; upon report it appeared that the sums alleged by them to have been paid by them, in the administration of the estate, were principally sums due to themselves, a large part whereof, and more than sufficient to absorb all the assets, was for bills of exchange, upon which Mr. W. Wilson was indorsed, and which he had taken up more than three years before the death of his testator, and more than five years before the trial of the cause in the Dumfries district court. A strong presumption arises from this circumstance that the vouchers were in his own hands—and if any difficulty did arise in obtaining them in time to produce them at the trial at law, it must have arisen from his own negligence. It at least throws the burden of proof on him to show special circumstances of accident, before any equity can arise in his favor. If he had a right to retain all the assets for the satisfaction of his own debt, he might have availed himself of it at law. The bill does not state any one specific fact of accident which prevented him from doing so, and such an accident cannot be presumed, especially in such a case. Excepting the allegation of the payment of the $40 damages and the costs, which were not credited in the second judgment, I see no ground of equity in the bill. A general allegation of difficulty in procuring vouchers, or of unavoidable delay in settling accounts, without stating from what circumstances that difficulty and delay arose, is too vague and indefinite even to support an injunction in the first instance.

THE COURT, at March session, 1806, dissolved the injunction, except as to the $40 damages and $13.33 costs, which were admitted by the defendant's counsel to have been paid. Since that time, no evidence has been produced, and the cause having now come to a final hearing, the court can only dismiss the bill with costs.

The allegation, that the defendant was indebted to the intestate in the sum of $60, is an amendment to the bill, I believe made since the dissolution. It is, however, a naked allegation, without circumstances and without proof. In the account taken by the master, it appears that the plaintiffs have paid a judgment for more than $2,000, rendered since that recovered by the defendant. This, probably, would at law be deemed an admission of assets. But at all events, as the bill is totally deficient in equity, except as to the amount paid for the damages and costs, and as no proof, whatever, had been adduced in support of any circumstance of accident, the injunction must be perpetual as to the $40 damages and the $13.33 costs, and the bill must be dismissed with costs as to the residue.

SHIPPING — LOADING OF CARGO — DUTY OF MATE.

[1. It is not the duty of a mate, in loading casks of wine from a lighter, either to work at the fall, or bear off with his own hands the cask from the side, as it is about to come aboard; though both duties are sometimes performed by mates from commendable motives.]

[2. Lightermen, to whom is committed the charge of transporting goods from the shore, and slinging them in the lighter, for hoisting aboard, are responsible for any defect or negligence in the manner of slinging.]

[Cited in Spurr v. Pearson, Case No. 13,268.]

[3. Mates, being appointed by the master, though approved by the owners, are the master's deputies, and the master must share the responsibility when casualties occur; so, also, must the seamen, unless the goods are lost by defective tackle, etc.]

[4. Where a cask of wine was lost while being hoisted aboard by the mate and crew, held that the master, mate, and crew must share the loss with all the rest of the ship's equipage, in proportion to their monthly wages; and the fact that the master had paid off the seamen did not in any wise affect the contribution of the mate.]

load; a cask of wine having been brought along side, and slung, in a lighter, by men not of the crew, was hoisted on board by part of the crew, and the mate, who occasionally assisted at the tackle fall, when the labour was hard. On its arrival at the point of passage over the waist of the ship, which was high, the cask suddenly turned athwart-ships, slipped out of the slings, was stoven, and the wine lost. The wages due the seamen were paid to them without deduction, and the value of the wine was charged solely against the mate. It was alleged that it was the mate's peculiar duty to bear off the cask from the side, while hoisting; which had he performed, the accident would not have happened. Several casks, slung in the same way, had been hoisted in, and no casualty occurred. Many masters of ships were examined. It was the general opinion, as to the duty of the mate, that the bearing the cask off the side was not particularly incumbent on him, though it was often done by a mate, where the hands at the fall were no more than competent to that service. He might order a hand to this duty; but where skids, or other fixtures, for the purpose, were provided, it was not always necessary; and much depended on slinging the cask,—the business of the lightermen.

BY THE COURT. When quarrels and personal dissensions arise between masters and mates, I have often had occasion to make enquiries into the appropriate and respective duty of both. I have generally found great difficulty in ascertaining nice points of alleged duties, (many of them made on the spur) on which my decision must depend. In the present case, proof of two things is required: (1) That the mate was bound to bear off the cask in question. (2) That if it had been so borne off, it was so well slung, that no accident would have occurred. It appears to me that the mate was not obliged, manually either to work at the fall, or bear off the cask from the side; though both are sometimes done by mates, from motives very commendable.

The second requisite, to wit, the slinging the cask, is not in proof, and would in its consequences be merely conjectural. If it was ill slung, the lightermen were solely responsible for the whole loss. Several casks slung in like manner, and none of them borne off the side, had arrived safe into the hold. It therefore depends upon the general principle, and this case is only of consequence, as that applies. If the mate has been guilty of gross negligence, in any point peculiarly his duty, he alone is responsible. And so it is with the master or any officer, or seaman. It does not appear, in this case, that the mate was grossly negligent. On the contrary, he had reason to presume, while engaged at the tackle fall, that this cask was well slung, and would arrive at its berth as others had done. Lightermen to whom is committed the charge of transporting goods from the shore, and slinging them in the lighter, are responsible for this part of the business. So if stevedores are employed, they are responsible for the stowage of a ship. The mate must attend to the taking in, and delivery of the cargo. He must take an account of it, according to established custom. He must exercise a general superintendence under the master, over the whole business; and if any special directions are given, he must obey them: where none are given, he must use common care and discretion, according to the best of his judgment; but he is not solely answerable for casualties. Masters often attempt to fix the sole responsibility on mates, to screen themselves, who, of all others, should constantly exercise the most care, and marked attention. If their engagements, in other duties, or their avocations, throw on the mates the executive duties, they being, (though approved by the owners) selected by the masters, and their deputies, the masters must share responsibilities when casualties occur. So must the seamen generally;—I say generally, because if goods are lost by bad ropes, or other defects of tackle, or furniture, against which they remonstrate, they are acquitted. The law emancipates the watchful, when they warn against impending misfortune,—but it mulcts in contribution the negligent and incautious. The mate in the case before me, must bear his contribution, with all the rest of the ship's equipage, the master included, in proportion to their monthly wages. If the master has improvidently, or with design, paid off the seamen, it has no operation to affect the mate. His contribution is not more or less, on that score. It is a business resting entirely between the master, and those with whom he has thought proper to accommodate. This is often used as a means to introduce the seamen as witnesses, for purposes required by the party who deems their testimony necessary.

Wages decreed, deducting a contribution.

WILSON v. BERRY.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 707.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1826.

ARREST OF JUDGMENT—VARIANCE.

A variance between the capias ad respondendum and the declaration is not a ground for arresting the judgment.

The capias ad respondendum was issued in trespass on the case. The declaration was in covenant upon a sealed instrument covenanting to pay certain debts amounting to $846.47, with interest. The defendant [B. M. Berry] appeared and pleaded "covenants performed," &c., upon which there was an issue, and a verdict for the plaintiff.

Mr. Frost, for defendant, on the 20th of June, 1826, moved in arrest of judgment, on account of the variance between the writ and the declaration, and cited 3 Bl. Comm. 393; 1 Chit. 438, 443.

Mr. Swann, for plaintiff, contended that judgment cannot be arrested for error in process.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. This is a motion in arrest of judgment for variance between the writ of capias ad respondendum and the declaration; the writ being in trespass on the case, and the declaration being in covenant. "Arrests of judgment arise from intrinsic causes appearing on the face of the record; of this kind are (1) Where the declaration varies totally from the original writ; as where the writ is in debt, and the plaintiff declares in an action upon the case for an assumpsit; for the original writ out of chancery being the foundation and warrant of the whole proceedings in the common pleas, if the declaration does not pursue the nature of the writ, the court's authority totally fails." 3 Bl. Comm. 393. In England, pleas in abatement to the count could only be pleaded in actions by original writ. After declaration, formerly, the defendant might demand oyer of the writ, and then, the same being set forth on the roll, if there were any variance between the count and the writ, and a record or specialty, &c., mentioned in the count, the defendant might plead such variance in abatement, or demur; move in arrest of judgment, or sustain error. 1 Chit. Pl. 438; Hole v. Finch, 2 Wils. 394; Com. Dig. "Abatement" G, 8; 3 Instr. Cler. 62; Reg. Pl. 277, 278. But, as the variance between the writ and count could in no case be pleaded without craving oyer of the writ (Hole v. Finch, 2 Wils. 394, 395), and the defendant cannot now have such oyer, such variance or defect is no longer pleadable in abatement, and if it be pleaded in abatement, the plaintiff may sign judgment, or move the court to set the plea aside. 1 Chit. 438; Murray v. Hubbard, 1 Bos. & P. 646, 647; Gray v. Sidneff, 3 Bos. & P. 395; Deshons v. Head, 7 East, 383; Boats v. Edwards, 1 Doug. 227; Spalding v. Mure, 6 Term R. 364. Nor will the court set aside the proceeding, in respect of the variance, as oyer of the writ cannot now be craved. Hole v. Finch, 2 Wils. 393; Oakley v. Giles, 3 East, 167; 1 Chit. 247, 249; Boats v. Edwards, 1 Doug. 227. It is one of the general requisites of a declaration, that it corresponds with the process (Com. Dig. "Pleader," C, 13), and, in bailable actions, with the ac etiam and affidavit to hold the bail (1 Chit. 248).

Regularly the declaration should correspond with the process; but as, according to the present practice of the courts, oyer of the writ cannot be craved, and a variance between the writ and declaration cannot, in any case, be pleaded in abatement (1 Saund. 318, note 3; Gray v. Sidneff, 3 Bos. & P. 395; Spalding v. Mure, 6 Term R. 364), and as there are several instances in which the court will not set aside the proceedings on account of a variance between the writ and declaration, many of the older decisions are no longer applicable in practice. In the king's bench, when the proceedings are by special original, the venue must be laid in the county, into which the original was issued, or, in bailable cases, the bail will be discharged; but in the common pleas the bail would not be discharged by such variance. Smithson v. Smith, Willes, 461; Id., Barnes, 94; Stroud v. Lady Gerrard, 1 Salk. 8; Doo v. Butcher, 3 Term R. 611; Hole v. Finch, 2 Wils. 393; Bac. Abr. tit. "Pleas," I, 11; Tidd, Prac. 582, note i.; Benson v. Derby, 1 Ld. Raym. 249, cont. Chitty (volume 1, p. 254) says: "Upon common process by bill in the king's bench, or upon a capias, or original quare clausum fregit in the common pleas, the plaintiff may declare in any cause of action whatever, although the writ in each case is in trespass. Foster v. Bonner, Cowp. 455. But in bailable actions, the declaration must correspond with the cause and the form of action in the affidavit, and the ac etiam part of the latitat or other process, for otherwise the defendant will be discharged out of custody upon filing common bail; but this will be the only consequence, for the court will not, in such a case, set aside the proceedings for irregularity." And, even "when the proceeding has been by special original, if there be a variance between it and the declaration, the defendant will be discharged on entering a common appearance; but the proceedings will not be set aside merely on account of a variance in the cause of action; and therefore the only consequence of the mistake is, that the plaintiff loses the security of the bail." In Hole v. Finch and Jackson v. Doleman, cited in 2 Wils. 393, the court said: "One reason why the court should not interpose is, that after the defendant hath appeared, and is in court, there is an end of the mesne process; and if the defendant craves oyer, it must be of the original writ; he cannot have it of the mesne process; and if application was to be made to the master of the rolls, he certainly would not refuse to order right originals to be made out in both these cases." In the case of Murray v. Hubbard, 1 Bos. & P. 647, Eyre, C. J., said: "The arrest, however, is not the operation of the writ, but of the mesne process, which is out of the question, after appearance." "The objection to the mesne process being cured by appearance in the true name, the writ, whenever it is properly called for, will be found to be a writ against the party by his true name." "The case, therefore, comes to this, that so long as it is the practice of the court to issue the mesne process first, and to allow an original to be sued out afterwards, if necessary to substantiate the proceedings, no advantage can be taken, after appearance, of a misnomer in mesne process." In Gray v. Sidneff, 3 Bos. & P. 348, Lord Alvanley, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It has been long the practice not to grant oyer of original writs; and though, perhaps, such refusal may be considered in the first instance to have been a strong measure; yet it was the necessary consequence of assuming jurisdiction without original." "When courts adopt a fiction, they must necessarily support it. The court of king's bench would not allow a party to say that he was not in the custody of the marshal; nor the court of exchequer, that he was not the king's debtor. By this doctrine, no right is taken away from the subject, nor is he proceeded against in any way injurious to himself. If such a plea were to be allowed, the master of the rolls would issue a new writ agreeable to the declaration. If the court thinks itself at liberty to proceed without an original, it will never permit a mode of proceeding to be adopted which will have the effect of compelling the plaintiff to sue out that original which the court feels itself justified in acting without." See, also, De-shons v. Head, 7 East, 383; 1 Saund. 318, note 3. In England, neither the original writ, nor the mesne process is entered on the roll, so as to form any part of the record either in the king's bench or common pleas. A record in the king's bench commences in this form: "London, ss. Memorandum that on Monday next, after three weeks of St. Michael, in that term, before our lord the king at Westminster, came R. B. by D. S. his attorney, and brought here into the court of our said lord the king, then and there, his certain bill against C. D. in the custody of the marshal, &c. of a plea of trespass on the case; and there are pledges of prosecution, to wit, John Doe and Richard Roe; which said bill follows in these words, to wit: London, ss. R. B. complains of C. D. in the custody of the marshal of the marshalsea of our lord the king, before the king himself being, for this, to wit," &c. See 1 Modus Inrandi, 1; Barker v. Thorold, 1 Saund. 40. A record in the court of common pleas commences in this form: "Essex, ss. Elizabeth Savil, late of, &c. in the county aforesaid, administratrix, &c. was summoned to answer to Thomas Wallford of a plea that she render to him £300, which she detains from him; whereupon the said Thomas, by John Reynolds, his attorney, says," &c. A record in the king's bench, when sent up by writ of error, is headed thus: "Pleas before our lord the king at Westminster, of the term of the Holy Trinity, in the second year of the reign of our lord James the Second, now king of England," &c. Rot. Cur. Reg. 139; Grey v. Briggs' Adm'r, 1 Lutw. 889. A record from the common pleas is headed thus: "Pleas at Westminster, before George Treby, knight, and his associate justices of our lord the king of the bench, ss. In the term of St. Hilary in the tenth and eleventh years of the reign of our lord William the Third," &c. Rot. Cur. Reg. 1337.

It appears by the case of Longvill v. Hun- dred of Thistleworth, 6 Mod. 27, that judgment cannot be arrested for variance between the original writ and declaration, unless the writ be made part of the record by oyer. There is no case in the books where judgment has been arrested for variance between the declaration and the process. In the case of Bragg v. Digby, 2 Salk. 658, "the defendant without praying oyer of the original writ, pleaded variance between the writ and count, showing particularly wherein; and the plaintiff demurred; and it was adjudged that the defendant should answer over; for he ought to have demanded oyer of the writ before he could take advantage of the variance; because, although the writ is in court, yet not being upon the same roll with the count, the defendant cannot plead to it without demanding oyer." And in Ellery v. Hicks, 4 Mod. 246, upon a motion in arrest of judgment on the ground of a variance between the original writ and declaration, "the exception was disallowed, because the defendant cannot take advantage of an ill original, without demanding oyer of it; which had not been done." See, also, Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. (Va.) 212; Mr. Justice Lyon's opinion. In Lindo v. Gardner, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 344, there is a note of the reporter, intimating that in Maryland the capias ad respondendum is considered as part of the record; but this is the mere dictum of the reporter, unsupported by any authority. In the case of Lowry v. Lawrence, 1 N. Y. Term R. [1 Caines] 71, the court said "that the declaration must be captioned (entitled) of the term when the writ is returned served;" and the court must (from the recital at the head of the declaration, that "heretofore, to wit, on the third Tuesday of July, in July term, 1801, came William Lowry and brought into the said court then and there his certain bill," &c.) "necessarily intend the fact that the writ was returned in July term, 1801, and of course the action, both in fact and technically speaking, commenced previously to that time."

This reasoning shows that the writ itself was not considered as part of the record; because, if the writ itself had been officially before the court, the judges would not have resorted to inference for proof of the time of its issuing or of its return, but would have looked at the writ itself.

Finch, in his "Common Law" (folio 54b, French Ed., p. 172, English Ed. 1759, lib. 3, c. 1), says "such is the commencement of the suit" (that is, the original writ). "The proceeding until judgment consists of two parts, the parol and the process, and this is proved by the form of the writ of error; because in the record and process, and the giving judgment of the plaintiff, &c. Reg. Brev. 116; 8 Coke, 157b. The parol which is called the 'plaint,' is that which depends in plea, namely, all the time until judgment; for after judgment the suit is not said depending. And all this is entered of record in a roll, which is called the 'plea-roll'; but the entry of the original writ in the roll is but superfluous, forasmuch as the writ always remains of record, and is sufficient by itself; but it shall not have any roll, although the contrary is used. Variance in any part of the original writ shall be amended at any time." "Stat. 14, Edw. III. c. 6; 9 Hen. V. c. 4; 4 Hen. VI. c. 3; 8 Hen. VI. cc. 12, 15; 5 Geo. I. c. 13;" 8 Coke, 156b. And again, in page 177 (folio 56a), he says: "After the count, the defendant, for his aid to plead better, shall have oyer, if he demand it, of every thing which is not parcel of the record, as of the writ and return thereof; of an obligation and the condition, and the like." In Arthur Blackamore's Case, 8 Coke, 156b, 157a, Lord Coke says: "So at the common law the judges might amend as well their judgment as any other part of the record, &c., in the same term (Co. Litt. 260a; 5 Coke, 74b), for during the same term, the record is in the breast of the judges, and not in the roll. But at the common law the misprision of clerks, in another term, in the process, was not amendable by the court; for in another term the roll is the record; and therefore by 14 Edw. III. c. 6, it is enacted, &c., that no process shall be annulled," &c. "But this statute doth not extend to an original writ, nor to a writ which is in the nature of an original, for that is not included in this word 'process.'" "Recordum" (in the writ of error), contains "the plea-roll;" "Processus, all the proceedings out of it till judgment." 8 Coke, 157b. "And the first part of the record is the count." 8 Coke, 161a. Blackstone (3 Bl. Comm. 272, 273) says, the original writ, issued out of chancery, "is the foundation of the jurisdiction of the court; being the king's warrant to proceed to the determination of the cause. For it was a maxim, introduced by the Normans, that there should be no proceedings in the common pleas before the king's justices without his original writ; because they held it unfit that those justices, being only substitutes for the crown, should take cognizance of any thing but what was thus expressly referred to their judgment." Fletch. Trustees, bk. 2, c. 34; Gilb. Com. Pl. Introduction, x; Gilb. Com. Pl. 2; Fletch. Trustees, 58. See, also, Finch, 198, as to the definition of process, mesne process, and judicial process. Finch, 168, says: "Until the original writ be returned the suit is not said depending." "nor can the courts hold plea but upon an original returned before them." Gilbert, in his History of the Practice of the Common Pleas (page 26), says: "The appearance of the plaintiff and defendant in propria persona, at the return of the writ, is recorded by the philazer" (the officer who issues process), "because he was to continue the process of the court, till the prothonotary took it upon the declaration, this prothonotary sets forth the authority by which the court proceeded, that the court might appear to have cognizance of the cause, and that they pursued their warrant; and therefore in all actions where the first process is by summons, though he did not appear at the return of the summons, and they had issued several mesne writs, yet they only took notice of the summons, and said summonitus fuit ad respondendum, and so in trespass, attachiatus fuit ad respondendum." See, also pages 96, 97. And in page 42 Gilbert says further: "But where there is a variance between the original and the count, or the bond, and oyer prayed, there the variance may be pleaded, because it was usual for the pleaders to show it to the court and have the writ abated; these, taken down by the prothonotary, were the original of those pleas in abatement; but when the recital of the writ and the count itself were entered on record, if there were any material variance, the defendant might take advantage of it, not only by way of plea, but by motion in arrest of judgment after the verdict, or by a writ of error; because the writ being the foundation and warrant of the whole proceedings, if the plaintiff did not pursue it by his count there was no authority to the court to proceed in such cases."

A mistake in the recital of the writ is immaterial after verdict; and if there be a variance between the recital of the writ, and the count, the court, unless the contrary appears, will, after verdict, intend that there was a good original; and that the plaintiff's clerk had made a mistake in the recital of it. Redman v. Edolph, 1 Saund. 317, 318. Again, in chapter 10, p. 86, Gilbert says "that matter amendable, and matter of form, as the law now stands, will not arrest judgment." And in page 87 he says: "That part of the count which recites the writ, was amendable at common law;" and in page 93: "The writ" (meaning the original writ) "is amendable if there be false Latin, if it be only in the form of the writ; but if it be in the substance it shall not be amendable; for the statute gives the court leave, where they have sufficient authority to proceed, to amend the form, but not to make an authority for themselves by altering the substance of the writ." See, also, Tidd, Prac. 124, and Davis v. Owen, 1 Bos. & P. 343, that the capias is no part of the record, and may be amended.

The result of my reflections is this: In England, the reason why a variance, between the original writ and count, was fatal, was because the original writ was the foundation of the authority of the court to take cognizance of the cause, and the warrant to the judges to proceed to judgment. It was necessary that they should pursue their authority strictly. Their acts, if not warranted by the writ, were void. But as these writs have, for a long time, been grantable of common right, (ex debito justitiæ), and as the jurisdiction of the courts has been so long established, and precisely ascertained, it became apparent to the whole nation, that a particular warrant to the judges, in every case, was wholly unnecessary, and had become a mere matter of form. The judges themselves, finding that justice was often defeated or delayed by exceptions taken to the accidental variance between the count and the writ, even after the parties had pleaded and gone to trial upon the merits, decided that the defendant should not take advantage of such variance without oyer of the writ; and finally that oyer should not be granted when that was the object; and that if a variance appeared between the recital of the writ and the count, they would, after verdict, intend that there was a good original, which had been misrecited by the misprision of the clerk, so that, at this time, no advantage can, in England, be taken of any such variance. In that country the judicial power is not separated from the executive. The king is the source of all judicial authority. In theory, he himself is supposed to exercise judicial power. The judges are his delegates or substitutes, and can hear no cause unless it be referred to them by the king, or be brought before them by his order. Hence the necessity, at first, of original writs. But in this country the judicial power is a separate branch of the national sovereignty. It does not emanate from the executive; and after being organized by the legislature it is independent of both. It exercises its functions suo jure, although the jurisdiction of each particular tribunal is described and defined by the legislature at the time of its erection. It is not necessary that each particular case should be referred to the court by a higher authority. It requires no original writ to warrant its proceedings. Every person has access to it, as of common right. It is bound to hear and determine every case, brought judicially before it, of which it has jurisdiction. The writ which is issued to compel the appearance of the defendant, is what, in England, is called "process," issued from the court itself, and not an original writ issuing from another tribunal. Although it may be called the "original writ" because it is the first writ which issues in the cause, yet it has not the qualities of the English original writ; and no variance between it and the count can abate it, because it is not the foundation of the authority of the court; and if it could be thus abated, the abatement of the process, issuing from the court itself, could not deprive the court of that cognizance of the cause which it must have had before it issued the process.

There is no instance, in the English books, of a plea in abatement, or of an arrest of judgment for variance between the count and the process. Such variance is seldom noticed, unless it affect the interest of third parties, as in bailable cases, or unless it be very material. The mode of taking advantage of such variance, is not by plea, but by motion, either to discharge the bail, or to set aside the proceedings for irregularity. It is a motion to the discretion of the court; not as a matter of strict right; and the court varies the remedy according to the justice of the case. 1 Chit. Pl. 248, 254. When we find that the English courts have deemed it necessary for the purposes of justice to throw obstacles in the way of taking advantage of a variance between the original writ and the count, and that no advantage, by way of plea, or motion in arrest of judgment can there be taken of a variance between the process and the count, it would seem strange that we, who have no original writ sent to us as the foundation of our jurisdiction, should decide that the process is abated by its variance from the declaration; or that judgment should be arrested for that cause. The English doctrine, respecting the original writ, is wholly inapplicable to our courts; and a doctrine which for its injustice and inconvenience, has been reprobated there, ought not to be gratuitously assumed here. The reason why, in England, judgment was arrested for variance between the original writ and count, was, that the court had no jurisdiction of the cause actually prosecuted; and it is never too late, before judgment, to show that the court has no authority to give the judgment which is asked. But in this country an error in the process does not affect the jurisdiction or authority of the court, especially when the defendant has appeared upon that process and pleaded to the action. The process is only the means of bringing the defendant into court. If he appear and do not object to the process, nor move to be discharged on account of its irregularity, but submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court, it is immaterial by what sort of process he is brought in.

But it may be asked, shall a man arrested for trespass, be obliged to answer to the plaintiff in an action of debt? In answer, it may be asked, why not here as well as in England? No inconvenience is felt there in this course of proceeding. The only objection would be on behalf of the bail, and he might be relieved on motion.

I think it quite immaterial whether the capias ad respondendum, be, or be not, part of the record; for if it be, a variance between it and the count is not fatal, for the reasons before stated; and if it be not a part of the record, the variance does not judicially appear, and cannot be noticed by the court.

The motion in arrest of judgment is overruled.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This case was removed from the state court under the act of congress, and a motion is now made to dismiss it, on the ground that some of the defendants are citizens of the state. Blodget & Co. are citizens of Massachusetts; and it appearing that the defendants, who are citizens of the state, are mere agents, and against whom no decree is prayed, and whose names may be stricken out of the pleadings, as they are not necessary parties, it is contended the jurisdiction should be sustained. It is clear that no suit can be removed from the state court by either party where some of the parties, plaintiffs or defendants, are citizens of the state where the suit is brought, and others of a different state. The motion to dismiss is granted.

WILSON v. BOYCE.

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1873.²

LIEN OF THE STATE OF MISSOURI UPON THE RAILROADS FOR STATE BONDS—LEGISLATION OF THE STATE CONSTRUED.

1. Under the act of the Missouri legislature of March 3d, 1857, bonds issued by the state to the several railroad companies receiving them "constituted a first lien or mortgage upon the road and property" of said companies. Held, that the lien of the state under this statutory mortgage extended to lands which had before that time been granted by congress to aid in the construction of the road, and by the state to the railroad company, and that the lien of the state was not confined to the road and such property immediately connected with the road as was necessary for its operation.

2. A title to such lands derived from the state (which subsequently foreclosed its lien) is superior to a title derived from the railroad company, by deed made by the company, after it had accepted the provisions of the act of March 3d, 1857, giving the state a first lien on the "road and property" of the company.

This is an action of ejectment for a tract of land in Scott county, in this state. The tract in dispute is part of a large body of land acquired by the state of Missouri under the act of congress, entitled "An act granting the right of way, and making a grant of land to the states of Arkansas and Missouri to aid in the construction of a railroad from a point on the Mississippi, opposite the mouth of the Ohio river, via Little Rock, to the Texas boundary, near Fulton, in Arkansas, with branches to Fort Smith and the Mississippi river," approved February 9th, 1853 (Railroad Laws, p. 5). The lands thus granted by the act of congress were afterwards granted by the state to the Cairo & Fulton Railroad Company of Missouri, by act of the general assembly of February 20th, 1855. The plaintiff [Blakely Wilson] and defendant [Peter Boyce] each claims under the Cairo & Fulton Railroad Company of Missouri as a common source of title. The plaintiff claims to have derived the title of the Cairo & Fulton Railroad Company of Missouri by means of the following instruments:—(1) A deed from the Cairo & Fulton Railroad Company, of date May 23d, 1857, to John Moore, John Wilson, and Albert G. Waterman, in trust, with power of sale. [This paper bears date May 23d, 1857, though the resolution of the board, which is the authority on which it rests, was made March 8th, 1858, and the certificates of acknowledgement are dated respectively April 30th, May 7th, and 14th, 1858, so that for some reason the document was given a false date.] (2) An instrument purporting to be a deed from Moore, Wilson, and Waterman, trustees, of date November 25th, 1859, to one H. S. Hamilton. (3) A deed bearing date March 29th, 1860, from H. S. Hamilton to Walter A. Stevens. (4) A deed of date November 23d, 1860, from Walter A. Stevens to Blakely Wilson, the plaintiff. The defendant, who is tenant in possession, claims that Thomas Allen, his landlord, has derived the title of the Cairo & Fulton Railroad Company of Missouri by means of two certain statutory mortgages put upon its property by the railroad company, and by the proceedings that were subsequently had for the foreclosure of said mortgages.

The first of the two mortgages was created under the act of the general assembly, entitled "An act to expedite the construction of the Cairo & Fulton Railroad of Missouri," passed December 11th, 1855. The first section of the act made provision for the issuing of the bonds of the state, and the delivery of them to the railroad company, to aid the company in the building of its road. The second section forbade the delivery of the state bonds to the company until the acceptance thereof should be signified to the secretary of state by a certificate of the company filed in the secretary's office. The third section provides that "each certificate of acceptance so executed and filed as aforesaid, shall be recorded in the office of the secretary of state, and shall thereupon become and be, according to all intents and purposes, a mortgage of the road, and every part and section thereof, and its appurtenances to the people of this state, for securing the payment of the principal and interest of the sums of money for which such bonds shall from time to time be issued and accepted as aforesaid." State bonds, amounting to $250,000, were delivered to the railroad company under this act after March 3d, 1857. The second of the two mortgages arose under the act of the 3d day of March, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act to secure the completion of certain railroads in this state, and for other purposes," approved December 10th, 1855. By the 20th section of the act there was "granted to the Cairo & Fulton Railroad Company an additional loan of $400,000." By the 17th section it was provided that "all bonds issued under the provisions of this act shall constitute a first lien or mortgage upon the road and property of the several companies so receiving them, in the same manner as provided by the act approved February 22d, 1851, to expedite the construction of the Pacific Railroad, and of the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad, and the act approved December 10th, 1855, of which this is amendatory." On the 19th day of October, 1857, the board of directors adopted a resolution accepting the provisions of the act of the 3d day of March, 1857, as required by the 16th section of the act and afterwards, in due time filed a copy of it in the secretary's office, and thereupon the amount of bonds granted by the act were issued and delivered to the railroad company, and the company in due form filed in the secretary of state's office the certificates of acceptance required by the 4th section of the act of February 22d, 1851. The railroad company having made default in the payment of the interest on these bonds, and remaining in default for a number of years, the general assembly passed the act of the 19th day of February, 1866, called the "Sell-Out Law" (Laws of Adjourned Session of 1866, p. 108), by which provision was made for the foreclosure of the mortgages and for the sale of the mortgaged property. Pursuant to the provisions of the act just cited, a sale of everything that belonged to the railroad company in foreclosure of these mortgages was made, at which the state became the purchaser, and the state thereupon re-sold to McKay, Reed, Vogel, and Simmons, who afterwards sold and conveyed to Allen, the defendant's landlord. The plaintiff's counsel, in the progress of the trial, conceded that if the state's mortgages covered the property in dispute, the defendant's landlord had, by means of the proceedings shown in evidence, acquired a good title.

Mr. Clover, for plaintiff.

Dryden & Dryden, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This is an action of ejectment. The parties have stipulated that the title to the land in controversy was at one time in the Cairo & Fulton Railroad Company, and it is under the company that each party claims to derive title—the plaintiff under a deed made by the trustees of the company, November 25th, 1859, to one Hamilton; the defendant under an alleged first mortgage lien in favor of the state of Missouri and its subsequent foreclosure, and the sale of the land by the state to the grantors of the defendant's landlord.

It was admitted on the trial by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, that if the state had a lien upon this land by virtue of the statutory mortgages in its favor, created either by the act of December 11th, 1855, or the amendatory act of March 3d, 1857, the title was subsequently acquired under a foreclosure of its lien by the state, and by it conveyed to the grantors of the landlord of the defendant. One question, if decided in favor of the defendant, as we think it must be, is decisive of the case, and that is: Did the lien or mortgage in favor of the state under the act of 1855, or 1857, embrace or extend to the lands of the company which were granted by congress to the state, and by the state to the company, to aid in the construction of its road?

The point of the controversy is just here: The plaintiff admits that the state had, by virtue of these acts, a first lien upon the road and all the lands necessary to its use and operation as a railroad, but denies that this lien extended to the lands of the company, which had been granted to it by congress to aid, by a mortgage or sale thereof, in the construction of its road. On the other hand, the defendant contends that to secure the state for the bonds issued to the company under the acts named, the state stipulated for, and the company consented to give, a first lien, not only upon the road and its appurtenances, but as well upon the other property of the company, including its lands.

By the act of December 11th, 1855, when accepted by the company as it was, there was created a first mortgage in favor of the state upon "the road and every part and section thereof, and its appurtenances." But, by the amendatory act of March 3d, 1857, the language was changed, and it was provided that "all bonds issued under the provisions of this act shall constitute a first lien or mortgage upon the road and property of the several companies so receiving them, in the same manner as provided by the act approved February 25th, 1851, to expedite the construction of the Pacific Railroad, and the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad, and the act approved December 10th, 1855, of which this is amendatory."

All of the state bonds to the Cairo & Fulton Railroad Company were issued after the act of 1857 was passed and its provisions had been accepted by the company; and the act was accepted by the company prior to the time when it authorized the execution of the conveyance of its lands in trust to Moore, Wilson, and Waterman. Indeed, the conveyance to these trustees in terms refers to the acts of 1853 and 1857, and recognizes the priority of the state to the extent provided for in these acts; but in reciting that upon which the lien of the state attached, the language of the act of 1855 is followed, and the word "property," used in the act of 1857, omitted, apparently ex industria.

It is unnecessary to consider whether the lien provided for in the act of 1853 upon "the road and every part and section thereof, and its appurtenances," extended to the lands which had been granted by congress, because the state was equally entitled to the security provided for in the act of 1857, which was "a first lien or mortgage upon the road and property of the company."

This legislation has been construed by the supreme court of Missouri. Whitehead v. Vineyard, 50 Mo. 30. In the case just cited that court decided that, by the act of 1857, the state's lien extended to "all the corporate property of the companies named in the act," to lands as well as to the road proper, and even to lands subsequently acquired by the companies, as well as to those owned by them when the act was passed. We do not stop to inquire whether the nature of the case is such (the state having been a party in interest) that the construction of the state legislation by the highest tribunal of the state should not conclude us; for it will be admitted that a different judgment is not to be here pronounced, resulting in disturbing or overturning titles held good in the state tribunals, unless the opinion of the state supreme court is clearly erroneous.

Upon the best consideration we have been able to give to the subject, we concur in the opinion that by the act of 1857, however it would have been under the act of 1855, the lien of the state extended to the lands as well as to the road proper and its appurtenances.

We mention briefly the reasons that give support to this conclusion:—

1. The anxiety of the state to have full security is manifest on the face of all the enactments relating to the subject, and hence the provision for a first lien or mortgage, which was not only to be upon the road, but upon the property of the company.

2. The terms "road and property" are general and comprehensive, and as the word "property" was specially inserted in the latter enactment, it must be supposed, particularly in legislation of such great moment, that it was advisedly done either to close doubts, or to extend the lien to property which would not be embraced by the words "road and its appurtenances." The lien extends not only to the road, but in addition to the property of the company—to property which would not or might not be embraced by the language "road and appurtenances." What property was meant? What so likely as the lands of the struggling companies, which, without the aid of the state by bonds, were unable to go on with their enterprises, and what more appropriately than lands falls within the comprehensive term property?

3. If the lands of the company be excluded from the mortgage, it is difficult to give a construction to the act which will give any adequate or considerable significance to the word property.

The plaintiff's counsel argues that the act of 1857 "gave the state a mortgage upon nothing other than the road and property of the company held for the purpose of the road," and he adds: "The term property can be well satisfied without giving it the interpretation of including all the land granted the road, not for its purposes of a railroad corporation, but in aid of the construction of the road. The term property is evidently meant to include, and to include nothing more, than the road-bed, rails upon it, turn-outs, depots, erections, buildings, franchises, locomotives, passenger and freight cars, hand cars, tenders, tools, machinery, materials, etc. and all property as part and necessary part of the entire establishment, movable or immovable, essential to the production of tolls and revenue."

But would not all this, or substantially all this, unless it be the franchise of being a corporation, be covered by a mortgage upon the road of the company, or the road and its appurtenances?

Under this view the defendant's landlord has the title, and this makes it unnecessary to determine whether the plaintiff would also fail for the reason that the deed to Hamilton was never executed or delivered by the trustees so as to be operative as a conveyance of the lands described therein.

Judgment for the defendant.

NOTE. A special finding of facts was made, and the case taken to the supreme court, [where the above judgment was affirmed. 92 U. S. 320]. Further, as to legislation of the state of Missouri in aid of railways, and the rights of the grantees of the state, see Murdock v. Woodson [Case No. 9,942].

WILSON v. BRINKMAN et al.

[2 N. B. R. 468 (Quarto, 149); 1 Chi. Leg. News, 193; 2 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 65.]¹

District Court, E. D. Missouri. March Term, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—INSOLVENT MERCHANT—UNLAWFUL PREFERENCES.

1. A merchant or trader who cannot pay his debts, in the ordinary course of his business, is insolvent.

2. A creditor who knows that his debtor cannot pay all his debts in the ordinary course of his business, has reasonable cause to believe his debtor to be insolvent, and will not be allowed to secure, by confessions of judgment and the levy of executions, any preference over other creditors, and the assignee in bankruptcy may recover the property seized and taken upon executions under such judgments, or the value thereof.

[Cited in Martin v. Toof, Case No. 9,167; Goodenow v. Milliken, Id. 5,535; Haskell v. Ingalls, Id. 6,193; Strain v. Gourdin, Id. 13,521.]

A petition was filed by creditors against August Brinkman, of Cape Girardeau, alleging several acts of bankruptcy, by the confession of judgment to several creditors with a view of giving them a preference, and by procuring and suffering his goods to be taken in execution with a view of giving a preference. At the hearing of the rule to show cause, these charges of acts of bankruptcy were withdrawn, and the act charged that he, August Brinkman, being a merchant and trader, had fraudulently suspended payment of his commercial paper and had not resumed within fourteen days. This charge was confessed and the party adjudged a bankrupt, and the plaintiff was subsequently appointed assignee. The assignee after his appointment filed his bill in chancery against the defendants, alleging that on February 4th, 1868, the said August Brinkman, being insolvent, and in contemplation of insolvency and in contemplation of bankruptcy, he being then a resident of Cape Girardeau county, did, with a view of giving a preference to the defendants, Ernest Brinkman, Louis Stortz, and Fritz Johns, who were then creditors of said August Brinkman, and had good reason to believe him insolvent and to be acting in contemplation of bankruptcy and in contemplation of insolvency, go to Commerce, in Scott county, and there confessed judgments in favor of said Ernest for three thousand six hundred and forty dollars, of Fritz Johns for two hundred and sixty-two dollars and sixty-five cents, of said Louis Stortz for three hundred and ten dollars, and that on said several judgments executions were issued to the defendant, Herman Bader, who was then sheriff of Cape Girardeau county, and delivered to said sheriff, who on February 11, 1868, levied the said writs by seizing the stock of goods in the store of said August Brinkman in Cape Girardeau, together with the books, notes, and accounts, and also by levying the same upon certain real estate; that said sheriff sold the stock of goods for the sum of three thousand one hundred and nineteen dollars, on February, 1868, and sold said real estate for the sum of fifty dollars, and collected of said notes and accounts the sum of two hundred and seventy-seven dollars and twenty-five cents, making a total of three thousand four hundred and forty-six dollars and twenty-five cents; that said August Brinkman did thereby suffer and procure his goods and property to be seized on execution, with a view of giving a fraudulent preference to his said creditor, and with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy and from being distributed under the provisions of the bankrupt act. The defendant Bader answered, setting out the delivery to him of the writs fieri facias, and his proceedings thereunder, showing a balance in his hands after deducting costs and commissions, and submitting himself to the judgment of the court. The defendants, Ernest Brinkman, Stortz, and Johns, answered, setting forth that the debts for which said judgments were confessed were honestly due them; denying that they had reason to believe that said August Brinkman was insolvent, or that he was acting in contemplation of insolvency or in fraud of the provisions of the act of congress [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and denying that said judgments were voluntarily confessed by said August Brinkman, with a view of giving a fraudulent preference; and alleging that August Brinkman was induced to give said confessions of judgment by the earnest solicitations of the defendants, and by the operating upon his fears, and thus inducing him to go to Commerce with them and to confess said judgments, and claiming that they, by thus procuring said judgments and causing said executions to be levied, had exercised only their legal rights in the premises.

To this answer the plaintiffs filed a replication, and the case was heard upon bill, answer, replication, and proofs. Depositions were taken upon both sides. The evidence showed that the judgments were confessed by August Brinkman by his appearing in person before the Scott circuit court, and authorizing judgments to be entered upon notes given by him immediately before the date of the judgments for debts then due by him, in good faith and for a good consideration; that said August Brinkman was in fact insolvent and unable to pay his debts in the ordinary course of his business; that he was hard pressed by some of his St. Louis creditors, and that attachments had been threatened and even issued, but not levied, for fear there was not sufficient ground to sustain them. The testimony offered by the plaintiff tended to show that August Brinkman well knew his condition, as did also his judgment creditors, and that he was determined to take care of his friends; and that in going to Scott county he was not influenced by fear of any of the parties in favor of whom he confessed the judgment. The testimony offered by the defendants tended to show that in confessing the judgments, he was influenced by the pressure and urgent solicitations of the judgment creditors; that the attorney of the creditors sent for him to come down to Commerce, and induced him to confess said judgments, and that said confessions were obtained by the pressure brought to bear upon him, and were not voluntary upon his part.

TREAT, District Judge. Upon a review of the facts of the case, without going through all the testimony presented, it is sufficient to say that it appears that August Brinkman knew that he was insolvent, and unable to pay all his debts, and, being hard pressed by some of his creditors, he determined to take care of his friends, who procured the executions to be issued with the purpose of getting ahead of the other creditors. The evidence really presents a case of a confederation between a debtor in failing circumstances and some of his creditors, by which the debtor confessed judgments with the intention of giving a preference to some, over the other, creditors. It is claimed by the respondents that the confessions of judgment were procured by their urgent solicitations, and by a pressure brought to bear upon the debtor, and by appealing to his fears, so that the confessions were not voluntary upon his part, but extorted from him by a kind of duress. The evidence shows no such case, but presents one of a purpose formed to accomplish what the bankrupt act forbids. Under the present act there is no discrimination between cases of voluntary or involuntary preference. This matter has been well considered in the decision lately made by the United States district court in Michigan, in the case of Foster v. Hackley [Case No. 4,971], which discusses fully the provisions of sections thirty-six and thirty-nine of the act, and concludes that where the creditor has reasonable cause to believe that the act done was in fraud of the bankrupt act, or that there was an intention to prevent the property of the bankrupt from being equally distributed, that a fraud is worked, and the operation of the act is impeded; and that a conveyance of all his property by a debtor to one creditor, or set of creditors, is evidence of such intention; for if the transaction will, in fact, impede the operation of the statute, the parties must be supposed to know the consequence of their acts.

It is immaterial whether the confessions of judgments were voluntary or involuntary, and procured by pressure upon the debtor, and as the judgment creditors sought to procure a preference over other creditors, the assignee may proceed to recover the property which has been seized and sold by the sheriff under the executions issued upon these judgments. It is claimed that the preference thus supposed to be obtained was not a voluntary preference given by the debtor, but was obtained from the debtor by operating upon his fears, and that the presence of the prosecuting attorney, who was also the attorney of the creditors, operated to produce such fears. But the attorney tells us that when he saw the bankrupt he assured him that there was no danger; and it is apparent from the evidence that, whatever threats may have been made, they did not proceed from these judgment creditors; and then the bankrupt proceeded to do an act which exposed him to penalties provided in the act. A trader is insolvent when he cannot pay his debts in the ordinary course of trade and business. Here was a debtor in failing circumstances, against whom attachments had been issued, who enters into a contrivance to defeat the attachments and the impending levy thereof. The whole proceeding was fraudulent and void under the provisions of the statute. A decree will be entered for the value of the property sold by the sheriff; and as no evidence is presented of such value, except the amount of the sales made by him, the decree will be for the gross amount of the sales as returned in his answer, and the judgment creditors must be left to pay the costs of their own suits. The court, upon the statement of the counsel for the parties, that the suit had been conducted by a sort of amicable arrangement, for the purpose of fairly testing the questions of law, so far modified its decree as to adjudge the sheriff to pay over to the assignee the net instead of the gross amount of sales.

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. 1873.
BANKRUPTCY—EXECUTION CREDITORS—PRIORITY—INJUNCTION.

1. The right of an execution creditor or a landlord, upon a warrant of distress, is paramount to that of the assignee in bankruptcy, where the execution or warrant of distress was issued before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. Marshall v. Knox [16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 551] cited and followed.

2. An injunction will be refused when there has been a failure to file a bill in equity, as there is, in such a case, nothing upon which a motion for an injunction can rest.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. As nearly the whole of this week has been occupied with the argument of these cases, there is no time to elaborate an opinion upon the points submitted. All the court can do is to state the result, and the simple principle which must govern us in these, and in all like cases in the future. The recent decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Marshall v. Knox [16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 551], must control us. It is there held, that where an execution has issued from a state court, and a levy has been made before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, the possession of the assets cannot be obtained by the assignee. The latter, in such cases, is only entitled to such residue as may remain in the sheriff's hands, after the debt for which the execution issued has been satisfied. As by the laws of Pennsylvania the execution is a lien upon all the personal property of the defendant from the moment it reaches the sheriff's hands, the right of the execution creditors, or of a landlord, upon a warrant issued before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, is paramount to the assignee in bankruptcy, and will control the fund as against the general creditors. But inasmuch as no bills in equity have been filed in any of these cases there is nothing upon which a motion for an injunction can rest, it for this reason must be disallowed, independent of any question upon the merits. The preliminary order is dismissed.

WILSON et al. v. CITY BANK.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1838.

FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTIONAL AVERMENTS—ALIENAGE OF PARTY—CORPORATIONS—CITIZENSHIP OF CORPORATORS.

1. It is not sufficient to give jurisdiction to the courts of the United States, to allege, that a party is an alien. There must also be an allegation, that he is a subject or citizen of some one foreign state.

[Cited in Prentiss v. Brennan, Case No. 11, 385; Hinckley v. Byrne, Id. 6,510.]

2. Nor is it sufficient to give jurisdiction, where a corporation is a party, to allege, that all the corporators are citizens of the United States. There must be an allegation, that the corporators are all citizens of some one or more state or states of the United States.

[Cited in Commercial Bank of Commerce v. Green, Case No. 3,059.]

3. The circuit court has jurisdiction to aid in enforcing the judgment of a state court.

4. In the case of a bill against a banking corporation, to account for certain property held by them, as collateral security for debts due them from a third person, and to apply the surplus, after satisfying themselves, to the plaintiff's debt, the debtor is a necessary party to the bill.

Bill in equity. The bill alleged, that the plaintiffs (Fletcher Wilson, Melville Wilson, and Gabriel Shaw, bankers and co-partners, under the firm of Thomas Wilson & Co.) were of London, in England, and aliens to each and all of the United States; that S. G. Williams, June 1, 1837, being then of Boston, but now of New York, out of the jurisdiction of this court, was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £7,000 on a balance of account, and refusing to pay the same, the plaintiffs sued out a writ against the said Williams, in the court of common pleas for the county of Suffolk, in Massachusetts; and subsequently recovered damages against him for $30,000 and upwards, on which execution issued, and was delivered to the sheriff, who returned nulla bona; that Williams, before execution issued, left the state, insolvent, and has not since been within its jurisdiction. That the said Williams heretofore transferred stocks, lands, goods, and choses in action to the defendants, a corporation, all the members whereof were citizens of these United States, to secure the payment of certain notes he owed to them; that such property was more than sufficient to pay claims of the defendants, and that the residue ought to be applied to the payment of the plaintiff's claim. The bill concluded with a prayer, that an account might be taken of the principal and interest due on the plaintiff's claim against Williams, and of what was due from him to the defendants, and of the property held as security therefor; and that the same be applied to the payment thereof, and the residue to payment of the plaintiffs' judgment; and that the defendants be restrained from conveying the property.

To the bill the defendants put in a demurrer, on various grounds. (1) Because the bill alleged that the plaintiffs were aliens; but did not allege that they were citizens or subjects of any foreign state. (2) Because the bill alleged that the defendants were a corporation created by a law of Massachusetts, and that all the members were citizens of the United States; but did not allege that they were citizens of Massachusetts. (3) Because the bill sought to enforce the judgment of the court of common pleas of Massachusetts, a court foreign to the United States court. (4) Because the bill sought an account between the plaintiffs and Williams, and also between the defendants and Williams; and that Williams' property should be applied to the payment of their respective claims; yet did not make him a party, and expressly alleged that he was out of the jurisdiction of the court.

F. C. Loring and P. Blair, for defendants, in support of the demurrer.

I. As to the first ground of demurrer. The words of the constitution of the United States, relative to the jurisdiction of the judiciary, are "controversies between a state or citizens thereof, and foreign states, or citizens or subjects." The judiciary act is broader in its language, giving jurisdiction generally, where an alien is a party. But this has always been restricted in construction to the provisions of the constitution. There may be aliens who are not citizens or subjects of any foreign state, recognized by the law of nations; as, for instance, persons born and residing in piratical settlements, not recognized by any state or country. Abercrombie v. Dupuis, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 243; 3 Day, 294; Society for Propagation of Gospel v. Wheeler [Case No. 13,156]; Brown v. Keene, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 114.

II. As to the second ground of demurrer, they cited Picquet v. Swan [Case No. 11,134]; Birethpaut v. Bank of Georgia, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 238; Story, Eq. Pl. 384; Emery v. Greenough, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 369; Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 382; Strawbridge v. Curtis, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 267; Hope Ins. Co. v. Boardman, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 57; Kitchen v. Strawbridge [Case No. 7,854]; Butler v. Farnsworth [Id. 2,240]; Kirkpatrick v. White [Id. 7,850].

III. As to the third ground of demurrer. That the several states are in some respects foreign to each other, has been held in a variety of cases; a familiar instance of which is, that a bill of exchange drawn in one state on a person in another is a foreign bill. That the United States courts are foreign to the state courts, was held by Parsons, C. J., in Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 461. The circuit court has no jurisdiction to enjoin the judgment of a state court, nor a state court to enjoin a judgment of the circuit court. Diggs v. Wolcott, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 179; McKim v. Voorhis, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 279. These courts are foreign to each other, in the same sense in which the courts of the several states are foreign to each other. Their powers are derived from different sovereignties. Would a court of the state of New York give the relief sought in this case? Would the court of chancery in England lend its aid to enforce a judgment of a court of Scotland, or Ireland, or of a foreign power? There, no authority has been found to maintain such a position. The court of chancery will not aid the jurisdiction of an inferior court.

IV. As to the fourth ground of demurrer. That Williams can be made a party is fully established in the case of Picquet v. Swan [supra], and also by numerous other decisions in the United States courts. See, also, the 11th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 78]. That he is an essential and necessary, and not a mere formal or passive, party seems obvious. The bill seeks that accounts may be taken between him and the defendants, and also between him and the complainants, and that his property may be applied to the payment of the amounts to them respectively found to be owing. How are these accounts to be taken in his absence? How is the debt alleged to be owing to the defendants to be ascertained? It must depend entirely on the answer of the defendants, and they may state it to be what they please, and Williams has no opportunity to contradict or contest it. How is the plaintiffs' debt to be established? Their judgment may have been paid in whole or in part; or they may hold collateral security for its payment; or there may be an agreement, not unusual, that the judgment shall not be enforced within a limited time. But if this suit can be brought to a final decree without making him a party, a large amount of his property may be conclusively disposed of in the payment of fictitious claims, and be irretrievably lost to him. The general rule is, that a suit cannot proceed where a party, whose interests are sought to be affected, is out of the jurisdiction. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 83, 84, 416, 543; Browne v. Blunt, 2 Russ. & M. 83; U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108; Roveroy v. Grayson, 3 Swanst. 145; Pierson v. Robinson, 3 Swanst. 140; West v. Randall [Case No. 17,424]; Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 69; Caldwell v. Taggart, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 190.

C. P. and B. R. Curtis, for plaintiffs, spoke against the demurrer.

I. As to the first ground of demurrer. The judiciary act gives jurisdiction where an alien is a party. The bill avers, that the plaintiffs are aliens. It pursues the language of the act of congress, of course this act is interpreted as consistent with the constitution, and the word "alien" is, therefore, held to be "a foreign citizen, or subject." Picquet v. Swan [supra]. So, by the averment in the bill, that the plaintiffs are aliens, the language of the judiciary act, and the meaning of the constitution are both satisfied. None of the authorities cited by the defendants' counsel seem to have the least application.

II. As to the second ground of demurrer: (1) All the cases where the plaintiffs were citizens, and the defendants also, were citizens of the United States, are to be laid aside, because there the jurisdiction depended on the fact, that the parties were citizens of different states, and of course it ought to appear of what particular state they were citizens; here, the jurisdiction is claimed because an alien is a party. (2) Those cases are to be laid aside, in which an alien has sued a citizen who was abroad; for there the difficulty arose out of the absence of the defendant from the jurisdiction, so that he could not be served with process; while here, the only party to be served with process exists within this district, is created by a law of Massachusetts, has been served with process, and has appeared. In this case all the plaintiffs are aliens, all the persons defendant are citizens, and the only party which can be served with process is found in this district, has been served, and is before the court. (3) Those cases are to be laid aside, in which it is held, that the court has jurisdiction only where one party is a citizen of the state where the suit is brought, for that applies only where both parties are citizens. These views seem to dispose of the cases cited on the other side.

III. As to the third ground of demurrer. There is certainly a broad distinction between enjoining a judgment of a state court, and aiding the judgment creditor, to procure satisfaction of his judgment. It is not true, that Parsons, C. J., decided in the case in 9 Mass. 462. that the United States courts are foreign to the state courts. The whole extent of his decision is, that the judgments of the courts of other states are not domestic judgments in Massachusetts, and he expressly says, that such judgments are not to be considered as foreign judgments. Page 469. The case of Bean v. Smith [Case No. 1,174] is in point for the plaintiffs.

IV. As to the fourth ground of demurrer. It is admitted that Williams is a proper party, but not that he is so far a necessary party, that the court cannot proceed without him. As to the objection that his interests will be affected in taking an account of what is due from the defendants to him, this by no means necessarily follows. For if the defendants state an account, and pay over to the plaintiffs the balance they admit, Williams will not be precluded from calling on them for a new account, and not being a party to the first suit, he would be in no way affected by the proceedings therein, except just so far as the defendants had discharged themselves by paying his debt to the plaintiffs. It is true that a court of equity will not ordinarily undertake to do any equity unless they can settle the whole controversy; but we take it to be clearly settled, that the courts of the United States are, from their peculiar constitution, subject to such extreme difficulties in following out strictly the rules of the English chancery courts as to parties, that they very early found it necessary to depart from those rules, or suffer their own usefulness to be crippled and all but destroyed, and that it is now a fixed principle in this court, that the court will entertain jurisdiction, and do all the equity they can, between the parties before the court, although it is not possible thus to terminate the whole controversy. In Child v. Brace, 4 Paige, 309, the chancellor decided, that it was not absolutely necessary to make the co-defendants in the judgment, parties, and it seems to us that most of the reasons which apply to one defendant apply to all. In U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108, the court do not seem to consider it absolutely necessary, that the debtor should be before the court, though it is undoubtedly proper, that he should be made a party if possible.

STORY, Circuit Justice, held, that the demurrer was good, as to the first, second, and fourth causes of demurrer; but not for the third.

1. The bill ought to have alleged, that the plaintiff was a subject or citizen of some one foreign state.

2. The allegation ought to have been, that the incorporators were all citizens of some one or more state or states of the United States.

3. The circuit court has jurisdiction to aid in enforcing the judgment of a state court.

4. That Williams was a necessary party to the bill.

PROOF OF PARTNERSHIP—PAROL EVIDENCE.

To prove a partnership, parol evidence cannot be given of the contents of printed cards, bearing their joint names, nor are the cards themselves evidence unless traced to the defendant. Nor can general reputation of partnership be given in evidence.

Indebitatus assumpsit for board, lodging, and washing, of Michael Coleman & Owens Lyons, and Richardson their apprentice. The witness spoke of printed cards which he had seen bearing their joint names.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, Lyons, objected to evidence respecting the cards, unless they were produced and traced up to the defendant.

THE COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent) said they must produce the cards; they could not give parol evidence of their contents.

John Hewitt, for plaintiff [Eliza Wilson] asked the witness whether the defendants were not generally reputed partners.

Mr. Jones objected, and THE COURT decided the question to be improper.

ACCEPTANCE—FRAUDULENT POSSESSION.

If the plaintiff obtain possession of the defendant's acceptance, by a fraudulent practice, he cannot recover upon it.

Assumpsit on acceptance of an inland bill. The defendant proved that upon the assumption of J. H. Barney in writing, to pay the debt, the acceptance was given up by A. & W. Bowyer to the defendant to be cancelled. That afterwards, the plaintiff, under pretence of a wish to see the bill, to calculate the interest upon Barney's assumption, got possession of it, and then gave up to Barney his assumption, and insisted upon keeping the bill.

Mr. Baker, for plaintiff, contended that A. & W. Bowyer, to whom the bill was sent for collection, were only special agents to receive the money of Cromwell, and, in default of payment, to bring suit. That if such was the only authority of the Bowyers, and they gave it up without any other consideration than J. H. Barney's assumption, they exceeded their authority, and it was improperly obtained; and therefore it was proper in the plaintiff to get possession of the bill in the manner he did. And that it would support the action; and prayed the instruction of the court to that effect. Esp. N. P. 109.

But THE COURT refused to give such instruction; and upon the prayer of Mr. Morsell, for defendant, THE COURT instructed the jury that if they should be of opinion that the Bowyers came into possession of the bill by authority of the plaintiff for the purpose of collection, and they gave it up to the defendant to be cancelled, without any fraud on the part of the defendant, and the plaintiff afterwards obtained possession of the bill by a fraudulent and deceitful practice, the plaintiff could not recover upon it. And that if they should be of opinion that the note was fairly given up by Bowyer to the defendant to be cancelled, and the plaintiff obtained possession of it by any false pretence, it would be evidence of a fraudulent obtaining of the possession.

PATENTS—PLANING, TONGUING, AND GROOVING MACHINE.

[Cited in Wilson v. Rousseau, Case No. 17,832; Id., 4 How. (45 U. S.) 704; Smith v. Mercer, Case No. 13,078.]

This was a case commenced by a bill in equity, on the 12th day of December, 1844, to restrain the defendants [Curtius and Grabau] from infringing the patent right granted to William Woodworth in 1828, and extended for a further term of seven years in 1842. The invention is for planing, tonguing, and grooving plank and other materials, by means of the combined use of a revolving cutter wheel or cylinder in the centre, to plane and reduce the plank to a given thickness; two side cutter wheels to tongue and groove the edges of the plank; and, also, by the use of pressure rollers, to confine plank to their proper place. Upon filing the bill, a motion was made by complainant [James G. Wilson] for an injunction, which was granted by the court; but afterwards was dissolved upon a re-hearing, on the ground (among others) that the affidavit was insufficient to support it, inasmuch as it did not state with certainty the infringement by the defendants; and that complainant did not swear, at the time of filing the bill, that he believed Woodworth was the "original and true inventor;" &c.; and upon the further ground that the defendants made a declaration on oath, that the said invention was not the original invention of the said Woodworth; and denying, under oath, the novelty and utility of the same.

Upon the dissolving of the injunction the defendants filed their answer, in which they made the following defence: 1st. "That the patent granted to Wm. Woodworth was originally invalid, because all the several parts of Woodworth's machine, and the application of these parts were publicly known, long prior to the issuing of the patent right to him." They were "known in the year 1799, and were sufficiently described by Samuel Bentham in the Repository of Arts." 2d. "That as early as the year 1824, at Syracuse, in the state of New York, one Uri Emmons did invent and put in operation a cylindrical planing machine, embracing all the essential combinations and parts of Woodworth's machines." 3d. "That complainant had not such title to the exclusive right in said invention as to enable him to bring suit," &c. 4th. "That the compromise and agreement entered into between Emmons and Woodworth was in fraud of public rights, and therefore rendered both patents void." 5th. The Woodworth patent "is void and cannot be maintained because of the uncertainty and ambiguity in the description and in the claim." They further averred that "the machine of Woodworth was without utility, and therefore void, and that the specification is unintelligible and insufficient, if not contradictory." "That the extension of said patent was not authorized by law; that the extension was made by the administrator of William Woodworth; whereas the law only permits the patentee himself to apply for and obtain the same." "That the machinery of the respondents is not in principle, combination or mode of operation like Woodworth's; that their machinery was substantially different from that patented."

The case rested in this situation till the 7th day of April instant, when complainant filed an affidavit, made by himself, setting forth the infringement by the defendants, by describing what parts and combinations of defendants' machine were like the one patented; and that he really believed William Woodworth was the first and true inventor, &c. &c. Complainant also filed affidavits, made by other persons, to contradict the answer of the defendants, and moved for a revival of the injunction. The cause was set down for hearing on Friday, the 11th inst., at which time defendants filed many new points, and raised questions of law. The only one which was considered at all serious by complainant was this, "That on the 28th of November, 1829, Woodworth, the patentee, transferred and assigned all his right, title and interest in the original and extended term to Halstead, Twogood and Tyack, in and throughout a great part of the South, including Louisiana; and that under the proviso of the 18th section of the act of congress, of 4th July, 1836, these defendants were protected against any claims set up under the patentee in the original, or under the administrator in the extended term." Defendants also filed affidavits to show the substantial difference between the machine used by the defendants and the one patented by Woodworth. It is to be observed, however, that these affidavits only stated in general terms "that the machines were substantially different," without specifying any particulars; and were held by the court as having no weight in the case.

F. Perin and C. Roselius, for complainant.
W. S. & F. Upton, for respondents.

The argument was commenced on Friday, the 11th, and continued to occupy the court until Tuesday, the 15th. And on Friday, the 18th, the court gave a verbal decision, sustaining the bill and granting the injunction as prayed for, without putting complainant to the expense and trouble of giving security. The court promised a written opinion in the case, touching fully all the points discussed.

WILSON et al. v. DANDRIDGE et al.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March 26, 1804.

CHANCERY ATTACHMENT—PRACTICE.

In a chancery attachment in Virginia, the court may order the attached debt to be paid over to the plaintiff, on his giving security to refund, &c., although the plaintiff's right may be doubtful.

Attachment in chancery. Motion by Mr. Swann, to order Ricketts & Newton, the garnishees, to pay the money to the plaintiffs on security to return, &c., under the second section of the act of Virginia of December 26, 1792 (Old Rev. Code, p. 122).

Mr. Jones, for Ricketts & Newton, two of the defendants. This court has no jurisdiction to make an order that Ricketts & Newton should pay the money to the plaintiffs on their giving security, because the person (Comark) named as executor, has disclaimed the office of executor, and administration has been committed to James H. Hooe, who is made a defendant, and has answered. There is, therefore, no absent debtor. Even if Comark had acted as executor, under the will and probate in St. Domingo, yet he would have no control over the debts due to the testator in this district, according to the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Fenwick v. Sears' Adm'r, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 259.

Mr. Swann, contra. The second section of the act is explained by the fifth section. The words of the second section, are, "any absent defendants, and others within the state indebted to such absent defendants." The decision of the supreme court in Fenwick v. Sears' Adm'r applies only to administrators, not to executors. The latter derive their authority from the will. The executor, therefore, is the real debtor, although the probate was in a foreign country.

Mr. Jones, in reply. The only evidence of the debt due from Ricketts & Newton, to Dandridge, is from their confession; the whole must be taken together, exactly as they have stated it. Hooe has obtained administration since filing the bill, and has been made a party at this term. It would interfere with the priority due to the bond debts, &c.

Mr. Swann. This is the business of the administrator to look to.

Motion granted.

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. July, 1835.

SPECIAL BAIL.—STAY OF EXECUTION—LIABILITY FOR DEBT.

1. Special bail for the stay of execution before a justice of the peace, become liable to pay the debt, in case it is not paid by the principal, or made out of his property, on the issuing of execution at the expiration of the stay, and nothing can discharge the bail except payment of the judgment.

2. Bail cannot complain of what is for his benefit, or by which he is not injured.

Error to Hempstead circuit court.

[This was an action by Berry A. Wilson against Thomas Eads.]

Before JOHNSON, and YELL, JJ.

JOHNSON, J. On the 24th day of January, 1829, Wilson, the plaintiff in error, recovered a judgment against Robert B. Musick, for the sum of eighty-three dollars debt, and five dollars and sixty cents damages, and the costs of the suit, and on the same day, Eads, the defendant in error, appeared before the justice and acknowledged himself jointly bound with Musick for the stay of execution. On the 24th of July, the stay of execution having expired, Wilson caused execution to be issued against Musick and delivered it to the proper officer, who made return thereon, on the 19th day of August, 1829, in the following words: "No goods or chattels are found in my township to levy on, nor is the body of the defendant Robert B. Musick." A second execution issued on the 19th of August, on which a part of the debt was made, and returned on the 18th of September, and a third execution issued on the last-mentioned day, and was returned on the 1st of October, on which nothing was made. On the 26th of August, 1829, Wilson sued out from the justice who rendered the judgment, a scire facias against Eads as special bail, which was duly served upon him. On the 30th of September, 1829, the justice rendered judgment that execution issue in favor of Wilson against Eads and Musick jointly. To this judgment Eads sued out a writ of certiorari from the Hempstead circuit court, where the judgment of the justice awarding a joint execution against Eads and Musick was reversed, and judgment for costs given in favor of Eads; and to this judgment this writ of error is prosecuted.

It is admitted that the judgment obtained by Wilson against Musick, is regular and free from error. The only inquiry now before the court, relates to the judgment against Eads, the defendant in error.

The counsel for the defendant in error contend that the judgment is erroneous upon two grounds: First, because the execution against Musick was not returned in twenty days from its date, and a scire facias issued forthwith against Eads. And secondly, because the plaintiff Wilson caused two other executions to be issued against Musick, and thereby released the defendant Eads. It is material to inquire into the nature and extent of the obligation entered into by the special bail for the stay of execution, upon a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace. The act of the legislature, passed the 26th day of October, 1825 (page 20), provides: "That any person who shall hereafter become special bail for any defendant against whom judgment may be rendered, so as to entitle such defendant to stay of execution, such bail shall, before the justice of the peace, acknowledge himself jointly bound with such defendant in the full amount of such judgment and costs, which judgment the justice shall enter upon his docket, and at the time limited for the stay of execution shall issue execution against the principal, and if the principal shall not satisfy the execution, and if the bail shall not show property, and constable cannot find property of the principal to satisfy said execution, then, and in either case, it shall be the duty of the constable to return said execution to the justice within twenty days of the date thereof, whose duty it shall be to issue scire facias against such bail requiring him to show cause why execution should not forthwith issue against him for the judgment and costs aforesaid; and if he fails to show sufficient cause the justice shall issue execution against both principal and bail." Ter. Dig. 364. From the provisions of this act it is manifest that the obligation into which the special bail for the stay of execution enters, is, that he will pay the judgment, provided an execution shall be issued against the principal at the time limited for the stay, and the amount of the judgment cannot be made out of the principal. There is no provision in the act that the special bail may discharge himself by the delivery of the body of the principal. He becomes jointly bound for the amount of the judgment in consideration of the time given for the principal, and if it cannot be made on execution against the principal, his liability is fixed, and from which nothing can discharge him except the payment of the judgment.

The execution against Musick was not returned within twenty days, and this is relied upon as a ground for discharging the special bail from his responsibility. The provision of the statute requiring the return of the execution within twenty days was introduced solely for the benefit of the plaintiff in the execution, and the failure of the officer to return it within that time cannot possibly operate to the prejudice of the special bail.

The alias executions taken out against Mulsick might and did operate for the benefit of Eads, but could not possibly prejudice his rights. Judgment reversed.

WILSON v. The ENVOY.

[8 Leg. Int. 10; ¹ 1 Phil. 138.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Jan. 8, 1851.

COLLISION—SCOW WITH VESSEL AT ANCHOR.

[A heavily laden scow allowing herself to be cast off by a steam tug, while in motion in the tideway, and with a sheer towards the shore, in a crowded harbor, stands as her own insurer against the hazards of a collision with an anchored vessel; and, if the scow is sunk by striking against the stem of such a vessel, it can be no ground of liability on the part of the latter that her anchor may have been hanging afloat, contrary to good seamanship, so as to cause increased damage to the scow.]

KANE, District Judge. There is no need of discussing the conflicting evidence of this case in order to decide it; the conceded facts are quite enough. A section-scow, made up of two rectangular boxes held together by a shifting hinge, was bringing some sixty tons of iron to one of the wharves on the Delaware in tow of a steam tug; and, according to the reprehensible practice of our tow masters, she was cast adrift in the tide-way, with a sheer towards the shore. Utterly unable to take care of herself, she was driven by the tide and wind against the ship Envoy, and sunk. Her owners claim damages, because they say the disaster would not have occurred, or would, at least, not been fatal, if the scow had not encountered the flukes of the Envoy's anchor, which was hanging from her bow below the water, as they contend, improperly.

The respondents controvert both fact and inference. They say the Envoy was about to shift her position at the wharf, and had raised her anchor for that purpose, but that it was not under water, though it might have been so without contravening either law or usage, and that, whether it was so or not, the scow could not have escaped destruction from the collision, which her management or want of management invited. Of the probability of this last inference, my experience in cases of this sort has convinced me abundantly. A heavily laden scow like this, driven by tide and wind, must go to the bottom almost as a matter of course, if she comes against the bows of a ship at anchor. But my decree will not rest on that ground. I hold it to be the law, that a vessel which is purposely thrown adrift in a crowded thoroughfare stands her own insurer against the hazards of collision. The principle, which requires of every vessel that she shall use her best efforts to avoid running foul of another, has its very strongest illustration in just such a case as this. Nor do I think it needful to inquire, what might not perhaps be a question of difficulty, though one to which no evidence has been addressed, whether the custom of carrying the anchor afloat as it is asserted the Envoy's was, instead of catting it, is not seaman-like and lawful. For I do not understand the admiralty rule that when both parties are to blame, they shall bear the damages jointly, as having application to all sorts of faults alike. I understand the fault, of which that rule is predicated, to be such an one as induces, or contributes to the collision. I do not suppose it to be the law, that the party aggressor can be admitted to set off against the wrong he has done to another, the injuries which were consequent on it to himself, nor even to claim a sort of hotch-pot adjustment of the two sets of grievances, because he would have suffered less if the party assailed had conformed more exactly to rules.

I therefore dismiss the libel with costs; regarding the libellants as the party causing the collision, and the mode of carrying the respondent's anchor, even if improper, as contributing only incidentally to the damage which the libellants have brought on themselves. Decree accordingly.

WILSON v. FISHER.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1830.

JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—CITIZENSHIP—ASSIGNEE OF JUDGMENT.

A citizen of New York obtained a judgment against a citizen of Pennsylvania in a court of the state, which the plaintiff assigned to a citizen of Pennsylvania, whose executors assigned it to the complainant, an alien. Held, that he could sustain a bill in equity in this court, notwithstanding the intermediate assignment to a citizen of Pennsylvania.

[Approved in Milledollar v. Bell, Case No. 9,549. Cited, contra, in Hampton v. Truckee Canal Co., 19 Fed. 4.]

William Brownjohn, a citizen of New York, had obtained a judgment against Charles Hurst, a citizen of Pennsylvania, in the supreme court of this state. This judgment was assigned to William Hurst, a citizen of New York, in trust for himself and his brothers and sisters, citizens of Pennsylvania. Under this assignment J. H. Hurst, a citizen of Pennsylvania, became entitled to two-thirds of this judgment. After his death his executors, also citizens of Pennsylvania, assigned the interest of J. H. Hurst to the complainants, who are aliens. Myers Fisher, also a citizen of Pennsylvania, claimed a part of this judgment, by an assignment from J. H. Hurst, and received some part of the money arising therefrom. His executors, the defendants, are also citizens of Pennsylvania. The prayer of the bill is for an account of moneys received under the judgment of Brownjohn. The only question raised on the pleadings was, whether the complainants could sue in this court.

Mr. Price, for defendants, contended, that inasmuch as both parties claimed under J. H. Hurst, a citizen of Pennsylvania, and the defendants were citizens of the same state, the case came within the proviso to the eleventh section of the judiciary act, which prohibits suits in this court by assignees, in cases where the party originally entitled to a note or chose in action could not sustain a suit. 1 Story's Laws, 57 [1 Stat. 78]; Sere v. Pilot, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 334. The complainant represents J. H. Hurst, not Mr. Brownjohn, the plaintiff in the judgment; he had parted with all his interest in the judgment, and so far as citizens of Pennsylvania become entitled to the proceeds, the privilege of suing in this court was extinguished for ever, by being suspended for a time. The judgment is a chose in action, within the meaning of the law, and comes within the proviso.

Mr. Rawle, Sen., for complainant, without inquiring whether a judgment was a chose in action, contended, that it was sufficient to give jurisdiction that the judgment was originally due to a citizen of New York, who was competent to sue in this court, by an action of debt to enforce its payment, or by a bill in equity in a case growing out of it. It is immaterial through whose hands it may have passed by assignment; if the right to the debt is transferred to an alien, or a citizen of another state, he may sue here, not as representing his immediate assignor, but the plaintiff in the judgment. The cases of Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 8, and Mantelet v. Murray, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 46, could not be sustained, because it did not appear on the record that the original payees of the notes were aliens or citizens of a different state from that in which the defendant resided. But that objection does not apply here, as the bill avers Brownjohn to have been a citizen of New York at the rendition of the judgment. The act of congress refers to the capacity of the party to whom the debt was originally due, to sue in the federal courts, his right passes to the last assignee, who, if he is an alien or a citizen of another state, has the same right to sue here, as if he was the plaintiff in the judgment. If the assignment is colourable merely, to give jurisdiction to the court, the court will not sustain the suit. But if made bona fide, and any interest passes to the assignees, and the assignment is real and not fictitious, the court will take cognizance of the case. M'Arthur v. Smalley, 1 Pet. [28 U. S.] 623, 625. Full effect is given to the proviso in the act of congress if the assignee is in the same situation as the party originally entitled to the debt; it would be straining the law beyond its obvious meaning, to put him in a worse. Here the complainant being an alien, the defendants citizens of Pennsylvania, he comes within the enabling part of the law; and as a suit might have been prosecuted in this court, if no assignment of the judgment had been made, he does not come even within the letter of the proviso. As the judgment merged the cause of action on which it was obtained, the court will require no averment of its nature, or to whom the debt was originally payable.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. The bill, in this case, is filed by John Wilson and Israel Wilson, aliens, against Redwood Fisher and others, executors of Miers Fisher deceased, and sets forth: "That on the 2d of July, 1787, Mary Brownjohn, Gabriel W. Ludlow and others, executors of William Brownjohn deceased, all citizens of the state of New York, obtained a judgment in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, against Charles Hurst, a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania, for the sum of 6175 pounds 12 shillings and 11 pence, money of Pennsylvania; part of which has been levied and received by the plaintiffs out of the real estate of said Charles, and part thereof, to wit, 1715 dollars 83 cents hath been received by the defendants in this suit. That when this money was received by the defendants, the complainants were ignorant of the rights of Jonathan H. Hurst to a proportion of the said judgment. That on or about the 12th of May, 1796, the said judgment, by a decree of the chancellor of New York, was assigned by the said Gabriel W. Ludlow, the survivor of the said executors of William Brownjohn to William Hurst, then of the city of New York, in trust for himself, and for the said Jonathan H. Hurst, and others, his brothers and sisters, each being entitled to one-sixth part. Jonathan afterwards became entitled to two third parts of the said judgment, and died, leaving a will by which he appointed Edward Hurst and Alfred Hurst his executors; who, on the 24th of April, 1829, in consideration of 1500 dollars, assigned to the complainants the said two-thirds of the said judgment." To this bill the defendants have pleaded to the jurisdiction of this court, alleging that Jonathan H. Hurst was, at the time of his death, a citizen of Pennsylvania; that his said executors, at the time of the assignment made by them to the complainants, and at the time of the filing of this bill, and the institution of this suit, were citizens of Pennsylvania. To this plea, the complainants have demurred, and for cause show, that the judgment set forth in their bill, two-thirds of which were assigned to them as set forth in their bill, was obtained by the parties, plaintiffs therein, as executors of William Brownjohn deceased, all citizens of the state of New York, against Charles Hurst, a citizen of Pennsylvania. The complainants in this bill are all aliens; the defendants are citizens of the state of Pennsylvania; and the record therefore presents parties who have an undoubted right to sue in this court, under the provisions of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 78], describing the persons who may sue in the federal courts. But the question arises under a clause in the latter part of that section, by which it is declared as follows: "Nor shall any district or circuit court have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note, or other chose in action, in favour of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made."

We do not find it necessary to decide in this case whether a judgment is such a chose in action as to fall within this prohibition or restriction of our jurisdiction. The question now to be disposed of may be determined on other grounds. On the one part it is insisted, that as the present defendants are citizens of Pennsylvania, and both J. H. Hurst and his executors, by virtue of whose assignment the complainants have derived the right now prosecuted, were also citizens of Pennsylvania, who therefore could not have prosecuted this suit against these defendants in this court, it is a case directly within the provision of the act of congress. On the part of the complainants it is answered, that although their right is derived immediately from J. H. Hurst, yet that he derived that right by an assignment from the executors, who were citizens of the state of New York, and had a clear right to prosecute their suit in this court; and the question is thus presented, whether the assignment mentioned in the act of congress has reference to that under which the plaintiff claims directly, or to that by which the right was divested out of the party originally entitled to it. The suit cannot be maintained here unless it might have been prosecuted here, if no assignment had been made; that is, as we understand it, if it had remained with the original parties to the transaction, contract or cause of action. The law does not declare that no assignee shall prosecute his suit in this court unless his assignor might have done so; but, unless a recovery of the right claimed might have been had in this court if no assignment of it had been made; and of course in every case in which a recovery might have been prosecuted in the courts of the United States if no assignment had been made, it may be so prosecuted after such assignment to a party competent to sue here.

The question now under consideration has received, as far as we can find, no direct adjudication; but the clause of the act of congress under which it arises has several times come under the notice of the courts. In the case of Sere v. Pilot, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 322, the question turned on a distinction set up between an assignment made by operation of law, and one by the act of the party, the plaintiff claiming by virtue of a general assignment of the effects of an insolvent. The chief justice states the objection to be, "that the suit was brought by the assignees of a chose in action, in a case where it could not have been prosecuted if no assignment had been made." The terms in which the objection is taken and stated, show a disposition to keep to the words of the law, and to oust the jurisdiction only in cases falling clearly, if not literally, within them. In Mantelet v. Murray, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 46, we come still nearer to the construction we have adopted. It is there said: "If it did not appear upon the record that the character of the original parties would support the prosecution, the objection is fatal." The court here seem to refer the question of jurisdiction to the character of the original parties to the contract, or chose in action, for the recovery of which the suit is prosecuted, without regarding any subsequent or intermediate holder, provided that the plaintiff himself is qualified to sue. The provisions of the act of congress are met if we have good parties on the record; and the right claimed to be recovered might have been prosecuted here if no assignment of it had been made. The parties to the contract, or chose in action, and the parties to the suit, are looked to by the act of congress; and we may suggest many doubts and difficulties that would arise if the character of the various persons through whose hands the chose in action might have passed are to be inquired into. So far as we may speculate upon the intention and policy of the legislature in making this enactment, they will be fully answered by this construction.

We are of opinion that the jurisdiction of this court is well maintained in this case; and that judgment on the demurrer be entered for the complainant.

Case No. 17,804.

WILSON v. GRAHAM.

[4 Wash. C. C. 53.]¹

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1821.

PRIZE JURISDICTION—EFFECT OF CONDEMNATION—PARTIES NOT SERVED—PLEADING—PRAYERS FOR RELIEF.

1. Libel to carry into execution a sentence of the circuit court of Rhode Island against Graham, a resident citizen of Pennsylvania, for the value of a box of merchandise, condemned by that court, and which was charged to have come into his hands after condemnation. Plea, that the defendant had not been served with process in the district of Rhode Island, and was not a party to the proceedings in that court.

2. The circuit court of Rhode Island had no jurisdiction against Graham in personam, as he was a citizen of Pennsylvania, and was not served with process in that state.

[Cited in Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co., Case No. 2,859; Tenney v. Townsend, Id. 13,832; Otis v. The Rio Grande, Id. 10,613.]

3. The decree of that court is conclusive against the merchandise, and upon a proper application to this court, the court would not hesitate to give it effect against the appellee, in respect to the merchandise; if it should appear that he had, or has, possession of them or their proceeds. As to the thing, Graham, and all others claiming it on the ground of property or possession, were parties to that suit, and were represented by it in that court, although they were not served with process, or had not heard of the proceedings.

[Cited in Hunter v. Marlboro, Case No. 6,908.]

4. Where a specific relief is asked for, even though there be a prayer for general relief, the circuit court cannot grant a relief which is inconsistent with, or entirely different from, that which is prayed.

5. The respondent is, however, not bound to put his defence upon the answer, and reserve it for a final hearing; but may, if it be a fit subject for a plea, put it into that shape, in order to save the expense of going into a general examination.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania.]

This was an appeal from a pro forma decree of the district court. The appellant filed a libel in that court, in behalf of himself, the owners, officers and crew of the private armed brig Yankee, setting forth that certain prize proceedings were duly instituted and prosecuted in the district and circuit courts of Rhode Island by Oliver Wilson, commander of the Yankee, against the ship Francis, her tackle, &c. goods, wares, and merchandise on board, wherein it was so proceeded, that, at the June term, 1819, of the circuit court of the United States for the said district, it was decreed as follows, viz.: "That it appearing by the record and proceedings in this cause, that the said Oliver Wilson by his complaint, duly verified by proof, hath shown that a certain box of merchandise, consisting of silks, marked, &c. captured in the ship Francis, and condemned, as lawful prize to the captors, in the case of the libel of said Wilson, at the June term, 1813, was delivered to one James Stewart by the inspector of the district of Bristol, by mistake, and by the said Stewart received and carried away; and further (here reciting the monition and attachment against Stewart, and his being in contempt), that afterwards it was shown to the court at the November term, 1816, that the said box of merchandise, or the proceeds thereof, were in the possession of Peter Graham, of Philadelphia, &c." the decree then proceeds to recite a monition to Graham, his being in contempt, and a decree against him at the November term, 1818, that he pay into the registry of the court, for the use of the complainant, the amount of the value of said box of merchandise, upon due proof being made of such value and possession by said Graham. And at a subsequent term it was decreed (the said Graham still being in contempt) that he pay into the registry of the court the sum of $2,000, the value of said box of merchandise, and in default thereof, that execution issue against him. The execution is then set out at large, with the return that it was wholly unsatisfied; the said Graham, nor any goods and chattels to him belonging, being to be found within the said district. The libel then proceeds to pray the advice and assistance of the court for enforcing and effectuating the said decree against the said Graham.

To this libel Graham put in a plea, stating that he never was duly monished and cited to appear before the said court at Rhode Island; to answer or defend in the suit wherein the said decree was rendered, or to bring in the box of merchandise in the said decree mentioned; and that the said court of Rhode Island had no jurisdiction to hold any plea, civil or maritime, against him personally, touching the matter in the said libel and decree mentioned; because, he saith, that he, the said Peter Graham, was a resident and inhabitant of Pennsylvania, and personally abiding therein at the time of issuing the monition in the said libel mentioned, and so continued to reside till after the return thereof; and that he was not an inhabitant of the said district of Rhode Island, and was not found therein at the time of serving the same, and was not monished therein, and did never appear, or authorize any one in his behalf to appear thereto: wherefore, &c. To this plea the libellant put in a general demurrer.

The record of the district and circuit courts of Rhode Island set forth the proceedings against the Francis and her cargo, and the sentence of condemnation of parts of the latter, amongst which was the box of merchandise in question, and that the same was by mistake delivered to Stewart instead of box No. 105, which the decree had ordered to be restored to him, and which was afterwards delivered to him. It further states that the proceedings against Graham were instituted and carried on at the suggestion and instance of the proctors of Stewart and of Wilson.

Ingersoll, for appellant, contended: (1) That this court was bound to carry into effect the sentences and decrees not only of other federal courts of the United States, but of the admiralty courts of foreign countries. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. It was insisted upon by Chauncey and Binney, for the respondent, that the Rhode Island court had not jurisdiction over a person who resided out of that district, and was not served with its process within the same; and they relied upon the eleventh section of the judicial law, and upon the principles laid down by the court in the case of Ex parte Graham [Case No. 5,637], decided in October, 1818. They admitted the conclusiveness of the sentence condemning the box of merchandise in question, and that it would be considered in any suit against the same. But the decree now sought to be enforced is in personam against a person residing in another district, and not served with process within the district. They cited 4 C. Rob. Adm. 44; 3 C. Rob. WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, after stating the case as above, proceeded to deliver the opinion of the court.

This case turns exclusively upon the question, whether the circuit court for the district of Rhode Island had jurisdiction in the case, wherein the decree which this libel seeks to enforce was made? If it had, then it is clearly conclusive upon this court, and it must be carried into effect against Graham. If there was a defect of jurisdiction in that case, it is admitted by the appellant's counsel, that the decree ought not to be enforced by this court. In the case Ex parte Graham [Case No. 5,658], which terminated in the discharge of the appellee from arrest, under the process of attachment issued by the circuit court of Rhode Island in this very case, the following points were resolved: (1) That the federal, circuit and district courts of one state, have no authority to issue process into any other state to compel an appearance in those courts, whether in a matter at common law, in equity, or of prize or no prize. (2) That the jurisdiction of those courts, though sitting in prize causes, is limited in point of locality by the bounds of their respective districts, except in a few cases particularly provided for by law. (3) That it is essential to the jurisdiction of those courts, that the person, or thing, against which the proceedings are directed, should be within their local jurisdiction; except in the latter case, when the thing is considered as being constructively within their jurisdiction; as where it is in possession of the captors, though in a neutral country. (4) That if a prize proceeding be instituted against the person, the jurisdiction is excluded, unless it be in a court of the district whereof the person is an inhabitant, or in which he is found at the time of serving the process.

If these principles be correct, (and after an attentive reconsideration of them, we think they are,) it follows, that the circuit court of Rhode Island had no original jurisdiction over the person of Peter Graham, because, the process of that court could not legally issue into this district, and be here served upon him; nor was it served upon him in that district: he was not bound to appear and to make himself a party to the suit. Can he then be personally bound by a sentence, given in a suit in which he was not a party, nor was heard, or could be heard in his defence? Such a doctrine, cannot, we think, be maintained. It is repugnant to the immutable dictates of justice, as well as to the express provisions of the eleventh section of the judicial act, which provides "that no civil suit shall be brought before either of the said courts, against an inhabitant of the United States by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ." For, if the court can exercise jurisdiction in a case, and over a person who has not, and could not be legally served with its process, the above provision was quite nugatory, and afforded no protection to those for whom it was designed. We have no doubt but that the learned judge who passed that decree; presuming that, in respect to the process, all had been rightfully done (for Graham had no person to represent him in court, and to place that matter in its true light;) had no reason to question his jurisdiction.

I admit that that court had unquestionable jurisdiction over the box of merchandise alleged to be in the possession of Graham, and as to that or its proceeds, the sentence of that court is conclusive; not only as to its correctness, but as to every thing which it professes to decide. And this court would not hesitate to execute that decree against the appellee, were a proper application made for that purpose; and if it appeared in proof, that he had, or has the thing, or its proceeds in his possession. As to the thing, Graham, and all other persons claiming an interest in it, either on the ground of property or of possession, were parties to that suit, and were represented in court by the thing which was the subject of the court's jurisdiction; although they were never served with process, nor had even heard of the suit. It is upon this ground that the res, or its proceeds, may be followed by the decree of this court into the hands of any person who may have the same in his possession, and who is personally within its jurisdiction. But whether the appellee has, or ever had in his possession, the merchandise mentioned in the decree, or its proceeds; is a fact which this court cannot consider as established by the decree of the circuit court of Rhode Island, inasmuch as the appellee was no party to that suit.

It is contended that the decree against Graham was not founded on original process, but was merely an incident to the original suit, in which the box of merchandise was condemned to the captors. This is not quite correct, since the sentence against Graham was not for the thing condemned, or its proceeds, but for a gross sum. But were it otherwise, still the suit against Graham was an original one, in which the question to be decided was, not whether the goods were legally condemned to the captors, but whether they had come to the hands of the person against whom the suit was prosecuted? And this is the very question which, for the reasons before mentioned, that court was incompetent to decide. At every turn that this case is presented to our view, it is met by the objection, that the circuit court of Rhode Island had not cognizance of the matter upon which its sentence was founded.

Again, it is said, that as the libel in this case, setting forth the sentence of condemnation, as well as the decree in personam against Graham, and the plea, by avoiding the charge of possession, and merely alleging matter in bar of the relief prayed, admits the fact that the appellee was so possessed; there can be no solid reason why the court should not now execute that decree.

The conclusion of the counsel is clearly drawn from mistaken premises. The libel sets forth no part of the proceedings of the Rhode Island court, but the complaint of Wilson, supported by proof, that the box of merchandise imported in the Francis, and condemned as lawful prize to the captors, was delivered by mistake to Stewart—the proceedings against him—the suggestion, and proof that the said merchandise, or the proceeds thereof, came to the hands of Graham, and the process against him, followed up by the decree to pay $2,000 into the registry of that court, and the execution founded thereon returned unsatisfied. The prayer of the libel is, that the said decree against P. Graham, may be carried into execution by a decree of this court. It is manifest therefore that although the sentence of condemnation is mentioned, it is merely by way of recital in the complaint of Wilson against Stewart—that the only decrees set forth in this libel are those against Stewart and Graham; and that the latter is the only one which the libel prays the aid of this court to execute. Now it is perfectly clear, that, according to the practice of the court, where a specific relief is asked for, even although there be a prayer for general relief (which there is not in this case), the court cannot grant a relief which is inconsistent with, or entirely different from that which is asked for. Much less can the court, in a case where the libel seeks execution of a decree which is specially set forth, execute a different decree, which is not even stated in the libel as an existing and final decree. If the practice were otherwise, it would be not only unnecessary to state the relief which is desired, but it would be mischievous to do so, as it could only serve to deceive the other side. Neither is it correct to say that the plea, by not denying possession of the merchandise, admits it. In the first place, that fact is not charged in the libel, nor is it proved by the decree, for the reasons before mentioned. And even if it were charged, still it must have been upon the conclusive effect of the decree, from which the respondent could in no other way have extricated himself, but by showing that the court which pronounced it had not jurisdiction in the case.

I will not say that the respondent in the district court might not have stated all the matter of the plea in an answer, and also have denied the fact of possession. But then the latter part of his defence would have been merely gratuitous, and not being responsive to the libel in that respect, it could not have availed him. It is, after all, to be remarked, that the respondent is never bound to reserve to the final hearing, any matter which amounts to a bar of the relief prayed; but may, by a plea, demand the judgment of the court upon such matter, so as to save the expense of a general examination.

The decree of the district court must be affirmed, with costs.

CHARTER PARTY — IMPLIED WARRANTY OF SEAWORTHINESS.

W., by a charter party under seal, hired from G. a vessel, for a specified term, to be run, as a freight and passenger vessel, between New York and San Domingo, for so much per month, W. to supply, man and navigate the vessel, and G., in case of damage to her by the perils of the seas, to repair her, and no claim for charter money to be made during the time she should be unfitted for use on such route by such damage. The charter party contained no covenant that, at the time of the charter, the vessel was seaworthy. W. sued G., in covenant, averring such a covenant, and alleging a breach of it, in that the vessel was not seaworthy, so that the voyages stated in the charter party could not be commenced. G. demurred to the declaration: He'd, that there was an implied covenant by G. that the vessel was seaworthy, or fit for the service for which she was hired, and that W. could aver such a warranty and declare on it, in covenant.

William R. Darling, for plaintiffs.
Charles M. Da Costa, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The plaintiffs declare upon a charter party, under seal, whereby the defendant charters to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs hire, the defendant's vessel, the steamer Norwich, for the term of four months from the date thereof, with the privilege to the plaintiffs of continuing the charter for an additional four months, the vessel to be run by the plaintiffs as a freight and passenger vessel, between the city of New York and a port or ports in San Domingo, at a fixed compensation of $1,500 per month, payable, $750 at the beginning, and $750 at the end, of each month, the plaintiffs to coal, victual, officer, man and navigate the vessel, with covenants by the plaintiffs against negligence or mismanagement in the care, conduct and navigation of the vessel, and a covenant by the defendant, that, in case of damage by fire, collision, the breaking of machinery, or injury to the steamer, or other unavoidable accident, caused solely by perils of the seas, he will repair the same without delay, "so that the said steamer may resume service under this charter, and, if the said steamer shall become unfitted by such damage for use upon the said route, no claim for charter-money shall be made for the time she shall be so unfitted for business." There are many other provisions in the instrument, but there is no express covenant or stipulation, that, at the time of the charter, the said vessel is tight, staunch, and strong, well fitted and furnished, seaworthy, and fit for the uses and purposes in the charter party stated. The pleader has, nevertheless, averred such a warranty and covenant, and alleges a breach thereof, in that she was not tight, staunch, strong, well fitted and furnished, and was not seaworthy or fit for the uses and purposes in the charter stated, but was leaky, rotten, and utterly unseaworthy, and unfit, from inherent weakness and defects, for the purposes and voyages in the charter party stated, or to go to sea at all with cargo or passengers, by reason whereof, the voyage was never commenced, but the vessel was returned to the defendant. Various items and amounts of damage are averred and claimed by the plaintiffs.

The defendant, having obtained oyer of the instrument, demurs to the declaration; and thereupon two questions have been discussed by the counsel for the respective parties: (1) Whether, in this case, there was an implied covenant or warranty by the defendant, that the vessel was seaworthy, or was fit for the service for which she was hired, and which voyage, as one of the terms of the contract, he agreed to perform; (2) whether it was competent for the plaintiffs, in declaring, to aver such a warranty, if implied, or whether they should have proceeded in assumpsit, for the breach thereof.

(1) The general rule, that, in a contract of affreightment, there is an implied covenant or undertaking by the owner of the ship, that the ship is seaworthy, is not questioned. But, it is claimed that this is only incidental to his obligation, as a common carrier, to carry the goods safely, and that, therefore, when the owner lets his ship to hire without any undertaking either to carry goods, or to assume any duties, either in the navigation or supply of the ship, or in the conduct of the business in which she is to engage, the hirer acts at his peril, and the principle applies to him, as to a purchaser, "caveat emptor."

Looking to the terms of this charter, the purposes for which the ship was hired, the service prescribed to the hirers by the very terms of the instrument, and the obligation of the owner to repair, if, by perils of the sea, &c., she became unfit, every reason to infer a covenant of seaworthiness and fitness for the purpose, which can exist in any case of charter, exists in this case; and, that such was the actual intent and meaning of the parties, inferrible from the contract, seems to me to admit of no doubt.

The text writers, in declaring, as all, without exception, to which I have referred, do, that the chartering of a vessel for the transportation of goods implies an undertaking that she is seaworthy, point out no distinction between a charter wherein the owner mans, victuals and navigates the ship, and a charter wherein the charterer assumes to do this. Nor is there any sound reason for such a distinction. In case of an ordinary bailment for hire, there is an implied undertaking or warranty that the subject of the letting and hiring is without faults or defects which prevent the due enjoyment or use of the thing. Story, Bailm. § 390; Edw. Bailm. 311; Sutton v. Temple (opinion of Lord Abinger) 12 Mees. & W. 52, 60. And so of a letting of a furnished house (Smith v. Marrable, 11 Mees. & W. 5); and selling a horse (Harrington v. Snyder, 3 Barb. 380). With especial reference to the chartering of a vessel, see, also, Add. Cont. p. 413; Abb. Shipp. 421, 422; 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 284, 285; 3 Kent, Comm. 204, 205; Lyon v. Mells, 5 East, 428.

(2) As to the form of action, it is wholly immaterial whether the covenant be implied or express. If, from the specialty executed by the parties, the law implies such a covenant, it is, as respects the form of action therein, as if it were incorporated therein in terms. In a legal sense, the law does incorporate the covenant therein. Assumpsit would not lie, for the reason, that, whatever the parties stipulated, was by their sealed instrument. See cases cited below. And, although it was competent for the pleader to have set out the instrument in totidem verbis, and alleged thereupon the want of seaworthiness as a breach, I see no reason why he might not in this, as in ordinary cases, declare upon it according to its legal effect. Randall v. Lynch, 12 East, 179; Lent v. Padelford, 10 Mass. 230; Grannis v. Clark, 8 Cow. 36; Barney v. Keith, 4 Wend. 502.

The plaintiffs must have judgment on the demurrer, but leave is given to the defendant to withdraw the demurrer and plead, upon the usual terms.

DEATH OF PARTY—SUBSTITUTION OF ADMINISTRATOR.

In case of the death of a plaintiff, the filing of letters of administration by his administrator is such a proceeding in the case before the tenth day of the second court, as will justify the court in retaining cognizance of the cause, under Act 1785, c. 80, § 1.

The plaintiff's death was suggested, July, 1805.

Mr. Morsell, for defendant, then objected that the appearance of the executor was not entered within the first ten days of this term, and relied on the acts of assembly of 1785, c. 80, § 1, and of 1787, c. 9, § 7. The act of 1785, says, if there be no appearance or other proceeding before the tenth day of the second court, &c., the action shall be struck off.

Mr. Van Horne. The plaintiff's letters of administration were filed on the 7th day of this term. This is a "proceeding." The words of the act of 1787, "where new parties are to be made," gives a further time. The act of 1785, meant to give a year.

Mr. Morsell, in reply. The word "proceeding," in the act of 1785, applies only to the case of the death of the defendant. The words "to be made" in the act of 1787, are only applicable to cases happening after the passage of that act.

THE COURT was of opinion that the filing of the letters of administration was such a proceeding in the case before the tenth day of the second court, as justified the court in retaining cognizance of the cause.

EXECUTION—MOTION TO QUASH—REVIVOR OF JUDGMENT.

1. A fieri facias issued in 1806, under which there was a levy and condemnation of the real estate of the defendant, and afterwards a venditioni was taken out. The levy, inquisition and venditioni were quashed. Afterwards the defendant died. In 1813, a fieri facias was issued, and a levy made on sundry lots in the hands of persons, purchasers thereof since the judgment. This execution was quashed on the ground that the judgment ought to have been revived, against the defendant's executors, in order to make it the foundation of this process; although it might have been different, had an alias fieri facias been taken out, and continuances entered.

[Cited in Thompson v. Phillips, Case No. 13,974.]

2. The court will not willingly listen to a motion to set aside an execution, on the ground that other property, in the hands of purchasers from the defendant after the judgment, and liable to contribute, might have been levied on.

3. Quere, if notice ought not to have been given to the plaintiff, that there was such property, in order to furnish him with an opportunity to levy upon it.

ment confessed in April, 1806. In October, 1806, a fieri facias was issued and levied on two lots; which upon an inquisition returned, were condemned. On the motion of the plaintiff, in 1813, this levy, inquisition, and the venditioni exponas issued on it, were quashed. In October, 1813, a new fieri facias was issued, without a scire facias. Hurst died in 1804. The fieri facias was levied on sundry lots, in the hands of purchasers under Hurst, since the judgment was rendered. An inquisition was taken, and they were condemned, and a venditioni exponas was issued. Levy obtained a rule to quash the execution, and all the proceedings founded on it. First, because the fieri facias issued without a scire facias to revive it, against the executors of Hurst; and secondly, because the execution should have been levied upon other lands, in the hands of other purchasers under Hurst; that all might contribute. 1 Ld. Raym. 244; 2 Inst. 471; 3 Croke, 14; [Graff v. Smith] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 485.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Had this execution been an alias, and the first execution, issued in 1806, been continued down, or the court could direct the continuances to be entered; the case would be different from what it is. But it is a new or original fieri facias, and having issued since the death of Hurst, the judgment ought to have been revived against his executors, by scire facias. As to the other point, it need not be decided. But the court will not willingly listen to a motion to quash an inquisition or venditioni exponas, on the ground, that there are some other purchasers unknown to the plaintiff, whose lands might have been levied on. At this rate, a plaintiff may be kept for many years, in pursuit of his rights; by new parties being suggested, as subject to contribution. It would seem reasonable, that those who move to quash on this ground, should have notified the plaintiff, that there were such other persons and such other lands, liable to contribution; in order that the plaintiff might have had an opportunity of including them in his levy. However, the court do not mean now to lay down any definite rule on the subject.

Rule made absolute to quash the execution, for the first cause.

WRITS — CONCLUSIVENESS OF RETURN — PLEA OF PAYMENT — ASSIGNMENT OF WORTHLESS BONDS — PRACTICE.

1. The return of the marshal to a writ, cannot be traversed in an action between the parties to the suit in which the writ issued.

[Cited in Lowry v. Coulter, 9 Pa. St. 353. Cited in brief in Paxton v. Steckel, 2 Pa.

St. 94. Cited in Phillips v. Elwell, 14 Ohio St. 244.]

2. Bonds, assigned to be applied to the discharge of a debt for which a suit is brought, although they are not returned to the assignor, cannot be given in evidence on the plea of payment, it being proved that the consideration of the bonds had failed, and that they had been acknowledged by the assignor to be of no value.

3. A payment which might have been pleaded to the original scire facias to revive a judgment, cannot be given in evidence on a second scire facias.

4. On the plea of "no assets," the practice in Pennsylvania is, for the jury to find for the defendant, and for the plaintiff to pray judgment de terris, etc. and of the assets, quando, etc.

[Cited in Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 465.]

This case came before the court at the April sessions, 1816, and upon a demurrer, which was adjudged good, a respondeas ouster was awarded. The defendants pleaded payment and no assets. In support of the first plea, they contended, that Charles Hurst, having been arrested under a capias ad satisfaciendum issued on the original judgment in 1791, was discharged by order of the plaintiff; and they offered to examine a witness to prove this fact.

BY THE COURT. The marshal having returned the capias ad satisfaciendum, non est inventus, that return cannot be traversed in this action.

It was stated by the counsel, in answer to this, that the real defendants in this case are the terre tenants, and that the rule stated by the court is not applicable to third persons, not parties to the original judgment.

BY THE COURT. We know of no party defendants but the person or persons so named in the record, and they are the legal representatives of Charles Hurst, the party to the original judgment, which the scire facias in this case is brought to revive. If the terre tenants have any equitable defence to make, it cannot be asserted in this suit. The plaintiff consented that the witness should be examined, but he proved nothing material to the point.

The defendants then gave in evidence, that in the year 1798, the agent of the plaintiff received an assignment of two bonds to be applied to the discharge of this judgment, which bonds had not been returned to Charles Hurst. It was proved, however, by the plaintiff, that the consideration of those bonds was land sold to the respective obligors, which could never be found, and, in consequence thereof, the contract was set aside by agreement of the parties; and Charles Hurst applied to the agent of the plaintiff to return the bonds, as they were worthless. This the agent promised to do, but at that time he could not lay his hands upon them, and it was afterwards neglected or not thought of.

THE COURT informed the jury that these bonds could upon no principle be considered as a payment. They were nothing more than blank paper. But if they had been good and available, and had even been paid in the year 1800, when they were to become due, the evidence would be inadmissible in this case, since it appears, that in the scire facias to revive the original judgment, Charles Hurst, so far from pleading this payment, confessed judgment in 1806, and it is to revive that judgment that this scire facias was brought. Nothing which could have been pleaded in bar to the original scire facias, can be pleaded or given in evidence in this case.

THE COURT directed the jury to find for the plaintiff, on the plea of payment, and for the defendants, on the other plea.

NOTE. THE COURT at first directed the jury to find generally for the plaintiff. But it was stated by Mr. Fisher and some others of the bar, that the established practice was to find for the defendant, on the plea of no assets, and then for the plaintiff, to pray judgment de terris, &c., and of assets quando acciderent, which is entered as a matter of course. THE COURT so directed.

Circuit Court, D. New York. April Term, 1815.

ARMY — ALIEN ENEMIES AS VOLUNTEERS — DISCHARGE — VOLUNTEERS TO SERVE AT PARTICULAR POST — POWERS OF PRESIDENT.

1. Alien enemies who had enrolled themselves as volunteers, and been accepted by the president, under the act of the 6th of February, 1812 [2 Stat. 676], not entitled to be discharged; there being no law enjoining the president from accepting them.

[Cited in Re McDonald, Case No. 8,751.]

2. It seems that the president had a right to accept volunteers, to serve at a particular post as well as for general service, the act being silent on the subject. At any rate he had a discretion in the premises, not to be controlled by a court of justice.

3. The insertion in their enrolment of the officer's name under whom the volunteers were to serve, was meant merely to ascertain the post where they were to serve by designating its commander, and not to attach them to his personal command, so that he could not be changed.

W. Sampson and J. Anthon, for plaintiffs.
N. Sanford, for defendants.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. By the return made to the habeas corpus issued in this case it appears, "that the complainants had enrolled themselves as privates in a corps of volunteers, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Denniston; that as such their services have been accepted by the president of the United States, agreeable to the act authorizing him to accept and organize certain volunteer military corps, passed the 6th of February, 1812, and an act supplementary thereto, passed the 6th of July in the same year; and that the parties are now doing duty as private soldiers in the city and harbour of New-York, as stipulated in the original instrument by which they enrolled themselves." On referring to this instrument of enrolment, which is annexed to and made part of the return, it appears that the complainants, among others, did thereby "volunteer and offer their services to the United States, pursuant to the act of congress of the 6th of February, 1812 (4 Bior. & D. Laws, 374 [2 Stat. 676]), to serve under the command of Brigadier General Armstrong, for the sole purpose of defending the city and harbour of New-York, for one year only." This roll was signed by one of the complainants as an artificer. It is not stated in the return that the parties have received pay as privates, nor that they have taken the oath prescribed by the 18th section of the act "to raise an additional military force," "to observe and obey the orders of the president of the United States, and the orders of the officers appointed over them, according to the rules and articles of war." But, as it is averred in the return that the president has accepted them, and that they are in actual service, it is fairly to be presumed, until the contrary be made to appear, that they receive pay, and have taken the oath just recited.

On this state of facts, it has been contended that these volunteers are entitled to their discharge.

First. Because they are alien enemies, which is a fact not appearing on the return, but sworn to at the time of the allowance of the habeas corpus. This objection is at once disposed of by saying, that the president is not enjoined by any law, either from enlisting alien enemies in the armies which have been ordered to be raised during the present war, or from accepting of the voluntary services of persons of that description. Whether British subjects may not thus commit themselves with their natural sovereign, or whether it be good policy to employ them, are questions of legislative, not of judicial consideration.

A second ground of relief is, that the president is not authorized to accept of volunteer corps for the defence of a particular place, but only for general purposes; so that they may be ordered, in case of necessity, to any part of the United States.

On this point the act in question is silent, and as far as the power delegated by it to the president may be misused, it is unimportant which construction prevails; for in either case there will be a latitude of discretion, as must ever exist in such cases, which will afford ample scope for very serious abuses. As commander in chief of the army, it does not appear to have been reposing too much confidence in the president to leave it to him to accept of these volunteer corps, either for the defence of particular forts or cities, which must be garrisoned throughout the war, or for the general defence of the Union. For the first of these purposes it would be more easy to obtain volunteers, and when obtained they would feel better reconciled to the service, and in general be more useful and zealous in the defence of their own firesides, than they would be if marched to a great distance from home, and employed to defend remote parts of the United States. But this court does not think it necessary to express any opinion whether the president has a right or not to accept of volunteers for the defence of a particular city or harbour, because under the powers vested in him by this act, he has a discretion in the premises, in the exercise of which he cannot and ought not be controlled by any court of justice. If he abuses this discretion, he must be amenable for his acts, if at all, in some other way. But however the public interests may be affected by accepting of soldiers for the discharge of a particular duty, it does not lie in the mouth of the men who have thus made a good bargain with the president, to allege as a reason for their not being bound, that he had exceeded his powers. So long as they receive pay, and are employed agreeably to their offer, this court feels disposed to consider them as regularly in service under the act in question, and can perceive no cause whatever of complaint on their part. It might be added that, for aught that appears, the president may have accepted of them for general purposes. If so, it will not be denied that he has a right to use them for the defence of the harbour of New-York, and that so long as they are thus employed, they are doing duty within the terms of the offer which they made of their services.

Another complaint is, that Wilson, one of the parties in the instrument of enrolment which is produced, has engaged as an artificer; whereas by the return it appears, that he is doing duty as a private soldier, as stipulated in the original instrument of enrolment. The court is not prepared to say that this return furnishes any evidence of the employment of this man contrary to the offer which he made of himself. A company of artificers may, for aught that appears, be called a company of soldiers, and may be compelled, for any thing that appears to the court, to do duty as such. This man has certainly sworn, as well as the others, that he will faithfully serve against the "enemies of the United States," and it is presumed that, in day of battle he might, although he be called an artificer, be compelled to fight against the enemy. Again, it is said these men engaged to serve under Brigadier General Armstrong, and are now placed under another officer. This gentleman having, at the time of this enrolment, the command of the city and harbour of New-York, his name must have been inserted for no other purpose than for designating the extent of the duty to which they obliged themselves; or, as is more probable, merely for the purpose of stating who was the then commander in chief over the city and harbour. It never could have been supposed that it imposed any obligation on the government to continue General Armstrong in this command; or that, in case of his death or employment elsewhere, they were exonerated from any further service, and that all subsequent detention would be unlawful. But if this be no satisfactory answer, one completely so will be furnished by the oath which these men have taken, which must have been subsequent to their enrolment, and to the president's acceptance. By that oath they oblige themselves to "obey the orders of whatever officers are appointed over them." If they had any claim before to an exclusive service under General Armstrong, by this oath they surrendered that privilege, and became bound to continue in service, under such other officer or officers as might be appointed to command them.

It is the opinion of the court that the parties be remanded.

WILSON v. JANES et al.

[3 Blatchf. 227; Merw. Pat. Inv. 236.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 24, 1854.

PATENTABLE INVENTION — NOVELTY — COOKING STOVE OVENS—ACTION FOR INFRINGEMENT —SETTING ASIDE VERDICT.

1. Where a patented improvement in a cooking stove consisted in "the placing the fire-chamber in the middle of the oven, so that the latter may receive the heat of three sides thereof at once," the oven being a single chamber extending around three sides of the fire-chamber, as distinguished from stoves with three compartments around the fire-chamber, one on each side and one behind, divided by partitions behind the fire-chamber, quere, whether the change was a patentable discovery.

2. The verdict of the jury, given for the plaintiff, on the trial of an action for the infringement of a patent, being against the evidence, both as to the novelty of the invention and as to the question of infringement, it was set aside by the court.

This was an action on the case for the infringement of letters patent granted to the plaintiff [Carrington Wilson] October 10th, 1834, and extended for seven years, for an improvement in cooking stoves. It was tried in October term, 1851, before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and a jury, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff. The defence was, that the plaintiff was not the original and first inventor of the thing patented, and that the discovery was well known and in public use prior to his application for his patent. A motion was now made by the defendants [Adrian Janes and others] for a new trial, on a case made, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence. Objection was also made to the patentability of the alleged invention.

Carrington Wilson, in person.
Charles O'Connor, for defendants.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. The decision of this case will be placed upon the ground that the verdict was against evidence. It was, in our view, without competent evidence to support it, even if no proofs had been produced on the part of the defendants.

The patent was for an improvement in cooking stoves. The court, in its instructions to the jury, construed the patent to claim the invention of placing the fire-chamber in the middle of the oven, so that the latter might receive the heat on three sides at once. The substance of the claim is, that the patentee makes the heat of three sides of the fire-chamber available for cooking. He has one oven, with three doors, extending all along the sides and back of the fire-chamber. The summary in his specification on this head is, "the placing the fire-chamber in the middle of the oven, so that the latter may receive the heat of three sides thereof at once." All the testimony given by the plaintiff on the trial was directed to this particular of his claim. He proved, by two witnesses, that a stove with an oven on three sides of the fire-chamber was useful; and, by one witness, that, prior to seeing the plaintiff's stove, he had seen ovens having the articles to be baked located on one side of the fire-chamber, and others in which the articles were placed on opposite sides of the fire-chamber, the whole being three rectangular compartments of equal length, the fire occupying the middle compartment, and that he had not, before seeing the plaintiff's stove, known of one which had the front side of the fire-chamber on a line with the front side of the oven, and the oven connected behind the fire-chamber.

The plaintiff does not, by his specification, nor did he by testimony on the trial, show any peculiarity of construction in his oven or fire-chamber, or point out any shape or size of the parts, or method of arrangement, that is original with him, other than leaving the space behind the fire-chamber open, as a part of the entire oven—that is, instead of forming three ovens or compartments around the fire-chamber, he removes the partitions behind the fire-chamber, and makes a single cooking space, instead of the three spaces into which that part of the stove in common use is divided. We are not convinced, if this be an original idea with the plaintiff, that the change is a patentable discovery. Ordinarily, a patent is prima facie evidence that the discovery claimed is new and useful; and any person who undertakes to use any thing similar to it, and producing like effects, must disprove the title of the patentee to his grant. But we suppose that a patent for a discovery which is manifestly frivolous cannot be sustained, and that it is competent for the court to declare a patent to be inoperative for such cause, when that is apparent upon the face of the specification. As, if the plaintiff had taken out a patent for the discovery of making a fire in a grate, or for placing a blower or cover before it, to quicken its kindling, or for exposing to the side of a heated fire-chamber, objects intended to be affected by the heat, a court could hardly be required to adjudge itself to be so judicially blind to the state of the arts and the usages of life, as to be unable to discover, except through the teaching of witnesses, that the things patented were in common use, and therefore could not be monopolized by a patent.

We do not, however, feel it necessary to dispose of this case on that view. The evidence given by both parties on the point of novelty is before us, and we think it is clearly shown, that the use of the fire-chamber for heating circumjacent ovens, was a thing long and familiarly known in the arts when the patent was issued. One witness testifies to a plan of cooking range that was made public in 1798; and it appears that a similar contrivance was described, with drawings annexed, in Webster's Encyclopædia of Domestic Economy. That range was constructed with a fire-chamber inside of the shell or general exterior of the stove, and compartments were heated from each side of the fire-place, one for baking, and one containing water to be heated, these being contiguous to the sides of the fire-place; while, behind the fire-chamber, was a third compartment, with an open space heated in the same manner, and the hot air in which came in contact with the boiler. Other witnesses proved the construction and use of similar cooking ranges, the fire-chamber in which was placed inside of the body of the oven, and heated, from its three sides, other compartments fitted up for baking, boiling, etc., the materials used for the oven being tin or sheet iron. A patent granted to Eliphallet Nott, January 9th, 1834, describes an oven constructed in a manner substantially the same with that claimed by the plaintiff; so, also, does a patent issued March 29th, 1834, to Stephen J. Gold. No testimony was produced by the plaintiff countervailing these proofs.

The defendants further gave evidence, that the ranges built by them did not contain the single oven surrounding the three sides of the fire-chamber, in the manner claimed by the plaintiff to be his invention, but consisted of two ovens or compartments, one placed on each side of the fire-chamber, and of a third one behind it, in which was contained a metal pipe, used for heating water to be distributed over the house. The defendants' ranges, with the two ovens of that construction, were built and in public use, in New York, several years anterior to the grant of the patent to the plaintiff. No evidence was given by the plaintiff rebutting that proof, or showing that the defendants used the three sides of their fire-chamber for heating a single oven in the manner claimed by the plaintiff.

Without placing the decision of the case upon the construction of the patent, we think it is clearly shown that the verdict of the jury, both as to the novelty of the plaintiff's invention and as to its infringement by the defendants, is decidedly against the evidence given in the cause. The verdict must, therefore, be set aside, and a new trial be granted, the costs to abide the event of the suit.

Case No. 17,812.

WILSON et al. v. The JEWESS.

[N. Y. Times, Nov. 29, 1854.]

District Court, D. Connecticut. Nov., 1854.

MARITIME LIENS—MATERIALS AND REPAIRS—SALE PENDING REPAIRS—LOCAL STATUTES—PRIORITY OVER MORTGAGE—NOTICE OF MORTGAGE—RECORD IN COLLECTOR'S OFFICE.

[1. Where material and repairs were being put upon a foreign vessel in the port of New York, and, before completion thereof, she was sold to her master, who lived in New York, the material and repair men have a lien, first under the general admiralty law, and afterwards under the local statutes.]

[2. A lien for materials and repairs will have priority over a mortgage owned by one who was presented to the material and repair men as a part owner of the ship, and, who, by his bearing, himself confirmed the impression that he was one of the owners.]

[3. The record of a mortgage in the office of the collector is not constructive notice to material and repair men.]

[This was a libel in rem by James S. Wilson and others against the steamer Jewess, for materials and repairs.]

INGERSOLL, District Judge. The libel is for materials furnished, and repairs put on the steamer by the libellants. Previous to her arrival here, she was owned in Baltimore, and is admitted to have been then a foreign vessel, and, as such, liable in rem for the repairs. After she came to New York, the libellants proceeded to put these repairs on her, and, while they were so in process, she was sold by the owners to her captain. It is claimed that he belonged to New York, and therefore that the steamer then became a domestic vessel. The captain at the time mortgaged her to the original owners, to secure the purchase money, and also to the claimant, Trowbridge, to secure advances made by him.

Two questions arise in this case: First. Have the libellants a lien on the vessel? Secondly. Was their lien prior to the mortgagees'?

To this first question the reply is that, when the libellants commenced furnishing the vessel with supplies, she was foreign, and needed them; therefore a lien would arise in favor of those who furnished them with supplies, which lien would last as long as the foreign character of the vessel continued, and after the purchase of the vessel by Wright; and whether he has continued a resident of the city or not would make but little difference, as the local law or lien existed against the ship, she not having departed from the state. I therefore find in favor of the libellants on that question, and hold that they have a lien on her.

As to the next question, it becomes a matter of more difficulty to decide whether the Baltimore owners and Trowbridge should be treated as mortgagees, or that the libellants should have a priority of lien. On that point we have two decisions of district judges which are adverse to each other. Judge Hall gave his opinion that "material men" have a priority over mortgagees, and Judge Betts held that mortgagees have a priority over "material men." I can, however, give my judgment without clashing with either of the learned judges referred to. Although Judge Betts lays it down as a principle of law that mortgagees have a preference over material men, yet he admits that circumstances will arise wherein such priority will not exist; as, for instance, where mortgagees are in part owners, or held out to be such.

The question then recurs, are there any such circumstances in this case to bring the mortgagees within the distinction laid down by Judge Betts. I find that there are. It appears that Mr. Trowbridge was introduced to several of these material men as an owner, and his deportment and acts were such as to induce them to believe that he was one of the owners of the vessel to which the supplies were furnished. The act of the Baltimore owners of the vessel in sending her to this port for supplies, in charge of the registered master, and he being regarded as the master of a foreign vessel, also operated to mislead the material men into the idea that they were dealing with the owners, and not with the mortgagees. If such are the facts, the libellants had no notice that the claimants were mortgagees, unless the record in the office of the collector amounted to that notice. Does that record amount to a notice? I think not, because from an examination of the act of congress, which provides that conveyances and mortgages should be recorded, it appears that the record is only a notice to persons holding title to or interest in vessels, by express conveyance or instruments under law. I therefore find the record question in favor of the libellants. I shall therefore decree in favor of the libellants, with costs, and order a reference to ascertain the amount due.

[3 Woods, 642.]²Circuit Court, N. D. Alabama. April Term, 1878.FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—DEED BY INSOLVENT TO WIFE—EXECUTORS—BREACH OF TRUST—CONTRACT WITH CONTESTANT OF WILL.

1. J. who was insolvent, conveyed to his wife real and personal property of the value of $7,700, for a consideration estimated at $1,537. Held, that the consideration was so grossly inadequate as, under the circumstances, to establish conclusively the fraudulent character of the conveyance.

[Cited in Dodson v. Cooper, 50 Kan. 681, 32 Pac. 371.]

2. A testator devised a large estate to various legatees to the exclusion of the heir. The heir filed a bill, in which the validity of the will was assailed. Pending this bill, the executor and the heir entered into a contract with each other, to the effect that, in case the will should be set aside, the executor was to pay the heir a certain fixed sum out of the estate and retain as his own all the residue, to the exclusion of the legatees under the will. Held, that such a contract was a flagrant breach of trust by the executor, and was against public policy and void.

In equity. Heard upon pleadings and evidence for final decree. The bill was filed by the complainant [Robert H. Wilson] as assignee in bankruptcy of Fleming Jordan, to set aside as fraudulent two deeds made by Jordan on September 29, 1866, one to his wife, Lucy Jordan, and the other to Frederick B. Moore. Both these deeds conveyed personal as well as real property. They were attacked by the complainant on the ground that the consideration for the conveyances was grossly inadequate, and that they were executed to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of Jordan. The consideration of the deed to Lucy Jordan was the release of her inchoate right of dower in the lands conveyed by her husband to Moore, and the consideration of the conveyance to Moore was the cancellation of a debt due to Moore from Jordan, evidenced by certain bills of exchange of which Jordan was the drawer, and Moore the holder, amounting to $28,000.

S. D. Cabiniss, F. P. Ward, and David P. Lewis, for complainant.

L. P. Walker, D. D. Shelby, Milton Humes, and Geo. S. Gordon, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The evidence shows conclusively, indeed it is not controverted, that on September 29, 1866, the day when the deeds to Frederick B. Moore and Lucy Jordan were executed, Fleming Jordan was largely insolvent. At that time he owed at least $80,000, and all his property was not worth more than $25,000 or $26,000. On the day just mentioned he conveyed, substantially, all his real and personal property to Frederick B. Moore, and to his wife, Lucy Jordan, and others. Lucy Jordan knew that her husband was insolvent at the date of the conveyance to her, for she so testifies. The real estate conveyed to her by the deed in question is estimated by one witness, Joseph C. Bradley, at $5,000, by another witness, Larkin A. Warthan, at $9,550, and it was valued for taxation for the year 1867, by Lucy Jordan herself, at $9,000, and taxes paid by her on that valuation. Two items of the personal property conveyed by said deed, namely, six mules and two hundred barrels of corn, are estimated by the witness Warthan to be worth $2,020, the mules $1,020, and the corn $1,000. Besides these articles of personal property, the deed to Lucy Jordan also conveyed to her one wagon and gear, fifteen head of cattle, twenty head of hogs, one horse-cart, one rockaway and harness, and all the household and kitchen furniture at the residence of the grantor. Lucy Jordan, in her evidence, puts the value of the mules at $900, and other witnesses put the price of corn at from sixty to seventy-five cents per bushel. According to the lowest estimates made by the witnesses, the mules and corn alone were worth $1,500.

The return of property for 1867 made by Lucy Jordan for taxation, shows that she returned for taxation cattle over five head in number, valued at $150, household and kitchen furniture in excess of $300, valued at $700, and vehicles, not excluding those used for agricultural purposes, valued at $50. The value of these articles amounted, in the aggregate, to $1,200. It is true, it is not directly shown that they were the same articles conveyed by the deed of Fleming Jordan the year before, but the inference that they are so is not a forced one. If this property, returned by Lucy Jordan for taxation in 1867, was not the property conveyed to her by Fleming Jordan in 1866, it certainly stood her in hand to show it. It was a fact peculiarly within the knowledge of herself and husband, yet neither of them has attempted to deny the identity of the property. Estimating the corn and mules at $1,500, and the other personal property conveyed at $1,200, the estimate put upon it by Lucy Jordan for taxation, the value of the personal property conveyed by the deed of September 29, 1866, foots up at $2,700. Estimating the mules and corn at the price named by Warthan, to wit, $2,020, the entire value of the personal property conveyed foots up $3,220. There are but two estimates of the value of the real estate conveyed to Moore, in which Lucy Jordan released her dower. One is that of Warthan, who placed it at $10,500, and the other of Joseph C. Bradley, who placed it at $7,000. The only evidence to show the residue of the lands conveyed by Fleming Jordan to Warthan. Lightfoot, Reynolds and Larkins, was the sum for which Jordan testifies he sold them at that time. These lands sold for $2,225. Therefore, taking Warthan's estimate, the entire value of the lands in which Mrs. Jordan released her dower, as a consideration of the conveyance to her, was $12,750; according to Bradley's estimate, was $9,225.

Now, what was the inchoate right of dower of Lucy Jordan, in other lands, worth on September 29, 1866. The statute of Alabama has fixed the utmost limit to its value. If, at the date just named, Mrs. Jordan had actually been a widow eighteen years of age and in perfect health, the present value of her vested dower estate in these lands would have been, according to the law of Alabama, only one-sixth of their value, in fee simple. See Walk. Rev. Code, §§ 2229-2231. According, therefore, to Warthan's estimate of the value of the lands, Mrs. Jordan's dower therein, if she had been a widow in youth and health, would have been $2,125; according to Bradley's, it would have been $1,537. When it is remembered that on September 29, 1866, the date of her release of dower, Mrs. Jordan's husband was living, that he was only five years her senior, and that she was fifty-seven years of age, the value of her inchoate right of dower almost entirely disappears. But suppose it to be worth what it would have been if she had been actually a widow eighteen years of age, and in good health, how does its value compare with what she received for it? According to the highest estimate of the value of her dower, and the lowest estimate of the value of the personal property only, conveyed to her by the deed of September 29, 1866, she received in personal property alone $575 more than her dower was worth. Taking Bradley's estimate of the lands in which dower was released, the mules and corn alone, at the lowest estimate put upon them by any witness, came within $37 of paying all that her dower was worth, if she had been actually a widow and only eighteen years old. The truth is, that the inchoate right of dower of Mrs. Jordan, in the lands conveyed by her husband, was almost worthless. If we are to exercise our own judgment in such matters, we know that, if put up to sale, it would have brought nothing. The purchasers of the land would doubtless have paid a small sum for it, but not near one-sixth of the value of the estate in fee.

These facts show how grossly inadequate was the consideration paid by Mrs. Jordan for personal property worth from $2,000 to $3,000, and for lands estimated at from $5,000 to $9,550. When we reflect that at the time of this transaction Jordan owed more than three times what he had means to pay, and that he knew, and his wife knew, that he was insolvent, and that he, on the day he made the conveyance to his wife, conveyed everything else he owned in the world to his brother-in-law, Moore, it needs no further consideration to establish the fraudulent nature of the deed to Mrs. Jordan. So gross an inadequacy of consideration, taken in connection with the insolvency of Jordan, is alone sufficient to show the fraud of the conveyance. Kempner v. Churchhill, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 362; Ratcliff v. Trimble, 12 B. Mon. 32; Borland v. Mayo, 8 Ala. 104; Prosser v. Henderson, 11 Ala. 484. The release of her dower was more than thrice paid for by the personal property which she received, and the conveyance of the land to her was left without any consideration whatever. Taking any of the estimates of the value of the property, the consideration which Mrs. Jordan received for the release of her dower, was nearly equal in value to the entire estate in fee in which she released her dower. We think the facts clearly show that the difference between the property conveyed to her and the consideration paid "was so great as to shock the common sense of mankind, and furnish in itself conclusive evidence of fraud." Hoot v. Sorrell, 11 Ala. 400.

I have thus far considered the case as if Fleming Jordan had such title in the lands conveyed to Moore as gave his wife a right of dower therein in case she survived him. But that Fleming Jordan had such title is strenuously denied by the complainant. To entitle Mrs. Jordan to dower, her husband must have held the legal title during coverture, or must have had a perfect equity therein. Walk. Rev. Code, § 1624. Jordan had no legal title. On his own showing he had only a contract for a deed. Had he such an equity as entitled his wife to dower?

The facts about this contract, as claimed by the complainant in this case, were these: Fleming Jordan was one of the executors of the will of Fleming J. McCartney, deceased. Mathew H. Bone and wife, the latter being the only heir of McCartney, having filed their bill against Jordan, as executor, and others as legatees under the said will, Jordan entered into a contract, by which it was agreed between him and Bone and wife, that in the event the will should be set aside and the probate revoked, Bone and wife were to take $40,000 of the estate, and sufficient in addition to pay off certain sums in which they were indebted, amounting to between $2,000 and $3,000, and that Jordan was to have the residue of the estate to pay off its debts and to distribute among the legatees under the will. Jordan, on the other hand, claimed that the contract he made was for his own benefit exclusively, and that he, individually, was to have and retain all the residue of the estate remaining after the share of Bone and wife was taken out and the debts of the testator were paid. This would leave in his hands a residuum of about $60,000.

In the view I take of this branch of the case, it is unnecessary to pass upon this disputed question of fact. Taking Jordan's own version of the contract between himself and Bone and wife, can such a contract be sustained? Fleming J. McCartney, the testator, reposing confidence in the fidelity and integrity of Jordan, had made him one of the executors of his will, to take the title to and distribute his estate among the legatees under his will. While holding this trust his title as executor was attacked by a stranger to the will. Pending this attack, and while the suit was undetermined, Jordan, according to his own showing, entered into an understanding with the party assailing his title, by which it was agreed that if the title were declared void, they would divide the property of the testator between them, Jordan taking the lion's share, to the exclusion of all the beneficiaries under the will. Now, if Jordan made this contract, he was guilty of a most flagrant betrayal of his trust. His contract was in violation of the clearest dictates of public policy.

"No party can be permitted to purchase an interest in property and hold it for his own benefit, when he has a duty to perform in relation to such property which is inconsistent with the character of a purchaser on his own account and for his individual use." Van Epps v. Van Epps, 9 Paige, 237; Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cow. 717. Much less can an executor whose duty it is to defend his title to the trust property, make a contract with the party assailing the title, by which, in case the assault prevails, the property of the estate is to be divided between them. When such a contract is made and carried into execution, the executor will be declared a trustee for the legatees under the will. "Where trust and confidence are reposed by one party in another, and such other accepts the confidence and trust, equity will convert him into a trustee, whenever it is necessary to protect the interest of the confiding and do justice between them." Tiff. & B. Trusts, 481.

It is a rule in equity, of universal application, that no person can be permitted to purchase an interest in property, where he has a duty to perform which is inconsistent with the character of purchaser. The rule is applicable to all classes of persons standing in fiduciary relations, or relations of confidence. As stated by the supreme court of the United States, in Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 503, "the general rule stands upon our great moral obligation, to refrain from placing ourselves in relations which, ordinarily, excite a conflict between self-interest and integrity." And, if an agent employed to purchase for another, purchases for himself, he will be considered trustee of his employer. Story, Eq. Jur. 316. So, if an agent discover a defect in the title of his principal to land, he cannot misuse the discovery to acquire the title for himself; if he do, he will be held a trustee for his principal. Ringo v. Binns, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 269. So, also, where an individual is employed as an agent to purchase up a debt of his employer; he is bound to purchase it at as low a rate as possible; if, therefore he purchase it upon his own account, he will be deemed as acting for his principal, and will be entitled to no more than he paid for it. Reed v. Norris, 2 Myne & C. 361, 374; Hitchcock v. Watson, 18 Ill. 289; Moore v. Moore, 5 N. Y. 256. Where a trustee, after the acceptance of the trust, causes a sale of part of the trust property under execution, for his own benefit, and becomes himself the purchaser, he will be considered as having purchased in his character of trustee for the benefit of those concerned in the trust. Harrison v. Mock, 10 Ala. 185. Where an executor has, under a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage due to the estate, purchased the premises, he holds in trust; if he sells the premises at a large advance, such excess will belong to those for whose benefit the mortgage was held. Martin v. Branch Bank, Decatur, 31 Ala. 115.

It is impossible to enumerate all the cases where the law raises an implied trust between parties standing in a confidential relation to each other. The law is very astute in discovering such relation, and exact in requiring fidelity to it. Reasoning from the foregoing authorities, can a clearer case for the application of the doctrine of implied trusts be found than the case under consideration? I think not. So, whether Jordan made the understanding with Bone and wife, for the benefit of all the legatees under the will of McCartney, as they claim, or for his own exclusive benefit, as he claims, is immaterial. In either case, he is a trustee for the benefit of the legatees under the will. There has been no such acquiescence in his claim by the legatees as estops them from settling up the trust, for the evidence shows a decree in their favor against Jordan, rendered by the state chancery court, establishing the trust. If Jordan held the lands conveyed to Moore in trust for the legatees under the will of McCartney, as it seems to me clear he did, his wife had no contingent right of dower therein. And the only consideration for the conveyance made to her by her husband on September 29, 1866, was her inchoate right of dower in other lands, the fee of which sold for $2,225. Under the most favorable circumstances for the dowress, the present value of dower in these lands, ac-ording to the rule laid down by the Code of Alabama, would only be $370. When it is remembered that in this case the husband was living, and his wife was fifty-seven years of age at the date of her release of dower, the value of that release shrinks to an almost inappreciable sum. I am therefore led to the conclusion that Jordan, being hopelessly insolvent, and knowing it, and his wife knowing it, his conveyance to her of property valued at from $8,000 to $12,000 for so grossly inadequate a consideration, establishes, conclusively, the fraudulent character of the transaction, and that the conveyance is null and void. This conclusion is strengthened by the fact that, on the same day, Jordan made a conveyance to a near relative of substantially all his remaining property and effects.

It only remains to consider whether the conveyance of the personal property included in the deed from Jordan to Moore was fraudulent and void. After a patient consideration of the evidence upon this point, I am not satisfied that the fraud in this conveyance has been made out. The consideration was certainly ample. By the conveyance of a tract of land to which he had no title, either legal or equitable, and a small lot of personal property worth $1,500 or $2,000, Jordan pays off bills of exchange of which he was the drawer, amounting to $28,000, and for which his vendee had paid $4,500 in money. The title of Jordan to the land must have been considered doubtful, for he had twice offered it in payment of the bills, and his offer had been declined. By the purchase of the land, Moore became the creditor of Jordan to the amount of $28,000, and Jordan had the right, in September, 1866, to make the conveyance to him in payment of the debt, even though such conveyance resulted in a preference of Moore to the exclusion of all other creditors. It is true there are some circumstances of suspicion surrounding the conveyance, which I will not notice; suffice it to say, that they do not establish satisfactorily the fraud of the conveyance. There must be a decree dismissing the bill as to Moore, and declaring the deed of Jordan to his wife to be fraudulent and void, and directing the property to be turned over to the complainant as assets of the bankrupt estate of Jordan, and to be administered accordingly.

[3. In an action to recover duties paid under protest, the importers cannot avail themselves of any objections to the action of the customs officers, except those specified in the protests.]

This was an action [by Daniel M. Wilson and others] against [Cornelius W. Lawrence] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an alleged excess of duties paid him. A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court.

Elias H. Ely, for plaintiffs.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. This is another of the cases of iron importations. The iron in this case was imported by the plaintiffs in April, May and June, 1849. It was purchased by them from the Coalbrookdale Company, and Stitt, Brothers, of Liverpool, through an agent of the vendors in New York, by written orders addressed to the vendors in December, 1848, and January, 1849. On the trial, the agent testified that the course of business was to supply the iron at the prices which ruled when the order was booked and accepted. That date is not given in the proofs, but it is to be assumed that the arrangement was completed in due course of the mails. Letters from the vendors to the plaintiffs, of contemporaneous dates with the invoices, were put in evidence, advising the plaintiffs that the iron ordered had then been shipped at Liverpool. It was further proved that the price of iron materially advanced in Liverpool, between the times the orders were received and the dates of the invoices and shipments, and that the invoices represented the prices at which it was agreed the iron should be furnished to the plaintiffs at Liverpool. The plaintiffs, when the invoice price was objected to at the custom house as being below the market value in Liverpool at the dates of the invoices, offered to show to the appraisers the correspondence above referred to, and claimed the right to enter the goods at the invoice valuations, based upon that correspondence and the actual purchase-prices on such contracts. Eight several entries were made. The appraisers raised the invoice prices to the market value at Liverpool, and duties were exacted on that valuation. The duties on the increase in valuation amounted in the whole to $538 80, against the payment of which the plaintiffs made, on the first entry, the following protest in writing: "We do hereby protest against the payment of duties on the extra 10s. per ton, added to the invoice per Wisconsin, from Liverpool, by the U. S. appraisers, as said invoice was made out and charged at fair market value at the time of purchase. We pay the additional duty to get possession of our iron, reserving our rights to future decisions on the subject." The other seven protests, written on the respective entries, varied somewhat from the terms of the first one, and were substantially as follows: "We protest against the payment of duty on any valuation exceeding our invoice, and only pay the duty on the value as appraised, to gain possession of our goods." The action is brought to recover back the extra payment of $538 80.

This statement of the case brings all the points raised upon it by the counsel for the plaintiffs within the principles adopted in the several other cases reviewed and decided at the present term, relative to the rights of importers under purchases of this character and protests of like import. Pierson v. Lawrence [Case No. 11,158]; Pierson v. Maxwell [Id. 11,159]; Focke v. Lawrence [Id. 4,894]; Cornett v. Lawrence [Id. 3,241].

In our opinion, the iron was not purchased by the plaintiffs, within the meaning of the duty acts of congress, until it was acquired by them in a condition for shipment; and we think, especially, that under their protests they cannot legally raise any question as to any proceeding at the custom-house, except as to whether the appraisement was according to the fair market value of the iron at Liverpool at the dates of the respective invoices. No proof was offered impugning the justness of the custom-house valuation in this respect, and, upon the reasons assigned in the cases before referred to, we hold that the plaintiffs cannot, under their protests, avail themselves of any other objection to the payment of the duties which were exacted. Judgment for the defendant.

ACTION FOR TRESPASS—PARTY WALLS.

1. On the resurvey of property it was found that the dividing wall of nine inches was built wholly nine inches or more on the defendant's lot. When the defendant desired to rebuild, he pulled down the dividing wall, and was building a party-wall on the resurveyed party line, when he was enjoined from doing so; the court deciding that after the wall had remained where it was for over 12 years, it could not be pulled down and rebuilt on the resurveyed party line, but must be rebuilt on the old site.

2. Also that where a 9-inch party-wall is torn down it cannot be rebuilt by a 14-inch wall.

[This was an action at law by John Wilson against Charles H. Leiberman.]

Jos. H. Bradley, for plaintiff.

J. M. Carlisle, for defendant.

Prior to 1807 a certain Clotworthy Stephenson was the owner of lots 16 and 17, square 254. In 1807 he built a house three stories high on lot 17, with a gable end towards lot 16, having stacks and chimneys and fireplaces protruding toward the lot 16 for the convenience of the building against it. In the same year he conveyed to Mrs. Wheaton, under whom the plaintiff claims "one divided and ascertained moiety of lot 17, in square 254" and on the back of the deed was endorsed a memorandum (as appears by the record, for the original deed was not produced) of the same date, with the deed signed by the grantor and by Joseph Wheaton, the husband of the grantee, and who, as there was evidence tending to show, bought the property for her and caused it to be settled upon her, by which memorandum the terms upon which the grantor should have the use of the wall in building on "the adjoining lot" were stated. Stephenson, the grantor, after the Wheatons went into possession, continued to reside on the residue of his property there; having it enclosed, and part of the enclosure being the wall in question. In 1821 the defendant's house was built, having this for one of its walls. In 1853 the plaintiff purchased the

Wheaton's title, and took a deed conveying by metes and bounds the half of lot 17 adjoining lot 16. The defendant's deed, and the deeds under whom he claimed described this property by metes and bounds as part of lot 16 with the appurtenances. After the plaintiff's purchase in 1853 an accurate survey of the square showed that the division wall stood wholly nine inches or more within lot 17. The plaintiff claimed the land according to the survey. For the purpose of building on it he caused the old house to be torn down, intending to build, and to make the wall next to the defendant 14 inches instead of 9, as it had been before, and to place the centre of the new wall with the increased thickness precisely on the line ascertained by the new survey, which would bring it some distance inside of all the defendant's fire-places. On the other hand, the additional width to the plaintiff's lot would add greatly to its value. It seems not unreasonable, therefore, that a narrow strip of land, in itself of small value, should have given rise to so much litigation. In 1852 Leiberman procured an injunction against Wilson to prevent the taking down of the old wall unless it should be found unsound, and to prevent his building a new wall otherwise than on the site of the old one, if it should be taken down. The old wall was unsound and was taken down, and rough boards nailed up in its place, and so the premises (vacated by Leiberman) continued for a year, when Leiberman rebuilt the wall, and as was stated by his counsel, rebuilt it 14 inches thick, instead of 9 inches, as the other walls of his house are, in order to be sure that it should be strong enough to support Wilson's projected house, but when the new wall was about 10 feet above the pavement Leiberman was stopped by an injunction at the suit of Wilson, preventing him from rebuilding any other than a 9 inch wall, he therefore dropped off to a 9 inch wall. Wilson then brought this suit for trespass, and Leiberman brought his suit to recover damages for cutting away the side of his house and leaving it for a year without rebuilding it.

The case tried is the former, and it has resulted, as to the law, in the court having restricted the plaintiff Wilson to damages for the alleged trespass in occupying for several days before the bringing of the suit so much of the ground as was not covered by the old 9 inch wall.

The points of law interesting to the public in this city are—First, that a man may enjoy the comforts of his own hearth, when he has done so for more than 12 years, without fear of an action for damages founded upon accurate survey made by his neighbors; and, secondly, that when a 9 inch party wall is torn down it cannot be rebuilt by a 14 inch wall, whatever the building regulations may be supposed to say to the contrary; the first builder being the person who exercises the power under these regulations.

Verdict for the plaintiff one cent damages.

Case No. 17,817.

WILSON v. LE ROY et al.

[1 Brock, 447.] †

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. June 7, 1820.

CHARTER PARTY — BLOCKADED PORT — EFFECT OF TAKING LICENSE FROM ENEMY — NEW CONTRACT.

1. A charter-party was entered into during the war between England and the United States, and during the blockade of the Chesapeake by the British fleet, by which the plaintiff let his ship to the defendants, to carry flour from Norfolk to Cadiz; and covenanted to deliver the flour, "excepting always restraints of princes and rulers;" and the freighters covenanted to pay the freight. The ship was provided with a Sidmouth license, but the charter-party does not express it; yet the fact was well known to the defendants, who, as well as the plaintiff, relied on the protection afforded by that license. The date of the charter-party, was the 31st of January, 1813. After the ship was loaded, it was ascertained that the license would afford no protection against the blockading squadron. The defendants, on the 3d of March, by letter, directed, that the ship should not proceed to sea under existing circumstances; on the 19th of June, they directed, that she should continue ready to prosecute the voyage as soon as the blockade should be raised; and, finally, in the January following, the blockade still continuing, they directed, that the flour should be delivered to their order, which was done. Held, that the procurement of the license, vitiates the contract as much as if it had been inserted in the charter-party.

2. Although freight cannot be recovered, yet the various directions given by the defendants amounted to a new contract, which may be enforced; and the ship owner was entitled to an equitable compensation for his labour, and the expenses incurred by him prior to the 3d of March; from that time, to the 19th of June; and after the last day, to January, 1814, when the flour was delivered by the plaintiff to the order of the defendants.

The plaintiff, George Wilson, in October, 1815, exhibited his bill against the defendants, Le Roy, Bayard & M'Iver, merchants, and residents of the state of New York, and against Moses Myers & Son, residents of Norfolk, in Virginia, who held in their hands effects of, and were otherwise indebted to, the said Le Roy, Bayard & M'Iver, in the chancery court held in Williamsburg, Virginia. At the May term, 1816, of that court, the cause, on the petition of the defendants, Le Roy & Co., was removed to this court, under the authority of the act of congress. In December, 1817, those defendants filed their answer, and the cause came on to be heard at the May term, 1820. The opinion of the court gives so full a view of the facts and circumstances of the case, that it is deemed unnecessary to give a farther statement.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. The bill states that, on the 21st of January, 1813, the plaintiff, being owner of the Woodrop Simms, chartered her to James Dykes & Co. agents, for Robert Pollard, who was agent for Le Roy, Bayard & M'Iver, to carry a load of flour from Norfolk, to Cadiz, for a freight of $3, per barrel, and five per cent. primage. Having received a full cargo, 3,407 barrels, he was about to despatch her, when on the 3d of March, he received a letter from Dykes & Co. forbidding him on the part of Le Roy, Bayard & M'Iver, from sending her to sea, under existing circumstances, (meaning the blockade,) and if he did, he would be held responsible. This letter was answered on the same day, expressing his readiness to prosecute his voyage, but that he should conform to the instructions he had received, holding Le Roy, Bayard & M'Iver, answerable for freight, &c. The blockade still continuing, the plaintiff on the 17th of June, 1813, wrote to Robert Pollard, proposing to change the voyage of the ship, on terms which he expressed. Robert Pollard rejected these terms, and insisted on the ship's going to sea so soon as she could sail, without violating the blockade. The blockade still continuing, and the warm weather commencing, the plaintiff was compelled to land the flour. The blockade appearing to be as lasting as the war, the flour was kept in store, and the plaintiff offered to abandon the voyage, on being paid a sum which he thought a reasonable compensation for his trouble and expense. On the 11th day of January, 1814, he received a letter from Moses Myers & Son, as agents, demanding the flour, and proffering their own responsibility, to comply with the decision of a court, as to the quantum of compensation. The flour was delivered, and this suit brought. It is prayed that a master may be decreed to report, what sum is due, and that it may be paid. The charter-party lets the vessel, engages to receive the cargo to proceed with the first fair wind, and to deliver, &c. (excepting always "restraints of princes, and rulers,") for which the freighters covenant to pay, &c: the owner to allow 45 running days, for loading and delivery: and to receive demurrage at the rate of 10 guineas per day. The letter of 3d of March, 1813, forbidding Wilson to send the ship to sea, "under existing circumstances," was exhibited in evidence. The answer admits the contract, &c., but alleges, that before she proceeded to sea, the blockade commenced. The ship was provided with a Sidmouth license, but the blockade embraced such vessels, as well as others, which fact became notorious, by the sending back of such vessels.

Upon these facts, the plaintiff claims the full freight, as if the voyage had been performed, because he was stopped by the agent of the defendants, when ready to proceed upon it. If this be not allowed, then he claims compensation for his labour and expenses, performed and incurred at the request, and by the direction of the defendants. The defendants insist, that they are responsible for nothing: that the plaintiff has not entitled himself to freight, because the voyage was not even commenced: and because, the whole contract was rendered so illegal, by the British license, with which the ship was furnished, that neither party can recover under it. The Woodrop Simms was furnished with a license, granted by the British government, then at war with the United States, to protect her in the voyage, mentioned in the charter-party. It is not denied, that if, by contract, Wilson had expressly stipulated, that the vessel should sail under the protection of such a license, the charter-party would have been vitiated, and the plaintiff would have been incapable of recovering on it.² But it is

² See Patton v. Nicholson, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 204. Action of assumpsit for $750, for the sale of a certain paper, called a sawyer's license, to which the defendant pleaded non-assumpsit. Evidence offered to the jury, to show, that both parties were citizens of the United States, and that the license was sold by the plaintiff, to the defendant, in Alexandria, D. C., to be used for the protection of the schooner Brothers, an American vessel, during the war, against enemy's vessels, on a voyage from Alexandria, to St. Bartholomews, to be cleared out for Porto Rico. Marshall, C. J., said, that the opinion of the court was, that the use of a license or pass, from the enemy, by a citizen, being unlawful, one citizen had no right to purchase of, or sell to, another, such a license, or pass, to be used on board an American vessel. "In the several cases during the late war, of The Julia, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 181; The Aurora, Id. 203; The Hiram, Id. 444, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 440; and The Ariadne, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 143,—the court determined, that the use of a license, or passport of protection, from the enemy, constitutes an act of illegality, which subjects the property sailing under it, to confiscation in the prize court. The act of the 2d Aug. 1813, c. 535 [Colvin's Laws], and of 6th July, 1812, c. 452, § 7 [Colvin's Laws], prohibiting the use of licenses, or passes, granted by the authority of the government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, repealed by the act of 3d March, 1815, c. 766, were merely cumulative upon the pre-existing law of war. The Saunders [Case No. 12,372]. It follows, as a corollary from this principle, that a contract for the purchase or sale, of such a license is void, as being founded upon an illegal consideration. That no contract whatever, founded upon such a consideration, can be enforced in a court of justice, is a doctrine familiar to our jurisprudence, and was, also, the rule of the civil law. It is upon the same principle, that every contract, whether of sale, insurance, or partnership, or growing out of a commercial intercourse, or trading with the enemy, is void. Thus, it has been held by the supreme court of New York, that a partnership, between persons, residing in two different countries, for commercial purposes, is, at least, suspended, if not ipso facto determined, by the breaking out of war between those countries; and that, if such partnership expire by its own limitation, during the war, the existence of the war, dispenses with the necessity of giving public notice of the dissolution. Griswold v. Waddington, 15 Johns. 57." Mr. Wheaton's note (a) to Patton v. Nicholson, supra. A vessel and cargo, which is liable to capture, as enemy's property, or for sailing under the pass, or license of the enemy, or for trading with the enemy, may be seized, after her arrival, in a port of the United States, and condemned as prize of war. The delictum is not purged, by the termination of the voyage. The Caledonian, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 100.

insisted, that the fact of the license being on board, did not contaminate the charter-party, which contains no stipulation respecting it, nor annul the contract of which it is not an ingredient; the more especially as the voyage had not commenced, and the owner of the vessel might have parted with the license before she sailed.

This argument assumes a fact upon which its whole force depends. It is, that the license was not an ingredient in this contract. It is true, it is not mentioned in the charter-party. But if the consideration be contrary to law, it is not necessary that such illegal consideration should be expressed in the instrument. It may be pleaded and shown in evidence. That this Sidmouth license did form an ingredient in the contract, that the plaintiff would have failed in his engagement, and, supposing the contract to sail under the protection of a license to be legal, would have been responsible in damages, had his vessel sailed without such protection during the war, is, I think, satisfactorily proved. The contract itself, and the circumstances under which it was made, would go far in preparing us to believe the well and mutually understood views of the parties. I will not undertake to say what influence this mutual understanding might have been entitled to, had it not been communicated by the parties to each other; but if it was communicated, if the plaintiff declared, that his vessel was furnished with such a license, and the defendants chartered her on that declaration, the plaintiff was bound to make his vessel such as he described her to be, at least, so long as the license was material. I think the testimony shows, that these reciprocal communications were made by the parties. The defendants were about to make a voyage which required a British license, and a license for a particular port. They would, of course, inquire for a vessel furnished with such a license, and their inquiries would be answered, by any person disposed to make the contract, that his vessel was so furnished.

The letter from Robert Pollard to James Dykes & Co., authorizing the transaction on the part of his friends in New York, dated January 25th, 1813, contains these expressions: "I will thank you to charter a good vessel that will take from 3500 to 4000 barrels for Cadiz, if practicable, at a rate not higher than $2.75 a $3 per barrel, having a Sidmouth license; but if this cannot be done, to take up one for Lisbon, having such a license." In a letter, dated the 30th of the same month, James Dykes & Co., referring to a previous letter, say, "Dickson lately failed in exchanging his Sidmouth license to Lisbon, for one to Cadiz; in consequence, we have chartered the 'Woodrop Simms,' to load flour for you to Cadiz, at $3 per barrel, &c. Her Sidmouth is dated the middle of August, which made her owner, Mr. George Wilson, very tenacious about time." The charter-party is dated the 31st of January, and is executed by James Dykes & Co., for Robert Pollard, agent for Le Roy, Bayard & M'Iver. Wilson, therefore, must be supposed cognizant of the authority, under which Dykes & Co. acted; and that authority contains the instruction to charter a vessel, furnished with a Sidmouth license, for Cadiz. These papers, with the circumstances under which the contract was made, circumstances which, in themselves, are testimony never to be disregarded, prove, I think, that the possession of the Sidmouth license, was communicated, and was the inducement to the contract. If so, it has the same influence, as if it had been mentioned in the charter-party, so long as it was on board, and as it was material that it should be on board.

It has been insisted for the plaintiff, that, admitting the testimony to prove the fact, it is not alleged in the pleadings, and the proof must, therefore, be disregarded. It is undoubtedly true, that a decree must be according to the allegations, as well as the proofs in the cause; but it is not necessary, that every circumstance attending a general fact, should be minutely alleged. In this case, the defendants say that the vessel was provided with a Sidmouth license, but do not aver, that this license formed an ingredient in the contract. If I should be of opinion, that the defendants could not, on this account, avail themselves of this defence, and that, in consequence thereof, the plaintiff would be allowed to claim the whole freight agreed on in the charter-party, so that the real justice of the cause would be defeated, I would certainly permit them to amend their answer on equitable terms; but not to amend it, so as to defeat the justice of the case. But I do not now think this part of the case material, because the blockade, having been imposed and declared, after the charter-party was signed, I do not think, the letter of the 3d of March, 1813, gave Wilson any right to claim freight, on the principle, that the voyage was arrested by Le Roy, Bayard & M'Iver. The blockade justified their interference. And as the voyage was never made, and the freight never earned, the owner of the vessel cannot recover on the charter-party, whether the parties to that instrument were bound by it or not. But as the view I take of the effect of the charter-party, has some influence on those circumstances, on which the decision of this court may depend, I will observe, that in that contract there was nothing morally wrong. The George [Case No. 5,327]. It is annulled by the law, upon principles of policy; and this operation of the law upon it, was unknown to the best informed among us, until the decision was made in the supreme court of the United States. See cases cited in note [supra]. The parties, therefore, are, in fact, innocent. The contract was made with a belief that it was valid, and, therefore, I think, that although it could not have been enforced, it will not infect and vitiate any other contract between the parties. On the 3d of March, the defendants forbade the "Woodrop Simms" to proceed to sea, and afterwards, on the 19th of June, she was ordered by them, to continue ready to prosecute the voyage, so soon as the blockade should be removed, which, the letter says, was daily expected. The expenses, then, which were incurred, and the services which were rendered, perhaps, from the 3d of March, certainly from the 19th of June, were incurred and rendered by the direction of the defendants. Had the defendants, on understanding that the license would not protect the Woodrop Simms, from the effect of the blockade, allowed her owner to land his cargo, he might have employed his vessel, perhaps, in the bay navigation; certainly he would have been liberated from all the extra expenses of retaining his vessel in a state of preparation for sea.

While things were in this uncertain state, a proposition was made by Wilson, to vacate the contract, and abandon the voyage, on certain terms, which are stated generally, but as the proposition itself, is not before the court, they cannot be particularly stated. This proposition was not accepted, but afterwards, on the 11th day of January, 1814, a proposition to abandon the voyage, was made on the part of the defendants, who demanded the delivery of the flour, offering to abide by the decision of a court. On this letter, the flour was delivered, and upon this part of the transaction, the claim of the plaintiff, in my opinion, rests. He was in possession of the cargo, and had a right to hold that possession until he could perform his voyage. Whether he performed this voyage, with or without the license, he could have retained the flour at Cadiz, until the freight was paid. If the blockade should be of equal continuance with the war, he might at the expiration of the war, have made the voyage without the license; and I am not prepared to say, that in that case he might not have recovered the stipulated freight, even on the charter-party. In the mean time, the cargo might be, and, probably, would have been, totally lost to the defendants. These advantages were given up with the flour. It could not have been expected by either party, that they should have been given up for nothing. The fair construction then of the contract, under which the flour was restored to the defendants, is, I think, that some equitable compensation should be made, with a view to all the circumstances of the case. This is rather a fit subject for the consideration of the parties themselves, or of friendly arbiters, than of a court. It is a case of hardship, and of loss on both. Each ought to concede something. If the court must decide it, I am not certain what will be my ultimate decision, but I shall now direct an account to be taken, of the expenses incurred by Wilson, from the date of the charter party, to the time of restoring the flour, stating separately those which were incurred, in taking the cargo on board, and prior to March 3d, 1813, those which were incurred between the 3d of March, and 19th of June, and those which were incurred after the 19th of June. In addition to this report, I could wish to be informed how cases of this character have been generally settled by the parties.

June 7th, 1820, the order of the court was as follows: "This cause came on, &c. On consideration whereof, the court doth direct an account to be taken by one of its commissioners, of the expenses incurred by the plaintiff, from the date of the charter party, in the proceedings mentioned, to the time of restoring the flour, the cargo of the Woodrop Simms, by the plaintiff, to the defendants Moses Myers & Son, stating separately those which were incurred in taking the cargo on board, and to the 3d March, 1813, those which were incurred between the 3d March, and the 19th June, 1813, and those incurred after the said 19th June, which account he is directed to report to the court, &c." In obedience to this order, Commissioner John Cowper, made a report of the expenses incurred by the plaintiff, during the three periods specified in the order. The expenses incurred from the date of the charter-party, to the 3d March, amounted to $1943 24 cents. This however included "the cost of a Sidmouth license, $1000;" those incurred for the second period, amounted to $633 50 cents; and those after the 19th June, to $359 52 cents, making the aggregate sum of $2936 26 cents, principal. He also calculated the interest on those respective sums, from the 3d March, the 19th June, and 31st July, 1813, to 3d December, 1820, the time of the report, making an aggregate of principal and interest of $4281 98 cents. The court rejected the charge for the Sidmouth license, and the interest on it amounting to $1465, and rendered a decree for the balance.

9th June, 1821, MARSHALL, Circuit Justice, without expressing any further opinion, directed the following decree to be entered: "This cause came on to be finally heard on the papers formerly read, and on the report of the commissioner, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, the court, disapproving of so much of the report, as allows one thousand dollars for the Sidmouth license, with interest thereon, and approving the residue thereof, doth adjudge, order, and decree that the defendants do pay to the plaintiff, the sum of two thousand, eight hundred and sixteen dollars, ninety five cents, and his costs by him about his suit in this behalf expended."

EVIDENCE—STATEMENT OF GROUNDS FOR BELIEF.

When a witness states the grounds of his belief of a material fact, his belief, together with the reasons of his belief, are proper evidence to be left to the jury.

In a deposition the deponent said he "believed the goods were for the house of McClean & Winterberry, as they were shipped to McClean & Winterberry at Alexandria."

Mr. Youngs, for defendant, moved the court to strike out the words above (in italics), which the court refused, because the witness has stated the grounds of his belief.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—MERCHANT'S ACCOUNTS.

The statute of limitations, does not apply to accounts between merchants.

Assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. Pleas general issue, and limitation of five years. Va. Law, Dec. 19, 1792, p. 107, § 4.

E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, moved for leave to withdraw the general replication and put in a special replication, that the money in the several promises, &c., became due "on trade and merchandise had between the plaintiff and defendants as merchants, and wholly concerned the trade of merchandise." This replication was taken verbatim from that in Webber v. Tivill, 2 Saund. 122.

Mr. Lee cited Scudemore v. White, 1 Vern.

Mr. Youngs, for defendant, contended that the exception in the statute applies only to actions of account.

THE COURT permitted the general replication to be withdrawn and the special replication to be filed, being of opinion that the exception did not apply to actions of account only, but to assumpsit upon open accounts. See the cases cited in notes to the case of Webber v. Tivill, 2 Saund. 124.

WILSON v. MANDEVILLE et al.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 18, 1807.²

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—MERCHANTS' ACCOUNTS—PRACTICE.

1. The statute of limitations does not apply to accounts current of trade and merchandise between merchants, and it is not material that all dealings between the parties had ceased for more than five years before the bringing of the suit.

2. After judgment for the plaintiff upon demurrer to the replication to the plea of limitations, the court will not permit the defendant to withdraw the demurrer, and rejoin specially, unless he can show by affidavit, that it is necessary to the justice of the case.

Assumpsit. The declaration consisted of three counts: (1) Indebitatus assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. (2) Quantum valent. (3) Indebitatus assumpsit in the sum of $135.47, "for the hire of a certain negro man named Herbert, by the plaintiff, before that time hired to the defendants at their special instance and request, and they the said defendants according to that hiring, had used and labored the said negro man; and being so indebted the said defendants in consideration thereof," &c., "promised to pay," &c. Pleas: (1) Non assumpsit. (2) The act of limitations, non assumpsit infra quinque annos. Replication: "That the money in the several promises and undertakings aforesaid above mentioned in the declaration, at the time of making the promises and undertakings aforesaid, became due and payable on an account current of trade and merchandise had between the said plaintiff and the said defendants as merchants, and wholly concerned the trade of merchandise." Rejoinder: "That in the month of January, 1799, the partnership of Mandeville and Jameson was dissolved, and public notice given of such dissolution, of which the plaintiff had a knowledge at the time; and that at the time of the said dissolution of the partnership aforesaid, all accounts between the said plaintiff and the said Mandeville and Jamesson ceased, and since which time no accounts have existed, or been continued between the said plaintiff and the said defendants, and this they are ready to verify," &c. Surrejoinder: "That the goods, wares, and merchandise in the said declaration mentioned, were by the said plaintiff sold and delivered to the said defendants, and the said negro in the said declaration mentioned was hired by the said plaintiff to the said defendants, before the 9th day of January, in the year 1799, the time when the said defendants in their said rejoinder state their said copartnership was dissolved, and this," &c. Demurrer: "Because the surrejoinder is a departure in this, that it is no answer to the defendant's rejoinder."

E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, cited Scudemore v. White, 1 Vern. 456; Chievly v. Bond, 4 Mod. 105; Catling v. Skoulding, 6 Term R. 189.

[See Case No. 17,820.]

CRANCH, Chief Judge. Upon this demurrer the first question is whether the replication is substantially good. If it be consistent with the declaration and goes to fortify it, and to avoid the effect of the defendants' plea in bar, it is good; but if it be inconsistent with the declaration, or be no answer to the defendants' plea, it is bad, and judgment must be against the plaintiff. The declaration charges that the defendants are indebted to the plaintiff in a certain sum, for the time of a negro. The replication avers that the money became due and payable on an account current of trade and merchandise had between the plaintiff and defendants as merchants, and wholly concerned the trade of merchandise. The question then occurs, whether money due for the hire of a negro, can become due and payable on an account current of trade and merchandise between merchants, and whether such account can be said wholly to concern the trade of merchandise. There can be no doubt that money due for the hire of a servant may be a proper charge in an account current between merchants; the servant may even be employed as a porter in a merchant's warehouse; or he may be employed in other confidential business concerning the trade of merchandise, so that such an account may, strictly and literally, "wholly concern the trade of merchandise." If the defendants had taken issue upon the facts averred in the replication, and the plaintiff should have produced in evidence an account current, rendered to him by the defendants, giving credit to the plaintiff for the hire of the negro, I imagine it would have been good evidence to show that the money for the negro hire was due on an account current of trade and merchandise. In order to recover by law the amount of an account current, it is often necessary, according to the forms of legal proceedings, to divide it into distinct parts, classing charges of the same kind together, and framing a particular count in the declaration for each class. It may happen that only one item of the account may apply to one count of the declaration; and that item alone would not constitute an account current; yet it is evident that the money due for that item may be due upon an account current, and such may be the present case. The replication therefore is not inconsistent with the declaration.

The next question is whether the defendants' rejoinder is good. The facts stated in this plea are, that in January, 1799, all accounts between the plaintiff and the defendants ceased: and that since that time, no accounts have existed, or been continued, between the plaintiff and the defendants. It is evident that this rejoinder is no answer to the replication, unless by implication, (derived from the negative pregnant, "no accounts have existed between the plaintiff and defendants since January, 1799,") that the accounts had been settled and stated and the balance paid. Because if such settlement had not taken place, the account must have continued to exist notwithstanding the dissolution of the co-partnership, and although no further dealings were had afterwards between them. But if the meaning of the rejoinder be, as it seemed to be understood by the defendants' counsel, that all dealings ceased at that time between the plaintiff and defendants, and that no new mercantile transactions had since taken place between them, the question will occur whether, a cessation of dealings for five years before the bringing of the action, takes away from the plaintiff the benefit of the exception in the statute, in favor of merchants' accounts. No case has been cited which sanctions such a doctrine.

The result of the cases collected in the notes to the case of Webber v. Tivill, is that where there are mutual accounts, and some of the items credited are within the six years, the plaintiff need not rely on the exception in favor of merchants' accounts, but may rely upon those items as evidence of an acknowledgment of there being an unsettled account and a promise to pay the balance. But when no items are within the six years, then it behooves the plaintiff to rely on the exception in favor of merchants, and to plead it; and then it is immaterial whether any part of the dealings were within the six years or not, for the case is wholly out of the statute. These principles are acknowledged by Lord Kenyon, in the case of Catling v. Skoulding, 6 Term R. 189, and are in substance stated by Sergeant Williams, in his notes to the case of Webber v. Tivill. If this rejoinder is to be considered as an implied averment that the accounts were settled and discharged, it is bad, because it is not a direct averment, but is a negative pregnant, and because it amounts to the general issue. So that whatever may be the meaning of the rejoinder, it is bad. This being the opinion of the court, it is unnecessary to inquire whether the sur-rejoinder be good or bad. The judgment must be for the plaintiff on the demurrer.

Opinion given nem. con.

Mr. Youngs, after the decision upon the demurrer, moved the court for leave to withdraw the demurrer and take issue on the plaintiff's replication to the plea of the statute of limitations.

But THE COURT refused, unless the defendant could show, by affidavit, that the plea of the statute was necessary to the justice of the case; namely, that his evidence was lost, &c.

WILSON v. MARSHAL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 608.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1809.

HABEAS CORPUS—IMPRISONED DEBTOR.

When a debtor is in the prison bounds, the court will not award a habeas corpus to discharge him on the ground that his creditor has refused to pay his daily allowance.

Motion for habeas corpus to bring up W. Wilson, a debtor confined in the prison bounds of Alexandria, upon a capias satisfaciendum in a civil cause, to be discharged. The marshal having demanded of the creditor the daily allowance according to the act of congress of March 3, 1803 (2 Stat. 237), which the creditor refused to pay. Notice of this motion had been served on Colonel Simms, the agent of the creditor.

E. J. Lee, for Wilson. There is no difference between imprisonment within the walls of the prison-house and the walls of the prison-yard. The statute says that the party keeping within the bounds shall be "adjudged in law a true prisoner."

THE COURT refused to issue the habeas corpus, saying that they would not in this ex parte summary mode undertake to decide the question of law. Mr. Wilson, if he chose to run the risk of involving his sureties, might depart; or if the marshal was satisfied, he might discharge him; or if the marshal refused, he might bring his action of false imprisonment.

Mr. Lee afterwards applied to the supreme court of the United States, who refused to award a habeas corpus, not being satisfied that a habeas corpus is the proper remedy in a case of arrest under civil process. 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 52.

The libellants [Edward Wilson and John Richards] were seamen on board of the American brig Mary [Dodd, master], which arrived in the harbour of Port-au-Prince on the 28th August, 1828, and remained there until the 22d October, following. On several occasions, while the brig lay in port, the crew were guilty of much insubordination, and the captain, after consulting the American commercial agent, as he alleged, caused the libellants to be confined in the common gaol. This was done more than once, and, the last time, for a period of three weeks, during which a person was employed to do their work. On the arrival of the vessel at Philadelphia on her return, the captain refused to pay the libellants the full amount of their wages, having deducted therefrom, and charged them with, the whole expenses incurred on account of their imprisonment at Port-au-Prince, and the sum paid to the person employed there in their stead. The present proceeding was instituted to recover the sum thus withheld.

Mr. Grinnell, for libellants.

Mr. Phillips, for respondent.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. The practice of imprisoning disobedient and refractory seamen in foreign gaols is one of doubtful legality. It is certainly to be justified only by a strong case of necessity. It is not among the ordinary means of discipline put into the hands of the master. I am inclined to think there should be danger in keeping the offender on board, or some great crime committed, when this extreme measure is resorted to. It should be used as one of safety, rather than discipline, and never applied as a punishment for past misconduct. The powers given by the law to the master, to preserve the discipline of his ship, and compel obedience to his authority, are so strong and full, that they can seldom fail of their effect; they should be clearly insufficient, before we should allow the exercise of a power which may so easily be made an instrument of cruelty and oppression, and may be so terrible in its consequences. A confinement in an unwholesome gaol, in a hot and pestilential climate, may be followed by death or some disabling disease. In this case the libellants were taken from the prison when the brig sailed on her return; and although one of them was able to do his duty, the other was prevented by sickness for the whole voyage. I would rather altogether deny a power which can be so seldom necessary, than trust it in hands, in which it is so likely to be abused, and so difficult to be regulated. The master may, without the aid of foreign police officers and dungeons, in which he cannot control, even if kindly disposed, the treatment of his men, take measures of great strength to enforce the discipline of his ship. He may there confine a refractory sailor; he may stop his provisions; he may inflict reasonable personal correction, according to the enormity of the offence and the obstinacy of the offender; and, if he be incorrigibly disobedient and mutinous, he may discharge him, and withal he incurs a forfeiture of his wages. A firm and judicious exercise of these powers can hardly fail of reducing the most perverse to obedience.

Without deciding the general question, whether the master of a vessel may, under any circumstances, imprison a seaman in the gaol of a foreign port, under the control and discipline of a foreign police and its officers, for the mere maintenance of his own authority, I will examine the facts of this case under the principles above mentioned. (The judge thought the evidence was not such as to warrant the imprisonment, and proceeded.) If the imprisonment in this case was unauthorised, the men cannot be charged with the expenses attending it; especially with their boarding which the master was bound to provide. Nor is it just to forfeit their wages; or, what is the same thing, charge them with the pay given to another hand. They have been punished for their misconduct, by their imprisonment, and to inflict these penalties would be to double the punishment.

I will take this occasion to notice an error which, I fear, has frequently, as in this instance, misled our masters of vessels. They seem to believe that they may do any thing, provided they can obtain the assent of the consul to it; which assent consuls are apt to give with very little consideration. When the master, on his return, is called upon to answer for his conduct; he thinks it is enough to produce a consular certificate approving his proceedings; or to say, he consulted the consul, or acted on his advice. This is altogether a mistake. It is certainly a very prudent precaution to consult the consul, in any difficulty, and if the case were fully and fairly stated to him, and his advice faithfully pursued, it would afford a strong protection on the question of malicious or wrongful intention, but it can give no justification or legal sanction to an illegal act; nor deprive those, who have been injured, of their legal rights and remedies.

WILSON (MASON v.). See Case No. 9,257.

Case No. 17,824.

WILSON et al. v. MAXWELL.

[2 Blatchf. 316.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1851.

CUSTOMS LAWS — ASCERTAINMENT OF QUANTITY — ALLOWANCE OF TARE — PENALTIES — APPRAISEMENT OF PACKAGES.

1. The tariff act of July 30th, 1846 (9' Stat. 42), did not vary the law previously in force regulating the method of ascertaining the quantity of merchandize imported. Such quantity is still to be ascertained by the rules prescribed in sections 58 and 59 of the act of March 2d, 1799 (1 Stat. 671, 672).

2. Accordingly, where soap in boxes was imported in 1850, held, that the dutiable weight was the gross weight of the soap and boxes, deducting only 10 per cent. as tare, as prescribed by section 58 of the act of March 2d, 1799, and that the importer was not entitled to an allowance of the actual weight of the boxes as tare. [Cited in Cobb v. Hamlin, Case No. 2,922.]

3. But, the soap having been entered at the custom-house at a valuation based upon its net weight, after deducting the actual weight of the boxes, and the custom-house valuation, upon an allowance of only 10 per cent. on the gross weight as tare, having exceeded the invoice valuation by more than 10 per cent., and the collector having then imposed an additional duty or penalty of 20 per cent. upon the custom-house valuation, claiming that such penalty was authorized, in consequence of such excessive valuation, by section 8 of the act of July 30th, 1846 (9 Stat. 43): Held, that the penalty was illegally imposed.

4. The weight of the boxes, cases or packages in which goods are imported is not the subject of appraisement, within the meaning of section 8 of the act of July 30th, 1846.

5. The case of Grinnell v. Lawrence [Case No. 5,831], cited and applied.

This was an action to recover back money paid to the defendant [Hugh Maxwell] as collector of the port of New York. The facts were these: The plaintiffs [William S. Wilson and Francis Brown] imported from Marseilles into New York a quantity of castile soap in boxes, and entered it at the custom-house, in July, 1850, at the invoice weight of 11,749 pounds, and at the net weight, deducting the weight of the boxes as tare, of 9,436 pounds. The weight returned by the public weigher was 11,760 pounds, from which a deduction of 10 per cent., or 1,176 pounds, was made for tare, leaving the net or dutiable weight at 10,584 pounds. The valuation of the importation on the entry, according to the net weight on the invoice, was $550. The valuation on the return of the weigher, after taking off the 10 per cent. tare, was $619 94, being an excess over the invoice valuation of $69 94, or more than 10 per cent. The price or value of the soap itself was not changed by the custom-house valuation. The plaintiffs claimed the right to enter the soap at its net weight of 9,436 pounds, deducting the actual weight of the boxes, but the collector imposed duties on 10,584 pounds, allowing only the 10 per cent. tare. He also imposed an additional duty or penalty of 20 per cent. upon the custom-house valuation of $619 94, because that exceeded the invoice valuation by more than 10 per cent. The plaintiffs paid, under protest, this additional duty or penalty, and also the duty on all beyond 9,436 pounds of soap, and then brought this action to recover back the amount so paid. A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court.

John S. McCulloh, for plaintiffs.

J. Prescott Hall, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. We think that the collector adopted the true interpretation of the law, in relation to the tare allowable. When duties are imposed on merchandize by the weight or measure, the importer is not required to pay for a greater quantity than actually arrives in the United States. U. S. v. Southmayd, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 637; Marriott v. Brune, Id. 619. But it lies with congress to prescribe the rules by which the quantity or value of merchandize imported shall be ascertained. Accordingly, it rests in its discretion to fix the particulars to be regarded in determining the quantity by weight of goods imported in boxes, casks, bags or other packages, and to exclude or include the boxes, &c., in the computation. If no regulation in that respect is adopted, the true principle is to consider the merchandize alone as subject to duty. Marriott v. Brune, Id. 619.

It is contended that the treasury circulars of March 24th, 1847, and January 5th, 1848, give the importer a right to the deduction of the actual tare on the importation of articles invoiced and entered by weight. We do not think that those circulars admit of such an interpretation. It would seem that the secretary of the treasury understood that the act of July 30th, 1846 (9 Stat. 42), in its arrangement of the method of imposing duties, had in effect supplanted the provisions of the 58th section of the act of March 2d, 1799. (1 Stat. 671), and he enjoined regulations to meet the case of importations of goods by weight in boxes, casks, &c. The regulations, however, expressly prohibit the allowance, by way of tare or draft, of a greater deduction than was given by the act of 1799; and, if the plaintiffs adopt the treasury circulars as the foundation of their right to tare, they must be confined to the limits of those instructions.

But we do not understand that the tariff act of 1846 has in any manner varied the law previously in force regulating the method of ascertaining the quantity of merchandize imported. The 4th section of the act of 1846 recognizes the existence of the 58th and 59th sections of the act of 1799 as the means of determining the weight or gauge or quantity of goods imported, when the invoice does not contain the weight or quantity or measure. We do not suppose that this 4th section has operation only in case of an entire omission, in the invoice, of any statement of weight or measure, but are inclined to think that the provision is intended to apply the then existing law to importations which would have been subject to it previous to the act of 1846, although the invoice is made up on a valuation only, without any statement of quantity. Otherwise the government might be concluded by the invoice, in case it gave the weight or quantity, and would have discarded all authority to test the accuracy of that statement. We think that the language of the 4th section of the act of 1846 may be satisfied, without attaching to it an implication evidently so directly at variance with the whole policy of the revenue laws. The language is rather indirect and involved, but the want of perspicuity seems to arise out of the aim of the person who drew the section to conform the system of ad valorem duties, made universal by the act of 1846, to the provisions of the then existing laws, which require the weight or measure of particular classes of merchandize; and, under the impression that importations of such articles may, under the new act, be made on an invoice of value alone, it directs the weight or measure of them to be made at the expense of the owner, agent or consignee. The section appears to have been introduced out of greater caution, and for the purpose of avoiding the construction contended for by the counsel for the plaintiffs, and which the circulars of the treasury department tend to countenance. The revenue laws, as modified from time to time by congress, are construed and administered as an entire system, the later acts not superseding the prior ones, unless they are in conflict with them or expressly repeal them. Aldridge v. Williams, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 1. The 7th and 8th sections of the act of 1846 recognize this principle, in the one case modifying the existing tariff law, and in the other referring to it as supplying the mode of ascertaining the dutiable value of imported commodities. The 4th section, in our view of the subject, effects two purposes only, both of them in consonance with and in furtherance of the existing law. First. In respect to goods subject to weight, it removes all doubt as to the application of the act of 1799, under this new arrangement of duties, when the invoice does not contain the weight, by directing the goods to be weighed. Secondly. It provides that the owner or consignee shall bear the expense. When the invoice does contain a statement of weight, it must, under the directions of the 8th section of the act of 1846, be proceeded with conformably to the act of 1799.

The weight returned by the weighers in this case, pursuant to the 38th section of the act of 1799, determined the quantity of soap subject to duty, and the collector properly imposed and collected duties on 10,584 pounds, because, although that was beyond the actual weight of the soap itself, yet the whole importation, including its boxes, is made subject to duty, excepting only 10 per cent. therefrom for the assumed weight of the boxes. It was in the discretion of congress either to impose duties on the gross weight, or to deduct from that a fixed rate of tare, or to permit the importer to have the allowance of actual tare. The law in this instance specified the mode or rule by which the tare should be determined, and the importer can claim nothing beyond that.

The remaining question is, whether the collector could legally impose an additional duty or penalty of 20 per cent. on the appraised valuation of $619 94, the price or value of the soap itself not being changed. The 8th section of the act of July 30th, 1846, declares, that it shall be the duty of the collector to cause the dutiable value of imports to be appraised, estimated and ascertained, in accordance with the provisions of the then existing laws, and that, if the appraised value thereof shall exceed, by 10 per centum or more, the value declared on the entry, then, in addition to the duties imposed by law on the same, there shall be levied, collected and paid, a duty of 20 per centum ad valorem on such appraised value. It is to be observed, that the valuation adopted in the entry was not changed by the appraisers, so as to affect the justness of the entry valuation. No point is made on the part of the government, that the weight given in the entry was not accurate, and it was found to correspond with the custom-house weight within a small fraction. The only question presented is as to the right of the plaintiffs to enter the importation according to the true weight, without obtaining the consent of the collector and naval officer to the allowance of the actual tare. Does the deficiency in weight in the entry, arising from an erroneous claim of tare, constitute an excess of value over the value declared in the entry, so as to subject the whole importation to an additional duty of 20 per cent.? The principle involved in this inquiry was considered and decided by this court in Grinnell v. Lawrence [Case No. 5,831]. The court there say: "The eighth section of the act of July 30th, 1836, imposes this duty" (the additional duty or penalty of 20 per cent.) "in cases where the appraised value of the goods imported shall exceed, by 10 per cent. or more, the value as declared in the entry." The "appraised value," as used in this act of 1846 and in that of August 30th, 1842, and, indeed, in all of the revenue acts, means the value of the goods, to be estimated and ascertained by the appraisers, either according to the "actual cost," "actual value" or "market value," as the case may be, exclusive of charges. The doctrine adopted by the court in that case was, that the enhanced valuation which called for and authorized the additional duty of 20 per cent. had relation alone to the goods imported, and did not include those extraneous particulars which the appraisers added to the appraised value of the merchandise, under the special direction of the various tariff acts, in order to make up the dutiable value of the importation. In that case, charges were so added; in this case, the weight of cases or packages is added; but neither of them are subjects of appraisement. So far from that, in this instance, the "actual cost," "actual value" or "market value" of the boxes is not a matter upon which the judgment of the appraisers is in any way exercised. On the contrary, the gross weight of the importation is ascertained by the weigher, and then the proper officer of the custom-house, by an arithmetical process prescribed by statute, fixes the deduction to be taken from the gross weight, and the remainder is the dutiable quantity.

Our judgment upon the second point, therefore, is, that this importation was not subject to the additional duty of 20 per cent. exacted by the collector, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover that amount, with interest from the time of its payment. Judgment accordingly.

WILSON v. The OHIO.

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. 24, 1834.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—NAVIGABLE TIDE RIVERS—SEAMENS' WAGES.

1. A contract for wages on board of a steam-boat, plying between ports of adjoining states, on a navigable tide river, may be enforced by a suit in rem, in the admiralty.

[Cited in The Mary, Case No. 9,190.]

2. The pilot, deck-hands, engineer, and firemen on board of a steamboat are entitled to sue in the admiralty for their wages.

[Cited in Thackarey v. The Farmer, Case No. 13,852; The Sultana, Id. 13,602.]

HOPKINSON, District Judge. The question in this case is, whether the hands of a steamboat, that is, the pilot, the firemen, and deck-hands, navigating the river Delaware, between the city of Philadelphia and the state of Delaware, carrying passengers and merchandise, are mariners entitled to attach the vessel and recover their wages in this court. I have turned to my opinion in the case of Smith v. The Pekin [Case No. 13,090], which was a libel for wages. The libellant had shipped at Smyrna, in the state of Delaware, as cook and steward, to ply between Smyrna, Brandywine, and Wilmington, in Delaware, and the port of Philadelphia. A plea was filed to the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground taken in this case. It was fully argued, and the authorities carefully collected. After a deliberate examination of the law, I was well satisfied, that the service was a maritime service, and the court had jurisdiction of the case, and decreed accordingly. I adhere to that opinion.

As to the capacities, in which the libellants in this case were severally employed on board of the Ohio; the pilot, the deck-hands, the engineer and the fireman; I think they are all entitled to sue in the admiralty for their wages. In the case of The Pekin, the libellant was the cook and steward of the sloop, and might, in strictness, be said to have nothing to do with navigating her. In the case of Ross v. Walker, 2 Wilson, 264, it is said to be established, that any officer or common man who assists in navigating the ship, (except the master,) even the surgeon, is a mariner, and may sue in the admiralty for his wages. So of the carpenter; in short, any one, whose services are employed to preserve the ship, or those on board of her, is deemed, to this intent, to be a mariner.

Decree: That the libellant, Henry Wilson, recover and have paid to him the amount of wages claimed.

WILSON v. PIERCE.

[15 Law Rep. 137.]

District Court, N. D. California. March, 1852.

ADMIRALTY PROCEEDING—FOREIGN ATTACHMENT—NONRESIDENT DEFENDANT—JUDICIARY ACT.

1. The 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 79] applies to the courts of the United States sitting in admiralty, as well as when sitting in equity and common law.

2. The libellant brought his libel in personam against the respondent, and joined other parties as trustees. Process of foreign attachment issued, according to the prayer of the libel, against the respondent and the supposed trustees. The marshal returned, as to the defendant, non est inventus, and that he had attached his goods, effects, and credits, in the hands of the trustees. The respondent, by his proctor, pleaded specially to the jurisdiction of the court, that the defendant was a citizen of another state, and then domiciliated therein, and was not found within that district at the time of serving the writ. Held, that it was a civil suit, against an inhabitant of the United States, commenced by original process, and, as such, within the prohibition of the 11th section of the judiciary act.

[Disapproved in Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 600. Approved in s. c. Id. 602, but overruled in s. c. 13 Wall. (85 U. S.) 306. Disapproved in Cushing v. Laird, Case No. 3,508.]

3. The case of Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. [Case No. 2,859] considered.

[This was a libel by Allen T. Wilson against Henry A. Pierce.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This was a libel in the admiralty, founded on an alleged breach of a maritime contract. The libel, after setting out the cause of action, prays that process in due form of law, according to the course of this court in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in suits in personam, may issue against the said defendant, to compel him to appear and answer on oath, all and singular, the matters, &c.; and that the court will be pleased to decree that the said defendant pay to the said libellant his damages, and that the said libellant be satisfied out of the goods and chattels, lands and tenements, moneys and credits of said defendant in the hands of Upham & Post, (garnishees,) and for his costs and charges. Process of foreign attachment issued in accordance with the prayer of the libel, and the marshal returned that the defendant was not found, and that he had attached his credits and effects in the hands of the garnishees named. To this process the defendant, by his proctor, appeared under protest to the jurisdiction, and filed his exceptions to the libel, on the ground that the defendant is a citizen of another state, and now domiciliated therein.

It is not claimed that the defendant was an inhabitant of this district, or that he was found here at the time of serving the writ. The important question then to be determined, is: Can a process of foreign attachment legally issue in the admiralty against a citizen and inhabitant of the United States, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ? The proceeding by way of foreign attachment, which in England rests only on the customs of London and Exeter, is demonstrated by the court in Manro v. Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473, to be a familiar and authorized method of exercising admiralty jurisdiction. It does not owe its origin to any local customs of England, but it is derived from the same sources as those which furnish the other elements of admiralty powers. The authority, therefore, to attach the property of non-residents, which in court of common law results either from special custom or statutory provisions, (Com. Dig. "Attachment," B, D) in this court is derived from the usages and practice of courts of admiralty and civil law, which, as contradistinguished from those of courts of common law, regulate the modes of proceeding in the maritime tribunals of the United States. Act 1792.

The supreme court, in the case above cited, in deciding that the process of foreign attachment has the clearest sanction in the practice of the civil law, rely not only on the fact that it has been resorted to in one, at least, of the courts of the United States,—McGrath v. The Candalero [Case No. 8,809]; McGrath v. The Candalero [Id. 8,810]; Bouysson v. Miller [Id. 1,709]; Ryan v. The Cato [Id. 12,134],—but also on the explicit declaration of a work of respectable authority and remote origin, which has been universally recognised as among the best books on the practice of admiralty courts. In Clerke, Praxis Adm. (pt. 2, tit. 28), it is said: "If the defendant has concealed himself, or has absconded from the kingdom so that he cannot be arrested, if he have any goods, merchandise, ship, or vessel, on the sea or within the ebb and flow of the lord high admiral, a warrant is to be impleaded to this effect, viz: to attach such goods or ship of D., the defendant, in whose hands soever they may be, and to cite the said D. specially as the owner, and all others who claim any right or title to them, to be and appear on a certain day to answer unto P. in a civil and maritime cause."

By comparing the foregoing extract with the decision of which it forms the basis, it will be seen that the supreme court held that the process of foreign attachment might issue against the credits and effects of an absconding debtor who had fled beyond the jurisdiction, and against whom no means of redress remained unless by process of attachment. Such, in fact, were the allegations of the libel, and by the marshal's return it appears that the motion had been served by leaving a copy at the "late dwelling-house of Almeida, the defendant." The case of a similar process, against an "inhabitant" of the United States and a resident of another district, was not before the court. Dr. Brown, however, in his treatise on Civil and Admiralty Law, (volume 2, p. 434,) speaks of the easy and effective remedy (by process of foreign attachment), provided by the ancient practice of the admiralty court in cases where the person against whom a warrant has issued cannot be found, or lives in a foreign country. This proceeding, though not authorized according to Huberus, (Huberus de in Jus Vocando,) by the example of the civil law, he commends as salutary and effective; and though in latter times it has fallen into disuse in England, he laments the great mischief accruing to commerce from the want of it. Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, ubi supra. If, then, the point to be decided were, whether the process of foreign attachment is in accordance with the principles, rules and usages of courts of admiralty, the case of Manro v. Almeida [supra], as well as those of Bouysson v. Miller [supra], and The Invincible [Case No. 7,054], would leave no room for doubt.

But it is urged that the prohibition contained in the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789 presents an insuperable obstacle to the exercise of jurisdiction in the case under consideration. By that section it is provided that "No person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another, in any civil action, before a circuit or district court, and no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ." It is not denied that the defendant in this case is an inhabitant of the United States, and that he is not an inhabitant of this district, nor is it asserted that he has been found within it at the time of serving the writ. If this proceeding had been instituted on the common law side of this court against a defendant similarly situated, there can be no doubt that the court would have been without jurisdiction. In the case of Picquet v. Swan [Case No. 11,134], it was concluded, after an elaborate investigation by Judge Story, that the process of foreign attachment, though in accordance with the local practice, could not issue from the circuit court against a defendant, unless he were in the one or the other predicament stated in the clause of the judiciary act above cited,—that is, unless he were either an inhabitant of the district or found within it, and this doctrine was affirmed by the supreme court in Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 300.

If, then, the restriction contained in the judiciary act applies to civil suits at common law before the circuit courts of the United States, does the same prohibition apply to a civil suit before the district court in admiralty? It may be urged that the jurisdiction and modes of proceeding of the admiralty courts of the United States, rest exclusively on the grant in the constitution, and the rules furnished by the process act of 1789 and 1792;—that as, by those acts, the forms of proceeding are required to be according to the practice of the civil law and the rules and usages of courts of admiralty, and as the writ of foreign attachment is in accordance with such practice, rules and usages, the prohibition clause of the judiciary act has no application. But by the same process act (29th Sept. 1789), the forms of writs and modes of proceeding in the supreme courts of the states, respectively, were adopted into the judicial proceedings of the United States, on the common law side. And in the cases of Picquet v. Swan [supra] and Toland v. Sprague [supra] above cited, the very point adjudged was, that though the practice of the state courts authorized the proceeding by foreign attachment, yet that practice can have no effect where it contravenes the positive legislation of congress;—and that the state practice can be followed only where the court independently of it possesses jurisdiction; the process acts not having enlarged the jurisdiction, but only furnished rules for its exercise. The analogous provision, adopting in admiralty and maritime cases the practice of the civil law, must, it seems to me, receive a similar construction. If this reasoning be well founded, it follows that the process act, which prescribed the modes of proceeding in the admiralty cases, conferred no additional jurisdiction on the district courts, and that, if the prohibition contained in the judiciary act applies to courts sitting in admiralty cases, the prohibition was not removed, nor was the jurisdiction enlarged by the subsequent adoption of the civil law practice and that “of courts of admiralty.”

Does, then, the prohibition alluded to embrace the district courts sitting as a circuit court of admiralty? At first sight, the language would seem to admit no other construction. The terms of the clause are: “No civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts, (the circuit and district courts,) against an inhabitant of the United States by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ.” In the case under consideration, the party sued is an inhabitant of the United States; the suit is confessedly in personam, for it is under the supposed sanction of the supreme court rules regulating actions in personam that the attachment issued. That the attachment is an original process is evident, not only from the fact that it can only issue, by the rules of the supreme court, as part of, and together with, process to be served upon each person, but also from the cases of Picquet v. Swan and Toland v. Sprague, where the process of foreign attachment to compel appearance was issued from the circuit court and was held to be illegal, and contrary to the prohibition contained in the section of the judiciary act under consideration.

But it is urged that, notwithstanding the language of the act, there is high authority to support the position that the process of foreign attachment can be resorted to in the admiralty to compel the appearance of non-residents, whether found within the district or not; and the cases of Manro v. Almeida, before cited; Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. [Case No. 2,859]; Same v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344, have been cited. The case of Bouysson v. Miller [supra], is also referred to. But the case of Manro v. Almeida does not necessarily determine the point now before the court. In that case, as has been seen, the attachment issued against an absconding debtor, and the monition was returned served by leaving it at his “late dwelling-house.” The court did not decide that, notwithstanding the 11th section of the judiciary act, an attachment could issue against an “inhabitant of the United States” who was not an “inhabitant” of the district where suit was brought, but who was domiciliated in another state, and who had not been personally served within the district. The object of the prohibition in question was, undoubtedly, to secure the inhabitants of the United States from suits in the United States courts, except in the districts they inhabited, or in which they might be found. It may well be that this exemption does not extend to the case of an absconding debtor who has fled from the district he inhabited, and from the United States, and against whom no other redress remained.

But the case of Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. affords a much stronger confirmation of doctrine contended for by the libellant, and has occasioned me the greatest perplexity and embarrassment. The point actually decided in that case was, that the district courts, as courts of admiralty, may award attachment against the property of foreign corporations found within their local jurisdiction, so as to compel the appearance of the corporation to answer the suit, or to subject the property attached to the final decree of the court. The whole argument turned upon an alleged distinction between the case of a private person and that of a corporation, and the court held that no such distinction existed. But it must be confessed the reasoning of the court proceeds upon the assumption, that process of attachment well lies in admiralty suit against the property of private persons whose property is found within the district, although their persons may not be found therein,—and the court observe, that ever since the case of Manro v. Almeida the question has been deemed entirely at rest. But it has been attempted to be shown that that decision does not necessarily extend to the case of an inhabitant of another district not found within the district where suit is brought; nor does Judge Story say in express terms that it covers such a case. The prohibitory clause in question does not seem to have been cited on the argument as presenting any obstacle to the jurisdiction, although certainly some decisions under it are cited in the opinion of the court. But the opinion of the court contains some expressions which, if taken without qualification, would seem decisive of the present question. “The jurisdiction of the admiralty,” observes the learned judge, “may be executed not only against persons found within the district, but also by attachment against their property found within it, although their persons are not there. In each case where the court acts upon the property, it acts solely in rem. and it is at the option of the owner whether he will appear and allow the proceedings to go in personam or not.”—“Unless there be an appearance and a general defence, the decree of the court ultimately binds and acts in rem only upon the thing which is attached." Picquet v. Swan [Case No. 11,134]. That such is the effect of the decree, cannot be questioned; but the point for consideration is: Is the suit on that account a suit in rem, or rather does it cease to be "a civil suit brought against an inhabitant of the United States," within the meaning of the 11th section of the judiciary act?

The title of the suit is certainly in personam, for it names Henry A. Pierce as defendant. The supreme court rule, which is supposed to authorize this proceeding, is a rule prescribing the process in suits in personam, and by it the attachment can only issue as part of, or together with, process to be served upon the person. But if a proceeding by attachment, when the defendant does not appear and contest the suit, is to be treated like a proceeding in rem, and if, being such a proceeding, it is not within the clause prohibiting the bringing of any civil suit before the United States courts against an inhabitant of the United States, except in the district whereof he is an inhabitant, I have been unable to perceive why the same argument would not justify a proceeding by attachment in the circuit courts as well as in the admiralty; and yet in the former it has been adjudged to be illegal. See Toland v. Sprague, above cited. In all cases, if the defendant has never appeared and contested the suit, the proceeding is to be treated to all intents and purposes as a mere proceeding in rem, and not as personally binding on the party in possession. In Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 468, Chief Justice Parsons remarks: "If the goods, effects and credits attached are insufficient to satisfy the judgment, and the creditor should sue on that judgment in this state to obtain satisfaction, he must fail, because the defendant was not personally amenable to the jurisdiction of the court rendering the judgment." In Kilburn v. Woodworth, 5 Johns. 37, it was held that no suit could be maintained in New York, on a judgment obtained by default in Massachusetts, in a suit by attachment against a defendant domiciliated in New York. In Story, Conf. Laws, § 559, the same doctrine is laid down, nor is it necessary to cite further authorities to the point. If, then, it is urged that the decree in attachment suits in cases of default acts in the admiralty only in rem, and therefore is not within the prohibition of the 11th section, why is the judgment of the circuit court in a similar case, which it appears has only the same effect, any more within its operation? And yet that it is so has been, as we have seen, expressly decided. In Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 330, the court say: "The right to attach property to compel the appearance of persons, can properly be used only in cases in which such persons are amenable to process in personam." If this observation applies to suits in admiralty,—and I am unable to see why it does not,—it would seem decisive of this case. It is not pretended that the defendant here is personally amenable to the jurisdiction. The court adds, "That even in case of a person being amenable to process in personam, an attachment against his property cannot be issued against him, except as part of, or together with, process to be served upon his person."

It is precisely in this form, and in accordance with this principle, that the supreme court rule directs process of attachment to be issued in the admiralty. It seems hardly supposable that process against the person should be required to precede or accompany the attachment, had the supreme court contemplated the issuing of an attachment in cases where the writ against the person would necessarily be a mere nullity. The more reasonable supposition would rather seem to be, that it was intended to restrict the issuing of attachments to the cases where, in the language of the court above cited, "the persons are amenable to the jurisdiction." If the clause in the 11th section has any application whatsoever to the district courts sitting in admiralty, it must, I think, be conceded that the person in this case was not so amenable.

The decision actually made in the case of Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. may perhaps be supported on grounds consistent with the view taken of the case before this court. Judge Story, as has been seen, held that an attachment might issue in the admiralty against the goods of a foreign corporation. It may be that the case of a corporation is not within the prohibition of the judiciary act. There is certainly some difficulty in affirming a corporation, as such, to be an "inhabitant" of any district, Flanders v. Aetna Ins. Co. [Case No. 4,852]; Hope Ins. Co. v. Boardman, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 57; [Commercial & Railroad Bank of Vicksburg v. Slocomb] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 60; [Runyan v. The Lessee of John G. Coster] Id. 122; [Irvine v. Lumberman's Bank] Id. 293; and some considerations may be urged to an attachment against the goods of a foreign corporation not applicable to a similar process against the goods of an individual. The proper process against corporations aggregate was, at common law, by distringas. Bac. Abr. "Corporations," E. 2. And if they have neither lands nor goods, it seems there is no way to make them appear, either in a court of law or equity. Thusfeld v. Jones, Skin. 27; 1 Vent. 367. The process of distringas is closely analogous to that of foreign attachment. [McCormick v. Sullivant] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 196. And it may be that on these considerations an admiralty attachment may issue against the goods of a foreign corporation, even where the same process could not be allowed against the goods of a non-inhabitant not found. With regard to the case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 350, it is enough to say, that the exception to the jurisdiction, on the grounds we are now considering, was not taken, and the authorities are clear that the privilege is personal, and is waived by a general appearance. Pollard v. Dwight, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 421; Knox v. Summers, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 496; [Logan v. Patrick] 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 288; Harrison v. Rowan [Case No. 6,140]; [Gracie v. Talmer] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 699. In the case of Bouysson v. Miller [supra], the objection we are considering was not taken nor passed upon by the court.

The only decision which I have been able to find directly bearing on the principal question before the court, is Ex parte Graham [Case No. 5,657]. In that case the question arose, whether the provisions of the 11th section applied to the district courts as courts of admiralty in prize cases; and it was held, by Mr. J. Washington, that they did. It was urged that the restraints contained in that section were incompatible with the essential jurisdiction of an admiralty court, more especially in prize causes; and a distinction was attempted to be drawn between the courts of common law and equity and the admiralty jurisdiction in prize causes. But the court repudiated the doctrine, and declared, "that it is confidently believed that such a distinction is unauthorized by the laws of the United States." "The jurisdiction of these courts," says Mr. J. Washington, "in prize causes is limited as to persons, by the express provisions of the 11th section of the judiciary act before referred to. Prize proceedings against an inhabitant of the United States is unquestionably a civil suit, and, if it be against the person instead of the thing, the jurisdiction is excluded, unless it be instituted in the court of the district whereof he is an inhabitant, or is found at the time of serving process. The manifest policy of the judicial system of the United States was to render the administration of justice as little oppressive to suitors as possible, and corresponds entirely with the construction which confines the process of the courts within the limits of the district in which the court sits, and from which it issued."

The case from which the above citations are taken undoubtedly differs from the one under consideration. But the opinion of the court sufficiently establishes the important points that the provisions of the 11th section apply to the district courts sitting in admiralty, and that the limitation is not removed nor the jurisdiction enlarged by the process acts. If these doctrines are correct, it seems to me the present case is disposed of. It may further be observed, that the prohibition in question is by the act extended to all civil cases before either of said courts. If the admiralty jurisdiction of the district court be excluded from its operation, the only cases cognisable by the district courts to which it can apply, are suits against foreign consuls, and where an alien sues for a tort only in violation of the laws of nations or of a treaty of the United States;—cases which, from their own nature as well as their unfrequent occurrence, would hardly seem to call for so express and solicitous a restriction of the jurisdiction of the court.

It may be contended that by the second supreme court rule the foreign attachment is expressly allowed as mesne process to be used in suits in personam, and that, inasmuch as these rules were prescribed by the court in virtue of acts of congress, they are to be regarded not only as of the highest authority, but as legislative enactments intercepting and repealing the 11th section of the judiciary act. But if any inference is to be drawn from the general language of the rule, it would rather seem to be, that the supreme court did not contemplate the issuing of an attachment in any case against a non-inhabitant, for it is required to be accompanied in all cases by a warrant of arrest,—which, against a person not an inhabitant, and not alleged to be within the district, would be an idle formality. The object of the rules was, to prescribe rules of practice in the admiralty courts of the United States, not to enlarge their jurisdiction; and unless the language of the rules admits no other construction, or its provisions no other application, it should not be deemed to have repealed an important provision of the fundamental and original act under which the courts of the United States went into operation. By the twenty-third rule of the supreme court, it is required that the libel, if in rem, should state the property to be within the district, and if in personam, the names, places of residence and occupation of the parties. If the first allegation in suits in rem is necessary to show that the court has jurisdiction, (except perhaps in prize cases,) the last allegation would seem to be required for the same purpose, and may not unreasonably be supposed to have been required that the court might see on the face of the libel that the case was not within the prohibition of the judiciary act.

It is urged, however, that the practice of issuing foreign attachments, in cases like the present, obtains in all the admiralty courts of the United States, and, therefore, must have a solid foundation in law. Whether such be the universal practice, I am ignorant. I have attempted to investigate its legal foundation, and after great consideration, have been unable to take the case out of the clause in question. But if the practice be as is represented, it must excite some surprise that neither in the elementary writers nor in the rules of court, so far as I have discovered, is any mode of proceeding indicated by which, in the case of non-residents, the opportunity of appearing is secured to the defendant. In all statutory provisions regulating proceedings by attachment, some time is always allowed for actual or constructive notice; and by the custom of London, it seems four successive defaults were first incurred, and then the plaintiff only obtained execution for the money in the hands of the garnishee, on finding pledges to return it if the defendant, within a year and a day, disprove the original debt. Com. Dig. "Attachments," A. But in this case the proceeding contemplated is to go on to decree upon default therein, after the time usual when the defendant is personally served, (ten days,) and to have satisfaction thereof forthwith out of the moneys attached. Such a proceeding would be virtually ex parte, and, it seems to me, would never be allowed in a court of justice. It is urged, however, that the evil is, or might be as great, in all suits in rem. But suits in rem are instituted in only a limited number of cases, and are to enforce a charge on the specific thing seized. The presumption of the law is, that the party in possession of it for the owners, has the means, as well as interest, to defend it from all claims brought against it specifically, and the rules of the admiralty recognise the master as a proper party to appear and defend the suit. The claims brought to be enforced in rem, are, in almost all cases, the obligations created or liabilities incurred by the master, and if personal notice is to be served on any one, it should be on him; and this is effectually done by seizing his ship. But on other accounts the master is, in suits in rem, the proper party to be notified. By the maritime law he is regarded not so much as the agent or mandatory of the owners, as the administrator of the property, that is, the vessel, intrusted to his care and management. He acts for the owners rather in the character of a gerant or active partner of a société en commandité, or limited partnership, than as their agent. The Phœbe [Case No. 11,064], and authorities cited. Occupying this relation, there is, therefore, a theoretical propriety, as well as no practical danger, in treating a notice to him in suits in rem as sufficient.

But the case of a foreign attachment is wholly different. The bailee in whose hands the goods are attached, has not the information necessary to enable him, nor the motives to induce him, to defend an action against the bailor, having no reference to the subject of the bailment, except that the goods are attached. Still less has a debtor, where the debt is attached in a suit by a third person against his creditor, any motive to do more than appear in the court and apply the money due from him according to its decree. I think, therefore, that the practice in suits in rem cannot be invoked to authorize the mode of proceeding contemplated in suits commenced by attachment, and have arrived at the following conclusions:—1st. That, on principle and authority, the 11th section of the judiciary act must be deemed to apply to the United States courts sitting in admiralty, as well as in equity and at common law. 2d. That this is a civil suit against an inhabitant of the United States, commenced by original process. 3d. That, as such, it is within the prohibition of the act.

I have considered the questions involved in this case with the care and attention demanded by its importance, and due to the great name of the illustrious judge, some of whose observations I have felt obliged to receive with some qualifications. If there be any statutory provisions or adjudged cases which I have not noticed, my attention has not been called to them. In differing from a casual observation of Judge Story, I may well feel some distrust of the accuracy of my own conclusions. If I have been led into error, I can only regret that the means of correcting it are not more easy and expeditious.

WILSON v. PORTER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 458.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1824.

ACTION ON NOTE—DECLARATION—INDORSEMENT BY AGENT.

A declaration upon a note payable to J. S., and averring that J. S., "acting by authority, and as agent of said defendant, indorsed the said note for and in behalf of the said defendant, by writing thereon the name of him the said J. S. as agent of the said defendant;" should also aver that the note was made payable to the said J. S. as the agent, and for and in behalf of the said defendant, otherwise the note will not appear to be indorsed by the said J. S. in the character in which it was made payable to him; and so no title in the plaintiff.

Assumpsit [by James C. Wilson] against [David Porter] the defendant as indorser of Edgar Patterson's note for $49.23, payable to John Shreve or order, sixty days after date, and indorsed, "for the Union Steamboat. John Shreve." The declaration contained a count upon the note, stating it to have been made by E. Patterson, payable to John Shreve, and that the said John Shreve, "acting by authority, and as the agent of the said defendant, indorsed the said note for and in behalf of the said defendant, by writing thereon the name of him the said John Shreve, as agent for said defendant."

Mr. Worthington, for defendant, objected to the note going in evidence.

THE COURT, however, (nem. con.) overruled the objection, but intimated an opinion that if a verdict should be obtained on that count, the judgment might be arrested, as it did not appear by that count that the note was made payable to Shreve in the same capacity in which he indorsed it; so that it would appear to be a note payable to Shreve, but indorsed by Porter; and so no title in the plaintiff.

Mr. Marbury then contended that the defendant would be liable as drawer of a bill on Patterson, the maker, in favor of the plaintiff, and that Patterson would be considered as having accepted the bill.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, suggested that Patterson could not be considered as the acceptor, because he promised to pay only to the order of Shreve in his individual character; and Shreve's order was not made in that character, but as agent of Porter.

Mr. Marbury then abandoned the count upon the note, and relied upon the count for goods sold and delivered to the defendant, and gave evidence that Commodore Porter was owner of the Union Steamboat; that Shreve was his agent for the management of that boat, which plied as a passenger boat between Georgetown and Alexandria; and that the plaintiff furnished articles for the use of the boat.

Verdict for the plaintiff, $49.23.

WILSON v. PREWETT et al.

[3 Woods, 631.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. Alabama. April Term, 1878.²

MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT — VALIDITY — FRAUD ON HUSBAND'S CREDITORS—EVIDENCE.

1. To make an ante-nuptial settlement void as a fraud on creditors, both parties to the settlement should concur in, or have notice of the intended fraud.

2. The husband and wife, parties to such a settlement, are deemed, in the highest sense, purchasers for a valuable consideration.

3. But if the settlement is not bona fide, the fact that it is made for a valuable consideration will not save it.

4. A marriage settlement cannot be made a cover for fraud. If the purpose is to delay or defraud creditors, and both parties are cognizant of it, the consideration of marriage will not support the settlement.

5. If the amount of property settled is extravagant, or grossly out of proportion to the station or circumstances of the husband, and he is embarrassed by debt, and the other party knows it, this, of itself, is sufficient notice of fraud.

6. To ascertain the purpose of the grantor in a marriage settlement, evidence of fraudulent transfers by him to other persons at or about the time of the settlement, is admissible.

7. Actual knowledge, on the part of the prospective wife, of the fraudulent purpose of the grantor in the marriage settlement, is not necessary to avoid the deed. A knowledge of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent person and put her on inquiry, amount to notice, and are equivalent to actual knowledge.

8. P. was indebted in the sum of about $90,000, and owned property worth about $50,000. In alleged consideration of marriage, he conveyed to his prospective wife property of the value of $32,776, and in addition thereto, he conveyed to her other property of the value of $13,300, to be held by her in trust for two favored creditors. This conveyance included all his property, except three thousand six hundred and eighty acres of land worth two dollars per acre, which was covered by a deed of earlier date which had never been canceled. The deed of marriage settlement left $70,000 of debts unprovided for. The prospective wife knew, before the marriage and before the execution of the marriage settlement, that P. was embarrassed by his debts, and for that reason had demanded an ante-nuptial settlement before she would consent to marry him. Heid, that the deed of settlement was in fraud of creditors and void.

9. Where a deed in favor of two persons is obtained by the fraud of one, although without the privity of the other, the deed is void as to both.

In equity. Heard on pleadings and evidence for final decree. The purpose of the bill was to obtain a decree of the court, setting aside as fraudulent, and null and void, a marriage settlement, made on April 27, 1866, by the defendant Richard Prewett, on Josephine Prewett, whom he afterwards, on May 6, 1866, married. Prewett was fifty-eight years of age. About the first of February, 1866, he proposed marriage to Josephine Prewett, who was the widow of his nephew, and was twenty years of age, and childless, and was the owner of property worth less than $1,000. Josephine Prewett consented to marry him. A short time afterward, for what reason the evidence did not disclose, she wrote Prewett, withdrawing her consent to marry him. About the first of April following, Prewett renewed his addresses. Josephine again agreed to marry him, this time on condition that he made a settlement of property upon her, in consideration of the marriage. To this Prewett assented, and agreed to settle on her a large amount of real estate and some personal property, but without specifying any particular property. On April 27, Prewett executed the deed of marriage settlement, which is attacked in this case. It conveyed to Josephine Prewett, in consideration of the contemplated marriage, real estate which it is conceded was worth $30,000, and personal property worth $2,776. The lands lay partly in Franklin county, but mainly in Lawrence county, Alabama. The personal property conveyed embraced live stock, farming utensils, household furniture and seed cotton, all on the land conveyed. At the date of the marriage settlement, Prewett was indebted in the sum of $90,000. Property of the value of $13,300, in addition to that already mentioned, was conveyed by the deed of settlement, to be applied to the payment of $18,000 of this indebtedness. No other provision was made by Prewett for the payment of his debts. The deed of settlement included all the property to which Prewett had any title, except 3,680 acres of land which he had previously conveyed, by deed, to one Bates, his son-in-law, as will be hereafter more fully stated, and personal property of the value of $600 or $700. On November 20, 1865, Prewett had, by deed of that date, conveyed to his said son-in-law, James R. Bates, for the recited consideration of $25,982, 4,400 acres of land, which included the 3,680 acres of land just mentioned.

The consideration was made up of an account said to be due to Bates from Prewett, amounting to about $18,000, and the residue of the purchase price was to be paid to Prewett in money. The account was for eleven years' services as overseer, with interest computed from the close of each year, eight years' hire of a slave, with interest computed in the same manner, and the price of a horse, $250, and $220 interest thereon. There were no payments or credits on the account. Prewett testified that this deed, some time after its execution, and before the execution of the marriage settlement, was returned to him by Bates, and their contract in reference to said 4,400 acres of land rescinded. Bates, however, did not re-convey the land to Prewett, nor was the deed therefor canceled even, and Prewett must have considered the deed as of some effect, for in June, 1866, after the marriage settlement, he returned no property of his own for taxation, so that the marriage settlement included all the property of Prewett not covered by deeds of conveyance, except $600 or $700 worth of personal property. On July 16, 1866, Prewett, by deed of that date, conveyed to Bates 3,680 acres of land, parcel of the 4,400 acres mentioned in the deed of November 20, 1865, in satisfaction of the said debt due from Prewett to Bates, on the account before mentioned, the amount of which was stated by the parties at $18,560.80. These lands, it was agreed, were worth $2 per acre. On May 6, 1866, Richard and Josephine Prewett were married. On June 25th following, Prewett gave in for taxation, in the name of his wife, all the lands embraced in the marriage settlement, and returned no property whatever of his own for taxation. On July 16, 1866, the day when the last conveyance was made by Prewett to Bates, Josephine Prewett made her last will, whereby, in the event of her dying without issue by her then husband, she devised and bequeathed to one Hodges, all her estate, real and personal, in trust, to pay over to Richard Prewett, her husband, all the annual rents, issues and profits thereof, and in case of her dying leaving issue of her said marriage with Richard Prewett, she devised to the said Hodges a child's share of her estate, real and personal, in trust for the said Richard Prewett, upon the like terms and conditions as she had devised her entire estate, in case of her dying without issue living of her marriage with said Richard Prewett. Prewett testified that he was not informed of the contents of this will until 1870. On December 29, 1868, Richard Prewett filed his petition in bankruptcy, and the only property returned in his schedule was his wearing apparel, valued at $50. In her answer, filed December 17, 1866, to a bill in equity, brought against her and others, in the state chancery court, to set aside this marriage settlement made on her by Richard Prewett, Josephine Prewett said that "at the time of the execution of said deed (the marriage settlement), as well as at the time she contracted to marry the said Richard, she knew that he was embarrassed and indebted, but to what extent, and to whom, she did not know, and does not now know. * * * It was because of her knowledge of the embarrassed condition of the said Richard that she stipulated at the time of her engagement of marriage aforesaid, for the promises, covenants and undertakings of the said Richard, particularly set out and described in the deed of conveyance aforesaid." The answers of both Richard Prewett and Josephine Prewett, which are under oath, deny, that there was any fraudulent purpose in the execution and delivery and acceptance of the deed of settlement, and aver the entire bona fides of the transaction.

L. P. Walker, D. D. Shelby, Milton Humes, and Geo. S. Gordon, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The attack on the marriage settlement is made by the assignee in bankruptcy of Richard Prewett, representing his creditors, and the charge is, that the settlement was made by Richard Prewett, and accepted by Josephine Prewett, with the purpose to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of the former, and is, therefore, null and void. The bill prays that the deed may be so declared, and the property described therein turned over to the assignee, and by him administered as assets of the bankrupt estate.

The principles of law which apply to a case like this are well settled. "Nothing can be clearer, both upon principle and authority, than the doctrine that to make an ante-nuptial settlement void as a fraud upon creditors, it is necessary that both parties should concur in, or have cognizance of, the intended fraud. If the settler alone intend a fraud, and the other party have no notice of it, but is innocent of it, she is not, and cannot be affected by it. Marriage, in contemplation of law, is not only a valuable consideration to support a settlement, but is a consideration of the highest value, and from motives of the soundest policy, is upheld with a steady resolution. The husband and wife, parties to such a contract, are, therefore, deemed, in the highest sense, purchasers for a valuable consideration, and so that if it is bona fide and without notice of fraud, brought home to both sides, it becomes unimpeachable by creditors. Fraud may be imputable to the parties, either by direct co-operation in the original design at the time of its concoction, or by constructive co-operation from notice of it, and by carrying the design, after such notice, into execution." *Magniac v. I have known several cases where persons have given a full and fair price for goods, and where the possession was actually changed. Yet, being done for the purpose of defeating creditors, the transaction has been held fraudulent and void." * * "The question in every case is, whether the act done is a bona fide transaction, or whether it is a trick or contrivance to defeat creditors." "A man who is indebted may, on his marriage, make a settlement of his property, provided the settlement is made honestly and in good faith, and the wife's knowledge of his indebtedness will not alone render it void. It is however, clearly established that marriage cannot be made the means of committing fraud. If there is intent to delay, hinder or defraud creditors, and to make the celebration of a marriage part of a scheme to protect property against the rights of creditors, the consideration of marriage cannot support the settlement." Bump, Fraud. Conv. 308, citing Bulmer v. Hunter, L. R. 8 Eq. 46; Ex parte McBurnie, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 441; Betts v. Union Bank, 1 Har. & G. 175; Campion v. Cotton, 17 Ves. 264; Richardson v. Horton, 7 Beav. 112; Colombine v. Penhall, 1 Smale & G. 228. Notice of the fraud may be inferred from the facts and circumstances of the settlement. Colombine v. Penhall and Bulmer v. Hunter, supra. If the amount of property settled is extravagant, or grossly out of proportion to the station and circumstances of the husband, this, of itself, is sufficient notice of fraud. Ex parte McBurnie, supra; Croft v. Arthur, 3 Desaus. Eq. 223.

In an able opinion, in the case of Davidson v. Graves, reported in Riley, Eq. Cas. 232, Justice Nott, of South Carolina, says: "There is no case that I have seen, where a man has been permitted to make an intended wife a mere stock to graft his property upon, in order to place it beyond the reach of his creditors. A marriage settlement must be construed like every other instrument. The question may always be raised, whether it was made with good faith, or intended as an instrument of fraud. Even though marriage may be a part of the consideration, fraud may be mingled with it, and that may be as well inferred from internal evidence as from circumstances aliunde. Marriage is put on the footing of a pecuniary consideration. And it is said, if a person sell his property for a full consideration and squander the money, his creditors have no redress. From which it is inferred, that marriage will afford the same protection. But, in the case of a bona fide sale, the seller has parted with his property, the purchaser has parted with his money, and the law will presume that the object was the payment of his debts. But the purchaser is not answerable for the misapplication of the money. It is not so with a marriage settlement. The seller does not, in fact, part with his property. It is still intended for his own enjoyment. Neither does he receive in return anything that will satisfy his creditors. His wife will not be received in payment of his debts. It is not to be understood that because marriage is equivalent to a pecuniary consideration, it is to be considered in the nature of an actual purchase. A settlement is not intended as the price of the wife, but as a provision for a family. It must, therefore, be reasonable, and with a due regard to the rights of others. A creditor has an equitable claim to the property of the debtor."

Applying these rules of law to the facts of this case, it is to be determined whether the purpose of Richard Prewett, in making the conveyance to the woman whom he proposed to marry, was to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors, and, if it were, whether Josephine Prewett had notice of such purpose before the marriage. As to the first question, the evidence leaves no doubt in my mind touching the fraudulent intent of Richard Prewett. To ascertain the intent of the settler we are authorized to consider fraudulent transfers to other persons at or about the time of the transfer assailed: Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances, 545, and numerous authorities there cited. The evidence shows that Prewett had been insolvent ever since the close of the late war; that he was largely insolvent on November 20, 1865, when he made a conveyance to his son-in-law, Bates, of 4,400 acres of land. The consideration named in this deed was $25,982 in money. Prewett testifies that this was not the real consideration, but that it was the discharge of his debt to Bates, and the payment by Bates of the residue in money. He further says, that at the date of this deed no formal account was stated between him and Bates, but the debt was supposed to be $17,000 or $18,000; but that afterwards, in July, 1866, the account was stated, which showed that there was due from Prewett to Bates the sum of $18,560.80. The account is in evidence, and it bears upon its face the earmarks of a trumped-up account. There is not a word of evidence to show that any contract had ever been made by Bates for his own services, or for the hire of his slave, or for the sale of his horse; that any note had ever been given, or any account kept. In fact, Prewett says the account was never stated till eight months after the date of the deed of November 20, 1865. It is a remarkable fact, too, that for a period of eleven years this account should be allowed to run, without a single credit or payment. That such an account could be bona fide seems incredible. And yet, upon such an account, at that time uncertain in amount, and without the payment of a cent of money, and without taking from him any evidence of debt, Prewett conveys lands to Bates which he estimated to be worth $26,000. If this were the deed assailed, no court would have any hesitation in pronouncing it fraudulent. We find, then, that in November, 1865, Prewett, being hopelessly insolvent, is attempting to cover up a large part of his property by a fraudulent deed to his son-in-law. For some reason the device was abandoned, and the deed returned to Prewett, but there was no re-conveyance of the land to him, and in the following April Prewett executed the marriage settlement. He owed his creditors $90,000. His available means amounted to little over $50,000. Of these means he devoted $13,000 to the payment of two favored creditors, he retained lands worth about $7,000, which must have been under the cloud of the deed of November, 1865, which was never canceled, and which he afterwards conveyed to his son-in-law, Bates, in payment of the account heretofore referred to, and he conveyed to his intended wife all the residue of his property, worth, according to the agreed facts, $32,776, leaving about $70,000 of debts unprovided for.

The mere statement of these facts reveals the purpose of Prewett. He commenced his attempts to defeat his creditors, by a fraudulent deed, in November, and he closes by a deed by which he, in effect, secures to himself the enjoyment of more than three-fifths of his property, by a conveyance to his intended wife, and leaves creditors to the amount of $70,000 entirely unprovided for. The effect of this deed was to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors, who were not mentioned in the marriage settlement, for it conveyed all the property which he had not before conveyed, and left such creditors nothing. Prewett must be held to know what he was about, and to intend the natural consequences of his act. The pretense that he was insolvent in April, 1866, but did not know it, is absurd. He owed $90,000, which was bearing interest, and he had but $50,000 of property to pay it with. The disposition of $33,000 of this property, all that he had not covered by a former deed, in such a way as to place it beyond the reach of his creditors, while, at the same time, he received no pecuniary equivalent which he could apply to his debts, shows clearly his purpose to defraud his creditors. Prewett was, at the date of the settlement, embarrassed and largely insolvent. The property settled on his proposed wife was out of all reasonable proportion to his means, even if he had owed no debts. The property settled was equitably the property of his creditors. The deed of settlement conveyed, substantially, all his property not covered by a previous conveyance which was still in force, and it left creditors to the amount of $70,000 entirely unprovided for. When, in December, 1868, Prewett filed his schedule in bankruptcy, he reported his wearing apparel, valued at $50, as his only assets. We find, then, that the fraud upon the creditors, designed and consummated by Prewett, was gross and palpable. But fraud brought home to the settler is not of itself sufficient to avoid the settlement. The grantee must participate in the fraud, or at least have cognizance of it. It is, therefore, to be inquired, whether Josephine Prewett had, before her marriage with Richard Prewett, notice of the fraud which Prewett contemplated, and which he carried into execution by means of the marriage settlement. We know, from her own answer, that before the execution of the marriage settlement she was advised that Prewett was indebted, and that he was embarrassed, and it was, as she says, on account of his indebtedness and embarrassment that she demanded a marriage settlement before she would consent to marry him. Why did she make this demand? Clearly because she feared that the creditors of Prewett might sweep away his property and leave her destitute. With this knowledge Prewett presents to her a conveyance, which transfers to her property worth $32,776. Could she, bona fide, knowing that Prewett was indebted and embarrassed, accept a conveyance for so large a sum? Could she shut her eyes and say she did not know the extent of his debts, did not know of his fraudulent purpose, and, therefore, she received the deed in good faith?

Actual knowledge of the fraudulent intent is not necessary. A knowledge of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent man or woman, and to put him or her on inquiry, amounts to notice, and is equivalent to actual knowledge in contemplation of law. Atwood v. Impson, 5 C. E. Green [20 N. J. Eq.] 150; Tantum v. Green, 6 C. E. Green [21 N. J. Eq.] 364; Jackson v. Mather, 7 Cow. 301; Smith v. Henry, 2 Bailey, 118; Mills v. Howeth, 19 Tex. 257. It has even been held that the means of knowledge, by the use of ordinary diligence, amounts to notice. Farmers' Bank v. Douglass, 11 Smedes & M. 469. But in this case it is not necessary to go so far. The indebtedness and pecuniary embarrassment of Prewett, and the large estate conveyed by the deed of settlement, put Josephine Prewett on inquiry, and she is chargeable with knowledge of every fact which she could have learned on inquiry. She might have learned all that the evidence in this case discloses about the amount of Prewett's debts and property, and such knowledge would have made clear Prewett's fraudulent purpose. She is, therefore, chargeable with notice of the fraud, and her acceptance of the deed of settlement, after such notice, makes her a party to the fraud, and renders the marriage settlement null and void. The creditors of Prewett, whose bona fide debts were provided for by the marriage settlement, can take no benefit from the fraudulent instrument. When a deed in favor of two persons is obtained by the fraud of one, although without the privity of the other, the deed will be void as to both. Whelan v. Whelan, 3 Cow. 537; Hunt v. Bass, 2 Dev. Eq. 292; Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273; Townsend v. Harwell, 18 Ala. 301. Although they had no notice or knowledge of the fraud contemplated by Prewett, yet the fact that the grantee, under whom their rights are claimed, not only had notice of the fraud, but was a beneficiary under the fraudulent deed, avoids the instrument as to the beneficiary as well as to the grantee.

The result of these views is, that the marriage settlement made by Richard upon Josephine Prewett, must be declared void for all purposes, and the property conveyed thereby turned over to the assignee in bankruptcy for administration.

[On appeal to the supreme court, the decree of this court was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill. 103 U. S. 22.]

[Brun. Col. Cas. 109; 1 Overt. 464.]

Circuit Court, D. Tennessee. 1809.

CONTRACT TO CONVEY LAND - DAMAGES FOR BREACH.

The measure of damages in an action for breach of a covenant to convey lands, the title to which was not in the defendant, is the value of the lands at the time of judgment.

The defendant had given an obligation to make Clark a deed in fee simple, to six hundred and forty acres of land, his choice out of two thousand acres on the waters of Stone's river, to join some corner of the tract. The bond was given about twenty years ago, and the title was to be made so soon as grants should issue. It did not appear that the defendant had any such land on the waters of Stone's river. The only question was as to the measure of damages: whether it should be the value of the land at the time the bond was given, when grants were obtained, or at this time. The jury found a special verdict. That neither at the time of the contract, when grants issued, nor at any time since, has the defendant had such land as the bond calls for. That such land at the time the bond was given, and when grants should have issued, was worth, with the interest thereupon, $340, and at this time $1040.

Overton, for defendant, said he was prepared with authorities to show that judgment ought to pass for the lesser sum. The special verdict does not find fraud, and the court cannot presume it. See 3 Johns. 281; 1 Johns. 551; 1 Caines, 379; 7 Johns. 605. If fraud had been found by the verdict it would not be contended that the larger sum ought not to be the measure of damages.

PER CURIAM. The jury have found that the defendant had not the land he contracted to convey; in contemplation of law it was therefore a fraud. If the defendant had such land as he has attempted to prove (though he had not a legal title to it), if he offered to show land, to which he was entitled by contract for locating, by showing this he may perhaps have relief in equity; but, it having been found by the jury that he had no title, there must be judgment for the value of the land as it was estimated at this time. Case No. 17,831.

WILSON et ux. v. ROSE.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1828.

DECEDENT'S ESTATE - DEBT DUE BY EXECUTOR - INCLUSION IN LIST OF DEBTS - RUNNING OF LIMITATIONS.

1. If a debt by an executor to his testator be not barred by the statute of limitations at the time of the death of the testator, the executor is bound to give in the claim in the list of debts; and the statute of limitations ceases to run in favor of the debtor from the time of his accepting the trust as executor.

2. The right of a person interested in the administration to proceed in the orphans' court, according to the Maryland statute of 1798, c. 101, subc. 8, § 20, against an executor who neglects to give in a claim against himself, accrues upon the death of the testator; and from that time only, the limitation of twelve years begins to run, if it runs at all in such a case.

3. If an executor fails to give in a claim against himself, his administration-bond is liable to be put in suit.

This was a proceeding by petition in the orphans' court under the testamentary law of Maryland of 1798, c. 101, subc. 8, § 20, by James C. Wilson and Ann his wife, who was one of the distributees, or legatees, of the estate of Thomas B. Beall, against John Rose, one of the executors of that estate, charging him with neglecting to give in a claim against himself in the list of debts due to his testator.

The orphans' court, under the provisions of that section of the law, directed the following issues to be sent to this court to be tried, namely: "(1) Whether or not the said John Rose, the defendant, was indebted to his testator, the said Thomas B. Beall, on the 30th of September, 1820, the day of the death of the said Thomas? If yea, in what sum of money? (2) Whether or not the recovery of the said debt, if any, was not barred by the statute of limitations, as used and practised in the county (of Washington) on the said 30th September, 1820? (3) Whether or not the recovery of the said debt, if any, was not barred by the statute of limitations, as used and practised in the said county on the 8th day of April, 1828, the day on which the said James C. Wilson &c. filed their petition against the said John Rose, in the orphans' court aforesaid? (4) Whether or not the said John Rose, as one of the executors of the said Thomas B. Beall, and having accepted the trust, and taken upon himself the burden and execution of the will of the said Thomas, was not in duty bound to give in all claims against him by the testator, in the list of debts, to the said orphans' court; whether or no the recovery of the said claim was barred by the statute of limitations, as used and practised in the said county on the 30th of September, 1830, the day of the death of the said Thomas; or on the 8th of April, 1828, the day on which the said James C. Wilson and wife filed their petition in the said orphans' court against the said John Rose? And whether the said John Rose, having failed to give in to the said court, any claim against himself by his testator, his testamentary bond has not become liable to be put in suit?"

On the trial of the several issues, and each of them, the orphans' court requests the honorable judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia for Washington county, to direct and instruct the jury, whether or not the said Thomas B. Beall, the testator, on the 30th of September, 1820, had any "just claim" against the said John Rose, his executor; and whether the said Rose, having "accepted of the said trust" of executor, and having taken upon himself the burden and execution of the said will, was not bound to give in to the said orphans' court, all claims against him, in the list of claims due to his testator; whether the recovery of the same was or was not barred by the statute of limitations; and whether, on the said Rose failing to give in such claim, his testamentary bond may not, under the provisions of the act of assembly aforesaid, be put in suit." The debt, due by the defendant Rose to Thomas B. Beall, arose upon a covenant under seal, and accrued in 1810. The testator, Thos. B. Beall, died September 30, 1820. The preliminary question was, whether the limitation of twelve years, in the Maryland statute, was a bar to this proceeding in the orphans' court, founded upon the neglect or failure of the executor, Rose, to give in the claim against himself in the list of claims due to his testator. More than twelve years had elapsed between the time the debt became payable and the filing of the petition in the present proceeding; but twelve years had not elapsed when the testator died, and the defendant accepted the trust and office of executor.

R. P. Dunlop and Mr. Jones, for the petitioners, contended that it was a trust in Mr. Rose, and that the statute of limitations does not run against a trust. There was no person who could bring suit at law against him upon his covenant, after he became executor. The statute of limitations does not run against the claims of legatees in such a proceeding in the orphans' court. This is not a suit upon the covenant, nor for final distribution; it is only to decide whether the claim is to be accounted for by the executor as assets, it is only to establish the claim. It is a suit of a peculiar jurisdiction. The statute of limitations goes only to the remedy. It is the lex fori. It is no bar out of the jurisdiction of the forum. It applies only to actions at law. Courts of equity, however, have adopted it; but the orphans' court has not.

Mr. Marbury and Mr. Swann, contra. The statute of limitations ought to be applied to all new remedies or forms of action. Bank of Columbia v. Sweeny [Case No. 881], in this court at the May term, 1826, and in supreme court, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 671. This is not a technical trust. The limitation began to run in the lifetime of the testator, and nothing can stop it. The legatees stand in the place of the testator, and the limitation continues to run against them, as it did against their testator. By the Maryland statute, the thing in action cannot be given in evidence, if it be of 12 years' standing. The orphans' court has as good a right to adopt the statute of limitations as a court of equity has.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion, that the statute of limitations was not a bar to this proceeding in the orphans' court, for the reasons stated by CRANCH, Chief Judge, who said:

The cause of this suit is the neglect of the executor to return this debt as assets. That duty accrued in 1820, upon the death of the testator. Twelve years had not elapsed from that time to the institution of this suit in the orphans' court. The debt was not barred at the time of the death of the testator. It was a subsisting valid debt, which the executor was bound to return in the list of debts. His not having done so is the cause of this suit; and if the orphans' court, in analogy to courts of law, should admit the statute of limitations as a defence, it could be pleaded to this suit only. The limitation ceased to run as to this debt, when it was collected and came into the hands of the executor. It then became assets. No cause of action upon the covenant then existed. The debt was satisfied.

The jury was then sworn to try the issues, and upon this verdict, this court certified to the orphans' court: That John Rose, one of the executors of Thomas B. Beall, was indebted to him on the 30th of September, 1820, in the sum of $752.76, and that he then had a just claim against him to that amount. That the said Rose was bound to give in to the orphans' court, the said claim against him in the list of debts due to his testator, and that the recovery of the said debt was not barred by the statute of limitations, on the 30th of September, 1820, nor on the 8th of April, 1828, the time of filing the petition in this cause in the orphans' court. And that the said John Rose, having failed to give in such claim, his testamentary bond is liable, under the provisions of the act of assembly aforesaid, to be put in suit.

Case No. 17,832.

WILSON v. ROUSSEAU et al

[1 Blatchf. 3.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1845.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INFRINGEMENT.

In this case the judges of this court were opposed in opinion upon ten several questions, which were certified to the supreme court of the United States. The case in that court is reported in 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646. The arguments of counsel on the case in this court are here given, with a view to a better understanding of the full scope and bearing of the answers of the supreme court to the several questions certified, the same arguments having been presented in both courts and by the same counsel.

This was an action on the case [by James G. Wilson against Louis Rousseau and Charles Easton] to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent. The questions in the case arose on demurrer. The judges of this court were opposed in opinion upon ten several questions which were raised by the demurrers. [Case unreported.] Those questions were certified to the supreme court of the United States for its opinion, and the decision of that court upon them is reported in 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson. It will be seen, by referring to it, that the seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth questions certified are simply answered, without the assignment of any reasons for the conclusions of the court, and neither the arguments nor the points of the counsel who argued the cause in the supreme court are given by the reporter. It has therefore been thought that it would not be unprofitable to give at some considerable length the positions assumed by the same counsel in this court on the argument of the demurrers, (and the same arguments were presented in the supreme court.) as tending to assist in a better understanding of the full scope and force of the very important decisions made by the supreme court in the case.

The declaration contained two counts. The first count set forth the issuing of letters patent to William Woodworth, December 27th, 1828, for fourteen years from that day, for "a new and useful improvement in the method of planing, tonguing, grooving, and cutting into mouldings, or either, plank, boards, or any other material, and for reducing the same to an equal width and thickness, and also for facing and dressing brick, and cutting mouldings on or facing metallic, mineral, or other substances;" the death of William Woodworth, intestate, at New-York, February 9th, 1839; the appointment of William W. Woodworth, his son, as his administrator, February 14th, 1839; the application of William W. Woodworth, as administrator, July 20th, 1842, to the commissioner of patents for an extension of the patent for seven years; the action of the proper board of commissioners, November 16th, 1842, extending the patent for seven years from the 27th of December, 1842; an assignment by William W. Woodworth, as administrator, to the plaintiff, August 12th, 1844, of the exclusive right to make, use, and vend two machines, under the patent as so extended, to be used in the town of Watervliet, Albany county, New-York; and the infringement by the defendants by the use of the patented invention in Watervliet since the assignment to the plaintiff.

To the first count the defendants pleaded the general issue and three special pleas. The first special plea to the first count set forth, that William Woodworth, on the 4th of December, 1828, after the discovery of his improvement, assigned to one James Strong the one half of his interest in it, by an assignment in writing, under seal, which was duly recorded in the patent office; that on the 28th of November, 1829, by an instrument in writing, under seal, Woodworth and Strong assigned to Daniel H. Twogood, Daniel Halstead, and William Tyack, all their right to the patent for certain territory, embracing, among other places, said county of Albany; that said instrument contained an habendum clause as follows: "To have and to hold the rights and privileges hereby granted, to them and their assigns, for and during the term of fourteen years from the date of the patent," and also this further clause: "And the two parties further agree that any improvement in the machinery, or alteration or renewal of either patent, such improvement, alteration, or renewal shall enure to the benefit of the respective parties in interest, and may be applied and used within their respective districts as hereinbefore designated;" and that said instrument was recorded in the patent office, October 9th, 1837.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred, assigning the following special causes of demurrer: First. That the assignment made by Woodworth and Strong to Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack, November 28th, 1829, having been executed before the passage of any law authorizing an extension of the terms of letters patent, did not vest the grantees with any interest in the rights secured by the extension of the patent for seven years. Second. That the plea did not show that the defendants were assignees of Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack, or ever derived any advantage from the assignment to Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack. The defendants joined in demurrer.

The second special plea to the first count set forth, that William Woodworth, prior to the 1st of November, 1836, disposed of his entire interest in the patent; and that at the time of his death on the 9th of February, 1839, he had no interest in the patent.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred, assigning the following special causes of demurrer: First. That the validity and sufficiency of the extension of the patent were not affected by anything alleged in the plea, nor was the plaintiff's right to judgment barred or affected by the matters alleged in the plea. Second. That William W. Woodworth, in his capacity as administrator, had good right, by law, to apply for and obtain an extension of the patent, and that the extension of the patent could, by law, be made on his application, and to him, and not otherwise. The defendants joined in demurrer.

The third special plea to the first count set forth that William Woodworth died on the 9th of February, 1839, and that at the time of his death he had no interest in the patent.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred, assigning two special causes of demurrer, the same as to the second special plea. The defendants joined in demurrer.

The second count of the declaration set forth the issuing of the patent, the death of Woodworth, the appointment of his administrator, and the extension of the patent for seven years, as in the first count; the extension of the patent for seven years from the 27th of December, 1849, by an act of congress passed February 26th, 1845; the surrender of the patent on the 8th of July, 1845, by William W. Woodworth, as administrator, on account of defects in the specification, and its reissue on that day on an amended specification; an assignment in writing, under seal, by William W. Woodworth, as administrator, to the plaintiff, on the 9th of July, 1845, of his right and title to the said re-issued patent of July 8th, 1845, for the residue of said first extension of seven years, so far as regarded, (among other things,) the exclusive right to use two machines in the town of Watervliet, Albany county, New-York; and the infringement by the defendants, by the use of the patented invention in Watervliet, since October 1st, 1845.

To the second count the defendants demurred, assigning the following special causes of demurrer: First. That it did not appear by the second count that the plaintiff was the assignee of an exclusive right to make, use, and vend said improvement within the town of Watervliet, or that he was invested, as to that territory, with all the rights of the original patentee. Second. That the re-issued patent of the 8th of July, 1845, was void: 1st. For uncertainty in the amended specification; 2d. For ambiguity in the same; 3d. For multiplicity of claim in the same; 4th. Because it appeared that the re-issued patent of the 8th of July, 1845, was not for the same invention for which the patent of December 27th, 1828, was granted. Third. That the decision of the board of commissioners, upon the application for the extension of a patent under the 18th section of the act of congress of July 4th, 1836, commonly known as the patent act, is not conclusive upon the question of their jurisdiction to act in the given case. Fourth. That the commissioner of patents could not lawfully receive a surrender of letters patent for a defective specification, and issue new letters patent upon an amended specification, after the expiration of the term for which the original patent was granted, and during the existence of an extended term of seven years. The plaintiff joined in demurrer.

The questions upon which the judges were opposed in opinion will be severally stated hereafter. They will also be found at length in the report of the case in 4 How. [45 U. S.], together with the certified statement of facts, and copies of the letters patent and specifications, and of various papers referred to in the statement and questions. The first cause of demurrer to the first special plea to the first count raised the second and third questions; and the second cause, the fourth question. The causes of demurrer to the second and third special pleas to the first count raised the first and fifth questions. The first cause of demurrer to the second count raised the sixth question; the first, second, and third subdivisions of the second cause the seventh question, and the fourth subdivision the eighth question; the third cause, the ninth question; and the fourth cause, the tenth question. For the sake of convenience the arguments will be presented in the order of the questions as certified, rather than in their order as raised by the pleadings in this court.

William H. Seward, for plaintiff.

Level, smooth, and impervious wooden floors are among the necessary parts of all our dwellings. They were prepared until 1828 with manual labor, and with very imperfect instruments. A skilful and vigorous mechanic would prepare ten or fifteen planks, equal to one hundred feet, in a day, at a cost of two dollars. William Woodworth invented a machine by which five thousand feet of lumber are prepared for floors in one day, at an expense of ten dollars.

Point I. Whether the 18th section of the patent act of 1836 authorized the extension of a patent on the application of the executor or administrator of a deceased patentee. The laws of the United States regard property in letters patent for inventions as personal property in contradistinction to real property. If a patent be granted for fourteen years, and the patentee die during the term, the property in it becomes vested in his personal representatives. The 18th section of the patent act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 124), declares a new and further right in behalf of an inventor who has obtained a patent. This new right is a title to an extension of the original grant for seven years more, if the patentee, at any time before the expiration of his patent, shall show to the proper authority, by a certain form of proof, that such an extension would be "consistent with the public interest," and "just and proper, by reason of his failure," without neglect or fault on his part, "to obtain from the use and sale of his invention, a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon the same and the introduction thereof into use." The effect of such an extension, when made, is that the original letters patent "have the same effect in law as if they had been originally granted for twenty-one years." By the operation of the 18th section, such a new and additional right as has been described vests at once in every inventor when he obtains his patent; that is to say, a contingent right to an extension for seven years. The consideration of this new and additional right is of the same nature, if not identical, with that of the right to demand the original patent, and belongs as exclusively to the same inventor. That consideration is the unremunerated merit of a discovery useful to the commonwealth. If the original patent had been for twenty-one years, and the inventor had died during that period, the administrator would have taken the benefits of the unexpired term. Why should not the administrator apply for and obtain the extension, on the death of the patentee during the same term? The argument on the other side is that the letter of the statute provides for an application by the patentee, prescribes conditions to be performed by him, and directs a grant to him, without at all alluding to the possibility of his death. But the statute recognizes the application for an extension, not as a petition for a boon, but as a demand, which must be granted whenever certain circumstances exist. The inventor, then, has a right to an extension in certain cases. If it were of such a nature that courts of common law could enforce it by proper remedies, it would be a legal right. But it is a right contingent on the favorable adjudication of the board of commissioners, which is invested with legislative discretion in regard to the application, and it is also an equitable right, because any claim or interest in regard to it which may be created among individuals by contract, can be enforced in courts of equity alone.

But, where not affected by assignment or testamentary direction, chuses in action, whether legal or equitable, and whether absolute or contingent, always pass by mere operation of law to the personal representative of a deceased owner, without any words of perpetuity. An administrator, though not named in the obligation, may sue on a bond executed to his intestate. So any personal right, whether arising by express agreement, or by mere implication of law, whether absolute or conditional or contingent, may be asserted with the same effect by an executor, as by the party to whom in life the right belonged. The administrator's right of succession to personal property is absolute and universal. This transmissibility has only one exception. The right to damages for personal torts does not descend. Rights conferred by law, or created by legislation, whether rights of one citizen against another, or of a citizen against the commonwealth, are as truly rights of property, as those created between citizens by contract. In such cases the law is a contract, or creates a contract, as has been well settled. Therefore, such rights are subject to the principle of transmission to personal representatives, like all other rights of personal property. If the state grant the use of a bridge for a term of years, on condition that the grantee shall erect the bridge, and, at the expiration of his term, devote it to the public, is not this a contract, which, if performed by the grantee, will descend to his representatives and carry the franchise to them? Nor is there anything in the intangibility of the right to an extension of a patent, or in the uncertainty of its future establishment, which exempts it from the principle of this law.

An executor or administrator is entitled to all the personal property of the decedent, not only to such as is susceptible of manual possession, but also to things in action, whether in law or in equity; and this includes not only property not in the possession of the deceased at the time of his death, but also interests vested in him by condition, remainder, limitation or election, and such interests equally in equity as in law. 9 Petersd. Abr. 298. The right to an extension of a patent is an interest concerning personal property, in equity, depending on the election of the patentee and on a condition beyond his control. Such an interest must necessarily pass to the administrator, unless the statute, expressly or by implication, limits its duration to the life of the patentee. The statute contains no such express limitation. No limitation is implied by the provision that the patentee shall desire an extension; for the desire here described is an election, which can be made by an administrator. Nor is a limitation implied by the provision that the patentee shall apply; for the application is only a legal proceeding to assert a personal right, and an administrator may institute such a proceeding.

But it is chiefly insisted that a limitation is implied by the provision that proof shall be made by the oath of the patentee concerning his profit and loss resulting from the invention. This direction concerning the oath of the patentee is merely incidental and a matter of detail, which must give way when necessary to secure effect to the essential portion of the statute. The essential thing is, that it must appear that the inventor has not been adequately rewarded. It must appear also, that the application is for his benefit, as between him and the world at large. But, in view of the policy of the act, he lives in the person of his administrator, and an application by the administrator is virtually an application by the inventor. The law requires the patentee to exhibit his profits and losses. They must be exhibited, even though he be dead. His administrator has his books and accounts, and is therefore presumed to be competent to show what the law requires. If he can do this, the object of the provision concerning proof is attained. If he cannot, the application must fail. It would alike fail, for the same cause, if made by the inventor himself. If, in some cases, an administrator might be unable to satisfy the board, that circumstance would constitute no reason why one who could fully satisfy the board should not apply.

The object of the patent laws is, as defined in the constitution, "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their writings and discoveries." The 18th section of the act of 1836 implies that, in order to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, it is necessary to extend a patent, when the public interests will permit, if the inventor have, without fault on his part, failed to obtain a remuneration during the term of fourteen years. The act is, therefore, remedial. But, if the position of the defendants be correct, the law will altogether fail in those numerous cases where a patentee dies without obtaining an extension. Now, since there is no express limitation on the life of the patentee, imposing on us the necessity of adopting so suicidal a construction of the 18th section, and since portions of the statute may seem to conflict with each other, all that can be claimed by our adversaries is that, in this respect, that section is ambiguous. Admitting such ambiguity, only for argument's sake, we humbly submit that our construction is in harmony with the policy of the statute. Again, our construction brings the 18th section into harmony with the other details of the statute. The 6th section provides that any inventor, (without alluding to his possible death,) may apply for and obtain letters patent. The 10th section declares that if the inventor shall die before a patent issue, then the right of applying for and obtaining such patent shall devolve on the executor or administrator of such person, in trust for the heirs at law of the deceased, or of his devisees, in as full and ample a manner, and under the same conditions, limitations, and restrictions, as the same was held or might have been claimed or enjoyed by such person in his life-time; and when application shall be made by such legal representative, the necessary oath or affirmation shall be so varied as to be applicable to him. Again, the 13th section provides that, if a patent shall prove void by reason of mistake or accident, the patentee may surrender it, and obtain a renewed patent for the unexpired portion of the original term; and the statute expressly declares that the executor or administrator of a deceased patentee may apply in such a case. Now, the most accomplished casuist would fail to find a reason for a policy in that case, distinguishable from the policy of extension provided for in the 18th section. Again, the statute is beneficent. It is, therefore, to be construed rigorously against the public and beneficently towards inventors. It would be a mockery of national magnanimity and justice to offer the extension of a patent to the unrewarded inventor while in life, and yet plead his death in abatement of an application for an extension on behalf of his children. The construction insisted upon by our adversaries does violence to natural sentiments of justice. The commonwealth has, by the discovery, received a beneficial consideration. It pays an equivalent to the inventor. Would it not be absurd and capricious to say that the equivalent shall be conferred on the inventor if he live fourteen years, but shall be denied him if he do not live so long? Again, the 18th section provides for the transmission of the benefits of the extension to assignees. It would be very strange indeed if an assignee should be remembered with justice and kindness by his country, and the inventor's children be cast out from her favor. The language of the British statute in regard to the extension of patents is to the same effect. Executors and administrators are not expressly named, while in fact they apply for and obtain such extension. St. 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 83, § 4; Hind. Pat. 600.

But, it is urged that executors and administrators seem to have been intentionally excluded, because they are not mentioned in the 18th section, while they are expressly named in other sections, such as the 5th, 6th, 10th, and 13th. The remark is founded on the principle that the entire law is the symmetrical production of one mind, and that uniformity of language must therefore be expected, where there is uniformity of purpose. But the reason fails in construing statutes enacted by popular legislatures. It is insisted, moreover, that the powers vested in the board of commissioners are special and administrative, and are, therefore, to be strictly exercised. This is very true. But how strictly? Certainly not so strictly as to defeat the statute. The letter must be preserved, but not if it kill the spirit of the law.

The question thus discussed was necessarily involved in the decision of the board of commissioners, when the extension of 1842 was granted in this case. That board acted judicially and decided the point in our favor. In the case of Van Hook v. Scudder [Case No.

16,853], in the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New-York, the late Mr. Justice Thompson, in June, 1843, held that an administrator or executor might make application for the extension of a patent after the death of the patentee, and that the patent might lawfully be extended on such an application. The same view of the statute was adopted by Mr. Justice McKinley in the case of Wilson v. Simpson [Id. 17,834], in equity, in the circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of Louisiana, and by Judge McCaleb in the same court in the case of Wilson v. Curtius [Id. 17,800]. Mr. Justice McLean considered the same question, on the same extension of this patent, in the case of Brooks v. Bicknell [Id. 1,945], in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Ohio, and decided that the construction of the act in this respect had been rightly settled by the board of commissioners. The question was several times presented to the lamented Mr. Justice Story. At first he adopted the opinion of Judge McLean from courtesy; but afterwards, in the case of Woodworth v. Sherman [Id. 18,019], he said that, on the fullest reflection, he had come to the opinion that Judge McLean was right in his decision that an administrator was competent to apply for and receive this grant, and that to hold otherwise would be going contrary to the whole spirit and policy of the patent laws.

Point II. Whether by force and operation of the 18th section of the act of July 4th, 1836, entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts, &c.," the extension granted to William W. Woodworth, as administrator, on the 16th day of November, 1842, enured to the benefit of assignees under the original patent granted to William Woodworth on the 27th day of December, 1828, or whether said extension enured to the benefit of the administrator only, in his said capacity. The policy of promoting science and the arts by granting letters patent is feebly shadowed forth in the books of common law. It is certain that letters patent originally no such object. They were chiefly employed to grant to favorites of the crown, estates, honors and franchises at the expense of the public welfare. Certainly, very imperfect notions of the present policy of letters patent existed until near the close of the reign of Elizabeth. That queen granted to a favorite of hers, named Ralph Bowes, a monopoly of the manufacture of playing-cards for twelve years, and afterwards extended the franchise for twenty-one years longer. In the letters patent she did not pretend that he had invented those instruments of amusement, or any process of manufacturing them. This monopoly was tested in the case of Darcy v. Allein, 11 Coke, 84b, and it was declared void, because injurious to the public welfare. A severe examination of all existing monopolies was made in parliament at an early period in the reign of James I. But this was done by royal concession, and not at all under a claim of legislative power. On that occasion a large number of letters patent were condemned and abrogated, and none were saved but such as had short terms, and were granted to inventors, for useful discoveries. At last, the statute of 21 Jac. I. c. 3, was passed. See Hind. Pat. 592. This statute, which constituted the British code of the law of letters patent for two hundred years, originated, as is seen, not in the policy of promoting science and the arts, but merely in a jealousy of royal power. It established that policy not by direct and affirmative enactments, but by way of excepting those patents which could be defended on public considerations. The grounds of these exceptions were: 1st, that the patentee was the inventor; 2d, that the discovery was useful; 3rd, that the monopoly would operate as an encouragement to genius; 4th, that the term of the monopoly did not extend longer than fourteen years.

This was the British law of patents when the American constitution was founded. An obvious necessity dictated that the power to provide for the promotion of the arts and sciences should be vested in the federal government, rather than in the authorities of the respective states. And it is remarkable how distinctly every feature of the policy of the statute of James I. is impressed on the constitution of the United States. Article 1, § 8. Congress shall have power. What power? Power to promote the progress of science and useful arts. How? By securing the exclusive right of property in writings and discoveries. To whom? To authors and inventors. For how long? For limited times. Congress exercised its constitutional power in the act of April 10th, 1790 (1 Stat. 109), and that law was expressed in the very words of the statute of James I. The act was revised in 1793, and amended in 1800, 1819, and 1832. Neither the statute of James I., nor the act of 1793, provided for the case of an improvement of an invention already patented; nor for the conflict of claims between the inventor of the principle and the discoverer of the improvement. Nor did either the British or the American code provide for the re-issue of void letters patent; nor for an extension under any circumstances of the limited term for which letters patent were issued. As early as 1793, however, it was perceived that a controversy might arise between the patentee of a machine, and a person who should discover an improvement of it. Congress, therefore, in that year enacted that any person who should have discovered an improvement in the principle of any machine, or in the process of any composition of matter, which should have been patented, and should have obtained a patent for such improvement, should not be at liberty to make, use, or vend the original discovery, nor should the first inventor be at liberty to use the improvement. 1 Stat. 321. Here we recognize for the first time improvements of patents, in the law regulating the rights of scientific property.

In England, as well as in America, until a very recent period, a defective description of the invention rendered the letters patent void.

An attempt was made by American judges, as early as 1812, to correct this great injustice. It was held by them that letters patent might be valid, although the specification were defective, unless the defect arose from an intention to deceive the public. Whittemore v. Cutter [Case No. 17,600]; Park v. Little [Id. 10,715]. But this view was abandoned in submission to stringent British decisions on the same subject, and it was thereafter held here, as in England, that a defective specification rendered letters patent absolutely void, no matter how innocent of fraudulent design the inventor, or how beneficent his invention. Morris v. Huntington [Id. 9,831]. The evil could now be corrected only by a proceeding which the letter of the law did not direct or recognize, namely, an amendment of the specification and a re-issue of the letters patent. In a case which came before Mr. Justice Thompson in 1824, he held, that there was no insuperable objection to entering a vacatur of the patent, if it had been taken out inadvertently and by mistake; that all the proceedings in the state department were ex parte, and were conducted ministerially rather than judicially; and that there was no good reason why the patent might not be surrendered and cancelled of record, a new and correct specification be filed, and a second, that is to say, a re-issued patent for the unexpired portion of the fourteen years be issued to the patentee, whereby the inventor and the public would be secured in their rights. The department of state promptly adopted the opinion of Judge Thompson, and the principle was sanctioned by the supreme court of the United States. Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 218; Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 292. It was also engrafted by congress upon the patent system of this country in 1832, by a law which declared that whenever any patent should be invalid or inoperative, for the reason that any of the terms or conditions prescribed in the third section of the act of 1793 had not, through inadvertence, accident or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, been complied with on the part of the inventor, it should be lawful for the secretary of state, upon the surrender to him of such patent, to cause a new one to be granted to the inventor, for the same invention, for the residue of the period, then unexpired, for which the original patent was granted, upon his complying with the terms and conditions prescribed in the third section of the act. 4 Stat. 559. The law remained thus until 1836. The security offered to inventors, as authorized by the constitution and granted by congress, consisted of the following provisions, namely: a patent for an invention for the term of fourteen years; a patent for an improvement of an invention already patented; and a right to an altered and renewed or re-issued patent for the same term, in lieu of one which should prove void by reason of a defective specification. The act of 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 83, passed in 1835, through the efforts of Lord Brougham, contained a provision for the surrender of letters patent for a defective specification, and for the renewal of them on an amended specification, similar in all respects to our own law of 1832.

There was yet another advance to be made. This was accomplished in 1836. Congress, in that year, revised the entire patent system, and abolished all existing laws. A new code was enacted. 5 Stat. 117. Under the former system an inventor was held, in regard to time, to the strict letter of the contract between himself and the government, as expressed in his letters patent. By that contract, he had agreed to surrender his discovery to the public forever, in consideration of being secured in the exclusive enjoyment of it for the limited time appointed by law. Previously to 1836 the term was inflexibly fixed at fourteen years. If an inventor improved his own invention or that of another, he could obtain a patent for the improvement, but only for the term of fourteen years. If a patent proved defective and void, it could be amended, altered and renewed, and thus be made valid and effectual, but only for so many years or months or days as might remain of the fourteen years originally stipulated. No public authority had power, on any consideration, to extend the duration of a patent. No law existed recognizing a right in the inventor to an extension, and of course no such right existed. If, now and then, a patent was extended for seven or perhaps fourteen years, the act of extension was effected not by any subordinate authority, nor by virtue of any existing law, nor in acknowledgment of any right or claim on the part of the inventor, nor in accordance with any established policy. But, on the contrary, the extension was an exception to the policy of the country, and constituted a gift, conferred by a high and solemn act of legislative power. But a change at length came over the spirit of the age. In England as well as in America, after a long trial of the same absolute limitation of patents to the term of fourteen years, it was found that when an invention was really useful, such numerous and powerful interests were often combined against the inventor, that, with the aid of fraud and litigation, letters patent too often failed to secure to the inventor the enjoyment of his property during the limited time so strictly measured. The English statute of 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 83, was passed on the 10th of September, 1835. That statute provides that in certain cases after a full hearing of and enquiry into the whole matter by the judicial committee of the privy council, his majesty, if he shall think fit, may grant new letters patent for an invention already patented, "for a term not exceeding seven years after the expiration of the first term, any law, custom or usage to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding." The principle of that act was adopted by the congress of the United States at the very next session of that body. The provision thus made for extending patents, constitutes the 18th section of the act of July 4th, 1836.

All the difficulties which have arisen in the present case, and all which can be raised in regard to the construction of the 18th section, will vanish when a distinction is simply and plainly taken between the "extension" of letters patent and the "renewal" of letters patent. Legislative bodies may use terms loosely, but courts apply them strictly. A "renewal" renovates a patent which has become void, and restores it to the same condition in which it was when it became void, and for the same period of duration. An "extension" differs altogether from this. It seizes upon the franchise at the expiration of the fourteen years, and extends it seven years more; and it has this effect whether the franchise ran its course of fourteen years by virtue of original letters patent or of renewed letters patent. Hence it follows that the "extension" to be made under the 18th section is a relinquishment by the state to the inventor of a portion of an estate which he had solemnly dedicated to the public use; whereas, what is conceded to him by a renewal is what was granted ineffectually before. The claim of the inventor, recognized by the 18th section, arises, not as in other cases, out of his acknowledged title to his invention, for he has conveyed that to the public, nor yet out of the palpable obligation of the government to render effectual the defective guaranty for which it received so valuable an equivalent. But his claim arises now out of a principle of national magnanimity. The legislature is bound to secure individual rights, and could not justly deny a patent for a new invention, or for an improvement of an invention. Nor could congress, with more justice, refuse a renewed patent, when the first should prove useless, for that would be to seize the inventor's property without allowing him any reward, after pretending to give him a solemn guaranty for its enjoyment. And congress could not declare that the renewed patent should be for the sole use of the patentee to the exclusion of assignees, because that would be unjust, fraudulent, and a palpable violation of the constitution. But when the inventor has renounced his discovery to the public, by a contract fairly made and valid in law, a claim for a modification of that contract and for a further remuneration by a prolongation of the franchise, on the ground of disappointed expectation or effort, however just or reasonable, is at least without precedent. Nevertheless, the 18th section is neither capricious, nor unreasonable, nor impolitic. It does not authorize extensions without just claims and enlightened purposes. Those who maintain that, by virtue of the 18th section, assignees of the original term acquire an interest in the extended term, without any express agreement, seem to overlook the nature, alike, of the occasion provided for by that section, of the action prescribed, of the claims of the party procuring that action, and of the policy of the law. For it is on the desire, not of an assignee, but of the patentee, that an extension may be granted in proper cases. The patent to be extended must belong not to an assignee but to the patentee. And the patentee must not merely desire an extension. He cannot be passive. He must act. He must make application in writing and set forth the grounds thereof. Those grounds are to be exhibited, not by any stranger, or even by an assignee or privy in interest, but by the patentee. The 18th section acknowledges that however the patentee may have leased or sold his franchise, in whole or in part, for the term of fourteen years, an equity in remainder belongs to him, and that the right to a prolongation of the term, if it exist in any body, exists in him. It is unimportant to enquire whether the right in the thing patented, after the fourteen years, has reverted to the inventor, or whether he be deemed never to have parted with it. The law expressly declares it his, in saying—"if the patentee shall desire an extension of his patent."

Again, the act directs the commissioner of patents to demand forty dollars in advance, as a condition of receiving an application for an extension, and he shall exact that sum, not from an assignee or a stranger, but from the applicant, who, it has been shown, can be no other than the patentee. Congress distinctly say that this money is to be paid by him as in the case of an original application for a patent. These directions are given for a public transaction, in the nature of a suit to the government for a right. This suit is, in form, a judicial proceeding, a prosecution to obtain a grant or franchise beneficial to the applicant, and, possibly, injurious to the public. After the inventor has instituted his prosecution by an application in writing showing the grounds thereof, and after he has paid the legal fee in advance, he is next required to summon the parties interested to appear before the court. Not only is the government there, for its administrative agents constitute the court, but notice must be given to all the world, and care must be taken to bring the notice home to those persons who are most interested adversely to an extension. The duty of thus calling adverse parties before the court is devolved, with all its burthensome expense, not on any public officer or agent, nor on any assignee or person subordinately interested in the property, but on the patentee. A board is constituted, which is a court, for it "receives" an application, "considers" it, "hears the patentee and any person appearing to show cause in opposition," and, with the latitude of judicial discretion, "decides" upon "evidence produced," at a time and place previously given to the parties, and "certifies its judgment and opinion," that the same may become a public record. This view of the judicial character and functions of the board is sustained by the opinion of Mr. Justice McLean, in the case of Brooks v. Bicknell [Case No. 1,945].

Thus far the patentee is the actor or prose-cutur. Nor does his action stop here. Besides all other evidence, the court appeals to his conscience, by requiring a statement, on oath, of the ascertained value of the invention. Of its ascertained value to whom? To the public? No. To assignees and grantees? No. To the patentee and his assignees together? No. But of its ascertained value to the patentee. For that value is to be ascertained by an account of his receipts and expenditures, and of those alone. And the receipts and expenditures thus stated must show a true and faithful account of profit and loss, not by assignees and grantees, but of profit and loss in any manner accruing to him, the patentee, from and by reason of the said invention. Why this elaborate, perplexing and expensive exhibition of the accounts of the patentee exclusively, embracing every item of profit and of loss, arising from whatever cause or in whatever manner? The object is explained in the next clause of the section, to wit: that it may appear "to the full and entire satisfaction of the board, whether it is just and proper, that the term of the patent should be extended, because the patentee has, without neglect or fault on his part, failed to obtain from the use and sale of his invention, a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity and expense bestowed by him upon the same, and the introduction thereof into use."

Who can fail to see that as the inventor alone is invited into court to prefer an application, and is charged with all the responsibilities, expenses and burthens of a public suitor, so the claim investigated is his own, exclusively, and founded upon his own merits, services and sacrifices for the public good? If it be shown that he was not the inventor, his application fails. If it be shown that he has received an adequate recompense, his suit is of course denied. It encounters the same fate, if the failure to obtain such recompense resulted from his own fault or neglect. On the other hand, if he be the inventor, if the discovery be useful, and if he have failed to receive remuneration without such fault or neglect, then, so far as individual interests are concerned, it is just and proper that his application should prevail. And the result must be the same, whether he has used his improvement more or less, whether he has licensed one person or one hundred thousand persons to use his invention, whether he retains the entire property in his franchise or has sold it for every hamlet, town, county and state in the Union. Nor will the case be varied, although assignees have enjoyed the franchise, with or without interruption, whether they have become enriched or impoverished, with or without merit or neglect of their own. Their transactions, their profits and losses, find no place in the "true and faithful account" which the patentee must exhibit. If the board be fully and entirely satisfied of the justice of the claim of the patentee, and not otherwise, and upon that consideration alone, (but not without due regard to the public interests,) they certify their judgment to that effect to the commissioner of patents. The commissioner is required thereupon to extend the patent for the term of seven years from the expiration of the first term.

The patent thus extended "shall have the same effect in law as though it had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years." What is thus made to continue twenty-one years, instead of fourteen, its original limitation? The franchise secured by the letters patent. What is that franchise? If we consult the 5th section, we find it is a grant to the inventor for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, of the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, using and vending the invention. It is a grant which excludes all men from participating in the enjoyment of the property described. It is a grant to the inventor in praesenti, on the day of the extension. It leaps backward, over all intervening time, to the date of the first patent, and gives that grant the same effect, from that time, as if it had been originally made for twenty-one years. And it looks forward to the possible death of the inventor, or his future assignment of the whole or portions of this new and additional franchise, and includes the patentee and, contingently, his future heirs, executors, administrators and assigns. The heirs, executors, administrators and assigns thus provided for are not the persons who would have been such, had he died or assigned without that extension, but those who shall in fact, and by operation of law, or of his own grant, be his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, in the event of his future death or assignment. The original patent is not continued from its expiration, with all the accidents, incidents and accessions attached to and gathered round it during its course, but the extension relates back to the commencement of the patent, overleaps all assignments, incidents and accessions, and leaves them as they were, because they are not prolonged or extended, nor is it declared that they are to have the same effect as if the patent had been originally granted for twenty-one years. If the patent were not extended, all assignments and licenses would of course expire with the patent. They must equally expire although the patent is prolonged, for they are not prolonged.

Again, the portions of the 18th section which have been considered manifest a designed neglect and disregard of assignees and licensees. No matter how much any one assignee, or all the assignees, may desire the extension of a patent—no matter though the whole of the original franchise may have been assigned to one person, and he may desire an extension—no matter though assignees of a part, or even of the whole, make application in writing, and set forth the grounds thereof—no matter what grounds they set forth—no matter though, among such grounds, they show that they have furnished all the capital which has been used in perfecting the discovery and bringing it into use—no matter though they prove, by indisputable evidence, that they have been not merely just, but even generous to the inventor, and liberal to the public, and have been impoverished by their generosity, while the inventor has become opulent, and the country has grown in wealth and prosperity by the expenditure of their capital in bringing the invention into use—no matter though they show all this, and show besides, that the patentee, although indemnified by them, refuses to apply on their behalf and to set forth his accounts on oath, yet the assignees must be dismissed without a hearing. It thus appears, that not only is the patentee a necessary agent in obtaining the extension, but that the policy of the law is to encourage genius by furnishing additional stimulants to inventors, not to assignees, or even to patrons of inventors, and that the law can have effect only at the solicitation of the inventor, in consideration of his exclusive merits and for his benefit and his benefit alone. Why this careful consideration of the inventor? And why this studied neglect of the assignee? Simply because the constitution disclaims all care of assignees, while it positively enjoins the protection of inventors.

But it is insisted by the defendants, that this manifest effect of the 18th section is overcome and defeated by the qualifying sentence at the close of the section, to wit: "And the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented, to the extent of their respective interest therein; provided, however, that no extension of a patent shall be granted after the expiration of the term for which it was originally issued." Before examining particularly this portion of the section, it must be remarked that congress have constitutional power to promote science and the arts by securing rights of property in writings and inventions to authors and inventors only. A construction, therefore, of the 18th section which shall give it effect to secure such a right, primarily, to a mere assignee, without equivalent paid by him to the author or inventor, would certainly be unconstitutional. It is only by the special authority granted in the constitution that congress can interpose. And they can interpose only for the purpose of promoting science, and only by securing the discovery to the inventor. The British government is not restricted by a written constitution. Hence the king there grants letters patents to introducers and to assignees, and he may even deny letters patent to inventors, or refuse to extend them, and may compensate the discoverer of a useful invention by a sum of money, as was done in Arkwright's case, or oblige an assignee to secure an annuity to the inventor, as in Whitehouse's case. But here congress can do nothing but secure the discovery, and must secure that to the inventor alone.

Again, it must be apparent that neither the entire 18th section, nor the much disputed provision quoted from it, was framed exclusively, or even chiefly, or at all directly, with reference to rights in patented property existing at the time of the passage of the law. The 18th section is merely a part of a broad and comprehensive general system, in many respects new, established by congress for the purpose of regulating, in all cases whatever, for all time to come, the exercise of the constitutional power of the government to secure adequate rewards to authors and inventors. The disputed clause of the 18th section, therefore, as well as the whole section, and the entire statute, must be regarded as directly and chiefly prospective, and providing for future, rather than present patents, patentees, assignments and assignees. Although the proviso, the section, and the act, embrace rights and parties existing at the date of the enactment, their operation in that respect is merely incidental. If there be a conflict between the retrospective application of the provisions and their prospective application, the former must of course give way. Under the pressure of a temporary inconvenience, resulting from what may seem a rigorous application of the law to existing cases, we must carefully avoid fixing upon any part a permanent construction inconsistent with its just and enlightened purposes.

Having thus ascertained the spirit of the provision let us enquire into its possible prospective operation. The 6th section of the statute, following the previous policy of the government, provides for issuing patents in future for a term of fourteen years, as was done before. The 11th section, having reference to patents to be granted under the 6th, declares that they shall be assignable. This provision must be construed as simply declaratory of the assignability of patents to be thereafter granted in pursuance of the law. It may, indeed, be held to recognize the assignability of patents already existing, but, manifestly, it was designed to be chiefly prospective in its operation. So, the 18th section provides, that in certain cases, patents may be extended for seven years, and the disputed clause of that section, following the policy of the 11th section, provides that such extended patents shall be assignable and defines the rights to be acquired by assignees. Let it be remembered that a patent does not imply an irrevocable contract with the government that, at the expiration of the period, the invention shall become public property. The legislature has the power to revive or extend the grant. Evans v. Eaton [Case No. 4,559]. Now the 18th section is pertinent and effectual, if it be held that the assignees intended are such as shall become so after the passage of the law, and who would clearly take their interests subject to the law. Adopting this construction, the 18th section disturbs no contracts, nor does it interfere with any present interest, except for enlightened purposes; while it suffers existing patentees, without injustice to any person, to profit by the provision made chiefly for those who were afterwards to come upon the public stage. It would be a great violence to the law to divert its application unnecessarily; so as to alter the force, form or effect of any existing contract of assignment; it would be absurd to do so, when such diversion would defeat the very policy of the whole enactment, and criminal, if it would conflict with the constitution. The 18th section may further be admitted to have in view assignees of patents existing at the date of the law, and which might afterwards be extended, and, in regard to them, the section excludes the possible inference that, by granting a new term, congress were disturbing the interests existing under the old. All this may be allowed, without conceding that congress intended, by the 18th section, to give to assignees of the original term, without merit or consideration on their part, the benefits of the new one. But the defendants ask—why then did congress insert the provision at all, since they must have known that they could not disturb rights already vested, and since, if the patent, which was assignable, should be extended, it would follow that the extended patent would also be assignable? Legislative caution against misconstruction is neither unusual nor unreasonable, and it might well be doubted whether extended patents would be assignable, unless expressly declared so by law. The statute of 27 Hen. VIII. c. 11, solemnly declared that a patent lawfully issued to one person should not be invalidated by a subsequent patent granting the same thing to another. This was only an affirmation and application of a fixed principle of the common law.

Let us now imagine a case of the prospective application of the 18th section. The case shall be supposed to come before this court in 1855. The letters patent were issued in 1840. The patentee will have obtained an extension in 1854 for seven years. He will have assigned all his interest in that extended term to an assignee, who shall bring an action against the patentee himself for exercising the franchise. The court will of course sustain the title of the assignee. This is one sensible and effectual application of the 18th section. I submit another. A patent was issued before 1836 and assigned, with an express agreement by the patentee, that if congress should pass a law authorizing the extension of the patent for seven years, then the assignee should, for a sufficient consideration, have all the benefit of that extension. This is a sensible and pertinent prospective application of the 18th section, in regard to letters patent existing when the act of 1836 was passed. If these explanations of the provision in regard to assignees be sensible, and sufficient to allow it fair and practical effect in harmony with the spirit of the act and of the constitution, it ought not to receive another explanation which would be unreasonable, or inconsistent with the palpable object of the legislature.

But the defendants insist that inasmuch as the law of 1836, and especially the 18th section, operates upon existing patents and contemplates their extension, therefore the provision in relation to assignees equally contemplates a prolongation of their terms of assignment. If, indeed, when a patent shall be extended under the 18th section, (whether a patent existing in 1836, or one granted afterwards,) there shall then be in force a valid assignment of the patent, or of any interest in it, for the extended term, the assignee will, in that case, as has been shown, have the benefit of the extension; for the benefit of the extension enures to assignees, to the extent of their interest in the thing patented. In the case supposed the assignee would have an interest in the thing patented, reaching into the additional term of extension. But it must be remembered that the act by no means declares that the benefit of the extension shall enure to assignees beyond the extent of their interest in the thing patented.

The spirit of the constitution forbids congress to pass a law impairing the force of a contract. To abridge the term of fourteen years would be to impair the contract. To add seven years to it would equally be to impair it. Is the question affected by the circumstance that the party injured would be the patentee? Not at all. That circumstance strengthens the argument; for the patentee is the only person known to the government by merit or claim. If I convey an estate for life in lands, can the legislature enact that my grantee shall also have the remainder? Would not such a law impair my contract? If a patentee leases a machine for the fourteen years, reserving an annual rent, and congress declares that the lessee shall have it seven years longer without rent, or even on paying the same rent, would not that impair the contract contained in the lease?

Before the act of 1836, the extent of interest which an assignee could take in any thing patented, was a term of fourteen years and no longer. For assuredly, a man could take an interest in a thing for no longer time than the thing itself could endure. Ex vi termini, any assignment made before the act of 1836, ceased with the expiration of the first term, and when a patentee, whose patent was granted before the passage of the law, obtains an extension by virtue of the law, he takes the extended franchise, as he did the original grant, absolutely, and in entire exclusion of all persons to whom he may have assigned or granted an interest in the thing patented, for that interest was bounded by the duration of the original franchise. Now, to construe the act so as to confer the benefits of the extension on a previous assignee whose estate was limited to fourteen years, would involve the absurdity of altering a solemn contract, not merely without a motive, but in opposition to the motives of the legislature; an enlargement, by mere implication, of the assignee's interest in the thing patented, beyond its fixed bounds; and, in brief, a grant to a stranger, without equivalent, without consideration, without merit, of a portion of that property which once belonged wholly to the inventor, which he had unluckily surrendered to the assignee and to the public without adequate consideration, and which congress designed to restore wholly to the inventor for seven years, in consideration of so great a misfortune. And the grant thus supposed to be made is wrested from the meritorious inventor, and given to the assignee, although he not only never stipulated for it, but never contemplated the possibility of an extension of the patent.

Suppose a patentee to have assigned the entire franchise during the first term. In that case, according to the defendants' construction, the extension would enure to the exclusive benefit of the assignee. Can we suppose any thing more absurd than an application in such case by the patentee, in his own name, at his own expense, in his own person, on an exhibition of his own profits and losses, on the ground of his own merits and misfortunes, fortified by his own oath, for an extension of the patent for seven years for his own benefit, when all the benefits of the extension must pass instantly and irrevocably to his assignee? If this seem unreasonable, add to the statement the possible circumstance, that the patentee has been impoverished by the expense of his invention, while the assignee has become opulent by speculation in the fruits of the inventor's genius. Now, even if such unequal rewards were the result of fair and lawful trade, the lot of the inventor would be hard. But if the assignee have purchased the whole invention, and, by becoming bankrupt, or otherwise, have defrauded the inventor of a just compensation, yet even this circumstance would not at all prevent the entire benefit from enuring to the fraudulent assignee. This argument is believed to have always brought those who sustain the defendants' construction, to the very unstatesmanlike and unlaywerlike conclusion, that no extension of a patent can be granted, when the entire franchise has been assigned for the term of fourteen years. And yet the fact, that the assignee has defrauded the patentee of the whole invention for the whole term, would manifestly be the most conclusive evidence which the inventor could submit to the board in support of his claim to an extension. If however, it shall now be insisted that an extension can be granted in such a case, I respectfully ask—how can the assignee compel the patentee to apply for and receive an extension, and why were assigned interests, so important and meritorious, left by congress at the caprice of a patentee?

Why may not the assignee apply for an exten- sion? Let us pursue this idea. The law and the letters patent expressly authorize the patentee to grant and assign his original franchise. Nay more. According to the 18th section, he must have used all possible diligence, and granted and assigned all he profitably could, even the whole of the franchise, if in his power, or else he cannot obtain an extension. But just in proportion to the extent of his compliance with the law are the advantages of the extension reduced. And if he has been diligent enough and successful enough to sell the entire franchise, then all the benefits of the extension shall enure to strangers. Do the congress of the United States promulgate their laws by riddles? Is the statute book a volume of paradoxes?

It is urged, moreover, by the defendants, that the law clearly intended that assignees should share in the benefit conferred on the patentee, and have some advantage from the extension of the patent for seven years, for it provides, in express terms, that the benefit of the renewal shall enure to them, thus using a word which shows that it was not the intention of the legislature merely to protect interests which previously existed in assignees and grantees, but to give them a share in the benefit conferred on the patentee by the renewal of the patent. Now, I submit most humbly that it is by no means clear that it was the intention of the legislature to give gratuitously to assignees what is thus supposed. The supposed assignees were either assignees of interests in the extended term, by express contract, or they were not. If they were, their interests are saved. If they were not, then they can take no share in the benefits granted, unless they are created such assignees by operation of law, that is, by force of the 18th section. But that would be a violation of the contract, and, therefore, void. Congress are not to be supposed to intend what is unreasonable, unconstitutional or impossible. With the utmost deference I must insist, that if the law intended what is thus supposed, it intended to confer an unconstitutional boon. Admitting that previously existing interests are protected, certainly they are protected only to the extent in which they exist. The right of an assignee to share in the benefit of an extension depends on his having an interest, by virtue of his assignment, in the thing patented. And the right is co-extensive with the interest. If it reach into the new term for a county or a state, then the assignee has the benefit of the extension for that territory. If it reach into the new term one year or five or seven years, then the assignee has the benefit of the extension for that period.

But again, the words of the 18th section are as follows:—"And the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented, to the extent of their respective interest therein." Had the clause stopped at the word "patented," the privileges of assignees and grantees under the first term, independently of the language of their respective grants or assignments, without regard to the intention of the parties at the time of making them, and with or without consideration, as the case might be, would have been prolonged by the mere force of the act of congress, in the event of an extension. But the words "to the extent of their respective interest therein" are added to the clause, and the question now is as to their meaning and effect. Our opponents say that they refer to the fractional parts into which a patent-right may be divided, and extend the rights of the assignees of such parts, as well as those of assignees of the entire interest, as the case may be, during the extended term. On the other hand we contend that fractional assignments are protected without these words, and that consequently for this purpose they are, at best but surplusage. Suppose a patent-right divided among as many grantees as there are states in the Union, and suppose the clause ran: "and the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented," and there stopped—could it be doubted that in the event of an extension, it would enure to the assignees within their respective states, and no further? Could it be pretended that words of limitation were necessary to prevent the assignee for Maryland from invading the territory of the assignee for Pennsylvania? Courts under such circumstances could have no hesitation in deciding that the clause, without the words of limitation, prolonged the duration without widening the sphere of the grant or assignment. The clause being perfect, then, for the protection of assignees of the whole interest, or of fractional interests, without the words particularly referred to, we must look for some office for them to perform other than that insisted on by our adversaries.

We contend that they are words of limitation, added to the clause which gives the benefit of extension to assignees and grantees, for the very purpose of narrowing the broad construction that could be put upon it without them, had it stopped at the word "patented." The words are placed where we find them to prevent the benefit of extension from enuring to assignees and grantees independently of the language of their respective grants or assignments, without regard to the intention of the parties at the time of making them, and with or without consideration, as the case might be. Their office is to limit the benefit of the extension to those who have acquired an interest therein, by the language of their grant, according to the intention of the parties, and for a consideration. The words in question fully accomplish this purpose, just and proper in itself, and perfectly consistent with and indeed necessary to the policy of the law. They accomplish, as we have seen, no other object.

Another objection urged against our claim is, that assignees may suffer serious injustice by the grant of a new and further term to the patentee, unless they are also embraced in it, for, relying on the assurance given by the law, that the monopoly would be thrown open to the public at the expiration of fourteen years, they may have erected costly machinery, and encountered extraordinary expenses, in which case the law of 1836 would enable the patentee to deal with them most severely and oppressively, and to exact from them a heavier sum for the extended term of seven years, than they would have been willing to give for the original term of fourteen.

What is the effect of any extension of a patent? Nay, what is its object? Does it not concede a monopoly, a designed monopoly? Could such a monopoly exist at all, unless it excluded participation? Is it not the very nature of a monopoly, that the patentee may, if he will, deal severely, nay oppressively, with every body? And why is an assignee, who has participated in the profits of the first monopoly, entitled, without paying any consideration, to exemption from the severity and oppression which congress deem it just to allow the patentee to practise towards all other citizens of the commonwealth? The whole force of the argument rests then in the assumption that the assignee may have incurred expense in erecting, during the first term, machinery which would be useful after its expiration, if the monopoly should be opened, as was anticipated when he took his assignment. Upon the point thus presented I offer the following remarks:

First. The act has reference chiefly to prospective cases. In all such cases the assignee takes his assignment without relying, or being at all entitled to rely, on the expectation that the monopoly will be thrown open at the expiration of the first term. On the contrary, he acquires his interest with full knowledge, that if the patentee shall fail to obtain remuneration, he will be entitled to an extension for seven years. All these chances enter into his bargain, and are considered in fixing the price he pays for his assignment. This injustice, against which congress are supposed to have guarded, could by no means happen, except in the very few cases in which patents existing in 1836 should be renewed; while the provision designed to guard against this temporary and inconsiderable inconvenience is one which would defeat the benign operation of the statute in a large class of cases. Certainly, the argument of the defendants is one against the policy of the law, and not merely against its right construction.

Secondly. Not every invention requires the erection of costly machinery or an encounter with great expense. An invention for combining colors would require no machinery and no expense. Yet the assignee of such a patent would participate with the patentee in the benefits of an extension, without paying any equivalent, and without the apology of fancied injustice. Such partiality to the assignee would be injustice, not only to the inventor but to the public.

Thirdly. When the first term of a patent is about to expire, any citizen may gather capital, erect costly structures and provide water or steam power with machinery, to use the invention for profit, and thus be ready to operate as soon as the fourteen years shall have ended. Nevertheless, the patent may be extended and the citizen, thus ready, be disappointed, and perhaps ruined. Why should not congress consider his case as favorably as that of an assignee, reimbursed, at least in part, by former profits, for similar expenditures?

Fourthly. Neither the patentee, nor his assignee, before the act of 1836, contemplated an extension, because it was not legally possible. When the assignee stipulated for his franchise for the first term, he could stipulate for no more than the patentee had, namely, a term limited to fourteen years. He paid the patentee for no more. If his intention to be ready with machinery, to prosecute the same operations when the patent should expire, constituted a part of his motive to the purchase, it was a contemplated advantage over his fellow-citizens. The extension disappoints his expectation. But it is a disappointment by the intervention of the government; such as all citizens must endure without complaint, when the law is changed for the general good.

Fifthly. The same argument of supposed injustice lies against the grant of the original patent. My neighbor invents a machine and omits to obtain a patent for it. Obtaining a knowledge of it, and deeming it useful, I encounter expense and erect costly machinery, and actually put the machine in operation. The inventor obtains a patent and arrests my wheels by injunction. He may deal severely and oppressively with me. Has congress furnished me any security against such oppression?

Sixthly. The same argument would apply in case of a renewal of a patent void for a defective specification. My neighbor obtains letters patent which the courts pronounce void. I have erected costly machinery and used the invention. He surrenders his void patent and obtains a valid one. Can I complain?

Again. Every patent must be extended before the expiration of the original term. If a patent be extended six months before its close, and if the assignee, having the whole right for the first term, have also a right to sell, may he not make and sell machines enough before the first term shall expire, to supply the entire market for the new term of seven years, and thus defeat the benign purpose of the legislature, and deprive the patentee of all benefit from the extension?

Once more. If, indeed, the benefit of the extension enure not to the patentee but to the assignee, and if the former be merely a trustee for the latter, then, when there has been an assignment of the whole term, the patentee, being authorized by the 18th section, may obtain an extension, and sell franchises, and when the sales are made, the assignee, having laid dormant during all the proceedings, may prosecute the patentee and strip him of the bounty of his country. This is the condition in which William W. Woodworth, the administrator, now is, if he be not entitled to the benefit of this extension for the children and heirs at law of the inventor. If this be the true construction of the law, well might the inventor shrink from his country's justice, for, like Roman gratitude, it would crush the recipient with its weight.

It is urged, also, that the enhanced value of an invention is often produced by the industry and expenditure of an assignee, in bringing it into public use and more general notice. And yet it is forgotten that the board of patents disregard entirely all industry and all expenditure, save only those of the inventor. The rigorous construction of the laws in relation to the conduct of inventors before obtaining letters patent, seemed to oblige them to mature their discoveries unaided and even in secrecy. Congress, seeking to meliorate this evil, enacted by the 7th section of the law of March 3d, 1839 (5 Stat. 354), that the inventor might sue out a patent, although he might previously have sold to other persons a right to use his machine, provided the sale was made not more than two years before his application, and provided also he had not abandoned or dedicated his invention to the public. This law secured to such a purchaser the right so bought by him to use a specific machine. The supreme court decided, in the case of McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 202, that the right acquired by such a purchaser was not confined to the particular machine actually constructed or manufactured before the application for the patent, and that the purchaser might construct and use one after the patent was obtained. And it is insisted here, that there is an analogy between the rights of the assignees in the present case, and the rights of purchasers under the 7th section of this act of 1839, as thus expounded by the supreme court.

Now a sufficient answer to this position will be found in the language of the law of 1839. These are the words:—"Every person or corporation who has, or shall have, purchased or constructed any newly invented machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, prior to the application by the inventor or discoverer for a patent, shall be held to possess the right to use, and vend to others to be used, the specific machine, manufacture, or composition of matter so made or purchased, without liability therefor to the inventor, or any other person interested in such invention." Now this law defines the right of a person who, before even an application for a patent, has purchased from the inventor a specific machine, not the right to make and vend such machines to others. The law speaks of the purchase of a machine, not of letters patent, or of a franchise. An inventor owns his discovery absolutely and forever. He may rely on this title alone, unprotected by law, or he may compromise with the state, and surrender all after fourteen years, to secure the public protection during that time. Having at first chosen the former way, he sells a specific machine, of course with an implied license to use it, to a person acting in good faith and paying an ample equivalent. Afterwards the inventor finds his error and applies for a patent. Congress grant the application so tardily made, but stipulate that the patentee shall not defraud the purchaser to whom he has sold a specific machine with a license to use it. Nothing could be more just. Nor does the case of McClurg v. Kingsland [supra] give a wider scope to the 7th section of the act of 1839. There a workman, with capital and facilities furnished by his employer, discovered and perfected an improved mode of making iron rolls, and it was, with his consent, used by the employer, without letters patent, in consideration of the benefits thus received. Afterwards the workman changed his service, obtained letters patent, assigned them, and the assignee brought an action against the employer. It was held that the employer had not only a right to use the specific machine, but to sell the rolls that he made with it. But it was not adjudged that he had a right to vend to others to manufacture and sell. In other words, his implied or constructive license was protected, but it was not enlarged.

Now, it is argued, that if the rule is just in one case, it is just in another; and that if it be said in McClurg v. Kingsland, that the purchaser might not know that the inventor would ever apply for a patent, and had no reason to suppose that any obstacle would afterwards be interposed to the free and undisturbed use of the right he had purchased, the same must be said in the case now before the court, because the purchaser could not know that the inventor would ever apply for a renewed term, and, when he purchased the right for the whole term of the existing monopoly, had no reason to suppose that any new obstacle would afterwards be interposed to prevent the free, undisturbed, and continued use of the right; and that it would make the legislation of congress in these two laws contradictory in principle, and inconsistent with justice, in cases like the present, if the construction contended for by the plaintiff is given to the act of 1836. But there is no analogy whatever between the cases. Here the assignees bought in 1820, after the patent to Woodworth. They bought under the patent, and were limited to the term thereby granted. What right of the assignee, then, is that which he is entitled to enjoy, without any new obstacle being interposed by the inventor? The right for fourteen years. Certainly the law, according to our construction, does not invade, but expressly secures that right. The inventor, then, raises no new obstacle to oppose the enjoyment of it in the most absolute manner. It is manifest, however, that the argument on the part of the defendants assumes a supposed further right of the assignee to use the invention freely and without disturbance after the expiration of the fourteen years. He might doubtless have indulged such an expectation when he bought the fourteen years; but every other citizen had just such an expectation without buying any right at all. In regard to the future beyond the fourteen years, the assignee had bought, if any thing, only what the law had already given to him in common with every other citizen. The new obstacle is raised against the enjoyment of that right and of that right alone—against a right held by the assignee in common with every other member of the state—against a right created and existing independently of the assignment. The obstacle, therefore, is created by law, and not interposed by the inventor. It is assumed, moreover, that the assignee has invested some money, or otherwise incurred expense during the first term, in view of a prospective continuance after the monopoly shall have ceased, and the conclusion is, that if the monopoly be renewed he ought to be favored. Is not then the entire argument perfectly answered when we say, that the just and practical inference in regard to patents is, that competition after the monopoly shall expire will render the use of the invention unprofitable to the inventor as well as to his assignee? The prospective continuance supposed to have been contracted for was, therefore, a prospective continuance by him, not as assignee under an extended monopoly, but as one manufacturer in competition with everybody.

Another argument urged is, that it is unjust in congress to take up the franchise again and prolong it after it has expired, because individuals, when they bought specific products or machines, expected to use them without disturbance after the expiration of the patent. This is true, but the argument, if it have any force, invalidates the interposition of congress altogether. Again, the argument confounds things entirely distinct, under a rule not applicable to all. When a party sells a machine, and the right to use it, he necessarily gives a license to use the products. That license cannot be revoked. If there be a patent for a composition of paint, the paint compounded cannot, when spread upon a house, be reached by the inventor, although the patent be extended. But certainly he would have a just and lawful right in such case to claim that no more paint should be compounded by the use of his invention.

It is also insisted, that the defendants' construction of the 18th section in regard to assignees, is in conformity with previous legislation of congress on the same subject, and reference is made, in support of this position, to an act passed in January, 1808, entitled "An act for the relief of Oliver Evans," whereby a new patent was granted to him after the expiration of his original one, and in which act there was an express provision, that no person who had before paid him for a license to use his improvement should be obliged to renew it, or be subject to damages for not renewing it. This argument, like most others founded on analogies, would, at best, be very inconclusive. The law referred to is almost a solecism; while many congressional precedents will be found on the other side of the question. Oliver Evans obtained a patent on the 18th of December, 1790, for a discovery in the art of manufacturing flour and meal. Three years and eleven months after the expiration of the first letters patent they were renewed and extended by an act passed January 26, 1808. In consideration, it is presumed, of the lapse of time, (which cannot occur under the act of 1836,) a provision was made for assignees under the first term, as has been stated; but it will be remarked that no saving was made for those who had built machines after the expiration of the patent and before its renewal. And now it is my duty to vindicate the distinction I have taken between the renewal and the extension of letters patent. That cannot properly be called an extension which does not take place until the franchise to be affected has ceased. The act of granting a new term in such a case must be a renewal or revival as well as an extension. In this law of 1808, however, the legislature avoid using words expressing either the idea of a renewal or that of an extension. On the other hand. A patent was granted to Amos Whittemore, on the 5th of June, 1797, for manufacturing cotton and woolen cards. It was extended by an act of congress passed March 3d, 1809, two years before the expiration of the first term. This law contains no restriction in favor of assignees of the original term. Congress declare that the letters patent are extended. No such words as renewed or renewal are found in the statute. The same Oliver Evans obtained from congress an extension of a patent for an improvement in the steam-engine. The law was on the 7th of February, 1815, before the expiration of the first term. The act does not protect assignees, although the patentee is prohibited from receiving more for the use of his invention under the extended term than was paid by assignees under the first term. No such inaccurate expression as renewed or renewal is found in this statute. The letters patent are extended. A patent to Samuel Parker, for improvements in currying leather, was extended for 14 years by an act passed March 3d, 1821, within the first term. The statute lays no restriction on the patentee, and confers no benefit on assignees. Here too the legislature employ the word extend. On the 2d of March, 1831, congress renewed and extended a patent which had been granted to John Adamson, for a floating dry-dock. Although the patent was renewed after the original term had expired, and although the erection of proper machinery for the use of the invention was vastly expensive, the grant is, nevertheless, without restriction, and saves no interest of assignees. And here, as in the act concerning Oliver Evans in 1808, under precisely similar circumstances, the legislature avoid using words conveying the idea of either renewal or extension. A patent to Samuel Browning, for separating iron ore by magnets, was renewed in 1831, almost three years after the end of the first term, without restriction and without benefit to assignees. Jethro Wood's patent for improvements in the plough was extended for 14 years, on the 19th of May, 1832. All the rights as well of assignees as of the patentee were expressly extended during the second term, and he was forbidden to charge for the use of his invention during the new term more than he received during the first term. This was an exception to the general policy of such statutes, and so notoriously has it failed in any degree to reward the inventor, that his son and heir has been imprisoned for costs incurred in a fruitless endeavor to protect his rights. Robert Eastman and Josiah Jaqueth, in March, 1835, obtained an extension by congress of their patent for a machine for sawing clapboards. The rights of assignees were not extended by that act.

Finally, the patent in question, which was granted to William Woodworth in 1828, and extended by the board of patents in 1842, by virtue of the act of 1836, was still further extended by an act of congress passed on the 26th of February, 1845, to take effect after the 27th of December, 1849, without any reservation in favor of assignees under either the first or the second term. These statutes embrace all or nearly all the instances in which the national legislature has put forth its power directly to extend patents, and they manifest a spirit of beneficence towards patentees and of neglect of assignees, entirely in harmony with the construction of the 18th section insisted upon by the plaintiff. Again, in every instance where letters patent have been extended before the expiration of the first term, which is the effect of the 18th section, the legislature have used the terms "extension" and "extended" and "prolongation" and "prolonged," and have never applied to the act of extension the word "renewal," which, on the contrary, has been invariably applied to the substitution of new letters patent on the surrender of those which were void by reason of a defective specification. It is also an extraordinary fact that in the British statutes, text books and reports, the same discrimination between "renewals" and "extensions" is maintained. (The counsel here read from the British statutes and from Webster on Patents to show that the terms "renewal" and "extension" were invariably used as he had applied them, and also referred to the orders of the privy council to show the same application of the terms in all cases.)

in question were made. They are fully exhibited in the memorial of the administrator of William Woodworth, submitted to congress. The invention of William Woodworth consisted in an entirely new organization of instruments and processes by which boards and plank, and even mineral substances, could be planed, tongued and grooved and cut into mouldings, at a single operation, with a power easily attainable, and with great dispatch. While engaged in perfecting his discovery he procured indispensable pecuniary assistance from James Strong, but not without a sacrifice of one-half of his right in the invention. After the patent was obtained, Woodworth and Strong incurred ruinous expenses in bringing their machine to public notice and favor. At this critical period, when they were greatly embarrassed, they were prevented from making sales by an advertisement published by Uri Emmons, who claimed to be the true inventor of the machine patented by Woodworth and denounced prosecution against all who should use the invention. This pretension of Emmons' was fraudulent and false. He was not the inventor. Henry Gifford of Syracuse applied to Emmons, in 1824, to devise a machine to be used in building vats required in manufacturing salt by solar evaporation. Emmons built a machine for this purpose, which was found useless and was abandoned and destroyed. Although it resembled Woodworth's in some particulars, it was essentially different as an organized machine. Emmons never built any other machine, or reduced his ideas to form, or applied for letters patent, until after letters were granted to Woodworth. Emmons found Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack negotiating with Woodworth for purchases under him, informed them that he was the inventor of Woodworth's machine, and, for the sum of one thousand dollars paid by them, proceeded to Washington, sued out letters patent for a machine like Woodworth's in many respects, and assigned it to Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack. Embarrassed by opposition of builders, especially of joiners, as well as by debts and heavy losses by incendiary fires, and threatened with litigation, Woodworth and Strong consented, from necessity, to assign to Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack exclusive rights under their patent for the Southern parts of the United States, for no other equivalent than an assignment of exclusive rights under Emmons' fraudulent patent for the Northern states. Woodworth and Strong encountered great difficulties in selling their franchise after this ruinous compromise. They received only an inconsiderable sum and the inventor died in the city of New York in the month of February, 1839, poverty bearing its usual testimony to his character as an inventor and vindicating his merits as a public benefactor. The administrator, after setting forth these facts, stated the extension of the patent under the 18th section of the act of 1836, and a failure thus far to realize the benefits of it, for causes not necessary to be specified here, and prayed an extension by congress to himself, as administrator, exclusive of assignees under the original patent. The act of 1845, further extending the patent, was passed in compliance with this memorial, and is not merely in harmony with previous legislation, but is entitled to be regarded as a legislative construction of the act of 1836.

It is also claimed that, in England, letters patent are extended on the application of assignees and to assignees, and that, since the language of the British statute and that of our own agree, the same construction ought to be given to the one as to the other. But it has been shown that the British legislature are not rigorously held to secure scientific property to the inventor, as congress are, by a constitution. Patent-rights pass in England by involuntary assignment, that is, by decree in bankruptcy and sale on execution. And the decree in bankruptcy carries all the estate of the inventor, and, of course, the possible remainder of the scientific property after the expiration of the term of fourteen years, as much as the right to the property before the granting of a patent. Therefore, Lord Brougham declared that the statute requires that the letters of extension shall issue to the person owning the possible remainder, whether he be patentee or assignee. Case of Southworth's Patent (in privy council, 1837) Webst. Pat. Cas. 487. And it was declared by the same eminent jurist that the British government seek to benefit the patentee, mediately, through his assignee. Extensions of Bate's and Macintosh's Patents, Webst. Pat. Cas. 739. So, in England, letters patent of extension are granted to the legal assignee, and he is sometimes obliged to secure an annuity to the inventor, as in Whitehouse's Case; while sometimes an extension is denied, but compensation is made in money, as in Arkwright's Case.

But even in England no person is entitled to an extension or to any benefit from an extension, as assignee or grantee, merely because he had a license or grant under the first term, but he must be an assignee of the future estate after the first term. So, licensees there take no right whatever under the new term, not even a right to use specific machines. This is clearly shown from the case of the extension of Southworth's patent. Webst. Pat. Cas. 486. In that case the assignee applied. There were twenty-two licensees, and they had all stipulated to pay during the extended term at the same rates at which they had paid under the first term. A review of the cases of extensions of letters patent adjudicated in the privy council, will clearly illustrate these two propositions: First. That the patentee only, or his assignee, for an adequate consideration, of the contingent extension, and not merely of the franchise for the term of fourteen years, must apply for and obtain the extension. Secondly. That no shadow of benefit from the extension is reserved to grantees or licensees of the first term.

Thus far, the effect of the 18th section has been considered with reference to interests of assignees created by an assignment executed before the act of 1836 was passed, and expressly limited in its provisions to the original term of fourteen years, and our object has been to show that that act does not operate to enlarge or extend or alter or affect the rights of assignees in such cases, but that the renewal of a patent under the 18th section enures to the benefit of the administrator, exclusive of all such assignees.

Point III. Whether the extension specified in the foregoing second point enured to the benefit of the administrator to whom the same was granted, and to him in that capacity exclusively; or whether, as to the territory specified in the contract of assignment made by William Woodworth and James Strong to Twogood, Halstead and Tyack, on the 28th day of November, 1829, and set forth in the first special plea to the first count of the declaration, and by legal operation of the covenants contained in said contract, the said extension enured to the benefit of the said Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack, or their assigns. In the first place, the incidental retrospective operation of the 18th section on patents and assignments existing when the law was passed, (to which class the present case belongs,) must be distinguished from the prospective effect of the statute upon patents granted after its enactment. Since the act of 1836 extensions of patents are legally possible. An inventor has not only a legal property in his discovery, but a legal right to obtain letters patent for fourteen years, together with a legal contingent right to apply during that term for an extension for seven years more. This contingent right is undoubtedly as really the subject of assignment or release as the right to an original patent. Contracts concerning it would be upheld, at least in a court of equity. But in such a case the contract, to pass to the assignee the benefit of the extension for a future term, must be express, or must arise by unquestionable legal implication; that is to say, the intention of the parties to that effect must be plain and unequivocal.

Again, it is not to be denied that, before the act of 1836, an inventor, having a patent for the term of fourteen years, might have contemplated the possibility of the abolition of the whole patent system of the country and the establishment of a new one in its stead, and of a new feature in the new system, under which meritorious and unfortunate inventors might obtain extensions of their letters patent. It is also true that an inventor thus speculating on the distant and uncertain, if not improbable action of the government, might lawfully contract with an assignee, or with any other person, concerning the speculative extension of his patent by a future commissioner of patents, under the contemplated law of congress, and that a court of equity might oblige the patentee to perform such an agreement. But such an agreement could not be inferred from any general or ambiguous terms. For, in all legal transactions some measure of certainty is necessarily required, and, in contracts, certainty in an absolute degree. Now what certainty is there in the present case? It can only be conjectured that the parties, when making this agreement in 1829, contemplated things so strange and extraordinary, as that the whole patent system of the United States should be changed in 1836, and provision be made for extending letters patent, and the greater contingency of William Woodworth's ability to obtain such an extension. And these conjectures are repugnant to all probability. But it is not enough that we can imagine such conjectures to have been entertained by the parties. We must have them written in the contract, in terms so plain, strong, and unequivocal, as not to mislead. This would be necessary to indicate with certainty what the contingency was and whether it has happened. The knowledge, speculations, and intentions of the parties must have been fully expressed in every such instrument, so that it may be certainly known, when the supposed contingency shall happen, whether it be the same which was the subject of the contract. The contract of assignment by Woodworth and Strong to Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack, made in 1829, expresses no such anticipation or speculation concerning the future action of congress. The contract looks to possible improvements of the invention, and to possible alterations and renewals of the letters patent. But it is totally silent concerning not merely the passage of a future law authorizing an extension of this patent, or extensions of patents generally, but concerning any possible extension of the patent in any manner whatever. Who can say, then, that the parties intended that extension which has taken place?

Again, no matter what the parties may be supposed to have stipulated for, and even though a right to an extension might have passed under the general words, yet these words are controlled by the habendum, and restricted to fourteen years. The assignee can take nothing but what must expire with the fourteen years. It is argued that the whole of the 18th section must have effect, and that the agreement between Woodworth and Strong must have effect. Granted; but the whole agreement must have effect. No part of it must fail. At least, if any part must fail, it must be that which is vague and uncertain, not that which is absolute. Now that part of the agreement which is most absolute and unequivocal is the declaration that Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack shall have and hold the rights and privileges thereby granted for and during the term of fourteen years from the date of the patent, and no longer.

Mr. Stevens: The deed does not say "and no longer."

No; the words "and no longer" are not there. But they are affixed by conclusion of law as absolutely as if they were written in capitals. The construction insisted upon by our adversaries, sacrifices this limitation which is certain, to carry out an inference from the contract as uncertain as any human speculation. Who will say, then, that when the patentee expressly limited his grant to the term of fourteen years, it nevertheless conveyed the same franchise for twenty-one years, seven years of which could only be created by the future legislation of congress? When this agreement was made, the former patent laws were in force. The act of 1836 had not yet come into being. The contract must be expounded with reference to laws and facts which then existed. There was, in 1829, a definite legal meaning of the term "improvement in machinery," and an equally definite legal significance in the words "alteration of a patent," and an equally definite legal application of the expression "renewal of a patent," and each and every one of these terms expressed a well known legal and feasible transaction, different altogether from an extension of letters patent, which was then a legal impossibility. It results, therefore, that the improvements, alterations, and renewals stipulated for, were those which were thus well known, legal, and feasible; not an extension, which was then impracticable. The difficulty in the case arises altogether from confounding the word "renewal" with the word "extension."

Again, a contract can by no possibility be extended so as to bind either party to any thing, which was not mutually understood when it was made. This contract means now just what it meant before the 18th section of the act of 1836 came into the statute book. As the effect of the 18th section is to be ascertained by reasoning a priori, so the meaning of the contract is to be obtained by abstractly examining its provisions, excluding altogether the law passed so long after the agreement was made. Had William Woodworth proposed, after it was made, to apply to congress for an extension of his patent, and had he consulted counsel as to the extent of the assignment to Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack, would not any lawyer have advised him that the assignment related merely to the term of fourteen years, and to renewals of the patent, as then recognized by law, during that term? We are told, however, that when this assignment was made, the parties knew that congress did sometimes extend patents, and may therefore be deemed to have foreseen and provided for an extension. But the difficulty is not that the parties might have foreseen and provided for an extension, but that, foreseeing such an extension, they did not provide for it. They provided only for a renewal within fourteen years, not for an extension for seven years longer. The covenant as to renewal, is satisfied by such renewals as the law then provided for, and the limitation of the whole benefit of the grant to fourteen years, shows that such renewals, and not extensions, were then contemplated. Once more, it is reasonable to suppose that the parties covenanted for what was necessary. Here were two patents for the same discovery, Woodworth's and Emmons'. The parties compromised their conflicting pretensions by a mutual deed, each taking an equal interest in the other's patent. One or the other patent must be void, and must therefore be amended or renewed. None but the patentee, however, could obtain a renewal. Hence the mutual covenant that all renewals should enure to the benefit of the assignee within his district.

It remains to be observed that the 18th section leaves that contract of assignment as it found it. It does not diminish by a hair's breadth the rights of the assignees; nor does it enlarge them. The saving clause provides that "the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented," but only "to the extent of their respective interest therein." Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack had a right to use the thing patented, but only for fourteen years, only during the original patent, not for any portion of the extension; and of course their interest remains the same, if not enlarged by the statute. The 18th section presupposes sales of the whole, or of a great part, at least, of the patent, during the first term, calls for an account, and makes the profits and losses of the sales the basis of a right to an extension. To say, then, that the act meant to enlarge the contract of the assignees, and prolong the term assigned, and thus defeat the objects of the extension, is to impeach the wisdom of the legislature. But if we admit, for argument's sake, that the assignment by Woodworth and Strong contemplated such an extension of the patent as has been made, still it was invalid as an assignment, and constitutes no bar to the plaintiffs' suit. It was at most a mere executory agreement, concerning an impossible contingency, if such an expression may be allowed. An assignment or grant at law cannot be of a chose in action, bare right or naked possibility, much less of a legal impossibility. There was not only no such term of seven years, and no such extension of the fourteen years in being when the agreement was made, but it was not legally possible there ever should be.

But grant that the interest was a legal possibility, yet it was contingent and absolutely uncertain. It relates to a thing not in esse, and which never might be. When, however, such a thing comes in esse, chancery may seize the agreement and award a specific performance, which will convert the merely equitable possible interest into a legal right. Since, then, the interest is a merely equitable one, requiring protection in equity, because of the absence of any legal right, it follows that the assignment in question cannot, with or without aid from the 18th section, carry any legal title to the benefits of the extension; and it is only of legal titles that we have here to inquire. This question was considered by Mr. Justice Story in the case of Woodworth v. Sherman [Case No. 18,019]. He there held that the doctrine for which I have been contending was expressly applicable to licenses and assignments under the patent act of 1836, and a fortiori applicable, because the whole design of the 18th section was, in terms, exclusively confined to the original inventor, and for his sole benefit, and not for the benefit of his licensee or assignee; and therefore that section was to receive a correspondent construction in favor of the inventor alone, unless the qualifying clause of the section, by natural or necessary implication, conferred the right upon the licensee or assignee. And in regard to the effect of the qualifying clause, the learned judge said: "The clause does not mean to enlarge the right of the assignees or grantees to use the thing patented, beyond the extent of the interest originally granted to them. If that interest was, from its nature or character, or just interpretation, limited to the original term for which the inventor held the patent, then the assignees and grantees were to have no benefit ultra in the renewed patent."

One word further. If the contract carry to Twogood, Halstead and Tyack the first extension, that made by the board in 1842, why does it not equally carry to them the second extension, that of 1845? Is there to be no end to their estate of fourteen years? May they forever remain passive and indifferent, and yet, at each successive effort by congress to reward the genius of the inventor, shall the very shadows of their names defeat the national magnanimity, and convert into mockery the magnificence of a grateful people; or, worse than this, can the assignees now wrest from the children of the inventor all they have realized from the extension?

Patented rights pass by all the forms of legal and involuntary assignment, that is by assignments in bankruptcy, as well as by voluntary grant, and may either be sold on execution, or a bill in chancery will reach them to satisfy a judgment. Phil. Pat. 354; Hesse v. Stevenson, 3 Bos. & P. 565. Now, the bankruptcy of the patentee is the consequence of his failure to obtain a remuneration by the use and sale of his invention. It was the design of congress to relieve him. Can it be supposed for an instant that when a bankrupt patentee has made a compulsory assignment of all his rights for the benefit of his creditors, those creditors may seize the new estate and swell their dividends, while he sinks into poverty and despair? The constitution provides not for payment of debts, but for the promotion of science and the arts, and directs this to be done by securing to authors and inventors the fruits of their labors, not by pampering creditors who have already eaten out the substance of public benefactors.

The argument is advanced that the word "renewal" used in the contract, is broad enough to embrace, not only renewals then authorized by law, but renewals that might afterwards be provided for; and that this construction of the word conforms to the scope and spirit of the agreement, and carries into effect the intention and design of the parties, at the time they made it, and is the only construction which will do equal justice to both parties. The word "renewal" is, indeed, broad enough. But the question is not whether it is broad enough to include extensions, but whether it is narrow enough, precise enough, accurate enough. If the word "renewal" had, when the contract was made, a definite and well understood legal application to renewals for the original term in cases where the patent was void, and the act of extending letters patent was at that time known in law by the term "extension" as contradistinguished from "renewal," then the word "renewal" is not accurate enough to embrace an extension. The word "renewal," in this contract, cannot, by any reasoning, or on any principle of law or of logic, mean anything which did not exist, or anything which, though it might happen thereafter, was probably not contemplated by the parties when the agreement was made. For, when the contract was made, the act of 1836 had not passed, and I understand it to be conceded on the part of the defendants, that probably the parties to the contract did not contemplate the passage of such a law. Now, not only is a party forbidden by equity and good conscience from using an unforeseen advantage to defeat his contract, but by no rule of legal reasoning can an agreement be so construed, either in letter or spirit, as to make its terms embrace an object not contemplated by the parties. An executory agreement is an agreement concerning what the parties contemplate, and nothing else. It cannot hold either party concerning things not contemplated. We may infer, therefore, a concession that the extension of the patent is not provided for by the letter of the contract.

The argument for the defendants is further stated thus: "Whether the word 'renewal' did or did not look to the extension of time given by the act of 1836, it is evident upon the words of the covenant that whatever additional value either inventor (Woodworth or Emmons) might afterwards be able to obtain for his invention, it should enure to the benefit of the assignee within the district aforesaid. The parties were not only bound, forever afterwards, to offer no obstruction to one another in their particular districts, but to give to each other the full benefit of their respective exertions to increase the value of their inventions; and if they then looked only to a renewal to be procured by surrendering the existing patent, if it should be found to be defective, and by taking out a new one according to the act of July, 1832, yet it is very clear that both parties intended that every benefit of any kind, that might be obtained for the respective inventors should belong to the assignees in the respective districts. They were in that respect to have a common interest in their inventions, and they have used the broadest words to accomplish that object—words which unquestionably embrace every mode by which the value of the patents could be increased. If by a subsequent act of congress advantages were given to the patentee which he did not at that time possess, and which were not, therefore, in the contemplation of the parties, yet, according to the spirit and meaning of the covenant, the assignee had a right to stand in the place of the patentee in his district, in respect to the new privileges as well as to the old, and it would be against equity and good conscience to allow him to use a privilege afterwards unexpectedly gained, in order to defeat his own contract.”

I reply to this very forcible argument: First. The effect of the extension is diminished by describing it as a mere extension of time. An extension is a resumption of the franchise, and a new grant thereof for a term of seven years. Secondly. How does it appear that any benefit of any kind, not stipulated, should pass to the assignees respectively? Thirdly. The contract here was expressly limited to fourteen years. The habendum is: “To have and to hold for fourteen years.” An extension of the patent after that time for the benefit of the patentee did not “defeat,” could not “defeat” the contract during the fourteen years stipulated. “Whatever additional value” the patent should receive, should pass to the assignee for fourteen years, but for no longer. Fourthly. If the extension were obtained unexpectedly, as is supposed, then manifestly it was not foreseen, when the contract was made. Unless the contract show such foresight, either by express words or by unerring legal implication, then the contract cannot be enlarged so as to make it transfer to the assignee the unexpected estate granted to the inventor. Fifthly. The force of the argument founded on the well understood meaning of the terms “improvements,” “alterations,” and “renewals” of the patent, employed in the assignment, is parried, by calling up a supposed “spirit of the contract.” This spirit is thus defined, viz: that “whatever additional value either inventor might afterwards be able to obtain for his invention, should enure to the benefit of the assignee.” And we are assured that the parties here used the broadest words to designate this generous spirit. If this be so, how does it happen, then, that the letter of the contract is not sufficient, without invoking its spirit? Where are any words which imply anything concerning an additional value to the invention, except an “improvement” of the machine, or anything concerning a better security for the franchise, except the words “alteration and renewal” of the patent? All those words are well and fully satisfied by transactions then legal and foreseen, without enlarging their application to things unexpected and legally impossible. But if this reasoning be thus far sound, the spirit of the agreement must, after all, be ascertained from a general survey of its entire contents. The limitation of fourteen years is absolute and inflexible. You must kill so much of the letter before you can call the supposed spirit to life. Thus, then, while we grant that the inventor could not within the fourteen years avail himself of any advantage, foreseen or unexpected, to defeat the contract he had made for that time, he is left at entire liberty afterwards to avail himself of the magnanimity of his country, not only because it was not foreseen, and clearly, therefore, not bargained away, but because all that was bargained away ceased at the expiration of fourteen years.

But, besides these views of the operation of the 18th section in regard to the rights of assignees, I will refer the court to some authorities on the question. In the case of Van Hook v. Wood [Case No. 16,854], in the circuit court for the Southern district of New-York, in equity, on a motion for an injunction, in October, 1844, Betts, district judge, declared that he considered it settled in the construction of Woodworth’s patent, at least so far as to control that incidental motion, “that the extension of the patent to the administrator, vested a legal and valid title in him, and that this right did not enure to the benefit of assignees of the original patent, their interest being limited to the period of that patent.” Mr. Justice McKinley took the same view of the subject in the case of Wilson v. Simpson [Id. 17,834], in the circuit court for the district of Louisiana. The question was elaborately examined in the same court by McCaleb, district judge, in the case of Wilson v. Curtius [Id. 17,800]. He held that the parties to the contract contracted without reference to any right which it is pretended is secured to assignees under the act of 1836; that the object of the renewal authorized by the 18th section of that act was not to benefit assignees, but the original inventor or his heirs; that the contract contained no stipulation securing an extension of the right, upon any reasonable or legal interpretation of that instrument; that the law should be construed liberally for the inventor and strictly for the assignee; that when the assignment was made, the parties knew well their rights, and a consideration was paid by the assignees for the exclusive right for fourteen years; that the assignment might have contained a clear, positive, unambiguous stipulation for the benefit of an extension, should one be obtained at the expiration of the fourteen years; but that the want of such a stipulation could not be supplied by the court, and was fatal to the claim of the assignee. In the case before cited, of Woodworth v. Sherman [supra], Mr. Justice Story reviewed the 18th section of the act of 1836, and came to the conclusion that the assignor, before an extension of the patent, could legally grant and convey no more than the first term; that the 18th section did not extend the rights of assignees; and that assignees could not, by virtue of that act, take any interest in the extended term, unless the assignor had, "by express words, or necessary implication, shown a broader intention," an intention to grant not merely what he then possessed, but also the possibilities which he might thereafter acquire. He declared that this construction made the whole structure of the 18th section harmonious with its professed objects, while any other would render it contradictory and subversive of the object of its enactment, would take from the inventor what he never intended to part with, and might "deprive him, in part, or in the whole, according to circumstances, of the reward, which the section seemed so studiously to hold out to encourage his genius and skill, and to reimburse his expenditures." Mr. Justice McLean also examined these questions in the case of Brooks v. Bicknell [Case No. 1,946], and came to the same conclusions.

Point IV. Whether the plaintiff, claiming title under the extension, from the administrator, can maintain an action for an infringement of the patent-right, within the territory specified in the contract of assignment to Twogood, Halstead and Tyack, against any person not claiming under said assignment, or whether the said assignment be of itself a perfect bar to the plaintiff's suit. If the second and third questions, or the third only, be decided in favor of the plaintiff, the decision will be conclusive in his favor on this fourth proposition.

First. It has been shown that, at most, the interest assigned by Woodworth and Strong to Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack was a mere contingent claim in equity, not assignable at common law. Now, the utmost effect of the qualifying provision at the close of the 18th section is to secure that interest just as it was; and if it were an interest in the extended term, the law must recognize it during that term. But it does not therefore convert the mere equity into a legal property, or interest, or title. Such a mere equity cannot deprive the plaintiff of his title. As long as the patentee, though he has agreed to make an assignment, has not made it, he may bring an action in his own name for an infringement of the patent, notwithstanding such agreement, since the assignee is not put in the place of the patentee, as to right and responsibility, until the assignment is executed. Park v. Little [Case No. 10,715].

Secondly. This is not an action for trespass on land, nor are the interests with which we are concerned real estate, or even real chattels. Nor are the legal instruments with which we are engaged deeds or grants. This is an action of trespass on the case for violating rights in personal property. Whatever may be the rights of Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack, or of their assignees if they have any, the defendants appear here without title. They neither derive nor pretend any title. The plaintiff, by title from the administrator, who had a right to assign, is enjoying the franchise. The defendants are mere trespassers, and their defence amounts to this:—"Because you made an agreement in 1829 with Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack, that if you should obtain an extension for this term of seven years, you would assign the extension to them, therefore we are at liberty to pirate the property during that time, even though Twogood, Halstead and Tyack do not demand the performance of your agreement, or though you may be their trustee." At all events, the legal title is in the plaintiff. Only the patentee or his administrator can apply and obtain the extended patent. It is extended to him. The assignees cannot apply and cannot obtain the extension. If they be entitled to all they claim, it is only an equity in what the law has vested in the patentee or his administrator. The defendants cannot be held to account by the cestui que trust. It would be a good plea in bar, that they had answered in damages to the plaintiff, who is in possession, as the legal assignee of the legal title created by the extension and by force of the 18th section of the act.

No principle is plainer than that trespass for injuries concerning personal property may be brought by any person having any degree of interest in possession—even by a bailee. If the 18th section confers no rights on assignees of the first term, then the question now under consideration does not arise. If the section does confer any such benefit on assignees, it does so through a trust which it creates in their behalf, to be executed by the patentee; and this action may, for aught that is known, be for the benefit of the assignees. The declaration avers continued possession by the patentee, by the administrator, and by the plaintiff, successively. It does not appear that any possession or right ever followed the supposed assignment to Twogood, Halstead and Tyack. The new patent, by virtue of the 18th section, carried the possession, as well as the legal right, to the administrator, and it followed his assignment to the plaintiff. The defendants' plea cannot be good, unless it show that the plaintiff has no legal title or possession, general or special. Certainly this does not appear.

The principles of the common law, as well as of the statute law, have arisen out of commerce in tangible property, real and personal. Nothing is more difficult than to apply them to scientific property. But we venture another exposition. Possession and use are material circumstances in considering the validity of a transfer of a patent-right, as well as of one of other personal property. Phil. Pat. 343. A patentee having mortgaged the patent-right, continued in the notorious use of it, until he became bankrupt. Lord Eldon was inclined to the opinion that the patent-right passed to his assignee in bankruptcy, that is, that the mortgage was not good against the assignee, and ordered a feigned issue to try the question. Ex parte Granger, Evans' 4 St., p. 67, note, cited in Phil. Pat. 344. The statute of frauds, though not enacted by congress, is adopted by the federal courts, or, at least, such parts of it as are derived from the common law; and of this sort is that in relation to the sale of chattels. Applying this principle, it is submitted that the judgment of this court should sustain the plaintiff's action. When he claims by an assignment of the extended patent, ought a party to be heard who shows no title whatever, and only sets up an agreement to assign the first term, made sixteen years ago, unattended by possession? Suppose this contract of assignment to Twogood, Halstead, and Tyack to have been procured by fraud, could not that fraud be proved by the plaintiff, and would it not vitiate the contract, assignment and covenant? Unquestionably. But will the court allow a stranger, a trespasser, a wrongdoer, to set up the assignment and oblige the plaintiff to prove the fraud in this collateral action? This argument is conclusive of the question.

Point V. Whether the extension of 1842 could be applied for and obtained by William W. Woodworth, as administrator of William Woodworth, deceased, if the said William Woodworth, the original patentee, had, in his life-time, disposed of all his interest in the then existing patent, having, at the time of his death, no right or title to or interest in the said original patent—or whether such sale carried with it nothing beyond the term of said original patent; and if it did not, whether any contingent rights remained in the patentee or his representatives.

My argument on the first and second points demands an affirmative answer to the leading question in this point. Scarcely anything can be said in support of it without repetition. The question will be rendered more simple if we suppose William Woodworth, the patentee, to have survived and obtained the renewal, although he had previously assigned all his interest in the patent. Those who maintain the right of partial assignees of the first term to share the benefit of the assignment with the patentee, are obliged to claim, also, the entire benefit of the extension for an assignee of the whole of the franchise for the first term. This position is so palpably in conflict with the 18th section, (which, as we have shown, recognizes only the patentee, and requires the application to be made by him only, at his expense and cost and on his own merits,) that those who have been led into such an absurdity, seek escape by asserting that in such a case there can be no extension whatever. But the 18th section affords them no such refuge. "Whenever any patentee shall desire an extension," he may apply in all cases, at all times, within the first term of fourteen years. Certainly a patentee may desire an extension when he has sold all the franchise, as well as when he has sold a part; and the more he has sold unprofitably, the more eagerly will he desire an extension. His application must be heard whenever it is made. And on what ground must a judgment be rendered in favor of extending the patent to the patentee? Upon the supposed ground that he has not sold all his interest in the first term? No! But on the ground that whether he has sold the whole, or only a part, he has not been adequately remunerated by the sale. Again, in certain cases, the board of patents must render judgment against the extension. And in what cases? The supposed case where the patentee has sold all his interest? No! The only cases in which the application can be denied are, first, where an extension would conflict with the public interest, and secondly, where, by sales, the inventor has been adequately remunerated. And let it be especially remarked that the judgment must pass against the inventor in such case, equally whether he has sold a part of his original invention, or the whole.

Point VI. Whether the plaintiff, if he be an assignee of an exclusive right to use two of the patented machines within the town of Watervliet, has such an exclusive right as will enable him to maintain an action for an infringement of the patent within said town; or whether, to maintain such action, the plaintiff must be possessed, as to that territory, of all the rights of the original patentee. The 11th section of the act of 1836 declares that "every patent shall be assignable in law, either as to the whole interest, or any undivided part thereof, by any instrument in writing; which assignment, as also every grant and conveyance of the exclusive right under any patent, to make and use the thing patented, within and throughout any specified part or portion of the United States, shall be recorded in the patent office within three months." The 14th section of the same act provides that damages for infringement may be recovered in an action on the case to be brought in the name or names of the person or persons interested, whether as patentees, assignees, or grantees of the exclusive right within and throughout a specified part of the United States.

It was understood in England that a party merely licensed for a particular district might maintain an action for infringement. Our patent law of 1793 was construed so as to deny to the assignee for a particular district, a right to maintain an action; as such an assignment was considered to be a mere license, and not an assignment under the 4th section of that act. Phil. Pat. 333. Confessedly the 10th and 14th sections of the act of 1836, were designed to overrule this construction. A plain man would give them, as we think, the sensible and just effect, that a patentee might assign his whole interest or any undivided part of it, great or small, defining the quantity by the measure of use, or by the number or quantity of the thing patented, to be made, used or vended, or made, used and vended, and for any territory, great or small, and that any such grantee or assignee who should be injured by piracy might have his action in his own name, for certainly such grantee or assignee is "interested." The words "exclusive right" in the 14th section, supply one part of the description of grantees, and are not, as some suppose, words of limitation to the character of all plaintiffs. Thus, to maintain an action, the plaintiff must show either that he is a patentee or that he is an assignee, (not of an exclusive right within and throughout a specified part of the United States,) but of the whole or some undivided interest in the patent, or that he has a grant and conveyance of the exclusive right to make and use and grant to others to make and use within a specified part of the United States.

If the plaintiff be an assignee of an exclusive right to use two of the patented machines within the town of Watervliet, certainly it is true either that he is an assignee of an undivided part of the whole interest, and may maintain a suit on this ground, or he is grantee of an exclusive right to use within certain territory, and may maintain an action in that capacity. My proposition is, that the act of 1836 was, in this respect, remedial and designed to relieve the law of patents from the technical difficulties which existed in regard to the parties who might maintain actions; and that the act goes the full length of declaring that an injured assignee may maintain a suit alone, whether any other party have an interest in the same patent, in the same territory, or not. Bold as the proposition may seem, it is in harmony with other laws, which do not deprive one tenant in common of legal remedies, because his co-tenants will not join. I invite the court to consider this broad construction of the law, since, if it be adopted, it will bring our statute into harmony with the patent system of England. If the patentee do not wish to part wholly with his patent, he may grant licenses to persons to use it, and it would appear that in the event of an infringement of the patent right, all who have licenses may maintain actions for damages. 13 Petersd. Abr. 236. It has been held that if the patent has been assigned, the assignee may sue alone, or he may join with the patentee in the action. Id. 238. This principle is eminently just, since the patentee of scientific property may refuse to join, and the assignee ought not to be exposed to the caprice of a patentee in regard to a remedy. But if this opinion should not prevail, then I submit that the plaintiff's exclusive right to use two of the patented machines within the town of Watervliet is sufficient to enable him to maintain this action. What is an exclusive right to use two machines in the town of Watervliet? It must be admitted to be an exclusive right to use two machines "within and throughout" the town of Watervliet.

Again, it is either exclusive of the rights of all other persons to use the improvement in that town, or it is not an exclusive right to use. For, if any other party can lawfully use the same machine, then the plaintiff has not an exclusive right to use. Now, if he has such an exclusive right, he is within the letter of the law, since the patent may be divided so that one may have an undivided interest in it to make, another to sell, and another to use, and yet all these remain an undivided whole. The words of the 11th section show that there may be a valid assignment of the right to make and use, and to grant to others a right to make and use, without including the power to grant to others to vend. The question was very elaborately considered by Mr. Justice Story in the case of Washburn v. Gould [Case No. 17,214]. In that case the words of the assignment were, that "the party of the first part hath agreed to license and empower the parties of the second part to construct and use, and to license others to construct and use fifty of the said patented machines;" and the patentee covenanted to bring suits and pay over the damages recovered to the assignee, deducting expenses. Judge Story decided: First. That the words "license and empower," as there used, were equivalent to words of grant or assignment. Secondly. That the effect of the assignment was to give the exclusive right, for the purpose of profit, to construct and use the patented machines, and with them the exclusive right to the patent itself, as an appropriate incident, within the prescribed territorial limits. Thirdly. That if it were necessary to maintain the plaintiff's action in that case, he should decide that the patent might be construed distributively, so as to permit a grant of the exclusive right to construct to one person, to use to another, and to vend to another. Fourthly. That the words conveyed an exclusive right to the patent within and throughout the territory, although the number to be used was limited to fifty, that is to say, that the limitation of the number did not qualify the exclusiveness of the grant. The reasoning of the learned judge in that case seems to lead so clearly to the conclusion at which he arrived, that I very cheerfully leave the question to rest upon his authority.

Point VII. Whether the letters patent of renewal, issued to William W. Woodworth, as administrator, on the 8th day of July, 1845, upon the amended specification and explanatory drawings then filed, be good and valid in law; or whether the same be void for uncertainty, ambiguity, or multiplicity of claim, or any other cause. The question is general. The affirmative can be maintained only by controverting the objections against the validity of the patent, which may be raised by the counsel for the defendants. The question, however, supposes an objection that the specification is uncertain or ambiguous, or at least that it is bad by reason of multiplicity of claim. I suppose this has allusion to the fact that the machine is capable of planing a plank, of tonguing it, and of grooving it, all at one operation; while, by detaching certain instruments, the same machine might be made to plane alone, to tongue alone, or to groove alone, or to perform any two of these operations together. Hence, it has often been said that the invention was divisible, and ought to have been patented as three separate machines. Words could hardly be more explicit than those used to define the claim:—"What is claimed, is the employment of rotating planes, in combination with rollers, or any analogous device, to prevent the board from being drawn up by the planes when cutting upwards; and also the combination of the rotating planes with the cutter-wheels for tonguing and grooving, for the purpose of planing, tonguing, and grooving boards at one operation; and also the combination of the tonguing and grooving cutter-wheels for tonguing and grooving boards at one operation; and finally, the combination of either the tonguing or the grooving cutter-wheel, for tonguing or grooving boards, with the pressure-rollers." It is apparent that here is described a perfect, organized, unique machine, capable of making three different impressions on different parts of the same material. The human mind might have contrived, first one, then another, and then a third of these operations, successively. But the invention is not vitiated because the whole three were invented in combination for one practical and useful purpose.

We find ourselves engaged with the most subtle of all legal questions when we examine whether the patent is multiplex. The objection of multiplicity is not likely to be received with very great favor, since every inquirer will fail to find a satisfactory reason for the objection in any case. But what is the rule? As explained in Phil. Pat. 219, the rule is, that an application which embraces more than one principal subject or invention, will be rejected; that is, whatever is accessory and auxiliary to the principal subject, may be joined in the same patent, but nothing more. Floors are essential in every structure for human habitation, and they must be smooth and impervious. The mechanic who, if it were possible, should make a machine, which, at one operation, would prepare the entire floor for an apartment, large or small, might combine many instruments, many methods of operation, but surely he would produce but one principal subject or invention. Even the nailing the floor upon the joists would only be auxiliary and accessory, and therefore the addition of a hammer to drive the nail, with power to move it, and perhaps of a forge to make the nail, might not be a violation of the rule. Whatever might be thought of so extreme a case, we have in Woodworth's patent one principal subject, which is no more than the preparation of a board, to be adjusted with others, so as to produce a smooth and impervious face. All the operations of planing, tonguing and grooving, are performed simultaneously, by the use of one power, and upon the same piece of the same material, leaving upon that piece their varied impression. It is one purpose, accomplished upon the same subject matter, by one operation, at one instant of time. Complex as this operation is, the board is single afterwards, as it was before. It was a rough, unshapen plank; it is still no more than a plank, though fitted for a definite use.

But there is another and conclusive answer to the objection of multiplicity. Although the rotating grooving wheels and knives, or the rotating planing knives might be removed, and one or two of the other operations be nevertheless carried on effectively, yet there is one part of the improvement essential to each several operation, which is, of itself, altogether useless, but which, combined with one or more of the other powers and processes, is effective. That is, the rollers and the superior cylinder, which keep the plank or board fastened down on its bed, while it is subjected to one or more of the three operations of planing, tonguing and grooving. Here then is a complex yet unique machine. It is difficult to define its peculiar nature or character. It is a combination or aggregate, for it is made up of many parts and of several operations. But certainly, it is not, as has been supposed, a mere combination. It is an unique machine, for one great and important purpose. And its combination does not consist in uniting three several and separable perfect machines, but in employing certain powers and processes never before applied to effect either object, but now made to operate so as to produce at the same time, on the same substance, three effects, each equally necessary to one single and distinct purpose. The objection of multiplicity of claim results from misapprehension. There may be a lawful patent for a new combination of existing machines, applied to produce one principal purpose or effect. Moody v. Fiske [Case No. 9,745]. So, also, there may be a patent for a machine which combines several auxiliary operations to produce one purpose or effect. And such a patent is not a grant of an abstract principle, nor is it a grant of the different parts of any machine, but it is an improvement applied to a practical use, and effected by a combination of various mechanical powers to obtain one new result. Gray v. James [Id. 5,718]. This last definition describes Woodworth's patent. The new result is the complete preparation of the board, by giving it a smooth surface, and by the adaptation of a tongue and a groove. It is effected by combining no known machinery or machines, but by uniting various known mechanical powers in a new and practical application. The defendants' argument must be, that a compound machine cannot be patented. But a machine loses neither any of its intrinsic proportions, nor its uses, by being composed of various parts, producing various effects, all of which terminate in one chief object or purpose.

The object of the patent law was to encourage inventions which will reduce labor. In the old way, planing a board was one operation, cutting a tongue along one edge was another, and cutting a groove in the other edge was a third. So, making a nail was once three operations, the forging, the shaping and the heading. Now, since a man of genius has invented a machine for simplifying the manufacture of nails, and reducing all three operations to one, what would be thought of a legislative policy which should forbid the combination, and keep the three operations separate, as when manually performed? In regard to Woodworth's invention, as described in the first specification, one court decided that the machine was multiplex, and that three patents ought to have been issued. The administrator thereupon applied to the commissioner of patents, who decided that the machine was not multiplex, and that three patents could not issue.

In view of the argument on this seventh point, I respectfully ask the court to decide that, according to the specification, Woodworth's patent is not for a mere aggregate of separate machines, nor yet a grant of the different parts of a new machine, as several, but is an improvement applied to a practical use, effected by a combination of various mechanical powers to obtain one new result at one operation. The importance of fixing the character or legal description of this machine, will appear from considering that it will control the question whether the patentee shall be protected from every encroachment on his invention, or whether it shall be free to any person to pirate its parts severally.

Point VIII. Whether the court can determine, as matter of law, upon an inspection of the said two patents and their respective specifications, that the new patent of the 8th of July, 1845, is not for the same invention for which the said patent of 1828 was granted.

The question seems to admit of a brief answer. Certainly the old specification and the new one are unlike. If the new one describes the machine rightly, and the old one was defective in this respect, then the old one, in one sense, does not describe the invention at all. In order to decide that the specifications are for different machines the court must assume the first specification to be a good description of a machine. But it is confessedly bad, because it has been surrendered and cancelled as such. I cannot present a clearer argument on this subject than to quote the late Mr. Justice Story's opinion on the same question:—"Upon the face of it, the new patent purports to be for the same invention and none other, than is contained in the old patent. The avowed difference between the new and the old is, that the specification in the old is defective, and that the defect is intended to be remedied by the new patent. It is upon this very ground that the old patent was surrendered and the new patent was granted. The claim in the new patent is not of any new invention; but of the old invention more perfectly described and ascertained. It is manifest that, in the first instance, the commissioner was the proper judge whether the invention was the same or not, and whether there was any defect in the specification or not, by inadvertence, accident, or mistake; and consequently, he must have decided that the combination of machinery claimed in the old patent was, in substance, the same combination and invention claimed and described in the new. My impression is, that at the former trial of the old patent before me, I held the claim, substantially (although obscurely worded) to be a claim for the invention of a particular combination of machinery for planing, tonguing, and grooving, and dressing boards, &c.; or, in other words, that it was the claim of an invention of a planing machine or planing apparatus such as he had described in his specification. It appears to me, therefore, that prima facie, and, at all events, in this stage of the cause, it must be taken to be true, that the new patent is for the same invention as the old patent; and that the only difference is not in the invention itself, but in the specification of it. In the old, it was defectively described and claimed. In the new, the defects are intended to be remedied. Whether they are effectually remedied is a point not now properly before the court. But as the commissioner of patents has granted the new patent as for the same invention as the old, it does not appear to me, that this court is now at liberty to revise his judgment, or to say that he has been guilty of an excess of authority, at least, (as has been already suggested,) not in this stage of the cause; for that would be for the court, of itself, to assume to decide many matters of fact, as to the specification and the combination of machinery in both patents, without any adequate means of knowledge or of guarding itself from gross error." Woodworth v. Stone [Case No. 18,021]. I add only, that the argument that the entertaining the question by the court would involve an assumption of facts without proof seems incontrovertible, and that this consideration is as conclusive upon this court, in this cause, at this stage, as it was upon the court in Massachusetts in that cause, on a motion for an injunction. A similar question arose incidentally in the case of Carver v. Braintree Manuf'g Co. [Id. 2,485]. It was held, in that case, that the 13th section of the act of 1836, and the 8th section of the act of 1837, authorizing the re-issue of a patent, because of a defective or redundant specification or description without fraud, or for the purpose of adding thereto an improvement, did not require a patentee to claim, in his renewed patent, all things which were claimed in his original patent, but gave him the privilege of retaining what he deemed proper; and that the question whether the original and the renewed patent were not for the same invention, involved matters of fact, and therefore was for the jury to decide upon evidence.

Point IX. Whether, the decision of the board of commissioners who are to determine upon the application for the extension of a patent under the 18th section of the act of 1836, is conclusive upon the question of their jurisdiction to act in a given case. My argument on the various points relating to the extension under the 18th section, has proceeded on the ground that the decision of the board of commissioners, even on a question of jurisdiction, was subject to review by the courts of the United States. Yet the law has created a board with discretionary and judicial power. Great public interests are involved in their decision, and, in this respect, the board act as a board of executive administration. It may well be supposed, that if congress designed that their decision on any question should be reviewed judicially, the law would have directed the time, manner and circumstances of an appeal, and would have designated the appellate tribunal.

Point X. Whether the commissioner of patents can lawfully receive a surrender of letters patent for a defective specification, and issue new letters patent upon an amended specification, after the expiration of the term for which the original patent was granted, and pending the existence of an extended term of seven years, or whether such surrender and renewal may be made at any time during such extended term. First. The language of the law is comprehensive and unlimited. It does not limit the power to renew to the first fourteen years. But, in the same statute which provides, by the much discussed 18th section, for an extension for seven years, we find the 13th section declaring that "whenever any patent which has heretofore been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall be inoperative and invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, it shall be lawful for the commissioner, &c." Now, here is a patent which was issued in 1828, before the act of 1836 was passed. It is thus far expressly within the letter, as well as within the spirit of the statute. But the statute was, of course, designed to apply to living franchises. Every patent granted before 1836, might, at any time within the term for which it was issued, be surrendered and cancelled. What was the condition of the patent, then, on the 8th day of July, 1845, when it was renewed? The original term of fourteen years had expired. But the new act of 1836 authorises a certain public functionary to certify an extension of it for seven years, and declares that when he shall have so certified, the certificate shall have such effect upon the original letters patent, that they shall, to all intents and purposes, be regarded as if they had issued for twenty-one years. The commissioner has thus certified, and so these letters patent have now living force and effect, which will last until the 27th day of December, 1849. Thus they are brought within the letter and the spirit of the enactment contained in the 13th section. Secondly. The law has long been well settled, that when a patent has been extended, it is prolonged during the additional term, subject to all the legal incidents of the first term. The rights and remedies, the risks and dangers, the privileges and rules of law which appertain to the patent, are prolonged with it. Although it was contended that the special act of congress for the relief of Oliver Evans, passed in 1808, was conclusive of the originality of the invention it was held that the rights of the patentee remained unchanged in all respects, except the limited time. Evans v. Eaton, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 322. Thirdly. The power and duty of the commissioner to cancel patents void by reason of a defective specification, exist independently of the 13th section of the act—that is to say, they exist independently of any words of express enactment. As has been seen, such a proceeding was had under the law of 1793, which contained no express provision on that subject, and was affirmed by the supreme court of the United States. Morris v. Huntington [Case No. 9,831], and other cases, before cited, in that connection. If, then, a new patent could be issued as an act of ministerial duty, even without the authority of the 13th section, certainly it can be in all cases where the spirit of the contract between the patentee and the commonwealth requires it. The American continent, from its icy boundaries on the north, to undefined latitudes within the tropics, seems to be rapidly falling under the political sway of our confederacy. The habitations of an hundred millions of people, and of how many more I dare not conjecture, are to be erected by our artisans. The machine in question reduces in the proportion of nine-tenths, the labor and expense of a necessary part of every structure, whether it be raised for use or ornament. If my argument seem to have been too long, I hope the offence may find an apology in the importance of securing to the children of the inventor the reward allotted by his country for so distinguished a benefaction.

This case presents ten questions for solution, each of which calls for the interpretation of different parts of the patent act of 1836; but none of them can by possibility involve the consideration, or require, or even justify, a discussion, as to the policy of that law. This court have nothing to do with the policy of an act of congress. The question upon the construction of any statute is, what have the legislature done, not what it ought, or ought not to have done. I shall therefore abstain from even an attempt to answer all that part of the argument of the counsel for the plaintiff, (and which is much the greater portion of it,) in which he has attempted to demonstrate the extensive obligation resting upon the government "to foster genius or reward merit," and especially the peculiar genius and exclusive merit of authors and inventors. That argument might have been very properly addressed to the law-making power, to induce the enactment of a statute, with such provisions as the learned counsel supposes congress, from his idea of its duties, should have inserted; but how it is to aid in the humbler task of expounding the statute which has been enacted, is not so easily perceived. Nor have the merits or demerits of the invention for which Woodworth obtained his patent, the most remote bearing upon any of the questions to be discussed or decided in this case. Whether the invention is of the utmost public, as well as private utility, or whether the least possible degree of usefulness that will sustain a patent, is all that can be attributed to it, can make no possible difference in the construction of this statute. The statute must receive the same construction in the one case as in the other. Nor has the history of William Woodworth the least possible connection, directly or remotely, with any of the topics or questions which can legitimately occupy the attention of the court in this cause—whether he died in poverty or in affluence—whether he was a benefactor or a beneficiary of the public, the court have no means of knowing; and if it had, whether he was one or the other, most certainly could not alter or affect the rules by which this statute is to be expounded. The consideration of those topics, therefore, will constitute no part of the argument which I propose to submit.

I. The first question presented is: Whether the 18th section of the patent act of 1836 authorized the extension of a patent on the application of the executor or administrator of a deceased patentee.

To maintain the negative of this question, I shall endeavor to establish the following propositions or points:

1. No property in, or right to, the renewed or extended term, is, by the act, vested in the patentee until such renewal or extension is actually obtained. Therefore upon the death of the patentee, before obtaining such extension or renewal of his patent, no property in, or right to, such renewal or extension, can vest in his heirs or personal representatives.

2. The 18th section of this statute does not, in terms, authorize the renewal or extension of a patent on the application of the executor or administrator of the patentee.

3. It cannot be legitimately inferred from the language of the statute, that the law-makers intended to authorize the renewal or extension of a patent in favor, or upon the application, of the executor or administrator of a deceased patentee; or to give any latitude of discretion, whatever, to the commissioner of patents, or to the board which is to determine upon the application, as to the person upon whose application such renewal or extension might be granted.

1st. The executors or administrators of the patentee seem to have been intentionally excluded from the 18th section. This is manifest from the fact, that in other parts of the statute, where any right, or privilege, is intended to be given to executors and administrators, it is given to them in express terms. Vide sections 5, 6, 10 and 13.

2d. An administrator or executor of a deceased patentee, cannot perform, or comply with, the terms and conditions required of the patentee by the 18th section, to entitle him to a renewal of his patent; nor could any executor or administrator comply with the conditions required by the 6th section, to authorize the issuing of a patent originally, and therefore, those terms were varied by the 10th section, so as to enable an executor or administrator to comply with them. But there is no such provision in regard to the 18th section.

3d. The power granted to the commissioner of patents and to the board, by the 18th section, is a special and limited power, and must be strictly pursued.

4th. The provision for the renewal of a patent, contained in the 18th section, if it applies to patents issued before the passage of the act, is, as to those patents, a gratuity to the patentee, in derogation of the rights to which every other citizen would be entitled upon the expiration of the first patent. The law bestowing this gratuity, will not be extended, by construction, to persons not named in it, and who cannot comply with the conditions upon which it is to be granted.

1. As to the first position: The question is not whether the inventor has any or what right to, or property in, his invention, independent of any legislative provision; but whether the 18th section of the act vests in the patentee such a right to a renewed or extended term of his patent, which may or may not thereafter be granted to him under the provisions of that section, as can be regarded as property. After the extension of a patent is duly obtained under that section, I concede that the prolongation of the exclusive right thus secured is property, as much so as the exclusive right granted by the original patent; but I deny that the patentee, before obtaining such renewal or extension of his patent, has any such right to demand or have such renewal granted to him, as will, either in law or equity, constitute property, which will descend to heirs, or vest in personal representatives. Of what description of property is it? Clearly, it is not a chattel, real or personal, in possession. Is it a chose in action? This species of property is defined to be "a personal right not reduced to possession, but recoverable by an action at law." 2 Kent, Comm. (2d Ed.) 351; 2 Bl. Comm. 396. It depends entirely upon contract. Mr. Justice Blackstone says (2 Bl. Comm. 397) that all property in action depends entirely upon contract, express or implied. Has a patentee such a claim upon the government for a renewal or extension of his patent under the 18th section, as would entitle him to enforce it by an action at law, or suit in equity, if the government were liable to be sued? If a similar right or claim existed against an individual, could it be enforced by any proceeding in law or equity? No obligation is imposed upon the government, by this act, to grant an extension of a patent. It simply authorizes it to be done, provided it shall be deemed by the proper department consistent with the interests of the public. If an individual were placed precisely in the position of the government, it would be entirely at his own option whether such renewal or extension should be granted or not.

The duty and the power of deciding upon an application for the renewal of a patent under this section, is vested in certain designated officers of the government. If those, or any other officers of the government, refuse to perform a duty imposed upon them by statute, and which an individual has a right to require them to perform, to the injury of such individual, this court can, by mandamus, compel the performance of such duty. Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524. Now, suppose the board designated to decide upon these applications, should refuse to renew a patent, in a case where the patentee had complied, on his part, with all the requisitions of that section, could this court compel the board, by mandamus, to renew the patent? Most clearly not. The decision of the board that, in its opinion, a renewal of such patent could not be granted, with a due regard to the public interest, would be conclusive upon the subject. A right of any description in one person to claim the performance of any act by another, necessarily implies an obligation on that other person to perform such act, and an obligation too, which can be enforced at law or in equity; and where no such obligation exists, no such right exists. A patentee has no more right to demand, or require, the renewal of his patent under the 18th section, than he has to demand such renewal of congress. Before the act of 1836 was passed, congress renewed patents upon the application of the patentee, requiring, however, of the patentee, proof of the same facts required to be proved by him, under the 18th section of that act. Act July 3, 1832, § 2 (4 Stat. 559). Notwithstanding the act of 1836, congress have still the right and power to renew a patent if they should deem proper to do so. But neither congress, nor the board of commissioners are bound, or under any obligation, to grant such renewal. There is, therefore, no more right, in the patentee, to demand, or have, an extension of his patent, under the 18th section, than he would have, if that statute had never been enacted.

It was contended by the counsel for the plaintiff, that the property in this assumed right of renewal, was similar to the property in a franchise; and he illustrated this argument by this simile: "If," said he, "the state grant the use of a bridge, for a term of years, on condition that the grantee shall erect the bridge, and at the expiration of his term, devote it to the public, is not this a contract which, if performed by the grantee, will descend to his representatives, and carry the franchise to them? Now," (continued the learned counsel) "is there any thing in the intangibility of the right to an extension of a patent, or in the uncertainty of its future establishment which exempts it from the principle of this law?" No one will be disposed to deny or doubt the correctness of the simile or case put by the learned counsel, but no one can fail to see the inappositeness of the case supposed, to the one at bar. Nor, does it require any legal or logical acumen, to perceive that the conclusion which the learned gentleman drew from his hypothesis, by no means follows from it. A patent or grant of any exclusive right after it has been duly obtained, is a franchise (Webst. Pat. p. 1), a privilege of royalty, or of the supreme power, in the hands of a subject or citizen. 2 Bl. Comm. 37; 4 Kent, Comm. (2d Ed.) 45S. Such a grant or franchise, no one doubts, is property. In the description of the various kinds of property given in the books, such a property is designated an incorporeal hereditament. 2 Bl. Comm. 21; 3 Kent, Comm. (2d Ed.) 403. And it is called an hereditament, because it is heritable property, that is, it is property which descends to the heir, and does not go to the personal representatives of the decedent.

But a franchise of any description has no existence before it is granted. The possibility that a franchise may be granted to a person if he apply for it, is not property of any description. If the relation between the decedent and the sovereign power were such, that the sovereign power were under such an obligation to grant the franchise to the decedent and his heirs, as would, in the case of a private person, constitute a legal obligation, which might be enforced at law or in equity, there might be some propriety in classing it with that species of property known as choses or things in action. But where no such obligation exists, to hold the mere capacity to apply for such a grant, and the possibility or even probability that the application would be successful, when it is entirely in the discretion of the power to which the application is made to grant it or not, to be a right, amounting to property, to a chose in action, would most certainly be entirely new. It would be creating a species of things in action hitherto unknown to the law. It might just as well be said, that the right, or rather the privilege, of asking alms, was a chose in action, which would vest in the executor or administrator of a decedent. I will not say that the law-making authority could not, in the plenitude of its creative powers, exalt such a mere possibility, to a right which should be regarded as property; but I do say, that it has not done it, and it is not within the constitutional powers of this court to do it.

Another argument has been urged by the counsel for the plaintiff, which certainly is entitled to attention for its boldness in setting at defiance well established principles, if for no other cause. It was contended by the learned gentleman, that, independent of any statutory provision, an inventor has a perpetual, absolute and exclusive right to his discovery; that the disclosure of his invention upon obtaining a patent for it from the government, raises an equitable claim upon the government to renew the patent, provided the patentee has not, during the original term for which the patent was granted, been reasonably compensated for the invention; that this equity is a property, vested in the patentee, which, upon his death, vests in his personal representatives; and that the 18th section of the act should be so construed, as to extend to and embrace this equity. To maintain this proposition it was asserted, (I say asserted, because it certainly was not proved,) that the state, in its organic law, (the constitution,) admits that the inventor has a perpetual, absolute and exclusive right to his discovery; that the state admits also, that so strong is the conflict between this private right and the public interest, that the private right is unsafe, and that in view of these facts, the state compromises with inventors, and encourages them, by securing to them an exclusive enjoyment of their rights for a limited term. To me, it is not only a strange, but a startling doctrine, and I think it must be so to this court, and to every other person living under a government of laws, relying upon those laws for the security of life, liberty and property, that there is any kind or species of property, to which a citizen has a just and legal title, that cannot be protected by those laws, and would be unsafe under the guardianship and protecting power of those laws. If an inventor has a perpetual, absolute, and exclusive right to his discovery, independent of any statutory provision, is the law, indeed, so feeble that that right is unsafe? And is a right granted by government, any more sacred or secure, or more easily protected by the laws of this land, than any natural or inherent right? Is property of any description, acquired by any lawful means, less secure or more difficult to protect, than the property in a monopoly granted by government?

But the whole and every part of this position of the learned counsel, is in direct hostility to the decision of the supreme court in the case of Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 591. In that case the court held that an author or inventor has no exclusive right of property in his works or discoveries, after he has published them to the world, and that such right never existed at common law; and, as it regards inventors, the court said that it never had been pretended that they could hold, by the common law, any property in their inventions after they shall have sold them publicly, and that, in the United States, authors and inventors have no exclusive right or property in their works and inventions, except such as is secured to them by the acts of congress. And in regard to the eighth section of the first article of the constitution, the court held that it does not provide for the protection of acknowledged existing rights, and that the acts of congress, under that clause of the constitution, instead of sanctioning an existing right, created the right which is secured by those acts for a limited period; that a man is entitled to the fruits of his own labors, but can enjoy them only by statutory provisions, and under the rules of property which regulate society, and which define the rights of things in general.

Were it necessary to sustain this judgment by the most clear and undoubted common law authority, the task would be by no means difficult; but I forbear fortifying, by authority, a decision which is of itself the best authority. Starting, then, with the proposition that an inventor has no exclusive right whatever to his invention, except what is created and protected by the acts of congress, an inventor has no claim of any description upon the government, equitable or otherwise, beyond the express provisions of the acts of congress; and, therefore, no equity exists in favor of a patentee against the government, to which the 18th section of the patent act can be extended by construction, even should the court be of opinion that it could, under the name of expounding a statute, extend it to cases and persons clearly not embraced in its language.

Will any one pretend that the claim of a patentee to have a patent extended under the 18th section of the act, is any greater, or approaches any nearer to a right, or to a property, than the claim of an inventor to a patent, before it is issued? By the 5th section of the act, the patent, when issued, secures the exclusive right to the patentee, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns. By the 6th section, the first and original inventor of any new and useful improvement, &c., is entitled to a patent, upon complying with the conditions and making the oath thereby required. No person pretends to deny, indeed it is conceded, that if the inventor should die before obtaining his patent, his personal representatives would not be entitled to, and could not obtain a patent by virtue of the 5th and 6th sections. Now, is there not at least as much right to an original patent, vested in the inventor at the time of his death, when he has matured and completed his invention, but died before obtaining his patent, as there is to an extension of a patent already obtained, when a patentee dies before such extension is granted? Has not the right to a patent in such case, a much greater resemblance to property, which would vest in executors or administrators, than this mere possibility of an extension of a patent under the 18th section? And is there not just as much authority, under the 5th and 6th sections, for the issuing of an original patent to the personal representatives of an inventor, as there is under the 18th section to extend a patent in favor of the personal representatives of a deceased patentee?

If an inventor complies with the 6th section of the act, he is entitled to a patent; no discretion is vested in the commissioner of patents to issue or withhold a patent; and should he refuse, in such case, to issue a patent, this court would compel him, by mandamus, to issue it. But if a patentee does all that is required of him by the 18th section, it is still discretionary with the board, to extend the patent or not, as it may be deemed compatible, or incompatible, with the public interest. Can any one deny that while the former has some resemblance to a chose in action, the latter has none whatever? And yet, while it is conceded that, in the former case, the personal representatives could not obtain a patent, were it not for the 10th section, which expressly authorizes it, it is contended that in the latter case, such personal representatives are entitled to an extension by virtue of the 18th section, when the patentee has died without making any application for a prolongation of his patent, or complying with any other requisite of that section.

2. My second proposition requires no illustration. Its truth is demonstrated by reading the 18th section. It cannot be affirmed, that that section, in terms, authorizes the renewal of a patent on the application of the executor or administrator of a patentee.

3. It cannot be legitimately inferred from the language of that section, that the lawmakers intended to authorize the renewal or extension of a patent, provided for in that section, in favor of, or upon the application of, the executor or administrator of a deceased patentee, or to give any latitude of discretion whatever to the commissioner of patents, or to the board, as to the person in favor of whom, or upon whose application, such renewal or extension might be granted. The question presented by this proposition, relates solely to the interpretation of the 18th section of the act. In the discussion of this question, I shall assume, as an undisputed and indisputable position, that, in the exposition of the act, the court will be governed by the same rules and principles which control the interpretation and construction of any other statute, upon any other subject.

The most important and most universal of those rules and principles, and the one which I most desire to impress upon the mind of the court at this stage of the argument, is, that the intention of the legislature can only be ascertained by the language it has used in the act to express that intention. As expounders of the law, we are not at liberty to presume that the legislature intended what it has not expressed, or expressed what it did not intend. Should courts indulge in any speculation of that kind, there would be, indeed there could be, no certain rule for the construction of any statute. In Pennington v. Cox, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 33, the court say: "That a law is the best expositor of itself, is one of those plain rules, which has been uniformly acknowledged." In Minor v. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 46, the court assert the principle, that a legislative act is to be interpreted according to the intention of the legislature, apparent upon its face. The rule is laid down, explicitly and emphatically, in Dwar. St. 703, and the writer sustains his position by reference to many well considered cases.

Assuming then, that the court is not at liberty, according to the well established principles of law governing the construction of statutes, to intend or suppose, that the legislature meant what it has not plainly expressed or declared, I humbly, but most confidently, submit, that the statute in question does not authorize the renewal or extension of a patent upon the application of, and in favor of, the personal representatives of a deceased patentee.

First. It is manifest from the provisions in other sections of this act, that the administrators and executors of the patentee were intentionally excluded from the provisions of the 18th section, and that congress did not intend to authorize the renewal or extension of a patent, provided for in that section, after the decease of the patentee. Wherever and whenever congress have intended to extend this exclusive right to the heirs or personal representatives of a patentee, they have provided for it in express terms. The 6th section of the act authorizes the issuing of a patent to the inventor, upon his making the oath required, and complying with the other requisites of the statute. The 10th section provides expressly that, in case of the death of the inventor, his executors or administrators may obtain the patent, and shall hold it in trust for the heirs or devisees of the inventor, and prescribes the oath to be made by such personal representatives as a substitute for the oath required of the inventor by the 6th section. The 13th section provides for the surrender of a patent by the patentee, and the obtaining of a new patent for the same invention, when the original patent is void by reason of a defective specification, without fraud or fault on the part of the patentee; the same section provides, that this privilege shall extend to the executors, administrators, and assignees of the patentee. But the 18th section, in its terms, authorizes an extension of a patent only upon the application of the patentee. Now I submit, if congress had intended that the benefit and privilege provided for by the 18th section, should extend to the heirs or personal representatives of a deceased patentee, they would have said so, as they did in the other sections referred to. Can any legal reason be given why, in this particular solitary instance, congress should have omitted to express its intentions, as in the 10th and 13th sections, if it did intend that the provisions of the 18th section should extend to the heirs or personal representatives of the patentee? The omission, (manifestly ex industria), of any words extending the provisions of the 18th section to the heirs or personal representatives of the patentee, is a clear indication of the intention of the law-giver, that those provisions should not be thus extended. "Where in several statutes in pari materia," (and the principle is equally applicable to several sections in the same act,) "the legislature is found sometimes inserting and sometimes omitting a clause of relation, it is to be presumed that their attention had been drawn to the point, and that the omission is designed." Moser v. Newman, 6 Bing. 536. "If," says Mr. Dwarries, "there is a material alteration in the language used in the different clauses of a statute, it is to be inferred that the legislature knew how to use terms applicable to the subject matter." "The several inditing and pruning of the different branches," said the judges in Edrich's Case, "doth argue that the maker did intend a difference of the purview and remedies, or otherwise they would have followed the same words." Dwar. St. 707; Edrich's Case, 5 Coke, 118a.

To overturn or escape all the rules which have been established by the wisdom and experience of the most learned jurists for the construction of statutes, the counsel for the plaintiff reposed, apparently with confidence, upon the position assumed by him, that no reason could be divined for denying to the heirs and personal representatives of a patentee, the benefit of obtaining an extension of a patent under the 18th section, which would not apply with equal force against the policy of the 10th and 13th sections. I call this an assumed position of the learned counsel, because, although he most confidently asserted it, he failed to prove it; indeed, he did not attempt to demonstrate its truth. And the learned counsel concluded that part of his argument, with a defiance to the most accomplished casuist, to find a reason for a difference of policy in the cases provided for in those three sections. Suppose there were so much of danger and peril in this defiance, that no wrangler could be found of sufficient intrepidity to attempt a trial of conclusions with the learned gentleman, as to the truth of his hypothesis, do the deductions which he has attempted to draw from it by any means follow? The argument of the learned counsel is simply and plainly this: The same reason and policy which induced congress to authorize the executors or administrators of an inventor to take out an original patent, where the inventor died before obtaining it, and also to surrender a patent void by reason of a defective specification, and take out a new patent upon a corrected specification, for the residue of the term of fourteen years then unexpired, required congress to authorize the extension of a patent under the 18th section, in favor of the executors or administrators of a deceased patentee, and, therefore, it is to be presumed congress so intended. Is this so? Does it advance one step towards proving that congress has done a thing, to show it ought to have done it? Besides, the rule of law and good sense applicable to the construction of a statute is, that when the law-giver, in one section of the act, uses words which, in their terms, apply to particular persons or things, and, in another section, omits those words, the presumption is, that he did so intentionally, understanding the force and effect of the use of the words in one section, and the omission of them in another; and that he intended "a difference of the purview and remedy" by the different phraseology of the sections, otherwise he would have used the same words in the several sections. This inference is directly the opposite of that which the learned counsel supposed necessarily followed from those facts. A statute introductory of a new law, (as is the case of the 18th section of this act,) in its terms applicable to particular persons or things, cannot be extended or applied by construction to other persons or things, although standing on the same reason. Jacob v. U. S. [Case No. 7,157]; Foster's Case, 11 Coke, 64a.

But suppose congress unintentionally, and through mere inadvertence, omitted, in the 18th section, the provision in favor of executors and administrators contained in the 10th and 13th sections, would it help the plaintiff's case? Can this court, by construction, insert those provisions in the 18th section? Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Rex v. Skone, 6 East, 514, 518, has answered this question. "It is no question for us," says that learned judge, "whether it would be expedient that there should be an appeal to the sessions in the case of a conviction before two justices of the peace, for a penalty in respect of the malt duty. If there be no words of reference to any act giving such an appeal, we cannot supply the want of them. Now the clauses in the statutes of Car. II. and Geo. II. have not the word 'penalties' in those parts giving the appeal;" (the words of those statutes describing the convictions for which an appeal was given, being "forfeitures and offences,") "and when that word occurs in other clauses, in other respects facsimiles, it seems as if the omission were intentional; but if it were not intended, we can only say of the legislature, quod voluit non dixit." In Dwar. St. 790, a like rule is laid down as the result of adjudged cases on the subject. But the hypothesis of the learned counsel, of which he so confidently challenged a refutation, and from which he has attempted to draw his conclusions, has no foundation in truth. If I am not wholly in error in regard to the policy and the main object of the provision of the constitution on this subject, and of the laws framed in pursuance of that provision, they furnish a sufficient and most satisfactory reason for the provisions of the 10th and 13th sections, which can have no application to the provisions of the 18th section. The late Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the judgment of the court in the case of Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 218, 243, says: "The great object and intention of the act is to secure to the public the advantages to be derived from the discoveries of individuals, and the means it employs are the compensation made to those individuals, for the time and labor devoted to those discoveries, by the exclusive right to make and sell the things discovered for a limited time." The same doctrine is laid down by Mr. Justice Ashurst, in Turner v. Winter, 1 Term R. 602, 605. Many other authorities might be adduced, were it necessary, to show that such is the true exposition of the principles, policy and object of the laws authorizing these monopolies. It is upon the same principle that the law declares a patent void, if it turns out that the patentee was not the first and original inventor, or if he has suffered his invention to get into public use before obtaining his patent, or if he does not describe his invention truly, and with sufficient intelligence to be understood by others. In either case the patent is void, because the consideration upon which it was granted fails.

The great object of these laws, then, being to give the public the benefit of the discoveries of individuals, and the exclusive right granted to those individuals to use the invention for a limited period, as a compensation for the time and labor devoted to those discoveries, and the disclosure of them to the public, being the means employed to obtain this public benefit, it follows that the same policy which would induce the grant of a patent to the inventor, would dictate a similar grant to the legal representatives of an inventor, who has died before disclosing his invention. The public would derive the same benefit from the disclosure of an invention by the executors and administrators of an inventor after his death, and the government should grant the same compensation to the heirs or devisees of an inventor for such disclosure, as it would to the inventor himself. No such reason, however, can apply to the case of the extension of a patent provided for by the 13th section. In that case, the disclosure has already been made; the patent for fourteen years, (the stipulated compensation for the invention and disclosure,) has already been granted to the patentee; a further grant of seven years is entirely at the option of the government, based upon no new consideration of a new invention, or new disclosure, from which the public would or could derive a benefit; but, on the contrary, such extension takes from the public that which they are fairly in possession of, and to the benefit of which they are justly entitled. In Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 292, 320, the court say: "The patent law was designed for the public benefit as well as for the benefit of inventors. For a valuable invention, the public, on the inventor's complying with certain conditions, give him, for a limited period, the profits arising from the sale of the thing invented. This holds out an inducement for the exercise of genius and skill, in making discoveries which may be useful to society, and profitable to the discoverer. But it was not the intention of this law to take from the public that of which they were fairly in possession." This principle applies equally to the case of a possession acquired by the public, by the disclosure upon obtaining a patent, as to a possession of a discovery acquired before a patent for it is issued, by a promulgation of it to the public by the inventor.

The conditions upon which a renewal or extension of a patent is authorized by the 13th section, furnish another reason why congress would intentionally exclude executors and administrators from the purview of that section. None but a patentee himself could have any accurate knowledge of the facts required to be shown to authorize an extension of a patent for an additional term. The patentee is required to furnish to the board a statement in writing, under oath, of the ascertained value of the invention, and of his receipts and expenditures, sufficiently in detail to exhibit a true and faithful account of loss and profit in any manner accruing to him from and by reason of said invention. And the patent is only to be extended in case it shall be just and proper, by reason of the patentee, without neglect or fault on his part, having failed to obtain from the use and sale of his invention a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity and expense bestowed upon the same, and the introduction thereof into use. How is it possible, in the nature of things, that his executor or administrator could know anything of this? Is it within the range of possibilities, that any person but the inventor himself, could have any accurate or certain knowledge of the time spent, of the study and reflection bestowed, of the mental powers exerted, in projecting and maturing the invention, or of the amount of time and money expended in experimenting upon his discovery, and the introduction of it into use, or how much he has received for or on account of the invention, or how much he might have received therefor, with proper attention, or without neglect or fault on his part? Congress undoubtedly appreciated the uncertainty that must necessarily exist in relation to the best information that could be given by an executor or administrator upon this subject, and for that reason deemed it discreet to confine the provisions of that section to the patentee alone. The 13th section proceeds upon the principle that the inventor, having in good faith complied with the policy and provisions of the law on his part, has a just right to expect that the government will secure to him and his heirs the exclusive use of his invention for fourteen years, as a reward for his ingenuity, skill and science, and as a remuneration for the disclosure of his invention to the public, and that, if from any defect in the patent issued, such exclusive right is not secured to him, and no blame or fault is imputable to him, the government will, by a new and valid patent, secure to him such exclusive right. Such is the view taken of the act of 1793, in the case of Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 218, 243. The same principle which would require the issuing of a new patent in such case to the patentee, would require it to be issued to his heirs or personal representatives for the unexpired portion of the fourteen years. The compensation agreed to be given by the government, is a valid patent for fourteen years, to the patentee, his heirs or assigns; and when the patent issued turns out to be void, a new and valid patent could, with no more propriety, be refused to the heirs or assigns of the patentee, than to the patentee himself. The government has received the consideration for which a valid patent should be granted, and which the government admits it is bound to grant; and the death of the person entitled to this grant does not exonerate the government from the obligation. Upon this principle, and for this reason, the 13th-section of the act of 1836 was framed. But no such principle or reason exists in regard to the 18th section of the act.

Second. The 18th section of this act cannot be so construed as to authorize the renewal or extension of a patent, in favor of the personal representatives of a deceased patentee, because such representatives cannot comply with the terms and conditions required by that section to authorize the renewal of a patent. The 18th section requires the oath of the patentee to the statement in writing which is required to be made to the board. Such, I submit, is the plain import and meaning of the words used. After providing that the application for an extension of a patent shall be made by the patentee, in writing, to the commissioner of patents, prescribing the notice to be published by the commissioner, and designating the persons who shall constitute the board to hear and decide upon the application, the section proceeds in these words: "The patentee shall furnish to said board a statement in writing, under oath, of the ascertained value of the invention, and of his receipts and expenditures, sufficiently in detail to exhibit a true and faithful account of loss and profit in any manner accruing to him from and by reason of said invention." Under whose oath is this statement to be furnished? From the nature of the facts required to be verified by this oath, facts the knowledge of which must, from their character, rest almost, if not entirely, exclusively with the patentee, can there be any doubt that the verification of these facts, required by this section, is the oath of the patentee? Besides, the terms of this section are so explicit, that nothing is left for construction or criticism. The patentee shall furnish a statement under oath. Does not this language as clearly and unequivocally require the oath of the patentee, as if the word "his" had been inserted between the words "under" and "oath?" Can any one suppose that congress had the most remote idea, that this statement should or could be verified by the oath of any other person than the patentee? An executor or administrator cannot comply with this requirement of the section any more than he could with the requirement, in this respect, of the 6th section. By the 10th section, congress made a special provision, varying the oath to be made when executors or administrators apply for an original patent, but no such provision has been made in relation to the 18th section.

My learned adversary has urged with much earnestness, that the object of congress in enacting the section in question, was exclusively to reward and encourage inventors, "to foster genius and reward merit"—that this object could not (as he conceives) be sufficiently accomplished, without a provision in favor of the children of the inventor who may be and often are left destitute at his death—and that therefore it is the duty of the court to give a construction to this section, which will extend its provisions to personal representatives of the deceased patentee. If such were the object of congress, it is certainly to be regretted that it has not in some way expressed it, or given some hint of it in some of the laws which have been passed upon this subject. It was certainly a very plain and easy matter for congress to have made such a provision as the learned gentleman supposes it intended to make and ought to have made, had it deemed it expedient to do so. But I have heard no argument which tends to prove that this law owes its origin to the object supposed by the learned counsel. Certainly the argument would furnish no reason for extending a patent in favor of the personal representatives of a patentee who had no family, no children, or (as might be the case) no heirs. And suppose the patentee should die deeply in debt and leave a destitute family. This family could not be benefited by an extension of his patent, unless its value should be more than sufficient to pay his debts. The patent, when extended in favor of his executors or administrators, would be assets in their hands to be administered as a part of his estate.

Again, the patentee may not be the inventor, he may not be the man of genius and of merit, which the government ought to foster and reward. An inventor may assign his invention before obtaining a patent, and the patent be taken out in the name of the assignee. Act March 3, 1837, § 6 [5 Stat. 193]. What benefit would the renewal of a patent in favor of the personal representatives of such a patentee, be to the family of the inventor? How would the extension of such a patent "foster genius or reward merit?"

If the object of congress had been to benefit the children of inventors, it is inconceivable how or why they would enact a law in the words of the 18th section of this act, which, according to the construction attempted to be given to it, would in most cases benefit only the creditors of the inventor, and in many cases benefit neither the inventor, nor his children, nor his creditors, and which, in its terms, applies to all patentees whether they are inventors or not, or do or do not leave any children or heirs to be benefitted. No principle in aid of the plaintiff's construction of this section, can be extracted from the proceedings of the privy council under the statute of 5 & 6 Wm. IV. In England the crown is the fountain from which all monopolies flow. Previous to the reign of James I., monopolies of every description and for unlimited periods, were created by letters patent from the crown. Such grants were simply the exercise of the royal prerogative, the original source of power, from which all such and the like privileges and franchises emanated. This portion of the royal prerogative was frequently exercised in a manner greatly to prejudice the business, commerce, and prosperity of the kingdom. To remedy such abuses the statute of 21 Jac. I. c. 3, commonly called the "Monopoly Act," was passed. The 1st section of that act declared all monopolies to be against public policy and void. The 6th section contained a proviso excluding from the operation of the first section, letters patent for a period not exceeding 14 years, for the sale, making and working of any manner of new manufacture in the kingdom. The act of 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 83, amended the 6th section of the monopoly act, so as to authorize the crown, if in its wisdom and discretion it should deem it proper and expedient, by and with the advice of the privy council, to enlarge or prolong the time for which such letters patent were authorized by the 6th section of the monopoly act, for a period not exceeding seven years. Although by these acts the power of the crown as to granting patents is thus limited, yet in granting or prolonging patents which are not prohibited by these acts, the crown still acts as the original source of power—possessing in that respect the same power that the congress of the United States does, and, therefore, in the exercise of that power, it prolongs patents in favor of the heirs or assignees or executors or administrators of a particular patentee. Congress may do the same by special act, or it might if it deemed proper, pass a general act, authorizing the extension of a patent by any officer or officers it might designate, in favor of the personal representatives or heirs of a deceased patentee.

But the question here is not what congress has the power to do, but what it has done. Has it, by this 18th section, granted the power to the board therein mentioned, to extend a patent, in favor of the executors or administrators of a deceased patentee? This board, acting under this section, is not the original source of power, but a mere servant or agent of the original source of power, acting under and by virtue of a delegated limited authority; and the question is not what authority or powers the principal might have bestowed upon this agent, but with what power or authority, it has clothed this agent. Demonstrating that congress might have granted to this board the power claimed for it, is not advancing one step towards proving that it has done so.

Third. This brings me to the consideration of the third proposition under my third point, which is that the power granted to the commissioner of patents and to the board, by the 18th section of this act, is a special and limited power, and must be strictly pursued. Is the power given by this section limited and special? Of this there can be no doubt. It certainly is not a general power to extend all patents, in favor of any person, in the discretion of the board. Where a jurisdiction is limited by custom or by statute, either, 1st, as to place, as a leet or corporation, or, 2d, as to persons, or, 3d, with respect to the subject matter, it is deemed a special and limited jurisdiction; and its proceedings in a case arising out of the place, or in favor of persons not named in the statute giving the power, or upon a subject matter not mentioned in the statute, or in a mode or manner not specified in the statute, are coram non iudice and void. Perkin v. Proctor, 2 Wils. 382; Case of The Marshalsea, 10 Coke, 74-76.

The power conferred on the secretary of state by the patent act of 1793, was a special and limited power; and hence it was held in Pennock v. Dialogue, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 1, that the patentee acquired no title to his patent, without a strict compliance with all the preliminary steps required by that statute. Clearly, under that act, the secretary of state had no power to issue a patent in favor of any other persons than those named in the act. Could he dispense with a strict compliance with any one of the provisions of that act? His whole power to act in the premises, depended upon a strict compliance by the patentee with every requirement of the act. It is contended that the board organized by the 18th section of the present act, is a judicial court, whose judgments or decisions upon the subject matter before it are conclusive. If this board were to be deemed a judicial court, the conclusions drawn from that supposition by the plaintiff's counsel would not follow. If a court at all, it is indisputably a court of limited and special jurisdiction, and all its proceedings in favor of persons not specified in the act, or upon a different application from that mentioned in the act, or without a strict compliance, by the applicant, with all the requirements of the statute conferring the power, would be coram non iudice, and void. But, I insist, the board act as commissioners by virtue of the power or commission given them by this act, and not as a court. It is not a judicial court recognized or authorized by the constitution of the United States. Article 3, § 1, of the constitution of the United States declares, that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." By article 1, § 8, subd. 9, power is given to congress "to constitute tribunals inferior to the supreme court." It cannot be contended with the semblance of plausibility, either, that the persons composing the board constituted by the 18th section of this act, are judges within the provision of the constitution, or that the board is a tribunal inferior to the supreme court. Its decisions cannot be reviewed by the supreme court, nor can that court, by mandamus, or otherwise, interfere with its action; nor are the powers and duties of the board, within the judicial powers of the government. By article 3, § 2, of the constitution, "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." This is all of the section which is applicable to the question now under consideration.

The late Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution (volume 3, § 1639), says, that the terms "law and equity," as used in this section of the constitution, mean "law and equity," according to the known legal definition of those terms, in the jurisprudence of England, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and that by this section the constitution appeals to and adopts the common law to the extent of making it a rule in the pursuit of remedial justice in the courts of the Union. In the same volume (section 1640), this learned jurist defines the words "cases in law and equity," as used in this section of the constitution, to be cases which arise under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, and which can be litigated in the ordinary mode of proceeding in a court of common law, or in a court of equity. He says: "A case is a suit in law or equity, instituted according to the regular course of judicial proceedings; and when it involves any question arising under the constitution, laws or treaties, of the United States, it is within the judicial power confided to the Union." By an act of congress "to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions," approved March 23, 1792 (1 Stat. 243), it was provided that certain disabled persons therein mentioned, should be entitled to be placed on the pension list of the United States for such time, and to be entitled to such allowance, not exceeding a certain rate, for arrears of pensions, as the circuit court of the district in which they respectively resided, might think just. The act, then, prescribes certain preliminary proofs to be presented by the applicant to the court, and then the section (section 1), concludes in these words: "The circuit court, upon receipt of the proofs aforesaid, shall forthwith proceed to examine into the nature of the wound, or other cause of disability of such applicant, and having ascertained the degree thereof, shall certify the same, and transmit the result of their inquiry, in case, in their opinion, the applicant should be put on the pension list, to the secretary at war, together with their opinion in writing, what proportion of the monthly pay of such applicant will be equivalent to the degree of disability ascertained in manner aforesaid." The third section of the act required the several circuit courts to continue in session five days at the least, from the time of opening the sessions thereof, that such disabled persons might have full opportunity to make application for relief under that act.

Immediately after the passage of this act, applications for relief under it, were made to the circuit court for the district of New York. That court, then consisting of Chief Justice Jay and Mr. Justice Cushing of the supreme court, and Judge Duane, the district judge of that district, were unanimously of opinion: "That by the constitution of the United States, the government thereof is divided into three distinct and independent branches, and that it is the duty of each to abstain from, and to oppose, encroachments on either; that neither the legislative nor the executive branches can constitutionally assign to the judicial any duties, but such as are properly judicial, and to be performed in a judicial manner; that the duties assigned to the circuit courts by this act are not of that description. As, therefore, the business assigned to this court, by the act, is not judicial, nor directed to be performed judicially, the act can only be considered as appointing commissioners for the purposes mentioned in it, by official instead of personal description; that the judges of this court regard themselves as being the commissioners designated by the act, and therefore as being at liberty to accept or decline that office; that as the objects of this act are exceedingly benevolent, they will execute it in the capacity of commissioners." The circuit court for the district of Pennsylvania, consisting of Mr. Justice Wilson and Mr. Justice Blair of the supreme court, and Judge Peters, district judge for the district of Pennsylvania, certified their unanimous opinion to the president, that the court could not proceed under that act; and one reason assigned was, that the business directed by it was not of a judicial nature, and formed no part of the power vested by the constitution in the courts of the United States; and consequently, had the court attempted to perform the duties assigned by the act, it would have proceeded without constitutional authority. The circuit court for the district of North Carolina, consisting of Mr. Justice Iredell of the supreme court, and Judge Sitgreaves, the district judge, came to a similar conclusion, which they maintained in a very elaborate argument. Hayburn's Case, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 410 to 414, note. The board, therefore, created by the 18th section of this act, is not a court. It is no part of, nor in any manner connected with, the judiciary. It constitutes no portion of the judicial branch or department of the government; its powers and duties are not within the judicial powers of the government.

Mr. Seward—What do you say of courts martial? Are not they courts authorized by the constitution?

Mr. Stevens—I say courts martial are part and portion of the war and navy departments, having no connection whatever with the judiciary; they are not mentioned in the constitution, and are only authorized by implication, as being necessary incidents to the power given to congress by article one, section eight, to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy. This board is a board of commissioners, with special and limited jurisdiction and powers. It is an inferior jurisdiction, not proceeding according to the common law. Such a tribunal acquires no jurisdiction, unless every preliminary step is taken in the manner, and by the person, prescribed by the statute. Jones v. Reed, 1 Johns. Cas. 20; Smith v. Bouchier, cited in 2 Wils. 385. The preliminary jurisdictional facts, required by the 18th section of this act, to authorize the board to act at all upon the application are: 1st. The patentee must make application to the commissioner of patents, for the renewal. 2d. The application must be in writing. 3rd. The sum required must be paid. 4th. The commissioner must publish notice, as required. 5th. The patentee must furnish to the board a statement in writing under oath of the ascertained value of the invention, &c. If any of these steps are omitted, the board acquires no jurisdiction to act upon the application. The power must be strictly pursued; nothing is to be taken by implication. Now, is there any more authority given by this section to the board to entertain and act upon the application of an executor or administrator of the patentee, than upon the application of the heir, or assignee, or devisee of the patentee? Can the application be made by a different person than the one designated by the statute? Can any application, except one in writing, give jurisdiction? Can the publication of notice, or the statement of the patentee in writing, under oath, of the ascertained value of the invention, as required by the statute, be dispensed with? Has the board any such dispensing power? If the board can dispense with any one of these requisites, it may dispense with the whole.

The statute securing to authors an exclusive right in their works, is authorized by the same clause of the constitution, and is very analogous in principle to the act now under consideration. In regard to that act, the supreme court held, in the case of Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 591, 664, that no requirement of the statute, whether important or unimportant, could be dispensed with; and that if any one of the provisions of the statute, however unimportant the court might deem it, were not strictly complied with, the author acquired no title to an exclusive right in his book. The same doctrine was held by Mr. Justice Washington, in the case of Ewer v. Coxe [Case No. 4,584]. The case of Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 218, is relied upon as authority for the latitude of construction contended for by the plaintiff. I confess I am unable to see the least analogy between the principle decided in that case, and that contended for in this. The main question presented in that case was whether the law of 1793 authorized the secretary of state to issue a valid patent to an inventor, after he had issued a void one, in a case where no fault or blame was imputable to the inventor. The court, after much hesitation, and not without doubt, came to the conclusion that the issuing of a void patent did not exhaust the power of the secretary of state under that act, and that he could issue a valid patent for that portion of the fourteen years then unexpired. This was, doubtless, correct; all the requirements of the statute were complied with; a void patent was issued; that was no patent; so that the case, in legal effect, stood as though no patent had before been issued, although the application in due form had been made by the inventor several years before.

Fourth. The fourth proposition under my third point is, that the provision in the 18th section for the renewal of a patent is, as to patents issued before the passage of that act, a gratuity to the patentee, in derogation of the rights to which every other citizen would be entitled upon the expiration of the first patent. Such an act ought not to be extended by construction beyond its express terms. All grants from the government are construed strictly against the grantee. In this respect the rule of construction is different, from that which is applied to grants between individuals. But between individuals, a grant which is a gratuity—a deed of gift—is always construed strictly against the donee. The donor is never presumed to have given, or to have intended to give anything that is not expressly mentioned, or to a person not expressly named in the deed. In relation to public grants, by act of the legislature, Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in the case of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, says—the rule is well settled, that, in grants by the public, the grantee can claim nothing that is not clearly given; nothing passes by implication. 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 420, 544–546. This rule should be applied with the utmost strictness to a grant that is a mere gratuity. It cannot be denied that so far as the 18th section of the act in question authorizes the extension of a patent issued before the passage of that act, it is a mere gratuity to the patentee. The patentee had, in such case, received all that the government had agreed to give, and all he had a right to expect as a reward for his invention; an act authorizing such a patent to be extended for seven years longer, is a grant of a monopoly in derogation of the rights of the public, without consideration. It is, therefore, submitted that such a gift ought not to be construed to extend beyond the party expressly named, nor should it take effect at all, but upon a strict and literal compliance with the conditions required by the act.

II. The second question presented is, whether by force and operation of the 18th section of the act of July 4th, 1836 [5 Stat. 124], entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts, &c.," the extension granted to William W. Woodworth as administrator on the 16th day of November, 1842, enured to the benefit of assignees under the original patent granted to William Woodworth on the 27th day of December, 1828; or whether said extension enured to the benefit of the administrator only in his said capacity. So far as it regards the particular case now under argument, this question will be wholly out of the case if the defendants prevail on the first question; because if the court shall be of opinion, that the act does not authorize an extension of a patent in favor of the personal representatives of a patentee, then the extension of this patent is wholly void and can enure to the benefit of no person. It will be necessary, therefore, to discuss this question on the supposition that the extension of this patent in favor of the administrator of the patentee is valid; or, (which will render it still more simple,) to assume, for the purpose of the argument, that the renewal or extension of this patent was obtained upon the application of the patentee himself. If the 18th section of this act does authorize the extension of a patent in favor of the administrator of a deceased patentee, such administrator can have no greater interest in, or more extensive right to the benefits of such extension, than the patentee himself would have had, had he lived and obtained the extension or renewal himself. The simple abstract question then, (to pursue the words of the statute,) is, does "the benefit of such renewal extend to assignees and grantees" of the original patentee? It is respectfully submitted that it does. (1) Such is the plain sense and import of the last clause of the 18th section. (2) Any other construction of that section would render it unjust and invalid, as to those assignees and grantees of the original patentee, who had purchased their rights and obtained their grants or assignments prior to the passage of the act.

1. The clause of the 18th section, upon the interpretation of which this question depends, is in these words: "and the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented, to the extent of their respective interest therein." The alleged obscurity of this clause does not arise from the language used by the framers of the act, but from an attempt by construction and interpretation, to give that language a meaning different from the plain import of the words used. Our adversaries contend that the word "therein," refers to the extended term, and gives the same meaning to the clause as if it read "to the extent of their respective interest" in such renewed or extended term of the patent. Therefore, if the assignment does not extend to and embrace the renewed term, or, in other words, if it is not an assignment in terms for the new term for which the patent may be extended, the assignee has not only no benefit of the renewal, but will be precluded by the renewal from using the thing patented during the renewed term. If I may be permitted to borrow a phrase from my learned adversary, I would say that "the most accomplished casuist would fail" to furnish anything like a plausible argument in favor of this construction. It is diametrically opposed to the intention of the legislature as clearly manifested by the language used to express that intention. Besides, such an interpretation would violate one of the best established rules of construction, by rendering the whole clause entirely nugatory and utterly useless. Every statute should, if possible, be so construed that every clause, sentence and word shall have full effect. Dwar. St. 763. An assignee or grantee of a renewed term, would, by virtue of his grant, be entitled to all the benefit of such renewed or extended term, without this clause in the statute.

It is, indeed, contended, that even a specific, absolute grant of the extended term, before the extension was obtained, would not vest in the grantee the legal title to such extended term, after it should be obtained, without this clause in the statute; and that without that clause, such a grantee would be obliged to resort to a court of equity to compel the patentee to convey the title to the extended term after he had obtained the extension of his patent. This position is attempted to be sustained upon an alleged principle of law, that it was not in the power of a patentee before the passage of this act, by any form of grant, assurance or covenant, to convey the legal title to an extended term of his patent which he might thereafter obtain; and that before the extension, it was not a right or property capable of being so transferred, as that the legal title to it would vest in, or enure by force of the conveyance to the benefit of the vendee. The court, I think, cannot fail to be struck with the harmony and consistency of this argument, with that urged by the learned gentleman upon the first question presented by this record, to prove that this possibility of an extension or renewal of a patent, was such a right or property as would vest in the personal representatives of a patentee at his death. But is this argument sound, or even plausible, upon the ground assumed by the counsel? Why would not the legal title of the renewed term vest in the grantee by virtue of the grant, if it contained the necessary words to effect that object? The only reason that has been or can be urged is that from the nature of such contemplated future interest or right, any grant, or conveyance of it, must, notwithstanding any possible covenants of warranty or further assurance, necessarily be deemed an executory, and not an executed contract. Now, can it be contended that the intent, object and purpose of this clause, in the 18th section of this act, was simply to convert an executory into an executed contract? Could any object or purpose, more foreign from the sense conveyed by the words used in the clause, be imagined? This effect is attempted to be given to the statute under the name of construction. Nothing of the kind is to be found in its language. The court is asked to intend, independently, I may say with truth, in defiance of the language, that such was the subtle, metaphysical intent of congress, and that the words used express such intent.

But the proposition of the learned counsel, that no form of conveyance of such extended term, before it was obtained, could operate so as to vest the legal title thereto in the grantee after it is obtained, is wholly unsound. Suppose a patentee had, prior to 1836, granted by deed his entire right and title to his patent, and all the benefit secured thereby, and all that he might thereafter acquire in a certain specified territory, and had covenanted in the conveyance, that in case the patent should in any manner be renewed, extended or prolonged, all the right and title to such renewed, extended or prolonged term of such patent, and all the benefits thereof, should enure to, and vest in, the grantee, to the extent of his territory; after which an act should be passed similar to what the 18th section of the patent act would be, excluding the clause in question, under which the patentee should obtain an extension of his patent for seven years. Could the patentee, in direct opposition to the covenants in his grant, maintain a suit at law against his grantee, for using or vending the thing patented within his territory, after the commencement of the renewed term? Would the grantee be driven to a court of equity for relief in such a case? Could the patentee in any manner, by the judgment of any court governed by the rules of law or equity, deprive his grantee of the benefit of the renewed term? Certainly a court of equity would not sanction any such attempt. Then suppose he brings his action at law against his grantee, for a violation of the patent during the extended term, would not that covenant of the patentee be a conclusive defence to such an action? How could it be otherwise? Would such subsequent law of congress cancel or annul such a contract, or so far affect it, as to make a resort to equity by the grantee necessary for his relief? Congress has no power to pass a law that would so affect existing contracts.

At the time the act of 1836 was passed, there was no statute or law authorizing an extension, renewal or prolongation of a patent, beyond the original term of fourteen years. When, therefore, congress made the provision that the benefit of such renewal should extend to assignees and grantees, could they have meant assignees and grantees of the renewed term? Is it at all consistent with sound reasoning, to suppose that congress, by the terms "assignees" and "grantees," meant assignees and grantees of a future possible interest in the patent, after the expiration of the original term; assignees and grantees who, as the counsel claiming this construction insists, could not, from the nature of things, have any existence; and when, in fact, such an assignment or attempt at such an assignment, was extremely rare; while on the other hand, assignments and grants, and assignees and grantees of the original patent, or of some interest therein, were as common as the patents themselves? These, I submit, are insuperable objections to the construction of the clause in question, contended for on the part of the plaintiff, while the construction claimed by us, follows from the grammatical construction and meaning of the words in which the clause is expressed.

The term "therein" obviously refers to the phrase, "the thing patented," so that if all that is grammatically understood, were expressed, the clause would read thus: "and the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented, to the extent of their respective interest" in the thing patented. The word "therein," as used in the clause, is a relative term, and is used to obviate the repetition of the phrase, "in the thing patented." This, I submit, is the plain grammatical construction of the sentence. What, then, is the thing patented? Clearly the exclusive right to make, vend and use the thing invented or discovered. If, as in this case, the invention consists in the discovery of a machine, the thing secured by the patent, and consequently the thing patented, is not the machine itself, but the exclusive right to make, vend and use that machine. An assignment or grant by the patentee of the whole of such exclusive right, for a specified territory, vests in such assignee or grantee all the right and property of the patentee, in and to such exclusive right, to the extent of such territory. The extent of the interest of such assignee or grantee is limited by the territory to which the grant or assignment is confined. Therefore, the extent of the interest of such assignee or grantee in the thing patented, to which the benefit of such renewal extends, is the extent of the territory, in and over which he has, by the terms of his assignment or grant, such exclusive right.

It is insisted, that the word "extent," used in the clause, applies to duration of interest as well as to extent of territory. Metaphorically or poetically, the word "extent" is sometimes used to express duration; but it is never so used in a professional sense or in common parlance. The term used by property lawyers and conveyancers, to express the duration of interest in an estate, is "quantity." "The term for which the right of enjoyment is to continue, forms the quantity of the estate." 1 Prest. Est. 21. No writer on property has ever used the word "extent," or "extent of interest," to designate the time of enjoyment. In common parlance, the word "extent" is rarely, if ever, used to denote duration. Extent of one's interest or property in a town—extent of one's plantation or farm—extent of dominion—extent of a road or river—designate space and not time. If any person were to enquire as to the extent of the interest of a grantee or assignee in a patent, every one would understand the inquiry to be, whether the grant or assignment was of the whole patent, or of a part, and of what part. No one would understand such an inquiry to relate to the duration of the interest. No definition signifying duration, is given to the word "extent," by the best lexicographers. Walker defines it to mean—"space or degree to which a thing is stretched." Johnson—"space or degree to which a thing is extended." Webster, (first octavo edition,) defines it thus: "1st, space or degree to which a thing is extended; hence compass, bulk, size; as, a great extent of country, or of body; 2d, length; as, an extent of line; 3d, communication, distribution; 4th, in law; a writ of execution, or extendi facias." It is not to be presumed, at least it is not a legal presumption, that congress, in penning or framing this clause of the act, used any of the words employed for that purpose, in any other than their ordinary sense. The 18th section also declares, that upon the patent being so renewed, "the said patent shall have the same effect in law, as though it had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years." Is there anything in this language which authorizes, or in the least degree countenances the construction given it by the counsel for the plaintiff, that the renewed patent shall only have this effect quoad the patentee? Can a sentence expressed in such clear and unequivocal terms, be thus curtailed and restricted by any known rule of interpretation? I insist, not. The patent, when renewed, is to have the same effect in law, in all respects, and to every intent and purpose, as though it had, in the first instance, been issued for twenty-one years. By the express terms of the act, the renewal, by relation, makes it a patent for twenty-one years ab origine. One of the necessary effects in law of this is, that an assignment of all the patentee's interest in the patent, in any specified territory, would vest in the assignee the whole right to the patent for that territory, for the twenty-one years.

2. The construction contended for by the counsel for the plaintiff, would, if adopted, render the law unjust and invalid as to those assignees and grantees who had purchased their rights and obtained their grants or assignments, prior to the passage of the act of 1836. Such assignees and grantees, by virtue of their grants, acquired the right, as the law then stood, to use the thing patented in the manner specified in their grants or assignments, not only during the continuance of the original patent, but for all time to come; an exclusive right, during the existence of the patent, and a right in common with other persons after the expiration of the monopoly. Such, we have a right to assume, was their just expectation, which entered into the inducement to purchase, and which constituted a portion of the consideration for the price paid for the grant. No man would give so much for a business of any kind, which he might by law be compelled to relinquish in fourteen years, as he would if it could be continued at his pleasure. True, he would have no exclusive right after the expiration of the monopoly, but he nevertheless knew that after the expiration of the patent, he would have a common right, and would have the benefit of being in the market, with every necessary material and structure, to carry on the business. This to start with, at the expiration of the monopoly, would be no inconsiderable advantage; an advantage valuable in itself, to which he would be legally entitled, from having purchased and paid a valuable consideration for the right of placing himself in that position. The bare making of the thing patented, during the existence of the patent, ready to be used, would be a violation of the patent. No person but the patentee, or those deriving the right from him, could do so, with impunity. This advantage, independent of the large sum that must necessarily be invested in the business at the expiration of the patent, is a property—a right—vested in the assignee or grantee, by virtue of his grant, which congress has no power to impair, much less to take from him and bestow upon his grantor. A law which would impair, or take from a grantee rights, thus lawfully acquired, for the benefit of the grantor, would be unjust and invalid. Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 627, 657, 658.

The grantor, or his heirs or representatives, have no right to do, or omit to do any act, which would impair or injuriously affect any part or portion of the rights thus granted by him, and no such right could be vested in him, or his heirs or personal representatives, by any subsequent law. The fourth section of the act of 1793, under and by virtue of which the assignees and grantees of the patent in question acquired their rights, declares: "that it shall be lawful for any inventor, his executor or administrator to assign the title and interest in the said invention, at any time, and the assignee having recorded the said assignment, in the office of the secretary of state, shall thereafter stand in the place of the original inventor, both as to right and responsibility, and so the assignees of assigns, to any degree." By what rule of construction, can the word "thereafter" be held to mean any limited period? By the plain meaning of the language used, the assignee, to the extent of the right acquired by his assignment, is to all intents and purposes, and for all time, put in the place of the inventor, both as to right and responsibility. And yet the construction contended for by our adversaries, would require the word "thereafter" to be expunged from the section, and the words "during the existence of the patent" substituted in its place.

In the case of Herbert v. Adams [Case No. 6,394], it was held that an inventor who had assigned his invention, and afterwards took out a patent for it, could not maintain an action for an infringement of the patent. Mr. Justice Story said, that the patentee was estopped from claiming any right adverse to the assignee; that, although the assignment was made before the patent was obtained, yet the assignee, by force of the 4th section of the act of 1793, stood in the place of the inventor, both as to right and responsibility; and that the patent obtained by the inventor subsequent to his assignment, enured to the benefit of his assignee. Now, I ask, could congress pass any law which could, or would, at any period of time, re-invest in the inventor any right to such invention, without the consent of, and hostile to his assignee? And more especially, if congress should pass any law on the subject which did not, in the most explicit terms, declare such to be its object, would this court, by construction, give it that effect? By the 7th section of the act of 1839, it is enacted that every person who has or shall have purchased or constructed any newly invented machine, &c., prior to the application by the inventor or discoverer for a patent, shall be held to possess the right to use and vend to others to be used, the machine, &c., so made or purchased, without liability therefor, &c., but that the patent for such invention, if obtained within two years, shall not be held to be void by reason of such prior sale or use, &c. The only alteration of the law, made by this section, is, that the prior use or sale of an invention shall not render a patent subsequently obtained void, unless such prior use, purchase or sale has continued for more than two years prior to the application for the patent. In the case of McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 202, the defendant had used the invention four months before the inventor applied for his patent; and the question was, whether the use of the invention by the defendant after the patent was obtained, rendered him liable to an action for infringing the patent. The court held that the defendants had a right to continue to use the invention, notwithstanding the patent, without liability to the patentee or his assignee. Now, suppose this patentee should get his patent renewed or extended under the 18th section of the act of 1836, would such renewal give him any better or greater or other right, than he had by his original patent? Would persons who were not liable to him for an infringement of the patent before it was extended, be liable for the same or similar acts of infringement, after it was extended? By the 2d section of the act of the 3d of February, 1831, to amend the several acts respecting copyrights, an author may renew and continue his copy-right for fourteen years after the first term of twenty-eight years. Could an author, who had sold the original copy-right of his book to a publisher, acquire by a renewal of such copy-right, any right to prohibit such publisher from publishing or selling such book after the expiration of the first term? Suppose the work were so extensive, and the publication so expensive, that the publisher should deem it advisable to publish a very large edition in the first instance, a large portion of which (of the value of many thousands of dollars) should remain on hand at the expiration of the first term of the copy-right. Would a renewal of such copy-right by the author, entitle him to prohibit the sale of the books thus published? Clearly, such an interpretation of the second section of that act, would render it most manifestly unjust, and such a construction would be still more indefensible, if we suppose (to make the case more analogous) that this second section had been enacted after the publisher had purchased and paid for the original copy-right. A retroactive effect, injurious to existing rights, is never given to a statute by construction.

The very able and conclusive opinion of Chief Justice Taney upon this very question, in the case of Wilson v. Turner [Case No. 17,845], at the Maryland circuit, in December last, divests it of all doubt. After stating the construction contended for by the plaintiff in that case, which was the same as that now insisted upon, the learned chief justice remarks: "Now, if this be the construction of the act of congress, the provision in favor of assignees and grantees would seem to the court to be useless and nugatory. No one, we think, would suppose that the grant of this new right annulled all contracts made under the old one; and that giving to the patentee an additional term of seven years, would deprive purchasers of the right which they had acquired in the original term, before the renewal was granted. If the patentee had assigned all his right in a particular district or state, for and during the whole fourteen years, or even for a shorter period, surely that contract would continue binding upon him, notwithstanding he afterwards procured an extension of his patent, and congress could hardly have deemed it necessary to make a special provision for its protection. Certainly, according to this construction, the assignees or grantees would derive no advantage from the renewal. Yet the law clearly intended that they should share in the benefit conferred on the patentee, and have some advantage from the extension of the patent for seven years. For it provides, in express terms, that the benefit of the renewal shall extend to them; thus using a word which shows that it was not the intention of the legislature merely to protect interests which previously existed in assignees and grantees, but to give them a share in the benefit conferred on the patentee by the renewal of the patent. Moreover, assignees who had purchased the title of the patentee in particular states and territories, and individuals who had paid for the right to use the invention during the original period of the monopoly, might have suffered serious injustice by the grant of a new and further term to the patentee, unless they also were embraced in it, and they would, therefore, very naturally and properly be the objects of protection. For, in cases like the present, where the patent was issued and the purchaser obtained his assignment before the passage of the act of 1836, both parties must have understood that the exclusive right of the patentee for its whole period was transferred, and that at the expiration of the fourteen years the assignee would have the right to use the invention without interruption, and without paying the inventor any further compensation. The object of the clause in question in the act of congress, is to preserve the contract in the sense in which both parties understood and intended it at the time it was made, and to secure to the purchaser the right which he intended to buy, and supposed he had bought, and which the patentee must have intended to sell, and, at the time of the contract, must have supposed he had sold. Indeed, the power of extension given by the act of 1836, would have operated most unjustly upon those who had purchased the right to use a patented machine, if it had not been accompanied by a provision for their protection. For, relying on the assurance given by the law, as it stood when the contract was made, that they had purchased for the whole period of the monopoly, and that they might lawfully continue the use of the invention after the expiration of the fourteen years, many grantees, after having obtained the assignment or grant from the patentee, had undoubtedly erected costly machinery, and encountered expenses which they would not have incurred, if they had supposed it would be in the power of the patentee to forbid the use of his invention after the term limited by his original patent; and if, with these expenses incurred and arrangements made for the continued use of the improvement, congress had passed the law of 1836 without this provision in favor of assignees and grantees, it would have enabled the patentee to deal with them most severely and oppressively, and to exact from them a far heavier sum for the extended term of seven years, than they would have been willing, under other circumstances, to have given for the original term of fourteen." After further illustrating and demonstrating the correctness of this construction, and answering the arguments urged against it, the learned chief justice concludes: "Besides, the words of the law appear to us to admit of no other interpretation than the one we have given. It declares that the benefit of the renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the thing patented, to the extent of their respective interest therein. Now, what benefit have they in the renewal, if they are excluded from the use of the thing patented during the whole of the renewed term. According to that construction of the law, so far from receiving a benefit, they would be subject to loss; they would not even enjoy the right which they supposed they had bought, but would be compelled, at the expiration of the fourteen years, to stop the works they had constructed, at whatever loss it might occasion, unless the patentee gave them leave to proceed. Yet the law, in plain terms, declares that they are to derive an advantage from the extension, and that the benefit of the renewal shall extend to them according to their respective interests. In other words, it means to provide that assignees and grantees shall share with the patentee the benefit of the renewal, according to the interest which they respectively acquired in the thing patented within particular districts of country, or for their own individual use."

The learned counsel for the plaintiff has urged, as an answer to this argument, that there are many inventions which do not require the erection of costly machinery, or an encounter with great expense; and he instanced an invention for combining colors, in which case the loss of capital invested in machinery, must at most be very trifling. I will not say that such an argument is absurd, but, surely, it must derive its whole force, it must be exclusively indebted for whatever consideration it may command or receive, wholly and entirely to the source whence it emanated. What is it? The gentleman contends for a construction of this act, which will exclude from its provisions persons expressly included in its language. We resist this construction, and, as one reason against it, show to the court the gross injustice it must inevitably work in the case pointed out. To this the learned counsel answers: There may be other cases where the injustice would not be so great or so apparent. If the construction contended for by the plaintiff would inevitably work injustice in a single case, it demonstrates such construction to be wrong, notwithstanding there may be other cases and other persons that would not be injuriously affected by such a construction.

It has also been urged that any citizen, when a patent is about to expire, may erect costly structures and machinery to use the invention after the monopoly shall have expired; and the question is asked: Why should not congress consider his case as favorably as that of the assignee? I suppose the difference between the case of an assignee who has purchased and paid the patentee for the right to make, use and vend the invention, and who has invested his capital in that business under a just and lawful expectation, which entered into the inducement to purchase, that he would have a right to continue in the business after the monopoly expired, and a person who, without such right, should invest his capital in the same business, is too obvious to require illustration.

If the interpretation of the plaintiff's counsel is adopted, it must inevitably deprive purchasers of the patented article for sale or for use, as well as assignees or grantees of the patent, of the right to vend or use the article purchased. Take the article of a stove for instance, an article of prime necessity, and for which hundreds of different patents have been obtained. Suppose a patentee, shortly before the expiration of his patent, should sell to a stove-dealer, a quantity of the patented stoves, or should sell a single stove to a person for his own use. The renewal of the patent would authorize the patentee to prohibit the sale in the one case, or the use of the stove in the other, after the expiration of the original patent. Any person who may have purchased the patented article from the patentee, his assignee or agent, the day before the expiration of the original patent, be it ever so expensive, may the next day be prohibited from using it. A mere purchaser of the patented article for any purpose, cannot, perhaps, be deemed to be an assignee or grantee of the patent, or of any interest in it, or of any right secured by it, and is, therefore, not within the words of the clause extending the benefit of the renewal to grantees and assignees. But can it be supposed that congress ever dreamed, much less intended, to give a patentee, under any circumstances, the right to prohibit the use of the patented article which had been sold by him, or by his authority? Can it be maintained for a moment, that such would be the effect of the 18th section, even if the clause in question had not been inserted in it? The term "to use" is employed in the clause in question, in its most extensive sense, as it is in common parlance. "The right to use the thing patented" means the right to make any use of the thing patented, of which it is susceptible, and which is authorized by the grant or assignment. If the grant be only to make and sell the thing patented, the only use the grantee can make of the invention, is to make and sell the article invented. If the grant be of all the patentee's right to the invention within a specified territory, then the grantee can make any use of it which the patentee himself could. The verb "to use," in its general signification, means any employment or disposition of a thing. Loaning money, or purchasing property with it, is using it. Retailing goods is the use to which the shop-keeper or merchant applies that kind of property, while the consumption of it is the use to which the purchaser applies it. It has before been shown that the thing patented—the thing secured by the patent, is the exclusive right to the use of the discovery. Making and selling the article discovered, is as much an use of such exclusive right, as any employment or disposition of the article by the purchaser can be.

Another argument has been urged by the plaintiff's counsel which should not be passed unnoticed. It is contended that the constitution does not authorize any legislation on this subject, directly or indirectly, in favor of assignees, and, therefore, if the 18th section does, by its terms or effect, extend the benefit of such renewal to assignees, such provision is not authorized by the constitution, and is therefore void. To sustain this position, the counsel has cited 3 Story, Comm. § 1148. Upon this hypothesis, it is asserted that if the construction of this section is as is insisted by us, congress has undertaken to give the property of William Woodworth to his assignees, which it had no power to do. Now, it appears to me that this argument admits of a very plain answer. In the first place, although it is true that the constitution only authorizes congress to grant such exclusive right to authors and inventors, yet it is equally true that congress has power to annex any terms or conditions to the grant of such exclusive right, that it may deem proper. Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 591. 663. It was entirely competent for congress to annex any terms or conditions to the renewal of a patent that it might deem proper. The patentee can accept of the renewal on those terms or not, as he may choose, but he can only have such renewal subject to those terms and conditions whatever they may be. In the case of Wilson v. Turner before referred to, the court say: "The legislature, obviously, we think, intended to guard the party who had purchased from the patentee the right to use his invention until the expiration of his exclusive privilege, from the necessity of buying it again; and when they were giving to the patentee a new privilege, and one which he had no legal right to demand, they had undoubtedly a right to annex to it such conditions and limitations, as in their judgment, justice required."

In the next place, it is an utter misconception, if not a perversion of the facts, and of the rights of the parties, to say that if the construction contended for by us be correct, it would be giving the property of the patentee to his assignee. The patentee had no legal or equitable claim to an extension of his patent, at least before this law was passed. The law created a new right, if it be a right, which had no existence before. In creating this right, congress was bound to protect the interests of the grantees and assignees of the patentee; and the clause in question simply and only protects the assignees against any future exaction of the patentee under the new right gratuitously bestowed upon him. Instead of giving the property of the patentee to his assignees, it only protects assignees and grantees in the enjoyment of the rights which they have purchased of the patentee. Without such a provision expressed or implied, the law would be justly obnoxious to the objection, that it deprived assignees and grantees of rights acquired by grant from the patentee, for the benefit of their grantor.

The Commentaries of the late Mr. Justice Story, in no manner favor the views of the learned counsel. The monopoly act of 21 James I. c. 3, authorizes patents to be issued to persons who shall introduce into the kingdom any new manufacture, &c., as well as to inventors. Our constitution authorizes congress to secure the exclusive right to authors and inventors only, to their respective writings and discoveries. In the commentaries referred to, Mr. Justice Story is discussing the policy of the provision in our constitution, excluding introducers of new works and discoveries. The language of the learned commentator, referred to as authority against us, is this (section 1148): "The power, in its terms, is confined to authors and inventors; and cannot be extended to the introducers of any new works or inventions;" clearly having no reference whatever, as to whether the constitution did or did not authorize congress to enact any provision for the protection or benefit of the grantees or assignees of inventors or authors. Besides, congress, upon the literal construction of the constitution insisted upon by the counsel for the plaintiff, would have no more power to authorize the issuing or renewal of a patent in favor of the executor, administrator or heirs of a patentee, than in favor of his assignees, grantees or creditors.

V. The fifth question is so intimately connected with the second, that I beg leave now to present such considerations as have occurred to me in relation to it. I assume that the discussion of the second question has demonstrated, that a renewal or extension of the patent under the 18th section, enures to the benefit of the assignees and grantees of the patentee. That section does not contemplate or authorize the renewal of a patent, unless the patentee can, to some extent, be benefitted by it, without injury to his assignees or grantees. If this be true, it necessarily follows that a patentee who has parted with his entire interest in the invention, is not within the spirit and intent of the 18th section. I have already shown that where a patentee assigns his discovery before obtaining his patent originally, he is not entitled to a patent for his own benefit, and if he do afterwards obtain a patent, it will enure to the benefit of the assignee. Suppose the case of a patentee who has, in clear and unequivocal terms, and for a valuable consideration, granted his entire interest in his invention and patent, future as well as present, so that the benefit of any extension or renewal must, by force of the grant, enure to the grantee. Would the patentee, in such case, be within the provisions of the 18th section? Clearly not; unless that section authorizes a renewal from which the patentee can derive no benefit whatever. Clearly, such renewal could not reinvest the patentee with any right or title to the discovery, in direct violation of his grant.

III. The third question is: Whether by legal operation and effect of the assignment from Woodworth (the patentee) and Strong, to Twogood, Halstead and Tyack, on the 28th of November, 1829, and the covenants therein contained, the benefit of the renewal of said patent enures to said assignees, to the extent of the territory specified in said assignment. This question is presented on the hypothesis that the assignee is not entitled to any benefit of the renewal, or to any interest in the extended term, unless it is secured to him by the terms or legal effect of his assignment. Such, we insist, is the legal effect of the assignment in question. Upon this point I hope to establish, to the satisfaction of the court, the following propositions: (1) That all the interest which William Woodworth had in and to said invention in November, 1829, and all the right, property, and interest therein, which he contemplated thereafter acquiring, or might thereafter acquire, could be legally passed or transferred by grant or assignment, with proper granting terms therein used for that purpose. (2) By the assignment or grant in question, all the interest, right, and property, which the patentee then had, or which he might thereafter acquire, to the exclusive right to said invention, was transferred to the said assignees or grantees, to the extent of territory embraced in said grant or assignment. (3) But if the property thereafter to be acquired by the patentee in the exclusive right to said invention, by a renewal of his patent therefor, were not such a property as could legally be passed, or transferred by grant, then we submit that the covenants contained in said assignment, operate by way of estoppel, to transfer such future interest to said assignees, the moment it is acquired by the patentee or those representing him.

1. As to the first proposition, it is contended on the part of the plaintiff, that at the time of the assignment (1829) the patentee had not such a property in or right to the renewed term, as could pass by assignment; that there was nothing in esse upon which an assignment or grant could operate. Were it necessary for me to controvert this doctrine, I would refer the court to the argument of the same learned gentleman, upon the first question presented; where, it will be recollected, he labored with equal zeal to establish a diametrically opposite doctrine. It was necessary for his purpose then, and he attempted to prove that the interest of the patentee in this future contingent right of renewal, was a chose in action; such a right to property as would, by operation of law, vest in the administrator, and might be enforced by him. I admit I could not see anything like plausibility in that argument. The possibility of obtaining a patent by a patentee, was as mere a possibility in 1839 when the patentee died, as it was in 1829 when he made the assignment. The act of 1836 did not invest the possibility of obtaining a renewal of a patent under it, with any more of the characteristics or attributes of property or right to property, than it had before. A possibility is not changed to a right, nor does it approach nearer to a right, by a change of probabilities in its favor. Nevertheless, unsound as I deem that argument to be, unless the court adopt it, there can be no pretence of authority for the renewal of the patent in favor of the administrator. It is, therefore, only upon the supposition that the court may, by possibility, hold the right of the patentee to apply for a renewal of his patent, and the possibility of such application being successful, to be a right of property, which, upon the death of the patentee before making the application, will vest in his administrator, and constitute assets in his hands, that the present question becomes at all material. Should such be the decision of the court, it would establish the proposition for which I am now contending. Surely, it cannot be denied, that every species of property which would constitute assets in the hands of an administrator, may be sold and transferred by the decedent in his life-time. Whatever the law might once have been, it is now perfectly settled, that a chose in action, or any property of whatever description, may be assigned, and the rights of the assignee will be protected at law as well as in equity. A claim of any description upon the government, which would constitute assets in the hands of the administrator, is capable of being assigned by his intestate in his life-time.

But I do not controvert the present doctrine of the learned counsel. I admit now, what I attempted, (and I hope not without success,) to prove, in my argument upon the first question, that the liberty or power of the patentee to make the proper application for a renewal of his patent, and the possibility of such application being granted, is not property or a right to property, which would go to personal representatives. It is only a possibility; and although an assignment, purporting to convey only the present interest of the assignor, would not pass any after acquired right, into which such possibility might ripen, that by no means disproves the proposition now under discussion. Every future contingent right, even a bare possibility, may be barred by estoppel, or may be transferred by deed, with proper and apt words for that purpose, although it would not descend to heirs, or pass to personal representatives. An heir, during the life of his ancestor, has only a possibility in the estate of the ancestor; yet an assignment by deed or grant, from him to a third person, of all the interest he then had, or might thereafter acquire in such estate, with covenants for further assurance, would pass to the grantee whatever estate the grantor should thereafter acquire in the premises, at the moment he acquired it.

In this case, the patentee, at the time of the assignment, had a present tangible property in his patent. The patent, securing to him the exclusive right to his invention for fourteen years, was that species of property denominated in law an incorporeal hereditament. It is classed by the writers upon property, as a species of real estate. The patentee, at that time, also had the possibility of an extension or renewal of his patent for a further period. Congress had before renewed patents, and they might do so again, by special or general law. This was a possibility coupled with, attached to, and dependent upon, his present right and interest, and was grantable over. "A bare possibility, coupled with some present interest, is grantable over." Shepp. Prec. 252. If the grant or assignment contain either proper and apt words to transfer such possibility, as well as the present interest, or a present grant of the entire interest of the patentee in the invention, with covenants of warranty, or covenants to convey such future interest as the patentee might thereafter acquire, the patentee might thereafter acquire, the grantee or assignee would, by force of the deed, become vested with such future interest as the patentee might thereafter acquire, the moment he acquired it. An heir, entitled to an estate for years, the remainder in fee in his ancestor—the interest of the heir in the remainder is a mere possibility, not a right. Yet, if the heir should convey the whole estate with covenants of warranty, and for further assurance, or should convey his estate for years, together with his possibility in the remainder, or with covenants that his vendee should have the remainder, or so much thereof as he should thereafter acquire, his grantee, by force of the grant and the covenants, would be vested with the remainder the moment it became vested in the grantor. An inventor has no exclusive right to his invention before he obtains a patent for it. Yet if he assign his discovery, and afterwards acquires such exclusive right by obtaining a patent, such exclusive right immediately vests in his assignee, by force of the previous assignment. The same principle would vest any extension of such exclusive right in the assignee. In short, the simple question is: Has a patentee the power of transferring to another any possible future extension of his exclusive right? That he has such power, there is no ground for a reasonable doubt.

2. The assignment is by deed. It contains apt and appropriate words to convey and transfer all the interest which the patentee then had in his invention, or which he might thereafter acquire by a renewal of his patent. The assignment is of all the right and interest of the patentee in the patent, in the territory therein specified, (the county of Albany being a part of such territory,) to have and to hold the rights and privileges granted for and during the term of fourteen years from the date of the patent. The assignors then covenant that any improvement in the machinery, or alteration or renewal of the patent, shall enure to the benefit of the assignees, and may be applied and used by the assignees, within their territory thereinbefore designated. It is clear, from the words used, that the patentee intended to grant, and supposed he was granting, and the assignees supposed they were receiving, a conveyance, not only of the right of the patentee to the original term, but also to any renewed term of the patent, should such renewed term be obtained. The intention of the parties must govern in this as well as in any other case of contract, unless, indeed, the whole law of contracts, as well as every rule for the construction of statutes, is to be overturned for the benefit of the plaintiff in this cause. Woodworth's interest in the patent, in the territory embraced in the assignment, was his entire interest, to the extent of that territory, in the invention patented. The term "patent," as used in this assignment, includes the invention, or thing patented. Webst. Pat. 1. The patent was his title to the exclusive right to his invention; the whole of that right is conveyed to the assignees, with an express covenant, that if the patent, securing that exclusive right, should be renewed, such renewal should enure to the benefit of the assignees, and that they might apply and use such renewed patent within the territory specified in their assignment.

3. If the court should be of opinion that the right to the renewed term could not, from its nature, pass with the then present right of the patentee, still there can be no doubt that the covenants in the assignment operate by way of estoppel to transfer the after acquired interest, by such renewal, to the assignee, the moment such renewal was obtained by the assignor or his representatives, without any other or further conveyance. Mr. Sheppard, in the Touchstone (volume 1, p. 182), says that the effect of such covenants is to transfer all the present and future rights of the covenantor at once to the covenantee. Mr. Preston, in his edition of the same work, says, that such covenants operate, by way of estoppel, to transfer any after acquired right, to the grantee. The grantor and his heirs being estopped, by his covenants, to assert any after acquired right, such right necessarily enures to the benefit of the grantee. No subsequent conveyance is necessary; the covenants operate as a conveyance. The doctrine must be familiar to the court. Where a grantor, without title, or with a title for years or for life, conveys in fee, with covenants of warranty and further assurance, and afterwards acquires the fee, the after acquired right enures, by force of the covenants, to the grantee, without any further or other assurance. This doctrine is not peculiar to real estate. Where the mere bailee of a chattel, without title, sells it absolutely, and afterwards acquires the title to it from the owner, he cannot assert this after acquired title against his vendee. Mr. Sheppard, in the Touchstone (volume 1, p. 161), says: "A covenant doth sometimes, also, make a transmutation of property and possession of things, as in case of a covenant to stand seized of land to uses; and in case where one doth covenant that another shall have a piece of land for five years, this is a good lease for five years. And in law, where one doth covenant with another, that if he pay him ten pounds such a day, he shall have all his cattle in Dale, or his lease for years he hath of of the manor of Dale; in this case, if he pay the money at the time, he shall have the property of the goods, and of the lease for years."

It is urged that the covenants in this assignment are executory, and therefore a subsequent conveyance is necessary to transfer the title to the assignee. In all the cases I have referred to, the covenants were executory. A covenant of warranty, a covenant for further assurance, and the covenants in the several cases just referred to in Sheppard's Touchstone, are all executory covenants, and yet they all operate either as a conveyance or by way of estoppel, to transfer the title to the property, without any other or further assurance. The doctrine contended for by the plaintiff would work the greatest injustice, and be productive of the greatest mischief, in the most common affairs of life. Suppose a person entitled to a chattel for fourteen years, sells his interest in it, with a covenant that all the right he should thereafter acquire to it, should enure to the vendee, and the vendor should afterwards acquire a further right for fourteen years; could he, after the expiration of the first fourteen years, reclaim the chattel from his vendee, or maintain any action at law against him for it? Would not the covenant be a complete defence to any such claim? Would it be any answer to such defence, that no further conveyance had been made by the vendor? In the case of Cartwright v. Amatt, 2 Bos. & P. 43, this doctrine was applied to a covenant contained in an assignment of a patent. In that case, A., by indenture, (reciting that a suit was pending between him and B. respecting certain patents, and that the same could not be assigned without hazard of defeating the suit,) granted absolutely the said patents, with others, to C., excepting, however, from the grant, until the determination of said suit, such patents as should be necessary to support his, (A.'s), title. Then followed a covenant that A., upon the determination of the suit, should assign the excepted patents to C., and that, until such assignment, A. should stand legally possessed of such excepted patents. It was held that the legal interest in the excepted patents, vested in C., upon the determination of the suit, without any other or further assignment.

A grantor in fee with covenants of warranty, or for further assurance, who at the time of the grant has no title, but afterwards acquires one, is deemed in law, quoad his grantee, to have had the title at the time of his grant or conveyance. Hence, no other or future conveyance is necessary to vest his after acquired interest in his grantee. This is precisely the position in which the 18th section of this act places the patentee, upon obtaining a renewal of his patent. "And, thereupon," (upon the renewal,) "the said patent shall have the same effect in law as though it had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years." Does it not necessarily follow, from the terms of this section, as well as from the principles of law applicable to such covenants, that the assignment in this case has the same effect, as though the patent had originally been issued for twenty-one years instead of fourteen years?

It has, however, been urged with great earnestness, that the habendum clause in this assignment restricts the grant and the covenants, to the period of fourteen years. "No matter," says the learned counsel, "what the parties may be supposed to have stipulated for, and even though a right to an extension might have passed under the general words, yet those words are controlled by the habendum, and restricted to fourteen years." It seems that the legal effect of the habendum clause in grants must be directly reversed for the benefit of this meritorious plaintiff. The habendum may sometimes enlarge, but it never restricts a grant. Mr. Preston says, the habendum is a formal and not an essential part of a deed. Where the habendum is inconsistent with the grant, the grant and not the habendum will operate. As a grant to A. and his heirs, habendum to A. for life, or for years, the grant will operate, and the habendum be rejected as repugnant to it. So, if a man grant rent, or common, &c., out of his land, by the premises of the deed to one and his heirs, habendum to the grantee for years, or for life, the habendum is repugnant, for a fee passeth by the premises, by the delivery of the deed; and, therefore, the habendum for years or life is void. 3 Prest. Abst. 43, 45; Baldwin's Case, 2 Coke, 22b. Whatever interest, therefore, the patentee had in his invention and patent, beyond the term thus secured by the patent, whether contingent or merely possible, being coupled with and incident to his then present interest as patentee, passed by the assignment, notwithstanding the habendum. Besides, the covenants expressly assure to the assignees any future interest that the patentee may acquire by a renewal of his patent. Whatever effect the habendum may have on the granting clause, it can have none whatever upon those covenants.

But it is contended, that inasmuch as there was no general law for the renewal of patents at the time of this assignment, the parties cannot be supposed to have provided, or intended to provide, for an extension of the patent; that the term "renewal" does not mean an extension of the patent, and is, therefore, inappropriately used in the 18th section; and that it must be deemed in law to have reference to a new patent being issued in consequence of the original patent being void for some cause which would, as the law was then understood to be, authorize the issuing of a new patent for the same invention, for the residue of the term then unexpired, for which the original patent was issued. Such a construction of the covenants in this assignment, would not only render the covenant giving to the assignees the benefit of any renewal of the patent, wholly nugatory and inoperative, but would pervert and change the known and well established effect and signification of the word "renew." At the time this assignment was made there was no statute authorizing a new patent to issue, in case the first should turn out to be void from mistake, nor any general statute authorizing the renewal of a patent. But in the case of Morris v. Huntington [Case No. 9,831], tried at New York, in April, 1824, where the patentee had taken out two patents for the same invention, the specification in the first patent not having sufficiently described the improvement, but still the first not having been vacated, it was objected that the second patent was void for that reason, and Mr. Justice Thompson held the second patent, (for the violation of which the suit was brought,) to be void for that reason. But he remarked, in making that decision, that he saw no insuperable objection to entering a vacatur of the first patent, of record in the department of state, if taken out inadvertently, and that upon such surrender or vacatur of the first patent, the secretary of state might issue a new one (not renew the old one) for the residue of the term of fourteen years from the date of the first patent; but expressed some doubts, whether this could be done solely at the instance of the patentee. In January term, 1832, (nearly three years after this assignment,) the case of Grant v. Raymond, came before the supreme court, on a certificate of division upon this very point, and the court held (6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 218, 240-244) that the secretary of state might receive a surrender of the first patent, and cancel the record thereof, and issue a new patent with a corrected specification, for the same invention, for the residue of the term of fourteen years, where the first patent was void in consequence of a defective specification arising from inadvertence or mistake, and without any fraud or misconduct on the part of the patentee; that such issuing of a new and valid patent, was only a due execution of the power conferred by the first section of the act of 1793; and that an abortive attempt to execute that power by inadvertently issuing a void patent, whether such inadvertence was imputable to the patentee or to the secretary, was no impediment to a due and valid execution of it subsequently. At the time, therefore, that the assignment in question was made, it was very doubtful whether a new patent could be issued, where the first patent was void for a defective specification.

But suppose that principle of law had been well settled, it would require no covenant in an assignment, to give the assignee the benefit of such new patent. If a patentee should assign his exclusive right to use the invention in a specified territory, without any covenants, or should sell one of his patented machines, and his patent should afterwards turn out to be void, in consequence of his own mistake or inadvertence in framing the specification, and he should, for that reason, obtain a new and valid patent for the same invention; will any one contend, that he could deprive his assignee of the right to use the invention according to the assignment, or prevent the individual to whom he had sold one of the patented machines from using it? Certainly, no such doctrine can find a place in the law or equity of this or any other civilized country. The patentee sells his exclusive right to his invention, as a valid exclusive right. If it be invalid for a defect, arising from his own inadvertence, which he can supply and does supply, and he obtains a new patent, effectually securing the same exclusive right to the same invention, and for the same term for which the invalid patent was issued; can it be pretended that that exonerates him from his assignment of the exclusive right to use the same invention for the same term? Could he maintain an action against his assignee, for using such exclusive right, after the valid patent had issued? Surely, such a principle could not be gravely insisted upon. It cannot, therefore, be determined as matter of law, upon the face of this assignment, that the covenant in question was not intended to secure to the assignee the benefit of a new patent issued under such circumstances, unless the court determine as matter of law that the parties intended to make a covenant entirely useless, nugatory and inoperative; and that, the law never does presume or intend.

The proper philological signification as well as legal meaning of the term "renewal of the patent," as used in this assignment is, to "continue"—to "prolong"—to "extend." Renewal of a lease, of a contract, of a policy of insurance, of a note, of a bond, &c., means to prolong—to extend. The term "renew" is not applicable to the making of a new thing, as a substitute for a void thing. The renewal of a thing ex vi termini presupposes the prior existence of the thing renewed. It is renovating a thing which has expired, or is about to expire; while a new thing is a thing which did not exist before. Making a new thing is making a thing which did not exist before. Issuing a new patent in the place of a prior void patent, is in no sense a renewal of the void patent. It would be absurd to call the giving of a new lease, as a substitute for a prior void lease, a renewal of the prior lease. The terms "renew" and "renewal" are, therefore, appropriately used in the 18th section, to designate the extending and extension of a patent. In section two of the act of July 3d, 1832 [4 Stat. 559], concerning patents for useful inventions, the word "renew" is used as synonymous with "prolong." The 3d section of the act of 1832, and the 13th section of the act of 1836 [5 Stat. 122], provide for the issuing of a new patent in the place of an invalid patent. The word "renew" is not used; nor is the word "renew," or the terms "renewal of the patent," used in a single instance by the supreme court in [Grant v. Raymond], 6 Pet. [31 U. S.], or by the circuit court in Morris v. Huntington [Case No. 9, 831], when discussing the legality of issuing a patent in the place of a prior invalid patent. It is called, as it is, a new patent for the same invention and for the same term, as a substitute for and not a renewal of the former invalid patent.

It is useless to pursue this philological discussion further. It must be obvious, that the definition and meaning now attempted to be given to the word "renew," are forced and arbitrary, and contrary to the intention of the parties, and to the import of the word as understood by them, when this contract of assignment was entered into. If it can be supposed that there is anything ambiguous or equivocal, as to the sense in which the parties to this assignment used the term "renewal," the covenantor, or those who represent him, cannot be benefitted by it." "A covenant is always taken most strong against the covenantor, and most in advantage of the covenantee." Shepp. Touch. (1st Am. Ed., 1808) 166.

IV. The fourth question is, whether the plaintiff, claiming under the extension from the administrator, can maintain an action for an infringement of the patent-right within the territory specified in the contract of assignment to Twogood, Halstead and Tyack, against any person not claiming under said assignment; or whether said assignment be, of itself, a perfect bar to the plaintiff's suit. If I have been successful in the attempt to maintain my proposition in regard to the second and third questions, or either of them, nothing further need be said upon this question. If I have been unsuccessful in that attempt, nothing further can be said. If my construction of the 18th section of the patent act, or of the assignment to Twogood, Halstead and Tyack, be correct, it necessarily follows: 1st. That the plaintiff has no right or title to the exclusive use of the invention in question, in the county of Albany. That right is vested in others. 2d. Without such title, the plaintiff cannot maintain an action for an infringement of that right. The defendants are in the possession and enjoyment of the patented machine, in the county of Albany. This action is brought against them because they are in such possession and enjoyment. If the plaintiff has no title to the exclusive use of the patented machines in that county, it is idle to contend that he can maintain the action, because the defendants have no title. The defendants have a right to say, we are answerable to no one but him who has the title to the exclusive right.

VI. The sixth question is, whether the plaintiff, if he be an assignee of an exclusive right to use two of the patented machines within the town of Watervliet, has such an exclusive right as will enable him to maintain an action for an infringement of the patent within said town, or whether, to maintain such action, the plaintiff must be possessed, as to that territory, of all the rights of the original patentee?

Prior to the act of 1836, an action at law could not be maintained by and in the name of such an assignee. Whittemore v. Cutter [Case No. 17,600]; Tyler v. Tuel, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 329. The only provision of the law of 1836, which authorizes an assignee to maintain an action, is contained in the 14th section, and is in these words: "and such damages" (damages for the infringement of the patent) "may be recovered by action on the case, in any court of competent jurisdiction, to be brought in the name or names of the person or persons interested, whether as patentee, assignees, or as grantees of the exclusive right within and throughout a specified part of the United States." To entitle an assignee or grantee to maintain an action in his own name, for an infringement of the patent, he must, by the express terms of this section, be the assignee or grantee "of the exclusive right within and throughout a specified part of the United States." Is an assignee or grantee of a part only of the exclusive right within a specified territory, an assignee or grantee of the exclusive right? What exclusive right must the assignee have, to enable him to sue in his own name? Clearly the exclusive right secured by the patent, to the extent of the specified territory. The exclusive right cannot mean a part of the exclusive right.

The patentee, in this case, has an equal interest with the assignee or licensee, that no more than the two machines should be used in the town of Watervliet. For, although the patentee, after he had granted to another the exclusive right of using two machines in the town of Watervliet, could not lawfully use or authorize the use of any other machines in that town; yet the unauthorized use of more than two machines in that town, would prejudice the sale and lessen the value of the exclusive right to use the machine in other places. If such an assignee can be deemed to have any interest in the patent, it is a joint interest with the patentee; in which case, a suit might perhaps be maintained in the name of both, but clearly it could not be in the name of such assignee alone. He is not an assignee of the exclusive right; that is, of the whole of the exclusive right for that town, or any other specified part of the United States.

But I submit that a grant of the exclusive right to use two machines in a specified town or territory, is only an exclusive license to use such machines, and gives the licensee no right in the patent itself. In such case, the suit must always be brought in the name of the patentee, as the title to the whole patent is in him. A grant of the exclusive right to use two or more machines, in whatever form it may be made, is in legal effect only an exclusive license, and gives no title whatever to the patent, even if such exclusive license should be co-extensive with the patent. Protheroe v. May, 5 Mees. & W. 675. It necessarily follows, that a suit for an infringement of the patent under such circumstances, must be brought in the name of the patentee.

VII. The seventh question is: Whether the letters patent issued to William Woodworth, as administrator, on the 8th of July, 1845, upon the amended specification and explanatory drawings then filed, be good and valid in law; or whether the same be void for uncertainty, ambiguity or multiplicity of claim, or for any other cause. As to this question, it is submitted that the new patent issued to William W. Woodworth, as administrator, on the 8th of July, 1845, is void on the following grounds: (1) The said letters patent are not countersigned by the commissioner of the patent office, and there was no vacancy in the office of the commissioner, when said patent was issued. Vide sections 2, 4, 5, 13, of the patent act of 1836. (2) The said patent of July 8th, 1845, is for an improvement in machines for planing boards, and the specification² does not describe the machine upon which the invention patented is claimed to be an improvement, nor in any other manner specify in what the alleged improvement consists. Turner v. Winter, 1 Term R. 602, 605; Campion v. Benyon, 3 Brod. & B. 5; MacFarlane v. Price, 1 Starkie, 199; Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 454, and 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 356; Lowell v. Lewis [Case No. 8,568]; Barrett v. Hall [Id. 1,047]; Sullivan v. Redfield [Id. 13,597]; Dixon v. Moyer [Id. 3,931]. (3) The specification claims the invention to be of the machine or machines therein described, and not of an improvement upon any existing machine, while the patent is for an improvement in machines, which presupposes the existence of a machine upon which an improvement has been invented. The specification is, therefore, broader than the patent, does not support it, and the patent is therefore void. Sullivan v. Redfield [supra]; section 5 of patent act of 1836; Webst. Pat. 65, note b. (4) The specification describes and claims several distinct and separate combinations of tools or implements, each of which combinations is claimed as a separate machine, that may be operated separately; and also a combination of those several combinations into one machine. This multiplicity of claim renders the patent void. (5) The said new patent of July 8th, 1845 [6 Stat. 936], is not for the same invention for which the original patent was granted. (6) The patent is issued for a longer time than is authorized by law, and is also issued in trust for third persons, which is not authorized by law.

1. In regard to the first point, I submit, that unless a patent is issued, signed and countersigned by the officers designated by the statute, it is void. If it be not signed or countersigned by the proper authority, it is not a patent. The 5th section of the act of 1836, requires all patents to be signed by the secretary of state, and countersigned by the commissioner of the patent office. The 2nd execution of that act authorizes the chief clerk of the patent office to perform the duties of the commissioner during a vacancy in the office of commissioner. The same section also gives the chief clerk the custody of the seal, books, records and models of the office during the necessary absence of the commissioner, but only authorizes him to discharge the duties of commissioner, when that office is vacant. This patent is countersigned by the chief clerk, acting as commissioner, when the office of commissioner was not vacant. This, I submit, was wholly unauthorized, and the patent, not having been countersigned as required by the act, has no validity.

2. The objection to the validity of the patent, raised by the second point, it seems to me, is a matter of settled and positive law, if any question, which has been settled by repeated adjudications, can be deemed so. The patent shows upon its face, that it was granted for a "new and useful improvement in machines for planing, tonguing, and grooving, and dressing boards." It appears, also, upon the face of the patent, that that was the invention for which the patent was claimed. It will be seen, by reading the specification, that the improvement is in no manner whatever described. It describes how the machines are constructed and the manner in which they are to operate, but it does not describe the machine upon which the invention patented is claimed to be an improvement, nor in any other manner specify in what the alleged improvement consists. Sullivan v. Redfield; Dixon v. Moyer; Lowell v. Lewis; Barrett v. Hall.

The doctrine which I maintain, was, to its full extent, confirmed by the supreme court in the cases of Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 454, and 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 356. In the last case, at page 366, Mr. Justice Washington says: "The patent is for an improved hopper-boy, as described in the specification, which is referred to and made part of the patent." In the case at bar, the patent is for "a new and useful improvement in machines for planing, tonguing and grooving, and dressing boards, &c.,"—"a description whereof," (that is, of the improvement in the machines,) "is given in the words of the said William W. Woodworth in the schedule" (specification) "hereunto annexed, and is made part of these presents." Thus far the patent in this case is the same as in the case cited, a patent for an improved thing and for an improvement in a thing being the same; and, by pursuing the opinion of Mr. Justice Washington, and comparing the specification in this case, with that in the case cited, it will be seen, so far as it regards the question now under consideration, that the specifications in the two cases are identical, and that the same principle of law must govern both. After stating that the patent was for an improved hopper-boy, Mr. Justice Washington proceeds: "Now, does the specification express in what his improvement consists? It states all and each of the parts of the entire machine, its use, and mode of operation, and claims, as his invention, the machine, the peculiar properties or principles of it, viz: the spreading, turning, and gathering the meal, and the rising and lowering of its arm, by its motion, to accommodate itself to the meal under it. But does this description designate the improvement, or in what it consists? Where shall we find the original hopper-boy described, either as to its construction, operation, or use; or by reference to anything, by which a knowledge of it may be obtained? Where are the improvements on such original stated?" In the case at bar the specification states all and each of the parts of the several machines, and the mode of their operation separately, and jointly when combined as one machine. The summary or claim is then stated in the specification as follows: "Having thus fully described the parts and combination of parts, and operation of the machine for planing, tonguing, and grooving boards or plank, and shown various modes in which the same may be constructed and made to operate, without changing the principle or mode of operation of the machine, what is claimed therein as the invention of William Woodworth, deceased, is the employment of rotating planes, substantially as herein described, in combination with rollers, or any analogous device, to prevent the boards from being drawn up by the planes when cutting upwards, or from the reduced or planed to the unplanned surface, as described. And also the combination of the rotating planes with the cutter-wheels for tonguing and grooving, for the purpose of planing, tonguing and grooving boards, &c., at one operation, as described. And also the combination of the tonguing and grooving cutter-wheels, for tonguing and grooving boards, and at one operation, as described. And finally, the combination of either the tonguing or the grooving cutter-wheel, for tonguing or grooving boards, &c., with the pressure rollers, as described, the effect of the pressure rollers in these operations being such as keep the boards, &c., steady, and prevent the cutters from drawing the board towards the centre of the cutter-wheels, whilst it is moved through by machinery. In the planing operation, the tendency of the plane is to lift the board directly up against the rollers; but in the tonguing and grooving, the tendency is to overcome the friction occasioned by the pressure of the rollers."

Now I invite the learned counsel for the plaintiff to point out, and the court to ascertain and designate if it can, in what the improvement of the patentee in the machines for planing, tonguing and grooving and dressing boards, consists. What was the machine before it was improved? How did it operate? Of what cutter-wheels, or other tools or implements, was it composed? What has been added by the improvement? Where does the old stop, and the new begin? What was the previous combination, and how does the improved machine differ from it? To all these enquiries the same answer must be given, which was given by Mr. Justice Washington to similar questions put by himself, in the case of Evans v. Eaton. "The undoubted truth is, that the specification communicates no information whatever upon any of these facts." At pages 434, 435, of the case of Evans v. Eaton, in 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.], the supreme court fully agree with and confirm the doctrine of Mr. Justice Washington. Unless these and the other authorities cited in support of this point are overruled, this patent cannot be sustained. I need not, I trust, remind the court, that if the invention consists of a machine constituted by the combination of known implements, or by the combination of known machinery, the patent must be for the machine itself so constituted, and if taken out for an improvement upon or in machines, it cannot be sustained.

3. The third objection to the validity of this patent, rests upon a different, though somewhat analogous principle. It is a well established principle of law, in regard to patents, that the specification must not be broader than the patent; it must support the patent; if it fail to do so, the patent is void. If the patent be for an improvement in a machine, and the schedule or specification claims the machine which it describes, as the invention, or if the patent be for a machine, and the specification claim an improvement as the invention, in neither case does the specification support the patent, and it is, therefore, void. This principle is clearly deducible from the patent act, as well as from the adjudications on that subject. The 5th section of the patent act of 1836 provides, that "every patent shall contain a short description or title of the invention or discovery, correctly indicating its matter and design." In Webst. Pat. p. 65, note b, it is stated, that great accuracy is necessary in stating the description or title of the invention for which the patent is issued, in the letters patent; because if the invention, which is particularly described in the specification, varies from the description or title in the patent, the patent cannot be considered as having issued for the invention described in the specification, and will, therefore, be void. In Cochrane v. Smethurst, 1 Starkie, 205, the patent was for an improved mode of lighting cities; the specification described the invention to consist of an improved street lamp. It was held that the specification did not support the patent; that the invention described in the specification was not truly indicated by the description or title in the patent; and that the patent was therefore void. The description or title of the invention, as contained in the patent in this case, and for which the patent is issued, is, "a new and useful improvement in machines for planing," &c. This description necessarily presupposes the existence of a machine upon which an improvement has been invented, and that the invention for which the patent was issued, consists of such improvement. But the specification claims the invention to be of the machines therein described, and not of an improvement upon any existing machine. In the case of Sullivan v. Redfield, before referred to, Mr. Justice Thompson says: "This specification is obviously broader than the patent. The latter is for an improvement of the steam tow-boat, and the former contains a description of the steam tow-boat itself, of which the patentee claims to be the inventor, according to his specification. The patent and specification are connected together, and dependent on each other for support. The specification should maintain the title of the patent. The latter should not indicate one thing and the former another, as the subject of the grant."

But it is said by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, that the liberality of construction for which he contends, would authorize the court to hold, that this patent is for the machines described in the specification, and not for an improvement in machines. That is most undoubtedly true. His construction of statutes and of language, would not only authorize but require the court to hold, that this patent, although it is declared in express terms to be for an improvement in machines, is, nevertheless, not for an improvement, but for the machines themselves. There is, however, a slight objection to this liberality, or, to use a more appropriate phrase, to this liberty of construction. It is entirely at variance with all principle and every adjudged case on the subject.

4. The fourth objection to the validity of the patent is founded upon the multiplicity of claim. It has already been shown, by reading the specification, that it claims a separate and distinct combination of tools and implements, constituting a machine for planing; another combination of implements constituting a machine for grooving boards and plank; another combination for tonguing boards and plank; a combination of the two last machines, constituting another and a different machine, for both tonguing and grooving plank at one operation; and a combination of all these machines, constituting another and different machine, for planing, tonguing and grooving boards at one operation. These five separate and distinct machines, it is claimed, and, as appears by the specification, may be operated separately, producing separate and distinct results; not different parts of one complete manufacture at which the work must arrive before it can be used, but producing separate and distinct manufactures, each of which not only may be, but very frequently is used without the other. Many boards and plank are required to be planed only, the use to which they are to be applied not requiring them to be tongued and grooved; and many are required to be tongued and grooved which are not required, for the uses to which they are to be put, to be planed.

In the case of Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 454, 506, the supreme court manifested a very serious doubt—Mr. Justice Story said, a very significant doubt, which he was persuaded could not be removed—that several distinct inventions could not be embraced and secured in one and the same patent. When the question afterwards came before him in the case of Barrett v. Hall, he held, that if the patentee embraced several distinct improvements or inventions in the same patent, it would be void. In that case the patent was for “a new and useful improvement, being a mode of dyeing and finishing all kinds of silk goods.” The invention, as described in the specification, consisted of an improved reel and an improved silk-frame. The reel was used to wind and secure the silk and put it in the dye. The frame was for the purpose of extending and finishing the silk after it was dyed. The learned judge held, that if the specification claimed the reel and also the frame as the invention, the patent was void for multiplicity of claim, as containing two distinct machines, each of which might be operated separately and independent of the other. “A patent,” said he, “cannot embrace various distinct improvements or inventions; but in such case, the party must take out separate patents. If the patentee has invented certain improved machines, which are capable of a distinct operation, and has also invented a combination of those machines to produce a connected result, the same patent cannot at once be for the combination and for each of the improved machines; for the inventions are as distinct as if the subject were entirely different.” Unless the doctrine promulgated in this opinion of the circuit court is held to be unsound, the patent in the case at bar is void. Most certainly, planing boards, and tonguing and grooving boards, are much more separate and distinct operations, than those of dyeing and finishing silk. The latter are, to some extent, connected, and necessary to be performed upon the article before it can be used. Silk must at least be dried after it is dyed, before it can be used, and, in most instances, it is required to be finished before it is used, though it is sometimes used in its raw state, without receiving its gloss by being dressed. But a much greater portion of boards and plank are required to be planed without being tongued and grooved, and to be tongued and grooved without being planed, than are required to be planed, tongued and grooved. The operations of planing, tonguing and grooving boards and plank, are no more necessarily connected, or different parts of one and the same general operation, than the operations of making a garment, and of coloring and dressing the cloth of which it is made.

But it is said that this is but one invention, and that it was necessary for the patentee to claim the several machines as well as the combination of the whole, to prevent piracies of any part of the combination of the whole, because if the patentee had only taken out his patent for the combination constituting the machine to plane, tongue and groove at one operation, any person might, with impunity, use the planing, or tonguing, or grooving machine separately. If the objection to the patent, presented by this point, be correct in principle, this argument sustains, instead of disproving it. It shows that the operations of the several machines are separate and distinct, and are not the performance of parts of one and the same general connected operation. The patentee might have obtained a patent for each of the machines, and also a patent for a combination of the whole. In the case of Treadwell v. Bladen [Case No. 14,154], the patentee took out a patent for a combination of five parts, and afterwards took out a patent for a combination of two of them, which produced a part of the result obtained by the combination of the whole. It was objected that the first patent embraced the whole and all its parts, and therefore the last patent was void, because a patentee could not have two patents for the same invention. But the court held the two patents were not for the same invention—that a combination of the whole did not embrace each part, or a combination of two or any number of parts less than the whole, unless such combination would produce the same result, in the same manner, accomplished by the combination of the whole.

5. In discussing the fifth objection to the validity of the patent, I shall assume that the new patent, of July 8th, 1845, issued upon the surrender of the original patent, is not for the same invention for which the original patent was issued, as that proposition is embraced in and will be debated under the eighth question. If I am right in the assumption that the new patent is not for the same invention for which the original patent was issued, it is clearly unauthorized and void. The only authority for issuing the new patent is contained in the thirteenth section of the patent act of 1836. That section only authorizes a new patent to issue for the same invention for which the original patent was issued, in case the original patent is invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, and shall be for that reason surrendered and cancelled. If, therefore, an original patent is invalid for the reason mentioned in the act, and is for that cause surrendered and cancelled, a new patent can only issue for the same invention. If the new patent is not upon its face for the same invention, or if the corrected specification describes an invention different from that for which the original patent was issued, the patent would be unauthorized by the act and consequently void.

6. As to the sixth point: The new patent appears upon its face to have been issued to the administrator of the patentee, in trust for his heirs at law, for the term of twenty-eight years from the date of the original patent. This is wholly without authority. The thirteenth section of the act only authorizes the new patent to issue for the unexpired term for which the original patent was issued. If the patentee be dead at the time such new patent is issued, it may be issued to his executors or administrators; but it contains no authority for the issuing of such patent in trust for the heirs at law of the original patentee. The tenth section authorizes an original patent to be issued to the executors or administrators of an inventor in trust for his heirs at law or devisees, in case the inventor dies after having made the discovery and before obtaining a patent. But in no other case is a patent authorized to be issued in trust for the heirs at law of the inventor. Nor is there any authority for issuing a patent in any case for twenty-eight years. It is said the original patent was extended under the eighteenth section for seven years, and by the act of 1845 for seven years longer, making a period of twenty-eight years from the date of the original patent. But this is no answer to the objection. The exclusive right secured by the original patent, may, by law, continue for twenty-eight years, and still, the commissioner of patents has no authority to issue a patent for that period. That depends entirely upon the fact, whether any such authority is given by the statute. The act of 1845, although it extends the original patent of 1828 for seven years from December, 1849, yet gives no authority whatever to the commissioner of patents or to any other person to issue a new patent for any period. Nor, is the extension granted by that act, in trust for, or for the benefit of, the heirs of the patentee. In both these respects, therefore, the commissioner of patents has exceeded his power, and the patent is for that reason void.

VIII. The eighth question is: Whether the court can determine, as matter of law, upon an inspection of the said two patents, and their respective specifications, that the said new patent of the 8th of July, 1845, is not for the same invention for which the said patent of 1828 was granted. Whether the specifications of the two patents describe two distinct inventions materially different from each other, cannot perhaps be decided as a matter of law upon an inspection of those specifications. The testimony of experts might prove them to be different or the same. I do not, therefore, propose in this stage of the cause to raise any question as to the dissimilarity of the two inventions as described in the two specifications. But I insist, it appears upon the face of the two patents, that the new patent is not for the same invention for which the original patent was issued. The original patent states the invention for which it is issued, to be, "a new and useful improvement in the method of planing, tonguing and grooving plank and boards." The new patent states the invention for which it is issued, to be, "a new and useful improvement in machines for planing, tonguing and grooving boards, &c." These are manifestly different things. A method of planing, is not a machine for planing. The method of doing a thing is the manner, the modus operandi of doing it, and not the instrument by which it is done. It is the mode of operating with the machine, and not the instrument itself. There may be an improvement in the method of planing boards, without any improvement in the implements or machine with which that work is performed. So there may be an improvement in a machine for planing, without any improvement in the mode of its operation. They are not the same improvement or invention. A patent for the one will not embrace the other.

In the case of Cochrane v. Smethurst, 1 Starkie, 205, it was held that a patent for an improved method of lighting cities, was not supported by a specification describing an improved street lamp. The patent should have been for an improved street lamp; yet if an invention of an improved mode or method of lighting cities, and an invention of an improved street lamp, were the same thing, clearly the specification would have supported the patent. Two patents, one for an improved method of lighting streets, and the other for an improved street lamp, would not be for the same invention. A specification which would support the one, would not support the other. So in this case, a patent for an improved method of planing, and a patent for an improvement in a machine for planing, are entirely different. A specification which would support the one would not support the other. In the case of Barrett v. Hall, Mr. Justice Story says: "If the invention consist in a new combination of machinery, or in improvements upon an old machine to produce an old effect; the patent should be for the combined machinery, or improvements on the old machine, and not for a mere mode or device for producing such effects, detached from machinery." In Boulton v. Bull, 2 H. Bl. 463, Chief Justice Eyre, said that method was not a machine, but was the mode of operating, either with a machine or the hand of man; that it was a principle detached from all physical existence whatever; and that if it were new and useful and reduced to practice, it was patentable. In Barrett v. Hall, before cited, Mr. Justice Story concurs in this doctrine of Chief Justice Eyre. The authority and reasoning of these cases are decisive of the question.

IX. The ninth question is: Whether the decision of the board of commissioners, who are to determine upon the application for the extension of a patent under the eighteenth section of the act of 1836, is conclusive upon the question of their jurisdiction to act in the given case. It has already been shown, first, that this board is a tribunal of special and limited jurisdiction; and, secondly, that all acts and proceedings of such a tribunal, beyond the power specially given it, or in a manner different from that specially prescribed, are coram non iudice and void. It necessarily follows, that the decision of such a board, that it has jurisdiction, cannot give it jurisdiction. An adjudication, whether upon the question of jurisdiction, or any other question, which is void for the want of jurisdiction, is a mere nullity. There is no judge, and, therefore, no judgment; and so far from being conclusive upon the question of jurisdiction, it can have no effect whatever upon any question.

X. The tenth and last question is: Whether the commissioner of patents can lawfully receive a surrender of letters patent for a defective specification, and issue new letters patent upon an amended specification, after the expiration of the term for which the original patent was granted, and pending the existence of an extended term of seven years; or whether such surrender and renewal may be made at any time during such extended term. The only authority for issuing the new patent of 8th July, 1845, is given by the 13th section of the patent act of 1836. Whatever may have been the power of the secretary of state, prior to the law of 1836, by that law the authority to issue a new patent for the same invention, in a case where the original patent is void, is limited to, and can be exercised only in strict accordance with the power given by the 13th section of that act. The part of that section applicable to the present question, is in these words: "Whenever any patent which has heretofore been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall be inoperative, or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification as his own invention, more than he had or shall have a right to claim as new; if the error has, or shall have arisen by inadvertency, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, it shall be lawful for the commissioner, upon the surrender to him of such patent, and the payment of the further duty of fifteen dollars, to cause a new patent to be issued to the said inventor, for the same invention, for the residue of the period then unexpired for which the original patent was granted, in accordance with the patentee's corrected description and specification." This is a limited special authority, and must be strictly pursued. In exercising the authority conferred by this act, the commissioner is confined strictly to the power given him. "He can take nothing by implication, but must show the power to be expressly given in every instance." Jones v. Reed, 1 Johns. Cas. 20. The very authority to the commissioner to issue such new patent declares, in express terms, that such new patent shall be issued only "for the residue of the period then unexpired, for which the original patent was granted." This phraseology is an unequivocal exclusion of the period unexpired, for which the original patent may have been extended; or the unexpired period or term of a renewed patent.

Congress undoubtedly intended, that it ought to be and necessarily would be ascertained within the fourteen years for which the original patent was granted, whether it was or was not void, for any of the reasons specified in that section. This part of the section is an exact transcript of the third section of the act of 1832. It can mean no more or less now, than it meant then. Prior to 1836, a renewal or extension of the term for which the original patent was issued, was only granted by a special act of congress. The 3d section of the act of 1832 confines the power of the secretary of state to the issuing of a new patent for the unexpired term for which the original patent was issued, in case such original patent were void for any of the reasons specified in that section. Should congress, by act, renew a patent, without making any provision in the act for remedying defects in the specification, the secretary of state would have no authority, by virtue of the 3d section of the act of 1832, to supply such omission. In short, if congress, by the 13th section of the act of 1836, intended to provide for the issuing of a new patent for the unexpired term for which any original patent might have been or might be extended, it is clearly a casus omissus, and cannot be supplied by interpretation or construction. Dwar. St. 711.

I have now submitted to the court all the observations which have occurred to me as pertinent to the various questions presented; and although I am perfectly aware that the law has no respect to persons, yet so much has been said in the course of the argument, of a disparaging and somewhat vituperative character against assignees of patents, and laudatory of patentees, that I hope I may be pardoned, if, before I take leave of the subject, I remind the court that the plaintiff in this cause, as well as the defendants, is an assignee of the invention in question. The only difference in their characters or positions, as litigants, is, that the plaintiff is a subsequent assignee, with a full knowledge of the prior assignment, and the right claimed under it—certainly, therefore, in no sense, a bona fide assignee without notice—an assignee, too, who, we are at liberty to assume, has purchased the rights which he now claims, at a reduced price, in consequence of the claims of others under the prior assignment. It is in favor of rights thus acquired that this court is invoked to disregard the plain words, as well as the established rules for the interpretation of statutes—to put a limited, forced, and unnatural construction, against the covenantee, upon the words of the covenant contained in the prior assignment, under the specious, though, I insist, unfounded and illegal pretence, that this extraordinary departure from all law and all principle, is invoked "to foster genius and reward merit." Is inventive genius, however meritorious, to be fostered and rewarded at such an expense—at such a sacrifice?

The answers of the supreme court to the several questions certified will be found in 4 How. [45 U. S.] 687, 688.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 25, 1880.

EQUITY PRACTICE—BILL OF REVIVOR—REPRESENTATIVE OF DECEASED PARTNER.

In a suit in equity against the members of a firm a demurrer will not lie to a bill of revivor to bring in the representative of a deceased partner.

George B. Newell, for plaintiff.
Evaris, Southmayd & Choate, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The demurrer to the bill of revivor must be overruled. It is said in 1 Daniell, Ch. Prac. (4th Ed.) p. 269, that if there be a demand against a partnership firm all the persons constituting that firm must be before the court, and if any of them are dead the representatives of the deceased partners must be likewise made parties. Judge Story seems to be of the same opinion. Story, Eq. Pl. § 167, note 2, and Id. § 169. This rule certainly applies to equitable demands, such as that in this suit, and to cases of purely equitable relief, such as that prayed for in this bill. The cases of Van Reimsdyk v. Kane [Case No. 16,871], and Voorhis v. Child's Ex'r, 17 N. Y. 384, cited by the defendants, are not in point. In the first case the suit was to recover the amount of a bill of exchange suable at law. What the court says is that where the claim is suable at law against the surviving solvent partners equity will not lend its aid against the representative of a deceased partner unless the bill alleges the insolvency of the surviving partners. In the second case no different rule is laid down as being the law of New York. It was a suit at law on a promissory note to recover its amount against the survivors of the firm which made it and the executor of a deceased member of the firm, and the complaint was held bad on the demurrer of the executor because it did not allege any proceedings against the survivors, or that they were insolvent. Demurrer overruled.

[1 Blatchf. 536; 1 Fish. Pat. Rep. 361.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June Term, 1850.

PATENT FOR INVENTION—LICENSE TO USE—BREACH OF CONDITION—INJUNCTION—JURISDICTION OF PERSON.

1. A license to run a planing machine contained a restriction, that the licensee should not dress plank or other material for other persons, to be carried out of a specified territory and resold as an article of merchandise. The restriction was both a covenant by the licensee and a condition of the grant. Held, that under no circumstances could the planed article, with the privity or consent of the licensee, be sold out of the territory as an article of merchandise, or, with his privity or consent, be sold within the territory, to be carried out and resold as such article.

2. A provisional injunction would be granted against such licensee to restrain his use of the machine, if applied for during his violation of such restriction.

[Cited in Goodyear v. Congress Rubber Co., Case No. 5,565; McKay v. Smith, 29 Fed. 296; Hat Sweat Manuf'g Co. v. Porter, 34 Fed. 747; Boomer v. United Power Press Co., Case No. 1,638.]

3. But such injunction was refused, where it appeared that the licensee had violated the restriction under a misapprehension of his rights, and had discontinued the violation.

4. Where the alleged unlawful use of the machine was in Vermont, and the suit was brought in New-York, held, that for the purpose of restraining the use of the machine it was only necessary for the court to have jurisdiction of the person of the defendant.

5. This question was involved in the cases of Simpson v. Wilson, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 709, and of Wilson v. Simpson, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 109.

6. But, where it may be necessary to proceed directly against the machine itself, as in extreme cases of contumacy, or of fraudulent contrivance to evade an injunction, the proceedings must be instituted in the district in which the machine is located.

This was an application for a provisional injunction for an infringement of the Woodworth patent [for an "improvement in the method of planing, tonguing, and grooving, and cutting into moldings, or either, plank, boards, or other material, and reducing the same to an equal length and thickness," &c., granted to William Woodworth December 27, 1828, extending for seven years, from December 27, 1842, and reissued July 8, 1845].² The defendant Jehaziel Sherman resided at Ferrisburgh, Addison Co., Vt., and the defendant Cook at Whitehall, Washington Co., N. Y. The facts were these: On the 29th of September, 1846, the plaintiff, being assignee of the re-issued patent for the state of Vermont, for the congressional extension of seven years commencing December 27th, 1849 (see Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 661, 662), executed a license to Chauncey & Akin, to construct, use and vend during said term four Woodworth planing machines in the state of Vermont, within ten miles of Lake Champlain, excepting therefrom the county of Chittenden. The license was given upon the express conditions: (1) That the licensees should not plane plank or other material under the regular prices established by the mill-owners at Albany, Troy and New-York, as set forth in a tariff annexed to the license; (2) that they should not keep a depot for the sale of the manufactured products of the machines, beyond the limits of the territory assigned; or sell to others the products, to be carried out of said territory or sold as an article of merchandize; or dress plank or other material for other persons, to be carried out of said territory and resold as an article of merchandize.

On the 13th of November, 1846, Chauncey & Akin assigned all their interest and rights under the above license to the defendant Sherman. It appeared that he had been, since the beginning of May, 1850, and was now engaged in running two Woodworth machines in Vermont, within the assigned territory, at a place called Bascom's Mill, at the Elbow, adjacent to the town of Whitehall, N. Y. The mill was situated about half a mile from the head of the Champlain canal; and, since it had been in charge of Sherman, some 80,000 pieces of lumber had been planed there, and shipped through the canal to some of the principal markets in the state of New-York. The lumber thus planed and shipped belonged to the defendant William W. Cook, and was planed by Sherman under a contract, for a given price per foot. Cook had no interest in the mill or the machines, or in the running of them, and no connection with Sherman in the business of planing plank or other material, except as above set forth. The contract was completed about the 1st of July, 1850, and since then Cook had had no planing done at the mill, and no connection with it. The bill was filed June 27th, 1850.

George G. Sickles, for plaintiff.
Samuel Stevens, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. There is very little if any doubt, as the case stands upon the proofs before us, that one of the conditions annexed to the grant of the license to run the four machines, and under which the defendant Sherman is engaged in operating the two, has been violated; and that, according to its terms and spirit, all right and title to run the same have become forfeited. One of the conditions is, that the licensees shall not dress plank or other material for other persons, to be carried out of said territory and sold as an article of merchandize. The restriction is twice mentioned in the agreement; once, by way of covenant on the part of the licensees, and again, as a condition of the grant; and the above is the substance and effect of the limitation.

It was suggested on the argument, that if it should be made to appear that the lumber planed had been sold in the territory embraced within the license, then the purchaser could rightfully carry the same out of said territory, and put it into the market for sale, and resell it as an article of merchandize. We think not. The true meaning, in our judgment, of the restriction and condition is this, that under no circumstances shall the planed article, with the privity or consent of the licensees, be sold out of the territory as an article of merchandize, or, with their privity or consent, be sold within the territory, to be carried out and resold as such article. It may be sold for any purpose or use within the territory, except for the purpose of being carried out of it for sale as an article of commerce. In other words, the licensees have the market unconditionally of the territory covered by the grant, and also beyond it, for all purposes except that of sale as an article of commerce. The object of this restriction is obvious, when we take into consideration the fact that the territory within which the licensees are authorized to run the machines is situated in the neighborhood of an extensive lumber region, and at the head of navigation leading directly to the great marts for the sale of the article, namely, the cities of Troy, Albany and New-York. An unconditional grant to operate the four machines at the given locality, would have seriously interfered with those already licensed and in operation at these several cities.

It has been supposed that the sub-contract made by Chauncey & Akin with Sherman is more liberal than the principal one between them and Wilson. We think not. On the contrary, the legal effect of it is the same. But, were it otherwise, the result would not be changed, as the defendant could acquire no greater rights from Chauncey & Akin, than they possessed under the grant from the plaintiff. "Ille non habet, non dat."

There is nothing in the suggestion that Wilson has made himself a party to the sub-contract in a way to bind him, without regard to the principal one with Chauncey & Akin. Had this motion been made while the defendant Sherman was engaged in planing the lumber for Cook, we should have felt bound, as the case is presented before us, under our view of the grant to Chauncey & Akin, to have interfered and enjoined him, on the grounds that the license set up, not only did not authorize the use made of the machines, but that such use was in direct violation of it. It appears, however, that this use terminated on the 1st of July, 1850, the contract with Cook having then been fully completed, and has not since been renewed. This particular ground, therefore, for a preliminary injunction has failed, as no beneficial object would be attained in granting one.

It has been urged on the part of the plaintiff, that an injunction should be granted on the ground of the forfeiture of the license, the defendant Sherman having violated one of the express conditions upon which it was granted. We think that this would be too rigorous an exercise of the power of the court, under all the circumstances that appear in the case. Sherman seems to have labored under a misapprehension of his rights as derived from his agreement with Chauncey & Akin, and to have unwittingly entered into the agreement with Cook to plane the lumber in question. Under these circumstances, a compensation for the damages sustained, if it should turn out on the final hearing that he has been in the wrong, will afford the appropriate and fit remedy.

The grant has now been expounded, and the extent of his rights under the license, explained; and it is but just and reasonable to assume, that he will hereafter conform to the decision. If not, the plaintiff will be at liberty to file a supplemental bill, and move again, in case of a renewal of the violation of the condition in question, or of any condition annexed to the grant.

An objection has been taken by the counsel for the defendants to the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that the use of the machines complained of was in another judicial district, namely, in the district of Vermont. It is supposed that proceedings grounded upon any such use should have been instituted within that district. The objection, we think, is not well founded. Proceedings for the purpose of restraining the unlawful use of a machine are instituted against the owner or party concerned in the infringement, who is personally responsible for the violation. The offending machine is reached through the party legally accountable for the wrong, and without whose agency, directly or indirectly, there would have been no ground of complaint.

The eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 78) gives jurisdiction over the party, in the district whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ. The defendants come directly within this provision.

We agree, that in a case where it might become necessary to proceed directly against the machine itself, as it may be in extreme cases of contumacy, or fraudulent contrivance to evade an injunction, the proceedings must be instituted in the district in which the machine is located. Act May 20, 1826 (4 Stat. 184); Conk. Prac. 288. But it is otherwise where the court act simply upon the guilty party. This question was involved in the case of Simpson v. Wilson, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 709, and which was again before the supreme court at its last term. Wilson v. Simpson, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 109.

PATENTS — JOINT INVENTIONS — SURRENDER AND REISSUE—RES JUDICATA.

[1. When a reissue is asked, under the act of 1837, the old patent is surrendered by the free will of the owner, and the reissue operates de novo for the unexpired term. And in the case of a joint patent, therefore, the question of joint patentability is not res judicata, but is open to question, upon an application for a reissue.]

[2. A joint patent may be issued to two persons, where each has invented a distinct improvement on the same machine, the object sought to be attained being a unit, and the legal effect thereof is to vest in each of them a joint interest in both improvements.]

[3. Upon a surrender for reissue, the patentee or his assignee may make the reissue what he would have made the original, if he had known how, or if the office had permitted him to have it.]

On appeal from the decision of the commissioner of patents of the 20th of December, 1859.

DUNLOP, Chief Judge. This is an appeal by James G. Wilson from the decision of the commissioner, refusing to Wilson, as assignee, a reissue of the patent of Aikins & Felthousen of date the 5th August, 1851, with amended specifications and claims. An interference was declared by the office on the 15th April, 1859, between the application of Wilson, assignee of Aikins & Felthousen's patent of the 5th August, 1851, and the patent of I. M. Singer, dated the 12th August, 1851, reissued October 3, 1854, all relating to improvements in sewing machines. Wilson, as assignee, surrendered the patent of Aikins & Felthousen, under the 13th section of the act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 122] for reissue with amended description and claims. The invention at issue, in this interference, is one of the approved devices in the sewing machine, and the commissioner in his decision says: "The main feature in controversy is a feeding device, consisting of a wheel, with a roughened surface projecting a little above the surface of the table, and a spring pressure pad, between which the cloth to be sewed is placed, and moved automatically forward, to receive the stitches, so that seams of any desired length may be sewed either in straight lines or curves, at the will of the operator." The original specification, on which the original patent to Aikins & Felthousen was granted, relating to the feeding device, is in these words: "To the front end of the shaft, K, and within the circular shaped rest, W, is arranged a toothed feeding wheel, the teeth of which project sufficiently far through a slot in the top of said rest, W, to catch the cloth, and feed it under the needle, as said toothed feeding wheel is turned, by the operation of the pawl and rag wheel, before described; said feeding wheel running right or left, as the pawl may be set working, carrying the cloth in either direction."

The original fourth claim (struck out by the office) in the original patent of Aikins & Felthousen is in these words: "We claim feeding the cloth, under the needle, from right to left, or vice versa without stopping the machine, as fully set forth."

The claims of Wilson, on the reissue, as finally modified (they were at first fourteen), are ten in number. Of these the office allowed the 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, and 7th, about which there is no dispute. The 1st, 4th, 8th, 9th, and 10th relate to the feed apparatus of the sewing machine, and are as follows:

1st. I claim the employment, in combination with a reciprocating needle, and a flat surface which supports the material to be sewed, of a rotating toothed feeding wheel, or other equivalent feeding device, to which the cloth is not attached, and a holder, which holds the material against the said feeding device, with a yielding pressure, substantially as and for the purposes herein specified."

"4th. I claim the employment in a sewing machine, of a table, which presents a surface for the support of the material to be sewed, on every side of, or all around, the needle, in combination with a feeding device, substantially as herein described."

"8th. I claim a sewing machine feeding the cloth or other substance, to determine the space between the stitches, by the friction of the surface of the periphery of the feed wheel, or any equivalent feeding device, substantially as specified, in combination with a spring pressure plate or pad, which gripes, or other substance against such feeding surface, substantially as specified, and for the purpose set forth.

"9th. I claim projecting the operating part of the surface of the feeding apparatus through the surface of the table, substantially as described, so that such feeding surface may act on a portion of the under surface of the material, to give the required motion to space the stitches, while the other portions of said material slide on the table, which answers the purpose of freeing the said material from the feeding surface, and to cover and protect the parts of the feeding device which are below the table.

"10th. I also claim the combination of mechanism substantially such as is herein described, so that the cloth or other material to be sewed, being placed upon the machine under the pressure pad, will be automatically carried forward, to receive the stitches, substantially as herein described, and so that seams of any desired length may be conveniently sewed into curves or figures at the will of the operator."

At the fourth page of the examiner's report of the 8th December, 1859, he says: "The invention involved in the patent of I. M. Singer, reissued Oct. 3rd, 1854, covers the combination in question, so far, at least, as the moving feeding mechanism is concerned. One clause of his claim is: 'In a sewing machine, feeding the cloth or other substance, to determine the space between the stitches, by the friction of the surface of the periphery of the feed wheel, or any equivalent feeding surface, substantially as specified, in combination with the spring pressure plate or pad, which gripes the cloth or other substance against such feeding surface, substantially as specified, and for the purpose set forth.' This reissue is based on a patent to I. M. Singer of the 12th August, 1851, and the specifications, drawings, and models in that patent clearly developed a complete anticipation of the invention now claimed by the applicant for this reissue, and this, too, in a perfectly operative machine."

That Wilson's amended claims, on his application for reissue, as assignee of Aikins & Felthousen, were covered by the original patent, specification, model, and drawings of Aikins & Felthousen of 5th August, 1851, I now proceed to show, by the official action of the office, at page 6 of the examiner's report of the 8th December, 1859. He says: "A reissue, therefore, can only properly be granted for the same invention as the one originally patented. Aikins & Felthousen have sworn that they are the original and first inventors of the sewing machine described in their patent, and, as the reissue now asked for purports but to correct the inadvertences, accidents, or mistakes in the original patent, the necessity or propriety of making the requirement of a new oath, on the part of the inventors, cannot be perceived." A new oath, would have been necessary if Wilson, in his amended claims, had been seeking anything new, and not embraced in "the same invention." This is a judgment of the office that the amended claims of Wilson covered only "the same invention" patented, or rather patentable, by right to Aikins & Felthousen on the 5th August, 1851, but then struck out by the office wrongfully. Again, at page 7 of the same report, the examiner says: "In this case there would be a liability to serious inconvenience to the applicant, in such a requirement (meaning a new oath), as his assignors seem, from the testimony, now to occupy an antagonistic position, and, besides, the machine, to some extent, seems to give sanction to the scope of the amended claim the assignee now seeks to have granted. I am, therefore, of opinion that, while cases may arise, where such a requirement might be just, and even necessary, it is not called for in this case." Again, at page 9 of the same report, the examiner says: "The facts here recited show, that Aikins & Felthousen and Singer took out letters patent at the same time for improvement in sewing machines, and that the improvements claimed in both machines so nearly resembled each other as to justify the declaration of an interference between them." Again, at page 12 of the same report, the examiner says: "The invention of Aikins & Felthousen, relative to the feed motion, consists in the employment of the table to support the cloth, through which projected the teeth cut in a thin disk of metal, that was driven by a pawl both ways, so as to feed the cloth forward and back, whilst the cloth was lightly pressed by a spring pressure on the toothed wheel. Here the examiner, properly, I think, interprets Aikins & Felthousen's fourth claim (struck out by the office) in the original patent as embracing the feed wheel, and the forward, as well as the reverse, motion.

The official letter of April 12, 1859, by Mr. Shugert, as acting commissioner, the office says: "These claims are the 1st, 3d, 5th, 6th, 7th, 9th, 12th, 13th, and 14th. As to these claims, the office admits that they are sustained by the model and drawings." The 1st, 5th, 12th, 13th, and 14th are identical with Wilson's finally amended 1st, 8th, 9th, and 10th claims, and relate entirely to the feed apparatus; and, at the close of the same official letter of the 12th April, 1859, it is said: "Claims 12, 13, and 14, involve the principle of the invention secured to Singer by the reissue of patents of August 12th, 1851, and are rejected thereon accordingly." These claims 12, 13, and 14 are identical with 8, 9, and 10 of Wilson's final amended claims, and relate exclusively to the feed apparatus; 8, 9, and 10 are for the feed claimed by Singer, and are said by the office, as above, to be the same in principle with the Singer claim, and to be sustained by the model and drawings in Aikins & Felthousen's original claim.

The commissioner in his decision (page 3) says: "The construction given by the courts and by my predecessors to that portion of the patent law relating to reissues is to the effect that a patentee, on an application for a reissue, may claim all those devices, which were clearly exhibited in his original specification, drawing, or model, and which he might have legally claimed at the time of taking out his original patent." As it appears by the official letter of the 12th April, 1859, and the passages of the examiners' report hereinbefore recited, that Wilson's amended claims are sustained by the model and drawings in Aikins & Felthousen's original patent, there can be no dispute that, other objections out of the way, they are proper subjects of a reissue.

The commissioner holds the main point in controversy in this interference to be "whether Aikins & Felthousen were the joint inventors of the feed device now claimed, by the assignee, James G. Wilson. The evidence on this point is very conflicting, but, from all the testimony submitted, I can come to no other conclusion than that the feed device exhibited in the model and drawings of Aikins & Felthousen's patent of August 5, 1851, was the sole and independent invention of Aikins. The testimony of S. G. Parker, Stephen B. Cushing, and others, seem clearly to establish the fact that Aikins showed them a machine containing this device as early as the latter part of the year 1848, which machine was then in working order. Aikins at that time in conversation referred to it as his invention." The commissioner, at page 5 of his decision says: "It is doubtless true that two independent inventors, engaged in producing a particular new and useful improvement, may embody their separate inventions in one machine, and obtain a patent for said machine as joint inventors. But, in such a case, each must have contributed something to the machine, and the claims must be so drawn as to cover the joint invention only. I am not aware that this precise question has been ever determined by the courts, but it appears to me plain that the intention of the laws is to allow to joint inventors, in an application for a patent, to claim only such distinct features as are in fact the joint invention of both, or a combination of features, to which combination each person has contributed something."

These extracts of proceedings in the office show two things: (1) That the amended claims of Wilson, on this his application for reissue of the patent, obtained by Aikins & Felthousen on the 5th August, 1851, are shown in, and sustained by, the model and drawings presented to the office on their original application for a patent in April, 1851; and (2) that, under the decision of the supreme court, in Battin v. Taggart, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 74, the 44th general rule of the office, the 13th section of the act of 1836, and the 8th section of the act of 1837, these amended claims are the proper objects of a reissue, as a matter of right, in the original patentees, or their assignee, unless other good cause to the contrary is shown.

Although the office has declared an interference in this case between the claims of Wilson and Singer for the feeding device in the sewing machine, which imports identity of invention, there is a continued effort made by the examiner in the original report, by the commissioner in the answer to the reasons of appeal, and by Singer's counsel in argument, to distinguish them, on account of the roughened or serrated surface, of the feed wheel in Singer's model, and the pointed teeth on the periphery of the feed wheel in Aikins & Felthousen's model. This could not have been thought other than a difference in mechanical detail and finish. The principles in both models being declared by the office to be the same in the official letter of the 12th April, 1859, to which I have referred. Commissioner Bishop, in his decision, so treats the claims of the parties in controversy, as did the board of appeals in the office, and being myself of the same opinion, I shall dismiss all that is said by Singer's counsel on the subject without further comment.

The foregoing official extracts also show that the main point in controversy in this interference is whether the invention of the feed device in dispute,—that is to say, the forward feed,—was the sole invention of Aikins, or the joint invention of Aikins & Felthousen, or was properly the subject of a joint patent, to Aikins & Felthousen, as several inventors of it, and another patentable improvement on the same sewing machine. Before I proceed to discuss the main point, let me consider the objection raised by the appellant's counsel, that the matter of joint invention and joint patentability is res adjudicata. Mr. Stanton insists for Wilson that this question cannot be reopened upon an application for reissue; but the reissue is to be dealt with by the 8th section of the act of 1837, as on the original application, and on it the question of joint or sole invention is open, as is also priority of invention, laches, or any other legal cause which on an original application would lead the commissioner to refuse a patent. Whenever a reissue is asked, the old patent is surrendered by the requirement of the statute, and the free will of the owner and the reissue operates de novo, a new patent is granted for the unexpired term. The question of joint patentability on a reissue, it seems to me, is no more res adjudicata than the question of original and first invention, also at the same time decided, and, if this was conclusive, no interference could be declared, but I think that on a reissue it is not only competent for, but the duty of, the commissioner to declare an interference, if there is an existing claimant asserting right, as original first inventor, and so the office has properly decided in this very case. On the question of interference declared, the appellant's counsel contends, that priority is the only issue. This is certainly so as to the parties to the interference, but when one of the parties in the interference claims, not only priority of invention, but a patent, the commissioner must deny the claim to the patent, if the applicant has lost his right to a patent, even though original and first inventor, by laches, fraud, or any other legal cause.

The duty of the commissioner to the public calls him to decide these questions when they arise, and appear in the evidence before him, before he issues the patent applied for. Mr. Wilson, the applicant for the reissue, must meet the questions, not only of priority as to Singer, but the right to a joint patent of Aikins & Felthousen, his assignors, in the original patent granted to them 5th August, 1851. Has he established this joint right? As this is the leading point in the controversy, both as to the law and the fact relating to it, and has been most ably and closely argued by the learned counsel. I propose first to show what is the law in relation to joint inventions, and then to apply the facts in this case to the law so ascertained. If I am right in the legal principles I shall announce, there will be no difficulty in sustaining the reissue in favor of Wilson, even assuming the facts to be as his adversary, Mr. Singer, asserts. First, as to the law in Curt. Pat. § 3: "It has also been held that a patent may be taken for several improvements on one and the same machine, or for two machines which are invented by the patentee, and conduce to the same common purpose and object, although they are capable of a distinct use and application, without being united together. But a patent cannot be taken for two distinct machines, not conducing to the same common purpose or object, but designed for totally distinct and independent objects." Also, section 109: "The object which the inventor proposes to accomplish will always be the main guide by which to determine whether the subject matter is a unit or not." In Moody v. Fiske [Case No. 9,745], Judge Story says: "I wish it to be understood, in this opinion, that though several distinct improvements in one machine may be united in one patent, it does not follow that several improvements in two different machines, having distinct and independent operations, can be so included, in less that the same patent may be for a combination of different machines, and for distinct improvements in each."

The law seems clear, therefore, that one patent may be taken by a single inventor for different and distinct improvements, in a single machine, because the object sought to be attained is a unit, and that no fraud is practised thereby on the revenue of the patent office. If one person can thus unite two or more different and distinct improvements on a single machine, in the same patent, it would seem in reason, and upon principle, impossible to deny the same right to two persons, who each invented one of the distinct and different improvements in the same machine. The object being a unit, they have each contributed to its attainment, and the patent must be joint, as the genius of the two has accomplished a result, which, as before said, is a unit, and therefore the subject matter of a single patent.

The commissioner in his decision admits the principle, although he fails to apply it to the case in hand, as I think he ought to have done. I refer to the passage in his decision heretofore cited by me. Unless this is a true interpretation of the law relating to joint inventions, which are mentioned and provided for in the patent acts, no joint invention could exist, unless each of two persons contributed an unpatentable element of invention, which unpatentable elements, when united, produced a patentable result; a thing which, to be sure, might happen (and which I will hereafter endeavor to show did happen, in this case of Aikins & Felthousen), but which I think is too refined and metaphysical for the practical business of life.

It would restrict, indeed almost obliterate, the theatre for joint invention, and it seems to one could never have been in the contemplation of the legislature in enacting the patent laws.

Let me apply this law to the case now before me on appeal. The feed apparatus of the sewing machine now in controversy embraces, among other things, the rotary feed wheel, and the mechanism to give it its forward motion, so as to feed the cloth to the needle, and space the stitches. This feed apparatus, it is insisted by Singer's counsel, invented in the early part of 1849, as the commissioner decides, before the date of Singer's invention of the same thing, was the sole invention of Aikins, and not the subject of a joint patent to Aikins & Felthousen, under whom Wilson claims title, as assignee.

Mr. Keller insists upon Felthousen's testimony that Felthousen only invented, or contributed to invent, the reverse or backward motion of the feed apparatus. Now, assuming Felthousen to be a competent witness, and that Mr. Keller has properly interpreted his testimony, then Felthousen had nothing to do with the feed proper, or "forward feed," as it is called, which was the sole invention of Aikins, but in the year 1850, as Mr. Keller alleges, after the date of Singer's invention of the feed proper, or forward feed, in the same year, Felthousen invented, or contributed with Aikins to invent, the reverse feed.

This reverse feed has been described by the office to be an improvement on the sewing machine, and, as such, patentable, and Wilson's claim No. 2 in his amended claims has been acquiesced in and granted by the office. See official letter of the 12th April, 1859. Now here are two distinct improvements on one and the same machine (the sewing machine); Aikins the sole inventor of one, and Felthousen the sole or joint inventor with Aikins of the other, with which other Singer has no connection, and to which he sets up no claim as inventor.

Upon the principles of law herein set forth, if sound and maintainable, Aikins & Felthousen were entitled, August 15, 1851, to the joint patent then granted to them, and Wilson, their assignee, to all the rights acquired by them under that grant. Aikins alone invented the feed wheel and feed apparatus for the forward feed, which was one patentable improvement of the sewing machine, and Felthousen, either solely, or jointly with Aikins, the reverse feed, which was another patentable improvement of the same sewing machine.

The fourth original claim, struck out by the office, is in these words: "We claim feeding the cloth under the needle, from right to left, or vice versa, without stopping the machine, as fully set forth. These two improvements were the subject of one joint patent to Aikins & Felthousen, which properly issued to them jointly, the legal effect of which joint grant was to vest each of them with a joint interest in both improvements, or, in the technical language of the law, to cause them to be seized "per my and per tout," and to be competent by a joint grant or deed to convey the whole to Wilson, their assignee. The model and drawings of Aikins & Felthousen in the patent office in August, 1851, if they were the original first inventors of the above-named improvements, as now appears in proof, entitled them to have had these improvements embraced in their patent, as that was not done by the fault of the office in disallowing and erasing their claim, and without any fraud or deceptive intention on their part, under the decision in Battin v. Taggart, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 74. They and their assignee, Wilson, who stands in their shoes, have a just claim to have them inserted in a reissue. Where there is a defective or insufficient description or specification, on surrender, the patentee, or his assignee, can make the reissue patent what he would have made the original if he had known how, or if the office had permitted him to have it.

There is another view of Felthousen's testimony, supposing him a competent witness, not presented on the part of Singer's counsel, which proves the invention of the feed apparatus to be, in the strictest sense, the joint invention of himself and Aikins. In answer to the 9th cross interrogatory, Felthousen says: "I suggested and invented the application of the set screw, above the needle rod, to regulate the length of the stroke, and made the same. I also suggested the arrangement for feeding the cloth both ways, backwards and forwards, and helped make the machinery." A very ingenious and earnest argument has been made to show that Felthousen meant that he had suggested only the backward or reverse feed, as it is called, but, when the witness says backwards and forwards, I must take him to mean what he says. I do not feel at liberty to mutilate or erase any portion of his testimony. I must give to the language of the witness its plain and natural import, and this is the more incumbent on the judge when the natural import harmonizes with Felthousen's original oath in March, 1850, when the joint patent was applied for, and with the testimony of Parker, Cushing, and others, who testify that both forward and reverse feed appeared in the machine which they saw late in 1848, or early in 1849, and with the testimony of Hamner, Hollister, Hardy, and Bishop, who saw Felthousen at work with Aikins in 1848, and heard him say he was with Aikins, getting up a sewing machine, which would be a woman killer, &c. It is more reasonable and charitable, and, it seems to me, more judicial, to reconcile Felthousen's whole testimony with itself, and with the proof of the other witnesses, by supposing that Felthousen has been mistaken in the time when he and Aikins made their joint improvements on the sewing machine, and that they were made and completed not later than the early part of the year 1849.

But, if clear in this view of the case, is Felthousen a competent witness against Wilson? No rule of evidence is better settled on authority than that an assignor cannot, after assignment, impeach the title of his own assignee. Mr. Keller does not deny this law. He admits the rule of evidence, but says it has no application to this case. At page 8 of his additional argument, he says: "It is true that in the original application for the original patent he (Felthousen) joined in the oath of joint invention, but he nowhere has sworn that he was joint inventor with Aikins of the things now claimed by Wilson, as assignee." Is this so? The office has declared in the official letter of the 12th April, 1859, and the examiner in the passages of his report, to which I have referred, that all Wilson's present claims are sustained by the model and drawings of Aikins & Felthousen. Now Felthousen swore in his application to what was new in his model and drawings. The office has so decided, in not requiring Wilson, the assignee, to get a new oath from Aikins & Felthousen on the reissue, which would not have been left undone (as no patent can lawfully issue without the oath of the inventors), unless the office had thought the old oath applied to Wilson's present claims. Moreover, in the original application, Aikins & Felthousen (4th claim, struck out by the office) claimed as follows: "Fourth, we claim feeding the cloth under the needle, from right to left, or vice versa, without stopping the machine, as fully set forth." His claim was appended to the original application, when the oath was taken, though it was afterwards struck out by the office, and is covered by the oath.

It is true both the examiner and the commissioner construe this 4th original claim, so struck out, to be a claim only for the reverse feed motion, and not for the forward motion, nor for the feed wheel. However it may be as to the feed wheel, of which I shall presently speak, I cannot understand how the office confines this 4th original claim to the reverse motion only. The words are: "Feeding the cloth under the needle, from right to left, or vice versa, without stopping the machine, as fully set forth." "Right to left, or vice versa," certainly mean both feed motions, backwards and forwards, and you cannot get rid of either without expunging half the claim. Though this original claim is general and broad in its terms, and not prepared with technical accuracy, and certainly I think it ought to be construed to embrace the feed wheel, as well as both feed motions. The present construction of the office is most literal and rigid. It sticks in the bark, and does not agree with the passages in the examiner's report, hereinbefore cited by me. The feed wheel was in the original model, and is admitted to be new in the combination. The feed motion, backwards and forwards, to feed the cloth under the needle, could be effected only, as I suppose, by the revolutions of the feed wheel. This feed wheel is set out and described in the original specification of the original patent of Aikins & Felthousen in these words: "To the front end of the shaft, K, within the circular shaped rest, W, is arranged a toothed feeding wheel, the teeth of which project sufficiently far through a slot in the top of said rest, W, to catch the cloth, and feed it under the needle, as said toothed feeding-wheel is turned by the operation of the pawl and rag wheel, before described; said feeding wheel running to the right or left, as the pawl may be set working, and carrying the cloth in either direction."

When the original 4th claim, in general terms, asserted the right to feed the cloth under the needle "from right to left, or vice versa, without stopping the machine, as fully set forth," it ought, as I have before said, in fairness, to be construed to embrace the feed wheel, the revolutions of which could alone feed the cloth to the needle from right to left, or vice versa, and which feed wheel is set forth in the original specification, as above detailed.

It seems to me, therefore, if Felthousen's late testimony on his examination by Singer is to be construed as the office and Mr. Keller contend, that he only invented, or helped to invent, the reverse motion of the feed apparatus, and not the forward motion and the feed wheel, his late testimony is in conflict with his original oath, and the credit of it thereby impaired. But Felthousen in his original 4th claim and in his original oath, as well as in his answer to the 9th cross-interrogatory on his examination as Singer's witness, is consistent in averring that he was a joint inventor with Aikin of the forward or feed motion proper, as well as the reverse feed. It is not denied. At all events, both the commissioner and the examiner assume it as clearly proved that the feed proper, or the forward feed, was invented and on the machine not later than the spring of 1849, long before Singer's alleged invention. Felthousen must therefore be foresworn or mistaken as to the time when he fixes his invention after his partnership with Aikins in the year 1850.

Assuming, however, against the clear proof in the cause, and against Felthousen's uniform and consistent averments, that he did invent, or contribute to invent with Aikins, the forward feed, and that he only invented the reverse feed in the fall of 1850, still, as this reverse feed, was a substantive patentable invention, he had a right, on the law, admitted by the commissioner, and sustained herein on authority and principle, to unite his invention with the invention of Aikins, and to take out with him, as they did, a joint patent for their several improvements on the same sewing machine; and the case, in this aspect of it, is strong against Singer as in any other view of it.

Lastly, if Aikins & Felthousen are to be rejected, as incompetent witnesses to impair Wilson's title, after assignment, the joint invention is prima facie proved by their original oath, and confirmed by the testimony of Hamner, Hollister, Hardy, Bishop, and others. Upon the whole, therefore, I am of the opinion the original joint patent of the 5th August, 1851, properly issued to Aikins & Felthousen, as joint inventors; and, as James G. Wilson is their assignee, and his amended claims, on his application for reissue, cover only what was shown in the original model and drawings of Aikins & Felthousen, and of which they were the first and original inventors, a reissue patent ought to be granted to said Wilson, as prayed.

The fourth and fifth reasons of appeal are sustained. The commissioner's decision of the 20th December, 1859, is reversed, this 30th June, 1860, and I do this same 30th June, 1860, adjudge and order, that a reissue patent be granted by the commissioner to the said James G. Wilson, assignee of Aikins & Felthousen, for the amended claims claimed by him. I return to the honorable, the commissioner of patents, all the papers, model, and drawings with this my opinion and judgment this 30th June, 1860.

[The patent was accordingly reissued January 27, 1863, but was held void in Potter v. Dixon, Case No. 11,325.]

MARKING ARTICLE AS PATENTED—EXPIRATION OF PATENT.

1. The manufacturer of an article, which has been patented, can affix upon such article the word "Patented" or any other word of similar import, together with the date of the patent, after the patent has expired.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is a quiet action brought by plaintiff under the last clause of Rev. St. § 4901, tit. "Patents and Copyrights," which reads substantially as follows: "Every person who in any manner marks upon or affixes to any unpatented article the word 'Patent,' or any word importing that the same is patented, for the purpose of deceiving the public, shall be liable for every such offense to a penalty of not less than one hundred dollars, with costs, one-half of said penalty to the person who shall sue for the same, and the other to the use of the United States, to be recovered by suit in any district court of the United States, within whose jurisdiction such offense may have been committed."

The declaration contains three counts, to which defendant demurs generally and specially. The first count charges that "on the first day of Nov., 1876, and from time to time from that date hitherto, to-wit: In this district defendant did knowingly, willfully and negligently, and contrary to the statute of the United States in such case made and provided, and for the purpose of deceiving the public, print, mold, cast, stamp, engrave, make or affix upon sliding plates the words or inscription: 'Patented Sept. 10, 1846, May 8, 1849, Nov. 13, 1850, Aug. 4, 1851, Aug. 12, 1851, Apr. 11, 1854, May 30, 1854, Nov. 2, 1854, Dec. 19, 1854, May 29, 1855, Oct. 9, 1855'; and did fix and attach one such plate so marked, engraved or stamped to and upon each of one hundred thousand Singer sewing machines; that the words and figures so as aforesaid placed upon said machines imported that the same were patented; and the plaintiff avers that said machines, on the first day of November, 1876, were not, nor were any of them patented; and plaintiff avers that it was at said last mentioned time well known to said defendant that said articles and each of them were unpatented. Whereby an action hath accrued," etc.

The second count charges that defendant, at the same time and place, did knowingly, etc., and for the purpose of deceiving the public, affix upon each of one hundred thousand other Singer sewing machines the same words and figures mentioned in the first count. "Which words and figures imported that said machines were patented." "And plaintiff avers that said machines, on the first day of November, 1876, were not patented, which defendant well knew," etc.

The third count charges that defendant, at the same time and place, did knowingly, etc., and for the purpose of deceiving the public, affix upon each of one hundred thousand other Singer sewing machines the same words and figures mentioned in the first count, which said words and figures imported that said machines were patented. "And the plaintiff avers that said machines, on said first day of November, 1876, were not patented," which defendant well knew, etc.

It is contended on the part of the defendant that the declaration is defective in not alleging that the machine or some part of it was not patented at the times imported in the words affixed to it.

The question raised by the demurrer is, whether the manufacturer of an article which has been patented can affix upon such article the word "Patented" or any other word of similar import, and the date of the patent after the patent has expired. Is such an article an "unpatented article" within the meaning of this clause of the statute?

Section 4900, makes it the duty of all patentees, their assigns, etc., and of all persons making or vending a patented article, "to give sufficient notice to the public that the same is patented; either by affixing thereon the word 'Patented' together with the day and year the patent was granted; or when from the character of the article this cannot be done, by fixing to it or to the package wherein one or more of them is enclosed, a label containing a like notice."

It was conceded by plaintiff's counsel on the argument that defendant had held patents upon sewing machines, issued by the United States at the several dates mentioned in the declaration; but the point made was that because these patents had expired, the defendant had no longer the right to affix to the machine the word "Patented" or any other word or sign importing that it or any part of it was patented or had been patented. This is a highly penal statute, and its scope will not be extended by implication. It must be strictly construed. U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76; Andrews v. U. S. [Case No. 381].

The law of the United States in force at the several dates inscribed on these machines, limited the life of a patent to 21 years,—that is, 14 years for the original term, and 7 years extension, if an extension is granted. It is clear then that at the time when defendant is charged to have committed this offense, the patents mentioned in the inscription had expired by limitation of law, even if all had been extended so as to remain in force the full 21 years.

The mischief which this statute was intended to punish, can hardly be stated more concisely than in the words of the law itself: "The purpose of deceiving the public," that is, stating falsely that an article is then the subject-matter of a patent. And can it be said that the public is deceived by the notice inscribed upon, or affixed to, a manufactured article, that has been patented, and that the patent has expired? The "public" is presumed to know the law as well as the patentee—to know that a patent issued on the 9th day of October, 1855, had expired on the 1st day of November, 1876. If, therefore, the inscription be true in fact, as it is conceded to have been in this case, I am of opinion that it does not subject the defendant to the penalty of this statute.

It may be valuable information to the public to be told that a machine offered for sale is made in accordance with a patent which has been granted, but which has expired. So that purchasers instead of being deceived, have only desirable or important facts imparted to them, and are able to act more intelligently in dealing with the manufacturer or vendor.

The law makes it the duty of the manufacturer of a patented article, during the time the patent is in force, "to give notice to the public that the same is patented, by fixing thereon the word 'Patented,' with the day and year the patent was granted," and I do not see anything in the spirit of this clause of the law which prevents the manufacturer from continuing to affix such word and date after the expiration of the patent.

This being a highly penal statute, it was the duty of the pleader in making a case under it to negative all presumptions in favor of the innocence of the defendant. 1 Chit. Pl. 221. The allegation is, that "on the first day of November, 1876, said machines were not nor was any part of them patented." The act charged, when construed in the light of the law, in regard to the duration of patents, does not import that they were then patented, or that they are made under any patent in force on the 1st day of November, 1876, but directly the contrary. The legal meaning of the words said in this case to have been affixed to defendant's machines is: "This machine was patented at such a date, but the patent has expired." This is the fair import of the words which defendant is charged with using, and I do not think they make a case within the intent of the law.

I do not deem it necessary to discuss the special causes of demurrer assigned, and which go only to the form of the declaration—those could readily be cured by amendment. The wish expressed by counsel upon the argument was that I should pass upon the merits of the case as stated. Demurrer sustained.

Attachment in chancery. Security given, attachment dissolved.

Mr. C. Lee moved that the assignees of Stewart, under a commission of bankruptcy taken out in England, might be admitted as defendants. And to show that they were the assignees, he offered a copy of the proceedings of the commissioners, certified by a notary-public at Liverpool, and a certificate of the American consul at Liverpool, that the notary was a notary-public duly commissioned, &c. Act of Assembly, Rev. Code, 168.

Mr. Taylor objected that this copy is not within the act of assembly, and there is no law authorizing such copy to be admitted as evidence.

Objection overruled, and the assignees made defendants.

Mr. C. Lee moved that Stewart might be admitted to answer by his attorney in fact.

THE COURT did not refuse to suffer the answer by attorney to be filed.

SALE BY BANKRUPT—VALIDITY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The 35th section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 534)], which declares a sale, transfer, etc., not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor, shall be prima facie evidence of fraud, throws the burden of proof on the purchaser to sustain the validity of his purchase.

2. In such a case the proofs may be taken ore tenus at the hearing.

3. Under the evidence in this case the sale was void.

D. M. Dickinson and George Gray, for plaintiff.

John T. Holmes, for defendant.

WITHEY, District Judge. The petition upon which this hearing is had, was filed by plaintiff, and alleges that about the 10th of August, 1868, the bankrupt made to defendant a sale and transfer of a stock of goods of the value of six thousand dollars, and within six months from the filing of the petition upon which Cummings was declared a bankrupt; that Cummings was then insolvent, that defendant had reasonable cause to believe him insolvent, and to be acting in contemplation of insolvency, and that the transfer was made with a view to impair, hinder, impede, and delay the operation and effect of the provisions of the bankrupt act. Defendant was ordered to show cause; and having denied the allegations of the petition, the case has been heard upon proofs. Defendant's counsel has taken exceptions to the petition and to the proofs being taken ore tenus at the hearing, which are overruled. The facts disclose that Cummings was at the date of the sale insolvent, and that defendant knew of his embarrassed condition. Defendant's counsel conceded this upon the argument. Cummings was a trader at Plainwell, Allegan county, in this district, and had been for several years doing a general country trade. At the time of the sale of his goods to defendant, there was a mortgage lien thereon of two thousand two hundred dollars to one Sissen, of Plainwell, for money loaned; and also a mortgage to one Brigham, on that part of the stock composed of boots and shoes, on which was unpaid two thousand eight hundred dollars. Cummings owed among other indebtedness in addition to those mortgage debts, one thousand dollars to one Cory, being the amount of two notes of five hundred dollars each, on one of which defendant was liable as indorser. He also owed defendant one thousand one hundred and four dollars not secured, and four hundred dollars to parties not named. Of all this indebtedness defendant admits to have had knowledge when he bought the property of Cummings. His purchase amounted to six thousand one hundred and ninety-seven dollars and twenty-seven cents for goods, and about fifty dollars for accounts bought from Cummings—say six thousand two hundred and forty-seven dollars, total purchase price of goods and accounts. He was to pay by canceling Cummings' debt to defendant of one thousand one hundred and four dollars and fifty-one cents; paying the notes of Cummings to Cory, five hundred dollars and five hundred and four dollars respectively, and by paying Sissen's mortgage of two thousand two hundred dollars. He also gave Cummings his two notes—one for one thousand dollars, the other for eight hundred and eighty-eight dollars. Other creditors have proved debts of more than four thousand dollars against the bankrupt, of which defendant swears he had no knowledge. The sale by Cummings to defendant covered all the bankrupt's property except the boots and shoes, part of his stock mortgaged to one Brigham, and by him taken, at or about the time of sale to defendant, to satisfy two thousand eight hundred dollars.

The provision of section 35 of the bankrupt act, which declares a sale, transfer, etc., not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor, shall be prima facie evidence of fraud, throws the burden of proof on defendant to sustain the validity of his purchase. Defendant swears that he did not know Cummings owed more than four hundred dollars over the two mortgage debts, the debt due to himself and the other indebtedness, which by the terms of purchase he assumed to pay; and urges that, such being the fact, the prima facie case of fraud is conclusively met, and shows the sale to have been in all respects bona fide, and in no wise a fraud on the provisions of the bankrupt act. Standing alone, this testimony might be sufficient explanation; but when viewed in connection with other testimony, I cannot regard the sale as one entitled to the sanction of the court. When the mortgage to Sissen was made, June 25th, 1868, defendant was placed in the store as agent of the mortgagee, to see that the terms of the mortgage were complied with in regard to keeping up the stock, and applying sales to its payments. Defendant from that time acted more or less as clerk in Cummings' store, up to the time of his purchase—was familiar with Cummings' business affairs, had access to his books of accounts, and to his invoices of purchases. He knew of the two mortgages on the stock, was a creditor for over one thousand one hundred dollars, indorser on one of Cummings' notes to Cory of five hundred dollars, and knew of the other note of five hundred dollars to Cory. He knew, too, that Cummings was unable to pay this indebtedness, much of it due, and from his relations to Cummings as a creditor, as agent of one mortgage, and as clerk in the store, must be supposed to have been watchful of Cummings' affairs, and have known pretty fully as to his pecuniary standing.

Cummings was upon the point of going away as some sort of an itinerant lecturer, breaking up his business, and without any property left from which other debts could be satisfied. A question arose, while taking the inventory of stock, as to the safety of defendant purchasing, when he was advised by an attorney present, that if Cummings was indebted beyond what it was proposed to arrange, it would not be safe to purchase. Cummings denied that there were any other debts except four hundred dollars. Defendant was thus warned, and prudence required that he should act with reference to the existing state of things. Again, Cummings' indebtedness, according to defendant's testimony, was all to parties residing at Plainwell, where the debtor resided, except the four hundred dollars to parties in Chicago. And yet Cummings had been a trader at Plainwell for many years, purchasing his goods in New York, Chicago, Cleveland, and other places, as defendant well knew. Now, is it reasonable to say or believe that defendant did not know, or, at least, have reasonable cause to believe, that this trader owed debts on his purchases, as it is shown he did, to an amount exceeding four hundred dollars, and when it was known that he was largely indebted at home, and purchased his goods abroad? Defendant, while taking account of stock, consulted the invoices of purchase, and one witness testifies that defendant said to him, after the purchase, he bought the goods to protect himself.

I cannot doubt for a moment but defendant knew of Cummings' insolvency and indebtedness to some extent outside of home debts, and that he purchased the goods to protect his own interests, in utter disregard of the rights of a large number of other creditors. Defendant assumed the payment of no part of Cummings' debts, outside of one note of five hundred dollars to Cory, who was his brother-in-law, except what it was to his interest to pay. Sissen's two thousand two hundred dollar mortgage was a lien on the goods. Defendant could get no title except subject to this mortgage. He was liable to Cory on one of the five hundred dollar notes held by his brother-in-law; the other he assumed to pay.

I hold the sale void, under the evidence, by the terms of the bankrupt act. The plaintiff is satisfied to take judgment for three thousand five hundred and forty-three dollars, and, although I think he is entitled to recover more, I will take that sum as the amount of defendant's liability in this case, with costs of the proceedings.

This notice was designed to enable the defendant to resist the application for an injunction; and this resistance can be more effectually made by permitting the defendant to file his answer. Affidavits are heard in behalf of both parties, especially in patent cases. This course seems to come within the spirit of the above section, and it enables the judge to act on the motion with a better knowledge of the equitable rights of the parties. As no precise rules have been adopted in regard to this procedure, except that a reasonable notice shall be given of the time and place of the motion, it has been usual to give a reasonable time for the preparation of the answer and the taking of affidavits. The delay of the defendant in preparing his answer in this case, seems not to be unreasonable; and no very strong reason is perceived why the defendant should not be permitted to show, as preliminary to a motion for an injunction, that the bill, upon its face, is materially defective.

The question now made is, whether an original bill for relief, which calls upon the defendant to answer, must not contain interrogatories, under the rules of practice adopted by the supreme court. The 41st, 42d, and 43d rules make the interrogatories a part of the bill, and prescribe its form; and the 40th rule declares that "a defendant shall not be bound to answer any statement or charge in the bill, unless specially and particularly interrogated thereto; and a defendant shall not be bound to answer any interrogatory in the bill, except those interrogatories which such defendant is required to answer"—which must be specified in a note at the foot of the bill, in the form stated. From this it appears the defendant is not bound to answer the bill, unless special interrogatories, of the form required, are contained in it. The 18th rule declares, that "it shall be the duty of the defendant, unless the time shall be otherwise enlarged, for cause shown, by a judge of the court, upon motion for that purpose, to file his plea, demurrer, or answer to the bill in the clerk's office, on the rule day next succeeding that of entering his appearance; in default thereof, the plaintiff may, at his election, enter, an order (as of course) in the order book, that the bill may be taken pro confesso," etc. This rule applies to all bills where an answer is required. Now, if the bill contain no interrogatories, and the defendant is not bound to answer it, can he be in default for not answering? He can never be in default except for neglecting to do that which he was legally bound to do; and if he be not in default, no decree pro confesso can be entered against him. This seems to be a reasonable construction of the above rules, and it gives to each one of them a proper effect.

The bill being defective for want of interrogatories, it is unnecessary now to consider the other objection, that the bill does not require an answer under oath.

Case No. 17,840.

WILSON v. STOLLEY.

[5 McLean, 1; 1 Fish. Pat. Rep. 261.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1849.

PATENTED INVENTION—LICENSE TO USE—ASSIGNMENT.

1. A license to run a planing machine may be assigned, it not being a mere personal privilege.
2. In such case the assignee is bound to perform the conditions of the license.
3. The same rule applies to the assignment of his right by the licensor.
4. And a forfeiture of the license may be enforced according to its terms, by reason of the abandonment or neglect of the licensee.

² [Action on the case. Suit brought on letters patent for an improved method of planing, tonguing, and grooving and cutting into moldings, or either, plank, boards, or other material, and for reducing the same to an equal width and thickness, etc., granted William Woodworth, December 27, 1828, extended for seven years from and after December 27, 1842, in the name of William W. Woodworth, administrator of William Woodworth, deceased, limited by a disclaimer filed by said William W. Woodworth, administrator, January 2, 1843; reissued to the latter July 4, 1845, and again extended for seven years from December 27, 1849, by act of congress, passed February 26, 1849.

[On August 9, 1843, William W. Woodworth assigned all his right and interest in and to the said letters patent, and renewal in and for the county of Hamilton, in the state of Ohio, and in certain other territory, to James G. Wilson, the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for and during the residue of said first extension; and afterward, on August 29, 1843, Wilson granted, by an instrument in writing, to Moses Brooks and Joseph L. Morris the exclusive right, under said extended patent, in said county of Hamilton, as well as other territory, in said instrument described, and thereby authorized said Brooks & Morris to construct and use during the said first extension the said planing machine, in the said letters patent described, in said county of Hamilton. Afterward, on November 4, 1845, said Brooks & Morris granted to Jacob P. Wilson the exclusive right, under said patent for the first extended term aforesaid, in the county of Hamilton, and in certain other territory, and authorized the said Jacob P. Wilson to construct and use during the first extension, as aforesaid, the said planing machine, in the said letters patent mentioned, in said county of Hamilton.

[On July 9, 1845, by a certain instrument in writing of that date, William W. Woodworth, administrator, assigned and confirmed unto said James G. Wilson all the right and title of him, the said Woodworth, administrator, within the said county of Hamilton, and certain other territory, for and during the extensions of the said letters patent, to the exclusive right of making and using said improvement or machine.

[Afterward, on April 15, 1846, and before the defendant committed the grievances for which this action was brought, said Jacob P. Wilson assigned to said James G. Wilson, plaintiff, the exclusive right, under said patent extended as aforesaid, in the county of Hamilton, as well as other territory, to the extent of the interest of him, the said Jacob P. Wilson, as conveyed by the aforesaid deed of said Brooks & Morris.

[While said Brooks & Morris held, as aforesaid, the exclusive right under said extended patent, and had authority to use and construct the planing machine, as described in the patent, they granted, on September 11, 1843, to John H. Stolley, the defendant, a license. That portion of this license material to the present case is as follows:

["Whereas, John H. Stolley has two machines constructed according to the specifications in said letters patent, having fully viewed and considered said improvement, and of his own motion has requested and desired said Brooks & Morris to give him a license for using one of his two machines on the said improved plan, in the county of Hamilton aforesaid, and in no other place, on conditions hereinafter mentioned, and has offered to pay said Brooks & Morris the sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents for each and every thousand feet he may plane, payable on every Monday, during the unexpired term of said extended patent, and to plane boards for others than himself for cash only; and to require payment for the same before the boards go out of his possession; and to require such price for planing as shall be agreed on by a majority of the owners of machines running under this patent in said county, said Stolley being one of them, as they shall from time to time determine on; and, whereas, by competition heretofore, the price has been reduced to seventy-five cents per hundred feet, it is agreed not to reduce below that price until agreed on by a majority of the owners as aforesaid, to which request and desire the said Brooks & Morris have agreed to comply: Now, in consideration of the propositions aforesaid, to wit, that the said John H. Stolley shall pay said Brooks & Morris one dollar and twenty-five cents for each and every thousand feet of boards he may plane, payable on Monday of every week during the extended term of said patent, and shall render an account, if required, under oath, and shall keep books in which entries of all boards planed shall be made, and shall give said Brooks & Morris access to said books at all times, and shall plane no boards for any other person than himself for anything but cash, and shall require payment thereof before the boards go out of his possession, the said Brooks & Morris license said Stolley the right of running either of his two machines, provided he does not run more than one of them at a time; and, provided, also, he shall keep and perform, on his part, all the stipulations aforesaid. And the said Brooks & Morris having also two machines, and Hughes & Foster having also two other machines, which they wished to run under said letters patent, it is further agreed by the said Brooks & Morris, that they will not run more than their two machines at any one time; nor will they license Hughes & Foster to run more than one of their said machines at any one time; nor will said Brooks & Morris license any additional number of said machines, in the county of Hamilton aforesaid during said extended term of said letters patent, nor will they plane boards for other persons than themselves without requiring cash for the same, nor will they plane boards other than their own at less price than shall be fixed by a majority of the owners of said right as aforesaid. It is further agreed that, in case said Brooks & Morris may think proper to bring suits against any persons for infringing the aforesaid patent right, they shall do it at their own cost; and nothing herein shall be so construed as to prevent said Brooks & Morris from receiving from persons infringing said patent, for their own use, such sums as they may think proper to receive, either after suit brought or before, and, in case of such compromise, said Brooks & Morris may grant to such persons license to run, notwithstanding anything herein contained. And it is further agreed, that if said Stolley elect to abandon the running of his machine as aforesaid, or cease for two weeks to run the same, then such neglect to run shall be considered an abandonment on his part, and said Brooks & Morris may consider this contract at an end. Witness our hands and seals, this 11th day of September, 1843, at which day this contract commences—parties each hold a copy hereof. John H. Stolley. (Seal.) Jos. L. Morris. (Seal.) M. Brooks. (Seal.)"

[After said James G. Wilson, plaintiff, had become possessed of the rights of the administrator and of Brooks & Morris, in and under the patent for the said county of Hamilton and elsewhere, the defendant committed in said county certain grievances, which are sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the court, whereupon this action was brought, the declaration of which charged infringement and actual damages to the amount of five thousand dollars, and asked for exemplary damages, and charged that the defendant had refused to pay the plaintiffs damages incurred by reason of infringement.

[The defendant pleaded not guilty, and set up, among other matters, by way of defense, the license granted him by Brooks and Stolley, of September 11, 1843, and averred he had always performed all the stipulations in said contract of license on his part to be performed, with the exception of paying the said license money, which money he had always been and was then ready to pay, and had repeatedly offered to pay as well to Brooks & Morris as to plaintiff, who had uniformly refused to receive the same, and presented with the plea an exhibit of the account of said license moneys due and unpaid.]²

E. P. Norton, Groësbeck & Telford, and Henry Stanbery, for plaintiff.

T. Walker, Storer & Gwynne, and Thomas Corwin, for defendants.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice (charging jury). This is an action at law, to recover damages for the infringement of Woodworth's patent for planing boards, which has been assigned to the plaintiff. The defendant sets up a license in his defense. Plaintiff alleges that the license was forfeited by the defendant. The license was given by Brooks & Morris, in whom the right to the patent was vested, but they have since assigned to the plaintiff. In that assignment the license to Stolley and others is referred to, and Wilson, the plaintiff, bound himself to do what Brooks & Morris were bound to do. In the license it is stated that Stolley has two planing machines, and he was authorized to run either. Stolley agreed to pay one dollar and twenty-five cents to the lessor, or his assigns, for every thousand feet of boards by him planed, to be paid every Monday morning, during the term of the lease; and that he will work for cash only. He bound himself to keep regular books, to be inspected when required by the licensor, and that he would make his return under oath, when required. Among other provisions of the contract, it was agreed, if said Stolley elect to abandon the running of his machines as aforesaid, or cease for two weeks to run the same, then such neglect to run shall be considered an abandonment on his part, and said Brooks & Morris may consider this contract at an end.

Under the contract, Stolley had a right to abandon it without cause. The neglect, for two weeks, to run the machine, might be considered an abandonment by the plaintiff. A formal notice was not necessary by the plaintiff, that he considered the failure to run the machine two weeks as an abandonment. Any unequivocal act, showing a waiver of the right to put an end to the contract, such as an expressed determination to enforce it, would be sufficient; or an acceptance of rent subsequently. A refusal to receive the rent would show, that he considered the contract terminated.

It seems, from the testimony, that Stolley sold his license to Garrard. The license, we suppose, was assignable, as it could not be considered a personal privilege. Garrard purchased the machine of Stolley, and commenced running it the 1st of June, 1846. Inquiry was made of Garrard, by Wilson, jun., by what right he was running the machine; and he was informed that he was running under Stolley's license, which had been assigned to him, and that his father, the plaintiff, had promised to give him a license if Stolley would abandon his license. Young Wilson then gave Garrard notice to cease running the machine. Stolley was then in the shop, and told Garrard to go on,—that he would stand between him and Wilson. Witness ran the machine from 1st June to October, 1846. In September, Garrard informed Stolley, that he had made an agreement with Wilson, to run the machine. Stolley proposed to Garrard to rescind the sale of the machine, and refund the money, and give him the use of the property up to that time, but Garrard refused to cancel the contract. On the 30th of September, 1846, Stolley commenced an action of replevin for the machine, until which time Garrard continued to run it. About two weeks before this, Stolley commenced running a new machine. Garrard was induced to purchase in the first, by the representations of Stolley, that he would give his custom in that business, as far as he could by sending his customers to him. When the sale was made to Garrard, Stolley stated as a reason for selling, that his saw mill and the planing machine afforded more business than he could attend to.

From these facts, gentlemen of the jury, it will be for you to say, whether there was not an abandonment of his license by Stolley. He sold his machine, agreed to transfer his license, and ceased to run a machine from some time in May till some time in September. To cease two weeks was an abandonment under the contract. But here was an abandonment of more than three months, under a declaration that he intended to quit the business, as he had more to do than he could attend to. Under these facts, it will not be difficult for you to render a verdict in the case, and you will find such damages in favor of the plaintiff as you shall think the circumstances require.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

[This case was twice tried before a jury. Upon the first trial the jury brought in a verdict of five hundred dollars damages for the plaintiff. This verdict being set aside, upon the second trial, before a new jury, the latter brought in a verdict of five dollars damages for the plaintiff. A motion to set aside this latter verdict was overruled, and the verdict confirmed.]²

WILSON v. TAYLOR.

[2 Hayw. & H. 334.]¹

Orphans' Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 20, 1859.

ADMINISTRATORS—DECEDENT'S ESTATE.

An administrator cannot acquire the title to the property of the deceased by paying his debts. The property must be sold and accounted for by him.

[This was an action by Mary A. and Michael P. Wilson against Marion M. Taylor.] A summons was served on the administrator to show cause why he does not distribute the balance in his hands as administrator de bonis non of Geo. B. Scott, deceased.

PURCELL, J. M. M. Taylor qualified as administrator of George B. Scott, deceased, and returned an inventory of the personal estate, being slaves and other perishable property, and he is duly charged with the same. Subsequently he credits himself before the register, who is also regarded as auditor of this court, and stated his account in the usual mode, with sundry debts paid by him against the estate, and then charges himself, in his own account as guardian, with the balance, being the difference between said inventory and debts by him paid, no previous order of publication for a final settlement asked or obtained from the court by Taylor, the administrator. At the time said settlement was made the distributees were minors and females who have since married the petitioners. It is a strange idea that an administrator, except by consent of parties, becomes the owner of perishable property because he charges himself with an inventory which the law of 1798 imperatively requires him to do, for the information of the court, heirs and creditors, because he has paid debts to that amount. There are but two modes of disposing of the property of intestates: One by a proper sale previously ordered and directed by the court, when the property is incapable of division or for the payment of debts. An executor or administrator cannot buy at his own sale. See Conway v. Green, 1 Har. & J. 151; Davis v. Simpson, 5 Har. & J. 147; Seaglach v. Harris, 4 Har. & J. 67. The account in this case must be reformed in the following manner:

A public sale of the perishable property must be made by the administrator after giving at least three insertions in some newspaper of the time and place of sale, published in the city daily on a credit of sixty days for bonds with approved security for sums over $5, and all sums of $5 and under cash. When the amount of sale is collected, returned approved and stated by the register a publication to creditors and heirs for a final settlement must be made. The administrator is to be charged with hire at $150 per annum; that being the amount he charged himself with the first year, for the two slaves embraced in the inventory. See Hall v. Griffith, 2 Har. & J. 483; Haslett v. Glenn, 7 Har. & J. 17. When the above orders are completed the court will order the amount, after the payment of debts and proper expenses, to be paid to the distributees; as the relation of guardian and ward ceased on the marriage of the minors with the petitioners. See Wilson v. Boyer, 1 Har. & J. 297.

WILSON v. The TRUXILLO.

[N. Y. Times, Sept. 18, 1852.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1852.

SALE OF CHATTELS—PASSING OF TITLE—FAILURE TO DELIVER.

[The seller of merchandise agreed with the vendee to deliver it on board a brig lying at pier No. 9, North river, but by mistake of the carman it was delivered to another brig lying at pier No. 9, East river, and a receipt for the merchandise was signed by the master of the latter brig, which sailed before the mistake was discovered. The seller then delivered similar merchandise on the other brig in fulfillment of his contract. Held, that the title to the merchandise shipped on the wrong brig remained in the vendor, so that he could sue such brig for the value thereof.]

The libellant, Joseph Wilson, sold twenty-five cases of friction matches to John P. Beauville, and agreed with Beauville to deliver them on board of the brig Hector, at pier No. 9, North river, for $187.50; and to carry out his agreement Wilson employed Vernon McGoun, a carman, to make the delivery of the matches according to contract, and gave orders accordingly. The carman took the matches for that purpose, and at the same time he was furnished by Wilson with a blank receipt for the mate of the Hector to sign, and return when executed. On the face of this receipt it was specified that the twenty-five cases of matches were received of John P. Beauville, to be carried or shipped to Matanzas; and with this blank receipt and the twenty-five cases, the carman Vernon McGoun, left the store of Joseph Wilson—as Wilson supposed—for pier No. 9, North river; but, misunderstanding the order of Wilson, the carman made his way in an opposite direction, and brought up at pier No. 9, East river, instead of No. 9, North river, where lay the brig Truxillo, ready for sea; and the man in the care of this brig supposed to be the mate, and acting as such, received from McGoun these twenty-five cases of matches on board the brig Truxillo, destined to St. Domingo, and not to Matanzas. And having received the twenty-five cases of matches on board the Truxillo, this supposed mate thinking that the cases were for his ship, signed the receipt; and the carman, supposing all to be right, took the receipt back to Wilson, and he, again, believing that all was right, did not examine the receipt. It was a singular fact, that the two brigs should be sailing about the same day, to the West Indies—one from pier 9, North river, and the other from pier No. 9, East river; and it was equally singular, that the carman should have misunderstood his orders, and yet found at No. 9, East river, a brig ready to receive his load for the West Indies, and ready to receipt for them, as the brig Héctor would have done had the delivery been there.

These admitted facts present a case founded in mistake—a case, each step of its progress, a mistake also, and all parties remain in ignorance of the real condition of things, until the brig Truxillo sailed from the port of New York. Then it was that the purchaser of the matches discovered that there had been no delivery of matches for him on board the Hector, and giving notice of that failure to Wilson, the seller, Wilson immediately, in compliance with his contract with John Beauville, sent twenty-five other cases of matches on board the Hector, still remaining at pier No. 9, North river. This last act of Wilson was received as an entire fulfillment of his contract of sale, and J. P. Beauville had the twenty-five cases shipped to Matanzas, in the Hector, as was originally agreed, and in due time. Wilson did not claim that the delivery of the first matches, at No. 9, East river, was a fulfillment of his contract, nor could he claim that such a delivery was available to him. It follows, from these facts, that the property in the first twenty-five cases never passed to John P. Beauville, but remained in Wilson as if they had never passed out of his hands. The delivery of property by the mistake of all concerned can never be construed into a delivery in fact or in law, and the right of property remains in the original owner. In this case Wilson is that owner, and he now brings this suit to recover its value. The defence rests upon the idea that the libellant holds the receipt of the mate of the Truxillo in the name of John P. Beauville, and, therefore, this action should have been in the name of John P. Beauville instead of Joseph Wilson. And secondly, that this receipt being written evidence of the contract, cannot be contradicted or explained by parole. In short, that it is conclusive, and the respondents are alone answerable to John P. Beauville on that receipt. In reply to this defence the libellant proceeds to show that as soon as these mistakes were made known to him, he called on Mr. Chamberlain, one of the owners of the brig Truxillo, she then having proceeded to sea, and explained to him the circumstances which had placed on board the Truxillo these twenty-five cases of matches. And thereupon the owner, Mr. Chamberlain admitted that the goods were on board his brig, that he did not until that time know the owner, and further said to Wilson, that on the return of the brig, he would settle for the goods; and McGoun testified that he was present at the same interview, and remembers that Chamberlain said to Wilson that the goods would be sold at the market price, and that he would pay to Wilson what the goods brought there. It was in evidence that one case was sold at Jeremie, and the residue left for sale at different ports in the West Indies, and that before suit commenced libellant has made demand of the owners of the Truxillo. The respondents urge in their defence, that they are liable to the person named in the receipt and when he shall call for the money they are ready to respond to that claim. To sustain the defence, counsel for the defendants quote 3 Phil. Ev. 1,466, 1,469, 1,440, and Hill's Notes.

THE COURT (JUDSON, District Judge) is of the opinion that the right of property in these goods never passed from Wilson to John P. Beauville; there was never any delivery to him of these twenty-five cases; that when on board the Truxillo, by mistake of the carman, the right of property still remained in Wilson; and that as a necessary consequence, this action is maintainable against the owners of the brig Truxillo, and constitute a lien on the brig. The facts of the case bear a strong resemblance to that class of cases where, at the common law, an action of trover might be maintained. The goods went out of the hands of Wilson by mistake,—tantamount to losing them; they came into the possession of the respondents by another mistake,—tantamount to finding; they have been demanded and payment refused. This would be evidence of conversion to an act of trover. By the admiralty law, the same equity prevails and compels payment for the goods thus received and disposed of by the respondents. The receipt, upon which the defence rests, having been executed in the manner above stated, imposes no obligation upon any one, and is laid out of the case. The value of the goods thus in the possession of the defendant having been ascertained, there will be no necessity of a reference. The decree will be for $197.42, including interest.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 492.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1808.

PLEA OF LIMITATIONS—WHEN FILED.

In actions against executors and administrators, the statute of limitations may be pleaded after office judgment.

This cause having been referred, but no issue made up, and the award having been set aside at the last term, and the cause standing on an office judgment and writ of inquiry,—

Mr. Swann, for defendant, moved to plead the statute of limitations, which

E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, opposed, and produced the will of Turberville, by which he orders all his just debts to be paid, and contended that that would be a good bar to the plea of the statute, and that the court would not suffer a nugatory plea to be pleaded.

But THE COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent) admitted the plea, it being in a case of executors, and referred to the case of Dean v. Flannery [Case No. 3,707], at November term, 1807, where the plea was admitted after office judgment.

WILSON v. TURBERVILLE.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 512.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1808.

LIMITATIONS—CLAIM AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE.

A clause in a will directing all the testator's debts to be paid, and appropriating the rents of his real estate, does not take the case at law out of the statute of limitations, when the plaintiff does not seek his remedy under the will.

Special assumpsit by defendant's testator to sell all his crops for several years at a certain price; breach, that he did not sell and deliver, &c. Pleas, non assumpsit and limitations.

To rebut the plea of limitations, E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, produced a copy of the will of the defendant's testator, in which he directs all his just debts to be paid, and directs that the rents of his real estate shall be applied, in case certain parts of his personal estate should not be sufficient; and contended that this clause of the will took the case out of the statute. Jones v. Strafford, 3 P. Wms.

Mr. Swann, contra. If the plaintiff claimed under the will, the cases might apply; but if he will avail himself of that clause of the will he must confine himself to the provision made by the will. All the cases are in chancery. No case where at law such a will takes it out of the statute. If the plaintiff in a suit at law could avail himself of this equitable evidence, he might perhaps gain a priority which would exclude other creditors who have as good a right in equity as himself.

THE COURT (nem. con.) directed the jury that that clause of the will was not an acknowledgment of the cause of action.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, suggested that there was a difference between a debt liquidated and a claim for uncertain damages upon a breach of such a contract as this.

Upon this ground, as well as upon those urged by Mr. Swann, the court founded its opinion; but told the plaintiff's counsel that they would hear any cases which he might cite upon a motion for a new trial if the verdict should be against his client upon the plea of limitations.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1811.

PLEA OF LIMITATIONS—WHEN FILED.

After interlocutory decree, and an issue ordered, the court will not permit the defendant to plead the statute of limitations, and to file an answer.

An issue from chancery being called up for trial, in this cause, Mr. Swann, for plaintiff, moved for leave to plead the statute of limitations, and to file an answer.

E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, objected that it was now too late, after interlocutory decree; that the answer offered was not a full and fair answer; and that by his will the testator had ordered all his just debts to be paid; which took the case out of the statute.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), after consideration, overruled the motion.

PATENT FOR INVENTION—RENEWAL AND EXTENSION—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE—CONSTRUCTION OF ASSIGNMENT.

1. On the 27th of December, 1828, W. of the state of New York, obtained a patent for a machine of which he was the inventor, giving him the exclusive right to use the invention for fourteen years from the date of the patent, and no longer; on the 28th of November, 1829, in consideration of the assignment to him of a rival patent, W. assigned to T. H. & T., and their assigns, all his right in said patent, for certain places, amongst others, for all the state of Maryland except the part west of the Blue Ridge, "for the term of fourteen years from the date of the patent;" and by the deed of assignment, it was agreed, "that any improvement in either of the patents mutually assigned, in the machinery, or any alteration or renewal of the same, shall accrue to the benefit of the respective parties in interest, and may be applied and used within their respective districts as therein designated." W., the patentee, afterwards died, and on the 16th of November, 1842, his administrator obtained a renewal and extension of the patent, under the act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 117], for the term of seven years from the expiration of the original patent, and on the 9th of August, 1843, assigned to J. G. W. his interest in the patent so renewed, for all the state of Maryland east of the Blue Ridge. On a bill filed by J. G. W. against the assignee of T. H. & T., claiming the exclusive right to use said machine, within said limits, during the term for which the patent was renewed: held, that the act of July 4, 1836, applied to patents granted before its passage, as well as to those afterwards issued, and consequently, embraced the patent in question.

2. This law clearly intended that the assignees or grantees of the patentee should share in the benefit conferred on the patentee, and have some advantage from the extension of the patent for seven years; for it provides, in express terms, that the benefit of the renewal shall extend to them.

3. The object of this clause in the act is, to preserve the contract, in the sense in which both parties understood and intended it, at the time it was made, and to secure to the purchaser the right which he intended to buy, and which the patentee must have intended to sell.

4. The legislature intended to guard the party who had purchased from the patentee, the right to use his invention until the expiration of his exclusive privilege, from the necessity of purchasing it again; and when they were giving the patentee a new privilege, and one which he had no legal right to demand, they had a right to annex to it such conditions and limitations as, in their judgment, justice required.

5. The law meant to provide that assignees and grantees should share with the patentee the benefit of the renewal, according to the interests which they respectively acquired in the thing patented, within particular districts of the country, for their own individual use.

6. Under the covenant contained in the deed of the 28th November, 1829, each assignee, in his respective district, was to have precisely the same rights and benefits as the patentee himself had, or might afterwards obtain, so far as concerned these inventions; and if by a subsequent act of congress, advantages were given to the patentee which he did not at that time possess, and which were not, therefore, in the contemplation of the parties, yet, according to the spirit and meaning of the covenant, the assignee had a right to stand in the place of the patentee, in his district, in respect to the new privilege as well as the old; and it would be against equity and conscience, to allow him to use a privilege afterwards unexpectedly gained, in order to defeat his own contract, in a manner obviously inconsistent with the intention of the parties.

[Disapproved in Wetherill v. Passaic Zinc Co., Case No. 17,465.]

7. A case of this description is not one in which a court of equity is bound to lend its aid, even if the party had a right at law upon the technical construction of the covenant; but the word "renewal" is broad enough to embrace not only renewals then authorized by law, but renewals that might afterwards be provided for, and this construction of the word conforms in every respect to the scope and spirit of the agreement, and carries into effect the evident intention and design of the parties, at the time they made it, and is the only construction which will do equal justice to both.

In equity.

On the 31st of August, 1844, James G. Wilson, a citizen of the state of New York, filed his bill in this court, stating that on the 27th of December, 1828, William Woodworth, of the state of New York, obtained a patent for a new and useful improvement in the method of planing, tonguing, grooving and cutting into mouldings, either plank, boards or any other materials, and for reducing the same to an equal width and thickness; and also, for facing and dressing brick, and cutting, moulding or facing metallic, mineral or other substances. That said Woodworth was the true inventor and discoverer of said machine, and that it had not been in use, or described in any public work, anterior to the invention and discovery thereof by said patentee. That afterwards, Woodworth died, and on the petition of his administrator, William W. Woodworth, there was granted, on the 16th of November, 1842, an extension of said patent, for the term of seven years from the 27th of December, 1842, the date of the expiration of the first term. That afterwards, on the 2d day of January, 1843, the said William W. Woodworth executed an instrument of disclaimer to a part of the said patented improvement, according to the act of congress in such case made and provided. That on the 9th day of August, 1843, the complainant purchased from the said William W. Woodworth, administrator, all his interest in said letters patent, so renewed and extended, with the benefit of said disclaimer, for the state of Maryland east of the Blue Ridge. That being thus the assignee of all the rights existing under the said letters patent, and the extension thereof, in and for the state of Maryland, he had reason to believe that he would be permitted to enjoy the same, and the profits thereof, without let or hindrance; but that a certain Joseph Turner, Jr., and John C. Turner had had in operation, without any right or title thereto, ever since the date of said purchase, a machine substantially the same, in principle and mode of operation, with the machine for which letters patent were granted as aforesaid. That he had given notice to the said Turners, more than once, that such conduct was in violation of his, the complainant's, rights, and if persisted in, application would have to be made to this court for redress; of all which the said Turners had been utterly regardless. That from the time of the original patent, the machine had been known and recognized as the invention of William Woodworth aforesaid, and the right thereto, if ever questioned at all, had in the end always been admitted and yielded to. That at the term of the circuit court of the United States for the First district, commencing on the 16th of May last past, the case of Washburn & Brown v. Gould was tried, which was an action brought to recover damages on account of an alleged infringement of said extended letters patent, and after an able and protracted defence, a verdict was rendered for the plaintiffs. Whereupon the complainant alleged that said patent had not only been sustained by long public concession, but also by the verdict of a jury and the judgment of a court, upon an ample trial upon the merits, and he, therefore, respectfully suggested that he had brought himself within the scope of the action of this court, by way of injunction, to protect his rights. The bill concluded with a prayer for an account and an injunction.

On the 19th of November, 1844, John C. Turner filed his separate answer, stating that a patent subsequent in date to Woodworth's was granted to Uri Emmons, for a new and useful improvement in the mode of planing floor-plank, and grooving, tongueing and straightening the edges of the same, planing boards, planing and straightening square timber, &c., by machinery, at one operation, called the cylindrical planing-machine; and that, by sundry assignments, the interest in the two patents of Woodworth and Emmons, for all the state of Maryland, except that part lying west of the Blue Ridge, became vested in the respondent and his co-defendant, with the right to receive the benefit, within said limits, of any improvement in the machinery, or alteration or renewal of the patent. That by virtue thereof, at the time of the supposed renewal of the patent granted to William Woodworth, the interest therein for the state of Maryland, except that part of said state lying west of the Blue Ridge, was vested in the respondent and his co-defendant, jointly with John Walsh and Samuel House, to whom, to that extent, said renewal, if valid at all, accrued by force of an agreement in one of the deeds of assignment, through which the defendants trace their title, dated the 28th November, 1829; and at the time of the expiration of the said patent, on the 27th of December, 1842, the said right, by assignment to them of the interest of said Walsh and House, was vested wholly in the respondent and his co-defendant. That he knew nothing of the supposed purchase alleged in the bill to have been made by the complainant of the said William W. Woodworth, but he denied that the said William W. Woodworth had any right to convey to the complainant the rights and privileges which he claimed to derive from that purchase. That the respondent and his co-defendant were the proprietors of a machine which they employed in the business of planing, and that it was erected at a very great expense, and a very large capital was employed in carrying on the business connected therewith. That the said machine was erected before the expiration of the original patents granted to Woodworth and Emmons, by those who were possessed of the privileges conferred by both those patents for all the state of Maryland except that part lying west of the Blue Ridge. That this respondent and his co-defendant had invested their capital in the said machine and in the said business, upon the faith of the several assignments aforesaid, and believing that they would be entitled to carry on the said business and use the said machine, either, in case the said patents expired, with the public at large, or, if either or both of them were renewed, by virtue of the agreement contained in one of the said deeds, that all renewals of either of them should accrue to the benefit of the parties in interest; and he asserted that they were entitled to do so, even if the machine which they employed were substantially the same, in principle and mode of operation, with the machine for which letters patent were granted to the said Woodworth as aforesaid, which he denied. That he knew nothing about the disclaimer of a part of the invention of William Woodworth made by William W. Woodworth, or of the trial in the district court of Massachusetts. That he believed the patent-right above recited as granted to Uri Emmons, was identical in principle and in mode of operation with the machine now used by the respondent and his co-defendant. And further, that the patent granted to said Woodworth was in part for facing and dressing brick, and cutting mouldings on or facing metallic, mineral or other substances; and he believed that said method was not capable of being applied to metallic or mineral substances, or to any other substance than wood, and that he was advised that said patent is therefore void.

Subsequently to the filing of this answer, the parties filed in the cause the following agreement:³ It is agreed that this cause be set down for final hearing, and submitted upon bill and answer, and the following statement of facts, which it is agreed shall be taken and received as though the same had been regularly proved under a commission issued and returned in the cause, either party to have the right to appeal to the supreme court, from such decision as the circuit court may see fit to make.

Statement of facts: It is admitted that, on the 27th December, 1828, William Woodworth obtained letters patent of the United States, for a new and useful improvement in the method of planing, tongueing, grooving and cutting into mouldings, either plank, boards or any other materials, and for reducing the same to an equal width or thickness; and also for facing and dressing brick, and cutting mouldings on, or facing metallic, mineral or other substances. That subsequently, the said William Woodworth died in the city of New York, when letters of administration upon his estate were granted by the surrogate of the county of New York, unto William W. Woodworth, a son of the deceased. That subsequently, the said administrator applied to the commissioner of patents for an extension of the said letters patent, when, on the 16th November, 1842, the board to whom, under the statute in such case made and provided, the said application was referred, did adjudge and certify in writing that the letters patent aforesaid should be extended; whereupon the commissioner of patents did renew and extend the said patent for the term of seven years, from and after the expiration of the term of fourteen years, for which the said patent was originally granted. That subsequently, on the 2d January, 1843, the said William W. Woodworth, administrator, did make disclaimer of all that part of the claim which is mentioned in said letters patent, which relates to the use of the circular saws, for reducing floor-plank and other materials to a width. That subsequently, the said William W. Woodworth, administrator as aforesaid, on the 9th August, 1843, did convey to the plaintiff, James G. Wilson, all his right, title and interest in and to the said patent-right and renewal, in and for the state of Maryland (except the western part thereof, which lies west of the Blue Ridge), and no other place whatever.

It is admitted further, for the purpose of the present suit, that at the time of the filing of the bill of this cause, the defendants were using, in their planing mill, in the city of Baltimore, a machine or machines which were substantially the same, in principle and mode of operation, with that described in the specification attached to the letters patent aforesaid, without the license of the said plaintiff, or the said administrator, or any grantee or grantees under them, or either of them.

It is admitted that, on the 4th December, 1828, William Woodworth, the inventor, sold and conveyed half of his interest in the said invention to James Strong. That on the 25th April, 1829, one Uri Emmons obtained a patent for a new and useful improvement in the mode of planing floor-plank, and grooving and tongueing and straightening the edge of the same, planing boards, straightening and planing square timber, &c., by machinery, at one operation, called the cylindrical planing-machine. That afterwards, on the 16th May, 1829, the said Emmons sold his entire interest, in the last mentioned patent, to Daniel H. Toogood, Daniel Halstead and William Tyack. That afterwards, on the 28th November, 1829, the following mutual deed of assignment was executed between Woodworth and Strong, on the one part, and Toogood, Halstead, Tyack and Emmons on the other part, by which Woodworth and Strong conveyed to Toogood, Halstead and Tyack, all their interest in the patent of December 27th, 1828, in the following places, namely, in the city and county of Albany, in the state of New York; in the state of Maryland (except the western part, which lies west of the Blue Ridge); in Tennessee, Alabama, South Carolina, Georgia, the Floridas, Louisiana, Missouri and the territory west of the Mississippi; and Toogood, Halstead, Tyack and Emmons conveyed to Strong and Woodworth all their interest in Emmons' patent of 25th April, 1829, for the rest and residue of the United States; by which mutual deed of assignment the parties agreed that any improvement in the machinery, or alteration or renewal of either patent, such improvement, alteration or renewal should enure to the benefit of the respective parties in interest, and might be applied and used within their respective districts. That subsequently, on the 28th December, 1829, Tyack conveyed all his interest in the two patents to William Henry Culver. That subsequently, Toogood disposed of his entire interest in the two patents to Halstead. That subsequently, on the 15th October, 1830, Halstead assigned all his interest to William H. Culver, in whom all the interest conveyed by Woodworth & Strong under the joint deed became centred. That subsequently, on the 4th May, 1831, Culver assigned all his interest within the state of Maryland, except that part thereof lying west of the Blue Ridge, to Samuel T. Bladford. That subsequently, on the 6th September, 1831, Bladford sold his interest to Richard G. Howland. That subsequently, Howland, by deeds dated on the 7th September and 3d October, respectively, conveyed to Zachariah Woollen an equal interest with himself in the two patents within the limits last aforesaid. That subsequently, on the 1st April, 1836, Howland &

³ The papers referred to as part of this agreement are omitted, as they are too lengthy to be inserted, and their substance sufficiently appears.

Woollen assigned all their interest to Joseph Turner, Jr., one of the defendants, John Walsh and Samuel House. That subsequently, on the said 1st April, 1836, Turner, Walsh and House conveyed two-fifths of their interest to Richard S. Howland. That subsequently, on the 1st August, 1836, Howland conveyed one-half of the two-fifths held by him to Edwin P. Starr. That subsequently, Starr and Howland, on the 7th April, 1838, assigned their interest to the said Turner, Walsh and House. That subsequently, by two assignments, dated on the 31st December, 1839, and 10th December, 1842, respectively, Walsh and House conveyed their interest to the two defendants, Joseph Turner, Jr., and John C. Turner.

It is further admitted, for the purposes of this suit, that at a trial which took place at May term, 1846, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, in the case of Washburn and others v. Gould, the originality of the invention by Woodworth, the patentee, became a question, and was decided in favor of the patentee.

Reverdy Johnson and John W. B. Latrobe, for plaintiff.

Wm. Schley and Hugh Davey Evans, for defendants.

Before TANEY, Circuit Justice, and HEATH, District Judge.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. This case comes before the court upon a bill filed by James G. Wilson, against Joseph C. Turner, Jr., and John C. Turner, to restrain them from using a certain machine for planing planks and boards and other materials, which the said Turners have erected and are using in the city of Baltimore. John C. Turner, one of the defendants, has answered, and the material facts of the case as they appear upon the bill, answer and exhibits, so far as they affect this controversy, are as follows:

On the 27th of December, 1828, William Woodworth, of the state of New York, obtained a patent for the machine in question, of which, as the case now stands, he appears to have been the inventor, and according to the laws of congress then in force, this patent gave him and his assignees and grantees the exclusive right to use this invention for fourteen years from the date of his patent, and no longer; consequently, his monopoly would expire on the 27th day of December, 1842.

On the 28th of November, 1829, Woodworth, the patentee, and James Strong (who had, by purchase from the patentee, become entitled to one-half of the interest in the patent), in consideration of the assignment to him of a rival patent, assigned to Toogood, Halstead and Tyack, and their assigns, all their right and interest in the patent, to be sold and used in the following places: "namely, in the county of Albany, in the state of New York; in the state of Maryland (except the western part thereof, which lies west of the Blue Ridge); in Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, South Carolina, Georgia, the Floridas, Louisiana, Missouri and the territories west of the Mississippi, and not in any other state or place within the limits of the United States, or the territories thereof; to have and to hold the rights and privileges thereby granted, to them and their assigns for and during the term of fourteen years from the date of the patent:" as more fully appears by reference to the deed of assignment filed in the case. The respondents claim the right to construct and use the machine in question, by title derived from these assignees.

Woodworth, the patentee, died some time before the 9th of February, 1839; on which day, letters of administration on his estate were granted to William W. Woodworth; and on the 16th of November, 1842, the administrator obtained from the board of commissioners established by the act of congress of 4th July, 1836, the renewal and extension of the patent, for the term of seven years from and after the expiration of the first term of fourteen years; and on the 9th of August, 1843, Woodworth the administrator assigned to James G. Wilson the complainant, all his right, title and interest, in and to the said letters patent renewed and extended as aforesaid, for the state of Maryland, east of the Blue Ridge; and under this assignment, he claims the exclusive right to the use of this machine, in the part of this state above mentioned, from the date of the assignment, until the expiration of the extended term of seven years; and he insists that Toogood, Halstead and Tyack, and those claiming under them, have no right in the patent, by virtue of the assignment of 28th November, 1829, at the expiration of the original term of fourteen years; and that the continued use of it by the respondents is an infringement of his right. It is upon this ground that he asks for the injunction.

At the time this patent was originally granted to Woodworth, and at the time of the assignment to Toogood, Halstead and Tyack, and the subsequent assignments, until one of the defendants became interested in the patent as assignee, there was no law authorizing, under any circumstances, the extension of a patent beyond fourteen years. At the expiration of that period of time, the exclusive rights of the patentee, and his assignees and grantees, terminated, and every person had the right to use the invention without any consent or license from the inventor. But by the act of July 4, 1836 (section 18), the patentee of an invention or discovery was authorized to obtain a renewal and extension of the patent for seven years, after the expiration of the term of fourteen years, upon proving, to the satisfaction of the board of commissioners, established by that act, that he had failed to obtain from the use and sale of his invention, a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity and expense bestowed upon it, and the introduction thereof into use; and that thereupon the said patent should have the same effect in law, as though it had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years; and the same act provides, that the benefit of such renewal shall extend to the assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented, to the extent of their respective interests therein. This power of extension applied to patents granted before the passage of the act, as well as to those which should be afterwards issued, and consequently, embraced the patent in question.

The dispute now before us arises upon the construction of the provision in favor of assignees and grantees. It is contended, on the part of the complainant, that this provision embraces only the rights which had been acquired in the original term of fourteen years, and that assignees and grantees of the original patent can claim no benefit, from their contracts, in the extended term of seven years; that the latter enures altogether to the benefit of the patentee; gives him the exclusive right to vend, assign and use the invention during that period; and authorizes him to prevent the use of it by those who had purchased the privilege for themselves immediately, or for particular districts of country, for the original time. If this be the construction of the act of congress, the provision in favor of assignees and grantees would seem to the court to be useless and nugatory. No one would suppose that the grant of this new right annulled all contracts made under the old one, and that giving to the patentee an additional term of seven years, would deprive purchasers of the rights which they had acquired in the original term, before the renewal was granted. If the patentee had assigned all his right, in a particular district or state, for and during the whole fourteen years, or even for a shorter period, surely that contract would continue binding upon him, notwithstanding he afterwards procured an extension of his patent, and congress could hardly have deemed it necessary to make a special provision for its protection. Certainly, according to this construction, assignees or grantees would derive no advantage from the renewal; yet the law clearly intended that they should share in the benefit conferred on the patentee, and have some advantage from the extension of the patent for seven years; for it provides, in express terms, that the benefit of the renewal shall extend to them, thus using a word which shows that it was not the intent of the legislature merely to protect interests which previously existed in assignees and grantees, but to give them a share in the benefit conferred on the patentee by the renewal of the patent.

Moreover, assignees who had purchased the title of the patentee, in particular states and territories, and individuals who had paid for the right to use the invention during the original period of the monopoly, might have suffered serious injustice by the grant of a new and further term to the patentee, unless they were embraced in it; and they would, therefore, very naturally and properly be the objects of protection. For in cases like the present, where the patent was issued, and the purchaser obtained his assignment, before the passage of the act of 1836, both parties must have understood that the exclusive right of the patentee for its whole period was transferred; and that at the expiration of the fourteen years, the assignee would have the right to use the invention without interruption, and without paying the inventor any further compensation.

The object of the clause in question is to preserve the contract, in the sense in which both parties understood and intended it, at the time it was made, and to secure to the purchaser the right which he intended to buy, and supposed he had bought, and which the patentee must have intended to sell, and at the time of the contract, must have supposed he had sold. Indeed, the power of extension given by the act of 1836 would have operated most unjustly upon those who had purchased the right to use a patented machine, if it had not been accompanied by a provision for their protection; for, relying on the assurance given by the law, as it stood when the contract was made, that they had purchased for the whole period of the monopoly, and that they might lawfully continue the use of the invention after the expiration of the fourteen years, many grantees, after having obtained the assignment or grant from the patentee, had undoubtedly erected costly machinery, and encountered expenses, which they would not have incurred, if they had supposed it would be in the power of the patentee to forbid the use of his invention, after the time limited by his original patent; and, if with these expenses incurred and arrangements made for the continued use of the improvement, congress had passed the law of 1836, without this provision in favor of assignees and grantees, it would have enabled the patentee to deal with them most severely and oppressively, and to exact from them a far heavier sum for the extended term of seven years, than they would have been willing, under other circumstances, to have given for the original term of fourteen.

The legislature obviously, we think, intended to guard the party who had purchased from the patentee the right to use his invention until the expiration of his exclusive privilege, from the necessity of buying it again. And when they were giving the patentee a new privilege, and one which he had no legal right to demand, they had undoubtedly a right to annex to it such conditions and limitation as, in their judgment, justice required.

The construction which we put upon the law is conformable also to the previous legislation of congress upon a similar subject; for in the act passed the 21st January, 1808, entitled "An act for the relief of Oliver Evans" (6 Stat. 70), whereby, in consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, a new patent was granted to him, after the expiration of the original one, there is an express provision, that no person who had before paid him for a license to use his improvements, should be obliged to renew it, or be subject to damages for not renewing it; thus granting the new patent upon the same principles, with reference to purchasers, that has been adopted and followed in the act of 1836, in cases of the extension of the term.

It is true, as was urged in the argument, that the right of extension is obviously given by the law, chiefly with a view to the advantage of the inventor, and not of his assignees or grantees; and that the patent, if extended at all, must be extended on the application of the inventor, and not his assignees; and the reason of this distinction is evident. The assignee purchases because he supposes the improvement is worth the money he pays for it, and that he can make a profit by his bargain; and if it afterwards turns out that he was mistaken, and his speculation in the patent-right proves to be a losing one, there would be no more justice in giving him a new privilege, whereby the public would be compelled to make good his losses, than there would be in the case of any other speculation, which proved to be unfortunate. But the same reason which would operate to prevent an extension to the assignee, would apply with equal force between the patentee and assignee, where the right to extend was conferred on the former. For he assigns his right to the exclusive privilege in a particular district of country, or grants it to a particular individual for his own use, for a price which he deems adequate, and is willing to take; and it would hardly be just, if the invention afterwards proved to be more valuable than he himself supposed it to be, to re-invest him on that account with the exclusive privilege for a new term, in such a manner as would enable him to compel those who had already bought, to buy again; the more especially, when the enhanced value is often produced by the industry and expenditures of the assignee or grantee, in bringing it into more public use and more general notice.

There is one evident distinction, however, between the patentee and assignee, so far as the public is concerned. If the invention is a valuable one, the inventor confers a benefit upon the public, and yet, without any fault of his, he may fail to obtain a reasonable remuneration within the fourteen years, for the time, ingenuity and expense which he bestowed upon it; his title may be controverted, and a large portion of the time spent in expensive litigation; he may be unable to erect the improvements necessary to show its value and bring it into notice; he may have been unable to make sale of his privilege to others, upon terms which he was willing to take; and as between him and the public, therefore, which is to be ultimately benefited by the improvement, there is justice in the extension. It is to cases of this description that the act of congress applies. It proposes to do justice between the inventor and the public, while it protects assignees and grantees in the rights which they had previously acquired by contract with the patentee.

Besides, the words of the law appear to us to admit of no other interpretation than the one we have given. It declares that the benefit of the renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the thing patented, to the extent of their respective interests therein. Now, what benefit have they in the renewal, if they are excluded from the use of the thing patented during the whole of the renewed time? According to that construction of the law, so far from receiving a benefit, they would be subjected to loss. They would not even enjoy the right which they supposed they had bought, but would be compelled, at the expiration of the fourteen years, to stop the works they had constructed, at whatever loss it might occasion, unless the patentee gave them leave to proceed; yet the law, in plain terms, declares that they are to derive an advantage from the extension, and that the benefit of the renewal shall extend to them according to their respective interests. In other words, it means to provide, that assignees and grantees shall share with the patentee the benefit of the renewal, according to the interests which they had respectively acquired in the thing patented, within particular districts of country, or for their own individual use.

The construction we have given to this law, is not only called for by its language, but conforms to the principles established by congress, in a similar case, in the act of 1839. The seventh section of that act enables the inventor to obtain a patent, although he may have previously sold the right to use or vend it to different persons, provided the sale was not more than two years before his application for a patent, and provided further, that such invention had not been abandoned to the public. But the same section also provides, that the party who purchased prior to the application for a patent, may, notwithstanding the patent, continue to use the invention and vend it to others to be used, without incurring any liability to the inventor, or any other person interested in the invention. This privilege of the purchaser is without limitation as to time, and evidently would extend to a renewed or extended patent, as well as to the original term of fourteen years.

It was decided by the supreme court, in the case of McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 202, that this right is not confined to the particular machine actually constructed or manufactured before the application for the patent, but that the purchaser may continue to construct, manufacture and vend the machine or composition of matter, after the patent has been obtained. Now there can be no reason for denying to a purchaser, who makes his purchase after the patent, the privileges which the law obviously intended to secure to the party who made his purchase or obtained the license of the inventor before. If the rule is just in one case, it is just in the other; and if it be said that, in the last-mentioned case, the purchaser might not know that the inventor would ever apply for a patent, and had no reason to suppose that any obstacle would afterwards be interposed to the free and undisturbed use of the right he had purchased, the same must be said of the case now before the court: for the purchaser could not know that the inventor would ever apply for a renewed term; and when he purchased the right for the whole time of the existing monopoly, he had no reason to suppose that any new obstacle would afterwards be interposed, to prevent the free, undisturbed and continued use of that right. It would make the legislation of congress in these two laws inconsistent and contradictory in its principles, and, as we think, inconsistent with justice, in cases like the one before us, if we gave to the act of 1836 the construction contended for by the complainant.

But if the law admitted of a different construction, yet the covenant of the inventor and his partner, contained in the deed of assignment hereinbefore mentioned, of 28th November, 1829, would, in the judgment of the court be an insuperable bar to the relief asked for by the bill; for it is expressly agreed between the parties to that instrument, that any improvement in either of the patents mutually assigned, in the machinery, or any alteration or renewal of the same, shall accrue to the benefit of the respective parties in interest, and may be applied and used within their respective districts, as therein designated. It is very true that, at the time this contract was made, the law authorizing the renewal in question had not passed, and the parties probably did not contemplate the passage of such a law. But whether the word "renewal" did or did not look to the extension of time given by the act of 1836, it is evident, upon the words of the covenant, that whatever additional value either inventor might afterwards be able to obtain for his invention, it should enure to the benefit of the assignee within the district assigned. The parties were not only bound forever afterwards to offer no obstruction to one another in their particular districts, but to give to each other the full benefit of their respective exertions to increase the value of these inventions; and if they then only looked to a renewal to be procured by surrendering the existing patent, if it should be found to be defective, and taking out a new one, according to the act of July 3, 1832; yet it is very clear, that both parties intended that every benefit of every kind that might be obtained for the respective inventions, should belong to the assignees in their respective districts. They were, in that respect, to have a common interest in their inventions, and they have used the broadest words to accomplish that object; words which unquestionably embrace every mode by which the value of the patents could be increased.

Each assignee, in his respective district, was to have precisely the same rights and benefits as the patentee himself had, or might afterwards obtain, so far as concerns these inventions; and if, by a subsequent act of congress, advantages were given to the patentee, which he did not at that time possess, and which were not therefore in the contemplation of the parties, yet, according to the spirit and meaning of the covenant, the assignee had a right to stand in the place of the patentee, in his district, in respect to the new privilege as well as to the old; and it would be against equity and conscience to allow him to use a privilege, afterwards unexpectedly gained, in order to defeat his own contract, in a manner obviously inconsistent with the intention of the parties.

A case of this description is not one in which a court of equity is bound to lend its aid, even if the party had a right at law upon the technical construction of the covenant. But we think that the word "renewal" is broad enough to embrace not only renewals then authorized by law, but renewals that might afterwards be provided for; and that this construction of the word conforms in every respect to the scope and spirit of the agreement, and carries into effect the evident intention and design of the parties at the time they made it, and is the only construction which will do equal justice to both parties. Upon the whole, therefore, the court are of opinion that the complainant is not entitled to relief, and that his bill must be dismissed. Bill dismissed with costs.

The WILSON v. UNITED STATES.

[1 Brock. 423.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1820.
CUSTOMS DUTIES—SCOPE OF ACT—FOREIGN PRIVATEER—NECESSITY OF REPORT AND ENTRY—IMPORTATION OF COLOURED SEAMEN.

1. The 31 section of the act of congress passed on the 2d of March, 1799 [1 Stat. 651], "to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," which exempts "ships or vessels of war" from the necessity of making a report and entry, on arriving at any of the ports of the United States, from any foreign port or place, extends as well to privateers as to national ships.

2. The power of controlling navigation, is incidental to the power to regulate commerce, which the constitution confers upon congress; and, consequently, the power of congress over the vessel, is co-extensive with that over the cargo.

[Cited in U. S. v. Jackson, Case No. 15,458.]

3. The act of congress of the 28th of February, 1803 [2 Stat. 205], forbidding any master or captain of a ship or vessel, to import or bring, into any port of the United States, any negro, mulatto, or other person of colour, under certain penalties, where the admission or importation of such persons is prohibited by the laws of such state, does not apply to coloured seamen, employed in navigating such ship or vessel.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Virginia.]

The brig Wilson, Ivory Huntress, commander, was libelled in the court below, and the vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, thirty-one demi-johns of brandy, thirteen cases of gin, and several other articles, claimed as forfeited to the United States, for violating the act of congress "to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;" and also for bringing into the state of Virginia, several persons of colour, from a foreign port, contrary to the laws of the said state, and in contravention of the act of congress, entitled, "An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain states, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited." The four first counts of the libel, charged, that the said spirits, &c., were imported, and brought into the United States, on the — day of October, 1819, by sea, in vessels of less capacity than ninety gallons, wine measure, from some foreign port, unknown, into the port of Norfolk, in Virginia, on board the brig Wilson, which were not mentioned in the manifest and report made by the commander of the vessel, but were carefully concealed, for the purpose of evading the payment of the duty thereon, and were discovered by an agent, specially appointed by the collector of the port of Norfolk, after diligent search, &c. The fifth count in the libel, charged, that the said brig Wilson, so arriving in the port of Norfolk, in Virginia, had on board three persons of colour, not being native citizens or registered seamen of the United States, or seamen, natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, the admission or importation of such persons being prohibited by the laws of Virginia; and that the said three persons of colour were landed from on board the said brig, contrary to the form of the act of congress, whereby the said vessel, her tackle, &c., had become forfeited to the United States.

The claimant and respondent, Huntress, in his answer to the above libel, admitted that the brig Wilson did come into the port of Norfolk, on or about the 27th day of October, 1819, having on board the brandy and gin, &c. mentioned in the libel, but affirmed that the Wilson was a private vessel of war, duly commissioned by the United Provinces of Venezuela, and New Grenada, and belonged to a citizen thereof, and that she sailed from Marguerita, on a cruise, about the 18th of August preceding, with a crew of nearly ninety persons: that in addition to the stores and other supplies, taken on board at Marguerita for the use of the crew, sundry articles of merchandise were captured on the high seas, as prize of war, and among them, the brandy and gin now libelled, which were intended to be used as sea stores of the ship, and not as merchandise. That the vessel put into the port of Norfolk, with intent to refit, and obtain supplies in the United States, without any intention, that the spirits should be unladen, or sold in the United States, and with intent that the same should be carried out again on the departure of the vessel. That on board of such armed vessels, it is not within the province of the captain, personally to inspect, or take an account of such articles, when on board; but the practice is, that such inspection and account are made and taken by some inferior officer, on whose official report of the quantity he relies. That on the arrival of the vessel at Norfolk, the first and second officer having departed, he gave orders to the clerk to examine, and report the articles on board, to enable this respondent to make his report to the collector of the port of Norfolk. That the failure of the clerk to enumerate the demi-johns of brandy, and cases of gin, in the manifest, was purely accidental, resulting from the haste in which it was prepared, and the confusion on board. That these articles were not concealed, but were deposited in the usual and proper place on board the vessel, and with the other articles reported in the manifest, and delivered to the collector. In responding to the fifth count in the libel, he denied that the three persons of colour were landed from on board the Wilson, and affirmed that they were persons engaged in the navigation of a foreign armed vessel, and constituted part of her crew. He, therefore, prays restitution, &c.

The evidence on behalf of the United States, consisted in the depositions of William Bush, supernumerary inspector of the customs for the port of Norfolk; of W. P. Davis, captain of a pilot boat; of Francis Benson, commander of a revenue cutter; and of Alexander Tunstall, deputy collector for the port of Norfolk. Bush said, that he was ordered on board of the brig Wilson on the 28th of October, 1819, to see the powder discharged. After the powder was discharged, under his inspection, the vessel, which had been lying between the forts, got under weigh and went up into the harbour. On the 29th of October, Captain Huntress made out prize tickets for his crew, a number of whom were persons of colour. The deponent examined their baggage, but found no merchandise among it. He visited the ward room, birth deck, cabin, and fore-castle, and in the ward room discovered a great variety of articles, and among the rest, several demijohns of Spanish brandy, and cases of gin, which he was told were ship stores, and which were not comprised in the manifest given in on the 31st of October, by the captain. On the 1st of November, deponent went on board again, by request of the captain, and found a great part of the crew discharged that morning, of different colours and nations, whose baggage he inspected, and found no merchandise in it. While on board, Captain Benson, in the revenue boat, came along side, and assisted him in examining the vessel, and they found the same articles previously spoken of. The deposition of Benson was to the same effect. Davis stated, that about half way between Old Point Comfort and Cape Henry, he, being the commander of the pilot boat Anne of Hampton, on the 26th of October, 1819, about 10 or 11 o'clock p. m. was hailed, by some person on board of a vessel, then at anchor on the Horse Shoe, who inquired if there were any men of war in Hampton Roads, and then requested him to come on board, and take some goods, which he refused to do. The person conversing with him, said the vessel was called the brig Wilson. She was the same vessel detained by the officers of the customs, and then in dispute. Tunstall said, that on the day, or the day following that on which the search was directed of the brig Wilson, Captain Huntress made an application at the office of the customs, to make a post entry of a number of articles, stating that he had depended on his officers, and in consequence of an improper report from them, the goods were not included in the manifest. He was informed that if the proper entry was not made, from accident or mistake, it might be corrected. The captain then stated that some of the articles not entered, were taken at sea. This conversation took place after the discovery of the articles, spoken of by Bush and Benson, and about four days after the entry had been made, all of which articles were omitted in the manifest. On being interrogated what was the usual allowance per man in merchant ships, of spirits as stores, the deponent stated, that about four gallons per man were usually allowed, but that this depended somewhat on the length of the voyage, and in the case of armed cruisers, they had generally come in short of stores, and no instance of excess had occurred in practice to settle the rule in the office.

On the part of the claimant, the depositions of several of the officers of the brig Wilson, were read, all substantially proving the same facts, viz.: That about the 12th of August preceding, the privateer brig, Wilson, Ivory Huntress, commander, sailed from Marguerita, under a commission from the government of Venezuela, and proceeded to St. Thomas: that while at St. Thomas, the crew of the vessel was reinforced, by the addition of some eighteen seamen, principally people of colour, and all free. The vessel then sailed from St. Thomas, on an intended cruise of six months. At this time, the crew consisted of about eighty or ninety, inclusive, and among them were many free people of colour. During the cruise, two Spanish schooners, and one English ship, having Spanish property on board, were captured. The ship, and one of the schooners, were sent under prize masters to Marguerita, and the other schooner was abandoned, after some mutineers from the Wilson were put on board. From this schooner, they took on board of the Wilson, as prize, various articles, among them, demijohns of brandy, cases of gin, &c. The brandy and gin, and other small articles, were added to the stock of stores for the crew, and some of the gin was repeatedly afterwards served out to the crew. Several days before they reached the United States, when the Wilson was on the outer edge of the Gulf Stream, she fell in with an American schooner, called the Wasp, bound for Baltimore, and put on board of her several articles of merchandise, which were captured from the Spanish schooner, and Thomas B. Grey, of the Wilson, was sent in with the goods to Baltimore. The Wilson arrived at Norfolk, on the 27th of October, 1819, having put in to refit, with intent to depart and resume her cruise in a short time.

The district court, on the hearing of the cause, decreed, that the 31 demijohns of brandy, the 13 cases of gin, and merchandise, according to schedule, were forfeited to the United States, under the 29th and 68th sections of the act of congress, entitled, "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage." "And it appearing to the court, that three persons of colour, as charged in the libel, were brought in, and landed from the said brig Wilson, not being native citizens, or registered seamen of the United States, or seamen, natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, in violation of the act of congress of the United States, entitled, 'An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain states, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited;' whereby the said brig Wilson, together with her guns, stores, tackle, apparel, and furniture, have become forfeited to the United States, and they are decreed to be forfeited accordingly." [Case unreported.] From this decree, the claimant appealed to this court.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. The four first counts of this case, present for the consideration of the court, a general question of considerable importance. It is this: Does the act "to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage"² apply to privateers, not engaged in the importation of goods? The 31st section enacts "that it shall not be necessary for the master, or person having the command of any ship or vessel of war, &c., to make such report and entry as aforesaid." If the words "ship or vessel of war," be construed to comprehend a privateer, there is an end of this part of the case, because, if no report or entry is required, it cannot be pretended, that any of the provisions of the act extend to a privateer, demeaning herself in her military character, and not performing the office of a merchant vessel.

The counsel for the appellant has certainly urged many reasons, which have great weight in favour of the construction for which he contends. The term, "ship or vessel of war," has been considered, and, I think, properly considered, as a generic term, including both national ships, and private armed ships. When it is used generally, it comprehends both, unless the context, or the subject matter, should exclude the one or the other. The authorities cited at bar, show, that courts and writers on public law, have used the term in this general sense. If either the language, or the objects of this law, be consulted, I think they strengthen this natural and comprehensive construction of these words. The object of the law, is professedly and obviously to raise a revenue from commerce and consumption, not to regulate the conduct of the ships of war, whether public or private, of foreign nations. All the regulations are obviously calculated for merchant vessels, and not one calculated for privateers, who might come into our ports, although a totally distinct provision for them, would certainly be necessary. The language of the law, applies it to vessels destined for the United States, not to vessels destined for a cruise on the high seas. The form of the manifest requires, that the importer should state, to what port the vessel is bound, and to whom the goods are consigned; regulations not adapted to goods captured at sea, by a cruiser. If this act applies to privateers, the tonnage duty would be demandable. But it cannot be supposed, that this duty is imposed on privateers, employed in cruising, and not in the conveyance of merchandise.

It is also an argument, which deserves consideration, that the policy of the United States has been unfriendly to the sale, in our ports, of prizes made by foreign privateers, on nations with whom we are at peace. Some of our treaties contain express stipulations against it; and the course of the government has been, to prohibit the practice, even where no specific engagements bind us to do so. Were the revenue laws, applicable to privateers, and to their prizes and prize goods, they would give a right to introduce those goods in opposition to the avowed and uniform policy of the government. The doctrine, that the validity of prizes could not be adjudged in our ports, would be of little importance, if they could be brought in and sold.

I think, then, that our revenue laws do not apply to privateers, unless they take up the character of merchant-men, by attempting to import goods. When they do so, they attempt, under the garb of their military character, to conceal real commercial transactions. This would be fraud on the revenue laws, which no nation will or ought to tolerate. The privateer, which acts as a merchant vessel, must be treated and considered as a merchant vessel. In this case, there is no evidence, that any goods were landed, or that more were brought in, than were intended to be carried out. The only evidence, which I think at all important, is that of the pilot. His testimony, certainly, excited suspicion. Opposed to it, however, is the testimony of the witnesses belonging to the vessel, who say, that the spirits were designed for the crew, to be used as stores.

I proceed, now, to the fifth count in the libel. The first question which will be considered in this part of the case, will be the constitutionality of the act of congress, under which this condemnation has been made. It will readily be admitted, that the power of the legislature of the Union, on this subject, is derived entirely from the 3d clause of the 8th section of the 1st article of the constitution. That clause enables congress, "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes." What is the extent of this power to regulate commerce? Does it not comprehend the navigation of the country? May not the vessels, as well as the articles they bring, be regulated? Upon what principle is it, that the ships of any foreign nation have been forbidden, under pain of forfeiture, to enter our ports? The authority to make such laws has never been questioned; and yet, it can be sustained by no other clause in the constitution, than that which enables congress to regulate commerce. If this power over vessels is not in congress, where does it reside? Certainly it is not annihilated; and if not, it must reside somewhere. Does it reside in the states? No American politician has ever been so extravagant as to contend for this. No man has been wild enough to maintain, that, although the power to regulate commerce, gives congress an unlimited power over the ² "And be it further enacted, that it shall not be necessary for the master, or the person having the charge, or command, of any ship or vessel of war, or of any ship or vessel, employed by any prince, or state, as a public packet, for the conveyance of letters and despatches, and not permitted, by the laws of such prince, or state, to be employed in the transportation of goods, wares, or merchandise, in the way of trade, to make such report and entry, as aforesaid." Act March 2, 1799, c. 128, § 31; 1 Story's Laws, 600.

cargoes, it does not enable that body to control the vehicle in which they are imported; that, while the whole power of commerce is vested in congress, the state legislatures may confiscate every vessel which enters their ports, and congress is unable to prevent their entry. Let it be admitted, for the sake of argument, that a law, forbidding a free man of any colour, to come into the United States, would be void, and that no penalty, imposed on him by congress, could be enforced; still, the vessel, which should bring him into the United States, might be forfeited, and that forfeiture enforced; since even an empty vessel, or a packet, employed solely in the conveyance of passengers and letters, may be regulated and forfeited. There is not, in the constitution, one syllable on the subject of navigation. And yet, every power that pertains to navigation has been uniformly exercised, and, in the opinion of all, been rightfully exercised, by congress. From the adoption of the constitution, till this time, the universal sense of America has been, that the word "commerce," as used in that instrument, is to be considered a generic term, comprehending navigation, or, that a control over navigation is necessarily incidental to the power to regulate commerce. I could feel no difficulty in saying, that the power to regulate commerce clearly comprehended the case, were there no other clauses in the constitution, showing the sense of the convention on that subject. But there is a clause which would remove the doubt, if any could exist.

The first clause of the ninth section, declares, that "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the states, now existing, shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the congress, prior to the year 1808." This has been truly said to be a limitation of the power of congress to regulate commerce, and it will not be pretended, that a limitation of a power is to be construed into a grant of power. But, though such a limitation be not a grant, it is certainly evidence of the extent which those who made both the grant and limitation, attributed to the grant. The framers of our constitution could never have declared, that a given power should not, for a limited time, be exercised on a particular object, if, in their opinion, it could never be exercised on that object. Suppose the grant and the limitation be brought together, the clause would read thus: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce, &c., but this power shall not be so exercised, as to prohibit the migration, or importation of such persons, as any of the states now existing, may think proper to admit, prior to the year 1808." Would it be possible to doubt, that the power to regulate commerce, in the sense in which those words were used in the constitution, included the power to prohibit the migration, or importation, of any persons whatever, into the states, except so far as this power might be restrained by other clauses of the constitution? I think it would be impossible. It appears to me, then, that the power of congress over vessels, which might bring in persons of any description, whatever, was complete before the year 1808, except that it could not be so exercised, as to prohibit the importation or migration of any persons, whom any state, in existence at the formation of the constitution, might think proper to admit. The act of congress, then, is to be construed with a view to this restriction, on the power of the legislature; and the only question will be, whether it comprehends this case? The case is that the brig Wilson, a private armed cruiser, commissioned by the government of Buenos Ayres, came into Norfolk, navigated by a crew some of whom were people of colour. They were however, all free men, and all of them sailors, composing a part of the crew. While in port, some of them were discharged, and came on shore. The libel charges that three persons of colour were landed from the vessel, whose admission or importation was prohibited by the laws of Virginia, contrary to the act of congress, by which the vessel was forfeited. Is this case within the act of congress, passed the 28th of February 1803?³

³ An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain states, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited.

Section 1. Be it enacted, that from and after the first of April next, no master or captain of any ship or vessel, or any other person, shall import or bring, or cause to be imported or brought, any negro, mulatto, or other person of colour, not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman, of the United States, or seamen, natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, into any port or place of the United States, which port or place shall be situated in any state, which, by law, has prohibited, or shall prohibit, the admission, or importation of such negro, mulatto, or other person of colour. And if any captain, or master aforesaid, or any other person, shall import or bring, or cause to be imported or brought, into any of the ports or places aforesaid, any of the persons whose admission or importation, is prohibited, as aforesaid, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars for each, and every negro, mulatto, or other person of colour aforesaid, brought or imported as aforesaid; to be sued for and recovered by action of debt, in any court of the United States; one half thereof to the use of the United States, the other half, to any person or persons prosecuting for the penalty: and in any action instituted for the recovery of the penalty aforesaid, the person or persons sued, may be held to special bail: provided always, that nothing contained in this act, shall be construed to prohibit the admission of Indians.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, that no ship or vessel, arriving in any of the said ports or places of the United States, and having on board any negro, mulatto or other person of colour, not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman of the United States, or seamen, natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, as aforesaid, shall be admitted to an entry. And if any such negro, mulatto, or other person of colour, shall be landed from on board any ship, or vessel, in any of the ports or places aforesaid, or on the coast of any state prohibiting the admission or importation as aforesaid, the said ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture,

The first section, which is the prohibiting part of the act, is in these words: "From and after the first day of April next, no master or captain of any ship or vessel, or any other persons, shall import or bring, or cause to be imported or brought, any negro, mulatto, or any person of colour, &c." There are nice shades or gradations in language, which are more readily perceived than described, and the mind impressed with a particular idea, readily employs those words which express it most appropriately. Words which have a direct and common meaning, may also be used in a less common sense, but we do not understand them in the less common sense, unless the context, or the clear design of the person using them, requires them to be so understood. Now the verbs, "to import," or "to bring in," seem to me to indicate, and are most commonly employed as indicating, the action of a person on any thing, animate or inanimate, which is itself passive. The agent, or those who are concerned in the agency or importation, are not, in common language, said to be imported or brought in. It is true that a vessel coming into port, is the vehicle which brings in her crew, but we do not in common language say, that the mariners are "imported," or brought in by a particular vessel; we rather say they bring in the vessel. So, too, if the legislature intended to punish the captain of a vessel, for employing seamen of a particular description, or for allowing these seamen to come on shore, we should expect that this intention would be expressed by more appropriate words, than "to import" or "bring in." These words are peculiarly applicable to persons not concerned in navigating the vessel. It is not probable, then, that in making this provision, a regulation respecting the crew of a vessel was in the mind of congress. But it is contended, on the part of the prosecution, that the succeeding words of the sentence, exempting certain descriptions of persons from the general prohibition, show that the prohibition itself was intended to comprehend the crew, as well as those who did not belong to the vessel. Those words are, "not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman of the United States, or seamen natives shall be forfeited to the United States, and one half of the net proceeds of the sales on such forfeiture shall inure, and be paid over, to such person or persons, on whose information the seizure on such forfeiture shall be made.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, that it shall be the duty of the collectors, and other officers of the customs, and all other officers of the revenue of the United States, in the several ports or places situated as aforesaid, to notice, and be governed by, the provisions of the laws now existing, in the several states, prohibiting the admission or importation of any negro, mulatto, or other person of colour, as aforesaid. And they are hereby enjoined vigilantly to carry into effect the said laws of said states, conformably to the provisions of this act; any law of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding. Act Feb. 28, 1803, c. 63.

of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope." That this limitation, proves the prohibition to have been intended to comprehend free-men, as well as slaves, must, I think, be admitted. But it does not follow, that it was, also, intended to comprehend the crew of a vessel, actually employed in her navigation, and not put on board, in fraud of the law. A person of colour, who is a registered seaman of the United States, may be imported, or brought into the United States, in a vessel in which he is not employed as a mariner. The construction, therefore, which would extend the prohibitory part of the sentence, to the crew of the vessel, in consequence of the language of the exception, is not a necessary construction, though I must admit, that it derives much strength from that language. The forfeiture of the vessel is not, in this section of the act, but I have noticed its construction, because it is not reasonable to suppose, that it was intended to forfeit a vessel for an act, which was not prohibited. The second section enacts, "that no ship or vessel, arriving in any of the said ports or places of the United States, and having on board any negro, mulatto, or other person of colour, not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman of the United States; or seamen, natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, as aforesaid, shall be admitted to an entry." It is obvious, that this clause was intended to refuse an entry to every vessel, which had violated the prohibition contained in the first section; and that the words, "having on board" were used, as co-extensive with the words "import," or "bring." We had, at that time, a treaty with the emperor of Morocco, and with several other Barbary powers. Their subjects are all people of colour. It is true, they are not so engaged in commerce, as to send ships abroad. But the arrival of a Moorish vessel in our ports, is not an impossibility; and can it be believed, that this law was intended to refuse an entry to such a vessel? It may be said, that an occurrence which has never taken place, and which, in all probability, never will take place, was not in the mind of congress; and, consequently, the omission to provide for it, ought not to influence the construction of their acts. But there are many nations, with whom we have regular commerce, who employ coloured seamen. Could it be intended by congress, to refuse an entry to a French, a Spanish, an English, or a Portuguese merchant vessel, in whose crew there was a man of colour? I think this construction could never be given to the act. The words, "having on board a negro, mulatto, or other person of colour," would not, I think, be applied to a vessel, one of whose crew, was a person of colour.

The section then proceeds: "And if any such negro, &c., shall be landed from on board any ship or vessel, &c., the said ship or vessel, &c., shall be forfeited." The words, "shall be landed," seem peculiarly applicable to a person, or thing, which is imported, or brought in, and which is landed, not by its own act, but by the authority of the importer, not to a mariner, going on shore voluntarily, or on the business of the ship. The words, "such negro," &c., refer to the preceding passages, describing those whom a captain of a vessel is forbidden to import, and whose being on board a vessel exclude such vessel from an entry, and no others. If, then, the commentary, which has been made on those passages, is correct, the forfeiture is not incurred by a person of colour, coming in as part of a ship's crew, and going on shore.

Although the powers of Barbary, do not send merchant ships across the Atlantic, yet their treaties with us, contemplate the possibility of their cruizers entering our ports. Would the cruizer be forfeited, should one of the crew come on shore?

I have contended, that the power of congress to regulate commerce, comprehends, necessarily, a power over navigation, and warrants every act of national sovereignty, which any other sovereign nation may exercise over vessels, foreign or domestic, which enter our ports. But there is a portion of this power, so far as respects foreign vessels, which it is unusual for any nation to exercise, and the exercise of which would be deemed an unfriendly interference with the just rights of foreign powers. An example of this would be, an attempt to regulate the manner in which a foreign vessel should be navigated in order to be admitted into our ports; and to subject such vessel to forfeiture, if not so navigated. I will not say, that this is beyond the power of a government, but I will say, that no act ought to have this effect given to it, unless the words be such as to admit of no other rational construction.

I will now take some notice of that part of the act which has a reference to the state law. The language, both of the constitution and of the act of congress, shows, that the forfeiture was not intended to be inflicted in any case but where the state law was violated. In addition to the words, in the first and second sections of the act, which confine its operation to importations, into "a state which, by law, has prohibited, or shall prohibit, the importation of such negro," &c.; the third section enjoins it on the officers of the United States, in the states having laws containing such prohibition, "to notice and be governed by the provisions of the laws, now existing, of the several states, prohibiting the admission or importation of any negro, mulatto, or any person of colour, as aforesaid." This is not inflicting a penalty for the violation of a state law, but is limiting the operation of the penal law of the United States, by a temporary demarcation given in the constitution. The power of congress to prevent migration or importation, was not to be exercised prior to the year 1808, on any person whom any of the states might think proper to admit. All were admissible who were not prohibited. It was proper, therefore, that the act of congress should make the prohibitory act of the state, the limit of its own operation. The act of congress does not, necessarily, extend to every object comprehended in the state law, but neither its terms, nor the constitution, will permit it to be extended farther than the state law.

The first section of the act "to prevent the migration of free negroes and mulattoes" (see 1 Rev. Code Va. 1819, pp. 437, 438, c. 91, §§ 64-66) into this commonwealth, prohibits their coming voluntarily or being imported. The second section imposes a penalty on any master of a vessel, who shall bring any free negro or mulatto. The third section provides, that "the act shall not extend to any masters of vessels, who shall bring into this state any free negro or mulatto, employed on board, and belonging to such vessel, and who shall therewith depart." The act, then, does not prohibit the master of a vessel, navigated by free negroes or mulattoes, from coming into port, and setting only part of his crew on shore, provided they depart with the vessel. The state prohibition, then, does not commence, until the vessel departs without the negro or mulatto seaman. No probability, however strong, that the vessel will depart without the seaman, can extend the act to such a case, until the vessel has actually departed. If this be true, neither does the act of congress extend to such a case. But this is not all. The act of assembly prohibits the admission of free negroes and mulattos only, not of other persons of colour. Other persons of colour were admissible into Virginia. The act of congress makes a clear distinction between free negroes, and mulattos, and other persons of colour. But so much of the act of congress, as respects other persons of colour, does not apply to Virginia, because such persons were admissible into this state. The libel charges the sailors landed, to have been persons of colour, not negroes or mulattos. If, under this libel it were allowable to prove, that the sailors landed, were, in fact, negroes or mulattos, it is not proved. Mr. Bush does not prove, that any were landed, but says, that those discharged were "of different colours and nations." Andrew Johnson says "that on the 29th of October, the people of colour received their prize tickets, went on shore, and, of course, took their own discharge." There is, then, no evidence, that these people were negroes or mulattos. Upon these grounds, I am of opinion, that no forfeiture of the vessel has been incurred, and that so much of the sentence as condemns the brig Wilson, ought to be reversed, and restitution awarded.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1816.

SCIRE FACIAS AGAINST EXECUTOR — REVIVOR OF JUDGMENT—AUDITA QUERELA—SALE OF LANDS FOR DEBTS.

1. To a scire facias against an executor, to revive a judgment obtained against his testator, the defendant cannot plead that there are terre tenants whose lands are also bound by the judgment, so as to oblige the plaintiff to sue out a scire facias against them.

2. The proper remedy, for persons aggrieved by proceedings under such a judgment, is an audita querela, or by obtaining a rule of court, to stay proceedings.

3. The court in such a case will, if necessary, direct an issue to ascertain the facts.

4. Lands in Pennsylvania are liable to debts, in the same manner as chattels.

5. Practice and proceedings, under the laws of Pennsylvania, to sell the lands of a deceased person for the payment of debts.

6. Practice and proceedings, under the laws of England, where lands are taken in execution for the payment of debts.

This was scire facias against the defendant, one of the executors of Susannah Rodney, who was executrix of Charles Hurst; to revive a judgment, recovered by the plaintiff against said Hurst, in his life time. See [Case No. 17,808]. The defendant, who was alone warned, appeared and filed a plea, in substance as follows: That the said Hurst, in his life time, and at the time the said judgment was rendered, was seized in his demesne as of fee, of divers lands, &c. within this state, and that he continued so seized, until after the rendering of the said judgment; but that, at different times afterwards, he, for a valuable consideration, conveyed the same to divers persons in fee; and the said lands, by force of said conveyances, and of divers mesne assignments thereof, or by descent or other operation of law, have come to the possession of divers persons; who, or whose heirs or assigns, are now seized in fee respectively, viz.: to the possession of Miers Fisher; and so enumerating other persons; and perhaps to divers other persons, purchasers as aforesaid, to the defendant unknown; and the defendant, protesting that goods, &c. which were of the said Hurst at the time of his death, came to the hands of the said Susannah Rodney, whereby the said judgment might be satisfied; and that no goods which were of the said Susannah Rodney, at the time of her death came to the hands of the defendant; and that the only assets or funds, whereby the said judgment can be satisfied, are the said lands, &c., whereof the said Hurst, at the time of the said judgment, was seized, and which, by the said conveyances, became vested as aforesaid, in the said persons, before named; who, or some, or one of whom now being seized of the said lands, may have some good and sufficient cause to assign, why the said debt should not be levied of the said lands, &c.; and because the said terre tenants are not commanded to be warned, or summoned to show cause, &c.; the defendant prays judgment of the writ, and that it may be quashed. To this plea the plaintiff put in a general demurrer.

In support of the demurrer, it was contended: First, that the plea is bad in substance, there being no necessity for a scire facias against terre tenants, by the law or practice of Pennsylvania. Second, that this plea is bad in form, as it does not even profess to name the terre tenants but states, that perhaps there are others. Third, it does not state, that no goods of Charles Hurst, came to the defendant's hands; and for aught that appears, the defendant may have received sufficient personal assets to pay this judgment. Upon the first point was cited 2 Bin. 218. Upon the form of the plea, Chit. Pl. 454, 441, 445, 443; 1 Saund. 291; 2 Ld. Raym. 1015; 1 Ld. Raym. 337; 2 Salk. 194; 3 Term R. 186; 2 Saund. 210, notes.

On the other side, on the first point were cited, 3 Coke, 12; Herbert's Case, 2 Fitzh. Nat. Brev. (Ed. 1794) 265, 266; 2 Saund. 6 et seq. A scire facias may go against the terre tenants generally, or they may be named; and the first form is best; note 10. 1 Smith, Laws Pa. 8. As to the objections to the plea they were said to be merely formal, and not to be taken advantage of on a general demurrer. 1 Chit. Pl. 647.

In answer to the argument, that there was not a special demurrer, the plaintiff's counsel contended, that a special demurrer is not necessary to a plea in abatement. 1 Chit. Pl. 454, 443.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The principal objection made to this plea, is, that the lands of Hurst, being subject to execution for payment of debts, equally with the chattels; the plaintiff is not bound to join the terre tenants with the executor, in the scire facias to revive the judgment obtained against the testator; and therefore he cannot be compelled by plea to do so. The defendant's counsel have endeavoured to support the plea, by reference to English authorities. But the laws of England upon this subject, differ so widely from those of this state, that it is impossible for one to throw much light upon the other; there is no analogy between them. In England, lands are not liable to be sold in execution, except leasehold interests. If the debtor die after judgment, and the plaintiff means to proceed against the land, in order to extend it, he must take out a scire facias against the heir, or against him and the terre tenants, either generally, or name them in the writ. If all the terre tenants are not warned, those who are, may appear and plead this fact, in delay of execution; naming in the plea, the persons so omitted; and the plaintiff must, if the plea be true in fact, take out another scire facias against the persons so named; and until they are warned, the proceedings will be stayed. The reason of this is, that the terre tenants who are warned, have a right to the aid of the others, to have contribution by an extent equally, of all the lands of the debtor, which are bound by the judgment.

In Pennsylvania, lands may be seized under a fieri facias, as chattels, and sold under the writ of venditioni exponas. If the defendant in the judgment die, the judgment may be revived by scire facias against the executor, and the lands of the testator may be taken in execution, and sold, if there be a deficiency of personal assets; and even without such execution, the executor may obtain an order of the orphans' court, to sell as much of the testator's lands, as may be necessary for the payment of his debts. Since then lands may be seized and sold in this state, under a judgment originally obtained or revived, against an executor; it is in vain to look into English cases for precedents, when according to the English law, the land cannot be touched, unless a judgment be first obtained against the terre tenants. Nevertheless, we may derive much information from an attentive examination of the English practice, and a correct understanding of the principles on which it is founded.

According to the law of England, in cases of judgment and recognizances, the lands of the defendant or conusor, such as he may have aliened subsequent to the recognizance or judgment, may be extended under the eligit, without the necessity of a scire facias against the alienees. I take the reason to be, that the judgment or recognizance charges the defendant or conusor, personally, and there being no change of the person against whom the execution is to issue, no scire facias is necessary. And even if a scire facias should be rendered necessary, in consequence of a year and a day having passed, still the law would be the same as to the alienees; for the writ in this case, is not to charge new parties, but merely to enable the defendant or conusor to show, that the debt has been paid or otherwise satisfied or discharged. But, although the plaintiff or conusee, need not sue out a scire facias against the alienees in this case, they are not without remedy. For, since it would be unreasonable, that the judgment or recognizance which charged all the lands equally, in the possession of the debtor, should be borne by a part of the purchasers only; they may compel the plaintiff or conusee, to sue out execution of all the lands; and as they had no day in court, they may relieve themselves by audita querela. But upon the death of the debtor or conusor, a scire facias must issue; not merely to revive, but to charge persons not parties to the judgment; and who of course have a legal right, by the rules of the common law, and upon the immutable principles of justice, to be heard in court before they can be charged. If the plaintiff or conusee means to charge the land, he must sue out a scire facias against the heir, or the heir and terre tenants, if there be any; and thus, having a day in court, and opportunity to be heard, if they fail to avail themselves of it, by a proper plea, to bring in those who are bound to contribute, they cannot be afterwards relieved by audita querela.

Thus stands the practice in the English courts. Let the principles upon which it is founded, be now applied to the laws of this state, in relation to executions. Here the lands of the debtor, as well as his personal estate, may be taken in execution and sold, under a judgment against his executor. Lands are chattels for the payment of debts, and although they do not pass into the hands of the executor, in the same way that chattels do, they are nevertheless liable to be seized and sold, in like manner as if they had. In relation to creditors, the executor stands in the same situation as the testator. He alone is to be charged, and consequently, he is the only person against whom the judgment is to be revived. Because the real estate in the possession of the terre tenants may, under the judgment, be taken in execution; it no more follows, that a scire facias must issue against the terre tenants, than if the execution had gone against the testator; in which case, it has been shown, that no scire facias is necessary, although their lands may be extended; and if in that case, the terre tenants can relieve themselves in no other way than by audita querela, it follows, that the remedy should be the same in this, the reason being precisely the same.

That this is considered by the courts of Pennsylvania, as the correct mode of proceeding, is strongly to be inferred, from the two cases which were cited, of Young v. Taylor, 2 Bin. 218, and Graff v. Smith, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 481. In the former, one of the questions was, whether upon a judgment against Taylor, he being then in life, a scire facias ought not to have issued against the terre tenants? The court decided, that such process was unnecessary, and such would have been the decision according to the English law. In the other case, where the judgment was obtained against the administrator of the debtor; the question came before the court, upon a rule obtained by the purchaser from one of the heirs of the debtor, to show cause, why the sheriff should not be directed to postpone the sale of his lands, which had been taken under the execution, until all the lands remaining unsold in the hands of the other children, should be sold by virtue of the execution. The court suggested no objection to this mode of proceeding, which it would have been proper to do, if a scire facias was the proper remedy; on the contrary, the doctrine of contribution among the heirs and terre tenants, was fully gone into and decided, upon this rule, and the law and practice of this state, in relation to executions against land, was laid down as I have before stated it.

Upon the whole I am of opinion, that under the laws relative, to executions, in this state, the plaintiff is under no necessity to sue out a scire facias against the heirs and terre tenants of the debtor, in order to charge the lands of which they are seized; and that the proper remedy for those persons, where they may be aggrieved, by an execution levied upon their lands, is by audita querela; or more properly, by obtaining a rule of court to show cause. In this way, every relief to which the parties are entitled may be afforded; should an issue be necessary, the court may direct it. It is unnecessary to give any opinion, in relation to the various objections to the plea; it is sufficient, that it is no answer to the writ; and if it were, still I should feel no hesitation in saying, that it is no part of the executor's business to take care of the terre tenants' interest, and to delay the plaintiff, because it is possible they may be injured. Let those persons take care of themselves, and pursue such remedy as the law may allow, if it is their wish to do so. As for the executor, he wants not the co-operation of the terre tenants to assist him in making his defence, nor does he require, from them, contribution: let him look to his administration of the personal estate, and the proceeds of the real estate, so far as he has been authorized to sell it; and plead, so as to discharge himself from personal responsibility. The demurrer is adjudged good, and the defendant is ordered to answer over.

In answer to the argument, that this was not a special demurrer, the plaintiff's counsel contended, that a special demurrer is not necessary to a plea in abatement. 1 Chit. 454, 443.

POWERS OF EXECUTOR—CONFESSION OF JUDGMENT.

An administrator has a right at law to give a preference to a creditor by confessing a judgment, and a court of equity will not interfere by injunction.

[Cited in brief in Relfe v. Columbia Life Ins. Co., 76 Mo. 595.]

Bill for injunction to prevent the administrators from confessing judgment at law in favor of other creditors in equal degree; and to distribute the assets pari passu.

C. Lee, for complainant.

An administrator is a trustee, and subject to equitable jurisdiction. At law an administrator may prefer a creditor in equal degree; but a court of equity may interfere; especially before any payments are made. The equity of him who claims pro rata is superior to that of him who contends for all. Kelly v. Collins, 1 Fowl. Exch. Prac. 298; Max. Eq. 15, 17; 2 Ch. Cas. 228; Gibson v. Kinven, 1 Vern. 66; Solley v. Gower, 2 Vern. 62; Waring v. Danvers, 1 P. Wms. 296; Joseph v. Mott, Finch, Prec. 79; Smith v. Haytwell, Amb. 66; Brooks v. Reynolds, 1 Brown, Ch. 183; Hardcastle v. Chettle, 4 Brown, Ch. 163; Lowthian v. Hassel, Id. 167.

Mr. Simms, for defendants.

This attempt is novel. There is no precedent for it as to legal assets. It goes to prevent the creditors from proceeding at law to recover judgment. The administrators cannot defend themselves. If they are trustees, they are created by law and must proceed according to law. Why not extend the principle to the dignity of the debt? A court of chancery has as good a right to interfere in that case as in this. A creditor ought not to be prevented from gaining a priority at law by his diligence. Preference is not fraud per se. If it was, all preferences would be void at law as well as in equity. In equal equity the law must prevail. Max. Eq. 62. There is a difference between the court's power over trusts created by the parties and those created by law. Equity will not interfere, unless there is some circumstance which brings the legal assets under its jurisdiction. The mere deficiency is not a ground of equity. Equity will not prevent the creditor from the legal remedy which he had at the death of the intestate. Went. Off. Ex'r, 145. Preference is not covin. Goodfellow v. Burchett, 2 Vern. 299; Waring v. Danvers, 1 P. Wms. 295; Earl of Orford's Case, Finch, Prec. 183; Morrice v. Bank of England, Cas. t. Talb. 220; Martin v. Martin, 1 Ves. Sr. 211.

KILLY, Chief Judge. The injunction in this case, is applied for on the ground that equity requires that the creditors of an insolvent should equally share his effects. It is an application to dispense with a rule of law, because that rule is inequitable in itself, and not because this particular case has any peculiar circumstances which take it out of the general rule. That a law is in itself inequitable in every possible case, or in its general application, will not justify the court in dispensing with it. This would be to usurp legislative power. Where it is necessary for a person to apply to a court of equity to obtain a remedy which he could not have at law, the court will compel him to do equity before they will grant him the relief he asks. Upon this principle, it is, that when a creditor claims equitable assets, they will allow him only an equal share with those who have equal equity. But where a creditor gains a legal advantage, the court will not restrain him, unless for the purpose of carrying into effect its own decree—its own decree already passed, not that which it may hereafter make. The same law which gives a priority to creditors of a particular class, (for instance, bond-creditors,) makes it necessary, in case of a deficiency of assets, that a priority should exist between creditors in equal degree; otherwise the administrator would not be able to protect himself against them all, by paying some, and pleading plene administravit as to the residue. Priority of payment follows priority of judgment; and even if an administrator could not confess a judgment, there would still exist a priority, because the judgments could not be rendered at the same moment. Some creditors would gain a priority by diligence, and others by the greater ease in establishing their claims. It is, therefore, clear, that there is, at law, a priority, or at least the legal means of obtaining a priority, among claims in equal degree, as well as among claims of different degrees. The principle upon which the injunction is claimed, applies as strongly to reduce to a level claims of different degrees, as claims of the same degree. The rule of law is as strong in favor of the one priority as of the other. The question then recurs, whether this court can set up the general inequitable nature of the law, as (in itself) a ground of equitable relief? We are clear that it cannot. That it would be an usurpation of legislative, and not an exercise of judicial powers. The injunction, therefore, cannot be granted.

PATENT FOR INVENTION—CANNED GOODS—INJUNCTION AGAINST INFRINGEMENT—PROOF.

1. The main and principal feature of the art of canning foods of various kinds, being old and well known, a patent for any particular article of canned goods "as a new article of commerce" must be clearly sustained by proof, in order to sustain an injunction against other manufacturers of similar goods.

2. An injunction ought not to issue to restrain the infringement of a patent when it does not appear from the record that the defendant has ever made or sold any of the goods in the district.

3. The sending of circulars to parties engaged in the trade, notifying them of a preliminary injunction, is improper.

4. Whether the pyramidal form of can is patentable, quære.

In equity. On the 5th of January last, a motion was made by complainants, based on the bill and affidavits previously filed, for an injunction, restraining the defendant [William B. Clapp] from putting up, manufacturing, or selling canned corned beef, in such manner as to infringe upon certain patents belonging to complainants and particularly described in the bill. The bill and affidavits were not read, but both parties being represented by counsel, it was conceded that a case was made for an injunction and an injunction order was accordingly entered as prayed, with the understanding that defendant might move for the vacation of said order, as soon as counsel could prepare their affidavits. The affidavits were soon after filed and the motion submitted upon the allegations and proofs of the respective parties and the briefs and arguments of counsel.

Munday & Everts, West & Bond, John N. Jewett, and T. A. Goodwin, for complainants.

Eldridge & Tourtelotte, Noble & Orrick, and Coburn & Thacher, for defendant.

¹ [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission.]

BLODGETT, District Judge. The bill charges that complainants own three patents relating to the subject matter of packing and preserving meats in hermetically sealed cans or packages. The first of said patents was issued [July 12] 1864 to W. C. Marshall [No. 43,516; reissued May 25, 1875, Nos. 6,451 and 6,452]; the second was issued in 1874 to W. J. Wilson [No. 149,276; reissued April 6, 1875, No. 6,370]; and the third was issued in 1875 to J. A. Wilson [No. 161,848; reissued October 23, 1877, No. 7,923]. All these patents have been re-issued, and two of them, (the Marshall and one of the Wilson) within the past year. The claims are, briefly, for canned meats put up in the manner described "as a new article of commerce"; and for some special improvements in the cans or packages—the principal of which is the shape of the can—the Wilson can being made in the form of a section of a pyramid with rounded corners; whereby the solidly packed contents of the can are turned out in a firm mass or cake by cutting off the bottom or lower end of the can, so that the beef can be readily cut in slices for the table.

The process of preserving fruits, vegetables and meats in hermetically sealed cans or packages, is not new or original to these patentees. In 1810, M. Appert published in France the details of the process then lately discovered by him for preserving fruits, vegetables and meats by parboiling or cooking them so as to expel the fixed air, and then sealing them up in airtight cans, bottles or jars. This discovery was considered of so much importance to the world that the French government paid M. Appert 10,000 francs for making it public. And the art has since then been extensively practiced both in this country and Europe. The Appert process was afterwards improved by Durand, Danksin, Gamble and others in England, and by Winslow and others in this country, so that canned foods of various kinds had become an article of commerce long before the date of either of complainants' patents. 9 Enc. Brit. 767, tit. "Food" (published in 1855); 13 New Am. Cyc. (published in 1863) tit. "Preservation of Food," p. 569. The main and principal features of the art being so old, it will be, at least, a nice question to determine how far a patent for each particular article of canned foods "as a new article of commerce" can be sustained, as a new invention. I do not intend to be understood as now saying that such patents are invalid for want of novelty. I only intend to say that I think courts should not be hasty or inconsiderate in granting injunctions at the instance of the holders of such patents against other manufacturers of similar goods. And had the whole facts been brought to my notice, as they are now, at the time the original motion was made, I feel sure I should not have granted the injunction.

So far as the complainants' patents cover the cans they use, no special proof is put into the record. To the eye the cans used by complainants and those said to have been sold by defendant, appear to be, externally, substantially alike. But I doubt whether the pyramidal shape which is the distinctive feature of complainants' can, is a patentable device. It would seem to be a shape so often adopted in other packages and molds when it is desirable to turn the contents out whole or solid, as to be no longer novel. Still, it may be patentable. I only intimate a doubt, and say that I think a court should be cautious in regard to such a patent.

Aside from the objections that apply directly to the patents it does not appear from the record that this defendant has ever made or sold any goods in the similitude of complainants' goods in this district. He is the agent of a St. Louis packing company for the sale of their goods in New York City, and does no business and has no place of business in this district. A preliminary injunction ought not, therefore, to issue against him in this district; because such a process cannot run beyond the territorial limits of the district; certainly not in an ordinary case such as is made in this record. A case possibly might be made upon extraordinary facts which would justify such an issue, but such case is not made here.

It also appears that immediately on the entry of the order in this case, circulars and notices were sent outside this district to parties engaged in the trade, dealing with the complainants' competitors, intended to alarm such persons and injure the trade of competing manufacturers. This strikes me as hardly justifiable under the circumstances. I think complainants, if they have faith in their patents, should make their attack directly on such competitors as they claim are infringing their patents, and contest the question squarely with them. This class of goods has now, according to the proofs, gone into very general use as an article of food, and can be found for sale in most family groceries; and it seems to me not the right course to attack these dealers, and annoy and intimidate them by threats of patent suits. The course taken by complainants suggests the charge that they intended to obtain many of the advantages of an injunction by harassing and interfering with the business of a rival without taking the risk of a direct suit with that rival, when they would be responsible for the consequences of their act. Such may not have been their purpose but it is liable to such construction.

The injunction is dissolved.

This case was subsequently brought to final hearing before DRUMMOND and BLODGETT, District Judges, and the patents held void for want of novelty, and the bill dismissed on a certificate of division. See Wilson Packing Co. v. Clapp [Case No. 17,851].

3. The pyramidal form of can, for packing food, is not patentable.

4. The Marshall and Wilson patents for canning beef not sustained.

In equity.

Munday & Everts, J. N. Jewett, and W. H. Clifford, for complainants.

Eldridge & Tourtellotte, for defendant.

Before DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge, and BLODGETT, District Judge.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. The only question in this case necessary to be considered is, whether the two things which are the subject-matter of the patents are in themselves patentable, namely, the mode described in which meat is compressed, and put into cans, and the mode described of making the cans or vessels in which the meat is placed.

The first patent is that of W. C. Marshall, originally issued July 12, 1864, and re-issued May 25, 1875. It relates to the putting up and preserving of meats. Mr. Marshall's mode, as I understand, is this: He prepares the meat, it being cut in proper form, and in its raw state, by what are called antiseptics; that is, by the various methods of preserving meat with salt, salt-peter, etc., and when the meat is in this condition he subjects it to a strong pressure. It is then put, in the proper quantity, into a package, box or can, of the required size, and is there also subjected to pressure. Then, in the usual way, the air is expelled from the package by heat, and it is hermetically sealed.

This seems to be the whole process as described by Mr. Marshall, and in his claim he declares that it is for packing and preserving meat, in subjecting it, after it has been submitted to preserving processes, to a heavy pressure, and packing and hermetically sealing in packages, or boxes, compressed meat, as described.

The question is whether of itself, this was a patentable subject, viz.: cutting up meat in its raw state, putting it into antiseptics, subjecting it to pressure, as in a mold, before and after it is put in the box or package, and then hermetically sealing it. It is admitted that the manner in which the package is hermetically sealed was well known. That is not claimed, but only the particular way in which the meat is prepared, put up and placed in the box or package.

The main difference as I understand, between the patent of Marshall and that of William J. Wilson, is that in the latter, which was originally issued on the 31st of March, 1874, and re-issued on the 6th of April, 1875, Wilson describes his meat as being first cooked thoroughly, at a temperature of 212° Fahrenheit, so that all the bone and gristle can be removed and the meat retain its natural grain and integrity. In both patents, it is claimed that the meat retains all its nutritious qualities, and that it is not desiccated, or dried, and in Wilson's patent, after it is thus cooked, it is compressed, as in Marshall's, in the box or package, and then it is hermetically sealed. These two modes of preserving meat appear to be somewhat different from any of those which have been presented to the court, in this, that the meat is not put up in brine or any other liquid, neither is it dry or desiccated, but it remains in such a form that it can be reduced to a compact mass, so as to retain most of the nutritious qualities of the meat. I take it for granted that it is impracticable to cook meat as Wilson proposes it should be cooked, (although nothing is said as to the manner in which it is to be cooked,) either by steam or water, or otherwise, without losing some of its nutritious qualities, but there may be a difference in the mode in which it is cooked; in some cases it may retain most of its nutriment, and in others only a comparatively small part. It is claimed both by Wilson and by Marshall, that it retains all the juices and nutritious qualities of the meat, the compression only removing the superfluous moisture. I doubt whether that is exactly true, but I presume it does retain most of the nutritious qualities of the meat.

Wilson claims "the process described for packing cooked meats for transportation, by compressing the same into an air-tight package, so as to preserve the meat in its integrity and retain all the natural juices and nutritious qualities of the meat, substantially as set forth;" and then he claims "as a new article of merchandise, cooked meat put up in a solid form in its natural state, without disintegration or desiccation, in hermetically sealed packages as set forth." It seems that there is an advantage in putting up meat in this way, which does not exist in other cases which have been brought to the attention of the court. The difficulty I have had, and still have, in the case is, whether this can be said to be of such a character as to entitle the parties to a patent.

The next point is as to the form of the can described in the patent of John A. Wilson, issued April 6, 1875; re-issued, Oct. 23, 1877. He claims an hermetically sealed can, used in packing meat or other articles, made in the shape of a pyramid, having rounded corners, and both ends slightly flaring to form shoulders, against which the head or end pieces rest. In other words, it is the shape of a can of cooked corned beef, put up by Libby, McNeill and Libby, and it is not material of what size it is made. "A.," he says, represents the body of the can made in the form of a truncated pyramid with rounded corners, and of any desired number of sides, although he prefers to make it of four sides; both ends of the body are made slightly flaring so as to form interior shoulders or offsets against which the heads "C." and "B." (top and bottom) rest. The edges of these heads are turned outward, as shown, and the flaring edge of the end of the can is turned over the flange, and the three thicknesses of metal pressed together by machinery, with or without solder, so as to make the joints air-tight. The meat is prepared, cut up, pressed and put in cans, pressed afterwards, and then the cans hermetically sealed. As I understand, the meat is put in at the large end. And then he claims the can for packing food, hermetically sealed, and constructed of pyramidal form and rounded corners, with offset ends to support the head, said head being secured as shown and described. He also claims, as an improved article of manufacture, solid meat, compressed as described, and within a pyramidal can, so that said can forms a mold for the meat, and permits its discharge in a solid cake substantially as specified.

It is conceded that there cannot be a patent for a mere form unless the form is of the essence of the invention. It is not easy to describe what constitutes the essence of the form so as to make it the subject of a patent, and distinguish it from that which is mere form. Sometimes, as the courts say, the form may be the substance of the invention, and there may be such a change produced in a certain article as to make it, (the article manufactured or otherwise, whatever it may be,) the subject of a patent. It seems that there are some advantages about the construction of the can which have made it come into common use. I have described the manner in which the meat is put up—that it becomes a compressed, compact mass, neither dry nor liquid; that it retains most of its nutritious qualities, and if freed from the pressure which surrounds it, it will retain its compact condition. The advantage of this can is, that when it is opened, as it usually is, at the bottom, and the bottom taken out, (the can having been previously cooled, so that the ice or the cool water may leave it in its least expansive condition,) and it is struck on the top, the meat falls out in a compact mass, and then can be eaten, or is fit for the table. Both of these are advantages, and the advantages have been such as have caused it, as the testimony shows, to come into great use, such that it has made what is claimed to be a revolution in the trade of preserved meat. And the patent office seems inclined to issue patents for such things which it calls a new article of manufacture, both as to the manner in which the meat is put up, and as to the structure of the can. And it has issued patents for both of these as a new article of manufacture. But I must confess, on principle, I am not inclined to hold that these are the proper subject matter of a patent.

If we sustain a patent of this kind, I do not exactly see how we can do so without preventing everybody else from preparing and cooking meat, cutting it up and subjecting it to a pressure as these patentees describe. There seems nothing of invention in preparing and cutting up meat, or in putting it into a can, or in pressing it before or after it is put there, and there is certainly nothing new in hermetically sealing a can in the manner in which this is said to be sealed. There is nothing new in constructing a can of this particular form. It is a matter of fancy more or less. This can might be round or octagonal or in any other form, provided it was larger at the bottom than at the top—lessening gradually as it approached the top—and if the meat was in the same condition in which this was, and the can open at the bottom, the meat would fall out in the same way as from the plaintiff's can. If we sustain this patent, we prevent every one else from putting up meat in this form; that is, from cooking it, compressing it in the manner in which this is compressed, and putting it in cans, and hermetically sealing it. I do not feel like sustaining a patent, when such consequences are to follow.

And as to the plaintiff's can: There is nothing about this can, except the exercise, as I understand it, of mechanical skill. There is, certainly, nothing inventive in making it in this shape. I was at first inclined to think that there might be something in the peculiar form in which the can was put together, as in the rounded corners with both ends slightly flaring to form the shoulders, and the manner in which the end pieces are put on and secured, but I do not know that this is more than a mere mechanical device.

In stating my views about these patents, I may admit that there are some authorities which seem to sustain patents of this kind, and that seems to some extent to be the usage of the patent office; but my own view is, that this is wrong, and that patents of this kind ought not to be sustained.

The case of the can of lard, unreported, Tucker v. Fairbanks [Case No. 14,218], is somewhat similar. I have always doubted whether I ought to have sustained that claim. My desire about this case is, that it should be arranged in such a way that the opinion of the supreme court can be taken on this question, whether or not these two things are patentable, namely: the manner in which the meat is prepared, compressed and placed in the can; and secondly, the manner in which the can is constructed.

It may be true that here is an article of merchandise which, in one sense, may be said to be new in the form in which it exists, and which, in consequence of its advantages, has come into common use.

It may be true that this is something like the caustic alkali case which has been so often referred to, but I must confess, personally, my strong opposition to the maintenance of patents of this kind as being against the rights of the public. For the court now to sustain these patents in this form is really giving them a complete monopoly of putting up compressed meats in this way, and in cans like these, and as the questions involved in this case are important, and as it may simplify matters, my brother judge and myself have concluded to certify the questions to the supreme court.

[On appeal to the supreme court, the decree of this court was affirmed. 105 U. S. 566, note.]

These patents were again brought before this court, at the December term, 1881, and decided invalid in the case of Wilson Packing Co. v. Chicago Packing & Provision Co. [9 Fed. 547]. See, also, Wilson Packing Co. v. Clapp [Case No. 17,850].

FOREIGN CORPORATION — SERVICE OF PROCESS — FEDERAL JURISDICTION.

1. A foreign corporation doing business in Illinois, is liable to be sued there in the federal court, though there be no express provision of statute in regard to service.

[This suit was brought for an infringement of a patent as to the process of preserving and canning meats. The defendants [Robert Hunter and others] object to the jurisdiction of the court, because they are a corporation of the state of Missouri, and, therefore, can not be sued in the Southern district of Illinois. The complainants assert that they may be sued here, because of the statute of Illinois which provides (Rev. St. p. 290, § 26): "Foreign corporations and the officers and agents thereof, doing business in this state, shall be subjected to all the liabilities, restrictions and duties, that are or may be imposed upon corporations of like character, organized under the general laws of this state, and shall have no other or greater powers." The St. Louis Beef Canning Company has a slaughter-house and stock-yards at East St. Louis, and the officers and agents of the company do business in that state for it and in its name. Thus, it is argued, the corporation is doing business in the state of Illinois, within the provisions of the statute. There is no averment by the defendants, showing that the corporation is not doing business in that state. The Illinois statute provides (Rev. St., p. 775, § 5) that corporations may be served by summons on the president, and it is not denied that the president of the St. Louis Beef Canning Company was found in this state, and was duly served with summons in this case as such president.]²

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. This case is of importance, as it involves the question whether process can be served upon a foreign corporation doing business in this state, because it is found in the state.

The acts of 1789 [1 Stat. 73] and 1875 [18 Stat. 470] declare that no suit shall be brought against any person in any other district than that in which he is an inhabitant, or where he is found, so that where suit was brought against any person in a district other than that in which he resides, or in which he is an inhabitant, he must be found there, in order to enable the courts of the United States to have jurisdiction; so there has always been a rule in relation to suits brought against any persons in the federal courts. When the supreme court declared that a corporation was a person within the meaning of the law, which authorized suit to be brought by and against persons, then, of course, the question arose at once where this person was to be found or was found. The case of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 517, decided the question as to where a corporation could make a contract. The question did not arise there under the clause of the law as to where a corporation was found. The court held that although a corporation could not migrate from the place where it was created, still, unless there was some law of the state which prohibited a corporation from making a contract, that is to say, where it was outside of the state by which it was created, it was a valid contract and might be enforced. In the cases which have been cited, the Schollenberger Case, 96 U. S. 369, the Case of Williams (Williams v. Empire Transp. Co. [Case No. 17,720]), and some other cases, they were cases where there was an express provision of the statute declaring that process might be served upon a foreign corporation doing business in the state or district where suit was brought. That was true of the law of Pennsylvania, the law of New Jersey, and is also true of foreign insurance companies in this state. These are obliged to answer to process upon their agent precisely the same as in the state where created. But in this case it is admitted that no express provision of law authorizes this particular corporation, created under the law of the state of Missouri, to be served within the limits of this state. But I think we may infer that, from its right to do business in this state. That foreign corporations, and their agents doing business in this state, shall be subject to all liabilities, restrictions and duties which are or may be imposed upon corporations of like character of this state, and that they shall have no other or greater power, is expressly stated in the statute. Rev. St. Ill. c. 32, § 26. This statute implies that foreign corporations may do business within this state, but when they are admitted to do business in this state, they shall be subject to this provision of the law. Now, the question is, whether foreign corporations, coming into this state and doing business in this state, are subject to this liability, namely: to be sued within the courts of this state, and so in the courts of the United States, in the district where they are doing business. It seems to me that this question was substantially decided by the case of Harris, reported in 12 Wall. (Railroad Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 65). If we admit that under the law of this state this corporation can do business in this state, and has been doing business in this district within the meaning of the acts of congress, then it was found within this district so that process could be served upon it.

The allegation in the bill that the St. Louis Beef Canning Company—this corporation created under the laws of Missouri—owns and possesses a slaughter house and stock yard in the city of East St. Louis, Illinois, where beef to be canned by the company is slaughtered and dressed, preparatory for, and in the name of, such company, is not denied in the plea, and it must be considered as admitted. Now, in the Case of Harris, supra, the only ground upon which the court took jurisdiction of the case was under the acts of congress. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad was authorized to construct a railroad within the District of Columbia; the service of process was upon the president of the company; he was found within the district; the person—the corporation—was there through its president, and it was the only way that the court could by any possibility take jurisdiction. The person—the defendant—the corporation, must be found within the district in order that the court may take jurisdiction, and it was found there in consequence of the acts of congress, which authorized it to construct a branch road within the district, and because the president was there within the district. At the time the writ was thus served there was no act of congress authorizing suits against corporations doing business in the district, and of course no act which authorized service of process upon foreign corporations, though the court took jurisdiction of the case, as I have said, on the ground that the corporation was there found. It is said that if this position be maintained, that every officer of every foreign corporation who comes within the limits of the state of Illinois is liable to service of process, and that the corporation would be found here because the officer or president was here. That does not follow. On the contrary, I think that it is to be said only of foreign corporations that should be thus found here, in the absence of any express legislation authorizing service of process. It is necessary that the foreign corporation should do business in the state in order to be found here, and in order to warrant service on the president when within the limits of the state. The mere fact of its president or other officer passing through the state, and process being served upon him, would not bring the case within the meaning of the act of congress. A foreign corporation would not in that way be found within the limits of the state, and it seems to me that independent of the authority of the case of Harris, sound reasoning leads us to the same result. As soon as it was determined that a corporation was a person liable to sue and be sued, it must of necessity be brought within the jurisdiction of the federal courts. As the law is now understood and has been decided by the supreme court of the United States, a foreign corporation cannot do business outside of the territory where created, except by the consent of the state where it desires to do business. Of course, that being so, the state has a right to prescribe upon what condition it may do business. As to foreign insurance companies, Illinois has legislated upon that subject because the agents are so numerous; their names are legion. The statute, therefore, declares that before a corporation of that kind can do business here, it must consent to service of process upon its agent.

There is no such legislation as to this particular kind of corporation; but does it follow that the state must legislate upon the Beef Canning Association of Missouri, or that otherwise it cannot be served with process? I do not think that because it has legislated in relation to foreign insurance companies, it must legislate upon all corporations as to service of process. When they attempt to do business within the state, they come within the limits of the state; they are protected by our laws when they transact business within our territory, and are they then not to be subject to suits against them? Ought they to be permitted to come here, to make contracts, to do, maybe, all their business here by virtue of the law of another state, and then say they cannot be sued in our state because their corporation is within another—a sister state? I do not think that it is reasonable or right. They transact business under the protection of the laws, and they ought to be liable to the burdens as well as the benefits of the laws. One of the burdens, I think, is liability to be sued. I do not very well see how they cannot be, under the statute I have cited already, which provides that they shall be subject to all liabilities, restrictions and duties of home corporations. Undoubtedly, the state can legislate in relation to all foreign corporations, and can declare under what terms they shall do business within our state, as in relation to foreign insurance companies, and perhaps other kinds of corporations. It has not chosen to do so as to this particular class, but I do not think on that account a foreign corporation doing business within our state can escape the consequences which follow from that business, one of which is liability to be sued. Inasmuch as this plea does not meet the allegation of the bill in all respects, and especially in the view taken of this case, it must be held to be insufficient, and is overruled.

NOTE. A national bank cannot be sued in the federal court outside of the district where it is located, and service on the cashier, when found within another district, does not give jurisdiction. Main v. Second Nat. Bank [Case No. 8,976]. The acts of congress confer no jurisdiction over a defendant who is served with process, while temporarily in a district in which he does not reside. Smith v. Tuttle [Id. 13,120]. In a suit against a corporation, in the United States circuit court in one state; by a citizen of another state, service of process within the state upon a joint defendant, a citizen of a third state, gives the federal court jurisdiction over him. Mowrey v. Indiana & C. R. Co. [Id. 9,891]. Under the act of congress of March 3, 1875, a corporation cannot be served with process outside of the state where it was created, and the presence of an agent of a foreign corporation is not the presence of the corporation within the meaning of the act. Hume v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. [Id. 6,865.]

sions must be strictly complied with in taking depositions de bene esse under it; the witness must be "carefully examined," and must be sworn to testify the "whole truth" on the entire subject-matter of the depositions, and not merely the whole truth in response to each of several interrogatories propounded to him.

2. As to the mode of administering the oath, it is sufficient in that respect to follow the directions of the statute law of the state of the United States where the depositions were taken.

BOND, Circuit Judge. At the trial of this cause the plaintiff, in support of its claim, offered to read to the jury the deposition of the president, one Wilson, taken de bene esse. The defendant objected on the ground that the statute (Rev. St. U. S. § 864) had not been complied with, the deponent not having been properly cautioned and sworn, and the court sustained the objection, and refused to allow the deposition to be read. The verdict being for the defendant, the plaintiff makes this its motion for a new trial. It appears from the certificate of the notary who took the deposition, that in pursuance of the notice given he attended at the time and place appointed, and that William G. Wilson, a witness of lawful age, produced on the part of plaintiff, "being by me first duly sworn on interrogatories propounded to him, testified" as is set forth. Originally there followed after the word sworn the words, "on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God," but on cross-examination the witness stated he had not been so sworn, and the notary struck those words out of his certificate. At the close of the deposition the notary certifies that William G. Wilson "was by me first sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth" touching the interrogatories propounded to him, and at the close of his certificate he certifies that the said Wilson "was by me sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God." The statute of Illinois, the place where this deposition was taken, provides (Rev. St. 1874, c. 101): "It shall be lawful for any person empowered to administer an oath to administer it in the following form. The person swearing shall with his hand uplifted swear by the ever-living God, and shall not be compelled to lay the hand on or kiss the Gospels." The supreme court of the United States has determined that the act of congress now expressed in section 864 of the United States Revised Statutes is in derogation of the common law, and must be strictly construed and complied with. It requires that the party about to testify shall be cautioned and sworn to tell the whole truth, and be carefully examined. The first certificate of the notary is that he was duly sworn, and it is to be supposed from that statement that the witness was legally sworn; that is, that he took the oath prescribed by the statute of Illinois. But that is not sufficient. It must be certified in the form prescribed by the statute that witness was sworn to tell the whole truth; not merely that he should true answers make to the interrogatories propounded to him. But the second certificate of the notary is that the witness was first sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth touching the interrogatories propounded to him. What the witness should have been sworn to do in this ex parte proceeding was to tell the whole truth as far as he knew it respecting the matter in controversy between the plaintiff and defendant. He might well have told the truth in answer to all questions propounded to him, and then have suppressed facts within his knowledge about which he was not interrogated, and yet those facts might have been of infinite importance to the defendant. But laying this aside, how was the witness sworn on this occasion? The notary further certifies that he was sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God; the witness says he was not. If there be a statutory form of oath in the place where the witness is examined, that is the form to be used upon an examination under section 864 of Revised Statutes of the United States, unless the deponent expresses conscientious scruples respecting that form. If he expresses such conscientious scruples the oath which he regards as binding upon his conscience must be administered to him, and the commissioner or other examining officers must certify the reason which caused him to vary from the customary or statutory form of oath. But in this instance the notary certifies first, that he duly swore the witness; that is, according to the customary or statutory form; and then he certifies that he swore him according to another form, without alleging any conscientious objection to the statutory form on the part of the witness, and the witness states in his examination that he was not sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, as the notary certifies he was sworn. The notary had no authority to vary the customary form of oath unless the witness had conscientious scruples respecting that form, and we suppose he did so vary it because of the witness's scruples. If he did so do, the witness declares he was not sworn at all, and even if he were, the notary does not certify that under the form the witness was sworn to tell the whole truth.

There are other reasons filed for a new trial, but they all depend upon the disposition of this question respecting the admissibility of this deposition; except perhaps one, and that the verdict must stand. This motion is denied.

NOTE [from 4 Cent. Law J. 225]. This case shows the necessity of exercising great care on taking and certifying depositions de bene esse, to be used in the federal courts. The first case bearing on the leading proposition involved in it is that of Garrett v. Woodward [Case No. 5,253]. There the witness was affirmed to testify the truth concerning all the matters touching which he should be questioned. The deposition was rejected. The next case was that of Rainer v. Haines, Hemp. 689. There the witness was duly sworn to testify the truth in regard to the matters in controversy. The deposition was suppressed. The next case was that of Shutte v. Thompson, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 151. There it did not appear that the witness was sworn to testify the whole truth. The court held that this defect was sufficient to require the rejection of the deposition, but also decided that the objection had been waived. From this review of the authorities, it will be seen, that the principal proposition involved in this case is fully supported. The forms contained in reliable works on practice in the federal courts are in conformity with this doctrine.

such hearing a decree was entered setting aside the mortgage of Wilt as invalid, and ordering the assignee to sell the real estate and apply the proceeds to the debts of the estate. On the 13th of May, 1875, this bill of review was filed by the complainant, praying that said decree be reviewed and set aside for reasons therein stated, and a rehearing of the case be had. On the 9th of July, 1875, the defendant, assignee, filed a plea to said bill, setting up the statute of limitation, alleging that the cause of action did not accrue to the complainant within two years before the filing of the bill of review. To this plea the complainant files a general demurrer.

The question made by the demurrer is, whether the limitation provided in Rev. St. § 2057 of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] applies to this proceeding, it being conceded that the bill of review was not filed within two years from the rendition of the original decree. That section provides that "no suit at law or in equity shall be maintained in any court between an assignee in bankruptcy and a person claiming an adverse interest touching any property or right of property transferable to or vested in such assignee, unless brought within two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee."

It is claimed by the respondent that this proceeding is in effect a suit, and comes within the provisions of the section. In construing this statute it is important to understand what is meant by the term suit as used in the section. Does it mean all proceedings of any character, in which is involved the property or rights of the bankrupt arising between the assignee and claimant? Technical words used in statutes are to be given their legal signification. What then is a suit? It is defined to be the prosecution or presentation of some claim, demand, or request. In law language it is the prosecution of some demand in a court of justice. Story, Comm. Const. § 1719. The word "suit" is used in its modern sense as synonymous with action. 1 Barb. 15. An action is defined to be a legal demand of one's right; or it is the form of a suit given by law for the recovery of that which is due. 1 Barb. 15. Till judgment the "suit" is called an action. Bouv. Law Dict. Proceedings in error coram nobis in law, and bills of review in equity cases are in the nature of applications for new trials in cases already once tried or heard, and are but continuations of the original cases. In 1 Barb. 16, it is said that "a writ of error is not a suit or action as those words are understood and used." In 4 Ohio St. 690, it was decided that "a bill of review is not an original bill or suit."

It is, however, claimed by the respondent that, in Bailey v. Glover, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 342, the supreme court of the United States has given a construction to this section of the statute which substantially determines this question. The court held in that case that the section was a statute of limitation, and precisely like other statutes of limitation, and "applies to all judicial contests between the assignee and other persons touching the property or right of property of the bankrupt transferable to, or vested in the assignee, where the interests are adverse, and have so existed for more than two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against the assignee." The use by the court of the terms "all judicial contests" certainly was not intended to change the definitions of a suit or action, as well understood in the law, but should be regarded as simply another form of the general definition of those terms already given. Two things are required of this statute: First. Must be a suit. This we have considered, and in the light of authority find this proceeding not a suit. Second. Must be a cause of action upon which the limitation can operate. Cause of action means simply a right of action. The remedy sought by this review is not to assert a right of action, but to review and reverse an action already heard and determined, to obtain a rehearing of an action already commenced, and cannot be considered a cause of action in the sense in which it is used in the statute.

It seems to me, therefore, that the true and correct construction of the statute sustained by principle and authority is, that it does not apply to proceedings for reviews in cases in equity, and that the limitation to this class of proceedings is that provided for writs of error and bills of review. The demurrer is sustained.

CRIMINAL LAW — DISAGREEMENT AND DISCHARGE OF JURY—AUTHORITY OF COURT.

In the case of James H. Wiltbank, charged with mutiny, the jury came into court, and stated that they were still unable to agree upon a verdict. Judge CADWALADER said that in his opinion, if the jury gave due effect to the evidence, their verdict should be one of guilty. The foreman stated, and several jurors sustained him, that they were divided in opinion as to the facts in the cause, some of them believing the witnesses for the prosecution, and others accepting as true the testimony of the second mate for the defence. There was an absolute division upon the facts, the differing jurors having formed their judgment conscientiously, and therefore being unwilling to yield.

The judge said that even if the statement of the second mate was believed, the verdict should still be one of guilty. He then expressed his views of the duties and powers of a jury, the importance of this case affecting the safety of life and property at sea, and the necessity for a verdict. He therefore refused to discharge them, and sent them back to their room.

The case was given to the jury on Wednesday. After being locked up all night, they came into court at noon on Thursday, and announced that they were unable to agree upon a verdict. CADWALADER, District Judge, after listening to their agreement to disagree, sent them back to their room, where they remained until the scene in court this morning narrated above.

One of the jurors is quite ill. He was sick all night, and is reported to be no better to-day. This afternoon, between 1 and 2 o'clock, the jury came into court, and stated that after an honest and laborious effort, they found themselves still unable to agree upon a verdict. There were conscientious differences upon questions of fact, which the members could not relinquish unless compelled to. A verdict from their own voluntary conviction was impossible; therefore, as they understood the powers and duties of a jury, they could not agree except under a binding instruction from the court, to which they would be bound to yield.

CADWALADER, District Judge, said that, under the evidence, he thought it the duty of the jury to convict the defendant. They could not do otherwise, unless they found that at the time of the occurrence charged as mutiny, the captain of the brig was incapable of navigating the vessel, because he was so intoxicated as to be irrational, and of this he saw no evidence in the case. In criminal cases the jury had the power to decide questions of law and fact, but always in conformity with the law and legal evidence, and they had no right to give an arbitrary decision of any question. To find that on this occasion the captain was incapable from drunkenness from navigating the vessel would be extremely arbitrary. He was willing to assume as much responsibility in this case as the law would permit, and therefore would accept the verdict of guilty, accompanied by a declaration that but for the further instruction of the court the jury would not have agreed upon a verdict. Such a verdict was accordingly rendered, coupled with a recommendation to mercy.

The defendant was permitted to depart on his own bail, the judge saying that the importance of the case had led him to the course he had pursued, and he was not only willing, but anxious, to hear an argument for a new trial, and correct whatever error he may have committed.

The jury, which consisted of eleven members, stood on Wednesday and Thursday six for conviction to five for acquittal; yesterday seven for conviction to four for acquittal; this morning nine for conviction to two for acquittal; and from noon until they finally came into court ten for conviction to one for acquittal.

EVIDENCE UNDER PATENT ACT—PRACTICE.

The 15th section of the act of congress of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 123], commonly called the "Patent Act," does not require notice of the names and places of residence of the witnesses, by whom it is intended to prove a prior knowledge and use of the thing patented.

[Cited in Woodbury Patent Planing Mach. Co. v. Keith, Case No. 17,970; Agawam Woolen Co. v. Jordan, 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 596.]

In this suit, which was one for an infringement of a patent right, the defendants pleaded the general issue; and, relying in their defence upon a previous use and knowledge of the thing patented, gave notice to the plaintiffs under the act of congress,² that they would offer proof upon the trial that it had been publicly used at certain places which they named, and that a prior knowledge of it was possessed by certain persons, whom, together with their places of residence, they also named. But the notice did not specify the names nor residences of the witnesses by whom it was intended to prove what was thus notified. The act of congress of July 4, 1836 (section 15), which allows this defence and notice, says: "Whenever the defendant relies in his defence on the fact of a previous invention, knowledge, or use of the thing patented, he shall state in his notice of special matter the names and places of residence of those whom he intends to prove to have possessed a prior knowledge of the thing, and where the same had been used."

² Of July 4, 1836, § 15 (5 Stat. 123), that the defendant shall be permitted to plead the general issue, and to give any special matter in evidence of which notice in writing may have been given thirty days before the trial, tending to prove that the thing patented had been in public use, &c.

Mr. Mallery, now calling upon a witness to prove where and by whom the thing had been used, Mr. Hazlehurst objected to the testimony, because the name and residence of the witness had not been given. He cited 2 Greenl. Ev. § 501, where it is said: "The facility with which this defence" (of prior use) "may be made, affords a strong temptation to the crime of subornation of perjury; to prevent which the defendant is required to state, in his notice, the names and residence of the witnesses by whom the alleged previous invention is to be proved." He cited, also, Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 448, 459, in the supreme court of the United States. The court below had rejected the testimony of one White, for want, says, the reporter, "of the notice required by the act of congress, of the use of the machine at Mauch Chunk, at which place it was said his testimony would shew it had been used." This report, Mr. Hazlehurst thought, did not shew precisely what notice was or was not given, but Judge Story, in giving the opinion of the court, clearly did. "There is no proof on the record," says that judge, "that notice had been given according to the requirements of the statute, that White was to be a witness," &c. "Unless such notice was given, it is plain that the examination could not rightfully be had." What notice does the court here mean, as being within "the requirements of the statute?" Clearly "that White was to be a witness." Dr. Greenleaf, without quoting this case, yet seems to have the same notion of the requirements of the act. Indeed, if a witness knows, i. e. legally knows, of another man's discovery, he himself knows of the discovery, and the notice ought to be given.

Mr. Meredith, contra. There has been a misconception of the act by Judge Story and by Dr. Greenleaf, who follows him. The case cited of Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 448, 459, shews that the ground of the rejection of White's testimony was because notice was not given of a use of the machine at Mauch Chunk. White was, himself, the person who had used it there, and his name ought to have been given, not as witness, but as that of a person who "possessed a prior knowledge of the thing." The point adjudged was as to the "place." The language of the court, or rather the judge who delivered the opinion of the court, is loose, and goes for what it is worth.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The language of the act, I think, requires nothing more than the names and residences of the persons who possessed the prior knowledge of the thing patented, and the name of the place at which it had been used. It would be unreasonable to extend it, unless it clearly required us to do so, to the names and residences of all the witnesses whom the defendant meant to summon. The other requisition is reasonable enough, and was intended to guard against surprise from such evidence as was given in Whitney's Case (Whitney v. Fort [Case No. 17,588]). Though Mr. Whitney's cotton gin was an invention of perfect originality, two persons were yet brought forward, one of whom testified that he had seen a similar machine in England seventeen years before, and the other that he had seen one in Ireland.

It would have been quite enough, in order to disprove it, that the other side had had notice of the place at which, and name of the party by whom, the alleged prior machine was used.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—SPECIFICATIONS—AXLES FOR RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

Where the plaintiff, in the specification of his patent, claimed as his invention "an improvement in the construction of the axles or bearings of railway, or other wheeled carriages," and it appeared, that the improvement, though it had never before been applied to railway carriages, was well known as applied to other carriages, it was held, that the patent was not good.

Case for infringement of a patent dated the 30th of July, 1831, for "a new and useful improvement of railway and other wheeled carriages." Plea, the general issue with special matters of defence: (1) That the invention was not new. (2) That the invention was in public use before the patent, with the consent of the patentee. The specification annexed to the patent was in substance as follows: "To all whom it may concern, be it known, that I, Ross Winans, have invented an improvement in the construction of the axles, or bearings, of railway, or other wheeled carriages, and that the following is a full and exact description thereof: The axle, with my improved journals, or bearings, may be made straight, and the wheels placed thereon in the usual way; but instead of forming the bearing under the body of the carriage, and within the naves or hubs, of the wheels, there to sustain the weight of the load, I extend the axles out at each end, projecting beyond the naves to such a length as shall enable me to form them into gudgeons. The lengths and diameters of these gudgeons, I regulate according to the load they are intended to sustain, and to other circumstances. In all cases, however, the value of my invention depends upon the gudgeons having their diameters as small as a due attention to the strength required will allow. The causing the axles to run in boxes, or upon bearings, without the naves, admits of their being made much smaller than usual, the degree of diminution which I have found to answer well in practice, will hereafter be stated. They should be formed of good wrought iron, and case-hardened: or overlaid, or cased with the best steel, and hardened, which materially diminishes the extent of bearing surface necessary to enable them to receive and resist the pressure of the load, and their tendency to wear; they may therefore be short, and are consequently strong, when of comparatively very small diameter. The tendency to lateral movement is checked, or limited by forming the end, or point of the axle, or gudgeon, so as to be met occasionally by the external cap or cover of the gudgeon box, when lateral pressure occurs. By placing the bearing outside (as aforesaid), the diameter of the wheels may be enlarged with more advantage than formerly, as the axles between the wheels may be made of any required strength (to resist the increased stress thrown on to that part of them by an enlargement of the wheels,) without affecting the size or strength, of the bearing journals. By the foregoing means, the leverage of the wheels (or the mechanical advantage with which the moving power acts, to overcome the resistance to motion), is increased, and consequently the friction or resistance to motion in rail-road carriages, diminished to a greater extent than heretofore. This improvement in the axles or journals of rail-way carriages, was devised and carried into operation on my experimental rail-way, and exhibited to various persons in the early part of the year 1827; and it was put into practical operation, under my direction, on the Baltimore and Ohio, and on the Liverpool and Manchester rail-roads, in the early part of 1829, in connection with another improvement for the further diminution of friction, by means of a revolving bearing, or friction wheel, for which other improvement a patent was granted to me on the 11th of October, 1828." "The object of the invention, and a practical demonstration of its utility having been shown, its application and adaptation to the different railroad carriages, burden wagons, locomotive engines, &c., and to the different bearing boxes that may be preferred for different purposes, (either revolving or common,) will be evident and easy, to any person acquainted with the building of railway carriages. But to render it still more so, the following general directions and proportions are given," &c. "I, therefore, declare that the improvement, or improvements, above explained and described, in diminishing the resistance to motion in wheeled carriages to be used on railways, which I claim as my own invention, is the extending the axles each way outside of a pair, or pairs, of wheels, far enough to form external gudgeons to receive the bearing box of the load body, and diminished as aforesaid with a view to lessen the resistance of friction, as small as its situation, with the use of the most favorable metal for wear, will permit. Thus conveniently increasing the leverage of the wheels, without impairing their effective strength or durability."

At the trial, it appeared that Winans had obtained a patent for the invention in England, in Oct., 1828, and afterwards on the 30th of July, 1831, he took the present patent.

It was argued by B. R. Curtis, for the defendants, that this was too late; and Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 292, 320, 322, Act 1839, c. 88, § 7 [5 Stat. 354], and McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 202, were cited. But the main ground was, that the invention was not new, but had been before applied to other carriages, although not to railway carriages, before the patentee applied it to railways. The patent was not for the application of the improvement to railway carriages alone, but it was "to rail-way and other wheeled carriages." Edgew. Roads & Carriages, printed in 1817, Append. 2, pp. 71, 73, 76; and Dr. Hook's Essay upon Carriages, printed in 1684, pp. 145, 146, were cited in support of the objection.

C. G. Loring, for plaintiff, argued, that it was the intention of the plaintiff to claim as his invention the application of extended axles of wheels to carriages with flanges on railroads; that the plaintiff claimed this particular combination as new, and it was so. But he did not mean to claim the invention as applicable to all other wheel carriages.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I fear that it is impossible to give this limited interpretation to the plaintiff's patent. The patent itself is for "a new and useful improvement of rail-way, and other wheeled carriages;" and the specification expressly states, that the patentee has invented "an improvement in the construction of the axles, or bearings, of rail-way, or other wheeled carriages," and then he proceeds to give a description thereof. It is plain from this language that he does not limit his invention to rail-way carriages; but he insists, that it is new as to other carriages. It is true, that in summing up his claim, in the close of the specification, he seems to use language somewhat more restrictive; but even there he says, that what he claims as his invention is, "the extending the axles each way outside of a pair or pairs of wheels, far enough to form external gudgeons to receive the bearing box of the load body, and diminished as aforesaid with a view to lessen the resistance of friction, as small as its situation, with the use of the most favorable metal for wear, will permit; thus conveniently increasing the leverage of the wheels without impairing their effective strength or durability." Now the invention, as stated in this general form, is precisely what the defendants insist is not new, but was well known before, as applied, not to railway, but to other carriages. If this be true, it seems difficult to perceive how the present patent can be maintained.

A verdict was thereupon taken pro forma for the defendants, with liberty to move a new trial upon the question of law. No such motion was made.

WINANS v. DANFORTH et al.

[New York Times, Nov. 17, 1860.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1860.

PATENTS — INFRINGEMENT — ANTICIPATION — ABANDONED EXPERIMENTS.

[1. A patent for increasing or decreasing the draft of a locomotive boiler by carrying the exhaust pipes of the engines to the bottom of the smoke pipe, and there controlling the discharge of the steam by plugs, is infringed by a locomotive in which a like result is accomplished by carrying the exhaust pipes to the bottom of the smoke box, instead of the smoke pipe.]

[2. The previous construction of a machine resembling that of a patent, but which proved unsatisfactory in operation, and was therefore abandoned, does not operate as an anticipation of the patent.]

This was an action by Ross Winans against Charles Danforth and others for damages for an alleged infringement of a patent granted in November, 1846, to the plaintiff, for an improvement in the machinery of locomotive engines, by which the exhaust steam which was made to discharge itself into the smoke pipe, was so regulated as to increase or decrease the draught of the smoke-stack, according as the engineer desired to increase or decrease the working power of the engine. This object the plaintiff effected by carrying his exhaust-pipes, to the bottom of the smoke-pipe, and fitting them there with conical plugs, by the motion of which in the pipes, the discharge of the steam into the smoke-pipe was increased or diminished. The defendants, who are engine-builders at Paterson, N. J., have built engines in which the two exhaust-pipes are brought into one, in which a conical plug was fitted, by means of which the exhaust steam was discharged, not into the smoke-pipe, but into the bottom of the smoke-box. They claimed that this was no infringement upon the plaintiff's patent. They also claimed that the machinery built according to the plaintiff's patent would not be available, and they denied the novelty of the plaintiff's invention.

Mr. Blatchford and Mr. Keller, for plaintiff.
Mr. Cozzens and Mr. Stoughton, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury that the idea of the plaintiff was the regulation of exhaust steam for the purpose of increasing the draught according to the necessities of the engine, which idea was not denied to be a useful one; and if this idea was to be found in the arrangement which was placed at the bottom of the smoke box, it was just as much an infringement of the plaintiff's right as if it was placed any where else. That as to the denial of novelty, several points were relied on. One was an engine called the McNeil, but as it appeared that this was only an experiment which proved unsatisfactory and was abandoned, that might be laid aside, as it was necessary not only that a man should have an idea, but should embody it in a working machine, to secure him the benefit of the patent laws. Another reference was based on machinery described in the Mechanic's Magazine, but in that there was no idea of regulating the exhaust steam for the purpose of affecting the draught, but only for the purpose of checking the progress of the piston in the cylinder. Another matter relied upon to impeach the novelty of the plaintiff's invention was some experiments which were made to find out what was the proper amount of steam to discharge into the smoke-pipe of any locomotive by a fixed aperture, but which when ascertained would leave the pipes just the same as the pipes previously used, and had no idea of regulation of the exhaust steam in them. That another defence relied upon was a patent granted to Mann & Tyng. But this was simply a plan of diverting a portion of the steam into the boiler, when there was more made than was needed for the draught and not a regulation of the body of the steam discharged, and could not therefore be relied on. That if on all the evidence, the jury should find in the defendant's machine the ideas of the plaintiff embodied into a machine corresponding with the machine of the plaintiff they must find a verdict in his favor.

The case has been on trial for several days. The jury, after a short absence, found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $3,000.

of the car body in the lower part in the form of a frustrum of a cone, that form securing an equal pressure of the load in all parts, and by its diminishing proportions allowing it to pass through the track frame, so as to lower the centre of gravity.

The defendants had made car bodies in the form of a frustrum of an octagonal pyramid, and they were alleged to have thereby infringed the patent of the plaintiff, as the pyramid acted on the same principle with, though not altogether as well, as the cone.

J. H. B. Latrobe, for plaintiff.

J. Mason Campbell, for defendants.

THE COURT [GLENN, District Judge] decided, after a full argument, that the plaintiff had by his patent restricted himself to the particular form of car body there described, and was consequently not entitled to recover.

WINANS v. EATON et al.

[1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 181; Merw. Pat. Inv. 419.]¹
Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Sept., 1854.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION.

1. If there exist any reasonable doubt about the originality or novelty of the improvement as arranged and constructed by the patentee, or about the substantial identity of that manufactured by the defendant with the plaintiff's, the court is not at liberty, upon a motion for a preliminary injunction, to interfere and arrest the manufacture.

2. The determination of such questions must be postponed until the case is matured and disposed of at the final hearing.

[Cited in Sargent Manuf'g Co. v. Woodruff, Case No. 12,368.]

This was a motion for a provisional injunction to restrain [Orsamus Eaton from] the infringement of letters patent for "a new and useful improvement in the construction of cars or carriages intended to travel upon railroads," granted to Ross Winans, October 1, 1834, and extended for seven years from October 1, 1848.

The portion of the specification which is material to a correct understanding of the opinion, is as follows: "The object of my invention is, among other things, to make such an adjustment or arrangement of the wheels and axles as shall cause the body of the car or carriage to pursue a more smooth, even, direct, and safe course than it does as cars are ordinarily constructed, both over the curved and straight parts of the road, by the before-mentioned desideratum of combining the advantages of the near and distant coupling of the axles, and other means to be hereinafter described. For this purpose, I construct two bearing-carriages, each with four wheels, which are to sustain the body of the passenger or other car, by placing one of them at or near each end of it, in a way to be presently described. The two wheels on either side of these carriages are to be placed very near to each other, the spaces between their flanges need be no greater than is necessary to prevent their contact with each other. These wheels I connect together by means of a very strong spring—say double the usual strength employed for ordinary cars—the ends of which spring are bolted, or otherwise secured, to the upper sides of the boxes, which rest on the journals of the axles, the longer leaves of the springs being placed downward, and surmounted by the shorter leaves. Having thus connected two pairs of wheels together, I unite them into a four-wheel bearing-carriage, by means of their axles, and a bolster of the proper length, extending across, between the two pairs of wheels, from the center of one spring to that of the other, and securely fastened to the tops of them. This bolster must be of sufficient strength to bear a load upon its center of four or five tons. Upon this first bolster I place another of equal strength, and connect the two together by a center-pin, or bolt, passing down through them, and thus allowing them to swivel or turn upon each other in the manner of the front bolster of a common road-wagon. I prefer making these bolsters of wrought or cast iron; wood, however, may be used. I prepare each of the bearing-carriages in precisely the same way. The body of the passenger or other car I make of double the ordinary length of those which run on four wheels, and capable of carrying double their load. This body I place so as to rest its whole weight upon the two upper bolsters of the two before-mentioned bearing-carriages, or running gear. I sometimes place these bolsters so far within the ends of the body of the car as to bring all the wheels under it, and in this case less strength is necessary in the car body than when the bolster is situated at its extreme ends. In some cases, however, I place the bolster so far without the body of the car, at either end, as to allow the latter to hang down between the two sets of wheels or bearing-carriages, and to run, if desired, within a foot of the rails. When this is done, a strong frame-work projects out from either end of the car or carriage-body, and rests upon the upper bolsters of the two bearing-carriages. This last arrangement, by which the body of the car is hung so low down, manifestly affords a great security to the passengers, exempting them, in a great degree, from those accidents to which they are liable when the load is raised. * * * I do not claim as my invention, the running of carriages upon eight wheels, this having been previously done; not, however, in the manner, or for the purposes herein described, but merely with a view of distributing the weight, carried more evenly upon a rail or other road, and for objects distinct in character from those which I have had in view, as hereinbefore set forth. Nor have the wheels, when thus increased in number, been so arranged and connected with each other, either by design or accident, as to accomplish this purpose. What I claim, therefore, as my invention, and for which I ask a patent, is, the before-described manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels which constitute the two bearing-carriages, with a railroad car, so as to accomplish the end proposed by the means set forth, or by any others, which are analogous and dependent upon the same principles. Ross Winans."

Much testimony was offered to impeach the novelty of the patent, and the attention of the court was mainly directed to this point.

G. M. Keller and S. Blatchford, for complainant.

W. A. Beach and D. B. Eaton, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This case should have been decided at an earlier day, but such has been the pressure of business in court since the argument, that I have been unable to devote that time to its consideration which its difficulty and magnitude required. The papers are very voluminous, and some of the questions involved depend upon complicated and contradictory evidence.

As this is a motion for a preliminary injunction, I shall not deem it necessary to go into the case at large, or as fully as if it stood for a final hearing; but shall content myself by stating briefly the ground upon which I have arrived at the conclusion that the motion must be denied. This patent has been before me heretofore in the case of Winans v. Schenectady & T. R. Co. [Case No. 17,865], on a motion on the part of the defendants for a new trial. The case had been tried at law before his honor, Judge Conkling, and the questions involved were, the correctness of the rulings at the circuit.

In deciding upon these questions, it became necessary to give a construction of the patent, which will be found in the opinion then delivered, and which I do not understand is a matter of dispute on this motion.

The patent is for a new and useful improvement in the construction of cars or carriages intended to travel on railroads, which is particularly adapted to passenger cars; and after stating the difficulties to be encountered in running these cars on the road at great speed, from curvatures and consequent friction between the flanges of the wheels and rail, and from other obstructions and impediments specified, and after describing the parts and manner of the construction of a car, with a view to overcome these difficulties and impediments, the patentee closes by saying: "I do not claim as my invention, the running of cars or carriages upon eight wheels, this having been previously done; not, however, in the manner and for the purpose herein described, but merely with a view of distributing the weight carried, more evenly upon a rail or other road, and for objects distinct in character from those which I have had in view as hereinbefore set forth; nor have the wheels, when thus increased in number, been so arranged and connected with each other, either by design or accident, as to accomplish this purpose. What I claim, therefore, as my invention, and for which I ask a patent, is the before-described manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels which constitute the two bearing-carriages, with a railroad car, so as to accomplish the end proposed by the means set forth, or by others which are analogous and dependent upon the same principles."

In the arrangement of this passenger car, the patentee constructs the bearing-carriages each with four wheels, which sustain the body of the car, by placing one of them at or near each end of it; the two wheels on either side of the truck are to be placed very near each other. The spaces apart between the flanges need be no greater than are necessary to prevent contact. The car body rests upon bolsters supported on each of the two bearing-carriages or four-wheeled trucks, the bolsters so constructed as to swivel or turn on each other like the two front bolsters of a common wagon; the trucks may be so placed within and under the end of the car, as to bring all the wheels under it or without the end, so as to allow the body to be suspended within the two bearing-carriages. The closeness of the fore and hind wheels of the trucks, taken in connection with the use of them—the trucks arranged as distant from each other as can be done consistently with the proper support of the car-body—is considered by the patentee as an important feature of the invention, as, by the contiguity of the fore and hind wheels of each truck, while the two trucks may be at a considerable distance apart, the lateral friction from the rubbing of the flanges against the rails is most effectually avoided, while, at the same time, all the advantages attendant upon placing axles of a four-wheeled car far apart are obtained; for the two wheels on either side of the trucks, may, from their proximity, be considered as acting like a single wheel, and as the two trucks may be placed at any distance from each other, consistent with the required strength of the body of the car, all the advantages are obtained that result from having two axles of a four-wheeled car at a distance from each other, while its inconveniences are avoided.

The two wheels on either side of the trucks are connected together by means of a very strong spring, the ends of which are bolted or otherwise secured to the upper sides of the boxes which rest on the journals of the axles, the longer leaves of the spring placed downward. The bolsters extend across, between the two pairs of wheels, from the center of one spring to that of the other, and are securely fastened to the top of them. This is the car substantially as arranged and constructed by the patentee without going into all the details of the specifications.

As we held when the patent was formerly before us—the improvement claimed is the car itself, arranged and constructed as described in the patent, and which we have above in substance set forth; and the question now before us, is the same as before the jury on the former case, viz: whether or not cars or carriages for running on railroads as a whole, like the one described in the patent, had been before known or in public use? And whether or not the cars manufactured by the defendants are, in arrangement and construction, substantially like it?

The case, in its present posture, does not call for a definite determination of these questions, as that must be postponed till the final hearing. These questions are only important to be considered now, so far as they may aid us in deciding upon the right of the complainant to have the defendants enjoined pending the litigation. For if there exist any reasonable doubt about the originality or novelty of the car, as arranged and constructed by the patentee, or about the substantial identity of the cars manufactured by the defendants with the plaintiff's, then I am not at liberty to interfere and arrest the manufacture at this stage of the proceedings. The determination of that must be postponed till the case is matured and disposed of at the final hearing.

A good deal of proof has been furnished by the defendants in this case, bearing directly upon the question above stated, not before the court and jury in the case against the Schenectady and Troy Railroad Company. The most material is that relating to what is called in the proceedings the "Quincy Car." We have a description of this car from Gridley Bryant, the inventor and constructor of it. He is an engineer, and in 1826 superintended the building of a railroad leading from the Quincy quarries, in Massachusetts, to the landing at Milton, a distance of between three and four miles. This is said to be the first railroad built in the United States. Bryant states that the eight-wheeled car on this road was constructed in the summer of 1829, and has been used on it from that time to the present; that the objects of the construction were to carry a large load on the eight wheels without injury to the road; to turn the curves freely, descend the inclined plane, and run on the road carrying the stone as smoothly and safely as possible. It consisted of two four-wheel trucks, securely held by center pivots or king bolts about ten feet apart, which passed through the bolsters of a rigid body or platform framing, and the centers of the trucks. The body, with its bolsters thus secured by the vertical king bolts, had side bearings on curved plates on the trucks, and the truck swivelled under them to conform to the curves and switches or turnouts of the road, while the body connecting the trucks sustained and carried the load smoothly and safely. That the trucks consisted of rigid rectangular wheel frames with the double cross bolsters, and held the bearing points of the wheels on the rail, the same distance apart as the gauge of the track, which was five feet. He further observes that this car contained a combination of the two four-wheel trucks; rigid wheel frames, with a permanent body to carry the load by means of vertical king bolts, allowing the two trucks to swivel to conform to the curves of the road, the same in principle of construction and operation as the eight-wheeled cars now in general use on railroads in the United States.

Bryant continued in the service as superintendent and engineer of the road till 1836, at which time, two of these eight-wheeled cars were in use, including the one originally constructed. This witness is fully confirmed by three others, each of whom were engaged upon the road at the time spoken of by him, and since. The railroad has a steep inclined plane, on which the cars are raised and lowered by means of an endless chain, and has several sharp curves and turnouts. One of the heavy curves that encircle the hill of the quarry, is said to be about two hundred feet radius.

Several experts have been examined in relation to the arrangement and construction of this "Quincy car," and a decided preponderance in numbers, and among them persons of the highest skill and of the greatest experience in their professions, concur in saying that it embodies the principles, arrangement and construction of the cars in general use upon railroads, which it is admitted are the kind manufactured by the defendants. The evidence furnished on behalf of the defendants, in resisting the motion upon this branch of the defense, is very full and strong; and as the case stands, overcomes the contrary proofs given in support of the bill.

In addition to this "Quincy car," the defendants have furnished a model and drawing of the eight-wheeled steam carriage, devised and constructed by Horatio Allen, and put in operation in February, 1832, on the South Carolina Railroad. The drawings were made in the winter of 1830 and 1831. A few of the carriages were running on the road before the close of the year 1833. This car was therefore devised and completed in working order, by Allen, prior to the patent of Winans, and indeed prior to the perfection of his improvement preparatory to obtaining the patent.

As in the case of the "Quincy car," the decided preponderance of the evidence is, that this steam carriage embraces all the elements, arrangements and organization to be found in the cars manufactured by the defendants.

I do not find that this evidence was before the court and jury in the former trial upon this patent. Although it may not be regarded (looking at the particular construction and purpose of this steam carriage) as bearing so directly upon the novelty of the Winans car, or speaking perhaps more accurately, as showing the principles and arrangements of the defendants' cars to have been discovered and applied before the date of the Winans improvement, it is undoubtedly entitled to a good deal of consideration; and as the case now stands, sufficient at least, in connection with the "Quincy car," to forbid the granting of the injunction.

The defendants have also given in evidence a model of a carriage for railways and roads, described by W. and E. W. Chapman, in their patent granted in England, in 1812. The specification is published in the 24th volume of the Repertory of Arts, etc., under the date of February, 1814, with drawings. Fig. 3, says the patentee, shows a carriage of six wheels for the engine, which may rest equally, or nearly so, on each of its wheels, and move freely round the curves, or past the angles of a railway; 1, 1, the fore pair of wheels are, as usual, on railways, fixed to the body of the carriage; 2, 2, and 3, 3, the other two pair, are fixed on axles (parallel to each other) to a separate frame, over which the body of the carriage should be so poised as that two-thirds of its weight should lie over the central point of the fore wheels where the (pivot?) 4, is placed, and the remaining third over the axis (axle) 1, 1. The two-thirds weight of the carriage should rest on conical wheels, or rollers, bearing upon the curved plates 1, 1, so as to admit the ledges of the wheels, or those of the way to guide them on its curves, or past its angles, by forcing the transom, or frame, to turn on the pivot, and thus arrange the wheels to the course of the way, similar to the carriage of a coal wagon; and the patentees add, if the weight of the locomotive engine should require eight wheels, it is only requisite to substitute, in place of the axis (axle) 1, 1, a transom, such as described, laying the weight equally upon both, and then, similarly to two coal wagons attached together, the whole four pair of wheels will arrange themselves to the curves of the railway.

The weight of the evidence of the experts who have been examined in respect to the Chapman car, is, that the elements and arrangement, as described in the specification, and delineated in the drawing, comprise all the substantial elements and arrangements to be found in the cars of the defendants, and a critical examination of the description and of the drawing, certainly tends to confirm rather than weaken the inference of these witnesses. This Chapman car is probably the origin of the "Quincy car," the Horatio Allen car, and of all that class now in use upon the railroads of this country, and was devised by the Chapmans not simply to equalize the greater burden, attained by the multiplication of the wheels, and to relieve the stress upon the rail; but also by the arrangement of the four pairs of wheels, so that each of the pairs should be fixed to separate frames (the axles parallel to each other), and the burden resting upon the central points of the four wheels, and turning upon a pivot, or swiveling, to permit the trucks to accommodate themselves to the curves and angles of the road, and cause them to move more freely and smoothly round these.

This description and drawing of the Chapman car, as given in the volume of the Repertory of Arts, were before the court and jury in the former trial; but as the novelty and improvement of the plaintiff's patent were left, as questions of fact, to the jury, the subject was not a matter of particular examination on the motion for a new trial.

There are many other parts of this case which, were this a final hearing, it would be necessary to notice, but in the present stage of it are not important; as, for the reasons given, we think, upon the well-settled principles governing applications for a preliminary injunction, this motion must be denied.

WINANS v. McKEAN R. & N. CO.

[6 Blatchf. 215.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. 9, 1868.

CREDITORS' BILL AGAINST CORPORATION—UNPAID STOCK SUBSCRIPTIONS—JURISDICTION OF DEFENDANT—REMOVAL FROM STATE COURT—FOLLOWING STATE DECISIONS.

1. Where a suit is brought in a state court, and is duly removed into this court, by the defendant, under the 12th section of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 79), the question of the jurisdiction of this court is not dependent upon any of the provisions of the 11th section of that act.

[Cited in Hobby v. Allison, 13 Fed. 402.]

2. A defendant who voluntarily appears in a suit in this court, waives his right to urge, as an objection to the jurisdiction of this court, that he was not found, or served with process, in this district.

[Cited in Romaine v. Union Ins. Co., 28 Fed. 636.]

3. Where a bill is filed, in this court, against a corporation created by the state of Pennsylvania, by a judgment creditor thereof, for a sequestration of its property, rights, and franchises, and for the appointment of a receiver thereof, with power to collect from its stockholders the amount of their unpaid subscriptions, or sufficient thereof to satisfy such judgment, and for the payment therewith of such judgment, it is a sufficient statement, in such bill, of the amount and value of such unpaid subscriptions, to state that it has unpaid subscriptions to its stock much more than sufficient to pay such judgment.

4. The fact that such corporation has no property in this district, and no property any where, but the demands for such unpaid subscriptions, is no objection to the jurisdiction of this court, and no defence to such suit.

5. The cases of Mann v. Pentz, 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 415, and Dayton v. Borst, 31 N. Y. 435, considered.

6. The case of Dayton v. Borst maintains the right of a receiver of a corporation appointed under a judgment creditor's bill, to recover the balance unpaid upon subscriptions to the capital stock of such corporation, without any previous call for the payment of such subscriptions having been made by such corporation, and, as the latest exposition of the law of the state of New York on the subject, by its highest court, is adopted by this court.

[This was a bill in equity by Theodore B. Winans against the McKean Railroad & Navigation Company.]

The case came before the court, on a demurrer to the plaintiff's bill of complaint.

HALL, District Judge. The bill sets forth, in substance, that the plaintiff is a citizen of the state of New York, and the defendant a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Pennsylvania; that, heretofore, the plaintiff, being a citizen of New York, commenced an action in the supreme court of that state, against the defendant, for the same cause of action afterward stated in the bill; that, thereupon, the defendant, by the means, and in the mode, prescribed by law, and duly set forth in the bill, removed the case to this court for trial, in pursuance of the act of congress; that afterward, and at the next term of this court, the defendant filed, in this court, a copy of the process served upon it in this action, in said supreme court, and entered its appearance in the said action, so removed to this court for trial; that the defendant was, on the 10th of August, 1858, and still is, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of Pennsylvania, and is a citizen of that state; and that the defendant has its principal office and place of business in the city of New York. The bill then proceeds to state the regular recovery of a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, against the defendant, in the supreme court of the state of New York, for more than nine thousand nine hundred dollars, for money lent; that such judgment was recovered in September, 1865, and duly docketed; that executions were issued thereon, and duly returned wholly uncollected; and that the judgment remains wholly unpaid. The allegations in respect to such judgment and executions, and the return of such executions, are, in fact, those which are ordinarily required in a judgment creditor's suit, prosecuted for the purpose of reaching the equitable assets of the debtor. The bill then further states, that, since the recovery of such judgment, the plaintiff has made diligent efforts to have such judgment prosecuted, and to commence an action for the recovery thereof, in Pennsylvania; that he has not been able to find any of the officers of the defendant upon whom to serve process in that state, or any property belonging to the defendant, in that state, to attach, so as to commence an action therein; that all of the directors of the company reside in the city of New York, and all, or nearly all, of the stockholders thereof reside in that city; that the defendant has no office or officer any where in the state of Pennsylvania, and is not engaged in any business in that state, and has no property of any kind therein, and has no property in the state of New York, or elsewhere, subject to levy and sale on execution; that the only property or means which the defendant has, is the demand of the defendant against its stockholders, for the portion of their subscriptions remaining unpaid; and that the defendant has subscriptions to its stock remaining unpaid, and which have never been called for or required to be paid by the defendant, or its directors, much more than sufficient to pay the judgment of the plaintiff. The bill, then, without setting out any of the provisions of the defendant's charter, or of the laws under which it was incorporated, or any thing in regard to the terms, or legal effect, of the alleged subscriptions which have not been paid in full, or whether the parties who made such subscriptions are still stockholders in the corporation, and, in short, without setting out any thing beyond the fact of there being such unpaid subscriptions, to show that the corporation has a present, or any future, right of action to recover the unpaid balance of such subscriptions, and without making any of the persons whose subscriptions are unpaid, parties to the bill, proceeds to pray for a sequestration of the property, rights, and franchises of the defendant, and for the appointment of a receiver, with the usual powers to receive the property, rights, and franchises of the defendant, and to collect and receive from the stockholders of the defendant the amount of their subscriptions unpaid, or sufficient thereof to satisfy the plaintiff's judgment, with interest and costs; and that such receiver may be directed, by the judgment of this court, to pay over to the plaintiff the amount of such judgment, interest, and costs. It also contains the prayer for general relief.

To this bill the defendant demurs, and assigns as causes of demurrer: (1) That it appears, by the bill, that the defendant is a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania, and that all of its property and effects are within that state, and that the property and effects sought to be reached by, and through, this action, are in that state, and that none of the same are in the state of New York; (2) that it does not appear that the defendant has any property or effects whatever, to be used, or applied, in or towards the satisfaction of the judgment mentioned and described in the bill; (3) that it does not appear that the defendant holds against its stockholders, or any of them, any demand for any portion of their subscriptions, or that any portion thereof is unpaid, or that any portion thereof is collectable; (4) that the plaintiff has not, in and by his bill, made and stated such a case as does, or ought to, entitle him to any such discovery, or relief, as is sought, and prayed for, from and against the defendant. There is also a fifth formal cause of demurrer assigned, but it is only a reiteration, in a different form, of the substance of the cause of demurrer fourthly assigned.

As it was conceded on the argument, and is substantially stated in the bill, that this suit was first instituted in a state court and removed to this court for trial, according to the provisions of the 12th section of the judiciary act, it is unnecessary to discuss the questions presented by the cause of demurrer firstly assigned, or to examine the numerous cases cited on the argument to show that this court has no jurisdiction of this case by reason of the character and citizenship, or legal domicile or locality, of the defendant. If this question of jurisdiction depended upon the provisions of the 11th section of the judiciary act, most of the cases cited would be pertinent; but, as it depends wholly upon the provisions of the 12th section, a sufficient authority for holding that the demurrer cannot be sustained upon the grounds stated, is furnished by the cases of Bliven v. New England Screw Co. [Case No. 1,550]; Barney v. Globe Bank [Id. 1,031]; Sayles v. Northwestern Ins. Co. [Id. 12,421]; Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. [Id. 2,859]. But, even in a case within the 11th section of the judiciary act, a defendant who is not found, or served with process, in the district in which the suit is brought, waives his right to object to the jurisdiction upon that ground, by voluntarily appearing in the suit, as the defendant did in this case, by entering his appearance in this court, as alleged in the bill. The immunity which, under the 11th section of the judiciary act, is, in certain cases, secured to a defendant not so found or served with process, is a personal privilege which he may always waive; and he does waive it by entering his appearance. Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 300; Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. [supra]; Flanders v. Etna Ins. Co. [Case No. 4,852]; Harrison v. Rowan [Id. 6,140]; Gracie v. Palmer, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 699; Logan v. Patrick, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 288; Irvine v. Lowry, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 293.

The objection that the property and effects of the defendant which it is the object of the bill to reach, are in the state of Pennsylvania, and all the objections stated in the second, third, and fourth causes of demurrer assigned, may, perhaps, be properly considered together; or else, as having such direct and close connection as to justify the omission to consider each separately and in its order.

The bill alleges, in substance, that the defendant has no property of any kind in Pennsylvania, and that the only property or means which it has is its demand against its stockholders for the proportion of their subscriptions remaining unpaid; but it alleges that the defendant has subscriptions to its stock remaining unpaid much more than sufficient to pay the plaintiff's debt. Taken together, these allegations can hardly be said to show that the defendant is without means to pay the plaintiff's debt. The alleged sufficiency of these unpaid subscriptions would seem to require that their value as well as their amount should be more than equal to the plaintiff's debt; and it must be admitted that the allegation of value would have been more clearly appropriate and sufficient, if the value of these subscriptions, or their amount, and the pecuniary responsibility of such subscribers, had been directly alleged, and not been left to be inferred from the somewhat indefinite statement just referred to. The question is not free from doubt, but I am inclined to think that the bill is sufficient in so far as this statement of amount and value is concerned, and shall therefore proceed to consider the more serious questions still remaining for discussion.

The right to require payment of these amounts of unpaid stock, if it can be considered as the property or effects of the defendant, must belong to the defendant as a Pennsylvania corporation, and, as a chose in action, must be considered as property of the defendant in Pennsylvania, where and where only the body corporate exists. If it is, as yet, a mere right of the corporation, by a resolution of its board of directors or managers, to call for the payment of the balance unpaid, by installments or otherwise, it is a right which can be made the basis of an action at law against the stockholders only, upon and by means of the proper action of a Pennsylvania corporation; and, probably, this action cannot be enforced by this court, for want of power to compel the directors or managers of this foreign corporation to make the necessary calls for such payment. If the proper calls have been made, or if a suit at law could now be sustained by the corporation, without any such call having been made, to enforce payment, such a right of action follows the locality of the corporation or creditor, and, so far as locality is concerned, must be considered as assets of the defendant in Pennsylvania, and not within the jurisdiction of this court—and this whether the written subscription, or other evidence of such subscription, be within this district or in Pennsylvania.

But I am inclined to the opinion that the fact that the defendant has no real or personal property, choses in action or equitable interests, in this district, is not, of itself, an objection to the jurisdiction of this court or a sufficient defence to the present bill. The actual appearance of a foreign corporation as a defendant, gives to this court the same right to grant a proper decree upon the case made, that it would have the right to make under like circumstances against a natural person proceeded against for the same cause of action; and the case of Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, 606, cited and relied upon by the defendant, as well as several English cases there cited by Chancellor Walworth, would seem to authorize this court to make a decree in a judgment creditor's suit, requiring the defendant to transfer to a receiver real and personal estate, situated in a foreign country, and choses in action belonging to him, though he might be a resident of a for-ign country, in order to secure their application to the satisfaction of the judgment of the plaintiff in such suit. It is not, ordinarily, a sufficient defence to an action at law or a suit in equity, that the plaintiff will not be able to enforce the judgment or decree to which he would otherwise be entitled; but, in a judgment creditor's suit brought to enforce the payment of such creditor's demand out of the equitable interests and assets of the defendant which are not subject to execution at law, the precise ground of relief is, that the court of equity can enforce the remedy sought, while it cannot be obtained in a common law court; and, in such suits, a court of equity ought not to allow the parties to go through a long course of expensive and, perhaps, vexatious litigation, when it is apparent that it must be fruitless in its result. This makes it necessary to consider the more important questions which relate to the actual merits of this case, and the extent of the relief which can be afforded to the plaintiff under his bill as now framed, through the action of a receiver or otherwise.

It is very clear, that the capital stock of the corporation defendant, and any unpaid portions of such capital stock, must be considered, in equity, as a trust fund, specifically charged with the payment of the debts of the corporation. Mann v. Pentz, 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 415, 422; Spear v. Grant, 16 Mass. 9; Wood v. Dummer [Case No. 17,944]; Briggs v. Penniman, 8 Cow. 387; Slee v. Bloom, 19 Johns. 456, 474; Hume v. Winyaw Co., 4 Am. Law Mag. 92; Ward v. Griswoldville Manufacturing Co., 16 Conn. 593; Nathan v. Whitlock, 9 Paige, 152; Dayton v. Borst, 31 N. Y. 435. This being so, it must necessarily follow, that a court of equity, upon a bill properly framed, in a suit brought by and against all proper parties, would grant the equitable relief to which the plaintiff might be entitled. (See cases just cited.) This brings us to the questions whether, in this case, the proper parties are before the court, and whether the bill states a case which entitles the plaintiff to the relief, or any portion of the relief, prayed for in the bill.

The case of Mann v. Pentz, ubi supra, apparently decides, that the allegations of the bill in this case would be insufficient to authorize a decree against any single stockholder of a railroad corporation created by the legislature of this state, who might have been made a party to such a bill; and that any receiver who might be appointed in such a suit would have no right, in any event, to prosecute, either at law or in equity, an individual stockholder, for the recovery of the sum unpaid upon his stock. If that case stood alone, it would create very serious doubts, whether a receiver appointed in this case could maintain any action at law or suit in equity, for the purpose of enforcing payment of the amount still unpaid upon subscriptions to the capital stock of the defendant; and it might well be doubted, whether the liability of a stockholder upon his unpaid subscriptions could be enforced in the courts of this state, except by a suit in equity, in behalf, or for the benefit, of all the creditors of the corporation, and against all the stockholders in default. The stockholders' liability to creditors of the corporation was apparently considered, in that case, as a statutory liability only, and it was said that the stockholder could only be made liable to the corporation by regular calls, in pursuance of its charter; but the subsequent case of Dayton v. Borst, 31 N. Y. 435, seems to be opposed to the case of Mann v. Pentz, on these points, (unless there is a difference between the two cases by reason of the fact that one was a New York corporation and the other a corporation of New Jersey,) and to maintain the right of a receiver, with the ordinary powers of a receiver appointed under the bill of a judgment creditor, to recover the balance unpaid upon subscriptions to the capital stock of the corporation of which he has been made receiver, without any previous call being made by the corporation. The 13th section of the act creating the corporation in which the defendant in Mann v. Pentz was a stockholder, provided for calls upon the stockholders, and notice thereof, and for the forfeiture of stock in case the calls thereon were not paid; and it may have been properly considered by the judges who decided the two cases referred to, that this 13th section, in effect, required calls to be made before any action could be brought for the recovery of the amount unpaid upon the subscriptions of its stockholders, although I confess that my own first impression was, that the provision referred to required such calls, and notice thereof, only in cases where a forfeiture of the stock was contemplated. The rights of the parties were also considered to depend upon the New York statutes in reference to insolvent corporations, and these facts may, perhaps, distinguish the case from that of Dayton v. Borst. The cases of Mann v. Pentz and Wood v. Dummer were cited by Judge Davies, in delivering the opinion of the court in Dayton v. Borst, and there is nothing in his opinion, showing that the court intended expressly to overrule the decision in Mann v. Pentz. Nevertheless, the two cases appear to me to be irreconcilably in conflict, unless the case of Mann v. Pentz proceeded upon the ground that, under such 13th section, there could be no liability against the stockholder, unless a call had been made in pursuance of that section, or upon the ground that the statute of New York had provided a different remedy against delinquent stockholders; and the latter case, in which the plaintiff was the receiver of a foreign corporation, "with power" (as is stated) "to sue for, collect, receive, and take into possession, all the goods, rights, and credits" of such corporation, shows that a receiver with these powers, (such as are or dinarly conferred upon receivers under judgment creditors' bills), had a right to sue for the unpaid balance of subscriptions, and that, when there was nothing to the contrary appearing in the case, the receiver might recover the amount, without showing anything more than the fact that the defendant had become a stockholder and had failed to pay the full amount of his stock.

The case of Dayton v. Borst seems to be full authority for the position, that a receiver appointed in this suit would, under the case made by the bill, be entitled to recover the unpaid balances due from the stockholders of the defendant, to such extent as would enable him to pay the plaintiff's demand; and, as the question is one of state law, and the decision in Dayton v. Borst was made by the highest court of the state, without the express dissent of any of its judges, I shall rule the demurrer in this case on the authority of that decision, as the latest exposition of the law of this state upon the questions involved in its determination.

I confess, that a bill framed according to the views expressed in the cases of Wood v. Dummer and Mann v. Pentz, and making the corporation, and its delinquent stockholders, parties defendants, seems to me a more appropriate form of proceeding in the case of a domestic corporation; and no insuperable objection to adopting that form of proceeding in the case of a foreign corporation, at least so far as to make stockholders in default parties defendants in a state court, now occurs to me, or has been suggested by the counsel. The equitable attachment of the demand of the corporation against such defaulting stockholders, thus made defendants, would be an important consideration in favor of such a form of proceeding; but, as it has not been adopted in this case, it is not necessary now to decide whether such a bill could be maintained upon the case stated by the plaintiff.

The demurrer is overruled, but with leave to the defendant to answer, within thirty days after notice of the order overruling the demurrer, on the payment of costs.

WINANS v. NEW YORK & E. R. CO.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June, 1856.²

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF SPECIFICATIONS—ACTION FOR INFRINGEMENT —RAILROAD CARS.

1. The patent and the certified copy of the record thereof, in December, 1854, and the certified copy of the drawings deposited by the patentee in the patent office, on the 19th November, 1833, with the references thereon, are under the provisions of the act of congress of

March 3, 1837 [5 Stat. 191], prima facie evidence of the particulars of the invention patented.

2. If the jury finds the plaintiff's patent to be valid, and that the defendants have infringed, they will have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the invention claimed by the plaintiff was put in use by the defendants, because such use was known to be advantageous.

3. If the specification of the plaintiff's claim is too broad, and he thereby claims to be the first inventor of that which was old and in public use before his alleged discovery and invention, and which is absolutely necessary to an organization constituting the arrangement and connection claimed by the plaintiff as his invention, and having the capacity to operate upon the principles of his invention, he is not entitled to recover in action, although some substantial part of the invention claimed, or some new combination of mechanical powers or devices, described in the patent, may have been first invented and discovered by him.

4. When a patentee specifies what he claims as new, every mechanical part, principle, or combination which he mentions in his specification, but which are not included in his invention, as claimed and limited, must, by necessary implication be considered as admitted to be old, or in use before; and the patent is not invalid, because the patent has not in express words particularly stated them to be old, nor described the particular manner of their construction.

This was an action on the case tried before Judge Hall and a jury, to recover damages for the infringement of the letters patent for "a new and useful improvement in the construction of cars or carriages intended to travel upon railroads," granted to Ross Winans, October 31, 1834. A portion of the specification and the claims will be found in the report of the case of Winans v. Eaton [Case No. 17,861]. The charge of the court related mainly to the construction of the patent, for, from the evidence offered, it sufficiently appeared, that, if the claims of the patentee were construed as insisted upon by the defendants, the patent was void for want of novelty, and the plaintiff could not recover.

J. A. Spencer, D. L. Seymour, C. M. Keller, and S. Blatchford, for plaintiff.

D. B. Eaton, S. Hubbell, and S. Stevens, for defendant.

HALL, District Judge (charging jury). I am very happy to inform you that there is a prospect of this case being very speedily disposed of. These are the rulings, gentlemen, which the court has determined to make, in delivering to you the charge which is to guide you in determining your verdict.

1st. The patent itself is prima facie evidence of the novelty and utility of the invention patented. The issuing of the patent is also prima facie evidence that the specification, when delivered, was accompanied with drawings and written references thereto, as then required by statute. So also the patent; and the certified copy of the record thereof, in December, 1854, and the certified copy of the drawings deposited by the patentee in the patent office on the 19th November, 1838, with the references thereon, are, under the provisions of the act of congress, of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 117], prima facie evidence of the particulars of the invention patented.

2d. It can hardly be necessary to occupy the time of the jury upon the question of utility, for the reason that, if the jury find the plaintiff's patent to be valid, and that the defendants have infringed, they will, it is believed, have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the invention claimed by the plaintiff was put in use by the defendants, because such use was known to be advantageous. On the question of novelty, I shall presently give other instructions.

3. It is necessary that you should understand what the plaintiff claims as his invention; that is, what is covered by the terms of the claim contained in his specification. The plaintiff, by his specification, does not claim to be the first inventor of the first railroad car or carriage, run upon eight wheels; nor does he claim to be the discoverer of the different effects produced by the near and by the remote position of the wheels of an ordinary four-wheeled car. He admits by his specification that the different effects produced by these different positions of the wheels in a four-wheeled car were known, and he also admits that the knowledge that placing the axles of such wheels comparatively near together, enabled the car to pass curves of short radius with the least friction, but at the same time rendered it less suited to the attainment of the steadiness of motion desired; together with the knowledge that the remote position of such wheels gave greater steadiness of motion to the car, and greater relief from the lateral and vertical vibrations, and the frequent shocks and concussions caused by minute obstructions and irregularities on the track, had caused the adoption, in the modes of construction then in use, of a compromise in regard to the distance between the fore and hind wheels of the four-wheeled car; which compromise, he says, was then most commonly made, between the evils resulting from a considerable separation and a near approach of the wheels of the four-wheeled car. He then says that by the modes of construction then in use, one of these advantages of positions of wheels must be sacrificed to the other, by which, and by the statement in regard to the usual compromise, he is understood to mean that no mode of construction then in public use would allow the full advantages of both these positions of the wheels (the near and the remote) to be attained at the same time; and that in practice, a part of the advantages resulting from each position was (by the compromise in regard to the distance between the wheels, adopted in the modes of construction then in use) necessarily sacrificed, in order to obtain part of the advantages of the other position. He afterward, in stating the object of his invention, informs us that he seeks to attain that object by the before-mentioned desideratum of combining the advantages of the near and distant coupling of the axles, and other means, to be therein-after described. He then describes the means by which this desideratum is to be obtained; the construction of two bearing-carriages, each with four wheels; the two wheels upon each side of these carriages to be placed very near each other, there being no necessity that the space between the flanges should be greater than is necessary to prevent their contact; the placing upon these bearing-carriages of a bolster of proper length, extending across between the two pairs of wheels; the placing on the top of this lower bolster of another of equal strength, and connecting the two together by a center-pin or bolt, passing down through them, and thus allowing them to swivel and turn upon each other, in the manner of the front bolster of a common road-wagon; the placing of the body of a passenger or other car, of double the ordinary length of those used upon four wheels, so as to rest its whole weight upon the two upper bolsters of the two bearing-carriages, at, near, or beyond the ends of the car body, so that such weight shall be borne substantially upon the central portion of the bolsters, being also the central portion of the bearing-carriages. His disclaimer, which follows, is in this language:

"I do not claim as my invention the running of cars or carriages upon eight wheels, this having been previously done; not, however, in the manner or for the purposes herein described, but merely with a view of distributing the weight carried, more evenly upon a rail, or other road, and for objects distinct in character from those which I have had in view, as hereinbefore set forth; nor have the wheels, when thus increased in number, been so arranged and connected with each other, either by design or accident, as to accomplish this purpose."

This disclaimer excludes from his subsequent claim no mode of arranging and connecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing-carriages, with an eight-wheeled railroad car, except those modes where the use of eight wheels was adopted merely with the view of distributing the weight carried more evenly upon a rail, or other road, and for objects distinct in character from those of enabling a car with a comparatively long body to turn curves with facility and safety, and with less friction. His subsequent claim furnishes a further limit of the invention claimed, and this claim embraces, by its specific language and express terms, the manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing-carriages, with a railroad car before described in the plaintiff's specification, by the means set forth, or any others which are analogous and dependent on the same principles; and it embraces nothing more. Therefore, according to the import and true construction of the plaintiff's patent and specification, he claims to be the first inventor of "a new and useful improvement in the construction of cars and carriages intended to travel upon railroads"—which improvement consists in the manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing-carriages, with a railroad car, the object of which is to make such an adjustment of the wheels, axles, and bearings of the car, as shall enable a car with a comparatively long body to pass curves with greater facility and safety, and less friction; and as shall at the same time cause the body of the car to pursue a more smooth, even, direct, and safe course over the curvatures and irregularities, and over the straight parts of the road.

4. The manner of such arrangement and connection is to place upon the upper bolsters of two bearing-carriages, each having four wheels, with the flanges of each pair of wheels very near together, the body of a car, so as to rest its weight and have the bearing of the load upon the center, or central portion of the bearing-carriages; the bolsters of the bearing-carriages and car-body respectively being connected by center-pins or bolts, so as to allow them to swivel and turn upon each other, in the manner of the front bolster of a common road-wagon, and the bolsters being placed at, near, or beyond the ends of the body, and the closeness of the fore and hind wheels of each of the two bearing-carriages, coupled as remotely from each other as may be desired, or can conveniently be done, for the support of one body, is a most important feature of the invention, with a view to the objects, and on the principles set forth in the specification.

5. The patentee does not claim to be the inventor of a car-body (either for freight or for passengers), of a new or peculiar construction, in size or form, nor of any single and wholly separate part of the entire car; but he claims as his invention, the manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels which constitute the two bearing-carriages, with a railroad car, in the manner and by the means described in his specification, for the ends before described, whether such railroad car is adapted to the transportation of freight or of passengers. The leading principle set forth in the specification, upon which the arrangement and connection act, to effect the objects aimed at, is, that by the contiguity of the fore and hind wheels of each bearing-carriage, and the swiveling motion of the trucks or bearing-carriages, the planes of the flanges of the wheels conform more nearly to the line of the rails, and the lateral friction of the flanges on the rails while entering, passing through, and leaving curves, is thereby diminished; while at the same time, in consequence of the two bearing-carriages being arranged and connected with the body of a passenger or burthen car by means of the king-bolts or center-pins and bolsters, placed as remotely from each other as may be desired, or can be conveniently done, and with the weight bearing upon the central portion of the bolsters and bearing-carriages, the injurious effect of the shocks and concussion received from the slight irregularities and imperfections of the track, and other minute disturbing causes, are greatly lessened.

6th. The plaintiff has then clearly and distinctly claimed the manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing-carriages, with a railroad car, in the manner described in his specification, so as to accomplish the end proposed by the means set forth, or by any others which are analogous and dependent upon the same principles. And he has not by the disclaimer, in his specification or otherwise, circumscribed or limited this claim by admitting the previous use or disclaiming the invention of the mode of connecting and arranging the eight wheels in two bearing-carriages or trucks of four wheels each, with a car-body or platform, by means of bolsters and center-pins or bolts, allowing these trucks to swivel upon their center, so as to suit the lateral curves of the railroad, and also to run upon the straight track, and also allowing a railroad car-body of any convenient length, consistent with the required strength of such body, to be run upon such bearing-carriages upon curves of short radius—thus rendering unnecessary the compromise which the patentee represents in his specification it was, prior to his invention, necessary to make. If the patentee intended to claim only the exclusive center-bearing, and an unusual or previously unknown proximity of the wheels on either side of the separate bearing-carriages, or either of these features separately, he should have limited his claim to the particular features or feature intended to be claimed; or, if he intended to take a patent for a combination only, he should have expressly claimed the invention of such combination, and should have pointed out clearly and exactly the elementary parts of such combination. He has done neither. Nor has he by the terms of his disclaimer and claim, when considered in connection with those parts of the specification which necessarily exclude the conclusion that the patentee knew or intended to admit that railroad cars, running upon two four-wheeled swiveling trucks, were generally known to the public, or known to those interested in their adoption and use, or even when these are considered in connection with the evidence, showing the use, to some extent of such railroad cars, limited his claim to the form, substance, mechanical properties, functions or action of any number less than the whole of the separate parts or devices which, by the united mechanical action in the arrangement and connection claimed as his invention, give effect and utility, as well as the peculiar character and distinguishing principle, to such arrangement and connection. He, therefore, embraces in this claim of his improvement the use of the two four-wheeled swiveling-trucks, so arranged and so connected to the body of the car as to allow the trucks, when used under, or at, or near the ends of a car-body at any convenient distance from each other, to adapt themselves to the lateral curves of the road.

And, therefore, if you find as a fact, that which I understand is conceded in this case, that the use of two four-wheeled swiveling-trucks, so arranged and so connected to the body of a car as to allow the trucks, when under, or at, or near the ends of a car-body, at any convenient distance from each other, to adapt themselves to the lateral curves of the road, is absolutely necessary to an organization constituting the arrangement and connection claimed by the plaintiff, and having the capacity to operate upon the principles of the invention claimed (as such claims are construed by this court) in order to attain to any useful extent the objects stated in the plaintiff's specification; and if you shall also find, as a fact, that cars constructed with the body of such length as to rest upon the bolsters, remotely placed at or near the ends of the car-body, and the lower bolster resting upon two four-wheeled trucks, swiveling upon their centers, so as to adapt themselves to the lateral curvatures of a railroad, by means of the use of such bolsters, connected by and swiveling upon center-pins or king-bolts, were known and in public use in the United States prior to the time of the alleged invention, then the jury must find a verdict for the defendant, whether such trucks were constructed with or without a spring to each wheel, or whether the wheels thereof were coned or cylindrical upon their threads, or revolved with, or were loose upon their axles; because the plaintiff having suffered both the original and extended terms of his patent to expire, without having filed in the patent office, according to the provisions of the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1837, a disclaimer of part of the thing claimed and patented as new, and still claiming in this suit to be the first inventor of everything which he claims as new in his patent, is precluded from claiming the benefits conferred, under certain circumstances, by the provisions of said seventh section, and because, if the specification of the plaintiff's claim is too broad, and he thereby claims to be the first inventor of what was old and in public use before his alleged discovery or invention, and which is absolutely necessary to an organization, constituting the arrangement and connection claimed by the plaintiff as his invention, and having the capacity to operate upon the principles of the invention claimed by the plaintiff; he is not entitled to recover in this action, although some substantial part of the invention claimed, or some new combination of mechanical powers or devices, described in the patent, may have been first invented and discovered by the plaintiff.

7th. I do not deem it necessary to do so, but at the suggestion of the counsel, I will add, that bearing-carriages constructed in any of the modes usually practiced at the date of the patent, (being, except in regard to the required close proximity of the two wheels on either side of the bearing-carriages, which constitute or embody what have been called the alternative modes of construction), having been in common use at the date of such patent, and that fact appearing on the face of the specification, it was unnecessary to describe particularly the mode of constructing such bearing-carriages, or the other elements which form portions of the car, containing the arrangement and connection which the plaintiff claims to have invented, if such other elements were well known and in common use; and as the patentee specifies, that he claims as new the before described manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing-carriages, with a railroad car, every mechanical part, principle, or combination which he mentions in his specification, but which are not included in his invention, as claimed and limited, as before stated, must by necessary implication be considered as admitted to be old, or in use before; and the patent is not invalid, because the patent has not in express words particularly stated them to be old, nor described the particular manner of their construction.

8. It being conceded, in this case, that the defendant has not used the long, single spring described in the plaintiff's specification as part of the means, in one mode of construction, of connecting the two wheels on either side of the bearing-carriages, it is not now material or necessary to determine that said long spring is or is not claimed as a part of the plaintiff's invention; but at the request of the plaintiff's counsel I shall express my opinion upon that question, and my opinion is, that it is not so claimed.

The jury found a verdict for the defendants.

Case No. 17,864.

WINANS v. NEW YORK & H. R. CO.

[4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 1; Merw. Pat. Inv. 421; 61 Jour. Fr. Inst. (3d S.) 316.]¹Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1855.
PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—RAILROAD CARS—ORIGINAL INVENTION—PUBLIC USE.

1. The invention of Winans was an improvement in the four-wheeled car previously in existence, and consisted in the arrangement and construction and adjustment of the eight-wheeled car, as a whole, as described in his specification.

2. The circumstance that a person has had an idea of an improvement in his head, or has sketched it upon paper, or has drawn it, and then gives it up, or neglects it, does not in judgment of law constitute or have the effect to constitute him a first and original inventor.

[Approved in Reeves v. Keystone Bridge Co., Case No. 11,660.]

3. It is not the person who has only produced the idea that is entitled to protection as an inventor, but he who has embodied the idea into a practical machine, and reduced it to practical use.

4. Where one is engaged in producing some new and useful instrument, and who has embodied it into a machine and endeavored to reduce it to practice by experiments, if he fail of success and abandon it, that consideration affords no impediment to another, who has taken up the same idea and has gone on perseveringly until he has perfected it and brought it into practical and useful operation.

5. Upon the trial of an action brought after the act of 1837 [5 Stat. 191], upon a patent granted prior to that act, it is a defense, that the invention was in public use prior to the application.

6. Public use means the use of the perfected invention. If it be experimental, to ascertain the utility, value, or success of the thing invented, by practice, it will not be fatal to the patent.

[Cited in Harmon v. Struthers, 57 Fed. 641.]

7. A patent for an improvement does not absorb the thing improved, or give the right to the patentee to use it.

8. The court, having given all instructions and stated all principles of law deemed necessary, declines to give special instructions prayed for by the parties.

This was an action on the case tried before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and a jury, to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent for "improvement in the construction of cars or carriages intended to travel upon railroads," granted to Ross Winans, October 1, 1834, and extended for seven years from October 1, 1848. The material portion of the specification is quoted in the report of the case of Winans v. Eaton [Case No. 17,861].

C. W. Sandford and W. Whiting, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice (charging jury).
The first question in this case is, what is the thing, the machine or instrument, which the plaintiff claims to have invented? It is essential to comprehend this, in order to ascertain whether it is new, never before known, or in public use; and is also essential to enable you to determine whether the cars used by the defendants are a violation of the patent. It will be necessary, therefore, in the first instance, to turn your minds to the patent and the description of the improvement claimed, which is there to be found. The description, I think I may say, is one of unusual clearness and precision for instruments of this character. We have had no difficulty in ascertaining from it the improvement as claimed by the patentee, as it defines not only the arrangement and construction of the car—the running gear and the body—but also the principles governing the same, and upon which the improvement is founded. The patentee refers in the beginning to the numerous curvatures in the railroads of this country, the radius of which, in many instances, is but a few hundred feet, and to the friction arising between the flanges of the wheels and the rails, causing a loss of power, and destruction of both wheels and rails. He then refers to the high velocities on railroads by the modern improvements in locomotive engines, and the demand of public opinion—of the business interests of the country—for this description of speed, and also to the consideration, that certain things in the construction of both roads and cars become important which were not, and would not have been, at the old rates of speed. He observes that the great momentum of the load and intensity of the shocks and concussions are among the things to be noted and provided for.

The patentee then refers to the fact that passenger and other cars, in general use upon railroads, have but four wheels, the axles of which are placed from three and a half to five feet apart, the distance being governed by the nature of the road upon which they are run, and other considerations. He then observes that when the cars (meaning the four-wheeled cars) are constructed so that the axles retain their parallelism, and are at a considerable distance apart, there is, of necessity, a tendency in the flanges of the wheels to come in contact with the rails, especially on a curvature of a short radius, as the axles then vary more from the direction of the radii; and that, from this consideration, when taken alone, it would appear to be best to place the axles as near each other as possible, thus causing them to approach more nearly to the direction of the radii of the curves, and the planes of the wheels to be more in the line of the rails. But there are other considerations, he says, that must not be overlooked in the construction of the car, namely, the increased force of the shocks from obstructions at high velocities; and he observes that the greater the distance between the axles, while the length of the body remains the same, the less is the influence of these shocks and concussions. In consequence of this, he says a compromise is most commonly made between the evils resulting from a considerable separation and a near approach, as by the modes of construction now (meaning then) in use in respect to the four-wheeled cars, one of the advantages which he has referred to must be sacrificed to the other. The patentee then refers to the fact that the lateral curvatures of the roads, together with their irregularities, create these difficulties—are at the foundation of these difficulties. It becomes very important, therefore, he observes, both as regards comfort, safety and economy, to devise a mode of combining the advantages derived from placing the axles a considerable distance apart, with those of allowing them to be situated near to each other.

Now, gentlemen, this is a result to which the patentee arrives after his discussion of the various difficulties to be encountered in the construction of the car, and it may be said to be the leading idea—the general principle—the fundamental principle, if you please—embodied in the eight-wheel car, and which he has subsequently described. I will call your attention to it again, because it brings out the principle upon which the eight-wheel car has been constructed by the patentee. It tends, therefore, very much to develop the leading features, the controlling features of that construction. He says: It becomes very important, both as regards comfort, safety, and economy, to devise a mode of combining the advantages derived from placing the axles at a considerable distance apart, with those of allowing them to be situated near to each other. He then refers to the attempt to overcome these difficulties by the use of coned wheels, and to the partial remedy thereby, but points out the failure of the use of those alone, under high velocity, to get rid of the embarrassment.

The patentee then explains the object of his invention, which, among other things, is to make such an adjustment or arrangement of the wheels and axles as shall cause the body of the car or carriage to pursue a more even, direct, and safe course than it does as cars are ordinarily constructed, both over the curved and straight parts of the road, by the desideratum of combining the advantages of the near and distant couplings of the axles, and other means which he has described.

He then describes the arrangement and construction of his cars, which I will not take up your time in reading. It has been read so often and so frequently illustrated and exemplified in the progress of this trial, that I have no doubt you are familiar with it. It will be found upon the copy of the patent which I have between folios twenty-one and twenty-eight. And then comes the claim. The patentee says, after describing the construction of his car:

"I do not claim as my invention the running of cars or carriages upon eight wheels, this having been previously done; not, however, in the manner or for the purposes herein described, but merely with a view of distributing the weight carried more evenly upon a rail or other road, and for objects distinct in character from those which I have had in view, as hereinbefore set forth. Nor have the wheels, when thus increased in number, been so arranged or connected with each other, either by design or accident, as to accomplish this purpose. What I claim, therefore, as my invention, and for which I ask a patent, is, the before-described manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing carriages, with a railroad car, so as to accomplish the end proposed by the means set forth, or by any others, which are analogous and dependent upon the same principles."

The claim itself explains the improvement set up by the patentee. It is the arrangement and construction and adjustment of the eight-wheeled car, as described in his specification, the car as a whole. The patentee claims no right as inventor to any of the constituent parts of the car, the wheels, the axles, and peculiar construction or framing of the running gear of the bearing carriages, the contrivances by which they are connected together, the springs, the bolsters, the turning of them upon the center, or the swiveling of the trucks—nothing of this is claimed as new on the part of the patentee. This is plain from the terms of the claim, which is the construction and arrangement and adjustment of these various parts into a car as a whole, combining the advantages which he has set forth as he claims.

Now, it is proper to observe, that this improvement, as claimed by the patentee, is made upon the existing four-wheel car then in general use, and which, as has appeared in the progress of this trial, is still in use in England, and probably upon the Continent, unless they have adopted our eight-wheel cars, some specimens of which I have understood have been sent to the Continent. It will, therefore, be proper and useful for you to examine this four-wheel car as then in general use, and the evidence in respect to it. Models have been introduced and exemplified, and no doubt you understand it. But you should inquire into this fact, in order to ascertain whether or not the difficulties described by the patentee existed upon curved roads at great velocity, I mean as respected this four-wheel car then in use upon roads with high velocity and with short curves—and whether or not the eight-wheel car, as arranged and constructed by the patentee, is an improvement upon it. This is one of the questions in the case for your consideration, and, as to this, you will probably not have much difficulty. From the time they were first brought out in Baltimore—I mean the eight-wheeled cars—it is admitted on all sides, that they have generally taken the place of the previous four-wheel car, and their use soon spread throughout the railroads of the United States, and, for aught that appears before us in this trial, the first construction and arrangement, and adaptation of those eight-wheel cars to the railroads of this country was in Baltimore, and they were constructed and arranged for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and the Washington branch of it. It was offered, it is true, to be shown, on the part of the defendants, that one—that is, an eight-wheel car—was brought out in Massachusetts in 1838, but that fact, at that late day, affords no exception to the truth of the remark I have made; for the eight-wheel car, what is claimed by the patentee to be the perfected car, the car completed, and upon which the patent was founded, was made as early as the beginning of the winter, some time in December, 1834—the Washington cars, four years before the eight-wheel car in Massachusetts.

Now, gentlemen, if I have succeeded in explaining to you the improvement described in the plaintiff's patent, and claimed by him, upon these four-wheel cars, by the construction of an eight-wheel car, as I hope I have, the next question to which your attention must be called is this—whether or not this improvement as thus described in the patent, and as first brought out in Baltimore—whether this was the improvement of the plaintiff. This is one of the material questions in the case, which, as you have already discovered, has been most seriously contested between the parties. After calling to your minds the construction given by the court to the patent, and to what constitutes the improvement which is claimed to have been reduced to practical use—after you have ascertained and comprehended this improvement claimed by the plaintiff, and described in his patent—after this, which is a question of law (I mean so far as the construction of the patent is concerned), after you have ascertained what is claimed by the plaintiff as his improvement, the question whether or not he was the first inventor of it is a question of fact, which belongs to you to determine. The burden of the evidence—for the greater portion of the time, the long time which has been consumed in this trial—has been directed on both sides to the solution of this question. The patent of the plaintiff, given in evidence, and the extension of it for seven years, which has been given in evidence, together with the testimony of the experts introduced on the part of the plaintiff in the opening of the case, furnish prima facie evidence that the plaintiff was the first and original inventor of the improvement claimed, and of its utility; and therefore, the burden of showing that he was not the first and original inventor, and of the inutility of the patent, rests upon the defendants. They are obliged to assume this position in that stage of the trial. Accordingly, they have gone into evidence at large for the purpose of satisfying you upon these points, and you have before you, first, the evidence from Baltimore, for the purpose of showing this—that, assuming the car described in the plaintiff's patent to be the improvement upon the four-wheel car, and that it was new and useful, yet the defendants insist upon this evidence, that the plaintiff was not the first inventor, but that somebody else was. They refer to the timber, the wood, and the trestle cars, and much evidence has been given in respect to these cars. The plaintiff, on the contrary, insists that neither of them embodied his improvement, or that if any of them did, it was constructed after his invention, which it is claimed is carried back upon the evidence to the fall or beginning of the winter of 1830. Now, gentlemen, I am not going over this evidence on either side. It has been so amply and ably discussed by the learned counsel upon both sides, that I can not doubt that you are familiar with every material portion of it. It will be for you to say, upon the evidence, whether or not the defendants have furnished evidence to satisfy you that the plaintiff was not the first and original inventor, but that somebody else was. They have that burden upon them. It will be for you to determine, upon the whole of the evidence, whether they have overcome the patent, and the evidence furnished in support of it.

Then another ground is taken, viz: that there is nothing new in the arrangement or construction of the car, as described in the patent, but that it was old, and before in public use; and they say that it is to be found in Chapman's patent and drawings, and also in Tredgold and Fairlamb's—although as to the two latter, they are not much relied upon—in the Quincy car, in the Allen locomotive, and in the Jervis locomotive. All these have been brought out in the progress of the trial, and amply examined and discussed, and I am persuaded that you are entirely familiar with all the evidence bearing upon this branch of the case. The question upon it will be, whether or not you find the improvement of the plaintiff—the improvement existing in the arrangement and construction of his eight-wheel car upon the four-wheel car—whether you find that improvement in any one or all of these patents or machines—not whether they have eight wheels and two trucks, free to swivel or rock; but the question is, whether the peculiar arrangement, adjustment, and construction of the car—the wheels and trucks in relation to the road—claimed in the patent, and which I have endeavored to explain to you, on the principles which the patentee has developed—whether that embodiment thus found in the eight-wheel car is to be found in either of these structures to which you have been referred. That is the question.

Another ground of defense set up on the part of the defendants is, that Mr. Imlay is the inventor. You recollect his testimony, I have no doubt. It is claimed that he carries back the construction, or the idea, if not the construction, of the eight-wheel car, to 1829. It is, however, proper to say, in respect to this witness, that he spoke doubtfully as to time. He would not speak positively. It was a matter of memory with him. I noted his evidence particularly. He was uncertain as to time. But, whatever that time was (and I refer to his interview with the committee of the French Town Railroad), he says he made a rough sketch of his idea of an eight-wheel car at this time, whatever time that may be, and that he made a contract with the road to build a car, as he thinks, but which fell through in consequence of his partners not concurring with him; and then we hear no more of his connection with an eight-wheel car until he removes from Baltimore to Philadelphia, in 1833, and brings out, I think, the "Victory," in 1834 or 1835, I am not certain which. I refer more particularly to the evidence of this witness, for the purpose of stating to you a principle of law. Now, the circumstance that a person has had an idea of an improvement in his head, or has sketched it upon paper—has drawn it, and then gives it up—neglects it—does not, in judgment of law, constitute or have the effect to constitute him a first and original inventor. It is not the person who has only produced the idea, that is entitled to protection as an inventor, but the person who has embodied the idea into a practical machine, and reduced it to practical use. He who has first done that is the inventor who is entitled to protection.

A kindred principle, also, it may be proper to state here, which is, that where a person engaged in producing some new and useful instrument or contrivance, and who has embodied it into a machine, and endeavored to reduce it to practice by experiments—if those trials fail—if he fail in success and abandon it, or give it up, that consideration affords no impediment to another person, who has taken up the same idea or class of ideas, and who has gone on perseveringly in his studies, trials, and experiments, until he has perfected the new idea, and brought it into practical and useful operation. He is the person—the meritorious inventor—who is entitled to the protection of the law.

Another ground of defense set up is, that the patentee allowed the public use of his improvement, of his eight-wheel car, upon the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, before he made his application for a patent. Now, it is undoubtedly true, as the law stood at the time of this patent, in October, 1834, that the public use of the invention, with the consent of the patentee, or sale of it, prior to the time of his application for a patent, operated as a forfeiture—as a dedication to the public. This, however, means the use of the perfected invention—the invention complete.

If the use be experimental, to ascertain the value, or the utility or the success of the thing invented, by putting it into practice by trial, such use will not deprive the patentee of his right to the product of his genius. The plaintiff, therefore, in this case, had a right to use his cars on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, by way of trial and experiment, and to enter into stipulations with the directors of the road for this purpose, without any forfeiture of his rights. He could not probably obtain the opportunity of trial which was essential to the perfection of his improvement without obtaining their consent, and, as I have already said, it is the use of the improvement after it has been completed and reduced to practical success, which operates as a forfeiture—as a dedication to the public—as a giving it up to the public.

Now, gentlemen, if, upon consideration of these questions which I have submitted to you, you should come to the conclusion that this improvement is a useful one, and that the plaintiff is the first and original inventor of it, the next question for your consideration is, the question of infringement. If you are against the plaintiff upon either of the two first questions of utility and originality, then, of course, this other question will not be reached.

Then, as to the infringement by the defendants' cars, the question is: Do they embody the arrangement and construction of the plaintiff's car—in other words, the improvement in the plaintiff's specification? Improvements, as you have seen during the progress of this trial, have been made upon the eight-wheel car, since it was brought out and put in operation. The swinging bolster is an instance, and there are also others that have been mentioned in the course of the trial. Now, the improvements thus made upon the eight-wheel car do not give any right to the thing improved. The plaintiff in this case would have had no right to use a four-wheel car, if there had been a patent for it, because he had improved it by the eight-wheel car. So an improvement upon the eight-wheel car does not absorb, or give a right to the inventor of that improvement to use the thing improved. Therefore, the question still is, whether or not you find in the defendants' organization and arrangement the organization and arrangement of the plaintiff's improved car. If you do, the additional improvements since made upon it do not disprove the infringement. It is a question of fact for you to determine. Having ascertained and comprehended what the improvement of the plaintiff is, as claimed in his patent, and which I have endeavored to explain to you in the beginning of this charge, you will apply that to the defendants' cars, and see whether it is embodied there. If it is not, then there is no infringement. If it is, there is an infringement.

Then, as to the question of damages. It is admitted by the counsel for the plaintiff that the amount stated in the declaration is ten thousand dollars. This suit was brought January 16, 1849, as stated. They claim damages for the years 1847 and 1848. It is in evidence that twenty-four eight-wheel passenger cars, thirty-two freight cars, and eight baggage cars were used in 1847 by the defendants, upon their road; and in 1848, twenty-five eight-wheel passenger cars, thirty-five freight cars, and eleven baggage cars. It is also in evidence, and it does not seem to be contradicted, that the patent fee for the right to use an eight-wheel passenger car is worth two hundred dollars a car per annum for license, and that the freight cars and baggage cars would be worth twenty dollars per annum. Taking this evidence, and there seems to be no contradiction about it, the damages claimed, upon the principle which I have stated, would exceed considerably ten thousand dollars. There is no doubt about that. But you are limited, and you can not go beyond that sum. These, gentlemen, are all the observations I think it is necessary to make to you.

I have prayers for instructions here, by the defendants' counsel, numbering, I believe, eighty, but the counsel must excuse me from going over them. I have given all the instructions, and all the principles of law that I deem necessary or useful in the submission of this case to you, and whatever else may be found in these numerous prayers is beyond what I deem proper to trouble you with, for I regard them as not pertinent, nor relevant, and not material to comment upon.

The jury, not being able to agree upon a verdict, were discharged.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF RAILROAD CARS—LOCATION OF TRUCK—SUFFICIENCY OF SPECIFICATION.

1. The claim of Winans' patent, granted October 1st, 1834, for an "improvement in the construction of cars or carriages intended to run on railroads," which claim is "the before-described manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing-carriages, with a railroad car, so as to accomplish the end proposed by the means set forth or by any others which are analogous and dependent upon the same principles," is a claim for the car itself constructed and arranged as described in the patent, and evidence that parts of the arrangement and construction were before known does not affect the novelty of the invention.

[Cited in brief in Locomotive Engine Safety Truck Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., Case No. 8,453.]

2. The location of the trucks relatively to each other under the body of the car, as well as the near proximity of the two axles of each truck to each other, form an essential part of the arrangement of the patentee, who states, in his specification, that the closeness of the fore and hind wheels of each truck, taken in connection with the use of two trucks arranged as remotely from each other as can conveniently be done for the support of the car-body, with a view to the objects and on the principles set forth by him, is considered by him as an important feature of his invention. But the improvement does not consist in placing the axles of the two trucks at any precise distance apart, or at any precise distance from each end of the body; and the specification is sufficient, although it does not state in feet or inches the exact distance from the ends of the car-body at which it would be best to arrange the trucks, or what should be the exact distance between the axles.

3. The patent, which was issued in 1834, had no drawings originally annexed to it, and the specification contained no reference to any drawings. The patent was recorded anew in June, 1837, under section 1 of the act of March 3d, 1837 (5 Stat. 191), and a drawing of the invention, verified by the oath of the patentee under said section 1, was filed in November, 1838: Held, in an action for the infringement of the patent, that a certified copy of such drawing was admissible in evidence under section 2 of said act, in connection with certified copies of the patent and specification, and that the whole together were prima facie evidence of the particulars of the invention and of the patent granted therefor.

4. As a general rule, such a drawing cannot be used to correct any material defect in the specification, unless it corresponds with a drawing filed with the original specification for the patent; otherwise, in case of discrepancy, the specification must prevail.

5. Nor can such a drawing have the same force and effect as if it had been referred to in the specification, nor is to be deemed and taken as part of the specification.

6. The specification of Winans' patent said nothing about the mode of attaching the car to the motive-power or to the next car in a train, nor anything about the use of side-bearings to prevent the rocking of the car from side to side, but the drawing filed in November, 1838, showed that the car was to be attached to the motive-power and to the next car in a train by its body, and not by a perch from the truck, and also showed a provision for side-bearings: Held, that the specification afforded a sufficient description of the invention independently of the drawing, and that the mode of attaching the car and the use of side-bearings did not enter into the essence of the invention or constitute any substantial part of the improvement.

7. The law allows an inventor a reasonable time to perfect his invention by experiment and ascertain its utility, before it obliges him to take out his patent; and, in the case of Winans' invention, experiments could be made only by putting the car into the service of those controlling lines of railroads. In applying the rule, a jury must take into consideration the nature of the invention, and all the circumstances of the case. But an inventor is bound to act in good faith, and must not suffer his invention to be used except for the purposes of experiment.

This was an action on the case, tried before CONKLING, District Judge, in June, 1850, for the infringement of letters patent² granted to the plaintiff on the 1st of October, 1834, for an "improvement in the construction of cars or carriages intended to run on rail-roads."

At the trial, the plaintiff gave in evidence the original patent. It had been recorded

"To all whom it may concern—Be it known, that I, Ross Winans, civil engineer, of the city of Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, have invented a new and useful improvement in the construction of cars or carriages intended to travel upon railroads; which improvement is particularly adapted to passenger-cars, as will more fully appear by an exposition of the difficulties heretofore experienced in the running of such cars at high velocities, which exposition I think it best to give in this specification, for the purpose of exemplifying the more clearly the object of my said improvement. In the construction of all railroads in this country, which extend to any considerable distance, it has been found necessary to admit of lateral curvatures, the radius of which is sometimes but a few hundred feet; and it becomes important, therefore, so to construct the cars as to enable them to overcome the difficulties presented by such curvatures, and to adapt them for running with the least friction practicable upon all parts of the road. The friction to which I now allude is that which arises from the contact between the flanches of the wheels and the rails, which, when it occurs, causes a great loss of power and a rapid destruction of or injury to both the wheel and the rail, and is otherwise injurious. The high velocities attained by the improvements made in locomotive engines, and which are not only sanctioned, but demanded, by public opinion, render it necessary that certain points of construction and arrangement, both in the roads and wheels, which were not viewed as important at former rates of travelling, should now receive special attention. The greater momentum of the load, and the intensity of the shocks and concussions, which are unavoidable, even under the best constructions, are among those circumstances which must not be neglected, as the liability to accident is thereby not only greatly increased, but the consequences to be apprehended much more serious. The passenger and other cars in general use upon railroads have four wheels, the axles of which are placed from three and a half to five feet apart; this distance being governed by the nature of the road upon which they run, and other considerations. When the cars are so constructed that the axles retain their parallelism, and are at a considerable distance apart, there is a necessary tendency in the flanches of the wheels to come into contact with the rails, especially on the curvatures of least radius, as the axles then vary more from the direction of the radii. From this consideration, when taken alone, it would appear to be best to place the axles as near to each other as possible, thus causing them to approach more nearly to the direction of the radii of the curves, and the planes of the wheels to conform to the line of the rails. There are, however, other circumstances which must not be overlooked in their constructions. I have already alluded to the increased force of the shocks from obstructions at high velocities; and, whatever care may be taken, there will be inequalities in the rails and wheels, which, though small, are numerous, and the perpetual operation of which produces effects which cannot be disregarded. The greater the distance between the axles, while the length anew on the 7th of June, 1837, under section 1 of the act of March 3d, 1837 (5 Stat. 191), as appeared by a memorandum to that effect endorsed upon it. No drawings were annexed to the original patent, nor was there any reference in the specification to any drawings. On the 25th of September, 1848, the patent was extended for seven years from the 1st of October, 1848, as appeared by a certificate of extension endorsed on the

of the body remains the same, the less is the influence of these shocks or concussions; and this has led, in many instances, to the placing them in passenger-cars at or near their extreme ends. Now, however, a compromise is most commonly made, between the evils resulting from a considerable separation and a near approach, as, by the modes of construction now in use, one of the advantages must be sacrificed to the other. But it is not to the lateral curvatures and inequalities of the road alone that the foregoing remarks apply. The incessant vibration felt in travelling over railroads is mainly dependent upon the vertical motion of the cars, in surmounting those numerous though minute obstructions which unavoidably exist. The nearer the axles are placed to each other, the greater is the effect of this motion upon the passengers, and the greater its power to derange the machinery and the road. It becomes very important, therefore, both as regards comfort, safety and economy, to devise a mode of combining the advantages derived from placing the axles at a considerable distance apart, with those of allowing them to be situated near to each other. It has been attempted, and with some success, to correct the tendency of the flanches to come into contact with the rails, on the curved and other parts of the road, by making the tread of the wheel conical; and, if the travelling upon rail-roads was not required to be very rapid, this would so far prove an effectual corrective, as the two rails would find diameters upon the wheels which would correspond with the difference in length, the constant tendency to deviation being as constantly counteracted by this construction; but, at high velocities, the momentum of the body in motion tends so powerfully to carry it in a right line, as to cause the wheel on the longer rail to ascend considerably above that part of the cone which corresponds therewith; the consequence of this is, a continued serpentine motion, principally, but not entirely, in a lateral direction; nor is this confined to the curved parts of the road, but it exists to an equal, or greater extent, upon those which are straight, especially when the axles are near to each other, the irregularities, before spoken of, constantly changing the direct course of the wheels, whilst there is no general curvature of the rails to counteract it. To avoid this effect, and the unpleasant motion and tendency to derangement consequent upon it, an additional motive is furnished for placing the axles at a considerable distance apart.

"The object of my invention is, among other things, to make such an adjustment or arrangement of the wheels and axles, as shall cause the body of the car or carriage to pursue a more smooth, even, direct and safe course than it does, as cars are ordinarily constructed, both over the curved and straight parts of the road, by the before-mentioned desideratum of combining the advantages of the near and distant coupling of the axles, and other means to be hereinafter described. For this purpose, I construct two bearing-carriages, each with four wheels, which are to sustain the body of the passenger or other car, by placing one of them at or near each end of it, in a way to be presently described. The two wheels on either side original patent. The plaintiff then offered in evidence a certified copy from the patent-office of the patent; of the specification; of the certificate of extension; of a drawing accompanied by written references thereto, which drawing was not filed at the time the patent was recorded anew, but was filed on the 19th of November, 1838; and of an affidavit made by the plaintiff on the 19th of November, 1838, and filed in the patent-office. The written references accompanying of these carriages are to be placed very near to each other; the spaces between their flanches need be no greater than is necessary to prevent their contact with each other. These wheels I connect together by means of a very strong spring—say double the usual strength employed for ordinary cars—the ends of which springs are bolted, or otherwise secured, to the upper side of the boxes which rest on the journals of the axles; the longer leaves of the springs being placed downwards, and surmounted by the shorter leaves. Having thus connected two pairs of wheels together, I unite them into a four-wheel bearing-carriage, by means of their axles and a bolster of the proper length, extending across, between the two pairs of wheels, from the centre of one spring to that of the other, and securely fastened to the tops of them. This bolster must be of sufficient strength to bear a load upon its centre of four or five tons. Upon this first bolster I place another of equal strength, and connect the two together by a centre-pin or bolt passing down through them, and thus allow them to swivel or turn upon each other in the manner of the front bolster of a common road wagon. I prefer making these bolsters of wrought or cast iron; wood, however, may be used. I prepare each of the bearing-carriages in precisely the same way. The body of the passenger or other car I make of double the ordinary length of those which run on four wheels, and capable of carrying double their load. This body I place so as to rest its whole weight upon the two upper bolsters of the two beforementioned bearing-carriages or running gear. I sometimes place these bolsters so far within the ends of the body of the car as to bring all the wheels under it, and, in this case, less strength is necessary in the car-body, than when the bolster is situated at its extreme ends. In some cases, however, I place the bolster so far without the body of the car at either end as to allow the latter to hang down between the two sets of wheels or bearing-carriages, and to run, if desired, within a foot of the rails. When this is done, a strong frame-work projects out from either end of the car or carriage-body, and rests upon the upper bolsters of the two bearing-carriages. This last arrangement, by which the body of the car is hung so low down, manifestly affords a great security to the passengers, exempting them, in a great degree, from those accidents to which they are liable when the load is raised. Several bodies may be connected or rest on a common frame, and be supported, on the bearing-carriage, in a manner similar to that of a single body. When the bolsters of the bearing-carriages are placed under the extreme ends of the body, the relief from shocks and concussions, and from lateral vibrations, is greater than it is when the bolsters are placed between the middle and the ends of the body, and this relief is not materially varied by increasing or diminishing the length of the body, while the extreme ends of it continue to rest on the bolsters of the bearing-cars, the load being supposed to be equally distributed over the entire length of the body.

"Although I prefer the use of a single spring to a pair of wheels, as above described, instead of the ordinary spring to each wheel, and consider it as more simple, cheap and convenient than any other arrangement, the end which I have in view may, nevertheless, be obtained by constructing the bearing-carriages in any of the modes usually practised, provided that the fore and hind wheels of each of them be placed very near together; because, the closeness of the fore and hind wheels of each bearing-carriage, taken in connection with the use of two bearing-carriages coupled remotely from each other as can conveniently be done for the support of one body, with a view to the objects and on the principles herein set forth, is considered by me as a most important feature of my invention; for, by the contiguity of the fore and hind wheels of each bearing-carriage, while the two bearing-carriages may be at any desirable distance apart, the lateral friction from the rubbing of the flanches against the rails is most effectually avoided, whilst, at the same time, all the advantages attendant upon placing the axles of a four-wheeled car far apart are thus obtained. The bearing of the load on the centre of the bolster, which also is the centre of each bearing-carriage, likewise affords great relief from the shocks occasioned by the percussion of the wheels or protuberant parts of the rails or other objects, and from the vibrations consequent to the use of coned wheels; as the lateral and vertical movements of the body of the car, resulting from the above causes, are much diminished. The two wheels on either side of one of the bearing-carriages may, from their proximity, be considered as acting like a single wheel; and, as these two bearing-carriages may be placed at any distance from each other, consistent with the required strength of the body of the car, it is evident that all the advantage is obtained which results from having the two axles of a four-wheeled car at a distance from each other, whilst its inconveniences are avoided. Another advantage of this car, compared with those in common use, and which is viewed by me as very important, is the increased safety afforded by it to passengers, not only from the diminished liability to breakage or derangement in the frame-work, but also from the less disastrous consequences to be apprehended from the breaking of a wheel, axle, or other part of the running gear, as the car-body depends, for its support and safety, upon a greater number of wheels and bearing points on the road. I do not claim as my invention the running of cars or carriages upon eight wheels, this having been previously done; not, however, in the manner or for the purposes herein described, but merely with a view of distributing the weight carried more evenly upon a rail or other road, and for objects distinct in character from those which I have had in view, as hereinbefore set forth. Nor have the wheels, when thus increased in number, been so arranged and connected with each other, either by design or accident, as to accomplish this purpose. What I claim, therefore, as my invention, and for which I ask a patent, is the before-described manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing-carriages, with a rail-road car, so as to accomplish the end proposed by the means set forth, or by any others which are analogous and dependent upon the same principles."

Fig. 1. Side view of an eight-wheel car. Fig. 2. End view of the same. Fig. 3. Upper and lower bolsters, detached from the body and bearing-carriages. AA represents the body of the car resting on the bearing-carriages B and C, as exhib-

ited at DD, on pivots equidistant from the wheels of each bearing-carriage. H represents an upper bolster of cast iron, separate from the body of the car, with its pivot X corresponding with the socket Y in the lower bolster E, also shown as separated from the bearing-carriage." The said affidavit was in these words: "State of Maryland, Baltimore, Sect.: On this 19th day of November, in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, before me, the subscriber, a justice of the peace of the said state, in and for the said city, personally appeared Ross Winans, and made solemn oath that he is the inventor of an improvement in the construction of cars or carriages intended to run on railroads, for which letters patent of the United States were granted him, dated the first day of October, 1834, and that the annexed drawing is, as he verily believes, a true delineation of the invention, as described in the said letters patent. Sworn before James Blair, justice of the peace." The defendant objected to the evidence offered, on the grounds, first, that it appeared no drawing was annexed to the original patent; second, that the act of congress did not make such a drawing as this evidence. The court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence. It was claimed by the plaintiff that the drawing showed that his car was to be attached to the motive-power, and to the next car in a train, by its body, and not by a perch from the bearing-carriage or truck, it being conceded that this connection by the body was indispensable to the free action of the plaintiff's trucks; and that the drawing also showed a provision in the arrangement of the trucks for side-bearings, to prevent excessive rocking of the car from side to side. It was insisted by the defendants that the specification was defective in saying nothing about the mode of attachment of the car or about the side-bearings; and that the plaintiff could not give any evidence to show in what manner his car, as perfected and used, and the various arrangements of trucks which he tried while experimenting, were connected in a train for the purpose of draught, or use the drawing to show anything which was not set forth in the specification. The court decided that the drawing might be referred to to illustrate the specification, but not to enlarge the claim of the patent, and allowed the plaintiff to give evidence as to what was represented in the drawing in regard to a mode of attachment and to side-bearings, and as to the mode of attachment actually used in the car as perfected and the various modes tried while the plaintiff was experimenting. The evidence was, that the plaintiff was experimenting at Baltimore, Md., to produce an eight-wheeled rail-road car, for about four years prior to October, 1834; that the first car made by him, the Columbus, was made in July, 1831; that three others were made, all of them unsatisfactory, prior to the car described in the patent, which was completed and found to be successful but a short time before the date of the patent; that one of the chief defects in the various arrangements of trucks tried during the course of the experiments was, in the cars being coupled together by the trucks and not by the bodies; and that the car, as finally successful, and as shown in the drawing, was drawn by the body. The car Columbus, made in July, 1831, had two trucks, with four wheels in each, but was drawn by a perch from one of the trucks, and the axles of each truck were too far apart from each other, which defects caused the car to run off the track in turning curves.

The defendants set up that one Conduce Gatch, of Baltimore, was the actual inventor of the successful car made in 1834; and that the claim of the plaintiff's patent was void for want of novelty. The various points raised by the defendants in connection with this latter defence, and the nature of the evidence adduced in its support, will sufficiently appear from the instructions prayed for by the defendants, as hereafter set forth.

After the close of the evidence, the defendants requested the court to charge the jury: (1.) That the mode of attaching the car to the motive power, or to other cars to be drawn in trains, formed no part of the improvement claimed by the plaintiff, and, therefore, could not be taken into consideration in determining whether all or any part of the improvement claimed by the plaintiff was new. The court refused so to charge, but instructed the jury, that although the mode of attachment formed no part of the improvement claimed by the plaintiff, yet it might be taken into consideration for the purpose of ascertaining whether the plaintiff had complied with the law by describing his invention and showing how it was to be used; that the specification was sufficient if the patentee had described a carriage susceptible of an attachment of the power to the body, if the drawing showed such mode of attachment; that the plaintiff could suffer no disadvantage from not having stated it in his written specification; and that, although the drawing was not to be taken into consideration for the purpose of measuring the extent of the patentee's claim, yet it might be considered in ascertaining whether what he claimed was new, if the jury could discover that it had any bearing on that point. The court also charged, that the drawing, of which a certified copy had been given in evidence, was to have the same force and effect as if it had been referred to in the specification, and was to be deemed and taken as a part of the specification.

The defendants also requested the court to charge: (2.) That the remoteness of the two bearing-carriages from each other when attached to the car, was not so expressed or described in the specification as to constitute any part of the improvement claimed by the plaintiff. The court charged to the contrary of this instruction.

The court further charged that the improvement claimed by the plaintiff consisted: 1st. Of the manner of arranging the eight wheels into the two trucks which constituted the two bearing-carriages, which arrangement included the bolsters placed on the centre of each bearing-carriage, and the placing the axles of each truck as near together as could be done without the flanges of the wheels interfering with each other. 2d. Of the manner of connecting the two bearing-carriages to the body of the car by a centre-pin or king-bolt passing through the centre of the upper bolster, which was attached to the body of the car, into the lower bolster on the bearing-carriage. The court also charged that the position of the trucks at or near the ends of the car, was to be considered as constituting a part of the arrangement claimed by the plaintiff as his invention.

The defendants also requested the court to charge: (3.) That if the jury should find that any part of the arrangement of the eight wheels into the two trucks, or the manner of connecting these trucks to the body of the car, was known and used before the alleged improvement by the plaintiff, the patent was void, but the court refused so to charge.

The defendants also requested the court to charge: (4.) That if the jury should find that, prior to the alleged invention of the plaintiff, there was published, in any public work, a description of a car to run on rail-roads, resting on two bearing-carriages composed of four wheels, each having a bolster extending across in the centre between the two wheels, fastened to and forming a part of the carriage, and attached to these bolsters by a centre-pin or bolt passing through the substantial frame of the car in the centre of the bolsters, so as to allow the frame of the carriage to turn and swivel upon the bolsters of the bearing-carriages, the plaintiff's patent was void. (5.) That if the jury should find that any part of the arrangement of the eight wheels into bearing-carriages, or the manner of their connection with the frame or body of the car, was described or delineated in Chapman's patent, or the plates accompanying it, as set forth in the 24th volume of the Repertory of Arts, &c., second series, published in London in 1814, or in Wood's Treatise on Railroads, published in London in 1825, at pages 154 to 157, or in the plate between pages 294 and 295 of the latter book, the plaintiff's patent was void. The court declined to give the instructions specified in the fourth and fifth prayers, in the form therein requested, but left it to the jury to say whether, in their opinion, it had been shown that the alleged invention of the plaintiff was substantially described in either of the books mentioned in the fifth prayer, and instructed the jury that, if it was so, the patent was void.

The defendants also requested the court to charge: (6.) That if the jury should find that it was known to persons acquainted with the science of mechanics and mechanical motion, that a four-wheeled carriage, with its axles in close proximity, would traverse a curve more easily than if they were further apart, then that part of the arrangement described and claimed in the specification was not new, and the patent was void. But the court refused so to charge.

The defendants also requested the court to charge: (7.) That if the jury should find that the timber-car found to have been used on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad before the car Columbus was built, embraced any part of the manner of arranging or connecting the eight wheels to the body of the car, as claimed in the plaintiff's specification, his patent was void, and that it made no difference that said timber-car was only used temporarily or for a temporary purpose. (8.) That if the jury should find that the car Columbus did not substantially embody the whole improvement claimed by the plaintiff, and should also find that the truck of four wheels constructed by Mr. Jervis in the winter of 1832 for the locomotive Experiment, and put in use on the Mohawk and Hudson Railroad in April, 1832, or that the timber-car proved by Mr. Williams and Mr. Whitney to have been constructed and put in use on said road in April or May, 1832, contained any part of the arrangement or connection of the eight wheels to the body of the car claimed in the plaintiff's specification, his patent was void. The court refused to give the instructions mentioned in the seventh and eighth prayers, in the form therein requested; but, after informing the jury that unless the plaintiff appeared by the evidence to be the first inventor of all that by his patent he claimed as his invention, his patent was void, and after submitting to them the evidence relative to the timber-carriage mentioned in the seventh prayer, and also that respecting the four-wheeled truck devised by Mr. Jervis for the locomotive Experiment, and the timber-carriage mentioned in the eighth prayer, the court left it to the jury to decide whether or not it was shown by this evidence that the plaintiff was not such inventor, and declined to give any other or further instructions in answer to these prayers.

The defendants also requested the court to charge: (9.) That if the court should be of opinion that the remoteness of the two bearing-carriages, as described in the plaintiff's specification, constituted a part of the arrangement of the eight wheels into bearing-carriages and the connection to the body of the car, as claimed in the plaintiff's specification, then the patent was void, unless the jury should find that the specification described, with sufficient precision, the proper and necessary location of those bearing-carriages under the body of the car, to enable a mechanic of sufficient skill to construct rail-road cars, to locate the bearing carriages under the car the necessary distance apart, without any experiment, invention or addition of his own. The court gave the instructions contained in this prayer, and left it to the jury to say whether the plaintiff had not sufficiently indicated the position of the trucks with respect to the ends of the carriage; and remarked that their distance apart must depend on the length of the carriage.

The defendants also requested the court to charge: (10.) That if the jury should find that a car constructed as described in the plaintiff's specification, without side-bearings at the ends of the bolsters, would not be entirely safe to passengers, the patent was void. In answer to this prayer, the court instructed the jury that, in order to find for the plaintiff, the jury must be convinced that what the plaintiff had patented was useful, but that any degree of utility was sufficient to support a patent, the word "useful" in the patent law being used in opposition to "frivolous" or "noxious"; and that, with regard to the question of side-bearings, although the jury should think it better to have longer bearings than the plaintiff contemplated, that would not warrant them in finding the patent void, if the invention was useful, within the instructions given, as it was not necessary that the thing patented should be the best possible thing of the kind that could be made; and the court refused to charge the jury otherwise in relation to this prayer.

The defendants also requested the court to charge: (11.) That if the jury should find that the car Columbus embraced in substance the improvements claimed in the plaintiff's specification, and that said car was put into use by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Co., on the 4th of July, 1831, and that it was occasionally used by said company from that time, by the consent of the plaintiff, then the patent was void. In relation to this prayer, the court instructed the jury that the law allowed to an inventor a reasonable time to perfect his invention and ascertain its utility, before, in order to secure to himself its exclusive use, it obliged him to take out his patent; that, in applying this rule, it was the duty of the jury to take into consideration, the nature of the invention and all the circumstances of the case; but that an inventor was bound to act with sincerity and good faith towards the public, and in accordance with the policy of the patent laws; that if he unnecessarily deferred his application for a patent, and suffered his invention to be used, except for the purposes already mentioned, and beyond what he had reason to believe necessary for those purposes, his patent would be void; and that this instruction was intended to embrace the evidence relating as well to the Winchester, Dromedary and Comet, as to the Columbus mentioned in this prayer. And, in relation to this prayer, the court refused to give any further or other instruction.

The defendants also requested the court to charge: (12.) That if the proximity of the axles of the bearing-carriages, and any particular remoteness of those bearing-carriages from each other, formed any valid part of the improvement claimed by the plaintiff, then, unless the jury found that both the proximity of said axles and the remoteness of said bearing-carriages from each other in the defendants' cars, were the same as that claimed by the plaintiff to be his improvement, there had been no infringement and the defendants were entitled to a verdict. The court instructed the jury, that in order to warrant them in finding the fact of infringement, they must be satisfied, from the evidence, that the defendants had used either the same thing, or substantially the same thing, as the plaintiff's invention; and the court refused to charge otherwise in relation to this prayer.

The defendants also requested the court to charge: (13.) That the patent was void on its face, because, 1st. There was not in the specification any sufficiently precise or certain rule for the arrangement and connection of the bearing-carriages with the car, to accomplish the objects of the pretended invention. 2d. The end proposed by the patentee was stated in the specification, but no means of accomplishing it were described, other than the application of known mechanical principles in such manner as would best accomplish that end or object. 3d. The claim was for an improvement to accomplish the "end proposed," by such arrangement and adjustment of things in use as would accomplish that end, but the specification left the rule or particular manner of arrangement and adjustment to be discovered and applied. 4th. The specification left the manner of arrangement and connection of the bearing-carriages or wheels, for the accomplishment of the purpose or end the patentee had in view, as much a matter of accident or experiment as they were before the specification was written. 5th. The patent was for a car to be constructed upon such known mechanical principles and with such mechanical arrangement as might be found necessary to attain the "end," or accomplish the purpose stated in the specification and claimed, without describing what that mechanical arrangement or combination must be. But the court refused so to charge.

The court also instructed the jury, that the drawing—a certified copy of which had been given in evidence by the plaintiff—was to have the same force and effect as if it had been referred to in the specification, and was to be deemed and taken as a part of the specification. The court further instructed the jury, that the application of a thing already known to a new and useful purpose, might be the subject of a patent, provided the new use was not analogous to the old, and required the exercise of the inventive faculties.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendants, upon a case made, now moved for a new trial.

Joshua A. Spencer and Samuel Blatchford, for plaintiff.

Samuel Stevens, for defendant.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and CONKLING, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. I. We have examined the various grounds presented by the counsel for the defendants on the motion for a new trial, and, after the fullest consideration, are of opinion that the motion must be denied.

Most of the exceptions taken at the trial, and relied on in the argument here, are founded on what we regard as an entire misapprehension of the thing claimed to have been discovered by the plaintiff and for which the patent has been issued. This will be seen on a reference to the instructions prayed for by the defendants, upon which most of the questions in the case arise. They assume that if any material part of the arrangement and combination in the construction of the cars or carriages described in the patent was before known or in public use, it is invalid; and hence, various parts were pointed out by the counsel at the trial, and the court was requested to charge, that if either of them was not new, the jury should find a verdict for the defendants.

Now, the answer to all this class of exceptions is, that the patentee sets up no claim to the discovery of the separate parts which enter into his arrangement in the construction of his cars. These may be old and well-known, when taken separately and detached, for aught that concerns his invention. His claim is for the car itself constructed and arranged as described in his patent. This, we think, is the clear meaning of the specification, and of the claim as pointed out in it. Proving, therefore, that parts of the arrangement and construction were before known, amounted to nothing. The question was, whether or not cars or carriages for running on rail-roads, as a whole, substantially like the one described in the patent, had been before known or in public use; not whether certain parts were or were not substantially similar. The argument presupposes that the claim is for the discovery of a new combination and arrangement of certain instruments and materials, by means of which a car is constructed of a given utility; and that, if any one or more of the supposed combinations turns out to be old, the patent is invalid. This is the principle upon which much of the defence has been placed; but no such claim is found in the patent. No particular combination or arrangement is pointed out as new or claimed as such. The novelty of the discovery is placed upon no such ground. On the contrary, the result of the entire arrangement and adjustment of the several parts described, namely, the rail-road car complete and fit for use, is the thing pointed out and claimed as new. This is the view taken of the patent by the chief justice, in the case of the present plaintiff against the Newcastle and Frenchtown Turnpike and Rail-road Company, tried before him in the Maryland circuit, and which was adopted by the judge on the trial of this case.

II. It was further insisted, on the part of the defendants, that if the relative position of the two bearing-carriages to each other constituted a material part of the arrangement in the construction of the car, the patent was void, unless the jury should find that the specification described with sufficient precision the location of these bearing-carriages under the body of the car, so as to enable a mechanic of skill in the construction of cars, to place them at the proper distance apart without experiment or invention. It was also contended, that the remoteness of the bearing-carriages from each other was not so described in the specification as to constitute any part of the improvement. In respect to this branch of the case, the court charged that the relative position of the bearing-carriages to each other, in the construction of the car, was a material part of the arrangement of the patentee, and left the question to the jury whether or not he had sufficiently described the position of the trucks, having in view their distance apart and also their distance from the ends of the car-body, suggesting, at the same time, that their location must always depend, in a measure, on the length of the body.

It will be seen, on looking into the specification, that the location of the trucks relatively to each other under the body of the car, as well as the near proximity of the two axles of each truck to each other, form a most essential part of the arrangement of the patentee in the construction of his cars. Great pains are taken to point out the defects in the existing four-wheel cars, and the impediments to be encountered and overcome in the running of cars upon railroads, as the latter are usually constructed. The patentee states that, in the construction of them, especially when of considerable length, it has been found necessary to admit of lateral curvatures, the radius of which is sometimes but a few hundred feet, and that it becomes important, therefore, to so construct the cars as to enable them to overcome the difficulties presented by these curvatures, and to adapt them for running, with the least friction practicable, on all parts of the road. The friction referred to is that which arises between the flanges of the wheels and the rails, causing great loss of power and destruction of the wheels and rails, besides other injuries. For this purpose, he constructs two bearing-carriages, each with four wheels, which are to sustain the body of the passenger or other car, by placing one of them at or near each end of it, as particularly described. The two wheels on either side of the truck are to be placed very near each other—the spaces between the flanges need be no greater than is necessary to prevent their contact with each other. The car-body rests upon bolsters supported on each of the two bearing-carriages or four-wheeled trucks, the bolsters so constructed as to swivel or turn on each other like the two front bolsters of a common wagon. The body of the car may be made of double the length of the four-wheeled car, and is capable of carrying double its load. The truck may be so placed within the ends of the car as to bring all the wheels under it; or, without the end, so as to allow the body to be suspended between the two bearing-carriages. The patentee further states, that the closeness of the fore and hind wheels of each bearing-carriage, taken in connection with the use of the two bearing-carriages arranged as remotely from each other as can conveniently be done for the support of the car-body, with a view to the objects and on the principles before set forth, is considered by him as an important feature of the invention; for, by the contiguity of the fore and hind wheels of each bearing-carriage, while the two bearing-carriages may be at any desirable distance apart, the lateral friction from the rubbing of the flanges against the rails is most effectually avoided, while at the same time all the advantages attendant upon placing the axles of a four-wheeled car far apart are obtained. The two wheels on either side of the bearing-carriages may, from their proximity, be considered as acting like a single wheel; and, as these two bearing-carriages may be placed at any distance from each other, consistent with the required strength of the body of the car, it is apparent that all the advantages are obtained which result from having the two axles of a four-wheeled car at a distance from each other, while its inconveniences are avoided. Among the principles stated by the patentee to be taken into consideration in the construction of the car is, that the greater the distance between the axles, while the length of the body remains the same, the less the influence of shocks and concussions occurring on the road; and hence the relief from them, when the trucks are placed under the extreme ends of the body, is greater than when they are placed midway between the centre and the ends.

It is apparent, from what we have already referred to in the specification, and still more manifest on a perusal of the whole of it, that the improvement in this part of the arrangement does not consist in placing the axles of the two trucks at any precise distance apart, in the construction of the car, or at any precise distance from each end of the body. The distance used must necessarily depend somewhat upon the length of the car and the strength of the materials of which it is built, and hence it was impracticable to specify in feet or inches the exact distance from the ends of the car-body at which it would be best to arrange the trucks. Neither do the advantages of a car constructed and arranged as described, depend upon the trucks being placed at a specified distance from the ends, or so that there may be a specified distance between the axles. Having in view the defects in the existing cars, and other difficulties to be encountered, some considerable latitude may be allowed in this respect, consistent with the object sought to be attained, to remedy the defects in the existing cars. All the principles for the construction of a car for the purpose of overcoming these difficulties and remedying these defects, are particularly set forth in the description given by the patentee. We think the specification sufficient, and that the court was right in the opinion expressed on this branch of the case. Any mechanic of skill could readily arrange the bearing-carriages in connection with the body of the car, so as to secure the advantages so minutely and clearly pointed out, and which are shown to attend the practical working of cars constructed in the manner described.

III. The questions of originality and of infringement were questions of fact, depending upon the evidence, and were properly submitted to the jury. We think the weight of it decidedly with the verdict.

IV. The patent in this case was originally issued on the 1st of October, 1834, and was recorded anew on the 7th of June, 1837, according to the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1837 (5 Stat. 191). No drawings were attached to the original patent, nor was there any reference therein to drawings. On the 25th of September, 1848, the patent was extended for the term of seven years from the 1st of October, 1848. The plaintiff gave in evidence, at the commencement of the trial, a certified copy of the patent and specification, of the certificate of extension, of a drawing with references to the same, and of an affidavit of the plaintiff, made November 19th, 1838. The drawing was not filed at the time the patent was recorded anew, but was filed on the 19th of November, 1838. The counsel for the defendants objected to the evidence, on the grounds: 1st, that it appeared that no drawing was annexed to the original patent; and, 2d, that the act of congress did not make such a drawing evidence. The court also instructed the jury, in summing up the case, that the drawing, a certified copy of which had been given in evidence, was to have the same force and effect as if it had been referred to in the specification, and was to be deemed and taken as part of the specification.

The 1st section of the act of 1837 provides that any person interested in a patent issued prior to the 15th of December, 1836, may, without charge, have the same recorded anew, together with the descriptions, specifications of claim and drawings annexed or belonging to the same, and it is made the duty of the commissioner to cause the same, or any authenticated copy of the original record, specification or drawing which he may obtain, to be transcribed and copied into books of record kept for that purpose; and that, whenever a drawing was not originally annexed to the patent and referred to in the specification, any drawing produced as a delineation of the invention, being verified by oath in such manner as the commissioner shall require, may be transmitted and placed on file, or copied as aforesaid, together with the certificate of the oath, or such drawings may be made in the office, under the direction of the commissioner, in conformity with the specification. The 2d section provides, that copies of such record and drawings, certified by the commissioner, or, in his absence, by his chief clerk, shall be prima-facie evidence of the particulars of the invention and of the patent granted therefor in any judicial court of the United States, in all cases where copies of the original record or specification and drawings would be evidence, without proof of the loss of such originals. This section also provides, that no patent issued prior to the aforesaid 15th day of December, 1836, shall, after the 1st day of June then next, be received in evidence in any court on behalf of the patentee, unless it shall have been so recorded anew, and a drawing of the invention, if separate from the patent, verified as aforesaid, shall have been deposited in the patent office. See, also, section 3 of the same act.

It is quite clear, from the above provisions of the act, that the court was right in admitting the drawing in evidence, in connection with the patent and specification. The whole together are made prima-facie evidence of the particulars of the invention and of the patent granted therefor. The weight to be given to the drawings furnished under the act, by way of enlarging or explaining the description as given in the specification, is another question. That will depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. As a general rule, they will not be effectual to correct any material defect in the specification, unless it should appear that they correspond with drawings which accompanied the original application for the patent; otherwise, in case of discrepancy between the drawings and specification, the latter should prevail. Care must be taken to avoid imposition by the use of the newly-furnished drawings, and, for this purpose, the specification will afford the proper correction, unless the plaintiff goes further and shows that the drawings conform to those originally filed.

The charge that the drawing in this case was to have the same force and effect as if it had been referred to in the specification, and was to be deemed and taken as part of it, was, perhaps, too strong, as it respects the drawings furnished under the act of 1837. The principle is true as it respects those accompanying the original application for the patent, but can hardly be said to be applicable, to the full extent stated, in the case of these newly-furnished drawings. The principle might open the way to imposition and fraud. Assuming that there is nothing but the oath of the party attesting that the drawing affords a true delineation of the invention, the specification should prevail, in case of a material discrepancy. But, admitting the instruction in this respect not to be strictly correct, and that too much weight was given to the drawing, we do not see that it would have altered the result. The specification afforded a sufficient description of the invention, independently of the drawing. It was open to some question whether some slight additions that improved the working of the car, were embraced in the specification, but they did not enter into the essence of the invention or constitute any substantial part of the improvement. Time and experience usually indicate these slight additions and alterations, and they should be regarded as consequential results, belonging to the inventor. It requires time and experience usually to perfect the machine, and improvements derived therefrom are justly due to him.

V. We think that the court was correct in its instructions as to the prior use of the car Columbus and of others constructed by the patentee before he made application for his patent. The law allows the inventor a reasonable time to perfect his invention by experiments; and these could be made, in this instance, only by putting the car into the service of those controlling lines of railroads. There were repeated failures in the experiments tried and in the cars which were abandoned before the perfection of the car described in the patent. These experiments and trials sufficiently account for the previous use set up by way of forfeiture of the invention.

Upon the whole, after a careful examination of the case, and of all the points made by the defendants on the argument, many of which have been noticed above, we are satisfied that the verdict is right, and that a new trial should be denied.

WINCHELL et al. v. JOHN HANCOCK
MUT. LIFE INS. CO.

[8 Ins. Law J. 651; 8 Reporter, 549.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1879.

LIFE INSURANCE—CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY—FORFEITURE—RIGHT TO PAID-UP INSURANCE.

[1. An endowment life policy provided that, after the payment of one annual premium, the insured might surrender the policy, and receive a paid-up policy for an amount proportioned to the premiums paid, and the policy should be void if any premium was not paid when due, subject to Acts Mass. 1861, c. 186, which continued policies in force in spite of a failure to pay any premium, provided notice of the claim and proof of death of the assured were given within 90 days. Held, that a paid-up policy proportioned to the premiums paid could be obtained, though the original policy had been forfeited by failure to pay a premium.]

[2. Equity could not relieve against the failure to submit notice of the claim and proof of death within 90 days, as provided by the statute, so as to keep the original policy in force, though this failure resulted from ignorance of the existence of the policy.]

[3. The right of insured to a paid-up policy was a property right, which survived to his representatives.]

Bill in equity by Isabella H. Winchell, wife and administratrix of the estate of George I. Winchell, deceased, and Harry Winchell, only child of said George, against John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company. The complainants alleged that said George I. Winchell obtained from the defendants a policy for $3,000 upon his life, for the benefit of his wife and children, a copy of which is annexed to the bill. It was dated June 17, 1866, and was what is known as a "ten-year endowment policy," that is to say, premiums were to be paid for ten successive years, after which nothing more was to be paid by the assured. The policy contained this clause: "At any time after one annual premium has been paid, as stipulated in this policy, it may be surrendered at the option of the assured; and he is entitled to receive, in lieu thereof, a paid-up or nonforfeiture policy for an amount pro rata of the annual premiums paid, to wit, for one-tenth of the amount insured by this policy, for each and every premium paid therein: provided expressly, and this policy is made, and it is accepted by the assured upon, the following express conditions, to wit: (2) That if the premium, or any premium note given therefor, or any part of either, shall not be paid to said company on or before the time specified for the payment of the same, this policy shall thereupon be forfeited and be null and void; this condition, however, being subject to the provisions of the 186th chapter of the acts of the legislature of Massachusetts, in the year 1861, entitled 'An act to regulate the forfeiture of policies of life insurance.'"

That statute continues in force all life policies for a time, reckoned according to their net value, notwithstanding a failure to pay the premium, provided that notice of the claim and proof of the death shall be submitted to the company within ninety days after the decease of the assured. The assured paid eight annual premiums, including that due June 17, 1873, after which time he paid nothing. He died December 17, 1877.

The bill alleged that the payments made upon the policy were sufficient, under the statute of Massachusetts referred to in the policy, to continue it in force until after the death of the assured. That Winchell was a man of little or no business knowledge or experience, and left his affairs in great confusion, and the plaintiffs were in ignorance of the existence of the policy, and the same was lost until on or about March 30, 1878, when they individually gave due notice and proof of the death of said Winchell to the defendant corporation, and demanded payment, which was refused; that the delay was due to unavoidable accident, from which a court of equity will relieve the plaintiffs. After reciting the clause concerning the option to take a paid-up policy in proportion to the number of premiums which had been paid, the bill alleged that the plaintiffs had offered to deliver up the policy to the defendants, and had demanded of them a paid-up policy for $2,400, but the defendants had refused to give said policy, or to pay the amount thereof. It prayed, in the alternative, payment of the full amount of $3,000, or a delivery of a paid-up policy of $2,400, and payment of that amount. The defendants demurred to the bill.

S. Wells and F. L. Hayes, for defendant.

(1) The plaintiffs have a complete and adequate remedy at law. Rev. St. § 723; Thompson v. Railroad Cos., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 134; Mossop v. Eadon, 16 Ves. 431.

(2) Equity will not relieve against a neglect to comply with the requisitions of a statute, and the ignorance of the plaintiffs is not an accident or mistake. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 101, 105, and cases, and sections 1325, 1326.

(3) The paid-up policy could be demanded only while the assured had an "option;" that is, while his policy was in force without default on his part. Bussing's Ex'rs v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. (March, 1879) 8 Ins. Law J. 218. The cases cited by the plaintiffs are distinguished in this: that they were on policies which were nonforfeitable, and which had an acknowledged value after a failure to pay a premium.

(4) The right of surrender was a personal right, which could not be exercised after the death of the assured.

D. Foster and A. D. Foster, for the plaintiffs.

(1) A bill for the specific performance of a contract to write a policy will lie after a loss, as well as before. Brooklyn L. Ins. Co. v. Dutcher, 95 U. S. 269; Eames v. Home Ins. Co., 94 U. S. 621; Tayloe v. Merchants' Fire Ins. Co. of Baltimore, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 405.

(2) The option may be exercised "at any time," after one annual premium has been paid. If it ceased as soon as there was a neglect of payment, it would be void at the only time when it was for the benefit of the assured to demand it. A policy should be construed most strongly against the company. Dorr v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., 67 Me. 438; Nat. Bank v. Insurance Co., 95 U. S. 678; *Chase v. Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. LOWELL, Circuit Judge. Equity will not relieve against a penalty or forfeiture imposed by statute, because it is presumed that the legislature would have inserted in an act any exceptions or mitigations which it intended to admit. A fortiori, when a new right is conferred by statute, and certain acts to be done within a certain time are made conditions precedent to the recovery, equity might perhaps even then relieve against a delay caused by the positive fraud of the defendant; but nothing short of that would avail. The plaintiffs admit this general rule, and distinguish this case by the fact that the statute is incorporated into the contract, and so becomes a right by stipulation. I do not think the policy intends any more in this respect than to remind the assured that he has the rights given him by the statute, and, indeed, I understand one of the statutes to require such a reference to be inserted in the policy. The plaintiffs, therefore, having failed to notify the loss until about one hundred days after it occurred, cannot be relieved on the ground of their ignorance of the existence of the policy.

The construction of the clause of the contract which gives the assured an option to take a paid-up policy at any time after one annual premium has been paid, coupled with the other clause that the policy shall be void if any premium is not paid when due, saving as the forfeiture is restricted by the Massachusetts statute, is a nice and difficult one. The defendants, in support of their demurrer, maintain that the two clauses, taken together, mean that the option must be exercised before there has been a forfeiture; that is to say, during some current year for which payment has been made, and before or on the day the annual premium is payable. The option, they argue, means a choice between the original and the paid-up policy, and there can be no choice between a forfeited policy and some other. The case of Bussing's Ex'rs v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. [supra], is an authority for this construction, which seems to reconcile the apparent discrepancies in the two clauses, and to be consistent with all the words used. On the other hand, the plaintiffs insist that the policy is nonforfeitable after one annual premium has been paid, and that the assured may choose between the temporary extension of the policy under the Massachusetts law, or a paid-up policy for a less amount. They further say that the word "option" may be disregarded, or be read as meaning "right"; that is, the assured has the right, at any time after paying one or more annual premiums, to take a paid-up policy for an amount proportioned to the premiums paid.

After much doubt, I have concluded that the plaintiffs' construction is the more obvious and natural one. I think the assured, in reading his policy, would suppose that he need give himself no uneasiness about the premiums, for that he could always be sure of a policy as large as those he had paid would warrant. That was my impression on first reading the policy, and I think, when that is the case, the other construction should be clear and decisive on a more careful consideration, before a court should venture to adopt it. The policy itself, as a policy for $3,000, was forfeited by neglect to pay the premium, except as it was kept in force until the death of the assured by virtue of the statute of Massachusetts; and that policy could not be revived or reinstated except by the consent of both parties. But it is not wholly inconsistent with that condition to hold that the right to a paid-up policy of less amount remained good. Such was the decision upon those words in two cases cited by the plaintiffs, which I agree are not otherwise specially like the present.

The defendants would import into the contract the words often found in such policies, that the paid-up policy must be applied for while the original policy is in force. The plaintiffs say that the very omission of those words is evidence that such is not the intent. I do not consider that form of expression to have become so universal that the court can supply it by implication, nor, on the other hand, that the omission has much bearing on the case. Nor do I consider that the words "at any time after" one premium has been paid refer to the present question at all. The meaning is the same as if "after" or "when" had been used, and points to a terminus a quo, to the beginning of the right, and not to its termination. But I do consider that one fair and reasonable, and, on the whole, the fairest, construction of the contract is that the forfeiture by nonpayment is of all rights not otherwise provided for. Even if we supplied the words, "while the policy is in force," this policy was in full force for the whole amount when the assured died. It was in force, in all respects, and to all intents and purposes, and subject to be forfeited, if the assured did any act prohibited by the conditions, such as traveling in certain countries, or engaging in certain occupations. In other words, up to this time it was not forfeited at all, except as to the right of extending it beyond the time to which the statute extended it. Why, then, should not the assured have the option to exchange it for a paid-up policy? If the assured had this right at the time of his death, the plaintiffs have it, because there was nothing of a personal character to die with the person. It was a right of property, which they would take, or, at least, which the administratrix would take, like other rights of that character.

I am inclined to think an action at law might at the present day be maintained on this claim; but, as the paid-up policy never was issued, and the defendants refused to issue it on demand, it seems to come directly within the cases cited by the plaintiffs, in which courts of equity have been held to have jurisdiction also; they having acquired it when courts of law were less liberal than now. Demurrer overruled.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1862.

HABEAS CORPUS—WHEN WRIT OF RIGHT SERVICE—PREVENTION BY FORCE.

1. Courts of justice may refuse to grant the writ of habeas corpus where no probable ground for relief is shown in the petition, or where it appears that the petitioner is duly committed for felony or treason plainly expressed in the warrant of commitment.

2. But where probable ground is shown that the party is in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, and is imprisoned without just cause, and therefore has a right to be delivered, the writ of habeas corpus then becomes a writ of right, which may not be denied.

3. The service of the writ in this case was prevented by force. The writ was ordered to be placed on the files of the court, to be served when and where its service might become practicable.

This was a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The circumstances of the case are fully set forth in the petition and the opinion of the court.

To the Honorable Nathan Clifford, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, sitting in the District of Massachusetts:—

The petition of William H. Winder respectfully represents, that he is and always has been a loyal citizen of the United States, and was a resident of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania until the time of the arrest and restraint hereinafter mentioned, and has been for a long time past confined in Fort Warren, a military fort of the United States within the district of Massachusetts, under the command of Colonel Justin Dimmick, where and by whom he is illegally restrained of his liberty. That your petitioner whilst so resident in the commonwealth of Pennsylvania was arrested at his residence in the city of Philadelphia upon the 11th day of September, A. D. 1861, under a warrant purporting to be issued by a United States commissioner, upon a charge of conspiracy to overthrow the government of the United States, under the act of congress of the 13th July, 1861. Your petitioner avers that he was entirely innocent of this charge, or of any other offence against the United States, and at once urged an immediate hearing of the case, which was refused, upon the alleged ground of other engagements of the United States attorney, and the hearing was postponed to the afternoon of the 13th September, 1861, your petitioner remaining in custody. Your petitioner was again present at the day to which the hearing of his case was adjourned, ready and anxious to meet the charge against him, when, after a considerable delay, the United States attorney stated that he had no charge to prefer against your petitioner. He then said that an order had been received for your petitioner's delivery to the United States marshal, and your petitioner was discharged by the commissioner; and a telegraphic message, of which the following is a copy, was produced and handed to the counsel of your petitioner, who was present with him:—

"Dated Wash'g. Sept. 11, 1861. To Geo. A. Coffey, U. S. District Attorney: Have telegraphed Marshal Millward to arrest Wm. H. Winder and transfer him to Fort Lafayette. S. Cameron, Secretary of War."

Your petitioner was then at about 5 o'clock of the afternoon of September 13, 1861, without any warrant or cause of commitment being exhibited or stated either to him or to his counsel, immediately seized and taken into custody by William Millward, United States marshal for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, and was on the same afternoon removed to the city of New York by a person believed to be a deputy or officer of said marshal, and upon reaching the city of New York was carried to Fort Lafayette, a military fort of the United States, under an order, a copy of which he has since obtained, and which is as follows:—

"Philadelphia, Sept. 13, 1861. Lieut.-Col. Martin Burke, Commanding Fort Hamilton: Dear Sir,—Permit me to introduce to you my deputy, Mr. Sharkey, who carries with him Mr. Winder, to be delivered to your custody, per order of secretary of war. Very respectfully, your ob't servant, Wm. Millward, U. S. Marshal."

Your petitioner avers that neither at the time of his said arrest, nor at any time since, has he ever seen the said order or pretended order of the secretary of war, which, for reasons hereinafter stated, he believes never existed. Your petitioner remained so unlawfully restrained of his liberty in Fort Lafayette, under color of some order or pretended order of the secretary of war or some other person, until some time towards the end of October or beginning of November, 1861, when he was transferred, under some order or direction to him unknown, to Fort Warren, near Boston, a military fort of the United States under command of Colonel Justin Dimmick, in which place he has ever since been detained in custody, and now is unlawfully restrained of his liberty. Ignorant of the cause of his unlawful arrest and detention, and conscious of entire innocence, your petitioner addressed a letter to the secretary of state upon the subject of his imprisonment, of which the following is a copy:—

"Fort Warren, 5th Dec. 1861. To the Hon. W. H. Seward, Secretary of State: Sir,—In accordance with your letter of instructions, read to the parties confined in this fort, to address you directly in relation to their release, I proceed to do so, relying upon the implied assurance of your letter, that these communications will receive your personal attention and reply. I have been confined now nearly thirteen weeks, and during all that time I have been unable to learn of any charge whatever; consequently, I can only state that I am unconscious of word or act inconsistent with the character of a true American citizen; and hence I infer that my arrest did not emanate from the head of a department, and that the names of such, when employed in this matter, were merely pro forma, without attention to, and probably without knowledge of, the document to which they were attached. In this state of affairs, I will respectfully submit to your consideration the propriety of allowing me, on parole, to visit Washington for the examination of my case, and I will add my conviction that a short interview will satisfy you of some error in my arrest and confinement, which have proved seriously detrimental. Should the granting the parole prove to be inconsistent with your purposes, I trust I shall not be disappointed in my expectation of receiving a statement of any charges against me, fully, specifically, and with all the evidence in possession of the department, together with the names of all parties making charges. Respectfully, your obedient servant, W. H. Winder."

No answer was ever received by your petitioner to this letter, and time rolling on, and remaining in his original ignorance of the cause of his unlawful imprisonment, your petitioner addressed a letter, of which the following is a copy, to the secretary of war:—

"I have been held in confinement in Forts Lafayette, N. Y., and Warren, Mass., without process or form of law, now more than five months, having been arrested in Philadelphia, my residence, from whence, by order of Simon Cameron, secretary of war, by telegraphic despatch, I was transferred to those distant points. Immediately upon my arrest, in my absence, my office, desks, and chests, &c., were all broken open, and all my papers, a collection of thirty years, ransacked, on pretence of hunting treasonable matter during the few months previous; the sanctity of private correspondence was violated and malignantly calumniated by the publication of pretended contents of letters thus seized; other parties were also thus grievously slandered by statement of falsely alleged contents, and I debarred of all opportunity to contradict such infamous publications. My letter-books, writings, and letters are still in possession of public officials. Even pictures twenty years old found in my possession were misrepresented to slander me. My correspondence at Philadelphia since my arrest has been intercepted and detained. I am to this hour in ignorance of the causes of my arrest and detention. Governor Seward, secretary of state, caused an order of his to be read to the prisoners, in which he stated that the employment of paid counsel would only have the effect of prejudicing the case of such parties, would be deemed an offence, and would occasion procrastination of imprisonment; his order required all applications to be addressed directly to him, or through unpaid parties. In accordance with this order, never having employed counsel, on the 5th December last, I addressed a letter to the secretary of state, in which, referring to his order as giving assurance that he would read and reply to our communications, I proceeded to state my long confinement, my ignorance of the causes therefor, and requesting permission to go to Washington for an investigation of my case, or for a statement of the charges against me, if any, the full testimony, and the names of my accusers, or else an unconditional discharge. To this hour no reply has been received. My release was tendered to me on condition of taking the oath of allegiance, &c., &c. I declined to accept release upon conditions. A second time release was offered upon condition of taking the oath, which offer was accompanied by a letter of explanation from Governor Seward, intended to remove supposed objections, in stating that support of the constitution did not include support of the individual members of the executive. My objection, being radical, applied to all tests or conditions, which might be supposed to admit that I had done anything inconsistent with the character of a true American, and I of course declined this second offer of release. In common with my fellow-members of the company to which I am attached, I took an oath to support the constitution, and I am still under its full responsibility. I am ready in common with all others, on every proper and lawful occasion, to take it a thousand times. But as a discriminating test, imputing past and future intended wrong, it is not possible for me thus voluntarily to calumniate myself. The interior of Fort Warren, with the mens sibi conscia recti, is preferable to release purchased at the expense of character. So far from being willing thus to calumniate myself, I have challenged and I do now challenge a comparison of record of fidelity to the constitution and the Union with all concerned in my arrest and detention, confident that the result will furnish none of them with cause for self-gratulation. In this state of the case, the secretary of war announces that the president will grant 'amnesty' for past offences and take 'parole' against future ones, of all persons 'except spies in the service of the insurgents, or others whose release at the present moment may be deemed incompatible with the public safety.' Thus I should be turned loose, stained with an unnamed guilt of the past, supposed to be covered by the 'amnesty,' and the equally nameless guilt of the future, averted by the 'parole,' allowing a censorious world to impute any wrong it may please, as being concealed beneath the cloaks of 'amnesty' and 'parole,' and to which, by my acceptance, I would give at least a quasi admission, and certainly would leave upon myself the color of guilt, and without power of vindication against such imputation. The 'spies' and those whose liberation may be 'deemed incompatible with the public safety' will have probably the opportunity of perfect vindication, while those favored with 'amnesty' and 'parole' will stand forever shaded beneath those clouds. It would seem to be an exquisite aggravation of the original wrong which the order admits and purports to remedy or correct. The wrong done was illegal incarceration without charge; the remedy now proposed is to confess that wrong has been done, and to receive 'amnesty' therefor; to acknowledge intention to do future wrong, and then to give 'parole' to forego such intention. The condition, in a Northern state, of a man accepting 'amnesty' and giving 'parole,' would be a confession of guilt bearing in its train intolerable consequences. For these reasons, and many others which naturally present themselves, and would be stated if necessary, the undersigned trusts the secretary of war will find it consistent with his duty to reinstate him at home to his original position before arrest. If there be any charge of crime against me, I am ready to meet it. If there be none, I trust the secretary will see that to impose conditions on me as the price of my liberation, is to aggravate the wrong which will then stand confessed. It might be simple justice, alike to the administration as to the prisoners, to have the informers who misled the defendant exposed to view and to just punishment. I have the honor to be your obedient servant, W. H. Winder. Fort Warren, 22d Feb'y, 1862. Hon. E. D. Stanton, Secretary of War, Washington City."

Your petitioner's books and papers had all been seized and taken by the marshal, at the time of his arrest; but having been, previously to his arrest, in correspondence with Gen. Simon Cameron, and believing it to be impossible that that officer would, of his own motion, have authorized his arrest, he wrote to him upon the 15th March, 1862, as follows:—

"Fort Warren, 15th March, 1862. Hon. Simon Cameron: Sir,—It was by order from you, through a telegraphic despatch, that I was taken from Philadelphia to Fort Lafayette and placed in confinement there, from whence I was transferred to this fort, in which I am confined, still ignorant of the cause which induced you to issue that order. The object of my writing this letter is to obtain from you information at whose instance and upon what representations you were influenced to the issue of the order for my confinement in Fort Lafayette. I believe I do not err in supposing the order could not have been of your own motion, but was upon the statement of party or parties who ought not, and who you supposed would not, willingly mislead you, and I trust that my reliance on your readiness to afford me the information will not prove delusive. I feel myself entitled to this consideration at your hands; and am unwilling to doubt your inclination to accord it to me. I am, respectfully, your obedient servant, &c., W. H. Winder."

To this letter an answer was received, as follows:—

"Lochiel, March 24, 1862. W. H. Winder, Esq.: Sir,—You surprise me by saying in your letter of the 15th inst., received to-day, that it was by my order you were taken from Philadelphia to Fort Lafayette and placed in confinement. I knew nothing of your arrest until I saw the fact stated in the newspapers, and, being at the time closely engaged in the discharge of my official duties, neglected to inquire into the cause, presuming, however, that it was done by order of the state department, which had charge of such cases as I supposed yours to be. Very resp't'y, Simon Cameron."

And the following further correspondence took place between your petitioner and Gen. Cameron:—

"Fort Warren, 31 March, '62. Hon. Simon Cameron, Lochiel, near Harrisburg: Sir,—I have to thank you for your prompt reply to my request for information as to the causes which induced you to issue an order for my transfer to Fort Lafayette. Your reply of the 24th, stating your surprise at learning that I had been sent there by your order, and that you knew nothing of my arrest until you saw it in the papers, and presumed it had been done by order of the state department, confirms me in my supposition that your name had been used either without your knowledge or inadvertently signed to a paper without heeding its contents. It was obtained somehow through the district attorney. I give you a copy of the document on which Col. Burke took charge of me and placed me in Fort Lafayette:—'Philadelphia, Sept. 13, 1861. Lt.-Col. Martin Burke, commanding Fort Hamilton. Dear Sir,—Permit me to introduce to you my deputy, Mr. Sharkey, who carries with him Mr. Winder, to be delivered to your custody, per orders of secretary of war. Very respectfully, your obt't servant, Wm. Millward, U. S. Marshal.' I am respectfully, your obedient servant, W. H. Winder."

"Fort Warren, 31 March, 1862. Hon. Simon Cameron, Lochiel, near Harrisburg. Dear Sir,—Since writing you to-day I have received the following copy of despatch from Philadelphia:—'Washington, Sept. 11, 1861. To Geo. A. Coffey, U. S. Dist. Att'y.: Have telegraphed Marshal Millward to arrest Wm. H. Winder and transfer him to Fort Lafavette. S. Cameron, Sec'y War.' I have supposed this might call to your mind the communication of Mr. Coffey to which apparently it is a reply. I am respectfully, your obedient servant, &c. W. H. Winder."

"Lochiel, 2 April, 1862. W. H. Winder, Esq.: Sir,—I have enclosed your letter of the 31st, received to-day, to the secretary of state, and disavowed all knowledge of your arrest, with a request for your release, if you have been held by my direction. Very respectfully, Simon Cameron."

"Fort Warren, 5th April, 1862. Hon. S. Cameron, Lochiel, near Harrisburg: Dear Sir,—I have been much gratified by the receipt of your letter of 2d April, in which you advise me of your having sent my first letter of 31st March to the secretary of state, with a request for my release, if I have been held by your direction. This is satisfactory, and is all the action the case requires at your hands, unless, indeed, a disregard of your request should render it proper for your own vindication against an act which you repudiate, but the responsibility of which is placed by the record on your name. I am, respectfully, your ob't serv't, &c., W. H. Winder."

It thus appears that no order was ever given by the secretary of war for the arrest of your petitioner, and he was left in absolute darkness as to the authority, or supposed authority, by which he was originally imprisoned and was then detained. In the month of May last, commissioners to visit and report upon the cases of those who had been arrested and were detained in the military prisons of the United States, came to Fort Warren, and your petitioner was summoned to appear before them. Then for the first time, and nearly eight months after his arrest, upon the 7th May, 1862, your petitioner was informed that his offence was his correspondence and his writings for the newspapers. Your petitioner at once demanded the production of any writings of his upon which any charge of violating the laws of the United States could be based. None such were produced, and your petitioner now asserts what he has before stated, that none such can be produced. Your petitioner was then told by the commissioners that his case would be taken into consideration, but he has never heard further from them upon the subject, nor has any offence been since ever imputed or stated to him, or the reason of his arrest and detention, nor has, so far as he is aware, any further or other action ever been taken in regard to him or his case. Your petitioner avers that he has now been nearly fourteen months unlawfully restrained of his liberty, and detained in custody under color of some pretended authority of the United States, without any specific crime or offence under or violation of its laws being imputed to him, in disregard of the plain provisions of the laws and constitution of the United States, to the benefit of which the humblest citizen is entitled. Your petitioner now solemnly reasserts what he has heretofore more than once stated, that he is innocent of any crime or offence against his country or its government and laws, and he respectfully prays your honor to grant a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to Col. Justin Dimmick, commandant of Fort Warren, and to his officers having charge of your petitioner, commanding him and them to bring your petitioner before your honor, to do, submit to, and receive what the laws may require. And he will ever pray, &c. W. H. Winder.

By his agent and attorney,

George W. Biddle.

Boston, October 25th, 1862.

Wm. B. Reed, Geo. W. Biddle, Peter McCall, and Geo. S. Hillard, for petitioner.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. This is a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, wherein the petitioner represents that for a long time past he has been confined in Fort Warren, a military fort of the United States, in this district, under the command of Colonel Justin Dimmick, where and by whom he is illegally restrained of his liberty.

As a foundation of the application, and to show that the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted, he alleges that he is and always has been a loyal citizen of the United States, and that until the time of his arrest, as therein set forth, he had been a resident of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and the complaint is, that while he was so resident there he was, on the 11th of September, 1861, arrested at his residence in the city of Philadelphia, under a warrant purporting to have been issued by a commissioner of the United States, upon a charge of conspiracy to overthrow the government of the United States.

According to the petition that warrant was founded upon the act of congress of the 13th of July, 1861 [12 Stat. 255]; but the petitioner avers that he was entirely innocent of that charge or of any other offence against the United States; that he urged an immediate hearing of the case on the day of his arrest, which was refused on the ground that the district attorney had other engagements, and the same was postponed to the 13th of the same month, when he was again present, and ready and anxious to meet the charge, but that the district attorney, after stating that he had no charge to prefer against him, informed him that an order had been received that he should be delivered to the marshal of the United States for that district; that he was accordingly discharged by the commissioner, and was then and there, without any warrant or cause of commitment being exhibited to him or to his counsel, immediately seized and taken into custody by William Millward, marshal of that district. When the district attorney, however, informed the petitioner that an order had been received that he, the petitioner, should be delivered to the marshal, he at the same time, as the petitioner states, handed to his counsel, who was present with him, a telegraphic despatch, addressed to the district attorney, of the following purport:—

"Have telegraphed Marshal Millward to arrest Wm. H. Winder, and transfer him to Fort Lafayette. S. Cameron, Sec'y of War."

Recurring to the copy of the telegram as given in the petition, it will be seen that it was dated at Washington on the 11th of September, 1861, two days before the petitioner was taken into custody by the marshal; and the petitioner states that on the same afternoon that he was so seized, he was removed to the city of New York, by a person believed to be a deputy or officer of the marshal, and upon reaching that city was carried to Fort Lafayette, a military fort of the United States, under an order of which the following is a copy:—

"Permit me to introduce to you my deputy, Mr. Sharkey, who carries with him Mr. Winder, to be delivered to your custody per order of the secretary of war."

Said order or letter was dated at Philadelphia on the 13th of September, 1861, and was addressed to the commandant of Fort Hamilton, and was signed by the marshal.

Having stated these proceedings, the petitioner avers that he has never seen the order or pretended order of the secretary of war, and, for reasons set forth in the petition, he does not believe that any such order ever existed, but that he remained in Fort Lafayette, so unlawfully restrained of his liberty, under color of some order or pretended order of the secretary of war or of some other person, until some time towards the last of October or the first of November, 1861, when he was transferred, under some order or direction to him unknown, to the military fort before mentioned in this district, under the command of Colonel Justin Dimmick, in which place he has ever since been detained in custody, and now is unlawfully restrained of his liberty.

On the 5th of December, 1861, he addressed a letter to the secretary of state, soliciting leave to visit Washington, on parole, for the examination of his case, or that he might be furnished with a statement of the charges against him; but as no reply was received to the communication, it will not be reproduced at the present time. Failing to get any reply to that letter, on the 22d of February, 1862, he addressed another letter to the present secretary of war, but, so far as appears, the communication was never answered. Believing it to be impossible that the former secretary of war, General Simon Cameron, would of his own motion have authorized his arrest, the petitioner states that he, on the 15th of March, 1862, wrote to General Cameron upon the subject, informing him that it was by his order that he, the petitioner, was seized and taken from Philadelphia to Fort Lafayette, and there placed in confinement, and afterwards transferred to Fort Warren, and inquired at whose instance and upon what representations he had been induced to issue the order.

To that letter, as the petitioner states, a reply was received under date of the 24th of March, 1862; and he gives what purports to be a copy of the answer. Suffice it to say, without attempting to give the precise language, the writer expresses his surprise at the remark of the petitioner that it was by his order that he had been taken from Philadelphia to Fort Lafayette and placed in confinement. On the contrary, he expressly states that he knew nothing of the petitioner's arrest until he saw the fact stated in the newspapers, and adds several circumstances confirmatory of that statement. Confirmed by that letter in the opinion that the name of the former secretary of war had been used without his knowledge, or inadvertently, the petitioner states that on the 31st of the same month, he wrote General Cameron another letter, thanking him for his prompt reply, and furnished him with a copy of the document under which the commandant of Fort Hamilton took charge of him and placed him in Fort Lafayette, and also a copy of his telegraphic despatch to the district attorney, which was handed to his counsel at the time he was discharged by the commissioner. Considering that the reply of General Cameron is a brief one, it will be given in the language of the copy set forth in the petition.

"Lochiel, April 2, 1862. W. H. Winder, Esq. Sir,—I have enclosed your letter (of the 31st) received to-day, to the secretary of state, and disavowed all knowledge of your arrest, with a request for your release, if you have been held by my direction. Very respectfully, Simon Cameron."

Various other matters are stated in the petition, which need not be particularly noticed at this stage of the case, except to say that the petitioner, in conclusion, avers that he has been nearly fourteen months unlawfully restrained of his liberty, and detained in custody, under color of some pretended authority of the United States, without any specific crime or offence being imputed to him, in disregard of the plain provisions of the constitution of the United States and the laws of congress, to the benefit of which every citizen is entitled; he accordingly prays the court to grant this writ of habeas corpus.

By the fourteenth section of the act of the 24th of September, 1789 [1 Stat. 81], it is provided, among other things, that either of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, as well as the judges of the district courts, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment; provided, that writs of habeas corpus shall in no case extend to prisoners in jail, unless where they are in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, or are committed for trial before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify. Additional authority upon the subject is also conferred by subsequent acts of congress, but it is unnecessary to refer to any other act, as the petition in this case is obviously founded upon the before-mentioned provision of the judiciary act.

Courts of justice may refuse to grant the writ of habeas corpus where no probable ground for relief is shown in the petition, or where it appears that the petitioner is duly committed for felony or treason plainly expressed in the warrant of commitment; but where probable ground is shown that the party is in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, and is imprisoned without just cause, and therefore has a right to be delivered, the writ of habeas corpus then becomes a writ of right, which may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man who is committed or detained in prison or otherwise restrained of his liberty. Authorities in support of these positions are unnecessary, as wherever the principles of the common law are adopted or recognized they are universally acknowledged.

Although the petitioner was arrested, in the first place, by virtue of a warrant issued by a commissioner of the United States, still the case, as stated in the petition, shows that he was discharged from that arrest, and that no warrant of any kind has since been issued against him. Assuming the case to be as stated in the petition, he was not only arrested and imprisoned under an order having no other sanction than that of a telegraphic despatch, but it now appears from the petition that the secretary of war who was supposed to have sent or authorized the telegram containing the order, denies all knowledge of the arrest of the petitioner, except as he learned the fact from the newspapers, and entirely disavows all responsibility for the proceedings.

Nothing need be added to the narrative of the facts as set forth in the petition, to demonstrate that the petition shows probable ground to conclude that he is imprisoned and restrained of his liberty without just cause. Undoubtedly he is in custody under or by color of authority of the United States, and such being the fact, all the requisites known to the law are shown to entitle the petitioner to the writ for which he prays; and on that state of the case, it becomes the duty of the court to grant it. When these pre-requisites appear, it is not competent for the court to deny the application, because the court has in such case no discretion upon the subject, but the writ must issue as a matter of right.

All these remarks must be understood as based entirely upon the facts as stated in the petition, and, of course, can have no application to any different state of facts which may be shown upon the return.

The United States marshal having declined to serve the writ, it was placed in the hands of B. F. Bayley, a deputy sheriff, who made the following return thereupon:—

"I, Benjamin F. Bayley, being duly sworn, do depose and say that I am one of the deputies of the sheriff of the county of Suffolk, in the commonwealth of Massachusetts; that on Tuesday, the 28th day of October, A. D. 1862, there was placed in my hands for service a writ of habeas corpus, a copy of which is hereto annexed, directed to Colonel Justin Dimmick, commandant of Fort Warren, or to any officer under him having the charge of William H. Winder, commanding him to bring the body of said Winder, then confined in said Fort Warren, to be dealt with as to law and justice should appertain; that upon receiving said writ, I immediately proceeded to Commercial Wharf, in the port of Boston, where the steamboat plying between the said port and said Fort Warren was lying, and stated to the captain in charge of said boat, that I desired to proceed therein to Fort Warren as a messenger from the United States court, with papers for said Colonel Justin Dimmick. The said captain told me that his orders were positive not to allow any one to go in said boat without a pass from Colonel Dimmick, said orders having been received on Friday last, the 24th instant; that being prevented from proceeding in said boat, I did on the morning of Wednesday, the 29th day of October, 1862, receive from the counsel of said Winder, certain instructions in regard to the service of the said writ of the following tenor:—"You are entrusted with the service of a writ of habeas corpus, issued by order of the Honorable Nathan Clifford, a justice of the supreme court of the United States, to be served upon Colonel Justin Dimmick, at Fort Warren. You will have with you the original writ, with an attested copy thereof. You will procure a proper conveyance to take you to Fort Warren, and land there in order to serve the writ as directed. Upon landing or meeting the sentry, or other person at the fort whom you may first meet, you will respectfully inquire for Colonel Dimmick, stating you have a paper to deliver to him from Judge Clifford, a judge of the supreme court of the United States. Should you be allowed to see Colonel Dimmick, you will respectfully deliver to him the original writ, saying at the same time, This is a writ from Judge Clifford, and at once return to Boston, when you will draw up a statement of the time and mode of service. Should the sentry or party with whom you first communicate refuse you permission to see Colonel Dimmick, you will ask by what authority you are refused; if none is stated, and the refusal be persisted in, you will hand a copy of the writ to the sentry or other party, asking him to deliver it to Colonel Dimmick, saying you will wait for an answer, and bring it if received. If this be refused, you will return at once. Should you be refused permission to land, and the refusal be persisted in upon your stating that you have a paper for Colonel Dimmick, you will at once return and make a report of what you have done. Should Colonel Dimmick be absent from the fort, you will communicate or endeavor to communicate with the officer in command, in the manner hereinabove set forth.' That upon receiving said instructions I hired a sail-boat in the port of Boston aforesaid, manned with two men, and was accompanied by John H. Clark, a reputable citizen of the county of Middlesex, in this commonwealth, and proceeded therein to Fort Warren, to serve the said writ according to my instructions; that I arrived near to said Fort Warren, at about three o'clock of the afternoon of said 29th day of October, when I perceived a body of about fifty armed men drawn up in military array near the place of landing; that upon nearing the landing I was hailed by a sentinel and told by him to keep off; that I then told said sentinel that I had a communication to make to Colonel Dimmick, and approached a little nearer to said landing; that the said force was then marched down to the landing, when I was again peremptorily ordered by a person in command of said force, to keep off, and was prevented from landing; that finding it impossible to land or approach nearer to the said fort, I directed the boat, in which I was, to be put about, and returned to the port of Boston, where I arrived at about five o'clock of the afternoon of the same day, having been forcibly prevented from serving the said writ; that I verily believe that had I attempted to effect a landing at said Fort Warren, after having been warned away, as hereinbefore stated, I should have been prevented from so doing by the force of armed men drawn up at the landing, and that to the best of my belief it was impossible for me to land and serve the said writ. And that further I say not. Benj. F. Bayley.

"Sworn and subscribed this 30th day of October, A. D. 1862. G. S. Hillard, Justice of the Peace."

Mr. Reed then addressed the court as follows:—"May it please your honor. Having presented to the court this affidavit, the counsel for the relator beg leave to say that we came to this jurisdiction to solicit the process of the law in order to release from a long and, as we believe, unlawful imprisonment (for nearly fourteen months), a fellow-citizen of Pennsylvania. We deferred any action until the district attorney should have full opportunity of communicating with the authorities at Washington. We came prepared, and anxious to meet and discuss any grave questions of law which the officers of the government might raise in opposition to this discharge. The court granted the writ of relief which was asked for, but its execution has been evaded and resisted, so as to prevent the consideration and decision of these questions. In the case decided by the chief justice of the United States, that of Merriman, the military officer to whom the process was directed, made a return in form respectful; and this, too, at a time of local disturbance and on the edge of actual war. But here in Massachusetts, many hundred miles away from any scene of war, where perfect peace reigns, and every peaceful relation of life is maintained, and the court is regularly transacting the ordinary and profitable business of the government, here in Massachusetts, the writ which your honor granted is both evaded and resisted, and an imprisoned American citizen is denied the common right of knowing who are his accusers and of what he is accused. Your honor's writ is that of the United States, and that peaceful writ the military force of the government prevents us from executing. At this moment we can do no more. We submit the facts this affidavit discloses. We beg to express to your honor our high sense of the kindness and consideration we have received at your hands, in this effort to assert the supremacy of the law and the rights of the citizen."

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. The court does not perceive that anything more can now be done to effect service of this writ. The service appears to have been prevented by force. The court deeply regrets that officers of the United States should obstruct process out of a court of the United States, especially this process. But those officers are at present beyond the control of the law, and the court has not the command of the physical force needful to effect a service of this writ at the present time. Let the writ be placed on file, to be served when and where service may become practicable.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—VALIDITY—SUBSEQUENT BANKRUPTCY OF ASSIGNOR.

[A debtor made, in 1838, an assignment for the equal benefit of all his creditors, to which assignment five creditors became parties before the debtor was decreed a bankrupt under the law of 1841, which prohibited preferences. Held, that the assignment could not be sustained in favor of the creditors generally, or in favor of those who became parties before the bankruptcy decree.]

This was a summary proceeding in equity, instituted by [Henry Winder] the assignee of Nathaniel Blake, a bankrupt, to recover of the respondent [William Whiting] a fund amounting to about $3,000, which had been collected by him under an assignment made to him by Blake, for the benefit of his creditors, December 10, 1838, according to the provisions of the statute of April 15, 1836. Only five creditors had become parties to this assignment, and no dividend had been paid, when, on the 20th of January, 1843, Blake filed his petitions in bankruptcy, but afterwards a number of other creditors signed the instrument.

Upon these facts, it was contended, for the respondent, (1) that the assignment was good at common law; (2) that, if Whiting, as assignee, held anything, he held for the trusts declared in the assignment; (3) that all creditors had a right to become parties to the assignment at any time before the final dividend; (4) that the assignee in bankruptcy had no rights beyond those of the bankrupt to defeat the assignment.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, held it clear that the assignment was not valid under the statute of 1836, which had been repealed before the instrument was made. The question, then, was, was it good at common law? Now, it was clearly settled in this state that, in case of an assignment to trustees for creditors, any creditor not a party thereto might attach the surplus, and so defeat the distribution according to the trusts. Therefore, the second and third propositions of the respondent fell to the ground. Then, as to the fourth proposition, the assignee in bankruptcy acted for the creditors, and for their benefit he had a right to follow property conveyed away by the bankrupt contrary to their legal rights. And, further, he took all their rights in that regard by operation of law, and therefore those creditors who executed the assignment after the bankruptcy could not take any part of the fund thereby. But how were those who executed the instrument before the decree of bankruptcy to be dealt with? It was contended that they should be paid in full, to the exclusion of all who subsequently became parties. This assignment, intended to derive all its efficacy from the statute of 1836, it was attempted to sustain by the common law, in order to carry into effect the intention of the parties. Now, the statute of 1836 prohibited preferences. It was the intention of the parties that there should be no preferences, and that all creditors should have a right to come in at any time before the final dividend. To cut off the subsequent signers, and give the whole fund to the five who had previously signed, would be to defeat the intention of the parties, by the means which were to be invoked for the purpose of effectuating that intention. Again, the bankrupt law prohibits preferences. Yet it was contended that it was to have such a construction and operation given to it as to create a preference for these five creditors, and exclude all others, as well those who signed subsequently as others. By this means the intention of the parties and of the bankrupt law were both to be defeated. An assignee, under the insolvent law of 1838, if it had continued in operation, would have defeated this conveyance; and the assignee, under the bankrupt law, had as extensive rights as an assignee under that statute would have had.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1865.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS—TIME OF INVENTION—PLATE HOLDER FOR CAMERAS.

1. The presumption, arising from the letters patent, that the patentee was the original and first inventor, in the absence of the application for the patent, extends back only to the date of the letters patent, and in no case does it extend further back than to the time of the filing of the original application.

2. Whenever a party desires to show that his invention was made prior to the date of his application for the patent, he must prove the fact by other sufficient evidence, because no such presumption arises from the letters patent, or the application, or both combined.

3. Letters patent to Albert S. Southworth, dated April 10, 1855, and reissued September 25, 1860, for a plate holder for cameras, examined and sustained.

[Cited in Ormsbee v. Wood, Case No. 10,579.]

4. The reissued patent is for the same invention as that described in the original patent.

5. The date of the patentee's invention was the latter part of 1847 or the spring of 1848, when the improvement was reduced to practice as an operative machine.

6. The patent is not for a principle or a result, but for the means described for accomplishing the result.

This was a bill in equity, filed to restrain the defendant [Charles F. Richardson] from infringing letters patent for a "plate holder for cameras," granted to Albert S. Southworth, April 10, 1855, reissued September 25, 1860, and assigned to plaintiff [Simon Wing].

The plate holder, as described in substance by the patentee, consists of a stationary casing, containing a zinc plate in front of the daguerreotype plate, provided with a square opening C equal to one-fourth of the latter plate. The hollow square space within the casing is of proper dimensions, so that when the frame holding the daguerreotype plate is successively slid into the four corners of said hollow space, the parts 1, 2, 3, 4 of the plate will be successively exhibited opposite the opening, ready to receive the picture. The plate holder is brought into said four positions by moving a square knob into the four corners of an opening in the rear part of the casing. This motion can be made so quickly that the four pictures can be taken without covering the aperture of the camera from first to last. The object of this arrangement is to obtain rapidly a succession of pictures, timing them differently in order to select the best, and also to take stereoscopic pictures with one camera.

The claim was as follows: "The within-described plate holder, in combination with the frame in which it moves, constructed and operating in the manner and for the purpose substantially as herein set forth."

The claim of the reissue was as follows: "I claim bringing the different portions of a single plate, or several smaller plates, successively into the field of the lens of the camera, substantially in the manner and for the purpose specified."

Chauncey Smith and B. R. Curtis, for complainant.

W. A. Herrick and J. F. Redfield, for defendant.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. This is a bill in equity for the alleged infringement of certain letters patent. Complainant is the assignee of the letters patent. Invention in question was made by Albert S. Southworth, and letters patent were duly granted to him for the same April 10, 1855. Description of the invention as therein set forth was, that it was a new and useful plate holder for cameras; but it is alleged that the description was defective, and on that account the patentee was allowed to surrender the original letters patent, and new letters patent were issued to him September 25, 1860, on an amended specification for the same invention. Present suit is founded upon the reissued letters patent, and the complainant, as the assignee of the same under certain mesne conveyances, alleges that the respondent, at North Bridgewater, in this district, on December 18, 1863, infringed the same. Wherefore he prays for an account and for an injunction.

Several defenses are set up in the answer, but the one principally relied on at the argument consists in a denial that the patentee is the original and first inventor of the improvement described in the letters patent. Letters patent are granted by the government under authority of law; and when regularly issued, and in the usual form, they are, if introduced in the case, prima facie evidence that the person named as such was the original and first inventor of what he has described therein as his improvement. Such presumption, however, in the absence of the application for the patent, extends back only to the date of the letters patent, and in no case does it extend further back than to the time of the filing of the original application. Whenever a party desires to show that his invention was made prior to the date of his application for the patent, he must prove the fact by other sufficient evidence, because no such presumption arises from the letters patent, or the application, or both combined. Specification of the reissued letters patent describes the invention as certain improvements in taking photographic impressions as therein described. Separate plates, as the inventor represents, had previously been used for each impression, and, consequently, where several impressions were to be taken, as in multiplying copies, it became necessary that the plate should, at each impression, be removed and replaced by another. Effect of those changes was to cause delay and inconvenience. Object of this invention is to remedy that difficulty, and it consists, as the patentee states, in bringing successively different portions of the same plate, or several small plates in one plate holder into the field of the lens of the camera. Practical operation of the machine is that it brings different portions of the same plate or several smaller plates secured in one plate holder into the axis of the focus of the lens, so that several impressions may be made on the same plate with equal correctness. Claim of the reissued patent is the "bringing the different portions of a single plate, or several smaller plates, successively into the field of the lens of the camera," substantially in the manner and for the purpose set forth in the specification. Patentee states that in carrying out his invention he makes use, as the preferred method, of a peculiarly-arranged frame, in which the plate holder is permitted to slide, but in which its position is so definitely indicated that the operator can quickly and accurately adjust the plate or plates to effect the described result. Decided preference is given to that arrangement, but the patentee states that his improvement may be embodied by causing the lens of the camera to be made adjustable in different positions with respect to the plate, so that different portions of the plate, although it remains stationary, may be successively brought into the field of the lens. One of the experts describes the invention embodied in the patent as a mechanism so organized that a lens may be properly focused with regard to different plates, or different parts of the same plate, without removing the plate from the mechanism until as many impressions are made as may be desired, and it is not perceived that the description is too broad if the definition be limited to the particular means set forth in the specification. Doubt can not be entertained that the invention is one of merit, and it is equally clear that the patentee, whether the first inventor or not, was the actual inventor of his improvement, and that, in making it, he borrowed nothing from any of the devices set up in the defense. Nothing of that kind is pretended; but it is insisted that the evidence shows as matter of fact that an apparatus substantially the same had been constructed and reduced to practice by one or more persons at a prior date, so that the patentee is not the original and first inventor of his alleged improvement. Patentee gave the directions for making his first model, or machine, in August, 1846, and it was made and sent to him at Boston in November following. Design of the camera then constructed was that it should slide in the frame so as to make successive pictures in the axis of the focus of the lens, but a frame was never actually adapted to that machine. Statement of the patentee is explicit that it was designed to operate in either of the modes pointed out in the specification of the reissued patent, but the frame was never made, and, consequently, was never so used. He also states that he constructed another machine for the same purpose, in the year following, which was used in taking pictures for seven or eight years. Principle was the same, but instead of moving the frame, the apparatus was so constructed that it moved the lens over the plate, being, in fact, the same arrangement suggested in the patent on which the suit was founded. The reasons given by the patentee, why he reduced the second form of his invention to practice, before he adapted a frame to the first machine, was that the first would be expensive, and that the second required fewer changes in the old apparatus, and could be perfected and put in operation at much less expense, as he could use his old camera and old frame. Belief of the witness is that he completed that machine in 1847, but he states positively that he used it early in the spring of 1848, and that it was a completed machine. His recollection is distinct that he completed it here, in this city, before he went to California, and that he commenced preparations to go there in the winter of that year.

Suffice it to say, without reproducing more of the testimony, that the invention held by the complainant is shown not only to have been made as early as the latter part of 1848, or the first part of the year 1849, but that the same was reduced to practice, as an operative machine. Respondent does not controvert the position that the patent, if it be valid, covers the two methods described in the specification. Both undoubtedly were invented by the patentee, and they are clearly embraced in his claim. Such are the views of the experts, and such is the legal construction of the patent.

2. Infringement is clearly proved, and the allegation in that behalf is scarcely denied. Regarding the evidence as plenary upon that point, it does not seem to be necessary to say more upon the subject.

3. Reissued patent in this case is for the same invention as that described in the original patent, and therefore is not affected by the cases cited in that behalf by the respondent.

4. Abandonment is not proved. On the contrary, the reasons assigned for the delay which ensued before the application for the patent was presented are satisfactory, and they show that there is no unexplained want of diligence in perfecting the invention.

5. Patent of the complainant is not for a principle or result but for the means described for accomplishing the result, and, consequently, is valid notwithstanding that objection.

6. Evidence offered by respondent to show that others had made similar machines prior to the date of the invention in question is not satisfactory. Recollections of Marcus A. Root, after the lapse of sixteen years, are quite too indistinct and uncertain to set up a lost machine to defeat a valuable improvement and deprive a meritorious inventor of the fruits of his toil and labor. Care should be observed in investigations of this nature to guard the public against a growing propensity on the part of patentees to expand their patents beyond what they ever invented, and at the same time to protect them against the equally unjust claims of pretentious persons who always stand ready to prove that they are the real inventors of what has been patented to another. Neither have any merit, and both should be discouraged. Dates stagger a good memory, even when the inquiry has respect to recent events; but, after the lapse of sixteen years, under the circumstances of this case, I do not think it safe to rely upon the unsupported statements of this witness. They are too uncertain, inconsistent, and contradictory. Statements of Philip Haas are no better, but in fact are less reliable. He contradicts himself, is contradicted by the circumstances, and by the testimony of the other witnesses in the case. Attempt is made to support his statements by the testimony of Enos B. Foster, but it can hardly be said to have that effect. When he went into the employment of the other witness he was but fifteen years of age, and they both admit that the alleged machine is lost. They do not attempt to testify to but one picture now in existence taken with that machine. Their statement is that it was lost in 1850, and they afford no reason to infer that any of its parts are in existence. Theory is that it was made by one Saxton, in 1840, under the directions of Philip Haas, and that it was stolen from the owner's place of business. But the proofs show that he never made another, and ever after used a machine constructed according to the old method. He gave a second deposition, and in that he states that he was mistaken; that it could not have been made as early as 1840, but thinks it was four years later. Complainant called a witness who worked for Philip Haas the latter part of 1846 and for the most part of 1847, and he states that he never saw any such machine in his shop, although he was an assistant operator, and had the fullest opportunity to see all the models or machines in the apartments. He had for eleven months, as he states, the general charge of all apparatus and material, and everything that pertained to the business of his employer, and it is sufficient to state that his statements are utterly inconsistent with the testimony of the principal witnesses for the respondent. In view of the whole evidence, I am of opinion that the respondent has not proved that the patentee in this case was not the original and first inventor of the improvement described in his reissued letters patent. Having come to this conclusion upon the evidence, I do not find it necessary to determine the other questions of law discussed at the bar.

WING v. SCHOONMAKER.

[3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 607.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. July, 1869.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PLATEHOLDER FOR CAMERAS—INVENTION.

The plate holder for cameras patented by Albert L. Southworth, April 10, 1855, existed, and was carried into practical operation by working machines, and was in use by practical photographers seven or eight years before the date of his patent, and before he had perfected his machine. The patent is therefore void.

This was a bill in equity filed to restrain the defendant [Christopher C. Schoonmaker] from infringing letters patent for a "plate holder for cameras," granted to Albert S. Southworth, April 10, 1855, reissued September 25, 1860, and assigned to complainant [Simon Wing]. The nature of the invention and the claims are stated in the report of the case of Wing v. Richardson [Case No. 17,869].

E. Cowen, for complainant.

Townsend & Browne and Henry Baldwin, Jr., for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The bill is filed in this case, founded on a patent to A. S. Southworth, April 10, 1855, for a new and useful plate holder for cameras, and reissued September 25, 1860. The claim in the reissued patent is, "bringing the different portions of a single plate, or several plates, successively into the field of the lens of the camera, substantially in the manner and for the purpose specified."

The patentee states in his specification that it had been customary to use a separate plate for each impression, the plate being removed from the camera and replaced by another, when several impressions of the same object were to be taken, as in multiplying copies. This caused delay and trouble, to obviate which was the object of this invention, and which consisted in bringing successively different portions of the same plate or several smaller plates, secured by one plate holder, into the field of the lens of the camera; and in carrying out the invention, the patentee has made use of a peculiarly arranged frame, in which the plate holder is permitted to slide, and in which the position of the plate holder is definitely indicated to the operator, etc.

The only real question in the case is, whether or not the patentee was the first and original inventor of the above improvement. The burden of the proofs, both on the part of the complainant and defendant, bears upon this point. It is insisted on the part of the complainant, that the improvement was conceived and put into practical use as early as 1846, and, if not, as early as the winter of 1847-8. The patent was not issued till 1855. I have looked, with some care, into the proofs, which are quite voluminous, and am satisfied this position is not sustained.

On the contrary, the better opinion is, the improvement was not perfected by the patentee till the year 1854. He went, according to his own account, to California, in the winter of 1848-9, and remained there two years; and on his return, he took up the subject of the stereoscope, and was engaged in considering new plans and new ideas on this subject, and taking out patents thereon, until he was taken sick and shut up in his room, when he applied himself to finish the idea of taking pictures rapidly in the center of the lens, by adapting the movement in a frame which would fit any ordinary camera. Again, he says on his cross-examination, that it was three years after his return from California that he was sick, and which was in November, in the fall of 1854. He says, also, on his examination-in-chief, that he had not perfected the mechanical parts of his machine, so as to carry out his idea readily, when the California excitement led him to go there.

He further says, that the instrument made by Coburn in the fall of 1846 was abandoned, and that he then contemplated a different improvement. This was by moving the lens over the plate. This idea was not in the first patent at all, and is only alluded to in the reissue. Now the proofs are full that this idea of making the same impression on different parts of the same plate, by the use of a sliding plate holder, existed and was carried into practical operation by working machines as early as 1847-48, and was in use by several practical photographers some seven or eight years before the date of the patent of Southworth, and before he had perfected his machine.

Entertaining these views, it follows that a decree must be entered for the defendant.

town, and subsequently, at the request of the assignees, had applied for and obtained a re-issue of the patent in his own name, which re-issued patent he had assigned as before, held, that the surrender of the original patent at the request of the true owners was valid; and that, if the reissue to the patentee was a clerical error, he had corrected it by the subsequent assignment.

Demurrer to bill in equity [brought by Simon Wing, Marcus Ormsbee, and A. S. Southworth, against W. S. Warren]. Suit brought upon letters patent for an "improvement in plate-holders for cameras," granted A. S. Southworth in 1855.

The bill alleged the issue of the patent to Southworth, and his subsequent assignment of all his right, title, and interest in it, except the right to make, use, and sell the thing patented in Salem, Massachusetts; that Southworth afterward, at the request of the assignees, surrendered the patent, and the commissioner of patents, at the request of all the parties, reissued it to Southworth, who assigned the reissued patent as before; that, on its expiration, in 1869, it was renewed for seven years to Southworth, and that it was then vested in the complainants.

The defendant demurred to the bill on the following grounds: (1) By the assignment of the original patent, Southworth's whole interest passed, and all that was left him was a license for Salem. Potter v. Holland [Case No. 11,329]; Smith v. Mercer [Id. 13,078]. (2) Therefore, Southworth could not surrender the patent, and his act assuming to do this was void. The bill says that this was done by request of the assignees, but there is no pretense that this was in writing, as in Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Wetherbee [Id. 3,810]. (3) Even if the surrender was good, the reissue was void, because not made to the true owners. In the case of the Cummings patent, involved in the above-named suit, a similar mistake was made, but it was immediately corrected in the office as a clerical error, and this was held to cure the difficulty.

W. W. Swan, for complainants.
J. E. Maynadier, for defendant.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. If we grant (which we are not at present prepared to do) that all title had gone out of the patentee by his assignment to Wing and Ormsbee, yet his surrender at the request of the true owners would be valid; and, if the reissue to him was a clerical error, he corrected it at once by an assignment. We are both of opinion that an infringer can not take advantage of such a mistake, if there was one, after it had been corrected either by the office or the parties. Demurrer overruled.

COLLISION—MUTUAL FAULT—ABSENCE OF LOOKOUT—EXCESSIVE SPEED—COSTS ON APPEAL.

1. Where a sailing vessel, coming into the Hudson river, at New York, off the Battery, in the night time, put her head to the wind and her sails aback, with a view to anchoring, before the hands on board of her discovered a steam vessel in motion coming towards her, but it appeared that she had no competent lookout, and that, if she had had one, the steam vessel might have been seen in time to prevent the plating of the sailing vessel on her track: Held, a collision having taken place between the two vessels, that the sailing vessel was in fault: Held, also, that the steam vessel was in fault for descending the river in the night too near to the shore, and at too great a rate of speed, at a locality where her lights were mistaken for the lights of vessels at anchor, and where she was liable to meet vessels coming in to anchor.

2. As both vessels were in fault, the damages were divided; and, as both parties had appealed, and the decree below was affirmed, no costs were given to either party, on appeal.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, against the ship Wings of the Morning, to recover for damage caused to the barge Stephen Warren, by a collision which occurred between the two vessels, in the Hudson river, at New York, off pier number 4, on the night of November 22, 1852. The barge was lashed to the steam tug General Wool, on her starboard side. The tug was descending the river with her tow, a quarter or a third of the way from the New York side, intending to pass around the Battery into the East river, for the purpose of discharging her cargo. The Wings of the Morning was coming up the river, having taken in all her sails except the spanker, preparatory to dropping anchor in the stream. The wind was southeast or south-southeast, and the tide was ebb. The Wings of the Morning had come up the river near the middle of it, and had ported her helm to luff into the wind and check her headway, to enable her to drop anchor, and was in the act of dropping it, or about to drop it, as the mate discovered the tug and tow coming down upon him. The district court held, that both vessels were in fault, and divided the damages. [Case unreported.] Both parties appealed to this court.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The main point of dispute is, whether or not the order to port was given, and the change of the direction of the ship had taken place in pursuance thereof, after the tug and tow were seen by the hands on board of the ship. If the order was given afterwards, or even after the tug and tow might have been seen with a proper lookout, then the ship was in fault in giving the order. On this point there is much conflict in the proofs. The result of my examination is, that the order to port was given, and the change of the direction of the ship, which placed her on the track of the tug and tow, took place, before her hands had discovered them in motion; and that, with her sails aback and her head to the wind, she was disabled from avoiding the collision. But, at the same time, I agree with the court below, that, with a competent lookout properly attending to his duty, the descending vessels might have been seen in time to prevent the manœuvre and the heading of the vessel in shore across their track. The night was not very dark, and the chief difficulty in discovering the tug and tow arose from the great number of vessels at anchor, with lights, in that locality. The hands on the ship saw the lights of the descending vessels in time to have avoided them, but mistook them for the lights of vessels at anchor.

I also agree with the court below, that the tug was in fault for descending the river in the night so near the shore in that locality, and at a rate of speed of five miles an hour, with the tide; and, according to the testimony of the captain of the barge, probably at a greater rate of speed. These vessels were on their way around the Battery to the East river, and should have kept further out into the river, outside of vessels at anchor with lights, and clear of vessels coming in to anchor in the night on the New York side.

The decree must be affirmed, but without costs to either party, as both parties have appealed.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The bark Winifred was seized on the 25th of May, 1861, by the United States steamship Quaker City, under command of Acting Master F. W. Mathews, on the high seas, off Cape Henry, and libelled for attempting to violate the blockade of Hampton Roads, in Virginia, and enter that place, it being then blockaded; also, because the vessel and cargo were at the time owned by enemies of the United States. The charge of violating the blockade was abandoned by the district attorney on the trial, and the confiscation of the vessel and cargo was demanded as being enemy's property. The firm of Crenshaw & Co. intervene for the vessel and five-eighths of her cargo, "as sole owners thereof," and claim that they are all citizens of the United States of America, trading in Richmond, Virginia, under the style of Crenshaw & Co., and that the bark "belongs to Richmond, aforesaid." The exemption of the vessel from liability to capture as enemy's property is put upon the denial in the claim that the claimants were insurgents, traitors, &c., or enemies of the United States. John Lewis and Charles Paul Phipps, having their principal house at Liverpool, England, under the style of Phipps & Company, and John Lewis, Phipps, and others, trading in the city of New York, through their branch house here, under the style of J. L. Phipps & Co., and in Rio, Brazil, under the style of Phipps Brothers & Company, intervened, and claimed to be owners of three-eighths of the cargo of the bark, and to have a lien on, and claim to, and right to the possession of the balance of the cargo, under large advances by them to the other claimants, Crenshaw & Co., and that the claimants are all British subjects; that on the 26th of April, 1861, before any seizure of the vessel and cargo, the claimants bona fide, in the usual course of business, and having no other security, made a special advance to Crenshaw & Co., owners of the residue (five-eighths) of the cargo, of the sum of $20,622.26, on possession of the original invoice and bill of lading thereof, and that such assignment of five-eighths of the cargo to these claimants by Crenshaw & Co. was without any fraudulent purpose or understanding to secure it from confiscation as the property of Crenshaw & Co. The test oath of part of the claimants verifies the bona fides and just consideration of such assignment to them.

The general positions of law and fact adopted by the court in regard to the preceding suits apply to the corresponding points raised in this one: (1) There was, at the time of the capture of the vessel and cargo a state of civil war subsisting between the citizens of that portion of the state of Virginia in which Richmond is situated and the United States. (2) The owners and claimants of the vessel were public enemies of the United States and its government at the time of her being taken and seized, and she thereby became subject to condemnation. (3) The owners of the vessel in their claim and answer assert they were sole owners of five-eighths of the cargo of coffee shipped on her at Rio Janeiro and bound to Hampton Roads, and it was consigned to them in the bill of lading found on board the ship. But a title to that portion upon bona fide hypothecation or lien is set up in the claim of Phipps & Co., to the amount of $20,622.26. No evidence is produced verifying the justness and validity of such lien.

The case, as it stands on the allegations and proofs, fixes the right of property in the five-eighths portion of the cargo to be in the owners of the vessel at the time it was shipped. That title must prevail in a prize court, in priority to the subsidiary interest of the lien holders (The Marianna, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 24), whatever the equities between the particular parties may be (The Frances, 8 Crauch [12 U. S.] 418), unless it be proved aliunde by the claimants, and that their title to this part of the cargo was absolute in them previous to its exportation.

The judgment of the court upon the whole case, therefore, is that three-eighths parts of the coffee be restored to the claimants, Phipps & Co., as neutral owners, without costs, and that the remaining five-eighths thereof be condemned as forfeited, being the property of Crenshaw & Co., enemy owners, and also that the vessel be condemned as enemy's property, with full costs. Further proofs will, however, if prayed for, be granted the claimants, on the claim of Phipps & Co. to the possession and right of property in themselves, as against the libellants, in that portion of coffee alleged by those claimants to be vested in them, by way of transfer or lien from Crenshaw & Co. The question of costs on such further proofs is to be reserved until a final hearing on that point.

The judgment now rendered is to be final, unless application to give further proofs is made by the claimants on notice to the libellants, and allowed by the court, within ten days after the entry of this decree.

The decree in this case was affirmed by the circuit court on appeal July 17, 1863, except as to five-eighths of the cargo condemned below. As to that the circuit court allowed further proofs. On those that court, December 3, 1863, allowed Phipps & Co. the amount of their advance on the five-eighths, with interest, to be paid out of its proceeds. [Case unreported.]

WININDGER et al. v. GLOBE MUT. LIFE
INS. CO.

[3 Hughes, 257.]¹

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. Nov. 14, 1878.
INSURANCE—NONPAYMENT OF PREMIUM—LAPSE OF POLICY.

The failure to pay an installment of premium of insurance in advance when due, causes a lapse of the policy, unless the agent of the company by indulgence creates the belief in the insurer that he is treating the installment as if it had been actually paid.

The case was brought first in the corporation court of Norfolk, and was removed thence into the United States circuit court.

The facts as given in evidence were, substantially, that although the policy called for the prepayment each year of annual premiums, yet that these were changed subsequently into quarterly instalments, payable at the beginning of each quarter-year, on what are called renewal receipts, the effect of which was to extend the policy for each three months on payment of the quarterly payment in advance. The payment by Winindger of these quarterly instalments of the premiums had been very irregularly made, rarely before near the end of each quarter instead of the beginning. These payments had been made partly in butcher's meat and partly in small amounts of cash to Mr. E. J. Griffith, the insurance agent of the defendant in this city. Mr. Griffith had been exceedingly indulgent to Winindger in respect to the forfeiture of the policy, keeping it alive by dealings, by accepting small sums at a time, and by taking due-bills for balances. The instalment due the 10th October was probably never paid, but Winindger relied upon Mr. Griffith's keeping his policy alive as usual, probably thinking his butcher's account had partly paid the quarter's premium, and that a sum of eight dollars in money sent by his clerk would be credited to the premium. At all events, Winindger was confident throughout his last illness that his policy was alive, and this as late as the first day of January, which was two or three days before his death. Nevertheless, on or about that day he sent out his brother with the money to pay the October instalment. His brother called on Mr. Griffith at once and offered to pay the instalment, but Mr. Griffith stated that he had returned to the insurance company in New York the renewal receipts for the October instalment, and could not now receive the money, especially inasmuch as Winindger was now seriously ill, and that the policy was forfeited. On this state of facts, given in evidence to the jury, counsel on each side asked the court for instructions to the jury covering their respective views of the law, and submitted learned arguments in support of them.

White & Garnett, for plaintiff.
Baker & Walke, for defendant.

HUGHES, District Judge, declined to give any of these instructions in the form in which they were asked for. He said:

A policy of insurance could only be kept alive in general by the payment in advance, at the beginning of each year insured for, of the annual premium. That the payment in advance of the premium was an essential element of an insurance contract. That on a failure to make this payment at the beginning of any year, the policy lapsed by its very terms. That the policy now sued upon provided that it might be renewed after default, if the premium should be paid within thirty days after the beginning of each year. But it must be borne in mind that the policy lapsed at the beginning of the new year, after default, and that payment within thirty days but renewed what had expired. The agreement in this case to accept quarterly instalments only changed the times and amounts of the payments, not the nature of the transaction. If the annual payment was not made by the beginning of each new year the policy lapsed. The payment in advance of a quarterly instalment of this premium only operated to revive and renew for the ensuing three months what had lapsed and expired. If, therefore, any quarterly payment was shown not to have been made, then the policy had not been revived, had not been renewed, and there could be no recovery.

The judge then instructed the jury as follows: "There are two questions upon which the jury are to pass in this trial, namely: First, whether the premium due the 10th October, 1877, was paid; and, if it was not paid, second, whether Winindger's neglect and failure to pay it before his mortal illness was caused by the defendant, or its agent, Mr. Griffith, inducing him to believe that he might neglect to do so to the extent that he actually did neglect it, without losing the benefit of his policy. The court accordingly gives the following instructions: 1st. If the jury believe, from the evidence, that Winindger did not pay the October quarterly instalment of the premium, then they must find for the defendant; unless, 2nd. They believe, from the evidence, that Winindger's neglect to pay it was induced by the conduct of the defendant or Mr. Griffith; and if they believe that his failure to pay was so induced, they must find for the plaintiff. 3rd. The court also instructs the jury that a tender of a past-due premium for or by the insured during his mortal illness, does not of itself save a policy otherwise forfeited."

The jury then retired to their room, and after a deliberation of about twenty minutes brought in the following verdict: "We the jury find for the plaintiffs, and assess their damages at $2,000, with interest thereupon at six per cent. from April 13th, 1878."

Mr. Walke entered a motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence, and both counsel agreed to submit the motion to the court without argument. The court accordingly took the motion under advisement.

On a later day in the term the verdict was set aside, and a new trial ordered. The case was afterwards compromised.

BANKRUPTCY OF PARTNER—DISCHARGE FROM FIRM LIABILITIES.

Where a member of an existing firm has filed an individual petition in bankruptcy where there are firm debts and firm assets, the firm must be declared bankrupt before a member thereof can be discharged from its liabilities. This applies only to copartnerships actually existing, or where there are assets belonging to the firm.

I, James F. Dwight, register of said court in bankruptcy, do hereby certify that in the course of the proceedings in this cause, the following question arose pertinent to said proceedings, and is submitted to the district judge for his decision under provisions of the act [of 1867; 14 Stat. 517]:

On the 31st day of December, 1868, Daniel Winkens, of New York City, filed in the court his petition to be adjudicated a bankrupt and discharged from his debts. Attached to the petition were Schedules A and B, as provided for by the bankrupt act. The petition was in form No. 1, established by the supreme court; and petition and schedule were correct in form. The matter was duly referred to me, as register, to make adjudication in bankruptcy, and to take such other proceedings as are required by the act. On the return day of the order of reference, January 6th, 1869, the bankrupt appeared by his attorney, and filed a certified copy of his petition and schedules, as directed in said order. On an examination of said Schedule A, it appears that the petitioner owes debts, both individually and as a member of the firm of Thomas & Co., and as a member of the firm of Daniel Winkens' Nephew. And that it appeared by an examination of said Schedule B, that among the assets set forth, is the individual property of the petitioner, certain claims and debts due the firm of Thomas & Co., and certain property of the firm of Daniel Winkens' Nephew; which firm of Thomas & Co. was composed of John J. Thomas and this petitioner, and became insolvent in March, 1868, and his property has been put in the hands of a receiver. And the firm of Daniel Winkens' Nephew was composed of the petitioner and Charles Marquandt, and was engaged in business at the time of filing the petition. (Charles Marquandt is also petitioner for adjudication in a separate proceeding pending before me.) Upon which facts the register declines to make adjudication in bankruptcy of the petitioner, until his co-partners in the firms referred to are brought into the proceedings, under the provisions of the thirty-sixth section of the act, and rule 18 of the supreme court. To this decision the bankrupt excepts, and prays that the question may be certified to the district judge, that his opinion may be had on the question, as to whether the register erred in declining to make adjudication against the petitioner, as prayed for; which prayer is granted, and this certificate made in accordance thereto.

I do not think that the petitioner is entitled to be adjudged a bankrupt or discharged in these proceedings, unless his co-partners are joined with him. He shows debts jointly with co-partners in two firms, and assets, the property of the same firms, but the co-partners in neither of these firms are parties to these proceedings, or sought to be brought in under the provisions of section 36 of the law, or rule 18, which provides for the bankruptcy of co-partnerships. He seeks a discharge from his debts due as a member of firms, that he does not ask to be adjudged bankrupt, and offers to pay his individual as well as co-partnership debts, with firm property, the members of which firms are not joined. I understand the law to be that, when there are firm debts and firm assets, the firm must be declared bankrupt (by either voluntary or involuntary proceedings) before any member of the firm can be discharged from its liabilities; and that this applies only to co-partnerships actually existing, or where there are assets belonging to the firm, and not to co-partnerships terminated heretofore by bankruptcy, insolvency, assignment, or otherwise. In the case of In re Little [Case No. 8,390], where I certified a question to the court, February 29, 1868, a decision is given on this point; and as I am aware that some misapprehension and uncertainty exists in the profession as to the effect of the decision in Little's Case, I would respectfully suggest to the court that this occasion be taken advantage of to definitely settle the law and practice in cases of petitions where firms are concerned.

Which facts and opinion are respectfully submitted this 15th day of January, 1869.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The register has stated, in his opinion, with accuracy and conciseness, the law on the subject referred to, as held by this court, and applied by it in repeated cases. His decision in the present case is correct.

BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDING — CLAIM OF LIEN CREDITOR.

1. A prior lien gives a prior claim, and the district court may ascertain and liquidate such a lien.

[Cited in Re Erwin, Case No. 4,524.]

2. The creditor who has a lien on property for the payment of his debt is admitted as a creditor only for the balance of the debt after deducting the value of such property.

[Cited in Re Hambright, Case No. 5,973; Re Bloss, Id. 1,562; Re Stansell, Id. 13,293.]

[In the matter of Elijah E. Winn, a bankrupt.]

In this case the following questions arose in the proceedings of the same, and upon request of James R. Hanks, a judgment creditor, were certified by the register, Lawson Black, for the opinion of the district judge. First. Does a debt secured by lien lose its lien by proof of the debtor? Second. Does a judgment in this state retain its lien in bankruptcy? Third. If a judgment is older than a mortgage, out of what fund shall it be satisfied?

My opinion is that the district court in bankruptcy is a court of equity, and that it is a court of original jurisdiction in matters of bankruptcy. The bankrupt is the complainant in equity, and each one of his creditors are defendants in the bill, and the court having original equity jurisdiction over all the parties and the subject matter of the suit, may pass any order, or decree in the case, it thinks proper for the purpose of doing equity between all the parties to the suit, either on the parties to the suit, or in relation to the subject matter of the suit, and that said orders and decrees so passed cannot be set aside nor inquired into in any other court, and that they are final and conclusive upon the parties and the subject matter of the suit, unless they are carried up in the manner prescribed in the bankrupt act. And any person disobeying the order or decree of the court, is liable to be punished for a contempt of the court. When a debtor is adjudged a bankrupt, all proceedings in a state court against him must stop, if the subject matter of the suit can be proven against his estate in bankruptcy, and no creditor, who holds a claim against the estate of the bankrupt, which might be proven in bankruptcy, whether the debt is secured by lien or not, can enforce such debt in a state court, except by the permission of the district court. The district court has no jurisdiction over a state court, but it has full and complete original jurisdiction of the bankrupt; and all the assets of the bankrupt; and over all the creditors of the bankrupt; and may fine and imprison any of the creditors of the bankrupt for interfering with the assets of the bankrupt, in a state court, without the permission of the district court, on any debt which might be proven against the estate of the bankrupt. And when the bankrupt obtains his certificate of discharge, it releases him from all debts, demands, and liabilities which might have been proven against his estate in bankruptcy. The court appoints a day and gives all the creditors of the bankrupt notice of the time and place to prove their debts against the bankrupt, and under this notice the creditor who holds no security for his debt, proves his debt as unsecured and entitled to share pro rata out of the general fund. The creditor whose debt is secured by lien, proves his debt as secured by lien on a certain piece of property of such a value, is not entitled to vote for assignee nor participate in the general fund, with the unsecured creditors, until the property on which his lien is secured, is applied towards the satisfaction of his debt. See twenty-second section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 527)], as to proof of debts with security. It is necessary for the creditor, whose debt is secured by lien, to prove or liquidate his debt as secured by lien, that the court may be fully informed how and in what manner to dispose of the assets of the bankrupt, so as to do equity between all the creditors of the bankrupt.

The only way a secured creditor can lose his lien on the property, is by a release of the lien on the property and proving the debt as an unsecured claim. When the secured debts are proven or liquidated, the court has power, by order, to authorize the assignee to redeem or remove the lien by paying the creditor the money due, if the assignee is in a condition to do so, and, if not, the court may permit the creditor to take the property, on which he holds a lien, at its value, towards the satisfaction of his debt; or the court may order the property sold, subject to the incumbrances as ascertained by the court; or the court may order the property to be sold free from all incumbrances, and that the said liens be secured and protected on the money arising from the sale of the said property, in the same manner as if the said property had been sold to satisfy the said lien in a court of law.

Second. My opinion is that a judgment in this state retains its lien in a court of bankruptcy in the same manner and to the same extent as it does in a court of law. The bankrupt act (section 20) mentions mortgages, pledges, and liens on the property of the bankrupt to secure the payment of a debt due the creditor. Here the question arises; what did congress mean by the word "lien"? They certainly did not intend that each district judge should determine for himself what is, and what is not, a lien on the property of the bankrupt, without some rule or law to guide him, by which he may determine by law what is a lien. My opinion is that congress meant by the word "lien" all the liens protected by the laws of each state, and that all the liens protected by the state law should be protected in bankruptcy. In section 21 of the act, no judgment can be taken against the bankrupt pending his adjudication, except by permission of this court, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the debt, upon which no execution can issue. If the judgment has no lien, and does not infringe or interfere with the rights of the unsecured creditors, why prevent the creditor from taking the judgment? By section 14 of the act, the assignee takes the property of the bankrupt with the like right, title, power, and authority to sell said property as the bankrupt could have done. He acquires no other or better title to the property than the bankrupt had, and if there was a lien on the property in the hands of the bankrupt, the same lien follows the property into the hands of the assignee.

Third. The judgment of Hanks is older than the Gate City mortgage, and has a general lien on all the property of the bankrupt. The mortgage has a special lien on a certain piece of the bankrupt's property, and if the mortgage creditor cannot get his money out of this piece of property he may lose his lien and his debt also. Therefore the lien of the judgment on the mortgage property is held in abeyance until all the other property or general fund of the bankrupt is exhausted by the judgment. It is therefore the judgment of the register that a debt secured by lien does not lose its lien by proof of the debt as secured by lien. And that a judgment in this state retains its lien in a court of bankruptcy in the same manner and to the same extent it does in the state court. And that an older judgment cannot take mortgaged property until all other property of the general fund of the bankrupt is exhausted by the judgment.

[All of which is respectfully submitted to the honorable district judge, at the request of James R. Hanks, Fears & Arnold and Luther J. Glenn, attorneys in said case.]²

ERSKINE, District Judge. A prior lien gives a prior claim, and the district court may ascertain and liquidate a lien. Bankrupt Law, § 1. By section 11 the debtor must, in his schedule, make a statement of any existing lien, pledge, mortgage, judgment, collateral, or other security, &c., and he must show what incumbrances are on the estate. By section 14 the assignee takes "all the estate" of the bankrupt, with the like right, title, power, and authority to sell, &c., that the bankrupt had, and the assignee may discharge any mortgage or conditional contract, or pledge, or deposit, or lien upon any property, at any time. Section 20. The creditor who has a lien on property for the payment of his debt, is admitted as a creditor only for the balance of the debt after deducting the value of such property. Section 27 declares that all creditors, whose debts are duly proved and allowed, shall share in the distribution. Thus we have the system: the court has jurisdiction to ascertain and liquidate the lien, and the debtor must state (disclose) the lien to the court. The assignee takes the estate, coupled with the right and power of the debtor to sell, &c. The debtor could only sell subject to the lien. The quantity of his interest was the right to the property as subject to the lien. The creditor is allowed to prove the balance of his debt to the extent of the balance; it must be "duly" proved, and if allowed, he would share in the distribution.

The clerk will certify this opinion to Mr. Register Black.

NOTE BY THE JUDGE. It is proper that I advert to my approval, on the 23d November last, of the opinion of Mr. Register Garnett Andrews in the matter of Fellner, Novell & Co., bankrupts. The approval was too general in its terms, and apparently affirms all the views expressed by the register. The affirmance ought to have been confined to what I consider the only pertinent question certified for my decision, namely, the protection of the property temporarily under the peculiar circumstances of the case, and should not have extended, even by implication, to the subject of liens, or whether judgments share the estate of the bankrupt, pro rata or otherwise, under the statute. The clerk will transmit a copy of this correction to Mr. Garnett Andrews, register in the Sixth district.

WINNE v. The CARROLL.

[14 Betts, D. C. MS. 57.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 20, 1848.

COLLISION — SAILING VESSELS IN EAST RIVER — COSTS IN ADMIRALTY.

[1. Failure of a sloop running before the wind in the East river to foresee the point at which an approaching schooner will run out her tack, so as to keep out of her way when she goes about, is a fault barring recovery for an ensuing collision.]

[2. When the blame for a collision is found to lie with the libellant alone, the costs will be taxed against him.]

[This was a libel by Gilbert G. Winne against the schooner Carroll to recover damages for a collision.]

PER CURIAM. The sloop Hornet, owned by the libellant, and the schooner Carroll, came in collision the afternoon of the 16th of August last in the East river between Grand street and Williamsburg Ferry, and this action seeks to recover the damages sustained by the sloop on this occasion. The wind was fresh, about south, with perhaps a slight inclination east, and tide ebb. The sloop was loaded with stone, and was beating down against as much wind as she could well bear. The schooner was loaded with lumber on deck, and coming up before the wind to make a berth on the New York side above Grand street. To accomplish that, she came up into the wind enough to enable her to drop her mainsail, and then, under her jib, was bringing her head towards the point she intended to make. There is some indistinctness and ambiguity in the testimony describing this manœuvre. No witness on board the sloop at the time has been examined, and the evidence of those observing the occurrence from the shore does not concur in respect to it. Prettyman was on his vessel at the foot of Delancey street; Barry and Hare were in front of a house near the Williamsburg Ferry,—all a distance of several hundred yards from the vessels. Prettyman says, when struck, the sloop was pointing towards Brooklyn on the Long Island shore, the wind about S. E., her mainsail taken in, and nothing but her jib set, and had little or no headway; she was heading to the wind. Barry says the sloop was standing right up the river, under her jib, and he did not observe she went into the wind to let her mainsail run. Mr. Barry's version is the most perplexing of all. He says the wind was S. or S. S. W.; that the sloop hove about to let down her mainsail and run off to about S., paying off by her jib till her head was S. or S. W., in which situation the schooner struck her on her larboard bow, the sloop at the time heading W. N. W., and to windward of the schooner.

It would be difficult to deduce from this evidence any reliable description which would inculpate the conduct of the sloop. But, without discussing it minutely, I think the testimony on the part of the claimants exonerates the schooner from all fault, and fixes the blame on the sloop. It is consistent, in its various particulars, with the libel, and the testimony of Barry and Prettyman, adding some facts which would more probably be noticed by those on the schooner, and the other witness near them in another vessel sailing in the same direction. The schooner made her starboard tack, from the New York shore, over as near to the Long Island side as was customary and proper to run, on account of a shore eddy at that point; the sloop at that time being before the wind, running directly up the river. As the sloop came about on her larboard tack towards New York, and was getting full, but with imperfect headway, the schooner was observed within a few yards of them in the act of veering round on the wind, having dropped her mainsail, and at that time and within that space there was no means by which the schooner could avoid a collision.

Want of precaution on the part of the sloop in two important particulars is established by the proof: (1) She should have foreseen at about what point the schooner's starboard tack would run out, and so placed herself as not to impede that movement, or be in the way of the schooner when she came about. The sloop was before the wind, and could take such direction or position as she desired. (2) She was loaded on deck with lumber, and had no lookout forward, and the circumstances raise strong presumption that her helmsman did not see the schooner, and brought his vessel into the wind without regard to the position and right of way of the other. It is manifest the two vessels struck when each had acquired but slight headway under their respective manœuvres, of tacking and coming round before the wind, and the decided import of the evidence is that the sloop was to the windward, and brought herself round either against the schooner, or into her track, so as to render it unavoidable that the schooner must come upon her.

In this view of the case I must declare that the libelant has established no cause of action in his own favor, and that a decree must accordingly be rendered discharging the schooner from the suit. The matter of costs is undoubtedly very much under the discretion of the court. Canter v. American & Ocean Ins. Co., 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 319; [U. S. v. The Malek Adhel] 2 How. [43 U. S.] 237. The general principle at law and equity is that costs in causes of damage in this court follow the decision. The Ebenezer, 7 Jur. 1117; The Athol, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 374. But in cases of collision the usage is to charge them on the party most to blame. The Celt, 3 Hagg. Adm. 321. If neither is to blame, each party pays his own costs. The Washington, 5 Jur. 1067. And in the English admiralty, when both are to blame, it would seem that the costs are imposed on both in common (Id.), although 1 W. Rob. Adm. 26, citing Hay v. Le Neve, leaves each party to pay his own costs. The negligence and blame leading to the damage in this case being on the part of the libelant himself, the libel must be dismissed, with costs. The Harriett, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 188.

REFUSAL OF BANKRUPT TO TESTIFY—PROTEST BY COUNSEL—CONTEMPT—COSTS.

1. A bankrupt was summoned, at the instance of a creditor who had proved his claim, to appear before the register to be examined. He appeared, but, under the advice of counsel, refused to be sworn and examined, on the ground that he was advised that the said creditor had no valid claim, and was not a creditor within the meaning of the act. The counsel for other creditors also protested against his examination. Held, that no legal invalidity of the creditor's claim being proved, the bankrupt could not refuse to be sworn and examined.

2. Counsel for other creditors had no legal right to interpose.

3. As the bankrupt had acted under advice of counsel, he ought not to be punished for contempt, nor to be required to pay costs other than those of the certificate.

4. The protesting creditors ought to pay the costs occasioned by their action.

Edwin K. Winship, a bankrupt, being required to testify before the register in the matter of his bankruptcy, before the election of an assignee, at the instance of Escher, a creditor whose claim, though proved, he intended to dispute as invalid for usury, refused to testify; and the counsel for 14 other creditors also interposed an objection to the examination of the bankrupt.

The register, upon request of the bankrupt, certified to the court his conclusions upon the questions arising, viz., that, inasmuch as no legal proof existed of the invalidity of Escher's claim, and such claim had been duly proved, the bankrupt should submit to the examination; that the counsel for the other creditors had no right to interpose any objection; that, as the bankrupt had acted under the advice of counsel, he ought not to pay costs other than those of the certificate which he demanded; but that the protesting creditors ought to pay the costs occasioned by their action.

PATENT OFFICE APPEALS—SUFFICIENCY OF "REA-SONS OF APPEAL"—VAGUENESS.

[1. Reasons of appeal which state "that the decision is in opposition to a clear apprehension of the merits of the case"; "that the decision is inconsistent as opposed in affirmation to precedents which have governed such cases"; and "that the decision is adverse to the opinion of skillful and competent men,"—held too vague and indefinite to raise any question for the judge to pass upon.]

[2. Where the commissioner's refusal to grant a patent is based upon want of novelty, the judge cannot consider a reason of appeal which is occupied mainly in a description of the object and importance of the machine, and of the comparative merits of the applicant's machine and a prior machine which the commissioner has cited as an anticipation.]

Appeal from commissioner of patents.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. Appeal from the decision of the commissioner of patents rejecting the application of Lieutenant J. A. Winslow for an alleged improvement in marine camels. The appellant in his specification, after describing his camel, which he calls a "camel steam tug," says, "claims to a patent": "First. For the peculiar model in which two camels are connected together, described as above, and intended for transporting ships, &c. Secondly. For the application, in combination, of letting water into the camels for sinking the machine and submerging the propellers when there is no ship on the ways, which, for want of such ballast, would interrupt the means of locomotion. Thirdly. For the application, in combination, of water-tight compartments, to prevent the ill effects which would arise from so large a body of water rushing backward and forward in a swell at sea, and also for controlling the water in these compartments to assist in preserving the trim of the machine, or an equal draught forward and aft. Fourthly. For the application, in combination, of balancing, by putting the heavy machinery forward to counteract the effect of want of buoyant power in the stern part of the machine."

These, I suppose, were intended to designate the particular improvements for which he desires a patent. There is no date to Mr. Winslow's specification; but as it was sworn to on the 17th of July, 1849, that may be considered as the date of his application for the patent. On the 31st of August, 1849, the commissioner of patents rejected his application and communicated his decision to Mr. Winslow in a letter of that date, marked No. 2; and as the commissioner, in stating the grounds of his decision, has referred to that letter, it seems necessary here to insert it: "Upon examination of your claims to letters-patent for alleged improvements in camels, it appears that your invention has been in all essentials anticipated, which fact prevents, under the law, the issue of letters-patent to you. In an application for letters-patent filed by Henry M. Shreve, December, 1839, to which you are referred, may be found described the two camels united by a platform upon which the ship is sustained, having their outer sides converging so as to form a bow, and also provided with compartments or sections in the body of the same in order that they may be balanced; and likewise with the means of propulsion by steam. Mr. Shreve in his specification declares the purport of his invention to consist in floating large vessels over shoals or bars. The sole difference between your machine and his consists in the position of the machinery, and this fact is not patentable when it is considered that both docks are furnished with means amply sufficient to equalize their draught of water of either stem or stern. A certificate as to the utility of your invention has been forwarded by you, which renders it proper to observe that the rejection of this case by the office does not in any way depend upon or is influenced by considerations of the practical merit of the contrivance. All that this office has to decide upon is the novelty of the contrivance and the fact that it is not pernicious. For terms of appeal or withdrawal you are referred to the enclosed circular." On the 29th of December, 1849, Mr. Winslow, through the office, presented his petition of appeal from the decision of the commissioner, and filed his reasons of appeal, viz.: "First. That it is alleged that the decision is in opposition to a clear apprehension of the merits of the case. Secondly. That the decision is inconsistent, as opposed in affirmation to precedents which have governed such cases. Thirdly. That the decision is adverse to the opinion of skillful and competent men," &c. These reasons of appeal are followed by a long argument as to the comparative merits of the two camels, viz., Mr. Shreve's and Mr. Winslow's, and an attempt to show that Mr. Shreve's would not answer the purpose and that Mr. Winslow's would. In February, 1850, before the day appointed by the judge for the hearing of the appeal, the commissioner of patents filed in the office "the grounds of his decision fully set forth in writing," as required by the eleventh section of the act of the 3d of March, 1839, as follows, viz.: (The commissioner's decision is omitted.)

By the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1839, section 11 [5 Stat. 354], in the case of an appeal from the decision of the commissioner of patents rejecting an application for a patent, the revision of the judge is confined to "the points involved by the reasons of appeal" filed in the office. It is necessary, therefore, to ascertain the points so involved. The first reason of appeal is "that the decision is in opposition to a clear apprehension of the merits of the case." This reason is certainly vague and indefinite, and I do not perceive that it involves any point affecting the decision of the commissioner. The second reason of appeal is "that the decision is inconsistent as opposed in affirmation to precedents which have governed such cases." This reason is also vague and indefinite, and I cannot see that it involves any point applicable to the decision of the commissioner in this case. The third reason of appeal is "that the decision is adverse to the opinion of skillful and competent men," &c. The residue of the paper filed, and headed "Reasons of an appeal," &c., is occupied principally in a description of the object and importance of the machine, and of the comparative merit of the camels of Shreve and that for which Mr. Winslow asks a patent.

The commissioner's decision is founded upon the want of novelty in Mr. Winslow's machine, and not upon its comparative merit. None of the reasons of appeal filed in the office involves any question of the relative merits of the two machines. The opinion of naval constructors respecting those merits cannot affect the question of novelty, and none of the reasons of appeal involve that question. It is therefore not within my cognizance, which, as before stated, is confined to the points involved in the reasons of appeal. I am therefore of opinion that the reasons of appeal filed in the office are not sufficient to justify a reversal of the decision of the commissioner of patents, that the said reasons must be overruled and the said decision be affirmed.

WINSLOW v. A FLOATING STEAM PUMP.

[2 N. J. Law J. 124.]

District Court, D. New Jersey. Feb. Term, 1879.

MARITIME LIEN—LOCAL LAW.

Furnishing an air pump to a water craft familiarly called a "chuncker," used for pumping the water out of a dry dock in the Hudson river, is a maritime service. The lien given by the local law for such service may be enforced by the district court in admiralty.

In admiralty.

NIXON, District Judge. This is a libel in rem, filed to recover the amount alleged to be due for the equipment of a vessel. The equipment was an air pump furnished to a water craft familiarly called a "chuncker," used for pumping the water out of a dry dock on the Hudson river, and incidentally from sunken vessels. The merits of the controversy are involved in the solution of two questions: (1) Whether such an equipment is a maritime service, and (2) the value of the articles furnished.

1. The respondents are the lessees of a dry dock at the foot of one of the streets of Jersey City. An useful if not an indispensable part of the instrumentalities with which they carry on their business of overhauling and repairing vessels is some sort of a mechanism for pumping out their dry dock. They rented with the dock a canal boat or "chuncker" for this purpose, having an engine and boiler, and the libellant sold to them an air pump and hose with necessary connections, which was placed in the boat in April last. The answer of the respondents admits "that said vessel is used by them for the purpose of holding their machinery for pumping out their dry dock and other kind of pumping in and about the Hudson river and Harbor of New York and the waters adjacent thereto." As the 2d section of the act of the legislature of New Jersey, entitled "A further supplement to an act for the collection of demands against ships, steamboats and other vessels," approved March 20, 1878, makes all debts to the amount of twenty-five dollars and upwards, contracted by the master, owner, agent or consignee of any ship or vessel within the state for * * * fitting, furnishing or equipping such vessel a lien thereon, and has a preference to all other liens, except mariner's wages, there does not seem room for doubt that the libellant's claim is a lien upon the vessel and is enforceable in a court of admiralty. It is now the settled doctrine that such liens, created by the local law, are cognizable in the district courts of the United States.

The remainder of the opinion concerning the value of the articles, is of no general interest, and is omitted.

WINSLOW v. FOUR HUNDRED BARRELS OF SALT.

[1 Biss. 459.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Aug., 1864.

LIEN FOR DEMURRAGE—WAIVER.

1. If a master delivers a cargo, and receives the freight, without an agreement on the part of the person receiving it that it is to be held subject to a lien for demurrage, the lien is waived, and a libel for demurrage cannot be sustained against the cargo.

2. The fact that the master stated that he should look to the cargo for the claim for demurrage, is not sufficient to sustain the lien.

Appeal from decree of district court of the United States for the Northern district of Illinois, dismissing the libel, which was filed to recover demurrage for delay in loading and unloading a cargo of salt. [Case unreported.]

Robert Rae, for libellant.

Waite & Towne, for respondent.

DAVIS, Circuit Justice. The bark Major Anderson, owned by the libellant, was employed to bring a load of salt from the port of Bay City, Michigan, to the port of Chicago. The vessel was unnecessarily detained at Bay City for three days, for which demurrage is claimed. Demurrage is also claimed because the vessel was not unloaded with dispatch at Chicago.

The question for determination is whether, if demurrage was due, the lien for it on the four hundred barrels of salt has not been waived. I think it has. The cargo of the vessel was salt, and consigned to H. Gelpcke, at Chicago. The master, on his arrival here, reported to Gelpcke, the consignee, who referred him to Haskin, who had bought from Gelpcke a large quantity of salt, to be delivered. Haskin, accordingly, received the cargo in place of Gelpcke, which was discharged after an unusual delay. Ingraham, the captain, and Egan, the agent of the Anderson, told Haskin that they would look to the salt for their claim for demurrage; but Haskin never agreed that he would receive the salt subject to this claim. The salt was delivered and freight paid, and, if there was a just claim for demurrage, why was not some understanding had between Haskin and the agent of the vessel, that the lien on the salt would be retained for the demurrage? If Egan, on delivery had insisted on this, and Haskin had assented to it, then the lien would exist. A mere intention, on the part of the agent of this vessel, that he would retain the lien, and saying so, does not constitute the lien. Egan could have refused to deliver the salt, if the vessel's claim for demurrage was right; but instead of that, he does deliver, on payment of freight only, and doubtless misled Haskin by leading him to believe that the vessel would look to Gelpcke, and, in fact, negotiation is afterwards had by Egan with Gelpcke, which, proving abortive, the salt was attached, and this libel filed. The delivery of the salt was unconditional. Haskin treated it as his own, without incumbrance and with no understanding that the lien should continue, and in fact sold part of this very lot now in controversy.

In the opinion of the court, the lien on the salt was waived when it was delivered to Haskin, who received it without consenting to hold it subject to the lien for demurrage.

Judgment below is affirmed.

WHAT ARE SALVAGE SERVICES—COMPENSATION—DAMAGE TO SALVING VESSEL.

[1. Where a steamer found a sailing vessel anchored among the shoals off Cape May, in ignorance of her true position, and in considerable danger of being driven upon the banks in case her cables should part, and, after attempting, without success, to get a hawser from her, led the way safely out to sea, the sailing vessel proceeding, however, under her own sails, held, that this was a salvage service for which a liberal compensation should be awarded.]

Where a steamer bound from Philadelphia to Boston was delayed several hours off Cape May by rendering a salvage service, and in consequence thereof arrived at Pollock Rip nearly at low water, and struck in going over, and received severe injuries, held, that the same were merely remote and consequential damages, which could not be recovered against the vessel to which the services had been rendered.]

[3. Five thousand dollars awarded to a steamer worth, with her cargo, $500,000, for piloting out to sea without any considerable danger to herself a sailing vessel worth $122,500, from a position of considerable peril among the shoals off Cape May.]

[This was a libel by Henry Winso and others, owners of the steamship Saxon, against the ship Cornelius Grinnell, to recover compensation for salvage services.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a libel for salvage, brought by the owners of the steamship Saxon against the sailing ship Cornelius Grinnell, for services rendered to the latter by the Saxon, near Five Fathom Bank, to the eastward of Cape May, on the 3d of April, 1863. Two questions are raised on the pleadings and proofs: (1) Whether the services rendered come within the rule of compensation applicable to salvage rewards; and (2) if so, what amount should be allowed.

The peculiar character of the case will be best presented by a somewhat detailed statement of the facts which appear proved by the evidence. The New York and London packet ship Cornelius Grinnell, of New York, valued for the purposes of this case at not less than $22,500, having on board a cargo of the value of at least $100,000, with a large number of passengers and a full crew, left London for New York on the 13th of March, 1863. On Saturday, the 2d of April, at about 10 o'clock a. m., she hove to in a severe gale of wind, her master supposing that he was off Fire Island, south of Long Island. The ship lay till the next morning at 4 o'clock, her head being kept east southeast, the gale continuing severe. After 4 o'clock she was run in west southwest, as it was then supposed, towards New York. Between 12 and 1 o'clock she made land, which was then thought to be the New Jersey shore. She was then headed off east south-east, and in half or three quarters of an hour struck in shoal water. She then wore ship to the westward, and immediately anchored in five and a half fathoms of water. She lay here, with her head to the wind, which was blowing fresh from the north-east, accompanied with rain, for about an hour, her officers being ignorant of their real position, when the steamship Saxon, owned by the libellants, and running regularly between Philadelphia and Boston, was discovered passing on her trip to Boston. The captain of the Grinnell immediately set signals of distress, and the Saxon bore down for him. When within hailing distance, Captain Spencer, of the Grinnell, inquired of the master of the Saxon if he could tell him where he was. The latter replied that he was on Five Fathom Bank, off Cape May. Captain Spencer then told him that he had struck on a shoal, had a considerable number of passengers on board, and asked him if he would take him to a port of safety. Captain Matthews of the Saxon replied that he would try. Thereupon, after the proper orders, the Grinnell's cable was slipped, and the Saxon took a hawser from her for the purpose of taking her in tow. In attempting to get the ship off before the wind, under her jib and foretopsail, the hawser broke from inevitable accident, and without fault on the part of either ship. The hawser parted near the Grinnell's knight heads, and, though every effort was made to haul it in on the steamer, it got foul of her screw, though her engines were stopped as soon as they could be. Some twenty or thirty fathoms of it were found on the screw after she reached Boston. After the hawser parted, the captain of the Saxon ordered the Grinnell to make sail and follow him, which was done, the two ships steering towards the mouth of Delaware Bay. After sailing five or six miles the steamer stopped her engines to let the Grinnell come up, when Captain Matthews told the master of the Grinnell that he should have to get another hawser to him before night, as it would be ebb tide before they reached the mouth of the bay, and he could not get him to a safe anchorage without it. Captain Spencer then asked him if he could not take him to sea. The captain of the Saxon said he could, and thereupon the steamer led the way, and the Grinnell followed out to sea clear of all shoals, when the Grinnell, on notice from the captain of the Saxon that she was all clear, hauled up on her course for New York. The Saxon went on her way to Boston. The ships parted about 8 o'clock, Sunday evening, April 3, having been together about five hours. When the Grinnell arrived in New York she was found to be in good condition, no damage having been suffered in the gale. While getting the hawser fast, the sea running high, the Grinnell in pitching, as the Saxon came across her bow, came down on her, staving the boat of the latter, carrying away her rail, and cutting a hole in her deck. This damage to the Saxon was repaired for $260. Beyond this, and the winding of the hawser about the screw, the Saxon received no injury while engaged in rendering assistance to the Grinnell. Before her arrival at Boston, however, she suffered serious injury, to repair which, including loss for her detention during the repairs, cost her owners more than $25,000. The weather continued stormy after she left the Grinnell, and, the evening of the day after, she encountered a heavy gale. She kept her best steam on, and arrived at Pollock Rip, in her usual route, at about 5 o'clock Tuesday morning, about an hour before dead low water. In attempting to cross the Rip, the steamer struck; and was very badly injured, and had to be towed to Boston. Had she not been detained by the services she rendered the Grinnell, she would undoubtedly have reached the Rip at about high water, and passed over it in safety. The Saxon was a valuable steamer, worth over $100,000, and had a cargo on board valued at $400,000. To the south and west of Five Fathom Bank, where the Grinnell lay, are shoals, some of which are said not to be laid down on the charts, and as the wind and current were moving in a southwesterly direction, if the Grinnell had parted her chains, she would have been in considerable danger of being wrecked, especially if the gale had increased to a point of great severity. In case of such increase of the gale, she would have been in some danger of parting her cable had she not been rescued. The Saxon was the only regular steam packet which was due at that point about that time, though government transports occasionally passed up and down the coast in that vicinity.

Upon these facts the two questions already referred to arise, which have been elaborately discussed by counsel, and they are, obviously, as heretofore stated: (1) Were the services rendered by the Saxon to the Grinnell salvage services, and therefore entitled to salvage compensation? (2) If they were salvage services, what compensation is the Saxon entitled to?

Upon the first point, the court is satisfied that the service rendered was in the nature of salvage. The Grinnell was saved by the timely interposition of the Saxon, from a position of considerable peril. She was at anchor in the neighborhood of dangerous shoals, upon which there was at least some danger of her drifting, in the event of the parting of her cables. One severe gale had just been encountered, which had driven her into the position of danger where she then lay; and though this storm had lulled, it was not entirely over. The sea was high and the wind fresh; and another severe gale visited the coast within a few hours after she was taken out to sea by the Saxon. The evidence is not entirely clear as to the degree of severity of the succeeding gale at Five Fathom Bank, but, judging from the ordinary range of such storms, it is fair to conclude, from the evidence, that it was felt in considerable violence at this point. It is true the Grinnell might have rode out this gale, but the captain was ignorant of his position, and the pilots who cruise the waters in that vicinity were thirty miles away at Delaware breakwater, and not likely to reach the neighborhood of Five Fathom Bank in such weather. No one can certainly determine whether or not she would have ridden out the gale in safety; and though Captain Spencer thinks she would, as her ground tackle was strong, still it must be conceded that there was more or less danger in her lying there and trusting to the experiment. It is quite evident that Captain Spencer considered his ship in great danger, and was therefore anxious that the Saxon should take him to a port of safety. It is true that he now says his fears at that time were based upon the supposition that his ship was leaking badly, which turned out to be an error. Still, I think it is clear that the ship was in real and unusual danger, independent of the fact whether she was leaking badly or not. The services of the Saxon were, therefore, in the judgment of the court, salvage services, and come entirely within the rule laid down by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Charlotte, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 71, where he says: "According to the principles which are recognized in this court in questions of this description, all services rendered at sea to a vessel in danger or distress are salvage services. It is not necessary, I conceive, that the distress should be actual or immediate, or that the danger should be imminent and absolute. It will be sufficient if, at the time the assistance is rendered, the ship has encountered any damage or misfortune which might possibly expose her to destruction if the services were not rendered." This doctrine is accepted and enforced by the admiralty courts in this country. Mr. Justice Curtis, in the case of Hennesy v. The Versailles [Case No. 6,365], gives a brief and clear definition of salvage: "The relief of property," he remarks, "from impending peril of the sea, by voluntary exertions of those who are under no legal obligations to render assistance, and the consequent ultimate safety of the property, constitutes a technical case of salvage." Many other authorities to the same effect might be cited, and in view of the general rule, when considered with reference to the particular cases from which it has been deduced, I cannot doubt but that the present case is covered by it.

It only remains to consider the amount of compensation to be awarded. We are met on the threshold of this branch of the case with the claim that the court, in fixing the amount to be awarded, should consider the damage suffered by the Saxon in striking on Pollock Rip. It is not claimed that the entire amount of this damage should be included in the award, but it is insisted that the Saxon, by the delay of five hours while aiding the Grinnell, arrived at Pollock Rip so much later, and at low water, by which her risk in crossing was increased, and in consequence of which she met with the accident, and suffered great damage. And it is clear that the Saxon would have arrived at the Rip at high water, and therefore, in all probability, have passed over in safety, had it not been for her delay in aiding the Grinnell. In a certain popular and remote sense, when she undertook to get the Grinnell out of danger at Five Fathom Bank, she incurred whatever risks such a delay might subject her to. She took the risk of encountering another storm, which she might escape if she avoided the delay. Whatever increased dangers might arise during the time which her detention in this salvage service at Five Fathom Bank might prolong her voyage were all in one sense hazarded by her in staying by the Grinnell. But these remote and uncertain dangers do not, in the eye of the law, enhance her merit, and thus increase her reward. Though she had been totally wrecked by another gale, which she would have wholly escaped but for her delay of five hours in this service, I apprehend that such a disaster could not be allowed to enhance the salvage compensation. All such dangers were contingent, and the damages which might result from them must be considered in the language of the law, as remote, having no logical or legal connection with the transaction upon which the libel is founded.

We come, then, to the simple question of the amount of compensation due the Saxon for the services rendered at Five Fathom Bank. The elements to be considered in solving this question are well understood. The only difficulty is as to their application. The general rule as to compensation is that it should be liberal. In determining what is liberal we are to consider "the value of the property saved, the degree of the peril from which it was delivered, the risk of the property, and especially of the persons of the salvors, the severity and duration of their labor, the promptness of their interposition, and the skill exhibited." The Versailles [Case No. 6,365].

So far as the value of the property saved is concerned, it was considerable; it is admitted, for the purposes of this case, to be $22,500 for the ship, and $100,000 for the cargo. As to the degree of peril from which the ship and cargo were delivered, it is more difficult to determine. It was sufficient to constitute a case of salvage, but was not that imminent peril which often menaces the certain destruction of vessels on a lee shore. As the wind and sea were at the time of her rescue, she was not in a condition of great peril. To what degree the gale increased soon after her escape, that point is not clear. So far as the risk of the property or persons of the salvors is concerned, there is no unusual ground of merit. There was, comparatively, very little risk to either. The labors of the salvors were neither severe nor long, and though their services were promptly rendered, there was nothing in the exigencies of the case to call for very great skill. On the whole, I think I shall be following the spirit of the rule which calls for liberal rewards in salvage cases, by adjudging five thousand dollars as the proper sum. Had it not been for the untoward disaster at Pollock Rip, I think the salvors themselves would have regarded this as a liberal reward. To this sum, however, I will add two hundred and sixty dollars, the amount of the damage which Captain Matthews stated that the Saxon suffered by being struck by the Grinnell.

Let a decree be entered for the libellants for the sum of five thousand two hundred and sixty dollars, with costs.

Ex parte WINSOR.

[3 Story, 411.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. July Term, 1844.

CORPORATIONS—POWERS OF DIRECTORS—LEVY OF ASSESSMENTS—SET-OFF—DIVIDEND OF STOCKHOLDER.

1. Under the act of 1809, the power to lay assessments is vested exclusively in the corporation, and cannot be delegated to the directors.

[Cited in Ruggles v. Collier, 43 Mo. 365.]

2. Where the powers and privileges of the Norfolk Manufacturing Company were, by its charter, made subject to the provisions of the act of 1809, and a by-law was passed authorizing the directors "to take care of the interests, and manage the concerns of the corporation;" it was held, that the corporation had no power to delegate an authority to the directors to lay assessments, and that the said by-law did not, in fact, import an intention to delegate it.

[Cited in Smith v. Duncan, 77 Ind. 94.]

3. And the said company, having first made a dividend of 10 per cent. and, before payment thereof, laid an assessment of 10 per cent. payable on the same day; it was held, that the corporation were not entitled to take the dividend of any stockholder, without an order from him, in payment of any debt due from him to the corporation, or as a set-off to the assessment, or as a charge upon any shares, which might afterwards be sold.

This cause came before the circuit court, being certified from the district court, on account of the district judge being interested therein. The original petition and answer, and the amended petition and answer thereto, were as follows:

"To the Honorable the Judge of the District Court for the District of Massachusetts: Henry Winsor, of Boston, in said district, as he is assignee of Samuel H. Babcock, a bankrupt, respectfully represents, that the said Babcock, prior to the decree of bankruptcy in his case, was the proprietor of twenty shares in the capital stock of the Norfolk Manufacturing Company, a corporation established by law, within and under the authority of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, which shares, under and by virtue of said decree, became vested in your petitioner. And your petitioner further shows, that on the fifteenth day of August, 1842, the said Babcock was indebted to the said corporation, in the sum of two thousand dollars (or more), for monies had and received by the said Babcock, for the use of the said company; that in the month of June, 1842, the said Babcock failed to pay his debts, and was insolvent, and ever since so continued, until the time of filing his petition for the benefit of the bankrupt act, February 7th, 1843 [5 Stat. 440]. That it was well known to the said corporation, on the said August 15th, 1842, that the said Babcock was insolvent and unable to pay his debts, and on that day the directors in the said corporation declared a dividend of ten per centum on the capital stock of the said company, being one hundred dollars on each and every share thereof, payable on November 1st, 1842; and on October 25th, 1842, the said directors laid an assessment of ten per centum, or one hundred dollars, on each and every share in the said company, payable on the same first day of November, 1842; that no money was paid by the said corporation for such dividend, but that the stockholders signed a receipt for their several portions thereof; and that as to all the shares in the said company, except the said twenty shares, the said company gave a receipt for the assessments laid thereon. That the said Babcock gave an order to the said company to receive the said dividend on the said twenty shares. That the said company claimed to apply the said dividend to the payment of the debt of the said Babcock to the said company, and to hold the said shares as security for the payment of the said assessment. That under and in pursuance of an order of the district court of the United States, for this district, the said assignee caused the said twenty shares to be sold at public auction, and James Read, of said Boston, became the purchaser thereof, and that the said Read is the treasurer of the said corporation. And it was agreed by the said Read, on behalf of the said corporation, that the said shares should be transferred to the purchaser thereof, at said sale, and that the amount of the said assessment should be placed on deposit in some bank to abide the decree of this honorable court in the premises. That the said corporation was not in a condition to, and would not have made any dividend at the said time, in the usual and ordinary course of its business; and that the same was done for the purpose and object of securing the payment of the debt, due from the said Babcock to the said company, and thus to give the said company a preference or priority over the general creditors of the said bankrupt. That the said Babcock gave the said order for the said dividends to the said company in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving to the said company a preference or priority over the several creditors of the said bankrupt; or if not so given, the same was given in contemplation of bankruptcy to the said corporation, which was not a purchaser for a valuable consideration, or a bona fide creditor without notice, and the same was a fraud upon the bankrupt act, and is void. That the said company had no right or authority to appropriate the said dividends, as payment of the said debt of the said Babcock; but if they had any right to declare the same, they were bound to apply the same in payment of the said assessments, as in the case of all the other stockholders in the said company. Wherefore your petitioner prays, that the said company, and the said Read, may be summoned to appear and answer the premises, the said Read under oath, and that this honorable court will decree, that the whole proceeds of the said shares be paid to your petitioner, and that the said company be restrained by an injunction of this honorable court, from claiming any lien thereon, or in any way intermeddling therewith, and for his costs most wrongfully sustained."

Amendments to the said petition were afterwards filed by the said Winsor, and were as follows:

"The said Winsor prays leave to file the following amendments to his petition, and that Theodore Dunn, the president of the said Norfolk Manufacturing Company, be required to answer the original petition, and this amended petition, under oath, according to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief. The said Winsor farther avers, that the dividend declared by the directors of the said Norfolk Manufacturing Company on the twentieth day of August, 1842, was never payable to the stockholders in the said company, and was never paid to the said stockholders, but that the vote declaring the said dividend was rescinded on the 25th day of October, 1842, before the dividend so declared became payable, by the vote laying an assessment of the same amount, on each and every share in the said corporation, as the said dividend previously declared, which assessment was made payable at the same time, at which said dividend had been declared to be payable, and that no assessment was ever payable for, or in respect of the said shares, in the capital stock of the said company, under and by virtue of the said vote of October 25th, 1842, the said vote to lay an assessment being, in effect, merely a rescission of the said vote declaring a dividend. That it was well known to the said Dunn, president, or to some one or more of the officers of the said corporation, on the 27th day of July, 1842, and on the 15th day of August, 1842, that the said Babcock had failed to pay his debts at maturity; that he was insolvent and unable to pay the liabilities to which he was subject, individually, and as a stockholder in the Dudley W. Manufacturing Company, and otherwise. That no assessment was duly and legally made upon the said shares of the said corporation, on the 25th day of October, 1842, inasmuch as by the acts incorporating the said Norfolk Manufacturing Company, the power to lay assessments upon the shares of the said company was vested in the corporation, and to be exercised by them only, at a legal meeting duly called for that purpose, and the directors of the said corporation, could not legally make any assessment whatever upon the said shares.

"The defendants in their answer admit that Samuel H. Babcock, in the said complainant's bill mentioned, prior to the decree of bankruptcy in his case, was the proprietor of twenty shares in the capital stock of the said Norfolk Manufacturing Company in the said complainant's bill mentioned. And that under and by virtue of said decree, the interest of the said Babcock in the said shares at the time of the said decree rested in the said Winsor as assignee of the said Babcock's estate. That the said Babcock on the 15th day of August, in the year 1842, was indebted to the said Norfolk Manufacturing Company in the sum of about $2500, for monies had and received by him in trust, as treasurer of the said corporation, for the use of the said corporation. And that, at some time, the said Babcock failed to pay his debts, but the defendants assert, that they are unable to state at what time he thus failed to pay his debts. And the defendants deny that, on the said 15th day of August, in the year 1842, and for a long period thereafter, they considered the said Babcock insolvent; but assert, that the said Babcock represented at that time, and for a long time subsequently thereto, that he fully believed, that he was solvent, and had more than sufficient property to pay all his debts, and that he was negotiating to avoid the sacrifice of his property, and to pay or to provide for the payment of all his debts in full. And that he did not intend to avail himself of the benefits or provisions of the bankrupt law. That from the efforts made by the said Babcock, and from his representations to them from time to time, they fully believe, that the said Babcock continued confident in the belief, that he should make some arrangement or arrangements by which he could pay or secure to be paid all his debts in full, until down to the time or about the time of his filing his petition to be declared a bankrupt, and that they themselves fully believed that he would be able so to do. And they further say, that but for the great sacrifice made of his property the said Babcock would have been able to pay all his debts in full—his schedule of property at cost amounting to about $200,000, and his indebtedness to 88,000 dollars only. The defendants also admit, that a dividend of 10 per cent. was made, and that afterwards an assessment of 10 per cent. was made, as set forth in the petition, and that no money was paid by the said corporation for such dividend. But they deny, that as to all the shares in the said corporation, except the said twenty shares, the said company gave a receipt for the assessments laid thereon. But they admit, that the said Babcock, on the 27th day of July, in the year 1842, did give an order to the said company to receive the said dividend on all his shares in the said company. And they further admit, that the said company claimed and do still claim to apply the said dividend to the payment of the debt of the said Babcock to the said company, and to hold the said shares as security for the payment of the said assessment. And that under and in pursuance of an order of the district court of the United States for this district the said complainant, as assignee as aforesaid, caused the said twenty shares to be sold at public auction—and that James Read, one of the defendants, became the purchaser thereof, and that the said Read is the treasurer of the said corporation. And they further admit, that it was agreed by the said Read, on behalf of the said corporation, that the said shares should be transferred to the purchaser thereof at the said sale, and that the amount of the said assessment should be placed on deposit in some bank, to abide the decree of this honorable court in the premises. But they absolutely deny the averment of the complainant in the said bill of complaint contained, 'that the said corporation were not in a condition to, and would not have made any dividend at the said time in the usual and ordinary course of its business, and that the same was done for the purpose and object of securing the payment of the debt due from the said Babcock to the said company, and thus to give the said company a preference or priority over the general creditors of the said bankrupt,' and each and every part and parcel thereof.

"But these defendants further answering say, that the said Norfolk Manufacturing Company, as their annual accounts made up to July 1st, 1842, verify, and which were fairly, honestly, and bona fide made up for the purpose of ascertaining the true condition of their affairs, and for no other purpose, as they always had previously done in the month of July in each and every previous year, show a balance of net profits in favor of the said company, at that time, of $10,931.64, that might properly be divided among the stockholders therein, which would pay ten per centum, and leave in the treasurer's hands a surplus of $2631.64; that nothing had occurred in the condition or affairs of the company between the time of making up the account and declaring the dividend as before mentioned to alter its pecuniary standing for the worse. That it was the bona fide intention of the directors of the said company, so far as these defendants know, to declare and make the said dividend of 10 per cent. and that the only question made as to the declaring of the said dividend was in relation to a large debt due to them, which was amply secured by attachment of property. And the time of payment of the said dividend was protracted until the first day of November in the year 1842, for the purpose of realizing the money for the said debt to pay the said dividend, it then being probable, that the said money would be received on, before, or about that time. That the directors of the said company laid the assessment set forth in the petition, because they were disappointed in not realizing the debt due to the said company as above mentioned, as they had confidently expected to do, prior to the said first day of November in the year 1842, and because the treasurer of the said company, then being in cash advance for the said company upwards of $13,000, and not having received the amount due to the company as aforesaid, declined paying the said dividend, and for no other reason or reasons whatever. That the said Norfolk Manufacturing Company have in previous years more than once declared dividends which, from some unforeseen occurrences, or disappointments in the receipts of money, they were unable to pay, and have been obliged to lay assessments to meet such dividends in the same manner as was done in the instance stated in the said plaintiff's petition, as will appear by their record. And they absolutely deny, that the said dividend was made for the purpose of securing the payment of the debt due from the said Babcock to said company, or to give the said company a preference or priority over the general creditors of the said Babcock. But they assert, that it was made for the purpose of making a dividend of profits among the stockholders;—the said corporation having earned profits amply sufficient for that purpose. That inasmuch as said Babcock was indebted to the said company, they would not, as a matter of business, pay out a dividend to a stockholder indebted to the said company, but would retain in their hands the amount of such indebtedment.

"And they absolutely deny the following charges, contained in the said bill of complaint, viz. 'that the said Babcock gave the said order for the said dividends to the said company, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving to the said company a preference or priority over the several creditors of the said bankrupt, or if not so given, the same was given in contemplation of bankruptcy, to the said corporation, which was not a purchaser for a valuable consideration, or a bona fide creditor without notice, and the same was a fraud upon the bankrupt act and is void—and each and every one of them, and each and every part of each and every one of said charges, or averments. But on the contrary, aver and state, that the said Babcock, when he gave the said order, did not contemplate bankruptcy, but did contemplate and fully intend and believe, that he had ample property and would be able to pay all his debts in full, and that he should moreover have a surplus for himself. And, therefore, that he could not suppose, that the giving of such order to the said company was giving them a preference or priority over the several, general, or any creditor, or creditors of him, the said bankrupt. And that the said corporation were bona fide creditors and purchasers for a valuable consideration, without notice. And that the same dealings and transactions by and with the said Babcock were bona fide made and entered into more than two months before he filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt as aforesaid, and that no other party, or any party whatever to any such dealings, or transactions, or any of them, so far as these defendants had knowledge, or believe, had notice of any prior act of bankruptcy, or of the intention of the bankrupt to take the benefit of the said bankrupt act. That the said Norfolk Manufacturing Company insist, that they are entitled and have lawful authority to appropriate the said dividends as payment of the said debt of the said Babcock. And that they had a lawful right to declare the same, and were not bound to apply the same or any part thereof in payment of the said assessments, and that the case of the said Babcock was different from that of all and every of the other stockholders in the said company, inasmuch as that, as these defendants say, the said Babcock was the only one of the said stockholders, that was indebted to the said company, except one other, who owes a debt not yet payable, and inasmuch as that the said Babcock's indebtedness arose from monies of the said company. And, that the debt due from the said Babcock to the said company was strictly of a fiduciary character, for monies of the said company in his hands, and to which the said company were entitled, notwithstanding he might not be enabled to pay all, or any portion, of his just debts. That it was not money belonging to him—and that the company never supposed, that they were crediting or charging him therewith—nor consented to take his express or implied obligation therefor. But that he used it for his own private purposes, without the knowledge or consent of the said company, or any stockholder or officer therein—and in violation of good faith to them. And the defendants pray that the bill may be dismissed, and that they be decreed their costs."

The answer of Theodore Dunn set forth, that he had read the answers of James Read, and the Norfolk Manufacturing Company, by James Read, treasurer of said company, to the original bill of complaint, or the original petition of said Winsor, filed in this case, and knew the contents thereof, and that the same are true, and contain as full and correct an answer to the said original bill as he can make, and requested that the same answer might be taken as and for his answer to said original bill, and to that part of the amendments to said bill or petition as requires his answer thereunto. The answer of the said Dunn then recapitulates the statements made in the preceding answer of Read, and further states that the dividend declared by the directors of said Norfolk Manufacturing Company, on the 13th day of August, 1842, was payable to the stockholders in said company, on November 1st, 1842, and was paid to all the stockholders, on said November 1st, 1842, excepting Samuel H. Babcock, by filing it in set-off to an assessment of the same amount per share, against the same stockholders, which was receivable on the same day—and that the said Babcock would have been paid the dividend on his shares in said corporation, on the same day, in the same manner, had he not previously assigned to the said company, or corporation, his said dividend, and been indebted to the said company, as stated in the answer of James Read to the original bill of complaint. That the vote declaring the said dividend was not rescinded on the 25th day of October, 1842, before the dividend so declared became and was payable by the vote laying an assessment of the same amount on each and every share in said corporation, or on any other day, in that or in any other manner. And that the assessment mentioned in the answer of said James Read, was payable for and in respect of the said shares in the capital stock of the said company, under and by virtue of the said vote of October 25, 1842, and that the vote to lay an assessment was not, nor was it intended to be, a rescission of the said vote declaring a dividend—but the said vote to lay an assessment was intended to be, and was independent entirely of the vote declaring a dividend. And according to the best of his knowledge, information and belief, the said vote to lay an assessment is not, in effect, merely a rescission of said vote declaring a dividend in law. And asserts that it was not so considered or intended, in fact, by the said Norfolk Manufacturing Company, nor the directors thereof, one of whom was the said Samuel H. Babcock, at that time, and who was present, and acted and voted to lay said assessment, nor by the said Dunn. That he not only did not know, but did not suppose that the assessment made upon the shares in the Norfolk Manufacturing Company, on the 25th day of October, 1842, according to the best of his knowledge, information and belief, was duly and legally made, inasmuch as by the acts incorporating the said corporation, it is empowered to make by-laws, not repugnant to the constitution and laws of the commonwealth. And that by one of the by-laws of said corporation, the directors are empowered, and it is made their duty, to take care of the interests, and manage the concerns of the corporation, which duties they could not have faithfully discharged, otherwise than by laying the said assessment to provide for the payment of the dividend declared as aforesaid, as they had been disappointed in the collection of monies due to them, upon which they relied for the payment of said dividend—and that the power to lay assessments upon the shares of said company vested in the said directors, although it might also have vested in the corporation—and could be exercised by said directors at a meeting duly holden for that purpose, as well as by the stockholders, at a legal meeting duly called for that purpose. That whether or not said assessment was duly and legally made upon all the shares of the said corporation, the complainant or petitioner cannot make that objection, because he claims under the said Babcock, and his claim did not exist until long after said assessment was laid and made payable, and the said Babcock, while he was the sole owner of the shares in the said corporation, and solely interested therein, in which the complainant claims to have an interest as assignee in bankruptcy, and while he was a director in the said corporation, at a meeting of the said directors duly called, and legally met together, he and the other directors laid the said assessment by an unanimous vote—and then and there promised to pay the same when it was then and there made payable to wit, on the first day of November, 1842; and because the said complainant had no claim or interest in the said shares until long after the said November 1st, 1842,—and must have taken the same shares subject to the said assessment, subject to the lien of the said corporation thereon, and subject to the promise and agreement of the said Babcock, from whom he derived them, in relation to the said assessments thereon. And the said Dunn further answering saith, that to the best and utmost of his knowledge, information and belief, the said Babcock had not failed to pay his debts, at maturity, prior to the giving by him, the said Babcock, of the said order for dividends to the said corporation, on the 27th day of July, 1842, or prior to August 15th, 1842, and that it was not well known to the said Dunn prior to said 27th day of July, that he, the said Babcock, had failed to pay his debts at maturity, and that it was not known to him, that he, the said Babcock, had failed to pay his debts at maturity, until he filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt, to wit, on, or about February, 1843.

William Gray, for assignee.
J. J. Clarke, for respondents.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The principal questions which have been argued in the cause, are: First. Whether the assessment laid by the directors on the shares of the Norfolk Manufacturing Company, on the 25th of October, 1842, was a good and valid assessment? Second. If valid, whether it did not, in contemplation of law, amount to a revocation, or rescission of the prior dividend declared by the directors, and payable on the same day with the assessment, or as a set-off against the same? Third. Whether, supposing the assessment and dividend good, and in full force, the order or agreement of Babcock with the company, for the transfer of his dividend, was not a collusive order or agreement in contemplation of bankruptcy, and therefore void as against the creditors of Babcock, under the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9 [5 Stat. 440]. The latter question can become material only, in case of the failure of either of the other grounds to support the claim made by the assignee. I shall accordingly, in the first place, consider the question, whether the assessment was valid; for if it were not, then the assignee has a perfect title to the redress sought by him in this court.

The charter of the Norfolk Manufacturing Company was granted by the legislature on the 4th of February, 1824; and it was therein declared that they "shall have all the powers, and privileges, and shall be subject to all the duties, and requirements, prescribed in an act passed on the 3d of March, 1809, entitled, &c., and the several acts in addition thereto." The only material clause affecting the present case, is the fifth section of the act of 1809, which provides "that any such corporation may, from time to time, at any legal meeting, called for that purpose, assess upon each share, such sum or sums of money, as shall be judged by such corporation, necessary for raising a capital for the establishment and completion of the object of the incorporation, and for defraying the charges and expenses incident thereto, to be paid to their treasurer, at such time or times, and by such instalments, as shall be directed by the corporation." Now, the present assessment was not laid by the corporation at all; but by the sole authority of the directors. But it is said, that the directors have a co-ordinate power with the corporation, as to the laying of assessments under the by-laws of the corporation, one of which declares that "they (the directors) shall take care of the interests, and manage the concerns of the corporation." In the first place, it strikes me, that by the very terms of the act of 1809, the power to lay assessments is intended to be vested solely and exclusively in the corporation, and to rest in its discretion, as to the time when, and extent to which it is to be exercised. The power is given in the affirmative, and the maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," seems to me strictly applicable to such a case. It is a very high power, of a summary nature, and may involve a loss or forfeiture of the shares of the corporators, in case of a noncompliance with the requisition. It is, therefore, founded in a sound public policy, that the corporation, which is to bear the burthen, should be the sole judge of the times and occasions on which assessments should be laid. But it is said, that the corporation may delegate the powers to the directors. That is a proposition, which I am by no means prepared to admit. The general rule certainly is, that the powers confided to a corporation, like those confided to an agent, cannot ordinarily be delegated. "Delegatus non delegare," is the known maxim as to agents; and when the corporation itself is pointed out as the proper functionary to execute a discretionary power, it seems to me, that the true conclusion is, in the absence of all other provisions, that it must be solely exercised by the corporation, at its legal meetings held for that purpose. And any by-law, made in contravention of the enactments of the charter, is, as well upon the general principles of law, as by the express provisions of the act of 1809, § 1, to be treated as a mere nullity. But it does not appear to me, that the corporation ever has, or intended by its by-laws, to delegate any authority to lay any assessments. The language of the by-law, on which the whole of this part of the argument rests, is conceived in very general terms, and by no means requires, and in my judgment, does not admit of any interpretation, which shall include any such delegation of authority. It is "to take care of the interests, and manage the concerns of the corporation," which must, upon the principles of fair reasoning, be limited to the ordinary interests, and ordinary concerns of the corporation, as general agents of the corporation; and not extend to the extraordinary interests, or extraordinary concerns, expressly confided to the discretion of the corporation itself, by the very terms of the charter. In the most ordinary cases of agency, general language, however broad, when found in the instrument creating the agency, is constantly construed as limited to the special objects pointed out as the scope and purpose of the agency.²

But if this doctrine were at all doubtful, which it does not appear to me to be, the second point made at the bar would be equally decisive in favor of the assignee. And that is, that the assessment, if lawfully laid, was, to all intents and purposes, a complete merger, or extinguishment, or set-off of the dividend; and it is immaterial in which light it is received. It was obviously and confessedly laid for the very purpose of controlling the payment of the dividend; it was payable on the same day; and was, in fact, in respect to all the other stockholders but Babcock, actually applied, as an extinguishment, or set-off, of the dividend. No other exigency existed, or was contemplated to exist, calling for the assessment, but to recoup the dividend, and indeed to supersede the necessity of paying the dividend. Babcock himself could not have claimed the dividend, without paying the assessment, and the corporation are entitled to take the dividend under the order, or agreement, only sub modo, to discharge the assessment, or subject to the assessment. The order was, in fact, given on the 27th of July, before any dividend was declared; and after it was declared, and before it became due, the assessment was made for the very purpose of preventing the payment of the dividend out of the funds of the corporation, not then properly applicable to the purpose. It seems to me, therefore, that in no respect is the corporation entitled to the dividend, in part payment of the debt due to it, or to set-off the assessment, as a charge pro tanto, upon the shares of Babcock, which have been sold, and the proceeds lodged subject to the order of the court.

This view of the subject renders it wholly unnecessary to consider the other point, viz. whether the agreement and order to transfer the dividend was a collusive transfer in the sense of the bankrupt act. That transfer was after the failure of Babcock, and, under the circumstances, is not a question wholly free from difficulty, and I desire, therefore, to express no opinion respecting it. But I am of opinion, upon the other grounds, that the whole proceeds of the shares sold of the bankrupt ought to be paid over to the assignee, for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate, without deducting any sum for the assessments thereon, and that an injunction do issue accordingly.

BANKRUPT'S DISCHARGE—OMISSIONS FROM SCHEDULE—KEEPING BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

1. If a bankrupt honestly regards a judgment held by him as worthless, he is not chargeable with false swearing or fraud if he omit it from his schedule. Even if it has value as an asset, and he considers it as having value, still its omission must be intentional in order to charge him with false swearing or fraud.

2. A merchant or trader who, prior to his becoming such, has kept books of account showing the state of his affairs, is not required to carry their contents or any part of them into his books opened and kept as a trader, in order to satisfy the requirement of the statute as to a bankrupt keeping proper books of account while he is a merchant or tradesman.

3. Keeping proper books of account, within the meaning of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], is the keeping of an intelligent record of the merchant's or tradesman's affairs, and with that reasonable degree of accuracy and care which is to be expected from an intelligent man in that business, and a casual mistake therein will not prevent a discharge.

4. It is not required that a chattel mortgage given to secure a debt shall be entered upon the merchant's or trader's books. An entry of notes upon the fly-leaf of the blotter is sufficient.

[In the matter of Zenas G. Winsor, a bankrupt.]

J. W. Champlin, for bankrupt.
Mr. Fletcher and Mr. Smiley, opposed.

WITHEY, District Judge. Fifteen grounds of opposition to the bankrupt's discharge are stated in the specifications of three opposing creditors, and cover all the grounds alleged by other creditors. It is necessary to notice but four in deciding the case, viz.: specifications 2, 3, 13 and 15. One and fourteen were abandoned, and three embraces in substance all that is alleged by four to twelve, inclusive.

The second specification alleges wilful and false swearing by the bankrupt in his oath to Schedule "D;" also wilful and fraudulent omission of an asset from the schedule. The evidence is, that one Butler, in 1868, obtained judgment in the state court against Jacob W. and Eugene E. Winsor, which in May, 1874, was assigned to the bankrupt. At the time of the bankruptcy, this judgment remained unsatisfied, and has not been scheduled as an asset. It also appears that Jacob W. Winsor died some time before the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, his estate being utterly insolvent. The other judgment debtor is irresponsible. The bankrupt testifies that the reason the judgment was not scheduled among his assets was because it never occurred to him to place it there. He seems to have considered it worthless and of no consequence before his bankruptcy. Eugene E. had entered into the obligation on which the judgment was recovered at the instance of the bankrupt, and on the understanding that he was to be saved harmless. The bankrupt did not consider that he had any just claim against Eugene, in view of that understanding.

The facts do not sustain the charge that the bankrupt took a wilful false oath, or that he fraudulently omitted the judgment from his schedule. If the bankrupt honestly regarded the judgment worthless, he might omit it from the schedule without being chargeable with false swearing or fraud. If it had value as an asset, and was considered by the bankrupt as having value, still there was neither a wilful false swearing nor fraud unless the omission to place the judgment in the schedule was intentional.

The third specification alleges that the bankrupt, being a merchant and tradesman, failed to keep proper books of account, in not having entered a debt owing to one of his children. Four other specifications allege the same thing as to four other children. The facts disclose that in 1865, the bankrupt held in trust land for his five children, which he sold for some fourteen thousand dollars and appropriated the money to his own use. This misappropriation occurred before the bankrupt engaged in trade. At the time of the sale of the land he entered the transaction in his then books of account. Six months or more before the petition in bankruptcy was filed, those books were destroyed by an accidental fire which consumed a building in which they were kept. When he went into trade in 1870 or 1871, the bankrupt opened books of accounts appertaining to his business as a trader, but did not transfer to them any of the transactions entered in the books of account which he had kept for fifteen years previously. The bankrupt law declares that "no discharge shall be granted, or, if granted, be valid, if, being a merchant or tradesman, he has not subsequent to the passage of this act, kept proper books of account." The question is, does this provision require the books of account kept by a trader as such, to contain entries of debts owed by him at the time he went into trade, previously contracted, as well as of those debts incurred in his business as a trader. The statute relates to the bankrupt while a merchant or trader, and, as we understand, visits upon him the penalty of being refused a discharge from his debts, if while a trader he did not keep proper books of account. The statute should be so construed as to carry out the intention of congress. A trader must be held to the utmost good faith in keeping his accounts, to the end that his assignee in bankruptcy or any competent person may be able from his books to ascertain the state of the bankrupt's business while a trader. But if, prior to becoming a trader, he kept books of account which exhibited the state of his affairs, their contents, nor any part of them, need not be carried into his books opened and kept as a trader in order to satisfy the provision of the statute as to a bankrupt keeping proper books of account during the time he is a merchant or a tradesman. The law requires no books of account to be kept by any one as a condition precedent to obtaining a discharge other than those who, being merchants or tradesmen, become bankrupt. Had the books kept by Winsor prior to his entering into trade not been destroyed and they been turned over to the assignee, it is obvious that the ground of opposition we are considering could not successfully have been urged, and the accident that destroyed those books ought not, therefore, to be made the circumstance for visiting upon him the penalty of being denied a discharge. We find that specifications three to twelve inclusive are not sustained.

The thirteenth specification involves the same clause of the statute as that last considered, but is too indefinite to constitute a ground of opposition; nevertheless we will consider it. The charge is that the bankrupt did not enter in his books of account "a large real estate transaction with one E. P. Ferry." The evidence shows that the transaction complained of was entered on page 510 of the blotter kept by the bankrupt as a trader, fully disclosing his indebtedness in relation thereto. We might, therefore, without further comment, dispose of this specification. But in the course of the trial, by reference to the schedule of debts, it appeared that subsequent to the real estate transaction the bankrupt gave to Ferry two notes of two thousand five hundred dollars each to cover the indebtedness growing out of that transaction, and these notes were not entered in the books of account. The specification charges that the bankrupt "had large real estate transactions with one E. P. Ferry, of Grand Haven, Michigan, of which he kept no record in his books of account." Now, suppose, by a liberal construction, the subsequent giving of the notes should be considered as part of the "real estate transaction," and covered by the pleading, or assuming that the court is not to grant a discharge if it appears the bankrupt has not kept proper books of account, whether such omission is pleaded or not, what conclusion should be reached? The evidence shows that the bankrupt's books purported to contain an account of his bills payable. He testified that he had supposed, until his attention was called to the omission, his books did contain entries of all his bills payable, that his practice was to enter them in his books of account. Now, the mere fact that they were not entirely accurate, or that items of his business were occasionally omitted from his books, ought not, standing alone, to be regarded as evidence that he did not keep proper books of account within the meaning of the bankrupt law, unless "proper" means "accurate" books of account; and if the latter is to be the interpretation of the statute, we venture to assert there will thereafter be few if any discharges of bankrupt traders.

It was urged that intentions and good faith are not to be considered in determining whether proper books of account have been kept. Such is the rule to be applied when no account of cash, of merchandise, or stock, or bills payable, etc., has been kept, or when no intelligent account of any such matters has been kept. The bankrupt merchant or tradesman in such case is not entitled to a discharge, no matter what may have been his intention, as has been often held. On the other hand, when it appears that he has in some intelligent form or manner kept an account of those and other departments of his business; and yet is shown to have omitted one or more items from the accounts it then becomes a proper inquiry whether the omission was casual or intentional. Keeping proper books of account, within the meaning of the bankrupt act, may be said to be the keeping of an intelligent record of the merchant's or tradesman's business affairs, and with that reasonable degree of accuracy and care which is to be expected from an intelligent man in that business. An intentional omission, fraudulent within the scope of the bankrupt law, would be conclusive that proper books of account had not been kept; whereas, if the omission to make the proper entry was not designed but casual, it is manifest that no such conclusion would necessarily follow. If on the other hand there were repeated omissions, evincing gross carelessness or want of reasonable care, it might justly be held that the bankrupt had not kept proper books of account, for he should be held not only to the utmost good faith, but to the exercise of at least ordinary care in keeping his accounts.

We have been guided by such considerations whenever the question has been presented whether the bankrupt, merchant or tradesman, has kept proper books of account. No case has been cited by counsel, and we have not been able to find any, which considers the questions we have discussed. The primary consideration is whether the bankrupt has kept his accounts in such manner as to furnish an intelligent understanding of his affairs. If such has been the manner of keeping a record of his affairs, and yet mistakes are exhibited therein, it then becomes a proper subject of inquiry whether there is evinced reasonable care and an honest purpose to fully enter or keep proper accounts. If the court can answer these questions in the bankrupt's favor, he is, in our judgment, entitled to a discharge.

The fifteenth and last specification presents other objections to the bankrupt's book-keeping. They relate to several notes made by the bankrupt and endorsed by E. E. Winsor, discounted at the banking-house of M. V. Aldrich, in this city, the first one being for two thousand dollars, the others being renewals for such part of the original sum as from time to time remained unpaid. It is alleged that none of these notes were entered as bills payable. An examination of the books kept by the bankrupt shows that on a fly-leaf in the back part of his blotter these notes were all entered, except, possibly, the original note for two thousand dollars. The entries show the date, amount and time of payment, etc., in the form of memorandums; but afford all the information necessary to advise any intelligent person of the indebtedness evidenced by the notes. There can be no doubt but this answers the requirements of the law. The entry of the last note given in renewals shows the indebtedness subsisting at the time of the bankruptcy; those previously entered had been canceled as paid. The court did not personally inspect the book as to the two thousand dollar note first given, but the attention of the bankrupt having been called as a witness to the fact whether it did there appear, he examined and stated it was entered and, as we understood, pointed out the entry. We therefore find the notes to have been entered in his books of account in such manner as to satisfy the requirement of the statute. It was further objected by this specification that the bankrupt also failed to keep proper books of account, in that he gave to Eugene E. Winsor a chattel mortgage on a part of his personal property to indemnify him against any liability which Eugene should thereafter incur on account of the bankrupt in conducting as agent the bankrupt's Grand Rapids branch of business. As the mortgage was evidence of no indebtedness and created no liability, but was given as mere indemnity against a possible future liability of the mortgagee, we entertain the opinion that there was no obligation on the part of the bankrupt to make an entry in his books of account of the giving of such mortgage. When, subsequent to the giving of the mortgage, Eugene became liable as endorser or otherwise upon the bankrupt's obligations, those obligations were entered in the manner we have stated. The mortgage, if it should come to have any valid effect as against creditors, would become a matter of public record in the proper clerk's office; it belonged to no account usually kept by merchants; it occasioned no increase in the debtor or credit side of any account, and all that could be entered would have been a memorandum of its existence and the purpose for which it was given.

Our conclusion is that the bankrupt is entitled to a discharge from his debts. A decree will be entered in accordance with these views.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1844.

PREFERENCE BY BANKRUPT—"CONTEMPLATION OF BANKRUPTCY"—KNOWLEDGE OF CREDITOR.

1. Where the petition set forth that K, as agent of B, paid to A, a creditor of B, a certain due bill, in order to induce A to become a party to a general assignment in favor of B's creditors, which never took effect; and B subsequently became a bankrupt under the act, it was held, that the payment of the due bill, as set forth in the petition, was not a fraudulent preference in contemplation of bankruptcy,—and that the evidence showed, that K did not act as agent of B, and that if he did, since he concealed his agency from A, that he was to be treated, as to A, as a purchaser and not an agent.

[Cited in brief in Tucker v. Daly, 7 Grat. (Va.) 331.]

2. A creditor is never held to be unduly preferred by a bankrupt, unless he understand at the time, that he is dealing with the bankrupt, or with his avowed agent, for security or payment out of the funds of the bankrupt.

3. The assignee of a bankrupt has only the right of the bankrupt, except in cases of assignment or transfers, or agreements with one creditor in fraud of the others.

4. The phrase "contemplation of bankruptcy" means contemplation of insolvency and total stoppage of business.

This case was adjourned from the district court into this court on account of the district judge being interested therein. The original petition in equity was in substance as follows: "Respectfully represents Henry Winsor of Boston in the county of Suffolk in said district, merchant, that on the seventh day of February, 1843, Samuel H. Babcock of said Boston, merchant, filed his petition in bankruptcy, and was declared bankrupt on the fourteenth day of April in the year 1843, and that your petitioner was afterwards duly appointed and qualified assignee of the estate of said bankrupt, and accepted that trust. That on or about the twenty-eighth day of December, 1842, the said bankrupt made or attempted to make an assignment of his goods, credits and effects, for the benefit of his creditors, and that on or about the said twenty-eighth day of December, the said bankrupt called upon one Hugh R. Kendall, of said Boston, merchant, and asked him to execute the said attempted assignment. That the said Kendall refused to do so, unless the said Babcock would pay, or cause to be paid, a certain due bill, dated January nineteenth, A. D. 1842, signed by said bankrupt, and payable to the said Kendall on demand, with interest,—said due bill being for the sum of one thousand dollars; and that the said bankrupt on or about the same twenty-eighth day of December, and for the consideration that said Kendall should sign the said assignment, furnished the money to one I. M. Smith, and caused him to pay the said due bill, together with the interest thereon, to the said Kendall, and said Kendall shortly afterwards executed the assignment. That the said payment was made by the said bankrupt for the purpose of giving said Kendall a preference or priority over the general creditors of said bankrupt. And that if the said payment was not made for such purpose, it was made by said bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy, and the said Kendall was not a bona fide creditor or purchaser without notice. The said payment was made within two months next before the filing of the petition, upon which said Babcock was declared bankrupt as aforesaid, and the same is a fraud upon the bankrupt act of the United States passed August 19, A. D. 1841 [5 Stat. 440]. The petition prays that Kendall may be ordered and pay over to the petitioner, as said assignee, the said sum and interest so received by him, and to pay to the petitioner his costs and counsel fees in this behalf incurred, and for such further and other relief as the nature and circumstances of this case may require."

The answer of the respondent was in substance as follows: "The respondent in his answer admits, that he did on the twenty-eighth of December, 1842, and for a long time previous thereto, hold a due bill signed by the said Babcock, dated January 19th, 1842, which, from the circumstances under which it originated, was regarded by this respondent, and as he believes by the said Babcock, as a debt, which said Babcock was not only legally, but in honor bound to pay. That he was applied to some days previous to December 28th, 1842, by the said Babcock, to become a party to an assignment, which the said Babcock represented he had made for the benefit of his creditors, and to avoid all occasion of becoming bankrupt under the laws of the United States,—which this respondent refused to do. But he denies that he made any agreement to sign the same, upon being paid the amount of the said bill, and avers that his motives and reasons for refusing to execute the said assignment were, because said Babcock had not paid said bill as this respondent conceived he ought in honor to have done, and because this respondent then had a suit pending in the court of common pleas in the county of Suffolk against the said Babcock, upon the debts due him from the said Babcock, wherein he had attached said Babcock's property; and because, also, he had another suit then pending in the said court against the Dudley Woollen Manufacturing Company, upon a draft drawn by said company and accepted by said Babcock, which constituted the principal debt due from Babcock to this respondent, in which suit this respondent then supposed he had obtained some security by an attachment on the property of said company. And the respondent denies, that the said due bill was paid to him by said Smith in consideration, that he should sign the said assignment, and avers, that some days after the application to him by the said Babcock hereinbefore mentioned, to wit, on December 28th, 1842, the said Smith applied to this respondent to purchase the said due bill, giving as his reason, that there was a difficulty in the said Babcock's family concerning said due bill, and he, Smith, wanted to purchase it for the sake of peace, (he the said Smith being, as this respondent now believes, a son-in-law to the said Babcock.) That the said Smith purchased said due bill of this respondent, giving him therefor his, the said Smith's, note for the amount due on said bill, payable in sixty days and endorsed by a good and sufficient endorser, which note was afterwards taken up by the said Smith on or about the seventh of January, 1843, upon this respondent's discounting two per cent. from the amount of the said note. And the respondent denies, that he knew at any time or now believes, that the said Smith, in purchasing said due bill, was acting for said Babcock, but on the contrary, this respondent, at the time of his said transactions with said Smith, believed and still believes, that he, the said Smith, was acting for himself. And this respondent admits, that he did afterwards execute the said assignment provisionally, and upon certain conditions, which to the best of his belief were, that those of said Babcock's creditors, who had attachments upon his property, should become parties to the said assignment within a limited time. And this respondent doth not admit, that the said Babcock gave the said Smith the money to pay said due bill, and does not believe, that said Babcock has ever paid the amount of said due bill to the said Smith, and requires the said complainant to prove the said facts, if they are material. That said Smith, as he is informed and believes, came to this respondent's store during the absence of the said respondent, a few days after this respondent had signed said assignment, and brought with him the said due bill, and left the same with said respondent's clerk, with a request that this respondent would prove the said due bill under said assignment, and receive a dividend thereon in Smith's behalf, but in his, the respondent's name, alleging as a reason, that he the said Smith did not wish to have it known that he, the said Smith, had purchased said due bill. This respondent, however, upon being informed of the said request, refused to comply therewith, and returned said due bill to said Smith. And this respondent denies that any of the transactions had between him and Smith were had for the purpose of giving him a preference or priority over the other creditors of said Babcock, and denies, that any payment was made to him by said Babcock within two months before the filing of the petition, and prays that the said petition may be dismissed, and that he may be allowed his costs and counsel fees in this behalf sustained."

Mr. Gray, for assignee.

Edward D. Sohler, for respondent.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The whole question in this case turns upon this, whether the due bill owing to Kendall was paid by Babcock in contemplation of bankruptcy, and with an intent to give Kendall a preference over the other creditors, contrary to the intentment of the second section of the bankrupt act of 1841 (chapter 9). To establish such a case, several facts must concur. The due bill must have been paid by Babcock or his agent, acting as such, out of his, Babcock's funds; it must have been in contemplation of his bankruptcy; and it must have been with a design to give a preference to Kendall.

I shall not dwell a moment upon the consideration, of what in point of law is the meaning of the words "in contemplation of bankruptcy," in the sense of the bankrupt act of 1841 (chapter 9). It has been often adjudged by this court to mean contemplation of an insolvency and inability of the debtor to pay his debts, and also the contemplation of a total stoppage and destruction of his business consequent thereon. In the former cases, arising under this same bankruptcy, (and the evidence in this case on the same points does not materially differ in its aspect,) I have had occasion to state that the general assignment made by Babcock did not, under all the circumstances, and with reference to the stipulations contained therein, constitute an act of bankruptcy, and that, as it became a nullity from the non-compliance of all his creditors with the conditions of that assignment, it might be laid out of our consideration. The very object of the payment of the present due bill, even according to the view of the case now asserted by the assignee, was to procure the assent and signature of Kendall to that assignment. His signature and assent were obtained; but it became ineffectual, because the assignment did not ultimately become a valid or operative instrument. It might, therefore, be truly said, that the object of the negotiation for, and payment of, this due bill was not to give an undue preference to Kendall in contemplation of bankruptcy, in the sense of the bankrupt act, but it was to give validity and effect to that instrument, so as to supersede the necessity of going into bankruptcy. In this view of the matter there is much difficulty in maintaining this point as propounded on behalf of the assignee. The case bears a close analogy to that of Wheelwright v. Jackson, 5 Taunt. 109.

But this point is the less material in this case, because the other points of the case seem to me, upon the evidence, decisive against the assignee. In the first place, it is, in my judgment, fairly made out by the evidence, and confirmed by the answer of Kendall, that the negotiation of Smith with Kendall was not for the payment of the due bill by Smith on account of or as agent of Babcock. Smith came avowedly as a friend of the family to purchase the bill on his own account, and not to purchase it for Babcock. The due bill was, upon the representations of Smith, sold to him as a purchaser on his own account, and he gave his personal security to Kendall, by a note, with his partner as endorser for the payment thereof. Non constat, if he had come to Kendall avowedly to pay the due bill out of Babcock's funds, and on his account, that Kendall would have taken the funds, or agreed to the arrangement; for if Babcock should subsequently become a bankrupt, the transaction might be liable to be overhauled as a fraudulent preference under the bankrupt act. If, on the contrary, Smith became a purchaser on his own account, then the transaction was susceptible of no such interpretation; for it would then amount to a mere assignment or transfer of the due bill to Smith, and make him, instead of Kendall, a creditor of Babcock. Besides, Smith does not pretend that he ever told Kendall that he came to purchase for Babcock or with his funds; and Kendall had not the slightest reason, from the attendant circumstances, to believe that he did. The professed, or at least the apparent object, was to purchase the due bill on his, Smith's, own sole account, to be used by him as he should choose; and enforced or not according to his pleasure. So Barnes expressly testifies; and Kendall solemnly asserts that he sold the bill to Smith upon the faith of this statement. Then, again, it is difficult to perceive any very satisfactory evidence in the case to establish the fact, that Smith did purchase and pay for the due bill out of the funds of Babcock. In fact, he paid the amount by his own promissory note, endorsed by his partner; and this very circumstance shows, that the funds actually appropriated by him for the payment were his own funds. It is true, that he or his firm, was owing Babcock a part of the money on a due bill, and that he obtained some other funds from Leonard, and other persons, which seem to have been handed to Smith for the purpose of paying the due bill to Kendall. But the money was not, strictly speaking, so applied; and Smith (as Barnes testifies) afterwards treated the due bill, not as an extinguished debt of Babcock, but as a subsisting debt; and he requested Kendall to take back the due bill and prove it as a debt against Babcock, as if it were his own, as he, Smith, did not wish to be known in the business at all. There is nothing in Smith's deposition which can fairly be said to shake or overcome the credibility of Barnes's testimony. Babcock's testimony has been introduced into the case; and certainly it does not exactly correspond with that which, upon his examination in bankruptcy, when he applied for his discharge, he gave as to the nature and character of the transaction. He then represented, in effect, that the funds to take up the due bill of Kendall were not his own funds; but were furnished by friends. How far that statement coincides with or contradicts his present testimony, I do not now stop to inquire. There is certainly much looseness in his testimony; and it may arise from the infirmity of his memory, without any deliberate intention to falsify the actual facts. Perhaps the different statements might be reconciled, if Babcock had been called upon to explain the apparent discrepancies. But, as my judgment in the present case does not turn upon any investigation of this sort, I am content to leave the testimony as it is.

What I do proceed upon is this: That even if Smith did actually use the funds of Babcock and with his consent, in paying the due bill; yet if Smith concealed that fact from Kendall, and Kendall, in the whole transaction and arrangement, understood from Smith that he was dealing with him as a purchaser on his own account, and not as an agent of Babcock, it is not now important either for Smith, or for Babcock, or for Babcock's assignee, to set up that concealment as a ground to recover back the money from Kendall. Kendall dealt with Smith as a principal and not as an agent. He sought no preference under the bankrupt act, and he had no means of knowing that Babcock was negotiating with him to give him any preference. To allow Kendall's title to the money under such circumstances to be impeached by Smith or by Babcock, would be in effect to enable them to perpetrate a fraud upon an innocent creditor, who supposed, and had a right to suppose, that he was making a sale to Smith, and not receiving payment from Babcock. I know of no case, where a creditor has been held to be unduly preferred by a bankrupt, unless, at the time, the creditor clearly understood himself to be dealing directly with his agent for a conveyance, security, transfer, or payment, from or out of the funds of the debtor, thus withdrawing a part of the common funds appropriated by law for the benefit of all the creditors. Payment or security by a third person out of his own funds, and not out of those of the debtor, would not fall within the predicament contemplated by the second section of the bankrupt act of 1841 (chapter 9). In general, the assignee of a bankrupt does not stand in a better predicament than the bankrupt himself, and can claim only what the latter might claim. See Wheelright v. Jackson, 5 Taunt. 109. An admitted exception is, where the conveyance, security, assignment, transfer, or negotiation is made in fraud of the other creditors, or is to give an unlawful preference. There may possibly be some other exceptions; but certainly this is the most prominent and important. But where the assignee seeks to recover from a creditor a sum of money, paid to him by a third person, for the debt due to such creditor by the bankrupt, it ought to appear, that the creditor knew that the payment was made out of the bankrupt's funds, or on his account, so as to extinguish the debt, and not that the creditor was misled by such third person into the belief, that it was a purchase of the debt on his own account, and was a mere assignment to himself for his own benefit, and to be paid for out of his own funds.

My opinion, therefore, is, that the petition of the assignee is not maintainable, and that it ought to be dismissed, with costs to the respondent.

WINSOR v. McLELLAN.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1843.

INTEREST IN VESSEL — BILL OF SALE — SECURITY FOR DEBT — DELIVERY OF POSSESSION — RECORD OF MORTGAGE — ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY — STATUS.

1. A bill of sale of one half of a vessel, as collateral security for a debt, with a provision, that the mortgagors may keep possession of the vessel, and use her for their own benefit until default of payment, is valid, as an immediate conditional sale.
 2. Delivery of possession to a purchaser, of a moiety of a vessel, when in the possession of the other part-owner, is not, in general, indispensable to pass the property.
 3. As between the mortgagor and mortgagee notice to the part-owner in possession is not necessary.
 4. By the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts, it is not necessary, as between the parties themselves, that a mortgage of personal property should be recorded.
 5. The assignee in bankruptcy, except in cases of fraud, stands in no better situation than the bankrupts themselves.

6. The fact that one of the mortgagors made oath at the custom-house, subsequent to the bill of sale, that the vessel belonged to him and his partner, cannot affect the rights of the mortgagee.
 7. The bankrupts, some months previous to their bankruptcy, conveyed, by a bill of sale, as collateral security for a debt of $2,000, one half of a vessel, of which the other half was owned by the master, and agreed to assign all future policies of insurance thereon, as further security for the same debt, which was done, it being agreed, that the mortgagors might use the vessel for their own benefit, until default of payment. The bill of sale was not recorded. The vessel, at the time the bill of sale was made, was at sea, in the possession of the master. Between that time, and the filing of the petition for the benefit of the bankrupt law by the mortgagors, the vessel came once to Boston, the place of business and residence of the mortgagors, and twice to Bath, the place of business and residence of the master, but the mortgagees did not take possession. Five days before the filing of the petition they sent notice to the master of the bill of sale. The said mortgaged moiety of the vessel having been sold by direction of the assignee, it was held, that the proceeds of the sale should be paid to the mortgagees.

This was the case of a question adjourned into the circuit court from the district court of Massachusetts. The petition set forth, that Edward and William H. McLellan, of Boston, merchants and co-partners, of whom the petitioner, Henry Winsor, of Boston, was the assignee in bankruptcy, included in the schedule of their assets one half of the brig Napoleon, at sea, and in the schedule of their liabilities, $2,000 due to the trustees of Mrs. Rebecca S. McLellan, secured by a bill of sale of one half of the brig Napoleon. The bill of sale was made Dec. 9, 1841, and the petition of the McLellans for the benefit of the bankrupt law was filed Nov. 22, 1842. In the intermediate time, the trustees did not take possession of the vessel, but the bankrupts employed her for their own use. And on April 28, 1842, Edward McLellan made oath at the custom-house, that he and his partner, and George W. Jordan, were the owners of the brig. Jordan was the master of the vessel, and owned one moiety. The trustees, on the 8th of April, 1843, petitioned the court for leave to sell the half of the brig, which had been conveyed to them, and the sale was authorized to be made under the direction of the assignee. The sale took place, and the trustees executed a conveyance, but the collector refused to issue a new register, unless upon a transfer by the assignee. The assignee accordingly executed a bill of sale to the purchasers, and received the purchase-money, amounting to $1,600, which sum was subject to deductions, for payments and charges, of $133.59. The balance was claimed by the assignee to be paid into the general fund, for the benefit of the creditors.

The answer of the trustees, in addition to the above facts, set forth, that the policies of insurance, made upon the said moiety, subsequent to the bill of sale, had been transferred and made payable to them, and that it was agreed, at the time the bill of sale was given, that the bankrupts should use the vessel until default of payment. The vessel, at that time, was at sea, but between that time and the time of filing the petition for the benefit of the bankrupt law it had been once at Boston, and twice at Bath, where the master lived. The trustees did not take possession; but, on the 17th of November, 1842, they addressed a letter to the master, notifying him of the transfer to them, and, subsequently to the receipt of that letter, the vessel was managed for the joint use of the trustees and the master. The answer concluded with a prayer, that the assignee be ordered to pay over to them the balance of the proceeds in his hands, and for costs.

Upon these facts, the question was adjourned into the circuit court.

Wm. Gray, for petitioner.

Sidney Bartlett, for respondents.

STORY, Circuit Justice. In considering the present question, it should be constantly borne in mind, that there is no provision in our bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9 [5 Stat. 440], corresponding with the provision in the statute of 21 Jac. I. c. 19, §§ 10, 11, and the more recent statutes of England, respecting reputed ownership in cases of bankruptcy. See statute 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, § 72. There is no proof, nor even any allegation of fraud between the trustees and the bankrupts, with a view to delay or defeat or defraud their creditors, in the present transaction. So that the case stands drily and nakedly upon the mere rights of the assignee, acting for the general creditors, under a general assignment in bankruptcy. Now, the principle has been long established, that the assignee in bankruptcy does not stand in the position of a purchaser, nor even in so favorable a position as an individual creditor may stand. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1228, 1229, 1411; Langton v. Horton, 1 Hare, 549, 563; Muir v. Schenck, 3 Hill, 228; Murray v. Lylburn, 2 Johns. Ch. 441, 443; Deac. Bankr. (Ed. 1827) pp. 320, 321, c. 10, § 3. The assignee in bankruptcy takes the property of the bankrupt, in cases unaffected by fraud, in the same plight and condition, that the bankrupt himself held it, and subject to all the equities, which exist against the same in the hands of the bankrupt. This was clearly laid down by Lord Hardwicke in Brown v. Heathcote, 1 Atk. 160, 162, and has ever since been adhered to, not only in courts of equity, but also, as the case of Leslie v. Guthrie, 1 Bing. (N. C.) 697, abundantly shows, at law. But I need not dwell upon this point, as it came very fully under consideration in the case of Rand v. Winslow [not reported] at the last October term of the circuit court in Maine.

It appears from the facts disclosed by the petition and answer, that in July, 1841, the trustees had in their possession $2,000 of trustee money, belonging to the cestui que trust, Mrs. S. M. McLellan, the wife of one of the bankrupts, and that they lent that sum to the firm of E. & Wm. H. McLellan

(the bankrupts); and on the 9th of December, 1841, upon a settlement with the firm, they took an accountable receipt from the firm for the payment of that sum and interest, on demand; and at the same time, they took as a collateral security a bill of sale of the one half of the brig Napoleon, then at sea, the one half being owned by the firm, and the other half being owned by one Jordan, who was then master thereof. And it was at the same time agreed, that the policy, then existing on the one half of the brig on behalf of the firm, should be assigned to the trustees, and also all policies on her future voyages, as collateral security for the same purposes. Assignments were accordingly made on the respective policies. No notice was given to the master of the bill of sale by the trustees, or otherwise, until the 17th of November, 1842, when a letter was written to him by the trustees, informing him of the fact, the brig then being abroad. Up to this period the firm had the possession and use of the brig in common with the master, and received the profits and earnings thereof, the brig having returned once to Boston (the place of residence and business of the firm,) and twice to Bath, the place of residence and business of the master. The firm petitioned for the benefit of the bankrupt act on the 22d of November, 1841, (five days only after the letter was written) and were duly declared bankrupts on the 3d of January, 1843.

It is under these circumstances, that the assignee, on behalf of the general creditors, insists that the want of delivery to and possession by the trustees is fatal to their claim, and that no property passed to them under the bill of sale made by the bankrupts to the trustees, one of the trustees being one of the bankrupts. In the petition, there is no allegation, that the bill of sale was made to the trustees in contemplation of bankruptcy, and therefore, that question, as well as the question, whether the conveyance was intentionally fraudulent, might properly be laid aside, as not belonging either to the allegations or the proofs in the statements of the parties. I shall, nevertheless, take occasion to speak a few words to the point, as if it were properly presented by the proceedings before the court.

The first objection to the conveyance, taken by the petitioner, is, (as has been already suggested) that there was no delivery or possession of the brig made or taken by the trustees; nor, indeed, any notice of the transfer, given to the master, until five days before the bankruptcy; so that, in point of fact, during all the intermediate period between the conveyance and the notice, the grantors had the full possession and use of the brig and of her profits. Now, in the first place, it is clear, that there can be no delivery of possession of a ship by one part owner of his share to a purchaser, when the actual possession is in another part owner; such, for instance, as in the present case, where the master is owner of a moiety of the vessel, and in actual possession thereof. The most, that can, under such circumstances, be required is, that the master, or other part owners, should have notice of the transfer, so as to put them in a correct position, so far as their own rights are concerned. That actual possession by a purchaser of the share of a part owner is not indispensable, at least in ordinary cases, is clearly established in Addis v. Baker, 1 Anstr. 222, and was affirmed in the case of a mortgage of an undivided share of a ship, in the case of Gillespy v. Coutts, Amb. 652. See, also, Abb. Shipp. by Shee (Ed. 1840) pt. 1, c. 1, § 3; 2 Kent, Comm. (4th Ed.) p. 132, § 45. In the next place, however the case may be as to a subsequent purchaser without notice, or to a creditor claiming by judgment and execution, where no possession is given by the part owner, or notice of the transfer given to the other part owners in possession, (which may require the application of a different principle,) it is clear, that as between the parties themselves to the transfer, the conveyance will pass a complete and effectual title, independent of the delivery of any possession. This is a known and old rule, applicable to the sale of all personal chattels. See 2 Bl. Comm. 448. In cases of bankruptcy, (independently of fraud,) as we have already seen, the assignee can take only what the bankrupt himself could lawfully hold; and he succeeds merely to that title, and nothing more. Nay, even in cases of reputed ownership, in bankruptcy, under the provision of the statute of 21 Jac. I. c. 19, §§ 10, 11, the omission of mortgagees to take possession of a ship for nine months after the transfer to them, and leaving the ship in the intermediate time in the possession and management of the mortgagees, has been held not to affect the title of the mortgagors, as against the assignees in bankruptcy, the mortgagees having, in fact, taken possession before the bankruptcy of the mortgagors; for the court said, that the ship could not be treated as within the order and disposition of the mortgagors at the time of their bankruptcy. Lord Chief Justice Abbott on that occasion added: "The bill of sale might be void upon the statute of Elizabeth, as against creditors; but not as against the parties, who executed it; and their assignees are in this respect in no better situation." Robinson v. M'Donnell, 2 Barn. & Ald. 134, 136. See, also, the remarks of Mr. Justice Bailey in the same case. The case of Briggs v. Parkman, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 258, is a very strong authority to show, that the omission to take possession of the mortgaged premises, being personal property, and agreeing, that until condition broken the mortgagor may retain the possession and use thereof, nay, even may sell and dispose thereof, substituting other property as security, are not to be deemed per se acts of fraud upon creditors;

but the presumption of fraud may be repelled, and the conveyance held good against the general assignees under the insolvent act of 1838 (chapter 163).

But it is further objected, that, notwithstanding the formal bill of sale to the trustees, yet, taking the other papers, the receipt given by the trustees, and the order on the policies, it was not the intention of the parties, that the title should pass to the trustees, but that the bill of sale and order were to be held as collateral security, and on repayment of the debt, the "bill of sale and order for insurance shall be returned to the owners, and be null and void." It strikes me, that this is a very forced and unnatural construction of the proceedings of the parties. Their manifest object was to give collateral security to the trustees, by way of mortgage on the vessel itself, and on the policies underwritten thereon, and not merely for them to hold the bill of sale as a formal instrument by way of pledge, without giving effect to it as a conditional transfer of the property. The permission of the owners to take the profits and earnings of the vessel in the intermediate time, and until the debt was to be paid, was not inconsistent with, but in pursuance of, the original agreement. The policies were underwritten, exactly as they should be, in the name of the mortgagors, who were the general owners, subject only to the rights of the mortgagees. The subsequent change of the papers by Edward McLellan, without the consent or knowledge of the trustees, could not change their rights, even if he intended thereby to affect them, of which there is not any evidence. In short, it appears to me, that no other sensible construction can be put upon the original transaction, than to treat it as an immediate conditional sale of the moiety of the vessel to the trustees, as collateral security for the debt due to them. But, then, it is said, that if the bill of sale is to be deemed, with the accompanying papers, to have created a mortgage, (as I think it clearly did,) then it is void, because it was not recorded, as required by Rev. St. Mass. c. 74, § 5. That section provides: "That no mortgage of personal property, hereafter made, shall be valid against any other person than the parties thereto, unless possession of the mortgaged property be delivered to, and retained by, the mortgagee, or unless the mortgage be recorded by the clerk of the town where the mortgagor resides." It may well admit of doubt, whether the statute was intended to apply to any cases of mortgages of undivided interests in personal property, of which, of course, no exclusive possession could be given to, or retained by, the mortgagee. But, assuming it to be otherwise, still the statute expressly holds such unrecorded mortgages to be valid between the parties; and the assignees in bankruptcy, as we have already seen, except in cases of fraud, take only what the bankrupt himself is entitled to.

But then again, it is urged, that the transaction is void under the second section of the bankrupt act of 1841 (chapter 9), as a conveyance made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving the trustees an undue preference as creditors. Now, this argument is mainly, if not wholly, founded upon the ground that the conveyance is not to be treated as a sale or conveyance of the moiety of the vessel to the trustees until the 17th of November, 1842 (only five days before the bankruptcy), when they gave notice to the master of the brig of their title, which notice, however, as the brig was then abroad, did not reach the master until long afterwards. But it appears to me, that the foundation on which the argument rests, utterly fails; for in the view which I take of the matter, the bill of sale took effect, as a mortgage, at the time of the execution and delivery thereof to the trustees on the 9th of December, 1841. There is no pretence to say, that at that time, either the mortgagors or the trustees contemplated any bankruptcy of the mortgagors. The notice to the master was not necessary to found a title in the trustees; but it was at most only an assertion of their title, necessary to be made for the protection of the master, and for the protection of the trustees against any subsequent bona fide purchaser or judgment creditor. The notice took effect from the time, when it was sent to the master; and the time, when it reached him, is not material, so far, at least, as the present assignee is concerned. The only remaining consideration, under any aspect of the case, would be as to the conveyance being founded in a positive actual fraud upon the creditors of the bankrupt. But this, upon the facts stated in the case, cannot be either inferred or presumed. And, indeed, as has been already suggested, no question arises under the petition and answer in the present case, either as to the conveyance having been made in contemplation of bankruptcy, or with an intent to defraud the creditors of the bankrupt.

Upon the whole, I shall direct it to be certified to the district court, upon the question adjourned into this court, that upon the facts set forth in the said petition and answer, the said one half of the said brig Napoleon, after the said Edward and W. H. McLellan were decreed bankrupts, was the property of, and should be holden by the said trustees, for the benefit of the said Rebecca McLellan, and that it was not the property of, or to be holden by the said assignee, for the benefit of the creditors of the estate of the said bankrupts.

TRUSTEES OF VESSEL—LIABILITY FOR MASTER'S WAGES—SET-OFFS.

1. Trustees holding the title of a vessel, and controlling and managing her, for the benefit of others, are liable for the wages of the master.

2. Charges by the owners, against the master, for passage of his minor son,—for freight of a piano forte,—for board-bill paid for him,—passage of his servant,—for regulating a chronometer,—and for use of extra state rooms, considered and decided upon.

This was a libel by the master of the ship Rockland against the owners, to enforce payment of $1761.42 wages, on a voyage round the globe, from New York to San Francisco, and Calcutta, and back to Boston. The defence was, that the respondents, Messrs. Sampson and Tappan, were not owners of the vessel, and not liable to Captain Winsor for wages; and secondly, if liable, they claimed a set-off of $1254.71, for various items specifically considered in the opinion of the judge.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for libellant.

William Dehon, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The first question is, whether the respondents are liable at all for wages. They say, in their answer, that they were not owners, and made no contract with the libellant. It appears that the register and bill of sale were in their names, as sole owners; but they say that they held merely as trustees, and an indenture of trust between them and one Horace B. Tebbets, of New York, has been produced. From this it appears that they were to hold the legal title and the possession of the vessel, to appoint the master, to collect the freight at all the ports, to determine the employment of the vessel, and at the end of the voyage, to sell the vessel, and after paying all expenses, to divide the net profits of the voyage, including the price obtained for the vessel, with said Tebbets and one Ward, giving one half to Tebbets and one quarter to Ward, and retaining the balance themselves. In pursuance of this indenture, they appointed Captain Winsor, gave him his instructions, from time to time, and it was to them he rendered his accounts at the end of the voyage. As mere trustees in possession, they would in law be liable for wages, unless the master agreed to exempt them, and looked to others. It is alleged in the answer, that he contracted with, and relied upon Tebbets, but the evidence is otherwise. Further, the respondents were not mere trustees. They had an interest in the vessel, and were trustees for themselves as well as Tebbets. On every principle, then, they must be held liable for the wages.

The remaining question is upon the claims against the master, which they present by way of set-off. They are six in number:

1st. A charge of $475 for the passage of the captain's son. The captain had leave to take his wife with him, and this was a boy about five years old, who went with his mother. The libellant says it was verbally agreed that the boy should go with his parents, and he has interrogated the respondents on this point, under oath. They deny all knowledge of the boy's going in the vessel, and their answer is evidence, and the only direct evidence. No knowledge of his going is traced to the respondents. In this state of the evidence, the master must pay for his son's passage, and it appears that $300 would be a proper charge.

2d. The next charge is $100 for freight of a piano, from New York to San Francisco. This piano belonged to Mrs. Winsor, was placed in the cabin, kept open, and used by Mrs. Winsor, and other ladies who were passengers. The evidence shows that it was taken as an article of furniture, and for use and amusement, and was not an incumbrance, but conducive to the pleasure of the passengers. This item, therefore, is disallowed.

3d. A deduction of $118.12 is claimed on the libellant's board bill, while at Singapore. The master's answer says that he was boarded at the lowest rate, and the bill was paid by the respondent's agent there, apparently without objection, and no evidence is offered to prove that the amount paid was unreasonable. This claim, therefore, is not allowed.

4th. The respondents charge $125 for the passage of a servant to the master, from Singapore to Boston. The evidence shows that this man was an assistant steward, signed the articles, and was paid by the owners; also that it was necessary to have such a person on a ship of this size, having three cabins, and that he did steward's duty, and did not attend more on the captain and his family, than on the other passengers. This item is disallowed.

5th. The next item is a charge of $34 for regulating the captain's chronometer at San Francisco, Singapore and Calcutta. It seems there were two chronometers on board, one belonging to the ship, and the other to the captain, and they were both regulated together. There is no evidence of the usage in such cases, and in the absence of a settled usage to the contrary, I think it reasonable that the expense of rating and regulating the captain's chronometer, where he used it for the benefit of the ship, solely, should be borne by the ship.

6th. The last item is a charge of $300 for the use of three extra state-rooms, on the passage from Calcutta. There was but one passenger, beside the captain's family, and the state-rooms in the three cabins were nearly all of them unoccupied, except by a few articles of ship's stores. The captain put several articles of his own in these rooms, with the ship's stores, but all his articles could have been stored in one room, if necessary, and were only distributed for convenience, and were not unreasonable in quantity. If there were reason to suppose that he used these rooms so as to displace freight or stores, he should be held answerable; but the evidence of both the supercargo and the mate shows, that there was no use for these rooms. It would be extremely unreasonable to charge him for them.

I shall allow the whole amount in the libel, less $300 for the son's passage. Decree for the libellant, for $1461.42, and costs.

COLLISION—CHANGE OF COURSE.

Mere apprehension of danger, not then imminent, is not sufficient to justify a change of course by a sailing-vessel meeting a steamer under way.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

[This was a libel for damages resulting from a collision by Joseph Winter against the steamer Hercules (Charles H. Winnett, claimant).]

J. C. Dodge, for claimant.

F. Goodwin, for libellant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Both parties have appealed from the decree of the district court, which awarded to the libellant one-half of his damages suffered in a collision between the steamer Hercules and the Antelope, a schooner of libellant. The collision occurred near Martha's Vineyard, three or four miles north of west from the Cross Rip light-ship. The wind was blowing heavily about east-south-east, accompanied by rain. The steamer was working to the eastward about three or four miles an hour through the water. The schooner was sailing westward before the wind eight or ten miles an hour through the water. Before either vessel changed her course in view of the pending collision, they were heading in nearly opposite directions; the schooner west by north, the steamer east-south-east one quarter east. The steamer struck the schooner about midships on her starboard side and nearly square across her. The steamer first starboarded; then the schooner, instead of keeping her course, starboarded; then the steamer changed and ported her helm. Then followed the collision. The schooner had the right of way, and was bound to keep her course. The steamer might go either side of the schooner, to starboard or port, as might be most safe. Without going into detail of the testimony, I am satisfied, upon a careful examination of the record, that if, when the steamer starboarded, she had adhered to that course without change, and the schooner had also kept her course, there would have been no collision. When the steamer starboarded, the schooner, apparently for the purpose of widening the distance between the two, also starboarded. But the steamer then changed and ported. This brought the schooner directly across the bow of the steamer. The schooner attempts to justify her change of course on the theory that it was not made until the collision was inevitable. I do not so find from the testimony. If the schooner had kept her course the probabilities are that the collision would not have taken place; that is, the correction of the mistake on the part of the steamer would not have been too late to avoid the collision if the course of the schooner had not been changed. Mere apprehension of danger does not exonerate the schooner for changing, unless the danger was imminent. It is contended on the part of the steamer that the first change of helm was corrected before it had occasioned any change in the course of the vessel. I have reached the conclusion from the testimony that the course of the steamer was changed, and that, if the order to port had been given at the time the first order to starboard was given, it would not have been too late to have avoided the collision. It is difficult to sift the truth from conflicting testimony on questions of time and distance. There are almost certain tests by which all other evidence in collision cases can ordinarily be tried in the undisputed facts of the case. Time and distance are the vital questions in this case. But looking to the facts as proved, I have reached the conclusion, not without some hesitation, that the steamer ported too late, and not until she was too near the schooner. The doubt in the district court was as to the fault of the schooner. The additional evidence before this court tends strongly to sustain the correctness of the conclusion of the district judge, holding her also in fault.

Decree affirmed, with interest and without costs after the appeal.

RAILWAY COMPANY—ACTS OF BANKRUPTCY—COMMERCIAL PAPER—PREFERENCE—TRANSFER OF STOCK.

1. The provisions of the bankrupt act apply to railway corporations, and if they commit an act of bankruptcy they may be proceeded against under that act.

[Cited in Re California Pac. R. Co., Case No. 2,315; Re Southern Minn. R. Co., Id. 13, 188; New Orleans. S. F. & L. R. Co. v. Delamore, 114 U. S. 506, 5 Sup. Ct. 1011.]

2. It is not an act of bankruptcy, under section 39 of the bankrupt act, as amended July 14th, 1870 (16 Stat. 276), for a railway company to suspend and not resume payment of its commercial paper for a period of fourteen days.

3. Object and effect of the said amendment of July 14th, 1870, discussed and considered.

4. An executory agreement by a railway company to transfer certificates of its stock to a creditor is not an act for which the company can be thrown into bankruptcy.

5. Effect of transfer by the company of its stock, discussed.

This is a petition for revision under the second section of the bankrupt act. Louis C. Winter filed his petition in the district court, representing that he was a creditor of the above named railway company, and charging that the company had committed certain specified acts of bankruptcy, asked that it be declared a bankrupt. To this petition a demurrer was sustained by the district court; and it is that ruling that the petitioning creditor, Winter, now seeks to have revised.

Brown & Dudley, for petitioner for revision.

O. C. Howe and Phillips & Phillips, for railway company.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The defendant is a railway corporation, organized under the general incorporation acts of the state of Iowa, and although not material, perhaps, to the determination of the legal questions now presented, counsel admitted that no part of its road was yet in operation.

The first ground of demurrer is that the defendant is not a "moneyed, business, or commercial corporation," within the meaning of the bankrupt act, and hence the provisions of that act do not apply to it. The provisions of this act shall apply to all moneyed, business, or commercial corporations, and joint stock companies. Section 37. Except as otherwise provided, corporations are within the bankrupt act (section 48) and in my judgment the purpose of congress in the use of the language above quoted from section 37 was to include all corporations of a private nature, organized for pecuniary profit. Instead of undertaking to enumerate by name or description the various kinds of such corporations, language broad enough to include them, and which would exclude corporations of a public, civil, or municipal character, as well as those organized purely and strictly for religious, charitable, educational, and like purposes, was employed.

Railways fall within the designation of business or commercial corporations. Domestic or inter-state commerce, as well as foreign commerce, is contemplated by the constitution, and is habitually carried on by land as well as by water. Indeed, since the general introduction of railways, it is a fact known to all that navigation by river has relatively become of secondary importance, and the inland commerce and travel of the country are largely conducted and carried on by means of railways.

The question whether railroad companies are within the operation of the bankrupt act has several times been before the courts, and so far as the researches of counsel have extended, it has been uniformly decided that they were. Alabama & C. R. Co. v. Jones [Case No. 126], per Woods, Circuit Judge; Adams v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. [Id. 47], per Shepley, Circuit Judge; approved and doctrine reaffirmed by Clifford, Justice, in Sweatt v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. [Id. 13, 684.] Concurring in the views expressed in the opinions in these cases, it is not necessary to enter into an extended discussion of the question, or to repeat the arguments by which the conclusion reached is sustained.

It has been strongly urged that the practical consequences of holding this view are so serious, involving the stoppage or interruption of the operations of the road when thrown into bankruptcy, that such a construction should not be adopted. But where the language and intent of the legislature are plain, such arguments belong not to the judiciary. When the language is doubtful and the intent obscure, it is permissible to look at consequences and guide our decision by the aid thus supplied, but such is not, in my judgment, the case with respect to the question now under consideration.

Under the laws of the state, railroads may mortgage their property, or it may be subjected to the payment of their debts by proper judicial order, and in this manner sold and transferred, and really the only question is whether insolvent railway companies shall be made to pay their debts under the collection laws of the state, or under the mode provided by the bankrupt act.

There may be practical difficulties or embarrassments in the administration in bankruptcy of a railway company, owing to the nature of the property, and this might suggest reasons to congress for excepting such corporations from the act, or for providing a special mode of proceeding; but it affords no sufficient grounds for a forced construction of the present statute so as to exclude such corporations from the scope of its operation.

One of the acts of bankruptcy charged in the petition is the non-payment for more than fourteen days of the commercial paper of the company, viz., two negotiable promissory notes, executed by the railroad company to the petitioning creditor. The demurrer to this portion of the petition presents the question whether the suspension and non-payment by a railroad company for more than fourteen days of its promissory notes is an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of section 39 of the act as amended by the act of July 14th, 1870 (16 Stat. 276). As thus amended, the act reads as follows: That any person residing and owing debts as specified in the act, "who, being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, has fraudulently stopped payment, or who has stopped or suspended, and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days."

As originally framed, this portion of section 39 of the act had given rise to controversy in respect to the question whether any non-fraudulent suspension by a "banker, merchant, or trader," (the only classes named,) of commercial paper, no matter how long continued, was an act of bankruptcy. Various opinions were entertained on this important practical question, and it was a question not free from doubt upon the phraseology of the original act. It was to settle this point that the amendment of July 14th, 1870, was enacted. Under the original act it is plain and undisputed that the person or corporation to be proceeded against under the clause must have been a banker, merchant, or trader. In making the amendment, congress did two things. First, it extended the provisions to "brokers," "manufacturers," and "miners," making six classes in all; and second, it provided in terms that the fraudulent stopping of payment by any person included in any one of these six classes, or the stopping or suspension and non-resumption of payment by any person included in any one of the enumerated six classes of his commercial paper for fourteen days, though not fraudulent, should be acts of bankruptcy. In other words, both clauses of the amendment extend to, and extend only to, persons belonging to one of the enumerated clauses. Mere suspension or non-payment of negotiable or commercial paper by any one else, as, for example, a farmer, or a mechanic, other than a manufacturer or trader, is not an act for which he may be thrown into bankruptcy; and, although I have read the argument in favor of the opposite view, made by a very able and experienced bankruptcy judge, I cannot agree to its correctness. In re Hercules Assur. Soc. [Case No. 6,402], per Blatchford, J.

As a railroad company organized under the laws of Iowa is neither a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, within the meaning of these words, as used in the bankrupt act, it follows on the supposition that the foregoing views are sound, that it cannot be proceeded against, in bankruptcy, for the mere suspension or non-payment, however long continued, of its commercial paper.

Another act of bankruptcy is alleged in the following language: "That the said railroad company, on the 7th day of August, 1872, being bankrupt and in contemplation of insolvency, did agree to issue to J. R. Mershon, its acting president, on demand, the certificates of stock of the said company, in the amount of $4,000, with the intent to give a preference to the said Mershon, and by such disposition of its property to defeat and delay the operation of the bankrupt act."

It is perhaps only necessary to observe that an unexecuted agreement by a company to transfer certificates of its stock is not an act for which it can be forced into bankruptcy.

Other acts of bankruptcy are charged to the effect that the company had actually transferred to creditors certificates of its stock, with intent to defeat or delay the bankrupt act by thus giving such creditors a fraudulent preference; and counsel have desired an opinion on the sufficiency of these counts of the petition.

The allegations are not sufficiently specific to warrant the expression of any very definite or final opinion upon the effect of the act charged. The rights of the stockholders are always subordinate to the rights of creditors, and it is difficult to see how the issue at par of the stock of the company not theretofore issued, in payment of the bona fide debts of the company could operate to the prejudice of creditors, or work a fraud upon them.

If, however, the stock was owned by the company as paid up stock lawfully acquired by it, it would probably be then regarded as ordinary property, and if disposed of by the authorized act of the corporation to creditors under circumstances to give them an illegal preference, no reason is perceived why it would not be an act for which the corporation could be proceeded against under the bankrupt law.

The order sustaining the demurrer to the petition of the creditor will be affirmed, and the cause remanded to the district court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. Affirmed.

Case No. 17,891.

WINTER v. LUDLOW.

[16 Leg. Int. 332, 340, 348; 1 3 Phila. 464.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct., 1859.

EQUITY JURISDICTION — NONJOINDER OF PARTY — SUPPLEMENTAL BILL—SUBPENA—SERVICE IN DIFFERENT DISTRICT.

1. The act of congress of 28th February, 1839 [5 Stat. 321], does not enable the circuit courts of the United States to make a decree in equity which may affect a resulting interest in the subject of controversy vested in a party not before the court.

2. Where an objection for the want of such a party has been sustained at a final hearing, the court, instead of dismissing the bill, usually retains the cause, in order that he may be made a party.

3. Where a person is a necessary party, in consequence of an act performed by himself after the commencement of the suit, the proper proceeding to bring him into court, is an original bill, in the nature of a supplemental bill.

4. Such a proceeding, though supplemental as to the former parties, is original as to the new party; and, though the former suit was commenced before the passing of the act of 4th May, 1838 [11 Stat. 272], may, if afterwards instituted, be within the meaning of that law, a suit brought after its enactment.

5. Under that act, and under the previous law and practice of the circuit courts in equity, a subpoena issued in such a case out of the circuit court, for either of two districts of a state, may be served in the other district of the same state.

In equity. After a final hearing, the decision of this cause was prevented by an objection that a decree could not be made until a person of the name of S. B. Ludlow should have been brought into court as a party. The question afterwards arose whether a subpoena issued by this court against this person, who was a resident of the Western district of the state, could be served upon him in that district. Upon the questions whether he was a necessary party, and whether he could thus be served with process, the opinion of the court was as follows:

CADWALADER, District Judge. S. B. Ludlow is not a person against whom, as a party, an enforcement of any decree by judicial process would be necessary. The question whether he was a necessary party, depended, therefore, upon the species of necessity which is determinable with a sole reference to the right of contestation recognized by courts of equity as belonging to every person who has an interest in the subject of controversy. The act of 28th February, 1839, provides that where, in any suit at law, or in equity, commenced in any court of the United States, there shall be several defendants, any one or more of whom shall not be inhabitants of, or found within, the district where the suit is brought, or shall not voluntarily appear thereto, it shall be lawful for the court to entertain jurisdiction, and proceed to the trial and adjudication of such suit between the parties who may be properly before it; but the judgment or decree rendered therein shall not conclude or prejudice other parties not regularly served with process, or not voluntarily appearing to answer; and the nonjoinder of parties who are not so inhabitants, or found within the district, shall constitute, no matter of abatement, or other objection to said suit. Under this act, a decree might have been made, without S. B. Ludlow as a party, so far as the amounts for which the original defendants were pecuniarily liable to the draftholders were concerned. But such a decree, if these defendants were still insolvent, might have been of little avail to the complainants. The question principally considered, therefore, has been whether under the act, or independently of it, the objection could be disregarded as to the fund in the hands of the receiver. Of this fund the resulting ownership is in S. B. Ludlow, who, if the complainants' case were fully sustained, has an option to redeem the fund by payment of the drafts in question from other sources. Independently of this right, he has an interest entitling him to contest every allegation of the bill on which a decree in favor of the draftholders might be founded, and to avoid, if he can, the effect of the complainants' allegations, by introducing new matter. The act of 1839 does not sanction a decree that may affect such an interest unless its proprietor is before the court as a party. Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 130, Coiron v. Millaudon, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 115, and Green v. Sisson [Case No. 5,768], show that the present case, as to the fund in the receiver's hands, must, therefore, be determined independently of that act.

In the circuit courts of the United States, in consequence of "the peculiar structure of their limited jurisdiction over persons," the general rule of equity practice, that all persons interested shall be brought in as parties, has not been applied without some qualification. Its unqualified application, in cases not within the act of 1839, would often divest these courts of their jurisdiction as it is defined in the constitution and acts of congress. Therefore, if a plaintiff has done all that lies in his power to bring every person interested before the court, a decree upon the merits may be made, though an interest exists in some person whom, as the resident of another state, the process of the court cannot reach, if the case may be completely decided as between the parties in court. But this relaxation of the rule has been admitted only where "the right of the party before the court did not depend upon the right of the party not before the court; each of their rights stood upon its own independent basis; and the ground upon which it was necessary, according to the general principle, to have both before the court, was, to avoid multiplicity of suits, and to have the whole matter settled at once." No exception from the rule has ever been allowed where the rights of the parties before the court, are not separable from, and independent of, the rights of the person who is not made a party. In such a case there can be no adjudication affecting the subject. This appears from the case of Mallow v. Hinde, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 197-199, cited in Shields v. Barrow [supra], and in other decisions which might be mentioned.

According to these rules of decision, the objection of the want of S. B. Ludlow as a party prevented a decree from being entered in favor of the complainants. For any reason other than to facilitate an appeal from a decision in support of this objection, the court was not willing to dismiss the bill hastily upon the objection. As between the complainants and the original defendants, this fund had been rightly taken into the custody of the court for the purpose of preventing its malappropriation. There was no want of jurisdiction between these original parties; and at the stage of the cause at which the receiver was appointed, the objection of the want of other necessary parties would not have prevented his appointment. See [Mallow v. Hinde] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 198; 2 Russ. 149, 152; 3 Hare, 62, 63. It might then have been expected that S. B. Ludlow, when apprised of the proceeding, would become a co-plaintiff. If, in an ulterior stage of the proceeding, the court found itself unable, without having him before it as a party, to make a decree upon the merits, the suggestion of the difficulty was by parties who did not support the objection upon any equity of their own. Whether a decree of dismissal could have been made at the instance of these defendants, without some provision for the future security of the fund in court, is a question which it was not necessary immediately to decide. The fund could not be restored to them, to be handed by them to Beebee & Company, under the wrongful acts of appropriation which have been mentioned, without permitting a palpable violation of honesty. Certainly, no decree, other than one in favor of the craft holders, would have been proper while there was any probability that, if the cause were retained, the impediment in the way of such a decree on the merits might be removed. In the above cited case of Mallow v. Hinde, an injunction against proceeding under judgments at law had been granted in an early stage of a suit in equity, in which the objection of want of parties finally prevailed. The necessary parties who could not be served with process were named Taylor and the Beards. The supreme court said: "We have no doubt the circuit court had jurisdiction between the complainants and the defendant Hinde, so far as to entertain the bill, and grant an injunction against the judgments at law, until the matter could be heard in equity. And if it had been shown to the circuit court, that from the incapacity of that court to bring all the necessary parties before it, that court could not decide finally the rights in contest, the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, might have retained the cause, and the injunction, on the application of the complainants, until they had reasonable time to litigate the matters of controversy between them and Taylor and the Beards in the courts of the state, or such other courts as had jurisdiction over them; and if then it was made to appear, by the judgment of a competent tribunal, that the complainants were equally interested with the rights of Taylor, the trustee, and the cestuis que trust, * * * the circuit court could have proceeded to decree upon the merits, * * * Such a proceeding would seem to be justified by the urgent necessity of the case, in order to prevent a failure of justice." [Mallow v. Hinde] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 198, 199.

The court suggested its readiness to dismiss the bill without prejudice, founding the dismissal upon the want of S. B. Ludlow as a party, if such a dismissal would expedite an appeal from such a decision of the point. But the complainants' counsel intimated no desire of an immediate decision for this purpose. The cause was retained, therefore, with a suggestion, however, from the court, that perhaps it could not be thus retained indefinitely. The practice in England, as Mr. Daniel states it on the authority of 2 Atk. 14, 3 Atk. 111, and 5 Brown, Parl. Cas. 504, is, not to dismiss a bill for want of parties immediately, when the objection is sustained, but to order the case thus to stand over. In Herndon v. Ridgway, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 425, a cause appears to have been retained twelve months before dismissal for want of parties upon motion in an earlier stage of the proceedings.

At this period the belief was that S. B. Ludlow, as a citizen of California and resident of that state, was not amenable to the process of the court. He had, however, as the complainants allege to have been afterwards ascertained by them, become, in the meantime, a citizen of Pennsylvania, by having resumed his residence in the state, but in the western district. The complainants have since adopted measures for making him a party. An objection to the sufficiency of these measures for their intended purpose has been interposed. It is made, not on his own part, but on that of the original defendants. Nevertheless, it must be considered, so far as it involves the question whether he has been effectually made a party in the cause.

The complainants appear to have assumed that, as to S. B. Ludlow, the necessary proceeding is for the simple addition of a party by way of amendment. This is a mistake. The foundation of the right of suit in this case is the appropriation made on the 1st September, 1851, by the original defendants. But S. B. Ludlow had, as we have seen, a right of ratifying this act so as to make it his own. His letter of 14th October, 1851, which appears to have been his first adoption of it, was not written until after the original bill in this case had been filed. If this letter had not operated as a ratification, it would have constituted in itself a sufficient independent appropriation for the security of some, if not of all of the draft-holders. Regarded as a ratification, its effect was to modify materially the character of the interest which had previously been equitably vested in the draft holders under the appropriation, as an act of the original defendants alone. Until thus ratified, it had taken effect only as the declaration of a trust attaching to these defendants' own interest in the ultimate proceeds of the remittances in their hands. It operated afterwards as an assignment of the immediate property in the remittances themselves upon a direct trust for the security of the draft holders. Even if the necessity for the proceeding against S. B. Ludlow had not, in part, arisen thus from a material occurrence happening after the filing of the original bill, he could not regularly have been brought in as a party by way of simple amendment in so late a stage of the cause. When a cause, after evidence taken or a master's report made, has been heard upon a bill, answer and replication, a new party who might, in an earlier stage, have been added by amendment, cannot regularly be brought in otherwise than by supplemental bill. But, a bill simply supplemental, or a supplemental bill in the nature of an amended bill, is a proceeding essentially different from that which must be instituted where parties have acquired, as the complainants had here acquired, a new or modified equitable or legal interest in the subject of litigation after the commencement of the original suit, or where the relation of defendants to the subject of controversy may be determinable, in part, by the effect of an occurrence happening—or as in this case, an act performed—since its commencement. Such a new proceeding may, according to the circumstances of different cases, approximate, in its character, in various degrees, to that of an original bill; and so far as a new party is concerned, may, sometimes even become a bill entirely original. In 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 2 (B) pl. 1, reasons are given for the rule, which was recognized nearly two centuries ago, that a devisee cannot bring a bill of revivor, for want of privity, but must bring his original bill. When a new party is to be added in respect of such an interest as was in question in the present case, and the effect of the proceeding against him depends, or may depend, upon the effect of an act which, like S. B. Ludlow's ratification of the paper in question, has occurred after the former suit was brought, the bill, though supplemental, as to the former parties, is, as to him, an entirely original bill. This is distinctly apparent in Vice Chancellor Shadwell's opinion in Woods v. Woods, 10 Sim. 210, 213, a case which, much less than the present, required such a decision. He founded his opinion upon texts of Lord Redesdale's treatise which he quoted. The following additional passages may be cited from the 4th edition of the treatise. On pages 72, 73, 98, and 99, Lord Redesdale specifies cases in which "the suit cannot be continued by a bill of revivor, and its defects cannot be supplied by a supplemental bill; but by an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill the benefit of the former proceedings may be obtained." He says (page 99): "This bill, though partaking of the nature of a supplemental bill, is not an addition to the original bill, but another original bill, which, in its consequences, may draw to itself the advantage of the proceedings on the former bill." He had on pages 63 and 64 defined cases in which parties to the suit are able to proceed in it to a certain extent, though, from an event subsequent to the filing of the original bill, the proceedings are not sufficient to attain their full object, as when the subsequent event gives a new interest in the matter in dispute to any person not a party to the former bill, or a new interest to a party. He observed, in effect, that in such cases, the defect may be supplied by a bill which is usually called a supplemental bill, and is, in fact, merely so, with respect to the rest of the suit, though with respect to its immediate object, and especially against any new party, it has also, in some degree, the effect of an original bill. He says on pages 72 and 73: "There seems to be this difference between an original bill in the nature of a bill of revivor, and an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill. Upon the first, the benefit of the former proceedings is absolutely obtained, so that the pleadings in the first cause, and the depositions of witnesses, if any have been taken, may be used in the same manner as if filed or taken in the second cause; and if any decree has been made in the first cause, the same decree shall be made in the second. But in the other case, a new defence may be made; the pleadings and depositions cannot be used in the same manner as if filed, or taken, in the same cause; and the decree, if any has been obtained, is not otherwise of advantage than as it may be an inducement to the court to make a similar decree." This passage was commented upon by Lord Eldon, 9 Ves. 54, 55, in the case of a tenant in tail, who, upon the death of a preceding tenant in tail party to a suit in equity, succeeded to the right of suit, not as heir of the former party, but as remainderman, "claiming," as Lord Eldon expressed it, "by force of a new limitation, and not by succession." He thought the right of such a party to the benefit of the former proceedings, including the depositions, dependent upon such order as the court might make upon a view of the circumstances of the case. See, also, 13 Sim. 287, 288; 2 Hare, 95, 96. In the case in 10 Sim. from which Vice Chancellor Shadwell's opinion has been quoted, a bill was filed against a trustee with power to sell, and a purchaser from the trustee, to set aside the purchase on the ground of fraud. The purchaser, after filing his answer, died. The plaintiff then filed against his devisees the bill which Sir Lancelot Shadwell denominated original as to them, though supplemental as to the trustee. The question was, whether the insertion by the pleader, in the latter bill, of nearly the whole of the contents of the original bill, was, or was not, according to the rules of equity practice, objectionable. It would have been objectionable, if the proceeding in question had been, as to the new parties, a continuance of the original proceeding. The vice chancellor decided that it was not objectionable, because the suit, as to them, was an entirely new one. It was, he thought, not less a suit newly brought as to them because the former proceeding was continued against the original parties. In our practice, a supplemental bill which, as to a new party, is an original bill, would no doubt be sustained if references to the contents of the original bill on file were so made as to incorporate the parts referred to, without repeating them at length. In the case which has been cited, the decision was, not that they "must," but that they "might" be thus repeated.² The omission to repeat them would not render the substantial character of the proceeding less that of a suit newly brought against such a party.

The case thus decided was not one in which the point arose, as it here arises, upon an act of the new defendant himself, performed after the commencement of the original suit. The present case is, therefore, even more clearly, that of a new suit against S. B. Ludlow, in respect of his act of ratification, than the case decided by Vice Chancellor Shadwell. The proper character and form, in this respect, of a proceeding for the purpose of bringing in S. B. Ludlow as a party, having been thus determined, we may, before considering further the sufficiency of the particular measures which have been adopted for the purpose, inquire whether the process of the circuit court for this district of the state, can, in any mode, be executed for the purpose, in the other district.

The compulsory exercise of the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, through the execution of process by the marshals of the respective districts, may, where a state has been divided into two or more districts, depend upon the division of the state in which a party resides, or may be served with process. The marshal, where his authority has not been, for special purposes, enlarged by particular legislation, can "execute throughout the district" for which he has been appointed, all such lawful precepts issued under the authority of the United States as may be directed to him; but cannot go out of his district. The occasional consequent limitation of the exercise of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts is, however, not a limitation of the jurisdiction itself. This jurisdiction of the circuit courts never depends upon the district of a state in which one of her citizens resides or may be found. The jurisdiction, as to all persons, except aliens, depends upon citizenship alone of the respective states. In the present case, therefore, the question is not of jurisdiction, but of its exercise. See [Gracie v. Palmer] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 699; [Harrison v. Rowan] [Case No. 6,140].

Under acts of congress now in force, there are states of which each constitutes a single judicial district. The other states are divided, each into two or more districts. No state is divided into districts which are in different circuits; and no district is composed of parts of any two states. Under the judicial system of the United States, the relations, within a state, of two districts into which it has been divided, are, for many purposes, different from the relations of either or both to the district of any other state. The differences depend as well upon considerations of uniformity in the exercise of jurisdiction, as upon those of the separate sovereignties of the several states, which require, for the one case, provisions not needed for the other. For some purposes, the several districts of a state are little else than divisions of a district composed of the entire state.

The general motives and purposes of the series of statutes which have organized the system, and regulated the course of procedure under it, have been consistent and uniform. The act of 13th February, 1801 [2 Stat. 89], by which the courts were temporarily re-organized, should not, however, be regarded as one of the series. If a deviation, or tendency to deviate, in some particulars, from their otherwise uniform policy may be detected in certain provisions of this act, the extreme shortness of the time during which it was permitted to remain in force, and the complete restoration of the previous system effected by its early repeal, furnish sufficient reasons to dismiss it from consideration under this head, and render any recurrence to the well known historical causes of its repeal unnecessary. The judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], contained peculiar provisions as to Kentucky and Maine. The provisions have ceased to be in force; but their former motives require explanation. Kentucky, though a part of Virginia, was, under the provision in the constitution for the admission of new states, on the very point of becoming a separate state. As to her, the legislation was for her prospective condition of a state. Maine, though a part of Massachusetts, was territorially detached. So far as the course of procedure might be concerned, she was to be treated as a separate jurisdiction. In order that crossing and recrossing the intervening state of New Hampshire, in the service of process, might be avoided. This act made Kentucky and Maine each a separate district. Neither of these two districts was made a part of any judicial circuit. The act conferred the jurisdiction of a circuit court upon the district court of each of them, so far as this could be done without making it a circuit court. Eleven other judicial districts, created by the act, were composed, each, of one of the eleven states which had then ratified the constitution. These eleven states, as districts, were divided into three circuits, each composed of two or more such states as districts. The two other original states having afterwards ratified the constitution, each of them was, in the year 1790, made a district, and annexed to one of the three former circuits. In 1792, under an act passed in 1791 [Id. 189] Kentucky was admitted as a state, without any immediate change in the provisions, concerning her, of the act of 1789. Vermont, having also become a state, was, in 1791, made a district, and annexed to one of the original circuits. There thus were sixteen judicial districts. Each of the fifteen states constituted an entire district, except Massachusetts, whose detached territory, constituting a separate district, was not a division like any of the divisions of states into districts which were afterwards made.

Lest a doubt should arise whether, under this organization of the courts of the United States, their process might not, in certain cases, run beyond their jurisdiction, the act of 1789, provided, or as Judge Washington says, "declared," that no civil suit should be brought before either of the said courts against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process in any other district than that in which he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ. In the reported cases, the effect of this enactment has been considered with a sole reference to the constructive, or actual service of process beyond the limits of the state, as well as district, for which the court issuing it was held. These cases recognize, as independent of the enactment, the rule that a controversy is not cognizable by a tribunal which has jurisdiction of neither the thing nor the person against whom proceedings are directed. They regard the prohibition in the act as a measure of precautionary legislation to prevent a departure from this rule in the procedure of the courts of the United States. Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 300; Piquet v. Swan [Case No. 11,134]; Ex parte Graham [Id. 5,657]; Allen v. Blunt [Id. 215]; Day v. Newark Co. [Id. 3,685].

A suit in equity, in which the original process is a writ of subpoena to appear and answer, was, of course, included in this prohibition. In the introduction to Crompton's Practice, published three years before the act was passed, this writ, as used on the equity side of the English court of exchequer, in imitation of the course of proceeding in chancery, had been denominated "an original process in a civil action." It was perhaps the original process as to which the precaution of such an enactment was, most of all, necessary. As a process directed immediately to parties defendant, it differs from the original process in suits at law, which is directed to the marshal, sheriff, or other local officer by whom it is to be executed. In consequence of this difference from process ministerially directed, it was, at one time, supposed in England that service of a subpoena upon a defendant in Scotland, or even beyond the four seas, if personally made, would be sufficient. 2 Madd. Ch. Prac. (2d Ed.) p. 199. The opinion was apparently sustained by reported cases. But upon examination of the registrar's book, it was afterwards discovered that these cases had been misreported. A service of the subpoena made beyond the jurisdiction of the court which issues it, except in modes, and under circumstances in which it has, from time to time, been authorized by statutes, is now regarded in England either as an absolute nullity, or as an insufficient foundation for any process of contempt for non-appearance. 2 Sim. 544; 4 Paige, 429; 1 Moll. 244, 245; 1 Hogan, 79, 131; 6 Bl. & Bl. 824, 825. And see the reports of the last case in 2 Jur. (N. S.) 787, and 36 Eng. Law & Eq. 179. The same rule now applies as to service of the writ in Jersey, Guernsey, and the other Norman isles which are under British dominion, but in which English laws are not in force, and the jurisdiction of English courts is not exercisable. Fernandez v. Corbin, 2 Sim. 544. See 4 Inst. 286; 11 Exch. 64, 67, 68. A case reported as having occurred in the year 1781, shows, however, that at the date of the act of 1789, there was in England a contrariety of opinion upon the general subject. 2 Dick. 587.

While every state, except Massachusetts with reference to Maine, constituted still a single entire district, the act of 2d March, 1793, § 6 [1 Stat. 335], enacted that subpoenas for witness required to attend a court of the United States, in any district, may run into any other district, provided that, in civil causes, the witnesses do not live out of the district at a distance greater than one hundred miles from the place of holding the court. This, it is believed, is the only law of the United States which, for any purpose whatever, authorizes any process issued on behalf of a private party to cross the line of a state. By an act of 9th June, 1794 [1 Stat. 395], "the state of North Carolina" was "divided into three districts, in which the district court of the said state" was to "be held at such times and places as" were "already ascertained by law" for the stated sessions of the court. The act defined the territorial extension of the respective districts. It created no new or distinct court. The judge, clerk, and marshal, a single officer of each denomination, retained respectively their former positions for the whole original district, of which the so called new districts were thus divisions. An act of 1797 [Id. 517] reunited them as a single district; but an act of 29th April, 1802, again divided the state into three such districts or divisions. The same act of 29th April, 1802 [2 Stat. 156], divided Tennessee which had, in the meantime, been admitted as a state, into two districts. The court of each district was to be held by the judge of the former district in whose office no change was made; but the districts were not the less distinctly organized with a different clerk, marshal, and attorney of the United States for each. The subsequent acts as to Tennessee prior to one of the year 1822 which will be particularly mentioned under a distinct head, require no citation. An act of 9th April, 1814 [3 Stat. 120], "for the more convenient transaction of business in the courts of the United States within the state of New York," divided that state into two districts. But there was no marshal in the state other than the former one officiating under his previous commission, until the 3d March, 1815 [Id. 235], when an act authorizing the appointment of a marshal for the Northern district impliedly limited the official character of the former incumbent and his successors to that of marshal for the Southern district. By an act of 20th April, 1818 [Id. 462], Pennsylvania was divided into an Eastern and Western district each separately organized, with a judge, district attorney, and marshal of its own; and by an act of 4th February, 1819 [Id. 478], Virginia was divided into two similar districts. These respective acts conferred upon the district court of the Western district of each of the two states, in addition to the ordinary jurisdiction and powers of a district court, the jurisdiction of all causes, except appeals and writs of error, cognizable by law in a circuit court, subject to writs of error in modes respectively provided. The law dividing Pennsylvania contained an enactment in the words: "All actions, suits, process, pleadings, and other proceedings of a civil nature, except in cases of appeals and writs of error, commenced and pending in the district or circuit court of said district of Pennsylvania, in which no verdict shall have passed, or plea to the merits shall have been decided, and which, by law, should have been or commenced in said district court of said Western district, if the same had been had or commenced before the passing hereof, and where the parties shall not otherwise agree, shall be and hereby are continued over to the district court of the Western district established by this act, and shall there be proceeded in with like effect and in the same manner as if originally had or commenced therein."

No other state had been divided into districts when the supreme court, in February term, 1822, under the authority of the act of May, 1792, § 2 [1 Stat. 276], prescribed "rules of practice for the courts of equity of the United States." A comparison of the acts which had thus divided five of the states, indicates that there had not been any uniform system of legislation on the subject. The general purpose of these acts, indeed their sole purpose, had been a convenient partition of the judicial business within the respective states. An extinction of any part of the former business of the courts was not intended. So far as it had occurred indirectly through the provisions of the acts, it was a result of defective legislation. The result, perhaps, may not have been produced at all in North Carolina, where one marshal still officiated for the whole state. However this may have been, the result in New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, was, that in suits at law, as the process could not be directed otherwise than to the marshal of the district in which it was issued, it could not be served in another district of the state. Where the jurisdiction existed, its exercise was thus prevented in cases in which the defendants, though citizens of the state, did not appear, and could not be served with process in the district. For such cases, a partial remedy of this evil was provided by the above mentioned act of 1839, and a complete remedy by an act of 4th May, 1858 [11 Stat. 272], which will be mentioned hereafter.

In the case of a subpoena to testify, the act of 1783 had been intended merely to sanction crossing the line of a state for the purpose of service of the writ upon a witness not living more than one hundred miles from the place of trial. After certain states had subsequently been divided into districts, the act, of course, authorized the service of it upon such a witness beyond the line of the district, but within the limits of the state in which it was issued, if a legislative authority for such a service of it was required. But in the case of a witness living within the state, more than one hundred miles from the place of holding the court, who has been served within the state, but out of the district, though service of the subpoena should be deemed regular, there cannot be an attachment if he disobeys his mandate. Whether the service of the subpoena would be deemed regular or not is, therefore, a question of little, if any, practical importance, and one which, in practice, can scarcely arise.

But the case of a subpoena to appear and answer in an equity is, in this respect, different in the courts of the United States. The difference has existed since the adoption of the rules of 1822, if not from an earlier period. The effect of the prior legislation which has been mentioned, upon the case of defendants in a suit in equity, citizens of the same state, but not residing or found within the same district of the state, has been different from its effect in suits of law. The writ of subpoena to appear and answer in equity, as process directed, immediately to the defendants themselves, has already been distinguished from original process at law. The subpoena differs in like manner from the subsequent processes of contempt for not appearing in obedience to its mandate, or for not answering after appearance. These processes, of which the attachment is the first, are directed in England to the sheriff or other local officer. A marshal of the United States cannot execute one of these processes beyond his district. But it by no means followed that the process of subpoena, when issued by the circuit court for one of the districts of a state, could not, in any case, be served in another district of the same state. Until the promulgation by the supreme court of the rules of 1842, this process might have been served by any person. The rules of 1822 had not required that it should in any case be served by a marshal. The 8th of those rules merely required that it should be executed by a sworn officer, or that affidavit of the service of it when executed by any other person should be made. The 15th of the rules of 1842 is that "the service of all process, mesne and final, shall be by the marshal of the district, or his deputy, or by some other person specially appointed by the court for that purpose, and not otherwise. In the latter case, the person serving the process shall make affidavit thereof." The subpoena, when there is no special order of the court, is under this rule, in substance and effect, process directed to the marshal, but it is not in form directed to the marshal. Other process is directed to him, and cannot be directed, even by the court's order, to any other person, except in the case in which he or his deputy is a party, as provided by the act of 1789. The distinction between such other process and the subpoena to appear and answer is recognized in the rule of 1842, which does not limit the court's power to direct that the subpoena shall be served by another person to this case alone in which the marshal is a party. This power, under the rule, is exercisable, therefore, whenever its exercise may, in the opinion of the court, promote the ends of justice, conformably to the rules prescribed by congress in organizing the courts and regulating their procedure.

We have seen that in England the service of such a subpoena out of the realm is not regarded as effectual, because the writ cannot run beyond the limits of the jurisdiction. But the process of subpoena always ran, throughout the realm, into its territorial divisions, in which ministerially directed processes of the courts of chancery, including the processes of contempt, could not be executed by any local officer to whom they might have been addressed. The subpoena was the former process to bring in a party to answer a charge before the king in council (see Hale, Jur. H. L. pp. 7, 44), and was, for some remedial purposes, a usual process of the court of chancery as early as the reign of Edward III., when the jurisdiction of the court was beginning to show traces of a partial independence of that of the council. See the records in 1 Rolle, Abr. 372. The present equitable jurisdiction of the court, if not that which was thus exercised at that period, originated in it; and the process was indubitably the same. If a question could have arisen as to the propriety, there could be none as to the power of sending this original process into any part of the realm. See 2 Burrows, 856. Chief Baron Gilbert (Forum Rom.) appears to have thought that the subpoena to appear and answer had been adopted from the common-law process to bring in a witness to testify. The subpoena to testify, like the subpoena to answer, cannot be served beyond the jurisdiction of the court which issues it. But it runs into every part of the territory which is within the court's jurisdiction. Thus, in Pennsylvania, when it issues from one of the courts to the respective counties, it runs into every county of the state. 2 Serg. & R. 349.

The distinction between the process which is directed to a local officer, and the process of subpoena directed to the party, has been exemplified in England in the case of a defendant residing in one of the counties palatine. The peculiar jurisdiction of the court of equity of the palatinate is exercisable only "between parties dwelling within the same, and for lands there, and for other local matters." Hales v. Daniel, Nels. Ch. 67, 68; 1 Cas. Ch. 41; Moor v. Somerset, Nels. Ch. 51. Thus defined, it is an exclusive jurisdiction. But if the suit is not of a local nature, or if any one party resides elsewhere, or if complete justice cannot, for any other cause, be rendered in that court, the court of chancery of England, or the court of exchequer on its equity side, has the jurisdiction. The legal presumption is always in favor of the jurisdiction of the superior court until a case has been shown, upon plea, to be exclusively cognizable, and sufficiently remediable, by the local court. A subpoena to appear and answer in an equity suit in chancery, or in the exchequer, may, therefore, be served in the county palatine. Cheetham v. Crook, McClel. & Y. 307; Egerton v. Derby, 4 Inst. 213, 12 Coke, 114; Edgworth v. Davis, Nels. Ch. 66; Owen v. Holt, Hob. 77; Ld. Redes. Tr. (4th Ed.) 224, 225, and the cases there cited. But independently of the statute (27 Hen. VIII. c. 24, § 3) and some other acts of parliament, the court of chancery, if the defendant had not appeared, could not have issued an attachment or other process of contempt to be executed within the palatinate. That act provided that, after a day named in it, all process in every county palatine should be made in the name of the king by the person having the royalty, and should be tested in the name of such person. Under this enactment, the process could not regularly be issued out of the chancery in the name of the king, directed to the sheriff of the county palatine. The practice was to issue out of the chancery of England a writ in the name of the king, directed to the chief judicial officer³ of the county palatine, requiring him, under the seal of the county, in the name of the king, to command the sheriff of the county to attach the defendant. See Lord Cholmondeley's Case, cited by Lord Kenyon in 6 Durn. & E. [6 Term. R.] 73. If the writ were addressed directly to the sheriff of the county palatine, it would, on motion, be quashed. Bradshaw v. Davis, 1 Chit. 374. And see Bracebridge v. Johnson, 1 Brod. & B. 12. The effect of British statutes of the present century has been to alter this practice as to the palatinates of Durham and Chester. But it was followed as to the duchy of Lancaster after their enactment. Lord Kenyon thought that so soon as the writ of attachment, properly tested, had been made out in the county palatine, and been delivered there to the sheriff, he became responsible directly to the court of chancery for his acts and omissions under it. The practice in the chancery, when obedience by the sheriff is to be enforced, is, however, to make an order upon the judicial officer of the palatinate to return the writ directed to him, and afterwards to make an order upon the sheriff of the county palatinate to return the second writ.

In England these distinctions between the process of subpoena and processes of contempt have been matters rather of form than of substance. Judgment that the bill be taken as confessed cannot there be entered until the defendant, after appearance, has been proceeded against as in contempt for not answering. Consequently, the question of the regularity of the place of service of the subpoena has usually arisen upon a subsequent application for an attachment, when it has, for practical purposes, been resolved into a question whether the attachment could be executed there. If it could not, the regularity of the service of the subpoena had usually been a point of no practical importance. But in the courts of the United States, a different practice, which had prevailed in some of the states before the judiciary act of 1789, and had been followed under it in some of the circuits, was established on a uniform footing for all of them by the rules of 1822. According to this practice, if the defendant did not appear and file his answer within a prescribed period after the proper day for his appearance, the complainant, at his option, instead of proceeding by attachment, might "proceed to take his bill for confessed," or he might have a general commission to take depositions, and proceed to a hearing, as if there had been an answer and replication. The rules of 1842, omitting the latter alternative require that, at the bottom of the subpoena, shall be placed a memorandum that the defendant is to enter his appearance on or before the return day, "otherwise the bill be taken pro confesso"; and provide for the entry of an order that it be so taken if he do not answer within a prescribed period. The judiciary act of 1789 would thus have given cognizance of the present case to this court; and the acts which have since divided the original district have neither taken the jurisdiction away, nor prevented its exercise. According to the practice recognized or established by the rules of 1822, and continued under those of 1842, if an equity suit was properly brought in any district against certain defendants, there could be no difficulty, doctrinal or practical, in the service of a subpoena upon other defendants, citizens of the same state, residing in another district of the state. Under the rules of 1822, this writ might have been served upon them by any person. Under the rules of 1842, there could be no difficulty in obtaining, in a proper case, a special appointment by the court of a person to make the service. After waiting the prescribed time to afford an opportunity for contestation by the party served, an order might, if he did not appear, be obtained, that the bill, as to him, should be taken as confessed. As no further decree, and no enforcement of any decree, would, as to S. B. Ludlow, be necessary in this cause, it might, after such an order, proceed against other parties without further impediment under this head. This, it has been said, would have been the practice in a case like the present, properly brought in the district in which the process was issued. In the present case, the question whether this was the proper district could have been attended with no difficulty. The principal, as well as the primary, cognizance of the cause was here.

But, in cases of a different character, the question which district was the proper one for the cognizance of an equity suit against defendants, within the jurisdiction, but residing in different districts of the same state, must often have been attended with embarrassing difficulties. A simple rule would have been, that the filing of the bill in either district, and primary service of process within its limits upon any one defendant, should always vest the cognizance of the cause in the circuit court of such district. In an equity suit, however, the casual primary service upon a mere formal party, having an insignificant interest, or, perhaps, no interest whatever in his own right, might, under such a rule of practice, have taken away the right of adjudication from the court of the district in which the controversy would seem, in a particular case, to be principally cognizable. But the objection thus founded upon the contingent occasional occurrence of such a case was outweighed by considerations in favor of a rule of certain uniform applicability. Therefore, a series of particular statutes, beginning in the year 1822, determined, according to this rule, the practice of the circuit courts for the several districts of the respective states of Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, Iowa, Ohio, and Texas. The last of these particular enactments was in 1857. The first of them had passed on 30th March, 1822. It enacted as to suits by citizens of the United States in the circuit courts of the United States for either the district of East, or of West, Tennessee, against two or more citizens of the state of Tennessee, some of whom should reside in East, and some in West, Tennessee; that the plaintiff might cause the clerk of the circuit court in which he should elect to commence his suit, to issue duplicate writs, one directed to the marshal of East, and the other to the marshal of West, Tennessee, which writs it should be the duty of the respective marshals to execute and return, and that, when returned, they should be docketed, and proceeded in to judgment as one case only. A provision authorizing executions to run from one district of the state into the other was added. An act of 18th January, 1839 [5 Stat. 321], divided the state into three districts, and re-enacted the above provisions of the act of 1822, confining, however, its provisions to suits not of a local nature, but omitting the restriction which had confined their application to cases in which citizens of the United States were plaintiffs. The form of the acts passed before 1839, as to Alabama and Mississippi, and after 1839 as to Georgia, Iowa, Ohio, and Texas, differed from the act as to Tennessee only in the degrees in which the language used in them, respectively, approximated that of a general act passed on 4th May, 1858 [11 Stat. 272], for the apparent purpose of regulating the practice, under this head, upon a uniform footing throughout the United States.

The general act of 4th May, 1858 [11 Stat. 272], is entitled "An act to provide for the issuing, service and return of original and final process in the circuit and district courts of the United States in certain cases." The first section enacts "that all suits not of a local nature hereafter to be brought in the circuit and district courts of the United States, in a district in any state containing more than one district, against a single defendant, shall be brought in the district in which the defendant resides; but if there be two or more defendants residing in different districts in the same state, the plaintiff may sue in either district, and issue a duplicate writ against the defendants directed to the marshal of any other district within the state in which any of the defendants reside, on which duplicate writ the clerk issuing the same shall endorse that it is a true copy of a writ sued out of the court of the proper district; and such original, and duplicate writs, so issued, shall, when executed, be proceeded on accordingly; and upon any judgment rendered in a suit so brought, process of execution may be issued and directed to the marshal of any district in the same state. And in suits of a local nature, where the defendant resides in a different district in the same state than the one in which the suit is brought, the plaintiff may have original and final process against such defendant directed to the marshal of the district in which he resides." The second section enacts "that in all cases of a local nature, at law, or in equity, where the land, or other subject matter of a fixed character, lies partly in one district, and partly in another district within the same state, the plaintiff may bring his action or suit in the circuit or district court of either district; and the court in which any such action or suit shall have been commenced, as aforesaid, shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide the same, and to cause mesne or final process to be issued and executed as fully as if the land or other subject matter were wholly within the district for which such court is constituted."

In suits which are within the enactments of this law, every case which can arise, in practice, under this head, appears to have been provided for. The provisions of the second section include, certainly, suits in equity, as well as actions at law. The provisions of the first section likewise apply to suits in equity, if the phrase "writ against the defendant directed to the marshal" includes the subpoena to appear and answer. Unless the phrase is interpreted so as to include this writ, the uniformity in the practice under the act throughout the United States which it appears to have been intended to secure, cannot be attained. This will be seen upon a recurrence to the above mentioned particular statutes as to Tennessee, in the first of which, passed, as above, in 1822, the legislation in question originated. These acts were an adaption to the courts of the United States for Tennessee of a practice which appears to have been familiar in the courts of the state in suits in equity. 6 Yerg. 85. Such suits must, therefore, have been within the intended application of the above mentioned acts of 1822 and 1839, as to the districts of Tennessee. The words of these acts were not more applicable to suits of the kind than the words of the act of 1858. While Tennessee was a part of North Carolina, "an act for giving an equity jurisdiction to the superior courts" for the respective districts of that state, passed in 1782, had conferred upon them the jurisdiction previously exercised by the court of chancery under the British government. It enacted that, upon the filing of the bill, the clerk should "issue a writ of subpoena, as is usual in cases of chancery," or, upon a special order of a judge to hold the defendant to bail, should issue, for this purpose, a writ in a prescribed form, directed to the sheriff. "Upon such writ or subpoena being duly served, and a copy of the bill delivered in proper time, proof being made to the satisfaction of the court, by return of the sheriff, or by affidavit, the defendant" was to "appear, and put in his answer, or plea, agreeably to the practice in chancery, or demur, or, on failure thereof, the plaintiff's bill" was to "be taken pro confesso." The subpoena in equity seems to have been regarded, in some of the states, from a period prior to the judiciary act of 1789, and in some of the circuit courts of the United States, from a period long anterior to the adoption of the rules of 1842, as process directed, in the state courts, to the sheriff, and in the federal courts, to the marshal. A statute of New Jersey, passed on 13th June, 1799, enacted "that it shall be the duty of the sheriff, or coroner, as the case may require, of any county in this state to whom any subpoena, order, attachment, process of sequestration, writ of execution, or other process issuing out of the court of chancery shall be directed or delivered, to serve, or execute, the same, and to make return thereof at the time and place therein mentioned, which shall be filed by the clerk"; and "that every subpoena, or process for appearance shall be served on the person to whom it is directed, or a copy thereof left at his dwelling house, or usual place of abode, at least ten entire days prior to its return." In this act, the subpoena, though in form directed to the person to be served, is classed with process ministerially directed. From the case of Kennedy v. Brent, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 191, it may be inferred that in the circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of Virginia,⁴ the practice, adopted from that of the state, was in the year 1810, that the subpoena in equity might be served by any person, but that its delivery to the marshal to be executed imposed upon this officer a duty to serve it not less obligatory than if it had been formally directed to him. Its delivery to a sheriff in England imposed no such obligation upon the sheriff.

If the act of 1858 had been passed before the adoption of the rules of 1842, the writ of subpoena to appear and answer in equity could not, however, in this court, have been regarded as process directed to the marshal, in any sense in which the phrase could have been understood here. But even here, the process may, under these rules, be understood as one of this description. The rules having been promulgated under the authority of an act of congress, have, in some degree, the force of statutory regulations. They provide, as above, that the service of all process in equity, including the subpoena, shall be by the marshal of the district, or his deputy, or by some other person specially appointed by the court. Independently of the act of 1858, when an order for service by another person is not applied for, the process cannot, under the rules of 1842, be served otherwise than by the marshal of the district, or his deputy. In such a case the record of the proceedings may, with great propriety, recite the filing or exhibition of the bill, and, after setting it forth, state that process of subpoena was thereupon awarded and issued, to be served by the marshal of the district, or by his deputy. The writ also might, with equal propriety, be endorsed by the clerk, at the complainant's instance, that it was to be served by the marshal, or his deputy, according to the rules. See [Kennedy v. Brent] 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 189. With or without such an endorsement, the subpoena, appearing by the record to have been thus awarded, is, as has already been suggested, in substance and effect, under the rules of 1842, process directed to the marshal. In the case of Allen v. Blunt [Case No. 215] Judge Nelson appears to have thought that, in the absence of everything like such an entry of record or endorsement, the subpoena could not be regarded as a process directed to the marshal. In that case the question was, whether service of a subpoena, in equity, upon the defendant, appeared by the marshal's return to have been made in the district of Massachusetts. The return did not state where it had been served. Judge Nelson, remarking that the fact of the service upon the defendant in the district of Massachusetts rested wholly upon the subpoena and return, said: "The writ of subpoena is not directed to the marshal for anything that appears in the record; and the return speaks of the service of a notice upon Blunt, which might very well refer to the memorandum accompanying the subpoena, directing that the appearance of the defendants must be entered on or before the return day of the writ, or the bill would be taken pro confesso." These observations would seem to import that, though the subpoena is, in the body of it, directed to the defendant, and not to the marshal, yet the record of the proceeding under which it has been issued, and is to be served, may contain what renders it process directed to the marshal, by whom it is to be served, and whose return is to attest the service.

Under an act of 1858, a bill averring residence of the defendants in different districts of the state, might very properly pray that the process, in duplicate, should be awarded for execution by the respective marshals, according to the provisions of the act. The clerk, in making out the record, would then very properly set forth an award of process accordingly; and he might endorse the duplicates of the subpoena with a direction that service of it by each of the respective marshals be made upon the defendants residing in his district. Each duplicate would thus become process directed to the marshal of one of the districts. These formalities might, perhaps, all, or some of them, be dispensed with, leaving the act of 1858 and the rules of 1842 to define their own effect. The ascertainment of their effect is, however, facilitated by stating thus a case of the fullest compliance with such formalities. This act of 1858 may, therefore, be interpreted as applicable to a suit in equity. Had it been interpretable as a measure entirely of intended new legislation, and thus applicable to suits in equity, it would show that, in the opinion of congress, the subpoena in equity did not, in any case, run out of the district in which it was issued into another district of the same state. The circumstance that the act, in express terms, is limited in its application to suits brought after its enactment, would then have added force to this argument. In part, the purpose of the act was to remedy absolute defects in the previous legislation. Thus in certain states, including Pennsylvania, it restored, in suits at law, the exercise of the jurisdiction on a footing as extended as before any division of the respective states into districts; and rendered the practice in them the same as that already established, by particular acts, for Tennessee and certain other states. But its purpose was also to settle the practice under other heads, according to rules applicable alike in all parts of the United States. We have seen that although, before its enactment, the subpoena from a district in which a suit in equity was properly brought, might have run into another district in the same state, yet the question, in which of two districts of a state the cause was properly cognizable, might often have been involved in embarrassing uncertainty. Under the act, the residence of any one defendant in either district in which the bill may be filed suffices always to determine the question, and sustain a service of process in the other district. The act thus furnishes, as to suits in equity, a uniform rule of proceeding, where the practice might otherwise have been uncertain and variable.

This law certainly contains enactments which are not new. Its first enactment that all suits not of a local nature, "in a district in any state containing more than one district, against a single defendant," should be brought in the district in which he resides, is clearly declaratory. It, moreover, attracts attention from the omission of any such provision, in express terms, for the case of a suit against a plural number of persons, all residing in the same district. The latter case, and the case expressly provided for, do not seem, either of them, to have required statutory regulation. Again, a general act of congress, passed on 20th May, 1826 [4 Stat. 184], had enacted that all writs of execution upon any judgment or decree obtained in any of the district or circuit courts of the United States, in any state which had been, or might thereafter be, divided into two judicial districts, might run and be executed in any part of such state, but should be issued from and made returnable to the court where the judgment was obtained. Notwithstanding this general enactment, the act of 1858 has re-enacted its provisions. They had in like manner been unnecessarily re-enacted for Tennessee in 1839. Their original enactment for Tennessee in 1822 had, however, been a useful provision for that state, at that period. This repetition in the act of 1858 of the general enactment of 1826 as to executions, the general conformity of the provisions of the act of 1858 concerning original process to those of the prior particular laws which have been mentioned, and the mode above defined, in which the act of 1858 applies to suits in equity, show that this act was not intended as an entirely new measure of legislation. Therefore the argument that the act, if applicable at all to suits in equity, manifests an opinion of congress that the subpoena could not, before the act, have been served, in any case, in another district of the same state, cannot prevail.

To recapitulate: The act of 24th September, 1789 [1 Stat. 73], divided the United States into judicial districts, with a sole reference to the jurisdiction of the respective courts, which it created. Process directed to a marshal could not be served beyond the limits of his district. He could not have crossed its line in serving the process, if nothing on the subject had been contained in the act. But the subpoena to appear and answer in equity was not in form, or in effect, process directed to the marshal. At the date of the act, opposing opinions were entertained upon the question whether in England such a writ could be served beyond the limits of the jurisdiction. That no doubt upon this or any similar question might be entertained in the practice under this act, the 11th section provided that no civil suit shall be brought against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that of which he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ. This enactment was applicable not less to the subpoena than to ministerially directed process. But its only effect, at its date, was to prevent the boundary of a state from being crossed in the service of original process of either kind. Under this act the former defendant, and S. B. Ludlow, could have been served with process, at law or in equity, in the same suit. The intended effect of the act which afterwards divided the state into two districts was a mere partition of the jurisdiction conferred by the act of 1789 between the courts of the two intraterritorial divisions. That these two acts, in their combined effect, prevented, in any case, the exercise of this jurisdiction where it had before been exercisable, was the result of an oversight in legislation since remedied. Where it occurred, it was not a direct consequence either of the prohibition in the eleventh section of the act of 1789, or of any enactment in the law dividing the state. It occurred in suits at law, when compulsory process was required against necessary parties residing in different districts of the same state, because the process in such suits could be directed to the marshal only. But when a suit in equity was brought against such parties, the subpoena, being directed immediately to themselves, could be served upon them all. The act of 1789 fulfilled its office in rendering service out of the district ineffectual, when, in order to make the service, the boundary of the state or original district was crossed. The rules of 1822, and the previous practice in some, if not in all, parts of the United States, dispensing with processes of contempt, enable the complainant, without issuing any writ ministerially directed, to obtain, as to such defendants as did not appear, an order that the bill should be taken as confessed. It was questionable whether a complainant could, under this practice, have claimed an arbitrary option to proceed in either district of the state, without reference to the question in which district his cause was the more properly cognizable. Particular acts of congress, however, gave him this option in certain states, in suits both at law and in equity. The rules of 1842 gave to the courts in Pennsylvania, and other states to which no such acts applied, a control in this respect of the proceeding, by preventing the service of process in equity otherwise than by the marshal of the district, unless a special order was made authorizing the service by another person. When there was no such order of the court, the subpoena became, under these rules, in substance and effect, process directed to the marshal of the district. But this character of the writ could, in a case like the present, have been changed under these rules, by an order of the court appointing another person to make the service upon a defendant residing in the other district. The act of 1858, containing general provisions like those of the particular statutes already mentioned, gave to the plaintiff in every suit not local, against parties residing in different districts of the state, an election of the district in which to proceed; and thus rendered the practice on the subject uniform throughout the United States. The subpoena issued in duplicate under this act is, in effect, a writ directed to the respective marshals of the two districts, to be served by each upon such defendants named in it as reside in his district.

In suits in equity the average number of original parties is very much greater than in suits at law, and the necessity for adding other parties often develops itself as the suits proceed. This act must, therefore, have been intended to apply to suits in equity, unless the remedial purposes of its provisions had already been attainable in such suits under the former practice established by rules of the supreme court. If the act were inapplicable to such suits, the complainants might, therefore, with even more certainty as to the correctness of the practice, proceed in this case, under an appointment of a person other than the marshal of this district, to serve the process upon a new defendant in the Western district.

Had the decision been that a subpoena issued by this court, in equity, could not, independently of the enabling provisions of this act of 4th May, 1858 [11 Stat. 272], have been served in the Western district, the present case would be embraced within these provisions of the act. It is true that the act applies only to suits brought after it was passed. But the complainants can proceed properly, for the purpose in question, in one way only. This, as we have seen, is by an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill, which would be, as to the former defendants, a supplemental, but, as to S. B. Ludlow, an entirely original, bill. The reason and spirit of the act of 1858 cannot require the complainants to go through the absurd formality of obtaining an order for the dismissal, without prejudice, of their original bill, as against the former defendants, for the mere purpose of bringing the case within the literal application of the words of the act, by recommencing the proceeding against those parties. By so doing, they could certainly bring themselves within the letter of the act. But it is to S. B. Ludlow unimportant whether he is made an additional party under such a proceeding, or in the other mode. The proceeding would not, as to him, be less original, in the one case, than in the other. So far as the proceeding is against "two or more defendants residing in different districts in the same state," the suit would, for the first time, be brought, when the original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill, might be filed. The case is, therefore, perhaps, within the words, but certainly within the reason and meaning, of the law.

The result appears to be that, under an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill, against the former defendants and S. B. Ludlow, service of a duplicate writ of subpoena could be made upon S. B. Ludlow, in the Western district, either under the act of 1858, or independently of its provisions.

Case No. 17,892.

WINTER et al. v. SIMONTON.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 585.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 4, 1825.

COVENANT ON CHARTER-PARTY—BAIL FOR DEFENDANT'S APPEARANCE—PLAINTIFF'S AFFIDAVIT—LIABILITY OF MARSHAL.

1. The authority of a justice of the peace, in one of the states, may be proved by parol.

2. An affidavit of the plaintiff's (written upon the back of a copy of the charter-party, and annexed to an account current which states the particular charge, with dates, &c., and averring that "there is now due and unpaid upon the original charter-party, of which the within is a true copy, $2,433.06, the whole amount of said charter being $3,212.96, of which $779.90 have been paid, agreeably to the account current by us signed and hereunto annexed, which exhibits the true and perfect state of the demand now existing between the said Simonton and ourselves") is sufficiently certain to hold the defendant to bail, in an action of covenant on the charter-party.

3. The marshal is bound to take sufficient bail for the appearance of the defendant, in all cases, except in the actions of trespass on the case mentioned in the 3d section of the Maryland act of 1715, c. 46, and he is the judge of its sufficiency.

4. That act does not include actions of covenant.

5. The marshal, being called upon by the court to bring before them any defendant arrested by him upon any original writ or mesne process, according to the tenor of his return, and, failing so to do, will, on motion, be amerced to the amount of the debt, or damages and costs, and judgment will be entered therefor, nisi, the second day of the next term.

Covenant on a charter-party. Upon the return of the capias ad respondendum, Mr. Key moved that the defendant might be permitted to appear without special bail. The affidavit was made in the state of Maine, before Eben Clapp, who calls himself a justice of the peace. Another person, who calls himself a notary-public and justice of the peace for the county of Lincoln, certified that the said Eben Clapp was a justice of the peace for the same county; but his certificate is dated one month before the date of the affidavit taken before Mr. Clapp.

Mr. Key, for defendant, objected that there was no evidence of the authority of the justice to administer the oath, and cited the case of Smith v. Watson [Case No. 13-124], in this court, at June term, 1806; 3 Whart. Dig. 50, tit. "Bail"; and Turner v. Fendall, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 117.

Before THE COURT decided upon this objection to the affidavit, the plaintiff produced a witness, (Geo. Sullivan, Esq.) who proved the handwriting of the justice, and that he was acting as a justice of the peace, at Bath, in the county of Lincoln, in the state of Maine, where the affidavit was made.
