WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The following objections have been made to the title of the plaintiff, and his right of recovery: (1) That the will of Peter Fretwell passed to Jonathan and Eliza Wright a fee simple estate. If so, the lessor of the plaintiff, who claims as the eldest son of Peter F. Wright, can have no title to the lands in question, which were sold and conveyed by Jonathan Wright his grandfather. (2) But if the estate was a fee tail, then it is objected, that the estate tail was converted into an estate in fee simple by force of two acts of assembly of this state, passed in the years 1784 and 1786, which operated to defeat the estate of the issue in tail. (3) That the plaintiff is barred by force of the act of limitations.

In construing the above recited clause of Peter Fretwell's will, the court will take care not to forget the maxim equally contended for by the counsel on both sides, and which all the cases upon the subject inculcate, that the intention of the testator apparent in the will, is to govern the construction, if such intention be not inconsistent with the established principles of law. We think there is no difficulty in discovering the intention of this testator, and it is quite clear to us that this intention entirely harmonizes with the rules of law. Can it admit of a doubt that the testator intended, in the first instance, to give to his daughter and to his son-in-law, a joint estate in fee tail, excluding for a moment, the words "or assigns for ever?" The words are "to his well beloved daughter, and to her husband J. W. and their heirs begotten of their bodies." The most unlettered man, however ignorant he may be of the difference between a fee simple and a fee tail, knows that the heirs of the body of the devisee, cannot include general heirs, who are not of his body. Again, can it be doubted that the testator intended, in the event of the death of his daughter, or of her husband, without issue of their bodies, to give the estate to the heirs of the body of the survivor of them? The words for this purpose are, "or for want of such heirs or assigns, then to the heirs begotten by or of either of them, and to their assigns for ever." The expressions "heirs begotten by or of either of them" have precisely the same meaning here, that they have in the devise of the particular estate. But the word "assigns," used in the first, and in the latter part of the clause, might well be construed differently, for the purpose of effectuating the intention of the testator; and that for the following reason. If they are construed in the first part to give a fee simple to the husband and wife, in violation of the obvious intention to give only a fee tail, the rule of law would not permit the equally evident intent, in favour of those in remainder, to take effect; because it would then amount to a limitation over, after a fee simple, dependent upon an indefinite dying without issue; which the policy of the law will not tolerate, even in wills, the favoured instruments of courts of justice. But the same reason does not apply to prevent the enlargement of the estate in remainder, by force of the same expression; because if the testator meant, in both cases, to give a fee simple, yet as he still more clearly intended to limit a remainder upon the first estate in the event of a dying without issue; such intention might be gratified by construing "assigns" where they are last used, so as to enlarge the estate into a fee simple, and yet to give a different construction to the same expression in the first part of the clause. These observations are made, not with a view to decide what estate passed to the remainder-man, as that question is not involved in this cause; but are merely intended to show, that because the word "assigns" might have the effect of converting the estate in remainder into a fee simple, without violating the intention of the testator, or the rules of law, it does not follow that it should be so construed in the devise of the particular estate, when by doing so, it would defeat the manifest intention of the testator, by bringing it into collision with the rules of law. What the testator meant by the use of the words "or assigns forever;" in the devise of the particular estate, it is not easy for us to say. Possibly he might have meant to apply them exclusively to the personal estate, reddendo singula singulis; which, he may have known, could not be intailed. Or he may have used them, as they are used in deeds, when superadded to heirs, without any meaning or operation whatever. Be this as it may, they cannot admit of the construction contended for by the defendant's counsel, without defeating the manifest wishes of the testator, which is a sufficient reason for rejecting it.

Many cases were read by the defendant's counsel to show, that certain expressions in one part of a will, may be resorted to, to enlarge the particular estate given in another part; such as charging it with payment of debts, the use of the word "estate," and the like. But it will be found, upon an examination of those cases, that they apply to devises of mere freehold estates. There is not one of them which bears upon an estate of inheritance in fee tail, devised by appropriate words, and especially where an estate is limited over upon a general dying without issue. We are therefore of opinion that an estate tail passed to Jonathan Wright, and to his wife, in joint tenancy.

The next question is, whether the lessor of the plaintiff is prevented from recovering in this action, on account, either of defect of title, or want of remedy? These are the two objections urged by the defendant's counsel under the second and third heads of their argument, and which we shall combine, for reasons which will be perceived when the objections are examined.

The plaintiff's counsel have contended that the estate tail created by the will of Peter Fretwell was not affected by the act of 1784 (Patt. Laws, 53) and the explanatory act of 1786 (Patt. Laws, 78), because Fretwell Wright, the first in descent, was not in the year 1784 in possession of the premises in controversy; that consequently he continued tenant in tail when he died; from which time, and not before, the right of the lessor of the plaintiff, his issue in tail, accrued; that the deed of Jonathan Wright to Henry Scott, and that of his son Jonathan to the same person in 1754, neither nor both of them, discontinued the estate tail, or passed an estate that could endure longer than the life of Jonathan, the first tenant in tail; or, that at most, it was a base fee; and finally that the instrument called a release, executed by Fretwell, dated in 1743, could not affect the right either of himself, or of his issue in tail, not only for the reasons assigned in respect to his father's deed, but because there was no second party to it; but even if it operated as a deed of bargain and sale, that still it could only affect the estate of the bargainor, and not that of his issue in tail, whose right did not accrue before the year 1797, within twenty years from which period, this action was commenced. It is further insisted on the same side, that since Scott held under the above deeds, he held under the grantors, and not adversely to Fretwell Wright; for which reason it is argued that the act of limitations did not begin to run against the lessor of the plaintiff till after his death; and again, that even if the act of limitations had commenced its operation against Fretwell Wright, still his heir in tail could not be affected by it, because if his title could not be defeated or impaired by his acts, neither could it be by his laches.

The court cannot agree with the counsel in many of the above propositions, and altogether dissent from the conclusions drawn from them. If the release, as it is called, by Fretwell Wright, were out of the case, there could be very little doubt as to the operation of the act of limitations. We will examine the case, then, first, as if this instrument had not been executed; and second, as it may be affected by it.

1. Before we proceed further in the investigation of these questions, it will be proper to attend to the language of the acts of limitations, and particularly to those which passed on the 5th of June, 1787 (Patt. Laws, 81), the first section of which enacts "that sixty years actual possession of any lands, &c., uninterruptedly continued by occupancy, descent, conveyance, or otherwise, in whatever way or manner such possession might have commenced, or have been continued, shall vest a full and complete right and title in every actual possessor or occupier of such lands, and shall be a good and sufficient bar to all claims that may be made, or actions commenced by any person or persons whatsoever for the recovery of any such lands," &c. The second section enacts "that thirty years actual possession of any lands, &c., uninterruptedly continued as aforesaid, wherever such possession commenced, or is founded upon a proprietary right, &c., or wherever it was obtained by a fair bona fide purchase of such lands of any person whatever in possession, and supposed to have a legal right and title thereto, or of the agent, &c. shall be a good and sufficient bar to all prior locations, rights, titles, conveyances or claims whatever, not followed by actual possession as aforesaid, and shall vest an absolute right and title in the actual possessor and occupier of all such lands," &c. The first proviso in this law saves the rights of a person under the usual disabilities existing at the time the said right or title first descended or accrued, if he shall commence his action within five years after the disability removed. The second proviso is in the following words, "that any citizen of this, or any other of the United States, and his or their heirs, having right or title to any lands, &c. within this state, may, notwithstanding the aforesaid times are expired, commence his or their action for such lands, &c. at any time within five years next after the passing of this act, and not afterwards." The tenth section of the act of the 7th of February, 1799 (Patt. Laws, 352), enacts "that from and after the 1st of January, 1803, every real, possessory, ancestral, mixed, or other action, for any lands, shall be brought or instituted within twenty years next after the right or title thereto, or cause of such action shall accrue, and not after." It may not be amiss to observe upon the second section of the first act, that the case shows that Henry Scott obtained possession of the land by a fair bona fide purchase from persons in possession, and supposed to have a legal right and title thereto. There can be no doubt but that the act of 1787 operates retrospectively as well as prospectively, with this difference, that where the sixty or the thirty years had entirely run out, at the time of the passage of the law, citizens of this, or any other state of the United States, claiming title to the land, were indulged with an additional five years within which to commence this action. But if the term was running when the act was passed, or began afterwards to run; in either case, the lapse of the time stated in the act constituted a complete bar, unless the plaintiff could save himself, by showing that he had been under some one of the enumerated disabilities. It will readily be admitted that the possession under this law must be adverse, so far at least, as that the possession must not be held and continued under the person claiming title; and therefore, a lessee for one hundred years, which was the case put by the plaintiff's counsel, could claim no benefit under the act, though he should retain the possession during all that time, inasmuch as such possession would be the possession of his lessor. How far a possession for sixty or thirty years, under a conveyance from a tenant in tail, believed to be such, would operate to bar the issue after the death of the grantor, is a question which does not arise under this head of the inquiry, and therefore need not be mooted. For the case states, that upon the death of Jonathan Wright, in 1742, Henry Scott entered upon the 225 acres conveyed to him by Jonathan Wright in 1741, and that the two sons of the said Jonathan, Ebenezer and Jonathan, entered upon the 700 acres devised to them by their father, (part of which, as well as the 225 acres, are the premises in dispute) and that in 1754, the said Jonathan conveyed the 125 acres to the said Scott. Can it then admit of a doubt, that Scott and the two sons of Jonathan Wright, claiming under his will, entered under titles opposed to that of Fretwell Wright, and consequently adverse to his title? Scott claimed, and was entitled to a base fee, by virtue of the conveyance of Jonathan Wright the elder, defeasible by Fretwell Wright, the issue in tail; and as for the two sons, they had no title whatever. But the possession of those persons, whether with or without title, was in hostility to that of Fretwell Wright, which he claimed, not under his father, but under Peter Fretwell, the donor. From the year 1742 then, to a period exceeding even sixty years, there was, in the words of the first section of the act, an actual possession, uninterruptedly continued by occupancy or otherwise; and this, the act declares, shall not only bar all claims and actions commenced for the recovery of the land, but shall vest a complete title in the possessor. It is to be remarked that this possession is unaffected by either of the provisions in the act, so far as we are informed by the case before us.

But it is contended by the plaintiff's counsel, that the lessor of the plaintiff is not within the operation of the above act, because he claims paramount to the title of Fretwell Wright, and that he cannot be barred, unless the title had run against him after his right commenced, or accrued in 1797, upon the death of Fretwell Wright. This doctrine is altogether untenable. It is opposed as well by the words, as by the obvious meaning of the act. It has been already shown, that the right of Fretwell Wright accrued in 1742, and consequently, that the time then began to run; and it is a clear principle of law, that in such a case it continues to run on, as well against the issue in tail, as against the tenant in tail, against whom it commenced its operation. The language of the first section of the act is general, as to all estates without exception; "in whatever way or manner such possession might have commenced, or have been continued." The act then applies as well to the claim of a tenant in tail, as to any other title. Yet the argument we are examining, if sound, would substantially exclude from its operation a title gained by length of possession, when opposed by the claim of a tenant in tail; which, particularly after the act of 1784 respecting intails, would be a construction altogether inadmissible. For if the length of time, during which the tenant in tail is bound to bring his action, does not run on, so as to affect his issue when he becomes entitled to the estate, then he, and his issue in succession ad infinitum, would be entitled to the benefit of the same length of time to make his claim, after the death of his ancestor; which would in effect do away the operation of the act altogether, as to estates tail. Supposing then the release of Fretwell Wright to be out of the case, we are of opinion that the title of the lessor of the plaintiff is barred by the act of limitations.

2. Taking the case as affected by the release, it is contended that the acts of 1784 and 1786, did not enlarge the estate of Fretwell Wright or of his alienee, but that he died tenant in tail of this estate, and having estopped himself by his release to claim or to sue for the same in her life time, the act of limitations did not begin to run until 1797, when, and not before, the title of the issue of Fretwell Wright accrued, before which time, the possession obtained by Scott under the release was not adverse. We have no doubt but that the effect of the acts of 1784 and 1786, was to unfetter estates tail from the restraints of the statute de donis, whether the tenant in tail was in possession when the act of 1784 passed, or whether the estate then existed as a base fee in possession of his alienee. Den v. Robinson, 2 South. [5 N. J. Law] 793, seems completely to have decided this point, and we think rightly. These acts then being clearly intended to defeat the title of the issue in tail, or in other words, to dock the intail in a case like the present, they operated like a common recovery to enlarge the estate of the alienee into a fee simple. Now we hold it to be perfectly indifferent, whether the plaintiff's or defendant's counsel is right, as to the validity of the release, so called, of Fretwell Wright. If it be valid then, by force of the above acts, it passed to Henry Scott a fee simple estate in the premises, and the lessor of the plaintiff can have no title as the heir of Fretwell Wright the grantor. If it was void, then it has been already shown that the plaintiff is barred by the act of limitations, which began to run upon the death of Jonathan Wright, in 1742.

The case in short stands thus: Upon the death of Jonathan Wright, the right to this estate vested in his eldest son Fretwell Wright, as issue in tail, notwithstanding his father's conveyance to Scott, and the devise in his will to Jonathan and Ebenezer; and Fretwell Wright might then have commenced his action. If his title was unaffected by his release, and also by the acts of 1784 and 1786, then the act of limitations began to run in 1742, and an adverse possession of more than sixty years, previous to the bringing of this action, had run out against the lessor of the plaintiff. If the release was a valid instrument, and the acts of 1784 and 1786 unfettered the estate tail, then the title of the issue in tail of Fretwell Wright was defeated; the estate of the grantee was enlarged into an estate in fee simple; and the heir at law of Fretwell Wright, who must claim under the grantor, and cannot claim paramount to him from the donor, can have no title against the grant. So that take the case under any and every aspect, the lessor of the plaintiff cannot recover.

The view which we have taken of this case, renders it unnecessary to notice many of the arguments at the bar which were much pressed upon us. Judgment for the defendant in each case.

Case No. 18,093.

WRIGHT v. SHUMWAY.

[1 Biss. 23; 1 2 Am. Law Reg. 20.]

District Court, D. Wisconsin. Aug. Term, 1853.

SETTLERS ON UNSURVEYED LANDS—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT—EQUITABLE MORTGAGE—AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE.

1. A covenant on the part of settlers on unsurveyed lands of the United States, to purchase those lands, as soon as surveyed and offered for sale by the government, and then mortgage them to a creditor, to secure a debt, is not a contract in violation of sections 4 and 5 of the act of congress approved March 31, 1830 [4 Stat. 390], for the relief of purchasers of public lands, and for the suppression of frauds at public land sales.

[Cited in Calhoun v. Memphis & P. R. Co., Case No. 2,309.]

2. A mortgage given to secure a debt due and payable, no time of payment being specified, may be redeemed or foreclosed at any time.

3. An equitable mortgage springs from an agreement, express or implied, that there shall be a lien. A covenant by a debtor with his creditor, to purchase certain lands, and then mortgage them to him will be enforced in a court of equity by a decree of sale.

4. Where a settler on public lands, entitled to a pre-emption, procures a capitalist to pay the purchase money of the land into the land office of the United States, and allows him to take the receiver's receipt in his own name, or makes an assignment to him of his certificate of location as his security for such payment, receiving back the bond of said capitalist for a deed upon the repayment, on a certain day, of the purchase money with interest, this is in equity a mortgage of the land, redeemable by the settler or his alienee at or before the time of payment, according to the condition of the contract.

5. A mortgagee of lands to which the mortgagor had no present title, is entitled in equity to the benefit of an after-acquired title.

In equity. The defendants, Charles N. Shumway, John P. Shumway, Jabez N. Rogers, and John S. Harris, in the year 1849, became indebted to the complainants, by several promissory notes in the sum of twelve hundred dollars. In December, 1850, Charles N. Shumway and John P. Shumway, having settled upon, and being in possession of, unsurveyed public lands, in this state, executed and delivered to complainants a deed, or instrument under seal, by which, for the consideration of one dollar, they sold, assigned, and conveyed to them all their right, title, and interest in those lands, describing them, together with all the water privileges, rights and easements, and other appurtenances, and the buildings erected on the same. The deed provided, that "the property hereby assigned, being intended to include all the claims held by us for the parties of the first part, on the lands now occupied by them, and yet unsurveyed, and not sold by the United States, to have and to hold the same to the said Edward and Augustus and their heirs forever. This grant is intended as a security for the indebtedness of the said parties of the first part to the said party of the second part, consisting of three notes, in all about twelve hundred dollars besides interest. And the said parties of the first part covenant and agree with the said parties of the second part, that they will purchase the said land of the United States whenever the same shall be surveyed and exposed for sale, and will mortgage the same with the appurtenances to the said parties of the second part, their survivors or assigns to secure the indebtedness aforesaid, or such part thereof as may be then unpaid, as soon as the land shall be exposed for sale." The deed was filed with the town clerk, as a chattel mortgage, and also recorded in the office of the register of deeds, as a mortgage of real estate, in October, 1852. In October, 1851, the defendant, Jabez N. Rogers, by his deed, duly executed and acknowledged, confirmed the aforesaid deed, and conveyed to the complainants his interest in the premises, for the purpose of securing the debt. The lands being surveyed, were offered for sale by the United States, in June, 1852. In November, 1852, John P. Shumway proved up a pre-emption right, and entered one hundred and sixty acres of the land, which included the village of Wautoma, and assigned the certificate of location to John Fitzgerald, one of the defendants, in consideration of the payment by him of the purchase money, at the land office, at the request of Shumway. And at the same time, Fitzgerald entered in his own name, one other quarter section of the land, for Charles N. Shumway, of which he claimed a right of pre-emption. Fitzgerald having purchased the two quarter sections, at the instance and request of the Shumways, gave to each of them a bond in the penalty of five hundred dollars, "conditioned that he shall make to them respectively a deed for his particular quarter section described in the bond, on paying to him two hundred dollars with interest, within two years thereafter, and also paying the annual taxes." After those two quarter sections were entered at the land office by Fitzgerald, demand of a mortgage was made by complainants of the Shumways, in pursuance of their covenant. Bill taken as confessed against John S. Harris one of the defendants, and also against Rogers, he not claiming any interest in the lands. The Shumways and Fitzgerald make defense.

Francis Randall, for defendants.

MILLER, District Judge. It is contended on the part of the defendants, that the deed of the Shumways to complainants is a contract in violation of the act of congress, approved March 31, 1830 (4 Stat. 392), entitled "An act for the relief of the purchasers of public lands, and for the suppression of fraudulent practices at the public sales of the lands of the United States," and is therefore void.

[I do not think that this is a contract prohibited by this act of congress. The plaintiffs were merchants doing business in the city of New York, and not contemplating the purchase of this land, or of any interest therein, either at a public sale by the government, or in any other manner, but merely desiring a security for their demand, accepted this deed for the purpose.]²

I do not think that this position is tenable. There is nothing in the deed tending to the formation of a combination of purchasers, or to prevent biddings for the land at a government public sale. But the improved portion of the land was not intended by the Shumways to be the subject of a public sale. As settlers and improvers, at the date of the deed, they considered that their right to pre-emption would be secured, which was afterwards perfected through Fitzgerald. The deed is not within the prohibition of the act. Private sales of pre-emption claims of settlers are recognized as valid, by the federal courts. Bush v. Marshall, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 284; Thredgill v. Pintard, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 24.

² [From 2 Am. Law Reg. 20.]

At the date of the deed, the Shumways had peaceable and undisturbed possession of the land, with the tacit or implied assent of the United States, and had erected thereon a saw-mill, dwellings, a tavern stand and other buildings; and they had an inchoate right of pre-emption. In consideration of their indebtedness to the complainants, they made the deed as a security. The debt was then payable. A conveyance, covenant, or mortgage, founded on a past consideration, is valid.

[But even if the land was to have been purchased by the Shumways at a public sale, there is nothing in this deed to prevent competition in bidding, or to stop these plaintiffs from becoming the purchasers; but on the contrary, the covenant on the part of the Shumways to purchase the land and then to mortgage it, might have induced competition, and required them to bid it off at a much higher rate than the minimum price.

[The defendants objected to this deed as void for want of consideration; and also, that if the debt was a consideration, it was then due and payable, and no time is mentioned for its payment, or for the purchase of the land, or giving the mortgage, and therefore it is vague and uncertain. A conveyance, contract, or mortgage founded on a past consideration is valid.]³

When the money is due and payable, and no time is mentioned in the mortgage for its payment or redemption, a foreclosure will be decreed at any time. And a mortgage intended to secure a certain debt is valid in equity, for that purpose, whatever form the debt may assume.

[This deed is declared to be for the security of the debt therein specified, with a covenant to purchase the land and to mortgage it whenever it should be surveyed and offered for sale by the government.]³

The consideration expressed in the deed is valuable and is sufficient to authorize the court to enforce performance of its covenants.

It is further contended, that the deed is of no validity, the premises not being legally vested in the Shumways. The deed does not purport to be a mortgage of the fee, but nevertheless it may be valid. In equity, whatever property, real or personal, is capable of an absolute sale may be the subject of a mortgage. Therefore, rights in remainder, and reversions, possibilities coupled with an interest, rents, franchises, and choses in action, are capable of being mortgaged. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1021. And courts of equity support assignments of, or contracts pledging property, or contingent interests therein, and also things which have no present, actual, potential existence, but rest in mere possibility.

Mr. Justice Story, in his opinion in Mitch- ell v. Winslow [Case No. 9,673], remarks: ["It seems to me a clear result of all the authorities, that, whenever the parties, by their contract, intend to create a positive lien or charge, either upon real or upon personal property, whether then owned by the assignor or contractor or not, or, if personal property, whether it is then in esse or not, it attaches in equity, as a lien or charge upon the particular property, as soon as the assignor or contractor acquires a title there-to against the latter and all persons asserting a claim thereto under him, either voluntarily or with notice."]⁴

If a mortgage be made of an estate, to which the mortgagor has not a good title, and then he who has the real title conveys to the mortgagor, or his representatives, a good title, the mortgagee will be entitled in equity to the benefit of it, for it will be considered as a graft into the old stock, and as arising in consideration of the former title. Seabourne v. Powel, 2 Vern. 10; Best v. Meddlenurst, 3 Atk. 376; Goodright v. Mead, 3 Burrows, 1703; McGinnis v. Noble, 7 Watts & S. 454; [Porter v. Emery, 1 Ch. Rep. 97; Harmer v. Morris, Case No. 6,076; Id., 7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 544].

The deed purports to be a mortgage of all the property or interest of the Shumways then existing, with express covenants "that they will purchase the land and mortgage it to the complainants to secure their indebtedness." By this express written agreement to make a mortgage, a lien is created on the land, in equity, on the principle that what has been agreed to be performed, shall be performed. Hankey v. Vernon, 2 Cox, Ch. 12; 3 Pow. Mortg. 1049 a, b. An equitable mortgage springs from an agreement, express or implied, that there shall be a lien. The agreement in this case to purchase the land, and then to mortgage it, is express, and is a specific lien, which will be enforced in equity. Finch v. The Earl of Winchelsea, 1 P. Wms. 277; Freemoult v. Dedire, Id. 429; Deacon v. Smith, 3 Atk. 323; Tooke v. Hastings, 2 Vern. 97; Lyde v. Mynn, 4 Sim. 505; Laundell v. Berry, Id. 481; Metcalfe v. Archbishop of York, 6 Sim. 224; Burn v. Burn, 3 Ves. 573; Legard v. Hodges, 1 Ves. Jr. 477. The same principle also seems to be well settled in the courts of this country. In re Howe, 1 Paige, 131; Delaire v. Keenan, 3 Desaus. Eq. 74; Menude v. Delaire, 2 Desaus. Eq. 564; Dow v. Ker, Speer, Eq. 413; Campbell v. Moseby, 6 Litt. (Ky.) 358; Fleming v. Harrison, 2 Bibb. 171; Richter v. Selin, 8 Serg. & R. 425; Tyson v. Passmore, 2 Barr [2 Pa. St.] 122; Longworth v. Taylor [Case No. 8,490]. I do not deem it necessary to enter into a minute statement of these cases, and also of many others, as I consider the principle to be settled beyond all controversy. The deed is an equitable mortgage, to be enforced by a bill in equity.

⁴ [From 2 Am. Law Reg. 20.]

The legal title to half the land is in Fitzgerald, subject to the equity of the Shumways, to redeem on or before the day of payment specified in the bonds of Fitzgerald for conveyance. On or before the day of payment, Fitzgerald is obligated to convey to the Shumways, or to their assigns, or to the purchaser under a decree in this case, upon the payment to him of the amount he advanced for the land to the government, with interest, according to the conditions of the bonds. The Shumways continue to hold actual possession of the land. The bonds of Fitzgerald for deeds, are not conveyances of the land, but obligations, whereupon the Shumways, or their representatives or assigns, may compel, by bills in equity, conveyances of the fee, upon the payment of the purchase money, according to the conditions. The purchase of the land by Fitzgerald, at the instance of the Shumways, the settlers and improvers in possession, and their acceptance of bonds for conveyances, are the same in equity as if they had made the purchases in their own names, with money borrowed of Fitzgerald, secured by mortgage of the land.

It is not necessary to determine the question of priority of lien, as the complainants consent to a decree of sale of the two quarter sections entered by Fitzgerald, subject to his lien, according to the conditions of his bonds to the Shumways, the lands being considered quite valuable, and abundant for the payment of both liens.

A decree of sale is ordered, according to the prayer of the bill.

[The plaintiffs might have come into court with a bill praying specific performance of the contract to mortgage, but such a useless proceeding is not required. The deed under consideration is an equitable mortgage of the premises, and is considered in this court, as to these parties, the same as a mortgage executed and delivered in legal form.]⁵

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May 22, 1828.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—HUSBAND TO WIFE—INADEQUATE CONSIDERATION—SALE UNDER DECREE—TITLE OF PURCHASER.

1. The statute of frauds, avoids all covinous conveyances, made with intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors, but does not extend to conveyances made on valuable consideration, and in good faith: therefore, where husband and wife, made a conveyance of land to trustees, for the use and benefit of the wife, in consideration of the wife's relinquishing her right of dower in other lands, for the payment of her husband's debts, although the value of the right of dower, is only about a third of the value of the land conveyed for her benefit, yet such conveyance is not absolutely void, but, in a court of law, must be adjudged to be valid.

[Cited in Robinson v. Boyd, 17 Mich. 134.]

2. Mere inadequacy of price may be so great, as to be evidence of fraud, proper to be submitted to a jury; but is not in itself a fraud, on which a court of law will pronounce a deed to be absolutely void.

[Cited in Briscoe v. Bronaugh, 1 Tex. 326.]

3. Although a court of equity would consider the deed before described, as being held in trust for the wife, only to the value of the dower she has released, and for the creditor, as to the residue: yet in a court of law, the deed cannot be sustained in part, and avoided in part, but will be considered as entirely good.

[Cited in Phelps v. Curts, 80 Ill. 115.]

4. W. & C., obtained a judgment at law against K., in December, 1824, and sued out an elegit in November, 1825: meanwhile, that is, in March, 1825, M., R. & G., other creditors of K., obtained a decree from the court of chancery, directing a sale of land which had been conveyed by K. to trustees, for the benefit of his wife, (made bona fide, and for valuable, though inadequate, consideration,) and that out of the proceeds of the sale, the trustees for the wife, should first be paid the amount of the consideration which had actually passed from the wife, and then the residue to be applied to the extinguishment of the debt of the said M., R. & G. Held, that the judgment-creditors, W. & C., (who had their elegit executed whilst the sale was being made under the decree,) cannot recover the land in ejectment against the purchaser under the decree.

At law.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. This cause comes upon a special verdict, found in an ejectment brought to obtain possession of a lot in the city of Richmond, which was taken by virtue of a writ of elegit issued on a judgment of this court. The ejectment being the prescribed mode for obtaining actual possession in such a case, the question is, was this lot subject to the writ when it was executed? The judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs [Wright and Cooke] against John King, on the 18th day of December, in the year 1824. The writ of elegit, issued on the 14th of November, 1825. The special verdict finds, that John King was seised in fee of the lot on which the inquisition was taken, on the 30th of September, 1819, on which day he conveyed a part of the premises to John Gibson and John M'Crea, in trust for the security of a debt in the deed mentioned. On the 9th of October, he conveyed the residue of the premises to the same trustees also, for the benefit of a creditor in that deed mentioned. The debt secured by the deed of September, 1819, was payable by instalments, the last of which fell due on the 16th day of January, 1822, and the deed stipulated that the said King, should retain the possession and receive the profits, until default should be made in the last payment. The debt secured by the deed of October, was also payable by instalments, the last of which fell due on the 24th day of January, 1825, and the trustees were to sell, if on that day any part of the debt should remain unpaid. The interest of the said John King, so far as it was a present interest, was unquestionably subject to an elegit. It remains, then, to inquire, whether this interest has been so transferred, as to be placed out of the reach of that writ. On the 22d of March, 1820, John King, and Helen S. King, his wife, in pursuance of an agreement to make a reasonable provision of the dower of the said Helen S., which is recited in the deeds, conveyed the dower-right of the said Helen S. to certain real estate, which had been previously conveyed by the said John King, in trust for certain creditors in the said deeds mentioned. On the 30th of March, 1820, John King, conveyed certain real property, including the premises in the declaration mentioned, to Peter V. Daniel and James Rawlings, in trust for his said wife. This deed professes to be made in consideration of the agreement recited in the deed of the 22d of the same month, and after its execution, the trustees received the rents of the said tenement for the benefit of the said Helen S. The jury find, that at the date of this deed, John King was greatly embarrassed in his circumstances, and had conveyed a great part of his property in trust for his creditors. They also find, that the dower-right conveyed in the deed of the 22d of March, was worth $1,016.67, and that the dower-right of the said Helen S., in other property conveyed by her husband, but not by herself, was worth $1,777; and that the property conveyed by the deed of the 30th of March, in satisfaction of dower released by the deed of the 22d of March, was worth $3,040.

The defendant claims under a sale made in pursuance of an interlocutory decree of the court of chancery for the state, which was pronounced on the 26th day of March, 1825, in a suit brought by Mollin, Rankin, & Gallop, creditors of the said King, to set aside the deed of the 30th of March, 1820, as being fraudulent as to creditors. The plaintiffs were not parties to this suit, and, consequently, are not bound by the decree. They have therefore a right to re-examine the validity of the deed, which was the subject of that decree. Having obtained their judgment before the decree was pronounced, and having issued their writ of elegit while that judgment was in force, the decree, however correct in its principles, must leave the property subject to the lien, if any, which was created by the judgment. If the deed of the 30th of March, 1820, was absolutely void, then the interest which the deed of the 22d of the same month left in John King, was liable to his creditors, and was bound by the plaintiff's judgment. If that deed was valid, no interest remained in John King, other than an equity of redemption. The dower relinquished by Mrs. King constituted, certainly, a valid consideration for a deed which should settle on her a fair equivalent for that right. But the dower which she relinquished was worth but little more than one-third of the property conveyed to her as that equivalent. A court of chancery may, very properly, and does consider such a deed, as being held in trust for the wife, to the value of the dower she has released, and for the creditors as to the residue. But how is such a deed treated in a court of common law? At law, the deed cannot be sustained in part only, but must be entirely good or entirely void. The statute of frauds avoids all covinous conveyances made with the intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors, but does not extend to conveyances which are made on good consideration and in good faith. It has been already said, that the dower released by Mrs. King under an agreement to make an adequate settlement on her, was a good consideration, in the sense in which those words are used in the act, and I can find no case in which a court of law has ever held a deed of settlement on a wife to be absolutely void, because the estate conveyed was worth more than the price for which it was conveyed. Mere inadequacy of price may be so great as to be evidence of fraud, to be submitted to a jury, but has never been determined to be, in itself, a fraud for which a court will pronounce a deed to be absolutely void. In this case, the jury have not found fraud. There is no secret trust for the benefit of the husband. On the contrary, the trustees were put in possession of the property, and received the profits for the separate use of the wife.

The plaintiffs contend, that though the jury have not found fraud, they have found facts which amount to fraud, and have submitted the question to the court, whether upon those facts the law be for the plaintiffs?

Without affirming or denying, that a verdict may present a case to the court which, though it does not contain a specific finding, that the deed is covinous or fraudulent, or made to deceive or delay creditors, may contain such equivalent matter as will, in point of law, show the deed to be void, I will hazard the opinion, that mere evidence of fraud, circumstances which may or may not accompany covin, do not constitute such a case. The court will consider those circumstances on which the plaintiffs rely, as amounting, in themselves, to a fraud.

1. The first is, the difference between the value of the dower which has been relinquished, and the property which has been settled in compensation for that dower. The court has already said, that this difference, if the conveyance be made with a real intent to pass the property, does not, of itself, vitiate the deed in a court of law. If the value of the dower had been a few dollars or cents less than the value of the property conveyed in satisfaction of it, no person would suppose the deed to be a nullity on that account.

And if a small difference of value would not avoid it, what is the difference that will? Where does the law stop? The difference may be so great as to satisfy the conscience of the jury, that the conveyance is intended to cover the property from the just claims of creditors; but as a mere question of law, I can find nothing in the books which will justify a court in saying, that a deed, otherwise unexceptionable, is void, because the consideration is of less value than the property conveyed.

2. The other circumstance on which the plaintiffs rely is, that the deed of the 30th of March, conveys all the property of John King, which property still remained in his possession. The verdict finds the deed; but does not find that it comprehended all his property. On this subject the jury say: "We find that at the date of the deed last mentioned, the said King was greatly embarrassed in his circumstances; and the greater part of his property was conveyed by deeds of trust, to secure the debts in those deeds specified." This finding, certainly does not show that the whole of his property was comprehended in the deed of the 30th of March, 1820. The jury find a subsequent deed, dated on the 24th of May, in the same year, which purports to convey other property to trustees for his creditors. The deed of the 30th of March, certainly stipulates for the surplus money arising from his property, which was conveyed in trust; but only the greater part of his property was so conveyed. Neither does the verdict show that King retained possession of the property. The deed itself does not stipulate for his retaining possession, and it authorizes the trustees to receive the rents for the separate use of his wife. It authorizes her residence in any tenement which she might elect, which was not rented out, but this is not a stipulation for the possession even of that tenement, much less of the whole property by the husband. The verdict does not show that this privilege was ever exercised, or could have been exercised. It appears to me, that the deed of the 30th of March, 1820, was valid at law, and conveyed the interest which was left in the said John King, by the deed of the 30th of September, 1819.

It remains to inquire, how far the proceedings in chancery can affect this cause. The court of chancery sustained the deed to the extent of the consideration which moved from Mrs. King, but no farther; and directed the property to be sold and the residue of the money to be paid to the creditor, at whose suit the sale was decreed. The plaintiffs in this cause, were not parties to that suit, and were, consequently, not bound by the decree; but if they would avail themselves of it, they must admit its validity. They cannot take a part, and reject a part of it. The decree ascertains the value of the dower-right of Mrs. King, and limits her claim under the deed to that value, which amount was received before the service of the elegit. The sale under the decree was made while the marshal of this court was taking the inquisition for the extent of the lot, and the chancellor has directed a conveyance to be made to the purchaser.

The counsel for the plaintiffs has taken several exceptions to the proceedings in chancery, which would be considered, if the verdict showed a title at law in the plaintiffs, independent of the decree of the court of chancery. But the verdict, I think, does not show such a title, and I do not think that this is a case in which the decree can be taken in part, and rejected in part. I am therefore of opinion, that the law on this special verdict is for the defendant.

Case No. 18,095.

WRIGHT v. SUN MUT. INS. CO.

SAME v. ORIENT MUT. INS. CO.

[6 Am. Law Reg. 485.]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April 21, 1853.
MARINE INSURANCE — FOREIGN COMPANY — LOCUS CONTRACTUS — ADDITIONAL PREMIUM.

1. Where an insurance company incorporated by the state of New York, having their principal office in New York, and there executing policies of insurance which were transmitted to agents in Baltimore, who had authority to receive applications for policies, and to receive and transmit notes for the premiums, and through whom the company paid losses to parties in Baltimore, underwrote a policy, and sent it to parties residing at Baltimore, it was held that the contract of insurance was a New York, and not a Maryland, contract.

2. Where the policy contained this clause, "to add an additional premium if by vessels rating lower than A2," and the cargo was shipped in a schooner rating lower than A2, and no fixed sum as additional premium agreed upon, held that the assured, in case of loss, could recover the value agreed in the policy, less such additional premium beyond the agreed per cent. as in the opinion of the underwriters might be deemed adequate for the increased risk of a cargo shipped in a vessel rating below A2.

[These were actions by John S. Wright against the Sun Mutual Insurance Company of New York and the Orient Mutual Insurance Company of New York, respectively.]

Henry May, Robert J. Brent, and Vivian Brent, for plaintiff.

John Nelson, Brown & Brune, F. B. Cutting, and Alexander Hamilton, Jr., for defendants.

The suits were begun by attachment, issued in the superior court for the city of Baltimore, and were removed into the circuit court of the United States for this district, under the act of congress. The two cases were tried together, and were commenced on Thursday, 16th April, and terminated on Wednesday, the 21st April, by a verdict in each case for the plaintiff for the sum of $17,365 13—under the direction and instruction of the court.

The opinion of the court (GILES, District Judge), which was not in writing, embraced the following points: The judge remarked in the commencement of his opinion, that the principal point in these cases was one deeply interesting to the commercial community, among whom these running policies were so frequently used. The defendants were insurance companies incorporated by the state of New York, and their offices were located in the city of New York. They had agents residing in this city, who received and forwarded them all applications for insurance; and received and transmitted to them the notes given for the premiums from time to time, and through whom the said defendants made payments for losses on policies held by parties residing here. The policies on which these attachments were issued, had been executed by the defendants in the city of New York, and transmitted to their agents in this city, by whom they were delivered to the plaintiff. The plaintiff, in both cases, had given to the said agents his promissory notes for the premium mentioned in said policies, and in the case of the Sun Mutual Ins. Co. the notes had been paid by plaintiff; and in the case of the Orient Mutual Ins. Co. the money had been placed by him in the Union Bank of this city, (where said notes were payable,) to meet them, but that company had so far, declined to receive it. The first question in these cases is, are these policies of insurance to be considered as contracts made in the city of New York, or as made in the city of Baltimore? For, when you have ascertained at which place the contract is to be considered as made, it is to be construed and interpreted by the law and the usages of that place, except where a contract is made in one place, and, by its terms, it is positively to be performed in another. The learned counsel for the plaintiff has contended that these policies were to be considered as Maryland contracts, and to be construed in reference to the usages and customs of underwriters in this city. Now this became an important question in the cases, because on the books of the insurance companies in New York, the schooner Mary W. (whose loss had given rise to this controversy) was rated below A2, while on the books of underwriters and mercantile records in this city she was rated A2. The authorities referred to by plaintiff's counsel did not, in the opinion of the court, sustain the position he sought to maintain. In the case of Bank of Augusta v. Earles, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 519, the principal point decided was, that a bank chartered in Georgia could purchase a bill of exchange in Mobile.

In the case of Cox v. U. S., 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 172, the point decided was, that the official bond of the navy agent, although signed at New Orleans, was for his faithfully accounting at the proper department at Washington, and that therefore the liabilities of the sureties were to be governed by the principles of the common law, and not by the civil law of Louisiana. The case of Boyle v. Zacharie, Id. 635, was one of a payment made in Louisiana by plaintiffs for Boyle, and by his sanction, to release his property there attached, and created a debt due there, and was not released by the subsequent discharge of Boyle under the insolvent laws of Maryland.

In the case of Hazard's Adm'rs v. New England Marine Ins. Co., 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 557, the point decided was that the letter, on application for insurance, written in New York, where Hazard resided, although addressed to the defendants, a company incorporated in Massachusetts, and having their office in Boston, was to be tested as to the truth of its representations by the custom as to the extent of coppering vessels in New York and not by the custom in Boston. Judge Story in his great work on "The Conflict of Laws" (section 278) says: "A policy of insurance executed in England on a French ship for the French owner, on a voyage from one French port to another, would be treated as an English contract, and in case of loss, the debt would be treated as an English debt." So in section 289, the same learned author says: "A merchant, resident in Ireland, sends to England certain bills of exchange, with blanks for the dates, the sums, the times of payment and the names of the drawees. These bills are signed by the merchant in Ireland, endorsed with his own name, and dated from a place in Ireland, and are transmitted to a correspondent in England, with authority to him to fill up the remaining parts of the instrument. The correspondent in England accordingly fills them up, dated at a place in Ireland. Are the bills, when thus filled up and issued, to be deemed English or Irish contracts? It has been held, that under such circumstances, they are to be deemed Irish contracts, and of course to be governed as to stamps and other legal requisitions by the law of Ireland;" and analogous principles have been recognized in the following cases: Woolsey v. Bailey, 7 Fost. (N. H.) 217; Smith v. Smith, Id. 244; Davis v. Coleman, 11 Ired. 303. But this very question has been settled in two cases by the court of appeals of New York; and in one by the superior court in the same state, in the cases of Hyde v. Goodnow, 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 264; Western v. Genesee Mut. Ins. Co., 2 Kernan [12 N. Y.] 258; and St. John v. American Mut. Life Ins. Co., 2 Duer, 419. In this last case the policy was issued from the office of an agency of the company in New York, although the company was incorporated in Connecticut; and it was held that the construction and effect of this policy were to be governed by the law of Connecticut.

The case of Hyde v. Goodnow was an action to recover the amount of two premium notes given on a policy of insurance. A mutual insurance company of New York had an agent residing in Ohio, authorized to receive applications for insurance. This agent received from a party residing in Ohio, the application with the premium notes, and transmitted them to the office of the company in New York, where they were received and approved, and where the policy was executed and transmitted to the applicant by mail. It was held by the court that the contract was made in New York at the office of the company, and not in Ohio.

In the case of Western v. Genesee Mut. Ins. Co.—a mutual insurance company incorporated and located in New York—had an agent residing in Canada, who received the application for insurance, and sent it to the company in New York, who there signed the policy of insurance and forwarded it to their agent to be delivered to the applicant—it was held to be a New York contract, and its validity to depend upon the laws of that state. The judge therefore held upon principle and upon authority that the policies of insurance in these cases now being tried, were to be considered New York contracts, and to be construed and interpreted as such, for by section 263 of "The Conflict of Laws," the rule is laid down, "that the law of the place of the contract is to govern, as to the nature, the obligation and the interpretation of the contract." In this case, therefore, as the evidence showed that the schooner Mary W. was rated below A2, in New York, what is the true construction of these policies, in that view, and assuming that fact to be proved? These policies, although differing slightly in phraseology, are substantially the same, and the court treated of them together. Now, what are the principal provisions of the "Sun" policy? "The Sun Mutual Insurance Company do make insurance, and cause Jno. S. Wright to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from Rio de Janeiro to a port in the United States, one half of 5,000 bags of coffee, laden, or to be laden, on board the good vessel or vessels, &c. Beginning the adventure upon the said goods from and immediately following the loading thereof on board the said vessel, and shall so continue and endure until the goods shall be safely landed at —, aforesaid. The said goods hereby insured, are valued at $18 per bag, as interest may appear," and the policy admits "that the company have been paid for this insurance by the assured, at and after the rate of one and one-half per cent. To return one quarter of one per cent. if direct to an Atlantic port. To add an additional premium if by vessels rating lower than A2, or by foreign vessels; subject to such addition or deduction as shall make the premiums conform to the established rate at the time the return is made to the company." The words italicised are in writing, and not printed, as are the other provisions of the policy.

The other clauses of the policy are not material to this inquiry. On the back of this policy there was this endorsement, made by the defendant's agent in this city:—"1856, August 27. Schooner 'Mary W.,' Rio de Janeiro to New Orleans, on half cargo, 1,830 bags coffee, valued at $18 per bag, not to attach if vessel be proved unseaworthy."—$16,470. Now, the counsel for the defendants contended that this coffee never was covered by the said policy, because it was loaded on board a vessel rating below A2, and the correspondence showed that no additional premium had been agreed upon between the parties, and that, by the true construction of the policy, the defendants had the right to fix the additional premium. Now, what are the rules for the construction of policies of insurance, as recognized and acted upon by courts of justice? The first one is common to the construction of all contracts; that you must from the written paper, ascertain, if possible, what was the true meaning and understanding of the parties in the language they have used, and to carry that into effect, if it violates no principle of law. The second rule is, that policies of insurance are always to be construed liberally, so as to insure the indemnity sought for, and that if there be any ambiguity in the words of an exception, they are to be construed most strongly against the party for whose benefit they are introduced. Another rule is, where the written and printed clauses of a policy are in conflict, the written ones are to be sustained and carried into effect. For these rules the court referred to the cases of Palmer v. Warren Ins. Co. [Case No. 10,698]; Yeaton v. Frey, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 335; Grant v. Lexington Ins. Co., 5 Ind. 23; Mobile Marine Dock, & Ins. Co. v. McMillan, 27 Ala. 77; Sayles v. Northwestern Ins. Co. [Case No. 12,422]; and Breasted v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 2 Seld. [6 N. Y.] 299. This last case was peculiar. It was decided by the court of appeals of New York, that in a life policy insurance, a provision "that it should be void if the assured should die by his own hand" had reference to an act of criminal self-destruction, and not to one committed "while the party was insane." By these rules let this policy be construed. And can it be successfully contended for one moment, that when the assured procured this policy, he had no intention of covering any of his coffee that might be sent to him in vessels rating below A2, until he and the company should agree upon the additional premium to be charged in such cases? What were the reasons for his procuring this policy, and paying the premium on so large amount in advance? Because he did not know at what time and by what vessels his correspondents in Rio might send him the 5,000 bags of coffee he had directed them to purchase on his account, and he therefore wished his property to be thus covered by insurance whenever it was afloat on the ocean, for it might well be, that he might never hear of the shipment of his coffee until its safe arrival or loss. This necessity of the mercantile world has given rise to these running policies, which cover annually property to the value of millions of dollars. But if the view of these insurance companies is to prevail, that the property is not covered until the additional premium is fixed by them, or agreed upon between the parties, then a very speedy termination would be put to this kind of policy, and the defendants might as well close their agencies in this city. But such the court held not to be the true construction of this policy. The policy meant this, and nothing more: that the defendants would insure the coffee of plaintiff, in its transit from Rio to a port in the United States, at 1½ per cent. premium by whatever vessel carried, but if carried in a vessel rating below A2, or by a foreign vessel, an additional premium should be paid them. Additional to what? Why, to the 1½ per cent. already paid, and such additional premium as, in the opinion of underwriters, would be equal to the increased risk to such a cargo in vessels rating below A2, or in foreign vessels. And this seems to have been the view taken by the Sun Mutual Insurance Company itself in its correspondence with its agent in this city; for although, in their letter of August 25th, 1856, they take the ground "that the assured had no right to have this risk on the Mary W. covered on this policy," they subsequently recede from this position, and in their letter of the 30th August, "they admit he had the right, but that the fixing of the premium rested solely with them." The court thought the latter position as untenable as the former. As something had been said in the course of the argument, in reference to the endorsement on the policy of the 27th August, the court remarked that they considered this endorsement fully warranted by the defendants' letter to their agent, of that date; and that, indeed, the agent, with that letter in his hand, could have made no other endorsement. The plaintiff presented the two prayers, and the defendants presented three prayers. The court remarked that they agreed with the propositions of law contained in defendants' first and second prayers, and plaintiff's second prayer, and only rejected them because they were substantially embraced in the instruction which the court would give to the jury, but they rejected the plaintiff's first prayer and the defendants' third prayer as in conflict with their view of the law of the case; and the court then gave to the jury the following instruction: "If the jury shall find from the evidence, that the defendants executed the policy of the 27th July, 1855, and received from the plaintiff the premium therein mentioned; and that their duly authorized agent in this city made the endorsements on the said policy, which have been offered in evidence, and shall further find that 1,830 bags of coffee, belonging to plaintiff, were shipped on the 12th of July, 1856, at Rio, on board the schooner Mary W., to be carried to New Orleans, and that when said schooner left Rio she was seaworthy and in good condition; and shall further find, that the said vessel and cargo were subsequently on said voyage totally lost by one of the perils insured against; and that said schooner was rated lower in New York than A2, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover for one half the value of said coffee so lost, at $18 per bag, less such additional premium beyond the 1½ per cent., as in the opinion of the underwriters may be deemed adequate for the increased risk to a cargo of coffee shipped in a vessel rating below A2, with interest from thirty days after such time as the jury may find the defendants were furnished by plaintiff with the preliminary proofs of his said loss; and there is no evidence in this case that the said schooner at any period during the running of this policy rated as high as A2 in any of the insurance offices in New York."

[The judgments in these two cases were afterwards reversed by the supreme court. See 23 How. (64 U. S.) 412.]

Case No. 18,096.

WRIGHT v. TAYLOR.

[St. Louis Law News, Oct. 11, 1872; 2 Dill. 23.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. Oct. Term, 1871.

EJECTMENT—MILITARY BOUNTY LANDS—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—CURATIVE STATUTES—DEEDS DEFECTIVELY ACKNOWLEDGED—CONSTRUCTION OF MISSOURI STATUTES.

1. In bestowing the bounty of the government upon its soldiers, congress had an undoubted right to shape that bounty as it deemed best, either by prescribing conditions or limiting the tenure and quality of the grant.

2. The act of congress of April 16, 1816 [3 Stat. 284], authorizing the designation of lands for military bounties, prohibited the alienation of said lands until after the issue of the patent therefor. Held, that a deed made in 1820 by the attorney of a patentee, under a power of attorney executed in February, 1816, the patent not having issued till 1819, is void ab initio, as being within the prohibition of the act.

3. The federal courts will follow the decision of the state supreme courts as to the admissibility in evidence of certified copies of deeds, without accounting for the absence of the originals, and as to the various curative acts concerning deeds improperly or defectively acknowledged, and as to the force and effect of the recording acts, whether those decisions are in accord with what are deemed sound rules of interpretation, or otherwise.

4. The inhibition of the Missouri constitution of 1865, forbidding the enactment of special laws giving effect to informal or invalid wills or deeds, &c., does not prevent the enactment of general curative statutes upon the subjects named, nor upon any of the other classes of subjects enumerated in that clause of the constitution. Such acts being general in the constitutional sense, since they apply to a class, and not to individual cases; hence, the exceptional legislation as to military bounty lands in Missouri is not within the inhibition of the Missouri constitution.

5. Section 38, c. 109, Rev. St. Mo., pertaining to the admissibility in evidence of certified copies of deeds for military bounty lands, is not repealed by the act of February 27, 1868 (Sess. Acts 1868, p. 51), nor is the common-law mode of proving the execution of deeds thereby abrogated. Hence, a deed for such lands can be received in evidence where its execution is proved according to the common-law mode, in the same manner as any other deed not acknowledged or recorded properly, and it will be valid between the parties and those having actual notice and mere trespassers.

6. A certified copy from the recorder's office of such deed, when the original has been recorded and acknowledged, under section 35, c. 109, Rev. St. Mo. 1865, must be received in evidence upon proof of the loss or destruction of the original; and, if duly acknowledged according to the laws of Missouri, a certified copy is to be received on the same terms as other deeds with valid acknowledgments.

7. A deed improperly acknowledged in New York in 1820, according to the laws both of New York and Missouri at that time, and recorded in Missouri in 1822, is not such a deed as section 35 et seq. of chapter 109 of the Revised Statutes of 1865 affects; and a curative act passed in New York in 1824, to operate on such imperfect acknowledgments in that state, cannot act extraterritorially, and work curatively upon a deed to Missouri lands.

Ejectment, military bounty lands, &c. This was an action of ejectment [by David C. Wright against Samuel E. Taylor] to recover possession of certain land in Chariton county, Missouri, forming part of the track appropriated for military bounties. Plaintiff claimed under a patent for the land, granted to Nicholas Columbey, dated January 4, 1819, and on the trial offered in evidence said patent, together with a power of attorney by Columbey to William Russell, dated February 23, 1816, a deed from Columbey by said Russell, his attorney, to Moses Russell, dated June 1, 1819, and also subsequent deeds making a chain of title to plaintiff. Defendant objected to the admission of said power of attorney and the deed made thereunder, as being in violation of the acts of congress granting bounty lands, and therefore void under them. Objections were also taken to other deeds, offered in evidence, upon the ground that some of them were imperfectly acknowledged, and that others, being copies, could not be admitted; the statutory requirements governing the admission of copies not having been complied with. The court sustained the objections as to the power of attorney and the deed made thereunder, and rendered judgment for defendant.

lands to soldiers in the war of 1812, require an interpretation of said acts of congress, and of the statutes of Missouri with reference thereto.

By the act of May 6, 1812, c. 77, § 4 (2 Stat. 729), it was provided: "That no claim for the military land bounties aforesaid, shall be assignable or transferable in any manner whatever, until after a patent shall have been granted in the manner aforesaid. All sales, mortgages, contracts or agreements of any nature whatever, made prior thereto, for the purpose or with the intent of alienating, pledging or mortgaging any such claim, are hereby declared, and shall be held null and void; nor shall any tract of land granted, as aforesaid, be liable to be taken in execution, or sold, on account of any such sale, mortgage, contract or agreement, or on account of any debt contracted prior to the date of the patent, either by the person, originally entitled to the land or by his heirs or legal representatives, or by virtue of any process or suit at law, or judgment of the court against a person entitled to receive his patent aforesaid." Thus congress, in providing for the land bounties, annexed to them the qualities of inalienability for any of the enumerated causes, existing prior to the emanation of the patent. It had the power to grant the land on such terms as it might prescribe, and it prescribed such terms as it deemed important for the protection of its beneficiaries.

The second section of the act provided for the issue of warrants, and "that such warrants shall be issued only in the names of the persons thus entitled, and be by them or their representatives applied for within five years after the said persons shall have become entitled thereto; and the said warrants shall not be assignable or transferable in any manner whatever." This act referred to the prior act of December 24, 1811, c. 10 (2 Stat. 669), which contemplated a grant of 160 acres to each noncommissioned officer and soldier enlisted for the term of five years, said right to the grant to accrue when said person should be discharged with a certificate of faithful performance of duty,—the land "to be designated, surveyed and laid off at the public expense in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be provided by law." The act of January 11, 1812, c. 24, § 11 (2 Stat. 672) contains like provisions. Thus, at the honorable discharge of any one of those persons enlisted for five years, he was to be "allowed and paid," in addition to the money named, 160 acres of land, to be designated, &c., as above stated. The act of May 6, 1812, above quoted, requires the persons entitled thereto to apply within five years from their honorable discharge for the prescribed land warrant, and annexed the condition in section 2, that said warrant should not be transferable; and in section 4 that no claim should be transferable in any manner whatever until after the patent issued, &c. It must also be carefully noted that as, by the prior acts, congress was thereafter to designate and prescribe the terms and conditions, those terms and conditions were in part fixed by the act of May 6, 1812,—one of which was inalienability, as already mentioned. That act of 1812 (section 1) designated the lands to be surveyed for those military bounty purposes, and no lands in that part of Missouri where the premises in dispute lie were among those so designated.

In aid of the foregoing acts, and in enlargement of the previous bounty system, congress passed the act of April 16, 1816, c. 55 (3 Stat. 286), whereby the president was to designate 2,000,000 acres of land in addition to those named in the act of 1811, subject to the conditions and terms of the last named act. Then, in section 5, as if to prevent all possible contrivances for alienating the county before the patent issued, congress provided: "That no transfer of land, granted in virtue of this or any other law, giving bounties of lands, &c., shall be valued, unless the contract or agreement therefor, or letter of attorney, giving power to sell or convey, shall have been executed after the patents shall be issued, and delivered to the persons entitled thereto." The prohibition was complete, under the act of 1812, against the transfer of the claim or of the warrant. But it is contended that a "letter of attorney," is not included within the terms used therein, viz. "sales, mortgages, contracts, or agreements." Whether that view be correct when the language and intent of the whole act is considered, it is not necessary to decide; for the lands included in that act, and designated for military bounties do not embrace the lands in controversy, and consequently the premises in question could not have been located or granted under it and the preceding acts. This tract of land, if the patent therefor issued under any act, must have been granted under the act of 1816.

The plaintiff claims under a deed executed in 1820, by William Russell, acting by virtue of a power of attorney from Columbey, the patentee. The power of attorney was executed in February, 1816, the land patent issued in 1819, the deed under the power of attorney was made by Russell in 1820, and by Russell's grantee back to Russell a few years thereafter. There could hardly be a plainer violation of the conditions prescribed by the act of congress under which this land must be claimed, if at all. It is apparent that the original letter of attorney was a mere contrivance to evade the act of 1812; but the act of 1816, taking effect two months subsequently, declared that any transfer of land to be granted thereafter should be void, if attempted to be transferred by such means. The land was then a part of the public domain, and had not been in any manner previously designated for bounties. The original act, promising a land bounty, provided that the bounty grants should be on such terms and conditions as congress might thereafter prescribe; and congress, knowing what contrivances might be used to defeat the objects of the county, prescribed the needed conditions to save to the soldiers the benefits intended: First, that the warrant should not be transferred; second, the claim should not be transferred; third, no sale, mortgage, contract or agreement for the purpose or with the intent of alienating, or pledging, or mortgaging any such claim should be valid; fourth, no tract of land granted under the county acts should be liable to be taken in execution or sold on account of any such sale, mortgage or agreement, etc.; and then, by the act of 1816, that all transfers of such land by means of any of such instruments or agreements or powers given before the patent issued, should be void. In the case before the court such a transfer was attempted, and it was void, ab initio. The plaintiff, claiming through and under that void act, takes nothing. Even if the acts prior to 1816 had not been passed, the plaintiff would be in no better position, although his power of attorney antedated the last named act; for the land in question was not appropriated for bounty purposes by any previous law. The grant, being under the act of 1816, was subject to its terms. If Russell had taken under the previous acts, the location of the land would have been elsewhere. In bestowing the bounty of the government upon its soldiers, congress had an undoubted right to shape that bounty as it deemed best, either by prescribing conditions or limiting the tenure and quality of the grant.

Many objections have been raised under the Missouri statutes as to the admissibility in evidence of certified copies of deeds, without accounting for the absence of the originals, and as to the various curative acts concerning deeds improperly or defectively acknowledged, and as to the force and effect of the recording acts. This court follows the decisions of the state supreme court upon such questions, whether those decisions are in accordance with what are deemed sound rules of interpretation or otherwise. The leading objects of the statutes concerning conveyances of land are to secure certainty, publicity, and good faith. As lands pass by deeds duly executed and delivered, it is desirable that there should be prescribed formalities observed, so as to insure due care and deliberation, and that they should be formally acknowledged before a competent officer, or duly proved. His certificate that the prescribed acts have been performed is designed to accompany the deed as authenticating its execution according to law. After execution and acknowledgment, it is to be recorded, so as to give notice to all concerned of the exact condition of the title, and thus close the avenues to fraud. But as the officers entrusted with those grave duties were often incompetent, and thereby the just rights of grantees became jeopardized, the general assembly, in furtherance of justice, has, from time to time, passed curative acts, the effect of many of which has been to create confusion and uncertainty. Indeed the mischief of such legislation eventually became so great that the new constitution of the state inhibited it to some extent in these words: "The general assembly shall not pass special laws * * * giving effect to informal or invalid wills or deeds * * * but shall pass general laws providing, so far as it may deem necessary, for the cases enumerated." That inhibition does not go so far as to prevent the enactment of general curative statutes, upon the subjects named, nor upon any of the other classes of subjects enumerated in that clause of the constitution. Thus the exceptional legislation as to military bounty lands in this state, not only as to defective acknowledgments, but as to limitations, is held not to be unconstitutional.

The statutory limitation for military bounty lands granted under the early acts of congress is two years; for other lands ten years. So the act validating deeds for military bounty lands defectively acknowledged, and giving to the recording of the same greater effect than is given generally to deeds for other lands, are not within the constitutional prohibitions. If the limitation as to military bounty lands is unconstitutional because a special, and not a general, law, then the curative acts as to those lands would fall within the same rule, and the plaintiff be without the desired muniments of title. Those various acts are general in the constitutional sense; for they apply to a class, and not to individual cases. The fact that the district or county in which those lands are situated is not co-extensive with the state does not alter the rule.

Inasmuch as the general assembly had, by a series of acts during the last twenty years, given special and peculiar advantages to that class of claimants, validating their invalid acknowledgments, and changing for their benefit the ordinary rules of proving their titles; and inasmuch as by so doing the doors had been opened to increased litigation, and it may be to speculative dealings in such claims; and inasmuch as from failure to record conveyances, the lands could not be properly assessed, or, if assessed, the taxes due thereon were not paid, it was not improper to limit the time within which such special and unwonted favor should continue. The General Statutes of Missouri contemplate that all deeds shall be duly acknowledged, or proved, and certificates thereof be attached; that they shall then be recorded; and that, when so acknowledged or proved and duly certified, the original shall be read in evidence. Thus the certificate of acknowledgment, or of proof by the proper officer, is to be received as proving, prima facie, the due execution of the deed. The statutes contemplate the production of the original, in order that the prima facie case made by the certificate may in proper cases be rebutted.

This is important for protection against fraud. The officer recording deeds does not necessarily know either the handwriting of the grantor or of the witness, nor of the magistrate giving the certificate. He records what purports to be genuine; and if a certified copy from his office is to be conclusive evidence, or even prima facie, then the power to rebut is of no avail. But it may be that the original is lost, or "not within the power of the party wishing to use the same;" and hence the statute provides that in such cases certified copies may be read in evidence, where the party, or some one knowing the fact, makes oath to the loss, &c.

This provision would seem to require such oath to be made in every instance where a certified copy is to be used. But the supreme court of Missouri, in Barton v. Murrain, 27 Mo. 235, held that: (1) The exemption of the patent certified by the commissioner of the general land office may properly be received in evidence without proof of the loss of the original (5 Sept. 242). (2) A certified copy of the deed may generally be read without the preliminary oath, if the original is presumed to be in the hands of a third person; and that such presumption, in the absence of suspicious circumstances, arises when a party claims under a warranty deed (for he is supposed not to hold deeds anterior to his own), also when he claims under a sheriff's deed, for the deeds anterior thereto are likely to remain with the execution debtor. The other cases referred to in the opinion seem not to dispense with the preliminary oath; but merely when the facts sworn to amount to sufficient proof of the deeds being beyond the power of the party to produce, viz.; that the grantee presumed to have the original is out of the state; or that the deed is in the hands of some one beyond the process of the court, or who cannot be compelled lawfully to produce it. The dicta in that opinion are far from giving a clear and authoritative exposition of the statute on all of the various points referred to. In Christy v. Kavanagh, 45 Mo. 376, and in Boyce's Trustees v. Mooney, 40 Mo. 105, the court seems inclined to narrow the rule dispensing with the oath; and, therefore, considering the plain language of the statute, parties should be held to the preliminary oath, except in the two cases of deeds anterior to a warranty and to a sheriff's deed. Certainly there is no hardship imposed upon a party claiming title through a series of conveyances, in compelling him to produce the original, or to make proper efforts to procure them, especially if his oath that they are lost, or beyond his power, as when in the hands of a non-resident, &c., who is not his own agent, servant, or bailee, is sufficient to let in a certified copy.

This court is not inclined to interpret away the statute further than the supreme court of the state has done; particularly, in consideration of the mischief to be guarded against. Hence, the rule must be held to be, that the preliminary oath is required in all cases except the two named, and also in those to be considered in connection with military bounty lands.

As to conveyances of military bounty lands, the statutes have for a long period of time permitted them to be recorded, though not acknowledged or proved, according to the laws of this state in force at the time whenever they were acknowledged or proved according to the laws of the place where executed, and such place was out of this state, and within the United States, and have validated such acknowledgments. The statutes also gave to the recording of such defectively acknowledged deeds the same force as if properly acknowledged, viz. such recording imparts notice. Copies of such instruments, duly certified by the recorder of the proper county, were made evidence on the same conditions as the original, upon proof of the loss or destruction of the original. Rev. St. 1865, p. 448, § 38. But the act of February 27, 1868 (Sess. Acts, p. 51), provides: "That section 36 of chapter 143 of the General Statutes of 1865, be, and the same is hereby amended so as to read as follows:—Section 36. Certified copies, or any other copies of such records as are contemplated in the next preceding section shall not be received in evidence until the execution of the original instrument or instruments from which the records were made shall have been duly proved according to law, unless the said records were made thirty years before the first day of January, 1867; in which case the certified copies may be read in evidence without proof of the execution of the originals." But the thirty-eighth section of chapter 109 of the General Statutes of 1865 pertains to military bounty lands, and section 36 of chapter 143 to lands generally; hence the 38th section of chapter 109 was not repealed by the act of 1868.

The supreme court of Missouri has held (Bishop v. Schneider, 46 Mo. 480) that generally, the recording of a deed imperfectly acknowledged does not impart notice to any one, unless recorded prior to the Revised Code of 1855. The exceptional cases as to military bounty lands, if said section 38 in the Code of 1865 is to be considered as repealed, would fall under the general rules concerning proof of deeds—would cease to be exceptional. As the amendatory act, however, is expressly confined to section 36 of chapter 143, what effect is to be given to section 38 of chapter 109, unrepealed, which permits certified copies from the record to be read upon proof of the loss or destruction of the original? The amendatory act requires the execution of the original instrument in the cases to which it refers to be proved according to law, before certified copies are received in evidence. But if the execution of the original is to be proved according to law, what law is meant? The common-law mode, as tolerated under certain early decisions in this state, permits the parties to produce the original and prove the signature of the grantor, and, in some instances, of the witnesses to the deed, if there were any; and if such is the mode of proof contemplated, why say that after such proof is made of the original before the court, certified copies may be received in evidence? If, on the other hand, proof of the execution of the original is to be made before a competent officer under the statute, and his certificate is to be annexed, then such deeds can be received in evidence only when such course has been pursued, and copies thereof only when the deed with said certificate has been duly recorded. Hence the grave question: does that amendatory act abrogate the common-law mode of proof as recognized in Clardy v. Richardson, 24 Mo. 295? In that case it does not distinctly appear whether the deed in question was between the parties to the suit, or other parties, through whom plaintiff claimed title? If, between the parties to the suit, or those having actual notice, then that mode of proof was legitimate; for, by the Missouri statutes, a deed not acknowledged or recorded is valid between the parties thereto and those having actual notice thereof, according to the several decisions of the Missouri supreme court. 17 Mo. 561; 11 Mo. 642. Such seems to have been the uniform ruling of that court under the state statutes; and, if the act of 1868 was designed to work so radical a change, its language would have been more explicit. That court has held a deed unacknowledged and unrecorded not only valid between the parties and those having actual notice, but also against a naked trespasser, (14 Mo. 166); also, that the necessity of acknowledgment and registry, being unknown to the common law, arises only from such statutes in some states as make such requisites essential to the validity of deeds; of which states Missouri is not one. 17 Mo. 561. If, then, the act of 1868, does not exact acknowledgment or proof, according to the statutory requirements for registry, the question still recurs: Why, if the execution of the original is proved by the common-law mode, did the general assembly enact that only when such proof was made a certified copy should be received in evidence? It is evident that the common-law mode or statutory mode may be followed; and, if the latter, then the certified copy may be used. It may be that the framer of the act of 1868 intended also to furnish a substitute for section 38 of chapter 109, in the act of 1865, as well as of section 36 of chapter 143; and thus, as to all deeds, require formal statutory proofs, before a proper officer, with his certificate attached and the subsequent recording thereof, except where the deed, informally acknowledged, had been recorded the prescribed thirty years. If such were his purpose, the act fails to accomplish it. Section 38 of chapter 109, is still the law, and leaves the true rules as follows: A deed for military bounty lands can be received in evidence, where the execution of the original is proved according to the common-law modes, just as is the case with any other deed when not acknowledged or recorded properly, and it will be valid between the parties, and those having actual notice, and mere trespassers. A certified copy from the recorder's office, where the deed has been recorded and acknowledged under section 35, must be received in evidence upon proof of the loss or destruction of the original. If duly acknowledged according to the Missouri laws, a certified copy is to be received on the same terms as other deeds with valid acknowledgments.

In 46 Mo. 480, it is held generally that a deed recorded with a defective acknowledgment does not impart notice to any one, and that the act of 1865, re-enacting the act of 1855, as to recorded deeds not proved or acknowledged, or imperfectly proved or acknowledged, has no reference to any other deeds than those recorded prior to the taking effect of said act of 1855; consequently no such recording of imperfectly acknowledged deeds after that date imparts any notice whatever. Rev. Code 1865, p. 582, §§ 35, 36. The last cited sections have reference to deeds recorded under the act of 1855, other than deeds for military bounty lands; consequently section 38 of chapter 109 stands unaffected by the act of 1868. In 27 Mo. 235, the court holds that proof of loss or destruction of the original deeds to military bounty lands need not go to the extent of showing the actual destruction, but it will be sufficient to raise the presumption of loss that search was made in the proper place, and by the proper person, and that the deed cannot be found after due diligence in the search. And in 45 Mo. 376, it was held that the party should show that he has in good faith exhausted all the probable sources of information and means of discovery which the facts and circumstances are calculated to suggest, and which are at the same time within his reach. Each case, depending on its own circumstances, should show the extent and thoroughness of the search which the circumstances suggest. Thus that court has gradually restricted the rule, so that the mischief of letting in copies as indicated by the case in 27 Mo. 235, is reduced within narrow and safe limits, and accords with the views intimated by this court before said last decision was rendered.

The general provisions in sections 46 and 47, p. 731, in the Revised Code of 1855, concerning the recording of deeds not acknowledged, &c., certainly do not apply to deeds for military bounty lands, recorded after 1855, and consequently sections 35 and 36 of chapter 143 of the Revised Code of 1865 (page 582), which copy the sections in the act of 1855, do not apply to such deeds. Sections 35 and 36 of chapter 143 (1865) have reference only to deeds recorded before the act of 1855, while sections 35-38 of chapter 109 (1865) have reference to deeds recorded at any time which fall within the description therein given. As by section 35, c. 109 (1865), deeds acknowledged or proved according to the laws of the state where executed (if for military bounty lands), are admitted to record and validated, it must, if they are not in conformity with Missouri laws at the time, be shown to have conformed to the laws of the place where executed at the time they were so acknowledged, in order to give to the certificate the force of proof. Hence a deed imperfectly acknowledged in New York in 1820, according to the laws both of New York and Missouri at that time, and recorded in Missouri in 1822, is not such a deed as sections 35 et seq. of chapter 109 of 1865 affects. A curative act passed in New York in 1824 to operate on such imperfect acknowledgments in that state cannot act extraterritorially and work curatively upon a deed to Missouri lands. The Missouri curative statutes alone apply to deeds for lands in Missouri. Under the territorial laws of Missouri, a notary public in Maryland was not at that time such an officer as could take acknowledgments of deeds for Missouri.

For a full elucidation of the Missouri Statutes as to imperfectly acknowledged deeds, reference must be had to the two classes of cases. Section 46 of chapter 62 (1855), page 731, and section 47 of the same chapter, reproduced in 1865 as sections 35 and 36 of chapter 143, page 581, refer to deeds not acknowledged or proved at all; also to those acknowledged and proved, but not according to the law in force at the time the same was done, which said deeds had been recorded prior to the act of 1855. Under the general law, the recording of such imperfectly acknowledged instruments would not impart notice to any one; so the general assembly enacted that the recording theretofore of such instruments should be taken out of the general rule, and be held to impart notice. Inasmuch as such effect was to be given to that class of instruments previously recorded, viz. imparting notice, it did not follow that copies of the record should be received in evidence on the same terms as copies of deeds previously recorded according to law. Hence copies of the defective instruments so recorded were not to be received in evidence until the execution of the original instrument was proved according to law. The same rule, as amended by the act of 1868, simply excepts from that stringent rule such of those deeds as were recorded prior to 1837. But the act concerning military bounty lands permits deeds therefor, which, though not acknowledged according to the Missouri law, were yet acknowledged according to the laws of the state where made, to be recorded, and gives to such acknowledgment the same effect as if rightly done originally. Hence, when the original of such a deed is produced, it stands on the same footing as other deeds validly acknowledged; but, if a certified copy of the record is offered, instead of its being admissible upon the preliminary oath of the loss of the original, or of its being beyond the power of the party to produce it, as other valid deeds, the party offering it must first prove the loss or destruction of the original, or that it is beyond the power of the party to produce it. But in military bounty cases, there must be proof of the loss or destruction of the original, and not merely that it is beyond the power of the party, etc. But if deeds to military bounty lands were put on record prior to 1855, when they were not acknowledged according to the laws of Missouri, or of the state where made, then they fall under the provision of section 36, c. 143 (1865), and the amendatory act of 1868, and the execution of the original must be proved, unless recorded before 1837. Hence the only exception to military bounty deeds is, that when they were acknowledged according to the laws of the state where made, though not according to the Missouri laws at the time in force, the originals can be received in evidence, or certified copies, upon proof of the loss or destruction of the original, unless they were recorded prior to 1837.

All imperfectly acknowledged deeds recorded prior to the act of 1855 may be proved according to the common-law mode in open court; or, if proved according to the statutory mode, before a competent officer, with his certified proof attached, and then duly recorded, a certified copy can be used. Either course is admissible. If the latter be taken, then the properly proved deed according to the statutory mode would place it on the same footing as any other deed properly acknowledged and proved and recorded, with this advantage only, that the recording of the deed originally would have imparted notice from that time, instead of only from the time of recording the properly proved instrument. Those imperfectly acknowledged deeds, in other words, though recorded, and thereby notice of their existence was given, remained to be proved just if they never had been recorded; if military bounty lands, falling under sections 35-38 of chapter 109 (1865); if not military bounty lands, under the general provisions of the statute. Notice imparted by the curative act of 1855 affected notice alone, and not the rules of evidence or proof of execution. The deeds remained to be proved, and could not be proved by producing a certified copy of a record, which, on itself, contained nothing even purporting to be proof of the execution of the original.

It appears that the supreme court of Missouri holds that a husband, by virtue of his life estate, may maintain or defend in ejectment for the possession of his wife's realty. 4 Mo. 106; 22 Mo. 22; 38 Mo. 439.

WRIGHT v. UNITED STATES.

[1 Hayw. & H. 201.]¹Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 4,

FALSE PRETENSES—EVIDENCE OF SIMILAR CRIMES.

It is not error in the court to allow evidence to go to the jury in a trial for obtaining money under false pretenses that the prisoner made false representations to other persons for the purpose of obtaining money; but it is error to allow evidence to go to the jury that the prisoner had obtained money by means of said representations.

At law. In error from the criminal court. [William S. Wright] indicted for obtaining money under false pretenses.

James Hoban, for prisoner.
Philip R. Fendall, for the United States.

The prisoner was convicted and sentenced to suffer imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary of the District of Columbia for the period of two years. Exceptions were made to the admissibility of the following evidence: The testimony of Mr. Hawley: That the prisoner borrowed ten dollars from him about seven years ago upon statements of the prisoner that he had shipped large quantities of cotton to the North; that he was a son of the collector of the port of St. Johns, Nova Scotia; that he was very intimate with a number of clergymen and spoke familiarly of them, and concerning them, and that he knew several bishops, among them—the bishops of Nova Scotia, of Massachusetts, and of South Carolina—with all of whom Mr. Hawley, the witness, was acquainted; on the strength of which asserted acquaintance of the prisoner the witness lent the money; that the money never was repaid him; that he does not know whether these statements were true or false. And further testimony of J. M. Cutts: That the prisoner called on him to borrow money some two years ago and said that he had certain papers and deeds of Mr. Madison which he had lost, and that he was out of money; that he does not know whether those statements were true or false; that he called himself Scott; that witness gave him no money.

After argument by counsel and on consideration by the court, the following opinion was rendered: That the criminal court did not err in allowing evidence to go to the jury that the prisoner had represented himself to Mr. Hawley, a witness in this cause, as a son of the collector of the port of St. Johns, in Nova Scotia, or that the prisoner represented himself to J. M. Cutts, another witness in the cause, as being named Scott; that the said criminal court erred in allowing evidence to go to the jury that the prisoner had obtained money from the said Mr. Hawley by means of the representations set out in the bill of exceptions, and it is ordered and adjudged by this court that the judgment of the said criminal court in this cause be reversed and that this cause be remanded, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

Case No. 18,098.

WRIGHT v. UNITED STATES.

[1 Hayw. & H. 211.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Jan., 1845.

OBTAINING GOODS UNDER FALSE PRETENCES—INDICTMENT.

In an indictment under the act of congress of March 2, 1831 [4 Stat. 448], for obtaining goods, etc., by false pretences, it is error to aver "that by reason of which false pretence the prisoner did then and there unlawfully obtain," etc.

James Hoban, for prisoner.
P. R. Fendall, for the United States.

The court on petition of the plaintiff issued two writs of error. The defendant in the criminal court was found guilty of obtaining money under false pretences on two indictments each for separate and distinct acts. One of them that Wm. S. Wright, etc., unlawfully did falsely pretend to one, John P. Van Ness that he the said Wm. S. Wright was a brother of one Silas Wright Jr., a senator of the United States, etc., by reason of which said false pretence the said Wm. S. Wright did then and there unlawfully obtain from the said John P. Van Ness two bank notes each for the payment of money to the amount of ten dollars. The other that Wm. S. Wright, etc., unlawfully did falsely pretend to one Edward Dyer that he was a brother to Silas Wright, a senator of the United States by reason of which false pretence the said Wm. S. Wright did then and there unlawfully obtain from the said Edward Dyer a certain instrument in writing for the payment of money. There were other counts in this latter indictment. The prisoner was found guilty on both indictments.

The error assigned by the defendant was: Because it is apparent on the face of the record in these cases that the prisoner is charged with obtaining money by a false pretence, whereas the act of congress² only applies to obtaining money by false pretences, and for other reasons and errors.

² Section 1: "That from and after the passage of this act, every person who shall be convicted in any court of this District of Columbia of any of the following offenses, to wit: Obtaining by false pretenses any goods or chattels, money, bank note, promissory note, or any other instrument in writing for the payment or delivery of money or other valuable thing, shall be sentenced to suffer punishment by imprisonment and labor."

Sec. 12: "That every person duly convicted of obtaining by false pretences, any," etc. Approved March 2, 1831 (4 Stat. 448).

The criminal court (Judge Dunlap presiding) overruled the objection.

The following points were raised in the arguments by the several counsels: (1) Is the offense such as is punishable under the statute? (2) Is the want of venue of the pretence fatal? (3) Is there a venue? (4) Is one pretence only punishable under the statute against false pretences? The latter point was the only one pressed.

Mr. Hoban, for plaintiff, contended that in the first Van Ness case the indictment charges the prisoner with obtaining two bank notes from General Van Ness by the false pretence of representing himself as the brother of Silas Wright, a member of the United States senate. The language of the penitentiary act applies to persons duly convicted of obtaining goods, money, bank-notes, etc., by false pretences, here only one false pretence is charged. Penal statutes must be construed strictly, stealing horses does not apply to stealing a horse. 1 Bl. Comm. 88. To meet this a declaratory act was required, and the act of 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 33, that took away the benefit of clergy from the case of stealing horses; before that act clergy was allowed in the case of stealing a horse by statute. In Hassel's Case, 1 Leach, 1, stealing a bank note was held to be included under the act punishing the larceny or stealing "any bank-notes" upon the like principle burning a house was held punishable under the act for burning any houses.

The argument of the attorney general in the case in Leach, shows that case to turn upon other portions and the peculiar phraseology of other portions of the same law. These cases are not in point. The question here is not to what a plain law applies but what that law is, whether the obtaining goods, etc., must be by one or more pretence. The English acts of false pretences use this language: "Any pretence or pretences." Our penitentiary act speaks only "of false pretences." Rex v. Goodhall, 11 Ryan, 343 [Russ. & R. 461]: this was a case of obtaining meat upon a promise, at the same time, to send the money, which was not done. The twelve judges held the conviction wrong, saying: "It was merely a promise for future conduct, and common prudence and caution would have prevented any injury arising from the breach of it." In the case of Jones v. U. S. [Case No. 7,499], April 9, 1840 (Cranch, C. J.), the court say that they are to judge whether the averment contains a false pretence within the contemplation of the law. 4 Pick. 177 (per curiam): "A mere naked lie (is this case any mere?) may not be sufficient to sustain an indictment on this statute, for it is not the policy of the government to punish criminally every wrong which is committed. It is difficult, no doubt, to draw the line."

Mr. Fendall in his notes, says: In the notes handed to the court by the prisoner's counsel, he refers to the facts of the case. There would be no difficulty in meeting the arguments suggested, if such a course were admissible, but it is not so. The proceedings in the Van Ness case before the court on a writ of error to the criminal court for its refusal to correct the judgment. Of course no question can come before the appellate court, except such as arises on the face of the indictment. As to the nature of the offence, Mr. Fendall referred to the case of People v. Stone, 9 Wend. 182, under 1 Rev. St. N. Y. pp. 410, 616, and People v. Genung, 11 Wend. 18, under 2 Rev. St. N. Y. pp. 677, 653; the opinion of Cranch, C. J., in the case of Jones v. U. S. [supra], April 9, 1840. As to the simple pretence, Mr. Fendall cited, 1 Bl. Comm. (Christian's notes) 88; Archb. Cr. Prac. & Pl. (8th Ed.) 239; Hassel's Case, 1 Leach, 1-5; and U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76.

The judgment of the criminal court was reversed.

Case No. 18,099.

WRIGHT et al. v. UNITED STATES.

[2 Paine, 184.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York.²

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURE OF GOODS.

Under section 14, of the act of congress of July 14, 1832 [4 Stat. 593], it is not a distinct and substantive ground of forfeiture that on the opening, &c., of a package of imported goods, &c., the same are not found to correspond with the entry at the custom-house.

[In error to the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

In admiralty.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This case comes up on a writ of error from the district court for the Southern district of New York. An information was filed in the district court against five cases of merchandise, alleging the same to have become forfeited. The information alleges the forfeiture incurred in various ways; but the question upon which the cause turned arises upon the 14th section of the act of congress of July 14, 1832, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports." That section is as follows: "That whenever, upon the opening and examination of any package or packages of imported goods, composed wholly or in part of wool or cotton, in the manner provided by the fourth section of the act for the more effectual collection of the import duties, approved on twenty-eighth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and thirty, the said goods shall be found not to

Upon the trial, the court decided that the construction to be given to this section was, that if the goods found in the package do not correspond with the entry, they are subject to forfeiture; that is, that the want of correspondence between the entry and the goods found in the package, was a distinct offence and a substantive ground of forfeiture, under this section of the law; and whether it be so or not, is the only question to be decided here. This section of the law is certainly very inartificially drawn, and its interpretation may admit of doubt; but I think the construction adopted in the district court cannot be sustained. If this want of correspondence is considered a separate, distinct and substantive ground of forfeiture, there is an entire omission of any express words declaring a forfeiture as the penalty for such want of correspondence. It must arise by implication, and this would violate the rules of construction applicable to penal statutes. If this is to be considered a distinct offence, it is difficult to say what circumstances shall constitute it. Any disagreement is a want of correspondence, and the clause is too vague and indefinite in the description of the offence. The forfeiture, if incurred under this clause in the section, must be a forfeiture of the whole package in which the goods shall be found not to correspond with the entry, and the words "shall be forfeited," contained in the next clause, cannot be construed as applying to the antecedent clause; it provides for a distinct case: "And if any package shall be found to contain any article not entered, such article shall be forfeited." The forfeiture here is expressly limited to the article not entered, and cannot, by any construction, be extended to the whole package, which it must be if applied to the antecedent clause. The last clause in this section, which repeals a part of the 4th section of the act of 1830 [4 Stat. 410], would seem to afford some countenance to the construction that this want of correspondence was a distinct ground of forfeiture: "And so much of the said section as prescribes a forfeiture of goods found not to correspond with the invoice thereof, be and the same is hereby repealed." But this is evidently a mistaken construction or description of the effect and operation of that section of the act of 1830. It gives no forfeiture for such want of correspondence. It directs the collector to cause one or more packages of every invoice to be opened and examined, and if the same shall be found not to correspond with the invoice, or to be falsely charged in such invoice, the collector shall forthwith order all the goods contained in the same entry to be inspected, &c.; and if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, or if such package or invoice be made up with intent, by a false valuation or extension or otherwise, to evade or defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited. The want of correspondence between the package and the invoice is not here made the ground of forfeiture; but its discovery is to lead to further examination, and the forfeiture grows out of other circumstances developed by such examination, viz.: that the package is found to contain any article not described in the invoice, or that the package or invoice was made up with intent to defraud the revenue. We find, also, in the act of the 1st of March, 1823 (Pamph. p. 23, § 15 [3 Stat. 735]), the same language made use of with respect to the want of correspondence. The collector is required to examine one or more packages, and if the same be found not to correspond with the invoice thereof, or to be falsely charged in such invoice, a full inspection of all the goods contained in the same entry shall be made, and, if subject to an ad valorem duty, an additional duty of fifty per cent. on the appraised value is to be demanded; and, whether subject to an ad valorem or specific duty, if any package be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, the whole package shall be forfeited. The ground of forfeiture here is not the want of correspondence between the package and invoice, but the forfeiture grows out of the discovery that the package contains some articles not described in the invoice; and when we find in the acts of 1823 and 1830 the same language employed as in the act of 1832, and as in the two former there can be no pretence for the construction that a want of correspondence between the package and invoice works a forfeiture, so the latter ought not to receive a different construction. These laws being in pari materia, may be taken together for the purpose of discovering the true interpretation. In none of them is this want of correspondence made a distinct and substantive ground of forfeiture; but only imposes upon the collector the duty of further examination, and the forfeiture depends upon other discoveries. The consequence of finding in the package articles not described in the invoice was different, under the acts of 1823 and 1830, from that provided by the act of 1832. In the two former, such discovery worked a forfeiture of the whole package; in the latter, the article not entered is only forfeited. The judgment of the district court must, accordingly, be reversed.

³ Where a seizure of merchandise is made on suspicion of its having been illegally imported, it is the duty of the officer making the seizure to institute proceedings in rem in the district court, or if the suspicion should prove to be unfounded, to return the goods to the owner. By the act of 24th September, 1789 [1 Stat. 73], exclusive original jurisdiction is given to the district courts in all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including seizures under laws of import, &c. And if the officer making the seizure shall refuse to institute the proper proceedings, on application of the aggrieved party, the court will compel him to proceed to adjudication, or to abandon the seizure. The Ann, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 289. In the case of Galston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246, the court remark: "The pendency of the suit in rem would be a good plea in abatement, or a temporary bar of the action, for it would establish that no good cause of action then existed. If the action be commenced after a decree of condemnation, or after an acquittal, and there be a certificate of reasonable cause of seizure, then in the former case by the general law, and in the latter case by the special enactment of the statute of the 25th April, 1810, c. 64, § 1, the decree and certificate are each good bars to the action. But if there be a decree of acquittal, and a denial of such certificate, then the seizure is established conclusively to be tortious; and the party is entitled to his full damages for the injury." That the certificate of condemnation, as also the certificate of acquittal, is equally conclusive as to the character of the seizure, is clearly established by the authorities. Wilkins v. Despard, 5 Term R. 112, 117; Scott v. Shearman, 2 W. Bl. 977; Henshaw v. Pleasance, Id. 1174; Geyer v. Aquilar, 7 Term R. 631; Slocum v. Mayberry, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 1; The Apollon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 362.

DISTRESS FOR RENT.

Costs do not accrue, upon levying a distress for rent, unless the goods are sold.

Replevin of goods distrained for rent.

Mr. Dermott for defendant, moved the court to allow the constable's poundage fees for levying the distress, to be taxed as costs in replevin, the defendant having obtained a verdict for the rent arrear.

Mr. Redin, contra, contended that those fees did not accrue in this action, but, if they accrued at all, they accrued before the suit was commenced. But they did not accrue at all, for Act Md. 1779, c. 25, gives them only in case of sale; but here the goods were replevied, and not sold.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Justice, absent) said that the poundage fees had not accrued, as no sale had been made.

REMOVAL FROM STATE COURT—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT—RELEASE OF PART OF CLAIM.

If a cause be removed from a state court by the defendant, and the plaintiff declares in the circuit court of the United States for more than five hundred dollars, the plaintiff cannot, by a release of part of his debt, so as to reduce it to less than five hundred dollars, take away the jurisdiction of the circuit court.

[Cited in Ladd v. Tudor, Case No. 7,975.]

Rule to show cause why this suit, which had been removed from the state court, should not be remanded, on a suggestion that the sum demanded is less than five hundred dollars. After this suit was entered in the state court, and before a declaration was filed, the defendant filed his petition, praying that the cause might be removed into this court, which was directed accordingly. On an appearance being entered in this court, the plaintiff filed a declaration, and laid his damages at one thousand dollars.

Mr. Rawle showed cause, and relied upon the damages in the declaration, as being sufficient to maintain the jurisdiction of this court. It was answered by Mr. Lewis, for the plaintiff, that the sum really demanded is less than five hundred dollars, as is admitted by the plaintiff on the record.

BY THE COURT. The state court was not bound to grant the petition for removal, unless it was satisfied, that the sum in dispute amounted to five hundred dollars. Having done so, it follows, that that court was so satisfied. In this court the plaintiff has laid his damages at five hundred dollars, which is sufficient for the jurisdiction of this court, and it cannot be ousted by the plaintiff's releasing so much of his demand, as to reduce it below that sum. Rule discharged.

Bill in equity for the sale of real estate to pay debts. The words of the will were, "I give the whole of what I may be possessed of, at my decease, and after my debts are paid, to Mrs. West." The plaintiff's claim was for a balance due for work and labor.

E. J. Lee, for defendant, demurred to the bill, because it did not state that the plaintiff could not establish his debt at law, nor that he could not prove the amount of assets at law. If the will makes the real estate assets, the executrix is bound to return them in the inventory.

Demurrer overruled.

The defendant then offered an answer, sworn before an alderman of Richmond, who was ex officio a justice of the peace. Rev. Code, 72. The alderman was certified by the mayor of Richmond, who was certified by the clerk of the court of hustings.

Mr. Taylor, for plaintiff, objected to the answer, because the mayor had not certified the clerk of the court of hustings.

But THE COURT overruled the objection, upon consideration of the case of Potts v. Ghequiere, in this court in March, 1805 [Case No. 11,346].

BANKRUPTCY—LEVY OF EXECUTION—PROCEEDS OF MORTGAGE SALE.

The bankrupts having made default in the payment of a chattel mortgage, the mortgagees, pursuant to the terms thereof, took possession of the mortgaged property. Before the sale a creditor issued execution to the sheriff. One hour thereafter the petition was filed. There was a surplus on the sale of the property. Held, that at the time the execution was issued the bankrupts had no leviable interest in the property, and that the creditor had no lien on the surplus to the exclusion of the assignee.

Claim of Beinicke & Co. to the surplus arising on the sale of certain mortgaged property of the bankrupts [Frank Wrisley and John L. Wrisley], on the ground that they held a lien thereon by virtue of an execution issued prior to the filing of the petition.

W. S. Palmer, for assignee in bankruptcy.
C. Goeller, for Beinecke & Co.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The chattel mortgage executed by the bankrupts to Field and others, August 31, 1875, grants, bargains, and sells to the mortgagees all the household furniture, etc., then on the premises and mentioned in the schedule, to have and to hold the same to the mortgagees forever, on condition that if the payments of money specified shall be made as they shall become due, and if the covenants of the lease shall be kept, the mortgage shall be void. The instrument further provides, that until default be made, the mortgaged property shall remain where it is, and that, if default be made in the payment of rent, or in the performance of the conditions of the lease by the lessee, the mortgagees may take possession of the mortgaged property and sell it at public auction and receive the proceeds, and apply them, first to the expenses of sale, and next to paying claims arising under the lease, and the surplus to go to the mortgagors.

It is shown that prior to the issuing to the sheriff of the execution on the judgment of Beinicke & Co., there had been default in the payment of the rent on the lease, and the mortgagees had lawfully, and in accordance with the terms of the mortgage, taken possession of the mortgaged property. Under the law of New York, no leviable interest in the property remained in the mortgagors at the time the execution was issued. Hall v. Sampson, 35 N. Y. 274. The legal title, the right of possession, and possession in fact, were then out of the mortgagors and in the mortgagees. The petition in bankruptcy was filed one hour after the execution was issued, and its operation was such that the right of the assignee in bankruptcy subsequently appointed attached to the property, in priority to any right of Beinecke & Co. Nor, although there was a surplus of the proceeds of the mortgaged property, which would have returned to the mortgagors, if there had been no bankruptcy, can the issuing of the execution operate as a lien on such surplus in exclusion of the right which the general creditors, represented by the assignee in bankruptcy, have to it.

I do not think it is satisfactorily established by the evidence, that there was any property levied on, or capable of being levied on, or attempted to be levied on, or in possession of the mortgagees, when the execution was issued, that was not covered by the mortgage, or that any property not covered by the mortgage was sold by the mortgagees. It results that the claim of Beinecke & Co. must be wholly rejected, with costs of the proceedings, to be paid by them.

INVALID SEAMAN—RIGHT TO WAGES.

[Cited in The Mary Sanford, 58 Fed. 926.]

The mariner Sheffer had shipped on board the Richmond to perform a voyage to the East Indies, and back to Philadelphia. He died on the outward passage; and now Writer, his administrator, claimed wages for the whole voyage. The decisions of the court in the case of the administrators of Walton v. The Neptune [Case No. 17,135], were relied on by the counsel for the claimant. The surgeon of the Richmond was examined, who stated, that Sheffer was affected with a severe pulmonic disease at the commencement of the voyage, and fell a victim to that complaint soon after the Richmond left the port of Philadelphia. It was stated, that at the time he shipped, the master of the Richmond objected to him as not being able from sickness to perform the intended voyage, but he insisted on his being an able-bodied seaman, and as such was received on board.

THE JUDGE said he could not consider the claim of the administrator as well-founded. The principles established in former cases could not be applied to this. The mariner was not competent to perform the voyage for which he had shipped as an able-bodied seaman, and it was a fraud on his part to have represented himself as such. Merchants were not to be thus imposed on by mariners being placed on board their vessels to die, and thus to give a foundation to claims of this nature.

Cephas Brainerd and James S. Stearns, for creditors.

Melville H. Regensburger, for bankrupts.

WAITE, Circuit Justice. This is a petition, under the supervisory jurisdiction of this court, in bankruptcy, to set aside an order of the district court directing that a resolution of creditors, accepting a proposition of compromise made by the bankrupts, be recorded. The objections are: (1) That the court had no jurisdiction; (2) that the compromise was not payable in money; (3) that Hogan, one of the bankrupts, was excused from attendance at the meetings of the creditors, without sufficient cause; (4) that the composition was not for the best interest of all concerned.

There can be no doubt of the jurisdiction of the district court. Composition proceedings must be had in the court where the suit in bankruptcy is pending. A petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed against these bankrupts in the district court, and it alleged facts sufficient to show jurisdiction. Upon this petition an adjudication in bankruptcy was had, and an assignee was appointed and qualified. Wronkowitz, one of the partners, was a resident of the district, and Hogan, the other, appears by attorney in the composition proceedings.

The offer was of payment in money, but on time, secured by notes. This was the substance of the proposition. By reason of the bankruptcy proceedings, the creditors had already acquired an interest in the real estate which had passed to the assignee by the conveyance of the register. It does not invalidate the proposition that, in addition to the money to be paid, this real estate was to remain with the assignee, to be converted into money, for the use of the creditors, to whom, in reality, it then belonged. The offer, in effect, was, that the creditors should retain the real estate which they already had, and that the twenty per cent., in money, should be paid in addition. There is nothing wrong in this.

The debtors are not, by law, required to attend any meeting of the creditors but the first, and that is to be considered as continuing until the vote is taken upon the resolution to accept. If, being summoned to attend a future meeting, they fail to appear, that fact may, with great propriety, be taken into consideration by the court, in determining whether the resolution of acceptance should be admitted to record. As the composition proceedings are part of the bankruptcy suit, it would, undoubtedly, be in the power of the court, upon proper showing made, to compel an attendance; but the law itself does not make it obligatory upon the bankrupt to be present, except at the first meeting.

He is to be present then, unless prevented by sickness, or other cause satisfactory to the meeting. Of the sufficiency of the cause the creditors themselves are to decide, in the first instance, and their decision should not be disturbed by the court, except for good cause shown. It must, in some form, appear that wrong has been done to the minority creditors, by reason of the vote which was given. After the district court has affirmed the action of the majority, this court, in the exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction, ought not to interfere, except on a very clear case. While the rights of the minority creditors should be carefully watched and protected against all unreasonable acts of the majority, the judgment of the requisite majority should always be allowed to prevail, unless obtained without sufficient consideration, or by some unfairness or undue influence.

In this case, the excuse presented for one of the debtors was his absence in California, where he resided. This was fairly submitted to the meeting. It seems to have been fairly considered. The meeting was well attended. All the objections made were fully presented and duly deliberated upon. The result was a vote in favor of the sufficiency of the excuse. The petitioners were not present at this meeting. For some cause satisfactory to themselves they stayed away. At the second meeting called by the court to inquire whether the resolution of acceptance had been properly passed, and whether it was for the best interest of all concerned that the resolution should be recorded, the petitioners appeared for the first time. They then complained of the absence of the one debtor at the first meeting, and insisted that he ought not to have been excused. At their request, the resident debtor submitted to a further examination from them, but, notwithstanding all this, a report in favor of the acceptance was again secured, both from the register and the creditors. This being done, the petitioners appeared before the court, and still further urged their opposition to the composition. They were again unsuccessful, and now are here. Apparently, every other creditor is satisfied but themselves. If they had availed themselves of their privileges under the law, and had attended the first meeting, to urge their views upon the consideration of the creditors there assembled, the result might have been different, and, certainly, they would have occupied a much more favorable position for inviting the attention of this court to their complaints now. If creditors interested in composition proceedings fail to attend to their interests in time, they must not expect the courts to relieve them from the consequences of their neglect, except they make a clear case for equitable interference in their behalf. That has not been done here.

It is next insisted, that the compromise is not for the best interest of all concerned. The requisite majority of the creditors, at the first meeting, thought it was. The same thing occurred at the second meeting, called specially to consider that very question. The register coincided in the opinion of the creditors, and so reported. The district court, upon full argument, has decided in the same way. This court ought not to interfere, under such circumstances, unless specific errors in the action of the creditors or the court below can be pointed out, which, if sustained, would change the judgment. Mere general questions of expediency must, ordinarily, be considered as settled, when the requisite majority of the creditors, the register, and the district court all agree. Nothing short of fraud or gross error in judgment should call into exercise the jurisdiction of this court in such a case. That does not appear here. This court is simply called upon to decide, upon the whole case, whether the creditors and the district court have come to a wrong conclusion as to what is for the best interest of all concerned.

The order of the district court is affirmed.

DISCHARGE OF BANKRUPT—OPPOSITION.

Where a specification in opposition to the discharge of a bankrupt is that the bankrupt has concealed his effects, or that he has sworn falsely in his affidavit annexed to his inventory of debts, it must be shown that the acts were intentional in order to preclude a discharge.

[Cited in Re Boynton, 10 Fed. 279; Re Warne, Id. 379.]

On an application for a discharge by the bankrupt [W. Wyatt], certain creditors, Morton, Galt & Co., bankers, opposed the same on two grounds, viz.: First. That he concealed an interest of three thousand dollars (which they allege he had in a lot of land and four cottages thereon), with the intent to defraud his creditors. Second. That he wilfully swore falsely in the affidavits annexed to his petition and schedules, in wilfully and intentionally omitting from the schedules of his estate the above-mentioned interest.

The following is substantially the evidence in the case: On the 2d of October, 1866, the bankrupt gave his wife four notes of one thousand dollars each, which he had received in part payment for his undertaking establishment on the corner of Seventh and Jefferson streets, Louisville. He had sold it to L. D. Pearson. Said notes were due respectively in one, two, three, and four years. In January following he took back two of these notes and gave them to George W. Morris as collateral security for the balance of the purchase-money then owing by the bankrupt to Morris. The wife of the bankrupt owns a lot of ground of one hundred and two feet front, the legal title of which has been held by her trustee for about eleven years. On this ground she erected four cottage houses. It does not distinctly appear whether they were built in the fall of 1866 or in the spring of 1867. The other two notes she used in the construction of these cottages. It does not appear at what exact time the notes were so used. The estate of the bankrupt, in October, 1866, amounted to twenty-four thousand five hundred dollars, over and above all his debts, which at that time amounted to about two thousand or two thousand five hundred dollars. The bankrupt was possessed of the above estate for six or eight months after the date of the gift to his wife. In July, 1867, the bankrupt, who was then in Memphis, sent his wife by express one thousand dollars. Of this she paid two hundred and fifty dollars for taxes and family expenses. It does not appear what became of the balance. The counsel for the creditors contended that the bankrupt was invested with an interest of three thousand dollars in his wife's property; that he failed to mention it, and that he concealed the same. By a statute of Kentucky "all conveyances, gifts, &c., made without valuable consideration, are void as to existing liabilities." Under this statute it has been held that it makes no difference how much the assets of the grantor may be in excess of his liabilities.

The counsel for the bankrupt contended that the bankrupt had no interest whatever in his wife's property, for these reasons: First. Whether the gift was fraudulent or not, or void or not, the gift as between Wyatt and his wife was conclusive, as to Wyatt, that he had no further interest, as he had conveyed it to his wife. Whether the creditors have, is another question. Second. Because a husband cannot encumber the separate estate of his wife, it having been decided in the case of Fetter v. Wilson, 12 B. Mon. 90, that a husband cannot even create a mechanic's lien on his wife's property. Third. That the gift was not, even under the statute of Kentucky, constructively fraudulent or void, as there is a difference between gifts under such circumstances made to strangers and those made where love and natural affection is the consideration (9 B. Mon. 514; 1 Metc. [Ky.] 351); and that, having no interest in his wife's property, it was impossible for him to conceal that which he did not have. If these positions and views of law were not correct, the bankrupt, who is a business man, could not have known that under the law he was vested with an interest in his wife's property; that whether he had an interest or not, was an abstruse and recondite question of law, which the bankrupt did not know and could not be expected to know; that, if it should be decided that he has an interest, he has merely failed to put it in his lists of assets, because he did not know he had it, by reason of his ignorance of the law; and that a mere omission to mention an interest is not made a good ground of opposition by the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and that such an omission is no concealment; that a concealment must be wilful, intentional, and deliberate, and that it was irrational to say that a man concealed that which he neither had nor knew he had.

J. G. Wilson and Wm. Mix, for Morton, Galt & Co.

P. A. Gaertner, for bankrupt.

BALLARD, District Judge. This case is now heard on specifications of grounds of opposition to the bankrupt's discharge. Two grounds of opposition are specified: First. That the bankrupt, knowing his interest to the extent of three thousand dollars in a lot and four cottage houses (particularly described), did conceal his aforesaid interest with intent to defraud his creditors. Second. That the bankrupt has wilfully sworn falsely in his affidavit annexed to his petition and schedules, in that he has wilfully and intentionally omitted from the schedule of his estate an interest of three thousand dollars in and to four cottage houses erected on a lot of land (particularly described), whereof the legal title was held for his wife, &c.

The proof shows that the bankrupt, in the fall of 1866, or in the spring of 1867, allowed his wife to expend the proceeds of two notes^f belonging to him, each amounting to one thousand dollars, and perhaps other of his money, amounting to a few hundred dollars. In erecting four cottage houses on a lot of land, the legal title of which was in Wm. Hatzell, for her use. The bankrupt filed his original petition on the 6th of February, 1868, and in his schedules discloses debts amounting to between eight and ten thousand dollars, and assets of little or no value. The bankrupt did not, in his schedules, disclose his interest, if he has any, in said cottage houses; nor did he in any manner disclose the same until his examination, which took place on the 20th of April, 1868. It does not appear from the papers before me, at whose instance the examination took place, but, so far as the papers show, this examination gave the first information to the opposing creditors of the supposed interest of the bankrupt in the cottage houses mentioned.

The twenty-ninth section of the bankrupt act specifies all the grounds of opposition to a bankrupt discharge. Among other things it is therein provided that "no discharge shall be granted * * * if the bankrupt * * * has concealed any part of his estate or effects." The term "concealed" implies something wilful, intentional. One cannot be said to conceal property, unless he not only knows that he owns it, but unless he also intentionally, not inadvertently, conceals the same from his assignee or creditors. The failure of a bankrupt, though wilful, to disclose in his schedule all his property, is not by the bankrupt act made a specific ground for withholding his discharge. It is not therefore clear to me that should a bankrupt immediately on the election of his assignee disclose to him all the property owned by him at the time of the filing his petition, and promptly deliver to the assignee all the property belonging to him, he could be refused his discharge—if no other ground of opposition were specified than that he had concealed his estate or effects, even although it should appear that he had wilfully omitted to disclose such property in his schedule annexed to his petition. This possibly might be regarded in law as a meditated concealment, though not an actual concealment. It is not necessary, however, to decide the question here suggested, and it is not decided. But whether the specification be that the bankrupt has concealed his effects or that he has wilfully sworn falsely in his affidavit annexed to his inventory, it is equally required that the act should be shown to be intentional to preclude a discharge.

The evidence in the case is exceedingly limited. It consists entirely of the statements made by the bankrupt in his examination, and of the deposition of L. D. Pearson and P. A. Gaertner. The latter deposition, I think, discloses nothing material, and that of Pearson only discloses that he gave the bankrupt, on the 2d or 3d of October, 1866, four notes of one thousand dollars each, payable in one, two, three, and four years from date; that he paid one of the notes to Geo. W. Morris; that Messrs. Henning & Speed, and A. D. Hunt hold two of the notes, and that one note is in suit. When the two notes were passed to Henning & Speed, and A. D. Hunt, does not appear, but it is probable, from the testimony of the bankrupt, that they were so assigned between the 2d of October, 1866, and the following summer; and it appears from the same testimony that two of the notes were assigned to George W. Morris, in January, 1867. Pearson proves nothing that had not been already proven by the bankrupt himself.

As the grounds of opposition were not filed until after the bankrupt had disclosed in his examination all that is now known respecting his supposed interest in the cottage houses in question, it follows that the opposing creditors seek to convict the bankrupt of concealing his effects by his own disclosures. I am not sure that this may not be done, but it would seem that in such case it should appear that the disclosures were extorted from the bankrupt and not voluntarily made. I have already said it does not appear from the papers before me at whose instance the examination of the bankrupt took place, nor that it was ordered by either the district court or register. But the questions remain: Has the bankrupt any interest in the "cottage houses" which passed to his assignee? and if he has, did he conceal this interest within the meaning of the bankrupt act?

The money invested by the bankrupt in building the four cottage houses on his wife's land must undoubtedly be regarded as a gift by him to his wife. But every gift by a husband to his wife is not per se fraudulent. If the husband, free from debt or serious embarrassment, give to his wife a small portion of his estate, leaving an ample amount to pay all his debts and liabilities, such gift is not fraudulent; although it is, in this state, by virtue of a statute, void as to all debts existing at the time of the making of the gift. Whether the gift in this case was made in October, 1866, or in the spring of 1867, the bankrupt owed at the time some debts, though, if the gift was made in October, 1866, the debts then existing bore but a small proportion to the value of his whole estate. But whether the amount of the debts owing at the time of the gift was large or small, in proportion to the estate of the giver, the gift, as before stated, was, under the statute of this state, void as to existing debts. Whether such a gift, not fraudulent, but void as to existing debts, under the statute of Kentucky, would pass to an assignee in bankruptcy, is an interesting question; and assuming that it would pass, how the assignee should administer the proceeds, whether for the benefit of all the creditors of the bankrupt, or only of the creditors existing at the date of the gift, would be a still more difficult question. I am at some loss to know how either the assignee of the bankrupt can reduce to possession or in any manner subject the money which the bankrupt invested in improvements on his wife's lands, or how the value of the improvements so made, with the means of the bankrupt, can be made available to his creditors. And I think it plain, if it could not be so subjected or made available, there was no concealment in law, even though the bankrupt intentionally omitted to mention the fact in his schedule or otherwise.

There can in law be no concealment except in respect to assets or effects liable to the bankrupt's creditors.

I do not mean to decide that the money of the bankrupt, or the value of it, invested in improvements on his wife's land, cannot by some process be subjected for the benefit of his creditors. But the learned counsel of the opposing creditors have not suggested any process by which it can be done; and if they have not and cannot suggest how it may be reached, surely the bankrupt, who is not learned in law, may be excused for being ignorant.

It may be that upon the authority of the case of Athey v. Knotts, 6 B. Mon. 29, to which case the court called the attention of counsel, during the argument, the cottage houses erected with the money of the bankrupt on his wife's land, may in some way be subjected by his assignee for the benefit of his creditors, if it should turn out that the money was so applied by the husband in either actual or constructive fraud of his creditors, or even without such fraud.

But I am not entirely satisfied with the authority of Athey v. Knotts; and the subsequent cases of Fetter v. Wilson, 12 B. Mon. 90, and Robinson v. Huffman, 15 B. Mon. 80, seriously shake, if they do not overrule it. I shall, however, not decide this question, until it shall be presented in a suit in which the cottage houses shall be sought to be subjected.

I mean to say only that it is so doubtful whether said houses can be subjected by the assignee, that the question of law involved is so nice and difficult, that the bankrupt is not to be convicted of concealment upon the single ground that he omitted to state in his schedules that the houses in question were built wholly or in part with his money. He may well be excused if neither the learned counsel nor the court can now positively say that the bankrupt has any interest in said houses which can be subjected or which could be the subject of concealment. It is therefore ordered that the discharge be granted.

AMENDMENT OF DECLARATION—TIME TO PLEAD—EVIDENCE.

1. When a substantial amendment is made in a declaration, the defendant should be allowed until the next succeeding term to plead.

2. It is improper to allow evidence to go to the jury which would constitute the ground of a separate action.

[Appeal by John Wyatt from a judgment in favor of Jacob Harden.]

Before JOHNSON, SCOTT, and SELDEN, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The judgment in this case must be reversed upon two grounds: (1) The court erred in not allowing the appellant, the defendant in the court below, until the next term to plead, after a substantial amendment of the declaration had been made. (2) The court erred in permitting any evidence to go to the jury in relation to a ferry, as a disturbance of or injury done thereto would constitute the ground of a separate action. Reversed.

ESTOPPEL—NECESSITY OF FRAUD—MISSTATEMENT BY AGENT.

1. To constitute an estoppel there must be some intended deception of the party to be estopped, or such gross negligence on his part as to amount to a constructive fraud, by which another has been misled to his injury.

2. A principal may be estopped by the intentional, wilful misstatement of an agent.

On motion for a new trial.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The general principle of estoppel in pais is laid down in Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & E. 469, as follows: "Where one by his words or conduct wilfully causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time." In general there must be "some intended deception in the conduct or declaration of the party to be estopped, or such gross negligence on his part as to amount to a constructive fraud by which another has been misled to his injury." Brant v. Coal Co., 93 U. S. 326; Morgan v. Railway Co., 96 U. S. 716. The court charged the jury that if the bankrupt, whom the defendant as assignee represents, either by himself or his general agent, fully authorized and empowered to get the note discounted, and clothed with all the powers of the owner in respect to the note, induced Van Horn to take it upon the intentional misrepresentation and wilfully untrue assertion that it was a business note, then the defendant was estopped to assert the truth in regard to its origin. To this part of the charge the defendant excepted. He does not now object to the proposition that a principal may be estopped by the intentional, wilful misstatement of the agent, who was the principal's other self. The authorities which are cited are upon the effect of the declaration of the agent, who was not clothed, and was not apparently clothed, with general powers, and the defendant's position is that the jury should have been charged that the defendant was not estopped unless the agent was authorized to make the representations, and that the court assumed that Smith was a general agent. It is not to be supposed that either of the parties understood at the time when the charge was given that the court was assuming that the agency had been established. That question was plainly enough left to the jury. Upon all the material questions in the case there was sufficient evidence to justify the verdict of the jury. Motion denied.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—ICE CUTTING MACHINE—SURRENDER TO PUBLIC USE—EFFECT—SPECIFICATIONS—SEPARATE MACHINES—ASSIGNMENT OF PATENT.

1. In a bill in equity for a perpetual injunction of the defendants, on account of an asserted violation of a patent right for an invention, it is a good defence, that prior to the granting of the patent, the inventor had allowed the invention to go into public use, without objection. But it should be clearly established by proof, that such public use was with the knowledge and consent of the inventor. The mere user by the inventor of his invention, in trying experiments, or by his neighbours, with his consent, as an act of kindness for temporary and occasional purposes only, will not destroy his right to a patent therefor.

[Cited in Blackinton v. Douglass, Case No. 1,470; Jones v. Sewall, Id. 7,495.]

[Cited in brief in Schillinger v. Cranford, 4 Mackey, 456.]

2. If the defendants use a substantial part of the invention patented, although with some modifications of form or apparatus, it is a violation of the patent right. So, if the patent be of two machines, and each is a new invention, and the defendant use only one of the machines.

3. If the patentee, after obtaining his patent, dedicates or surrenders it to public use, or acquiesces for a long period in the public use thereof, without objection, he is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity to protect his patent; and such acquiescence may amount to complete proof of a dedication or surrender thereof to the public.

[Cited in Taylor v. Carpenter, Case No. 13,785; Bartlette v. Crittenden, Id. 1,082; Teese v. Phelps, Id. 13,819; Magic Ruffle Co. v. Elm City Co., Id. 8,950; Kelleher v. Co., 21 Fed. 575; Kittle v. Hall, 29 Fed. 511; Blair v. Lipincott Glass Co., 52 Fed. 227.]

4. But to entitle the defendants to the benefit of such a defence, the facts must be explicitly relied on, and put in issue by their answer; otherwise the court cannot notice it.

5. In the present case, the patent and specification claimed for the patentee, as his invention, the cutting of ice of a uniform size by means of an apparatus worked by any other power than human. It claimed, also, not only the invention of this art, but also the particular method of the application of the principle, stated in the specification, which was by two machines described therein, called the saw and the cutter. It was held by the court, that the specification, so far as it claimed the art of cutting ice by means of an apparatus worked by any other power than human, was the claim of an abstract principle, and void.

[Cited in Hovey v. Stevens, Case No. 6,746; Smith v. Downing, Id. 13,036; Rapid Service Store Ry. Co. v. Taylor, 43 Fed. 250.]

6. But so far as it claimed the two machines described in the specification, it might be good, if a disclaimer were made of the other parts, according to the patent act of 1837, c. 45, §§ 7, 9 [5 Stat. 193, 194], within a reasonable time, and before the suit were brought. But a disclaimer, after the suit brought, would not be sufficient to entitle the party to a perpetual injunction in equity, whatever might be his right to maintain a suit at law on the patent.

[Disapproved in Tuck v. Bramhill, Case No. 14,213. Cited in Sessions v. Romadka, 145 U. S. 29, 12 Sup. Ct. 802.]

[Cited in brief in Schillinger v. Cranford, 4 Mackey, 456.]

7. If the patentee has assigned his patent in part, and a joint suit is brought in equity for a perpetual injunction, a disclaimer by the patentee alone, without the assignee's uniting in it, will not entitle the parties to the benefit of the 7th and 9th sections of the act of 1837, c. 45.

[Cited in Loudon v. Birt, 4 Ind. 568.]

8. A single patent may be taken for several improvements on one and the same machine, or for two machines, which are invented by the patentee, and conduce to the same common purpose and object, although they are each capable of a distinct use and application, without being united together. But a single patent cannot be taken for two distinct machines, not conducing to the same common purpose or object, but designed for totally different and independent objects.

[Cited in Burke v. Partridge, 58 N. H. 352.]

9. An inventor is bound to describe in his specification, in what his invention consists, and what his particular claim is. But he is not bound to any precise form of words, provided their import can be clearly ascertained by fair interpretation, even though the expressions may be inaccurate.

10. The assignee of a patent right, in part or in whole, cannot maintain any suit at law, or in equity, either as sole or as joint plaintiff thereon, at least as against third persons, until his patent has been recorded in the proper department, according to the requisitions of the patent acts.

Bill in equity for a perpetual injunction, and for other relief, founded upon allegations of the violation, by the defendants, of a patent right, granted originally to the plaintiff [Nathaniel J.] Wyeth, as the inventor, by letters patent, dated the 18th of March, A. D. 1829, "for a new and useful improvement in the manner of cutting ice, together with the machinery and apparatus therefor," as set forth in the schedule to the letters patent; and afterwards with a small reservation assigned to the other plaintiff [Frederick] Tudor, on the 9th of February, 1832, by a deed of assignment of that date, but which had never been recorded. The schedule set forth two different apparatus or machines for cutting the ice, the one called the saw, the other the cutter, which are capable of being used separately or in combination, and described their structure, and the mode of applying them, as follows:

(1) Two bars of iron, or other material, secured to each other by cross bars: the two first mentioned to be of such distance apart as the dimension of the ice is required to be. (2) On each outside bar is bolted a plate of iron as long as the bar, and at right angles with the cross bars. These plates to be so bolted to the bars as to project three inches each on one side of the bars to which they are bolted, and one of them to project on the other side of the bar two inches; the other, one inch. These projections may be varied, according to the desired depth of the cut. (3) These plates, both on the upper side and on the under side of the bars, are to be cut at four equi-distant points each, at an angle of forty-five degrees, or thereabouts, to the bar, thereby forming a cutting point of forty-five degrees, or thereabouts; to this point is welded a piece of steel, to form the chisel. The rear end of the plates to be of the before specified width from the bar, but to diminish toward the front end one fourth of an inch at each point, thereby giving each succeeding point a clear cut of one fourth of an inch deeper than its precursor. (4) The mouths, by which the chips cut from the ice by the chisels are discharged, are made similar to that of a carpenter's plough. (5) To the middle of the front cross-bar is fixed a ring, for the purpose of attaching a draught chain, to which the horse that draws the cutter is to be harnessed. (6) This first part of the apparatus for cutting ice is called the cutter, and is used as follows: The cutter is laid on the ice, with the three-inch side of the plates downward, and drawn forward in a straight line as far as is required, thus making two grooves of an inch deep. The horse is then turned about, and the cutter turned over, so that the two-inch side of the plate shall be in one of the first grooves cut, and the one-inch side on the ice; and as the cutter is drawn forward, the two-inch side makes one of the first grooves an inch deeper, and the one-inch side forms a new groove of an inch deep. Proceed in this manner until as many grooves are cut as are wanted; then turn the cutter over upon the three-inch side, go over the whole again with this side, and they are finished. Repeat the same process at right angles with the first grooves, and the operation with this part of the apparatus is finished.

Part Second of Apparatus for Cutting Ice. (1) Two spur-wheels, about three feet six inches, more or less, in diameter, connected together by an axletree of iron, or other material, from the centre of each to the other, fixed immovable in each. (2) A pair of fills, proceeding from the axletree, and secured to it by a pair of composition boxes, admitting the axletree to turn in them. (3) A cog wheel, about three feet two inches in diameter, more or less, fixed in the centre of the axletree, so as to be incapable of turning, except with the axletree. (4) A pair of handles attached to the axletree, in the same manner as the fills, so as to admit of the motion of the axletree in them; these handles to be placed one on each side of the cog wheel in the centre of the axletree, and to be connected together by a permanent bar, at a suitable distance from the axletree. (5) Two cog wheels, about four inches diameter, more or less, one of which to work on the large cog wheel, and the other to work on the one so working, and both to be secured by pintles passing through the handles: the small cog wheel not working on the large cog wheel to have secured beside it a circular saw, about two and a half feet diameter, more or less. (6) The proportion between the large and small cog wheels is varied, to obtain greater or less velocity for the saw, as may be wanted. This part of the apparatus for cutting ice is called the saw, and is used as follows: Put the saw into one of the outside grooves made by the cutter; drive the horse forward, following the groove made by the cutter; at the same time a man who manages the handles presses them down as much as the strength of the horse will admit of. This operation is followed back and forth, until the ice is cut through. The same is done with the outer parallel groove on the opposite side of the work, and also on one of the end grooves, running at right angles with these. By this process the ice on the three sides of the plat, or work marked by the cutter, is cut through. When this is done, take an iron bar (one end of which is wide and fitted to the groove, and the other end of which is sharpened as a chisel,) and insert the end which is fitted to the groove into the groove next to and parallel with the end groove which is cut through; pry lightly in several places, then more strongly, until the ice is broken off; then strike lightly with the chisel end of the bar into the cross grooves of the piece split off, and it easily separates into square pieces. Thus proceed with the whole plat marked out by the cutter. It is claimed as new, to cut ice of a uniform size, by means of an apparatus worked by any other power than human. The invention of this art, as well as of the particular method of the application of the principle, is claimed by the subscriber.

The answer insisted upon various grounds of defence, which are fully stated in the argument and in the opinion of the court.

W. H. Gardiner, for plaintiffs, contended: That the right acquired by the patent had not been lost by any act of the plaintiffs, the evidence not disclosing any abandonment, or dedication to the public. Pennock v. Dialogue, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 16; Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 292; Mellus v. Silsbee [Case No. 9,404]; Goodyear v. Mathews [Id. 5,576]; Phil. Pat. 184, 186. That the specification was sufficient on its face; and if not, that the fault was cured by the disclaimer. Ames v. Howard [Case No. 326]; Phil. Pat. 93; Whittemore v. Cutter [Case No. 17,600]; Lowell v. Lewis [Id. 8,568]. That superfluous matter in the specification did not vitiate it. Lewis v. Marling, 1 Lloyd & W. 28; Moody v. Fiske [Case No. 9,745]; Phil. Pat. 286. And that the several matters were well embraced in it; Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 454; Stearns v. Barrett, 1 Pick. 448; Barrett v. Hall [Case No. 1,047]; Phil. Pat. 216, 219, 229, 246, 274.

S. Greenleaf and G. T. Bigelow, for defendants, contended: That the invention was not new and original, being merely the common carpenter's plough. That the specification was bad, as it contained not only more than the plaintiff, Wyeth, invented, but also, as it included two distinct machines, and a combination of different machines. Barrett v. Hall [supra]; Moody v. Fiske [Case No. 9,745]; Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 454, 506; 4 Barn. & Ald. 540; Whittemore v. Cutter [supra]; Cochrane v. Smethurst, 1 Starkie, 205; Phil. Pat. 102, 104, 275. That if it could be upheld at all, it was only for cutting two grooves by one operation, which the defendants had not invaded. That the case was not within the relief of the patent act of 1837, §§ 7, 9. That the invention had been published previous to the issuing of the patent. Phil. Pat. 184. And that after the patent was issued, the plaintiffs abandoned the use to the public, and thereby betrayed the defendants into the use of the machine; which, in equity, was a good bar to the claim of damages, and entitled the defendants to costs. Walcot v. Walker, 7 Ves. 1; Platt v. Button, 19 Ves. 447.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I have considered this cause upon the various points, suggested at the argument by the counsel on both sides, with as much care as I could, in the short time, which I have been able to command, since it was argued; and I will now state the results, with as much brevity, as the importance of the cause will permit.

The first point is, whether the invention claimed by the patentee is new, that is, substantially new. The patent is dated on the 18th of March, 1829, and is for "a new and useful improvement in the manner of cutting ice, together with the machinery and apparatus therefor." Assuming the patent to be for the machinery described in the specification, and the description of the invention in the specification to be, in point of law, certain and correctly summed up, (points, which will be hereafter considered,) I am of opinion, that the invention is substantially new. No such machinery is, in my judgment, established, by the evidence, to have been known or used before. The argument is, that the principal machine, described as the cutter, is well known, and has been often used before for other purposes, and that this is but an application of an old invention to a new purpose; and it is not, therefore, patentable. It is said, that it is in substance identical with the common carpenter's plough. I do not think so. In the common carpenter's plough there is no series of chisels fixed in one plane, and the guide is below the level, and the plough is a movable chisel. In the present machine, there are a series of chisels, and they are all fixed. The successive chisels are each below the other, and this is essential to their operation. Such a combination is not shown ever to have been known or used before. It is not, therefore, a new use or application of an old machine. This opinion does not rest upon my own skill and comparison of the machine with the carpenter's plough; but it is fortified and sustained by the testimony of witnesses of great skill, experience, and knowledge in this department of science, viz., by Mr. Treadwell, Mr. Darracott, and Mr. Borden, who all speak most positively and conclusively on the point.

The next point is, whether the ice machine used by the defendants is an infringement of the patent; or, in other words, does it incorporate in its structure and operation the substance of Wyeth's invention? I am of opinion, that it does include the substance of Wyeth's invention of the ice cutter. It is substantially, in its mode of operation, the same as Wyeth's machine; and it copies his entire cutter. The only important difference seems to be, that Wyeth's machine has a double series of cutters, on parallel planes; and the machine of the defendants has a single series of chisels in one plane. Both machines have a succession of chisels, each of which is progressively below the other, with a proper guide placed at such distance, as the party may choose to regulate the movement; and in this succession of chisels, one below the other, on one plate or frame, consists the substance of Wyeth's invention. The guide in Wyeth's machine is the duplicate of his chisel plate or frame; the guide in the defendants' machine is simply a smooth iron, on a level with the cutting single chisel frame or plate. Each performs the same service, substantially in the same way.

In the next place, as to the supposed public use of Wyeth's machine before his application for a patent. To defeat his right to a patent, under such circumstances, it is essential, that there should have been a public use of his machine, substantially as it was patented, with his consent. If it was merely used occasionally by himself in trying experiments, or if he allowed only a temporary use thereof by a few persons, as an act of personal accommodation or neighbourly kindness, for a short and limited period, that would not take away his right to a patent. To produce such an effect, the public use must be either generally allowed or acquiesced in, or at least be unlimited in time, or extent, or object. On the other hand, if the user were without Wyeth's consent, and adverse to his patent, it was a clear violation of his rights, and could not deprive him of his patent.

Now, I gather from the evidence (which, however, is somewhat indeterminate on this point) that Wyeth's machine, as originally invented by him, was not exactly like that, for which he afterwards procured the patent. On the contrary, he seems to have made alterations and improvements therein. Pratt (the witness) says, that he made the iron part of the first machine of Wyeth, which was partly of wood and partly of iron, in December, 1825, or in January, 1826; and that he afterwards, in December, 1827, made the machine, which was patented for Wyeth; and it was not patented until March, 1829. So that the latter seems to have been more perfect than the former. But, at all events, I cannot but think, that the evidence of the user, as a public user, of the invention before the patent was granted, is far too loose and general to found any just conclusion, that Wyeth meant to dedicate it to the public, or had abandoned it to the public before the patent. It appears to me, that the circumstances ought to be very clear and cogent, before the court would be justified in adopting any conclusion so subversive of private rights, when the party has subsequently taken out a patent.

In the next place, as to Wyeth's supposed abandonment of his invention to the public, since he obtained his patent. I agree, that it is quite competent for a patentee at any time, by overt acts or by express dedication, to abandon or surrender to the public, for their use, all the rights secured by his patent, if such is his pleasure, clearly and deliberately expressed. So, if for a series of years the patentee acquiesces without objection in the known public use by others of his invention, or stands by and encourages such use, such conduct will afford a very strong presumption of such an actual abandonment or surrender. A fortiori, the doctrine will apply to a case, where the patentee has openly encouraged or silently acquiesced in such use by the very defendants, whom he afterwards seeks to prohibit by injunction from any further use; for, in this way, he may not only mislead them into expenses, or acts, or contracts, against which they might otherwise have guarded themselves; but his conduct operates as a surprise, if not as a fraud upon them. At all events, if such a defence were not a complete defence at law, in a suit for any infringement of the patent, it would certainly furnish a clear and satisfactory ground, why a court of equity should not interfere either to grant an injunction, or to protect the patentee, or to give any other relief. This doctrine is fully recognized in Rundell v. Murray, Jac. 311, 316, and Saunders v. Smith, 3 Mylne & C. 711, 728, 730, 735. But if there were no authority on the point, I should not have the slightest difficulty in asserting the doctrine, as found in the very nature and character of the jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity on this and other analogous subjects.

There is certainly very strong evidence in the present case, affirmative of such an abandonment or surrender, or at least of a deliberate acquiescence by the patentee in the public use of his invention by some or all of the defendants, without objection, for several years. The patent was obtained in 1829; and no objection was made, and no suit was brought against the defendants, for any infringement until 1839, although their use of the invention was, during a very considerable portion of the intermediate period, notorious and constant, and brought home directly to the knowledge of the patentee. Upon this point, I need hardly do more than to refer to the testimony of Stedman and Barker, who assert such knowledge and acquiescence for a long period, on the part of the patentee, in the use of these ice cutters by different persons (and among others by the defendants), on Fresh Pond, where the patentee himself cut his own ice. It is no just answer to the facts so stated, that until 1839, the business of Wyeth, or rather of his assignee, the plaintiff, Tudor, was altogether limited to shipments in the foreign ice trade, and that the defendants' business, being confined to the domestic ice trade, did not interfere practically with his interest under the patent. The violation of the patent was the same, and the acquiescence the same, when the ice was cut by Wyeth's invention, whether the ice was afterwards sold abroad, or sold at home. Nor does it appear, that the defendants have as yet engaged at all in the foreign ice trade. It is the acquiescence in the known user by the public without objection or qualification, and not the extent of the actual user, which constitutes the ground, upon which courts of equity refuse an injunction in cases of this sort. The acquiescence in the public use, for the domestic trade, of the plaintiff's invention for cutting ice, admits, that the plaintiff no longer claims or insists upon an exclusive right in the domestic trade under the patent; and then he has no right to ask a court of equity to restrain the public from extending the use to foreign trade, or for foreign purposes. If he means to surrender his exclusive right in a qualified manner, or for a qualified trade, he should at the very time give public notice of the nature and extent of his allowance of the public use, so that all persons may be put upon their guard, and not expose themselves to losses or perils, which they have no means of knowing or averting during his general silence and acquiescence.

The cases, which have been already cited, fully establish the doctrine, that courts of equity constantly refuse injunctions, even where the legal right and title of the party are acknowledged, when his own conduct has led to the very act or application of the defendants, of which he complains, and for which he seeks redress. And this doctrine is applied, not only to the case of the particular conduct of the party towards the persons, with whom the controversy now exists, but also to cases, where his conduct with others may influence the court in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction. Rundell v. Murray, Jac. 311, 316; Saunders v. Smith, 3 Mylne & C. 711, 728, 730, 735. Under such circumstances, the court will leave the party to assert his rights, and to get what redress he may at law, without giving him any extraordinary aid or assistance of its own.

But the difficulty in the present case arises, not so much from the doctrine considered in itself, as from the utter impracticability of applying it on account of the state of the pleadings. The point is not raised, or even suggested in the answer, in any manner whatsoever, as a matter of defence; and, of course, it is not in issue between the parties; and the whole evidence, taken on the point, is irrelevant and cannot be looked to, as a matter in judgment. This defect in the pleadings, therefore, puts the question entirely beyond the reach of the court.

In the next place, as to the objections taken to the specification. The question here necessarily arises, for what is the patent granted? Is it for the combination of the two machines described in the specification (the cutter and the saw) to cut ice? Or for the two machines separately? Or for the two machines, as well separately, as in combination? Or for any mode whatsoever of cutting ice by means of an apparatus, worked by power, not human, in the abstract, whatever it may be? If it be the latter, it is plain, that the patent is void, as it is for an abstract principle, and broader than the invention, which is only cutting ice by one particular mode, or by a particular apparatus or machinery. In order to ascertain the true construction of the specification in this respect, we must look to the summing up of the invention, and the claim therefor, asserted in the specification; for it is the duty of the patentee to sum up his invention in clear and determinate terms; and his summing up is conclusive upon his right and title. This was the doctrine maintained in Moody v. Fiske [Case No. 9,745]; (see, also, Hill v. Thompson, 8 Taunt. 375); and I see no reason to doubt it, or to depart from it.

Now, what is the language, in which the patentee has summed up his claim and invention? The specification states: "It is claimed, as new, to cut ice of a uniform size, by means of an apparatus worked by any other power than human. The invention of this art, as well as the particular method of the application of the principle, are claimed by the subscriber" (Wyeth). It is plain, then, that here the patentee claims an exclusive title to the art of cutting ice by means of any power, other than human power. Such a claim is utterly unobtainable in point of law. It is a claim for an art or principle in the abstract, and not for any particular method or machinery, by which ice is to be cut. No man can have a right to cut ice by all means or methods, or by all or any sort of apparatus, although he is not the inventor of any or all of such means, methods, or apparatus. A claim broader than the actual invention of the patentee is, for that very reason, upon the principles of the common law, utterly void, and the patent is a nullity. Moody v. Fiske [supra]; Brunton v. Hawkes, 4 Barn. & Ald. 541; Hill v. Thompson, 8 Taunt. 375, 399, 400; Evans v. Eaton, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 356; Phil. Pat. pp. 268-282, c. 11, § 7. Unless, then, the case is saved by the provisions of the patent act of 1836, c. 357 [5 Stat. 117], or of the act of 1837, c. 45 [Id. 191], which will hereafter be considered, the present suit cannot be sustained.

But, besides this general claim, there is another claim in the specification for the particular apparatus and machinery to cut ice, described in the specification. The language of the specification here is: "The invention of this art," (the general claim already considered,) "as well as the particular method of the application of the principle," (omitting the words of reference, as above described,) "are claimed by the subscriber." Now, assuming the former objection, that the claim for a general or abstract principle is not a fatal objection in the present case, it has been argued that the specification is too ambiguous to be maintainable in point of law; for it does not assert, what is claimed as the patentee's invention; whether it be the two machines separately and distinctly, as several inventions, or the combination of them, or both the one and the other.

It appears to me, that the language of the summary may be, and indeed ought to be construed, ut res magis valeat, quam pereat, to mean by the words "the particular method of the application," the particular apparatus and machinery described in the specification to effect the purpose of cutting ice. I agree, that the patentee is bound to describe, with reasonable certainty, in what his invention consists, and what his particular claim is. But it does not seem to me, that he is to be bound down to any precise form of words; and that it is sufficient, if the court can clearly ascertain, by fair interpretation, what he intends to claim, and what his language truly imports, even though the expressions are inaccurately or imperfectly drawn.

Is the patent, then, a patent for the combination of the two machines, viz.: the saw and the cutter? If it be, then the defendants clearly have not violated the patent right; for they use the cutter only; and the saw-machine has been abandoned in practice by the patentee himself, as useless, or unnecessary. It appears to me, that the patent is not for the combination of the machines, but for each machine separately and distinctly, as adapted to further and produce the same general result, and capable of a separate and independent use. In short, the one may be auxiliary, but is not indispensable to the use of the other. I deduce this conclusion from the descriptive words of the specification, which show, that each machine is independent of the other in its operations, and from the silence of the patentee as to any claim for a combination. This claim, then, for "the particular method of the application of the principle," although inartificial, may be reasonably interpreted, as used distributively, and as expressive of a distinct claim of each particular method set forth in the specification. I deem the patent, then, to be a claim for each distinct machine, as a separate invention, but conducing to the same common end. Of course, if either machine is new, and is the invention of Wyeth, and it has been actually pirated by the defendants, the plaintiff is entitled to maintain a suit therefor, under the acts of 1836 and 1837, although not at the common law. A fortiori, the same doctrine will apply, if both machines are new, upon the principles of the common law.

But it has been said, that if each of the machines patented is independent of the other, then separate patents should have been taken out for each; and that they cannot both be joined in one and the same patent; and so there is a fatal defect in the plaintiff's title. And for this position the doctrine stated in Barrett v. Hall [Case No. 1,047], and Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat [16 U. S.] 454, 506 (see, also, Phil. Pat. pp. 214-216), is relied on. I agree, that under the general patent acts, if two machines are patented, which are wholly independent of each other, and distinct inventions, for unconnected objects, then the objection will lie in its full force, and be fatal. The same rule would apply to a patent for several distinct improvements upon different machines, having no common object or connected operation. For, if different inventions might be joined in the same patent for entirely different purposes and objects, the patentee would be at liberty to join as many, as he might choose, at his own mere pleasure, in one patent, which seems to be inconsistent with the language of the patent acts, which speak of the thing patented, and not of the things patented, and of a patent for an invention, and not of a patent for inventions; and they direct a specific sum to be paid for each patent. Besides; there would arise great difficulty in applying the doctrines of the common law to such cases. Suppose one or more of the supposed inventions was not new, would the patent at the common law be void in toto, or only as to that invention, and good for the rest? Take the case of a patent for ten different machines, each applicable to an entirely different object, one to saw wood, another to spin cotton, another to print goods, another to make paper, and so on; if any one of these machines were not the invention of the patentee, or were in public use, or were dedicated to the public, before the patent was granted, upon the doctrines of the common law the patent would be broader than the invention, and then the consideration therefor would fail, and the patent be void for the whole. But if such distinct inventions could be lawfully united in one patent, the doctrine would lead to consequences most perilous and injurious to the patentee; for, if any one of them were known before, or the patent as to one was void, by innocent mistake or by priority of invention, that would take away from him the title to all the others, which were unquestionably his own exclusive inventions. On the other hand, if the doctrine were relaxed, great inconvenience and even confusion might arise to the public, not only from the difficulty of distinguishing between the different inventions stated in the patent and specification, but also of guarding themselves against fraud and imposition by the patentee, in including doubtful claims under cover of others, which were entirely well founded. In construing statutes upon such a subject, these considerations are entitled to no small weight. At least, they show, that there is no ground, founded in public policy, or in private right, which calls for any expanded meaning of the very words of the statute; and that to construe them literally is to construe them wisely. It is plain, also, that the act of 1837, c. 45, in the ninth section, contemplated the rule of the common law as being then in full force; and, therefore, it seeks to mitigate it, and provides, "that whenever, by mistake, accident, or inadvertence, and without any intent to defraud or mislead the public, any patentee shall have, in his specification, claimed to be the original and first inventor or discoverer of any material or substantial part of the thing invented" (not of different things invented) "of which he was not the first and original inventor, and shall have no legal or just right to claim the same, in every such case the patent shall be good and valid for so much of the invention or discovery" (not inventions or discoveries) "as shall be truly and bona fide his own; provided it shall be a material and substantial part of the thing patented, and be definitely distinguishable from the other parts, so claimed without right as aforesaid." This language manifestly points throughout to a definite and single invention, as the "thing patented," and does not even suppose, that one patent could lawfully include divers distinct and independent inventions, having no common connexion with each other, nor any common purpose. It may, therefore, fairly be deemed a legislative recognition and adoption of the general rule of law in cases, not within the exceptive provision of the act of 1837. And this is what I understand to have been intended by the court in the language used in Barrett v. Hall [supra]. It was there said, that "a patent under the general patent act cannot embrace various distinct improvements and inventions; but in such a case the party must take out separate patents. If the patentee has invented certain improved machines, which are capable of a distinct operation, and has also invented a combination of these machines to produce a connected result, the same patent cannot at once be for the combination, and for each of the improved machines; for the inventions are as distinct, as if the subjects were entirely different." And again: "If the patent could be construed as a patent for each of the machines severally, as well as for the combination, then it would be void, because two separate inventions cannot be patented in one patent." It is obvious, construing this language with reference to the case actually before the court, that the court were treating of a case, where each of the patented machines might singly have a distinct and appropriate use and purpose, unconnected with any common purpose, and therefore each was a different invention. In Moody v. Fiske [Case No. 9,745], the judge alluded still more closely to the distinction, and said: "I wish it to be understood, in this opinion, that though several distinct improvements in one machine may be united in one patent; (yet) it does not follow, that several improvements in two different machines, having distinct and independent operations, can be so included; much less, that the same patent may be for a combination of different machines, and for distinct improvements in each." It is perhaps impossible to use any general language in cases of this sort, standing almost upon the metaphysics of the law, without some danger of its being found susceptible of an interpretation beyond that, which was then in the mind of the court. The case intended to be put in each of these cases was of two different machines, each applicable to a distinct object and purpose, and not connected together for any common object or purpose. And, understood in this way, it seems to me, that no reasonable objection lies against the doctrine.

Construing, then, the present patent to be a patent for each machine, as a distinct and independent invention, but for the same common purpose and auxiliary to the same common end, I do not perceive any just foundation for the objection made to it. If one patent may be taken for different and distinct improvements made in a single machine, which cannot well be doubted or denied, (see Moody v. Fiske [supra]), how is that case distinguishable in principle from the present? Here, there are two machines, each of which is or may be justly auxiliary to produce the same general result, and each is applied to the same common purpose. Why then may not each be deemed a part or improvement of the same invention? Suppose, the patentee had invented two distinct and different machines, each of which would accomplish the same end, why may he not unite both in one patent, and say, I deem each equally useful and equally new, but, under certain circumstances, the one may, in a given case, be preferable to the other? There is a clause in the patent acts, which requires, that the inventor, in his specification or description of his invention, should "fully explain the principle and the several modes, in which he has contemplated the application of that principle or character, by which it may be distinguished from other inventions." Now, this would seem clearly to show, that he might lawfully unite in one patent all the modes, in which he contemplated the application of his invention, and all the different sorts of machinery, or modifications of machinery, by which or to which it might be applied; and if each were new, there would seem to be no just ground of objection to his patent, reaching them all. Act 1793, c. 55, § 3 [1 Stat. 321]; Act 1836, c. 357. A fortiori, this rule would seem to be applicable, where each of the machines is but an improvement or invention conducing to the accomplishment of one and the same general end.

But let us take the case in another view, (of which it is certainly susceptible,) and consider the patent as a patent, not for each machine separately, but for them conjointly, or in the aggregate, as conducing to the same common end; if each machine is new, why may they not both be united in one patent, as distinct improvements? I profess not to see any good reason to the contrary. If they may be so united, and were both new, then, upon the principles established in Moody v.

Fiske, it is not necessary, in order to maintain a suit, that there should be a violation of the patent throughout. It is sufficient, if any one of the invented machines or improvements is wrongfully used; for that, pro tanto, violates the patent. In this view, therefore, the use of the cutter of the inventor, without any use of the saw, would be a sufficient ground to support the present bill, if it were not otherwise open to objection.

We come, then, to the remaining point, whether, although under the patent act of 1793, c. 55, the patent is absolutely void, because the claim includes an abstract principle, and is broader than the invention; or, whether that objection is cured by the disclaimer made by the patentee (Wyeth), under the act of 1837, c. 45. The seventh section of that act provides: "That whenever any patentee shall have, through inadvertence, accident, or mistake, made his specification too broad, claiming more than that, of which he was the original or first inventor, some material and substantial part of the thing patented being truly or justly his own, any such patentee, his administrators, executors, or assigns, whether of the whole or a sectional part thereof, may make disclaimer of such parts of the thing patented, as the disclaimant shall not claim to hold by virtue of the patent or assignment, &c., &c. And such disclaimer shall be thereafter taken and considered as a part of the original specification, to the extent of the interest, which shall be possessed in the patent or right secured thereby by the disclaimant, &c." Then follows a proviso, that "no such disclaimer shall affect any action pending at the time of its being filed, except so far as may relate to the question of unreasonable neglect or delay in filing the same." The ninth section provides, "That whenever, by mistake, accident, or inadvertence, and without any wilful default or intent to defraud or mislead the public, any patentee shall have, in his specification, claimed to be the first and original inventor or discoverer of any material or substantial part of the thing patented, of which he was not the first and original inventor, and shall have no legal or just right to claim the same, in every such case the patent shall be deemed good and valid for so much of the invention or discovery, as shall be truly and bona fide his own; provided it shall be a material and substantial part of the thing patented, and shall be definitely distinguishable from the other parts so claimed without right as aforesaid." Then follows a clause, that in every such case, if the plaintiff recovers in any suit, he shall not be entitled to costs, "unless he shall have entered at the patent office, prior to the commencement of the suit, a disclaimer of all that part of the thing patented, which was so claimed without right; with a proviso, "That no person bringing any such suit shall be entitled to the benefits of the provisions contained in this section, who shall have unreasonably neglected or delayed to enter at the patent office a disclaimer as aforesaid."

Now, it seems to me, that upon the true construction of this statute, the disclaimer mentioned in the seventh section must be interpreted to apply solely to suits pending, when the disclaimer is filed in the patent office; and the disclaimer mentioned in the ninth section to apply solely to suits brought after the disclaimer is so filed. In this way, the provisions harmonize with each other; upon any other construction they would seem, to some extent, to clash with each other, so far as the legal effect and operation of the disclaimer is concerned.

In the present case, the suit was brought on the first of January, 1840, and the disclaimer was not filed until the twenty-fourth of October, of the same year. The proviso, then, of the seventh section would seem to prevent the disclaimer from affecting the present suit in any manner whatsoever. The disclaimer, for another reason, is also utterly without effect in the present case; for it is not a joint disclaimer by the patentee and his assignee, Tudor, who are both plaintiffs in this suit; but by Wyeth alone. The disclaimer cannot, therefore, operate in favor of Tudor, without his having joined in it, in any suit, either at law, or in equity. The case, then, must stand upon the other clauses of the ninth section, independent of the disclaimer.

This leads me to say, that I cannot but consider, that the claim made in the patent for the abstract principle or art of cutting ice by means of an apparatus worked by any other power than human, is a claim founded in inadvertence and mistake of the law, and without any wilful default or intent to defraud or mislead the public, within the proviso of the ninth section. That section, it appears to me, was intended to cover inadvertences and mistakes of the law, as well as inadvertences and mistakes of fact; and, therefore, without any disclaimer, the plaintiffs might avail themselves of this part of the section to the extent of maintaining the present suit for the other parts of the invention claimed, that is, for the saw and for the cutter, and thereby protect themselves against any violation of their rights, unless there has been an unreasonable neglect or delay to file the disclaimer in the office. Still, however, it does not seem to me, that a court of equity ought to interfere to grant a perpetual injunction in a case of this sort, whatever might be the right and remedy at law, unless a disclaimer has been in fact filed at the patent office before the suit is brought. The granting of such an injunction is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court; and if the court should grant a perpetual injunction before any disclaimer is filed, it may be, that the patentee may never afterwards, within a reasonable time, file any disclaimer, although the act certainly contemplates the neglect or delay to do so to be a good defence both at law and in equity, in every suit, brought upon the patent, to secure the rights granted thereby. However, it is not indispensable in this case to dispose of this point, or of the question of unreasonable neglect or delay, as there is another objection, which in my judgment is fatal, in every view, to the maintenance of the suit in its present form.

The objection, which I deem fatal, is, that the bill states and admits, that the assignment to the plaintiff, Tudor (made in February, 1832), has never yet been recorded in the state department, according to the provisions of the patent act of 1793, c. 55, § 4. That act provides, "That it shall be lawful for any inventor, his executor or administrator, to assign the title and interest in the said invention at any time; and the assignee, having recorded the said assignment in the office of the secretary of state, shall thereafter stand in the place of the original inventor, both as to right and responsibility." It seems a necessary, or, at least, a just inference, from this language, that until the assignee has so recorded the assignment, he is not substituted to the right and responsibility of the patentee, so as to maintain any suit at law, or in equity, founded thereon. It is true, that no objection is taken in the pleadings on account of this defect; but it is spread upon the face of the bill, and therefore the court is bound to take notice of it. It is not the case of a title defectively set forth, but of a title defective in itself, and brought before the court with a fatal infirmity, acknowledged to be attached to it. As between the plaintiffs and the defendants, standing upon adverse titles and rights, (whatever might be the case between privies in title and right,) Tudor has shown no joint interest sufficient to maintain the present bill; and therefore it must be dismissed, with costs.

ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY—CONVEYANCE BY REGISTER.

A register has the right to convey the estate to the assignee when there is "no opposing interest," although the title to the property is in dispute.

[Cited in Re Vogel, Case No. 16,983.]

By B. F. M. HURLEY, Register:

I, the undersigned, having been designated by the court as the register in bankruptcy before whom the proceedings in the above matter of the bankruptcy of William H. Wylie are to be had, do hereby certify that in the due course of such proceedings the following question, pertinent to the same, arose, and was stated: "Has a register the right to assign and convey to the assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt, when the title of the property is in dispute, under the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 522]?" The facts in the case are these: The bankrupt, on the 12th day of January, 1867, conveyed all his personal property by mortgage to Miss Phoebe J. Thomas, and on the 21st day of October, 1867, he gave a bill of sale of the same property to Grafton Duvall and Wm. H. Crantz. On the 14th day of November, 1867, he executed to Grafton Duvall a deed of trust of all the property heretofore conveyed, for the benefit of his creditors. On the 28th of November, 1867, he commenced proceedings in bankruptcy, and on the 30th of November Duvall took possession of the property by a writ of replevin. On the 4th day of January, 1868, the creditors met and proved their debts, and made choice of an assignee. Among the number of creditors who met and proved their claims was Miss Phoebe J. Thomas, by her duly constituted agent, thereby releasing her claim to the property named in the mortgage under section twenty of the bankrupt act. Your honor refused to confirm the assignee chosen by the creditors, and appointed Frank B. Carlin assignee of the estate. After being duly qualified, I assigned and conveyed to him all the estates, real and personal, under the fourteenth section. Charles W. Ross, Esq., attorney for the assignee, raised the question above stated.

Opinion of the register:

I am of the opinion that the register has the right to assign to the assignee all the estate, both real and personal, where there is no opposition to the assignment. Duvall & Crantz not having proved their claims are not known in the proceedings before me, and in my opinion there is no opposing interest. And the said party requested that the same should be certified to your honor for your opinion thereon.

GILES, District Judge. The register in this case certifies into court the following: "Has the register a right to assign and convey the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt, when the title of the property is in dispute, under the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act?" I am of the opinion that he has, if there be (in the language of the law) "no opposing interest;" that is, if there be no one before the register contesting the appointment of the assignee, or for any other cause, opposing the execution of said assignment. The assignment is general. Rice, Manual, form 66. The section then (presuming the assignment to be made) goes on to say what rights under it vest in the assignee, etc., and says that a copy of said assignment, duly certified by the clerk of the court under the seal thereof, shall be conclusive evidence of his title as such assignee, to take, hold, sue for and recover the property of the bankrupt, etc. On the facts stated by the register, he should make the general assignment to the assignee, who should appear in the case in the Frederick county circuit court, and claim the property, in which suit the validity of the deed to Grafton Duvall can be tested.

BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDINGS—CLAIM FOR RENT.

1. Rent accruing after bankruptcy cannot be brought in question in the bankrupt court.

2. Where rent had accrued before the bankruptcy, and was secured by a lien upon the crop grown on the demised premises, and the bankrupts had collected such rent from their under-tenant, the district court properly entertained jurisdiction of a petition filed by the landlord against the bankrupts and their assignees, for the purpose of following the fund bound for the satisfaction of the rent, in order to prevent the claim for rent from coming against the general estate of the bankrupts.

Petition to review decree of the district court sitting in bankruptcy.

Robert C. Smith and F. B. Pratt, for petitioner.

George L. Potter, contra.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. Smith & Brother became bankrupts, March 25, 1871, being decreed such, April 7, 1871. They were lessees of a plantation for the year 1871, from Wylie, at a rent of $500, payable on the 1st of November, secured by a lien on all the crops. The assignee refused to accept the lease, and Smith & Brother remained in possession by their under-tenants from whom they collected $396 rent, which they did not pay to their landlord, [W. G.] Wylie. The rent accruing after bankruptcy, it is conceded, cannot be brought in question in the bankrupt court. The rent which accrued before bankruptcy was a provable debt under the bankruptcy proceedings. The act says expressly (section 5071, Rev. St.; section 19 of the original act [14 Stat. 525]): "Where the bankrupt is liable to pay rent or other debt falling due at fixed and stated periods, the creditor may prove for a proportionate part thereof up to the time of bankruptcy, as if the same grew due from day to day, and not at such fixed and stated periods." Being so provable, the debt was discharged pro tanto. Section 5119, Rev. St., or section 34 of the original act. Hence the landlord could not maintain an action therefor. And being secured by a lien on the crops, he could not prove the debt in bankruptcy without surrendering his lien. As this lien secured not only the rent in question, but the rent for the balance of the year, a surrender of it would involve complications and expense desirable to avoid, if possible. Besides, the crops belong to the under-tenants, and they have paid to Smith & Brother, $396, and have an equity against the latter, to be relieved from the lien to that extent. Under these circumstances, Wylie filed a petition in the bankrupt court against Smith & Brother and their assignee [William Breck], praying that they might severally be decreed to pay him whatever they had severally received on account of said rents, and that the assignee might be decreed to make up the deficiency of the rent out of the general estate, and for general relief. As before observed, the bankrupt court has nothing to do with rent which accrued after the bankruptcy. For that which accrued before, which is a provable debt and secured by lien as aforesaid, it seems proper that the court should entertain jurisdiction for the purpose of following the fund bound for the satisfaction of the debt, in order to prevent its coming against the general estate of the bankrupts. To this extent the district court has made a decree against Smith & Brother, who possessed themselves of this fund pending proceedings in bankruptcy, by collections from their under-tenants. I think the decree was right and should be affirmed.

The amount of rent accrued prior to the bankruptcy should be slightly modified, and made up to the 25th of March, instead of the 7th of April; in other words, to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy instead of the decree. The general rule, as established in section 5067 (or section 19 of the original act), is that "all debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy * * * may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt." The commencement of proceedings in this case was the 25th of March. The defendants also supposed that the lease commenced on the 30th of January; but this is incorrect, for though dated on that day, the term leased is the whole year 1871. The number of days, therefore, for which rent is to be allowed is 84; and the amount is $115.07, instead of $134.40, as allowed in the decree of the district court. The decree, therefore, will be corrected accordingly, allowing interest from the 1st of November, 1871. The reference to a master for the purpose of taking an account of setoffs claimed by the defendants is correct. The decree is affirmed in all things, except as to the amount thereof, which is reduced from $134.40 to $115.07, with interest from the 1st of November, 1871, and subject to all just setoffs of Smith & Brother against the petitioner, not more properly applicable to the rent which fell due after the bankruptcy.

District Court, W. D. Virginia. Sept., 1872.

AMENDATORY BANKRUPT ACT — CONSTRUCTION — HOMESTEAD AND EXEMPTIONS.

1. The amendatory bankrupt act of June 8th, 1872 [17 Stat. 334], does not purport to embrace the homestead in the terms employed by the constitution, so as to make it good against debts "heretofore contracted," which it is conceded congress might have done if it had chosen.

2. The reference to "state exemption laws" confines the inquiry under this act to exemptions under state laws as interpreted and settled by the adjudication of its highest court, and precludes the court of bankruptcy from contravening that adjudication whenever made.

3. The homestead exemption exists only against debts contracted after the constitution took effect, and is by its terms subject to mortgages, deeds of trust, pledge or other security (including liens) thereon, notwithstanding the saving in the second section of the eleventh article.

[Cited in Re Vogler, Case No. 16,986; Re Kean, Id. 7,630; Re Smith, Id. 12,986.]

4. The act of June 8th, 1872, is not retroactive, but as a remedial act its benefits should be extended to all pending cases where the effects of the bankrupt are undisputed and it can be done without prejudice to vested interests.

5. The paramount duty of the court of bankruptcy to provide for the liquidation of liens forbids it to turn over the subject to another tribunal for litigation or adjustment, but requires it to abstract from the homestead provision the amount of liens rightfully attaching thereto.

In bankruptcy. This case was heard in conjunction with several others, involving the question of homestead.

E. Barksdale, C. E. Dabney, T. S. Flournoy, E. Barksdale, Jr., and Robert Johnson, for petitioners.

H. Robertson, B. Green, J. M. Whittle, William Daniel, N. Green, and W. W. Henry, for defendants.

RIVES, District Judge. These cases are now heard on the petition of bankrupts to be allowed the homestead exemption of the state under act of congress of June 8th, 1872. The first of these petitioners was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 29th day of June last; had listed real estate valued at $3000, unincumbered, except by a judgment of about $300, but no personal property of which he could claim a homestead. His debts are mostly anterior to July, 1868, and it is admitted that those before that date are more than sufficient to absorb the assets. His estate is about to be sold, and he asks to be allowed this $2000 exemption out of the proceeds of sale in the hands of his assignees, and claims that it should be free of the lien of the judgments aforesaid. The second petitioner, Jerre White, was adjudicated a bankrupt on 26th August, 1871. He alleges in his petition that, before filing his petition in bankruptcy he filed his "homestead deed," in compliance with the act of assembly, but that the same was held to be void by the state court; that his lands have been sold by his assignee, and he became the purchaser of the "home tract," but has not paid for the same. He therefore prays that he may be allowed out of the money to be received by his assignee $2000 as and for a homestead provision, to be settled on his wife and children. It is admitted that his debts were contracted previously to July, 1869. [As the questions involved in these cases concerned many other suitors in this court besides the immediate parties, I deemed it proper to invite discussion from the members of the bar, who might be pleased to assist and enlighten me by their arguments, though they might not be directly interested in these particular cases. My invitation was courteously acceded to, and for two days I have been closely occupied by able and discursive arguments, presenting the questions I am to decide in every aspect ingenuity could lend them. I should be loth to decide these cases amid the pressure of other business at this court if my studies had not given me some familiarity with the topics discussed, and if I did not feel the pressing necessity of composing the public anxiety on this subject.]²

I am called for the first time to give my opinion on the subject of these petitions. To determine the question thus raised it is necessary to ascertain the effect of the amendatory act of June 8th, 1872. It is brief. It merely substitutes one date for another in the first proviso, in section 14 of the general act, so that this proviso now reads as follows: "And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution, or other process, or order of any court, by the laws of the state in which the bankrupt had his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such state exemption laws in force in the year 1871." The date prescribed for these state exemption laws in the original act was the year 1864, and, of course, deprived bankrupts in this state of the homestead provisions of our constitution adopted in 1869. I presume that constitution went into operation July 6th, 1869. I can find nothing in the constitution itself, nor in the schedule and election ordinance appended to it, fixing the time at which it should take effect. Nor do I suppose that the terms prescribed by congress, upon the readmission of the state into the Union and to representation in congress, at all suspended or delayed the birth of the constitution. Hence I revert to the proclamation of the president, under date of 14th May, 1869, submitting the constitution to the people on the 6th July, 1869, for ratification or rejection, and accept the date of the actual ratification as the date of its birth. The adoption of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, which was made a condition precedent to the restoration of the state to the Union, and which occurred on the 8th of October, 1869, and the approval by congress of our constitution as republican, and its consent to our admission to congressional representation, which was declared by act of congress of January 26th, 1870 [16 Stat. 62], are facts extraneous, according to my idea, to the question when the constitution became the fundamental law of this commonwealth, and are such as affect only its external relations, and not its interior organization or autonomy.

The impression exists that our court of appeals, in the case of Griffin's Ex'r v. Cunningham, 20 Grat. 31, assumed January 26th, 1870, as the date when the constitution took effect. This seems to me a mistake. They properly took this date as the end of military rule under the reconstruction acts, and the end of official tenures under the same, and as the period of complete governmental organization under the constitution, declared as republican, and the admission to congressional representation ordained by the act of January 26th, 1870. But this plainly does not touch the present question, from what period that instrument as establishing new rights or rules of property, shall be deemed operative. It certainly existed for some purpose before that date, otherwise there was no constitutional assembly in October, 1869; and its ratification at that time of the constitutional amendment was void. While it may be said that the assembly was called into existence under the reconstruction acts of congress, it must be conceded that congress could by no act of its own alter or affect the mode prescribed by the constitution for the ratification of amendments thereto. Though it be admitted that the constitution was only provisional until its acceptance by congress, in the sense and under the theory of the reconstruction acts, still, in legal contemplation, its operation, upon the event of its complete authority, should relate back to its ratification, and this latter date, when the seal of public approval was given to it at the polls, be assumed as the rightful one by which rights accruing thereunder, and contracts regulated thereby, should be governed. It will scarcely be contended that this article did not confer clear rights of property, independent of legislative action, and that the reference therein to the assembly was merely for auxiliary details, under an express prohibition "to defeat or impair the benefits intended to be conferred by the provisions of this article." No neglect of the legislature to pass a law on the subject could at all abrogate the rights conferred by this article; it was operative of itself, and did not depend on a law of the assembly. I find nothing decisive of this point in the late case of Tackett v. Stone, 22 Grat. 266. It did not become necessary to ascertain in that case when the homestead took effect, nor does the court seem to have fixed a precise date therefor, though I concede there are incidental remarks in the opinion of the court to the effect that until the constitution was approved, and senators and representatives elected under it admitted, it did not become the organic law of the state, and as such binding upon the citizens thereof. The acts of assembly to which I have been referred for a legislative recognition of the date from which the constitution takes effect, purport only to fix the limit of the provisional military government, and the complete restoration of the state to the Union, which I do not doubt is properly fixed as January 26th, 1870. But it is not necessary to decide this question in these cases. The present inclination of my mind is, for the reason I have assigned, to take the date of the ratification of the constitution as the period from which the homestead provision became operative. As I find nothing decisive on the subject in the decisions of the court of appeals of this state, according to my view of them, I throw out this suggestion for the consideration of that bench and the learned bar of this state. Whatever, however, may be assumed as the period of the commencement of the homestead, whether 6th July, 1869, or 26th January, 1870, it is clear that the amendatory act of congress of 8th June, 1872, adopting as a part of the bankrupt exemption the additional benefit of the state exemption laws in the year 1871, embraces the homestead provisions of our constitution. This act was introduced by a senator from this state, and was designed to include our homestead provision. It clearly does so.

The question now arises, what is the nature, extent, and operation of that exemption, and how shall these be determined? The orderly examination of this question leads first to an inquiry into the scheme and theory of the bankrupt law on this subject of exemption. The establishment of a uniform system of bankruptcy is supposed to involve the idea of a discharge, greater or less, from precedent obligations. So far, confessedly, congress has the right to impair the obligations of contracts. In the Legal-Tender Cases (Knox v. Lee and Parker v. Davis) 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 459, this is incidentally conceded in the opinions both of the majority of the court and of the dissenting justices. The only difference was whether this power over contracts extended to the incidental or implied powers as well as the express powers, the dissenting justices admitting its application to the latter, but denying it as to the former, while Justice Strong, of the majority, declared with emphasis: "There was no ground for any such distinction. It has no warrant in the constitution or in any of the decisions of this court. We are accustomed to speak, for mere convenience, of the express and implied powers conferred upon congress. But in fact the auxiliary powers, those necessary and appropriate to the execution of other powers simply described, are as expressly given as is the power to declare war or to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy. They are not catalogued, no list of them is made, but they are grouped in the last clause of section 8 of the first article, and granted in the same words in which all other powers are granted to congress. And this court has recognized no such distinction as is now attempted." It may, therefore, be admitted that it is clearly within the competency of congress to grant a retrospective exemption so as to discharge antecedent obligations. Congress, in such a bankrupt law, might, if it chose, insert such a homestead provision as we have, making it good against any debts heretofore contracted, although its inevitable effect would be to impair the obligation of contracts; and for this simple reason, that the power to such an end is expressly given by the United States constitution. In the same way the power to regulate commerce, declare war, etc., may not be exerted without impairment of contracts, and yet it cannot be disputed because of this resulting injury from its exercise. I therefore concede the power of congress in the enactment of a bankrupt law to make exemptions in the very terms of our homestead provision, embracing past as well as future debts. But the question here is not what congress may do, but what congress has done; nor what the authors of this late act may have designed, but what they have accomplished.

To facilitate our inquiry in this direction, I submit a cursory analysis of the 14th section of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)]. The exemptions are twofold: First, such as are made in the first instance by congress, and secondly, such as have been made by the states. The first comprise four particulars: 1, necessary household and kitchen furniture, and other articles and necessaries, not to exceed in value the sum of five hundred dollars; 2, wearing apparel; 3, uniform, arms, and equipments of a soldier in the militia or federal army; and 4, such other property as is now, or hereafter shall be, exempted by the laws of the United States. The second class has one comprehensive designation, which it is well here to repeat in the language of the act now amended: "And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale, upon execution or other process or order of court, by the laws of the state in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such state exemption laws in force in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-one." Our concern is now exclusively with this second class of state exemptions, recognized and validated by the act of congress. It is but a part of the policy which led to the act of May 19th, 1828 [4 Stat. 278], and the practice of the federal courts under it. That statute provides that the proceeding upon execution in the courts of the United States shall be the same as were then used in the courts of each state, and empowers the courts of the United States, by rules of practice, to make such proceedings conformable to any changes thereafter adopted by any legislature of the respective states. Through this act, and subsequent rules of practice adopted as authorized by it, the practice in the federal and state courts was, in 1864, generally the same as to the exemption of the property of debtors under execution. This provision of the bankrupt law, therefore, only entitles the bankrupt to the same exemption as he would have had in the federal courts, if pursued by executions issued therefrom. An objection has been made to the constitutionality of this provision, for its lack of uniformity, because of the variety of these state exemptions. But it has been held that the law itself is uniform in its principles, but diverse only in its application or operation within the states, owing to the respect which congress pays to state laws. It has been generally acquiesced in. The policy of the legislature, and the practice of the judicial departments of the United States government, and the principles upon which the bankrupt law is framed and depends, do, therefore, alike support the idea that, upon questions of state exemptions, we must consult and be governed by the state codes alone. The judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 92] embraces the same principle in its 34th section, that "the laws of the several states, except when the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States where they apply." It has been well held that this provision is a mere legislative recognition of the principles of universal jurisprudence as to the operation of lex loci. Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1. Indeed, I do not see how, upon any other principle, our judicial system, state and federal, could consist and act in their separate and well-defined provinces without injurious clashing and serious interruptions to the harmony of both governments. Hence I recognize it as an elementary principle at the foundation of the department to which I belong, that when called upon to decide upon rights of property in my district under the local laws of the state, I am bound thereby as the same are expounded by the state tribunals. A statute consists not merely of its terms, but of the judicial exposition thereof, so that if a law of the state has been construed by the highest court of the state, I am bound by that construction, and relieved of all necessity of examining the same, and forming my opinion of what is already authoritatively settled for me. And this follows from the fact that I, like the state judge, administer the laws of Virginia where they settle the question submitted to me; and if I depart from them, I am depriving the citizen of the benefit of the laws under which he lives. The further and qualifying principle, that upon [questions of general jurisprudence independent of local laws, and upon] ² such as affect the constitution, treaties, and statutes of the United States, I am free to form my own judgment, and am not bound by the decisions of the state courts, admirably serves to show how our different sets of courts may move on harmoniously, and vie with each other in raising upon the foundation our fathers have laid for us a structure of enlightened jurisprudence, suitable to the wonderful progress of our country and the new dispensation of science, which is removing from the intercourse and trade of nations the obstacles of space and time.

These general considerations, growing out of the nature of our complex government, and the relation of our state and federal judiciaries, prepare us to determine what is now to be regarded as our homestead exemption. It is declared by our state constitution in these words: "Every householder or head of a family shall be entitled, in addition to the articles now exempt from levy and distress, to hold, exempt from levy, seizure, garnisheeing, or sale, under any execution, order, or other process, issued on any demand, for any debt heretofore or hereafter contracted, his real and personal property or either, including money or debts due him, whether heretofore or hereafter acquired or contracted, to the value of not exceeding two thousand dollars, to be selected by him." It is needless, for the purpose of the present inquiry, to quote more of this article 11. I refer, besides, to the second section thereof, which I understand as making this homestead superior to the lien of execution where the property has been restored; and to the lien of "judgment rendered or docketed on and after the 17th day of April, 1861, and before the 2d day of March, 1867, for any debt previous to the 4th day of April, 1865, excepted," etc. The feature of this provision, which challenged general inquiry, was its retroactive effect upon anterior debts and judicial liens in the two instances I have cited. The general provision in the third section subordinated this claim to "any mortgage, deed of trust, pledge, or other security thereon." Hence, by the terms of this section, this exemption could not stand against any voluntary incumbrance, such as "mortgage, deed of trust, or pledge," nor involuntary incumbrances, such as execution or judgment liens, which I take to be covered by the concluding phrase, "other security thereon." It may not be inapt to state here that this constitutional provision clearly comes under the designation of the 14th section of "state exemption laws," the constitution being the highest fundamental law of the state. So far as the allowance of this exemption against debts subsequent to the time when it took effect is concerned, there has been no doubt or difficulty. But the question naturally arose, whether it could affect or impair anterior obligations, and if so, whether it was not obnoxious to the constitutional inhibition upon the states to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. This question was differently decided in the circuits by able and learned judges. It has, however, been finally settled by the supreme court of appeals with entire unanimity. That decision settled the law for the state. Its effect is literally to expunge from the 1st section of the homestead clause the word "heretofore," so as to leave it applicable only to debts hereafter contracted, and also in my view to render nugatory the 2d section in relation to anterior liens of certain specified executions and judgments. This clause of the constitution is now to be read as if it were virtually altered in the text, so as to conform literally to the construction placed upon it by the highest judicial tribunal of the state. I can go no further to ascertain its meaning and its effect. I am not free to form an opinion of it judicially; and it would be supererogatory if not impertinent to express one. I must take and administer this law of the state as I find it settled by the highest and final court of the state. Any other course on my part would offend against the theory I entertain of the functions of our separate judiciaries, state and federal, and would render me culpable in my own eyes for having attempted to mar the symmetry and disturb the harmony of that wisely constructed system of courts for administering the law of both governments.

It must not be forgotten that I am now disposing of a question of "state exemptions" under the fourteenth section of the bankrupt law. That of the congressional direct exemption to the bankrupt is upon a different footing, and is necessarily a matter for the exclusive cognizance and decision of this court, but when congress chooses to add to its own list of exemptions further exemptions under "state laws," it refers this court in its action thereupon to those state laws, and the discussion must turn upon the construction of those statutes. I do not doubt it would have been in the power of congress to have given to bankrupts a homestead in the retrospective terms of our clause. The only obstacle in the way would be the direct enactments of variant exemptions in the different states. But this congress has not attempted to do. The alteration of the date in the fourteenth section only availed to extend the benefits of exemptions to such additional ones as the state had made between 1864 and 1872. This is the whole effect of the amendatory act of June 8th, 1872. I do not doubt that the projectors and authors of this law, without due consideration, supposed it would give validity and operation to the homestead exemption as expressed in the eleventh article of our constitution. But I feel confident upon further reflection and examination, they will see that they have not accomplished that object but have only extended the relief under it so far as the court of appeals has allowed it, namely, as against debts contracted subsequently to the operation of the constitution, which, in my view, dates from the ratification, the 6th July, 1869.

To this conclusion I have been conducted by general reasoning upon the principles of our judicial systems, and the interpretations of the fourteenth section of the bankrupt law. I now turn to authorities for this opinion. They are elementary and abundant. A leading case is that of Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 162, in which Chief Justice Marshall says: "The court has uniformly expressed its disposition, in cases depending on the laws of a particular state, to adopt the construction which the courts of the states have given to those laws. This course is founded on the principle supposed to be universally recognized, that the judicial department of every government, where such department exists, is the appropriate organ for construing the legislative acts of that government. Thus no court in the universe which professes to be governed by principles would, we presume, undertake to say that the courts of Great Britain, or France, or of any other nation, had misunderstood its own statutes, and therefore erect itself into a tribunal which should correct such misunderstanding. We receive the construction as given by the courts of the nation, as the true sense of the law, and feel ourselves no more at liberty to depart from that construction than to depart from the words of the statute. On this principle the construction given by this court to the constitution of the United States is received by all as the true construction, and on the same principle the construction given by the courts of the several states to the legislative acts of those states, is received as true, unless they come in conflict with the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States." So again in Polk's Lessee v. Windell, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 87, it is held, "In cases depending on the statutes of a state, and more especially those relating to titles to land, the federal court adopt the construction of the state where that construction is settled and can be ascertained." In Gardner v. Collins, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 58; Inglis v. Trustees of the Sailors' Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 127; U. S. v. Morrison, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 129; and Hinde v. Vattier, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 398,—the same controlling principle is announced variously as follows: "Where the question of the construction of the statutes of a state has been settled by judicial decision in the state where the land lies, the supreme court of the United States, upon the uniform principles adopted by it, would recognize that decision as part of the local law." "The uniform rule of this court with respect to titles to real property is to apply the same rule which is applied in state tribunals in like cases." "The supreme court, according to its uniform course, adopts the construction of the act which is made by the highest court of the state." This principle is carried so far that the supreme court abnegates its own judgment, and surrenders its own opinion when not in accordance with the construction settled in the state courts. McKeen v. Delancy, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 22. It recedes from its opinion, though in accordance with two decisions of the state, when satisfied that the law was finally settled otherwise by the highest court of the state. This was the noteworthy case of Green v. Neal, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 298. The language of this case is most pertinent to our present discussion, and I must be pardoned for making copious quotations from it. Judge McLean delivering the opinion of the court made this comment on the peculiar feature of the case: "But the question is now raised whether the court will adhere to its own decision made under the circumstances stated, or yield to that of the judicial tribunals of Tennessee. This point has never before been decided by this court on a question of general importance. The cases are numerous where the court has adopted the construction given to a statute of the state by its supreme judicial tribunal, but it has never been decided that this court will overrule their own adjudication establishing an important rule of property when it has been founded on the construction of a statute made in conformity to the decision of the state at the time, so as to conform to a different construction adopted afterwards. In a great majority of causes brought before the federal tribunals they are called in to enforce the laws of the states. The rights of parties are determined under these laws, and it would be a strange perversion of principle if the judicial exposition of these laws by the state tribunals should be disregarded. These expositions constitute the law and fix the rule of property. Rights are acquired under this rule, and it regulates all the transactions which come within its scope. On all questions arising under the constitution and laws of the Union, this court may exercise a revising power, and its decisions are final and obligatory on all other judicial tribunals, state as well as federal. A state tribunal has a right to examine any such questions and to determine thereon, but its decision must conform to that of the supreme court, or the corrective power may be exercised. But the case is very different when the question arises under a local law. The decision of the question by the highest tribunal of a state should be considered as final by this court, not because the state tribunal in such a case has any power to bind this court, but because in the language of the court in the case of Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 361, a fixed and received construction by a state in its own courts, makes a part of the law. If the construction of the highest tribunal of a state forms a part of the statute law as much as an enactment of the legislature, how can this court make a distinction between them? The inquiry is, what is settled law of the state at the time the decision is made? This constitutes the rule of property within the state, by which the rights of litigant parties must be determined. And the construction of a state law having been settled by a series of decisions of the highest state court, differently from a former decision of the supreme court, the latter construction of such law will be adopted in the federal courts."

It was from this course of reasoning the court felt constrained in this case to overrule its former decision and conform to the later decisions in Tennessee. The language of Justice McLean, in depicting the consequences of a different course, bears with great emphasis on the question I am now deciding. "Here," says he, "is a judicial conflict arising from two rules of property in the same state, and the consequences are not only deeply injurious to the citizens of the state, but calculated to engender the most lasting discontents. It is therefore essential to the interests of the country and to the harmony of the judicial action of the federal and state governments, that there should be but one rule of property in the state." It would hardly be presumed that a different rule would obtain as to the interpretation of a state constitution from that already indicated for state laws. To preclude any such distinction, I cite the cases of East Hartford v. Hartford Bridge Co., 10 How. [51 U. S.] 511; Webster v. Cooper, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 489; and Randall v. Bingham, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 513,—for the position that the decision of the highest court of a state upon a question arising under the state constitution as binding on the federal courts, and that the construction given by such state court to a provision of its state constitution, not called into question by any conflicting opinion of that court, is in like manner conclusive. I have not exhausted the authorities on this head. I have not sought to do so. I have not inquired into the limitations and exceptions to this doctrine, as they do not affect the questions under consideration. Abbott gives a summary of the cases in these words: "The courts of the United States look to the several states as the appropriate and authoritative expounders of the legislation of their respective governments, and whenever the courts of a state judicially settle the construction of a state statute, the courts of the United States are bound thereby, and will give effect to such statutes accordingly, saving, however, vested interests from being prejudiced by changes of construction. But in cases of conflict or fluctuations in the opinions of the state courts, the supreme court will interpret the statutes by their own judgment." Abb. U. S. Treatise, 240; Pease v. Peck, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 595. The citations, however, with which I have contended myself suffice to settle in a clear light, and place in an impregnable position the grand harmonizing principle in the structure and action of our two sets of courts, namely, that in the domain of state laws they are construed for both by the state judiciary; that cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, pertain to the supreme court, whose decisions thereon are binding on the state judiciary and upon the vast middle field of general jurisdiction, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages, embracing the doctrine of contracts and general commercial law. Each judiciary is left free for itself to explore all sources of legal science, and ascertain upon general reason and legal analogies the principles by which it shall be governed, subject to the deference and respect which educated and honest jurists will always gladly and emulously pay to the opinion of collaborators in the same exalted calling.

It only remains for me to illustrate, in the cases now under consideration, the practical operation of the principles which I have deduced from reasoning and authorities. The nature and extent of the homestead exemption is now finally settled in this state by its highest court. The supreme court of appeals has established a fixed rule by which the claims of creditors and the exemptions of the debtor shall be adjusted under creditors' bills or otherwise in the general liquidation which is now going on among our impoverished people. If this rule prevail, as I have undertaken to show it should prevail in the bankrupt court, then the citizen, whether creditor or debtor, would be entitled to and receive in both forums the same treatment and relief under an equal administration of the same laws. But if it be otherwise, and this court be at liberty to establish a different rule, a deplorable contention would ensue between the courts, and there would be neither repose nor certainty for the prosperous development of business or the encouragement of commercial enterprise and activity. This antagonism and clashing of the courts would extend to their respective suitors, and breed strifes and discontents, destroying public confidence in our courts, and estranging the affections of the people from their governments. If the federal courts fail of the deference they owe to the state courts, how shall the latter be expected to submit to the authority of the former in the rightful jurisdiction of all cases arising under the constitution, the laws, and treaties of the United States? These consequences are not urged as conclusive, but as most persuasive, to show that we cannot entertain the belief that our judicial systems were so viciously contrived by their wise founders as to involve such pernicious collisions of judicial authority and action. But where the rule is such as to allow of my revising the judgments of the court of appeals, and dissenting from its construction of the homestead provision, the inquiry would pertinently arise whether or not I concurred in that decision. But as the case now stands, I am warranted in referring the inquirer, if any such there be, to sundry opinions which I delivered while on that bench, expressive of my sense of the judicial obligations to enforce contracts, and vindicative of their sanctity against the plausible excuses of revolutionary changes and losses, so that business should flow on in accustomed legal channels and honesty be maintained in all private transactions, notwithstanding the demoralization and disturbances incident to a devastating war, which the indiscretion, the incompetency, the wickedness of rulers had been allowed by an inscrutable Providence for its just ends to bring down on a misled people. I choose, however, that my decision shall rest on the well-established principle that I cannot sit in judgment on the court of appeals in its construction of the constitution of the state, and that my whole duty is discharged in ascertaining what that decision is, and what are its effect and operation on the cases in hand. It might be replied to this reasoning that inasmuch as the decision of the court of appeals was upon a clause of the constitution of the United States, it came within the very exception that I have already mentioned. This would have been so had the decision of the court been otherwise and against the rights claimed under the United States constitution; but it will be recollected that under the venerable 23th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 85], as modified by act of February 5th, 1867 [14 Stat. 385], there is no right of appeal where the decision is against the validity of a statute assailed on the ground of its repugnance to the constitution of the United States. In such case the corrective power of the federal judiciary ceases. But in case of a contrary decision, a writ of error would lie to the supreme court of the United States, so that no one can lose his rights as asserted under the constitution of the United States without the sentence of the supreme court; but he can have no appeal there when such constitutional claims are not denied by the state tribunals. This is a logical consequence from the nature of our two governments, and necessary to maintain the supremacy of the general government within its sphere.

I have thus endeavored to present a connected view of my reasoning on this subject without turning aside to reply to the various arguments that have been addressed to me. Perhaps I have already incidentally indicated my leading reply to these arguments, but it may be well to notice especially a few objections to the view I have taken. The first and leading one is an argument ab inconvenienti. It is said that to follow the decision of our court of appeals is to create a distinction in debts at war with the fundamental principle of the bankrupt law, namely, equality of distribution after the satisfaction of liens; that this distinction would operate to the unequal satisfaction of creditors of the two classes into which they would be arrayed by this decision, and that the prescribed action of this court would be deranged by conforming to it. Concede that this consequence flows, where is its foundation? Certainly not in the act of congress, which merely adopts the state exemption, but rather in the state exemption itself. The vice is found in the homestead provision, and consists in the innovation thereby attempted of applying it to contracts "heretofore" made. To the honor of the state it may be said that in all her previous legislation having any bearing on contracts, the laws were always prospective, and the assembly instinctively revolted against the idea of turning back to affect past contracts. This inconvenience, then, is the product of reckless innovation, and cannot be traced to a faulty construction of the late act of congress. The effort is to construe it as adopting our homestead provision in totidem verbis, whereas it has no special reference to it, but includes it only under the generic phrase of "state exemption laws."

Another view is also based upon the fact of the act of congress preceding the decision of the court of appeals. It is inferred from this that congress gave the homestead exemption literally as it stood in our constitution. Had this decision been a new law out of the limits of time prescribed, there might have been some semblance of plausibility in it; but it makes no law, it merely construes the exemption and ascertains what it amounts to. Hence, it does not matter when the decision was pronounced; its effect, whenever rendered, is to establish the true reading of this clause. If it had not been made at this time I should have been left free to construe it for myself, but, whenever made, it becomes a part of the law which I have to administer, and I must implicitly follow it.

Another question is made as to the application and operation of this amendatory act to pending cases of bankruptcy. It is clearly prospective; but, as a remedial act, it may be availed of in all pending cases where assets are undistributed, and the enlarged exemption can be granted without prejudice to the interests already vested before the passage of the act. When congress chooses to increase this bounty it would be hard to discriminate between the applicant before and the applicant after the act, when the case of each was such as to put it in the power of the court, without the invasion of vested interests, to give both alike the benefit of the enlarged exemption. The contrary view is based upon the idea that the deed of assignment vests the title to the assignee in behalf of creditors, and divests to that extent the title of the bankrupt to his exemptions, but the direct opposite is plainly declared in the 14th section of the bankrupt law by the proviso, "that the foregoing exception shall operate as a limitation upon the conveyance of the property of the bankrupt to his assignees. And in no case shall the property hereby excepted pass to the assignee, or the title of the bankrupt thereto be impaired or affected by any of the provisions of this act."

It has also been contended in these cases that inasmuch as the exempted property is held independently of the deed of assignment, the claimant takes cum onere, and the lienor must follow it elsewhere for his satisfaction. This pretension rests upon the authority of a case from the district court of California. In re Hunt [Case No. 6,883]. I do not know enough of the nature and provisions of the California homestead, nor of their local laws and judicial proceedings, to weigh the considerations that may have induced this decision, but in this state I should feel, if I followed this authority, and should turn away the judgment creditor, when the assets liable to his demand are in my hands, to a state court, I should be derelict in my duty and should abnegate my rightful authority to provide for the liquidation of liens in this court.

2 [Many arguments and considerations, derived from the war and its results in the loss of property and the impoverishment of our people, have been pressed on me with fervor and eloquence, as incentives to earnest and careful investigation of the important questions at issue; they have been felt and weighed by me; but as appeals or motives for relief they belong to a wholly different forum from that which administers the laws, but has no power to modify them to meet the public wants or wishes. I am not insensible of the disappointment which this decision will give to a number of suitors in the courts of my district. An impression has been widely disseminated that the late act of congress would have the effect of giving validity to the homestead provision in the form and language in which it stands in the constitution. This was a vague and loose impression, arising from a cursory examination of the question, rather than from a close legal scrutiny which it demands for a satisfactory solution. Unfortunately, the press of the state has given currency to this impression. Without exerting its influence to prepare the public mind to await with serenity the judicial decision that, in the nature of things, could not long be delayed, some, without thought or inquiry, have hastened to predicate, on wholly insufficient data, their confident prophecies of a decision favorable to their views or interests; while another paper at the seat of government, with metropolitan influence and circulation, has not hesitated to seize with impatience these unauthorized rumors and speculations, and, in spite of all precedent and all decency, in the spirit of depraved journalism, and through a prurient taste for partisan detraction, has made them the occasion and the means of misleading and irritating the public mind, by falsely assuming what would be the decision of this court, and thus contemptuously arraigning and discrediting it in advance before the public. As but little credit is given now-a-days to newspaper editorials or correspondence, so that the sensitive man incurs the risk of being laughed at for his folly in seeking to correct them, nevertheless I used every precaution through proper channels to correct false ideas, to secure for myself time for deliberation, and stay the public judgment till it might receive with candor the formal adjudication, under the sanction of legal proceedings and observances. If the public mind is no longer in that state of equanimity which is desirable for the calm consideration of this question, I am in nowise responsible for its disturbance, and so far as I am personally concerned by these strictures of the press, I may be pardoned for indulging the humble hope that I may be able to live above them and be unaffected by them, in the opinion of capable and impartial men, whose judgment alone is of value to me. I do not suppose this is an occasion where one is likely to be betrayed by his feelings. It is a mistake to suppose, as a general thing, that our people can be divided into two distinctive classes of creditors and debtors. It was well said, by one of the counsel for defendants to these motions, that these attributes were usually interchangeably combined in the same individual, so that the embarrassed debtor, upon getting his legal dues, might either emerge from his class into the other, or else might at least escape the necessity of becoming a petitioner in bankruptcy. But were it otherwise, and were the case a clearer one for the sway of private sympathies and inclinations, all must feel and admit that they cannot intrude on this bench, and must yield here to the convictions of reason and judgment, matured by anxious reflections and able arguments. But the claimant of the homestead must remember he now obtains all that the constitution of the United States allows him, and even that may be jeopardized if the opposite doctrine should prevail, so that the state in some future convention might enact a retrospective repeal of it, with the same propriety with which it sought to interpret the original enactment as retrospective. In this way present losses are often compensated in the view of considerate sufferers by the greater and pervading good of adhering to the laws as interpreted by their constitutional expounders upon enduring principles, sanctioned by the wisdom and fortified by the experience of mankind in all ages and nations. There still remains the right of homestead—prospective in character, and good against all debts contracted after knowledge and upon the faith of it; but no homestead under the sting and reproach of vacating contracts made without notice of it. In the responsibility I bear and feel upon this occasion, I felicitate myself in the fact, that if I have erred in my judgment, the error admits, in a summary way, and with inconsiderable costs, of speedy correction by a superior tribunal. The counsel in these cases will be pleased to hand me sketches of decrees in conformity with this opinion.]³

Case No. 18,113.

WYMAN v. BABCOCK.

[2 Curt. 386.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1855.²

ABSOLUTE DEED AS MORTGAGE—ORAL EVIDENCE—DENIALS IN ANSWER—EQUITY OF REDEMPTION—PRESUMPTION OF RELEASE—LAPSE OF TIME—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST.

1. A deed, absolute in form, may be shown to have been really a mortgage, by the oral testimony of two witnesses, against the denials of the answer, where those denials are not satisfactory in themselves, and are accompanied with admissions that some confidential relations existed between the parties, not consistent with the terms of the deed. The statutes of Massachusetts, as to the foreclosure of mortgages, apply only to legal mortgages.

[Cited in Newton v. Fay, 10 Allen, 509; Campbell v. Dearborn, 109 Mass. 139.]

2. The presumption that an equity of redemption is released after twenty years' possession by a mortgagee, does not apply to a case where the mortgagee was in possession under an absolute deed, with an agreement that the mortgagor might redeem when he found it convenient, no specific time being fixed, and the mortgagee had no notice or request to redeem. And if, in such case, the mortgagee sells the land to a bona fide purchaser, and so destroys the equity of redemption, a court of equity treats him as a constructive trustee, so the trust is not barred till the expiration of six years from the discovery of the right to an account.

In equity.

S. Bartlett and S. Ames, for complainant.
C. G. Loring and Wm. Dean, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a suit in equity by Edward Wyman, a citizen of the state of Missouri, as assignee of Nehemiah Wyman, his father, against Archibald Babcock, a citizen of the state of Massachusetts. The bill states that, on the 20th day of November, 1828, Nehemiah Wyman was seized of a tract of land in Charlestown, containing about eleven acres and a half; that about one acre of this land had been sold and conveyed by him to James Foster, who, having mortgaged it back to secure the payment of the consideration money, Nehemiah Wyman had entered for breach of condition, and to foreclose the mortgage; that all but the Foster one was incumbered by two mortgages, both held by the defendant; the first being a mortgage from Nehemiah to Francis Wyman, on which there was then due for principal and interest the sum of $1,487³²/₁₀₀, the defendant, being the executor and trustee under the will of Francis Wyman, in that right holding this mortgage; and the second being a mortgage from Nehemiah to the defendant, nominally to secure the sum of $1,200 and interest, but really to secure the repayment of such sums as might be advanced by the defendant to Nehemiah; and that on this last-mentioned mortgage there was then due, for such advances, the sum of four hundred dollars. The bill further states, that at the same time, Nehemiah also owed to the defendant, personally, eight dollars ¹⁰/₁₀₀, and to him, as agent for the heirs of Nehemiah Wyman, senior, the sum of one hundred and thirty-six dollars ⁷¹/₁₀₀; that Nehemiah was much embarrassed in his affairs, and at the pressing solicitation of the defendant, who was his brother-in-law, and of William Wyman, his brother, he consented to make a deed of the said land, excepting the Foster acre, to the defendant, absolute in form, but intended to stand as security for what Nehemiah thus owed; that the conveyance was made for that purpose only, and the defendant went into possession; that none of the notes held by the defendant were surrendered or cancelled, the same being retained because the land was taken as security only; that the defendant was to have the management of the land and receive the rents and profits, and apply them towards the accruing interest; and if there should be any excess, towards the principal, and that Nehemiah was to have the right to redeem at any time when he should be able to do so. The bill further states, that in 1844 the defendant, without any notice to Nehemiah, of his intention to sell, or to the purchasers, of the nature of his title, sold the land by an absolute title, to bona fide purchasers, without notice; and it prays for an account of the rents and profits while held by the defendant, and of the value of the land when sold, and that after deducting the amount for which the land stood as security, the residue may be paid to the complainant, who alleges himself to be the assignee, by deed, for a valuable consideration, of all Nehemiah's equity in the premises.

Upon this case, an outline of which, as stated in the bill, has thus been given, several questions have been made, and elaborately argued by counsel. The first question which arises is, whether the complainant has made out, in point of fact, that the land was conveyed by way of security as is stated in the bill. The answer denies that it was so conveyed. Two witnesses, Nehemiah Wyman, and his brother William Wyman, testify, directly and positively, in support of the statements made in the bill. Ordinarily, this would be sufficient to control the answer. But there are facts in this case, which require me to examine the credibility of these witnesses, to compare their weight with that due to the answer, and to test both the answer and the proofs by their consistency with facts admitted or clearly proved, and to see how far the one or the other best accords with the surrounding circumstances. Nehemiah Wyman was, until a short time before the bill was filed, the owner of the equity asserted by this suit. He sold and conveyed his interest to his son; this purchase, the son was advised by counsel to make, in order that the father might be a witness. I see no sufficient reason to doubt that it was an actual sale, for a valuable consideration, which divested him of all interest. Nehemiah Wyman says he was not made to enable him to testify. As it appears, the son had communication with the counsel, and the father, who lived in a distant state, does not appear to have done so, perhaps the just conclusion is, that he did not know that was the inducement which led to the purchase by the son. But at all events, his relation to the cause is not that of an unexceptionable witness. William Wyman has acted as the agent of his brother, while he held the claim, and of his nephew since. He has had some difficulty with the defendant, who is the husband of his sister, about an account. It is apparent that his feelings are enlisted in favor of the claim.

Some supposed contradictions and inconsistencies in the testimony of the two witnesses were mentioned at the argument, and have been examined. My judgment is, that considering the lapse of time since the events testified to, and considering the relations of these two witnesses to the controversy, without imputing to either of them any intentional unfairness, I ought not to rest a decree, upon the unaided force of their testimony, against a satisfactory answer directly responsive to the bill. And therefore I must examine the answer, ascertain what are its claims to credence, and see whether it, or the evidence of these witnesses, is most credible in itself, and best consists with the known facts.

The account given in the answer of the purpose and consideration of the deed in question, is as follows:—"That this defendant at the urgent solicitation of the said Nehemiah, consented to accept said conveyance in payment of the sums of money due to him personally, and upon the agreement that if he should be able to realize therefrom in addition enough to pay the sums due to him as executor and trustee, he would pay the same, and upon no other agreement, trust, or confidence whatsoever. This defendant further says, that upon the delivery to him of the said deed, he cancelled the notes of said Nehemiah Wyman, held in his own right, and either surrendered them to him or destroyed them, but that he did not cancel or surrender the notes held by him as executor and trustee, because he was not satisfied that he should realize enough of the said land to pay the same, and that in order to prevent any presumption that he had so agreed absolutely, he made a minute thereon to the effect that he did not guarantee payment thereof; it being the understanding and agreement between him and the said Nehemiah, that if enough was not realized out of said land to pay the whole of said debts, the said Nehemiah should be personally liable therefor, and that this defendant should, if possible, realize enough to pay the same, and should not be under any liability to account with the said Nehemiah for his doings relating thereto."

The first observation which occurs on reading this statement is, that it is not consistent with the deed itself. That declares the consideration to be the sum of two thousand and thirty-three dollars and eighty-seven cents. The answer, in another place, admits that, "the consideration money expressed in the deed was the amount then due to the defendant in his own right and as executor and trustee, and of the further sums of eight dollars ¹⁰/₁₀₀ owed to this defendant, and fifty dollars owed to him as agent for the heirs;" and there is no doubt whatever how the amount expressed in the deed was arrived at, and that it was by a careful computation of the principal and interest due, at the date of the deed, to the defendant in his own right as executor and trustee, for the children of Francis Wyman, and as agent of the heirs of Nehemiah Wyman. If the above statement in the answer is correct, it is difficult to perceive how the debt due to the defendant as executor and trustee, for which the land was already mortgaged, formed any part of the consideration of this deed, or why it was said by the deed to do so; and still less why the amount due to the defendant as agent for the heirs of Nehemiah Wyman, senior, was included in the consideration; for according to the answer, there was no agreement at all concerning the application of the land, or its proceeds, to that debt.

It was suggested by the defendant's counsel that there was a mistake made in drawing the answer, and that instead of speaking of what was due to the defendant as executor and trustee, it should have said as agent. But I must take the answer as it stands. If there was any such mistake, there is an established mode of obtaining leave to correct it, and proper guards and securities are thrown round such applications. Smith v. Babcock [Case No. 13,008]; 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 911. But it cannot be done at the hearing; and requires more than a suggestion of counsel to obtain it, however probably correct that suggestion may be. Besides, if the proposed change were made, it would only increase the difficulty above adverted to; for then it would stand that there was no agreement concerning the greater amount, due to the defendant as executor and trustee, and yet it formed part of the consideration expressed in the deed.

The next circumstance which has attracted my attention is, that this part of the answer declares that the defendant took the land in payment of what was due to himself personally, "and upon the agreement that if he should be able to realize therefrom enough to pay the sums due to him as executor and trustee, he would pay the same." If this were so, then the heirs of Francis Wyman, whom the defendant represented as executor and trustee, acquired an interest in the land, which by the agreement, was to stand as security for the debt due to the defendant as executor and trustee, after enough should be received therefrom to pay his own debt. Yet when the defendant afterwards answered further, in consequence of exceptions to his original answer, in speaking of the proceeds of the sales of the land, he says, that he paid the two thousand dollars received of Hall, (one of the purchasers,) to said heirs, (of Francis Wyman,) on account of his liability to said heirs as their trustee, and not on account of any right they had to the said land or to the proceeds thereof, and that he used all the said money paid to him, as aforesaid, as his own money, as he had a right to do. As the proceeds of these sales very greatly exceeded what was due to the defendant personally, it is difficult to reconcile this, with the admission in the original answer, that he did agree to appropriate what he should be able to realize from the land, in addition to his own claim, to the payment of the sums due to him as executor and trustee; or to see how he could consider that his own money, to be used as he saw fit, which he had agreed to appropriate to pay notes on which Nehemiah Wyman was personally responsible.

There are also some singular incongruities in the defendant's statement of the agreement, in the passage above quoted from the answer. It is, in substance, that the defendant took the land in payment for what was due to him personally, and agreed that if he should be able to realize from the land enough to pay the sums due to him as executor and trustee he would thus pay the same; that Nehemiah was to remain personally liable if the whole of what was due to the defendant as executor and trustee was not paid out of the land; and that the defendant was, if possible, to realize enough to pay the same; but he adds that he was not to be under any liability to account to Nehemiah for his doings relating thereto. How it was to be ascertained, without a sale, whether the defendant could possibly realize from the land more than enough to pay his own debt, and how much more he could so realize; how the obligation to sell and apply the proceeds as stated, can consist with his absolute acquisition of the title in payment of his own debt, and how the agreement to realize enough, if possible, to pay the debt due to him as executor and trustee, could have any efficacy whatever, if, as he declares, he was not to be under any liability to account with Nehemiah for his doings relating thereto, I am not able to perceive.

These particulars in the answer are not matters drawn from collateral statements; they grow out of that part of it which undertakes to set forth the agreement which is in controversy. They affect the substance of the transaction; and I am obliged to conclude that the account which the defendant has given in his answer, of the purpose and consideration of this deed, is not probable in itself, and is scarcely reconcilable with what men of ordinary knowledge of affairs would agree to; for its substance and effect, as stated in the answer, would be, that Nehemiah Wyman conveyed to the defendant, land worth, as the answer admits, $1,900, in payment of a debt of about $400; and though the defendant agreed he would, if possible, pay, out of the land, a debt of upwards of $1,400, for which Nehemiah stood personally liable upon his promissory note, yet the defendant was never to be called to account, and might keep this agreement or not, at his own pleasure.

Such a transaction is not only improbable in itself, but, considering the relations of the parties to it, would be so inequitable, that a court of equity could not allow it to stand. It must be remembered that this land was mortgaged by Nehemiah Wyman by two mortgages; the first held by the defendant as executor and trustee, and the second in his own right; and that both were then payable, and the defendant had power to bring suits on the notes and to enter for condition broken, and to foreclose. Now, according to the answer, the equity of redemption was released for no real consideration whatever; for if we take the debts due to the defendant personally to have been extinguished by this conveyance, while the much larger debt due on the first mortgage was kept alive, what did Nehemiah gain? He parted with land, admitted to be worth $1,900, to pay a debt of $400, leaving himself personally liable for the debt of $1,400, which the defendant might pay out of the land, or not, as he should elect. In Russell v. Southard, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 154, the court had occasion to consider the subject of a release of an equity of redemption by a mortgagor to a mortgagee, and set aside such a release, under circumstances certainly not so inequitable as this answer discloses. For there, the mortgagor simply got nothing for his release; here, according to this answer, he was subjected to a loss of $1,500, at the pleasure of the mortgagee.

Looking further at these statements in the answer, we find the defendant declaring that he did not surrender or cancel the notes held by him as executor and trustee, because Nehemiah was to continue personally liable thereon, but that he did cancel or surrender the notes held by him personally; if so, it would have been consistent with the agreement on which the conveyance was made, as he states it; but the fact does not appear to be so; all the notes remained in his possession, and uncanceled. This is a very significant fact. It is not consistent with the agreement to receive the deed in payment of some of these notes. According to the usual course of dealing among men of common prudence the retention of all these notes is consistent only with the hypothesis that the land was taken as security.

I attach some importance also to the dates of some of these notes. One of them, $486⁷⁰/₁₀₀, is dated November 7th, 1828; and two others, one for eight dollars ¹⁰/₁₀₀, and the other for fifty dollars, are dated November 11, 1828, and all bear interest. It is testified by William Wyman, and there is no evidence to the contrary, and it is in itself probable, that this conveyance was under negotiation for some time. The deed bears date on the 20th of November, 1828. If it was intended it should stand as a security, there was reason for reducing the debts to the permanent form of notes bearing interest, which the defendant could retain, as he in fact did retain them; if it was intended to receive the deed in payment of these debts, it is not probable they would have been put into this form, pending the negotiation.

The defendant's counsel has very forcibly urged the improbability that the defendant, who had security on the land by a second mortgage for his own debt, and also by a first mortgage for the debt due to him as trustee, should have been willing to enter into an arrangement by which payment was so long, and almost indefinitely, postponed. There is much apparent weight in this argument; but it is lessened, on further examination of all the circumstances. Francis Wyman's will was such that, the principal debt was to remain invested, until 1842, and if this was a secure investment, as it is evident it was, its permanence was very desirable. Moreover, as the defendant himself states the transaction, he actually did agree to postpone the payment of that debt to the payment of his own, and to make its payment dependent on what he might realize from the land, at some indefinite time, when he might think it proper to sell. As to his own debt, as well as the debt due to him as a trustee, it must not be forgotten that this was a family arrangement, and that Nehemiah Wyman was poor and embarrassed, and had a large family. The same considerations of a rigid self-interest, which might be safe guides in considering the conduct of mere strangers, may not be so applicable to this case. It is testified by William Wyman that it was understood between the parties that as the defendant was to have the title, and consequently the power to sell, he would not do so without first appraising Nehemiah. This duty would undoubtedly be implied by law if the bill states the contract truly. But in considering whether the defendant would be likely to make the agreement stated in the bill, it should be remembered that it gave him the absolute control over the property, which he probably anticipated he could exert, if it should become necessary for his own protection.

The most material circumstance, in my judgment, in opposition to the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, is the lapse of time. Apart from all technical considerations drawn from statutes of limitation, or rules of law framed for the repose of titles, the lapse of time predisposes every judicial mind to look with disfavor on claims, and on evidence in support of them. I am sensible of having approached this case with such a predisposition. Yet, except when some rule of positive law interposes, or the principles of equity concerning acquiescence afford a bar to a claim, it is necessary to examine carefully the reasons for the delay, and the circumstances under which it has occurred.

I shall have occasion to state some of my views on this subject in speaking hereafter of the statute of limitations. But I may say here, that the witnesses themselves declare that Nehemiah Wyman removed in 1835 to a distant state; that he returned but once to this part of the country, in 1840, four years before the land was sold; that he had no knowledge of the sale of the land till 1851; that though the witness William Wyman knew of the sale of the land soon after it was made, when he spoke to the defendant concerning his brother's rights, the defendant informed him the right was barred by the statute of limitations, and he credited the assertion. These statements are not improbable in themselves, and they go far to explain the silence of these persons. Though I cannot say it is perfectly satisfactory, it is so far sufficient that in considering their evidence upon the main points of the case, I do not think much is to be detracted from its weight, by reason of Nehemiah's having omitted to make earlier claim.

It is further urged that William Wyman, who acted as scrivener in this transaction, was well acquainted with the forms of such business, and that Nehemiah Wyman having executed mortgages previously, must also be supposed to have known that a written defeasance ought to be given, and it is asked, why was it omitted if a mortgage was really intended. The defendant put this same question to Nehemiah Wyman on his cross-examination. He was asked "If there was understood between you and said Babcock any defeasance to the deed of November 20, 1828, why was not said defeasance reduced to writing." His answer is: "It was a confidential transaction between three brothers, and we all well understood the same, and for what intent the deed was made. The deed was intended and understood by us three, to operate as a mortgage, but being a transaction between brothers, we did not think it necessary to be so particular in setting forth the rights of the respective parties, never anticipating that there would be any difficulty in a settlement between Mr. Babcock and myself." There is a fact in the case which strongly corroborates this statement, that a defeasance was omitted upon a mutual confidence then subsisting between these parties. In April, 1826, Nehemiah Wyman executed a mortgage to the defendant to secure a negotiable note for twelve hundred dollars, payable in one year from its date, with interest. The real object was to secure future advances. These papers having been prepared by Mr. Tufts, a lawyer, he drew up a memorandum, declaring the object of the mortgage, and the defendant signed it, yet it appears never to have been delivered to the mortgagor and was found by William Wyman, who produced it, in the possession of the defendant.

In respect to the value of the land at the time of the conveyance, I do not perceive how I can avoid the conclusion, that it exceeded considerably, the consideration alleged by the defendant to have been paid for it. It had been purchased by Nehemiah, at an auction sale of his deceased father's estate, eight years before, for $2,272 ⁵⁰/₁₀₀, and the fences had been in part built anew. Three years previous, (in 1825,) one acre had been sold to Foster for $600. There is some evidence tending to show, that in 1830, the defendant, with the concurrence of William Wyman, offered to sell the land at $200 per acre; but this was when real property was much depressed in value. Both the plaintiff's witnesses testify that they believed the land of much greater value than the consideration mentioned in the deed. This is matter of opinion, but the defendant produces no witness who expresses a different opinion.

I have stated, in some detail, the views I have taken of the principal points involved in this question of fact, because I think it due to the parties that I should do so. The results at which I have arrived are, that the account given of the transaction in the answer, is so unsatisfactory, and the positive evidence of two competent witnesses is so far corroborated by circumstances, that I consider the answer overborne by their testimony, and that the allegation of the bill, that the conveyance of November, 1828, was made only as security, and not as an absolute sale of the land, is made out in proof.

The next question is, whether this oral evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that a deed absolute on its face, was intended as a mortgage, and that the defeasance was omitted from mutual confidence between the parties. This question has been elaborately and learnedly argued by the defendant's counsel. I consider it to be settled by authority, which in this court is decisive. In Taylor v. Luther [Case No. 13,796] the precise question arose. It was a bill to have a deed absolute on its face, declared to be a mortgage by force of a defeasance, which the bill alleges was by parol. The defendant denied that the conveyance was intended as a mortgage, and set up the statute of frauds. The complainant relied by the bill, solely on a parol agreement for his right of redemption. Mr. Justice Story, after stating the rule, laid down by numerous authorities, that parol evidence is admissible to show that an absolute deed was intended as a mortgage, and that the defeasance had been omitted, or destroyed, by fraud or mistake, adds: "It is the same, if omitted by design, upon mutual confidence between the parties,"—and he proceeds to state the reasons, and made a decree resting on parol evidence only. In Jenkins v. Eldredge [Id. 7,266], he reaffirmed the same position. The cases of Conway v. Alexan- der, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 238; Spriggs v. Bank of Mount Pleasant, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 201; Morris v. Nixon, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 126; and Russell v. Southard, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 139, fully support the doctrine upon which Mr. Justice Story decided Taylor v. Luther [supra]. In Russell v. Southard this question was elaborately argued, and the authorities were examined, and carefully considered by the supreme court. It is true a memorandum in writing was given in that case; but the memorandum disproved the allegation that the conveyance was a mortgage; parol evidence was admitted to control that memorandum, and to prove that it did not show the actual transaction; and a decree was made, declaring the conveyance to be a mortgage, by force of the parol evidence only. It was there stated to be the doctrine of the court "that when it is alleged and proved that a loan on security was intended, and the defendant sets up the loan as a payment of purchase-money, and the conveyance as a sale, both fraud and device in the consideration are sufficiently averred and proved to require a court of equity to hold the transaction to be a mortgage." My opinion is, that the statute of frauds does not afford a bar to the admission of the parol evidence in this case.

The remaining questions respect the effect of the statute of limitations, and the foreclosure of the mortgage. The statutes of Massachusetts concerning the foreclosure of mortgages can have no direct operation on the case, because they include only legal mortgages; and no indirect effect by affording an analogy to be followed by a court of equity, if for no other reason, because there was no entry by this mortgage after condition broken, and no entry before, and holding after condition broken, with notice of an intention to foreclose, as is required by the law of this state. The case must be considered, therefore, under the rules which equity has prescribed, concerning the duration of an equity of redemption, and also for limiting the other peculiar rights which belong to the complainant. In Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 497, the rule is thus laid down: "In the case of a mortgagor coming to redeem, the courts of equity have, by analogy to the statute of limitations, which takes away the right of entry of the plaintiff after twenty years adverse possession, fixed upon that as the period after forfeiture and possession taken by the mortgagee, no interest having been paid in the mean time, and no circumstances to account for the neglect appearing, beyond which a right of redemption shall not be favored." And this rule is amply supported by authority. † Kent, Comm. 291, and cases there referred to; Dexter v. Arnold [Case No. 3,859], and cases in the notes. This bar is founded on the presumption of a release by the mortgagor, drawn from his neglect to redeem after forfeiture. It is plain that it can have no application to a case where there has been no breach of condition, and nothing which can be attributed to the mortgagor as neglect.

In the case at bar no time was fixed by the parties, after which the condition could be considered broken, and the right to have the foreclosure by lapse of time begin. The agreement charged and proved is, that the mortgagee was to take possession, apply the rents and profits to keep down the interest, and the residue towards the payment of the principal, and that the mortgagor might redeem at any time. Whether upon an application by the mortgagees to a court of equity upon a bill to foreclose the mortgage, this right to redeem at any time, would not have been construed to mean at any reasonable time, and whether after the lapse of such time, the court would not have lent its aid to foreclose, need not be determined, though I should apprehend there could be little doubt respecting it. But mere lapse of time, unaided by any request to the mortgagor to redeem, or any notice to him that the mortgagee considered him in default, and was holding to foreclose, cannot, in this case, bar the right. I should have no difficulty in so holding upon principle, but I consider the position supported by authority. White v. Pigion, Toth. 135; Palmer v. Jackson, 5 Brown, Parl. Cas. 281; Orde v. Heming, 1 Vern. 418; Yates v. Hambly, 2 Atk. 359. It was argued that these authorities are not applicable because, in this case, the debts secured by the mortgage were all payable, and an action might have been brought at any time against the mortgagor and he forced to pay, and that the right thus to sue him personally, is not even alleged by the bill to have been waived or suspended. This does not make a distinction satisfactory to my mind. Every mortgagor who signs a bond or promissory note, and secures its payment by a mortgage, is liable to an action upon it in personam, the moment it becomes payable; and so far as the process of the law may be effectual for that purpose, may be forced at once to pay the debt, and thus to redeem the land. But all this stands with an ordinary equity of redemption. Why not with this equity? On the other hand, the personal claim of the mortgagee may be barred by the statute of limitations, for six years, while his right as mortgagee remains good fourteen years longer. I think the correct doctrine was stated in Coggswell v. Warren [Case No. 2,958].

There is another point of view in which I think it is not possible to sustain the bar, and which I consider presents the case in its true light. The mortgagee entered in 1828, and he sold the land in 1844, to bona fide purchasers without notice, who undoubtedly acquired an absolute title to the lands. In other words, the mortgagor's right of redemption was effectually destroyed by the mortgagee, when he had held only sixteen years. and while that right of redemption was, consequently, still subsisting. This act of the mortgagee was done without notice to the mortgagor, as is admitted in the answer. Such a sale was a constructive fraud on the rights of the mortgagor, and turned his right to redeem into a claim against the mortgagee personally, for an account of the value of the land, and of the rents and profits. Now the limitation of such claims in equity is, six years after the discovery of the fraud by the aggrieved party. Here the bill charges a studious concealment of the sale by this mortgagee, and that the mortgagor had no notice of the sale, and that he was in a distant state. The answer admits, that the defendant dealt with the land as his own; and though it denies intentional concealment, says, no notice of the sale was given to the mortgagee. The proof shows that the mortgagee first discovered the sale in 1851, and accounts reasonably for his ignorance, and for the discovery. It may be, that if the possession of the mortgagee and those claiming under him, and the neglect of the mortgagor was such as to bar a claim to redeem, it would also bar a claim for an account for a constructive fraud, in destroying his right of redemption. But as the circumstances of this case would not, in my judgment, allow the mortgagee to set up his possession, if it had lasted more than twenty years, as a bar to a claim for redemption, and as six years have not elapsed since the discovery of the claim for an account on the ground of a constructive fraud, I do not consider the statute of limitations, or any analogy drawn from it by courts of equity, affords a bar to this bill.

My attention has been attracted to a point not insisted on at the bar, concerning the right of the complainant to maintain this bill. If it were not for the relation subsisting between the parties to the sale of the right in question, there might be some difficulty in maintaining it. Though the doctrine held by Mr. Justice Story on this subject would seem to be broad enough to cover such a purchase by a mere stranger. Gordon v. Lewis [Case No. 5,613]; Baker v. Whiting [Id. 787]. But the case of father and son has always afforded an exception to the general rules concerning champerty, and there seems to be nothing in the nature of the interest sold, which would on any other ground, preclude a court of equity from recognizing the title of the assignee. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1049.

Let a decree be entered declaring the conveyance of November, 1828, to have been a mortgage to secure the debts, the amount whereof is named in the consideration of the deed, and that at the times of the sales of the land by the defendant, the complainant's assignor had right to redeem the same,—that the absolute sales and conveyances of the land to bona fide purchasers for valuable considerations, without notice, was a constructive fraud upon the rights of the complainant's assignor,—that thereupon he became entitled, as against the defendant personally, to an account of the then value of the land, and of the rents and profits, and (after deducting the amount due to the defendant for principal and interest) to the payment of the balance, and that the complainant, as assignee, has succeeded to those rights; and let the cause be referred to a master to take the necessary accounts.

[On appeal to the supreme court, the above decree was affirmed. 19 How. (60 U. S.) 289.]

Case No. 18,114.

WYMAN et al. v. FOWLER.

[3 McLean, 467.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. Oct. Term, 1844.

DECLARATION IN ASSUMPSIT—SURPLUSAGE.

1. If a count in a declaration contains sufficient averments, surplusage will not vitiate it.

2. Goods received, which are to be sold at certain prices, or the goods returned on demand; if sold, and the money received, no special demand need be alleged.

3. If the action were for a failure to return the goods, a special demand necessary.

At law.

Mr. Howard, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Frazer, for defendant.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This is an action of assumpsit. The defendant demurs to the seventh and eighth counts in the declaration. The seventh count charges that the plaintiffs agreed to deliver to the defendant, "a certain quantity of goods and merchandise, described in certain invoices, amounting to the sum of nine hundred and twenty dollars and forty-seven cents, on consignment, on terms that the defendant should account for all articles sold at prices named in said invoices, or to return and redeliver said goods to the plaintiffs, when demanded by the plaintiffs, without commissions." The goods were delivered to the defendant, and the declaration avers, that they were sold on the 1st of August, 1842, at the prices named in the invoices, and that the sum of nine hundred and twenty dollars and forty-seven cents, was received by the defendant. The breach alleges, that the money has not been paid nor the goods returned.

The following grounds of demurrer are assigned:

1. "No averment that the defendant had made collections from the sale of the goods." The declaration states, that the goods had been sold for the prices stated in the invoices, and the money received; consequently, there was no necessity for the above averment.

2. "That no special demand or request was made to account with plaintiffs for said goods or their avails." Had the goods not been sold, and the action were brought for a failure to return them, a special demand must have been averred, as by the contract the goods were to be returned on demand being made. But the sale of the goods, as averred, rendered this demand unnecessary. The goods having been sold, could not be returned. The general request is sufficient for the money received.

3. "No substantial cause of action, promise or undertaking, set forth in this count on the part of the defendant; and the breach in the declaration is insufficient, and not coextensive with the alleged agreement." There is a cause of action in the delivery of the goods for sale, and an allegation of their sale, at the prices agreed upon, and the receipt of the money. The breach alleges the non-payment of the money, or the return of the goods. As the goods were sold, it was not necessary to allege in the declaration that they were not returned. And this part of the breach may be considered as surplusage, and be disregarded. The other breach covered the contract, by averring that the defendant had not done that which, by the contract, he was bound to do.

4. That the bills referred to in the count are not set forth, nor the particular goods sold. In this respect, the count is not defective. A general description is sufficient. There is unnecessary verbiage in the count, but there is enough in it to sustain the action.

The eighth count is for an invoice of goods sold, amounting to the sum of four hundred and seventy-one dollars and thirty-four cents, delivered to the defendant on the same terms as stated in the seventh count. And as the eighth count is similar to the seventh, and the grounds of demurrer substantially the same as the above, they will not be further examined. The demurrer to both counts is overruled.

Case No. 18,115.

WYMAN et al. v. RUSSELL et al.

[4 Biss. 307.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. Feb., 1869.

FORECLOSURE—LIMITATION—SALE UNDER ATTACHMENT—RECORDING MORTGAGE—EFFECT OF EXTENSION ON NOTE—PARTIES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. As a general rule, mortgages cannot be foreclosed after the lapse of twenty years from the date when the cause of action accrued.

2. Under the statutes of Indiana of 1838, in a proceeding in foreign attachment where there was only constructive notice to the defendant, and where he did not appear to the action, no personal judgment could be rendered against him. In such a case, the judgment should have been simply for a sale of the property attached. And the only writ that could issue on such a judgment was a venditioni exponas. A sale on a fieri facias issued on such a judgment is void.

3. Under the Indiana Code of 1838, a neglect to record a mortgage within the prescribed time did not invalidate it, except as to a subsequent bona fide purchaser or mortgagee whose deed or mortgage was first recorded.

4. A mortgage was made in 1838, to secure notes which on their face all fell due in nine months thereafter. A suit to foreclose this mortgage was commenced in 1860. On each note the mortgagees indorsed an agreement to delay the collection of the notes for three years from the date of the mortgage. But these indorsements were not referred to in the mortgage, nor recorded. Quære, did this engagement thus indorsed on the notes, as between the mortgagee and innocent purchaser, take the case out of the operation of the Indiana statute of limitation of twenty years?

5. In a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage, all persons holding the equity of redemption of the lands or any part thereof must be made parties.

6. In a suit by assignees of a note and mortgage, if the assignment is denied it must be proved.

In equity.

Porter, Harrison & Fishback, for complainants.

M. M. Milford and McDonald & Roach, for defendants.

MCDONALD, District Judge. On the 11th of September, 1860, the complainants, [Leander] Wyman and [Ephraim] Mariner, filed their bill in this case against the defendants, Samuel J. Russell and Lucy his wife, Erastus Bond and Mary his wife, Charles W. Thomas and Elizabeth his wife, Benjamin Loboek and Mary Ann his wife, Samuel Finny and Elizabeth his wife, Joseph Pool and Rachel his wife, Samuel Haller and Sarah his wife, David Neal and Lucinda his wife, Isaac Coleman and Rachel his wife, Jonathan Shideler and Sarah C. his wife, and Othniel Williams. The bill charges that in 1838, the defendants, Russell and Gilbert, partners, executed to Rayner and Pond of New York three notes, payable respectively in five, seven, and nine months, in the aggregate sum of two thousand seven hundred and fifty-three dollars and sixty-five cents, which have never been paid; that to secure the payment of these notes at the end of three years, Russell and wife, on the 13th of April, 1838, executed a mortgage to Rayner and Pond on divers designated tracts of land in Fountain county, Indiana, and on certain lots in the city of Milwaukee, which was recorded in Fountain county, Indiana, in 1841; that afterwards Rayner and Pond assigned the notes and mortgage to one Eldred, who, on the 11th of July, 1860, assigned them to the complainants; that no proceedings have ever before been instituted to collect them; that the defendants, Bond and wife, Thomas and wife, Finny and wife, Loboek and wife, Pool and wife, Haller and wife, Neal and wife, Coleman and wife, and Shideler and wife, "have, or claim to have, some interest in said mortgaged premises, as purchasers, incumbrancers, or otherwise; but such interest, if any, is subsequent to the mortgage."

The bill prays a foreclosure of the mortgage.

Bond and wife, and Thomas and wife, Finny and wife, Loboek and wife, and Shideler and wife have filed a joint answer to the bill. It substantially denies the material allegations of the bill. These defendants, in this answer claim title to separate portions of the land in Fountain county. And they aver that, on the 28th of April, 1838, in the Fountain circuit court, Isaac Coleman and Samuel Coleman commenced a proceeding in foreign attachment against said Samuel Russell, and one John F. Russell, William E. Russell, Henry Russell, Othniel Gilbert, James B. Stewart, John Pierson, James Smith, Joseph Wright, and David K. Knight; that the writ of foreign attachment in that case was on the same day levied on said lands in said county; that in September, 1839, said court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in that proceeding for one hundred and twenty dollars and twelve cents, and costs; that thereupon an execution on that judgment was issued to the proper sheriff, commanding him to sell the attached lands; and on the 14th of December, 1839, the sheriff sold the same on that execution to said Isaac Coleman and Samuel Coleman for one hundred dollars; that on the 3d of September, 1844, the sheriff made to the purchasers the proper deed on said sale, who on the 12th of May, 1845, conveyed the same lands to one William Baldwin, Elias Butler, and Lewis C. Wilson for one thousand six hundred and forty-eight dollars, "under whom these defendants hold, and claim title, to said lands as innocent purchasers for valuable consideration"; that the notes in question, as they appear in the record of the mortgage, were due more than twenty years before the commencement of this suit, and therefore these defendants plead the statute of limitations; and that all the persons under whom these respondents hold said lands were, equally with the defendants, innocent purchasers, and together with them have, ever since the 14th of December, 1839, been in the quiet possession of these lands, and have made valuable improvements on them, without the assertion of any claim to them under the mortgage, and therefore the defendants insist that the complainants' claim is stale and inequitable, and should not be allowed. To this answer there is a general replication. The defendant, Russell, has filed an answer admitting the facts stated in the bill.

The cause is now submitted for final decree on the bill, answers, exhibits, and evidence. The mortgage and notes are in evidence; and in all respects the bill describes them correctly. The mortgage appears to have been acknowledged December 9, 1838, and recorded in Fountain county, April 5, 1841. On the back of each of the notes, there is the following indorsement: "For value received, we hereby agree to defer the payment of the within note three years from this date, interest being paid annually. Dated April 13, 1838. Rayner & Bond." But these indorsements, though of the same date as the mortgage, are not referred to in it, nor recorded. The defendants produce in evidence an authenticated transcript of the attachment proceedings referred to in their answer. And it proves substantially the averments in the answer relating to those proceedings. By this transcript it appears that the Fountain circuit court ordered a sale of the attached lands. But neither the writ under which the sale was effected, nor the sheriff's return thereto, appears in the transcript. The clerk who made the transcript, however, certifies thus: "Which said execution and return appear to have been lost—which said execution by the records of the court was issued for said sum of one hundred dollars and twelve cents, and fifteen dollars and ninety-eight cents, costs accrued." The sheriff's deed to the purchasers under his said sale is also in evidence. It is dated September 3, 1844. After reciting the judgment in attachment, as above stated, this deed says that a writ on said judgment was issued to the sheriff commanding him that, "of the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of the" defendants in the attachment suit, "found in his bailiwick he should cause to be made the judgment," &c. Thus the deed describes a feri facias, and not a venditioni exponas. Indeed, this conveyance and the transcript taken together plainly indicate that the writ was a common feri facias. Moreover, this deed makes no reference to the writ of foreign attachment; and by its terms it would seem that the lands were sold in solido, and not in parcels.

The respondents, by divers deeds of conveyance, unnecessary to be here particularly noted, prove a chain of title from the purchasers at the sheriff's sale down to them. And I see no defect in this chain of title if the first link in it—the sheriff's deed—is valid. Still, allowing for the present that it is, the question would remain, which lien should prevail, that of the attachment proceeding or that of the mortgage? The mortgage was executed on the 13th of April, 1838; and the suit in foreign attachment was commenced April 28, 1838. The mortgage lien was therefore the older.

But was this older lien defeated by the failure to record the mortgage till April 5, 1841? At that time, the Indiana statute provided that mortgages should be "recorded within ninety days after the execution thereof;" and, if not so recorded, that they should "be adjudged fraudulent and void against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for valuable consideration" unless such mortgage should "be recorded before the proving and recording of the deed under which such subsequent purchaser or mortgagee may claim." Code 1838, 312. Now, the mortgage in question was recorded before the sheriff's deed was executed.

It is plain, therefore, that the omission to record the mortgage till 1841 would not, under this statute, defeat its priority over a sheriff's deed which was executed in 1841. Therefore the neglect to record the mortgage in time is of no avail to the defendants.

But, even if the sheriff's deed had been recorded before the mortgage was, it could not defeat the mortgage, unless it was a valid deed. To make it such, it must be supported by a valid judgment and a valid execution. Armstrong v. Jackson, 1 Blackf. 210.

In this case, there was a valid judgment. The transcript, indeed, shows that there was a personal judgment for one hundred and twenty dollars and twelve cents; and this was undoubtedly void; because it was rendered in a proceeding in foreign attachment, by default on a mere newspaper notice, against defendants who were not residents of the state, and who never appeared to the action. But another portion of that judgment is valid, namely, so much of it as ordered a sale of the lands which were attached. On this order a proper writ might undoubtedly have been issued. But what was the proper writ? certainly not a fieri facias. Beyond question, the only proper writ was a venditioni exponas. Was the writ on which the sheriff made the sale in question a venditioni exponas? Unfortunately the writ is lost. But the sheriff's deed describes no such a writ. As we have already seen, both it and the transcript describe a fieri facias. And an agreement between the parties on file admits that "said writ and sheriff's return thereof are substantially in accordance with the facts recited in the deed." According to this the sale was made under a fieri facias; and it was therefore void; and the deed was and is consequently void.

But, though the respondents are not entitled to claim anything under the sheriff's deed, still is not the staleness of the complainants' demand such that a court of equity ought not to decree in their favor?

The mortgage was executed April 13, 1838. On its face, it purports to have been made to secure three notes then existing, and falling due respectively in five, seven, and nine months. On the face of the mortgage, therefore, it would seem that all these notes were due on the 13th of January, 1839. The bill was filed September 11, 1860, more than twenty-one years after the debt was due. To meet this difficulty, the complainants insist that, by the indorsements on the notes already referred to, they really did not fall due till the end of three years after the execution of the mortgage; and therefore the statute of limitations did not begin to run against their claim till January 13, 1842. Possibly this fact saves the case from the operation of the statute of limitations; though I doubt it. Perhaps it might as between the holders of the mortgage and the makers of it; but it is more questionable as between the holders and the respondents, who were ignorant of the agreement to extend the time of the payment of the notes, and who appear by the evidence to have purchased the land in good faith, and to have been long in quiet possession of it and made valuable improvements on it. However, in 1860, under my predecessor in office, so much of the answer as sets up as a defense the lapse of time was excepted to by the complainants as being an improper way of setting up the bar of the statute of limitations. The judge then sustained the exception and ordered the part of the answer thus excepted to be stricken out. It has not indeed been expunged; but I think I must not regard it as a part of the answer. But this is not very important in view of other points hereafter to be considered.

It is in evidence that the lands in question, since the mortgage was made and before the commencement of this suit, have passed through many hands, been subdivided into small lots, and sold to divers purchasers, who for many years past have occupied them as their own and improved them; and that several of these purchasers, though within the jurisdiction of this court, have not been made parties to this suit. Certainly they are necessary parties. And till they are made parties the complainants cannot have a decree of foreclosure. In such a case, the court might indeed order the case to stand over till all the necessary parties are brought in. But, as no motion to that effect has been made, and as there is a fatal objection to a decree for the complainants resting on the insufficiency of the evidence, I will not of my own motion make such an order.

The complainants sue as assignees of the notes and mortgage in question. The answer denies the assignments of them. Under these circumstances the burden devolved on the complainants to prove the assignments as alleged in the bill. On this point there is no evidence whatever. And this circumstance is fatal to a recovery by the complainants. The bill is dismissed without prejudice at the complainants' costs.

NOTE. Where creditors have allowed the statute to run against their debts, it runs also against the security for the debt; and where the creditors for whose benefit an assignment was made delay asserting any claim to the trust funds until the debts intended to be secured are barred by the statute, it becomes the duty of the trustee, after such lapse of time, to refuse to pay the debts, and a court of equity will refuse to enforce the trust. Gibson v. Rees, 50 Ill. 384.

For the general statement of the doctrines of limitations to mortgages, consult 2 Washb. Real Prop. (3d Ed.) 174. The purchaser from a mortgagor may avail himself of the statute in the same manner as the mortgagor might have done. McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 495; Coster v. Brown, 23 Cal. 142; Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482. The period from which the statute begins to run is the breach of the condition of the mortgage. Rodman v. Hedden, 10 Wend. 498; Powell v. Smith, 8 Johns. 249; Odlin v. Greenleaf, 3 N. H. 270.

In case of judgment by default, only constructive notice being had on the defendant, the property attached is alone liable. Conn v. Caldwell, 1 Gilman, 531; Boswell v. Dickerson [Case

No. 1,683]. And a special execution will, in Illinois, issue for the sale of the attached property. But if the defendant appear or is served, the judgment is in personam, and the plaintiff can have an execution generally and also a special one for the sale of the property. Conn v. Caldwell, supra. The general rule is that all persons interested in the mortgaged property, are necessary parties to a suit of foreclosure, and this includes all entitled to redeem. 1 Daniell, Ch. Pl. & Prac. 212 et seq.

At common law an indorsee of a promissory note is bound to prove the indorsement in the ordinary mode like any other handwriting, and that it was made by the person by whom it purports to have been made, and when the indorsement is special, that the indorsee is the person described in it. 3 Phil. Ev. 189. And in Illinois, where by statute the assignee in an action upon an assignable instrument is not bound to prove the assignment or signature unless they are put in issue by a verified plea, the statute is held to apply only to cases where the declaration is upon the instrument. When it is offered in evidence under the common counts the common law rule still obtains. Hall v. Freeman, 59 Ill. 54.

APPLICATION FOR INJUNCTION—NOTICE—DEFENCES AT LAW—ENJOINING JUDGMENT AT LAW—NEGLIGENCE OF ATTORNEY.

1. Notice should be given to the adverse party or his attorney, of the time and place for moving for an injunction.

2. If a defendant omits to make his defence at law, equity will not afford him relief on the same grounds.

3. Mere negligence in an attorney, unaccompanied by fraudulent combination or connivance, is not sufficient to arrest a judgment at law.

[Cited in Rogers v. Parker, Case No. 12,018; Downs v. Allen, 22 Fed. 810.]

Application for injunction on bill in chancery, to the Hon. PETER V. DANIEL, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, at chambers, in Washington City. The bill alleged, that on the 22d April, 1854, Samuel S. Wilson, son of James H. Wilson, recovered judgment for two thousand nine hundred eighty dollars and forty-six cents; that on 10th of June, 1854, execution issued on the judgment, that the marshal levied on certain slaves; that the complainant [William Wynn] gave a delivery bond, which had been forfeited, and that execution was about to be issued thereon, unless prevented; that the judgment was rendered on two notes, assigned by James H. Wilson to his son, Samuel S. Wilson; that these notes, in an arrangement and compromise between the complainant and said James H. Wilson, had been paid and satisfied before the assignment, but were not delivered up; that complainant employed counsel to defend the suit, but such counsel failed to make defence, and judgment was rendered against him by default; that at the time of the rendition of said judgment and suing out process thereon, the plaintiff was dead, and the process of the court thus abused, and praying for injunction and general relief. No notice was given of the intended application for an injunction. The bill was duly verified.

A. Pike and E. Cummins, for complainant.

George C. Watkins and George A. Gallagher, for defendants.

DANIEL, Circuit Justice. 1. By the act of congress of 1793, § 5 (1 Stat. 334), it is declared that no writ of injunction shall be granted in any case, without notice to the adverse party or to his attorney, of the time and place of suing for the same. And this provision has been sanctioned as long since as the case of New York v. Connecticut, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 1, and applied to injunctions granted by the supreme court, as well as to those that may be granted by a single judge.

2. Again, it is a rule perhaps without an exception, that whenever a defendant, in a suit at law, is possessed of a defence of which he may avail himself in the action, he cannot, after waiving or omitting that defence, invoke the aid of a court of equity for relief, upon the same ground, nor upon any others which he might have asserted at law.

3. It is believed that mere negligence of an attorney, unaccompanied by fraudulent combination or connivance, has never been deemed a sufficient reason for equitable interposition to arrest a judgment at law. If the judgment in question was in truth obtained in behalf of a man who was dead at the time, that judgment is merely void, and may be quashed by summary proceedings, upon notice and proofs, by which all acts in virtue of a judgment ipso facto void, would fall to the ground. If the death of the plaintiff at law was known to his attorney, or the officer of the court when entering that judgment, or when suing out process therefor, such acts would constitute an abuse of the authority of the court such as should be strongly disapproved and promptly set aside. They could create no rights in the plaintiff's representative, nor in any person pretending to claim under the judgment.

Upon the principles herein stated, the injunction prayed for in this case, as made by the bill, must be denied.

The application was renewed at the April term of the circuit court, 1855, before the same judge. RINGO, District Judge, having been of counsel did not sit, and notice of the application was waived. It was now stated and shown in the bill that the assignment of the notes to the plaintiff, in the suit at law, was fraudulent, and done to enable the said James H. Wilson to cheat and defraud complainant; and the particular facts constituting the fraud were set out and specified. Upon the second application the injunction was granted, bond and security given and approved, and a writ of injunction ordered to issue, which was done accordingly.

BANKRUPT PROCEEDING—DEED OF TRUST—VALIDITY—CHANGE OF SECURITIES—KNOWLEDGE OF INSOLVENCY ACT OF 1867—TIME OF TAKING EFFECT—LANDLORD'S LIEN.

1. A mortgage or other conveyance made as a security for a debt evidenced by a note or word, will operate as a security for the same continuing debt, though the evidence of it be changed by renewal or otherwise.

2. But if one deed of trust be executed as a substitute for a preceding one, the former will at once cease to have any validity or effect.

3. An assignee takes the property in the same plight in which it was held by the bankrupt when his petition was filed, subject to such liens or incumbrances as would affect it if no adjudication in bankruptcy had taken place; but the assignee represents the rights of creditors as well as the rights of the bankrupt; and any lien or incumbrance which would be void for fraud as against creditors, if no petition had been filed or assignee appointed, will be equally void as against the general creditors represented by the assignee.

4. When the question is as to the effect of a proceeding instituted on the same day on which an act affecting the validity of such proceeding was passed, the precise time at which the act became a law may be properly inquired into.

5. Though the bankrupt act purports to have been approved March 2, 1867, yet, as that day was Saturday, and it did in fact embrace Sunday and Monday, the bankrupt act did not become a law until the latter day.

6. Consequently, a deed of trust which was recorded on March 2, 1867, is not avoided by the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

7. Nothing in the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act affecting a deed, it may well be doubted whether, if the bankrupt act have been approved before the recording of it, its effect would have been altered.

8. It seems that as the Virginia statute against fraudulent conveyances avoids all deeds of trust as to creditors until and except from the time they are duly admitted to record, the assignee in bankruptcy would receive the benefit of that statute, and would take the property free from all claims under such deeds.

[Cited in Curry v. M'Cauley, 11 Fed. 368; Johnson v. Patterson, Case No. 7,403.]

9. It cannot be held that all mortgages or other securities not expressly included in the first clause of the second general proviso in the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act are invalidated by that act. To hold such to be the law would give to the act an ex post facto operation.

10. A deed of trust is made on December 8, 1866, and is recorded March 2, 1867. The recording of the deed can not be held to be an act of bankruptcy, that being altogether the act of the party. So far as the grantor is concerned, whatever consequences flow from his act, must attach to the act of making the deed on December 8, 1866.

11. Nor is it to be regarded as a deed executed on the day of its recordation, and therefore as a deed creating a preference on that day, as against creditors.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Virginia.]

Wynne executed a deed of trust in August, 1866, to secure certain debts due to Enders, Paine & Williams, and this deed was at the time of its execution delivered to the latter, but never recorded by them. Afterwards, in December, 1866, Wynne made another deed for the benefit of the same parties to secure the same debts as were secured by the unrecorded deed of August, which deed was likewise delivered to the qui trusts and held by them until Saturday, March 2, 1867, when it was recorded at their instance at four o'clock p. m. The congress had during the preceding session been considering the bill entitled "An act to provide a uniform system of bankruptcy," and its sittings terminated by law on Monday, March 4, 1867, at noon. It appears from the statutes at large, that the bankrupt bill became a law by approval of the president on Saturday, March 2, 1867, while the official records of the congress shows that the sitting of March 2 extended through Sunday, March 3, until Monday, March 4, at noon, and that the fact of the president's approval of the bill was communicated to the senate after nine forty a. m. Monday. In this state of doubt as to when the law went into operation, Wynne was adjudicated a bankrupt on the petition of Wheelwright, Mudge & Co., on June 8, 1867, and June 10, ten days after, Haxall, the landlord of Wynne, levied a distress by warrant for rent in arrear on the goods on the premises, and on July 18, of the same year, he levied another distress by warrant on the same goods for rent which would become due on January 1, 1868, the law of Virginia allowing distraint for rent whenever due during the current year of the tenancy, under certain circumstances. Whereupon the contention arose between the general creditors who claimed that the Enders, Paine & Williams trust deed was void, being contrary to the provisions of the bankrupt law, and that Haxall could acquire no lien by virtue of a distraint made after the adjudication of bankruptcy, and consequently, as they asserted, there being no liens on Wynne's property, it must all be divided equally. The trust deed creditors claimed that they held a lien dating from August, 1866, or at least from December, 1866, and that it could in no wise be affected by the bankruptcy law, for the reason that the deed was valid in itself, and the law was not in fact passed until Monday, March 4, 1867, notwithstanding the official statute book stated that it had passed on Saturday, March 2, and the landlord asserted that his lien for rent by the law of Virginia was prior to all other liens, and that it was as perfect and complete without distraint as with it, and therefore he was entitled to be first paid, even if his distraint was void because made after the adjudication of bankruptcy.

On this state of the case, Johns, the assignee of Wynne, filed his petition in the district court for instructions as to the distribution of the funds in his hands, from whence the cause came up to be heard in this court.

Ould & Carrington, for deed of trust creditors.

John Howard, for general creditors.

Ould & Carrington, for deed of trust creditors.

This case comes before the court on the application of John Johns, Jr., assignee of Charles H. Wynne. In view of the conflicting claims upon the property of the bankrupt, the assignee asks for instructions from the court as to the priorities of the litigating parties. The indebtedness of Wynne, by the deed of the deed of trust creditors, existed as early as August, 1866. In that month a deed of trust was made to secure them, though that deed was never recorded. A subsequent deed was made on December 8, 1866, which was recorded on March 2, 1867. The deed of August, 1866, as well as that of December, 1866, was a preference in favor of certain creditors, which it was competent for Wynne to make, under the well-settled law of Virginia. This is not disputed by the other side. It could not be under the repeated decisions of the courts. Even if the grantor was in failing circumstances or insolvent, such a preference could have been made. But at the time of the deed of August, 1866, no one pretends that Wynne was in failing circumstances or insolvent. His difficulties came upon him after that time. Under the well-settled law of Virginia, the renewal of a note is only an extension of credit for the former debt, and if the first note is secured by a deed of trust, the renewal note is also secured by the same deed, even if there is no express provision as to renewals. See Farmers' Bank v. Mutual Assur. Soc., 4 Leigh, 69. The real date, therefore, of the preference in this case in favor of Enders, Paine & Williams is August, 1866, and not December, 1866. And if the circumstances of the party making the conveyance become a material inquiry in this case, his condition in August would be the test. So if the knowledge of the preferred creditors is a material point, then the information they had in August when they accepted the preference, would be the real subject of inquiry. In other words, the preference in this case was not given in December, 1866, but in the August preceding, and the deed of trust of December was but a continuation and renewal of the preceding preference. The reason why the deed of August was not recorded, and why another deed was prepared and subsequently recorded, is fully explained in the answers of Enders and Paine, and not substantially controverted. According to our view of the case, it is not material whether the preference was made in August or December, as we hold that in either case it was valid. But in some of the aspects presented by the other side, it may become material to determine the true date of the preference, and in that view we insist that the true date is August, 1866. We trust we will subsequently show that a preference does not depend upon an act of recordation, and that it is as fully made without recordation as with it. The answers of the several deed of trust creditors set forth under oath that they had the most perfect faith and confidence in the ability and solvency of said Wynne at the time of execution of the said deeds, and at the time that the deed of December 8 was recorded, and that they were at liberty at any time to record the said deeds. The reasons why the deed was not recorded are set forth. We submit that there is nothing in the proofs in this case to controvert these answers. But we hold that even if this is not the fact, their creditors are entitled to the lien of the conveyance in their favor. If the facts are in accordance with these answers, of course the case is with these deed of trust creditors. The first material inquiry is, whether the deed of December, 1866, is avoided by any provision of the bankrupt act.

We admit that there is one class of conveyances which are avoided by the provisions of the bankrupt law, whether they are made before or after the passage of the bankrupt act. They are those conveyances named in the fourteenth section of that act: "All the property, conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors * * * shall in virtue of the adjudication in bankruptcy, and the appointment of his assignee, be at once vested in such assignee." Judge McDonald, in the case of Bradshaw v. Klein [Case No. 1,790], thus accurately states the law: "On the whole, I conclude that an assignee in bankruptcy may maintain an action to set aside fraudulent conveyances made by the debtor before he is adjudged a bankrupt, and even before the bankrupt act was passed, provided the person to whom the transfer was made was a party to the fraudulent intent, or received the transfer without valuable consideration." But in order to bring the case within this fourteenth section, the conveyance must be fraudulent in fact. A mere preference by an insolvent debtor is not a fraud. It has never been so held. After the passage of the bankrupt act, all such preferences are made illegal and void, it is true, but they have never been held to be fraudulent in fact. Hence Judge McDonald makes it as an essential ingredient of fraudulent conveyances, that there should not only be a fraudulent purpose on the part of the grantor, but that the person to whom the transfer was made was a party to the fraudulent intent, or received the transfer without valuable consideration." Now, there is no pretense that Enders & Co. were parties to any fraudulent intent, or that they received the transfer without valuable consideration. The transaction was the same that at that time was occurring daily in every county in the state to wit, a bona fide indebtedness, and a deed of trust to secure the creditors.

Nor was this deed of trust obnoxious to any other provision of the bankrupt act. The thirty-fifth section only reaches frauds on the bankrupt law, and therefore can only refer to preferences made after the passage of the act. Judge McDonald, in the case already cited, so expressly decides. He says that while the fourteenth section refers to conveyances which are fraudulent under state statutes, and which may therefore extend to acts done before the passage of the bankrupt law, the thirty-fifth section only relates to acts which that section denounces, and that therefore it can only refer to preferences made after the passage of the act. The most cursory reading of the section, must satisfy any one that such is its meaning. The acts denounced are those "made in fraud of the provisions of this act," or done "with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, or to prevent the same from being distributed under this act." How could such phraseology possibly apply to an act done or a conveyance made before the passage of the law? How could a conveyance be made "with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee," before any law was passed authorizing an assignee? How could a conveyance be "made in fraud of the provisions of an act," before that act was passed? How could a conveyance be made "with a view to prevent his property from being distributed under this act," before there were any provisions of law enacted, regulating distribution? Moreover, this thirty-fifth section only makes preferences void, where the creditor has reasonable cause to believe the debtor insolvent. This is utterly denied by the creditors, and is, we submit, not proved by the testimony. But even if this is not so, the case would not be altered. But it is contended that as the deed of trust was recorded on March 2, that being the day of the approval of the bankrupt act, such recordation is within the meaning and scope of the thirty-fifth section. It is alleged that as the act was approved on March 2, 1867, it brings within its scope any and every act done on that day. We will examine this position hereafter in the argument, and at present confine ourselves to the discussion of the very narrow question, whether the recordation on March 2 of a deed previously made, is denounced by the thirty-fifth or any other section of the bankrupt act. The statement of such a position, shows its utter absurdity. The only acts denounced by the thirty-fifth section are attachments, payments, pledges, assignments, transfers, and conveyances. Does the recordation of a security come under either one of these heads? Is it an attachment, or a payment, or a pledge, or an assignment, or a transfer, or a conveyance? Is it even a preference? Certainly not. The preference, the assignment, the transfer, the conveyance, was made in December previous, and as we have before shown, is not within the scope of the thirty-fifth section. In other words, this thirty-fifth section does not impose any penalty upon the recordation of a conveyance, but does impose a penalty upon the making of the conveyance under a given state of facts. Its purpose and intent were to prevent the debtor from making assignments under certain circumstances, from and after the passage of the act. The deed of trust was no more of an assignment or conveyance after it was recorded, than it was before. It was just as much a preference or conveyance on December 3, 1866, as it was on March 3, 1867, after its record. Recording neither makes nor unmakes an instrument. It only renders void certain acts of the debtor, and does not relate to any act to be done by the creditor. If it had been the purpose of congress to render void an act already done—if it had been its intent to prevent a creditor from recording a deed already executed, there would have been some explicit mention of such purpose and intent on the face of the act.

The force of the argument that the thirty-fifth section only refers to the acts of preference on the part of the debtor is so keenly felt, that the opposing counsel have been compelled to take the position that the recording of the deed by the creditor is an act of the debtor. The extraordinary ground is taken that a creditor records a deed given in his favor, by virtue of a verbal irrevocable power of attorney. If this position was correct, it would not meet the case, for the thirty-fifth section not only relates to some acts of the debtor, but particularly specifies what they are. It must be a payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance. If the recording of a deed by a creditor is in law and fact the act of the debtor, is it such a particular act as is named in the section? Is it a payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance? Certainly and clearly not. So that if the opposing counsel were to succeed in maintaining their point, it would amount to nothing, unless they further showed that the act of recording a deed was either a payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance. But it is not true that the act of recording a deed by a creditor is the act of the debtor. The theory of the power of attorney is altogether fanciful. We might with just as much reason and propriety hold that a customer who pays to a merchant ten dollars for a barrel of flour, gives him an irrevocable power of attorney to buy a coat with the money, and that the investment of such sum in that way by the merchant to cover his own back, was the act of the customer. If the gravity of the case will allow the expression, we say that the position is ridiculous. The creditor in such a case is not the agent or attorney of the debtor. The interests of the two parties are adverse, which can never be the case in an agency or attorneyship. If a creditor has not the right to record a deed for his benefit, it is because he has contracted not to do so, and not because he has no such power as the agent or attorney of the grantor. In the present case, the evidence is plenary that the deed of trust creditors had the right to record the deed at any time, and that when they did record it, it was done as their act and not as that of Wynne. In the discussion of this matter we have assumed, for the sake of the argument, that the recordation was after the bankrupt act went into operation. But is such the fact? It is in evidence that the deed was recorded about four o'clock on the afternoon of March 2, 1867. The congressional term expired by limitation of law at high noon on Monday, March 4, 1867. The 3rd was Sunday, dies non. It is well known that under such a state of facts, the president attends the night session of Saturday for the purpose of approving the laws then enacted. We understand that the bankrupt act of 1867, after having been made the subject of conference, passed late on Saturday, and was approved many hours after the time of the recording of Wynne's deed. Nay, it is well known that all laws approved by the president bear date one day before they are announced as approved to the house in which they originated, except in the special case to which we have referred, when the president attends the night session of congress. It is the well-known practice of the presidents to examine ordinary legislation of congress on the night of the day on which the bills are delivered to him, and if they meet his approval to endorse that approval on them, as of the date of that day. They are then regularly on the following day reported to congress, but bear date the preceding day. Probably not one act in a thousand has been endorsed with an approval before four o'clock in the afternoon of the day on which it appears to have been approved. In the light of these facts, we call your honor's attention to In re Richardson [Case No. 11,777]. Mr. Justice Story there held that the time of the day at which an act was approved might be inquired into, and if the fact appeared that a transaction took place before that hour, though on the same day, it was not affected by the act. He further held that if the matter was in doubt, and if it did not affirmatively appear whether the act was approved before the transaction occurred, the actors in the transaction should have the benefit of the doubt.

We now propose to examine this case in the worst possible light for the deed of trust creditors, and will take it as an admission, for the sake of the argument (although the proofs show otherwise), that Wynne was in failing or insolvent circumstances in August and December, 1866—that he knew that fact—that the deed of trust creditors knew that fact, that Wynne was insolvent when the deed of trust was recorded, that the deed of trust creditors knew that fact also as well as Wynne, and that the date of the record of the deed of trust was subsequent to the approval of the bankrupt act. We propose to show by the clearest and most abundant authority that even under such a state of facts, the deed of trust creditors are entitled to have the lien of their deed enforced.

Nothing is more clearly settled as law in all the states, than that an unrecorded conveyance or assignment is good as between the parties to the instrument and their representatives. It is so by virtue of the contract between the parties. To use the language of the books, "it results from contract." This is a fundamental principle of the law, growing out of the expressed written stipulations of the parties, and upon which the very statutes which provided otherwise as to creditors and purchasers without notice, are based. Hence, the statute of Virginia recognizes this doctrine in providing for the protection of creditors and purchasers. "Every deed of trust, conveying real estate or goods and chattels, shall be void, as to creditors and subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice, until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record." Without such a provision in the law, by virtue of the contract between the parties to the deed, the conveyance would be good as against creditors and purchasers, even before or without being recorded. If there was any doubt about this elsewhere, it is well settled in Virginia, by repeated decisions and by the concessions in reported cases, that as between the parties to a conveyance and their representatives, it is perfectly valid and effectual. Glazebrook's Adm'rs v. Ragland's Adm'rs, 8 Grat. 332; McClure v. Thistle's Ex'rs, 2 Grat. 182. Even the recitals in an unrecorded deed are evidence against the grantor and all claiming under him. Wiley v. Givens, 6 Grat. 277. In Johnston v. Slater, 11 Grat. 321, the court of appeals says: "Registration is not necessary between the parties to a deed; that it is not necessary as against volunteers or purchasers with notice."

If the doctrine of the opposite side be true, we are thrown into singular absurdities. On their theory, if Wynne had made a conveyance between December 8 and March 2 to another party having notice of the deed of December 8, and before March 2 had recorded it, such conveyance would have been valid against the assignee. But yet such conveyance would not be valid against the grantees in the deed of December, because of the notice. On the theory of the opposite side, we would then have this absurd state of affairs—to wit, Enders & Co. would have a valid deed as against the subsequent purchaser with notice, but not valid as against the assignee; while on the other hand the deed to the subsequent purchaser with notice would be valid against the assignee. When a doctrine leads to such absurd conclusions as these, we may rest very sure that the reasoning upon which it is based is vicious. We therefore take it as a matter beyond respectable controversy, that the beneficiaries of an unrecorded deed have a lien as against the grantor and his representatives, which will be enforced in any court of equity.

We now proceed to discuss the character and quality of the estate which vests in the assignee by virtue of the bankrupt law, and especially to consider what are his rights, where a deed of trust was made before the passage of the bankrupt act, but not recorded until after such passage. The fourteenth section of the bankrupt act defines the rights of the assignee. He has "all rights in equity, choses in action, and all the bankrupt's rights of action for property or estate, real or personal, and for any cause of action which the bankrupt had against any person, arising from contract, and all his rights of redeeming such property or estate, with the like right, title, power, and authority to sell, manage, dispose of, sue for, and recover or defend the same, as the bankrupt might or could have had, if no assignment had been made." The rights of the assignee, and the quantum of his interest in the estate of the bankrupt are learnedly discussed in the leading case of Winsor v. McLellan [Case No. 17,887]. That was the case of an unrecorded mortgage of a vessel. The vessel was sold by the assignees, and the question was, whether the funds should be paid to the general creditors or to the mortgagees. Judge Story, in his opinion, uses the following language: "Now the principle has been long established, that the assignee in bankruptcy does not stand in the position of a purchaser, nor even in so favorable a position as an individual creditor may stand. The assignee in bankruptcy takes the property of the bankrupt, in cases unaffected by fraud, in the same plight and condition that the bankrupt himself held it, and subject to all the equities which exist against the same in the hands of the bankrupt." In the same case, he says, when referring to the legal effect of the unrecorded mortgage: "In the view which I take of the matter, the bill of sale took effect as a mortgage, at the time of the execution and delivery thereof to the trustees on December 9, 1841." In Parker v. Muggridge [Id. 10,743] Judge Story uses the following strong language in reference to mere equitable liens, arising from contract, to wit: "The plaintiffs have an equitable lien and a superior title to the property over the assignee and the general creditors; and the assignee must take the property of the bankrupts for the general creditors, subject to this lien and superior title. The case of Dale v. Smithwick, 2 Vern. 151, is strongly in point, as to the nature and obligation of a contract of this sort to create an equitable lien or trust in property. In Legard v. Hodges, 1 Ves. Jr. 477, Lord Thurlow said, that it was an universal maxim, that wherever persons agree concerning a particular subject, in a court of equity, as against the party himself, and any claiming under him, voluntarily, or with notice, it raises a trust. The cases of Ex parte Copeland, 3 Deac. & C. 199, Ex parte Prescott, 1 Mont. & A. 316, and Ex parte Flower, 2 Mont. & A. 224, established that the same rule prevails in bankruptcy; and that the property will be followed and affected with the trust in the hands of the assignees, in the same manner and to the same extent, as it would be in the hands of the bankrupt. We all know that in bankruptcy, the assignee takes only such rights as the bankrupt himself had, and is subject to the like equities."

In Fletcher v. Morey [Case No. 4,864], which was the case of an equitable lien against certain shipments, Judge Story says: "Now, before proceeding to the points more directly in judgment, it is proper to remark, that it is a perfectly well settled principle in equity, that the assignee in bankruptcy takes the property and rights of the bankrupt in the same plight and condition, and with all the equities attached thereto, in the same manner as the bankrupt himself held them. I recollect at present but one exception to the doctrine, and that is in the case of fraud. The general rule was laid down by Lord Hardwicke in Brown v. Heathcote, 1 Atk. 160, and it has constantly been adhered to ever since. I need not cite the authorities at large. Many of them will be found referred to in a recent opinion, which I had occasion to deliver in the case of Mitchell v. Winslow [Case No. 9,673], at the last October term of the circuit court at Portland."

This, then, being the established principle, the first question which arises in the case is, whether there is any equitable lien, or right, or claim, under the agreement, which ought to be enforced specifically in equity against the shipments made to and for Messrs. Read & Co., or the proceeds thereof, so far as they can be distinctly traced in the hands of the assignee; and upon this point I entertain no doubt whatever. In equity, there is no difficulty in enforcing a lien or any other equitable claim, constituting a charge in rem, not only upon real estate, but also upon personal estate, or upon money in the hands of a third person, whenever the lien or other claim is a matter of agreement, against the party himself, and his personal representatives, and against any persons claiming under him voluntarily, or with notice, and against assignees in bankruptcy, who are treated as volunteers; for every such agreement for a lien or charge in rem, constitutes a trust, and is accordingly governed by the general doctrine applicable to trusts.

After enforcing this view by a citation of authorities, Judge Story proceeds: "Assuming that the state courts have no power, to enforce the lien or equitable claim or charge, arising under the present agreement, it is still capable of being specifically enforced in this court under its general equity jurisdiction, as well as under its particular jurisdiction conferred by the bankrupt acts. It is a valid agreement between the parties, and not prohibited by the laws of Massachusetts." Further in the same case, he says: "But I take it to be clear, that not only liens, but mortgages of personal property are perfectly good and supportable between the parties, and against creditors, where there is no fraudulent intent, and the possession remains in the owner or mortgagor of the property, and is consistent with the deed and the arrangements made between parties. There is a strong line of authorities, that in cases of sales of personal property, conditional or absolute, the transfer or conveyance is not void, even though the possession remains with the vendor, if that possession is consistent with, and a part of the arrangement intended by the parties in the transfer or conveyance. So that the possession of the property by Messrs. Read & Co., in the present case, is not, in my judgment, a badge of fraud, or against the policy of the law, or in any manner to be deemed inconsistent with the just rights of their creditors; and therefore the agreement is binding and valid to give a lien or equitable charge upon the property in the hands of the assignee, fit to be enforced in the present suit."

In Mitchell v. Winslow [supra] Judge Story says as follows: "The present is a question between the assignee of a bankrupt, acting for the benefit of all the creditors, and the mortgagee, claiming title under his mortgage; and it arises upon a petition, partaking of the character of a summary proceeding in equity, and not in a suit at the common law, or governed by its principles. Now, it is most material to bear in mind, under this aspect of the case, that is a well-established doctrine, that (except in cases of fraud) assignees in bankruptcy take only such rights and interests as the bankrupt himself had, and could himself claim and assert at the time of his bankruptcy; and consequently, they are affected with all the equities which would affect the bankrupt himself, if he were asserting those rights and interests." This was expressly laid down by Lord Hardwicke in Brown v. Heathcote, 1 Atk. 160, where he said: "The ground that the court goes upon is this, that assignees of bankrupts, though they are trustees for the creditors, yet stand in the place of the bankrupt, and they can take in no better manner than he could. Therefore, assignments of choses in action for a valuable consideration, have been held good against such assignees." The same doctrine was recognized by his lordship in Jewson v. Moulson, 2 Atk. 417. Sir William Grant, in Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. 87, said: "I have always understood assignments from the commissioners, like any other assignment by operation of law, passed his (the bankrupt's) rights, precisely in the same plight and condition as he possessed them. Even where a complete title vests in them, and there is no notice of any equity affecting it, they take subject to whatever equity the bankrupt was liable to. This shows they are not considered purchasers for a valuable consideration, in the proper sense of the words. Indeed a distinction has been constantly taken between them and a particular assignee for a valuable consideration; and the former are placed in the same class, as voluntary assignees and personal representatives." The same doctrine was held by Lord Thurlow in Worrall v. Marlur, reported in Mr. Cox's note to 1 P. Wms. 459. It has ever since been firmly adhered to, and has been fully recognized at law, in cases of bankruptcy.

We might multiply authorities upon this point indefinitely. We, however, do not deem it necessary, after so distinguished an authority as Judge Story has pronounced the doctrine to be "well established." Now, if the assignee "can take only such rights and interests as the bankrupt himself had," and which the bankrupt "himself could claim and assert at the time of his bankruptcy," it becomes material specially to inquire what rights and interests Wynne himself could have claimed against the deed of trust creditors, at the time he was declared a bankrupt. We have already shown by the highest authority in the state, that the deed even when unrecorded was valid and effectual as between the parties, and that Wynne could assert nothing against the legal effect of its provisions. Judge Story holds that even the equitable liens of third parties will be enforced by a bankrupt court under its equity powers, against an assignee. Surely, if this is so, a regular and formal assignment, recognized by the statute law, will be respected and enforced. The same eminent jurist, in one of the cases to which we have referred, declares that a bankrupt court would enforce liens, even if there was no specific provision in the act requiring it. Be that as it may, it is very certain that it is the well-established practice of the bankrupt courts to enforce all liens that exist by virtue of state laws. The bankrupt act adopts the liens that are known to the laws of the states respectively. If a lien is known to the law of Virginia, which is not recognized in New York, your honor will enforce it. For that reason we have specially referred to the decisions of the court of appeals, to sustain the position that an unrecorded deed does establish a lien as between the parties to the instrument. If the deed of trust had never been recorded, it would be a lien as against the grantor and those claiming under him. Nay, more, it would be good as against the whole world, excepting creditors who had themselves acquired a lien, or purchasers without notice. No creditor either before or since the date of the recordation has acquired an adverse lien, nor has there been any purchase with or without notice. We submit, therefore, in every aspect of the case, that Enders, Paine & Williams can rightly claim their lien, and that the assignee should be instructed to pay first out of the proceeds of sale now in his hands, the claims secured by the deed of trust.

We have not deemed it necessary to refer to the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act, as it relates to acts of bankruptcy, and only touches incidentally the matter of assignments and conveyances. Moreover in that portion which refers to conveyances and assignments, the provisions are identical with those of the thirty-fifth section and what we have said in relation to the latter, will apply with equal force to the former. Nor have we discussed whether Wynne was insolvent or contemplated bankruptcy, or whether the creditors knew that he was insolvent. We have thought that our case was sufficiently strong in its legal bearings for us to admit, for the sake of argument, anything that might be claimed in those respects by our adversaries.

Since the foregoing was written, we have been informed that your honor has already decided that a vendor's lien will be respected and enforced in your court. We do not know the name of the case, but a brief mention of the facts will doubtless bring it to your honor's recollection. In May, 1867, A sold land to B and executed a conveyance to him. B executed his promissory notes for the unpaid purchase money, and stipulated that he would secure them by a deed of trust. He, however, neglected or refused to do so, and in February, 1868, went into bankruptcy. Your honor held in that case that the vendor had a lien for the unpaid purchase money, which you would respect and enforce. Judge Story held to the same doctrine in Fletcher v. Morey [Case No. 4,864]. Such a case is surely not as strong as the present one in favor of the creditors. In that there was no deed at all, and of course no record.

We also call your honor's attention to the well-considered opinion of Chief Justice Ames of Rhode Island, in the recent case of Stone v. King, 7 R. I. 358, in which he held that a trust deed, which was given without consideration even, and which the grantor delivered to the trustee, who at the grantor's request communicated the fact of that delivery to the cestui que trust, and promised him to record it, could be enforced against the grantor, although the trustee afterwards refused to accept the trust, and returned the deed to the grantor, to be cancelled, and although the deed itself was destroyed by the grantor. The court in its opinion said: "The party who makes a voluntary deed, whether of real or personal estate, without reserving a power to alter or revoke it, has no right to disturb it; and as against himself, it is valid and binding, both in law and equity." If this is so as to voluntary conveyances, how much more is it so, in regard to conveyances for a valuable consideration, as in the present case? And how does the fanciful theory of a power of attorney, raised by the opposite side, comport with such principles as these? As to the doctrine that a voluntary settlement even, can not be revoked, without an express power of revocation reserved, see Villers v. Beaumont, 1 Vern. 100, and Bale v. Newton, Id. 464. Hare & Wallace, in their notes to the case of Ellison v. Ellison, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. marg. p. 192, say: "When once an instrument creating a valid and complete trust is duly sealed and delivered, the obligation is complete; the detention of the instrument by the grantor does not render it inoperative." These annotators refer to many cases, where the deed was not only never recorded, but where the grantor kept possession of the instrument; yet as against the grantor and all parties claiming under him, the deeds were enforced. In the present case, the deed was actually delivered to the creditors. Of course it will be borne in mind that the deed was executed prior to the passage of the bankrupt law, and that under the law as it then existed, would have been enforced by the law of Virginia. All such instruments have been since declared (if made after the passage of the bankrupt act by an insolvent) to be in fraud of the bankrupt law. It would be more proper phraseology to say "in violation" of the bankrupt law, because the act expressly makes such a preference by an insolvent, an act of bankruptcy. If not made by an insolvent, such preferences still hold. Even if made by an insolvent, they are not avoided unless the grantee or beneficiary had reason to believe the grantor insolvent. The true conclusion from all this is, that only conveyances made since the passage of the bankrupt act by an insolvent are in fraud or in violation of such act, and are not then avoided, unless the beneficiary has reason to know the insolvent condition of the grantor. A preference made since the passage of the act, may be an act of bankruptcy, without at the same time being void. We only mean to insist that when the judges in interpreting the bankrupt law, speak of conveyances or preferences in fraud of the law, they mean only to apply such phraseology to conveyances made since the bankrupt act was adopted. They never have meant to say that a conveyance or preference made before the act, even by an insolvent, was either fraud in fact, or fraud in law. So far from any actual or constructive fraud attaching to such preferences, they were, we believe, in every state in the Union, certainly in Virginia, enforced not only against the grantor and those claiming under him, whether the preferences were recorded or not, but even against creditors and purchasers without notice, unless they acquired a lien or possession before record. See 13 Grat. 615, that an unrecorded deed will prevail against general creditors, even after the death of the grantor.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. The question in this case arises upon a petition of John Johns, Jr., assignee of Charles H. Wynne, an involuntary bankrupt, who asks for instructions as to the order of payment of claims against the bankrupt estate. Wynne was adjudicated a bankrupt on the petition of Wheelwright, Mudge & Co., filed in the district court of the United States for the district of Virginia on June 8, 1867. Ender, Paine & Williams claimed to be preferred in payment under a deed of trust dated August, 1866, which was never recorded; or if that claim be disallowed, then under a deed of trust dated December 8, 1866, recorded March 2, 1867.

Haxall & Co. also insist on preference upon the ground that Wynne was tenant under them of the warehouse which he occupied, and that under the law of Virginia, they as landlords had a lien for the rent due at the date of the petition; to enforce which on June 10, 1867, they sued out a distress warrant for two thousand one hundred and twenty dollars, the amount of rent then due, and caused the same to be levied on the goods then on the premises, and subsequently, on July 18, 1867, sued out an attachment, which was levied the same day upon the same goods, for one thousand five hundred dollars, the amount of rent to become due on December 1, 1867. We will consider the claim to preference on payment advanced on behalf of Ender, Paine & Williams, and we must say at once that so far as this claim is founded on the deed of August, 1866, it can not be admitted. It is doubtless true that a mortgage or other conveyance made as security for a debt evinced by a note or bond will operate as security for the same continuing debt, though the evidence of it be changed by renewal or otherwise. [Farmers' Bank v. Mutual Ins. Soc., 4 Leigh, 69.] Winsor v. McLellan [Case No. 17,887].² But in this case it is the security itself which has been changed, and not the evidence of the debt. The deed of December 8, 1866, was executed, as it seems, in substitution for that of August, which thereupon ceased to have any validity or effect.

The only question now to be determined is, therefore, whether or not the deed of December created a lien upon the property described in it, which the assignee of the bankrupt must satisfy before applying any of its proceeds to the claims of the general creditors. And it is to be observed that the deed is not condemned by the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act, which avoids all assignments and other modes of preference made or attempted by insolvents, or persons in contemplation of insolvency, within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, or in case the person to be benefited has notice of the intent within six months before such filing. The deed in question was not made within either limit of time. It need not, therefore, be here considered whether either period could begin to run till after the passage of the act. If the deed is to be treated as void or inoperative as against the assignee by operation of the act, it must be because of effect of that clause of the fourteenth section, which provides that "all the property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors," "shall in virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of the assignee be at once vested in such assignee." We do not doubt that the assignee takes the property in the same plight in which it was held by the bankrupt when his petition was filed (Winsor v. McLellan, supra);² Bradshaw v. Klein [Case No. 1,790], subject to such liens or incumbrances as would affect it if no adjudication in bankruptcy had taken place; but it is to be remembered that the assignee represents the rights of creditors as well as the right of the bankrupt, and that any lien or incumbrance which would be void for fraud as against creditors, if no petition had been filed or assignee appointed, will be equally void as against the general creditors represented by the assignee. In re Richardson [Id. 11,777]; Carr v. Hilton, 1 Curt. 230 [Case No. 2,436].

This is what the act means when it vests in the assignee, "all property conveyed in fraud of creditors." It does not make any conveyance or incumbrance fraudulent. It simply clothes the assignee with the entire title, notwithstanding such conveyance or incumbrance, and makes it his duty to invoke the proper jurisdiction to annul the fraudulent proceedings. And it may be remarked further that, except to this extent, the bankrupt act has no influence upon this case, so far as the deed of trust is concerned.

Much was said in argument concerning the effect of the record of this deed upon March 2, 1867; and it was strenuously urged that the deed was avoided by the effect of the act which purports to have been approved on that day. But we entirely concur with Mr. Justice Story, in thinking that where the question is as to effect of a proceeding instituted on the same day on which an act affecting the validity of such proceeding was passed, the precise time at which the act became a law may be properly inquired into. See Winsor v. Kendall [Case No. 17,886]. And in this we think ourselves warranted also by the reasoning of the supreme court. Gardner v. Collector, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 511.

Now, it is in proof that the deed of trust was recorded about 4 p. m. March 2, 1867; and it appears from the senate journal of the session during which the act was passed that the day denominated March 2, in the journal, and in the approval of the statute by the president, consisted in fact of Saturday, March 2, of Sunday the third, and of Monday the fourth, until noon; and it appears further that the bill which afterwards became the bankrupt law was not enrolled and delivered to the proper committee, to be presented to the president for his signature, until after the recess, which ended at 7.30, p. m. on Sunday, and was not reported to the senate as actually signed by the president until after 9.40, a. m. on Monday. Senate Journal, 2d Sess. 39 Cong. 1866-67, pp. 432, 458; Rev. Code, 1860, p. 566, § 5. It can not be doubted, then, that the deed of trust was in fact recorded nearly two days before the bankrupt bill became a law; and we think ourselves not only warranted, on general principles, but bound by the constitution, to notice the fact thus appearing upon the public records. It may well be questioned, indeed, whether, if the act had been approved before the recording of the deed, the effect of the latter would have been altered. Nothing in the thirty-fifth section touches the deed; and nothing in any other except the fourteenth. It may be, and we think it is, true that if the deed had remained unrecorded when the petition in bankruptcy was filed the title of the assignee would have prevailed against any claim under the deed, for the assignee represents the creditors, and the statute of Virginia expressly declares "any deed of trust void as to creditors," until and except from the time it is duly admitted to record. It is not an unreasonable construction of the bankrupt act, as we think, which regards it as vesting in the assignee, for the benefit of creditors in general, the estate of the bankrupt, discharged of liens or trusts which at the time of the petition are valid inter partes under the statute of the state in which they are claimed to exist. But we do not see how the mere enactment of the law could affect a deed previously executed.

It is not, however, necessary to consider these points here. The important question in the case is whether under the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act this deed must be regarded as inoperative against the assignee. The counsel for the assignee has argued with much earnestness that the deed can not be sustained without disregarding the implied effect of the first clause of the second general proviso of that section: "That no mortgage of any vessel or of any other goods and chattels made as security for any debt or debts in good faith and for consideration, and otherwise valid and duly recorded pursuant to any statute of the United States, or of any state, shall be invalidated or affected hereby."

The argument is that all mortgages not expressly saved from the operation of the act by this clause must be held invalid; and, therefore, that all deeds of trust and other conveyances intended as security for debts, and not within the description of the mortgages expressly saved, must also be invalid.

But we can not adopt this reasoning. It would be going too far, we think, to hold all mortgages not included by the terms of the description to be invalidated by the act. The clause expressly saves certain mortgages, but it says nothing as to the others. Much less does it say anything as to deeds of trust or conveyances of analogous character. It leaves all deeds and instruments of writing not expressly saved to the general principles of jurisprudence. To hold otherwise would, we think, be to give to the act an ex post facto operation contrary the intent of congress. And it would be quite gratuitous so to hold; for the rights of creditors as against all instruments not described in this clause are fully protected by that which stands next in the section and vests in the assignee, for their benefit, all the property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors.

The next question in this case, therefore, is whether the deed of trust by which the several liabilities of Enders, Paine & Williams, for Wynne, were secured, was made in fraud of the creditors of Wynne. It has been argued that the deed of trust took effect as against creditors only on March 2, 1867, and that the recording of the deed on that day was itself an act of bankruptcy. To maintain this proposition it is necessary to show that the recording of the deed was the act of Wynne. But clearly it was no act of his. The deed as against him was operative from its date. It was then that all his interest in the property described in it became vested by way of security in the trustee. It was then that he delivered the deed and parted with all control of it. If the beneficiaries were satisfied with the security afforded by the deed unrecorded, there was neither necessity nor obligation to record it. To record it was only necessary to make it a valid security against other creditors; and it was not for Wynne, but for the creditors secured by the deed, to determine whether it should be recorded or not. The delivery of it for record was in no sense his act, but theirs. In no sense, therefore, can it be regarded as an act of bankruptcy. But it has been argued that as against creditors, it must be regarded as a deed executed at the date of the record, and, therefore, as a deed creating a preference on that day, which was within four months of the filing of the petition. There is ingenuity and apparent force in this argument. But we think there are decisive answers to it. In the first place, the preference which the law condemns is a preference made within the limited time by the bankrupt, not a priority lawfully gained by creditors; and we have just shown that the preference gained by the record was not a preference made by the bankrupt. And, in the second place, the law which makes deeds of trusts void "until and except from" the time of record, clearly makes them valid at and from that time. And it is as much the policy of the bankrupt act to uphold liens and trusts when valid, as it is to set them aside when invalid.

It is hardly necessary to add that this must be especially true of a trust deed created and recorded before the approval of the bankrupt act. Was there any actual fraud in giving or taking the security created by the deed of trust? There has been no attempt to maintain this.

It has been said that Enders, Paine & Williams, on December 8, 1866, knew that Wynne was insolvent, but it is not denied that they had a right to obtain if they could preference in payment under the laws of Virginia. They could obtain it by direct transfer of property by deed of trust, by judgment and execution. Until after the passage of the bankrupt act, nothing but fraud in obtaining the preference could invalidate it in whatever mode obtained. It is not necessary to insist on this in the case before us, for we do not think that the evidence establishes as matter of fact that at the date of the deed, or at the date of the record, Enders, Paine & Williams were aware of the actual insolvency of Wynne. They knew, indeed, that he was embarrassed in carrying on his printing and publishing business, but they seem to have fully believed that his property was more than sufficient to pay all his debts.

On the whole, we are of the opinion that the deed of trust must be supported as a valid deed, and that the creditors named in it are entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of the property embraced in it.

The remaining question to be considered is, whether at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy Haxall & Co. had any lien for rent upon the property of the bankrupt. This is the same property which was conveyed by the deed of trust, and the solution of the question just stated may be affected in some measure by the conclusion to which we have come in respect to the validity of lien created by that deed. And in considering the question now to be disposed of, we lay out of view the proceeding by distress warrant and also the proceeding by attachment. As we understand the bankrupt act, all the rights and all the duties of the bankrupt in respect to whatever property, not expressly excluded from the operation of the act, he may hold under whatever title, whether legal or equitable, and however incumbered, pass to and devolve upon the assignee at the date of filing of the petition in bankruptcy. And all rights thus acquired are to be enforced by process, and all duties thus imposed are to be performed under the superintendence of the national courts. No lien can be acquired or enforced by any proceeding in a state court commenced after petition is filed, though in cases where jurisdiction has been previously acquired by state courts of a suit brought in good faith to enforce a valid lien upon property, such jurisdiction will not be divested. Peck v. Tennessee, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612. Whether, therefore, the distress warrant or the attachment be regarded as a proceeding for obtaining or enforcing a lien, each was equally unwarranted. Buckey v. Snouffer, 10 Md. 149. If a lien for rent existed, it was a lien to be discharged by the assignee, and enforced in the United States court of bankruptcy. If it did not exist, it could not be brought into existence by any proceeding whatever.

The real question is, Were the goods on the premises demised to the bankrupt subject to a lien for rent under the state law when the petition was filed, independently of any proceeding by distress or attachment? Liens are various descriptions, and may be enforced in different ways; but we think it sufficient to say here, what seems to us well warranted in principle and authority, that whenever the law gives the creditor a right to have a debt satisfied from the proceeds of property, or before the property can be otherwise disposed of, it gives a lien on such property to secure the payment of this debt. And we think that a lien of this sort is given by the 12th section of title 41, chapter 128, of the Revised Code of Virginia, adopted in 1860. It expressly prohibits any person having, by deed of trust, mortgage, or otherwise, a lien upon goods of a tenant on demised premises from removing such goods without paying to the landlord the rent due, and securing the rent becoming due, not exceeding one year's rent, and it further requires any officer who may take such goods under legal process to pay out of the process the rent in arrear, and deliver to the landlord sufficient purchasers' bonds for the payment of that becoming due.

We can not doubt that this statute creates a lien in favor of the landlord, and a lien of a high and peculiar character. We have no concern with the policy of this legislation; it is upon the statute book, and the lien it creates must be respected and enforced.

The validity of the deed of trust in this case seems to us clear, and it is not doubted by anyone that in the absence of the special circumstances supposed to affect it with invalidity, the lien of the creditors secured by it would be perfect. But these creditors, by no process whatever, could appropriate these goods to the satisfaction of their debts without paying or securing the year's rent; and so of process under execution. The officer of the law, at his peril, must pay the rent out of the proceeds. Would it not be trifling with the plain sense of words to say that there is a lien under the trust deed and a lien under the execution, but the claim which by law is made superior to either as a charge upon the goods is no lien?

We hold in this case that the creditors in the trust have a lien. How can we hold that the landlord, whose claim under the law is superior to theirs, has no lien? It seems to us, therefore, that Haxall & Co. had a valid lien for the arrears of rent due and for so much rent to become due under the lease as will make the whole amount secured equal to a year's rent. And we think that this lien is given by the statute independently of proceedings by distress warrant or attachment, which we regard as remedies superseded by the effect and operation of the bankrupt act [Burket v. Bonde, 3 Dana, 209; Henchett v. Kimpson, 2 Wils. 140]; In re Pulver [Case No. 11,466].²

In this case we do not pass upon the claims of Haxall & Co. upon the assignee for rent beyond the year during which the lien for the rent is given. We are inclined to think that he was entitled to the occupancy during the unexpired term; and that for the rent becoming due during that period Haxall & Co. would be entitled to prove their claim against the bankrupts as general creditors.

The decree of the district court will be reversed, and a decree entered in conformity with the principles of this opinion.

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. March 27, 1876.

DONATION ACT—TITLE OF SETTLER—PARTITION BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE—PATENT TO FOLLOW CERTIFICATE—CONSTRUCTION—LOCATION OF DONATION.

1. A settler under the donation act of Oregon acquires title to his donation from the passage of the act or the date of his settlement; and the patent which issues to him upon the performance of the conditions upon which the grant was made, is only record evidence of the existence of such title, or of the facts out of which it arose.

2. Under said act the surveyor-general had authority to partition the donation of a married settler, in equal parts as to quantity, between him and his wife, at any point of the compass he might deem expedient; but his action in this particular, under section 1 of the act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 107), was subject to the supervision of the commissioner of the general land office.

3. When the surveyor issued a certificate to a settler under the donation act, the commissioner of the general land office was required to issue a patent thereon and in conformity therewith, unless he found some valid objection thereto; and if said objection was found, it could not be disposed of by issuing a patent so far contrary to the certificate, but the certificate should have been returned to the local office for correction, and the patent issued upon such corrected certificate.

4. A certificate and patent thereon, issued under said act, are parts of the same transaction or procedure, and may be read together for the purpose of correcting or explaining the patent, and where there is an absolute contradiction between them, the certificate must prevail.

5. On July 28, 1853, the surveyor-general issued a certificate to William H. Willson and Chloe A., his wife, for donation 44, including the site of the town of Salem, assigning therein "the north half, parallel with the south line of the claim, to Chloe A. Willson, and the south half to William H. Willson," upon which certificate, on February 4, 1862, a patent was issued, giving to said William H., "the south half" of said donation, and to said Chloe A., "the north half" thereof: Held, that the certificate and patent, taken together, showed that the partition line of the donation was a line running south, 70 degrees 21 minutes east, and parallel with the southern boundary of the tract, and not a due east and west one.

At law.

Addison C. Gibbs, P. C. Sullivan, and Ellis Hughes, for plaintiff.

J. Quinn Thornton and Joseph N. Dolph, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. These actions are brought by the plaintiff [W. T. Wythe], a citizen of the state of California, to recover possession of lots 8 in block 64, and 6 in block 46, situated in the town of Salem. He alleges that he is the owner in fee simple of said lot 8, and that the defendant [Jared] Haskell, unlawfully withholds the possession of it; and, also, that he is the like owner of the undivided two-thirds of said lot 6, and that the defendant, Cook, unlawfully withholds the possession of the same. On March 11, it was stipulated by the parties that an agreed state of facts theretofore filed should stand as the special verdict of a jury in each case, and that the court should give such judgment thereon as the law of the cases requires.

By these special verdicts it is substantially found that on July 28, 1853, there was issued by John B. Preston, the surveyor-general of Oregon, a certificate numbered 20, under the donation act of September 27, 1850, from which it appears that William H. Willson claimed a donation under said act, numbered 44, of a tract of public land, containing 615.02 acres, known and designated on the surveys and plats of the United States and particularly bounded and described as in said certificate specified: "The north half parallel with the south line of the claim, to Chloe A. Willson, wife of said William H. Willson, and the south half to William H. Willson." That said William H. had proved "to the satisfaction of the surveyor-general," that his settlement on such land was commenced in November, 1844, and he had resided upon and cultivated the same as required by section 4 of said act; and that said facts and the evidence thereof were thereby certified to the commissioner of the general land office, "in order that a patent may be issued to said claimant for said tract of land, as required by the seventh section of the act aforesaid; provided, the said commissioner shall find no valid objection thereto."

That afterwards, on February 4, 1862, a patent was issued upon said certificate which recites substantially, that said certificate "has been deposited in the general land office," and that it appears therefrom "that the claim of William H. Willson, and his wife, Chloe A. Willson, * * * has been established to a donation of 640 acres of land, and that the same had been surveyed and designated as claim No. 44," being parts of certain sections and bounded and described as stated in said certificate, containing 615.02 acres; and then declares that the "United States, in consideration of the premises and in conformity with the provisions of the act aforesaid, have given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant unto the said William H. Willson the south half, and to his wife, Chloe A. Willson, the north half of the tract of land above described; to have and to hold the said tract with the appurtenances unto the said William H. Willson, and his wife, Chloe A. Willson, and to their heirs and assigns forever, the respective portions as aforesaid."

That the premises in controversy are within the limits of the town of Salem, and the exterior lines of said donation claim; that said claim is in compact form, as appears from a plat made a part of the verdict, but none of its exterior lines run with the cardinal points of the compass; that the southern boundary runs south 70 degrees 21 minutes east, while none of the other three sides of the claim are bounded by continuous straight lines; that at and before the issuing of said certificate said surveyor-general duly designated the portions of said donation accruing to the husband and the wife as therein mentioned; and that thereafter the said Willson and wife, during their lives,—the former having died in 1856 and the latter in 1874,—treated said designation and partition as the true one. That as to the premises in controversy, the plaintiff is the successor in interest of said Chloe A., and the defendants of said William H., and that the same are situated to the south of the dividing line described in the certificate, but to the north of a line running due east and west, and dividing the donation in two equal parts.

Upon these findings the question arises, which is the lawful line between the husband's and wife's share of the donation, a line running due east and west, or one running parallel with the southern boundary of the claim? If a due east and west line is the correct one, the premises are upon the wife's part, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover the possession; but, in the other case, they are upon the husband's half, and the defendants are rightfully in possession. On behalf of the plaintiff it is argued that the action of the surveyor-general in dividing the donation between the husband and wife was subject to the supervision and control of the commissioner of the general land office; and that the designation in the patent of the husband's and wife's part was an exercise of that supervisory power, and the final action and judgment of the highest authority over the subject, and therefore so far as the patent differs from the certificate in this respect, the latter is superseded and set aside.

The defendants maintain that the action of the surveyor-general in making the division between the husband and the wife is not subject to review, and, therefore, so far as the patent differs from the certificate in this respect it is void; and also, that the patent and certificate are parts of the same transaction, the former being based upon and referring to the latter, and therefore they must be read together.

Section 4 of the donation act, of September 27, 1850 [9 Stat. 497], under which this donation was obtained, gave, by words of present grant, to a settler on the public lands in Oregon, before December 1, 1850, who had resided upon and cultivated the same for four successive years, if a married man, six hundred and forty acres thereof, one-half to himself, the other half to his wife, to be held by her in her own right, and provided that the "surveyor-general shall designate the part inuring to the husband and that to the wife, and enter the same upon the records of his office." The act also provided (sections 6 and 7), that the settler should give notice of the precise tract claimed by him, and make proof of compliance with the act before the surveyor-general, who should thereupon issue a certificate, setting forth the facts in the case, and return the proof so taken to the commissioner of the general land office, when, if he "find no valid objection thereto, a patent shall issue for the land according to the certificate." Section 15 declares that "all questions arising under the act shall be adjudged by the surveyor-general, as preliminary to a final decision according to law."

The title of a settler under the donation act vested in him upon the passage of the act or the making of his settlement, if the former was prior to the latter, subject to the performance of the conditions upon which the grant was made. Chapman v. School Dist. [Case No. 2,607]; Fields v. Squires [Id. 4,776]; Lamb v. Starr [Id. 8,022]; Lamb v. Davenport [Id. 8,015]; Mizner v. Vaughn [Id. 9,678]; Adams v. Burke [Id. 49].

The patent did not pass the title to Willson and wife, but is only record evidence of the existence of their title, and the facts out of which it arose. The words of release and transfer contained in the patent are part of an established formula, and are only intended to operate in cases where the government has some interest in the premises. They could be of no effect in this case, because the instrument shows upon its face that the title of the government was before vested in Willson and wife under the donation act. Therefore the patent is in law only a record of the previously existing rights of their donees. Langdeau v. Hanes, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 529.

Until the partition was made, the husband and wife were tenants in common of the whole donation. The power to make this partition was vested by the act in the surveyor-general, without qualification, and the parties had no control over it. It follows that he might divide it, so that an equal number of acres was assigned to each, by a line running to any point of the compass or parallel to any exterior line of the claim. But I think his action in this particular was subject to review. It is not declared in the act to be final; and by the act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 107), re-organizing the general land office, "all the executive duties," then or afterwards prescribed, by any law, touching the disposition of the public lands or any private claim thereto, were made subject to the supervision and control of the commissioner of said office. The making of this partition was such a duty, and the action of the surveyor-general in discharging it was subject to the supervision and control of the commissioner. If he exceeded his power or abused his discretion, it would be the duty of the commissioner to interfere and correct his action. Barnard's Heirs v. Ashley's Heirs, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 44; Castro v. Hendricks, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 443; Leroy v. Jamison [Case No. 8,271].

Besides, section 13 of the act, as above quoted, having declared that the decisions of questions arising under the act by the surveyor-general should be only preliminary, and section 7 having provided in effect that patents should not issue according to the certificates of the surveyor-general, when it appeared to the commissioner that there was any valid objection thereto, both go to show that it was the intention of congress to subject the action of the former to the supervision and control of the latter, particularly in the allowing of certificates for donations, which, in the case of married persons, practically included the partition thereof. Although the language in the certificate and patent, describing or indicating the partition is not the same, they are not necessarily contradictory, and therefore it does not follow that it was intended to correct or change the former by means of the latter. For, if the commissioner had found an objection to the certificate upon this point, instead of undertaking to correct or change it directly, he would, as the practice is understood to have been, returned it to the surveyor-general, with directions to change the partition; as, for instance, to make it by an east and west line instead of one parallel to the southern boundary of the claim, and then have issued a patent upon such corrected certificate. Indeed, it is very questionable whether the commissioner was authorized to alter or modify the effect of a certificate as to the partition or otherwise, by means of the patent or in any way, except by returning the certificate to the local office and directing the desired alteration to be made in it. The commissioner had no power to issue a patent except in pursuance of law, and in this case the act expressly provides that "patents shall issue for the land according to the certificate aforesaid;" that is, in conformity with a certificate to which he had found no valid objection. The act does not contemplate that there shall be any difference in the scope and operation of the certificate and the patent, but that the latter is based upon and conforms to the former.

In the case at bar, taking the patent and applying it to the plat or survey of the donation—which was also a part of the facts or proceedings upon which the patent is founded, and with which it was required to conform—the question arises at once whether it was intended to divide the donation by a due east and west line or a line parallel to its exterior north and south lines.

The southern and northern boundaries not being parallel and the southern one being the only one that is a continuous straight line, the most reasonable, if not the necessary conclusion is, that if the donation is to be divided by a line parallel to any of its exterior boundaries, it must be the southern one. This line runs so near east and west that a partition upon a line parallel to it, might be said to give the north half to one party and the south half to the other. In addition to this the proposition is plausible, that a grant of the north or south half of a tract of land, lying in a compact form and bounded on one side—the south side—by a continuous straight line, running within nineteen degrees and thirty-nine minutes of a due east and west course, ought in the absence of anything showing a contrary intent, to be understood and construed as applying to the half lying to the north or south of a line parallel with such south boundary. But it must be admitted that according to the primary and natural sense of the terms used in the patent describing the division of the land the partition line is a due east and west one. The expression—the north half of a tract of land—would ordinarily be understood as the moiety which lies to the north of a due east and west line, and the south half, is the remainder or what lies to the south of that line. This proposition is self-evident and cannot be made plainer by argument. But if the description in the patent of the two halves of the claim be read in conjunction with that in the certificate, the uncertainty in the patent is dispelled, and it becomes apparent that the donation was divided by a line running parallel to the southern boundary of the tract.

The plaintiff insists that this cannot be done because the patent does not refer to the certificate in this particular, and for the reason, that all which preceded the patent is merged in it, and cannot now be used to control or affect it. The defendants insist that the patent refers to the certificate and thereby adopts it, and therefore the two must be read together. As has been stated, the patent mentions the certificate and purports in a general way to be issued upon it. Not only this, but it substantially recites it, except as to the division of the claim. Upon this point it is silent. Neither does it otherwise specially adopt or refer to the certificate.

True the grant in the patent of the south and north half of the donation to Willson and wife, respectively, purports to be made "in consideration of the premises," but the "premises" are the preamble to the patent, which does not specially refer to the certificate, or recite that portion of it which designates the part inuring to the husband and the wife. The rule of law relied upon by the defendants, which declares that where a deed refers to a description of the premises contained in another writing, such description is thereby made a part of the deed, is admitted. Allen v. Bates, 6 Pick. 460; Foss v. Crisp, 20 Pick. 121. But it does not appear that there is any safe ground upon which to rest a conclusion, that this patent refers to the description or designation of the partition given in the certificate.

But I do not think it necessary that the patent should specially refer to or adopt the description in the certificate, to make it a part of it. The former is based upon the latter, and must conform to it. If it is uncertain or insufficient in its descriptive clause, reference may be made to the certificate. They are parts of one transaction or procedure, successive but dependent and related steps in the progress of ascertaining and making an official record of a pre-existing fact or matter, to wit: the settlement, residence and cultivation of the settler, Willson, upon the public lands, whereby he and his wife each became the owner in fee of a designated half of a compact of six hundred and forty acres thereof. This being so, the designation of the partition in the patent may be read and construed in conjunction with that in the certificate. 3 Op. Atty. Gen. U. S. 111. If they are contradictory and irreconcilable, in my judgment, the latter must prevail. The patent cannot lawfully issue, otherwise than in accordance with the certificate. The former is only intended to be an amplification and confirmation of the latter, and if it varies from it in any material particular, it is probably so far void.

For the same reasons, if the description in the certificate should materially vary from the plat or recorded survey of the donation, the former being based upon the latter and necessarily required to conform to it, the description in the plat would prevail.

Taking then this certificate and patent together and reading them as parts of the same record, it appears first, that the surveyor-general partitioned this donation between the husband and wife by a line running parallel with the south line of the claim, and designated the half north of this line as the part inuring to the latter, and that to the south of it as the part inuring to the former. So far there is no difficulty in the matter. The certificate being deposited in the general land office, and the commissioner, finding no valid objection thereto, caused this patent to issue upon and in confirmation of the same. In describing the parts inuring to the husband and wife respectively, instead of giving the course of the partition line, the patent simply says the south half to William H., and the north half to Chloe A., his wife. It may be admitted that, strictly speaking, there can be but one north half of a donation, and that must be bounded on the south by a line running due east and west. But the patent is not speaking in the abstract, but the concrete, of the halves into which this tract had already been divided by the surveyor-general, as appeared by the certificate from which it was drawn. The patent did not initiate the partition; it only confirmed and recorded one already made. Under the circumstances, therefore, it was natural, proper and convenient that the patent should describe the part inuring to the husband as the south half, meaning thereby the half lying to the south of the partition line described in the certificate. Relatively, the parts of the donation assigned by the patent to the husband and wife are the north and south halves of it. They are the north and south halves, because they are not the east and west ones.

Reading the certificate and patent together, there is no other reasonable or even possible conclusion, but that the partition line is one running parallel with the south line of the claim. The patent is not in conflict with the certificate, but is only obscure where the other is plain. But if this were otherwise, it would not affect the result. Upon both reason and authority, I am satisfied that so far as a patent varies from the certificate, upon which it issues, it is without authority of law and therefore void. A patent can only issue upon a certificate to which no valid objection is found, and therefore must, in the nature of things as well as by the express words of the act, issue in accordance with it. If objection is found to the certificate it cannot be corrected by the patent, but the certificate must be corrected and the patent issue upon it, and in conformity with it. Therefore, there can be no presumption that the commissioner objected to this partition by the surveyor-general, and undertook to correct it by the patent, but the contrary; that he found it without objection, and the patent issued in confirmation of it.

It appearing from the special verdict that the premises in controversy are, upon the part of the donation, assigned to William H. Willson, the defendants must have judgments in bar of the actions and for costs. As to the statement in the special verdict concerning the acquiescence of Willson and wife in the partition line named in the certificate, I have not found it necessary to consider what, if any, effect ought to be given to it.

Case No. 18,119.

WYTHE v. MYERS.

[3 Savy. 595; 8 Chi. Leg. News, 280.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. April 10, 1876.

ACTION FOR POSSESSION OF LAND—FRIVOLOUS DEFENSES—COUNTERCLAIM FOR IMPROVEMENTS—WITHHOLDING POSSESSION—DAMAGES—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—CITIZENSHIP OF PARTIES.

1. In an action to recover the possession of real property, a statement in the answer of the grounds upon or means by which the defendant claims to be the owner of the property is irrelevant, and may be stricken out on motion.

[Cited in Raymond v. Morrison (Wash.) 37 Pac. 320.]

2. An allegation in the answer to the effect that the defendant derives title to the premises from the administrators of W. H. Willson, it not appearing that said Willson was ever seised or possessed of the property, is frivolous, and may be stricken out on motion.

3. An allegation that the administrators of said Willson conveyed the premises to the defendant's grantors on March 30, 1859, "in obedience to an order of the probate court of Marion county," of March 29, 1859, may be stricken out as frivolous and irrelevant; it not appearing therefrom that said order was duly or lawfully made, or that such court had authority to make the same.

4. The defendant may allege in his answer that he is the owner of the premises in controversy, but if he couples such allegation with a statement of the grounds of his title from which it does not appear that he is such owner, the matter may be stricken out as sham.

5. A counterclaim for permanent improvements should not be pleaded to the whole complaint, but only to so much thereof as to which it is an answer or defense; and it should allege the present value of said improvements, and that they better the condition of the property for the ordinary purposes for which it is used.

6. The right to damages for withholding the possession of real property given by the Oregon Code (sections 313, 318) is equivalent to the action of trespass for mesne profits given by the common law, and includes all damages to which the owner is entitled on account of the wrongful occupation of the premises, as well for waste committed or suffered by the occupant as the value of the use and occupation; such right is a distinct cause of action, and if joined with a claim for possession, should be separately stated.

[Cited in Pengra v. Munz, 29 Fed. 837.]

7. Lapse of time short of twenty years is not a bar to an action to recover possession of real property where the defendant claims under a sale by an administrator, except where the sale was made under section 42 of chapter 5 of the Code of 1854, to pay the decedent's debts, and the plaintiff claims under such decedent.

8. If a defendant wishes to contest the citizenship of the parties to an action in the national courts, he must do so by plea in abatement; and such a plea, if joined to one to the merits, may be stricken out, but is not liable to a demurrer.

[This was an action by W. T. Wythe against A. Myers.] Motion to strike out defenses.

Addison C. Gibbs and Ellis Hughes, for plaintiff.

J. Quinn Thornton and W. F. Trimble, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This is an action to recover the possession of lots three and four and a portion of two in block nine, in the town of Salem, together with damages for withholding the same. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is a citizen of California, and the defendant of Oregon. The answer denies that the defendant is a citizen of Oregon, and in connection with such denial alleges that he is a citizen of California. The answer also contains a denial of the ownership of the plaintiff and his right to the possession. It also contains the following pleas or defenses: (1) That the defendant is the owner of the premises and entitled to the possession of the same; and that he derives title thereto by sundry mesne conveyances from E. M. Barnum and Jesse M. Shepherd, to whom J. G. Willson and C. A. Willson, as administrators of the estate of William H. Willson, conveyed the same on March 30, 1859, "in obedience to an order of the probate court" of the proper county made on March 29 of said year; (2) that permanent improvements of the value of one thousand dollars have been made upon the premises by those under whom the defendant claims "holding the same by the title thus derived adversely to the claim of the plaintiff, in good faith;" (3) that "more than five years had elapsed between the commencement of this action and the time of making the sale by the administrators aforesaid on March 29, 1859," and the making of the conveyances by said administrators to said Barnum and Shepherd "in obedience to an order of the probate court of said Marion county."

The plaintiff moves to strike out each of these three defenses as sham, frivolous and irrelevant. The motion must be allowed. All of the first defense, except the allegation of ownership, is at best a mere statement of the evidence upon which the defendant relies to sustain his claim of ownership, and is therefore irrelevant. But so far as appears, it is also frivolous. How a conveyance of the premises by the administrators of William H. Willson, deceased, could vest or pass the title to any one is not apparent. It is nowhere alleged that said William H. ever owned or had any interest in the property, and it might as well be alleged that the defendant derived title from the man in the moon. But admitting that he died seised of it, the plea does not show that the probate court of Marion county ever acquired jurisdiction to direct the administrators to make a conveyance. It is not even alleged that the order was "duly" or "lawfully" made. At the date of this alleged transaction the probate court had authority to order the sale of a decedent's lands to pay his debts, and also to order his administrator to make a conveyance of any part thereof which in his lifetime he had become "bound by contract in writing to convey." Code Or. 1854, cc. 5, 7.

But this defense of ownership in the defendant does not state under which of these provisions this order was made, nor in any way allege or show that the court had authority to make it. Standing by itself, the simple allegation of ownership in the defendant is sufficient and proper; but being coupled with what follows, it must be understood to be only such ownership as such a conveyance would transmit. Thus qualified, it amounts to nothing, and is a sham.

The second defense is frivolous and irrelevant, because it does not appear that such improvements are now of any value, or that they better the condition of the property for the ordinary purposes for which it is owned and used. Neff v. Pennoyer [Case No. 10,085]. It simply alleges that these improvements cost one thousand dollars. What is their present value, of what they consist, and when they were made does not appear. A counterclaim for permanent improvements is confined to their value at the time of trial, and this value ought to be alleged in the pleading. Civ. Code Or. § 318. Besides this defense, although separately stated, does not refer to the cause of action to which it was intended as an answer. Id. § 72. I suppose it is intended as an answer to the claim for damages for withholding the possession, but it professes to be in answer to the complaint generally. The only excuse for this is, that the claim for damages is stated in the complaint as if it was only an incident of the right to recover the possession. But this is an error. The right to recover the possession of the property and damages for withholding such possession are separate causes of action, which, for convenience and economy may be joined in one complaint. Id. §§ 91, 313, 318. The complaint also alleges that the defendant has unlawfully withheld the possession of the premises for six years, and that the value of the rents, issues and profits during that period is one thousand dollars, which he seeks to recover as something other and different than the five hundred dollars claimed as damages for withholding the possession. The right to damages for withholding the possession of real property given by Civ. Code Or. §§ 313, 318, is equivalent to the action of trespass for mesne profits given by the common law, and includes all damages to which the owner is entitled on account of the wrongful occupation of the property as well for waste committed or suffered by the occupant as the value of the use or occupation. Such right is a distinct cause of action, and while it may be joined with a claim for possession, it should be separately stated.

The third defense assumes that in any action to recover premises held under a sale by an administrator, the lapse of five years from the date of such sale, or a less period than twenty years is a bar to a recovery. But I am not advised that any such act was ever in force in this state. Under the Code of 1854 (section 42, c. 5) property sold by an administrator on the order of a probate court to pay the debts of the decedents, could not be recovered by any one claiming under such decedent after a period of three years. But it does not appear that this plaintiff claims under William H. Willson, whose administrators are alleged to have made this sale. As this statute of limitation applies only to particular cases, the defendant cannot claim the protection of it unless he brings himself within it.

But this defense does not really allege that the defendants are holding under a sale by an administrator. The matter is characterized as "the sale by the administrators aforesaid on March 29, 1859," meaning the transaction mentioned in the first defense, which is not therein alleged to be a sale at all, but simply a conveyance. Now this conveyance, if made by the administrators under any statute of Oregon, must have been made in performance of a contract of sale by the decedent in his lifetime, as provided in chapter 7 of the Oregon Code aforesaid. But as to this class of cases, there never was any special limitation short of twenty years in this state, that I am aware of, and none has been pointed out. The plaintiff also demurs to so much of such answer as denies that the defendant is a citizen of Oregon, and avers that he is a citizen of California, because this is a plea in abatement, and cannot be pleaded in conjunction with a plea to the merits.

At common law a party could not plead at the same time, in abatement and bar, to the same matter. 1 Chit. 491. It has been long held in the national courts that if the defendant disputes the allegation of citizenship in the complaint, he must do so by a plea in abatement, and that this must be done in the order of pleading required by the common law. Jones v. League, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 81. A plea in abatement cannot be filed with other defenses. Spencer v.

Lapsey, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 267. But as these decisions are anterior to the enactment of section 914 of the Revised Statutes, adopting the practice in the state courts, it may be said that the question turns upon whether the pleading is allowed by the law of the state or not. The Oregon Civil Code (section 72) provides that a party may plead as many defenses as he may have, but does not prescribe the order in which they shall be pleaded. The most reasonable inference from this silence is that it was intended that the matter should be left as at common law; or, on account of such silence, the court being at liberty to construe the statute, may adopt the rule of the common law if deemed most convenient and promotive of justice. In Hopwood v. Patterson, 2 Or. 50, the supreme court held that a plea in abatement could not be joined with a plea to the merits.

In Sweet v. Tuttle, 14 N. Y. 468, it was held that the nonjoinder of a defendant could be pleaded with other defenses; and I am not aware that this decision has since been departed from in that state. I think the rule laid down by the supreme court of this state the better one, and I suppose under section 914, supra, it furnishes the rule for the practice in this court.

This defense of the citizenship of the parties is one peculiar to the national courts and upon the question of whether it should be made by a plea in abatement, or a simple denial of the allegation in the complaint, the practice in the state courts furnishes no guide. Under these circumstances it is proper to follow the rule laid down by the supreme court, prior to the enactment of section 914, supra, in Jones v. League, supra, and require the objection to be made by a plea in abatement, instead of a mere denial of the allegation in the complaint. Indeed, since the passage of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470), concerning the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, a mere denial that the defendant is a citizen of Oregon would be immaterial; because by section 1 of that act, this court has jurisdiction, if the controversy is between citizens of different states. It is no longer necessary that one of the parties should be a citizen of the state where the action is brought.

But a demurrer is not the proper proceeding in this case. Matter pleaded in abatement with matter to the merits is deemed waived, and if not withdrawn, may be stricken from the files of the case. The pleading of matter to the merits admits the jurisdiction, and is therefore an implied retraction or withdrawal of matter already or at the same time pleaded in abatement. There is, then, nothing left to demur to. The matter in abatement is not demurrable, because the objection does not appear upon its face, but arises de hors the plea, by reason of the pleading of other defenses which are deemed to supersede it. If not actually withdrawn, the convenient mode of eliminating it from the case is a motion to strike out. The demurrer is overruled.

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Aug. 20, 1875.

CONVEYANCE BY ADMINISTRATOR—AUTHORITY OF COURT—DONATION ACT—TITLE OF SETTLER—EQUITY PLEADING.

1. The probate court of Marion county, in 1856, had no power to authorize an administrator, generally, to convey lands in performance of his intestate's obligations; but only to convey specific premises upon the petition of the person claiming to be entitled thereto.

2. Where a married settler under section 4 of the donation act [9 Stat. 497], has completed the residence and cultivation required by the act, and made proof thereof, he is entitled to a patent for his donation, and may convey the same in fee simple. Per Field, Circuit Justice.

3. Plea to bill in equity may be good in part and bad in part.

In equity.

C. Gardner and Addison C. Gibbs, for complainants.

W. W. Thayer, for defendant.

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and DEADY, District Judge.

DEADY, District Judge. This is a suit for the partition of lots 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, in block 44, in the town of Salem, Marion county. The complainants are citizens of California, and the defendant is a citizen of Oregon.

The bill alleges, in substance, that the premises are a part of the donation claim of William H. Willson, a married settler on the public lands of Oregon, under section 4 of the donation act of September 27, 1850, who died intestate on April 17, 1856, after having "complied with all the requirements of said act," and before the issue of a patent therefor, leaving his wife, Chloe A. Willson, and three children, including the complainant, Laura B. Wythe, surviving him. That upon the death of said Willson, the south half of said donation claim, comprising three hundred and eight acres, which had before been duly set apart to him, was, by virtue of said act and the facts aforesaid, duly vested in said widow and children in equal and undivided parts; and that the complainants, by reason of the premises, are now seised of an undivided one-fourth of the lots aforesaid, and entitled to a partition of them. That the defendant is seised of an undivided three-fourths of said lots derived from the widow and two of the children aforesaid, and has received the rents and profits of the premises for ten years, for which they pray an account. The defendant not answering the bill, pleads in bar of it, that he is seised in severalty of an estate in fee simple in the premises. That as to 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 of said lots he derives title thereto by a sufficient conveyance of the date of March 11, 1858, from the Wallamet University to whom said Willson and wife, for a valuable consideration, duly conveyed the same on December 2, 1854, after said Willson had complied with the requirements of said donation act. That as to said lot 8, he derives his title as follows: On March 31, 1855, said Willson and wife, for the sum of one hundred dollars, executed a sealed instrument whereby they bound themselves to make Henry B. Worden a good and sufficient title to said lot 8 within a reasonable time after they should obtain a title from the United States to said donation claim; and that after sundry assignments said instrument was assigned on June 13, 1857, to George K. Shiel. That on May 28, 1856, the probate court of Marion county, duly empowered J. G. Willson and Chloe A. Willson aforesaid, the administrator and administratrix of said William H. Willson, "to convey and transfer lands which the said Willson in his lifetime had obligated himself to convey"; and that in pursuance of said authority, said administrator and administratrix duly conveyed said lot 8 to said Shiel, who afterwards on April 26, 1860, duly conveyed the same to the defendant. That the defendant entered into the possession of said premises in pursuance of said conveyances respectively, and has ever since held the same exclusively and adversely to his sole and separate use.

The plea was argued and taken under advisement by the court. The plea of title in the defendant is bad as to lot 8. The probate court of Marion county had no power to authorize generally the administrators of William A. Willson "to convey and transfer lands which the said Willson in his lifetime had obligated himself to convey," but only to convey specific premises upon the petition of the person claiming to be entitled to such conveyance. See Code Or. 1854, p. 338. Upon any construction, then, of the fourth section of the donation act, the legal title of lot 8 vested in the children and widow upon the decease of the settler, Willson. Whether the defendant is entitled to a conveyance of this title on account of the instrument given by the deceased in his lifetime to Worden, and the subsequent assignment thereof, it is not necessary now to inquire.

As to lots 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7, the question arises, whether, upon the death of a married settler, under section 4 of the donation act, who has completed the residence and cultivation required by the act and made proof thereof, but dies intestate and before a patent issues, his interest in the donation terminates, and the title to the same is vested, by said section, in equal parts in his surviving wife and children, unaffected by any sales or conveyances thereof made by him in his lifetime; or, whether said settler, being entitled to a patent upon the completion and proof of his residence and cultivation aforesaid, is not thereafter to be held and considered as a settler who could convey a fee simple in the donation, although he might die before the issue of a patent.

Upon these questions the court being divided; for the purpose of a decision of the case, the Circuit Justice is of the opinion that Willson being entitled to a patent when he conveyed to the Wallamet University, under whom the defendant holds, a decree should be entered dismissing the bill as to those lots, unless the complainant puts the plea in issue and contests the facts stated therein, within a time to be fixed by the court, and in the meantime the point of this disagreement will be stated and certified to by the judges, and entered of record. Rev. St. § 652.

The plea is sustained as to lots 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7, and overruled as to lot 8. A plea to a bill in equity may be good in part and bad in part. Story, Eq. Pl. § 692; French v. Shotwell, 5 Johns. Ch. 562; Kirkpatrick v. White [Case No. 7,850].

ESTOPPEL—PLEA STRICKEN OUT—PLEA OF FORMER JUDGMENT.

1. A plea of estoppel by conduct, not showing that the defendant was ignorant of the truth of the matter or could not have conveniently ascertained the same; nor that the defendant had acted upon the matter claimed as an estoppel, stricken out on motion of plaintiff.

[Cited in Coos Bay Wagon Co. v. Crocker, 4 Fed. 581.]

2. In a plea of a former judgment in an action at law, it is a sufficient description of the cause of action in the first action to allege that it was identical with that stated in the complaint in the action pending.

Addison C. Gibbs and Ellis Hughes, for plaintiff.

N. B. Knight, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This is an action to recover possession of a block of land in the town of Salem, known as Marion square.

The defendant, by its amended answer, filed January 21, 1876, admits that the plaintiff [W. T. Wythe] is the owner of the fee in the premises, but denies that he is entitled to the possession of them. Besides the denials, the answer contains three separate defenses, namely: (1) A former adjudication; (2) A dedication of the premises by Chloe A. Willson, the grantor of the plaintiff, to the use of the inhabitants of said town, forever; and (3) an estoppel.

The plaintiff demurs to the first and second plea, and moves to strike out the third one. The motion to strike out is allowed. The plea of estoppel is founded upon the alleged public declarations of Chloe A. Willson, in 1857, to the effect that she had set apart said square for the use of the defendant forever, and alleges that the defendant, relying upon said declarations, improved said square in 1867 at a cost of $500. But it does not appear but that the defendant knew, as well as said Chloe, whether such dedication had been made or not, or that it could not conveniently have ascertained how the fact was, if it had desired to. The plea also states that the defendant was in possession of the premises at the date of such declarations, and has been ever since; so that, upon its own showing, it has not changed its position in regard to the property since the making of the same, or incurred any liability or expense on the faith of them, save the expenditure of this $500 for improvements, which is probably much less than the value of the use and occupation of the premises for over twenty years. Under the plea of dedication, any admissions of a prior dedication by Chloe A. Willson can be considered and have such weight as under the circumstances they are entitled to.

The second plea is sufficient, except that it contains no allegation that Chloe A. Willson had any interest in the premises to dedicate. This was stated on the argument to have been an oversight on the part of the pleader, and may be amended.

The first plea alleges that on June 25, 1868, in an action brought by Chloe A. Willson against this defendant, in the circuit court for the county of Marion, "for the same identical cause of action as that set forth in the complaint herein, the defendant had judgment against said Chloe A., for the perpetual possession of said square for the use of the inhabitants of said defendant, as a public square," which judgment is still in full force; and that plaintiff claims under said Chloe A. since the date of said judgment.

On the argument of the demurrer, counsel for the plaintiff insisted that a plea of former adjudication must state particularly what the cause of action was in the prior suit, so that the court can see that it is identical with that of the present one; and that therefore it is not sufficient to aver, as is done in this case, that the cause of action is the same or identical, but that the facts must be stated in detail. In support of this position counsel cited Heatherly v. Hadley, 2 Or. 273, in which it is said that "in pleading a former suit or action in bar, it is necessary to state facts showing what was the matter determined in the former suit," and the mere conclusion that they are the same is insufficient.

In support of this opinion the court cites Fowler v. Hait, 10 Johns. 111, and Logan v. Tallmadge, 14 Johns. 511. The first case was an action before a justice, and upon certiorari it was held that the defendant, having omitted to plead or give notice of a former trial and judgment concerning the same matter, was therefore precluded from giving evidence of it at the trial of the action. But this ruling only goes to the point that a former adjudication must be pleaded, and is silent upon the question of what is a sufficient plea of such adjudication.

The second case was a suit in equity wherein the chancellor had permitted a former decree between the same parties to be read at the hearing, without the same having been pleaded or relied on in the answer as a bar (2 Johns. Ch. 56); and this, Spencer, J., delivering the prevailing opinion in the court of errors, held to be erroneous, saying: "It is a well established rule in equity that a plea in bar of a former decree must state so much of the former bill and answer as to show that the same point was then in issue." The case itself is authority for the rule, which is undoubted, that a former decree, to be available in bar of a subsequent suit, must be pleaded or relied on in the answer, but how or with what particularity it must be pleaded or stated in the answer it does not decide. In Story, Eq. Pl. § 791, it is said that, "upon a plea of a former decree, so much of the former bill and answer must be set forth as is necessary to show that the same point was in issue." But this is so on account of the numerous matters, involving many points and questions, often contained in a suit in equity and determined by its decree. In such a case it may be insufficient, as was held in Heatherly v. Hadley, supra, to simply aver "that all the matters and things alleged in this suit" have been adjudicated in a former suit between the same parties.

But in an action at law, a specified definite object is sought to be obtained on account of some particular wrong or neglect of duty, or failure to comply with an obligation on the part of the defendant, and the scope and operation of the judgment which is given therein is limited accordingly. Therefore, in pleading a former adjudication at law, it is convenient and sufficient to say that the cause of action was the same or identical with that set forth in the complaint in the new action, or with some branch or feature of the case made in the bill if it be a suit in equity and the plea is only to a part of the bill, as often happens. In Story, Eq. Pl. § 780a, it is stated that a plea of prior judgment in the lord mayor's court on the same subject-matter on which the bill sought relief was held good. The plea itself is given in the note three to the same section, and while it contains some folios of introductory matter, the essential allegation as to the identity of the matter adjudged and that set up in the bill is contained in the statement that the demands of the defendant, which are controverted by the complainant's now bill, and the demands of the defendant, which were established by said adjudication, "are the same and not otherwise or different." In 3 Chit.

Pl. 928, a precedent is given of a plea of a former judgment, in which it is simply stated that the plaintiff impleaded the defendant in a certain term, before a certain court, in a certain plea of trespass on the case on promises "for the not performing the very same identical promises and undertakings in the said declaration mentioned," upon which the plaintiff had judgment. The plea in this case is substantially in the same form. It avers that the action brought by Chloe A. against the defendant was "for the same identical cause of action as that set forth in the complaint herein," and that judgment was given upon the merits in favor of the defendant's right of possession, as above stated.

In 2 Estes, Pl. 702, 715, a precedent is given of a plea of "another action pending," and also a "former judgment," in both of which the allegation as to the identity of the cause of action is a simple averment that the pending or former action is or was "for the same cause of action as that set forth in the complaint herein."

The plea is sufficient, and the demurrer thereto is disallowed.

At law.

Addison C. Gibbs and Ellis Hughes, for plaintiff.

J. Quinn Thornton and W. F. Trimble, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought to recover the possession of lot four, in block five, in the town of Salem. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff [W. T. Wythe] is a citizen of California, and the defendant [Jannette Smith] of Oregon; that the plaintiff is the owner in fee-simple of the premises and entitled to the possession thereof, and that the defendant unlawfully withholds the same from him, to his damage $600.

The answer of the defendant denies all the material allegations of the complaint, except the citizenship of the parties, and alleges that she is the owner in fee of a certain described part of the premises, for which alone she defends.

The answer also contains a plea of estoppel, to the effect that the plaintiff ought to be precluded from alleging that he is the owner of, and entitled to the possession of the premises, because (1) that whatever claim of title the plaintiff has to the premises is derived through certain mesne conveyances from Chloe A. Willson, who, on May 7, 1852, with a knowledge that the premises were a part of a donation claim, one-half of which belonged to her in her own right, made no objection to the sale of said lot four to Joseph Smith by the trustee of Nancy M. Thornton, who then claimed to be the owner of the same by virtue of a conveyance thereof by William H. Willson, the husband of said Chloe A., to said Nancy M., the consideration of which inured to the benefit of said Chloe A.; (2) that in 1852 said Smith sold said lot four to Joseph Holman, and "said Chloe A., having a knowledge of her rights and of the sale," made no objection thereto, but acquiesced in the same; (3) that in 1853 said Chloe A., with a like knowledge of her rights in the premises, represented to L. F. Grover that said Holman was the owner of said lot, and advised and encouraged said Grover to purchase the same from said Holman as a suitable place for a law-office, and that said Grover was thereby induced to make said purchase, and afterwards, relying upon such representations, expended a large sum of money in building a law-office on the part of said lot claimed by defendant; (4) that in May, 1856, when said Chloe A. had knowledge of the fact that said lot was within her half of said donation, said Smith conveyed the same to said Holman with the knowledge of said Chloe and without objection on her part, and that, under like circumstances, said Holman, on December 5, 1856, conveyed the same to said Grover; (5) that on July 2, 1861, the defendant purchased from said Grover, for the sum of $1,600, the part of said lot for which she now defends, with the knowledge of said Chloe A., and without objection on her part, and that she acquiesced in all said transactions concerning said lot up to the time of her death in 1875.

The answer concludes with a plea of the statute of limitations; that the plaintiff, nor those under whom he claims, has not been seised or possessed of the premises in controversy within twenty years from the commencement of the action, January 3, 1876. The plaintiff demurs to the whole answer, to the plea of estoppel and to the statute of limitations conjunctively, and to the latter separately.

In support of the plea of estoppel, counsel for the defendant insists that the wife of a settler under the donation act of 1850 had a legal and separate estate in the portion of the donation inuring to her, and that therefore she could convey it, or by her acts in pais estop herself to assert her title to it, as if she were a feme sole. That the wife's interest in the donation is a legal one, there can be no doubt. It is granted to her by the act directly and unqualifiedly, to be held by her in her own right. No trust is declared concerning it, and no trustee or third person is interposed between her and the ownership of the property.

By the common law which was in force in Oregon at the passage of the donation act, real property, however acquired by the wife, was transferred to her husband during their joint lives, leaving only the reversion in her. But in cases where the instrument or act by which the property was conveyed to the wife provided that it should be for her sole or separate use and benefit, equity interfered, and, while admitting that, by virtue of the marriage, the present ownership of the property passed to the husband notwithstanding the words of exclusive use to her in the deed, treated and held him as a trustee of the estate thus vested in himself for the use and benefit of the wife. This constituted what was called a separate estate in the wife. It was the creation of equity, and the expression "separate estate of a married woman" always referred to an equitable estate held by the husband or a third person in trust for her. Bish. Mar. Wom. § 794 et seq.

As has been stated, the wife's share of the donation was a legal estate granted to her by apt and ordinary words of conveyance, in which the husband, by virtue of the marriage, immediately took a freehold estate. It is not claimed that the donation act imposed any trust upon this estate in the hands of the husband, or charged his conscience with the duty of administering it for the separate benefit of the wife, so as to make it in equity her separate estate, unless such is the effect of the words, "to be held by her in her own right." As I understand the argument of the learned counsel for the defendant, it is not contended that these words make the property her separate estate in equity as above described, or that any trust was imposed upon it in favor of the wife by this or any other provision of the donation act. But it is maintained that this property was in fact some sort of a "separate estate" of the wife's, because the grant to her provided that it was "to be held by her in her own right."

Is such the natural or possible effect of this phrase, or does the use of it in this connection manifest any intention upon the part of congress to keep this grant to the wife out of the ordinary rule which gave the husband a present freehold in the wife's real property, however acquired?

A woman is said to hold property in her own right when she does not derive it from her husband; and a man is said to hold property in the right of his wife when his interest in it arises out of his marriage with her. The expression is an untechnical and vague one, and no instance has been shown in which it has been used to exclude or limit in any degree the marital rights of the husband in the real property of the wife. It is not clear why the words were used in the donation act, and the probability is that, like other expressions contained in it, they were inserted without much consideration. My impression is that they were placed in the act upon some vague apprehension that, as the whole section was first granted to the settler (the husband), and on account of his services upon the land, without them it might be claimed that the wife, instead of taking directly from the United States, derived title through the husband as his wife,—held in his right by virtue of the marriage, instead of her own, and that therefore the property might be in some way liable for his prior debts, contracts and obligations. To exclude this conclusion,—to avoid this possible doubt or danger,—it seems probable that these words were inserted immediately after the clause qualifying the grant so that the wife's half of the donation, instead of passing through the husband, went from the United States to her directly. It being provided that the wife should be considered as holding in her own right, and not in that of her husband, this would preclude the conclusion that she claimed through or under him, and therefore the property would be possessed by her, and descend, upon her death, the same as if inherited from her father or other ancestor. To hold or be seised of property in your own right is not incompatible with the use being in another. Seisin and use are not identical; and the seisin may be in one person and the use in another. A feoffee to use held or was seised in his own right, but to the use of another. The seisin or holding relates to the acquiring of the estate, and the use to the purposes for which it shall be held. Here the wife held or was seised in her own right, but not to her own separate or sole use and benefit, and therefore she had no separate estate in the property. As soon as she became seised, by reason of the marriage, the law cast upon the husband an estate in the premises for their joint lives. Bish. Mar. Wom. § 529.

But it is also claimed that this property became the separate estate of the wife by operation of the act of the territorial legislature of January 20, 1852, entitled "An act to exempt the wife's portion of lands, donated in Oregon territory by act of congress, approved September 27, 1850, from the debts and liabilities of her husband." This act provided "that all right and interest of the wife, both legal and equitable, in and to the land donated to settlers in Oregon territory, by an act of congress approved September 27, 1850, both now and hereafter, be and hereby is secured to the sole and separate use and control of the wife; and such interests in said lands, both legal and equitable, of the wife, and the rents and profits thereof, shall in no wise be made subject or liable for the debts or liabilities of her husband, whether contracted before or after the passage of this act." This act was repealed January 30, 1854, by the general repealing act of the Code of that year. As appears from the title, the intention of the act was to exempt the wife's portion of the donation "from the debts and liabilities of her husband," and this, doubtless, was the leading idea in its enactment. The language used is not accurate, but the purpose is apparent. It was not intended to exempt the reversion—the interest which remained in the wife notwithstanding the marriage—from the husband's debts and liabilities, but only the husband's present interest in the property. This interest or marital right of the husband was a freehold, and liable to be taken on execution and sold to satisfy his debts. Bish. Mar. Wom. § 585; Starr v. Hamilton [Case No. 13,314]. But to exempt the husband's interest in the wife's donation from execution did not divest him of such interest or reinvest the wife with it in any way. But the body of the act, in addition to exempting the husband's interest in the wife's donation from execution, did declare that "the right and interest of the wife" in such donation "is hereby secured to the sole and separate use and control of the wife."

At the date of this act all the right and interest of Chloe A. Willson in her share of her husband's donation was simply the reversion upon his death, he being already, by virtue of the marriage, seised of an estate in the premises for their joint lives. Strictly speaking, then, there was nothing in this case, in this respect, for the act to apply to. It did not in terms include the present ownership, for that being in the husband, was not "the right or interest of the wife," and the reversion was already hers beyond a question.

But assuming, what is probable, that it was intended by the phrase, "right and interest of the wife in the land," to include all the interest which came to her from congress under the donation act, then the act, as to settlements already made, was so far void.

Although it does not distinctly appear from the plea of estoppel when this settlement was commenced, it is well known to the court, from its records, to have been made long before the passage of the donation act, September 27, 1850; while in the defendant's brief it is admitted that it was made at least as early as that date. This being so, the husband was seised of a life estate in the wife's share before the passage of the act of January 20, 1852. This was a vested interest which the legislature could not deprive him of. They might exempt it from execution, in the interest of the family, or otherwise, but they could not dispossess him of that which had become his by the existing law of marriage. Starr v. Hamilton [supra]; White v. White, 5 Barb. 474; Westervelt v. Gregg, 2 Kern. [12 N. Y.] 202.

At common law a married woman could not pass her freehold except by fine and recovery. Her deed was absolutely void. Bish. Mar. Wom. § 586. But by the statutes in force in this state, at least since September 29, 1849, a married woman could convey any interest of hers in lands by joining with her husband in a deed thereof, and not otherwise. See Act Sept. 29, 1849, adopting the Iowa act "to regulate conveyances;" Sess. Laws 1849, p. 138; "An act relating to alienation by deed," etc., Code 1854, p. 476; same act, Code 1874, p. 515.

The donation act, not containing any provision touching the interest of the husband in the wife's share of the donation, or the alienation of the same, except to forbid all contracts for the sale of the same prior to the completion of the residence and cultivation required by the act, both subjects were governed by the local law,—the common law,—except as modified by the above cited statutes. It follows that the wife during coverture could do no act in pais which would estop her from asserting her right to her land, and that the only way she could divest herself of her interest in her donation was by fine or recovery, or joining with her husband in a conveyance thereof. An estoppel in pais can never be more effectual than by deed. And as Chloe A. could not have affected her interest in this property by her separate deed, of course she could not by an estoppel in pais. 2 Washb. Real Prop. p. 459.

The plea of estoppel is bad. But admitting that the wife's share of the donation was her separate estate, and that she could, by her acts in pais, estop herself from asserting her title thereto, the same as if she were a feme sole, the facts stated in the plea do not constitute an estoppel. They lack utterly the necessary and essential ingredients of intention to deceive on the part of Chloe A., and the want of knowledge, or all convenient means of acquiring it, on the part of Smith, Holman, Grover et al., concerning the true state of the title. The alleged sales of the property commenced in 1852 and ended in 1861. Chloe A. is not charged with anything more than simple acquiescence in relation to any of them except the one from Holman to Grover, which took place in 1853. As to this one, she is alleged to have advised the purchase, saying that Holman was the owner of the lot. Incidentally it appears from the plea that up to this time the donation had not been partitioned between the husband and wife. In what part of it her share would be assigned, she could not say or direct. The power of partition was vested in the surveyor-general, absolutely. Wythe v. Haskell [Case No. 18,118].

She may have thought he would so divide it as to bring this lot within the share of her husband and co-tenant, who, it appears, had sold the same, probably upon the same impression or expectation, before 1852. But if so, she was mistaken. The donation was divided so that the premises were included in her share, and thus it turned out that Holman was not the owner of the lot, and Grover acquired nothing by his purchase from him, nor even by his erection of a law-office thereon. Nor can anything be more improbable than that Mr. Grover, a distinguished lawyer, was misled by this casual opinion or expression of this unlearned feme covert, as to the true state of the title, or that he did not know, and had no better means of knowing than she, what was the legal effect of her husband's prior deed to this lot.

There was a time, commencing probably with Wendell v. Van Rensselaer (1815) 1 Johns. Ch. 353; when this doctrine of equitable estoppel, upon the seductive plea of promoting justice in particular cases, threatened to sweep away the statute of frauds and leave the right to real property to rest upon the precarious tenure of the uncertain and prejudiced testimony of ignorant and interested witnesses to the casual, stale and parol acts and declarations of parties no longer in existence or interested to maintain the title.

But since the announcement of the salutary rule contained in Hill v. Epley, 31 Pa. St. 334, and Boggs v. Merced Min. Co., 14 Cal. 367, this dangerous and indefinite doctrine has been brought within reasonable and safe limits again. As was said by this court, in McGuire v. Neff [unreported], December, 1875: "If such facts constitute an estoppel, then was the statute of frauds passed in vain, and paper titles are not worth the material upon which they are written. * * * Before a court of equity will estop a party from asserting his title to real property, it must be shown that there is some degree of turpitude in his conduct. To constitute an estoppel in pais in such a case, it must appear that the party sought to be estopped, with a knowledge of his rights in the premises, made some admission or declaration by word or deed, with an intention to deceive the party claiming the estoppel, or those under whom he claims, or with such carelessness or negligence as amounts to fraud; that the party alleged to have been misled was not only destitute of all knowledge of the true state of the title in question, but of all convenient means of acquiring such knowledge; and that he directly relied upon such admission or declaration, and will be injured by allowing its truth to be disproved." Boggs v. Merced Min. Co., 14 Cal. 367; Carpentier v. Thirston, 24 Cal. 268;

Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 38; Story, Eq. Jur. § 391; Fields v. Squires [Case No. 4,776].

At the date of this alleged declaration to Grover he had at least the same means of knowing as Mrs. Willson, that the husband's deed could not convey the wife's interest in the land, and that she herself could not convey it unless her husband joined in the deed for that purpose; that the surveyor-general had the absolute power to partition the donation between the husband and wife as he saw proper, and that then and since September 27, 1850, both Chloe A. and her husband were forbidden by the donation act to make any sale of the premises, and were therefore incapable of so doing, jointly or otherwise. She could not have intended to deceive him, and he could not have been misled by what she said—which at best was a mere expression of opinion about a matter of which he presumably was better informed than she. The facts stated do not constitute an estoppel, even if Chloe A. had then been a feme sole.

But if these facts constituted a sufficient equitable estoppel, it would not be a good defense to this action at law. In Adams v. Burke [Id. 49],—1875,—this court decided, after thorough argument and careful consideration of the question, that what is known as an equitable estoppel could not be pleaded in this state, and therefore not in this court, as a defense to an action of ejectment. At common law an estoppel in pais could only arise in the case of those solemn and peculiar acts to which the law gave the power of creating a right or passing an estate. Among these were feoffment and attornment. The instances given by Lord Coke are livery, entry, acceptance of rent, partition and acceptance of an estate. Subsequently, estoppels in pais were extended by courts of equity, until there grew up a class of estoppels called equitable estoppels in pais. Except in cases concerning the title to lands, in time these were recognized and allowed by courts of law; and in some of the United States without this exception. But I know of no act or decision in this state authorizing such practice, and it is to be hoped there never will be.

The plea of the statute of limitations appears to be sufficient on its face; but on the argument it was admitted and assumed that Chloe A. Willson was a feme covert, since prior to 1852 and down to a period less than twenty years before the commencement of this action. Admitting this fact, counsel for defendant maintained that this being her separate property the statute ran against her as if she was a feme sole. However this may be, the conclusion having been reached that this was not the wife's separate property, the argument based upon the contrary assumption falls with it.

But the statutes of limitations in force in this state since May 1, 1854, expressly provide that in the case of married woman to whom a cause of action accrues for the recovery of real property, the time of such disability or marriage shall not be counted as a part of the limitation. Code 1854, p. 172; Code 1876, p. 108. It is not apparent why these statutes do not apply to all married women, whether the property be her separate property or not. True, she might have sued alone for her separate property; but the exemption proceeds upon the theory that while she is under the disability of coverture, she is not in fact at liberty to sue without her husband's assent, even if the law will permit it. Now the husband may be a party to the disseisin and interested in having the bar of the statute established, and to prevent this possible wrong the law has provided without exception or qualification that the limitation upon a woman's right to sue for the recovery of her real property shall not run during coverture.

The demurrer is sustained as to the plea of estoppel and overruled as to the rest of the answer. If the plaintiff wishes to avail himself of the disability of Chloe A., during her husband's life-time, he must reply to the plea of the statute and set up the coverture.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—COMBINATION LOCKS—CONSTRUCTION OF CLAIMS.

1. The two different classes of combination locks, explained.

2. In the reissued patent granted to Linus Yale, Jr., April 28th, 1863, for an "improvement in locks," the second claim, which is: "In combination with a pack or series of tumblers set separately and in succession, I claim a vibrating fence and a bolt, and a proper stop against which the fence may abut, the whole being and operating substantially as set forth," is applicable only to the class of locks in which the tumblers are set separately and in succession, under the exclusive control of the operator, and subject to his discretion, as distinguished from the class of locks in which the tumblers are all set at one time, by fixed mechanism.

3. The nature of the invention covered by said second claim, defined.

4. Such invention was new with the patentee, and the said reissued patent is valid.

[Cited in brief in Locomotive Engine Safety Truck Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., Case No. 8,453.]

5. The combination covered by said second claim is a combination of the bolt, the vibrating fence, the stop and the tumblers.

6. Such claim is not invalidated by the prior existence of a combination in which the tumblers were set at the same time, by fixed mechanism.

7. Where a defendant, in a suit in equity, was held to have infringed one claim of a patent, and another claim of the patent was held not to have been new, no costs were allowed to either party.

8. A reference being made to a master to take an account, an injunction was withheld until the coming in of his report.

the Yale and Greenleaf Manufacturing Company, September 21, 1861.

[The claims of the original patent were as follows: "1. The piece E (key) or its equivalent used in the manner, or an equivalent manner, and for the purpose substantially as described. 2. The parts D, D, D, D (tumblers), or their equivalents, receiving motion in the manner substantially as described. 3. The piece C (fence) or its equivalent, with its arm g, for the purpose and object described."

[The specification of the reissued patent was as follows: "Be it known, that I, Linus Yale, Jr., formerly of Philadelphia, but now residing at Shelburne Falls, Massachusetts, have invented certain new and useful improvements in that class of locks in which each tumbler is set separately to its proper position by a key, or its equivalent, or by hand as in alphabetical or index locks, as distinguished from or contrasted with that class of locks in which all the tumblers are set at one time, or nearly so, by the action of a key or bit, and I declare the following to be a full, clear, and exact description of my improvements, reference being had to the drawings, in which: Figure 1 is an elevation of the lock, one side of the case being removed. Figure 2 is a section through the lock on the line x y of figure 1. Figure 3 is a section through the key curb. Figure 4 is a detail view of the bolt and bolt-lever or keeper. Figure 5 is a plan of one of the washers. In this lock I have introduced several improvements, the principal ones relating first to the method of operating the tumblers, and, secondly to the method of preventing picking. In this class of locks difficulty is often experienced in setting the tumblers; imperfect sight of the operator, or want of light, or a wrong position of the eye, preventing the indices usually employed from being brought to the exact spot which they must assume before the tumblers are adjusted, and the lock can be unlocked. In order to obviate this defect I have combined a tumbler with a revolving tooth on a separate shaft, the combination being such that a whole revolution of a tooth moves the tumbler only through the angular distance between two of its consecutive notches. Locks of this class have also been picked by new processes impossible to describe fully except in a specification of inordinate length, but depending for their success upon distinguishing one tumbler from the others, and the difference between false and true notches, or either of them, by forcing the stump against the tumblers, and noting the position of an index attached to the instrument, whatever it may be, that retracts or tends to retract the bolt, and I have remedied this defect in this class of locks, by combining with tumblers, set or adjusted separately and in succession, a bolt and vibrating stump or fence attached thereto, said fence acting to stop the motion of the bolt at one and the same point irrespective of the precise tumbler or precise notch of a tumbler against which the stump is forced. In this lock the bolt is shown at B, and is guided as usual by the gate in the rim, and, by two pins a1, a2. In the bolt is an aperture, b, permitting it to slide past the post a. The post a is strongly secured to, or made in one piece with the lock-plate A, and is a cylinder with one side flattened; this flattening is merely to prevent the washers 1, 2, 3, 4 from revolving. Upon the post are packed the tumblers D, D, D, free to revolve thereon, and between the tumblers are the washers, the whole pack of washers and tumblers being held in place by a stout washer H, secured by a spring ring I taking into a groove on top of the post. These tumblers are gated or deeply notched as at d, for the entrance of the stump, and have also false notches surrounding them as at 1', 2', 3', etc. Such notches also serving as cog-teeth, by means of which each tumbler can be revolved. These notches extend all around the tumblers, except at one spot, as at d'', where their original rim is left uncut, so as to secure a point of departure from which to count the position of the stump notch when the tumblers are revolved. The bolt has pivoted to it at b4 an ordinary guard tumbler G, held in abutment against the pin a2, which serves as a stop for this tumbler. Upon the bolt B and b2 is the vibrating safety fence C—part of this fence at c serves as an ordinary stump, and inserted in the bolt is a spring-pin b5, which bears against the stump and holds its end g out of contact with the top a': if the lock is put on the door with the side at x upward this pin is unnecessary, as the force of gravity will then keep the end g depressed. Near the tumblers is secured in the lock the key curb F, free to revolve and bored out and slotted from end to end, for the passage of the revolving tooth which sets the tumblers and also serves as a bolt mover; the shape of this tooth and its shaft are clearly shown in the drawings, and on its shaft are turned a series of grooves whose distance from center to center is the same with that of the tumblers, and into these grooves takes a spring-pin attached to the curb, and clearly shown in fig. 3. This pin permits the key to be shoved out and in within the case of the lock, and serves to determine the position of the tooth, so that the tumbler upon which it is acting may be known. The distances between the true notches or gates into which the bolt stump must enter before the lock can be unlocked, and the blank spot on the periphery of the tumblers, varying in each tumbler, and the number of tumblers may vary from two upward. In order to unlock the lock, one of the tumblers is to be turned by the revolving tooth operated by the crank until the blank is felt; when the tooth strikes the blank, further revolution in the same direction is impossible. The key is then to be shoved in or pulled out and another tumbler set in the same way until all the blanks lie over each other, then by acting on each tumbler separately, each one is to be revolved by the crank and tooth until the gate or true notch comes opposite the stump on the bolt; the necessary amount of revolution being known and depending upon the construction of each tumbler, or, in other words, the number of notches between the blank spot and the true gate. The key is then shoved in and turned so as to lift the guard tumblers; hold it lifted; take into the talons b3 and retract the bolt; in so doing the stump c will enter the true notches. Now, it will be noted that each tumbler is moved separately, and when adjusted remains in the position for the stump to enter without being held in place by the key, thus differing from that class of locks in which the tumblers are lifted all at once and held in position by a key or bits while the lock bolt is being retracted. It will also be observed that a whole revolution of the crank and tooth only turns each tumbler one notch, no index on the crank is therefore needed, all that is necessary being to count the turns of the crank, and it makes no difference whether the crank commences to turn from a precise spot or finishes its revolution at a precise spot, so long as it moves through such a portion of a revolution as will turn the tumbler upon which it is acting through the angular distance between two notches.

["This arrangement therefore dispenses with indices, permits opening of the door in the dark as well as in the light, and obviates the difficulties arising from imperfect vision, or false position of the eye of the operator. In case a lock is attempted to be opened by a person not knowing the true set of the tumblers and the relative angular position between the blanks d'' and the true notches, he must endeavor to set the tumblers experimentally, and then ascertain whether their arrangement is correct by forcing the bolt backward; when he does so, the stump as soon as it touches any tumbler will compress the spring and locate its long end (the fence) against the stop a', thus preventing the bolt from retracting further, and always bringing it up against the stop a' and at exactly the same point of retraction, no matter what tumbler or part of a tumbler it touches. This peculiarity of the sameness of range of motion of the bolt when forced back effectually prevents a lockpicker from distinguishing between the different tumblers, or discovering their true set, or that arrangement of the gates which will alone permit the bolt to be retracted.

In locking, the bolt is to be shot, and the tumblers are then, by means of the tooth, to be moved so that their true notches are no longer opposite the stump. I claim as of my own invention:

["First. The combination of a revolving tumbler with a revolving tooth; the two being relatively arranged so that a revolution of the latter moves the former only through the angular distance from one of its teeth to the next in succession, the combination being substantially such as described.

["Second. In combination with a pack or series of tumblers set separately and in succession, I claim a vibrating fence and a bolt, and a proper stop against which the fence may abut, the whole being and operating substantially as set forth; and, lastly, I claim in combination a revolving tooth, a pack or series of tumblers, a vibrating fence and a bolt, the whole operating substantially as herein before specified.

C. M. Keller and E. W. Stoughton, for complainants.

George Gifford, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. [This is a bill for an injunction to restrain the respondent from infringing certain alleged rights of the complainants, and is founded upon a reissued patent numbered 1,470, granted to one of the complainants, Linus Yale, Jr., and dated April 28, 1863. The other complainants, the Yale & Greenleaf Manufacturing Company, are the sole and exclusive licensees of Linus Yale, Jr., under this patent. The patent is for an alleged new and useful improvement in locks, and embraces three claims.]³

Of the three claims in this patent only two are involved in the present controversy, and the main struggle between the parties relates to the second. The object of the alleged invention, embraced in this second claim, is declared, in the body of the specification, to be, to prevent the picking of the lock. This claim is stated in the following language: "In combination with a pack or series of tumblers, set separately and in succession, I claim a vibrating fence and a bolt, and a proper stop against which the fence may abut, the whole being and operating substantially as set forth."

The specification, in describing the state of the art at the date of the invention, and the alleged improvements made by the patentee, distinguishes combination locks as capable of being separated into two classes—the first class embracing those "locks in which each tumbler is set separately, in its proper position, by a key or its equivalent, or by hand, as in alphabetical or index locks;" and the second class embracing those "locks in which all the tumblers are set at one time, or nearly so, by the action of a key or bit." It is to the first class only that the alleged improvements of the patentee are declared to be applicable. This distinction between these two classes of locks has an important bearing on the main question to be determined in this case. It is set forth in the specification, and was insisted on by the plaintiffs, at the hearing, for the purpose of marking the line of separation between what is alleged to be a new combination and what is admitted to be old. The novelty of the invention embraced in the second claim depends, therefore, upon the verity and validity of this distinction, as will be seen hereafter. Whether the combination described in the second claim is patentable, when considered apart from this question of novelty, is another and different matter, and will be discussed when we consider that point as separately presented by the defendant.

Locks, in their ordinary construction and use, are susceptible of being plainly separated into two classes. One class, which, for convenience, we will continue to denominate the first, is that in which the tumblers are so constructed and arranged that they are set separately and in succession, by bringing the gates of the tumblers, one by one, from different points, into a line, for the fence to enter, so that the bolt may be retracted. This setting of the tumblers separately, for the retraction of the bolt, presupposes, of course, that the tumblers have been disarranged after locking, upon a combination fixed by, and known to, the locker. Having thrown forward the bolt and disarranged the tumblers to a selected combination, the locking is complete, and, whatever security the mechanism affords against illicit opening is attained. By reversing the motion of the tumblers exactly according to the same combination, the gates are all brought again in a line with the fence, and the bolt can be retracted. In this class of locks the key-hole is dispensed with. No aperture is left in the case, through which the lock can be picked with an instrument, or into which explosive substances for blowing it open, or coloring matter for taking an impression of its internal structure, can be passed. There is no key to be lost or duplicated. In this class of locks, the tumblers may be said to be passive, and move through a wide range of motion, operated by a locking instrument, or the human hand, uncontrolled by springs or catches. The operator disarranges and sets or rearranges them, according to a combination formed in his own mind, and by his own discretion.

The second class of locks is operated by a key or bit passed through a key-hole in the lock case. This key takes up the tumblers simultaneously, or nearly so, in a mass, and carries them forward to a common point, where the fence can enter the gates, and the bolt be thrown forward or retracted, when the key is withdrawn from pressing against the tumblers, and the latter, by force of gravity or springs, are carried back to their original positions. The tumblers are carried forward to one fixed point by force of the operating hand, and return to the other fixed point by force of gravity or springs. All this is done, not in accordance with a rule originating and resting in the mind of the operator alone, but in accordance with a fixed rule resting in and limited by the mechanism. By this rigid mechanical law, the tumblers are both set and disarranged. The discretion or intelligence of the operator cannot vary the operation of the lock, except by changing the wards of the locking instrument to a different combination. The lock is more or less accessible through the hole in the case or door. Through this aperture, picking instruments can be introduced by the thief, or explosive materials for blowing it off, or coloring or plastic matter for the purpose of obtaining an impression of its internal construction or condition.

In the first class of locks, all these means of illicit access and information are cut off, by dispensing with the key-hole, and setting the tumblers separately, each one by itself, and distributing the gates upon a combination resting wholly in the knowledge and discretion of the operator, and not in the mechanism of the lock or key. Tumblers of this character are different mechanical devices or instruments from those of the second class, and accomplish very different and more complete results. They are flexible and obedient servants of secrecy and intelligence, upon which the security of locks greatly depends. These tumblers, combined with various other parts of locks, are old and well known. Their introduction formed an important era in this branch of invention. But, while they dispensed with the key-hole and removable key, and thus got rid of several means through which the bolt could be illicitly reached and controlled, it is said that they did not always baffle the thief, and that he could still communicate with, and draw information from, the interior of the lock, by the sense of feeling applied directly to the tumblers, or indirectly through the parts of the lock which communicated with the bolt and tumblers. Even where the hand of the burglar, however practised and sensitive, applied to the instrument for retracting the bolt, could detect no variations in the tumblers, and, therefore, could not bring the gates into line and present them to the fence, it is said that a delicate instrument, capable of measuring minute variations, could be attached to the part where the force was to be applied for moving the bolt, and thus the position of each notch or gate could be made known, and brought to the place necessary in order to free the bolt, and enable the operator to throw it back. It is obvious that, to overcome this defect, the tumblers, when any attempt is made to feel out their positions, must be isolated from all those parts of the locks which have any connection, either directly or indirectly, with the hand of the thief, or to which a measuring instrument can be applied. The parts, or connection of parts, through which intelligence of the position of the notches in the tumblers is communicated to the operator outside, must be cut somewhere. To accomplish this was the object of the combination described in the second claim of the patent in question. The patentee combined this class of tumblers with a vibrating fence, a bolt, and a stop against which one arm of the fence strikes when an attempt is made to retract the bolt. After the bolt is thrown forward, and the tumblers are disarranged, and the locking is thus completed, an attempt to retract the bolt brings one arm of the fence against the edge of the tumblers, and throws the other arm in a line with and against the stop, always at the same point of retraction. This retracting pressure on the bolt, by which one end of the vibrating fence is brought against the stop, relieves the pressure of the other end of the vibrating fence on the edge of the tumblers. The absence of pressure, and the uniformity of the range of motion of the bolt each time it is attempted to be thrown back, prevents the operator from distinguishing one tumbler from another, or discovering their set, or the relation of one gate to the other. He has, therefore, nothing left to guide his efforts to bring the gates in line, so that the fence will enter and the bolt pass back to its unlocked position. After the bolt is thrown forward, and the tumblers are disarranged to a combination existing only in the mind of the locker, every effort of a stranger must result only in retracting the bolt through uniform motions fixed by the stop, against which one arm of the fence abuts. No pressure can aid him in his attempts to distinguish the tumblers, for the fence conveys no information either to the hand or to a measuring instrument, as to the position of any one tumbler, or its relations to the rest, or the relative positions of any one or of the whole to the point to which all must come, in order to effectually throw back the bolt.

The proofs do not show that this combination of the vibrating fence, bolt, and stop with this class of tumblers was ever made until it was done by this patentee. Locks with this class of tumblers, having various combinations and devices intended to baffle the thief, are numerous. To describe and discuss these would prolong this opinion and shed no light on the vital point of this controversy, for, in none of them is found this simple combination of the tumblers, fence, bolt and stop, so arranged as to check the backward motion of the bolt and isolate the tumblers at the same time, and thus protect the tumblers from any adjustment by a stranger that would enable him to pick the lock.

On the question of the discrimination of tumblers into two classes, as set forth in the patent, proof was introduced by the defendant, which he claimed was evidence that no such classification could be properly made. By an ingeniously constructed key, for locking and unlocking tumblers of the second class, these tumblers were picked up separately, one by one, and carried to the point where the bolt could be thrown forward and retracted, and held there by the key. It was insisted, that the success of this experiment demonstrated that the tumblers of these locks could be set separately and in succession, and therefore, that the distinction which was attempted to be made in the different classes of tumblers, in this particular, was purely imaginary. The true answer to this is to be found in the fact, that the terms "set separately and in succession," as used in the second claim of the patent, as well as similar words in the body of the specification, refer not merely to their separate and successive movement, but to their separate movement and adjustment under the exclusive control of the operator—to combinations resting entirely in his own discretion. The tumblers that are distinguished from these, in the specification, are those which are controlled in their movements, not by the mere discretion of the locker, but by the law of their mechanism.

Experiments were also performed to show that the tumblers on the plaintiffs' lock, could, from a certain point, be thrown forward and set simultaneously. But they had to be picked up first separately and carried to a given point, before the mass could be operated upon simultaneously. In practical use, one class have always been set simultaneously, and the other separately, and the descriptive terms of the patent followed the language which naturally had grown out of that use. The ingenious experiments here referred to do not change the nature or functions of the different species of tumblers, or obliterate the distinctions which legitimately pertain to them.

It was insisted, on the hearing, that the reissued patent was false and fraudulent and improperly issued. But, no such issue is raised by the pleadings, nor is there anything in the proofs that would warrant the court in sustaining such an objection.

A more important point urged by the defence, and one directly involved, is that which relates to the construction of the second claim of this patent. It is insisted, that this claim purports to be for a combination of mechanism for preventing the picking of a lock, with the fact, or act, or means of setting the tumblers. If the claim were to receive this construction, it would fail, for it would be an absurdity. The manner of setting the tumblers can form no part of the combination. A combination in mechanism must consist of distinct mechanical parts, having some relation to each other, and each having some function in the organism. The combination embraced in this claim consists of the bolt, vibrating fence, stop and tumblers. These four distinct parts are brought together and into proper relation to each other, for the purpose of attaining more perfect security against any illicit opening of the lock.

But, it is claimed that this construction destroys the patent, because this combination was made in the Edwards and Stephenson locks, long before the alleged date of Yale's invention. This would be a conclusive answer to the suit were not the tumblers in the Edwards and Stephenson locks a different mechanical device from those in the locks of the patentee and of the defendant. The defendant insists, that the only difference is in the mere fact, that in one they are all set at the same time, or nearly the same time, and in the other they are set one by one. But, as already intimated, these two classes of tumblers are constructed and operate upon different principles, and reach very different results. One is constructed to, and does, operate only upon fixed mechanical laws, limited and controlled by mechanical devices. The other is made to operate at the discretion of the locker, and thus become the secret instrument of his intelligence, controlled alone by his will and purpose. The latter are, therefore, sufficiently unlike the former to form a novel element in a combination, where they are introduced into that combination for the first time.

The proofs show that Yale was the first to combine such a pack of tumblers with a bolt, vibrating fence, and stop for the fence to abut against, substantially as set forth in his patent. This combination is found in the defendant's lock. It has these four elements in the same combination. It has, also, a different and much more perfect mechanism for setting the tumblers and throwing the bolt. Indeed, the lock of the defendant is, in every way, a much superior piece of mechanism to that of the plaintiffs, but, as it embraces the precise combination first introduced by Yale, it is an infringement of his second claim.

As to the first claim of the plaintiffs' patent, it cannot be sustained, in its present form at least, for the same combination is found in the prior patent of Isham. A decree must, therefore, be rendered for the defendant on this issue.

As there is to be a decree in favor of each party on one issue, no costs will be allowed to either party. An account being prayed for, there will be a reference to a master to take proofs and report the amount which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. The decree for an injunction will be withheld till the coming in of the master's report.

Circuit Court, N. D. California. Jan. Term, 1859.²

MARINE TORT—WHAT CONSTITUTES—ABDUCTION AND DEPORTATION—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

1. Where a tort is a continued act and not separable, and a portion is committed on land and the remainder on the high seas, the jurisdiction of it attaches to the common-law courts.

2. But if the tortious act originates in port, and is not a perfected wrong until the vessel leaves the port, it is a continuous act and travels with the tort-feasor and the injured party during the whole voyage, and comes within the jurisdiction of the admiralty upon the principle enunciated in certain cases, that if a thing be taken on the high seas and brought to land, it is appropriate to a court of admiralty to decide the question as a marine tort.

[Cited in The Florence, Case No. 4,880.]

3. The torts in this case having been committed by different persons, and in different places, are separable.

4. The action for the trespasses committed by the parties on land is cognizable in the courts of common-law.

5. That committed by the party now sued, is within the jurisdiction of admiralty as a marine tort.

6. It originated on waters within the ebb and flow of the tide within the admiralty jurisdiction, and was continued on the high seas. Such locality gives the jurisdiction.

7. The law implies a corrupt motive in the perpetration of a tort by one who commits it in the departure from a known duty and in wanton violation of law.

8. In cases of contract the motive of defendant is not inquired into, to increase the compensation to be made by him.

9. In torts the malicious intention may be said to increase the injury.

Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Northern district of California.

A libel was filed in the said court in rem and in personam, and objections filed to the jurisdiction of the court. The exception to the jurisdiction in rem was sustained; and the jurisdiction as to the proceeding in personam was maintained, and the exception to it overruled. The court rendered a decision on the merits, against the respondent, for the sum of three thousand dollars [Case No. 5,196], from which the present appeal has been prosecuted.

Delos Lake, for appellants.

J. B. Manchester, for defendant.

McALLISTER, District Judge. The two questions which arise are—(1) As to the jurisdiction of this court of the present proceeding in personam. (2) As to the amount of damages.

The libel propounds that on the 25th May, 1856, in the city of San Francisco, while engaged in the discharge of his duties as night watchman, in the service of the government of the United States, at about 8 o'clock p. m., libelant was seized upon by armed men; that he represented to them that he was in the discharge of his duties as a watchman in the employment of the United States; that, notwithstanding, he was compelled to accompany his captors; that they carried him to a place in the city of San Francisco known as the "Vigilance Committee-Rooms," where he was delivered to another body of armed men, and by them confined in a cell. After remaining there several days, without being informed of any charge of any specific offense; without having been confronted with any accuser or witness; a document was read to him which he was told was his sentence, in the following words: "You, Martin Gallagher, are a rioter, or disturber of the public peace, a promoter of quarrels at the polls on days of election. You are a bad man, and you are banished from the state of California, never to return under the severest penalties." That, about midnight on the 5th June, 1856, a party of armed men came to the cell where libelant was confined, put irons upon him, took him to the rear of the building, where they were joined by a larger party of armed men, who directed that no noise or speech should take place, marched him with other prisoners to California-street wharf, and put them on board a small tug called the Hercules, with a guard of armed men. The tug ran alongside the ship Carrier Dove, towed her to sea, returned and "lay to" on the bar; that when the Yankee, standing out to sea, came opposite the Hercules, she "hove to," and the armed men on board the Hercules compelled libelant to get with others into a small boat, in which they were conveyed on board the Yankee, of which the respondent was at the time master. The small boat remained so short a time alongside the Yankee, that, in the language of one of the respondent's witnesses, "there was not time to speak half a dozen words from the time they came on board until I left in the boat." The Yankee went immediately to sea, and the libelant was carried off, and landed on a foreign shore in the Sandwich Islands.

Of the truth of the foregoing facts there can be little doubt. Several witnesses who had been members of the vigilance committee, among them George R. Ward, who is stated in the libel to have been the person who announced to the libelant, in his cell, the so-called sentence, were sworn, and still no material fact of the foregoing is denied by any one of them. That sentence is ascertained to have been issued by a body of men authorized by no law, and who substituted their private judgments for the action of those judicial tribunals to which the constitution and laws of their country had confided solely the distribution of justice. With the motives of those who thus acted, this court has nothing to do. With their acts, so far as they bear upon this case, it is its duty to deal. It is, therefore, constrained to attribute to those acts, and to the conduct of the respondent so far as it is connected with them, the character which the law annexes to them and to it. It is for the transportation and abduction of the libelant from his country to a foreign shore, with a view to carry out the proceedings of that unauthorized body, that he has appealed for the vindication of his rights to the laws of his country.

The first ground taken in defense to this appeal, is want of jurisdiction in this court. Under this ground, the first proposition presented by the argument for the defense is, "that all these statements cannot be set forth as matters of aggravation nor be treated as surplusage, and the court be thus enabled to confine its action to that part of the case which has reference to the injuries committed on the high seas; or in other words, it is asked, what is the gravamen of this action?" "How can it be said that the imprisonment at sea constitutes the gist of the action, and not the seizure and imprisonment on land? If it were possible to separate them, one would as clearly appear to be the ground of action as the other; and where it is impossible to separate them, for the reason that there is one continued trespass and false imprisonment, it is not quite as clear that the one is as much the gravamen of the action as the other." Again, "can the libelant maintain two separate actions, one for the injuries suffered on land, and the other for the injuries suffered on the high seas?" Lastly, to sustain this last point, and also that a single tort will maintain but one action, various common-law authorities from New York, and one from Massachusetts, have been cited. The court disposes of this point and the authorities with the remark, that it admits the legal proposition they are cited to support, but does not, for the reasons it will give, consider the law enunciated by it applicable to this case.

The last ground taken to which we shall advert is, that the acts of defendant Smith constitute but one cause of action; and that part of such cause being exclusively of common-law jurisdiction, this court cannot act on any part of it as a court of admiralty. It will be perceived that the argument of defendant's proctor is in the form of interrogatories. A response to an argument thus propounded, must be replied to by stating the views entertained of this case by the court in one condensed answer.

1. The court does not propose to treat the acts set forth in the libel as done by third parties on the land as surplusage, nor as part of the tort charged upon the respondent; but to consider and to retain them as matters of inducement, as facts going to aggravate the character of the offense committed by the present party, and as serving to show the animus with which he acted in the commission of the marine tort for which only he is sued. It is difficult to perceive why the court cannot so consider them. To illustrate, suppose a libel filed against a master for maltreatment and cruelty towards a passenger, would not the previous condition of the passenger on shore, his protracted sufferings and illness, and the knowledge of all this by the master, and his advice to the patient to go with him to sea for the improvement of his health be matters proper to be alleged and proved to qualify the character of the tort and the motives of the perpetrator? The respondent is called to answer for his own acts, not for those of third parties on the land prior to the time at which he began to violate the rights of the libelant. It is urged that the cause of action in this case cannot be separated, because there is one continued trespass and false imprisonment. The court cannot perceive against the present respondent but one cause of action, the abduction of the libelant against his will, and the transfer of him to a foreign land. There are cases where the perpetrator of the tort is the author and architect of the whole, in which the tort is regarded as a unit, as a continued act. They have no application to this case. Thus, in Plummer v. Webb [Case No. 11,233], where the tort was the abduction by a master of a vessel of a minor, and damages were sought, Judge Story says: "Here, it is true, the tortious act, or cause of damage, might be properly deemed to arise in port; but it was a continuing act and cause of damage. * * * It was in no just sense a complete and perfected wrong, until the departure of the vessel from the port; and it traveled along with the parties as a continuing injury through the whole voyage." In Rolle, Abr. 533, cited in the last case, it is said: "If a man take a thing upon the sea, and bring it to land, the suit for that may be in the admiralty court; for it is a continued act." Continued by whom? Certainly by the original tort-feasor. In Dean v. Angus [Case No. 3,702] it is decided of a single tort, if such act be partly of common law, and partly of admiralty jurisdiction, the common-law courts are to be preferred. But no one of these cases, nor the common-law cases cited from New York, touches the case at bar. Here, the respondent is sued for transportation of the libelant to a foreign shore against his consent. The act from its locality, is clearly within the jurisdiction of this court. It commenced on waters within the ebb and flow of the tide, and was continued on the high seas. In Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441, the supreme court decided that in cases where admiralty jurisdiction depends on locality, it extends to all torts committed on the high seas, or within the ebb and flow of the tide as far up a river as the tide ebbs and flows, although the place be infra comitatus. In this case, the tort originated and was carried out by the respondent at a locality which brings it within the jurisdiction of admiralty as a marine tort. The decision of the district judge on the exception to the jurisdiction of the court, must be affirmed.

2. We now come to the question of damages. In its adjustment, some embarrassment arises out of the difficulty which exists in keeping distinct from the great wrongs done to libelant by other parties, those committed on him by the present party. Testimony was given in the district court as to the character of libelant, without any objection. In the view the court entertains of this case, the consideration of the libelant's character should not influence to any extent the determination of the question of damages on the trial of this issue. In fact the district judge has repudiated the loss of character in his estimate of damages; for he states in his opinion, that the same "cannot be properly said to be the consequence of that portion of the torts committed upon him, of which a maritime court can take cognizance."

After a consideration of the testimony, the district judge says: "It is but just to say, that the charge that the reputation of the libelant was notoriously bad, that he was always engaged in election rows, and ballot-box stuffing, is not only unsustained by the evidence as to what his character was, but unsupported by any testimony as to particular facts which might have justly given him that character." But suppose the reputation of libelant to have been good, it was not blasted by his abduction, or any alleged wrong done on the high seas, but by the action of third parties. It was the sentence of the vigilance committee which branded him with the mark of Cain. The mere fact of transportation by the respondent could not have wrought the moral ruin on the libelant, he therefore should not be made responsible for it. If on the contrary, the reputation of libelant was bad, and he was a bad man, an evil doer, such fact could not justify or legalize the action of his self-constituted judges. The law does not even regard malefactors in such a light. A distinguished writer has well said: "The law withdraws its protection from a malefactor while actually engaged in illegal acts; but at any other moment, it protects his person and property as impartially as those of others. If a burglar breaks into my house, or a pick-pocket thrusts his hands into my pocket, I may on the instant knock him down. But, if I break into a notorious felon's house, and rob him, I am just as great a felon in the law's eye as if I so robbed an honest citizen; and so, if I attack a burglar's or a pickpocket's person and life at any moment when he is not feloniously engaged, I am none the less a villain in the law's clear eye because my villainy is aimed at a habitual villain. And here the law is not only just but expedient; for were such fatal partialities admitted, we would soon advance from doing acts of villainy upon villains to calling any one a villain and then wronging him."

With the motives of those, as before stated, who pronounced the sentence which was carried into execution by the respondent, this court has nothing to do; but it is its duty to apply to these acts in connection with the issue of damages in this case, the consequences which the law annexes to them. In order to do so, it is necessary to ascertain whether the respondent knew what had been done to the libelant, and that he willingly lent himself to the execution of the so-called sentence. That he was aware of what he was doing; that he acted with his eyes open; that he knew an illegally condemned man was in his possession to be transported from his country, the evidence satisfies me, has been proved. The existence of the vigilance committee was open, public, notorious; the results of their action were at the time known to every man, woman, and child in San Francisco. If the respondent knew nothing of it, he was the only human being in the city who did not. But the fact that the steamer Hercules lay to, with the libelant on board, in the harbor; that the respondent, master of the Yankee, went within one hundred and fifty yards of the steamer, made a tack, came right close up to her and threw the main-yard aback, and remained until a boat came to her from the Hercules with the prisoner on board; the presence of armed men in time of profound peace; the precipitation with which the delivery on board was made (one of the witnesses for the respondent—Abbott—stated that "there was not time enough to speak half a dozen words from the time they came on board until I left in the boat"); the instant filling away the sails and departure of the ship,—are all facts to prove that respondent's action was voluntary. But if there could be any doubt of the complete understanding by the respondent that he was carrying out the behests of the vigilance committee, it is removed by the fact that he received money for the act he was about to commit. Geo. R. Ward states he did not engage the passage himself, but he knows that the passage was paid. Another witness swears that respondent said, "that arrangements had been made for our passage." There can be little doubt that the act of the respondent was voluntary, in full knowledge of the position in which the libelant stood at the time of his being brought on board, and that he also had a foreknowledge of what was to be done by him. What effect this will have on the subject of damages must be considered hereafter. In the assessment of damages a marked distinction exists between cases of contract and tort. In the former, the motive of the defendant is not inquired into in order to augment the remuneration to be made by him. In the latter, the absence of evil motive cannot be set up as an excuse so as to bar the action. I "had learned," said Lord Kenyon, "from Bacon's Maxims, that there is a distinction between answering civiliter and criminaliter for acts injurious to others: in the latter case, the maxim applied, 'actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea,' but it is otherwise in civil actions where the intent is immaterial if the act be injurious to another." Haycraft v. Creasy, 2 East, 104. If, therefore, the transportation were a mere trespass, unaccompanied by no evil motive, the absence of such motive would be no bar to the action. But where the law imputes a corrupt intention to the party, then the question of exemplary damages arises in addition to damages merely actual.

Sedgwick, in his treatise on Damages, says: "The malicious intention may be said to increase, in fact, the injury; and the doctrine of exemplary damages might be reconciled with the strict notion of compensation." The author then proceeds to cite cases to prove that the idea of compensatory damages was abandoned, and that of punitive introduced. Sedg. Dam. 456. But a preliminary inquiry arises: does the law impute malice or a corrupt motive to the respondent in the tort he has committed? When the libellant stood before the respondent on the deck of an American ship, of which he, the respondent, was master, under the circumstances heretofore detailed, he (the respondent) must have known that to carry the libellant off, against his consent, and land him on a foreign strand, was "a willful departure from a known duty." There can be no doubt of this; and, if so, it was proof of malice and an evil motive. In the case of U. S. v. Cutler [Case No. 14,910], speaking of the term "malice," as used in the act of March 3, 1835 [4 Stat. 775], which punishes the offense of a master inflicting cruel and unusual punishment upon a seaman, the court say, that the word "malice" means "a willful departure from a known duty." But again, if the respondent knew the act was unlawful and did it intending to take the consequences, such wanton violation of law fixes upon him a malicious and corrupt motive. This principle is enunciated and was applied to the defendant in that case, who had resorted to a mode of punishment inhibited by law. If, in such a case, the violation of law is deemed per se proof of malice, a fortiori it should be annexed to the act of the present respondent, who availed himself of the protection of his country's flag, his character as an American citizen, and his position as a master of an American bottom, to violate in the person of an American citizen (however humble he may be), the constitution and laws of his country. This "willful departure from a known duty," "this wanton violation of law," authorize the assessment of exemplary damages. In Huckle v. Money, 2 Wils. 205, the action was for trespass, assault, and imprisonment; the act complained of being the arrest of the plaintiff under a general warrant. No actual ill treatment was alleged. A verdict for £300 damages was rendered; and a new trial was moved on the ground of excessive damages. Lord Justice Pratt made the following decision: "I know not what damages I should have given, if I had been upon the jury; but I directed and told them, that they were not bound to any certain damages. The personal injury done to the plaintiff was very small, so that if the jury had been confined to consider the mere personal injury, why, perhaps, £20 would have been thought sufficient; but the small injury done to the plaintiff, or the inconsiderableness of his life and station, did not appear to the jury in that striking light in which the great point of law touching the liberty of the subject appeared to them on the trial; they saw a magistrate over all the king's subjects exercising arbitrary power, violating magna charta by destroying the liberty of the subject by insisting upon the validity of this general warrant before them; they saw the king's counsel and the solicitor of the treasury endeavoring to support and maintain the legality of the warrant in a tyrannical and severe manner. These are the ideas which struck the jury on the trial; and I think they have done right in giving exemplary damages." If under the British monarchy a willful violation of law in the person of a British subject, is regarded by the judiciary as a case for exemplary damages, this court cannot consider that a much grosser violation of law in the person of an American citizen should be deemed by the courts of this country as fully recompensed by an amount in dollars and cents which may cover the actual loss of time and expenses of the injured man. In the case referred to, the amount of personal injury was small, an arrest of a few days, to be compensated for sufficiently by £20. The plaintiff acted under the color of legal process issued under the sanction of constituted authorities; and yet the gross violation of law was visited by exemplary damages to an amount nearly fifteen times the value of the actual damages.

There is another consideration which must receive the attention of this court, which controls its action in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. On this point, in the case of McGuire v. The Golden Gate [Case No. 8,815], decided at the July term, 1856, it was said "that ordinarily this court does not interfere with the amount of damages decreed by the court below. The district judge has the witnesses before him, and, therefore, has an opportunity of arriving at the truth, not within the grasp of this court, where the testimony is in writing. When, therefore, no additional testimony is taken,

I do not feel inclined hastily to disturb a decree on the point of damages." Certainly, in a case where it appeared that manifest injustice had been done in the assessment of damages, or error in law had been committed, it would be the duty of this court to interpose. I can see none such in this case. The libellant was carried off against his consent from home and country, and was by that act divested of his means of support, deprived of an office under the government which gave him a monthly income of $130, was held falsely imprisoned for upwards of a month. All these wrongs traveled with him and the tortfeasor during the voyage, and were consummated by landing him some thousands of miles from home, amid strangers, in a foreign country, with his indorsement, that he was a man unfit to live in a civilized country,—an hostis humani generis. And all this was done by respondent in violation "of a known duty," and in wanton contempt and violation of law. I, therefore, cannot say that injustice has been done in the assessment of damages by the district court. A decree will be drafted affirming the decree of the district court, and handed to the judge for signature.

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. May 15, 1876.

USURY AS DEFENSE—RIGHT TO SET UP—AFFIRMATIVE RELIEF—RULE IN EQUITY.

1. The general rule is, that a stranger cannot set up usury as a defense, and that the transaction can only be impeached by the borrower or those in privity with him.

2. The case in 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 205, is the later adjudication of the supreme court, and apparently strikes at the root of the general rule above stated.

3. The rule in equity is well established that affirmative relief against a usurious contract will be granted only upon condition that the plaintiff pay the defendant the amount of money advanced, or at least allow a decree therefor.

The original bill was filed on the 20th day of May, 1875, in the chancery court of Shelby county, Tennessee, by T. W. Yardley as owner of three bonds for $1,000 each, of an issue of 600 bonds for $1,000 each, made by the Memphis Water Company, and secured by a trust deed or mortgage of the franchises and property of the company made to F. S. Davis and T. R. Farnsworth, trustees. The complaint alleged that the defendant, the New York Guaranty and Indemnity Company, held two hundred and sixty-seven of said bonds as collateral for a loan made at New York City to the Water Company, for which interest was charged at the rate of seventeen per cent. per annum, ten per cent. of which was under cover of pretended commissions, fraudulently resorted to to conceal usury, and in violation of the charter of said Guaranty and Indemnity Company, and of the law of the state of New York. The prayer of the bill is for an injunction restraining the trustees named in the trust deed or mortgage aforesaid from selling the trust property, as they proposed to do; the Water Company having made default of payment of interest on said bonds. An answer and cross bill was filed by Charles H. Kilgour, as owner of nine of said bonds, joining in the complainant's prayer for an injunction. A temporary restraining order was granted; but meantime the property described in the trust deed had been bid off by the defendant, the New York Guaranty and Indemnity Company. On the 24th of May, 1875, the sale was set aside, and by consent it was ordered by the chancellor that all holders of bonds and of liens file answers asserting their claims.

The Guaranty and Indemnity Company, and the State Loan and Trust Company, filed separate answers, and incorporated therein demurrers to the bill and the two cross bills. The demurrers to the bill and to the cross bill of Kilgour were heard and overruled by the state court.

From the answers of the New York companies, it appears that the Guaranty and Indemnity Company loaned the Water Works Company $98,000, and received as security for payment one hundred and sixty-four bonds of the Water Company for $1,000 each; and the State Loan and Trust Company loaned the Water Works Company $62,000, which was secured by the pledge of one hundred and three bonds for $1,000 each. These loans were made at New York City, and evidenced by notes at ninety days, which were renewed from time to time. The nominal rate of interest was seven per cent. per annum; but two and one-half per cent. for each ninety days was charged as a "commission" for the care and custody of the bonds pledged, and "for supervising the disbursement of the money advanced," all of which was used in the construction of the works of the Water Company.

The answer and cross bill of [William A. Goodman, T. G. Gaylord, and Matthew Addy] the trustees of the Gaylord Iron and Pipe Company sets up their ownership of two hundred and forty-four bonds of the Water Company, issued to the Gaylord Iron and Pipe Company prior to the loans by the New York companies, alleges that the mortgage made by the Water Company is a scanty security for the bonds issued, and attacks for usury the bonds held by the New York companies, alleging that no services were rendered, or intended to be rendered, for the pretended commissions charged by those companies, but that they were mere devices fraudulently resorted to to evade the usury laws of New York, and the prohibitions of their charters. The cause having been removed to the circuit court of the United States, came on to be heard before the court upon the demurrer by the New York companies to the answer and cross bill of the Gaylord trustees. The points of the demurrer sufficiently appear in the argument.

BROWN, District Judge. While the general rule is recognized by all the authorities that a stranger cannot set up usury as a defense, and that the transaction can only be impeached by the borrower or those in privity with him, the application of this doctrine has occasioned a vast amount of litigation, and the authorities are far from harmonious. These questions of privity have arisen most frequently in the state of New York, where the penalty for usury is most severe, and usurious loans most frequent. The following rules are deduced from the authorities of that state:

1. That, notwithstanding the statute declares the usurious contract absolutely void, it is in reality only voidable, and the borrower may affirm it. (a) He may do this, if a mortgagee, by selling the mortgaged property subject to the usurious mortgage. Sands v. Church, 6 N. Y. 347; Chamberlain v. Dempsey, 36 N. Y. 144; Mechanics' Bank v. Edwards, 1 Barb. 271; Post v. Bank of Utica, 7 Hill, 406; Hartley v. Harrison, 24 N. Y. 170. (b) By appropriating property for the payment of a usurious debt, or assigning property to a trustee for that purpose. In such case the assignment is valid, and neither the assignee nor other person can attach the secured debt for usury. Murray v. Judson, 9 N. Y. 73; Green v. Morse, 4 Barb. 332; French v. Shotwell, 5 Johns. Ch. 555; s. c. 20 Johns. 668; Denn v. Dodds, 1 Johns. Cas. 158.

2. The borrower may disaffirm the contract and not only personally impeach it for usury, but may grant to another the right to do so. He may do this: (a) If a mortgagee, by selling his entire interest in the mortgaged property, including his right to impeach the usurious transaction. Shufelt v. Shufelt, 9 Paige, 137; Brooks v. Avery, 4 N. Y. 225. (b) A creditor who seizes the entire mortgaged property on execution, also succeeds to the right of his debtor in this regard, and may sell the property free from the usurious loan. Mason v. Lord, 40 N. Y. 476; Post v. Dart, 8 Paige, 639; Dix v. Van Wyck, 2 Hill, 528; Jackson v. Tuttle, 9 Cow. 233; Carow v. Kelly, 59 Barb. 239; Thompson v. Van Vechten, 27 N. Y. 568; Schroepel v. Corning, 5 Denio, 236. The authorities in other states are not entirely harmonious; most of them, however, hold that where a party takes subject to a usurious mortgage, he cannot impeach the security. Green v. Kemp, 13 Mass. 515; Town of Reading v. Town of Weston, 7 Conn. 409; Loomis v. Eaton, 32 Conn. 550; Baskins v. Calhoun, 45 Ala. 582; Fielder v. Varner, Id. 429; Stephens v. Muir, 8 Ind. 352; Henderson v. Bellew, 45 Ill. 322; Huston v. Stringham, 21 Iowa, 36; Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Kimmel, 1 Mich. 84.

Unfortunately, the only two decisions of the supreme court of the United States are in direct conflict upon this point. The first is that of De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 367. This was a bill to foreclose a mortgage which the assignee of the equity of redemption attempted to defeat by proof of usury between the mortgagee and mortgagor. The terms of sale of the property were expressly subject "to the incumbrances of my previous mortgage or deed of trust, particularly a mortgage deed to De Wolf from Prentis, dated," etc. In disposing of the case the court observed: "Again it is perfectly established that the plea of usury, at least as far as to landed security is personal and peculiar; and however a third person, having an interest in the land may be affected, incidentally, by a usurious contract, he cannot take advantage of the usury. Here, then, the case presents a third person, the assignee of an equity of redemption, setting up a defense, which, in one aspect, Prentis himself cannot set up; but, on the contrary, under the state of the pleadings must be supposed to have refused to set up, or have abandoned. * * * But had they purchased from Prentis in the most absolute and general manner, and altogether without notice, actual or constructive, they still could have acquired no more than an equity of redemption, and that would not have transferred to them the right of availing themselves of the plea of usury. It would indeed be astonishing, were it otherwise, for the contrary rule would hold out no relief to the borrower; it would only be transferring his money from the pocket of the lender to the pocket of the holder of the equity of redemption."

The case of Lloyd v. Scott, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 205, involves the same principle. One Scholfield, the owner of certain real estate in Alexandria, in consideration of five thousand dollars, granted to one Moore, his heirs and assigns forever, an annuity of five hundred dollars payable in half-yearly installments, with power to distrain for non-payment. Scholfield subsequently conveyed to the plaintiff, Lloyd, the property in question, subject to this charge. Upon distress afterwards made for rent, Lloyd brought replevin, claiming the annuity or rent charge was a mere device to cover a usurious loan. The court held that he could defend upon this ground, and disposed of the case of DeWolf v. Johnson [supra], by saying that "the question whether the purchaser of an equity of redemption can show usury in the mortgage, to defeat a foreclosure, was not involved in the case." It is true that the case was disposed of upon two grounds, one of which was that the contract was not in fact usurious, and the other that the defendant could not take advantage of usury if any had existed, but there is nothing to indicate it was not decided as much upon one ground as the other.

This opinion in Lloyd v. Scott [supra] though contrary to a great weight of authority and of the prior decision of the court which announced it, I am bound to respect as the later adjudication of the court, and it apparently strikes at the root of the general rule stated in the opening of this opinion, that the defense of usury is personal to the borrower. I think the principle there announced covers the case under consideration. It is true, as argued by the defendants, that the plaintiff, and every purchaser of bonds acquired the bonds they hold with the understanding and upon the condition that the deed of trust securing them, secured alike the whole issue of six hundred bonds and that the contract between all the parties was, that each of the bonds was secured by one six-hundredth part of the property conveyed; at the same time, every purchaser of these bonds had a right to assume that they were negotiated at a legal rate of interest and were interested in their realizing for the company as much as possible. Every dollar received by the company from the sale of these bonds and subsequently put upon the water works added to the security of every other bondholder. If bonds were sold at but fifty cents on the dollar, but half the money would be realized that there would have been had the bonds been sold at par. By one-half the amount of these bonds, therefore, the security of each bondholder would be lessened.

But there is a defect in the case made by the cross bill, which seems to me fatal to the relief sought. The parties to these suits are contestants for priority of payment. The cross bill sets forth the usury in the contracts under which the defendants held these bonds; prays that the trustees named in the mortgage may be enjoined from selling the property, and that the bonds issued to the defendants may be surrendered and cancelled. The rule in equity is well established that affirmative relief against a usurious contract will be granted only upon condition that the plaintiff pay the defendant the amount of money advanced, or at least allow a decree therefor. This rule has been repeatedly recognized by the supreme court of the United States. See Brown v. Swan, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 497; Tif- fany v. Boatmen's Ass'n, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 385.

In the case of Spain v. Hamilton's Adm'rs, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 604, it was held that the complainant who was contesting his claim to priority upon a fund in the treasury could only have relief for the excess over the real debt. I see no reason why that rule is not applicable here. While it would not be necessary for the complainant in a bill of this kind to offer to pay the defendants the amount of money advanced to them, with legal interest, I think they should consent, as a condition of the relief sought that the defendants have decrees for the amount so advanced. This, however, was evidently not the purpose of this bill. It seeks no less than the entire cancellation of the bonds held by the defendants, and the entire exclusion of their claim from the fund to be realized from the sale of the property.

Without undertaking to decide whether a bill might not be filed after the sale of the property, praying for a reduction of this claim to the amount actually advanced, with legal interest; or whether this bill may not be amended so as to accomplish, practically, the same purpose, it seems to me that in its present shape the case made by the cross bill of complainant cannot be sustained.

The demurrer to the cross bill must therefore be sustained.

YATES et al. v. ARDEN et al.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 526.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1838.

CONFUSION OF GOODS — PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — BILL IN BEHALF OF ALL CREDITORS—AMENDMENT BY COMPLAINANT.

1. If an agent, whose duty it is to keep the goods and effects of his employer separate, mix them with his own, it lies upon him to distinguish them; and if he cannot, the whole is to be considered as belonging to the other; and every sort of profit derived by an agent from dealing or speculating with his principal's effects, is the property of the latter, and must be accounted for.

[Cited in Gantt v. American Cent. Ins. Co., 68 Mo. 515. Cited in brief in Judevine v. Town of Hardwick, 49 Vt. 182.]

2. If the bill be originally filed by the complainants "for themselves and such other creditors as shall choose to come in and contribute to the expenses of the suit," the complainants, before answer, have a right to amend their bill by striking out those words, although some of the other creditors shall have filed their petitions to be let in as complainants; but the complainants must pay the petitioners their costs.

Bill in equity, having a double aspect [by Yates and McIntire against the heirs at law and administrator of D. D. Arden, deceased]: (1) To charge the real estate of D. D. Arden, deceased, with payment of debts due to the plaintiffs, "and such other creditors of D. D. Arden as shall come in and contribute to the expenses of the suit;" and (2), to obtain the exclusive benefit of such of the real estate as was purchased by the deceased, with the plaintiffs' funds, and as their agent; and to obtain a decree for the sale of the whole of the real estate. The plaintiffs claimed to be creditors to the amount of $35,301.51, and averred that the personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts of the intestate.

The heirs at law, without having answered the bill, filed a cross-bill against Yates & McIntire, and the administrator of D. D. Arden's estate, averring that the intestate carried on an extensive and profitable business in Washington upon his own account. That the defendant, John M. Maury, was appointed his administrator, and returned an inventory by which it would seem that the personal estate would be insufficient to pay the debts, but they have no means of ascertaining the correctness of the same. That Maury, the administrator, is the agent of the plaintiffs, and, as such, is in the possession of all the books and papers of the deceased; and represents that the intestate, in all his transactions, acted exclusively for the plaintiffs. These complainants are unable to answer the bill of the plaintiffs, Yates & McIntire, with any degree of accuracy, and pray that Yates & McIntire may specify all the transactions of the deceased in which they were interested; and that the defendant Maury may produce the books and papers of the deceased, and that the defendants may account for all the property which came to their hands.

Before any answer had been filed to either of those bills, the Bank of the United States and M. & H. Carey, respectively filed their petitions as creditors of the intestate, stating that his personal estate is insufficient to pay his debts. That Yates & McIntire, claiming to be creditors, and professing to act in behalf of all the creditors, &c., have filed their bill to subject the real estate to the payment of the debts of the deceased; but claim that the real estate, or a great part of it, was purchased with their funds, and therefore they claim a priority of payment, &c. That these petitioners deny the facts to be as averred by Yates & McIntire in their said bill; and, if true, deny their right to priority of payment; and suggest the inconsistency of thus professing to act for all the creditors, and at the same time claiming priority of payment; and they pray the court to compel them to elect upon which ground they will proceed; or to carry on the litigation, so far as their claim for preference is concerned, at their own expense, and that the petitioners may be admitted as parties to so much of the said bill as seeks to promote the common interest of all the creditors; and to resist so much as is at variance with their rights as creditors; and for general relief.

Before any answer was filed to the bill of Yates & McIntire, but after the Bank of the United States and the Messrs. Carey had filed their petitions, Yates & McIntire amended their bill by striking out the words "in behalf of themselves and such other creditors as shall choose to come in," &c., and by charging that the defendants, the heirs of the intestate, had entered upon the real estate, and were in receipt of the rents and profits, greatly exceeding $1,500 a year, which ought to be subject to the payment of the debt due by the intestate to the plaintiffs, the said real estate having been purchased with their funds improperly applied by him as agent, whereby he became a trustee for their benefit, and the defendants must take the same, subject to all the plaintiffs' legal and equitable claims thereon; and praying that a receiver may be appointed. Yates & McIntire, and Mr. Maury answered the cross-bill; and it was agreed that the cross-bill of the heirs should be received as their answer to the bill of Yates & McIntire, and that the answer of Mr. Maury should be read as his deposition in the same suit; that general replications should be filed to the respective answers, and that the causes should be set for hearing, and submitted upon the respective bills, answers, and general replications, and the deposition of Mr. Maury.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The facts which it is incumbent on Yates & McIntire to prove in order to justify a decree in their favor, to the extent of their prayer for relief, are: (1) That the intestate, D. D. Arden, was their agent for the sale of their lottery tickets, upon commission. (2) That, as such agent he received a large number of tickets which he sold for their account, and that he was indebted to them in a large amount at the time of his death, and that, on the 1st of June, 1836, there remained due to them, the sum of $31,074.10. (3) That D. D. Arden died seized or possessed of real estate, as alleged in their bill, the whole, or a large part of which, was purchased by the deceased, with the funds of the plaintiffs, Yates & McIntire. That if any part thereof was purchased and paid for with the separate and individual funds of the deceased, it is so mingled with the part purchased with the funds of the plaintiffs, Yates & McIntire, that it cannot be discriminated by the plaintiffs. (4) That so far as the plaintiffs, Yates & McIntire, seek to charge the real estate, if any, which was purchased with the separate funds of the deceased, they must show that his personal estate was insufficient to pay his debts.

None of these facts were denied in the cross-bill of the heirs which is received as their answer to this bill; and they are all proved by the answer of Mr. Maury, which is received by consent as his deposition in this suit.

Theobald, in his treatise on Principal and Agent (page 369), says: "And this principle will be found to be established, by many authorities, as a settled rule in equity, that if an agent, whose duty it is to keep the property of his employer separate, mix it with his own, it lies upon him to distinguish them; and if he cannot distinguish what is his own, the whole is to be considered as belonging to the other." And in page 371, he says: "Every sort of profit or advantage, clandestinely derived by an agent, from dealing or speculating with his principal's effects, is the property of the latter, and must be accounted for." Malynes, 154. See Lord Chadworth v. Edwards, 8 Ves. 48; Lupton v. White, 15 Ves. 436; and Panton v. Panton [supra]. These plaintiffs, therefore, have a right to consider the whole real estate of the deceased in this district as belonging to them, and either to have it specifically conveyed, they paying any balances of the purchase-money which may be due; or, to have it sold, and the proceeds of the sales, after paying such balances, if any there are, to be appropriated to the extinguishment of their claim against the deceased.

It has been suggested, that after the Bank of the United States, and M. and H. C. Carey, other creditors of the deceased, had come in, according to the invitation of the bill, the plaintiffs had no right to amend it so as to exclude those creditors who had come in under the invitation of the original plaintiffs, Yates and McIntire. The Bank of the United States, and the Messrs. Carey, had by their petition prayed to come in, not to aid the original plaintiffs, but to controvert the plaintiff's claim to the property purchased by their agent with their funds, and to be admitted to the benefit of so much of the bill as seeks to promote the common interest; at the same time averring the bill to be incongruous, and liable to be defeated upon demurrer. In order to avoid this objection, the original plaintiffs amended their bill, by striking out the invitation, and leaving the bank and the Messrs. Carey to pursue their own course; and the question now is, whether they had a right so to do.

We think they had; but they must pay the petitioners their costs.

The plaintiffs having shown that a large part of the real estate was purchased by the deceased with their funds, and the defendants having failed to show what part, if any, was purchased with the separate funds of the deceased, the court will order the whole to be sold, and the proceeds to be brought into court to be disposed of as the court shall direct.

YATES et al. v. CURTIS.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1828.

FOLLOWING TRUST PROPERTY — PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Wherever the principal can trace his property in the hands of his factor or agent, and distinguish it from the mass of the property of the latter, he is entitled to recover it from the agent, or in case of his failure, from his assignees.

Assumpsit for money had and received. Plea, the general issue. At the trial it appeared, that J. B. Wood had been employed by the plaintiffs to sell and dispose of large numbers of lottery tickets in different lotteries on their own account, he receiving a commission therefor. The accounts kept by the parties debited Wood with all the tickets received, and credited him with all tickets returned to the plaintiffs [Yates & McIntire], and credited them with the balance struck, deducting commissions. Some alterations were latterly made by the parties in their form of keeping the accounts for their own convenience; but the substance of the contract between them remained unaltered. Wood failed in business on the 8th of May, 1828, and assigned his property to the defendant [George Curtis] for the benefit of his creditors. Considerable sums were outstanding, due from third persons for the lottery tickets so sold, at the time of the failure, some part of which had been since received by the assignee; and for the money so received, the present suit was brought. It appeared that on the face of some of the tickets Wood's name was used in connexion with that of the plaintiffs, but any partnership concern was negated by the testimony. A clerk of Wood, on the trial stated, that all the tickets received from the plaintiffs, and all the sums now outstanding on the sales thereof, were perfectly capable of designation and separation from the other property of Wood.

Upon this evidence coming out, the counsel for the parties submitted the question to the court, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. If they were, then a verdict was to be taken for the plaintiffs, for a nominal sum, and the verdict was to be enlarged and altered, as the accounts, hereafter stated, should show that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Mr. Whipple, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Searle, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Upon the facts, there does not seem any room for controversy.

The case of Thompson v. Perkins [Case No. 13,972], following Scott v. Surman, Willes, 400, settles the principle of law, that where a party can trace his property in the hands of his agent, and distinguish it from the mass of the property of the latter, he is entitled to recover it. Here, it is capable of designation; and the outstanding dues on the sale of the lottery tickets belong to the plaintiffs, and the sums received by the defendant since the insolvency of Wood, are the property of the plaintiffs, and recoverable by them.

Verdict for plaintiffs according to agreement of the parties.

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1855.

EQUITABLE JURISDICTION—RELIEF FROM MISTAKE
—APPRAISEMENT FOR PARTITION.

Three persons having an interest in fifty lots in Saginaw city, they selected certain persons to appraise lots, and on this appraisement they made partition and executed quit claims. To the complainants were assigned lots one and two, with the warehouses and wharf, valued at seven thousand dollars. To the defendants was assigned lot three, with the wharf, at two hundred dollars. The warehouse, after the papers were all executed, was found to extend twenty feet on lot three, which adjoined lot numbered two. The warehouse was worth six thousand and five or six hundred dollars, it being divided into stores of thirty-three feet. The defendants claim twenty feet of the warehouse on the lot three, from which the plaintiffs gave a quit claim, not supposing that any part of the warehouse was on it. A bill was filed to correct the mistake, to which the defendants demurred. The court overruled the demurrer, holding that, under the circumstances stated in the bill, the mistake was a matter for equitable jurisdiction and relief.

[Cited in brief in Ashmead v. McCarthur, 67 Pa. St. 328.]

In equity.

Mr. Holbrook, for complainants.

Mr. Campbell, for defendants.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This is a bill in chancery, which represents that the complainants [Yates and Woodruff] owned three equal undivided fourth parts, and the defendant, William L. P. Little, was seized and possessed of one undivided fourth part of all the real estate in the city of Saginaw, known and commonly called the improved fifty lots. That the complainant Yates was entitled to two-fourths, and the complainant Woodruff to one-fourth; and to make an equitable partition of the lots in value, it was agreed between them that they should be appraised by Eleazer Jewett, Gardner D. Williams, and Charles L. Richmond, in regard to the above lots and other property, which embraced the interest of other parties. And on the 14th of September, 1848, the appraisers met at Saginaw city, and after viewing the premises and duly deliberating thereon, did determine on their report, in regard to the fifty lots as follows: Lots one and two in block thirty, with the warehouse and wharf were worth seven thousand dollars; that lot number three, in the same block, with the wharf, was worth two hundred dollars; that lot number one in block thirty-five, vacant, was worth seventy-five dollars; that lot eleven, in block thirty-four, with dwelling house, was worth three hundred and fifty dollars; that lot seven, in block twenty-eight, and Richmond's store, were worth five hundred dollars; that lot eight, vacant, was worth sixty dollars; that lot nine, same block, with Cushway's house, was worth five hundred and sixty dollars; that lot ten, vacant, was worth sixty dollars; that lot six, in block eighteen, with the shoe shop on it, was worth one hundred and sixty dollars; that lots one, two, seven and eight, in block twenty-seven, with Webster's house and barn, were worth four thousand dollars; that lots three, four, five and six, vacant, were worth forty dollars each, one hundred and sixty dollars; that lots nine, ten and eleven, were worth two hundred and twenty-five dollars; that lot twelve, in the same block, with joiner's shop, was worth three hundred dollars; that lot seven, block thirty-two, with Little's office was worth one hundred and ninety dollars; that lots eight and nine, with Little's house, were worth thirteen hundred and eighty dollars; that lots one, two and three, in block one hundred and twenty-one, vacant, were worth seventy-five dollars; that twelve lots in block one hundred and sixty-six, were worth five hundred and thirty dollars; that south of Cape street, lots one, two, three and four, vacant, in block ten, were worth one hundred and ten dollars; that lots five, six, seven and eight, same block, were worth one hundred and sixty dollars; that lots three and four, in block seventeen, were worth sixty dollars.

After the partition, it was agreed that the fifty lots, so called, owned by the parties, have been partitioned, and it was further agreed that Messrs. Yates and Woodruff shall take, as their portion of the property, block numbered twenty-seven, entire, with all the buildings, improvements and appurtenances; also lots numbered one and two, in block numbered thirty, and lots numbered seven and eight, in block numbered twenty-eight, with the buildings and improvements thereon. And W. L. P. Little agreed to quit claim unto the said Yates and Woodruff, all his right and interest above allotted to them as above. And the bill states that the above agreement was consummated, with a slight exception of a modification agreed to, as to the property which was to be released to the complainants, but not as to the appraisal, which remained the basis of the partition. On the 1st of May, 1849, the defendant executed a quit claim deed from the above property to the complainants; and they executed a like deed to the defendant for lot three, on block thirty, north of Cape street, together with other lots.

The complainants allege that the appraisal of lots one and two was made and accepted, under the belief that the warehouse stood wholly on those lots, and that lot numbered three was a vacant lot, with a wharf in front thereof, which was released by the complainant to the defendant at the valuation thereof; and the bill charges that such was the belief of the defendant. But the complainants allege they have since discovered that lots one and two extended only one hundred feet in front on the Saginaw river, and that the warehouse, which is a very commodious one, fronts on the river one hundred and twenty feet, being twenty feet on lot number three. And the complainants say that until after the agreements were all executed, the above discovery was not made; and since it has been made the complainants have tendered to the defendant the full value of the ground occupied by the warehouse on number three. That the warehouse, being divided into stores of thirty feet front, will be irreparably injured by cutting off twenty feet. That lot three was valued and conveyed to the defendant as a vacant lot, with a wharf in front. And the complainants pray, that relief may be given, and the mistake corrected, &c. To the bill the defendant, files a demurrer. And for cause of demurrer states, that complainants have made no case for relief; that they have not set out the deeds and writings, that the charges are not made specifically, and that the complainants have not offered to do equity, &c.

The case made in the bill is one of flagrant injustice, though it occurred, not by the contrivance of the defendant, but through the mistake of the appraisers and of the parties. Lots one and two, with warehouse and wharf, were valued at seven thousand dollars. Can any one suppose that one hundred feet only, of the warehouse was valued? Can any one doubt, that the entire warehouse and the ground on which it stood, with the wharf, were included in the valuation? The facts are so clear, looking at the face of the bill, in this respect, that no proof could be more satisfactory. By this mistake the defendant has got more than he was justly entitled to, and the question is whether he can conscientiously retain this advantage. Twenty feet of the warehouse, at the rate at which it was valued, not including the ground, could not be less than ten or eleven hundred dollars. And although the defendant has been applied to, he has refused to correct the mistake. His lot adjoining with the wharf, was appraised at two hundred dollars, and the defendant received it at that price. And he has refused three hundred and fifty dollars for the twenty feet of lot, which would be within twenty-five dollars of the sum charged him for the entire lot. This does not present a very favorable aspect of the defendant's case; and yet he refuses to do justice, or, in other words, is determined to hold twenty feet of the warehouse, which is on his lot. And the question is, can he do so conscientiously. The counsel for the defendant insist that he can, and that the complainants, by reason of their negligence are not entitled to relief.

It is insisted that the relief prayed cannot be given, as the appraisers were appointed by the parties, being judges of their own choosing, and that their decision cannot be set aside. The bill does not specially pray to have the award set aside, but for general relief, from the mistake in the partition, by the parties themselves, and the consequent injustice to the complainants. A mistake of the arbitrators is a ground to set aside an award, and no mistake could be more palpable than the one committed in this case. Lots one and two, including the warehouse and wharf, were valued at seven thousand dollars, which, in the partition, were assigned to the plaintiff. Now these lots were not specifically valued, but as connected with the warehouse; and in this view, the appraisers estimated the value of twenty feet more ground than the lots one and two contained. And when to this ground is added, the twenty feet of the warehouse, both of which the defendant claims, instead of the vacant lot, as described and valued, it makes a clear case of injustice, that any court, having the power, would, in some mode correct. To refuse this, on the ground that the plaintiffs had been negligent of their rights, under the circumstances, would be a mockery of justice. The injustice is so clear that it is matter of surprise, how the defendant should consent to take advantage of the mistake. And it is hoped for his own sake, that the allegations of the bill are not accurate. If the conveyance had been executed for the ground in front occupied by the warehouse, which would have taken twenty feet from lot numbered three; it would have given no more, in all probability, than was in the mind of the appraisers. And yet, under such circumstances, chancery would have corrected the error, by making the proper deduction from lot number three.

The parties were misled and very naturally, by the report of the appraisers. In making partition and executing conveyances, they were governed by that report. They failed to do what the plaintiffs and defendant intended to do, and it is most unjust and inequitable for the defendant to claim the advantage, in the partition, which the mistake has given him. The mistake has chiefly arisen from the parties themselves, and although the mistake of the appraisers led to the thing that was done, the case is not more the error of the arbitrators, than the error of the parties. Suppose a party had agreed to purchase a certain tract of land, and through mistake a different tract was conveyed to him, would not this be corrected? Such a mistake often occurs in the conveyance of town lots. No honest man would hesitate to correct such an error, and a refusal to do so, would authorize a court of chancery to correct it. Where an individual has been grossly negligent of his own rights, in some peculiar cases, chancery will not relieve him; as where an individual fails to procure evidence in a trial at law which he might have procured, equity will not relieve him. But the case before us is not one of mere negligence within the meaning of the books. The plaintiffs were non-residents, as appears from the declaration, and this may account for the mistake in the partition, unless the contrary be shown.

Acts done through mistake, by principal or agent, are not binding. Harmer v. Morris [Case No. 6,076]. Mistakes and fraud are equally relievable in equity. Dunlap v. Stetson [Id. 4,164]. A mistake of facts, going to the essence of the contract, avoids it. Hammond v. Allen [Id. 6,000]. A bargain, founded upon material misrepresentations of matters of fact, even though they were inadvertently made through the mutual mistake of the parties, or by mistake of the grantors alone, will be annulled in equity. Daniell v. Mitchell [Id. 3,562]. A mistake in the description of lands intended to be mortgaged, may be corrected in equity. Bank of U. S. v. Piatt, 5 Ohio, 540; Hunt v. Freeman, 1 Ohio, 490.

In 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 150, it is said: "In like manner, where the fact is equally unknown to both parties, or where each has equal or adequate means of information, or where the fact is doubtful from its own nature, in every such case, if the parties have acted with entire good faith, a court of equity will not interpose; for, in such cases, the equity is deemed equal between the parties; and when it is so, a court of equity is generally passive, and rarely exerts a jurisdiction. Thus, where there was a contract by A to sell to B for twenty pounds, such an allotment, as the commissioners under an inclosure act should make for him; and neither party, at the time, knew what the allotment would be, and were equally in the dark as to the value; the contract was held obligatory, although it turned out, upon the allotment, to be worth two hundred pounds." This turned upon the uncertainty of what the value of the allotment would be, and whether it was more or less, the contract was valid. In section 151, it is said: "The general ground, upon which these distinctions proceed, is, that mistake or ignorance of facts in parties is a proper subject of relief, only when it constitutes a material ingredient in the contract of the parties, and disappoints their intentions by a mutual error; or where it is inconsistent with good faith, and proceeds from a violation of the obligations, which are imposed by law upon the conscience of either party." And again, in section 152, the author says: "One of the most common classes of cases, in which relief is sought in equity, on account of a mistake of facts, is that of written agreements, either executory or executed. Sometimes, by mistake, the written agreement contains less than the parties intended; sometimes it contains more; and sometimes it simply varies from their intent, by expressing something different in substance from the truth of that intent. In all such cases, if the mistake is clearly made out by proofs entirely satisfactory, equity will reform the contract, so as to make it conformable to the precise intent of the parties." Durant v. Durant [1 Cox, Ch. 58]. In Calverly v. Williams, 1 Ves. Jr. 210, Lord Thurlow said: "No doubt, if one party thought he had purchased, bona fide, and the other party thought he had not sold, that is a ground to set aside the contract, that neither party may be damaged; as it is impossible to say, one shall be forced to give that price for part only, which he intended to give for the whole; or that the other shall be obliged to sell the whole for what he intended to be the price of part only. Upon the other hand, if both understood the whole was to be conveyed, it must be conveyed. But again, if neither understood so, if the buyer did not imagine he was buying any more than the seller imagined he was selling this part, then this pretence to have the whole conveyed, is as contrary to good faith upon his side, as the refusal to sell would be in the other case. The question is, does it appear to have been the common purpose of both to have conveyed this part?"

The argument is, that relief cannot be given, as the court cannot say what the appraisement would have been without the twenty feet. The answer to this is, that the partition was intended to be made on the estimated value of the parcels of property made by the appraisers, so that this objection is not insuperable. Lapse of time, and change of value in the property, is alleged in the argument; but this does not arise on the demurrer. If it be admitted that no decree can be made against the wife of the defendant, on the final hearing, or before it, the court can protect her interests.

Upon the above view of the case, the demurrer must be overruled.

YAW v. MEAD et al.

[5 McLean, 272.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1851.

PRACTICE—FOLLOWING STATE LAW.

A law of the state regulating the practice of the state courts, does not apply to the courts of the United States, unless adopted by act of congress, or by the courts of the United States.

Mr. Terry, for complainant.
Mr. Davidson, for defendant.

MCLEAN, Circuit Justice. This is a bill to foreclose a mortgage; and a question is made whether the decree for the sale of the land must be made subject to the 11th section of the general chancery act of the states, which provides, that whenever a bill shall be filed for the foreclosure and satisfaction of a mortgage, the court shall have power to decree a sale of the mortgaged premises, &c., but the judge shall not, by such decree, order any such lands to be sold within one year after the filing of the bill for foreclosure. In the case of Bronson v. Kinny [unreported] the supreme court of the state has held this statute to be binding upon the state courts. The above act has been passed by the legislature of Michigan, since the act of congress adopting the practice of the state courts, consequently the statute cannot apply to the courts of the United States, unless specially adopted by them. No such rule has been adopted. The court ordered the sale of the premises, by giving the usual notice, if the money should not be paid in 6 months.

YEADON et al. v. PLANTERS' & MECHANICS' BANK et al.

[Betts, Scr. Bk. 125.]

District Court, E. D. South Carolina. June 24, 1843.

BANKRUPTCY—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT—MORTGAGED PROPERTY—STATE COURTS.

[1. Under the act of 1841, §§ 2, 11 [5 Stat. 442, 447], the bankruptcy court has no jurisdiction to dispose of the security of a creditor whose mortgage is valid by the state law, and not inconsistent with the provisions of the second and fifth sections of the bankruptcy law, unless the mortgagee claims as a creditor under the bankrupt law. But, when the creditor does come into the bankruptcy proceedings, the court has full jurisdiction to order a sale of the property, and to make good title thereto.]

[2. A suit brought by the assignee under the second section of the act, to recover property fraudulently mortgaged or conveyed, is a "proceeding in bankruptcy," within the meaning of the sixth section of the act, and hence, under that section, as well as under section eight, the district court has jurisdiction of such a suit. But, as there is no language in the act indicating that this jurisdiction is exclusive, it must be considered as concurrent with the state courts, and the court which first obtains jurisdiction will have the right to decide the matter.]

[3. The filing of a petition in voluntary bankruptcy does not confer upon the district court jurisdiction in respect to a mortgage, who does not come in and prove his debt, but relies solely upon his security; and, if he commences suit in a state court to foreclose the same, before the assignee files a suit to set it aside as a fraud upon the law, the state court will then have the right to decide the matter, to the exclusion of the federal courts.]

[This was a suit in equity by Richard Yeadon, Sandiford Holmes, and James M. Wilson, assignee of Andrew M'Dowall and William G. Mood, bankrupts, against the Planters' & Mechanics' Bank, the Bank of South Carolina, and others, to procure a sale of certain property mortgaged by the bankrupt to the defendants, for an account of rents and profits thereof, and for an injunction to restrain defendants from prosecuting a suit in the state courts, etc.]

GILCHRIST, District Judge. It appears in this case that the firm of M'Dowall, Hayne & Co., being indebted to the Planters' & Mechanics' Bank, the Bank of South Carolina, and certain other banks in the city of Charleston, in various sums of money, amounting to upwards of $57,000, as drawers of certain notes, Andrew M'Dowall, one of the said firm, for the purpose of better securing the payment of the several sums of money due to the said banks, according to the true intent and meaning of the notes, on the 15th of August, 1842, executed a mortgage to them in fee simple, with a defeasance, of real estate in the city of Charleston, and of a lot of land, with the buildings thereon, situated in the village of Moultrieville, Sullivan's Island, estimated to be worth together at least 75 per cent. of the amount of their claims. It further appears that on the 31st of December, 1842, the said Andrew M'Dowall and William G. Mood, another member of the said firm of M'Dowall, Hayne & Co., filed their petitions in this court to be declared bankrupts, the said Andrew M'Dowall inserting in his schedule annexed to his petition the property mortgaged by him to the banks; and that on the 30th January, 1843, they were severally declared bankrupts by this court, and the complainants appointed assignees of their respective estates, in conformity with the provisions of the act of congress "to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," passed August 19, 1841. On the 23d day of February, 1843, the said Planters' & Mechanics' Bank filed their bill in the court of equity of this state, for the Charleston district, against the present complainants, the other banks, and others, as defendants, for a foreclosure of the aforesaid mortgage, and sale of the mortgaged premises for the payment of the amounts due the said banks, in preference to all creditors of the bankrupts, and for other relief; and this case now comes before me on a bill filed on the equity side of the court by the assignees of the bankrupts against the Planters' & Mechanics' Bank, the Bank of South Carolina, and others, for an account of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises, which the banks have received, for an injunction to restrain the said Planters' & Mechanics' Bank, their agents and officers, from further prosecuting their suit in equity in the state court against the present complainants, for a sale of the mortgaged premises by a decree of this court; and the application by this court of the proceeds of such sale, according to law, duly respecting all legal preferences and liens, and for other relief; the present complainants alleging in their bill that the said mortgage is null and void under the bankrupt act of 1841, as having been made and given "in contemplation of bankruptcy," and in violation of the provisions of that act.

The suit now before the court is certainly an important case, whether it be considered with reference to the amount of property which may be affected by the present decision, or as regards the various questions in relation to the jurisdiction of this court which have been brought into discussion. The zeal and ability displayed by the counsel engaged in the cause, and which have materially aided this court in forming its judgment, evince their sense of the importance of the case. Questions which affect the jurisdiction of courts of justice are always deserving of the most serious consideration, for, while no judge should willingly usurp jurisdiction, the judge who regards his official obligations will be careful not to decline the exercise of any powers with which he is legitimately invested, and, if in the discharge of his duties, the jurisdiction of his court should unfortunately clash with the jurisdiction of another tribunal, however much he might regret the circumstance, it should not form in his mind any good cause for a relinquishment of his authority. Whenever, therefore, such questions arise, the judgment of the court should be framed and pronounced without regard to any results that may occur from it. Taking this as the proper view of my official duty, I shall now proceed to express my opinion on the points involved in the consideration of the case submitted to me, and the first subject of inquiry is as to the jurisdiction of this court, under the bankrupt act of the United States of 1841, in relation to the claims of a bankrupt's mortgage creditors. The last proviso of the second section of the act declares that nothing therein "contained shall be construed to annul, destroy or impair any lawful rights of married women, or minors, or any liens, mortgages, or other securities on property, real or personal, which may be valid, by the laws of the states respectively, and which are not inconsistent with the provisions of the second and fifth sections of this act." Under this proviso all mortgages which are valid by laws of the states, respectively, and which are not inconsistent with the provisions of the second and fifth sections of the act, are protected from the operations of the act. In declaring that nothing contained in the act "shall be construed to annul, destroy or impair" any such mortgage, it was evidently the intention of the law makers that such mortgages should be protected as privileged liens; and, such mortgages being excepted from the general provisions of the act, the rights acquired thereby are not held under the act, but independently of it. This view of the subject receives confirmation from the 11th section of the act, which declares "that the assignee shall have full authority, by and under the order and direction of the proper court in bankruptcy, to redeem and discharge any mortgage or other pledge, or deposit, or lien upon any property, real or personal, whether payable on presentation or at a future day, and to tender a due performance of the conditions thereof." This section points out the mode by which a valid and existing lien on the property of the bankrupt is to be removed, and, taking it in connection with the proviso of the second section, I understand the law to be that the court in bankruptcy cannot dispose of such security of a creditor without his consent, but that the assignee may, under the direction of the proper court in bankruptcy, redeem and discharge the same. There must be some act done on the part of the creditor holding such security to bring his case within the jurisdiction of the court in bankruptcy, and, in accordance with this view, it was held in Ex parte Jackson, 5 Ves. 357, that the lord chancellor has no authority in bankruptcy to compel a second mortgagee, not claiming under the commission, but resting on his security, to join in a sale obtained by a prior mortgagee, the sale not producing enough for both mortgages. In that case the second mortgagee, not having attempted to prove his debt, chose to rest on his security, and refused to join in the sale, and the lord chancellor, while admitting that he could not make a title unless the second mortgage, as well as the first, was paid, held this language: "If the second mortgagee claims anything as a creditor, I have a hold upon him no doubt." Now let these principles be applied to the claims of the mortgagees of the case now before this court, and it is unnecessary here to inquire whether the mortgage executed by Andrew M'Dovall is such a mortgage as is contemplated by the proviso of the second section of the act of 1841, referred to above. It is sufficient, for the purposes of this argument, to suppose that it may be such a mortgage. If it be, I am of opinion that the mortgagees, not claiming as creditors under the bankrupt act, but choosing to rest on their security, they are not compelled to submit their rights to the adjudication of this court. But I am at the same time well satisfied that this court can entertain jurisdiction of any mortgage given by a bankrupt, upon the petition of the mortgagee, and that, under that part of the 6th section of the act of 1841 which gives to the district court in every district "jurisdiction in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy arising under" the act, the court can order a sale of mortgaged premises, where the creditor applies to the court for that purpose, and that, under the decree ordering such sale, a good, valid, and sufficient legal title to the premises may be made to pass to the purchaser. It is the practice in England, under the bankrupt law of that country, for the courts to direct a sale of collateral securities upon the application of the creditors, and the right of this court to order such sale in the cases stated is recognised by Mr. Justice Story in Re Grant [Case No. 5,690], where he says that "there can be no doubt that the creditor holding securities is enabled to prove his debt upon his offer to surrender, and actually surrendering, those securities, to be disposed of according to the order and direction of the court, and that he is entitled to prove his debt, deducting the true value of the securities therefrom; that true value, when ascertained, being paid or applied by the court for the exclusive benefit of such creditor"; and that "the court shall have full authority to ascertain the true value by a sale, or by an appraisal, or in any other mode which it shall deem best for all concerned in the estate."

But, supposing that the mortgage of the bankrupt shall not come within the proviso of the second section of the act, that it is not one of those mortgages "on property, real or personal, which may be valid by the laws of the states, respectively, and which are not inconsistent with the provisions of the second and fifth sections of that act," the question now arises whether this court has jurisdiction of proceedings instituted by the assignee of the bankrupt to set aside such mortgage. The second section provides "that all future payments, securities, conveyances or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by a bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any creditor, endorser, surety, or other person any preference or priority over the general creditors of such bankrupts," and all other payments, securities, &c., in contemplation of bankruptcy made or given to any person, not being a bona fide creditor or purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, "shall be deemed utterly void and a fraud upon this act; and the assignee under the bankruptcy shall be entitled to claim, sue for, recover and receive the same as part of the assets of the bankruptcy." There is here an express authority given to the assignee to "sue for" property conveyed in violation of the provisions of this section, though it is true that the district court of the United States is not specially designated in this section as the court in which such suit shall be brought; but the authority of the court to entertain jurisdiction of such suit, I apprehend, is to be found in the 6th and 8th sections of the act. The 6th section declares "that the district courts in every district shall have jurisdiction in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy, arising under this act, and any other act which may hereafter be passed on the subject of bankruptcy; the said jurisdiction to be exercised summarily in the nature of summary proceedings in equity;" and afterwards specifies certain cases of controversy to which the jurisdiction of the court shall extend, which, on the authority of the case of Ex parte Martin [Case No. 9,149], I consider as affirmative, and not restrictive of the preceding clause. If then, as I have stated, the clauses of this section, enumerating particular cases of controversy to which the jurisdiction of the court shall extend, are not to be regarded as restrictive of the general powers conferred by the first clause of the section, the language used in the first clause is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace every matter and proceeding in bankruptcy arising under the act; and a suit brought by the assignee of a bankrupt to have a mortgage cancelled, which is declared by the act to be utterly void, and a fraud upon it, is, I conceive, a matter and proceeding in bankruptcy, arising under the act. The 8th section, too, as I have already remarked, confers jurisdiction, in my opinion, on the district court of the United States, of all suits brought by the assignee of the bankrupt to cancel a mortgage, void by the law. The first clause of this section declares "that the circuit court within and for the district where the decree of bankruptcy is passed, shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district court of the same district, of all suits at law and in equity, which may and shall be brought by any assignee of the bankrupt against any person or persons claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt, transferable to, or invested in such assignee." Under this section, the person against whom the assignee of the bankrupt shall bring his suit must claim an adverse interest to that of the assignee for the United States court to entertain jurisdiction of the case. It is therefore necessary to ascertain the extent of the interest of the assignee of the bankrupt in the property mortgaged, before we can determine whether the interest of the mortgagee is adverse to his. "All property of the bankrupt, mortgaged or pledged to others by the bankrupt before his bankruptcy, vests in the assignees, subject to the claim or lien the mortgagee or pawnee has upon it, or, in other words, the equity of redemption in the case of a mortgagee, and the right to redeem, and the right of property when redeemed, in the case of a pledge, vests in the assignees by their appointment." Archb. Bankr. p. 223. But in the case of a mortgage adjudged fraudulent and void, the property remained in the bankrupt, and by the bankrupt law became vested in his assignee (per Spencer, J., in the case of Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. 536). The person, then, claiming under a mortgage void by law, claims an interest adverse to the assignee of the bankrupt, who, by virtue of his appointment, takes all the property and rights of property of the bankrupt, subject only to valid and existing liens thereon; and the assignee of a bankrupt may therefore well be considered as authorized, under this section, to bring suit in the circuit court or district court of the United States, to try the validity of a mortgage against the mortgagee who in such suit will claim an interest directly adverse to the interest of the assignee.

Such being the jurisdiction of this court, according to my views of the subject, it is proper now to enquire whether this jurisdiction is exclusive or concurrent with the state courts. There is certainly no language used in the bankrupt act of 1841 expressly granting an exclusive jurisdiction to the courts of the United States in the cases above stated; and the absence of any record conveying such a grant should raise the presumption that it was not the intention of congress to confer it. In the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Story's Laws, 50) [1 Stat. 73], the extent of the jurisdiction of the federal courts is not left to implication, and, whether the same is to be exclusive or concurrent, the powers conferred by congress are so clearly designated that there can be no mistake on the subject; "showing that, in the opinion of that body, it was not sufficient to vest an exclusive jurisdiction where it was deemed proper merely by a grant of jurisdiction generally." Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 26. I do not mean to be understood as saying that to give exclusive jurisdiction to the federal courts it is necessary that it should be expressly stated in the act conferring the authority, but I do mean to say that the grant of jurisdiction generally to the district and circuit courts of the United States, contained in the 6th and 8th sections of the act of 1841, already quoted and commented upon, is not sufficient to vest in these courts an exclusive jurisdiction in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy, arising under this act, or in the cases therein specially enumerated. To vest exclusive jurisdiction in the district court, the grant should be expressed in language, the fair and reasonable interpretation of which will bear that meaning; such, for instance, as in the 7th section of the act of 1841, designating the district court for the district in which the bankrupt shall reside or have his place of business as the court in which all petitions for the benefit of the act shall be had, and in which proofs of debts and other claims against the bankrupt's estate shall be open to contestation; as in the 9th section, directs "that all sales, transfers and other conveyances of property shall be made at such times and in such manner as shall be ordered and appointed by the court in bankruptcy," and that "all assets received by the assignee in money, shall within sixty days afterwards be paid into the court, subject to its order, respecting its future safe keeping and disposition;" as in the 10th section of the act, making it the duty of the court to order and direct a collection of assets, and a dividend of the same among the creditors who have proved their debts; and as, also, in the 11th section of the act, authorizing "the assignee, under the order and direction of the proper court in bankruptcy, to redeem and discharge" any liens on the property of the bankrupt, and to compound debts, &c., due or belonging to the estate of the bankrupt. In these cases, and in others, which can be pointed out on a reference to the provisions of the law, the jurisdiction vested in the federal courts is necessarily exclusive, and there would be a direct incompatibility in the exercise of similar powers by the state courts. I am aware that in the opinion which I have expressed as to the jurisdiction of the district court in matters and proceedings in bankruptcy, arising under the act, I may be considered as coming in conflict with the judgment pronounced by Mr. Justice M'Kinley in the circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of Louisiana, in the case of Walden's Assignee v. City Bank [unreported], relied on in the argument of this case at the bar; but, however great may be my respect for that judgment, I am bound to decide the case submitted to my consideration according to the deliberate convictions of my own mind; and, without presuming to comment on that decision, I will remark that, even in that case, authority may be found for the position taken in this that the jurisdiction of the district court is not exclusive in all matters in bankruptcy, as the learned judge states in one part of his decision that the jurisdiction of the district court of this state (Louisiana) over the subject upon a proper case is not doubted."

The jurisdiction, then, of this court of the case made by the pleadings being concurrent with the state court, the next question is as to the court which should have the decision of the matter, and the rule laid down in the case of Smith v. McIver, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 535, is the correct and sound rule on this point. "In all cases of concurrent jurisdiction, the court which first has possession of the subject must decide it." But here the question arises as to which court first took possession of the subject. On the part of the present complainants it is contended that the petition of the bankrupt for a decree of bankruptcy is a suit for the benefit of all the creditors, and that the filing of his petition is the commencement of such suit; but I apprehend it is not regarded as a commencement of the suit for the creditors who hold securities excepted from the provisions of the act, but only for those creditors who must come in and prove their debts, "under such bankruptcy," in the manner prescribed by the act, before they will be entitled to share in the bankrupt property and effects. Viewing the subject in this aspect, the state court of chancery first had possession of the matter now before this court, the bill to foreclose the mortgage in question having been filed in that court, before the bill of the present complainants, to set aside that mortgage, was filed in this court; but I think it is a matter of very little consequence in which court the validity of the mortgage shall be tried. The state, as well as the federal, tribunals are bound to administer the bankrupt law according to its provisions, as a law passed in conformity to the powers delegated to congress by the constitution of the United States. The act of August 19, 1841, is the supreme law of the land, and equally binding upon the courts of the federal and state governments. Any argument, therefore, upon which the present complainants might rely in this court, to cancel the mortgage, could be urged with equal force in the proceedings now pending in the state court, to which they have been made parties, as assignees of the bankrupt; and if, in that case, it should be decided that the mortgage is void, and a fraud upon the bankrupt act, the mortgaged property would pass into the hands of the assignees of the bankrupt, to be held by them subject to the order and direction of this court.

I might here close this opinion, and would do so, but for the position assumed by the counsel for the mortgage creditors as to the powers and authorities of this court in granting injunctions. To pass over in silence the question presented by them might be construed into an acquiescence in their views, and, to avoid such result, it is proper that I should make a few remarks on the subject. The right of this court to issue injunctions under its chancery powers was not disputed, but it was contended in the argument at the bar that this court has no authority to order injunctions against suitors in a state court, and the counsel rested their argument on the 5th section of the judiciary act of congress of March 2, 1793 ([1 Stat. 333], 1 Story's Laws, 311), which directs that no writs of injunction shall be granted to stay proceedings in any court of a state; quoting, in support of their view of the subject, the decision in the case of Diggs v. Wolcott, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 179, to the effect that a court of the United States cannot enjoin proceedings in a state court. Without disputing this law, or the authority of the decision referred to, I think it may well be questioned whether an injunction to restrain an individual suitor is an injunction against the proceedings of a court; and such a distinction between the two injunctions is drawn in the case of Bushby v. Munday, 5 Madd. 305, where the vice-chancellor of the court of chancery in England held that "if a defendant who is ordered by this court to discontinue a proceeding which he has commenced against the plaintiff in some other court of justice, either in this country or abroad, thinks fit to disobey that order, and to prosecute such proceeding, this court does not pretend to any interference with the other court; it acts upon the defendant by punishment for his contempt in his disobedience to the order of the court," that the injunction in no manner breaks in upon the absolute independence of the court, and touches only the party affected by it. But the jurisdiction of this court, in cases of application for injunction, does not rest on the act of March 2, 1793, or on that of the 13th of February, 1807 (2 Story's Laws, 1043 [2 Stat. 418]). In the case Ex parte Foster [Case No. 4,960], Mr. Justice Story held this language: "I lay it down as a general principle that the district court is possessed of the full jurisdiction of a court of equity over the whole subject matters which may arise in bankruptcy, and is authorized by summary proceedings to administer all that relief which a court of equity could administer, under the like circumstances, upon a regular bill and regular proceedings, instituted by competent parties. In this respect the act of congress, for wise purposes, has conferred a more wide and liberal jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States than the lord chancellor, sitting in bankruptcy, was authorized to exercise. In short, whatever he might properly do, sitting in bankruptcy, or sitting in the court of chancery, under his general equity jurisdiction, the courts of the United States are, by the act of 1841, competent to do." And in a later case, that of Carlton [Case No. 2,415], the same learned judge states that "there is no statute of the United States which imposes the slightest limitation upon the exercise of the power to issue injunctions, or requires notice thereof, unless in cases provided for by the act of congress of the 2d of March, 1793 (chapters 22, 66, par. 5), and the act of congress of the 13th of February, 1807 (chapters 58, 68). But neither of these statutes has any application to cases in bankruptcy in the district court, nor, indeed, to any cases except those which are pending in the circuit court, in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction. The former act requires reasonable notice of the application for an injunction to be given to the adverse party before the injunction is granted in causes pending in the circuit court. The latter act confers authority on the district judges to grant injunctions in like manner, upon notice, in all cases pending in the circuit court. These acts, therefore, do not touch the jurisdiction of the district court in the administration of equity in bankrupt cases, and, as they do not contemplate the classes of cases created by the bankrupt act of 1841, it is obvious that their provisions are inapplicable to it, and leave the jurisdiction to grant injunctions upon the general practice and principles which govern courts of equity. I am willing to take this exposition of the law as my guide on this subject, more particularly, too, as, within the possession of the right by the district court to issue injunctions against any persons who may interfere with the due administration of the assets of the bankrupt's estates, subject to the order of the court, under the bankrupt act of 1841, the provisions of that law might be defeated.

Various other questions have been raised by the present complainants in the matter now before this court which I do not deem proper subjects for inquiry on their motion for an injunction; and, in accordance with the views taken by me of the questions considered, I refuse the motion.

Case No. 18,131.

YEARSLEY v. BROOKFIELD et al.

[1 McA. Pat. Cas. 193.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March, 1853.

PATENTS—INTERFERENCE PROCEEDINGS—COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES—EVIDENCE OF PRIORITY AND NOVELTY—JURISDICTION ON APPEAL—JOINT INVENTORS—LACHES—POVERTY.

[1. A party to an interference may, from necessity, be allowed by his own oath to prove the loss out of his own custody of a paper, as a foundation for proving by other testimony the contents thereof; and, in the case of a joint invention, the deposition of one of the inventors alone may be received to show the loss of a drawing which he had made, although, as the other may be presumed to have had access to it, the proof would be more satisfactory if he too had joined in the deposition.]

[2. A party who, pending an interference proceeding, assigns all his interest in the subject-matter, and remains merely a nominal party, is nevertheless incompetent to testify therein. Scott v. Lloyd, 12 Pet. (37 U. S.) 149, followed.]

[3. Declarations of a party to an interference, at any time before the contest arose, describing his invention, are admissible, from necessity, and as part of the res gestæ, for the purpose of showing what he had invented at the date of such declarations.]

[4. The objection that one of two parties who claim as joint inventors is not shown by the evidence to have been in fact a joint inventor with the other is not available to the unsuccessful party in an interference proceeding, for his claim must fail if both or either of the joint applicants are shown to have been the first and original inventors.]

[5. Upon an appeal in an interference proceeding, the judge is not confined to the mere question of priority, but has jurisdiction to determine the question of the patentability of the alleged invention. Pomeroy v. Connison, Case No. 11,259, distinguished. Bain v. Morse, Id. 754, followed.]

[6. The American authorities differ from the English in holding that the result alone, even when shown to be more economical, useful, and beneficial to the public, in the manufacture of a better article, is not sufficient evidence of novelty and invention, and that it must appear, in addition, by other evidence, that the result was produced by some new process, device, contrivance, mode, or means, or by some new machinery. Where, however, such improved result is shown, but slight evidence of novelty will be required.]

[7. The fact that the first inventor of a new and useful improvement has not in his specifications described the same with the clearness and particularity required by the statute as a condition of obtaining a patent (Act 1836, §

6; 5 Stat. 119) will not aid a subsequent inventor, upon an interference between them; for, if the latter is shown not to be the first inventor, his claim fails, even if a patent cannot issue to his opponent.]

[8. The deposition of one not a party to the interference, tending to show that he was a joint inventor with one of two parties who are claiming as joint inventors, and that the other had no part in it, though not admissible to establish the deponent's claim, may yet be considered as affecting the rights of the joint applicants.]

[9. Loss of means by one of two joint inventors, rendering him unable to prosecute his plans in respect to the invention, combined with the assurance of his co-inventor that when the latter should move in the matter of procuring a patent the former should have an equal interest therein, held to excuse laches.]

[This was an appeal by Pascal Yearsley from a decision of the commissioner of patents, in interference proceedings, awarding priority to James M. Brookfield and Ephraim V. White in respect to an alleged invention of a new and useful improvement in the art of making glass.]

John S. McCulsche and James Wm. McCulsche, for appellant.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The original application of Yearsley appears to have been filed on the 18th of September, 1850, stating his claim, with specifications, &c., but which, being supposed defective, he was allowed to amend according to the application as stated in the report filed on the 7th of August, 1851, in which he says: "What I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters-patent as a new and useful improvement in the art of making glass, is the employment of anthracite coal in a glass furnace, substantially in the manner and for the purposes set forth in my specification." He then describes particularly the methods which had been formerly used and the difficulties met with in the ordinary process, and says the improvements and advantages attending his invention and discovery are—First, anthracite coal may be used, giving a flame which plays upon the vessels containing the fluxing materials; second, a great economy in fuel is effected and a much shorter time is required for fluxing, the flame being of a more uniform and higher temperature and under greater control than in the ordinary methods; third, the glass is of a superior quality and the scum sandiver or salts escape very freely; fourth, the great heat renders the sulphate of soda as useful a flux as soda ash and carbonate of soda; fifth, the fluxing-pots can be separated some distance from the burning fuel for the convenience of working, and freed from the cracks called fangs and feins, and they can be used without covers; sixth, colored glass may readily be made, and the labor of testing it much reduced; seventh, and finally, the manufacture of glass by this means will not be a nuisance in densely-populated cities. To enable persons skilled in the art of glass-making to understand and use his invention and discovery, he describes particularly its nature and operations, which specifications are supposed to comprehend, as the applicant's claim of invention, the combination of anthracite, blast, steam or vapor, and preparatory heating.

To this application the report states that there was found to interfere, in the recent archives of the office, a caveat, of which notice was given, and on the 31st of July, 1851, the caveators (James M. Brookfield and Ephraim V. White) filed their application, and claimed the application of a blast to an ordinary glass furnace, by which they are enabled to use anthracite coal in the manufacture of glass, substantially as herein set forth. This caveat appears to bear date the 31st of January, 1851, and to have been filed in the office the 4th of February, 1851; and their claim is stated in substantially the same way as the claim of Yearsley, above recited, as by reference to the specification and accompanying draft will appear. In the specification alluded to they say they have invented and discovered a new and improved mode of manufacturing glass by the use of anthracite coal as a fuel; and referring to the accompanying drawing, and to the letters of reference marked thereon, they state that the nature of the invention or discovery consists in burning coal instead of wood, the heat being generated by the application of a blast to the burning coal. They then describe the furnace. They say the construction consists of an air-chamber, a fire-chamber and furnace, or place in which the materials to be melted are deposited; in the drawing it is a chamber to receive the pots for the manufacture of glass, &c. The report then states: "The interference was declared on the 5th of August, 1851, and a hearing appointed for the first Monday of October, 1851, which hearing was postponed from time to time until Monday, July 5th, 1852, when it was fixed for final hearing, and on the 11th of August, after weighing the testimony, priority of invention was awarded by the office to Brookfield and White, and from this decision the appeal was taken and sundry reasons filed." Those relating to preliminary objections will be first considered, viz., that E. V. White's depositions are incompetent and inadmissible, and that the testimony of the witness, stating his declarations, is also inadmissible; second, that the joint invention, as alleged, of Brookfield and White ought to have been proved.

The commissioner, in his report, says that White, by assigning all his interest to Anderson R. Hay on the 26th of March, 1852, divested himself of every interest in the pending application that could, under any rule of evidence, have excluded his testimony, taken in the month of September, after the assignment.

First, as to White's deposition to show the loss of the draft made by him in the year 1847, for the purpose of introducing secondary evidence, in accordance with the rule that the nonproduction of the original must be accounted for. From a principle of necessity the party is allowed by his own oath, addressed to the court, to prove the fact of a lost paper if lost out of his own custody and not destroyed by fraud, the existence and details of such paper being proved by other testimony. In this case, although the evidence is not sufficient to show that it was destroyed by fraud, as Brookfield, by reason of his relationship to White in interest, may be reasonably supposed to have access to it, it would have been more satisfactory if he had been joined with White in the deposition. In the absence of proof, however, of his having the custody of it, the objection must be overruled.

With respect to the deposition of White, taken in the examination of him as a witness generally, I do not think that the objection can be sustained on the ground of his liability over to the assignee. There appears to be no warranty, either express or implied, of indemnity. But the objection on the ground of his being a party to the proceeding by his application for the patent at the time of the examination, and still so, though perhaps nominally—and, technically speaking, that proceeding cannot be called a record—yet the case appears to be within the reason of the rule which makes a party incompetent, and therefore the deposition cannot be considered as legal evidence. The rule and its reason will be found laid down by the supreme court in [Scott v. Lloyd] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 149. The court say: "The decision in Willings v. Consequa [Case No. 17,767], where the court held that a party named on the record might be released so as to constitute him a competent witness, has been cited and relied on in the argument. Such a rule would hold out to the parties a strong temptation to perjury, and we think it is not sustained either by principle or authority."

The next objection is to the admissibility of the evidence as to the declarations of Mr. White. The rule, as stated by the counsel of Brookfield and White, is—"If in 1834, 1847, or any other period, he (White) described, orally or by drawings, a mode of using anthracite coal for the purpose of making glass, those statements are acts or part of the res gesta, and show what he knew or had invented at the time when made." This position is correct, with this qualification, that the same were made before this contest arose. The case decided by the supreme court, Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 448, fully sustains the proposition. No better evidence from the nature of the subject could be expected or required. That objection is also overruled. With respect to an objection that the evidence does not prove Brookfield a joint inventor with White, I do not think it can be considered material in this issue, for if both, or either, is shown by the testimony to have been the first and original inventors or inventor, the appellant must be considered as having failed in his claim.

This disposes of the reasons Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 19, 36, and 38. The reasons Nos. 13, 18, 31, and 38, which involve the consideration of the effect which must be given to a supposed variance between the caveat now produced and the specification of the 18th of July, 1851, and from the plan actually experimented with, will be hereafter considered, when the principles of law shall have been considered and stated upon which the question of interference must be governed; and so also as to Nos. 8, 9, 10, 12, 20, 24, 26, 35, 32, 38, 27, and 23. Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, 21 present the question whether the claim of Brookfield and White for anthracite and a blast in an ordinary glass furnace is patentable, being devoid of novelty as a combination, and that it is but an analogous use. The counsel for the appellees contends that the judge in the present case of appeal is confined to the refusal by the patent office to grant letters-patent, and that his jurisdiction does not extend beyond this; by which I understand that he supposes Judge Cranch to have decided in the case of Pomeroy v. Connison [Case No. 11,259], that the judge has no jurisdiction to inquire into and decide the question of patentability. That was the case of an appeal by a patentee against whom the commissioner had decided, and the point determined by the judge was as to the character of the person; the judge held that he could take jurisdiction only in the cases of applicants for a patent on refusal, &c. In the case of Bain v. Morse [Id. 754] the judge says that, "upon the hearing, he is to decide, and from that decision, if either shall be dissatisfied with it on the question of priority, including that of interference, he may appeal, and upon such appeal, as I understand the law, the judge, in case of real interference, may determine which, or whether either, of two applicants is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for." The question, therefore, as to jurisdiction is settled against the objection.

I have already stated the specifications of the parties, and what they respectively claim a patent for, together with the description of each, embodying the principle of the invention. The sixth section of the act of congress of 1836 provides that if any person or persons have discovered or invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement on any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter not known or used by others before his or their discovery thereof, and not at the time of his application in public use and sale, on application, the commissioner may grant a patent.

Each of the parties show, as essential to their improvement, the use of anthracite coal with a blast, instead of wood, in the manufacture of glass in a glass furnace. Both show the result produced to be very highly useful, a better article, and much cheaper; but it is objected on the part of the appellants that the improvement, as claimed by Brookfield and White, is for anthracite and a blast in an ordinary glass furnace, and is therefore devoid of novelty as a combination, and but an analogous use. In support of his proposition, he states as an instance of analogous use the Case of Crane, where anthracite coal is used to melt iron from ores with a hot blast instead of a cold, by which latter means (a cold blast) it had been used before for the same purpose. He also claims that it had been used in the mint of the United States to melt metals, &c.; that White used it in the year 1834 to forge axes; that it had been in use to forge other edge-tools; and that it had been used for upwards of thirty years to raise steam for boats and furnaces, &c.; that it has long been known also to be cheaper than wood for various purposes, and than charcoal and bituminous coal where the means and the effect are the same but the occasion new. He cites as his authorities Curt. Pat. 23, 76-78; Folsom v. Marsh [Case No. 4,901]. The passage referred to in Curtis (page 23, 1st Ed., 1849) rests upon the authority of the law as laid down by Judge Story in Bean v. Smallwood [Case No. 1,173]. That was the case of a patent for a machine in which it appeared that the same apparatus stated in the claim had been long in use, and applied, if not to chairs, at least, in other machines, to purposes of a similar nature. The judge says the machine was old and well known, and applied only to a new purpose. That does not make it patentable. The thing itself which is patented must be new, and not the mere application of it to a new purpose or object. The next reference on this part of the subject is to Curt. Pat. pp. 76, 77. The principle of law stated here is upon the authority of Losh v. Hague, 1 Webst. Pat. Cas. 207, in which case Losh had taken out his patent to use his wheels on railways. The case shows that a patent cannot be granted for the application of an old contrivance to a new object; or, in other words, that you cannot have a patent for applying a well-known thing, which might be applied to fifty thousand different purposes, to an operation which is exactly analogous to what was done before. Curtis states one principle to be this: "When the principle is well known, or the application consists in the use of a known thing to produce a particular effect, the question will arise whether the effect is of itself entirely new, or whether the occasion only upon which the particular effect is produced is new." Hove v. Abbot [Case No. 6,766] is the next reference. This was the case of a patent for a new and useful in-provement in the application of a material called palm-leaf or brub-grass to the stuffing of beds, mattresses, sofas, cushions, and all other uses for which hair, feather, moss, or other soft and elastic substances are used. "The application of an old process to manufacture an article to which it had never before been applied is not a patentable invention. There must be some new process or some new machinery used to produce the result." Again (page 194): "He who produces an old result by a new mode or process is entitled to a patent for that mode or process. But he cannot have a patent for a result merely, without using some new mode or process to produce it."

The counsel for the appellants adds to these authorities the principles as declared to be law in the letter of Commissioner Ewbank of the 12th of November, 1850, to Yearsley, in which he says in the last clause of the letter: "The remark may be made for your guidance in the prosecution of your application, that any feature common in furnaces for other purposes is not patentable in its new application to a glass furnace." The commissioner in his report says: "As shown by the claims of both parties, the inventions are substantially the same, for the important feature is manufacturing glass by the use of anthracite coal as a fuel, with a blast, and the details of neither invention are absolutely necessary to the attainment of the result desired. The invention was deemed new in its particular application to this precise manufacture, and therefore patentable. The specifications, drawings, and models were sufficiently clear to enable the office to form a correct opinion of the invention, and the decision implied that the materials and mechanism, as set forth by both parties, were adequate to the result claimed. The office decided that the invention was patentable because anthracite coal and a blast had not been used in the manufacture of glass, and it was therefore a new application of known substances to produce a particular result, and that result was useful; the result, from the testimony, was an important gain to the public." Lord Dudley's Case (1 Webst. Pat. Cas. p. 14), Neilson's Case [Id. 278], and Crane's Case [Id. 393], were relied on by the office. To the same effect the counsel for Brookfield and White rely upon the following authorities: Curt. Pat. 379; Lund, Pat. 6; Hill v. Thompson, 3 Mer. 622; Boulton v. Bull, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 487; 2 March, 211; 4 E. C. L. 357; Hind. Pat. 76, 124; Crane v. Price, 1 Webst. Pat. Cas. 393; 4 Man. & G. 680. Lord Dudley's patent was at a very early period—1622. It was for a discovery for making iron with sea or pit coal. So far as appears in the letters-patent, the invention was simply the substitution of pit coal for wood or charcoal. This was the general feature of the invention. The means are not stated, the common law only requiring the inventor to be in possession of such means. The enrollment of a specification has since been declared an essential motive in granting a patent, and by statutory provision, both in England and this country, must form a part of the patent. Our statutes provide "that before any inventor shall receive a patent for any such new invention or discovery, he shall deliver a written description of his invention or discovery, and of the manner and process of making, constructing, and using the same, in such full, clear, and exact terms, avoiding unnecessary prolixity, as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, construct, compound, and use the same," &c. Neilson's patent was for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, and furnaces where bellows or other apparatus is required. The specification states distinctly his claim and the modes by which his object was to be attained. Objections were raised that his invention was the same with many others, as stated in the case. The case is too long to make even an extract from. I will therefore state the notice of it to be found in Webster: He says: "The object of these two inventions, or the ends to be attained by the inventions, are clearly distinct. That air had been applied in a heated as well as in its natural atmospheric state to different kinds of fires and furnaces, under certain circumstances and conditions, before the date of Neilson's patent, is undeniable, but no practical success had attended the application; and the ends proposed and nature of the inventions are quite distinct from Neilson's. The real question would appear to be, what is the principle of the invention as disclosed in and by the specification? For to suppose that the doing or using a thing with one object will deprive the doing or using the same thing with a different object of the character of invention, is unreasonable. The omission of one of several processes, or a change in the order of a series of processes, may give a new character to the thing produced, notwithstanding all that was done was done before."

In the case of Crane v. Price (supra) several of the cases are reviewed which have been referred to on this occasion. That was the case of a patent for an improvement in the manufacture of iron, in which case it is stated that "the plaintiff describes the object of his invention to be the application of anthracite or stone coal combined with hot-air blast in the smelting or manufacture of iron from iron stone, mine, or ore, and states distinctly and unequivocally at the end of his specification that he does not claim the use of a hot-air blast separately as of his invention, when uncombined with the application of anthracite or stone coal, nor does he claim the application of anthracite or stone coal when uncombined with the using of a hot-air blast; but what he claims as his invention is, the application of anthracite or stone coal and culm combined with the using of a hot-air blast in the smelting and manufacture of iron from iron stone, mine, or ore" (page 408). As to the result, the evidence showed that the yield of the furnace was more, the nature, properties, and qualities of the iron were better, and the expense of making the iron was less, than under the former process by means of the combination of the hot-air blast with the bituminous coal. At page 411 the judge says: "Upon the fourth issue, which raised no more than the usual inquiry whether the nature of the invention was sufficiently described in the specifications, the usual evidence was given that persons of competent skill and experience could, by following the directions, produce the manufacture described with success, and the evidence was entirely unopposed."

It appears from the reasoning of the court upon the issue raised by the fifth plea, that the allegation in the plea would have been fatal to the plaintiff's recovery but for the fact of the hot-air blast being used in combination with anthracite coal for the first time for the purpose stated in the pleadings. The court say: "Undoubtedly, if the second patent claims as a part of the invention described in it that which had been the subject-matter of a patent still in force, it would be void on the double ground that it claimed that which was not new (which, indeed, would equally be the case if the former patent had expired), and also that it would be an infringement." Page 412. The principles in the case of Rex v. Wheeler, 2 Barn. & Ald. 349, referred to as authority in the foregoing case, will be found to support the view I have expressed as to the proper understanding of that case. It was a patent for a new or improved method of drying and preparing malt. The judge in the first part of the case assumes, for the sake of argument, that the novelty and utility of the invention might have been established by proof. He gives what he considers the meaning of manufactures within the terms of the statute. 21 Jac. I. c. 3. First, as to machines or engines, &c., he says: "Or it may, perhaps, extend also to a new process to be carried on by known implements or elements acting upon known substances, and ultimately producing some other known effect, but producing it in a cheaper or more expeditious manner, or of a better or more useful kind." In applying his general principles, he says: "This is a patent for the invention of a method, that is, of an engine, instrument, or organ, to be used for the accomplishment of some purpose, or at least of a process to be so used. The patentee does not profess to be the inventor of any engine, instrument, or organ. He says that a coffee roaster or a kiln, or anything by which the grains may be kept in motion during their exposure to a requisite degree of heat, may be used." The judge proceeds to state the rule that the particular means, manner, or method by which the object was to be effected ought to be clearly and fully stated, so that any one skilled in the art might, without the necessity of experimenting, be enabled to accomplish the same end by the same means. Among other things which he ought to have stated in his specification, he says: "He does not say what heat beyond four hundred degrees of Fahrenheit may be used—a specification which casts upon the public the expense and labor of experiment, and that is undoubtedly bad."

In the Case of Crane, 1 Webst. Pat. Cas. 409, is to be found dicta to the effect that "there are numerous instances of patents which have been granted where the invention, consisted in no more than the use of things already known, producing effects already known, but producing those effects so as to be more economically or beneficially enjoyed by the public." At page 410 of this case the judge says: "The only question, therefore, that ought to be considered on the evidence is, was the iron produced by the combination of the hot-air blast and the anthracite a better or a cheaper article than was before produced from the combination of the hot-air blast and the bituminous coal, and was the combination described in the specification new as to the public use thereof in England." Our statute requires that it should be new and original with the inventor. So in the same case as quoted in Curt. Pat. p. 8: "The court of common pleas said: 'We are of opinion that if the result produced by such a combination be either a new article or a better article or a cheaper article to the public than that produced before by the old method, that such a combination is an invention or manufacture intended by the statute, and may well become the subject of a patent.'" I have before said that the proper understanding of the decision in this case must be by confining it to the case itself. I deem it unnecessary to take particular notice of the other cases cited by the counsel for the appellees to this point.

These authorities have been referred to on the question involved in the reasons of appeal, Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, and 21, and by which it becomes my duty to decide the very difficult question, what is or is not an analogous use, or, as it is called, a double use. It will be observed that the principal matters of difference between the English and the American cases on the subject of novelty and invention relate to the kind and degree of evidence by which it may be shown. The English cases are supposed to go to the extent of deciding that the result alone, when the effects produced are shown to be more economical, useful, and beneficial to the public in the manufacture of a better article, is of itself a conclusive test of invention and novelty. On the other hand, the American authorities show that the result alone will not be sufficient for that purpose, but that it must also appear by some other evidence that the effect was produced by some new process, device, contrivance, mode, or manner or means, or by some new machinery; also that a patent can in no case be granted for an effect only. When, however, the applicant shows such a result, slight evidence only of the existence of the novelty and invention will be required. All, however, agree that as a previous condition to the granting or issuing of every patent the applicant must set forth in his specification a true, full, and clear account and description of his invention, showing the contrivance, mode, method, manner, or means by which the result is to be produced; that in that specification he should state what his invention is, what he claims to be new and useful, and what he admits to be old. By the sixth section of our statute of 1836, also, it is provided that before any inventor shall receive a patent for any new invention he shall deliver a written description of his invention or discovery, and of the manner and process of making, constructing, using, and compounding the same, in such full, clear, and exact terms, avoiding unnecessary prolixity, as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, construct, compound, and use the same; and in case of any machine he shall fully explain the principle and the several modes in which he has contemplated the application of that principle or character by which it may be distinguished from other inventions, and it shall particularly specify and point out the part, improvement, or combination which he claims as his own invention or discovery.

And now to apply the law to the facts of this case. Is there a new and important mode of manufacturing glass by the use of anthracite coal as a fuel invented by the applicants, Brookfield and White, duly set forth in their specifications? They say "it is well known that anthracite coal has heretofore failed to produce suitable heat on account of the small amount of flame produced thereby, thus not enabling the heat to be readily conveyed to the pots. The objection is obviated in our improved mode by the application of the blast, properly regulated, through the aforesaid pipe 9, whence it passes up through the grates c q through the burning coal into the orchard chamber A, and surrounds the pots, when it escapes through the working holes a a or by chimneys. By this means the great amount of heat engendered by the burning coal is quickly conveyed to the melting pots as desired. We are aware that anthracite coal has been used with a blast in other processes of the arts; but the application and objects attained in our improved mode of manufacturing glass being peculiar, we claim our invention to be new and useful." In the argument on the part of Brookfield and White, it is said: "The blast has been before applied to other furnaces when a diffused heat was not necessary, but when, on the contrary, the greatest possible heat in a confined space, as for welding, smelting, &c., was the object. The invention is the combination of the blast to an ordinary glass furnace." If this peculiar mode were clearly and sufficiently stated in the specification, i. e., properly regulating the blast in an ordinary glass furnace so as to produce by the use of anthracite coal a sufficiently increased amount of flame and a suitably diffused instead of the confined concentrated heat, I should certainly think the improvement would unquestionably be new and more than an analogous use, and, of course, patentable, in view of the fact that it is clearly shown by the evidence in this case that an important result is obtained in the manufacture of glass of equal, if not superior, quality to that where wood is used as a fuel, and with a great saving of expense, and therefore greatly to the public benefit. But I feel obliged to say that I do not think the specification in this case amounts to such a statement, and that it is entirely too vague on that subject to warrant the issuing of a patent for the application of the blast to the ordinary glass furnace, by which anthracite coal may be used as a fuel in the manufacture of glass. It is true it is stated that the strength of the blast is regulated by the sliding valves h h or their equivalents; still there is nothing particular to show any new mode of using the blast for the diffusion of the proper degree of heat. Suppose, however, this to be the case, it is not perceived how the appellant can derive to himself any material benefit. It still remains necessary that he should appear to be the original and first inventor of a new and useful improvement in the art of manufacturing glass by the use of flame from an anthracite coal fire, as claimed by him in his specification. The reasons of appeal embracing this part of the subject will next be considered.

It is apparent from the specification of the parties that the main principle of the improvement contended for by each of the parties is the manufacture of glass by the agency of anthracite coal with a blast, instead of other kinds of coal more expensive, to effect which, they have adopted combinations of elements, as I have stated, in some respects different, but in the great essential principle they are the same, and that must be the test by which the interference is determined. To which effect, see Treadwell v. Bladen [Case No. 14,154], in which case it is said: "It seems to me that the safest guide to accuracy in making the distinction is, first, to ascertain what is the result to be obtained by the discovery; and whatever is essential to that object, independent of the mere form and proportions of the thing used for the purpose, may generally, if not universally, be considered as the principle of the invention." In Curt. 266, it is said: "It is in relation to this question of substantial identity that the doctrine of mechanical equivalents becomes practically applicable. This doctrine depends upon the truth that the identity of purpose, and not of form or name, is the true criterion in judging of the similarity or dissimilarity of two pieces of mechanism." At 270 also: "Where the subject-matter of the patent is a manufacture, the same test of substantial identity is to be applied. * * * The question will be whether in reality and in substance the defendant has availed himself of the invention of the patentee in order to make the fabric or article which he has made." And to the same effect, also, in Curt. 273: "Whenever the real subject covered by the patent is the application of a principle in arts or manufacture, the question on an infringement will be as to the substantial identity of the principle and of the application of the principle." It is believed that these authorities support the position as laid down by me.

The evidence on the part of Brookfield and White shows that they have succeeded in manufacturing glass by producing a good article, equal, if not superior, to that from the use of wood, by the use of anthracite coal with a blast, with a much greater saving of expense and resulting beneficially to the public, as they have stated in their specification, proving also, I think, that their invention was prior to that of Yearsley's. Upon which grounds, I think, and so decide, that the said Yearsley was not the original and first inventor of said improvement mentioned in his said specification, and therefore that he is not entitled to a patent as prayed for in his petition to the commissioner of patents.

The fourteenth and fifteenth reasons of appeal make it necessary that I should consider the claim of Jacob Faatz as an original inventor of the improvement mentioned in the specification of Brookfield and White. The commissioner states that in the question before the office Faatz could only be known as a witness upon the question of priority between Yearsley and Brookfield. This is certainly correct in one sense, but I suppose it ought to form a material subject of consideration in deciding on Brookfield and White's application for a patent. In Curtis on Patents (page 101) the law is thus stated: "It is necessary, therefore, in all cases that the subject-matter should be claimed as the sole invention of one party if such is the fact, or as the joint invention of two or more parties if it was invented by more than one." And so I understand the act of congress to be. The commissioner says: "And the testimony does not show that he (Faatz) had formed any opinion on the subject of the invention before White." And in another part of the report he says "that White had formed the opinion in the year 1834." As to the subject which I am now considering, that cannot be deemed very important, as like imperfect and impracticable opinions were formed long before, in the year 1816, by a glass company in Baltimore, and several others, as appears from the testimony in this case.

From the most careful examination of the testimony, it appears to me that the earliest period at which any regularly practicable opinions or principles were arrived at was when White and Faatz contributed an equal part, and that it was not until after that time that the drafts alluded to in the testimony were made, in accordance with which joint understanding the furnace was erected at Hornsdale. I shall state parts of the testimony relating to this point as the grounds of my opinion. I shall only state the material parts of the depositions, from which I shall extract them, and refer to the pages of the book in which the whole may be seen and read. Record of Evidence (page 105) shows the account which Faatz himself gives of it. This would not be competent evidence in an application for a patent by Faatz for him in support of his right; but under the circumstances of its being taken and forming part of the evidence in that record, although an objection to the credit may be valid, if he is sufficiently corroborated, I can see no reason why it may not be used for the present purpose. He states in substance that he had formed the idea previously to the year 1846 that he could make good glass profitably by using anthracite coal for fuel, with the aid of a blast, and that the plan of the first melting furnace which he built in the glass factory now in the possession of James M. Brookfield was devised and adopted by him so as to enable him to melt glass therein by the use of anthracite coal as a fuel, with the aid of a blast. This answer was made to an interrogatory of Yearsley's counsel. The witness then states and describes particularly how it was so adapted. He proceeds to state unfortunate circumstances, which so reduced him to poverty that he was unable to proceed with his plan. This, I think, will be found to be the earliest effort to bring the idea, which afterwards in a more complete form succeeded so well, into practice. (Quotations from the testimony are omitted.) Faatz may be charged with laches because he has not prosecuted the plan; but the loss of means brought on him by the misfortunes which it is stated in the evidence he sustained, and the reason he had to believe, from the assurance of Mr. White, that when he moved in the business he should be a joint sharer, I think a sufficient excuse and save his rights. My conclusion from the evidence is that he must be considered as a joint inventor with Mr. White, and that the commissioner, in acting upon his (White's) application must be governed by the rule of law which I have before stated on this branch of the subject. And for the reasons before stated, I am of opinion, and I do so decide, that neither of the said parties—Pascal Years-ley nor the said Brookfield and White—are entitled to the patents for said invention as prayed by them.

The patent was subsequently issued to Hay and Brookfield, No. 9,789, as the assignee of Faatz and White, in accordance with decision of Morsell that Faatz was joint inventor with White, June 14, 1853.

PLEA IN BAR—WITHDRAWAL—DISCONTINUANCE—ENTRY WITHOUT LEAVE.

1. A plea in bar cannot be withdrawn, after the case has been prepared for trial, in order to file a plea in abatement.

2. A discontinuance, though required to be by leave of court, is generally entered without such leave, which is presumed, unless the defendant interfere, and ask the court to withhold leave, on account of the discontinuance being oppressive.

On motion to withdraw plea in bar, and file plea in abatement.

IRWIN, District Judge. This motion has been argued as if the only question before the court was the power of the court of common pleas of Lawrence county to strike off the discontinuance of the suit before them, and of the right of the plaintiff to discontinue his suit there without leave of court. This was arguing the validity of the plea before it was filed, while the only question was the right of the defendant to enter such a plea at this time. A plea in abatement, not being to the merits, is considered a dilatory plea, and receives no favor from the court. It is a stringent and unbending rule of law, with regard to these pleas, that they must be pleaded in a preliminary stage of the suit, and must be put in within four days after the declaration has been filed. It cannot be put in after a general imparlance. A court has refused to permit the general issue to be withdrawn to let in a plea in abatement, where the defendant swore that the general issue was pleaded, without his knowledge, and by a person whom he never meant to retain as attorney. Anon., 3 Caines, 102. In that case, too, the plea was delivered in time. But in the present case, the time for pleading a dilatory plea is not only gone by, but the defendant has pleaded in bar, the cause is at issue, parties have taken their depositions, and prepared for trial at this, the second term. No instance can be found where a court has permitted a plea in bar to be withdrawn when the cause is down for trial, in order to permit a defendant to plead in abatement; nor is there any sufficient reason for the exercise of such a discretionary power, if the court possessed it.

The defendant desires to plead the pendency of another action in Lawrence county, while the fact that such action is pending has been brought about by the defendant himself, since the time for pleading in abatement in this suit has passed, and a plea in bar pleaded. The action in Lawrence county has been discontinued by plaintiff, and costs paid, before this suit was brought. A discontinuance, though required to be by leave of court, is, in practice, ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, entered without such leave, which is presumed, unless the defendant interfere, and ask the court to withhold leave, on account of the discontinuance being oppressive. When process of court is by arrest of the person and demand of bail, a discontinuance followed by another arrest is oppressive, and ought not to be permitted. In the present case, it is a mere contest as to which party shall have his choice of a tribunal. The revival of the action in Lawrence county is the act of the defendant, to trip up the plaintiff in his suit in this court, and that, too, at the second term, after issue and preparation made for trial. No precedent can be found for the use, or rather the abuse, of the discretion of the court (if they have such a discretion), by granting leave to a defendant, under such circumstances, to withdraw his issue, and commence a game of sharps or special dilatory pleas, at this stage of the pleadings, and we are not willing to make the first.

MORTGAGE FOR RENT—BANKRUPTCY OF LESSEE—EFFECT.

1. The lessor of a shop took a mortgage on the fixtures as security for the rent and the performance of the covenants of the lease. The lessee was to pay a certain rent monthly, and taxes. The lease provided that it should terminate if the lessee should be declared bankrupt, or any assignment of his property should be made for the benefit of creditors, unless within ten days from the date of the petition or assignment some sufficient person should become surety for the rent. The lessee became bankrupt November 1, 1869, an assignee was chosen November 23, and the keys were returned to the lessor January 1, 1870. Held, the mortgage was a valid security for the rent up to January 1.

2. It seems, that an assignee in bankruptcy will not become responsible for rent of a store merely by leaving some goods there mingled with other goods, which were mortgaged to the lessor.

Petition by an assignee in bankruptcy to redeem a mortgage given by the bankrupt. The bankrupt [R. F. Yeaton] took a lease from the respondent of a building on Washington street, in Boston, for five years from the first of April, 1868, at a yearly rent of three thousand five hundred dollars, payable monthly, and the taxes; and simultaneously with the execution of the lease, gave the respondent a mortgage upon the fixtures and some chattels as security for the payment of the rent and the performance of the other covenants of the lease. Among other provisos of the lease was the following: "Or if the lessee shall be declared bankrupt or insolvent according to law, or if any assignment shall be made, or attempted to be made, of his property for the benefit of creditors, and some sufficient person shall not, within ten days from the date of the petition or assignment, become surety for the payment of the rent due and to become due for the premises, then, and in either of said cases, this lease shall terminate by its own limitation, and said lessee, and those claiming under him, shall be considered, to all intents and purposes, as holding possession of the premises unlawfully, so as to entitle said lessor, or those having his estate therein, to any existing or future remedies under the laws of this commonwealth for recovering summary possession thereof." The parties agreed to the following facts: Rent was paid up to September 1, 1869. On the first day of November, 1869, the lessee petitioned to be adjudged a bankrupt; the assignee was chosen on the 23d of November, and the assignment bore date of that day. The taxes for 1869 were assessed before the bankruptcy, and were paid by the lessor, and have not been repaid; and the rent has not been paid since the first of September. On or about the first of January, 1870, the keys were given by the bankrupt to the lessor, and the latter has relet a part of the premises; but upon receiving the keys he notified the assignee in writing that he did not accept a surrender, but should hold the lessee and his estate liable for damages.

C. S. Lincoln, for assignee.
A. A. Ranney, for mortgagee.

LOWELL, District Judge. There is no evidence that the assignee has done any act looking to an acceptance of the premises, excepting that a part of the bankrupt's goods not included in the mortgage remained, and still remain, in the building. This circumstance alone does not prove an acceptance, especially when the keys were sent back to the lessor, which was an unequivocal act of renunciation. See Wheeler v. Bramah, 3 Camp. 340; Hoyt v. Stoddard, 2 Allen, 442. It cannot be contended, therefore, that the assignee is personally bound for the rent; and the question argued now has been, to what extent and for what sum is the mortgage a valid security in the hands of the lessor? He appears, to have acted upon the theory that the lessee remains liable on his covenants notwithstanding the bankruptcy. This was the law of England under the older statutes; but it may well be doubted whether by our bankrupt act, which authorizes all demands arising out of contract to be liquidated and proved, the lessor will not be bound by the certificate. I understand that this question is likely to be litigated in some other cases, and as it is not essential to pass upon it here, I merely advert to it. Under this lease and mortgage it would seem that the lessor may hold the chattels to secure the payment of all rent and taxes which were due him when the assignee had elected not to take the term. That election ought to have been made in ten days after the assignment, but was not in fact made until January 1, some weeks later. I say ten days from the assignment, because that is the fair construction of the proviso, which, taken literally, might give only ten days from the petition. It must be assumed that the parties to the lease knew that a petition in bankruptcy may never be followed by an adjudication, or not within ten days, and that even after adjudication there is no one to act for the estate until the assignment, and as the purpose of the proviso is to give an election to continue the lease, and not to forfeit it by relation to a past time, the more liberal construction should be adopted. But even if the lessor might have treated the estate as ended on the 11th of November, he could waive his extreme rights for the benefit of the assignee.

Neither party having acted or made known his election until the first of January, the lessor ought to have his rent up to that day, for he may have expected the assignee to take the lease, as he undoubtedly would have done if he had found a purchaser, or in any way could have made it profitable for the creditors. Assignee to redeem by paying the rent to January 1, 1870, and the taxes for 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE—MINING COMPANY—LIABILITY AS ASSAYER.

A mining company not assaying for others, but assaying its own ores, on its own account only, and not assaying any bullion or amalgam.

is required to pay a special tax as assayer, under subdivision forty-eight of section seventy-nine of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 223], as amended in 1866 [14 Stat. 98].

The defendant [Stephen T. Gage], as collector of internal revenue for the district of Nevada, collected of plaintiff a special tax levied upon it as an assayer. The tax was paid under protest, and this action brought to recover the tax so collected. Plaintiff claimed, that it was not an assayer, under the act of congress, and not liable to the tax.

T. H. Williams, for plaintiff.

Jonas Seely, U. S. Dist. Atty., for defendant.

Before SAWYER, Circuit Judge, and HILL-YER, District Judge.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. The question to be determined in this case is, whether a mining corporation assaying its own ores, simply, and assaying for itself and not for others, and not assaying any bullion or amalgam, is required to pay a special tax as assayer under subdivision forty-eight of section seventy-nine of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended in 1866.

The provision of the statute is as follows: "Assayers, assaying gold and silver, or either, of a value not exceeding in one year two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, shall pay one hundred dollars, and two hundred dollars when the value exceeds two hundred and fifty thousand dollars and does not exceed five hundred thousand dollars, and five hundred dollars when the value exceeds five hundred thousand dollars. Any person or persons or corporation, whose business or occupation it is to separate gold and silver from other metals or mineral substances with which such gold or silver, or both, are alloyed, combined or united, or to ascertain or determine the quantity of gold or silver in any alloy or combination with other metals, shall be deemed an assayer." 14 Stat. 121.

It will be observed, that the statute, in the latter clause of this provision, defines the term "assayer," as used in the act, and it is necessary to ascertain what is intended to be embraced by this definition. The statute says nothing about separating gold and silver from other metals for fee or reward, or for parties other than the party engaged in assaying. There is, then, no such express limitation to assaying for others, or for fee or reward; and if it was intended to so limit the term, the limitation must be derived, as a necessary inference, from some other provision of the statute, or from the whole statute, reading the different parts in connection with each other. After a careful examination of the numerous sections of the act, we find nothing to afford a reasonable inference that such limitation was intended. It seems evident that congress designed to tax most of the ordinary occupations of the people, whether pursued by the respective parties on their own account, or for others for fee, or reward. When the occupation taxed is intended to be limited to acts performed for others, or for a fee, or reward, congress has so expressed it in language not to be misunderstood. In some cases both are mentioned; thus, in the eighth subdivision, the definition of a livery stable keeper includes both those who "keep horses for hire," and who "keep, feed, or board horses for others." The ninth includes in the definition of brokers, those who negotiate sales and purchases for "themselves or others." Those who do business on their own account are clearly taxed in many cases. See subdivisions 12, 16, 17, 30, 31, 33, et seq. Under subdivision 30, auctioneers are taxed, and declared to be persons "whose business it is to offer property at public sale to the highest and best bidder." There can be no doubt that this would include those whose business is to regularly sell, in the mode indicated, their own, as well as others', property. Subdivision forty-three expressly limits the definition of lawyers to those "who for fee, or reward, shall prosecute," etc. So subdivisions forty-four and fifty, and others, contain similar limitations; and section eighty-one is adopted, apparently, for the express purpose of limiting the meaning of the definition given in other sections, so that parties embraced in the general language of such sections shall not be held liable to a tax for certain specified matters pertaining to their own business. Thus, it is manifest, that, when the tax is intended to be imposed only on those who perform the act indicated for others, for hire, fee, or reward, congress has had no difficulty in finding apt words to express that intention. And section seventy-six provides, "that in every case where more than one of the pursuits, employments or occupations hereinafter described shall be carried on in the same place by the same person at the same time, except as hereinafter provided, the tax shall be paid for each according to the rate prescribed," etc. So the fact that the plaintiff is subject to pay a miner's tax under subdivision forty-nine, does not militate against the idea that it can, also, be subject to a tax, as assayer, under subdivision forty-eight. Indeed, it seems to contemplate this very case, of a party engaged in both occupations as a part of his business.

These two provisions relating to assayers and miners are closely connected in the same section, and in consecutive subdivisions, so that congress, necessarily, had its attention called to both occupations at the same time, and, if it had intended to exclude from the tax, assaying for himself, when performed by the miner, as a branch of his business of mining, congress could scarcely have failed to express that intent in terms, when the two branches of the business were, necessarily, brought to its notice in such intimate relations. When the plaintiff as a part of its business is engaged in "assaying its own ore," it is separating the "gold and silver from other metals or mineral substances with which such gold or silver is alloyed, combined or united," etc., and this is within the express terms of the statutory definition of an assayer.

We think the plaintiff is an assayer, within the meaning of the statute, and subject to the tax imposed therein, and that the defendant must have judgment; and it is so ordered.

ARBITRATION CLAUSE—INSURANCE POLICY—RIGHT TO SUE.

1. The policy provided that, in case of differences arising touching any loss or damage, the matter may, at the written request of either party, be submitted to impartial arbitrators, whose award in writing should be binding on the parties to the amount of such loss or damage, "but shall not decide the liability of the company under this policy;" also, "it is furthermore hereby provided and mutually agreed that no suit or action against this company for the recovery of any claim by virtue of this policy shall be sustainable in any court of law or chancery, until an award shall have been obtained fixing the amount of such claim in the manner herein above provided." Held, that whilst a mere collateral agreement to refer to arbitration all differences arising upon a policy is not binding, and does not preclude a suit without such reference, it is not unlawful for parties to agree that no action shall be sustainable at law or equity until arbitration shall have determined what amount is due, and that in such a case a reference and ascertainment of the amount due are conditions precedent to the right of bringing an action.

[Cited in brief in Schollenberger v. Phoenix Ins. Co., Case No. 12,476.]

2. No suit could be sustained against the objection of the company until after an award had been made, although neither party had, previous to the suit, requested arbitration.

NIXON, District Judge. This is a motion to strike out the last plea filed by the defendants in the above-stated case. In reply to the suggestion, so strongly urged by the counsel of the defendants, that the question involved was of too great importance to be summarily disposed of on a motion to strike out, and that the defendants ought to have the benefit of solemn argument on demurrer, it is only necessary to observe that the remediless consequences which formerly followed the exercise of the power of striking out pleadings on motion, and which made courts so reluctant to act, do not now result from such action. Section 132 of the Practice Act of New Jersey (Rev. St. 624), which authorizes the court, or a judge, in vacation, on four days' notice, "to strike out any pleading, that is irregular or defective, or is so framed as to prejudice, embarrass, or delay a fair trial on action," contains the additional provision that "the order striking out such pleadings shall be entered on the record, if required by the party against whom the same is made, and error may be assigned thereon." This provision is made applicable to the courts of the United States, by the express terms of section 914 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and it saves to the defendants all the rights which they would have on demurrer.

The counsel for the plaintiff maintains that the plea is bad—(1) for want of proper averments; (2) because it seeks to set up an illegal defense. The plea is actio non, etc., because the defendants say that in the policy of insurance it is stipulated and agreed that in case difference should arise touching any loss or damage, after proof thereon should have been received in due form, "the matter might, at the written request of either party, be submitted to impartial arbitrators, whose award in writing should be binding on the parties to the amount of such loss or damage;" and it was further, in and by said policy of insurance, expressly provided and mutually agreed "that no suit or action against the defendants, for the recovery of any claim by virtue of this policy, shall be sustainable in any court of law or chancery until an award shall have been obtained from the said arbitrators, fixing the amount of such claim in the manner provided by the said condition hereinbefore set forth, and in said policy contained." And defendants say that differences did arise touching the loss or damage sustained by the said plaintiff, after proof of such loss had been received in due form by these defendants; and that the matter was not, at the written request of either party, submitted to impartial arbitrators, and no award has ever been obtained, fixing the amount of said plaintiff's claim, in the manner provided for in the said condition; and that said action was commenced by the said plaintiff against these defendants before an award was obtained, fixing the amount of said plaintiff's claim by the said arbitrators, in the manner provided in the said condition, etc., concluding a verification.

It will be observed that the plea sets up, in substance, two certain conditions in the policy, subject to which the policy was issued to the plaintiff. One of these is the following paragraph in the ninth condition: "In case differences shall arise touching any loss or damage, after proof thereon has been received in due form, the matter may, at the written request of either party, be submitted to impartial arbitrators, whose award in writing shall be binding on the parties to the amount of such loss or damage, but shall not decide the liability of the company under this policy." The other is on the thirteenth condition: "It is furthermore hereby provided and mutually agreed that no suit or action against this company, for the recovery of any claim by virtue of this policy, shall be sustainable in any court of law or chancery, until an award shall have been obtained fixing the amount of such claim, in the manner hereinabove provided." There is no question but that these conditions are a part of the contract between the parties. The controversy turns upon their interpretation, and whether they are enforceable.

The counsel for the plaintiff insists that the adjustment of differences by arbitration is only to be observed upon the written request of one party or the other; and, when no such request is made, it is presumed to have been waived; and, further, that all agreements between parties to refer the settlement of their disputes to arbitrators are void, for the reason that persons are not permitted to contract to oust the courts of their ordinary jurisdiction.

The counsel for the defendants, on the other hand, claim that their method of settlement is compulsory upon the respective parties as a preliminary step, and that no suit is sustainable by either party against the other until after an award has been made. It is conceded that the plea is bad if the effect of these clauses in the policy on which it is founded, is to prevent the party suffering loss from going into the courts for redress. They are so jealous of their jurisdiction that they do not allow parties to oust it by agreement. Although there was a long struggle against the doctrine in the courts of Westminster Hall, it has now become so well established that no attempt is made there, or in the courts of this country, to set up a contrary doctrine. Huger, Ins. 351; Ang. Ins. § 354; Fland. Ins. 632; Thompson v. Charnock, 8 Term R. 139; Mitchell v. Harris, 2 Ves. Jr. 136; Scott v. Avery, 20 Eng. Law & Eq. 327; s. c. on appeal, 36 Eng. Law & Eq. 1; Roper v. Lendon, 128 E. C. L. 825; Hagert v. Mun., 40 R. 515; Snodgrass v. Gavit, 28 Pa. St. 224. But in my judgment such is not the effect of these clauses. The differences arising between the parties to the contract touching only the amount of loss or damage is to be referred, and not the liability of the company on the policy; and the agreement is that no suit shall be instituted until the amount has been fixed by the judgment of arbitrators mutually chosen. There is no restriction after that preliminary step has been taken. It is in the nature of a condition precedent, and there is a large class of cases which determine that, where the contract is so framed as to make the reference of differences a condition precedent to the right of bringing a suit, the declaration must allege a reference, or give excuse for the want of it. Smith v. Railway Co., 36 N. H. 458; Worsley v. Wood, 6 Term R. 710; Milner v. Field, 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 531; Grafton v. Railway Co., 22 Eng. Law & Eq. 557; Davies v. Mayor, etc., 20 Eng. Law & Eq. 529; Adams v. Willoughby, 6 Johns. 67; U. S. v. Robeson, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 319; Scott v. Avery, 36 Eng. Law & Eq. 1. This last case was an appeal to the house of lords from the decision of the court of exchequer chamber, and the matter was examined and discussed with great learning and care. Mr. Justice Coleridge, who had delivered the opinion of the court of exchequer chamber reversing the court of exchequer, in giving his reasons to the lords for sustaining the last decision, said: "If two parties enter into a contract, for the breach of which, in any particular, an action lies, they cannot make it a binding term that in such event no action shall be maintainable, but that the only remedy shall be by reference to arbitration. Whether this rest on a satisfactory principle or not may well be questioned, but it has been so long settled that it cannot be disturbed. The courts will not enforce or sanction an agreement which deprives a subject of that recourse to their jurisdiction which has been considered a right inalienable even by the concurrent will of the parties. But nothing prevents parties from ascertaining and constituting, as they please, the cause of action, which is to become the subject-matter of decision by the courts. Covenantee parties may agree that, in case of an illegal breach, the damages to be recovered shall be a sum fixed or a sum to be ascertained by A. B., or by arbitrators to be chosen in such a manner, and, until this be done, or the nonfeasance be satisfactorily accounted for, that no action shall be maintainable for the breach."

This position had not been questioned in the argument before the house, nor was it, I think, in the court below.

To the same effect was the opinion of Lord Chancellor Cranforth. The only material plea, he said, "was the fifth, setting forth one of the rules of the association, which was, that if any difference should arise among the members, the member so dissatisfied should select an arbitrator, and, if the committee were not satisfied with the person appointed, they should select another arbitrator, and these two select a third, who were to determine the matters in dispute and the sum to be awarded, and that no action should be brought until such arbitration had taken place. The court of exchequer decided that the plea was bad, and no answer to the action. That decision was reversed by the court of exchequer chamber, and the latter judgment was never brought before your lordships' house. It appears to me merely a matter as to the construction to be put upon the policy itself, for there was no doubt that persons could not by contract oust the court of its ordinary jurisdiction. That point has been decided in many cases, but there was no principle of law which prevented parties from entering into any contract that no right of action should accrue until after a reference had been made to an arbitrator. If I covenant with A. not to do a particular act, and it is agreed between us that any question which might arise should be decided by an arbitrator, without bringing an action, then a plea to that effect would be no bar to an action; but if we agreed that J. S. was to award the amount of damages to be recoverable at law, then, if such arbitration did not take place, no action could be brought."

Adams v. Willoughby, supra, was a suit brought inter alia for unliquidated demands and accounts, and there was a general demurrer to the declaration. It appears that there was a contract between the parties that all unliquidated demands and accounts should be referred to three arbitrators, to be liquidated and ascertained, and the defendant was to pay such sum as they should adjudge to be due. The court sustained the declaration so far as it relates to one sum of $102, which the plaintiff alleged was due to him in a supplement made with the defendant; but in regard to the claim for the unliquidated accounts it said that, "as no reference had been made to arbitrators to liquidate and ascertain the amount due, nor any effort on the part of the plaintiff to procure it,—for none is shown or averred,—the plaintiff is not entitled to his action for any such demand."

In U. S. v. Robeson, supra, the supreme court sanctioned the same principle. Mr. Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Where the parties in their contract fix on a certain mode by which the amount to be paid shall be ascertained, as in the present case, the party that seeks an enforcement of the agreement must show that he has done everything on his part which could be done to carry it into effect. He cannot compel the payment of the amount claimed unless he shall procure the kind of evidence required by the contract, or show that, by time or accident, he is unable to do so; and, as this was not done by the defendant in the district court, no evidence to prove the service other than the certificates should have been admitted by the court."

I think it clear from these cases that, whilst a mere collateral agreement to refer to arbitration all differences arising upon a policy of insurance is not binding and does not preclude a suit without such reference, it is not unlawful for parties to agree that no action shall be sustainable either at law or equity, until arbitration shall have determined what amount is due, and that, in such a case, a reference and ascertainment of the amount are conditions precedent to the right of bringing an action.

The motion to strike out must therefore be refused.

BILL OF REVIEW—RULE TO SHOW CAUSE.

Where a bill of review is filed to set aside a decree of the court, made in a suit between the parties, the court will grant a rule to show cause why the former decree should not be reversed, and the injunction granted should not be suspended, only: (1) When the original decree shows upon its face that it is contrary to law; or (2) upon the allegation and prima facie proof of the existence of material facts, which, if known, would have hindered the decree, and which the complainant in the bill of review did not know at the former trial, and could not have discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

[Bill of review by Henry A. Yerrington against Henry W. Putnam.]

T. C. Nye, for complainant.

P. E. Havens, for defendant.

NIXON, District Judge. The bill is filed in this case to set aside a decree of this court, heretofore made in a suit between the parties. The defendant being in court, an application is now made for a rule to show cause why the former decree should not be reversed, and the injunction granted should not be suspended until the further order of the court.

There are two grounds only on which the court will grant a rule in such cases: (1) When the original decree shows upon its face that it is contrary to law; (2) upon the allegation and prima facie proof of the existence of material facts which, if known, would have hindered the decree, and which the complainant in the bill of review did not know at the former trial, and could not have discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

I have examined the bill, and do not find any reason therein alleged, which would authorize the court to grant the rule asked for.

Case No. 18,138.

In re YORK et al.

[3 N. B. R. 661 (Quarto, 163).] ¹

District Court, D. Louisiana. Jan. 11, 1870.

MORTGAGE FOR ADVANCES—SUPPLIES FOR PLANTATION—DATE OF MORTGAGE.

1. Where a valid mortgage of a plantation was made in Louisiana to secure advances of cash and supplies, to be made from time to time, for the purpose of working it, not to exceed in amount twenty-five thousand dollars, to be reimbursed out of its products; and advances were made to exceed fifty thousand dollars, and reimbursements to an amount that, however, left a balance due exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars, held, the mortgage is good as security to its full amount, on any balance remaining on advances and reimbursements under it, and is not extinguished by the reimbursement of the first twenty-five thousand dollars.

2. A mortgage given to secure the payment of four promissory notes, made to raise means to work a plantation, is valid, and, upon the negotiation of the notes, relates back to the date of execution.

DURELL, District Judge. In the month of February, 1869, two plantations, surrendered by the bankrupts, and designated as "White Hall" and "Home Place," were sold free of incumbrances, under the order of this court. In March, 1869, a rule was taken by the assignee calling upon the creditors of the bankrupts to show cause why said sales should not be confirmed, and the proceeds thereof distributed in accordance with the priority and rank of the mortgages, privileges, and liens existing at the date of the surrender. Upon the return of this rule, W. A. Ober, the purchaser at the sales, demanded a confirmation of the same; and the commercial firm of Ober, Atwater & Co. asserted themselves to be creditors of the bankrupts, secured by mortgage, first, in priority and rank, upon the property sold. The claims of Ober, Atwater & Co. were disputed by others of the creditors of the bankrupts, and the whole matter was referred to a commissioner, with instructions to inquire into the regularity of the sales, which certain creditors also impugned, and to determine the order and rank of the mortgages resting upon the respective plantations. In June last the commissioner made a voluminous report upon the law and facts of the case, confirming the sales, and sustaining the validity and priority in rank of the mortgages held by Ober, Atwater & Co. To the confirmation of this report exceptions were taken, and, subsequently, fully argued by counsel representing all parties in interest. The sales having been adjudged to be valid at a previous day of this term, it only remains for the court to determine the relative rank of the respective mortgages.

The mortgages on the respective plantations being distinct, will be separately considered.

First. As to the mortgages upon "White Hall." On the 17th of January, 1866, York & Hoover made an authentic act of mortgage, in which it is recited "that being in want of cash and supplies to carry on the cultivation of that certain plantation, known as 'White Hall,' and also the 'Home Place,' belonging to them, they have applied to Ober, Atwater & Co. for such advances of cash and supplies, who have agreed to advance the same, at such times, and in such manner as the same may be needed, to an amount not to exceed twenty-five thousand dollars, on the terms and conditions hereafter expressed." The conditions on the part of York & Hoover to be performed, were, to cultivate the plantations with diligence; to apply the advances to the use of the plantations; and upon the crops being gathered, to consign the same to the mortgagees for sale, who, out of the proceeds thereof, were to repay to themselves "all such advances as they shall at such time have made," together with commissions, costs of sale, interest, etc. Ober, Atwater & Co. agreed to make the advances, and, to represent the same, received from York & Hoover a negotiable note in the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, payable on the 1st day of January, 1867. After these recitals, the act proceeds to declare "that to secure payment of all said advances which the said Ober, Atwater & Co. may make as aforesaid, and such sums of money as may be due to them as aforesaid, under this contract, the said York & Hoover specially mortgage the 'White Hall' plantation." The act finally declares that all accounts accruing under it shall be due and mature on the 1st January, 1867. This mortgage was executed and inscribed before the execution and inscription of the mortgage given to Wright & Allen, under which last mortgage the opposing creditors claim.

The only question to be determined, then, is, whether Ober, Atwater & Co. have, within the terms of this mortgage, produced a valid, operative, and existing obligation. The testimony shows that during the year 1866, advances were made to the two plantations to an amount exceeding fifty-three thousand dollars; that during the year, payments were made exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars; and that in January, 1867, a balance existed, including commissions, of over twenty-seven thousand dollars. The opponents contend that the contract of Ober, Atwater & Co. was fulfilled when advances had been made to the amount of twenty-five thousand dollars; and that this mortgage was extinguished when they had received a like sum from the crops of the plantation. Ober, Atwater & Co. maintain, on the contrary, that their mortgage secured whatever might remain in January, 1867, as a balance on the account of advances made to them. The language of the act of mortgage, the character of the instrument, the conduct of the parties to the contract, and the judicial decisions, support this conclusion of the mortgagees. The mortgage was executed to secure advances to be made during the year; the settlement of accounts was postponed until the expiration of the year; and whatever advances were made the mortgage was designed to stand as a security for to the extent of twenty-five thousand dollars.

The case of Lawrence v. Tucker, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 15, is strictly analogous to the one now before the court. In that case a note was given for the sum of five thousand five hundred dollars, contemporaneous with the mortgage as a debit; but in truth, as a collateral security for advances made. The mortgage was given to secure such advances of money as had been, or might be made, within two years, to the mortgagors, not to exceed six thousand dollars in addition to the note, making a sum total of eleven thousand five hundred dollars. It appears from the report, that within the two years, from fifty thousand to one hundred thousand dollars were advanced; and that, at the expiration of the term, nearly ten thousand dollars were due on said advances from the mortgagors to the mortgagee. The objections having been made in that case, as in the one now before the court, that the mortgage was not given to secure a balance on the settlement of accounts to the amount stipulated in the mortgage, but only to secure first advances to the amount of the note, and six thousand dollars—to wit, eleven thousand five hundred dollars; and that the payment of that sum by the mortgagors to the mortgagee, in the course of their transactions during the term of the two years, was a ratification of the mortgage; the supreme court said: "Our object has been to show that the parties to the original transaction understood it alike, and acted upon it accordingly; that there never was a difference of opinion between them as to the character of the mortgage and its purposes; and that it was intended to be a security for, and a lien upon, the property mortgaged, for future advances to the extent of the sum provided for in it. * * * We consider it to be a mortgage for future advances; that they were subsequently made in conformity with its provisions; and that the proofs that they were so, were rightfully received by the court below to substantiate them."

In the case now before the court, similar proofs were submitted. The accounts current, the act of liquidation, the testimony of the parties to these accounts, all show an intent corresponding to that which the mortgage itself suggests.

The case of Lawrence v. Tucker [supra], in the supreme court of the United States, is supported by other decisions of that court, cited in the opinion delivered in the case, and also by the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana in Pickersgill v. Brown, 7 La. Ann. 298, decided under the regime of the Code of the state. Therein it was determined that a mortgage for advances to be made from time to time, during a definite period, for a specific amount, is a security for the eventual balance in account. That it is not affected by the fluctuations in the account at different periods in the time limited; and that the inscribed mortgage, declaring the nature of the transactions, the time within which they are to accrue, and the limit to which the mortgage debit may reach, afford a sufficient notice to all parties, so as to place them on their guard. These doctrines have been maintained in the French courts under the regime of the Code Napoleon, many of whose decisions are cited in the very able and learned report of the commissioner; and they are fully recognized in the highest courts of other states of the Union. Vide 5 Metc. (Mass.) 268.

Second. As to the mortgages upon the "Home Place." The mortgages upon the "Home Place" plantation bear date of the same day—to wit, January 20, 1866. One was made in favor of Alexander Allen, acknowledging a debit for supplies furnished the plantation; and to put said debit in a negotiable form, four notes were drawn in the sum of five thousand dollars each; payable to the makers, York & Hoover, indorsed in blank, bearing interest from date, and maturing in the following fall and winter. These notes are recited in the mortgage, and, thus secured, are payable to any future holder thereof. Another or second mortgage, bearing even date with the first, but inscribed one day later, was given to Messrs. Wright & Allen, factors and merchants, who had become liable for the mortgagors in large sums, as securities, as indorsers, and otherwise; which sums the mortgagors wished to discharge. For that purpose they made numerous notes, recited in the mortgage and negotiable in form, which were put into the hands of Wright & Allen, to be used solely in the discharge of their said liabilities, incurred by indorsements or otherwise. Wright & Allen, the factors and merchants of York & Hoover, had been consulted by them, in reference to their mutual business relations; and it was by the advice of Wright & Allen that York & Hoover made the mortgage first above described, and first inscribed. It was made to enable York & Hoover to raise money to work their plantations, "White Hall" and "Home Place." The notes were made to be negotiated in the market, and the mortgage was made to give additional credit to the notes. They were all negotiated for value before maturity, two of them in March, and two in August of 1866.

The opposing creditors contend that these notes are not protected by the mortgage. That at the date of the inscription there had been no negotiation of the notes, and that, therefore, there was no debt due; and that none was created until several months subsequent thereto. But the mortgagors' purpose was to raise money by a loan, and, preparatory thereto, these notes were made, a mortgage declaring the existence of a debt executed and inscribed, and both mortgage and notes placed in the hands of an agent for negotiation. It may be true that the mortgage and the notes were inchoate securities, framed to accomplish a particular object, and that a negotiation by the mortgagor or his agent was necessary to their complete validity. It may be that, until then, there was no creditor, no debtor, no right of action, nor perfect obligation; but the agent, from the date of the inscription, was in possession of all the means to the making of a perfect contract, by the delivery of the securities to a bona fide holder. These securities, by such a delivery, became operative from their date, and are binding, ab initio, upon the mortgagor. The Civil Code of Louisiana (article 3259) provides "that a mortgage may be given for an obligation which has not yet risen into existence;" and cites as an illustration, "as when a man grants a mortgage by way of security for indorsements which another promises to make for him." Id. A more apt illustration, and one that arises more frequently in practice is, "as where a man makes notes negotiable by delivery, and secures them by an inscribed mortgage, and places them in the hands of a broker for sale for his account." If the debtor may grant a mortgage to secure notes that have not been negotiated, but which he contemplates negotiating, with a friend's indorsement, why may he not, in the same manner, provide for the credit and payment of his own notes, prepared for negotiation, when the principle is admitted that a mortgage can be given for an obligation which is only proposed, or which has not risen into existence? The intrinsic validity of the mortgage under consideration is admitted. Article 3260, of the Code, declares the operative force of such a mortgage. "The right of mortgage shall only be realized in so far as the promise shall be carried into effect, by the person making the promise to indorse, or, as in the case supposed, by the actual and bona fide transfer of the notes. But the fulfillment of the promise to indorse," continues the article quoted, or, as in the case supposed, the negotiation of the notes of the mortgagors, "shall impart to the mortgage an effect relating back to the date of the mortgage."

The French authorities support the conclusion that the mortgage takes effect from the date of the inscription, and not from the date of the realization of the loan. The French judicial decisions show a clearer and deeper knowledge of the necessities of a commercial age and people than do the theories of the late illustrious president of the court of cassation, and of others of their great commentators, which they overrule.

In Telemetz v. Bonifay, Sir. & Vill. (1842) pt. 2, p. 520, the court of cassation say: "L'hypothèque stipulée pour sûreté d'un crédit ouvert prend rang du jour de son inscription pour toutes les sommes fournies en vertu de ce crédit, et même pour celles qui n'ont été fournies que postérieurement aux inscriptions prises par d'autres créanciers. Il y a, dès le jour même du contrat, obligation réciproque: obligation de la part de celui qui ouvre le crédit, de faire les avances promises; de la part du crédité, de restituer les sommes qu'il prendra en vertu du crédit. Si cette obligation est conditionnelle, elle n'en est pas moins une obligation à laquelle peut se rattacher une hypothèque. La condition accomplie a un effet rétroactif au jour auquel l'engagement a été contracté, et cette hypothèque prise en vertu du crédit ouvert prend rang du jour de son inscription, et non du jour de la réalisation du crédit, et prime en conséquence les hypothèques inscrites intermédiairement entre le jour du contrat portant ouverture du crédit et hypothèque, et celui où le crédit a pu se réaliser. Il n'y a aucun préjudice des droits des tiers, puisque par l'inscription les créanciers sont suffisamment avertis que si la condition s'accomplit, c'est-à-dire si le crédit se réalise, l'hypothèque prendra rang du jour de son inscription." The same doctrine is again declared by the same court in the same volume (pt. 2, p. 541) in Hutte v. Seignan. See, also, Hilderbrand v. Courcelles, Sir. & Vill. (1848) pt. 2, p. 729, and note, in which it is stated that this decision is in accordance with uniform jurisprudence, and the opinion of the majority of the authors, though the contrary had been maintained by Merlin, Toullier, and Troplong. The supreme court of Louisiana also shows a decided preference for this doctrine. 7 La. Ann. 297; 16 La. 370; 18 La. Ann. 235. And a corresponding disposition is exhibited in the American chancery reports. 7 Conn. 337; 24 Conn. 290; 4 Johns. Ch. 65, 74; 2 Cow. 246. That the mortgage for the four notes, the mortgage first inscribed, is not a nullity, but a valid security for the notes in the hands of holders for value, has been shown. It is to be inferred that Wright & Allen, the persons named as mortgagees in the mortgage of the same date, bearing upon the same property, but last inscribed, had notice of the mortgage for the four notes and consented to its prior inscription in order to give to it the priority of lien thence arising.

There is no evidence showing at what time the holders of the notes described in the mortgage last inscribed became parties in interest; and we find no evidence that any party attempted to restrain the negotiation of the four notes secured by the first. During the year 1867, Ober, Atwater & Co. continued to furnish supplies and to make advances to York & Hoover. Upon the accounts as stated, it appears that there is due to them more than the amount of the notes embraced in the mortgage. The payments, from whatever source derived, do not cover the balances due. The sum bid for the "Home Place" was nineteen thousand eight hundred dollars, and for "White Hall" the proceeds amount to twenty-two thousand dollars. The expenses and costs of the sales must be deducted from these funds, together with such expenses of the estate as are commonly chargeable against it.

Decretal order: This cause came on to be heard on the pleadings and proofs and arguments of counsel for the various creditors, and thereupon it is declared by the court—First, that the commercial firm of Ober, Atwater & Co. have established their right to the mortgages and mortgage debts specified in the two mortgages filed by them, one on the "White Hall" plantation, dated 17th of January, 1866, and inscribed the 9th of February, 1866, for the security of advances for twenty-five thousand dollars, to be due 1st of January, 1867, and which sum was advanced. And one upon the "Home Place" plantation, executed the 20th of January, 1866, and inscribed the 16th of February, 1866, to secure the payment of four notes therein described. And that these mortgages have a prior lien upon the proceeds of the sales of the said plantations, and must be paid in preference to any of the mortgages which have been set up in the oppositions of the creditors of York & Hoover. Second. It is further ordered, decreed, and adjudged, that the moneys arising from the sales of the said "White Hall" and "Home Place" plantations be paid to the said Ober, Atwater & Co. upon their several mortgages as aforesaid, to the extent of the moneys applicable, and that each mortgage be credited with the money derived from the property declared in it. Third. The assignee is directed to charge the said funds in his hands with the costs and expenses of the sale, and orders relative thereto, and their proportion of the general expenses of the estate. Fourth. That the costs of the litigation upon the regularity of the sale, and upon the oppositions to the rule by the assignee, be paid by the opposing creditors.

BANKRUPTCY—APPEALS—SUPERVISORY POWERS OF CIRCUIT COURT.

1. In computing the time within which an appeal in bankruptcy must be taken, Sunday is to be counted, except that when the last day would fall on Sunday, that Sunday is to be excluded.

[Cited in Shefer v. Magone, 47 Fed. 873.]

2. The decision of a district court, sitting in bankruptcy, upon an application to confirm a sale made of a bankrupt's estate, is not a matter within the general supervisory jurisdiction conferred by section 2 of the bankrupt law of 1867 (14 Stat. 518) upon the circuit courts.

3. A proceeding in bankruptcy, from the filing of the petition to the distribution of the bankrupt's estate and his discharge, is a single statutory proceeding.

[Cited in Alabama & C. R. R. Co. v. Jones, Case No. 126.]

4. When it occurs, pending this proceeding, that the assignee or creditor is driven to file a bill in equity or bring an action at law, the circuit court has no supervisory jurisdiction of the proceedings had therein, nor has it when the claim of a supposed creditor has been rejected in whole or in part,—nor where the assignee is dissatisfied with the allowance of a claim. These classes of cases may be taken up on writ of error or appeal.

5. Other questions, however, arising in the district court in the progress of a case in bankruptcy, whether of legal or equitable cognizance, fall within the supervisory jurisdiction of the court, and may, upon bill, petition, or other proper process of any party aggrieved, be heard and determined in the circuit court as a court of equity.

² [This was a petition to review certain proceedings in bankruptcy in the district court of Louisiana. Ober, Atwater & Co. claimed first mortgages on two plantations surrendered by the bankrupts, York & Hoover. They obtained an order for the sale of them, and purchased both at the assignee's sale. They applied for a rule to confirm the sale, and asked that the proceeds of sale be applied to the extinguishment of their mortgages. The Citizens' Bank and other creditors answered the rule, and alleged that the mortgage of Ober, Atwater & Co. on one of the plantations had been extinguished, and on the other it was only second in rank. They further alleged that Ober, Atwater & Co. had influenced a competitor not to bid for one of the plantations, and had also made overtures to the solicitor of the assignee, calculated to give them an unjust preference over other creditors with respect to both. The district court made the rule absolute (Case No. 18,138), and the Citizens' Bank appealed, and also joined the other creditors in a petition of review to the circuit court.

Before BRADLEY, Circuit Justice, and WOODS, Circuit Judge.

² [From 10 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 36.]

WOODS, Circuit Judge. York & Hoover having been declared bankrupts by the adjudication of the district court, E. E. Norton, their assignee, filed a petition in said district court sitting as a court of bankruptcy, praying for an order to sell two plantations, the property of bankrupts. An order of sale was made, and under it a sale of the plantations, called respectively "White Hall" and "Home," was made on the sixteenth day of February, 1869, and Ober, one of the creditors, became the purchaser. On a later day in February, 1869, C. H. Slocomb, one of the creditors of York & Hoover, filed his petition in the district court, setting forth the fact of the sale to Ober, that no deed had, at the time of filing his petition, been made by Norton, the assignee, to Ober, charging that the sale was fraudulent, and therefore illegal and void, and praying, on behalf of himself and other creditors of York & Hoover, that Ober, Norton, the assignee, and others show cause, on Saturday, March 6, 1869, at eleven o'clock a. m., why the sale should not be set aside; and in the mean time that they, and each of them, might be enjoined from taking any steps towards perfecting said sale, or conveying said plantations to the purchaser.

Pursuant to the prayer of this petition, an order was made, and the parties named were cited to show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted. The minutes of the district court of the date of March 19, 1869, shows the following entry: "No. 603. Matter of York & Hoover. On motion of H. D. Stone, attorney of E. E. Norton, and upon showing to the court that a sale was made of two plantations surrendered herein,—namely, the 'Home' and 'White Hall' plantations, situated in the parish of Concordia (here follows a description of the two plantations), on the 16th of February, 1869, and upon further showing to the court that the following parties appear to have had mortgages, privileges, claims, and liens upon said plantations (here follow the names of some fifty creditors), it is ordered that the parties above named, and the bankrupts, and all persons interested herein, show cause on the 1st day of May, 1869, at 11 o'clock a. m., why said sale should not be confirmed; and at the same time the priority and rank of said mortgages, privileges, liens, and claims be fixed and adjudicated; that, as so adjudicated, the same be directed to be paid; that notice thereof be given by publication in the New Orleans Republican for three days, the last publication to be at least ten days before such hearing."

After this order to show cause was made by the court, precisely when we are unable to ascertain from the papers submitted to us, the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana and a large number of other creditors of York & Hoover filed an exception, in which they set out various grounds why the sale should not be confirmed, and conclude by praying that the application of the assignee for the confirmation of the sale be refused and rejected, and that said sale be set aside and annulled.

On the day fixed for the hearing of this rule, the matter of the rule and exceptions thereto were referred by the district court sitting in bankruptcy to a commissioner, with instructions to ascertain and report upon the validity of the sale, and the priority of the claims; and subsequently the commissioner reported that there was no fraud or collusion in making the sale, and that certain mortgages held by Ober, Atwater & Co. on said "White Hall" and "Home" plantations were the first and best liens on those places respectively, and that the amount due on them was more than the proceeds of the sale. Thereupon it was ordered by the court, on motion, that the report of the commissioner, if not opposed within three days, be approved and homologated.

Exceptions were filed to the report of commissioner, and afterwards,—to wit, on January 11, 1870,—the district court confirmed the sale, but reserved the question of priority of mortgages and liens for further argument. On March 31, 1870, the district court declared that the mortgages of Ober, Atwater & Co. were the first lien on said plantations, and on the proceeds of the sale thereof, and directed them to be paid in preference to any of the other mortgages set up in the oppositions of the creditors of York & Hoover, and directed the money arising from the sale to be paid to Ober, Atwater & Co. On April 5, 1870, an application was made for a rehearing on the matters embraced in this decision of the court, and on April 27 a rehearing was refused.

The Citizens' Bank and other creditors of York & Hoover, on May 9 took an appeal from the order of the court of March 31. which in effect dates from the refusal for rehearing on April 27. And on the same May 9 said Citizens' Bank and other creditors filed in this court a petition invoking its supervisory jurisdiction, under section 2 of the bankrupt act, and praying that the orders and decrees of the district court above recited be set aside, the sales of said plantations declared null and void, and the same ordered to be resold, and that their mortgages be decreed to have priority.

The case is heard upon two questions: (1) Whether the appeal was taken within the time limited by law; and (2) whether the case presented by the petitions of the Citizens' Bank and others, was a case for the supervisory jurisdiction of the court, and whether this court has jurisdiction thereof.

I. As intimated during the argument, we are of opinion that if this were a proper case for appeal, the appeal was taken too late. If Sundays are counted, the delay of ten days allowed for the appeal had expired before the appeal was taken. Unless Sundays are expressly excepted in the statute, they are to be counted. The language of section 8 of the bankrupt act is: "No appeal shall be allowed from the district to the circuit court, unless it is claimed and notice thereof given to the clerk * * * within ten days after the entry of the decree or decision appealed from." The rule for computing the number of days within which an appeal is allowed is expressly declared by section 48 of the bankrupt act as follows: "In all cases in which any particular number of days is prescribed by this act * * * for the doing of any act, the same shall be reckoned, in the absence of any expression to the contrary, exclusive of the first and inclusive of the last day, unless the last day shall fall on Sunday, in which case the time shall be reckoned exclusive of that day also." The fair, and, as it seems to us, unavoidable inference, is that when Sunday is not the last day, it is not to be excluded. Applying this rule, excluding April 27, the day on which the decree was signed, the time for appeal in this case expired with May 7. The appeal not having been taken till the ninth, it was two days too late.

II. The other question presented is, whether this is a proper case for the supervisory jurisdiction of this court. By section 2 of the bankrupt act, it is provided that "the circuit courts in the districts where proceedings in bankruptcy are pending shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under this act, and except where special provision is otherwise made may, upon bill, petition, or other proper process of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the case as a court of equity." "The only construction which gives due effect to all parts of this section is that which, on the one hand, excludes from the category of general superintendence and jurisdiction of the circuit court, the appellate jurisdiction defined by section 8, and on the other brings within that category all decisions of the district court or district judge at chambers which cannot be reviewed upon appeal or writ of error under the provisions of that section." Chief Justice Chase, in Re Alexander [Case No. 160]. By section 8 of the act it is provided that appeals may be taken from the district to the circuit court in all cases in equity, and writs of error may be allowed to the circuit court from the district court in cases at law under the jurisdiction created by the bankrupt act when the debt or damages claimed amount to more than five hundred dollars; and any supposed creditor, whose claim is wholly or in part rejected, or an assignee who is dissatisfied with the allowance of a claim may appeal. Now, according to the decision of Chief Justice Chase, just quoted, unless this case falls under one of the classes provided for in this section, it is a proper case for the supervisory jurisdiction of the court.

1. It is not the case of an assignee who is dissatisfied with the allowance of a claim.

2. It is not the case of a supposed creditor, whose claim has been wholly or in part rejected. The claims of these petitioning creditors, so far as the record shows, have all been allowed in full. It is true the court has decided that their claims are not entitled to priority, and that other creditors are; but this is not a rejection of their claims. A creditor's claim is the debt due from the bankrupt to him, and the question of priority of payment is one totally distinct from the question of the allowance or rejection of the claim or debt. We think this is clear from section 1 of the act, which extends the jurisdiction of the court to all cases and controversies between the bankrupt and any creditor who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy; to the collection of the assets; to the ascertainment and liquidation of liens, &c.; to the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties.

Here is an evident distinction made between the claim of a debt or demand against the bankrupt, and priority as to other creditors. A claim of priority is not a claim asserted against the bankrupt, but a right asserted against other creditors.

3. The matter decided by the district court on March 31 is not a case at law in which a writ of error would lie. This is clear, and is not disputed. It remains, then, to consider whether it was a case in equity in which an appeal might be taken. The phrase "case in equity" in section 8, in our view means a suit in equity. It would seem hardly necessary to cite authority to show what a case or suit in equity is. Blackstone says: "The first commencement of a suit in chancery is by preferring a bill to the lord chancellor in the style of a petition; 'humbly complaining, sheweth to your lordship, your orator,' &c. This is in the nature of a declaration at common law, or a libel and allegation in the spiritual courts, setting forth the circumstances of the case at length; 'and for that your orator is wholly without remedy at the common law,' relief is therefore prayed at the chancellor's hands, and also process of subpoena against the defendant, to compel him to answer under oath all the matters charged in the bill. The bill must call all the necessary parties, however remotely concerned in interest, before the court, and must be signed by counsel."

The seventh equity rule, as prescribed by the supreme court of the United States, provides that the process of subpoena shall constitute the proper mesne process in all suits in equity, to require the defendant to appear and answer the exigency of the bill. Rule 12 provides that whenever a bill is filed the clerk shall issue process of subpoena thereon, which shall be returnable into the clerk's office the next rule day, or the next rule day but one, at the election of the plaintiff, occurring after twenty days from the issuing thereof.

It is further provided in the equity rules that the appearance day shall be the rule day to which the subpoena is made returnable, provided the defendant has been served with process twenty days before that day; otherwise his appearance day shall be the next rule day succeeding the rule day when the process is returnable. And it is made the duty of defendant to file his plea, answer, or demurrer to the bill on the rule day next succeeding his appearance.

From what has preceded, it will be seen what is a case in equity, how it is instituted, and how the parties are brought into court, and when they are required to answer. If we decide that the case before the court is not one for its revisory jurisdiction, we in effect decide that the matter which was passed on by the district court on March 31 was a case in equity. In other words, that a mere motion entered upon the minutes of the court without a prayer for relief, without a prayer for process, is a bill in equity; that a notice published three times in a newspaper is service of process, and brings parties into court as if served with a subpoena in chancery; and that a decree rendered upon such rule when only a portion of the parties referred to in the rule make any appearance whatever; when only a part of them file any response to the motion, and that in the way of an exception, and not sworn to; when no decrees pro confesso are taken against those who do not appear, is a final decree in a case in equity, from which, under the judiciary act, an appeal lies to the circuit court. The mere statement of the proposition is its own refutation. Nor do we think the case made by the petition of Slocomb, even if it was held to give character to the proceeding and decision which petitioning creditors seek to review, is any more of a case in equity than the motion of the assignee Norton by his solicitor Stone. There is scarcely anything in the petition which assimilates it to a bill in equity. It is, in fact, nothing more than a motion in writing. It simply prays that "said Ober, the said assignee, and said Girardy & Co., show cause, on a certain day, why the said sales should not be set aside as void, and until the hearing that the parties named be enjoined from taking any steps towards perfecting said sales. Only three or four of the persons interested in the question are named in the petition—the great mass of them are left out entirely; no prayer of process; no demand for answer under oath; no service of process, and, in fact, scarcely any of the common incidents of a bill in equity are to be found in this petition. To call it a bill in equity, or the proceeding a case in equity, it seems to us is an entire misapprehension of the meaning of the terms.

But it is insisted that the setting aside a sale for fraud and determining the priorities of liens are matters of purely equitable cognizance, and therefore the proceeding sought to be reviewed is a case in equity from which appeal lies.

Courts of law frequently pass upon questions purely equitable, on motion or rule; but the nature of the question has never been held to make such motion or rule a case in equity. It is a very common practice for courts of law, on motion, to set aside sales made by a sheriff on execution on account of some fraud or unfairness on the part of the sheriff or purchaser; yet he would be a bold man who would insist that such a motion was a case in equity. When money is brought into court, the proceeds of a sale on execution, courts of law do not hesitate, on motion, to direct how the money shall be distributed, assuming to pass upon the priorities of claimants to the fund; yet it has never been supposed that by so doing they were rendering a decree in chancery, or that the motion to distribute the fund according to the rights of the parties made a case in equity. These two things, passing upon the validity of a sale, and directing the distribution of the fund arising therefrom, on motion or rule to show cause, are precisely what the district court did, and we do not think the motion was a case in equity, or the ruling of the court a decree in equity. It was the simple exercise of a power incident to courts of law as well as equity, to regulate the proceedings in a case pending before it, to control its own process, and to distribute funds brought into court.

Our general view of the whole subject is this: The proceeding in bankruptcy, from the filing of the petition to the discharge of the bankrupt and the final dividend, is a single statutory case or proceeding. In the conduct of the case a large number of questions may arise. Before the assets of the bankrupt can be collected and distributed, it will frequently occur that the assignee or a creditor is driven to a regular bill in equity or an action at law. In these cases the circuit court has no supervisory jurisdiction, nor has it where the claim of a supposed creditor has been rejected in whole or in part, or where the assignee is dissatisfied with the allowance of a claim. These classes of cases may be taken up on writ of error or appeal. But all other cases, and questions arising in the progress of a case of bankruptcy through the bankruptcy court, whether the matter is of legal or equitable cognizance, and when the matter is not the subject of a regular suit in equity or at law, or is the allowance or disallowance of a claim, fall within the supervisory jurisdiction of the court, and may upon bill, petition, or other proper process of any party aggrieved, be heard and determined in the circuit court as a court of equity.

We think the motion to dismiss the petition of review in this case not well taken. It is, therefore, overruled.

The appeal, we think, is not well taken, both because not taken in time, and because the matter decided was not the subject of appeal. The appeal is therefore dismissed.

The YORK.

[3 Adm. Rec. 321.]

Superior Court, S. D. Florida. March 23, 1846.

SALVAGE COMPENSATION—PROFESSIONAL WRECKERS ON FLORIDA COAST—MISCONDUCT OF CREW.

[1. $13,000 upon a valuation of $95,000 awarded to professional wreckers for getting a ship off of Florida Reef in a condition to proceed on her voyage, the vessel having been in considerable danger, though not thumping on the bottom, and the weather being fair, the services occupying about 14 hours, and consisting in transferring 363 bales of cotton to the wrecking vessels, and thus floating the ship.]

[2. The conduct of the crew of a stranded vessel in refusing to assist in getting her off after wreckers were employed, unless promised extra compensation out of the salvage, is deserving of the severest reprobation, and, although such a promise is given, the court will prohibit the payment of any part of the salvage to them.]

S. R. Mallory, for libellants.

Wm. R. Hackley, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. The ship York, Dixon, master, while on a voyage from New Orleans to Liverpool, in the early part of the night of the 17th instant, struck upon the Florida Reef, where she remained until she was relieved and got off by the wreckers. The cargo consisted of 2,186 bales of cotton, 3,140 barrels of flour, and a small quantity of staves. The ship and cargo may be fairly estimated as worth $95,000. Soon after the ship struck, the master got out a boat, sounded the depth of the water around her, carried out a small anchor, and endeavored to heave the ship off. He also removed during the night some fifty or more bales of cotton, from the after to the forward part of the ship, with the view to bringing her on a more even keel. He continued his efforts during the night to get the ship off, but did not succeed. About nine o'clock the next morning, the libellants, regular wreckers on this coast, came to his assistance. They commenced discharging the ship's cargo on board their vessels, and continued at this employment, and heaving at the windlass, during the day, and until about eleven o'clock at night, when, having discharged three hundred and sixty-three bales of cotton, the ship came off the reef. After the employment of the wreckers, the ship's crew, except the officers and boys, refused duty, being excited to this refusal by one of their number, under the pretence that the ship was now a wreck, and that they were not bound to work, unless paid a part of the salvage. They remained disobedient and insubordinate until, at last, the master was induced to request the wreckers to promise them two dollars each a day for their services. This promise being made, they returned to their duty.

The ship and cargo were safely brought into this port, and, it being ascertained by the report of expert divers, that the ship had not been so much injured on the reef as to render her unfit to perform the voyage, and did not require to be discharged and hove out, the wreckers, at the request of the master, delivered the cotton that had been taken out of her again on board, and the ship is now in a condition to proceed again on her voyage. Such are the principal facts in this case, and it is impossible that they should not impress the mind of the court favorably as to the merit and good conduct of the salvors. The ship was ashore upon a hard and rocky bottom, and upon one of the outer reefs. She was surrounded by shoals. She had been driven more than a foot out of water by the force with which she struck. She did not thump or rise or fall with the tide, but remained the most of the time apparently still and fast. She could be got off only by being lightened. This could have been accomplished by the master with an obedient crew in time. He must have thrown overboard as many bales of cotton as were taken out of her by the wreckers, before he could have got her off. But this he could not do in the same time in which the wreckers discharged the cotton. The cotton was difficult to break out, and a strong force was necessary to dispatch. The wreckers brought twenty-nine men, besides thirteen men from the sloop Texas, into the enterprise. To these were added the ship's company. They all labored energetically, and yet they were able to discharge only 363 bales of cotton in about ten hours. It is idle to suppose that the master, if he had had an obedient crew could have got this ship off the first or second day, without other assistance. It is possible that the ship might have remained several days on the reef without sustaining material injury. It is agreed on all sides that the weather was moderate, and that the ship did not thump, except at the time she came off the reef. But is it probable that she would have remained there several days, or even until the next high water without serious and material injury? Although the ship did not rise and fall with the sea, or thump, yet she chafed and ground upon the bottom, and had sufficient motion to have chafed a hole through her bilge in no very long period of time. Had the master got the ship off without assistance, she would still have been surrounded with reefs and shoals, of which he was totally ignorant. But it is to my mind doubtful whether he would have succeeded in extricating his ship from her difficulties without other assistance than his crew, even if they had been obedient; and, when we consider that his crew was in an insubordinate and almost mutinous state, the doubt in regard to his success is very much increased.

It is natural enough to suspect that the refusal of the crew to do duty after the wreckers came on board was owing to the improper tampering with them by the wreckers, and, although none of the wreckers are charged by the master with any such misconduct, yet I felt it my duty to investigate this matter fully on the trial. The result of the investigation was to exonerate any of the salvors from any such charge. I am glad that it is so, for, had they, or any of them, been implicated in bringing about the refusal of the ship's company to do duty, I should have forfeited their salvage. Such an offense will never be permitted to pass unpunished in this court. But I am satisfied, from the testimony, that the ship's crew were influenced in determining not to do duty, without being promised pay by the salvors, by one of their number, whose character is fully indicated and known among seamen by the term "Sea Lawyer"; and from all the circumstances of the case, and the fact that this man had once been a wrecker on this coast, and instigated the crew, after their arrival in this port, to insist upon a discharge of the ship's cargo and heaving the ship out, before they would consent to proceed on the voyage, I am quite satisfied of the probability, at least, that the crew would have very soon refused to do duty, when the ship was on the reef, whether any wreckers had come to their assistance or not. The conduct of this man deserves punishment.

Under all these circumstances, it appears to me that it would be folly to say that this ship and cargo were not in very considerable peril, and that the services of the wreckers have not been of very considerable value to them. The fact that they got the ship off in the short period of about twelve or fourteen hours ought not to be considered as lessening the merit of their services, but the contrary. The fact that she is but little injured too ought not to be regarded as evidence that she was in but little danger, and that therefore the salvage ought to be less. The fact that the ship was in danger is evident from her position on the reef, the winds, the tide, or want of tide, and the state of the crew. And the fact that the ship was in a short period of time rescued from danger comparatively uninjured, by the prompt, active, and persevering efforts of the wreckers, adds greatly to the value of their services. Had the ship remained on the reef until the next high water, no one can say that she would not have been so badly injured as to require her discharge and repairs in this port, several weeks interruption in her voyage, the incurring of heavy expenses for wharfage, storage, repairs, &c. The fact, then, that these wreckers rescued this property in the shortest possible period of time is one of much merit, and should enhance their compensation. Their labors, so promptly and so actively rendered, have resulted in saving the ship in a sound and fit condition to proceed on her voyage, and, had this promptness and activity been wanting, it is probable that the ship would have been so injured as to require her discharge and repairs.

The wreckers are not transient voyagers, falling in accidentally with this ship while ashore, and rendering her assistance. Had this been the case, a very small proportion of the value of the ship and cargo might be deemed an adequate compensation to the salvors. But they are regularly and solely employed, under the license of this court, in the business of cruising along the reef, and rendering assistance to vessels situated as this was. The salvage decreed them by this court constitute their sole means of livelihood, and enable them to defray the expenses of their vessels, and to keep them well manned, equipped, and fitted to the business in which they are engaged. The dangers of the navigation and the liability to shipwreck on this coast have made their steady and regular employment in this business necessary to the interests of general commerce and the cause of humanity. Sound policy requires their encouragement within proper limitations.

Before deciding upon the compensation which ought to be decreed the wreckers in the present case, it may be useful to advert to a few cases analogous to the present, decided in this court by my predecessor. The case of The Hector [unreported] was decreed in 1833. This ship got ashore upon Conch Reef. The weather was calm, and continued so for several days after the ship was got off. The wreckers, after loading two of their vessels, succeeded in heaving the ship off. The master insisted at the trial that his ship was in no immediate danger; that he accepted the assistance of the wreckers as a matter of prudence and precaution, and not because he supposed their services were necessary to the safety of the ship and cargo; that, as the weather continued favorable, he might have removed the cargo, and got at and thrown overboard his ballast, and in this way lightened and hove his ship off without the assistance of wreckers. The judge did not regard the ship, under the circumstances, in great danger, yet he thought the prompt and active exertions of the wreckers entitled them to a reasonable compensation, and that $10,000 was not an unreasonable recompense, the ship and cargo being valued at $70,000. The case of The Austerlitz [unreported] was decided in 1837. This ship got ashore in the night, and remained ashore three days before the master would take assistance. During this time he carried out his anchors, and used all his exertions to get his ship off, but without success. He then employed the wreckers to lighten and get the ship off. They transhipped on board their vessels 400 bales of cotton, when she came off. The weather continued calm for several days after the ship was relieved. The cargo consisted of 1,567 bales of cotton, valued at $61,740. The judge decreed $11,800 salvage. In the case of The Ella Hand [Case No. 4,369], the weather was calm, and continued so for several days after the vessel was relieved. The wreckers lightened her by loading two of their vessels, and hove her off. The ship and cargo were valued at $33,200. The master contended at the trial that he might have saved his ship and the greater part of his cargo by throwing overboard a portion of it, of little value. The judge agreed that the master might have saved his ship and the greater part of his cargo by a jettison of a part of it, but he said "that experience has taught him that masters generally delay this operation until it is too late to be available to them." He decreed the wreckers $7,000 salvage.

The case now under consideration will compare with any of these just cited from decisions made by Judge Webb in point of merit, and in several important particulars far surpassed them. In each of the cases cited the ship was more or less damaged on the reef, and required to be hove out and repaired before she could proceed on her voyage, and thus other heavy expenses besides salvage were incurred. In the present case the promptness, activity, and energy of the wreckers saved the ship in an almost uninjured condition, when she was in equally as perilous a situation as any of the vessels in the cases cited. Such promptness and energy is positive merit in the wreckers, and is to be encouraged among them, on this coast, by liberal rewards. Their conduct, too, throughout, in the present case, has been fair, honorable, and praiseworthy. They have not attempted to enhance the value of their services in the mind of the court by any misrepresentations or unfair means, but have presented the case to the consideration of the court upon its fair merits. The value of the ship and cargo, as I have remarked, may be fairly estimated at $95,000, and, when I consider that the services of the wreckers have greatly contributed (if they have not been the sole means) to save this large amount of property, under all these circumstances of promptness, energy, and good conduct,—qualities which it is highly proper to encourage among the wreckers on this coast,—I cannot think that the sum of $13,500 is too high a reward to decree to them for their services. In my judgment this is a liberal compensation, as I intend it to be. Their vessels are of the larger class of wrecking vessels, and are well fitted and manned to do good service on this coast. The number of the salvors is not so great but that, upon a division of the salvage, the share of each will be considerable, nor is their number so small as to make the share, upon a proper division, exorbitant or extravagant. I deem this sum a liberal and sufficient compensation, although I do not expect it will equal the hopes and expectations of the salvors. These are often unreasonable and extravagant. It seems to grow out of the nature and character of their business and pursuits to entertain fanciful and extravagant ideas and hopes of the acquisition of sudden wealth by receiving large rewards for their services. But, although they may, now and then, receive a large remuneration for a few hours of labor and exertion, it will be found by experience that a continued and steady employment in the business of wrecking will, in the end, leave the wrecker in no better circumstances in life than he would have been in any other pursuit. The business is, and has long been, fully open to competition, and no increased rate of salvage compensation, no degree of liberality in rewarding salvage services, can possibly, in the end, result to the pecuniary advantage of the wrecker. Increased compensation must and will inevitably induce an increased number of persons to engage in the business, and their numbers must and will increase, until, by competition, and the additions made to the numbers to divide its profits, it is brought to the condition of being no more profitable than the ordinary business of life. As a permanent class, these engaged steadily in the business of wrecking on this coast, their true and lasting interests will be best promoted by withholding any extraordinary and extravagant rewards, and thus prevent an unreasonable and immoderate number from engaging in it; and by moderate and reasonable compensations, measured out to them with a steady and even hand, avoiding extravagance on the one hand, and illiberality on the other. The true and permanent interest of the wrecker is entirely in harmony with the general interests of commerce. The interests of the former require that no extravagant hopes of sudden wealth should be realized, and thus by a had example, tempt too many to engage in their business; and the interests of the latter require that the wrecker should be fairly and reasonably compensated, so that too many will not abandon the business, and thus deprive the commerce of these seas of their timely aid in moments of distress and danger. I am satisfied that the sum named is a fair and reasonable compensation in the present case.

In regard to permitting the salvors to pay the ship's crew the two dollars a day promised them for their services, while the ship was on the reef, I have come to the determination of positively interdicting it. The conduct of this crew was insubordinate and almost mutinous, and, instead of being paid an extra reward for their labor, they deserve punishment. There is not the slightest ground upon which to justify their pretence that they were not bound to work because the ship was a wreck, and wreckers had been employed. They were bound by their articles, by their duty, by every consideration of moral honesty, by their pride and ambition as seamen, if they had any, to stand by their commander in this trying moment of danger and distress, and not abandon their duty, prove traitorous to their plighted engagements, and recreant to every principle of honor. They ought to have done their duty and stood by their commander as long as two planks of the ship remained together to stand upon, and then, if, having behaved well, the ship were at last lost, they might perhaps be entitled to some compensation for extraordinary services, rendered in saving any portion of the materials and cargo. But their conduct in the present case is without excuse. I cannot censure the salvors, or blame the master, for yielding in this moment of anxiety, peril, and distress to the unlawful demands of the ship's crew, though so cruel and unreasonable; but I shall take it upon myself to see that they do not receive the rewards of their bold, faithless, and dishonorable conduct. The conduct of the master of the ship throughout seems to have been highly commendable and praiseworthy.

Therefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the libellants have, recover, and receive the sum of thirteen thousand five hundred dollars, in full compensation as salvage for their services rendered to the said ship York and cargo, while ashore upon the Florida Reef in manner and form as fully set forth in the libel in this case; and that, upon the payment of said sum and the costs and expenses of this suit, the marshal restore said ship and cargo to the master thereof, for and on account of whom it may concern. And it appearing to the court that the crew of said ship, except the officers and boys, did, while the said ship was ashore upon the Florida Reef, wrongfully and unlawfully refuse to do duty on board said ship, and did behave in an insubordinate and highly improper manner, and were only induced to return to duty again by promises of reward and compensation to be made them by the libellants herein, and it being considered by this court wrong, and of evil example, that they should receive a reward for their misconduct and insubordination, it is therefore ordered that the libellants refrain and do not pay to any of said crew any sum of money whatever for their services on board said ship, under the penalties that shall come for a violation hereof.

MUTUAL ACCOUNTS — SETTLEMENT — PROMISE TO PAY BALANCE — PRESUMPTION — CONFLICT OF LAWS.

[1. Where the contract was that the purchasers should pay the sellers in England, and the uniform mode of payment was to remit bills of exchange on England, the contract was to be governed by the laws of that country.]

[2. In order that a usage of trade shall control the method of stating accounts between two persons, it must have been continued for such a length of time as to have become generally known to those engaged in the trade, and must be so general as to have become the settled rule of commercial intercourse, in the absence of any special agreement or particular course of dealing between individuals.]

[3. The existence of a usage may be proved by one witness.]

[4. An account may be a stated or settled account, though not signed by the parties.]

[5. From the fact of stating an account, the law raises a promise to pay the balance found due.]

[6. The balance found on a statement of account may properly bear interest, though items of interest were included in the account.]

[7. The presumption of a promise to pay the sum claimed arises when the account is rendered and received without objections made in a reasonable time, especially if the same course of dealing is continued by the parties.]

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. The first question which arises in this cause, is whether it is to be decided by the law of England, or the law of Pennsylvania? The supreme court of the United States have decided that "the general principle adopted by civilized nations is that the nature, validity, and interpretation of contracts, are to be governed by the law of the country, where the contracts are made, or are to be performed." [Bank of U. S. v. Donnelly] 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 372. If a contract is made in one country or state, and is to be performed in another, the law where it is to be performed governs it. [Lanusse v. Barker] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 146. In this case the conduct of the parties has shown beyond a doubt that the agreement of the defendant has been to perform his contract of purchase, by paying the plaintiffs in England. His uniform mode of payment has been by remitting bills of exchange on England, and paying the premium at which they were purchased, and no objection has been made by his counsel to paying the premium at the present rate of exchange on the balance now due. You will therefore consider the contract between these parties as one which is to be executed in England, and to be governed by the law of that country. Five per cent. interest only can be charged, and the allowance or regulation of interest must depend on the rules established there, not on those which prevail here. We are far from saying that there is any difference between the law of the two countries on the subject of interest, whether simple or compound, on merchants' accounts. But it is unnecessary to make the examination, because, if we were now satisfied that there was a difference, we could not exclude the operation of the law of England on this case, after the parties had for fifteen years adopted it in the computation of interest and the course of remittance.

The next question is, what is the law of England in relation to such a course of dealing as has prevailed between the plaintiffs and defendants from the year 1814 to the close of their accounts. The course of dealing between them was by direct correspondence. Neither party employed an agent. The defendant sent out orders for goods, which were shipped to him by the plaintiffs, without any special agreement as to price, the terms, or time of payment. The plaintiffs also acted as the agents of the defendant in purchasing and paying for articles ordered, but which, not being in the line of their business, the plaintiffs procured for the defendant, who remitted money through them to those who furnished the goods.

The first item in the account is in —, 1814, to the debit of defendant, the last purchase made by him is charged 1 August, 1822. In the intermediate time, the charges amounted to £ stg. — and the credits to £ stg. —. Invoices of the different shipments, with the pattern cards, were sent, from time to time, according to orders, and the capacity of the plaintiffs to fill them.

The following accounts current were sent and received: No 2. Sent in a letter dated 15 November, 1815, exhibiting the balance due up to 31 December, 1815, post mark New York, 4 March. No. 3. Sent in a letter of 5 November, 1817, exhibiting the balance due on the 31 December, 1817, post marked New York, 15 January, 1818. No. 4. Sent in a letter of 12 October, 1818, exhibiting the balance on the 31 December, 1818, no post mark. No. 5. Sent in a letter 10 June, 1821, exhibiting the balance on the 31 December, 1820, no post mark. No. 6. Sent in a letter of 12 May, 1824, exhibiting the balance on the 31 December, 1823, no post mark. No. 7 was handed by T. Stewartson to defendant in 1829, and is a general statement of the accounts from 1815 till their close, being accounts No. 3, 4, 5, 6, contained in one paper. No. 8 was enclosed in a letter of 24 August, 1829, and exhibits the balance for which this suit is brought.

These accounts are made up of charges for the different invoices, and interest up to the time of closing the account, on one side, and credits for payments and interest on the other; a balance of interest is then added at the foot of the account, and a general balance struck, which is carried into the new account for the next year, and the account is carried on as before, with the interest on the balance. This being the admitted course of dealing between the parties, the question before us is whether the law of England sanctions such a mode of stating the account.

It is admitted that if such is the general usage of the trade between this country and England, such accounts are legal, and must be enforced in our courts. By the usage of trade you will understand is meant the usage of trade and dealing between the merchants of two countries, as evidenced by their actual transactions where no special contract has been made, but both parties have dealt together, on the tacit agreement that their dealings shall be regulated by the general rules which by common consent govern the particular trade. When there is such an established usage, it becomes the law of the trade, and applies to the dealings of the parties, controlling them in the same manner as the statute or common law in ordinary cases. It must, however, have been continued for such length of time as to have become generally known to those engaged in the trade and so general as to have become the settled rule of commercial intercourse, in the absence of any special agreement or particular course of dealing between individuals which form exceptions to the general rule prescribed by usage. The usage and custom of any particular trade is the law by which it is to be regulated. Whether there is such usage, and what it is, are questions of fact which are to be decided on the same principle as any other fact. One witness is legally competent to prove it, though the jury will judge of his credibility; but if his character is fair, his testimony clear, and he appears to have a proper knowledge on the subject, it would be an innovation on the rule of evidence to require a usage to be proved by more than one witness. Of the existence of any usage as to the course of dealing between the parties to this suit, which can affect its merits, you are the exclusive judges; you will decide upon it on a consideration of all the evidence. If any of you have any personal knowledge on the subject, which may have any influence on your verdict, you will state it in open court, so that each party may put to you any proper questions. Should you be satisfied that the plaintiffs have established the existence of an usage or course of trade, conformably to the accounts made out and rendered by them, then your verdict ought to be in their favor. If you are not so satisfied, then we must inquire whether the account has not been settled and agreed to by the parties, as a legal inference from the facts and circumstances in evidence, which make it what is called in law a stated account; that is, a statement of charges and credits agreed to by debtor and creditor,— a balance struck (if there is any due), and carried to a new account, or paid, as a debt admitted to be due by mutual consent, on a settlement of the accounts between the parties, and payable on demand if no time is fixed for payment. An account may be a stated or settled one, though not signed by the parties. The fact of their accounting together and striking a balance by consent, may be proved, as any other fact, by the direct evidence of their signatures, or circumstances which justify the legal inference that the parties have so accounted. If the facts and circumstances on which this inference depends are uncontested, the law makes the inference; if they are doubtful, the jury will decide how far the party claiming the balance has established a ground for the legal inference. If in their opinion such facts exist as lay the foundation of the legal presumption that the parties have agreed on the balance, it is their duty to find their verdict accordingly. Whenever an account is directly proved or inferred by the law to be settled, the party claiming the balance is not bound to prove any of the items of the account; they are presumed to be correct until the other party produces clear proof of fraud, error, or mistake. The balance stated is a liquidated debt, as binding as if evidenced by a note, bill, or bond. Though there is no express promise to pay, yet from the fact of stating or settling the account, the law raises a promise as obligatory as if expressed in writing, to which the same legal incidents attach as if a note or bill was given for payment. These incidents are an immediate right of action on demand of the balance, with interest from the time of settlement.

It is no objection to a stated account that it contains charges of interest, unless such as are usurious, or otherwise unlawful. If interest is due by the usage of trade, or if the debtor has agreed to pay it, the whole account is to be taken as principal, and a jury are no more authorized to strike out the charges of interest than principal. Both form a settled balance, which the debtor promises to pay on demand, which he has his option to do, or suffer it to enter into a new account. If not able or willing to pay, he ought not to place the creditor in a worse situation than if he had complied with his promise. No one would contend that if the debtor had given his note for the balance of the account, with interest from the settlement, the full account could not be recovered. It would be strange if the creditor should lose his interest, because he left the balance in the debtor's hands by mutual consent, on the faith of the implied promise and legal obligation to pay, without exacting a note.

This is not like a case of compound interest on an original contract. The parties settle their accounts, a certain sum is due for principal, and a certain sum for interest, composing one debt, thus due and payable. The right of the creditor to receive the one item is as perfect as to the other. If the debtor pays the balance, he cannot recover back any of the items of interest which made up the balance. If, instead of paying, he asks or takes time to pay the balance, he ought to be in no better situation than if he had paid his money. He chooses to use his creditor's money, and every rule of law and principle of justice requires that he should pay the interest. The time to object to the payment of interest is while the account is open, or a current one. It cannot be a stated account, without the express or implied consent of the debtor; but, when he waives his objection to interest till he has signed the settled account, or till the law presumes his agreement to pay the sum claimed, he is precluded by his own acts. This presumption attaches when an account is rendered, received without objections made in a reasonable time, especially when the same course of dealing is continued by both parties after the receipt of accounts, from time to time, on the same principle.

The rendering accounts made up of charges of interest, as those in the present case are, is a declaration by the creditor of the terms on which he gives the credit and continues to furnish his goods to the debtor. The receipt of the accounts without objection, and the continuance to purchase and remit, is an acquiescence and assent to such terms. A contract is thus made by both parties, evidenced by their mutual acts and dealings for years, as binding on both as if made in writing on opening the account. It is an admission of the balance claimed, on which the law raises a promise to pay it, with interest. This promise is not one which a jury will negative, if the law declares the account to be a stated one, any more than they would negative a promise to pay for goods, the sale and delivery of which was admitted. They will enquire into the fact of the accounts having been rendered by one party, received by the other, and whether any objections were made, and when made, in the same manner as they would into the fact of the sale and delivery of goods; but if they have no doubt about the facts, their duty is to find a verdict according to their legal result. When a man buys goods, it is not a question of fact whether the purchaser promises to pay for them, nor, when he settles an account, whether the debtor promises to pay the balance; the law settles these questions. A jury cannot open a settled account, unless on proof of fraud or mistake, or annul the fair agreement of parties which violates no law; and the law declares all accounts to be settled ones which have been received and retained without objection, within a reasonable time.

Of the facts of this case you can have no doubt. The accounts rendered by the plaintiff from time to time, the correspondence between the parties, and the whole conduct of the defendant, show a perfect understanding on his part of the claim of the plaintiff, and his tacit assent to its justice; and when it appears that no objection was made to the payment of interest till 1828, six years after he had ceased to make any further purchases, it cannot be pretended that this was within a reasonable time. On the whole case, we think that the account between the parties might be considered a stated one, the consequence of which is that the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict for the balance appearing due, with five per cent. interest to this time, with the addition of exchange at its present rate.

Case No. 18,142.

YORK BANK v. ASBURY et al.

[1 Biss. 230.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. April Term, 1858.

FORGED INDORSEMENT—SUIT IN NAME OF PAYEE—WHEN JUDGMENT A BAR—CESTUI QUE TRUST BARRED—USURY IN NOTE—EFFECT OF CONTINGENCY.

1. One partner having given the firm note, and forged the name of the payee to procure its discount at bank, no suit can be maintained by the bank under the assignment.

2. The bank may, however, bring an action in the name of the payee for its benefit.

3. A judgment in such action by a court having jurisdiction is a bar to any subsequent suit for the same cause of action; nor will any other than an appellate court inquire into the correctness of the judgment. The partner having authority to draw and negotiate the note, it cannot be said that the forged indorsement affects the rights of his co-partners.

4. The bank having sued in the name of the indorsee for its use, is substantially a party, and is within the rules that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is final between the parties, and a bar to a subsequent suit.

5. The making a note payable at a place in which exchange sells at a premium does not constitute usury; nor does it render the note void in the hands of a bank whose charter prohibits the taking more than a certain rate of interest. An agreement that the difference of exchange should be added to the interest would be a device to cover usury, and render a note usurious; but on a note payable at such a place, without proof that such a note commanded a premium at the place where it was made, the court will not presume usury. The contingency of the rate of exchange at maturity of the note cannot be incorporated with the contract to make it usurious.

6. A contract not usurious at the time it is entered into cannot become so by any future contingency. The corrupt intent must be apparent on the face of the contract, or rather it must contain all the elements to make it usurious.

This action is brought against the defendants Asbury and Pierce, as partners, the latter being a citizen of California (on whom the process was not served), who are charged to be indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of five thousand dollars for money lent, paid, had and received, and due on account stated &c. The defendants pleaded, (1) The general issue of non-assumpsit. (2) That the bank was not a corporation. (3) That Pierce and Asbury were partners, as cattle dealers, Pierce residing in Pennsylvania, and Asbury in Ohio; it being the business of the firm to buy cattle in the Western states and sell them in the East; that Pierce without the knowledge of Asbury made an agreement with the York Bank that it should discount a note for four thousand dollars, executed by Pierce, in the name of himself and Asbury, payable to Cyrus Milner, Jr., & Co., indorsed by the payees, and Samuel Milner and Amos Carter, in sixty days, and that when the note should come to maturity, being payable at the York Bank, another note for the same amount, payable at the Western Bank of Philadelphia, in ninety days, indorsed by the same parties, should be received in payment of it. The first note was discounted, and when it became due the second note was made, without the knowledge of Asbury, signed by Pierce in the name of the firm, payable to Amos Carter, and indorsed by Cyrus Milner, Jr., & Co., and Samuel Milner. Pierce forged the name of Amos Carter, as indorser, and delivered the note to the bank, in payment of the former one. The plea further states, that after the bank had knowledge of the forgery of the name of Carter, it brought a suit, in the name of Carter, for its own use, the payee, in the court of common pleas for Madison county, Ohio, against the defendants Asbury and Pierce, the process not being served on Pierce, to which suit the defendants pleaded non-assumpsit; on which issue the jury found for the defendants, and a final judgment was thereon entered, which remains in full force. The pleadings in the case are set out substantially. To this plea there is a demurrer filed.

Swan & Andrews, for plaintiff.
Mr. Wilcox, for defendants.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This demurrer raises the question, whether the above judgment is a bar to the present action. In support of the demurrer it is argued, the note was made by Asbury to Amos Carter, or order, and that the indorsement of Carter was forged, of which Asbury was not privy, and that the court of common pleas held that Carter had neither paid anything for the note, nor indorsed it; that Asbury was not concluded by the felonious act of Pierce; that the bank was without remedy on the note against the firm.

It may be admitted that the bank could not claim under the forged indorsement, nor was the action brought in that form. Carter being the payee of the note, the action was brought in his name, as payee, for the benefit of the bank; and no sufficient reason is perceived why this was not properly done. The bank received this note in payment of the first one discounted, of the same amount, which was a full consideration. The forgery did not affect the drawers on the paper, nor the obligations they assumed. It was treated as a genuine note payable to Carter, for the benefit of the bank. And this was the true character of the note, before the indorsement, under the contract with the bank; and the indorsement being void, after the payment of the money, the bank held the note for its security and benefit. The facts stated in the plea are admitted by the demurrer.

The note was made payable to the order of Amos Carter, and without his indorsement the other indorsers, it is supposed, could not be held responsible; but the drawers of the note, who received the money for their own benefit, could be sued in the name of Carter for the use of the bank. The drawers promised to pay him or order; and it is averred that Carter well knew the suit was prosecuted, but made no objection to it. Under the circumstances, the court would protect the bank in the use of his name, requiring it to indemnify him as to the costs.

If the court of common pleas, of Madison county, erred in their decision, on any point, it was the duty of the bank to remove the case by appeal or writ of error to the supreme court, and have the error corrected. Asbury it is said was not concluded by the felonious act of Pierce. This may be admitted; but as one of the partners, it is not disputed, that he had the right to draw the note and negotiate it; and although he was estopped from denying the indorsement of Carter, such indorsement, could, in no respect, affect the rights of Asbury.

If the maker of a note make it payable to a fictitious person, and put it in circulation with the fictitious name written on it; or if he make it payable to a real person and forge the indorsement, or procure it to be done, and then put it in circulation, he is estopped from saying that it was not genuine. Riley, Law Cas. 248; Meacher v. Fort, 3 Hill (S. C.) 227. In England it has been held that a bill drawn payable to a fictitious payee is payable to bearer, and may be declared on as such in favor of a bona fide holder ignorant of the fact. Chit. Bills (10th Am. Ed.) 157. Whether Carter had paid any thing or not for the bill, was a matter of no importance; as it was made to obtain money from the bank, and the suit was brought for its benefit.

But it is contended that the judgment in the Madison court of common pleas, is no bar to the action of the bank; as to constitute a bar, the former action must not only be for the same cause of action, but between the same parties. And it is insisted the action of Carter was on his title as indorser; the present action being for the money originally advanced by the bank to Pierce and Asbury.

The former action was not brought by Carter as indorser, but by the bank in his name as the payee of the note, for its benefit, the drawers having promised to pay him. Whether the cause of action was the same in the former action as in the present, is matter of fact and law. The present action is brought on general counts for money, claiming five thousand dollars. The former action was brought on the note for four thousand dollars, signed by Pierce and Asbury. But the special plea in bar, states in detail the former action in the name of Carter, for the use of the bank, to be the same cause of action as the present, and this is admitted by the demurrer. And on this, the issue of law is raised, whether the facts stated in the plea constitute a bar to the present action.

The judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the case before it, is final between the litigant parties. And this is true whether the parties have used the proper vigilance or not to bring the entire equity before the court and jury. No defect of either party in this respect can avail him, under a plea in bar. If it be the same subject matter of controversy, if it was fully brought before the court and jury, or might have been so brought before them, the judgment is final. Negligence or want of knowledge in the management of the case by the counsel or party, will constitute no excuse. If, on such ground a judgment could be regarded as not final, it would destroy its effect and make litigation endless. Where injustice has been done a motion for a new trial, appeal or writ of error, is the only corrective at law. The suit brought by the bank in the name of Carter, for its benefit, as appears from the facts admitted in the special plea, brought into litigation the second note given to the bank by Pierce and Asbury, and which, on proof of the facts, entitled the bank to a recovery; nor can it be doubted that it was the same subject matter involved in the present suit. That such a trial and judgment is final between the parties is clearly shown by the authorities cited in the defendants' brief.²

The bank was substantially a party in the first suit. The suit was brought for its benefit and was under its control; and its right so to prosecute the suit would, if objected to, have been protected by the court. The bank was a party within the rule which requires a judgment to be between the same parties, to constitute a bar. 1 Greenl. Ev. 523; Tuttle v. Willson, 10 Ohio, 24. Where a suit is brought for the use of another, a second action cannot be sustained for the same cause.

The case of McDonald v. Rainor, 8 Johns. 442, seems to have no application to the case under consideration. In that case the payee sued the maker of a note who pleaded that the payee had indorsed the note, and the indorsee sued the defendant, who defeated the suit on an objection to the assignment. This was pleaded in bar by the same defendant in a suit by the payee; but it was held, that a defect in the assignment, on which the assignee failed, did not bar the suit by the payee, which did not involve the assignment. For the reasons assigned, the demurrer to this plea must be overruled.

The second special plea is usury. The bank is alleged to be located at the town of York, in York county, Pennsylvania; that by the terms of its charter it is prohibited from taking more than at the rate of one-half of one per centum for thirty days upon a loan. And it is averred that for many years before the time of the loan, the rate of money exchange between the town of York and the city of Philadelphia, was and has been in favor of Philadelphia, and against the town of York, varying in amount from one-quarter of one per centum to one-half of one per centum; all which was known to the York Bank; and that as a scheme and device for the unlawful taking of more than at the rate of one-half of one per centum, for thirty days, it was agreed by the bank to loan Asbury and Pierce, the sum of four thousand dollars; and for the forbearance of the loan, that they should give their note for the above sum, indorsed and payable at the bank in sixty days, reserving forty-two dollars of interest; and when that note matured the said Asbury and Pierce, as had been agreed, paid the bank by way of renewal of the same, the sum of sixty-two dollars in money, and gave another note for the sum of four thousand dollars, payable at the Western Bank of Philadelphia, in ninety days from date, which is the note on which the first suit was brought.

The usury as alleged in the plea, consists in agreeing to make the payment at the Philadelphia Bank, the exchange on which was worth from one-quarter to one-half per centum, at the York Bank. The exchange here spoken of must mean on sight bills, and can have no reference to a bill payable in ninety days. It is not alleged that more than six per cent. was reserved as interest, but this difference of exchange being added to the interest reserved or paid, makes the usury, and was a device adopted for that purpose.

An agreement to pay the first note when due, in a note for the same amount payable at Philadelphia; or on the second discount to pay the note when due at the Philadelphia Bank, does not constitute usury. It is true, the plea alleges a corrupt agreement for the loan, but from the facts stated, there was no such agreement. If the agreement had been, that the difference of exchange proved should be added to the interest, and the payment made at the York Bank, it would have been usurious, and a device to cover the usury. But on a transaction to pay in ninety days the amount at the Philadelphia Bank, without showing that bills on that bank at ninety days, commanded a premium at York, the court will not presume usury. Such a contingency cannot be incorporated with the contract to pay, so as to make it usurious. To constitute usury there must be a loan of money, and for the forbearance, a corrupt agreement to pay more than the legal rate of interest. In the case under consideration, there was a loan of money, but there was no agreement that more than the legal rate of interest should be paid. The payment was to be made at a bank in Philadelphia, on which at the York Bank, sight bills generally sold at from one-quarter to one-half per centum advance; but whether a bill would sell, at an advance payable in ninety days is not shown. A contract must be usurious at the time it is entered into, or it cannot become so, by any future contingency. The corrupt intent must be apparent on the face of the contract; or at least it must contain all the elements to make it usurious. It is believed that the books furnish no instance of a contract which might or might not become usurious, according to circumstances, at the time of payment.

The plea not only sets up the usury on the ground stated, but it alleges that the charter prohibits the bank from receiving more than at the rate of six per centum, and that on this ground the contract is void. These two defenses united in the same plea make it double, and consequently bad on special demurrer. A general demurrer only has been filed, on which no advantage can be taken of this defect in the plea. But, aside from this consideration, the want of sufficient averments to show the usury is fatal. It must appear that more than at the rate of six per cent. was charged in violation of the charter. It may be a convenience to the debtor to pay the amount in Philadelphia, rather than at the York Bank. And a fair presumption arises that this would be the case with cattle dealers, who generally sell at the large cities.

The demurrer is sustained to the second special plea.

YORK MANUF'G CO. v. ILLINOIS CENT.
R. CO.

[1 Biss. 377.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. June, 1862.²

COMMON CARRIER—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

1. A common carrier may by special contract, limit his common law liability to that of an ordinary bailee for hire.

2. He cannot, however, go beyond this, or escape liability for misconduct or negligence.

This action was brought to recover the value of one hundred bales of cotton, the property of the plaintiff, which, it is alleged, were lost by the wrongful act of the defendant, in course of transit from Memphis to Boston. Thos. Trout & Sons were the agents of the plaintiff at Memphis in the fall of 1859, and on the 8th of November, purchased 201 bales of cotton on account of the plaintiff. Harris, Hunt & Co. were defendant's agents at Memphis for the purpose of making contracts for the shipment of goods from that place, which might pass over the Illinois Central Railroad or any portion of it.

Gallup & Hitchcock, for plaintiff.

Scates, McAllister & Jewett, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge (charging jury). I think there can be no doubt of the correctness of this principle, that the defendant, as a railroad corporation of this state could, under the law, appoint agents at Memphis to make contracts for freight to be carried over the road, and for the purpose of this action it is sufficient to regard this as a contract made at Memphis, by Harris, Hunt & Co. with T. Trout & Sons, the agents for the plaintiff, for the transit of the cotton from Memphis to Boston; and inasmuch as no controversy has been made that the cotton was actually in the possession or control of the defendant at Cairo, it is enough for us to know that defendant had authority to appoint an agent to make a contract which would be binding upon defendant the very moment the cotton came into the company's possession at Cairo, or that of its agents, because there it was within the limits of the state of Illinois, and the charter, of course, operated on the subject matter of the controversy. This being so, it was competent for the defendant, through its agents, to make the same kind of contracts, with the same restrictions and conditions, that they would have made at Memphis. The first question, therefore, to be determined is whether the defendant, through its agents at Memphis, made a contract for the transfer of this cotton from Cairo over its road, and if so, what were the terms and conditions of that contract. Thomas Trout & Co. acted for the plaintiff; Harris, Hunt & Co. for the defendant. On the 8th of November the shipment took place on board the steamer Adriatic, at Memphis. A bill of lading has been introduced which refers to the cotton as having been shipped by T. Trout & Sons that day on board the Adriatic, for Cairo, to be delivered without delay at the port of Boston, "fire, and the unavoidable dangers of the river only excepted," to Samuel Batchelor, treasurer, or to his consignee, and paying a freight of $4.75 per bale, from Memphis to Boston, by rail. And Mr. Trout, when asked in relation to his agency and the business transacted, says, "we had shipped the cotton on account of the York Manufacturing Company, on the 8th of November, 1859, 201 bales; the quality was strictly middling, and marked 'Y. M. Co.'—it was put on the steamer Adriatic. We made a contract with Harris, Hunt & Co. to ship the cotton to Boston. They signed a bill of lading, as agreed, for the I. C. R. Co."

Now the first question to be determined is, whether this property was shipped under this contract. It is not material as to the authority of Thos. Trout & Sons, from the plaintiff. They acted as the agents of the plaintiff, and delivered the cotton to the agents of the defendant, to transport it from Memphis to Boston. Then whatever contract Thos. Trout & Sons made was binding on the plaintiff, because, so far as the defendant was concerned, the only persons that acted for the company were Thomas Trout & Sons. If they shipped the cotton under a contract with the defendant, the only contract which could be binding on the defendant was the contract with Thos. Trout & Sons, and whether they were authorized by the plaintiff to make it is perfectly immaterial.

A bill of lading is ordinarily a memorandum of the quantity of the goods to which it refers, and, as such, may be explained, and is not conclusive evidence as to the quantity or quality of the goods; but in addition to being a memorandum of the amount of the goods, it is also a contract, and has precisely the effect of any other contract by which a party acknowledges that he receives goods, and agrees to transport and deliver them at a particular place for a fixed sum. That is what is done by the terms of this contract.

Was this property delivered to the agents of the company, and did they receive and agree to hold and transfer it under this contract? If they did, then, as a matter of course, it is the only contract which is binding upon them. And it is generally true of all transactions of this character, that when property is delivered to a carrier, either by land or by water, and a bill of lading is given, by which the carrier agrees to transfer the property for a fixed price, the bill of lading constitutes the agreement between the parties. If the property was delivered under this bill of lading as the agreement binding upon defendant for transit of the property over its road, then it is the only contract which is binding on them, and we must look to the terms of the contract in order to understand what they were.

In this contract there is an exception to the effect that the company are not subject to loss by fire, that is to say, that the obligations of the carrier did not include that of an insurer. He is responsible for all losses, it is said, except those of God and the public enemies. It is competent, however, for the carrier to limit his responsibility, and there can be no doubt, particularly in relation to so inflammable a material as cotton, that it is competent for carriers to put limitations upon their liability, so that they will not be responsible for the loss of any cotton in case of fire. There is such exemption in this bill of lading, and if it was under this contract that the cotton was shipped, then by its terms the defendant would not be subject to a loss by fire, except under certain contingencies to be hereafter explained.

At the same time this bill of lading was executed by Harris, Hunt & Co., acting as agents of the defendant, the steamboat Adriatic also executed a bill of lading, and, as it appears, with Harris, Hunt & Co., by which it was agreed that the goods should be transported from Memphis to Cairo, and there delivered to Mr Abbott, the agent of the defendant, and the price fixed as stated in this bill of lading. They were to be taken at $4.75 per bale and by way of the Illinois Central Railroad. The steamer Adriatic arrived at Cairo on the evening of the 10th of November, the shipments having been made on the 8th, during the night. Shortly after its arrival they transferred the cotton belonging to the plaintiff, with other cotton, to the barge lying by the side of the steamer. On the following day, November 11, the whole of the cotton was on board the barge, and the barge was fastened to the landing some little distance from where the steamer was lying. Not very long after the barge was placed there the fire was discovered, by which a very considerable portion of the cotton was consumed, and so far as this plaintiff is concerned, there was a loss of one hundred bales.

Now if you find that there was no contract limiting the liability of the defendant in relation to the fire, then the defendant would be responsible for the loss by fire, when the cotton came into its possession. If you shall find that there was a contract which limited the liability of the defendant, and which exempted the defendant from such liability, then the remaining question is, whether the defendant exercised reasonable care of this property. That is a question of fact for the jury to determine.

It seems to be conceded by the counsel on both sides, and it appears by the evidence we have had before us, that the proper way of transporting cotton is to leave it uncovered. The fact seems to be that if it could be covered completely, so as to prevent all sparks from reaching it, that would be the safest way of transportation; but this is not the general way of transport, and is said to be impracticable. It is found best to leave it uncovered, so that if it catch fire it can be extinguished at the earliest possible moment.

It is for you to say, if you shall find that there was this limitation upon the defendant as a common carrier, and that it was not subject to a loss by fire, in consequence of a special contract, whether the defendant is responsible in consequence of want of due care in the management of this cotton. You will consider, firstly, the value of the property; secondly, the character of the property; thirdly, the circumstances under which it was placed; and it is for you to say whether there was due care exercised in reference to the cotton. If there was due care, and if there was an exemption, then the plaintiff cannot recover; if there was not due care used by the defendant, then, notwithstanding there might have been an exemption in the special contract, still the defendant would be responsible. If you shall find that the defendant is responsible, the damages will be the net value of the property in the market to which it was to be transported, which, I suppose, would be the value of the cotton at Boston, deducting freight.

It is stated that the cotton was insured by an insurance company in Boston, and that the action is brought by the plaintiff on behalf of the insurance company. That it is competent for the plaintiff to do.

WAGER CONTRACTS — "PUTS" — SETTLING DIFFERENCES — INADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION — CLAIMS AGAINST BANKRUPT'S ESTATE.

1. "Puts," or the privilege for a nominal consideration of delivering a large quantity of grain within a certain time at a specified price, when taken of parties notoriously running a "corner," are wager contracts, and void as against public policy.

[Cited in Wolford v. Powers, 85 Ind. 304.]

2. Where no delivery of the grain was contemplated by the parties, but they expected simply to settle the differences as established by future prices, the contract is simply a wager, and therefore void.

[Cited in Clark v. Foss, Case No. 2,852; Gilbert v. Gauger, Id. 5,412.]

3. These "puts" are also within the Illinois statute concerning gaming, and the English decisions under 8 and 9 Vict. are applicable as authorities.

4. Claims against an estate for $400,000, founded on a consideration of less than $19,000, are grossly inequitable and unjust, and should not be allowed.

5. The "put" cannot be sustained, as being a measure of insuring prices, when such is not shown to have been the intent of the parties.

6. Money actually paid on these "puts" may be proved as claims against the estate.

These questions come up on motion by Sidney A. Kent, the assignee of Peyton R. Chandler, and Chandler, Pomeroy & Co., to expunge the claims of Wm. Young & Co., Bensley & Wagner, and a large number of others of the same character, on what are called "puts." These claims, having been first allowed pro forma by the register, were referred to him by the court for re-examination under the 34th general order, and the evidence was by him reported to the court. The facts fully appear in the opinion of the court.

Dent & Black, for Wm. Young & Co., claimants.

(1) It was not necessary that Wm. Young & Co. should have any of the property on hand when they entered into or took these contracts. Benj. Sales (2d London Ed.) 66; Chit. Cont. (10th Am. (2) Nor does the fact that it was optional with Wm. Young & Co. to deliver, render the contracts less binding. 2 Pars. Cont. (5th Ed.) 657. The doctrine there laid down, being that "an agreement may be altogether optional with one party, and yet binding on the other."

(3) As a mere offer from Chandler to Wm. Young & Co., these contracts gave a right to the latter to deliver; and this offer not being withdrawn, it continued up to and at the time of the tender. Boston & M. R. R. v. Bartlett, 3 Cush. 224; Western R. Co. v. Babcock, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 346; 1 Pars. Cont. (5th Ed.) 436, 480-482. Consult, also, Harlan v. Harlan, 20 Pa. St. 303, 307.

(4) This view also disposes of the objection alleging a want of mutuality. A contract, according to the opinion of Tindal, C. J., in Arnold v. Mayor of Poole, 4 Man. & G. 896, cannot be said to be void on that ground, except "where the want of mutuality would leave one party without a valid or available consideration for his promise." L'Amoureux v. Gould, 7 N. Y. 349; Chit. Cont. (10th Am. Ed.) 13; Morse v. Bellows, 7 N. H. 549. The law on the subject of wagers, so far as any question arises in regard to it here, is fully laid down in Fleming v. Foy [Case No. 4,862]; Beadles v. Bless, 27 Ill. 320; Bryan v. Dyer, 28 Ill. 188. Consult, also, Wells v. Porter, 2 Bing. N. C. 722, 29 E. C. L. 733; Alsop v. Commercial Ins. Co. [Case No. 262].

(5) A court should not be quick to set aside a contract on account of any supposed public policy, as clearly the legislature is the forum before which such matters most appropriately come in the first instance. The observations of Best, C. J., in Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 229, are pertinent to the point in hand.

(6) And again, the inquiry as to what was a violation of public policy, and who was the violator, must be made.

(7) But, even if it had to be conceded that the claimants knew that Mr. Chandler's action was wild, so far as his general operations in the oat market were concerned, and would cause irregularities of trade, still the law would not refuse its aid to those who did not instigate or participate in such action. In Tracy v. Talmage, 14 N. Y. 162, a case of great importance, and maturely considered, the court of appeals held that "mere knowledge by the vendor that the purchaser intends to make an illegal use of the property, is not a defense to an action for its price." Consult, also, Hill v. Spear, 50 N. H. 253; Michael v. Bacon, 49 Mo. 474.

The case of Porter v. Viets [supra] relates to a contract, not to a "put." These "puts" are void, as being within the first section of the statute of this state concerning gaming. 1 Gross, 312. "All promises, agreements, etc., made, etc., where the whole or any part of the consideration thereof, shall be for any money, property, or other valuable thing, won by any gaming, or playing at cards, etc., or by betting on the side or hands of any person gaming, etc., shall be void." The spirit in which the supreme court of Illinois regards this species of contract appears in 59 Ill. 160. Another view may be taken of the case—the "put" is simply an agreement to "pay differences"—a bet upon the price. Consult Rourke v. Short, 5 Bl. & Bl. 904; Shumate v. Com., 15 Grat. 653.

Walker, Dexter & Smith, also for assignee.

BLODGETT, District Judge. It appears from the testimony submitted with the register's report that in the month of May, 1872, and for several years prior thereto, the bankrupts, Peyton R. Chandler, and the firm of Chandler, Pomeroy & Co., were engaged in the business of buying and selling grain on the Chicago market, and as members of the board of trade of this city; that Chandler, Pomeroy & Co. were brokers and commission merchants, and Peyton R. Chandler dealt mainly on his own account as a capitalist, through Chandler, Pomeroy & Co., who acted as his brokers; that about the middle of May, Peyton R. Chandler conceived the idea of making a corner in oats for the month of June then ensuing, and with that view he purchased all the "cash oats" as they arrived in the market, and took all the "options" offered him for June delivery,—his purpose being to own all the oats in the market, and compel those who had sold "options" for June to pay his price; or, in other words, to settle with him by paying such differences as should exist between the prices at which he purchased the options, and the price he should establish for cash oats on the last day of June, when his options matured. In pursuance of this plan, he purchased, between the 15th of May and the 18th of June, 2,500,000 bushels of cash oats, being all, or substantially all, the cash oats on the market, and also bought June "options" to the amount of 2,939,400 bushels. The total amount of oats in store in this city on the 18th of June was only 2,700,000 bushels, from which it will be seen that Chandler practically controlled the market up to that time, and the total amount received during the remainder of the month was only 800,000 bushels. As incidental to and part of the machinery of this corner, Chandler also sold what are called "puts," or privileges of delivering to him oats during the month of June, for forty-one cents a bushel. These "put" contracts are alike in form, and read as follows: "Received of E. F. $50, in consideration of which we give him, or the holder of this contract, the privilege of delivering to us or not, prior to 3 o'clock p. m., of June 30, 1872, by notification or delivery, 10,000 bushels No. 2 oats, regular receipts, at 41 cents per bushel, in store; and, if delivered, we agree to receive and pay for the

The amount paid by the purchaser of these “puts” was $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per bushel for whatever quantity was named in the contracts. The tickets, or contracts, were all signed by Chandler, Pomeroy & Co., and part of them were also signed by P. R. Chandler, but Chandler, Pomeroy & Co. acted as the brokers of P. R. Chandler, and their contract was his. The total quantity of oats called for by these “puts” amounted to about 3,700,000 bushels. When Chandler commenced to buy oats with a view to the corner, the price in this market was about thirty-nine cents a bushel. After he took possession of the market he put the price to forty-one cents and upward, and held it there until the 18th of June. In the meantime the price had declined in New York and other markets, so that oats to ship were not worth over thirty-three to thirty-five cents, and July options for this market were not worth over thirty-five cents. On the 18th of June P. R. Chandler and Chandler, Pomeroy & Co. failed, and the price declined before the close of business that day from forty-one to thirty cents, and continued to decline during the remainder of the month, so that at one time they were as low as twenty-six cents per bushel. Between the time of the failure and 3 o'clock on the 30th of June, the holders of the “puts” claim to have made tender to the bankrupts of the quantity of oats called for by their respective tickets, and the oats not being accepted and paid for, they sold them upon the market that day or the next, under the rules of the board of trade, and have proved up their claims for the differences between the price named in the “put” and that for which they sold. The total amount of claims thus proved up is about \$400,000, and the total amount received by the bankrupts for these “puts” was less than \$19,000,—about \$18,500, as I compute it at half a cent a bushel.

The proof shows conclusively that the plans of Chandler, and the fact that he was manipulating the market with express reference to a corner in oats for June, were well known and understood on the board of trade, while the number of these “put” claims, about 125, all, or substantially all, in favor of members of the board, show that the struggle between Chandler, who was endeavoring to hold up prices, and the sellers of “options” and holders of “puts” who were endeavoring to break the price, was quite generally participated in by members of the board. In other words, it was notorious that Chandler was endeavoring to keep the price at forty-one cents or upwards, while the sellers of “options” and holders of “puts” were endeavoring to break down the price. It is true that in this testimony some of the claimants say there was no “corner,” or that they did not know that there was a corner, but the cross-examination shows that they knew Chandler was trying to make a corner, and they say he did not do it because he failed before the end of the month, so that by their own admission, they knew what he was attempting—knew the reasons for his purchase of such large quantities of “cash oats” and options, and knew he did not sustain his corner because the “short interest broke him down,” and the moment a man bought a “put,” he became identified with the short interest—his interests were antagonistic to Chandler.

The assignee attacks these claims upon the ground that they are fraudulent as against the other creditors of the bankrupt. The main ground, and the only one which I shall consider, being that they are wager-contracts, and therefore void. Without taking time to discuss all the points raised by the able arguments which have been adduced, and the various reasons urged for and against these claims, it is enough to say that it seems to me that the contracts in question partake of all the characteristics of a wager. It is in substance an assertion by the seller of the “put” that oats cannot be purchased on that market before three o'clock p. m. of the 30th of June for less than forty-one cents a bushel, and an undertaking to pay the difference between forty-one cents and any market price. If he, Chandler, sustains the price at forty-one cents or above, he wins the half-cent a bushel paid for the “put,” because the holder will not deliver, while if the price goes below that named he is to pay the difference. This is practically the contract. It is as manifestly a bet upon the future price of the grain in question, as any which could be made upon the speed of a horse or the turn of a card. The evidence in this case shows that in nearly all the cases of settlements on “put” or “option” contracts the grain is never delivered, nor expected to be delivered, but the parties simply pay the difference as settled by the prices. But, if that were not so in all cases, it is clear that in this case no delivery of the grain was intended by these “put” holders, because they knew that Chandler controlled all the oats in the market and fixed the price, and that their only expectation for success depended on their being able to break the market before their time for delivery expired. Some of them say that they intended to deliver the oats, but it is absurd to suppose that they intended to deliver, unless they could do so for less than forty-one cents. They intended to deliver if they could break Chandler, or prevent his “corner” from culminating, as the jockey may intend to walk his own horse over the course after he has poisoned or lamed that of his competitor. They did not intend to deliver if Chandler succeeded. Thus a struggle inevitably ensued between Chandler and the holders of this immense amount of “puts” and “options,” Chandler alone on one side attempting to hold up the price, and all the rest seeking to put it down. The fact that the sellers of "options" and holders of "puts" were able to get resolutions through the board of trade, making new warehouses, where oats had never been stored before, "regular" for the performance of these contracts, shows the intensity of the contest and the overwhelming influences with which Chandler had to contend. I do not mean to be understood as saying that the fact that Chandler sold "puts" to so many as to create an overwhelming opposition, makes the transaction any more or less a wager than if he had only sold one "put," but it shows the notoriety of the whole proceedings.

From the very nature of the transaction the interest of the holder of the "put," is to break down the price, and that of the seller to maintain it. The number engaged in this transaction, and the quantities involved, demonstrate that neither party expected any grain to be delivered. Chandler expected to hold up the price, in which event no grain would be offered him, and the other parties must have known they could not get the grain to deliver unless they first broke Chandler, as he held all the grain, and then, although they might tender, he could not receive, so that in reality no actual delivery was anticipated. They made their tenders only as a method of establishing differences after he had failed, and was powerless.

That transactions of this kind are only wagers, is abundantly established by authorities.² It is true those cases arose under statutes making such transactions void as gaming contracts. But the test applied was: did the parties intend to sell on one side and buy on the other the stocks which purported to be the subject-matter of the transaction, or did they only intend to adjust the differences? And as it was found that they only meant differences when they said shares, the contracts were held to be essentially gambling contracts, and therefore void.

It is said, however, that there is no statute in this state expressly prohibiting contracts of this kind, as there is in England and Pennsylvania; and, as the supreme court of this state has decided that wagers are not necessarily void, therefore, these contracts—not being inhibited by any express law of this state—are not void. There is no dispute that contracts of wager are valid at common law, unless affected with some special cause of invalidity. Ball v. Gilbert, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 397. But wagers which are contrary to public policy have always been held by the courts to be essentially void, without statutory prohibition, and cannot be made the ground of an action. Hartley v. Rice, 10 East, 22. And a high authority in the profession has stated the law on the subject of the validity of wagers with great force and clearness, when he says: "As the moral sense of the present day regards all gaming or wagering contracts as inconsistent with the interests of the community, and at variance with the laws of morality, the exception necessarily becomes the rule." 2 Smith, Lead, Cas. 306. Indeed, any one rising from a full examination of the law applicable to wagers, as expounded by the courts, would undoubtedly testify that, while he has found in the books, and especially among the older text-writers and cases, general expressions to the effect that wagers were valid at common-law, he has found the cases where they have been enforced to be extremely rare, and the courts have been astute to find reasons for not enforcing them.

Following this general current of authority, the supreme court of this state, under the statute prohibiting gaming, has decided that the wagers upon horse-races are void, and cannot be enforced; and that money paid on such wagers can be recovered back. Tatman v. Strader, 23 Ill. 493; Garrison v. McGregor, 51 Ill. 473. The language of the Illinois statute on which these decisions are based, is, in substance, that all promises made, etc., where the consideration, or any part thereof, shall be money won by gaming, etc, shall be void. The language of 8 and 9 Vict., on which Grizewood v. Blane and other English cases were decided, is: "All contracts or agreements, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void." The precise question made in this case has never been before the supreme court of this state to my knowledge, and I am not aware that it has ever been raised at the circuit, except in a late case before his honor Judge Tree, of this city, when he held that "option contracts for grain, when the parties intended only to pay the differences, and not to deliver the grain, were void, as wagering contracts." But it hardly seems possible that any court called upon to construe the Illinois statute in the light of the expositions already made by our courts, and of the English decisions upon a statute so substantially similar, could hesitate to pronounce these contracts wagers, and void as contrary to the statute.

But even if not within the letter or spirit of the statute of this state, the common-law authorities quoted show that all wagers contrary to the public policy are void without reference to any statute. And, as the contracts under consideration are essentially nothing but bets upon the price of oats in this market within the time limited, and as it is obvious that the effect of such transactions is to beget wild speculations, to derange prices, to make prices artificially high or low, as the interests, strength and skill of the manipulators shall dictate, thereby tending to destroy healthy business and un-settle legitimate commerce, there can be no doubt of the injurious tendency of such contracts, and that they should be held void as against public policy. As is most cogently said by the learned judge who delivered the opinion in the case cited from 55 Pennsylvania State Reports: "Anything which induces men to risk their money or property without any other hope of return than to get for nothing any given amount from another, is gambling, and demoralizes the community, no matter by what name it may be called." The financial disaster and ruin which followed "Black Friday" in New York, and the scarcely less damaging local consequences which followed the various "corners" which have either succeeded or been attempted in this city, furnish conclusive proof, if proof were needed, that such gambling operations should be held void, as contrary to public policy.

The total amount paid by the claimants in these cases was less than $19,000, and yet the amount they claim is within a fraction of $400,000—a disparity between the consideration paid and the sum demanded which strikes the mind at once as so grossly inequitable that the judicial conscience is shocked, and revolts from being made the instrument for enforcing such outrageous injustice.

I do not intend to be understood as holding that every option contract for the delivery of grain or stock, or that every "put," is necessarily void, but only that all these contracts, in the light of the testimony before the court, were in their essential features gambling contracts. The parties when they made them did not intend to deliver the grain, but only at the utmost to settle the differences. They knew they could not obtain the grain to deliver if Chandler sustained his "corner," and their action in buying a "put" was virtually a bet on their part that he could not accomplish what they all knew he was endeavoring to do, that is, keep up the price through June to his own figures, and virtually a bet on his part that he could do so.

It is shown in the proof, and urged in the argument, that the "put" is in itself a very harmless contract—that dealers frequently resort to it as a method of insuring prices. It is answer enough to this to say that the proof fails to show that such was the object of any of these claimants. Chandler was taking all the cash oats offered at the price named in the "puts" and upward, and none, with the exception of Bensley, claim that they had any oats to fill the "puts" at the time they bought, or bought for that purpose till after Chandler's failure. It is perhaps possible to imagine a dealer with a stock of grain on hand which he wishes to hold for an advance, who may take a privilege of this kind to insure himself against a decline while waiting for an advance. But the very act of offering to sell a "put" either implies that the seller has control of the market so that he expects to make his own price, or else it is a mere reckless assertion of the seller's opinion that the price will be maintained, either of which partakes of the character of a bet. "A wager," says Bouvier, "is a contract by which two parties or more agree, that a certain sum of money or other thing, shall be paid or delivered to one of them on the happening or not happening of an uncertain event." To say that these contracts were taken for the purposes of insurance, is too far-fetched an excuse, and evidently an afterthought.

In what I have said I do not intend to vindicate Chandler. His conduct was as reprehensible as that of the claimants. All were engaged in an immoral and illegal transaction, and this court ought not to allow its powers to be prostituted to the enforcement of these contracts for either party. Money lost at play or in gaming cannot be recovered except where an action is given by statute, but, as I have already intimated, my opinion that these cases are within the statute of this state on the subject of gaming, under which money paid may be recovered back, I shall allow the claimants to prove their claims for the amounts actually paid by them, respectively, which is a half cent per bushel on the grain named on their tickets.

District Court, S. D. New York. September, 1842.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE OF DEBTOR—OPENING DEFAULT DECREE.

[A delay of a month in moving to vacate a decree denying the bankrupt's discharge, which was rendered by default after full notice, is sufficient, under ordinary circumstances, to defeat the motion; but, in view of the fact that the bankruptcy law is about to be repealed, the court in this case permits the default to be opened on terms, in order that the bankrupt may not be finally debarred from bringing his case before the court.]

[In the matter of the bankruptcy of Daniel Young. The bankrupt moved to vacate a default decree denying his discharge.]

BETTS, District Judge. This motion, first brought on the 7th inst., was further supported by affidavits served the 14th, and afterwards presented to the court. On the 3d December last, a decree by default was taken in behalf of creditors denying the petition of the bankrupt for a discharge. The proceedings by the creditors were open and perfectly regular, and no suggestion is made that the bankrupt or his counsel were unapprised of the decree immediately after it was pronounced. On the 4th of January notice is served on the attorney of the creditors that a motion will be made to vacate the default and decree, because taken in surprise of the bankrupt, his counsel being absent from court, when the bankrupt expected and relied upon his attendance to the case. On the 14th the supplementary affidavit of the counsel for the bankrupt is furnished, stating that he did not attend personally to argue the cause, because there was a verbal understanding between him and the attorney for the creditors that both parties would submit the papers and proofs to the court without argument, and that he had confided in that understanding. The affidavit of the attorney for the creditors assents to this general understanding, and states his readiness at all times to have complied with it, and that he did actually submit the papers to the judge on the 2d December, the decree being recorded the succeeding day, but that the bankrupt's counsel never offered any papers on his part, and, as the attorney understood and believes, because the counsel considered the case on the proofs desperate on the part of the bankrupt.

There is no doubt of the competency of the court to open a default of this character, when the decree works no change in the situation of the parties; not but that this would be a proper case for relief if it had been pursued with any color of diligence. No excuse is offered to the court accounting for a delay of a full month after the decree was entered before taking measures to be relieved from it, nor for omitting, in the first instance, to present the affidavit of the counsel explaining the cause of the default.

The proceedings on the part of the bankrupt have been exceedingly remiss, and disregarding of the well-known rules of practice; and this circumstance would be sufficient to induce the court to deny the present application, but that, from the existing situation of the law, it is doubtless to be immediately repealed, and the bankrupt may be debarred the opportunity of ever bringing his case in any other manner before the court. To save him, therefore, from the hazard of losing any possible redress, I shall stretch the equity of the court so far as to open this default, but only upon the condition that the costs of the default be paid, and the creditors' disbursements of the commissioner for taking proofs be deposited in court, to abide the final hearing, and to be paid to the creditors if the bankrupt is defeated, and restored to him if he succeeds on such final hearing. Unless the conditions of this order are so complied with that the case can be put on the docket on Thursday, the 26th inst., it is to be understood as of no longer force.

BANKRUPTCY DECREE—FIDUCIARY DEBT.

A single debt, due from one petitioning to be declared a bankrupt, in a fiduciary capacity, will not prevent a decree as to all other debts. But whether the certificate of discharge, in such a case, should contain an exception of such debt,—quære.

This being the day of hearing, on the petition of Levi H. Young to be declared a bankrupt, Foster, counsel for one of the creditors, filed an objection to this decree, stating that the debt, by him represented, was due from Young as guardian, and proceeded to argue the question, against the right of the petitioner to be decreed a bankrupt. Owing this debt, as it is now admitted, in the capacity of guardian, the petitioner is excluded from all or any of the supposed benefits of the act.

Gen. Kimberly, for petitioner, having entered a demurrer to the objections, claimed a decree in bankruptcy in common form. If a petitioner has incurred a debt or defalcation as guardian, this will not suspend his rights under the act, as to all other debts. Should a discharge issue, that discharge will not bar the fiduciary debt, provided such a debt or liability did exist prior to filing the decree. It was not the intention of congress, that every person who owed a debt as executor, should thereby be prevented from taking the benefit of this act. A part of the first proviso to the fourth section of the act, is conclusive on this point.

JUDSON, District Judge, was inclined to the opinion, that the objection could not prevent a decree as to all the other creditors, and whether there should be an exception of this debt, in the decree for the discharge, or in the certificate itself, it was not necessary now to determine. When the case comes up for that decree and certificate, the court will then decide whether there shall or not be an exception of this debt, or whether the decree and certificate shall pass in common form, leaving the question to be decided when a suit may be brought on this demand, as to the effect of the discharge upon this debt. The court entertains no doubt, as to the rights of the objector, and although the first decree may pass, these rights will not be prejudiced. The question will be kept open until the next appearance, giving either party opportunity further to discuss the matter. Before dismissing the case, however, it may not be improper to remark, that if the act, after the provisions of the first section had been silent, as to this matter, the objector would have had a very strong argument against any decree, where there was outstanding a fiduciary debt. The words of the first section are, "all persons whatsoever, owing debts which shall not have been created in consequence of a defalcation as a public officer, or as executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, or while acting in any other fiduciary capacity, who shall, &c." The objection in the present case is doubtless indicated by this general language, construed as it is in the first section of the act. But when recurrence is had to a subsequent provision, a limitation is found for this general language. In the latter part of the first proviso to the fourth section, we have the following provision. "Nor shall any person" (be entitled to a discharge) "who, after the passing this act, shall apply trust funds to his own use." The trust funds in the present case are understood to have been applied to the use of the petitioner before the passage of the act. That being the case, as at present advised, the court will say that the objection cannot be available against the decree, neither does it seem to be a valid objection against the second. But, as already remarked, the court will not conclude the parties from further argument, at the next appearance. Decree accordingly.

BANKRUPT—EXEMPTION OUT OF FIRM ASSETS.

Where the assignee had allowed the two members of a bankrupt firm an exemption, under the laws of Missouri, of one hundred and fifty dollars each, out of partnership assets, there being no individual assets, the register disallowed the same, and on application of the bankrupt's attorney, certified facts for opinion of the court. He. d., the bankrupts were entitled to the exemption out of partnership assets.

[In the matter of Bernard F. Young and John M. Young, bankrupts.]

By LUCIEN EATON, Register:

"At the request of George W. Lubke, Esq., attorney in this matter for John M. Young, I make the following statement of facts: At the second meeting the assignee presented his accounts for audit. In them I found two items of one hundred and fifty dollars each to his credit, thus: By cash exempted to B. F. Young, $150. By cash exempted to John M. Young, $150. The assignee's papers showing no assets from any source other than the partnership property, which will fall far short of the amount of the partnership debts proved, I was of opinion that money derived from partnership assets was not subject to exemption for the benefit of the separate members of the firm. Therefore, I disallowed the items. No exception was taken by the assignee or the bankrupts. John M. Young had previously presented to me a check for the sum exempted, which I declined to countersign, and told him I thought it could not be allowed. I also told him it would come up at the meeting. He did not attend, I think. The meeting was held November 20th, 1869, and the schedules of exempted property were filed the same day. They contain these items as 'exempted under the provisions of sections 12, 13, c. 63, Rev. St. Mo.' No creditor opposed or objected to the exemption, and the disallowance of the items was of my own motion. My views are as indicated. No statutes of Missouri exempt the joint property of the firm from execution for debts of the firm. There can be no individual property, properly speaking, in partnership assets, until partnership debts are paid, and the interest of the copartners in the residue ascertained. Here there is no residue. The partnership debts will never be paid in full, and no occasion to adjust the rights of the several partners inter se will ever arise. If I am in error in my view of the law, I think the mistake can still probably be corrected."

Hitchcock & Lubke, for bankrupts.

TREAT, District Judge. While the foregoing views of the register would in many cases control the action of an assignee, yet, as the bankruptcy act contemplates that the bankrupt shall retain, as exempt, specified property, or its equivalent, in some instances, it is lawful and proper, when there is no individual ownership by the head of a family, of the property referred to in section 11 of the said Missouri statute, to make the allowance out of partnership assets. It is true, as a legal proposition, that the individual interest of a partner in partnership property is as stated by the register, yet his right of exemption in his individual property disregards the otherwise legal rights of his creditors. The policy of exemptions, and the legal rules on which they rest, modify the strict technical rules by which rights of creditors are otherwise enforceable. In this case the exemptions claimed should be allowed.

BANKRUPT—EXEMPTION OF RURAL HOMESTEAD.

If a bankrupt, under the laws of Texas, acquires a right to a rural homestead, the subsequent extension of the limits of a city so as to embrace a part thereof does not affect his right.

I, S. T. Newton, one of the registers of said district in bankruptcy, do hereby certify that in the course of proceedings before me in said matter the following question arose pertinent thereto, which, at the request of E. C. McClure and J. H. Carleton, Esquires, attorneys for said bankrupt, and George W. Chilton and Horace Chilton, Esquires, attorneys for W. G. Cain, assignee, are respectfully certified to the court. On the 12th day of June, A. D. 1875, W. C. Young, bankrupt aforesaid, filed his petition in voluntary bankruptcy, and was adjudged a bankrupt, and on the 3d day of July next thereafter, W. G. Cain, Esquire, of the city of Tyler, in said district, was duly elected assignee of said bankrupt estate. On the 3d day of September, A. D. 1875, the said assignee, in accordance with section 5045, Rev. St., reported to the register his certificate of exempted property, which was filed and recorded in said court, and on the 3d day of February, 1876, the said bankrupt, by his attorneys, filed his exceptions to said report, alleging that a portion of the real estate which constituted his homestead was not embraced in the assignee's certificate of exemptions, but was claimed by him as assets belonging to the estate of said bankrupt. In due course of the proceedings in said matter, I caused the exceptions, pursuant to rule 19, general orders in bankruptcy, to be argued before me, and at the hearing thereof I examined as witnesses touching said matter, W. W. Johnson, Samuel Wilson, E. H. McClure, and W. C. Young, bankrupt, whose depositions are herewith filed, together with other documentary evidence offered by said bankrupt in support of his exemptions filed herewith, and made a part of his certificate.

The testimony of the bankrupt shows that in January, A. D. 1867, being then a married man and head of a family, he purchased of one Abraham Hart, in the county of Dallas, in said district and state of Texas, a tract of land containing twenty-nine acres, but acquired title to only thirteen and one-half; that at the time of the purchase of said tract of land, it was situated in the county of Dallas, being mostly a cedar brake, and remote some five or six hundred yards distant from any other settlement or improvement, and from the then town of Dallas. That he paid two hundred and fifty dollars for the tract and went immediately into the possession, and commenced building and improving the same, and destined it then as his homestead.

The testimony of the bankrupt further shows, and he is in this corroborated by the testimony of the other witnesses, that he has continued ever since in the possession of said tract, residing upon, cultivating, using, paying taxes on and claiming it as his homestead, never at any time having shown or evidenced an intention to abandon it, or to exchange it for other property for similar purposes. By reference to the map filed herewith, it will be seen that the tract of land claimed by said bankrupt as his homestead is designated by a black line drawn in pencil, and the same which is described in his Schedule B, No. 5, containing, as appears from his testimony, twelve acres.

It is further shown in evidence that at the time of the original purchase of said tract and destination as a homestead, it was a country site, and not within the corporate limits of the town of Dallas, and so remained out of the corporate limits of said town until within the year A. D. 1873, when the corporate limits of said town were extended, pursuant to and authorized by an act of the legislature of the state of Texas, passed 20th of April, A. D. 1871 (see Sp. Laws 12th Leg. 2d Sess. A. D. 1871, p. 156), so as to embrace within its limits the said tract and residence of said bankrupt, when plots were made and streets laid off running and crossing portions of said tract and premises of said bankrupt, against his protests and without the consent of said bankrupt or that of his wife. The exemptions reported by said assignee, though not marked by any definite line, a certified copy of which is hereto attached marked "Exhibit J," includes by calculation about three acres, being that part of the tract claimed and described in bankrupt's Schedule No. 5, upon which said bankrupt has his dwelling house, cow lots, and some parts in cultivation.

The testimony further shows that said bankrupt has at different times since his first purchase bought some other fractional part of lots lying contiguous to and adjoining the land he first purchased, and has sold also since small fractional parts of his first purchase; these fractional lots purchased by him were intended to form a part of his homestead, the whole making the twelve acres claimed, and at no time exceeding in value twenty-five hundred dollars.

From the foregoing statement of the case, the question of law raised by the exceptions will appear: Whether the bankrupt at the time of his adjudication in bankruptcy was entitled to have set apart to him the entire lot of land claimed and described in his said Schedule B, No. 5, or did that portion, not exempted by the said assignee, pass by the deed of assignment to said assignee for the benefit of creditors?

By S. T. NEWTON, Register in Bankruptcy:

The 14th section of the bankrupt act of the 2d of March, A. D. 1867 [14 Stat. 522], excepts from the operation of the assignment of a bankrupt's estate his necessary household and kitchen furniture, and such of his other articles and necessaries, not exceeding in value in any case five hundred dollars, as shall be designated and set apart by the assignee, having reference in amount to the bankrupt's family, conditions, and circumstances; also his wearing apparel, and that of his wife and children, and his uniform, arms, and equipments, if he is or has been a soldier in the militia or service of the United States, and such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted by the laws of the state in which he is domiciled, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such state exemption laws in force in the year 1864, and "in no case shall the property hereby exempted pass to the assignee, or the title of the bankrupt thereto be impaired or affected by any of the provisions of this act." By an amendatory act passed on the 8th of June, 1872 [17 Stat. 334], this provision was changed so as to give the benefit of exemptions under state laws in force in 1871.

The courts of the United States, having recognized as a rule the interpretation given by the state courts to the exemption laws in force in the several states of the Union, we must then look to the constitution of our own state and laws in force passed pursuant thereto. The 15th section of article 12 of the constitution of 1869, of the state of Texas, reads as follows: "The legislature shall have power and it shall be their duty to protect by law from forced sale a certain portion of the property of all heads of families; the homestead of a family, not to exceed two hundred acres of land, not included in a city, town, or village, or any city, town, or village lot or lots, not to exceed five thousand dollars in value at their destination as a homestead, and without reference to the value of any improvement thereon, shall not be subject to forced sale for debts." The laws of Texas provide that there shall be reserved to every citizen, head of a family, or householder, citizen of the state, a homestead, as in the constitution of 1869, from forced sale, of the value of five thousand dollars at the time of destination as such homestead, nor shall the subsequent increase in the value of the homestead by reason of improvement or otherwise subject the same to forced sale.

It is shown by the evidence of the witnesses that the bankrupt is a man of limited means, with a wife and children dependent upon his own exertions and labor for their support and maintenance, and as such is entitled to the beneficial provisions intended by the framers of our constitution for the head of families, unless it is shown that he has by some act of his own forfeited his claim to them. It could not, I think, be contended for a moment with any show or reason but that the tract of land occupied, claimed, and continuously used by said bankrupt and his family from the time of the purchase and destination as his homestead in January, A. D. 1867, until his adjudication in bankruptcy was a rural homestead, being within the constitutional limit, both as to quantity and value, and as such free and exempt from forced sale under the laws of the state, it not being shown that he owned or possessed any other real estate. The only material question then which it seems necessary to mention in determining the rights of the parties in this matter is, whether the extension of the corporate limits of the city of Dallas, so as to embrace the premises occupied and used by said bankrupt at the time of his adjudication, and the laying off and running of streets crossing said premises, changed it from a rural to an urban homestead, and divests the said bankrupt of his previously acquired and vested rights.

It is contended by counsel for the assignee, in support of his report of exemptions, that the extension of the corporate limits of the city had this effect, and he refers to the case of Taylor v. Boulware, 17 Tex. 78, to sustain his position, in which the court say: "We are not disposed to question the power of the legislature to extend the limits of a town, nor to question that after the plat or plan of the town shall have been extended corresponding with its boundaries so authorized to be extended, a homestead so falling within such extension, though acquired before it was done, would work a change in the character of the homestead from a country to a town homestead, and subject necessarily to the value limitation placed upon a city homestead by the constitution." The doctrine here laid down would seem to some extent to favor the position assumed by counsel; but I think the reasoning of the court in the latter part of the same case will bear a different and more liberal interpretation, in which they say: "The protection of the homestead from forced sale was manifestly a favorite object with the convention, and the constitutional provision intended to secure that object has been regarded as entitled to liberal construction. The term lot or lots used in the constitution must be taken and construed in the popular sense of those terms; and when so used, never would be considered as embracing lands within the jurisdictional limits of the corporation not connected with the plan of the city. It might be important to the administration of the police laws of the corporation that such lands and those who owned them should be within its jurisdiction, but until streets had been extended through the land connecting it with the plan of the town, the land could not be called a lot of town."

In the case of Hancock v. Morgan, 17 Tex. 582, the court say: "The limitation of the homestead in a town or city is not to the number, but to the value of the lots. It is not required that the lots shall join, or be contiguous to each other; all that is required to entitle the property to exemption from forced sale is that it shall be used for the convenience or uses of the head or members of the family."

In the case of Bassett v. Messner, 30 Tex. 604, which is a case more in point, the facts were that Messner, in the year 1854, bought thirty-five and forty-five hundredths acres of land adjoining what was then the village of Brenham, for the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars; that he entered immediately into possession, and with his family occupied it as his homestead until his death, and that his surviving wife and children continued to occupy the premises. That the village of Brenham at that time embraced one hundred acres of land, which was laid off by the county authorities of Washington into streets, lots, and blocks. In the year 1858, the village of Brenham was incorporated as a town in accordance with the provisions of an act of the legislature, on the 27th of January, 1858. By this act of incorporation the limits of the town were extended to one mile, having the courthouse of the county for its center. By this extension of the original limits of the village, the town boundaries took in the land of Messner. The question raised in this case is the same that is presented in the case in the present matter, as to the effect of the extension of the limits of the town by the act of incorporation upon a rural homestead lying contiguous to a village, and used and enjoyed as a homestead at the time it was incorporated within the extended limits of the town, and as to the liability of such homestead to the claims of creditors.

Upon this state of facts the court say: "By direct act of legislation, the legislature of this nor of any other state, acknowledging the restraint of constitutional obligation, forbidding the disturbance of vested private rights, would undertake to declare as homestead, anywhere in the country, an incorporated town or city without the consent of the owner, and subject it to special taxation and burdens, in addition to the common charge incident to all property of the state, for the fiscal purposes of the government. What it would not, and we may say could not do directly without violating a cardinal principle of the government, it should not do by indirect legislation."

In the case of Nolan v. Reed, 38 Tex. 425, where the same question is discussed, the court say: "We conclude that the legislature itself could not work this metamorphosis of a rural into a suburban homestead without the consent of these peculiar words of construction; much less could the local corporation do so, and certainly we do not feel inclined by any judicial interpretation to achieve a result so repugnant to the letter and spirit of our domestic constitution."

I have been referred by counsel for the assignee to the case of Iken v. Olenick, 42 Tex. 195, as overruling the principle laid down in these cases, but I find upon examination of that case that the facts are dissimilar and do not in my opinion have any application to the question here presented.

I find upon reference to similar statutes in other states, where the same questions have been examined by the courts, they hold the same views. In 12 Iowa, 518, the court say: "The homestead right having once attached, it cannot be taken away without the consent of the owner." The courts of California hold the same doctrine. See 16 Cal. 134.

In the case now under consideration, the evidence shows that the tract of land claimed by said bankrupt lies in one body, and has been continuously occupied and used by him and his family for homestead purposes; that the streets which were laid off and running across his premises have never been opened, and that the value of the lot or tract of land owned by said bankrupt has at no time, including improvements, exceeded the constitutional limitation of five thousand dollars.

In view of the facts as proven, and the authorities cited, I think the exceptions in said matter by said bankrupt to the certificate of the assignee were properly taken, and that the property claimed by said bankrupt, as described in his schedule, should have been set apart to him, being protected and shielded by the constitution and laws of the state from forced sale and claims of his creditors.

DUVAL, District Judge. An examination of the facts in the case and law applicable to them satisfies me that Mr. Register Newton is correct in his decision. The bankrupt having acquired a rural homestead in accordance with the constitution and laws of the state of Texas has a vested right therein. The fact that the land embracing such homestead was subsequently included within the limits of the city of Dallas by an act of the legislature authorizing their extension cannot affect his homestead rights. The cases cited by the register, decided by supreme court of the state of Texas, appear to me conclusive on this point. The opinion of the register is, therefore, in all respects approved and confirmed, and the clerk will so certify.

Case No. 18,150.

YOUNG'S CASE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 453.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1824.

GRANT OF FERRY LICENSE.

This court has a discretion to grant or refuse a license for a ferry over the eastern branch.

Nicholas Young petitioned the court for a license to keep a ferry over the eastern branch of the Potomac, alongside of the eastern branch bridge, and a rule was granted to the Anacostia Bridge Company, and the Navy Yard Bridge Company, and the Eastern Branch Bridge Company to show cause why it should not be granted.

Mr. Marbury, for the petitioner, cited the acts of Maryland, November, 1781, c. 22, and April, 1782, c. 31.

By the act of 1781, c. 22, § 1, the justices of the county courts are authorized and required to grant their license to any inhabitant of their county to keep a public ferry at any place within their county then used as such, if they should think that a public ferry ought to be kept there; and if any person should keep ferry for hire or reward without such license, he should forfeit £5, for every offense.

By the act of April, 1782, c. 31, § 3, it is enacted, "that when, and as often as any person shall apply to the justices of any county court for a license to keep a public ferry, and shall offer two good and sufficient securities, the said justices may and shall grant a license to such person to keep ferry, notwithstanding the said court may have, previous to such application, granted license or licenses to other persons to keep ferry at the same place."

By the act of congress of 3d of March, 1801,

(2 Stat. 115), "supplementary to the act concerning the District of Columbia," section 1, it is enacted that the circuit courts of the District of Columbia shall have the same power respecting ferries, &c., for the county of Washington as had been theretofore exercised by the county and levy courts of the state of Maryland.

Mr. Marbury, contended that the act of 1782 was peremptory upon the court and left them no discretion, the petitioner having offered "two good and sufficient securities," and cited the cases of Thomas v. Cofield, and Ringgold v. Cofield [unreported], so decided in the court of appeals of Maryland in 1810 and 1812, in chancery.

Mr. Key, contra. This is an application to the discretion of the court. The act of 1781, is applicable only to places then used as ferries. This is an application for a new ferry. The old ferry has ceased for many years, and the owner of the old ferry and landing, Matthew Wigfield, was one of the petitioners for the erection of the eastern branch bridge. If the landing had ever been condemned it has, by non-user, reverted to the owner. In the case of Cofield, the petition was not for a new ferry.

Mr. Marbury, in reply. This is not an application for a new ferry. This court granted a license for this ferry in 1815.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) decided that they had a discretion, and refused to grant the license, as the object was to compel the bridge companies to take less toll than they are authorized by law to take. The bridge companies are liable to prosecution and forfeiture if they suffer their respective bridges to be out of repair; and if any one may keep a ferry along-side of them they may not be able to keep them in repair, and the companies may be destroyed, to the great injury of the public.

NOTE. The petitioner, or some other person, afterwards set up a ferry near the bridge, and the court, by injunction, restrained him from receiving hire or reward for the transportation of persons, &c. across the branch.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—TIME FOR APPLICATION.

1. Under the act of March 3, 1875 [18 Stat. 470], a removal of a suit pending in the state court at the passage of that act wherein a trial had been had after such passage, cannot be made, although the verdict was set aside and a new trial granted, and the petition for removal was made at the first term at which the second trial could have been had.

[Cited in Hendecker v. Rosenbaum, 6 Fed. 99.]

2. Although no motion be made to remove the cause to the state court until a full term had passed by since the filing of such motion and the transcript of the proceedings in the state court—there is no waiver of the right so to do, nor will such conduct be deemed a submission to the jurisdiction of the United States court; no other proceedings being had therein than the filing of such transcript and motion.

At law.

Matthews, Ramsey & Matthews, for plaintiff.

Moulton, Johnson & Levy, for defendant.

SWING, District Judge. The plaintiff, a citizen of the state of Louisiana, on the 18th day of March, 1874, filed his petition in the superior court of Cincinnati against the defendant, a corporation organized under the laws of Ohio, to recover from it the sum of twenty-three hundred and ninety-three dollars exclusive of costs for a loss under a policy of insurance against fire, issued by defendant to plaintiff. Issue was joined and a trial before a jury had at the April, 1875, term of the court named, resulting in a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the amount claimed in the petition. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, and the same was at the March, 1876, term of said court, granted, and the verdict set aside, and at the same term and before any further proceedings were had, the defendant made its application in due form, and accompanied with the required security, for a removal of the cause to this court under the act of congress approved March 3, 1875, relating to removals of causes from the state to the federal courts, and a transcript of the record was filed in this court on the first day of its April, 1876, term, thus completing the removal, so far as such filing was necessary; and it is also conceded that, so far as all questions of citizenship of parties, the amount involved and the nature of the suit, as well as the sufficiency within itself of the application and bond for removal, the defendant is within and has complied with the act already referred to. But the plaintiff, by his motion filed at the June term last past, asks to have the case dismissed from this court for want of jurisdiction, and to remand it to the state court, for the reason that the application for removal was not made in time in the state court, inasmuch as a trial was had in that court after the passage of the act of March 3, 1875, under which the removal was sought to be made. The defendant resists the motion, claiming first: that the motion to dismiss comes too late, being filed at a subsequent term to that in which the transcript from the state court was filed; and hence that the right to removal, simply because the application may not have been in time—that not being a jurisdictional element like citizenship or amount—has been waived or lost; and second, that the application was in time within a fair construction of the act. The defendant's position, under this latter point being that the right of removal is not wholly lost by a failure to make the application at or before the first trial, but suspended merely, and if a new trial be granted, that the right revives, and may be made available by an application at or before the term at which the case may be first tried after the granting of such new trial; in other words, that such granting places both parties in the condition they were before the trial, and the case stands as if no trial had been had, and that an application then made in proper time is within the meaning and purpose of the act—one made at or before the term at which the case could be first tried—and finally, that the trial which occurs and deprives a party of the right of removal must be a final trial.

The statement of facts presents for decision the questions:

1st—Was the application for the removal of the cause in time? The determination of this question involves the construction of the 3d section of the "Act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from state courts; passed March 3, 1875." The language of that portion of this section which bears upon this proposition is: "That whenever either party, or any one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants, entitled to remove any suit mentioned in the next preceding section, shall desire to remove such suit from a state court to the circuit court of the United States, he or they may make, and file a petition in such suit in such state court, before or at the term at which such cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof." It has been held that it made no difference that several trials may have been had in a cause, if it stood for trial at the time of the passage of the act, and that it was removable, if application was made at the first term of the court at which it could be tried after such passage. Merchants' & Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Wheeler [Case No. 9,439]; Hoadley v. San Francisco [Id. 6,544]; Andrews v. Garrett [Id. 375]. If the language of the act of 1875 was the same as that of the act of 1867 [14 Stat. 558], we should hold, in accordance with the decision of the supreme court in the case of Insurance Co. v. Dunn, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 214, that although there may have been a trial of the cause after the passage of the act, a new trial having been granted, it could be removed at the first term at which a trial could have been had after the new trial had been granted; but the language of the two acts is entirely different. That of 1867 is: "At any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit." That of 1875 is, "before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof." The supreme court said the word "final" in the first named act, applied as well to the word "trial" as to the word "hearing." This qualifying word is left out of the new act, and we, therefore, conclude that congress did not mean the final trial. The party having therefore proceeded to the trial of his cause without asking for its removal, is not at a subsequent term, entitled to have it removed, although a new trial may have been granted him.

2d—It is said, however, that the cause having been removed into this court, and the plaintiff having permitted a term of the court to pass without objection, has waived his right to object to the jurisdiction. We do not think so. If the plaintiff had taken any steps in the case after its removal into this court, he might have waived his right, but he did nothing in the cause until he moved for its dismissal, which was at the next term after the record had been filed. We do not think this was such negligence as would deprive him of the right of objection to the jurisdiction. The cause is, therefore, remanded to the superior court.

INFANCY AS DEFENSE—PLEADING.

Infancy cannot be given in evidence upon the plea of nil debet to an action of debt on a promissory note in Virginia. The promissory note of an infant is voidable, but not void.

[Cited in Hyer v. Hyatt, Case No. 6,977.]

Debt on a promissory note. The defendants [Bell & Wray] pleaded nil debet, and offered evidence of infancy in support of the plea.

Mr. Youngs, for plaintiff. There is a difference between contracts void and voidable. This note was not void, but voidable. If infancy be pleaded, the plaintiff may reply that it was given for necessaries. The plaintiff ought to have notice of the defence, that he may be prepared to rebut it by evidence of necessaries furnished, or that the defendant was of age, or that after full age, he acknowledged the debt. If not pleaded, notice ought to be given, as in cases of set-off. It is not a defence of which the plaintiff can have knowledge, as in the case of limitations, which the court has decided cannot be given in evidence on nil debet. The act of assembly (Rev. Code, 36, § 3), has made a note a substantive cause of action of debt.

F. L. Lee and E. J. Lee, contra. The plaintiff must prove his debt. Whatever shows

there is not a debt is good evidence on this plea. A promise of an infant is absolutely void. A contract must imply an assent, but he cannot assent. Nil debet is a good plea where there is no debt. 3 Com. Dig. 165; 5 Com. Dig. 240. Infancy may be given in evidence on non assumpsit (Darby v. Boucher, 1 Salk. 279), although it is otherwise in case of a deed (Zouch v. Parsons, 3 Burrows, 1805; Whelpdale's Case, 5 Coke, 119). A promise of an infant is as void as a bond of a feme covert. It is clear that on non assumpsit it may be given in evidence. Gilb. Ev. (Old Ed.) 164. There is a difference between non est factum and non assumpsit. On the latter plea it may be given in evidence. Solemn contracts, which require delivery, are voidable only; but simple contracts are void. If plaintiff can show that the note was given for necessities, he may do it on nil debet. The general principle is, that infancy may be given in evidence on the general issue. 1 Salk. 278; Buller, 152; Gilb. Com. Pl. 64, 65; Loft's Gilb. Ev. 368, 369; 4 Bac. Abr. 61; 1 Sid. 51; 12 Vin Abr. 76.

Noblet Herbert, in reply. In cases of usury and coverture, the instrument is absolutely void. But in case of infancy, it is only voidable. There is a difference between a note and an account. A note reduces the matter to a certainty, but an account does not. The act of Virginia, also, which gives an action of debt upon a promissory note, makes a difference, and puts it on the ground of a specialty. The authorities, which say it may be given in evidence on the general issue, mean in actions of assumpsit, not in actions of debt. See Trueman v. Hurst, 1 Term R. 40; Crantz v. Gill, 2 Esp. 472; Clare v. Earl of Bedford, 1 Strange 168; 13 Vin. Abr. 536; 2 Strange, 1101.

THE COURT, having taken time to consider, decided (nem. con.) that infancy cannot be given in evidence, on the plea of nil debet to an action of debt on a promissory note, being of opinion that it is not void, but voidable. See Hyer v. Hyatt [Case No. 6,977], at Washington, December, 1827.

son, and joint orders from all three, and an express promise in writing by the defendant to obey those orders; and a breach of the orders; and averred that if the defendant had obeyed the orders and brought in a cargo of salt, the profit of the plaintiffs on the sale of that salt would have been fourteen hundred and thirty-five dollars; by reason whereof the defendant became liable to pay that sum to the plaintiffs, and being so liable, the defendant, in consideration thereof, promised the plaintiffs to pay that sum to them on demand. The second count was like the first, but upon another breach of the orders. The third, was indebitatus assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. The fourth, money had and received. The fifth, insimul computasset.

THE COURT, upon the prayer of Mr. Swann, for the defendant, decided (nem. con.) that the plaintiffs, Young and Deblois, could not recover without evidence of an express promise to pay them their proportion of the damages for the breaches alleged. And that the orders, &c., were not evidence of such express promise, nor were they evidence on either of the three last counts. The plaintiffs became nonsuit.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT—CROSS BILL FOR DISCOVERY.

1. A defendant in a suit in equity founded on the infringement of a patent, can not, by a cross-bill which sets up no color of title in himself, demand a discovery from the plaintiff in the original suit as to the source or validity of his title.

[Cited in Stonemetz Printers' Machinery Co. v. Brown Folding-Mach. Co., 46 Fed. 852.]

2. It is essential to a bill of discovery that it should set forth a title sufficient to support or defend a suit, and pray a discovery pertinent to that title and nothing beyond. And, where it cannot be sustained as a bill for discovery, it cannot be retained for the purpose of relief, unless it makes a case for relief independently of the discovery sought.

[Suit by Hiram Young and Edward Leavitt against Samuel Colt. Heard on demurrer to a cross-bill.]

Seth P. Staples and Robert Emmet, for plaintiffs.

Edward N. Dickerson, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. The specific points presented for adjudication in this case arise on a demurrer to a cross-bill filed by the plaintiffs, but the discussion has also involved an examination of the original bill and answer, and it has thus become necessary to advert to the case made by the entire pleadings. The original bill was filed November 19, 1851, by Colt, as patentee, for an injunction and other relief against Young and Leavitt, for alleged violations of his patent-right. It avers that the patentee, before the 25th of February, 1836, invented a new and useful improvement in fire-arms, and that, on that day, letters patent were duly issued to him for his invention, and that he was the first and original inventor thereof. On the 28th of October, 1848, he surrendered the patent to the commissioner of patents, because of a defective claim or description of his invention in the specification, and a re-issue of the patent was made the same day, for the complement of the original term of fourteen years. Previous to the expiration of that term, the patentee applied for and obtained, on the 10th of March, 1849, from the commissioner of patents, an extension of the patent for seven years beyond the period of its expiration, and the order for extension was duly endorsed on the patent. The bill charges that the defendants have infringed and violated the patent-right since such extension, and continue to infringe and violate it.

On the 26th of December, 1851, the defendants filed their answer to the bill, denying that the patentee was the first and original inventor of the improvement, and that the patent was legally re-issued and extended, and that the patentee has any interest in the patent, and averring that he had sold and assigned his entire title and interest therein to the Massachusetts Arms Company.

On the same day, the defendants in the original bill filed a cross-bill against the patentee, for discovery and relief. That bill seeks from the patentee a discovery of the time and place when and where he made his discovery and first manufactured any fire-arm under the patent, and whether he sued any person, during the first term of his patent, for infringing it, or made any claim against any one therefor. It also demands a discovery of the proceedings had in the patent office in obtaining an extension of the patent, and whether the application was submitted to the secretary of war for his opinion thereon; and also a discovery of the proceedings before the commissioner of patents subsequently to the act of May 27, 1848 [9 Stat. 231], and whether notice of application for the extension was published, or was given by the patentee to any person. The bill further prays that, when the discovery shall be made, the court may decree the order extending the patent to be inoperative and void, and that the patent expired on the 25th of February, 1850, and also grant a perpetual injunction restraining the patentee from commencing any action at law or in equity for any infringement of the patent since the 25th of February, 1850; and that the court may declare the patent to be void, and may order it to be delivered up to be cancelled. A prayer for general relief is also appended.

The defendant files a general demurrer to this bill.

Upon the averments of the original bill, the plaintiff therein has clearly a prima-facie title to the thing patented, and the legal presumption in his favor is, that he had complied with all the requirements of law which are necessary to render his title complete. Phil. Pat. 407; Webst. Pat. Cas. 129; Cur. Pat. §§ 30, 39; Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 448.

The answer of the defendants to the original bill denies that the patentee is the first inventor or has acquired a valid patent. This answer will enable them to disprove any title or right of the plaintiff under the grant, or compel him to support it by evidence aliunde the patent. The scope and design of the cross-bill is to make that defence by means of evidence extracted from the patentee, and the demurrer interposed to that bill raises the question, whether the defendants in the original suit have a legal right to demand disclosures from the patentee which might show that he had no valid title to his patent.

It is to be remarked, that the defendants in the original suit do not take their defence in their answer, or file their cross-bill, under any color of title. They neither claim to be prior inventors or to hold by assignment the elder right of any other person. If not naked intruders or trespassers upon the possession of the patentee, they stand upon no higher ground than the allegation that the grant of the government to him is void, and they present this bill to support that assertion. This is engrafting a novel function upon the office of a cross-bill.

The broad principle upon which a cross-bill is allowed is, that equity should give suitors a common advantage in its processes. As it compels a defendant to make disclosures and discoveries under oath, to aid an action against him, so should it secure mutuality in this privilege, by allowing a defendant to become a plaintiff and compel his adversary, in particular cases, to make disclosures and discoveries of matters within his knowledge that are serviceable to the defence. The parties, to that end, alternate places, in order that each may have the same use of the powers of the court for the same object. A cross-bill, as its name imports, goes no further than to give the party filing it the reciprocal right enjoyed by the complainant in the original bill, in respect to their mutual title or interest in the subject-matter of the suit: Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 389, 390.

The English and American authorities are clear and nearly invariable in respect to the legitimate office of a bill of discovery. It is essential to a valid bill of discovery that it set forth a title in the party which is sufficient to support or defend a suit, and that it pray a discovery pertinent to that title and nothing beyond. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 317-320; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1490; Wig. Dis. 15; Phillips v. Prevost, 4 Johns. Ch. 205; Van Kleeck v. Reformed Dutch Church, 6 Paige, 600; s. c., in error, 20 Wend. 457. I find but one case (Adams v. Porter, 1 Cush. 170) in which a disposition is indicated to extend to a plaintiff in a cross-bill a wider privilege. That case might seem to authorize such plaintiff to place, in effect, the defendant on the stand, and examine him as to all matters applicable to the defence. But the same court, in a subsequent case (Haskell v. Haskell, 3 Cush. 540), concedes that the general principles of equity law would not favor such a rule, if it is declared in that decision.

Considering the cross-bill in this case as a bill of discovery, the defect is vital to it, that it rests on no title in the parties filing it, either in common with or hostile to the patentee. It is contrary to all principles of equity pleading, to permit a party who has no right himself to a subject-matter in dispute, to subject the one who shows a prima-facie title to it to interrogatories as to the source or validity of that title. Bills framed on that ground are always rejected as fishing, or as attempts to pry into an adversary's title, and as transcending the privilege granted to a suitor to draw from his adversary facts tending to support his own title. It is sufficient to refer to the elementary books, in which this doctrine is stated and amply supported by authority. Har. Ch. Prac. 115; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 189, 190; Coop. Eq. Pl. 58; Wig. Disc. 90, 93, 99; Hare, Disc. 196, 197; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 324, 571; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1490; Macn. Sel. Cas. 10; 58 Law Lib. 24. An article in 13 London Jurist, 52, gives a learned and able exposition of the late English cases on the subject.

As the defence which the cross-bill is designed to maintain has relation to the weakness of the plaintiff's title, and not at all to any title set up on the part of the defendants, it cannot be sustained as a bill of discovery. But it is contended that, as the bill prays relief as well as discovery, it will be retained for the purpose of relief, although the discovery be denied. This may undoubtedly be so in cases where the bill makes a case for relief independently, of the discovery sought for. But, in the present case, the relief asked is to be a consequence of the discovery. The specific relief prayed for is a perpetual injunction against the patentee and his assigns from bringing any suits in equity or at law for infringements of the patent, and a decree declaring the patent void and that it be delivered up to be cancelled. An injunction against the patentee is also prayed, restraining him from continuing suits he has already commenced in the District of Columbia, against the defendants, for violating the patent. General relief is also prayed, but the counsel for the defendants admitted on the argument that they could point out no other relief appropriate to their case than what the bill specifies.

Without discussing the question of the competency of the court to give the description of relief sought for by the bill, in protection of a party who shows a title to the patent-right in himself, I think that the principle upon which the first point is decided must also govern these demands in the cross-bill, and that, as the plaintiffs therein do not set up any color of right or title in themselves to the patented invention, and seek to defend themselves against the action of the patentee for infringement of his patent, only by evidence to be extracted from him showing the weakness of his title, they are not entitled to any injunction or interference of the court in their behalf, the supposed evidence to support that claim being denied them by the court. Their equity upon their bill is, that the patentee will discover, in his answer to the bill, that he has no valid patent, and that that evidence, when given, will entitle them to be relieved of all suits and prosecutions in his behalf. The court having denied their right to the evidence, the supposed equity to flow from it has no legal existence and affords no cause for upholding the bill.

The other claim, that this court shall enjoin the patentee from bringing actions against any parties whomsoever, and direct the patent to be cancelled, does not seem to be a ground of equity upon which the plaintiffs in the cross-bill can demand the interposition of the court. They have no authority to bring the bill for any other matter than what is connected with their individual rights and interests.

The demurrer must be allowed, with costs.

In equity.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. The facts, so far as they are material to the decision of the questions in this case, are substantially these: A man by the name of Adams was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of about $1,300. Cushing, one of the defendants, was indebted to Adams in the sum of about $1,600, and to secure a note given for the indebtedness Cushing had executed a mortgage or deed of trust on the property in controversy. The plaintiffs demanding some kind of security from Adams, he transferred to them as collateral security the note of Cushing to him, and the mortgage or deed of trust. The note was indorsed in blank. No assignment was made upon the mortgage or deed of trust. It was simply turned over to the agent of the plaintiffs. The mortgage or deed of trust of Cushing to Adams was upon the record and he appeared to be the owner of the property as mortgagee. Adams was financially involved, suits were pressing against him in this court, and among the judgments recovered was one in favor of one Edgerton. The note of Cushing to Adams not having been paid at maturity, Cushing transferred his equity of redemption to Adams.

Adams seems to have acted in bad faith toward the plaintiffs. He should not have taken the assignment of the equity of redemption, but it should have been made to the plaintiffs or to their agent for their benefit, but a deed of the equity of redemption of the interest of Cushing was, in fact, made to Adams, and the indebtedness of Cushing to Adams was considered as at an end. In other words, by the transfer of the equity of redemption Cushing extinguished, or intended to extinguish, the note of $1,600 which he owed to Adams, but which in fact was in the hands of the agent of plaintiffs.

There would have been no trouble in this matter if there had not been rights of third parties intervening, as judgment creditors. This assignment of the equity of redemption was made by Cushing to Adams after a levy was made under the judgment of Edgerton, but before a sale of the property covered by the deed of trust or mortgage, as the property of Adams the mortgagee, and after the transfer of the equity of redemption Adams was, of course, upon the record, apparently the sole owner of all the interest.

Mr. Strain of La Salle, as the attorney of the plaintiffs, held the note and deed of trust of Cushing. They were not given up, however. After this, proceedings took place in a suit against Edgerton (he being of the opinion that the security which he had for the plaintiffs was gone in consequence of the non-recording of any assignment from Adams to the plaintiffs). Arrangements were made by which security was obtained for the indebtedness. A quarter section of land in the military tract was turned over to him, and consequently, when Adams could not make the payment of the note to the plaintiffs, a deed was made to one of the plaintiffs.

The question is, whether, upon this bill filed to foreclose substantially this mortgage or deed of trust on the part of the plaintiffs, obtained by virtue of this transfer to them or to their agent, the court can make a decree without the presence of Edgerton and without affecting his interest. Edgerton was originally made a party. Afterward the suit was dismissed as to him, and it is now sought to obtain a decree by which their rights may be enforced without affecting the rights of Edgerton.

It is claimed that Adams has refused to execute the trust. He held the property as a trustee of the assignee, and it is insisted that he should enforce the trust by sale of the property, and not being willing to do it, that he should be removed from the position and another appointed, and that the trustee be directed to go on and sell the property and to leave Edgerton with whatever legal or equitable rights he may have under his judgment and sale. If the court could do this upon principles of equity there would be no objection, but I do not think that it can be done.

It was not necessary to come into this court with this case. The party might have gone into the state court, and he might have brought in all the parties who are non-residents, and a decree have been rendered. Edgerton being a non-resident and there being no way by which we can bring him into court by publication, he not voluntarily appearing, of course we can make no decree affecting his interest which would be binding upon him. Neither can we properly make any decree in this court in which he is not a party which would affect his interests. If this court should go on and remove Mr. Adams, and appoint another trustee, and direct the property to be sold, and he should sell it and a deed should be made to the purchaser, would it not affect the interest of Mr. Edgerton? Certainly. It would, to say the least, throw a cloud upon his title, and raise a controversy at once in the mind of any one who was called upon to investigate his title as to where the title actually was. He holds by virtue of a purchase under the judgment and execution against Adams the mortgagee of the property. Now, by our law the rights of mortgagees can be sold as well as of mortgagors. On the record Adams was the owner as mortgagee of the property. The judgment creditors had a right to sell that interest, whatever it might be. It was sold and he became the purchaser. Now we cannot make any decree which will affect his interest without making him a party. He is not a party, and cannot, without service or appearance, be made a party in this court. Therefore, the bill will have to be dismissed, but without prejudice.

Upon the trial, R. J. Brent, the plaintiffs' counsel, offered to read in evidence to the jury the deposition of one F. A. Russell, taken de bene esse, before the mayor of Washington.

Mr. Marbury, for defendant, objected that the notice to the defendant was given by the plaintiffs, and not by the magistrate, as required by the act of congress of September 24, 1789, § 30 (1 Stat. 88).

FIRM TRADEMARK—RIGHTS OF PARTNER.

The exclusive right to use the trademark of a firm does not pass to any member of the firm by mere implication; but such member may use it, provided he do so in a manner not to deceive the public.

Injunction against use of a trademark.

HUGHES, District Judge. A bill was filed by the plaintiff on the 15th of January last, complaining of a violation of his trademark by the defendants, and making a case for a temporary restraining order under section 718 of the Revised Statutes; and the order was given, to stand until the 12th instant. A rule was given against the complainant, returnable on the 12th instant, which is now heard. The defendant files his answer and affidavits. The complainant files affidavits, and the case is heard on the defendants' motion to dissolve the temporary restraining order, and on the complainant's motion for a preliminary injunction until the cause shall be finally heard on plenary proofs. Smith, Snyder & Co. was a firm which established a valuable European reputation for a certain manufacture of sumac and bark, and their brand became valuable as a trademark. They were succeeded by the firm of Jones, Snyder & Young, which acquired an exclusive right to their trademark or brand,

"Smith, Snyder & Co." The firm of Jones, Snyder & Young was composed in part of the firm of Jones, Bros. & Co., which was engaged in another business. This latter firm became insolvent, and went into bankruptcy. Previously to doing so, and in contemplation thereof, and by consent of all parties concerned, this firm of Jones, Bros. & Co. sold to N. J. Young, senior member of the firm of Jones, Snyder & Young, "all their right, title, interest, property, claim, and demand in or to the assets of the firm of Jones, Snyder & Young, as set forth in an itemized schedule" annexed to the assignment. This schedule contained a list of property and shipments of the firm, and did not enumerate either the good will or trademark, either of the firm of Jones, Snyder & Young, or of the original firm of Smith, Snyder & Co.

The question in this case is, whether the name and business of the firm was an asset of Jones, Snyder & Young. The interests of trademark and goodwill are omitted from express mention in this or any oral contract which accompanied the assignment to Young of the effects of Jones, Snyder & Co. It is well-settled law that upon the dissolution of a partnership each partner has a right, in the absence of stipulation to the contrary, to use the name and style of the partnership in any way consistent with the facts of their business which does not have the effect of deceiving the public. He may say successor to the late firm, and may make like representations. In the absence of express stipulations each partner may use the goodwill of the former partnership. It is also held that rights in the trademark are analogous to rights in the goodwill of a partnership. In the absence of express stipulation at the time of dissolution, each partner may go on and use the trademark of the firm. This right does not pass inferentially under a general assignment; but is like a man's skill in any kind of pursuit, it remains with him. See for this principle Banks v. Gibson, 11 Jur. (N. S.) 680. It has been a matter of some debate and contrariety of decision by the courts, whether one surviving partner after the death of the other succeeds to the goodwill of the firm; the better opinion now being that he does not. Hammond v. Douglas, 5 Ves. 539. Even where the goodwill of a prosperous business of eight years' duration has been sold by its proprietor along with the lease of the premises, and all the stock, wagons, and fixtures used in the business, which consisted of "Howe's Bakery," it was held in a leading case that the vendee had not the right to use the name "Howe" of the vendor, that not having been expressly mentioned in the contract of sale. Howe v. Searing, 10 Abb. Prac. 264; Colly. Partn. (last Ed.) 236; 2 Kent, Comm. 372, notes. On the want of right in the complainant, and not on the title to the trademark of the defendants, the injunction must be dissolved.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT—HOOP SKIRTS—APPLICATION FOR INJUNCTION—EFFECT OF AFFIDAVITS.

1. The claim of the letters patent granted to Thomas B. De Forest and Thomas S. Gilbert, February 18th, 1868, for an "improvement in springs for hoop-skirts," namely, "a skirt-hoop, formed by enclosing one or more wires within a covering, which not only envelopes and protects the wire, but forms an edge, A, or connection, B, substantially as and for the purposes specified," is a claim to such a skirt-hoop as is described, as an article of manufacture—a skirt-hoop capable of use in making what is known as a hoop-skirt.

2. The invention in the patent is limited to a skirt-wire made by folding the fabric over one or more wires, and securing it by sizing or glue and pressure, so as to thus enclose the wire or wires in a covering, and leave an edge of the fabric on the one wire, or a connection, formed by the fabric, between the two wires, so as to admit of attaching the skirt-wire to vertical tapes, in making a hoop-skirt.

3. The securing the fabric by gluing it, or using other equivalent adhesive substance, in contradistinction to securing the fabric, to form the enclosure, by weaving around the wires, or weaving pockets, in which to insert the wires, being cheaper, and an improvement in the trade, and useful, is, if new, patentable, the resulting fabric being a different article from one formed by weaving.

4. An article of dress, called a "bustle," containing wire hoops, each of which is a skirt-hoop, formed by enclosing, by means of glue or sizing and pressure, two wires within a covering, which not only envelopes and protects the wires, but forms a connection between them, so that, while the wires are confined to their proper places within the covering, the wire hoop or spring has the appearance of being made from a much broader wire than it in reality is, and may be secured to the vertical tape by means of a metallic fastening passing through the vertical tape and the material covering the spring, is, substantially, a hoop-skirt, of a diminished size, and the making and selling of such bustles is an infringement of said patent.

5. The ownership of a right to manufacture covered wire for springs for skirts, under a patent granted to John T. Loft, March 13th, 1860, for an "improved machine for covering the springs of skeleton skirts," confers no right, as against the De Forest and Gilbert patent, to make, under the Loft patent, the covered wire contained in such bustle.

6. Although such covered wire may be made by means of the machinery described in the Loft patent, no such wire or skirt-hoop is described or shown in the Loft patent, nor is the apparatus of that patent one which necessarily produces nothing else but such wire or skirt-hoop.

7. In opposition to a motion for an injunction, a general allegation, by affidavit, on information and belief, that the thing patented existed before, without disclosing the particulars of the information leading to the belief, is insufficient.

¹ [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission. The syllabus and opinion are from 9 Blatchf. 277, and the statement is from 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 230.]

8. The fact that the plaintiff is infringing the Loft patent, by using the Loft apparatus to make skirt-hoops, is no ground for refusing an injunction against the defendant, restraining him from infringing the plaintiff's patent.

9. A separate affidavit, by the plaintiff, of his belief that the patentees were the original and first inventors of the thing patented, dispensed with, the bill having in it such an averment, and having been sworn to eleven days before it was filed and notice of application, on it, for the injunction, was given.

[Cited in Consolidated Brake-Shoe Co. v. Detroit Steel & Spring Co., 47 Fed. 895.]

10. A provisional injunction was dissolved, on evidence showing the prior existence, in the United States, of the skirt-wire of the patent, specimens of the thing known before being produced.

Edward N. Dickerson, for plaintiff.
John B. Staples, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a motion for a provisional injunction, founded on letters patent granted February 18th, 1868, to Thomas B. De Forest and Thomas S. Gilbert, for an "improvement in springs for hoop-skirts," and now owned by the plaintiff. The specification states that the inventors have invented "a new improvement in the manufacture of hoop-skirts." There are three figures of drawings annexed to the specification. Figure 1 is a front view of one of the vertical tapes, with three springs attached. Figure 2 is a section of one of the springs, enlarged. Figure 3 is a like section, of a different construction. The specification says: "This invention relates to an improvement in the manufacture of springs attached to vertical tapes, and well known as hoop-skirts, the object being to produce a lighter and cheaper skirt than has heretofore been done; and the invention consists in enclosing one or more flat elastic wires in a covering, the said covering being, when sized, folded and pressed, of greater width than the spring, so that, while it confines the spring to its proper position within the covering, it gives to the spring the appearance of being made from a much broader wire than it in reality is, and admits of securing the spring to the vertical tape by means of a metallic fastening passing through both the vertical tape and the material covering the spring. * * * In Fig. 2, we represent the spring as two flat wires enclosed within the same covering, the wires being denoted in black. Various devices may be employed in covering the two wires. One, and, we think, practically, the best, is to take a narrow strip of fabric, sufficient in width to surround the two wires, and form the space between the two. Then, the two wires, with the fabric, are drawn through an apparatus prepared for the purpose, the fabric being sized with any adhesive material, and the wires sustained equidistant from each other, the apparatus folding the fabric over the wires, and pressing it down into the space between, the sizing being sufficient, or, other sizing being added, so that, when thoroughly dried, the wires will be sustained at their given distances from each other, one wire at each edge of the folded fabric. The wires may be very light, and the fabric equally light, and, when completed, the article has the appearance of a broad spring. Instead of the two springs, as seen in Fig. 2, a single spring may be inserted, as in Fig. 3, and the fabric guided and folded so as to leave an edge, A, of fabric upon the spring, as denoted in said Fig. 3. This folded edge, being sized and pressed, secures the wire in its position in like manner as first described, and gives the like appearance of a broad spring, the sizing in all cases being sufficient to sustain that portion of the fabric at the edge of the wire, or between the wires; or, if preferred, and to give more material at the edge, a single spring may be inserted at one edge, and a cord at the other edge. To construct a skirt from springs thus formed, pass the springs, B, through the pocket in the vertical tape, C, in the usual manner, then insert an eyelet, or other suitable metallic fastening, through the vertical tape, and through the fabric of the covering of the spring, as denoted in Fig. 1, and this may be done on the former, and the same means which secure the springs in the vertical tape may also lock the two ends of the spring within the pocket of the tape. A skirt constructed in this manner has every appearance of a strong spring, but is much lighter than the ordinary skirts, as the wire employed for the spring may be much lighter than that used in the ordinary manner, and the manner of attaching the parts together is of the strongest possible character. Other wires may be added, to increase the width, but forming a space in like manner between each two. We do not wish to be understood as broadly claiming the introduction of two or more springs into a fabric, as such is not new; but, in cases when it has been done, the fabric has been first formed into pockets for the reception of the springs, and the springs themselves covered separately and independent of the said pockets. This arrangement is seen in several well-known patents for the whole or lower portions of a skirt. It will be observed, that we do not in any way form a pocket in the fabric, the covering being simply a folded fabric, the folds being secured by strong sizing and pressed hard together." The claim is in these words: "A skirt-hoop, formed by enclosing one or more wires within a covering, which not only envelopes and protects the wire, but forms an edge, A, or connection, B, substantially as and for the purposes specified."

The allegation of infringement, in the bill, is, that the defendants are making and selling springs for hoop-skirts, precisely the same as those described in the plaintiff's patent. The evidence of infringement is, that the defendants have sold an article of dress called a "bustle," containing hoop-skirt wire made substantially in the manner described in the patent, and that the defendant Lippman has been vending such hoop-skirt wire. The making and selling of the bustle is not denied, and a specimen is produced, which contains wire hoops made in the manner described in the patent. Each hoop, in fact, is a skirt-hoop, formed by enclosing, by means of glue or sizing and pressure, two wires within a covering, which not only envelopes and protects the wires, but forms a connection between them, substantially as and for the purposes set forth in the specification of the plaintiff's patent.

There can be no doubt that the claim of the patent is for such a skirt-hoop as is described, as an article of manufacture—a skirt-hoop capable of use in making what is known as a hoop-skirt. The bustle referred to is substantially a hoop-skirt, of a diminished size.

The defendants set up, in defence, that the defendant Lippman is the owner of the right to manufacture covered wire for springs for skirts, under letters patent granted to John T. Loft, March 13th, 1860, for an "improved machine for covering the springs of skeleton skirts," and that he is making, under that patent, covered wire such as is contained in the bustle referred to. The specification of the Loft patent describes a machine for covering, in a continuous manner, the springs for hoop-skirts with any textile or other suitable fabric, the invention consisting in the use of glue or cement, distributing rollers, cutters, guides, folders, and drawing and pressure rollers, substantially as described in such specification, whereby the desired end is attained. The machine is intended to take the place of machines for weaving or braiding the covering around the wires of which the hoops are made. It describes and claims the covering of wires or springs for hoop-skirts, by passing the same, in connection with strips or covers of suitable fabric, having a suitable glue, cement or adhesive substance applied to them, through folders and between drawing and pressure rollers, arranged to operate substantially as and for the purpose set forth. There is no description or representation of any such skirt-hoop as the plaintiff's. The only wire or skirt-hoop shown or described is one in which the fabric merely encloses or covers the wire, so as to envelop and protect it, and does not, as in the plaintiff's hoop, also form an edge to a single wire, or a connection between two-wires, for the purpose shown in the plaintiff's specification. There is no suggestion, in the Loft specification, of the construction of such an article as the plaintiff's skirt-hoop. It may very well be, that the Loft machine is capable, either with or without modification, of being used to manufacture the plaintiff's skirt-hoop. The specification of the plaintiff's patent speaks of making his skirt-hoop by drawing it through a proper apparatus; but the mere fact of the prior existence of such apparatus shows no want of novelty in the invention covered by such patent. The novelty of such invention would not have been affected even if the plaintiff's patent had stated that the new skirt-hoop was to be made by the use of the Loft apparatus. Such apparatus is not one which necessarily produces nothing else but the plaintiff's skirt-hoop. This is shown by the fact that, as described and represented in the Loft patent, it does not produce the plaintiff's skirt-hoop, or anything having its characteristics.

The defendant Lippman, in an affidavit, states, that he is informed and believes, that, long before the date of the plaintiff's patent, and before the alleged invention of De Forest and Gilbert, covered wire, with spaces of the covering fabric between or on the outside of the wire, was known and used publicly for various purposes, and was an article well known and used and sold. This general allegation, on information and belief, amounts to nothing. If the defendant has any information to the effect stated, sufficient to warrant a belief in the truth of what is stated, he is bound to disclose it for the judgment of the court if it is to be of any avail to him. He cannot swear to the conclusion and withhold the particulars of the information.

The fact that the plaintiff does not or cannot make his hoop without using the apparatus covered by the Loft patent, as is urged, cannot affect the questions involved in this motion. It may be that the plaintiff is infringing the Loft patent, while the defendants are infringing the plaintiff's patent, and that neither can make the plaintiff's hoop without using what is covered by both of the patents. But the case of each must be treated separately, on its merits, when presented.

It is objected, that the application for the injunction is not accompanied by an affidavit of the plaintiff, that he believes that De Forest and Gilbert were the original and first inventors of the thing patented. The bill, however, which was sworn to on the 13th of November, 1871, and filed on the 24th of November, avers that De Forest and Gilbert were the first and original inventors of the improvement for which the patent was issued. On the filing of the bill, notice of the application, founded on the bill, for the injunction, was given for the 2d of December. Under such circumstances, no separate affidavit is necessary. Sullivan v. Redfield [Case No. 13,597].

An injunction must be granted, as prayed for in the bill.

After the granting of the injunction, in January, 1872, a motion was made, in March, 1872, to dissolve it, on matters not presented on the original motion.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I do not regard anything adduced by the defendants against the novelty of the invention covered by the plaintiff's patent, as of any importance, except the skirt wires brought from England by Marcus Berliner, in 1865. The invention in the patent is limited to a skirt wire made by folding the fabric over one or more wires, and securing it by sizing or glue and pressure, so as to thus enclose the wire or wires in a covering, and leave an edge of the fabric on the one wire, or a connection formed by the fabric between two wires, so as to admit of attaching the skirt wire to vertical tapes, in making a hoop skirt. This securing the fabric by gluing it, or using other equivalent adhesive substance, is in contradistinction to securing the fabric, to form the enclosure, by weaving around the wires, or weaving pockets, in which to insert the wires. It is in evidence, that the manufacture by folding and gluing is cheaper than that by weaving. It is an improvement in the trade, and useful, and, if new, patentable. The resulting fabric is a different article from one formed by weaving.

The article brought from England by Berliner in 1865, if his affidavit is true, and not a fabrication, and if the specimens which he produces, as the identical articles he brought from England in 1865, are not fabricated for this occasion, is the same thing as the skirt wire of the patent, made of a folded fabric, glued and pressed, over two or more wires, and with the connection of fabric between two wires. If his affidavit and these specimens had been presented on the original motion for injunction, I should not have deemed it proper to grant the injunction; and I think they must now avail to throw such doubt over the question of the novelty of the invention, as to entitle the defendants to have the injunction dissolved, leaving it to the plaintiff to proceed to proofs for final hearing.

SUIT ON ADMINISTRATION BOND.

An action will not lie against the sureties in an administration bond until a devastavit has been established in a suit against the administrator.

Debt [by R. Young, Judge, etc.] against the sureties in the administration bond of John Mandeville, administrator of Jonathan Mandeville. The breach assigned was, that the administrator had failed to pay to one Joseph Janney $111.94, and $26.86, due from the intestate, for which a judgment had been obtained in this court by the said Joseph against the said administrator.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, demurred to the replication in which the breach was assigned, and contended that no action would lie against the sureties in the administration bond until a devastavit has been established against the administrator in a separate suit against him, as this court decided in the case of Gilpin v. Crandell [Case No. 5,449], at November term, 1812.

Mr. Swann, for plaintiff, admitted the law to be so, according to the decisions in Virginia; but this court is not bound by those decisions.

THE COURT rendered judgment upon the demurrer, for the defendant, at May term, 1824.

It was yesterday decided (Cranch, Circuit Judge, absent) that the qualifications of jurors in this court shall be such as are required for jurors in the county courts of Virginia; and not those required for jurors in the district courts of Virginia. Jurymen therefore need not hold a freehold estate, COMPETENCY OF JUROR.

1. In an action against an insurance company, a nephew of a stockholder is not a competent juror.

2. It is not a principal cause of challenge, that the juror has had conversations with some of the parties; but it is evidence for the consideration of triors upon a challenge for favor.

[Action by James Young against the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria.]

Mr. James R. Riddle, being called as a juror, was objected to by the plaintiff, because he was the nephew of a stockholder in the insurance company.

The fact being agreed, THE COURT decided it was a good principal cause of challenge.

Mr. Swann, for plaintiff, cited Williams v. Delafield, 2 N. Y. T. R. [Caines] 329; Livingston v. Delafield, 3 N. Y. T. R. [Caines] 49. It was then suggested by the plaintiff's counsel that perhaps some of the persons called as jurors had had conversations with some of the parties, and hoped that such persons might be excused, or rather struck off the panels.

But THE COURT told the counsel they might challenge for favor and have it tried by triors.

This morning Dr. Dick, a physician, came into court, and stated that one of the jurymen (Mr. Mandeville) was too ill of a bilious attack to attend without danger to his life, and he did not think he would be able to attend for several days. The court having sat four weeks, and expecting to rise this week, and it being stated by the other jurors that there was no probability that they could agree, and the jury being called, and Mr. Mandeville not appearing, THE COURT discharged the other jurors and continued the cause.

BONDS INDORSED BY STATE—FORECLOSURE SUIT—STATE AS PARTY—SUBROGATION TO STATE'S RIGHTS—AUTHORITY OF GOVERNOR—SUIT BY JUNIOR MORTGAGEES—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER—PROPERTY IN CUSTODIA LEGIS.

1. It is not necessary to aver matter of law or public statute, of which the court takes judicial notice.

2. Where a state is concerned in the subject matter of the suit, it should be made a party, if that can be done; but the fact that the state cannot be sued is a sufficient excuse for not making it a party.

3. Where a state was an indorser of bonds secured by a statutory mortgage, it was not considered a necessary party in a suit brought by holders of bonds secured by the mortgage to foreclose the same.

4. A state indorser of the bonds of a railroad company, and was indemnified against loss on account of the indorsement by a statutory mortgage on the railroad property. Held, that the fact that the state could not be sued was no reason why the holders of the bonds so indorsed should not be subrogated to the rights of the state and have the benefit of the security.

first mortgage bonds of a railroad company, bearing interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum; the governor indorsed the bonds, and referred to the act in his indorsement as the authority therefor. Held, that the act authorized the indorsement of bonds bearing interest at eight per cent. per annum in gold.

6. Bona fide holders for value, of the bonds indorsed by the governor assuming to act under said authority, were not to be charged with constructive notice of the fact that the bonds so indorsed were not first mortgage bonds.

7. An act, passed subsequent to the one authorizing the indorsement of the said bonds, gave authority to the governor to indorse the bonds of the railroad company, notwithstanding there was a prior lien on said company's railroad, but it was claimed that this law did not pass the legislature by the vote required by the constitution, and was therefore null and void; yet that it was nevertheless constructive notice to the bondholders of the fact that the bonds owned by them were not first mortgage bonds. Held, that if this enactment were valid, it cured any defect in the authority of the governor to indorse the bonds, and that if it were not valid but void, it was not constructive notice to anybody of anything.

8. When a court having jurisdiction of a case has appointed a receiver for the property which is the subject of the suit, and he is in possession, no other court of co-ordinate jurisdiction can interfere with the property, or entertain complaints against the receiver, or undertake to remove him.

9. Junior mortgagees may file a bill to foreclose their mortgage without making prior mortgagees parties, but a sale in such a case would necessarily be made subject to the prior mortgages.

10. In such a suit, the prior mortgagees can be made parties only by service of process or voluntary appearance. A general notice calling upon them to present their claims will not make them parties or bind them.

11. If, however, such prior mortgagees are represented by trustees who are actual parties to the suit, then a notice calling upon them to present their claims before the master would be effectual, and the decree of the court would bind them.

12. When junior mortgagees have first brought their suit to foreclose, and the court has taken possession of the mortgaged property by a receiver, the senior mortgagees cannot gain possession of the property by a suit subsequently began, until the first is ended.

[This was a bill in equity by Mason Young and others against the Montgomery & Eufaula Railroad Company and others. Heard on demurrer to the bill.]

Geo. W. Stone, David Clopton, and James T. Holtzclaw, for complainant.

Samuel F. Rice, D. S. Troy, and H. C. Tompkins, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The defendant company is an Alabama corporation, which has constructed and equipped a railroad from Montgomery to Eufaula in said state. The case made by the bill is substantially as follows: The complainants are holders of certain bonds belonging to a class of bonds issued by the defendant railroad company and indorsed by the state of Alabama; twelve hundred and eighty of these bonds, for $1,000 each, were issued, indorsed by the state and put in circulation, and the indorsement was put upon said bonds before they were disposed of by the railroad company. One thousand of these bonds bear date the 31st of August, 1867, and are payable on the 1st day of March, 1886. To each of these bonds are attached coupons, thirty-seven in number, one on each bond for the payment of $40 in United States gold coin, on the first day of March, 1868, and others severally for the payment of a like sum in like coin, at the end of each six months thereafter, until the bonds themselves become due. The other two hundred and eighty bonds are substantially like the thousand bonds first named, with a like indorsement, but the date of these bonds and the date of their maturity is not stated in the bill. The indorsement upon all the bonds is in these words: "In pursuance of an act of the legislature of the state of Alabama, approved February 19, 1867, entitled 'An act to establish a system of internal improvements in the state of Alabama,' the undersigned, governor of the state, hereby for the state, indorses this bond and makes the state liable for its payment; the Montgomery & Eufaula Railroad Company having complied with the conditions upon which the undersigned is required on the part of the state to give such indorsement. In witness whereof, the undersigned, governor of the state of Alabama, has hereunto set his hand, this — day of —, 1866. (Signed) R. M. Patton, Governor of the State of Alabama." All of these bonds bear date before the first of March, 1873, but may have different dates and the indorsement of different governors, and are numbered serially, from one up to twelve hundred and eighty. The bonds held by complainants were sold before March 1, 1873, at not less than ninety cents on the dollar, and were put in circulation, and complainants became the owners of such of said bonds as are specified in a schedule annexed to the bill bona fide and for a valuable consideration, and the bonds held by complainants amount to $215,000. No mortgage was executed by the railroad company to secure these bonds, the company being advised by its counsel that no mortgage was necessary. No interest has been paid to the complainants on their bonds since the first day of September, 1872, and the railroad company is, and for more than two years has been, insolvent. The railroad and its property is, and for a long time has been, in the possession and control of the defendant, Andrew J. Lane, who by virtue of an appointment made in a suit brought by Samuel A. Strang against the said railroad company in the interest of certain persons, claiming to be second mortgage bondholders; such suit is pending in the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of Alabama. The bonds on which that suit is based show upon their face that they are second mortgage bonds, and that the mortgage by which they are secured is subject to the prior lien of the series of 1,280 bonds before mentioned, part of which complainants hold; and the bill of complaint under which said Lane holds as receiver, admits the prior lien of said 1,280 bonds.

It is charged that Lane, at the time of his appointment as receiver, was, and long before had been, the president of the said railroad company, and was a large creditor thereof, was interested as a stockholder and as a holder of a large number of said second mortgage bonds. It is alleged that the answer of the railroad company to the bill filed by Strang was dictated by Lane; that he was appointed receiver on the same day the bill was filed; that he was authorized to take possession of the road and property of the railroad company and manage and run it, and, on application to and approval of the court, to borrow money on his certificates for the purpose of repairing and running the property of the company; that on the 15th day of July, 1872, he applied to the court for leave to borrow $60,000, which was granted on the 19th of July, 1872. It is alleged that on the 31st of January, 1873, Lane applied to the court for authority to pay Lehman, Durr & Co., bankers, the sum of $12,202.09, which he, as receiver, had overdrawn, in order to meet taxes and executions, which would have stopped the operations of the road; and the court ordered him to make the payment out of the earnings of the road. The bill alleges, on information and belief, that Lane has filed no reports or accounts, and that a report made by him to the bondholders shows that he has expended the money, borrowed by authority of the court, for other and different objects than those authorized by the orders of the court. (I may say in passing that I have read the report referred to, which is alluded to in the bill as Exhibit No. 5, and it totally fails to sustain the allegations of the bill.) Other complaints are made of the receiver Lane, that he has applied to the court and obtained orders which the court ought not to have granted. The bill alleges further that the complainants cannot learn from the report of Lane, the receiver already referred to, whether the railroad has realized any and, if any, what net profits. It alleges that the South & North Alabama Railroad Company, by petition, had itself made a party defendant, and has filed a cross-bill in the said suit of Samuel A. Strang, in which it claims that it has a first lien upon said railroad for many thousand dollars; but complainants aver that by virtue of the laws of Alabama, under which the bonds held by them were indorsed, their bonds are the first and best lien on the road, complainants having purchased their bonds without notice of any older lien.

It is further alleged, "that leave has been obtained from Hon. W. B. WOODS, one of the justices of the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of Alabama, to bring suit against the said Andrew J. Lane, receiver, in the circuit court for the Middle district of Alabama, on the claims of complainant hereinbefore set forth." Such are the averments of the bill.

The Montgomery & Eufaula Railroad Company, the South & North Alabama Railroad Company, the said Andrew J. Lane, receiver as aforesaid, and William Fowler and Thomas Pullum, who are averred to be the trustees of the second mortgage executed by said Montgomery & Eufaula Railroad Company, are made defendants to the bill; and the prayer of the bill is, that this court will remove and take the said railroad and all the property and assets of the company and its control and management out of the custody and direction of the said Andrew J. Lane; that complainants, and all others in similar rights with them, who will come in and contribute to the expenses of the suit, may be subrogated to the lien and rights of the state of Alabama upon the property and franchise of said railroad company, and said lien established and purchased; that the property and effects of the said company may be administered in this court, and said property and assets and its income and profits be appropriated by sale or otherwise to the interest due on the bonds held by complainants and others in similar right; and that an account may be taken of the proceedings and administration of said Lane, etc., and for general relief.

In order to understand clearly the case made by the bill, it is necessary to refer to the act of the state of Alabama of February 19, 1867, as subsequently amended, by virtue of which the governor indorsed the bonds of the railroad company. This act (section 1) authorizes and requires the governor "to indorse in behalf of the state the first mortgage bonds of any railroad company in the state having completed and equipped twenty continuous miles of railroad, at the rate of $12,000 per mile, for each section of twenty miles so completed and equipped." The act further provides (section 4) that the railroad company is authorized "to issue the bonds of the company for such amount as it may determine, bearing interest at a rate not to exceed eight per cent. per annum, the interest to be paid semi-annually; * * * said bonds when indorsed by the governor on the part of the state shall recite the fact that they are first mortgage bonds, issued in accordance with and upon the conditions of this act; and said first mortgage and bonds issued thereon shall have priority in favor of the state (over) any and all other liens whatever." See Acts Ala. 1866, 1867, p. 680.

It is plain that the theory of complainants is, that the governor having indorsed their bonds in behalf of the state, this act constitutes a statutory mortgage prior in equity to all other claims; that this mortgage was intended to secure the state against its indorsement, and the bonds having come to the hands of complainants as bona fide holders, they are subrogated to the rights of the state, and the lien of the state enures to their benefit.

The failure of the railroad company to execute a trust deed on its property to secure these bonds has placed the bondholders in this embarrassment: that there are no trustees to represent their interest, and they are compelled to appear personally in any suit which affects their interest in the property.

Separate demurrers have been filed to the bill by Andrew J. Lane, by the Montgomery & Eufaula Railroad Company, and by the South & North Alabama Railroad Company. Several of the grounds of demurrer have been avoided by an amendment to the bill. These it is unnecessary to notice. In examining the remaining causes of demurrer, I shall pursue such order as may seem most convenient.

I remark in the outset that the demurrers are filed to the whole bill and not to any specified parts of it. In order, therefore, to sustain the demurrers, the grounds alleged for some of them must extend to the whole bill. Those which refer to or affect only a part of the bill cannot be a ground for a dismissal of the entire bill.

The first ground of demurrer which I shall notice is, that the state of Alabama is not made a party, and no reason is given why she is not made a party. The state cannot be sued in a court of the United States. The eleventh amendment to the constitution of the United States excludes the jurisdiction. She cannot even by her own consent be made a party complainant, for that would oust the jurisdiction of the court, the principal defendant being a citizen of the state of Alabama. As this is matter of law and public statute, of which this court takes judicial notice, it was unnecessary to aver in the bill the reason why the state was not made a party. Does the fact that the state cannot be made a party excuse her absence from the suit, and can the bill be maintained unless she is a party? Where a state is concerned, the state should be made a party if it can be done; that it cannot be done is a sufficient reason for the omission to do it. Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 378; Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 220. The state is in the position of surety on these bonds on which the suit is based, having received from the railroad company, the principal debtor, indemnity in the form of a statutory lien upon the property of the railroad company. The complainants hold the bonds, and ask a decree against the railroad company for the unpaid interest accrued thereon, and the sale of the property pledged as security; no relief is or can be sought against the state. The state, it is true, is interested in having the pledged property fairly applied to the extinguishment of its liability, and this court will take care, as it should, that this is done. The fact that the state is thus interested in the property is no reason why she must necessarily be made a party to a suit in which no decree is sought against her. The indorser of a note secured by a mortgage is not a necessary party to a suit to foreclose the mortgage. If the state has paid any interest on these bonds, and is thereby entitled to any part of the proceeds of the mortgaged property, she can propound her claim before the master and it will be allowed. Suppose we turn the complainants out of this court because the state is not a party. If they go into the state court, they are met by the same difficulty, for the state will not allow herself to be sued in her own courts. Can it be possible that these complainants are without remedy against the railroad company because their bonds are indorsed by the plighted faith of the state of Alabama? It would be a reproach to the administration of justice to so hold.

It is set up as another ground of demurrer, that as the state cannot be sued, the complainants cannot be subrogated to the rights of the state under the statutory mortgage which secures the bonds. The law of subrogation is the creation of equity. It is resorted to to prevent a failure of justice. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 327, 499, 499a, 638; Moses v. Murgatroyd, 1 Johns. Ch. 119. In view of this fact, it would be a strange proceeding for this court, sitting as a court of equity, to deny the right of subrogation in this case, because the state cannot be made a party here, while she refuses to be a party elsewhere.

It is next alleged, as a ground of demurrer to the bill, that in fact there is no statutory mortgage or lien upon the property of the railroad company to secure the bonds held by complainants, because the governor had no authority to indorse these bonds. His indorsement is therefore void. The state incurred no obligation by reason of the manual indorsement of the governor, and consequently no lien was created thereby to indemnify the state. There was no liability against which the state could be indemnified. This claim is based on two grounds: (1) Because the statute authorizes only the indorsement of bonds bearing eight per cent. interest, and these bonds bear eight per cent. interest in gold; and (2) because the statute authorizes the indorsement of first mortgage bonds only, and the Public Statutes of the state of Alabama show that the bonds in suit are not first mortgage bonds.

Does the fact that the interest on the bonds is eight per cent., payable in gold, make the interest greater than eight per cent.? The defendants claim that it does; that of necessity the agreement to pay in gold is an agreement to pay more than eight per cent. in currency. I cannot assent to this. It depends entirely upon contingencies, which cannot be foreseen, whether interest in gold is better than interest in currency. If gold is at a premium when the interest falls due, then it would take more than eight per cent. in currency to pay the interest. If it is not, it would take just eight per cent. If gold was at a discount, as under many circumstances it might well be, then eight per cent. in currency would more than pay the interest. Suppose the agreement were to pay eight per cent. in demand treasury notes of the United States, which are a legal tender, and they, when the interest was due, happened to be at a premium, as compared with United States notes, also a legal tender, would that really make the rate of interest greater than eight per cent.? When the legislature authorized the indorsement of bonds bearing eight per cent. interest, the fair construction was that it meant eight per cent. in any legal tender currency on which the parties might agree. At the time of the passage of the act "there were two descriptions of lawful money in use under the acts of congress, in either of which damages for nonperformance of contracts, whether made before or since the passage of the currency acts, might be properly assessed in the absence of any different understanding or agreement between the parties." Butler v. Horwitz, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 258. But I place my decision upon this point on the ground that a contract to pay eight per cent. interest in gold is not a contract to pay more than eight per cent., because when the interest falls due, gold may happen to be at a premium. This same question substantially has been decided by the supreme court of the United States in Meyer v. City of Muscatine, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 391. In that case authority was conferred upon the city of Muscatine to issue bonds bearing a rate of interest "not higher than ten per cent. per annum." The interest on the bonds was made payable semi-annually. This method of payment increased the burden on the city, and was an advantage to the bondholder. It, in fact, and under all circumstances, amounted to a higher rate of interest than ten per cent. per annum. It was objected that by issuing such bonds the authority conferred upon the city was transcended, and a usurious rate agreed to be paid, but the supreme court held otherwise, and sustained the bonds. I am of opinion, therefore, that the governor was not precluded by the law from indorsing the bonds because the interest was payable in gold.

The second ground, upon which it is claimed that the governor was without authority to indorse the bonds is, that there was a prior mortgage upon the railroad company's property, and the bonds indorsed could not, therefore, be first mortgage bonds. Let us concede, what defendants claim, that there was a prior mortgage on the road at the date of these bonds. Were the holders of the bonds under the necessity of taking notice of that fact, and does the fact make the bonds void in the hands of a bona fide holder for value? If the governor was without any authority to indorse any bonds, his indorsement would be void. If the law authorized him to indorse the bonds of the A. & C. Railroad, and he undertook to indorse the bonds of the South & North Alabama Railroad, his indorsement would be void. But in this case there is no dispute that the law authorized him to indorse the bonds of the Montgomery & Eufaula Railroad, on the conditions that there should be completed and equipped twenty miles of road before any indorsement, and that the indorsement should not exceed $16,000 per mile of completed railroad, and that the bonds indorsed should be first mortgage bonds. The authority of the governor to indorse such bonds on such conditions is not disputed. Now, suppose the governor indorses such bonds of a railroad company before twenty miles of its road are completed and equipped, or indorses the bonds at a rate greater than $16,000 per mile, are the bonds on that account void in the hands of a bona fide holder? Clearly not. The unbroken authority of cases decided by the supreme court of the United States is to the effect that such bonds are valid. Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 539; Mercer Co. v. Hackett, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 83; Meyer v. Muscatine, Id. 384. In the case last cited the supreme court says, "that if the legal authority was sufficiently comprehensive, a bona fide holder for value has the right to presume that all precedent requirements have been complied with." See, also, Grand Chute v. Winegur, 15 Wall. [52 U. S.] 355.

But do these authorities cover the case where an indorsement is authorized of first mortgage bonds, and the governor indorses bonds of a railroad company whose property is subject to a prior mortgage? After some hesitation I have come to the conclusion that they do. Unquestionably the duty is imposed on the governor by the internal improvement act, as subsequently amended (Acts 1866, 1867, p. 636), to decide whether the conditions precedent to the indorsement have been complied with. "When any railroad company," says the law, "shall have finished, completed and equipped twenty continuous miles of road, it shall be the duty of the governor, and he is hereby required, to indorse on the part of the state the first mortgage bonds of said railroad company to the extent of $16,000 per mile," etc. It is as much his duty to ascertain that the bonds to be indorsed by him are first mortgage bonds, as it is to ascertain that twenty miles of the railroad have been completed and equipped. These conditions stand on precisely the same ground, namely, that the security of the state for its indorsement may be sufficient. The law not only makes it the duty, but gives the governor the authority to determine these facts, and having determined them, to indorse the bonds. The legal authority to make the indorsement is sufficiently comprehensive to include the indorsement of the bonds in question; and the governor having placed his indorsement upon the bonds and certified in the indorsement itself that it was made in pursuance of the act of the legislature, I think a bona fide holder has the right to presume that all precedent requirements have been complied with, and that there are no prior liens upon the railroad; and, so far as he is concerned, this presumption cannot be rebutted. But defendants say, that the holders of these bonds are bound to take notice of what is contained in the statutes of the state of Alabama, and that the act approved December 30, 1868 (Laws 1868, p. 497), entitled "An act to authorize the governor to indorse the bonds of the Montgomery & Eufaula Railroad Company, issued under the act of 19th of February, 1867," and its amendments, shows upon its face that the bonds of the railroad company were not first mortgage bonds. This act declares: "That the governor of this state be, and he is hereby, authorized to indorse the bonds of the Montgomery & Eufaula Railroad Company, to the extent authorized by the act to establish a system of internal improvements in the state of Alabama, passed and approved February 19, 1867, and the amendments made to said act, notwithstanding the indebtedness of said company to the state of Alabama for $30,000, and the mortgage made by said company to the state under the act approved 17th February, 1866. Provided, that all sums of money which have been heretofore advanced by the state of Alabama, by the indorsement of bonds hitherto, shall be reckoned and regarded as so much of the amount authorized to be extended to said road by the authority of this act." If this is a valid enactment, it covers completely any want of authority in the governor to indorse the bonds of the railroad company by reason of a prior mortgage. It is a ratification of his indorsement, and makes it good and valid in all respects; this is conceded. But the defendants say, it was not passed by the number of votes required by the constitution of the state for the passage of such an act, and that the journals of the legislature show the fact; that it is therefore null and void, and no law at all. If this position be true, what becomes of the claim, that the bondholders were bound to take notice of its contents? If it is no law, it is not constructive notice to anybody of anything. It is without effect, to all intents and purposes. It cannot be said that a bondholder in Europe or New York is bound by constructive notice of an act that never passed the legislature, but which by some mistake of the printer, or some one else, found its way among the published acts of the state. I am of opinion, therefore, that the bonds of the Montgomery & Eufaula Railroad Company in the hands of bona fide holders are valid, that the indorsement of the governor is valid, and that by said indorsement the state acquired a valid lien upon said railroad property, superior to all other liens, unless it be that of the South & North Alabama Railroad Company. Whether the lien of complainants is better than that of the South & North Railroad Company, it is not now necessary to decide.

I have noticed all the grounds of demurrer which go to the entire bill, and am of opinion that none of them are well taken, and the demurrer must therefore be overruled.

A question, raised by one of the grounds of demurrer and much discussed during the argument, was whether this court would, if the bill was sustained, appoint a receiver to take possession of the property of the defendant railroad company, according to the prayer of the bill. It seems to me that there can be but one answer to this question. It appears from the bill that a suit to foreclose the second mortgage, executed by the defendant railroad company, is now pending in the United States circuit court for the Southern district of Alabama; and that in that case the defendant Lane has been appointed receiver, that he has taken possession of all the mortgaged property, and is administering it under the order and directions of the court. If there are any adjudged cases which would authorize this court to interfere with the possession of a receiver appointed by another court having jurisdiction, and who is in actual possession of the property, they have never fallen under my observation. The authorities all sustain the contrary doctrine. Smith v. McIvèr, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 532; Williams v. Benedict, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 107; Wiswell v. Sampson, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 52; Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583; Chittenden v. Brewster, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 191; Mallett v. Dexter [Case No. 8,988]; Alabama & C. R. Co. v. Jones [Id. 127]; Memphis City v. Dean, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 64. These authorities show that a question, which is pending in one court of competent jurisdiction, cannot be raised and agitated in another court; much less can one court assume to take possession of and administer property which is in the possession of another court and in course of administration by it. Nor is the case for the appointment of a receiver by this court aided by the leave granted to complainants by a judge of the court, wherein the other suit is pending, to sue the receiver appointed in such other suit. It is clear the leave given did not contemplate such a proceeding as the removal of that receiver by this court. No court or judge would be authorized to grant such a leave ex parte, and thus dispose of valuable rights and advantages of other parties, without at least giving them their day in court.

There are no averments in the bill which would justify the court which appointed Lane receiver in removing him from his trust. And no matter what showing the complainants may be able to make as to the incompetency, unfitness, or dishonesty of the receiver, this court cannot act. That showing must be made to the court which appointed him, and it must be asked to remove him. If these complainants are not satisfied with the manner in which the suit and proceedings of Strang v. Railroad Co. [Case No. 13,523] are conducted in the United States circuit court for the Southern district of Alabama, they must become, if they can, parties to that suit, and make their complaints to that court. This court does not sit to revise or review the proceedings of that court. Any motion, therefore, to appoint a receiver in this case, while the property to be administered is in the possession of a receiver appointed by another court, must be overruled, and this court can entertain no motion to remove or otherwise interfere with a receiver appointed by another court.

I add a few words in regard to the relations which the two cases referred to bear to each other. That suit was commenced by the holders of second mortgage bonds. They did not see fit to make the holders of the first mortgage bonds parties, nor was it necessary for them to do so. Calv. Parties, 13, 14; Story, Eq. Pl. § 193. They have the right to proceed to a decree and sell the mortgaged property, but the sale must necessarily be made subject to the lien of the first mortgage bonds. The holders of these bonds are not parties, and can only be made parties by service of process or voluntary appearance. No general notice calling on them to present their claims will make them parties or bind them. If they were represented in the case by trustees, then a notice calling upon them to present their bonds before the master would be binding. But they are in no way represented in that suit. Their rights cannot therefore be affected by any decree in that case. Campbell v. Railroad Co. [Case No. 2,366]. They have the same right to commence suit on this mortgage as the holders of second mortgage bonds have on theirs. But as the latter have commenced their suit first, and have first obtained possession of the mortgaged property, the suit of the first mortgage bondholders cannot be allowed to interfere with the suit of the second mortgage bondholders. They can only interfere by being admitted as parties in that suit. When the suit of the second mortgage bondholders has ripened into a decree of sale and the property has been sold, the first mortgage holders may then proceed in their suit to subject the property again to sale to satisfy their lien. But not till the proceedings in the first suit have so resulted that the property is no longer in the possession of the court through its receiver, can any other court or parties interfere with it.

AFFIDAVIT TO HOLD TO BAIL.

The affidavit to an account for cash lent was "that the above account, as stated, is just and true, and that the plaintiff has not received any part, parcel, or satisfaction for the same;" but it does not say that the plaintiff had received no security.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) was of opinion that it was sufficient to hold the defendant to bail.

INSURANCE POLICY—FORFEITURE PROVISION—WAIVER.

1. It is a general rule that forfeitures are not favored, and that provisions in contracts for forfeitures are strictly construed.

2. These principles apply to forfeitures in policies of insurance for non-payment of premiums when due.

3. Forfeitures provided for in policies of insurance are for the benefit of the party insuring, and may be waived by such party.

[Cited in Masonic Mut. Ben. Ass'n v. Beck, 77 Ind. 206.]

4. Where subsequent to the accruing of a forfeiture under the conditions of a life policy for non-payment of premiums, the insurer, with knowledge of the facts, by its own acts, or those of its agents, recognizes the contract as still subsisting, and manifests an intent not to take advantage of the forfeiture, and does not act prior to the death of the assured indicating a purpose to claim a forfeiture, the court will be justified in finding a waiver of the forfeiture.

[Cited in Pendleton v. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co., 7 Fed. 178.]

5. In such cases, the liability of the insurer accrues on the death of the assured, and it is too late afterward to claim for the first time the benefit of a forfeiture.

On June 5, 1867, McPherson Young made application to H. S. Homans, general agent of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York for the Pacific coast, at the office of said company, in the city of San Francisco, for a policy of insurance on his life for $5,000, and said Homans delivered to him a memorandum of agreement in writing, bearing date on that day, acknowledging the receipt of "ninety-nine dollars and thirty cents, being the first one fourth annual premium on his application for a policy of in-insurance of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, for the sum of five thousand dollars, on the life of Mack P. Young, payable at 45, or death, and premiums paid up in ten years. Said policy of insurance to take effect and be in force from and after the date hereof, provided that said application shall be accepted by the company; but should the same be declined or rejected by the said company, then the full amount hereby paid will be returned to said applicant upon the production of this receipt." The application of said Young was transmitted by Homans to the defendant's office in New York by steamer, the time of passage at that time being from twenty-three to thirty days. The application having been accepted, a policy was duly made out, signed and sealed, and transmitted to said Homans at San Francisco, and was received by him on or about August 2, 1867. The policy bears date April 5, instead of June 5, the date of the foregoing receipt, and, consequently, the time of payment indicated by the two writings does not correspond. The policy recites the consideration to be $96.60 paid by Young, and of the quarter annual payment of a like amount on or before the sixth day of April, July, October and January in every year. The first quarter's premium, the receipt of which is acknowledged in said memorandum, and in said policy, was not in fact paid in cash, but the promissory note of said Young was given therefor, payable in sixty days, without grace, which note fell due August 4, 1867. The policy states that it is issued and accepted "upon the following express conditions and agreements," among which are: "Second—If the said premiums shall not be paid on or before the days above mentioned for the payment thereof, at the office of the company in the city of New York (unless otherwise expressly agreed in writing), or to agents, when they produce receipts signed by the president or secretary, then, in every such case, the said company shall not be liable for the payment of the sum assured, or any part thereof, and this policy shall cease and determine. Third—In every case, when this policy shall cease and determine, or become or be null and void, all payments there in shall be forfeited to this company." Attached to the policy were two regular receipts duly made and signed by the proper officers in New York, dated at New York, April 6, and July 6, 1867, respectively, with blanks to be countersigned by the agent for the Pacific coast, purporting to be for the premiums for the two quarters, commencing at their respective dates. These receipts, upon their arrival at San Francisco, were duly countersigned by said H. S. Homans, agent, stamped, and the stamps canceled with the San Francisco office canceling stamp on August 2, 1867, as the date of the canceling marks on said receipts show. On August 8, the following letter was addressed from the office of said defendant in San Francisco to said Young: "San Francisco, August 8, 1867. M. P. Young, Esq., Vallejo, Cal.—Dear Sir: Your policy of insurance with the Mutual Life Insurance Company has arrived. Please inform me whether I shall send it to you at Vallejo, or if you will call and get it when you are in the city? Respectfully yours, H. S. Homans, General Agent. Per R. W. Heath, Jr." Heath was a clerk in the said office under Homans, but whether said note was delivered to or received by said Young, or when or in what manner forwarded or when or in what manner it came to the possession of the plaintiff, the administrator, does not appear from the evidence. No notice of the acceptance of said application or of the issue or arrival of said policy is shown to have been delivered to or received by said Young. Nor was any demand made upon him for further payment, nor any receipt or notice requiring payment presented to him, and neither said note, nor any subsequent installment of premium, was in fact paid; said note was never surrendered or offered to be surrendered, but said note and said receipts are still in possession of said company. On August 21, 1867, said McPherson Young was shot with a pistol at Vallejo, and mortally wounded. On the next day he was transported to St. Mary's Hospital in San Francisco, where he was confined in bed from the time of his arrival till September 20, 1867, when he died from the effects of his wounds. From the time of the shooting till his death said Young was neither physically nor mentally competent to transact any matters of business. After the death of Young, but at what date does not appear, the said general agent wrote upon the back of the policy with pencil, the words "Cancel, dead," and sent the policy to the defendant in New York. The policy was canceled October 31, 1867, by tearing off the seal of the company and the signature of the president; cutting a square hole out of the body and writing upon the back in blue ink the words, "C. Oct. 31, 67, Homans." Shortly after the death of said Young, notice was duly given to the general agent, and payment demanded, but refused on the ground that the defendant was not liable. The plaintiff [James Young] is the administrator of deceased.

B. S. Brooks, for plaintiff.
McAllisters & Bergin, for defendant.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts). It is not denied that there was, in fact, a contract made. The receipt and memorandum given to the applicant, dated June 5, purports upon its face to insure him from its date, provided, only, that the application should be accepted by the defendant. It was accepted, and a policy in due form fully executed and sent to the San Francisco office to be delivered. These acts, it is conceded, constitute a contract.

But it is insisted that, although the memorandum of agreement of June 5 does not specify all the terms of the contract, it is implied that the policy shall be upon the usual terms embraced in the company's policies; that the acceptance was upon the terms of the policy, as it was actually prepared and executed, and that, under these terms, the policy became forfeited for non-payment of premiums, as required by one of its express conditions. The defendant claims that the note given for the first quarter's premium, not having been paid when due, a forfeiture resulted. If not, then, that a forfeiture accrued upon the non-payment of the second quarter's premium, which fell due on July 5, if the date of the policy, or on September 5, if the date of the receipt and memorandum of June 5 is to control.

The plaintiff insists that it is incompetent to show a non-payment of the note against the acknowledgment of the receipt of the money in the memorandum of June 5, and also in the policy, for the purpose of defeating the contract; that the note was accepted as payment, and the defendant is estopped from denying it for such a purpose. It was so expressly held in Insurance Co. v. Fennell, 49 Ill. 180. This, I suppose, is on the principle recognized by the authorities, that such acknowledgments are often to be regarded as presenting a double aspect—firstly, as a simple receipt for money; secondly, as constituting a part of a contract. In the first aspect, and for collateral purposes, such as the recovery of the money, the acknowledgments may be contradicted. In the second, and for the purpose of defeating the operation of the contract, they cannot be contradicted. These distinctions are discussed in Peck v. Vandenberg, 30 Cal. 23, and cases there cited; Ashley v. Vischer, 24 Cal. 322; Goit v. Insurance Co., 25 Barb. 192. But I shall not rest my decision on that ground.

The plaintiff further insists that, if there was a forfeiture it was waived by defendant. It is elementary law that forfeitures are not favored, and that provisions for forfeiture must be strictly construed. The authorities, also, hold that these principles are applicable to forfeitures in insurance policies; that the provisions for forfeiture are inserted for the benefit of the companies, and may be waived by them; and that courts will find a waiver upon slight evidence. See, among many cases, Ripley v. Aetna Ins. Co., 29 Barb. 557; Id., 30 N. Y. 136; Goit v. National Protection Ins. Co., 25 Barb. 189; Baker v. Union Life Ins. Co., 6 Rob. (N. Y.) 394; Boehen v. Williamsburgh City Ins. Co., 35 N. Y. 131; Bouton v. American Mut. Life Ins. Co., 25 Conn. 542; Pino v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co., 19 La. Ann. 214; Insurance Co. v. Webster, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 129.

Apply these principles to the facts of this case. The policy bears date April 5, and the receipts prepared by the company correspond with this date. The company, therefore, regarded the second quarter's premium as due July 6, and acted upon that idea, although the application was made, and the first memorandum, receipt and contract given on June 5. The promissory note given for the first quarter's premium being payable without grace, fell due August 4. It will be seen that the condition of the policy imposing a forfeiture required payment to be made "at the office of the company, in the city of New York, or to agents," when they produce receipts signed by the president or secretary, "unless otherwise expressly agreed in writing." There is no evidence in this case of its having been otherwise agreed in writing. It does not appear that the policy was received at the San Francisco office before the second of August. At or about the sixth of July the policy must have been in defendant's office in New York, which would give twenty-seven days to August 2 to make the passage to San Francisco. The defendant knew, at the time of dispatching the policy, that the second installment of premium had not been paid at the office in New York. It also knew that it could not be paid to its agents here, in accordance with the terms of the contract, so as to be obligatory upon defendant, for the reason that the only receipt duly signed, as specified in the policy, authorizing the payment to its agents, was attached to the policy, and would not reach San Francisco till the month of August, a month after it was due. The defendant did not expect payment at its office in New York City, or it would not have sent its receipt to its agent to enable him to receive payment. The defendant, then, by its officers in New York, transmitted the policy and receipts with knowledge that payments had not, and would not, be made at the office in New York, and that it could not be made elsewhere in the mode required by the terms of the contract for a month after due. Yet the policy was sent with an intent that it should be delivered, and payment received by its agent in San Francisco, although it knew that there must necessarily be a forfeiture upon the strict letter of the contract. Also, after the receipt of the policy at San Francisco, on the second of August, nearly a month after the second installment fell due, according to the terms of the policy, the defendant's agent, necessarily knowing that payment had not been made, stamped and countersigned the receipt, ready for delivery upon payment, thereby treating the agreement as still in force. Again, on the eighth of August, four days after the note given for the first quarter's premium fell due, and after default in payment, and necessarily with knowledge of non-payment of both the note and second installment, the agents of the defendant addressed to Young the note set out in the findings of facts.

This act, after the forfeiture, if any there was, had attached, recognizes the agreement as being still in force. The letter does not even demand payment, or refer to the fact of non-payment, or fix any time when the insured should call for the policy, or make payment. It simply notifies him that his policy has arrived, and asks whether it should be sent to him at Vallejo, or whether he would call and get it, when in the city, implying that it would be at his option to have it sent to him at once, or wait his convenience till he should come to the city, and be able to call for it. The defendant manifested no haste or anxiety upon the subject, for the policy was on hand from the second to the eighth of August at least, before the notice to Young was even written, and it does not appear when it was sent. It does not appear that this or any other notice reached him. No other act of the company is shown inconsistent with this action, or tending in the slightest degree to show an intention to insist upon a forfeiture till after the death of Young, when the policy was canceled October 31, payment of the loss having before been refused.

It could hardly have been expected that Young would call to make the second payment until notified whether the risk had been accepted, especially as there was ample time between June 5, when the application was made, and the fifth of September, the time when the next payment would have fallen due, had the date of the policy agreed with the date of the application, and the preliminary memorandum of agreement given to him by defendant's agent in San Francisco. It was, doubtless, supposed that notice of acceptance or rejection would be given before the note for the first quarter's premium would fall due. But however this may be, the several acts of the defendant, and all its acts, and the acts of its officers in relation to the matter shown to the court, which were performed subsequent to the accruing of the forfeiture, if any accrued, treat the agreement for insurance as still in force. They affirmatively indicate an intention not to insist upon a forfeiture, and had the accident and death not occurred, there can be no doubt, from the facts shown, that even as late as the death of Young, the premium would have been received and the policy delivered. In the case cited by counsel of Chipman against the same defendant, tried in this court a year ago, there was no act of any kind shown on the part of the company indicating an intention to waive the forfeiture, or in any way recognizing a subsisting contract. Whereas, in this case, all the acts of the company, after the forfeiture accrued and prior to Young's death, shown to the court, recognize the contract as still subsisting, and manifest an intention not to claim a forfeiture.

I think, upon the facts, the court must find a waiver of any forfeitures which had accrued, and that under the circumstances, after the death of the assured, it was too late, for the first time, to insist upon the forfeiture. Let the plaintiff have judgment for the amount of the policy, less one year's premiums, and interest from the time payment should have been made.

[The above judgment was reversed by the supreme court. 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 85.]

YOUNG v. The ORPHEUS.

LEWIS v. SAME.

[2 Cliff. 29.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1861.²

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — CONTRACT FOR SHIP MATERIALS.

A contract to furnish materials for the construction of a vessel, even where the same is built upon the shores of tide-waters, and designed for use upon the navigable waters of the sea, is not within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States courts.

[Cited in Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 556; Rodd v. Heartt, Id. 592; Doolittle v. Knobloch, 39 Fed. 40, 41; The Manhattan, 46 Fed. 799.]

[Appeals from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

Both suits were in rem to enforce on the ship Orpheus a lien arising under the law of the state, for materials furnished at the request of the builders, and in the construction of the vessel. On the 6th of August, 1855, Mitchell and Rice contracted with the claimants, in writing, to build the ship, or the hull, including all iron-work and joiner-work, and also to furnish masts, spars, and blocks, including iron-work on the same and to the rigging, but not including rigging or copper sheathing. She was to be of certain specified dimensions, and was to be launched and delivered to the claimants by December 15 of the same year. The price for the vessel was $45,000 equal to cash, in thirty days after she was launched and delivered to them in Boston. Of that sum $30,000 was to be advanced, "as the ship progressed, and was to be paid out for materials and labor used in her construction." All of the materials constituting the claims of the respective libellants were furnished by them before the launch of the ship to Mitchell and Rice, the builders, and for the purpose of being used in building the same. Sixteen thousand six hundred feet of the lumber furnished by one of the libellants, and one thousand feet furnished by the other, were not used in the building of the ship, but, remaining in the yard after she was launched, were subsequently sold by the assignee in insolvency of the builders. The ship was built at Chelsea, was launched in February, and in March following sailed on a voyage to San Francisco. The libels alleged that the materials and lumber were furnished on the credit of the ship; that by the laws of Massachusetts and of the United States the respective libellants had a lien upon the ship for the payment of the amount due, which in the first-named suit was alleged to be $2,478.84, and in the second $462.83. It was denied, in the answer, that the statements of the libels were true accounts of the claims for materials furnished in the constructing and launching of the ship. Certain other defences touching the merits of the controversy were also set up by the claimants, but the view of the case taken by the court renders it unnecessary to make mention of them. The answers further set forth that at the time the vessel was seized by the marshal she was in the custody of the sheriff of the county, by virtue of an attachment made by him under process issuing from the state court, and it was denied that the subject-matter of the suits was one within the admiralty jurisdiction. The district court sustained the objection to the jurisdiction arising from the alleged prior custody of the sheriff, and dismissed the libels. [Case No. 8,330.]

E. F. Hodges, for libellant.

Was there ever a lien upon the ship in favor of the libellant? He furnished lumber, materials, &c., "to construct the ship," "by virtue of a contract" with a "person employed to construct her," and "money is due" therefor. By the language of the state statute (chapter 231, Acts 1855), the lien existed. Hawes et al. had no lien on the ship. The statute lien is dissolved, unless a certificate, &c., is filed in the town clerk's office, &c., as per section 2, c. 231, Acts 1855; and they filed no certificate. Hawes et al.'s attachment gives no notice of their lien; for all that appears, it is an attachment in an action of contract, which would give way before a lien process. Certain Logs of Mahogany [Case No. 2,559]; Travis v. Bishop, 13 Metc. (Mass.) 304; Denney v. Lincoln, Id. 200; Buttrick v. Holden, Id. 355. The sheriff, by abandoning the ship, and having no keeper, lost his hold upon the property; it was then no longer in the custody of the law. The process of the state court was no longer operative, and another jurisdiction could be exercised. The attachment in the Hawes Case was dissolved by a bond, and the sheriff abandoned the ship, leaving her in the possession of the marshal. There was clearly, then, no jurisdiction on the part of the state court. The bond is, "to pay the judgment," not "to return the ship." The federal courts then took and had jurisdiction, by taking and holding possession of the rem. It must be remembered that the state court rendered judgment against Hawes et al. The Oliver Jordan [Case No. 10,503]. The respondents have stipulated in this case, and in so doing waived all objection to the jurisdiction. The case is governed by the decision and reasoning of the court in The Robert Fulton [Id. 11,890]; The Young Mechanic [Id. 18,180].

The federal courts have jurisdiction to enforce such a lien. Prior to the decision in The Jefferson v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 393, no doubt existed that the federal courts had jurisdiction over cases of admiralty liens, however those liens may have arisen, or whatever authority may have created them. The decision was followed by a repeal of the twelfth rule of admiralty practice, under which the country had for many years acted, and by the following cases: Roach v. Chapman, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 129; The Coerline [Case No. 2,944]; Morewood v. Enequist, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 494. These cases announce the following principles: That contracts for building ships are not necessarily maritime contracts, and therefore are not necessarily within the admiralty jurisdiction of this court; that the admiralty law will not raise or create a lien in favor of the man who has furnished materials for building a ship in the absence of any local law. These cases do not decide that when a lien has been fairly created upon a ship, the federal courts have not jurisdiction to enforce such lien after the course of courts of admiralty. Nor can any such decision be found here or in any country, where admiralty law has authority. Prior to the decision of The Jefferson v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 393, such liens had been enforced by the federal courts in many cases, and in every case where the question occurred the jurisdiction was recognized as undisputed. Since the abolition of the twelfth rule, and the decision in The Jefferson v. Beers, the courts have sustained libels (commenced before the abolition of the rule) to enforce liens created by the state laws. Tupper v. The St. Lawrence [Case No. 14,240]; The Richard Busted [Id. 11,764]. The federal courts have jurisdiction to enforce liens for the construction or repairs of ships, designed for navigating the high seas, however those liens may have been created. By the constitution, art. 3, § 2, the judicial power of the United States extends to cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The act of 1789, c. 20, § 9 [1 Stat. 76], confers upon the district court "exclusive original cognizance of all original causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." The act of 1845 [5 Stat. 726] extends the admiralty jurisdiction of the district courts to vessels of twenty tons' burden, at the time employed in commerce between ports of different states, upon the lakes and navigable waters between the same. A contract to furnish materials for the construction of a ship, being built upon the shores of tide-water, and designed for use upon the navigable waters of the sea, is a maritime contract, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, as these words are used in the constitution and acts of congress. The words "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," as employed by the state and judicial authorities of this country, have an import much wider than they had in England, at the time of the separation of the colonies from the mother country. They embrace nearly or quite as much as they did under the civil law. Read v. Hull of a New Brig [Case No. 11,609]; Purinton v. Hull of a New Ship [Id. 11,472]; The Sandwich [Id. 13,409]; The Young Mechanic [Id. 18,180]; Mar. Ord. tit. 2, art. 1; Davis v. New Brig [Case No. 3,643]. A contract to build a ship was always maritime ex vi termini, both in England and in those countries of Continental Europe governed by the civil law. The Jerusalem [Case No. 7,294]; Ross v. Walker, 2 Wils. 265. Some decisions have been made in this country, in which such contracts have been held not to be maritime; but it is believed they were either cases in rem, where no lien existed, and of course no jurisdiction in rem could be maintained, or they were contracts for the construction of vessels not designed for use upon waters over which the admiralty jurisdiction extends. De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776]; The Jerusalem [supra]; Parmlee v. The Charles Mears [Case No. 10,766]; Roach v. Chapman, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 129; Davis v. New Brig [Case No. 3,643]; Read v. Hull of a New Brig [supra]. The fact that a maritime lien exists upon a ship within the ebb and flow of the tide, gives this court jurisdiction, without reference to the authority under which the lien is created. It is admitted that a state legislature cannot give jurisdiction to a federal court. But it can create a right in a thing over which the federal court has, by other and legitimate authority, jurisdiction. The fact that the law creates a maritime lien upon the ship, out of the contract between the material man and the builder (the ship being for use upon waters within the admiralty jurisdiction), makes that contract itself maritime. The lien created by the statute of Massachusetts is a maritime lien. A maritime lien is a ius in re, as distinguished from a ius ad rem, and, as such, may be enforced in a court of admiralty. The Young Mechanic [supra].

E. H. Derby, for claimants.

The contract declared on is not a maritime contract, and the court will not take jurisdiction. It is a contract to be performed on land. It is for the plank furnished to a ship before launching, before she touched salt water. See Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 399. The statutes of a state cannot confer jurisdiction on the United States courts; they derive their jurisdiction from the constitution and laws of the United States, and in admiralty are confined to purely maritime contracts. Maguire v. Card, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 249; Allen v. Newberry, Id. 246. Jurisdiction in admiralty cases is restricted to the power possessed by congress to regulate commerce with foreign states, which does not extend to those internal concerns that are completely within a particular state, when they do not affect other states. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 194. In the case of Allen v. Newberry, a steamer bound for Illinois to other states took goods from port to port in Wisconsin. Held, that a suit in admiralty would not lie. See Roach v. Chapman, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 129. Any former dicta or decisions which seem to favor a contrary doctrine were overruled by this court in the case of Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 400. See, also, Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 343, and The Orleans v. Phœbus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 183. The duty of the courts of the United States is to take notice of the want of jurisdiction, even where it has been waived by the parties, and without waiting for an objection from either side, when the proceedings in the district court show a want of jurisdiction. Cutler v. Rae, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 731; The Bee [Case No. 1,219]. The twelfth rule last adopted does not protect the claim of the libellant. It protects only claims of a purely maritime character, such as for repairs of ships in domestic ports, to which a lien attaches by a state law. The change of rule twelfth, which omits the former license to proceed in rem, in case of domestic ships, for repairs and supplies, as under the old rule, but puts the rule in force from May, 1859, preserves the suit in rem in contracts purely maritime, as for repairs, but does not apply to contracts to be performed on land, as for building a ship. The case of Roach v. Chapman, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 129, is directly in point. A contract to build a ship is not a maritime contract. See Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 399. In Roach v. Chapman, the court say: "A contract for building a ship is clearly not a maritime contract." In the case of Morewood v. Enequist, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 494, the court say: "The court decided in that case (Ferry Co. v. Beers) that a contract to build a ship is not a maritime contract." The United States courts have no jurisdiction over this case, under that provision of the constitution which gives congress power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several states of the Union. The lien given rests upon an artificial structure, and depends upon a local statute, which must be strictly followed and construed. Greene v. Ely, 2 G. Greene (Iowa) 508; Lynch v. Cronan, 6 Gray, 532. The lien rests on two statutes of Massachusetts. Chapter 117, Rev. St., combined with chapter 231, Acts 1855. The prerequisites of these statutes have not been complied with. Acts 1855, c. 231, § 2, requires the claimant, within four days from the time that the vessel leaves the port where she was when the materials were delivered, to file a certificate with the town clerk. The seizure made by the marshal was invalid, and gives no jurisdiction to this court. Nor is it helped by the stipulation. A mechanic who proceeds under the lien law of New York against owners, for work done under contractors, cannot recover if nothing be due to the latter on their contract. Pike v. Irwin, 1 Sandf. (N. Y.) 14.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. It is insisted by the libellants that on this state of facts the federal courts have jurisdiction to enforce the lien under the state law. They in effect admit that to maintain that view of the case it is necessary to show that a contract to furnish materials for the construction of a ship is a maritime contract, and they accordingly submit the affirmative of that proposition, and insist that all such contracts are maritime, especially where the ship is to be built upon the shores of tidewaters, and is designed for use upon the navigable waters of the sea. Maritime contracts are such as relate to commerce and navigation, and unless a contract for the building of a ship is to be regarded as a maritime contract, it will hardly be contended that a contract to furnish the materials for the construction of the same can fall within that designation, as the latter is more strictly a contract made on land and to be performed on land than the former, and is certainly one stage further removed from any immediate and direct relation to commerce and navigation.

On the other hand, if it be admitted that a contract to build a ship is a maritime contract, it is difficult to say that a contract to furnish the materials for the construction of the same is not also of the same character, although its breach and even its performance may involve judicial inquiries into the business transactions of men, as well in the forests and mines, as in the manufactories and workshops of the country.

Consequently, wherever the question involved in the record has been considered, the decision has uniformly turned upon the solution of the inquiry, whether a contract for building a ship is or is not a maritime contract. The parties in this controversy have conducted the investigation in the same way, and very properly, because it is clear that if a contract for building a ship is not a maritime contract, then this court has no jurisdiction of the matters involved in the cases under consideration. Beyond question the supreme court is the ultimate tribunal, under the constitution of the United States, to construe both the constitutional grant of judicial power in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and the acts of congress regulating its exercise. Decisions of the supreme court, therefore, are final and conclusive upon the subject. Such a decision is an authority in this court, and of course will be followed even in cases where the present circuit judge is not able to yield his assent to the conclusion. Allowing the rule to be so, it is insisted by the claimants that the question involved in the controversy has been several times conclusively decided in that court, and they refer to the cases upon which they rely to support that proposition. But the libellants deny the proposition, and insist that no one of the cases referred to fully decides the point under consideration. Some care must be observed, under the circumstances, in examining those cases, and the more so, as two of the district courts, in respect to one of them, have come to opposite conclusions as to the proper construction to be given to the opinion of the court. Reference is made, in the first place, to the case of The Jefferson, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 393, in which the opinion of the court was given by Mr. Justice Catron. Recurring to the statement of the case, it will be seen that it was a libel filed by the assignees of the builders against a new steam ferry-boat, for a balance due the builders on account of work done and materials furnished in constructing the hull of the vessel. The builders contracted to build three ferry-boats at Keyport, in the state of New Jersey, but they built this one only, and they claimed a lien for the unpaid balance of the price.

Decree was entered in their favor in the court below, and the claimants appealed to the supreme court. When the cause came up for argument, the first point made for the claimants was, that a contract to build and complete a ship is not one within the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts, though it be intended to employ her in navigating the ocean, and even though the employer be a citizen or inhabitant of some other place or country than that in which the work is to be done. Direct issue was taken upon that proposition by the libellants, and the court say: "The only matter in controversy is whether the district courts have jurisdiction in admiralty to enforce liens for labor and materials furnished in constructing vessels to be employed in the navigation of waters to which the admiralty jurisdiction extends." Notice was taken in the argument of the fact that the state law in that case gave no lien in favor of the builder, but the main point urged for the claimants was that the building of a ship was purely a local matter in no way directly connected with maritime commerce.

Responding to that argument, the court say: "The admiralty jurisdiction, in cases of contract, depends primarily upon the nature of the contract, and is limited to contracts, claims, and services purely maritime, and touching rights and duties appertaining to commerce and navigation." Applying that rule to the case then under consideration, the court say: "So far from the contract being purely maritime, and touching rights and duties appertaining to navigation (on the ocean or elsewhere), it was a contract made on land to be performed on land." Effort is certainly required to misunderstand that language; but the court go further, and say, the wages of the shipwrights had no reference to a voyage to be performed. They had no interest or concern whatever in the vessel after she was delivered to the party for whom she was built, and they were bound to rely on their contract.

Looking at the whole case, I am of the opinion that the supreme court in that case decided, and intended to decide, that a contract for the building of a ship is not a maritime contract. Judge Wilson took the same view of the question in the case of The Revenue Cutter [Case No. 11,713]; but Judge Sprague, in the case of The Richard Busteed [Id. 11,764], held that a contract for the building of a sea-going vessel was maritime, and came to the conclusion that the contrary opinion, expressed in the Case of The Jefferson, might be regarded as the reasoning or dictum of the judge who delivered the opinion. Since the last-named case was decided, the same question has more than once come before the supreme court, and on every occasion the decision has been that such contracts are not maritime. Such was the view of the court in the case of Roach v. Chapman, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 129, where the opinion of the court was given by Mr. Justice Grier. Proceedings had been instituted in the district court for the Eastern district of Louisiana, in that case against the steamer Capitol, to enforce a lien for a part of the price of the engine and boilers, which had been furnished at Louisville, in the state of Kentucky, where she was built. Libellants claimed a lien under the general admiralty law and under the law of the state. Plea was filed to the jurisdiction of the court, and the court say, a contract for building a ship or supplying engines, timber, or other material for her construction, is clearly not a maritime contract, and that any former dicta or decisions which seemed to favor a contrary doctrine were overruled by this court in the case of The Jefferson, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 400. During the same session of the court, the same question was again presented in the case of Morewood v. Enequist, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 494, and was again decided in the same way. On that occasion the court, after referring to the Case of The Jefferson, go on to say that the court decided in that case that a contract to build a ship is not a maritime contract; and though in countries governed by the civil law, courts of admiralty may have taken jurisdiction of such contracts, yet that in this country they are purely local, and governed by state laws, and should be enforced by the state tribunals. Regarding these decisions as authority in this court, it is not possible to sustain the views of the libellants in these cases.

Contracts for repairs and supplies are maritime contracts, and it is for that reason that libels for such claims, if furnished to a foreign ship or for a ship in a foreign port, may be filed against the ship and freight in rem, or against the master or owner in personam. Libels in rem in such cases are based upon a maritime lien, which arises as an implication of law. Such implication, however, does not arise in cases of domestic ships, but under the old admiralty rule the like proceeding in rem was allowed in such cases where a lien was given by the local law. Suits in personam may still be prosecuted in such cases under the new admiralty rule, but not in rem, as under the previous rule.

Pending cases or such as were brought before the 1st of May, 1854, when the new rule went into operation, are unaffected by the repeal of the old rule. The St. Lawrence, 1 Black. [66 U. S.] 522. Explanations touching the repeal of that rule and the effect of that repeal are so fully given in the case last referred to, that it seems unnecessary to say more upon the subject, especially as neither the old nor new rule has any application to the case under consideration.

It was suggested at the argument that the objection to the jurisdiction had been waived, but it is the settled doctrine of the federal courts that consent cannot give jurisdiction, nor can the objection be waived. Cutler v. Rae, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 731. Having come to the conclusion that the objection to the jurisdiction of the court must prevail, it is unnecessary to examine the other question. The respective decrees of the district court dismissing the libels are affirmed, but without costs.

SPECIAL BAIL.

In an action upon the case for selling negroes out of the neighborhood contrary to agreement, the defendant will not be held to special bail, upon an affidavit stating the breach of the agreement, and the belief of the plaintiff that he has sustained damage to a certain amount.

This was an action upon the case upon a special contract of sale of slaves by the plaintiff to the defendant, in which the defendant promised not to sell them out of the neighborhood, &c., whereby the plaintiff was induced to sell them for less money; but the defendant sold them, &c., contrary to his agreement.

The affidavit stated that the plaintiff "believes" he could have sold them for four hundred dollars more than he got for them from the defendant if he had sold them unconditionally, and "considers" that he has sustained damage in the sum of four hundred dollars.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, doubting) permitted the defendant to appear without special bail.

EQUITY SUIT FOR LAND—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINANT'S TITLE—EQUITABLE CLAIM.

1. Where complainants in a bill in equity to recover lands of which the defendants were in possession, claimed only an equitable title thereto, and did not set up any facts tending to show that the defendants were in any way affected by their equity, held, that the bill could not be maintained.

[Cited in Lamb v. Farrell, 21 Fed. 12.]

2. The bare fact that parties who hold an equitable title to land cannot sue at law, does not give a court of equity jurisdiction.

[Cited in Fussell v. Gregg, 113 U. S. 554, 5 Sup. Ct. 633.]

3. The remedy of parties so situated is first to obtain the legal title, and then bring their action at law against the parties in possession of their land.

[Bill by John S. Young against James Porter.] Heard upon demurrer to the bill for want of equity.

D. E. Thomas, for complainants, cited Jackson v. Morse, 16 Johns. 197; Bogert v. Perry, 17 Johns. 350; Fenn v. Holme, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 481; Tyler, 43, 44.

A. J. Peeler, for defendants, cited Orton v. Smith, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 263; Herrington v. Williams, 31 Tex. 448.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. The bill in this case is filed to recover 640 acres of land, of which the defendants are in possession. The complainants admit that they have not the legal title to the land, but they claim the equitable title; and it is because they have only the equitable title, and cannot maintain an action at law, that they come into a court of equity. They do not state that the defendants have the legal title or that they obtained possession under any person who had it. They do not state any facts going to show that the defendants are in the least affected by the equity which they, the complainants, set up. They only state that the defendants have wrongfully possessed themselves of the land, and are cutting timber and committing other waste thereon. The bill is, in fact, a mere ejectment bill, the only pretense for bringing which in a court of equity is that the complainants cannot maintain an action at law.

We entirely agree with the complainants' counsel in the proposition that the complainants could not maintain an action at law for the recovery of the land. But that does not prove that they can maintain a suit in equity for that purpose. They cannot maintain a suit which is the equivalent of an ejectment, merely because their title is only an equitable one. They must show that the defendants inequitably withhold the possession from them before they can do this. They must show some connection between the defendants and themselves. If the defendants had procured the legal title with notice of the complainants' equities, or were in any other respect guilty of fraud or want of equity towards the complainants in detaining the possession from them, then the latter might probably come into equity for relief. But they have not shown any such state of things. The complainants ask: If we cannot proceed either at law or in equity, what shall we do? The answer is plain: They must first take those proceedings against Alberty or his representatives or assigns which are necessary to obtain the legal title; and having obtained that, then they can bring trespass to try title against the defendants. If they say they cannot find Alberty, they must take those proceedings which the law gives to bring him into court by advertisement, or other constructive service. At all events, a suit in chancery cannot be maintained against the defendants, unless something more is shown against them than is shown in this bill. The bill must be dismissed.

YOUNG v. POTT.

[4 Wash. C. C. 521.]¹

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1825.

CROSS BILL FOR DISCOVERY—JURISDICTIONAL FACTS.

After the cause on the original bill was set for hearing, the defendant was informed that the plaintiff was a nominal one, and that the real plaintiff was a citizen of the same state with the defendant. He immediately filed a cross bill charging this and asking a discovery. The original suit ought not to be heard until the cross bill is answered.

The bill states that the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement for a purchase, by the former, from the latter, of a certain tract of land, for which he was to receive a good title, and was to pay a certain sum by instalments. That the plaintiff was put into possession, but the defendant having refused to convey the land according to his contract, and having brought an ejectment against the plaintiff to recover the land, which was removed from the state court to this, he prays for a specific performance, and for an injunction. No injunction was applied for or granted. The defendant filed his answer in January last, and now, at this court, he filed also a cross bill; stating, that he had been informed that, before the filing of the original bill, the plaintiff had conveyed and assigned all his interest in the premises to a citizen of this state, and that the suit is carried on in the plaintiff's name, in order to give jurisdiction to this court, and praying for a discovery.

Mr. Rawle, for plaintiff, in the original bill, contended that the original cause, standing ready for hearing, should be brought on before an answer is filed to the cross bill.

Mr. Sergeant, for defendant.

BY THE COURT. The cross bill having been filed within a short time after the plaintiff in it had received information of the matter to which it relates, the original cause ought not to be heard until the answer is filed to the cross bill, particularly as the prayer of it is for a discovery of matter going to show, if true, that this court has not jurisdiction of the principal cause.

THE COURT having, during the present term, granted a writ of estrepment in the ejectment cause, refused, on the motion of the defendant in that cause, to discharge the writ in the present state of the equity causes. Unless the plaintiff should succeed on the equity side of the court in obtaining a decree for a conveyance, the defendant must inevitably obtain a judgment at law in the ejectment cause. Until that is decided, it is proper to prevent the commission of waste by the party in possession.

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri. March, 1875.

BANKRUPT ACT—DISCHARGE—DEATH OF BANKRUPT.

1. After the final discharge of a bankrupt is granted, there is a strong, if not conclusive presumption that the final oath required by section 29 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 531)] was duly taken. This presumption is not overcome by the mere fact that such oath is not upon the files.

2. Where the bankrupt died after his uncontested application for a discharge had been submitted to the court and a favorable report of the master had been made, the court has power to order the discharge to be entered nunc pro tunc as of the date when the master's report was first filed.

3. Effect of the death of the bankrupt on pending proceedings in bankruptcy, considered.

Petition [by William Young and others] for review under section 2 of the bankrupt act. William Ridenbaugh was thrown into bankruptcy in 1870. The case went through all the stages of bankruptcy proceedings. In April, 1874, the bankrupt regularly applied to be discharged. In September, 1874, his application for a discharge, not being contested, was submitted to the court, and referred to the auditor as master, who, on the 17th day of October, 1874, reported to the court that the bankrupt had complied with the law, taken the final oath, and was entitled to his discharge. The court ordered the discharge. On the 18th day of October, 1874, the bankrupt died. No final oath now appears among the papers. The discharge was not entered of record until the 22d of October, 1874. When the order for discharge was made, whether before or after Ridenbaugh's death, did not exactly appear. Creditors who had proved debts in bankruptcy, sought, by petition in the district court, to set aside the discharge on the ground that no final oath was ever taken by the bankrupt. The court refused to set aside the discharge, and ordered a new certificate to be issued as of October 17, 1874. To review and reverse this order, the creditors bring the present petition for review, making Ridenbaugh's administrator defendant therein. The case was submitted to the circuit judge upon the facts in the opinion of the district judge, a synopsis of which is above given.

Johnson & Botsford and Lee & Adams, for creditors.

Henry Flanagan, contra.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The order of the district court complained of must be affirmed. If it be admitted that in no case, not even in the death of an adjudicated bankrupt, can a discharge be granted unless the oath required by section 29 has been taken and subscribed, still, it does not appear from the record or from any fact found by the district court that the deceased bankrupt did not take and subscribe the final oath. On the 17th day of October the auditor, as master, reported specially that the bankrupt had filed the oath required by section 29, and was entitled to a discharge and the court indorsed on this report an order for the bankrupt's discharge, and the discharge was entered of record October 22d, and on that date the certificate thereof was issued. The mere fact that the oath required to be subscribed by the bankrupt is not among the files, does not satisfactorily show that it was not taken and is not sufficient to overcome the contrary presumption arising from the report of the auditor and the order of the court for a discharge. The court below does not find, as a fact, that the oath was not taken. Whether the presumption arising from the order granting a discharge that the final oath was taken is a conclusive one, I need not inquire. Conceding that, in a proceeding of this kind, the presumption is a disputable one, it is not overcome by the record now presented to me.

There is no error appearing of record in the action of the district court ordering a new certificate to be issued as of the day when the auditor's report was filed. The case had gone through all the stages prescribed by the bankrupt act. In May, 1870, a creditor's petition was filed, a warrant issued, and subsequently an adjudication was entered. On April 24, 1874, the bankrupt filed a petition for his discharge, notice was given, and on the 12th day of September, 1874, no objection to the discharge being made by the creditors, his application was submitted to the court, and referred to the auditor, who, on the 17th day of October, reported that the bankrupt had, in all things, conformed to the bankrupt act. Whether the order for the discharge was then made or was made at some time between that day and the 22d of October, does not precisely appear and is not material. On the 18th day of October the bankrupt died. If the order was made before his death the record and the certificate should be changed to conform to the fact. If made after the 18th of October, still, as the application had been fully submitted and was under advisement and the delay was the delay of the court and not of the party, the court had the power to order the discharge to be made as of a date when the bankrupt was in life; and this, whether the proceeding be regarded as legal, or equitable, or strictly statutory in its nature. The authorities leave this point in no possible doubt. Broom, Leg. Max. 123; Miles v. Williams, 9 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 47; 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1027; Campbell v. Messier, 4 Johns. Ch. 334. The result is that the order of the district court must be affirmed.

Other considerations not pressed by counsel, growing out of the nature and purposes of the bankrupt law, lead to the same conclusion and may be briefly mentioned. When a debtor is adjudicated a bankrupt and a conveyance of his property is made to the assignee, it is to be administered by the court under the bankrupt law for the benefit of all his creditors who shall make proof of their debts. Everything relates back to the commencement of the proceeding in bankruptcy, and the bankrupt who surrenders his property and complies with the act is entitled to his discharge. To the creditor, the law gives the benefit of an equal participation in all the assets or property of the debtor, except what is exempted. To the debtor, it gives the benefit of a discharge from his debts if he makes an honest surrender of his property. Debts afterwards created and property afterwards acquired do not come within the bankruptcy; as to these, debtor opens a new book, and commences a new career, subject to his discharge being eventually obtained. Suppose after proceedings in bankruptcy are begun, the debtor dies; what is the effect of his death? Does the proceeding abate or go on? If it abates then the estate must be taken from the bankruptcy court and be administered in the probate or proper state tribunal and creditors must there establish their claims. If, however, the proceeding in bankruptcy continues notwithstanding the death of the debtor, the bankruptcy court must retain the custody of the property and make distribution of its proceeds to those entitled. It is, therefore, material to have settled the effect of the death of the debtor on a pending proceeding in bankruptcy against him. Troughton & Gitley, Amb. 630. By statute (6 Geo. IV. c. 16, § 26) no commission of bankruptcy abates by the death of the bankrupt after adjudication, but, if he die before adjudication, the commission cannot proceed. Ex parte Beale, 2 Ves. & B. 29; Ex parte Green, 1 Deac. & C. 230; Ex parte Dewdney, 15 Ves. 494. And so by 12 and 13 Vict. c. 106, § 116.

This matter is regulated here by section 12 of our bankrupt act, which provides that, "if the debtor dies after the issuing of the warrant (against the estate of the debtor) the proceedings may be continued and concluded in like manner as if he lived." That is to say, the death of the debtor after the bankruptcy court has issued its warrant to seize his property shall not have the effect to abate the proceeding. "A bankrupt or insolvent law viewed as operating on the rights of creditors is a system of remedy; it takes out of the hands of the creditors the ordinary remedial processes, and suspends the ordinary rights, which by law belonged to creditors, and substitutes in their place a new and comprehensive remedy designed for the common benefit of all." Mr. Justice Curtis, in Betton v. Valentine [Case No. 1,370]. And it is in this sense that an adjudication of bankruptcy has been said to be "a statute execution for all the creditors," and hence does not abate by the death of the bankrupt. In re Foster [Id. 4,960]; Hill, Bankr. § 16, and cases cited.

It appears that the creditors of the bankrupt who in the case before me are seeking to have the discharge set aside, proved their debts in bankruptcy. The effect of this is declared by the twenty-first section of the act, to be that they shall not be "allowed to maintain any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, but shall be deemed to have waived all right of action and suit against the bankrupt." The 7th section of the act of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 179], amending section twenty-one, does not affect the case under consideration, even if it retroacts so as to apply to it. But here, the discharge has not been refused, nor within the meaning of the amendment have the proceedings been determined without a discharge.

These creditors state in their petition that their object in seeking to set aside the discharge is that it stands as an impediment to the proof of their demands against the estate of the debtor in the hands of his administrator. They have participated in all of the estate in bankruptcy, and now seek to prove their debts against the estate acquired after the bankruptcy in the hands of the administrator, and to come in on a footing with creditors who became such after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. This, in my judgment, they cannot do, in a case where if the bankrupt had lived he would have been entitled to a discharge from the debts of the petitioners, and they cannot, as I am inclined to think, successfully object to such a discharge on the sole ground that the final oath required by section twenty-nine of the act has not been taken. Notwithstanding the death, the proceedings are to be "continued and concluded" in the same manner as if the debtor had lived, and with the like effect. Section 12. The death dispenses with the necessity of the final oath, and the discharge, if, indeed, a formal discharge in such a case is necessary, may be entered as of a time when the bankrupt was in life. Affirmed.

NOTE. As to the power of the court to enter orders and judgment nunc pro tunc, notwithstanding the death of a party, see Freem. Judgm. 34. If one party to an action die, during a curia advisari vult, judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc, for the delay is the act of the court and therefore neither party should suffer. Broom, Leg. Max. 123; 1 Strange, 426. In Miles v. Williams, 9 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 47, demurrers were set for argument in Trinity term, 1844, but were not argued until May, 1845, when judgment was given on them for the plaintiff. The plaintiff having died in March, 1845, the court made absolute an order to enter judgment as of Trinity term, 1844, on the ground that the issues of law had been delayed by the act of the court through press of business, until the plaintiffs' death. In Blewett v. Tregonning, 4 Adol. & E. 1002, judgment was entered in May, 1835, upon a verdict for the plaintiff, which was rendered in the spring of 1834. A like entry was made in Evans v. Rees, 12 Adol. & E. 167, in 1840 on a verdict rendered in 1839, the judgment to be of Trinity term, 1839; the party in whose favor it was entered having died after verdict, but before judgment. The practice in chancery is the same. 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1027. The American cases recognize and adopt the English practice. In Campbell v. Mesier, 4 Johns. Ch. 334, the case was submitted on the 26th of November, 1819, after which, but before decree, Mesier died. In 1820, the chancellor pronounced his decree, but ordered it to be entered as of November 26, 1819, the day of submission. In Wood v. Keyes, 6 Paige, 478, the cause was heard and submitted on the 20th of April 1836. In the meantime, and before decree, the cestui que trust died. Decree for complainant was rendered on May 2, 1837, but the chancellor directed it to be entered as of April 20, 1836. Hess v. Cole, 3 Zabriskie (23 N. J. Law), 116, is to the same effect. In Perry v. Wilson, 7 Mass. 393, the case was submitted to the court at the May term, 1810; final decision was rendered at May term, 1811, before that the defendant had died. Upon this fact being suggested to the court, judgment was rendered as of the preceding term in May, the chief justice remarking, "that when action was delayed for the convenience of the court, they would always take care that no party should suffer by such delay." When the plaintiff was non-suited at the trial, and applied for a new trial, and died while the motion was under advisement, the defendant was permitted to enter judgment as of the term succeeding the non-suit, the plaintiff being then in full life. Spalding v. Congdon, 18 Wend. 543; Bank of United States v. Weissiger, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 481; Clay v. Smith, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 411; Vroom v. Ditmas, 5 Paige, 528; Pool v. Loomis, 5 Ark. 110.

District Court, D. South Carolina. June, 1806.

PRIZE—CONDEMNATION AND SALE—RESTITUTION.

Property purchased at a provisional sale at Barracoa, afterwards confirmed by sentence of condemnation of the constituted authority at Guadaloupe, is not liable to restitution in a suit in personam against the purchaser's consignee.

BEE, District Judge. This is a suit in personam against Tavel, to recover the value of twenty hogsheads and eighteen barrels of sugar, and a large parcel of logwood; part of the cargo of the schooner Enterprize, belonging to the libellants. The libel states that this vessel was captured on the high seas by two French privateers, and carried into Barracoa, where the said articles were taken out of the Enterprize, put on board the brig Lear belonging to the defendant, and brought from Barracoa to Charleston, where they were landed. The libel prays that they may be restored. Tavel's claim and answer admits the capture of said schooner by two French privateers duly authorized to seize all vessels trading with the revolted negroes of St. Domingo; it admits also that she was sold at Barracoa with her cargo, by order of the agent of the government of Guadaloupe then residing at Barracoa. It states that the sale was provisional, and the money ordered to be deposited, to abide the definitive sentence of the government of Guadaloupe. This was afterwards obtained, and a copy of it, marked B, is filed with the answer. The defendant says he was unapprised that the sugar and logwood mentioned in the libel were part of the said cargo, but admits that he received twenty-nine hogsheads and sixteen barrels of sugar from his agent at Barracoa, which were shipped on board the brig Lear, on account of the proceeds of a shipment made by him to Barracoa. The claimant pleads the decree of condemnation and sale of said articles in bar to the jurisdiction of this court; and insists that no compensation should be granted, because the proceedings are in personam, not in rem, and that any sum the court might award would be in nature of damages, which ought to be grounded on some tort or wilful trespass, which he cannot have committed, as he was a bona fide purchaser of the property in question.

It was argued by the counsel for the libellants, that: 1st. The property is fully proved. 2d. That the trade to St. Domingo was lawful at the time of this capture, and that therefore the decree of condemnation at Guadaloupe was void. 3d. That in the case of Rose v. Himely [Case No. 12,045], the decree was declared void, as being founded on an ex post facto law; and that the present decree, being founded in error, is also void. 4th. That as the goods were not of a perishable nature, the sale was contrary to an arrêté. 5th. That the definitive sentence against the vessel is only by implication extended to the goods, and therefore void as to them. 6th. That by a determination of the supreme court of the United States, sentence of a foreign court does not decide the question of property. Lastly. That the proof offered of the sentence at Guadaloupe is not duly authenticated.

For the respondent it was said, that this case is similar to one formerly determined in favour of the same party, except that this is a suit in personam, and no restitution can be decreed; but damages only as for a tort or trespass, which is not pretended. That the agent at Barracoa was a purchaser in market overt, and the answer states, that the property received from that place was in return for a cargo shipped from hence in the same brig. That the provisional sale was lawful and regular, and the purchase at it equally so, though the money arising from said sale was retained till condemnation should take place. That even if the decree at Guadaloupe had been different from what it was, still this purchase in market overt would have been valid: the claimant being bound to recur to the money deposited, and not to the goods in the hands of a fair purchaser. But as the decree of condemnation actually took place, it must be considered as final; that it is certified in the usual form, and takes away all pretence for a suit here.

The principal points that occur in this case have already been investigated by me in the case of Rose v. Himely [supra], which, however, differs from the present in some material respects. The sale there was made without any provisional order, and before any decree. The arrêté upon which the decree finally rested was, itself, issued after the capture of the vessel. Here, the property was sold by a provisional order, from a competent source, and the money retained to abide the final decree, which confirmed the sale.

It must also be recollected that this suit is in personam; every thing relative to the goods being out of the question. The only point now left for the decision of the court is, whether the respondent has done any act that subjects him to restitution. His answer states that the articles he imported were a consignment from his agent at Barracoa in return for a cargo shipped from hence; that they were purchased in market overt; that the sale was made by order of a competent jurisdiction, and was afterwards confirmed by the constituted authority at Guadaloupe. The only questions then for me to decide are: 1st. Whether this decree is sufficiently authenticated. 2d. Whether, under the circumstances of the case, it can be set aside. 3d. Whether the respondent has done any thing to subject him to a suit in personam.

The decree appears to me duly authenticated, and has every mark of being genuine; a witness has been produced who proves the signatures. I do not think that I am authorized to set it aside, for the property is condemned as belonging to enemies, under an arrêté of the governor of Guadaloupe; and I have already determined a question like this, as to the validity of a foreign sentence. Nothing appears to me to make the respondent liable to pay damages, or make restitution. I am of opinion, therefore, that the suit be dismissed with costs, and I decree accordingly.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — ACKNOWLEDGMENT — DESCRIPTION OF DEBT.

A declaration by the defendants to the marshal, at the time of serving the writ (which did not specify the cause of action, nor its amount,) that they would pay the debt if they were not arrested upon other judgments then existing against them, and compelled to clear out under the insolvent act, is not sufficient to take the case out of the act of limitations, although the defendants were not arrested upon other judgments; but if the cause of action and its amount were mentioned to them at the time of such declaration, it may be left to the jury, and if they should find that the promise referred to that particular cause of action, it would be sufficient in law to take the case out of the statute.

Assumpsit on a promissory note [by Young and Queen against Wetzell and Mills]. Plea, limitations. When arrested by the marshal, in this suit, and shown the writ, which did not designate the amount nor specify the cause of action, the defendants said to the marshal that they would pay the debt, if they were not arrested upon other judgments then existing against them, and compelled to clear out under the insolvent act. They have not been so arrested.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) instructed the jury, at the prayer of Mr. Key, for the defendant, that such acknowledgment was not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations. See the case of Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 351.

Mr. Woodward, the deputy-marshal, who served the writ, further testified that he had filed the note in the clerk's office, in this case, and he thinks he mentioned this note to them as the cause of action; he had no certain recollection that he did, but his impression is that he did.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) said that the evidence might be left to the jury; and if they should be of opinion that the promise to pay referred to this cause of action, that promise was sufficient in law to take the case out of the statute.

CHANGE OF TRUSTEES.

The trustee of a family settlement, in which infants are interested, may be changed by consent of the parties, upon a bill filed for that purpose only.

[Cited in brief in Davis v. Bessehl, 88 Mo. 442.]

This was bill in equity to change the trustee of a family settlement in which infants were interested, by consent of the parties. The sole object of the bill, and the whole relief prayed, was the change of the trustee, with the consent of the parties.

THE COURT, at first, had great doubt of its jurisdiction, in such a case, so as to discharge the present trustee from his obligation.

But Mr. C. Cox cited the following authorities, and THE COURT, in May, 1832, would have made a decree, but, as THE COURT required the new trustee to give security, because infants were interested, who could not consent, the decree was never signed.

ADMIRALTY—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—JOINER OF ACTIONS IN REM AND IN PERSONAM.

1. It is not competent to amend a joint libel against three vessels, by substituting the name of the owner of one vessel for the vessel, so as to change it from a libel in rem to one in personam.

2. A libel in rem cannot be changed into a libel in personam against the owner.

3. A joint action for collision cannot be maintained in rem against one vessel, and in personam against the owner of another.

[Cited in The Corsair, 145 U. S. 343, 12 Sup. Ct. 951.]

Libel for collision, by Frederick H. Blood, against the tug Young America, the schooner Home, and Francis R. P. Cottrell, owner of the scow Wilcox. Case came up on motion by the respondent Cottrell to dismiss the citation as to him, and to vacate the order allowing an amendment to the original libel upon which the citation was issued. The original libel was filed against the tug, schooner and scow, in rem, for an alleged joint liability for damages on account of a collision. The tug and schooner were arrested and bonded. The scow was not arrested, on account of her being and remaining out of the jurisdiction, and no appearance was entered or bond given on her account. In this state of the case, the libellant presented his petition, setting forth the foregoing facts, and alleging that the respondent Cottrell was owner of the scow at the time of the collision, and praying "that the said libel may be amended, and so far as concerns the said scow may be turned into a libel in personam, and that your said libellant may be permitted to proceed against the said Cottrell, as owner of said scow, instead of proceeding against the said scow herself, and that the said Cottrell may be cited," etc. The court at the time expressed serious doubts as to the regularity of such a proceeding, but finally, without a critical examination of the subject, made an order in accordance with the prayer of the petition. A citation having been issued and served on Cottrell, he now moves to dismiss the same, and to vacate the order amending the libel, and allowing the citation to issue.

F. H. Canfield, for the motion.

The amendment changes the form of action from one in rem to one in personam. The court has no power to allow such an amendment. Kynoch v. The S. C. Ives [Case No. 7,958]. See, also, The North Carolina, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 40; The John Jay [Case No. 7,352]; The Richard Doane [Id. 11,765]. The amendment is open to the further objection, that it works a complete change of parties, and is in fact the institution of a new suit. At common law, the rule is well settled that the court has no power to amend, by adding new parties, or by changing the form of action. Winslow v. Merrill, 11 Me. 127; Atkinson v. Clapp, 1 Wend. 71; Winn v. Averill, 24 Vt. 283; Emerson v. Wilson, 11 Vt. 357; Bowman v. Stowell, 21 Vt. 309; State v. Cook, 32 N. J. Law, 347. No case can be found sanctioning the practice attempted here, and the absence of authority is an argument against its adoption.

H. B. Brown, contra.

Any amendment is allowable in admiralty which does not change the cause of action. Improper parties may be stricken out. Newell v. Norton, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 257, 263. New ones may be added. The Commander in Chief, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 49. A libel may be turned into an information. U. S. v. Four Pieces of Cloth [Case No. 15,150]. See, also, Dunl. Adm. Prac. 87, 129, 213; 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 429, 431. An amendment was refused in Kynoch v. The S. C. Ives [supra], because an entire change in the nature and character of the action was proposed. See, also, 2 Conk. Adm. 258, 415; The Harmony [Case No. 6,081]; Davis v. Leslie [Id. 3,639]; Nevitt v. Clarke [Id. 10,138]; The Richard Doane [Id. 11,765]; The City of Paris [Id. 2,766]; The Henry Ewbank [Id. 6,376]. It is settled that a court of admiralty is governed by the same rules of practice as a court of equity. In equity the name of a plaintiff may be changed. 1 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 402, 404; Jennings v. Springs, 1 Bailey, Eq. 181. The amendment is in furtherance of justice, as it is more equitable that the owner should pay, than an innocent purchaser of the vessel. We might discontinue against the Wilcox, and file an original libel against her owner, setting forth that his vessel was in fault, and the court would order the causes to be tried together. What may be done indirectly may be done directly.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The question presented involves two considerations: 1. As a libel against the scow alone, could the court allow it to be changed by amendment from a libel in rem against the vessel to a libel in personam against the owner? 2. In case of a joint liability of two or more vessels for a collision, can a joint action be maintained in rem against one or more of the vessels, and in personam against the owners of the others?

First. Touching the first question, the counsel on either side have not referred the court to any reported or unreported decision in point; and after a pretty thorough investigation I am satisfied that none exists. This would seem to indicate that the matter is so well understood at the bar that the question has never been raised, or if it has, that it has not been considered by the courts of sufficient importance to demand the promulgation of an opinion. But upon which side of the question does this seeming acquiescence of court and bar bear? This question must be answered, if at all, by ascertaining what the courts have decided in cases involving principles lying at the foundation of the question under consideration. In several instances in England and in this country the questions have arisen in collision cases, as to the right to ingraft upon or blend with an action in rem a proceeding in personam for the recovery of a deficiency against the owner, where the proceeds of the vessel were not sufficient to meet the damages pronounced for; and also whether an action in rem against the vessel, and an action in personam against the owner, could be joined in the same libel. In the United States, however, the latter question was settled by a rule of the supreme court in 1845 (admiralty rule 15). Since that time the decisions in this country have all turned upon the construction of the rule, and therefore throw but little light upon the question, and will not be noticed.

The first case in England which has come to the notice of the court was The Triune, in 1834 (3 Hagg. Adm. 114). In this case Sir J. Nicholl granted a monition to the owner, who had intervened and bonded the vessel, to pay a deficiency, failing to do which he was imprisoned upon an attachment. When the motion was made, Sir J. Nicholl put this pertinent interrogatory to counsel: "Is there an instance of a warrant of arrest under circumstances such as are in this case, against the master and part owner?" The interrogatory does not appear to have been answered, but at a subsequent date he allowed the process to issue. The matter does not appear to have been discussed or very much considered, and altogether the report of the case is quite unsatisfactory. The question next arose in England in 1840, in the case of The Hope, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 155. In this case Dr. Lushington decided directly the contrary to Sir J. Nicholl in The Triune, and held that it was not competent for the court to ingraft upon a proceeding in rem a personal action against the owner to make good the excess of damage beyond the proceeds of the ship. His attention had not at that time been called to the decision of Sir J. Nicholl in The Triune. Subsequently, however, in the case of The Volant, in 1842 (1 W. Rob. Adm. 383), where the same question was again presented, his attention was called to Sir J. Nicholl's decision. Dr. Lushington then went over the subject quite fully, and finally disagreed entirely with Sir J. Nicholl, and fully adhered to his former opinion in the case of The Hope; and such appears to have been the settled doctrine in England ever since. In Citizens' Bank v. Nantucket Steamboat Co., in 1841 [Case No. 2,730], Judge Story held that in collision cases it was not competent to proceed in the same suit in rem against the vessel and in personam against the owner. And this appears to be the only reported case in which any question of this kind arose in the courts of the United States before the promulgation of rule 15. But we are not concerned here so much with the particular points decided in those cases as we are with the reasons upon which the decisions were founded. In the case of The Hope, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 155, Dr. Lushington held substantially that, looking to the general principles upon which the proceedings in admiralty are conducted, it was wholly incompetent to ingraft a proceeding in personam against the owner upon a proceeding in rem against the vessel for the recovery of a deficiency. Applying that declaration to the present question, it may be remarked that, if in view of those general principles, it is wholly incompetent for the recovery of a part of the damages only, that is, the excess of damages over value of vessel, for a still stronger reason it is incompetent to change the whole proceeding from one in rem to one in personam, in which the owner may be made liable for the whole damages without regard to the value of the vessel against which the libel was filed.

In the case of The Volant, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 383, Dr. Lushington says: "The jurisdiction of this court does not depend upon the existence of the ship, but upon the origin of the question to be decided, and the locality. Looking to a proceeding by the arrest of the vessel, it is clear that, if no appearance is given to the warrant arresting the ship, there can be no proceedings against the owners, for the court cannot know who the owners are; the court cannot exercise any power over persons not before the court and never personally cited to appear." That is to say, in a proceeding in rem, for a collision, in which the owners are never personally cited to appear, there is no process or proceeding by which the court can obtain jurisdiction of the owners, or know who they are, even in cases where the vessel has been arrested, other than by their voluntary appearance. This doctrine commends itself to my judgment, and, applied to the present case, it seems to me unanswerable. How can it be said that, in a case like the present, where the vessel has not been arrested even, and there has been no appearance, the court can change the proceeding in rem against the vessel to a proceeding in personam against the owner, of whom the court has acquired and can acquire no jurisdiction, and whom the court does not and cannot know, by virtue of any process or proceeding incident to the proceedings in rem? The allowance of the amendment making the change, on the petition of the libellant, necessarily involved a determination by the court of the fact as to who was the owner, thus giving judgment beforehand, in an ex parte proceeding, and in a proceeding in rem, as to an essential and traversable fact in actions in personam in like cases—a thing no court ever does wittingly, and which, having done, through inadvertence or for want of due consideration, will be at once undone on attention being called to it. In Citizens' Bank v. Nantucket Steamboat Co. [supra], Judge Story says: "In cases of collision the injured party may proceed in rem, or in personam, or successively in each way, until he has full satisfaction. But," he says, "I do not understand how the proceedings can be blended in the libel." And in another place, in the same opinion, he says: "In the course of the argument it was intimated that in libels of this sort the proceedings might be properly instituted both in rem against the steamboat, and in personam against the owners and master thereof. I ventured at the time to say that I knew of no principle or authority, in the general jurisprudence of courts of admiralty, which would justify such a joinder of proceedings, so very different in their nature and character and decretal effect. On the contrary, in this court, every practice of this sort has been constantly discountenanced as irregular and improper." It will be observed that the ground upon which the objection to joining the two proceedings in one libel was sustained by Judge Story was that the two are so very different in their nature and character and decretal effect. The same objection, as it seems to the court, applies with increased force to changing the one proceeding into the other by way of amendment. And besides that, there is what seems to the court the further unanswerable objection that such change involves an entire change of the party proceeded against. It is, in fact, the institution of a new suit by way of amendment, a proceeding never tolerated, I believe, in this or any court.

Second. The foregoing considerations, I think, are equally conclusive against joining in one suit proceedings in rem against the two vessels and in personam against the owner of the other. The original libel was brought against the three vessels, upon the theory, of course, that they were guilty of a joint tort. The action was joint as to the three. With the amendment, the action remains joint as to the two vessels which were arrested, but has necessarily become several as to the owner of the third, because, as an action in personam, it involves other and additional proof, and a different decree. The amendment has, therefore, wrought a palpable misjoinder of actions. But in the view taken as to the first point, it is unnecessary to elaborate this one further for present purposes. It results that the amendment was irregular, and therefore that the order allowing the same must be vacated, the amended libel taken from the files, and the citation be dismissed, with costs of the motion against the libellant. Motion granted.

The YOUNG AMERICA.

[1 Brown, Adm. 549.]¹

District Court, E. D. Michigan. Feb., 1875.

COLLISION—INSUFFICIENT MANNING—PRESUMPTION OF FAULT.

1. Where the master of a small tug was also acting as wheelsman and lookout, but it was clear this fact did not contribute to the collision, held, the tug was not thereby chargeable with a fault.

2. But where the master, even of a small scow, was acting as wheelsman and lookout, and the proofs left it doubtful whether this contributed to the collision, the scow was held liable.

This was a libel, by the same libellant, in rem against the tug Young America and scow Home, and in personam against Francis B. Cottrell, owner of the scow Wilcox, for the same collision, and the two causes were heard together. The collision occurred about noon on the 22d day of November, 1871, at the lower end of the new canal on St. Clair Flats, by the libellant's vessel, the scow Liberty, first bringing up against the lower end of the pier on the port side coming down, and the scow Wilcox running into her stern while she lay against the pier, causing injury to both her stem and stern. The scow Home was in tow of the tug coming down, and the other two vessels were under sail also coming down, the tug and Home ahead, the Liberty next, and the Wilcox in the rear.

[For prior proceedings, see Case No. 18,178.]

H. B. Brown, for libellant in both cases.
W. A. Moore, for the Young America.
John Atkinson, for the Home.
F. H. Canfield, for respondent Cottrell.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. I. The only faults charged against the tug are: First, casting off the line of the Home while still in the canal, and without any warning to the other vessels; and, second, want of necessary officers and crew. (1) The first charge is not only denied by the answer and not sustained by the proofs, but is unquestionably negated by the proofs. (2) The second charge is sustained by the proofs in this, that the master was acting as wheelsman, and there was no lookout man on duty. The Victor [Case No. 16,933], decided by this court July 29, 1873. But no liability can be attached to the tug on this account in this case, because it is clear from the proofs that this fault did not contribute to the collision, as will appear hereafter when considering the case of the other two vessels.

II. The only charge of fault against the Home was for paying off when her line was dropped by the tug so rapidly that the Liberty could not pass her, whereby the latter was caused to collide with the pier. This is clearly not sustained by the proofs. The Home did pay off, as a matter of fact, not in consequence, however, of her line being dropped by the tug, because her line had not then been dropped, but in consequence of a puff of wind driving her up on to the tug, and obliging her to pay off to avoid running into the latter. The same puff of wind drove the Liberty at the same time up alongside and to leeward of the Home. The vessels having the wind from the starboard and nearly a-beam, the sails of the Liberty were becalmed by the wind being taken from them by the sails of the Home, and in order to extricate her the helm was put to starboard, and other measures taken to make her pay off still more. At first she did not seem to mind her helm, but when she did she payed off very suddenly and very rapidly, and although strenuous efforts were made to bring her back on her course, she proved to be unmanageable, and kept on quite sharply across the channel, and ran against and collided with the pier near its lower extremity, on the port side coming down. She struck the pier at an angle of from two to three points from the line of the channel bank, and did considerable injury to her port bow. The proofs showed that there was ample room for her to have passed between the Home and the pier, and that she could and would have done so with safety, but for her bad steering qualities or some mismanagement on board of her, or perhaps both. There was, therefore, no case made out against the Home.

III. The allegations of fault against the Wilcox are: (1) No lookout; (2) not properly manned; (3) no proper precautions to avoid the Liberty; (4) not coming to windward far enough to avoid the Liberty.

The first and second allegations of fault are fully sustained by the proofs. There was no lookout man on duty, and the master was acting as wheelsman. These are positive faults for which, in case of collision, a vessel will in all cases be held responsible, unless it can be shown by the vessel so in fault, clearly and satisfactorily, that such faults did not contribute to the collision. This was not so shown in this case. The most that can be said is that it was left in doubt whether the Wilcox could or could not have avoided the Liberty after it became certain that the latter could not be brought back on her course, and was in danger of colliding with the pier, even if the former had had a lookout man on duty, and the master had been giving his undivided attention to the navigation of his vessel. The rule above alluded to applies especially to vessels navigating narrow channels, with other vessels ahead in the channel, and in their immediate vicinity, involving the risks of emergencies, as was the case here, requiring intelligent and prompt action on the part of the officer in command. The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443, 463; The Victor, supra. The case against the defendant Cottrell is therefore sustained.

IV. The only remaining question is whether the Liberty was herself free from fault. This must be held in the negative, for the same reasons and on the same grounds for which the Wilcox has been held liable. The libellant is therefore entitled to recover against the respondent Cottrell for a moiety only of the damages done to the stern of the Liberty. The damages done to the bow of the Liberty were done by her colliding with the pier, for which the Wilcox was in no manner responsible.

Libel against the Young America and the Home dismissed, with costs to claimants. Decree against Cottrell for a moiety of the damages occasioned by the injuries done to the stern of the Liberty by the collision, and referring it to a commission to ascertain and report the same. Costs reserved till the coming in of the commission's report. Ordered accordingly.

MARITIME LIEN—DOMESTIC VESSELS—LIEN FOR MATERIALS—INSOLVENCY AND DEATH OF OWNER—EFFECT.

1. A maritime lien is a jus in re, constituting an incumbrance on the property, and existing independent of the process used to execute it. It is not divested by the death of the owner of the vessel, and the representation, by his administrator, of the insolvency of his estate.

2. The statute of Maine conferred on mechanics and material-men, such a lien on domestic vessels, as the general admiralty law had previously allowed to them on foreign vessels.

[Cited in Perkins v. Pike, 42 Me. 149.]

This was an appeal from a decree of the district court in a suit in rem, to enforce payment of a claim for materials supplied by the libellant for building a vessel within the district of Maine. The decree was in favor of the libellant [Case No. 18,181], and the claimant appealed. It appeared that the person who was building the ship, upon a contract with whom the materials were supplied, had died before the institution of the suit, and his administrator had represented his estate to be insolvent, according to the local laws of the state. The only question made on the appeal was, whether the lien conferred by the local law, still subsisted and could be enforced in the admiralty, notwithstanding such death and representation of insolvency.

Mr. Shepley, for appellant.

Mr. Evans, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This being a domestic vessel, the lien, if any, is conferred by the local law. If by that law it exists, it may be enforced in the admiralty. If it has ceased to exist, it can be enforced nowhere. The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324. The Revised Statutes of Maine (chapter 125, § 35) give to those who perform labor, or furnish materials for or on account of any vessel building or undergoing repairs, "a lien on such vessel for his wages or materials." To decide the question now before me, it is necessary to determine what this statute intends to confer, on the laborer or material-man. Its terms must be construed with reference to its subject-matter; and, prima facie, the word "lien," here used, should bear the same signification which had been attached to it in the maritime law. Under that law, mechanics and material-men have a lien on foreign vessels for the price of their labor and materials; but not on domestic vessels. This statute grants them a lien on domestic vessels. It does not define the term "lien," nor in any manner describe the sense in which it was intended to be employed. Sound rules of construction require me to say, it was intended to be employed in the same sense in which it had been previously known and used; and that the right or interest which it designates, is the same right or interest which laborers and material-men had previously possessed in foreign vessels. Using a legal term, and applying it, to give to laborers and material-men some right in the vessels, for or on account of which their labor or materials are furnished, the presumption is, that this term was used in its known legal sense. This presumption may be removed by other provisions of the statute. I shall consider hereafter whether it is so in this instance. But I will first inquire what right or interest is conferred by the statute, provided it intended to create such a lien, as exists by the general admiralty law upon foreign vessels.

Though the nature of admiralty liens has doubtless been long understood, it does not seem to have been described with fulness and precision, in England or this country. That it differs from what is called by the same name in the common law, is clear; for it exists independent of possession. The Bold Buccleugh, 22 Eng. Law & Eq. 62; The Nestor [Case No. 10,126]. That it is not identical with equitable liens, is equally clear; for the latter arise out of constructive trusts, and are neither a jus ad rem, or a jus in re; but simply a duty, binding on the conscience of the owner of the thing, and which a court of equity will compel him specifically to perform. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1217; Ex parte Foster [Case No. 4,960]; Clarke v. Southwick [Id. 2,863].

It has been declared by very high authority, that what we term a "maritime lien," was derived by the maritime law from the civil law. In The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 443, Mr. Justice Story, delivering the opinion of the supreme court, and speaking of the lien of a material-man, says: "The general admiralty law, following the civil law, gives the party a lien on the ship for his security." And in The Nestor [supra], he expresses an opinion that the general maritime law was in this particular, drawn from the texts of the Roman law, with some modifications, to which he refers. In delivering the judgment of the court of appeal in the case of The Bold Buccleugh, above cited, Sir John Jervis also declares, in terms, that the rule as to the persistency of a maritime lien, is deduced from the civil law. And the same law is declared by Mr. Abbott to be the source of maritime liens, of material-men. Abb. Shipp. 143. But the right conferred by the Roman law upon those who lent money to build, or repair a vessel, was merely a personal privilege, to be paid in preference to general creditors. Poth. Pan. 20, 24, 26, note. Emerigon (Traité des Con. a la Grosse, c. 12, § 1) observes, that Kuricke has maintained that, such creditors had an absolute privilege and a legal hypothecation, by the Roman law; but that perhaps he had no other design than to adapt the texts he cites to modern usages. In a similar way, they are probably to be understood, who speak of the deduction of this right from the civil law. Not that any texts of the Roman law can be produced which confer upon those who now possess it, what we call a maritime lien, but that the commercial usages of the middle ages modified some of the rules of that law respecting hypothecations, and adapted them to the wants of commerce.

The texts of the Roman law on this subject, were doubtless used, and with some modifications afforded the rules which obtained in the maritime laws of Europe during the middle ages. The laws "Qui in navem extruendam, vel instruendam, credit, vel etiam eruendam, privilegium habet" (D. 42, 5, 26); and "Quod quis navis fabricandæ, vel emendæ, vel armandæ, vel instruendæ causa, vel quoquo modo crediderit, vel ob navem venditam petat, habet privilegium post fiscum" (D. 42, 5, 34); and "Interdum posterior potior est priori. Ut puta: Si in rem ipsam conservandam impensum est, quod sequens credit; veluti si navis fuit obligata, et ad armandam eam (rem) vel reficiendam ego credidero" (D. 20, 4, 5),—were probably then understood as conferring, not merely a personal privilege, to be paid in preference to other creditors on a sale of the debtor's goods, but as importing an actual hypothecation tacitly made by the law. Pothier, in his note to the law last cited (20, 4, 4), says the correct opinion is, that these laws do not create tacit hypothecations, as they were thought to do by Accorsius and some of the ancient commentators. Pardessus, in his note to the last cited law (1 Col. des Lois Mar. p. 113) and to the law de exercitoria (Id. p. 98, note 4), mentions the same difference between the received interpretation and that of the older writers. The suggestion of Emerigon respecting Kuricke, already quoted, may be applicable, in some measure, to all these old commentators; but whether the texts of the Roman law were misunderstood, and so were the sources of the existing usages, or whether it was only intended to adapt them to those usages which had already obtained, it is certain that in the general maritime law of Europe privileged hypothecations were tacitly conferred in the cases in which, what we term liens, now exist. It is true we do not find their precise nature described in any of the ancient collections of sea laws, so far as I have discovered. These laws were, generally, simple practical rules, often partaking of the rudeness of the ages in which they were compiled, dealing, rarely, with abstractions, containing few definitions, and, with the exception of the customs and ordinances of Catalonia and Arragon, collected by Pardessus in volume 5, p. 333, &c., they are not laws of procedure. In the Consulat de la Mer, the most ancient and important of all, there is no definition of a maritime lien, nor any account of the way in which it was to be worked out. Its usual formula is, simply, the ship ought to be sold, and the debt or damage paid from its price. And so when the personal liability of the master is ordained, it is only said, he ought to be put into the power of the magistrate. See chapter

289. But that the right or privilege of the seaman in the ship as a security for his wages (chapters 138, 193), of the merchant for injury or loss of his goods, &c. (chapters 59, 63, 106, 227, 254, 259), or for the price of his goods sold to raise money for the necessities of the ship (chapter 107), was a real right, a jus in re in contradistinction to a mere personal privilege to be paid in a course of creditors, I have no doubt. In the Laws of Wisbuy this is clearly shown. Emerigon (Con. a la Grosse, c. 12, § 4) and Boulay Paty (1 Cours de Droit Com. p. 38) translate the forty-fifth article of these laws respecting the right of a merchant whose goods have been sold to supply the necessities of the vessel, or who has lent money for the same purpose, "auront special hypothèque et suit le navire." See, also, 1 Pard. Col. des Lois Mar. 492, art. 43. Le Guidon (chapter 19, arts. 1, 2; Pardessus's Col. des Lois Mar. 424) denominates such a right "special hypothèque."

According to the modern civil law of the continent of Europe, movables cannot be hypothecated, and as vessels are movables, to term the privileges created by the maritime law, hypothecations, would introduce a seeming anomaly. Dom. Civ. Law, bk. 3, tit. 1, § 1, note 1655, &c.; Kaufman, Mackeld. Civ. Law, bk. 1, c. 6; 1 Boul. P. Dr. Com. p. 35; Emerig. Con. a la Grosse, c. 12, § 2. For this reason the French ordinance of 1681, after deciding (article 1) that vessels are movables, in article 2, instead of the term "hypothèque," uses the words "affecté aux dettes." Boulay Paty, in his elaborate dissertation on the maritime privileges of the French law, though he distinguishes between "affectés" and "hypothèques," points out no practical difference between them, save that the latter are paid in the order of their dates, while the former are paid according to their causes. And he describes the right of a lender on bottomry, as "privilege sur les choses affectés au pret," as does Pothier also. 1 Boul. P. Dr. Com. pp. 36, 328; Poth. Pret a la Grosse, note 9. There is no doubt that the maritime law of France at this day, following the long existing usages of the commercial world, tacitly creates what we term "liens," but what are called in their law "privileges;" which are, in effect, tacit hypothecations of the vessel. Domat, Civil Law (Cushing's Ed., note 1765, bk. 3, tit. 1, § 5), says: "All privileges make a particular appropriation, which gives to the creditor the thing for his pledge." Merlin (Rep. voc. "Privilege de Creance") a "privilege," properly speaking, is a privileged hypothecation, distinguished by the name of "privilege" on account of the different causes from which they spring. See, also, Pard. Droit Commer. Pat. 5, tit. 1, c. 6, note 1190; and Toulier, liv. 3, tit. 3, c. 5, note 98. Emerigon, after giving the texts of the Roman law, already cited, says: "We have adapted to our own usages the texts just cited, as will be presently seen. The personal privilege of which the Roman law speaks is unknown in our jurisprudence. Every privilege imports, per se, a tacit and privileged hypothecation upon the thing which is the subject of it." In the law of Scotland such a right is termed "hypothec," and is, professedly, what was known to the Roman law as "hypotheca." Ersk. Prin. bk. 3, tit. 1, § 13.

In my opinion the definition given by Pothier of an hypothecation is an accurate description of a maritime lien under our law. "The right which a creditor has in a thing of another, which right consists in the power to cause that thing to be sold, in order to have the debt paid out of the price. This is a right in the thing, a jus in re." Traité de l'Hypothèque, art. prelim. See, also, Saund. Justinian, p. 227. It is not divested by a forfeiture for a breach of municipal law (St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409); nor by a sale to a bona fide purchaser without notice (The Chusan [Case No. 2,717]; The Bold Buccleugh, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 220; s. c. on appeal, 22 Eng. Law & Eq. 62). See, also, 1 Notes of Cas. 115; 4 Notes of Cas. 170; 6 Notes of Cas. 68. It is not merely a privilege to resort to a particular form of action to recover a debt. The maritime law, following the Roman, distinguished between actions and privileges, and held that actions do not make hypothecations. Emerigon, Con. a la Grosse, c. 12, § 1. It is an appropriation made by the law, of a particular thing, as security for a debt or claim; the law creating an incumbrance thereon, and vesting in the creditor, what we term a special property in the thing, which subsists from the moment when the debt or claim arises, and accompanies the thing even into the hands of a purchaser.

It is true, such a lien gives to the creditor no right to possess the thing; and it can be executed only by a suit in rem. But the same is true of an express hypothecation by a bottomry bond. Whether the creditor may himself seize and sell the thing or must obtain a condemnation, to be followed by a judicial sale, does not necessarily affect the question, whether he has a real right in the thing, jus in re. Under the Roman law he was allowed to sell, himself, even at private sale. Some regulations were made at a late day respecting notice. But the system was very inartificial. The modern civil law of Europe has better protected the rights of debtors and third persons. See Kaufman, Mackeld. Civ. Law, bk. 1, tit. 3. In France the creditor who had but a tacit hypothecation, without any judgment, could not seize and sell. He was obliged to institute judicial proceedings, and obtain a judicial sale. Pothier, De l'Hypothèque, c. 2, § 3. But the creditor could maintain a real action, to take the possession of the thing from a third person, actio hypothecaria, and have it condemmed, to the satisfaction of his debt, actio mutui, or locatio conducti. See Kaufman, Mackeld. Civ. Law, 396, and note. An ordinary libel in rem to enforce a lien, includes both these actions of the Roman law, and at the same time recovers the possession and subjects the thing to the payment of the debt. Indeed Pothier's description of the execution of an hypothecation is as applicable to a proceeding in the admiralty to enforce a lien. "The execution of an hypothecation is made by the seizure which the creditor makes of the thing hypothecated and the judicial sale which is ordered thereof." Poth. De L'Hypothèque, c. 2, § 3. Whether he can make the seizure himself, only to be followed by a judicial sale, or must resort to a court for both, may be important as to remedy, but does not affect his ultimate and essential right. A right which enables a creditor to institute a suit, to take a thing from any one who may possess it, and subject it, by a sale, to the payment of his debt; which so inheres in the thing as to accompany it into whosoever hands it may pass by a sale; which is not divested by a forfeiture or mortgage, or other incumbrance created by the debtor, can only be a jus in re, in contradistinction to a jus ad rem; or in contradistinction to a mere personal right or privilege. Though tacitly created by the law, and to be executed only by the aid of a court of justice, and resulting in a judicial sale, it is as really a property in the thing as the right of a pledgee or the lien of a bailee for work. The distinction between a jus in re and a jus ad rem was familiar to lawyers of the middle ages, and is said then to have first come into practical use, as the basis of the division of rights into real and personal. Saund. Intro. to Just. p. 49. A "jus in re" is a right, or property in a thing, valid as against all mankind. A "jus ad rem" is a valid claim on one or more persons to do something, by force of which a jus in re will be acquired. Poth. Traité du Droit de Domaine, c. "Pretences"; Hugo, His. du Droit Rom. p. 118. The lawyers of the middle ages, who gave form to the customs of the seas, and arranged judicial proceedings to carry them into effect, certainly did not rank a lien or privilege among the jura ad rem. For it has been settled so long, that we know not its beginning, that a suit in the admiralty to enforce and execute a lien, is not an action against any particular person to compel him to do or forbear any thing; but a claim against all mankind; a suit in rem, asserting the claim of the libellant to the thing, as against all the world. It is a real action to enforce a real right. Just. L. 4, tit. 6, de actionibus, and Sanders' note, p. 527.

I have bestowed attention on the investigation of the nature of an admiralty lien, because it is essential to the decision of the case now before me. If such a lien be, as has been considered by learned judges, for whose opinions I have great respect, "only a privilege to arrest the vessel for the debt, which, of itself, constitutes no incumbrance on the vessel, and becomes such only by virtue of an actual attachment" (The Triumph [Case No. 14,182]), then it might be difficult to maintain that this statute lien, conferred by the local law, subsists after the statute insolvency of the estate of the decedent owner. But if, as I think, it is a real and vested interest in the thing, constituting an incumbrance placed thereon by operation of law, to be executed by a judicial process against the thing, to which no person is made a party, save by his voluntary intervention and claim, then the inability to maintain a suit against the administrator, and the incapacity to make any attachment of the property of the deceased in such a suit, though they may amount to infirmities in the remedy when pursued in the state courts, do not affect the right of the creditor, nor his remedy in the admiralty. Indeed, if a maritime lien be merely a privilege to attach the vessel for a debt, which becomes an incumbrance only in virtue of an actual attachment, it is difficult to see, how it amounts to any special privilege in the New England states, where every creditor has the privilege of attaching all vessels for all debts, which become incumbrances by virtue of such attachments. Incumbrances created merely by attachments, must take rank, in the absence of positive provisions of law to the contrary, according to the dates of such attachments. But incumbrances created by maritime liens are marshalled according to the causes from which such liens spring. That is, they subsist, and bind the property, not in virtue of the legal process used to enforce them, but by operation of the law which creates them and fixes them on the property, at the moment when the debts are incurred. How they are to be marshalled, and what is the effect of a proceeding instituted by one lien creditor upon the rights of others, is quite a different question, upon which it is not necessary here to express any opinion. See The Globe [Case No. 5,483]; The America [Id. 288]; The Ord. of Peter 4, in Pard. Col. 389, cc. 32-34; Emerigon, Con. a la Grosse, c. 12, § 3; The Saracen, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 451.

I consider the decision of the supreme court of Maine in Severance v. Hammatt, 28 Me. 511, shows only that there is an infirmity in the remedy under the local law. But the legislature must be taken to have known that the right conferred could be enforced in the admiralty where no such infirmity exists, and by the act of 1850 (chapter 159) they promptly supplied the defects in the proceedings of their own courts.

My opinion is, that the lien conferred by the local law was an existing incumbrance on the vessel, not divested or extinguished by the death or insolvency of the owner; and that, consequently, the decree of the district court must be affirmed.

[1 Ware, 535.]¹

District Court, D. Maine. April 17, 1854.²

LIBEL AGAINST VESSEL — LIEN FOR MATERIALS — DEATH AND INSOLVENCY OF OWNER—EFFECT.

1. The privileged lien against a vessel given to material men by the Revised Statutes of Maine (chapter 125, § 35) amounts essentially to an hypothecation of the vessel to the privileged creditor.

[Cited in The Richard Busteed, Case No. 11,764.]

2. An hypothecary creditor has the same jus in re, or proprietary interest in the thing, as a pawnee or mortgagee.

3. His rights are paramount to the rights of the general creditors under the laws of the state regulating the distribution of estates of deceased insolvent debtors.

4. The case of Severance v. Hammatt, 28 Me. 522, was decided against a lien creditor on the death and insolvency of the debtor, on the ground that the laws provided no means by which the lien could be enforced in such a case, consistently with the rights of the general creditors under the laws for the distribution of insolvent estates. But as no such difficulty exists in the admiralty, that court can give the creditor his appropriate remedy.

Mr. Evans, for libellant.

Mr. Shepley, for respondent.

WARE, District Judge. This is a libel in rem against the hull of a new ship, since named the Young Mechanic, built the last season at Rockland, in this state, by a material man for the price of materials furnished by the libellant for building it. The libel is founded on the statute of the state giving to this description of creditors a lien on the ship, as a security for the price of the materials furnished. Wm. McLoon, the claimant, in his answer alleges that on or about the 8th of April, 1854, one Francis Rhoades, intending to build a ship during the season, applied to him for a loan of money to purchase the materials and pay the laborers; that he advanced for that purpose the sum of $20,000; that on the 8th of May, Rhoades executed and delivered to him a mortgage of the materials for the sum advanced; and that having required further advances, he, on the 8th of November, executed another mortgage of the vessel for the further sum of $20,000 advanced; that afterwards the respondent made further advances to the amount of about $25,000, and on the 4th of December, Rhoades made an absolute conveyance of the vessel to him, and on the eighth of that month died insolvent; that the estate was duly represented insolvent by the administratrix, and commissioners of insolvency have been duly appointed.

The answer proceeds to state, by way of defence, that the whole advances to the amount of $65,000 were made on the credit of the ship. It is admitted that the articles mentioned in the schedule annexed to the libel were furnished by the libellant at the request of Rhoades, the builder on account, and on the credit of the ship; but it is contended that if the libellant ever had a lien on the ship, it has been dissolved by the death and insolvency of Rhoades.

The respondent having admitted in his answer that the materials mentioned in the libel were furnished for and on account of the vessel, the case presents but a single question for decision; that is, whether, admitting that the libellant ever had a lien, it has been subsequently dissolved by the death and insolvency of the person who was owner at the time when the materials were furnished, and who remained so until the transfer, on the 4th of December. It appears to me very clear, under this law, that a creditor who has advanced money on a mortgage of the materials, or the ship, is in no better condition to defend against the liens of material men, than the owner or mortgagor; that he merely succeeds to the place of the owner, the evident object of the law being to give to material men and laborers a lien on the vessel for their security, whoever may be the owner, paramount to all other claims.

It is certainly true that there is the same apparent equity in allowing a privilege to a creditor, who loans money to be applied to the building of a ship, if in fact it is so applied, as in allowing it to the furnisher of materials and the mechanics, by whose materials and labor the ship is made, and the Roman law allows the privilege to both concurrently. For the thing thus created by his money, in the pointed language of Domat, is as it were his, to the amount that his money has contributed to make it, "elle est comme sienne jusqu' à la concurrence de ce qu'il y a mis," in the same sense and to the same extent as it is the material man's or the mechanic's. Domat, Lois Civiles, liv. 3, tit. 1, § 5, Nos. 4, 6, 9-11. But the common law gives to the lender no such privilege, and the legislature has not seen fit in amendment of the law to extend the privilege to him, which it has given to the laborer and furnisher of materials. The 35th section of the Revised Statutes of Maine, under which the lien is claimed, is in these words: "Any ship-car-penter, caulker, blacksmith, joiner, or other person, who shall furnish labor or materials for or on account of any vessel, building or standing on the stocks, or under repairs aftor having been launched, shall have a lien on such vessel for his wages and materials until four days after such vessel is launched, or such repairs afterwards have been completed; and may secure the same by an attachment on said vessel within that period, which shall have precedence over all other attachments."

The question whether the lien is dissolved by the death and insolvency of the owner, must depend on the nature and quality of the lien or privilege, and the right and interest in the thing which it assures to the favored creditor. If it is secured by an attachment or arrest of the vessel, within the time limited, it has a precedence over all other attachments, that is, attachments of any other creditors of the owner. The law thus constituting it a privileged lien, it amounts to a legal hypothecation of the ship, like a bottomry bond, or the lien of seamen for their wages. The ship itself becomes in some sense a debtor. It is a jus in re, a proprietary interest in the thing, which may be enforced directly against the thing itself by a libel in rem, in whose ever possession it may be and to whomsoever the general title may be transferred. It is not indeed a full jus proprietatis in every sense, but one of a qualified nature. It does not constitute the lien creditor a tenant in common with the general owner to all purposes, so that if the possession comes into his hands he can hold it as a tenant in common and employ it in that right; but it gives him an interest in the thing, and a right by judicial process to get his pay from it. And this proprietary interest is as complete, as it is in case of pawn or mortgage. In this respect there is no difference between pawn and hypothecation; and such is the decision of the Roman law. "Inter pignus et hypothecam tantum nominis differt." Dig. 20, 1, 5, 51; Just. Inst. 4, 6, 7; Domat, liv. 3, tit. 1, § 1, note. The difference between them consists only in the remedy. The pawnee having the possession of the thing, may, in some cases at least, sell it and pay himself; but the hypothecary creditor, not having the possession, must obtain a judicial order before the thing is sold.

If this view of the subject is correct, it seems to follow on general principles, that in the event of the owner's death and insolvency, the legal interest of the hypothecary creditor remains unaffected by the fact of insolvency and death, precisely as it would in a case of mortgage, the hypothecation being the precise equivalent to a mortgage containing a stipulation that the mortgagor shall retain the possession until the condition is broken. It being a transfer of a legal interest in the thing, jus in re, to the hypothecary creditor under a condition, after that is broken he has a right to hold the thing against all other persons, who derive title under the hypothecators, in whatever manner their title is derived, whether from contract, or whether it is cast upon them by operation of law.

But it is said that the supreme court of the state has given a different construction to the 37th section of the same chapter of the Revised Statutes, which gives to material men a similar lien on houses. The language of the two sections, though not perfectly identical, is so nearly alike in the operative words, that there does not appear to be any satisfactory ground for making a distinction in the construction of the two, both being in pari materia, and both apparently having the same general object, the benefit of material men and mechanics. And as the courts of the United States hold themselves bound, in carrying into execution state laws, by the construction given to them by the state tribunals, I might have felt myself bound to follow this decision, if it presented itself to my mind precisely in the same light as it seems to have done to the counsel for the respondent. But in examining the opinions, though it appears that the court intimated, and perhaps pretty strongly, their doubts, whether the lien in that case was not intended by the legislature to be subordinate to the general laws of the state for the distribution of the estates of deceased insolvent debtors, yet I think it is pretty apparent that the decisive, and turning point, in the decision, was the want of power in the court to carry the provisions of the law into effect under any other construction. "It might at least," say the court, "be regarded as doubtful whether such was the intention of the legislature," (that is, to make that lien paramount to the claims of other creditors, and all other claims, in case the debtor died insolvent,) "and if such an intention could be discerned, no provision is made to carry the intention into effect. In such a case the court would not be authorized to supply the enactments necessary to enable one to maintain an action and to recover a judgment only against the estate subject to the lien." Severance v. Hammatt, 28 Me. 522. Now, if this case had been under the 35th section, and the suit had been in the admiralty, this objection, which was fatal in a court of common law, would not have existed. For the law, having in its effect and operation made the thing itself a principal debtor, the admiralty proceeds directly against it, as a party, by a libel in rem, and the decree is executed upon it without touching the general assets of the estate. And if the law gives to the lien creditor this preference, he ought not to be deprived of it merely because one tribunal cannot consistently with the law, which governs the action of that court, give the remedy, provided another court, to which he is authorized to apply, can give it. And this result is no novelty, but is familiar to the jurisprudence of the state. When a party has rights, which are guaranteed by the general law of the state, and a court of common law cannot, consistently with its own peculiar jurisprudence and its forms and modes of proceeding, give a remedy, he is turned over to a court of equity. And further; the act of 1850, passed immediately after the publication of this decision of the court, was evidently intended to remedy the imperfection of that section of the Revised Statutes, which the decision disclosed. And though this act does not in its terms extend to the 35th section, it is so clear a declaration of the legislative intention in respect to the 37th section, and the 35th being in pari materia, and the credit being precisely similar in its character with the other, that in reason and equity it ought to be held to be a declaration of the legislative intention in relation to this section as well as the other.

The YOUNG MECHANIC.

[3 Ware, 58.]¹

District Court, D. Maine. Feb., 1856.

ADMIRALTY—COSTS—JOINDER OF PARTIES—PROCEEDINGS IN REM—INTERVENING PETITIONS—STIPULATION FOR RELEASE.

1. The act of congress of March 3, 1847 [9 Stat. 181], regulating costs in admiralty proceedings in rem, where less than a hundred dollars is recovered, is repealed by the act of Feb. 26, 1853 [10 Stat. 161]. The process act of July 22, 1813 [3 Stat. 19].

2. In suits in rem all persons having claims of a like nature against the thing, may join in a single libel for the purpose of having that question decided, whether the claims arise from tort or contract.

3. When a vessel is arrested by a lien creditor, all other such creditors may intervene by summary petition without having the vessel arrested again, and have their claims allowed.

[Cited in brief in The Pathfinder, Case No. 10,797.]

4. Quære. When the vessel is delivered on a stipulation for her full value, whether such creditors may have the same remedy on the stipulation that they have against the vessel remaining in the custody of the court.

In this case, several libels were filed against the vessel while on the stocks, and before she was launched, by material men claiming a lien under the law of the state. The claimant, for whom she was built, had advanced large sums of money to the builder from time to time while the work was in progress, for which he had taken a mortgage of the unfinished vessel, and finally, before she was completed, had taken a bill of sale. A few days after the bill of sale was executed, the builder died insolvent, and the material men commenced suits to enforce their liens. It was contended on the part of the claimant, that the liens were all defeated by the death and insolvency of the builder, to whom the materials were furnished. The district court decided against the claimant and in favor of the liens. [Case No. 18,181.] In order to settle the question one of the cases was carried by appeal to the circuit court, where the decree of the district court was affirmed. [Case No. 18,180.] All the libels were then referred to a commissioner to ascertain the amount of each claim, and his report was confirmed by the court, and on motion of the claimants, the parties were heard in the taxation of costs.

Evans & Hovey, for libellants.
Shepley & Dana, for claimant.

WARE, District Judge. Two of the libellants in these cases recovered less than $100 damage, and it is contended that under the act of March 3, 1847 (9 Stat. 121), they are entitled to no more costs in the whole, than one-half of the amount of the debts or damage recovered; that being the rule established when the suit is in rem. And if that act is to be considered as now in force, it must furnish the measure of costs in these cases. But my opinion is, that this part of the act is repealed by the act of Feb. 26, 1853 (10 Stat. 161). This act orders that "in lieu of the compensation now allowed by law to attorneys, solicitors and proctors, &c., the following and no other compensation shall be allowed," and then goes on to establish a general tariff of taxable costs. The fifth section repeals all previous laws, which are incompatible with the provisions of this act. And the act provides that on a final hearing in equity or admiralty, there shall be allowed to the solicitors or proctors a docket fee of twenty dollars, with a provision that if the libellant in admiralty recovers less than fifty dollars, the docket fee shall be ten dollars. The act does not distinguish between suits in rem and suits in personam, and being general must apply to both. The act of 1847 is clearly incompatible with this provision in the latter act, limiting as it does the costs in particular cases, and providing for a particular distribution of them inconsistent with the provisions of the last act.

Another objection to the allowance of full costs is of a more general character, and applies to all the libels. It is founded on the process act of July 12, 1813 (3 Stat. 19). The second section of this act provides, where several libels are brought against a vessel or cargo, which might be legally joined in one, that there shall be allowed no more costs than are taxable on a single libel, unless special cause for several is shown to the satisfaction of the court. This act, at least this part of it, does not appear incompatible with the act of 1853, and is therefore not repealed by it. The argument is, that material men, claiming a lien under the statute, may all, like seamen suing for their wages, unite in a single libel, and costs should be allowed only on one libel. This depends on the true construction of the act, and to arrive at that, the whole must be considered. Its professed object is to diminish the cost of judicial proceedings by preventing a needless multiplicity of suits.

The first section provides, that when several actions or processes are brought against persons who might legally be joined in one, the plaintiff or libellant shall recover costs only on one action, unless special cause is shown for more than one. This section contemplates several actions by a single plaintiff against several defendants who might be joined.

The second section is supposed to be applicable to these cases. The provision of this is that when several libels are brought against one vessel or cargo, which might be joined, costs on one libel only shall be allowed except on special and satisfactory cause shown. This section apparently contemplates the case of a single and not of several libellants, and this appears to be evident from the clause that immediately follows, which provides that on libels against a cargo or parts of a cargo, which are seized as forfeited for the same cause, costs shall be allowed only on one libel, whatever may be the number of owners or consignees. There is nothing in the language of this section which leads to the conclusion, that where several persons have a like cause of action founded on a several liability to each, and not on a joint liability to all, they must join under the penalty of a forfeiture of costs.

It is the third section of the act which applies to cases like the present. That provides that when causes of a like nature, or in relation to the same question, shall be pending before the court, it may make such orders or rules as to the course of proceeding as are conformable to usage, for the unavoidable delay and cost, and for that purpose order causes to be consolidated; and authority is given, where any attorney or proctor has multiplied processes unnecessarily and vexatiously, to require him to pay the costs himself.

The questions which arise under this section are, first, whether these libels could legally have been joined, and on this question my opinion is, that they might; and secondly, whether they have been so unnecessarily and vexatiously multiplied as to call for the application of the penalties which the act provides, and on this question my opinion is, that they have not.

A doubt was suggested, on the part of the libellant, whether these parties could unite in one libel, and an obiter dictum in the opinion of the court in the case of Oliver v. Alexander, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 146, is relied upon as sustaining the doubt. It is there stated arguendo, that this privilege, by which several persons, each having a separate and independent cause of action, are permitted to join in a single libel, is allowed as a special favor to seamen in suits for their wages and to them only. But the decision in the case of Rich v. Lambert, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 352, where this question was directly before the court, establishes the contrary doctrine. That was a libel against the vessel to answer for damage to goods, occasioned, as was alleged, by the improper stowage of the cargo through the negligence or fault of the master. The damaged goods belonged to fifteen different owners. Five of them united in one libel, and the other ten brought separate libels. In the progress of the causes, the court ordered them to be consolidated for the purpose of trying the general question involved in all, that is, the liability of the vessel. It was held, that in such a case, "it is fit and proper that the proceedings should be joint, either by allowing the parties to unite in the libel, or by an order for consolidation, if separate libels have been instituted." What was before allowed by the practice of the court, is now, by the process act of 1813, required under the penalties provided by the third section of the act. It may be stated as a general rule in the admiralty, that when several persons have claims in rem against a single thing, whether arising from tort or contract, of a like nature and all involving one question, all may join in a single libel for the purpose of having that question tried, although, when that is settled, there may be special defenses applicable to each case. When the general question is decided, the case of each libellant becomes separate and independent, and is litigated on its own merits. But though they may, they are not obliged to unite, and if separate libels are brought this will have no influence in a hearing on the merits of the case, but unless satisfactory cause is shown for separate libels, it will affect the question of costs.

The question then presents itself, was there in this case satisfactory cause for separate libels. Without relying on the doubts, which might have been entertained from the novelty of the question, of the right of the different libellants to unite in one libel, or inquiring whether such doubts might constitute a legitimate reason, another cause is shown which must be held satisfactory. When the first libel was filed the ship was restored to the claimant on a stipulation, not for her full value, but for double the amount claimed in the libel. The second libellant was, therefore, under the necessity of arresting her to secure his own claim, and each succeeding libel was brought under the same necessity. It cannot, therefore, be pretended, that separate libels have been unnecessarily and vexatiously multiplied by the fault of the proctors. If the ship had not been restored on stipulation, but had remained in the custody of the law, the other lien creditors might have presented their claims on summary petition and had them allowed without a new process against the thing; for that being in possession of the court a new arrest is unnecessary. In proceedings in rem, when the res is in the custody of the law, it is retained by the court in usum jus habentium, for lien or privileged creditors, who have jus in re, as well as for those who have a general or unqualified jus proprietatis subject to these liens. In regard to these privileged creditors, the thing itself is considered a debtor, and they may present their claims and have them allowed and paid from the proceeds of a sale. This is the familiar practice of the admiralty after a decree and satisfaction of the first libel, when there are remnants and surpluses remaining in the court. And I can see no reason, in principle or convenience, against allowing the same claims against the res before a decree, and such has been the practice in this district. Hull of a New Ship [Case No. 6,859]. The rights of the creditor are the same against the whole as against the remnants. If the claims stand in different ranks of privilege they are marshaled and paid according to their priorities. If they hold the same rank they are paid concurrently, without regard to the time when the debt was incurred, or the time when the suits were commenced. "Privilegia non ex tempore aestimantur sed ex causa; et si ejusdem tituli fuerunt concurrunt, licet diversitatis temporis in his fuerint." Dig. 42, 5, 32. It is true that a distinction is made by the English court of admiralty, which will allow payments to be made from the remnants on claims, over which the court will not take jurisdiction in an original suit against the thing. But the distinction rests on no intelligible principle. It has been adopted only in obedience to the common law courts and under the duress of prohibition. It should not be followed in this country. Whether, if the owner has the ship restored to him on a stipulation for her full value, the creditors may have the same remedy on the stipulation, that they have against the ship when that is retained in the custody of the law, is a question that has not, to my knowledge, been decided. No satisfactory reason occurs to me why they may not. The stipulation is a substitute for the thing. The owner is allowed to have the possession and use restored on his leaving an equivalent, and, having provided that, there is no reason why his possession should again be disturbed by lien claims existing at the time of the stipulation. If the whole amount of the stipulation is exhausted and paid, it amounts substantially to a re-purchase of the vessel discharged of the liens. If any technical difficulty arises from the form of the instrument, this is an objection not favored in the admiralty, especially in the construction of instruments like this taken by order of the court in the interest of justice. Lane v. Townsend [Case No. 8,054]. At any rate it may easily be obviated by a slight alteration in the terms of the instrument.

MARITIME LIEN FOR MATERIALS—REQUISITES.

The party claiming a lien on a vessel for materials must show that the contract under which the materials were furnished had reference to some particular vessel, for the construction or repair whereof said materials were to be used.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.]

In admiralty.

Mr. Butler, for appellant.

Mr. Shepley, for claimant.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an appeal from a decree of the district court, dismissing a libel filed in that court to assert a lien on a vessel for the price of materials used in its construction.

The material facts which I deduce from the proofs are, that in January, 1855, the claimant contracted in writing with one Edmund Merrill, for timber for the keel, shoe, floor timbers, naval timbers, foot-hooks, and risers, sufficient for a ship of about nine hundred tons, and agreed to pay therefor by conveying to Merrill in fee a certain shipyard and the buildings thereon. To enable himself to perform this contract, Merrill contracted with the libellant for the timber, for the price whereof the lien is claimed. This timber was put on to railroad cars by the libellant, consigned to the claimant at Portland, who obtained a delivery order from the railroad company, and directed the cars to be taken to Westbrook, and there received the timber, and used it in the construction of the vessel in question. It does not appear that when this timber was delivered, this vessel had been begun to be built. The inference from the fact that among the timber were keel pieces is that the vessel was not then begun.

There is no evidence that the libelant and claimant ever met at all concerning the timber, save that the libelant was present when the timber was unladen, and assisted in unloading that and other timber from the railroad cars. It is not shown by the libelant that when he contracted to sell the timber to Merrill, he relied on any lien on this vessel, nor that he even knew it was intended for any particular vessel. He neither produces his book of accounts to show a charge to any vessel, nor offers any evidence of the terms of the contract between Merrill and himself. He relies solely on the facts that he was once the owner of the timber; that whatever contract he may have made with Merrill, he himself was present when the timber came into the actual possession of the claimant, and that it was used in building the vessel libelled. The local law (Rev. St. c. 125, § 35) gives to any person who shall furnish materials for or on account of any vessel, building or standing on the stocks, or under repairs after being launched, a lien for the price of such materials. But the materials must be furnished for or on account of some particular vessel, building or standing on the stocks, or undergoing repairs. It has been repeatedly held in this district, and I concur in the correctness of the decision, that the parties must have reference to some particular vessel in the construction or repairs whereof the materials are to be used, and upon which the lien is to be created. The Calisto [Case No. 2,316]; on appeal, Read v. Hull of a New Ship [Id. 11,609]; Sewall v. Hull of a New Ship [Id. 12,682]. I entertain great doubt whether any case can come within this law, if the particular vessel had not been begun to be built before the sale of the materials. But it is not necessary to decide this point, because it is not shown by the libelant that his contract with Merrill had reference to any particular vessel, and I consider the burthen rests on him to prove this.

It was urged at the argument, that in case of materials furnished for a foreign vessel, the admiralty law presumes they were furnished on the credit of the vessel. But in such a case it must first appear that there was a particular vessel in the contemplation of the parties, whose necessities were to be supplied; and, according to the correct doctrine, as expounded by the supreme court at the last term, it must not only appear that the supplies were necessary for the particular vessel, but that it was also necessary that the master should have a credit to obtain them. The liens given by the local law do not depend on the same requirements. But whatever requirements are made by the local law, as prerequisites for a lien, must be shown by the libelant to have been complied with, before he can claim a preference over other creditors, or entitle himself to assert an interest in the property of a third person. Whether one who agrees to sell materials for building or repairing a vessel, and who contracts with another for the means to enable him to comply with his agreement, can thereby give a lien to a sub-contractor, under this law, it is not necessary in this case to determine. As was suggested in The Kiersage [Case No. 7,762], the case of a sub-contractor for labor is not necessarily the same as that of a sub-contractor for materials. I mention it here, only to exclude the conclusion that anything is intended to be decided respecting this question.

The decree of the district court is affirmed with costs.

YOUNT v. UNITED STATES.

[Hoff. Dec. 36.]

District Court, N. D. California. Aug. 14, 1861.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—LOCATION—ACT OF JUDICIAL POSSESSION—OBJECTIONS TO SURVEY—EXCESSIVE QUANTITY.

[1. Where juridical possession was given by the proper officer of the Mexican government, the boundaries of the grant established, and the grantee formally put in possession of a specific tract, the boundaries of which were long recognized by his neighbors and by the Mexican government in making other grants, the court will not declare that such boundaries were erroneous and void on the ground that the land measured off and delivered was not within the exterior boundaries of the tract out of which it was to be taken, except upon the clearest proof that such was the fact. If, from the rude character of the diseño, it is impossible to ascertain with certainty that the land so delivered was outside of the boundaries delineated on the map, the boundaries will not be altered.]

[2. Where a judicial measurement and delivery of a tract of land according to fixed boundaries has been made by the Mexican authorities, and long acquiesced in, such boundaries will not be modified, although they include a considerable quantity in excess of the amount specified in the grant.]

[Claim by George C. Yount for the rancho of Caymus, 2 square leagues, in Napa county, granted February 23, 1836, by Nicholas Gutierrez to George C. Yount. Claim filed May 26, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 8, 1853, by the district court July 17, 1855 (Case No. 16,784), and appeal dismissed February 23, 1857. Heard on objections to survey.]

survey made, objections have been filed on the part of persons intervening for their interests under the act of 1860.

The objections urged are: (1) That the official survey should be made in the form of a parallelogram, delineated in dotted lines on the diseño, and marked "Terreno Solicitado." (2) That the official survey embraces lands not only without the limits of the parallelogram referred to, but not included within the exterior boundaries of the diseño. (3) That the lines of the judicial survey, made under the authority of the former government, have not been followed, and that the same embrace more land than the quantity granted.

The first objection is, in effect, an attempt to procure a review and reversal of the decree of the court, which has become final by the dismissal of the appeal, and on which the survey has been made. On the argument of the cause it was strenuously contended that the delineation of the parallelogram on the diseño absolutely determined the location of the tract granted, and showed that it was to extend across the valley diagonally a distance of two leagues, and up and down the valley a distance of one league.

It was alleged by the claimant that the parallelogram in question was no part of the original diseño, but had been inscribed upon it after the grant was made. Another diseño, almost exactly resembling that found in the expediente, was produced, upon which no parallelogram was delineated. The record of judicial possession was also offered in evidence, from which it appeared that the tract measured out to the claimant in no respect corresponded to that delineated by the dotted lines of the parallelogram.

On the point thus presented full argument was had, and the court, by its decree, determined that the claim was valid to the land described in the record of judicial possession, and included within the boundaries of the tract delineated on Exhibit A,—i. e. the diseño which represented the whole tract, but which had no parallelogram inscribed upon it. The question, therefore, as to which should govern in the location of the tract,—the delineation of a certain parallelogram on the diseño, or the record of a judicial possession, which fixed the boundaries, and constituted a formal tradition of a specific tract by Mexican authority,—was deliberately and definitively determined, and it is now too late to reopen it for further discussion.

2. The second objection is that the juridical possession given was not within the exterior limits of the diseño adopted by the court and marked "Exhibit A." By the Mexican, and almost all continental, laws, a judicial delivery of possession was always necessary to effect a complete transfer of the right of property. By it the jus in re was added to the jus ad rem confirmed to the grant. When by the terms of the concession the land was imperfectly identified, or a specified quantity was granted, to be taken within large exterior limits, the delivery of possession operated in addition as a designation of the tract granted, and a severance of it from the public domain. It may therefore be viewed as consisting of two parts—First, the ascertainment of the particular tract to be delivered; and, secondly, the formal delivery to the grantee of the tract so ascertained. Of this tract, when thus delivered to him by the magistrate, in the presence of witnesses, the grantee took formal possession with appropriate solemnities and symbolical acts, by which he proclaimed his ownership. When, therefore, a proceeding of this kind has been had by competent authority under the former government; when the limits of the tract have been marked out, and the grantee has entered into the possession of it, and has remained in its undisputed enjoyment until the conquest of the country; when the boundaries so established have been respected by all his neighbors, and recognized by the government, when granting and giving possession of adjacent tracts,—it should at least require the clearest proof of manifest error on the part of the officer giving possession to justify the court in declaring a proceeding so formal, so long acquiesced in and acted upon, to be void on the ground that the land measured off and delivered was not within the exterior boundaries of the tract out of which it was to be taken.

The only grounds for asserting that so great an error was in this case committed are—First, that the delineation on the diseño of the course of the Napa river, and particularly of a considerable bend in it, shows that the tract exhibited on the diseño lay lower down the stream than the lands which were measured; secondly, that their situation is also proved by the position of a spring, or ojo de agua marked on the diseño. But the diseño is drawn in a manner far too rude and obviously inaccurate to justify us in attributing so much significance to the particular course which the stream is represented as taking. It represents nothing but two ranges of hills running parallel to each other, between which a stream marked Rio de Napa, pursues a sinuous course. On one of these hills a spring, or "ojo de agua," is represented. Had there been no judicial possession, no fixing of boundaries, no ancient and notorious possession of a tract of recognized limits, the indications of the diseño would necessarily have been accepted as fixing the location on that part of the stream which seems to correspond most nearly in course with the representation on the diseño. But when a juridical possession has been given, the boundaries established, and the grantee formally put in possession of a specific tract, I cannot consider the vague and unsatisfactory indications of the diseño as sufficient to justify me in disregarding the acts of the Mexican authorities, unsettling long established boundaries, and disturbing a possession of nearly twenty years. With respect to the "ojo de agua," the evidence is conflicting and unsatisfactory.

From the whole testimony, it may fairly be inferred that the spring intended to be represented on the diseño was very probably the upper spring, a short distance south of the northern boundary established by the judicial officer. It would seem that that spring from its rise and notoriety is as likely to be the one intended by the draughtsman on the diseño as the lower one, which it is urged fixes the position of the tract. If the upper spring be the one intended, the judicial measurements were within the limits of the tract; and, in any event, the question is so doubtful that no argument against the validity of the measurement can be drawn from the position on the diseño of the points marked "Ojo de Agua." On the whole, I think it clear that the tract measured off and delivered to the claimant under the authority of the former government should now be surveyed to him.

3. It is further objected that the official survey does not correspond with the judicial measurement. It is not necessary to recapitulate the testimony which in my judgment clearly establishes that the United States surveyor has conformed as nearly as may be to the lines established by the Mexican magistrate. Those lines are described in the record of possession, and the evidence of Leese, Bartlett, Fowler, Coombs, and others, show that the lines of the survey correspond with those of the judicial possession. One of these witnesses, Mr. Leese, officiated as measurer at the survey, while others were present at the measurement of the rancho of Dr. Bale, which immediately adjoins the rancho of the claimant, and whose southern boundary was the northern line of the rancho of the latter. It is also shown that the same line was pointed out by Dr. Bale to various witnesses as constituting the boundary between himself and the claimants, a fact of some significance when it is considered that the only objections to this survey are urged on the part of the representatives of Dr. Bale, the United States having withdrawn all opposition to it. It is contended that the northern or northwestern line should be drawn at right angles to the general course of the valley, or as nearly as possible parallel to the southern or southeastern line. That the course of that line was supposed by the Mexican magistrate to be parallel with the first line run by him is evident from the description of it in the juridical possession; but it is evident that his notion of the points of the compass was very inaccurate. All the witnesses, however, agree that the line was run across the valley from sierra to sierra in the direction of a lone pine tree, which was a conspicuous object from the starting point. An attempt was made to show that a tree lower down the valley than the line adopted by the surveyor general was the object in question. But I think it is shown beyond any reasonable doubt that the tree toward which the line was run was that which has been adopted by the surveyor as determining the course of the boundary. The boundary so fixed seems to be identical with that supposed by the attesting witnesses to have been established and acquiesced in at the time by Dr. Bale, who was present as a commandante, and subsequently, when possession of his own rancho was given.

But the most serious objection to the adoption of the judicial measurement is the quantity of land embraced within it. It appears by the official survey that the area of the tract within the lines established by the alcalde exceeds by about two-thirds of a league the quantity granted. There can be no doubt that possession was given of all the land between the two parallel ranges of hills, "from sierra to sierra." Such was clearly the intention of the magistrate, as appears by the record of judicial measurement as positively stated by Leese and other officiating witnesses, and as proved by the very nature of the case; for, independently of the testimony, it would hardly be conceivable that the magistrate would omit to establish for boundaries the great and unmistakable monuments which two abrupt and clearly defined ranges of mountains afforded, but would fix upon imaginary lines drawn near their bases. The width of the valley was correctly assumed by him to be about one league, and by the official survey we find that the length of the lower line, which crosses the valley from sierra to sierra, is 210 chains, while that of the upper line, also running from sierra to sierra, is 206 chains,—one Spanish league, or 5,000 varas,—being equal to 210 chains. As the tract was evidently intended to be one league wide by two broad, it is obvious that, at all events, it must extend from sierra to sierra. The excess in quantity principally arises from the circumstance that in making the measurement up the valley, and establishing the upper line, the alcalde has measured more than 10,000 varas, or two leagues in length.

The question is therefore presented, can the court disregard the formal delivery of possession by the Mexican authorities, and restrict the survey and location to the precise quantity granted? The nature and office of a judicial measurement of land and tradition of land have already been adverted to. It was a formality, not only contemplated, but required, by Mexican law, as a mode of establishing boundaries, and effecting a severance from the tract granted the adjoining public lands. Without it the grantee had, in strictness, no legal right of possession. When, therefore, this severance was effected and the boundaries established by competent authority, and with such exactness as, in the absence of instruments and professional surveyors, was usual, it has appeared to me that we are bound to treat the tract of land so laid off by boundaries as finally and definitely assigned to the grantee.

There may undoubtedly be cases of gross error or fraud where the judicial measurement should be disregarded. But where the excess or deficiency is not greater than may reasonably be attributed to the imperfect modes of measurement which were universally adopted, it seems to me but just to regard the mention of quantity in the grant as intended to designate, not that precise quantity to be ascertained by an exact and scientific survey, such as no one in the department was capable of making, but to be ascertained in the customary and well-known mode adopted by the ordinary magistrates and assisting witnesses. By that mode of measurement, both grantor and grantee impliedly agreed to be bound, and it has sometimes occurred that the quantity measured was less than that called for in the grant. In such cases I have not hesitated to apply the same rule, and to hold that the tract granted was that measured off and designated by the Mexican authority as the quantity conceded by the government. To adopt any other rule would unsettle the boundaries of every rancho whereof judicial possession was given, for it probably never happened that the tract measured off by the alcalde did not exceed or fall short of the precise quantity mentioned in the grant.

It cannot be supposed that the Mexican government contemplated any subsequent and more accurate survey of lands once measured off by the judicial officer, for, when all the lands of an extensive valley were granted to different rancheros, each of whose lands were bounded by the limits established by the judicial measurement of his colindantes, there would exist no means of making up a deficiency in quantity of any one, without encroaching on the lands of his neighbor; while any excess that might be cut off from the lands of any one must either be assigned to his neighbor, thus giving to him a like excess in quantity, or be reserved to the nation; and a strip of public land thus introduced between two ranchos intended to be coterminous, which, as land was then used, would be absolutely without value to the public, and which would almost always be less than a league, and might often not exceed a few hundred varas in width.

It has, for these reasons, seemed to me that the judicial measurement and delivery of land under a Mexican grant, where its boundaries have been definitely established, and a possession taken and held of the tract so laid off, ought to be treated as having effected a severance of the tract so designated from the public, and as definitely fixing its location and limits. I therefore think that the survey in this case, having been shown to correspond with the judicial measurement, ought to be approved.

Case No. 18,188.

YOUNT v. UNITED STATES.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 43.]¹

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT.

Under the decision of the United States supreme court in Fremont v. U. S. [17 How. (58 U. S.) 542], this claim is entitled to confirmation.

Claim for [the Rancho La Jota] one league of land in Napa county, rejected by the board, and appealed by claimant [George C. Yount].

Thornton & Williams, for appellant.
S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty., for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. On the hearing of this case, no oral argument on its merits was had, but the district attorney stated that the objections to its validity on which he should rely were those contained in the opinion of the board of commissioners rejecting the claim. To meet the objections stated in that opinion, additional testimony has been taken in this court, and as no other reasons for rejecting it have been suggested to us, we have now to inquire whether those objections were well founded, and whether they have been since removed by the additional testimony taken in this court. The ground on which the claim was rejected by the commissioners, and the only objection mentioned in their opinion, is that the land was not designated in the original grant with sufficient certainty to effect its severance from the public domain. No juridical possession of the land was given—the officer whose duty it was to give it having been deterred by fear of the Indians from doing so. It appears from the expediente in this case that the claimant made his petition to the governor for the grant on September 14th, 1843. After due reference of the same for information, and several reports thereon, Governor Micheltorena, on the twenty-first of October, 1843, made his order for a concession, and on the twenty-third of the same month issued and delivered to the claimant a grant, subject to the approval of the departmental assembly, and under the usual conditions. The grant duly authenticated is given in evidence in the case, and its genuineness is not called in question. In examining the nature and force of the objection to the validity of the claim on which the commissioners rejected it, it will be necessary to extract some portions of the opinion of the commissioners, as the same appears in the transcript on file in this court: "The petition for the grant alleges that the petitioner is a carpenter, and there being in the mountains, known by the name of 'La Jota,' a vacant place, he prays his excellency to grant him a league of said mountain land for the purpose of establishing a sawmill therein. Some confusion appears in the subsequent papers in the case relative to the application of the name La Jota, but an examination of the original in the Spanish language makes it clear that it is used as the name of the mountain region in which the land solicited was located; and the above is all the description of the land prayed for in the petition, except a reference to some neighboring ranchos bordering, not the square league of land solicited, but a large tract of broken and mountainous country within which it was to be located, and from which it was proposed to separate it by juridical survey. * * * The grant recites that said Yount has petitioned for an addition of one square league in the sierra next to his rancho, named 'La Jota,' and proceeds to declare as follows: 'I have granted him one square league in said range of hills.' * * * The land, a confirmation of which is asked of this board, is denominated in the application to this commission the tract of land called 'La Jota.' The land granted is nowhere in the documentary evidence emanating from the former government designated by that name, but on the contrary, seems, by the terms used, to be excluded from the place thus designated. It is not La Jota which is granted, but lands to the extent of one league which adjoin it—'La Jota.'"

Under the view of the facts of the case indicated in the foregoing extracts, the commissioners rejected the claim, regarding it as a grant, not of any particular piece of land, but of an unlocated quantity of land to be afterwards located within an extensive and undefined tract of mountain country. It is insisted, however, by the appellant, that this conclusion is founded on a misconception of the import of the grant, as appears, not only from the terms of the grant itself and the petition on which it was founded, but also from the additional testimony taken in this court. By the testimony of Elias Barnett, it appears that the tract of land claimed by the appellant was, as early as 1843, and at the time of the grant, well known under the name of "La Jota," both by the Mexicans and also by the Indians, by whom its name was originally given; that the witness has himself known the tract since 1843, and that ever since he first knew it it was called by the name of "La Jota;" that it is a piece of table land on the top of a mountain, and that its limits and extent are generally known, and its boundaries well defined; that a surveyor could have no difficulty in locating it, its extent being a little less than a square league. Ralph L. Kilburn testifies that he has known the tract of land called "La Jota" since the winter of 1843-44; that it lies on the top of a mountain between Napa valley and Pope's rancho, and that it is bounded by the slope of the mountain on every side; that it contains somewhat less than a league of land, and that it is as easy to ascertain its boundaries as those of Goat island in this harbor. He further states that this tract is generally known by the name of "La Jota," and that it was so known before he became acquainted with it.

It is evident from this testimony and the other depositions in the case, that there is in the vicinity of the rancho of the claimant called Caymas, a tract of land of well defined limits, and with generally recognized boundaries; that it was at the time of the grant, and previously, known under the name of La Jota; that it was occupied immediately after the grant by the claimants, and improvements were made upon it; and that it is now known under the name of La Jota and recognized as the land granted to him. Nothing appears in the evidence to show that the name La Jota was ever applied to the sierra or mountain range in which the tract was situated, or that that name was ever supposed to include any other land than the well defined tract of about a league square, now claimed by the appellant.

Such being the facts of the case, we have next to inquire whether the place called La Jota was granted to the claimant. The commissioners seem to have thought that the name of La Jota is mentioned in the grant as that of the rancho near which the granted land was situated, and not as that of the granted land itself. But independently of the fact that the rancho was not called by the name of La Jota, but was well known as "Caymas," a close examination of the grant will show that the name "La Jota" is applied, not to the neighboring rancho of the appellant, but to the sierra or serrania adjoining it. The original grant recites, that whereas George Yount, etc., has applied for an "estencion" of one square league in the sierra adjoining his rancho named "La Jota." In English the name thus used might well be taken for that of the rancho, but on referring to the original Spanish, it is apparent that the expression "nombrada" La Jota, in the feminine, cannot refer to the masculine antecedent "rancho," but must relate to the feminine "sierra." The land granted is afterwards described as one square league in the said range of hills—"Serrania." The original petition on which the grant is founded, sets forth that there being vacant "una serrania" adjoining the rancho of the petitioner "conocida con el nombre de Jota," he solicits one square league of said sierra, etc., etc. From the petition, therefore, as well as from the grant, it appears that the land granted is not a particular place known as "La Jota," but one square league in the "sierra," or the "serrania," called "La Jota."

It is argued by the counsel for the claimants, that the phrase in the recital of the grant "nombrada La Jota" applies to the "estencion" solicited. But whatever ambiguity there might have been in the recital of the grant, it is removed by the words of the granting clause, which describes the land granted as one "square league in the said range of hills" or mountain ridge, as the word "serrania" might with equal propriety be rendered. The petition, too, as has been stated, after reciting that there is vacant a "serrania," called La Jota, adjoining the rancho of the petitioner, solicits, not the place known by that name, but a square league of said "sierra," or mountain range. It is clear, then, that the grant cannot be construed as conveying a place called La Jota, but as granting a league square in a mountain ridge of that name. The true facts of the case are, we think, apparent. The petitioner undoubtedly intended to ask for, and probably the governor intended to grant, a particular piece of land in the mountain near his rancho. That piece of land was, as appears by the testimony, well known and had determinate boundaries; that it was what the petitioner asked for, is evident from the facts that its extent is exactly one square league, the quantity solicited; that he immediately took possession of it and made expensive improvements upon it; that it contained pine trees to furnish timber for the saw-mill he proposed to erect; and that it then bore and has ever since retained the name of "La Jota." Unfortunately, however, he does not, as we have seen, solicit the place called La Jota, but a square league in the sierra of that name, and the governor grants him, not La Jota, but a square league in said range of hills "en dicha serrania." Is, then, this grant so vague that the claim of the petitioner must be rejected?

In the case of Fremont v. U. S. [17 How. (58 U. S.) 542], it was determined that the claimant had a vested right to the quantity of land named in the grant to be located within the exterior limits mentioned. Those limits embrace a region of country containing more than one hundred square leagues. In the case before us, the claimant's right is to one square league in the mountain ridge named La Jota, adjoining his rancho. The limits within which the grant is to be located are distinctly indicated in his petition by boundaries, for it is stated to be bounded on the south by the rancho of Dr. Bale and Napa, on the east by that of Las Animas, and on the west by Las Mallaimas. We have, then, the exterior limits or boundaries of the league granted, as well as the name of the mountain ridge on which it was situated, with the further specification that it (the mountain ridge) is adjoining (inmediata) his rancho of Caymas. That this description conveyed to those acquainted with the country an accurate notion of the place solicited, appears from the report of Vallejo, to whom the governor referred for information. That report speaks of "the piece of land (el terreno) solicited" as situated north of Sonoma, and as not belonging to any individual, etc. We think the description in the grant, and the other facts in this case, bring it fully within the principles of the case of Fremont v. U. S. [17 How. (58 U. S.) 542]. No other objection than that already discussed has been brought to our notice. It appears by the testimony of José de la Rosa, that the claimant has occupied the land by "building a house, a grist and saw-mill, living on the land, carrying on the lumber business, farming and stock raising." Transcript, p. 10. The claim must therefore be confirmed.

YOUQUA v. NIXON et al.

[Pet. C. C. 221.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1816.

CONTRACT TO DELIVER GOODS—BREACH—INABILITY TO PROCURE ARTICLE—DAMAGES.

1. Where the defendant contracted to deliver teas of the first quality, he is not excused from a performance of his undertaking, by proving that no such teas could be obtained at the market. He is answerable to the plaintiff in damages, for the non-performance of such an agreement.

2. The defendant contracted to deliver a certain number of boxes of teas, of first chop, at stipulated prices;—a subsequent agreement to diminish the quantity and the price, does not excuse him for a violation of the contract as to quality.

[Cited in Cheongwo v. Jones, Case No. 2,638.]

3. How damages, for the delivery of teas of a quality inferior to those contracted for, are to be ascertained.

[Cited in Barrow v. Reab, 9 How. (50 U. S.) 371.]

This was an action on a Canton note, given by the defendants [Nixon and Walker] to the plaintiff. By the agreement of the plaintiff's counsel, the defendants were permitted to give in evidence, the breach of a contract entered into by the plaintiff, at the time this note was given; to deliver to the supercargoes of the defendants' ship, a certain number of chests of Young Hyson tea, of the first chop, at thirty-seven taels per picchol. It appeared, by the evidence of the supercargoes, that after the contract was made, and after the teas from the country had come in, the plaintiff told the supercargoes, that the teas of the denomination specified in the contract, which were then at market, were generally so indifferent, that he should not be able to procure the quantity agreed for; and proposed that they should take other teas, in lieu of the Young Hyson. This they refused, insisting upon the contract. They afterwards agreed, verbally, to reduce the quantity, and the plaintiff promised to select from the large quantity at market, such teas, as he would not be ashamed to put his chop upon. The teas which were delivered, were of three different qualities, for which the plaintiff charged forty, thirty-eight, and thirty-six tales the pichol; for the second quality, the plaintiff at first insisted on charging forty tale, but the supercargoes refused to allow it, and thirty-eight tale was at length agreed upon. The supercargoes knew, that the parcels delivered were of different qualities, but they declared, that they considered themselves in the plaintiff's power, and that they had no alternative, but to receive the teas, at the prices charged; in as much, as by the laws of the place, having secured with the plaintiff, they could not have obtained a clearance, but through his means. But they stated, that they made no express engagement to waive the original contract, nor did they intend so to do. The supercargoes stated, that although the quality of the Young Hyson tea, was generally indifferent, that season, yet the contract might have been complied with, by the plaintiff; but they considered, that his standing in the Hong, was not such as to enable him to do so. The teas were proved to have been of a very indifferent quality, when brought to Philadelphia. The best of them, were worth about sixty cents per pound; whilst teas of the first quality, sold from ninety to one hundred cents; the others would not sell at all, during the year they were imported; but after the embargo was laid, they were sold for seventy-five cents per pound.

The claim for damages for a breach of the contract, was resisted, upon the grounds, that the subsequent agreement, to diminish the quantity of tea mentioned in the contract, as well as the alteration in the price, amounted to a waiver of the original contract; and that the quality of tea mentioned in the contract, should be considered, as referable to the general state of the market.

Mr. Binney, for plaintiff.

Mr. Rawle, for defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The written contract was, to deliver four hundred and fifty chests of Young Hyson tea, of the first chop, at thirty-seven tales the pichol. If that quantity and quality could not be procured at the Canton market, the plaintiff undertook more than he was able to perform; but this does not excuse him from a claim of damages, for his breach of contract. He should have taken care, before he made the contract, to ascertain his ability to perform it; and in case the state of the market would not enable him to do so, he might have qualified the expressions of the contract. The first question is, was the original written contract put an end to, by the subsequent change as to the quantity and price? It is admitted, that it was not waived by any express agreement. The contract consisted of three particulars, quantity, quality and price. Now it does not follow, that a subsequent agreement to vary the price, or quantity, or both, does, necessarily, dispense with the obligation in respect to quality. Under circumstances, it may do so, but it is at most an implication; and the evidence should be such as to show, that the parties intended to dispense with the same. In this case, it is proved by the supercargoes, that they did not intend to do away with the contract. But if this was the effect of the subsequent agreement, still the plaintiff was bound by his promise, to furnish teas, on which he would not be ashamed to put his chop; and if the jury are of opinion these words do not import teas of the first quality, conformable with the terms of the contract, they cannot mean teas of an inferior quality, and such as it is proved were brought to the Philadelphia market. Upon this point, however, the jury must judge. Upon the whole, if they are of opinion, under all the circumstances, that the original contract was intended to have been given up; still, if the supercargoes were in the power of the plaintiff, and found it necessary to yield to imposition, in order to obtain a cargo at all, and a clearance from Canton; the defendants ought not to be bound, to receive teas of an inferior quality to what was stipulated to be delivered. If the jury should be of opinion, that the teas furnished, were not agreeable to the contract, and were inferior to other teas of the agreed quality; the difference will furnish the rate of damages, to be applied to the first cost. They will calculate interest, on the balance due on the notes to this day; and then deduct from it, the sum to which, by the above rule, the defendants are entitled, for the plaintiff's breach of contract.

YOUQUA v. NIXON et al.

[Pet. C. C. 224.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1816.

BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES—RIGHT TO INTEREST.

1. Damages for a breach of contract do not bear interest.

2. It is not legal in the jury to allow damages, so that they will defeat the right of the party to interest on a debt ascertained; and damages are to be credited by the jury, on the day of their verdict, and are not so to be considered by them, as that, by depriving a party of interest on a debt due, they are made to bear interest, in favour of the person to whom they may be allowed.

[Cited in brief in Harrison v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 74 Mo. 366.]

Rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted.

It was made manifest to the court, that the jury had allowed to the defendants [Nixon and Walker] damages, at the rate of thirty per cent., applied to the prime cost; and had credited these damages against the notes of the defendants, as of the time when the teas were delivered. [See Case No. 18,189.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Whether the rate of damage allowed by the jury, is too high or not, is a question the court will not pretend to decide, that having been left to them upon evidence, by no means clear; but it is plain, that the jury have departed from the rule laid down by the court, in regard to interest, they having credited the defendants with the amount of damages, as of the day when the teas were delivered, instead of the day when the verdict was rendered; as they were directed by the charge. In this way, they have not only allowed interest on the damages, but have made the rate of interest twelve per cent.; interest at that rate, having been stopped upon so much of the note given by the defendants, as this credit amounted to.

A new trial must therefore be awarded.

YTURBIDE v. UNITED STATES.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 273.]¹

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1857.²

MEXICAN LAND CLAIM—APPEAL FROM COMMISSIONERS.

The claimants omitted to file with the clerk a notice of their intention to prosecute the appeal from the decision of the board of land commissioners, within the six months prescribed by the act of 1852 [10 Stat. 99]. Held, that the court was without jurisdiction over the cause.

[Claim by the executor and heirs of Agustin de Yturbide for 400 square leagues in Upper California.]

Crockett & Page and Sloan & Hartman, for claimants.

P. Della Torre, U. S. Atty.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case having been rejected by the board, the transcript was duly filed in the clerk's office in this court on the second of June, 1855. No notice of appeal was filed by the claimants within six months thereafter as required by law, but on the 30th of April, 1856, a motion was made by the claimants' counsel for leave to file such notice nunc pro tunc, and to prosecute the appeal. No order or decree dismissing the appeal had been obtained by the district attorney, and the circumstances attending the omission to file the notice were such as to have induced the court at once to grant the application, if it had possessed any discretion on the subject. Much doubt was however entertained by the court whether it could on any showing disregard what seemed the positive requirements of the statute. The motion was therefore, with the acquiescence of the district attorney, granted, in order that if the court had any discretion on the subject it might appear to have been exercised in favor of the application, and in order that testimony on the merits might be taken and the whole case submitted to the supreme court in such a form as to enable them finally to dispose of it when for the first time brought before them. It was however expressly mentioned, that the point as to the jurisdiction of the court to grant the motion was reserved until the final hearing, and that if the court should then be of opinion that it had no power to allow a notice of appeal to be filed after the expiration of six months from the filing of the transcript, the claim would be rejected for want of jurisdiction. This question must therefore be now disposed of.

By the twelfth section of the act of 1851 [9 Stat. 631], it was provided, that to entitle "either party to a review of the decision of the board of commissioners, notice of the intention to file a petition in the district court shall be entered on the journal of the board within sixty days after the decision of the claim has been notified to the parties, and the petition shall be filed in the district court within six months after the decision has been rendered." The mode above prescribed for removing the cause was altered by the act of 1852. In that law it is provided "that the commissioners shall cause a transcript of their proceedings and decision to be filed with the clerk of the district court, and that the filing of such transcript shall ipso facto operate as an appeal for the party against whom the decision shall have been rendered; that if such decision shall be against the private claimant it shall be his duty to file a notice within six months thereafter of his intention to prosecute the appeal, and if the decision shall be against the United States, it shall be the duty of the attorney general, within six months after receiving a copy of the transcript, (directed by the act to be sent to him by the board) to cause a notice to be filed with the clerk aforesaid that the appeal will be prosecuted by the United States. And on the failure of either party to file such notice with the clerk, the appeal shall be regarded as dismissed." The acts of 1824, 1828, and 1830 [4 Stat. 52, 284, 405], relating to lands in Missouri, Arkansas, and Florida, provided that all claims within their purview should be brought before the courts authorized to adjudicate upon them, within a specified period. Under these acts, it has always been held that the courts had no jurisdiction over petitions not presented within the time limited. In U. S. v. Marvin, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 623, it is said by the court: "The policy of congress was to settle the claims in as short a time as practicable, so as to enable the government to sell the public lands, which could not be done with propriety until the private claims were ascertained. As these were many in number, and for large quantities, no choice was left to the government but their speedy settlement and severance from the public domain. Such has been its anxious policy throughout, as appears from almost every law passed on the subject." Similar observations are repeated in Villabolas v. U. S., 6 How. [47 U. S.] 91. In furtherance of this policy it was provided by the act of 1851, that all lands, the claims to which shall not be presented to the board within two years from the date of the act, shall be deemed part of the public domain, and after the decision, though an appeal was allowed, the party to be entitled to it was required to file a notice of his intention to prosecute within sixty days after the decision has been notified to him, and to file his petition in the district court within six months from the date of the decision. These provisions were clearly limitations. Nor will it be contended that under them either party could file a petition or otherwise prosecute his appeal after the expiration of the six months prescribed by law.

The alteration in the mode of taking the appeal made by the law of 1852 above referred to, had for its principal object to relieve the claimants of the burden and expense of procuring copies of the transcripts to be made, and to allow to the attorney general a longer time to determine whether an appeal should be prosecuted than the sixty days within which the notice was required to be entered on the journals of the board. It was accordingly provided that the board should cause the transcripts to be made out and filed in the district court, and that such filing should ipso facto operate as an appeal. As, however, congress did not mean to enact that every case should be appealed, whether the party against whom the decision had been made desired it or not, and as the provisional appeal could not continue forever, the same period for filing the notice of an intention to prosecute it, or to profit by the appeal which had thus by operation of law been taken, was prescribed, as had previously been assigned for filing the petition in the district court. It was therefore not only made the duty of the attorney general or the claimant to file such notice within the time limited, but it was provided that on the failure of either party to file such a notice, the appeal "should be regarded as dismissed."

We think that by these provisions congress intended to prescribe a rule of action to the court, which it is not at liberty to evade or to disregard. That some limitation on the rights of appeal to a definite period is necessary in all cases, is obvious. That it is peculiarly necessary in this class of cases, and that it has been restricted within limits much narrower than those allowed in ordinary suits by all the acts of congress previously passed, is equally evident. When, therefore, we find the act of 1851 allowing a time for appeal still shorter than that prescribed in previous acts, it is difficult to believe that congress, by the amended act of 1852, intended to depart from a policy so well settled, and so necessary, and to permit the court to allow the appeal to be prosecuted whenever in its judgment the party desirous of appealing might sufficiently excuse his omission. If it be said that hard cases may arise, and that such a power might with safety and propriety be committed to the courts, it may be answered—(1) that hard cases must always occur under any general rule of law, however beneficent or necessary it may be; and (2) that courts have never felt themselves at liberty to dispense with express provisions of law, whether in statutes of limitations or in those regulating appeals or in others, upon any equitable ground. To this effect is the language of the supreme court in Saltmarsh v. Tuthill, 12 How. [33 U. S.] 389, and in Bank of Alabama v. Dalton, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 522, the court decided that it could not engraft on a statute of limitations an exception not found therein, however reasonable and just it might be.

It is argued that the case at bar is to be distinguished from those under the statutes of 1824, 1828 and 1830, inasmuch as the latter limited the time within which the petition was to be filed, which was the commencement of the suit; whereas, by the act of 1852 the filing of the transcript ipso facto constitutes an appeal. The court therefore has jurisdiction of the suit, and the notice is not necessary to confer it. Hence, it is argued, the filing of the notice is not indispensable to the retention of the cause in court after it has been properly brought there. It is true that the filing of the transcript operates as an appeal, and the cause is properly in court. But the appeal so taken and the jurisdiction so acquired, are obviously but temporary and provisional. The very law which declares that the filing of the transcript shall operate as an appeal, prescribes the period and the conditions of its continuance in court, and though the appeal is pending and the court has jurisdiction for six months, yet if during that time no notice be filed, the same law requires that the appeal shall be deemed to be no longer pending, or that it shall be regarded as dismissed. The law which gave vitality to the appeal during the period limited, peremptorily deprives it of life unless certain conditions necessary to continue its existence be fulfilled. Such we consider would be the construction of statutory provisions like these, even if they related to ordinary suits before a court of general and superior jurisdiction. But they should a fortiori be so construed in this case, where the court has but a special and limited jurisdiction derived from the statute alone, and to be exercised, like the jurisdiction of an inferior court, only in the manner and to the extent prescribed by the statute.

The claimants' counsel have adduced in support of their construction of the statute, an illustration from the practice of the court of chancery of New York. It was by the rules of that court provided, that if the plaintiff did not reply within a certain time, "he should be precluded from replying." The court, however, under special circumstances, grants leave to file a replication. But this rule is obviously a mere rule of practice framed by the court for its own government. Such rules, even when prescribed by a superior tribunal, the court has the power to modify to meet the exigencies of special cases—a power which it does not possess over the positive requirements of a statute. [Poultney v. City of La Fayette] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 472; [Saltmarsh v. Tut-hill] 12 How. [53 U. S.] 389; [Bank of Alabama v. Dalton] 9 How. [50 U. S.] 522. Moreover the practice under this rule shows that it was merely intended to preclude the right of replying as of course, but that it was not intended to take away the right in all cases. The court which made the rule expounds its intention and meaning, and establishes the practice under it.

But if the views heretofore expressed be correct, the provision in the act of 1852 is not to be limited to a rule of practice established by the court, but is a statute of limitations enacted by the legislature. It prescribes a period within which the party is to adopt the appeal which the government has provisionally taken for him, and which is allowed to be pending and awaiting his action for a specified time. His failure to adopt this appeal by filing the required notice, puts him in the same position as if he had been himself required to take it within the same period, and had omitted to do so.

We are very sensible of the hardship of this and similar cases. We regret that we have no power to relieve them. Under the construction we have felt compelled to give to the statute, we have no alternative but to dismiss the claim.

RIGHT OF APPEAL—PROVISIONAL DECREE—REFER-costs, with liberty to either party, within 20 days, to take an order of reference to a commissioner to ascertain and report the amount of the sums composing the bottomry debt, and what portions thereof had been previously a lien upon the vessel, and, on the coming in of the report, either party to be at liberty to move the court to frame the decree in correspondence therewith, and the libellant appealed to this court from that decree, but no other steps were taken by either party in the court below, subsequently to the entry of the decree, held, that the decree was not a final decree from which an appeal would lie to this court.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court against the barque Yuba, to recover the amount due on a bottomry bond for $9,240, given by her master at New Orleans, for money required to repair her, she having put into that port in distress. The district court made a provisional decree in favor of the libellants, for $4,000, with interest and costs, with liberty to either party, within twenty days, to take an order of reference to a commissioner, to ascertain and report the amount of the sums composing the bottomry debt, and what portions thereof had been previously a lien upon the vessel, and, on the coming in of the report, either party to be at liberty to move the court to frame the decree in correspondence therewith. [Case No. 11,920.] The libellant appealed to this court from that decree, but no other steps were taken by either party in the court below, subsequently to the entry of the decree.

Francis R. Coudert, for libellant.

Welcome R. Beebe and Charles Donohue, for claimant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. It is manifest, from the form of the decree in this case, that it was not intended to be final. A gross sum is stated provisionally, subject to be modified by the court on the coming in of the report of the commissioner as to the portions of the bottomry debt that were liens on the vessel. Obviously, till this fact was ascertained the true amount for which the ship was liable under the bond could not be determined. The $4,000 fixed seems to have been a formal sum, with a view to the reference and the ascertaining of specific data from which the proper amount might be inserted in the final decree. But, even if this is not the fair construction of the legal effect of the decree, and the reference was left to the election of either party, the record should have shown the neglect or refusal of the claimant to take action in regard to a reference, and the entry of a final decree.

There being no final decree in the case in the court below, the court has no jurisdiction to revise the action of that court, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

[NOTE. Subsequently the district court dismissed the libel. Case unreported. The libellant again appealed to this court, where the decree of the district court was reversed. Case No. 18,193.]

BOTTOMRY BOND—REPAIRS OF VESSEL—COMMISSIONS AND PREMIUM.

1. Where a vessel entered a port of distress, and necessary repairs were made upon her on her credit, and afterwards, it being impossible to procure funds in any other way, a loan was made on bottomry to pay for the repairs, and the money was applied to paying for them: Head, that it was no objection to a recovery on the bottomry bond, that the repairs were made before the loan was effected.

[Cited in The Kathleen, Case No. 7,624; The Edward Albro, Id. 4,290.]

2. It having been necessary to discharge the cargo, to enable the extent of the damage to the vessel to be ascertained and the repairs to be made, the bill of a stevedore was a proper charge, as incidental to the repairs.

3. So, also, a charge for commissions in procuring the loan was proper, as incidental to the loan, it being impossible to raise the loan only through an agent.

4. Charges for repairs and other expenses allowed, as being customary at the bottomry port, although high, and a premium of twenty per cent. on the bottomry bond also allowed.

5. Some of the charges might be reduced, as between the claimants and the persons rendering the services, but the lender upon bottomry in good faith, and under circumstances which justified the loan, cannot be held responsible for the reasonableness of the charges in the repair of the vessel.

[Cited in The Archer, 15 Fed. 279.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court against the bark Yuba, to recover the amount of a bottomry bond on the vessel, executed at New Orleans. [The vessel was in New Orleans in distress, and was repaired under the directions of her master, and the money advanced by the firm of Ad. Odier, Stouse & Leisy, who took this bond for the amount with maritime interest of 20 per cent. and afterwards transferred it to the libellant. The money advanced was used for paying various bills for discharging the vessel previous to the repairs, for the bills of repairs, and commissions for procuring the advance, etc., and after the bills were paid there remained a balance of $192.44, which was handed to the master of the vessel. Judge Betts, in the district court, decided that the circumstances of the case were calculated to throw suspicion upon the good faith of the loan, and gave a decree for the libellant for only $4,000, with leave to make a reference and show whether claims which were liens on the vessel were paid by this loan to a greater amount. (Case No. 11,920.)² The district court subsequently dismissed the libel, [case unreported,] and the libellant appealed to this court.

² [From 41 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 709.]

Francis R. Coudert, for libellant.
Charles Donohue, Dexter A. Hawkins, and Joseph Lovell, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. I am satisfied, that the repairs of the vessel at New Orleans, into which port she entered in distress, were necessary; and that the money was lent on the bottomry bond in good faith, for the purpose of paying for those repairs, and was applied to paying for them.

The objection, that the repairs were made before the loan was effected, and, hence, that the loan was not necessary in order to procure the repairs and enable the vessel to proceed on her voyage, is not tenable. The repairs were made upon the credit of the vessel, and the loan was indispensable to relieve her from the charges.

The discharge of the cargo became necessary, to enable the surveyors to ascertain the extent of the damage, and the ship master to make the repairs. That service was incidental to the repairs, and without it they could not be made, and, hence, the stevedore's bill was a proper charge. So, in respect to the commissions for the procurement of the loan. They were incidental to the loan itself, as it could be raised, in the given case, only through an agency. This principle is applicable, also, to several other items objected to.

The charges for the repairs and other expenses connected therewith are high, and may be unreasonable; but, the weight of the proof shows that they are the customary charges and expenses in the port of New Orleans. The premium of twenty per cent. on the bottomry bond is objected to as exorbitant and out of all proportion to the risk, but I cannot so hold, upon the proofs in the case.

If the question was between the claimants and the persons rendering the services to the vessel, I might be disposed to cut down some of the charges, notwithstanding the evidence in support of them. But I think that the lender upon bottomry in good faith, and under circumstances which justified the loan, cannot be justly held responsible for the reasonableness of the charges in the repair of the vessel. He would be required, if held to this responsibility, to take upon himself the burden of contracting for or superintending all repairs.

Reasonable exertions were made by the consignee of the vessel to procure the funds from her owners and agents in New York, but they declined making the advances, or rather admitted their inability to make them, and the parties at the port of distress were left to raise the money as they best could.

Upon this view of the case, I must reverse the decree below, and decree, in favor of the libellant, the amount of the bottomry bond, except the $192.44 paid to the captain.

Adam Gordon, for libelants.

Wm. R. Hockley, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. This suit is instituted by the libelant [John P.] Smith and about 150 others, some of whom are joined with him in the main libel, and the rest appear as petitioners under the libel. They all claim salvage for services rendered to the cargo and materials of the ship Yucatan (Casey, master), wrecked upon Carrysfort Reef. Upon the trial of the cause considerable testimony was taken upon the subject of the comparative merits and demerits of the different sets of salvors in saving the cargo and materials, and also in relation to their respective shares in the salvage to be decreed. I shall not attempt to state or comment upon the mass of the testimony given upon the different branches of the case, or to reconcile any of its inconsistencies; nor shall I often give the reasons why certain portions of testimony should be believed and other portions rejected. I shall only state the main facts in the case as I believe them to be established by the testimony, and then apply the law to these facts.

The principal facts in the main cause, as alleged in the libel, admitted in the answer and proved by the testimony, are these: The ship Yucatan (Casey, master), laden with a cargo of cotton, pork, flour, and meal, while on a voyage from New Orleans to Liverpool, on the night of the 20th of April last, in tempestuous weather, struck upon that part of the Florida Reef known as Carrysfort Reef, and before morning filled with water. In the morning Captain Smith, of the sloop Gazelle, a regular wrecker on the coast, arrived at the wreck, and soon after the British schooner Triton, a transient vessel bound to this port, and the regular wrecking sloop Globe. In the afternoon of the same day the wrecking sloops George Eldridge and Convoy arrived. When Smith boarded the ship, she was filled with water, and was straining and working badly, so as to endanger her breaking in pieces. To relieve the wreck he advised Captain Casey to cut away the masts, which was accordingly done. The crews of the Gazelle, Globe, and Triton then attempted to save some portion of the cargo by boating it on board the Triton; but after transferring to the Triton eight bales of cotton, sailors' chests, and a few other articles, the weather became so tempestuous as to render it prudent for all persons to abandon the wreck and seek a harbor on board the wrecking vessels. This was accordingly done. The gale continued during the night of the 21st and a considerable portion of the 22d. On the 22d the salvors returned to the wreck, and succeeded in saving a small quantity of corn and a few bales of cotton. They were, however, soon obliged, by the continued bad weather, to seek shelter and safety in the harbor at Key Roderiguez. On the morning of the 23d, they again returned to the wreck, and partly loaded the schooner Triton. At this time, the wrecking sloops Plume, America, Vineyard, and Empire having arrived at the wreck, were consorted with the Gazelle, Globe, George Eldridge, and Convoy, making a force of eight vessels, of an aggregate tonnage of 445 tons and 79 men. These men now went to work to discharge the cargo and put it on board their vessels. During the 23d but little was accomplished, as the sea continued so rough throughout the day that no vessel could lie alongside of the wreck. On the 24th the wind had abated, and the sea had become smooth. The weather now remained good, and the sea smooth, throughout the whole period of the labors of the salvors, except a slight squall one afternoon. They continued their labors in discharging the ship, and placing the cargo on board their vessels, and bringing it to this port, until the 9th of May, when the principal salvors abandoned the wreck to another set of salvors, who saved the residue of the cargo. On the 26th of April the sloop Texas and her crew were united with the other salvors, thus increasing the force by another vessel and 16 men. The labor of breaking out the cargo and of transferring it on board the wrecking vessels was very considerable. The wreck heeled over very much, bringing the deck of the lower side several feet under water. The hold on the lower side was entirely full of water, and nearly so in the center. It was a work of great labor and difficulty to break out the cargo. It had been stowed very compactly. The corn in bags swelled, thus pressing the cargo more firmly together. To facilitate the discharge, the beams of the ship were cut asunder, to allow the vessel to open and spread, and thus loosen the cargo. The decks were cut away, and finally, on the 28th of April, the salvors set fire to the wreck, and burned off the deck and sides, down to the water's edge, to enable them to get at the cargo. For several days previous to burning the deck, the noxious gases and impure exhalations arising from the wet corn, in a state of fermentation and decomposition, sickened and blinded the men employed in the hold. Nearly or quite one-half of the cargo was saved by diving. In short, the entire service seems to have been one of some labor and fatigue, particularly to the divers, but unattended by any danger, except to the health of the divers exposed to the impure air in the hold. The general management and direction of the business of saving the cargo was committed to Captain Smith, as the first boarder and principal wrecker, by Captain Casey, who, however, remained by the wreck, advising, assisting, and controlling, as he thought proper. The mate, too, remained at the wreck, and kept an account of the cargo put on board the several wrecking vessels.

These are the principal facts connected with the saving of this cargo. On the trial of the main cause I was disposed to think that more time had been consumed in saving the property than was necessary, and that the active and prompt energies of the salvors had not been so much exerted, as are usual in like cases on this, in consequence of dissatisfactions existing among the salvors themselves as to the terms of their agreement to divide the salvage to be earned, and in consequence of delays arising in making these agreements. In a collateral proceeding, too, it is alleged by Stickney that Smith did not labor in good faith; that he repeatedly refused to permit other men and vessels than those already employed to save cargo; and it is suggested that, if he had allowed all persons arriving at different times at the wreck to save what they could, that the cargo would have been saved in much less time and in better condition. A fuller consideration of the whole case, a comparison of dates, and careful reflection upon the testimony have satisfied my mind that these charges and imputations upon Smith are entirely without foundation in truth. I think that he had at all times vessels and men enough employed to save the cargo, in nearly or quite as short a time as was practicable, and stood ready at any time or moment to employ more, if Captain Casey thought it necessary. Smith was the active man under Casey, and employed for him all the men and vessels Casey desired. The only part of Smith's conduct which appears to me is at all liable to censure is his hesitation and omission to employ and set to work all the divers he could procure, without waiting to bargain or agree with them as to the amount of their compensation. But even on this point it is difficult to determine from the testimony whether these divers would have gone to work without making terms on their part, or whether they were very much needed before they were actually employed, or whether his associates would have been satisfied if they had been employed without an understanding as to the amount of their compensation.

But, before proceeding to consider and decide the question of the amount of salvage to be allowed in this case, it will be well to examine and dispose of the petition of Captain Stickney. By so doing we shall have a more complete and full view of the whole case. It appears from his petition and the testimony that he arrived at the wreck on the 26th of April, in the Governor Bennet, with a crew of 12 men, and found Captain Smith in charge of the business of discharging the cargo. He applied to Smith for leave to go to work, and was refused. He alleges that the master of the ship had resigned the authority and control to Smith. This allegation is not proved, but, on the contrary, is disproved. He alleges that Smith did not labor in good faith; that he loaded but one vessel at a time, when several might have been loaded; that the cargo might have been saved in half the time; that Smith's forces did not work nights, when they might have done so; that Smith would not permit his (Stickney's) crew to work at night; and that much cargo, of great value, was totally lost by the refusal of Smith to permit him to labor, either by day or night. He alleges that the wreck was totally deserted on the 5th of May, and that he proceeded to take from it 26 bales of cotton, 8 barrels of pork, 7 barrels of lard, 7 barrels of corn meal, and a lot of rigging, all of which he has saved and brought to this port. He also dived up a bale of cotton that had fallen overboard and sunk, although forbidden to do so, which he also brought to this port, and he prays salvage upon these articles.

In regard to several of these allegations and charges against Smith, it may be remarked that they are matters of opinion merely, and are not capable of any direct proof or disproof. In regard to several others, they are disproved. It may be true that Captain Casey had resigned the authority or control in the business of saving the cargo to Captain Smith. Smith acted and labored under Captain Casey. Captain Casey permitted Smith to exercise a general management and control, to employ vessels and men when necessary, to refuse to employ others when unnecessary, and, generally, to act for him, so long as his acts and conduct were satisfactory to Captain Casey. It is true that Smith refused to allow Stickney's crew to go to work, but at that time there were sufficient vessels and men employed to save the cargo. Smith's forces did work, in the early part of the transaction, several nights, and, at a later period, part of the nights. Whether any men could have worked safely or to any advantage in the night, at any time after Stickney arrived at the wreck, I think very doubtful. After that time all the cargo had to be broken out by diving under the water, and whether this is a safe or prudent operation to be performed in the hold of a vessel in the night is, I think, very doubtful. I do not think that any cargo was lost by Smith's refusal to permit Stickney's crew to work. Much testimony has been taken upon these allegations of Stickney, and a great deal of it has been vague and unsatisfactory, and much of it mere matters of opinion. To recapitulate or comment upon this testimony would be tedious and unprofitable. It is sufficient to say that the impression made upon my mind by all of the testimony on both sides is by no means unfavorable to the capacity, energy, good faith, and good conduct of Captain Smith, as displayed in saving this cargo; nor is the testimony unfavorable in any degree to the competency, efficiency, and good conduct of Captain Casey and Mr. Hezewood, his mate.

Captain Stickney, in his petition, prays salvage on the bale of cotton dived up and saved by him, and on the cotton, pork, lard, and meal taken by him from the wreck; and the question to be decided is, is he entitled to it? As to the bale of cotton saved by diving, it appears that it had fallen overboard accidentally, and some one of the salvors told Captain Stickney that he might have the salvage on it if he would weigh and save it. He accordingly did so, but before and at the time of weighing the bale Captain Casey positively forbade his taking it, and again, before he had carried it on board his vessel, Captain Casey forbade his doing it. He still persisted in claiming that he had a right to save it, and expressed his willingness to abide by the decision of the court on the point. The reason Captain Casey assigned for prohibiting Stickney's saving the bale is that he did not wish to have the bale separated from the rest of the cargo. As to the 26 bales, the pork, lard, etc., taken by Stickney from the wreck, he alleges that, at the time he commenced taking them, the wreck had been totally deserted, and insists, therefore, that he had a right to take them. But before he had got out more than a very few bales, the other salvors returned to the wreck, when they, with the mate of the ship, who had now been left in charge, forbade his proceeding any further in obtaining cargo. It is evident, from the character of these transactions, that Stickney believed that the sunken bale of cotton had been abandoned at the time he weighed it, and that therefore he had a right to do so, and also that he believed that the wreck had been abandoned. There is no doubt that, if the sunken bale or the wreck had been at any time abandoned or deserted, in the proper sense of these words, by Captain Casey and the first set of salvors, then Stickney, or any other first comer or finder, would have the right to take possession of the bale and the wreck, and save what they could. But the facts are not so. As to the sunken bale, it had accidentally fallen overboard, the salvors intending at their earliest opportunity to weigh and save it. They had not abandoned it. They were there with all the means necessary, and they intended to save it. Captain Casey had not abandoned it, and he forbade Stickney's interfering with it. Neither had the salvors nor Captain Casey abandoned or deserted the wreck at the time that he took from it the 26 bales of cotton, the pork, and meal. They were but temporarily absent, intending to return. They had given up no right to save the property. They did almost immediately return, and continue to work at the wreck for several days afterwards.

Now, there is nothing clearer than that the master of a ship wrecked upon the coast remains and continues the master, with all a master's rights, authority, and responsibility, as long as a plank of her remains or a particle of the cargo can be saved by him. He cannot divest himself of the character of master, or so delegate his authority but that he may at any time resume it; for it is an authority conferred upon him by law. He has the custody and charge of the property with a special and qualified interest in it, and he may make such arrangements as he sees fit for saving it. No stranger has ordinarily any right to interfere, without his consent, under the pretense of saving the property. It is possible for extreme cases to exist where even a stranger might have the right to interfere to save and protect the property from destruction for the benefit of the owner; as when the captain of a vessel should fraudulently undertake to destroy the vessel and cargo by setting fire to them, or should attempt to run away with them, fraudulently intending to convert them to his own use, or to engage the vessel in acts of piracy. But these are extreme cases, and not at all like the one before us. In the present case Captain Casey was employed with a sufficient force in saving this property, and Stickney had no right to interfere with it without his leave and license. But suppose Captain Casey had resigned, or delegated to Captain Smith the management and control of the business of saving the cargo of the Yucatan; or suppose that the wreck had been abandoned by her captain and crew, and found as derelict by Smith, or by him and his associates, Stickney would not, in such case, have any right to interfere with Smith's possession of the property, or his conduct in saving it without his consent, unless in some such extreme cases as I have noticed above as applicable to the master. Nothing is clearer than that a salvor or set of salvors in possession has a lien,—a qualified property in the thing; and no other persons, without his or their consent, can lawfully intrude themselves upon that possession, or gain a title to be deemed co-salvors. The Maria, Edw. Adm. 175; The Henry Ewbank [Case No. 6,376]; Hand v. The Elvira [d. 6,015]. Even the master of a ship himself would not have a right to dispossess a salvor without his consent who had earned a clear right to salvage by rendering actual meritorious service. In short, in every point of view in which I am able to consider the matter, it appears to me that Stickney's interference, under the circumstances, was wrongful, and that his petition should consequently be dismissed.

To return, now, to the question of the amount of salvage to be decreed. Upon this subject little need be said. The main facts of the case have already been stated. The number of salvors is unusually large, and the services of all of them were needed in order to save the cargo as soon as possible from its perishing and perilous condition. Whatever amount shall be decreed the share of each upon a division and distribution will, in consequence of their great number, be small. The salvors were employed in this service in all about 17 days. The amount of property saved by them is $41,924.85. A large portion of this amount was saved by diving. All the circumstances considered, I think that 43 per cent. upon the amount saved by the larger wrecking vessels is a reasonable compensation. It will give to each no great reward, but it is as much as, under all the circumstances, I think I ought to allow. It is not common to allow, in any cases in this court, more than the one moiety of the net value of the property saved. In this case, by charging the residue with the payment of the costs and expenses, the wharfage and storage, etc., it will be found that the rate of salvage received will be equal nearly to the one-half of the net amount of the proceeds of sales. Upon the amount saved by the Robert Henry and the small boats a larger rate of salvage ought to be allowed. These vessels saved small amounts by diving after the wreck had been abandoned by the other salvors. As to them 60 per cent. of the amount saved ought to be allowed. Salvage, eo nomine, cannot be allowed for the services rendered by the schooner Triton, not because she was a foreign or a transient vessel, but because her services were hired by Captain Casey, or by Smith acting for him, for the sum of $300. I know of no principle which can entitle her to any more than the sum agreed upon. If Captain Casey permitted or directed Smith, as being the principal wrecker, and having the chief management under him of the business of saving the cargo, to hire the services of this vessel, all the advantages arising from such hiring must and do inure to the owners of the cargo; and if Casey, or Smith, in charge under him, could have hired all the vessels employed at the same rate, it would have been his duty to do so, and thereby save the expense of salvage to the cargo. The sum, however, agreed upon for the hire, should be paid, and also the further sum of $200 should be paid to Smith and his associates as a compensation for loading the Triton. The property saved by Stickney and his crew is not to be included in the amount liable for salvage, for the reasons I have given. The petition of Casey and others remains to be considered; but as the subject-matter of this petition relates almost entirely to the distribution of the salvage and the conflicting claims of the different sets of salvors as among themselves, in which the owners of the cargo can have no interest, I forbear for the present expressing any opinion upon it.

YUENGLING v. JOHNSON.

[1 Hughes, 607; 1 3 Ban. & A. 99.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. Sept. 7, 1877.

SUIT FOR INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—NEW COMBINATION—MECHANICAL EQUIVALENTS.

1. Since the passage of the judiciary act of June 22d, 1874, and the adoption of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the provision of the judiciary act of 1793 [1 Stat. 334], requiring reasonable previous notice of a motion for a preliminary injunction to be given, stands repealed.

[Cited in Industrial & Min. Guaranty Co. v. Electrical Supply Co., 7 C. C. A. 476, 58 Fed. 737.]

2. At the time of granting an order to show cause against a motion for a preliminary injunction, a United States court or judge may, under section 718 of the Revised Statutes, and in patent cases, under section 4921, grant an immediate restraining order to be in force until the decision of the motion, for the purpose of preventing irreparable injury to complainant.

3. In respect to interlocutory injunctions, United States courts and judges have a larger discretion in patent cases than in other cases, conferred by section 4921.

4. In deciding upon applications for interlocutory injunctions in patent cases, the action of the commissioner of patents at Washington usually makes a prima facie case for or against granting them.

5. Where a patent is for a peculiar combination or arrangement of old devices, and not for a new device, the patentee is not entitled to insist upon mechanical equivalents.

On bill of injunction [by David G. Yuengling, Jr., against Fountain D. Johnson] to enjoin the infringement of a patent right. Motion for a rule to show cause against a preliminary injunction was made on August 8th, 1877, in the circuit court at Norfolk; and also a motion ex parte, without notice, for an immediate restraining order. Exhibits were filed with the bill, consisting of the affidavits of experts, and extracts from the records of the patent office. The extracts showed that a patent had been refused by a primary examiner to the Moffett register for tallying drinks in bar-rooms, as interfering with Fountain's patent for an improvement in fare-registers, 188,349; and the extracts also showed that on the 5th August, a board of examiners of the patent office had, on appeal, affirmed the decision of the primary examiner. The affidavits showed that in the opinion of the affiants as experts the Moffett register did infringe the Fountain register. The bill showed that the right of Fountain's patent for the state of Virginia had been purchased by and duly assigned to Yuengling, the complainant. On the bill and exhibits the court gave an order requiring the defendant to show cause against the motion for a preliminary injunction at Alexandria, on the 4th September proximo, and also an immediate restraining order meantime against the making, using, or vending of the Moffett register. On the power of the court to grant an immediate restraining order on ex parte motion without notice, the judge filed the following note in the record of the case, on the 3d September:

HUGHES, District Judge. On the 8th of August the complainant filed a bill of injunction in this court in term at Norfolk, and moved for a temporary injunction in accordance with the prayer of the bill, and for an immediate restraining order. He also filed sundry documents and affidavits, making out a prima facie case for an injunction. The object was to prevent one Fountain D. Johnson, manufacturer of a certain mechanical register called the Moffett register, from selling and delivering these instruments, it appearing that he was about to deliver a large number of them to the auditor of public accounts of Virginia, to be distributed by him to retail liquor dealers throughout the state for use. The evidence filed with the bill showed that skilled officers of the patent bureau of the United States had officially decided this Moffett register to be an infringement of a patent, the exclusive right to use which was owned by the complainant for the state of Virginia; and it was plain, if this should prove true, that the state was about to embark, in a futile manner, with an improper instrument, upon a new plan of taxation devised by her legislature, to the injury of the rights of the complainant, and that this was likely to be done in a few days.

It being apparent to the court that in case the pretensions of the claimant were true, the injury and confusion resulting would be irreparable, and that the complainant might have no recourse except to the liberality of the legislature of the state, an order was entered by which: 1st. The defendant in the bill was required to show cause at Alexandria, on the 4th instant, why the motion for a temporary injunction should not be granted. 2d. Restraining the defendant and all others meantime from making, using, or vending the said Moffett register; and, 3d. Requiring the complainant to file a bond in the penalty of ten thousand dollars to answer any orders of this court against him in this cause.

The expediency of this order seemed obvious to the court; but it felt at first some doubt of its power to grant the temporary restraining order, except after reasonable previous notice served. Upon a critical examination of the condition of the law on the subject, however, this doubt was removed, as will appear from the following review of the legislation of congress,—and the order was given:

Section 5 of the judiciary act of congress of March 3, 1793 (chapter 22, Acts 1793, 1 Stat. 334, 335), concludes with the words: "Nor shall a writ of injunction be granted in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party, or his attorney, of the time and place of moving the same." The greater portion of the provisions of this act of 1793 were incorporated into the Revised Statutes of June 22d, 1874, c. 12; but the foregoing clause requiring reasonable previous notice to be given in all cases of injunction was left out, and therefore stands repealed by section 5596 of the Revised Statutes.² Instead of this provision the seventh section of the judiciary act of June 1st, 1872 (chapter 255, 17 Stat. 197), was inserted, which is in these words: "Whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction out of a circuit or district court, the court or judge thereof may, if there appears to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion, and such order may be granted with or without security, in the discretion of the court or judge." This act had already been in force for two years before the enactment of the Revised Statutes, and had virtually not only repealed the clause quoted from the judiciary act of 1793, but also rendered subordinate to its own provisions that part of rule 55 in equity requiring previous reasonable notice to be given of motions for injunction. While the clause of the act of 1793 in question was in force there were many decisions of the supreme and circuit courts of the United States enforcing it, and these rulings of the courts have gone into the digests and text-books in use by the bar. But when the law itself fell, of course these rulings of the courts and teachings of the text-books ceased to be of authority in contravention of the later law. But even before the passage of the judiciary act of June 1st, 1872, an act of congress revising, digesting, and consolidating all the laws relating to patent rights was passed July 8th, 1870 (see 16 Stat. 206), and a section enacted in it authorizing the courts of the United States to deal with injunctions in patent cases in a special manner. This section placed injunctions in patent cases on a different footing from other injunctions. In this particular class of cases the courts were released from the requirement to adhere strictly to the rules of practice prescribed by law or rule of court in general for the federal courts sitting in equity, and the circuit courts were "vested with power upon bill in equity, filed by any party aggrieved, to grant injunctions according to the course and principles of courts of equity, to prevent the violation of any right secured by patent, on such terms as the court may deem reasonable." Thus was authority given to grant injunctions in patent cases, not upon such limited terms as were at the time required by law or rules in equity to be observed in other cases by the circuit courts of the United States sitting in equity, either as to notice, security, or other requirement; but authority was given to grant them in patent cases on such terms as accorded with the course and principles of courts of equity in general, and as the particular court in which the motion was made "might deem reasonable." This law made injunctions in patent cases exceptional, and conferred on United States circuit courts an unrestricted discretion as to the terms of granting injunctions in them. This provision of the law of 1870 has been carried into the Revised Statutes, with slight literal modifications, and stands now the law of the land in the form of section 4921. Thus, in patent cases, where the emergency was urgent, the court might grant injunctions without reasonable previous notice, before the law of 1872. The passage of the judiciary act of June 1st, 1872, has given this power in all cases, and now injunctions may be granted in any case deemed exigent by the court, without previous notice, whether it be a patent case or not. The terms of the law of 1872, section 718, are, that "whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction," the court or judge, if irreparable injury or delay be likely to result from delay, may restrain temporarily until the motion can be heard. "Whenever" means "at" whatever time notice is given, and does not mean "after" whatever time. Simultaneously, therefore, with the time of giving the rule to show cause against the motion, the court may grant an order restraining the act threatened until the decision of the motion. There is no doubt of the power under section 718 to instantly restrain in any urgent case. But even if that were not so as to injunctions in general, there is no possible doubt of the power under section 4921 to enjoin in patent cases without previous notice; a power which, however, should always be exercised with great caution.

² The language of section 5596 is: "All acts of congress passed prior to said first day of December, 1873, any portion of which is embraced in any section of said revision, are hereby repealed, and the section applicable thereto shall be in force in lieu thereof; etc., etc., etc."

The motion for a preliminary injunction was heard at Alexandria on the 4th of September, and was for three days quite elaborately argued by counsel.

John B. Young and Hill & Ellsworth, for complainants.

W. W. Crump, Daniel A. Grimsley, and James G. Field, Atty. Gen. Va. (then recently appointed to succeed the late R. T. Daniel, deceased), for defendant.

The order to show cause had required the defendant to file his answer to the bill and sustaining affidavits by the 28th of August, which had been substantially done. On the first day of the argument, defendant's counsel produced in court a patent for the Moffett register just issued to Moffett & Deane by the commissioner of patents. At the conclusion of the argument, the court rendered the following decision:

HUGHES, District Judge. Most of the questions which have been argued at bar will be more properly considered at the final hearing of this cause, and must be adjourned until that time. The motion is now heard after three weeks' notice, on bill, answer, and affidavits. The court will consider now only such questions as necessarily bear upon the motion for a preliminary injunction. It must endeavor as far as practicable to avoid committing or concluding itself on every question which will arise at the final hearing upon evidence regularly taken. The question now to be determined is, whether the complainant is entitled to a preliminary injunction. As his right to the exclusive use of the Fountain patent in Virginia may be assumed as undeniable, the principal inquiry for the court is whether the Moffett register is an infringement of it. Even that question is not now to be finally decided, and the court ought not and is not bound to commit itself finally upon it.

The fact of infringement is denied, and the point to be now determined is whether the fact is prima facie made to appear with such certainty as to justify the court in granting a preliminary injunction against the use of the instrument pendente lite. The prima facie aspect of the case has been reversed since the 8th of August, when the temporary restraining order was granted. Then the action of the patent bureau had been such as to make, in the opinion of the court, a prima facie case for the complainant. Now the case in that particular is changed. The action of the patent bureau is such as to make a prima facie case for the defendant; for the commissioner of patents, whose action is final in that bureau, has reversed the judgment of his inferior officers, and virtually pronounced that the Moffett register is not an infringement of the Fountain register, by issuing a patent to Moffett & Deane for their invention as new. It is true that the issuing of patents is not conclusive upon the courts. Patents are subject to review by the courts. Suits in a very large proportion of patent cases are but means of appeal to the courts from the action of the patent office. Yet while this is so, that action must always carry great weight with the courts. It is always very strongly persuasive with them. Patents are the results generally of contests between accomplished experts, and after such contests of the matured judgment of officers selected and appointed by the president for their extraordinary competency and skill, I think it is hardly going too far to say, following Mr. Justice Grier, in Goodyear v. Dunbar [Case No. 5,570], that the action of the patent office is sufficient to make such a prima facie case as to justify the action of a court on almost any motion for a preliminary injunction. If, indeed, in any case the general unanimous testimony of experts united in condemning the action of the patent office, in such case a court might well hesitate to treat that action as constituting a prima facie case for or against a preliminary injunction. But when, as in the present case, the weight of expert testimony is nearly evenly balanced, a court may safely presume that the action of the patent office, taken after a sharp contest between patent lawyers and experts, is prima facie correct. On this ground alone I think I would be justified in refusing a preliminary injunction in the present case. But as a court is not at liberty to surrender itself to an unquestioning reliance upon the decision of another tribunal, when the duty and responsibility are upon itself to act upon its own convictions, I will state briefly the view of the facts of the case by which I am led to concur, for the present, in the judgment of the commissioner of patents.

The patent of Fountain is not for the invention of the mechanical devices used in making up his instrument, or of any of them. These are all old and in familiar use by the public. Fountain's patent is only for a particular combination and arrangement of these old and well-known devices in a manner to serve a particular purpose. Moffett & Deane's patent is of the same character. They employ old and well-known devices also; and their patent is for a particular arrangement and combination of these devices in a manner to serve a particular purpose other than that of the Fountain register. And it is a fact, obvious from an inspection of the two instruments, that the devices employed in one instrument are not identical with those employed in the other; and that the arrangement and combination of the respective devices made use of in each are different. Fountain claims the invention of the worm meshing into a cogwheel to impart motion to the indexes. Moffett & Deane use no worm. The striking apparatus of the two instruments are different. Fountain has a single spring attached to the hammer, without any means of withdrawing the hammer instantly from the bell. Moffett & Deane have two springs, one to throw the hammer against the bell, and another to instantly withdraw it. Moffett & Deane use a pinion to drive the registering apparatus; Fountain uses no pinion. Fountain's instrument is portable, and contrived especially for the purpose of registering fares taken on public conveyances; while Moffett & Deane's is intended to be stationary, and is contrived for the purpose of tallying drinks taken in a bar-room. Fountain, in his specifications, claims that "his invention is an improvement in fare-registers," "adapted to be carried in the hand," consisting in an "arrangement and combination of parts whereby full and half fares are registered, and an alarm sounded as rapidly as collected by the conductors," having "on its face one dial and two separate hands." In his specifications he speaks of his instrument as nothing more than a fare-register; and in alluding to devices for registering hundreds, thousands, and ten thousands, he expressly declares that these "form no part" of his instrument, thus indicating that his instrument was intended only for a fare-register. These latter devices are essential parts of Moffett & Deane's register. Moffett & Deane's organization and combination of old devices is also for a special purpose, and that purpose one which was not contemplated by Fountain, and for which Fountain's contrivance could not be used conveniently without material alteration. I think the doctrine of Mr. Justice Clifford and Judge Clarke in Crompton v. Belknap Mills [Case No. 3,406], is a sound one; that when the patent is for a peculiar combination of old devices the patentee cannot insist upon mechanical equivalents.

In general mechanics, the pinion may be the equivalent of the worm; but when one invention claimed is a combination of devices including the worm, another invention of a combination including the pinion differs from it in the very fact of using the pinion. It would be almost absurd to hold that a patent for a particular manner of using the worm would be infringed by a patent for a particular manner of using the pinion. We are taught at school that the lever, the windlass, and the pulley are all one and the same in the mechanical principle involved; yet a combination of several devices, of which a pulley should be one, might not, in fact, even remotely resemble a combination in which a lever or a windlass should be used. I think it is a just ruling of the courts that mechanical equivalents cannot be insisted upon in inventions which consist of the mere arrangement of old devices. The same seems to me to be the case with regard to the purpose for which a combination is invented. The invention of a new device is in general patentable without reference to the object it is designed to accomplish, and is good against any subsequent invention of the same device designed for any other object. But it seems to me that this is not necessarily the case where the invention is merely of a combination of old devices. In such inventions the purpose aimed at, the form of the structure, its portableness or non-portableness, whether it is used as a fixture or carried in the hand;—are elements which, though any one of them might not determine its character with reference to another invention of a combination of devices, yet all, together, might unite to constitute a different instrument. I repeat, however, that I do not wish to be considered as concluding myself or the court in its decision at the final hearing. It is sufficient for me to say that the complainant has not made a prima facie case so strongly in his favor as to warrant the court in awarding a preliminary injunction; and the motion is therefore denied. The order denying the motion will also dissolve the temporary restraining order which was granted on the 8th of August, and put the defendant under bond to account for the number of instruments manufactured by him and his receipts from their sale. The bond of the defendant must also be given with reference to the great number of suits which complainant may be obliged to bring in the event of a decree in his favor at the final hearing.

In accordance with this opinion bond was required of the defendant in the penalty of $20,000, conditioned as indicated. The case was continued for final hearing at Richmond to the 17th day of October, during the fall term of the circuit court.

YZNAGA et al. v. PEASLEE.

[1 Cliff. 493.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1860.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS — APPRAISEMENT BY SAMPLES — WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

1. Where sugar imported into the United States is appraised by samples which were drawn from the packages by the person called the sampler, and were delivered by him to the local appraisers, and the examination was made by them without having seen the packages, held, in the absence of any objection by the importers as to the manner of drawing the samples, or to their identification, that it was a substantial compliance with the requirements of the act of congress authorizing the appraisal in such a case to be made by samples.

2. And where, upon appeal to merchant appraisers, the samples were, after the decision of the local appraisers, placed in the depository in the appraisers' department, and were there kept until the meeting of the merchant appraisers, and were then produced by one of the local appraisers, and no objection as to the identity of the samples being then made by the importers, held, that all objections which might have been taken at the appeal were waived by the importers.

3. If the samples are fairly selected from one in ten of the packages, and are fully identified, it is of no importance whether they were drawn from the packages by the appraisers themselves or by the official sampler of the appraisers' department.

[Cited in brief in Re Rosenwald, 59 Fed. 766.]

This was an action of assumpsit brought by the plaintiffs [Antonio Yznaga and others] as importers of foreign merchandise, against the defendant [Charles H. Peaslee] as collector of the port of Boston, to recover back an alleged excess of duties which they had previously paid on an importation from Trinidad, of two hundred hogsheads of Muscovado sugars. The goods were entered at the custom-house at Boston for warehousing at the public stores, October 23, 1853. Certain additions were made to the invoice value by the importers at the time of the entry, so that the entry value amounted to seven thousand seven hundred and fourteen dollars. To this amount the local appraisers added six hundred and ninety-six dollars and twenty-three cents. The importers appealed to merchant appraisers, but they returned the same sum, making the dutiable value of the importation eight thousand four hundred and ten dollars and twenty-three cents. Duties were accordingly calculated on that basis, and the appraised value exceeding by ten per cent. the value declared in the entry, a duty of twenty per cent. in addition to the duties otherwise imposed by law was levied and claimed by the collector. The local appraisers reported December 23, 1853; and the merchant appraisers, January, 1854. On the 2d and 3d of February the goods were withdrawn from the warehouse and the duties paid under protest. None of the hogsheads containing the sugars were actually examined by the local appraisers, nor were the sugars at any time seen by the merchant appraisers. The appraisement was made by both upon samples drawn out by the examiner of sugars, liquors, and cigars in the appraisers' department. His duties, as he stated, were to sample goods, and carry the samples to the office of the local appraisers. He is called the sampler, holding no commission, but usually selected by the local appraisers, and approved by the secretary of the treasury. Samples are drawn from one in ten of the packages; but where all the packages bear the same mark, indicating them to be all of the same description, one sample, containing a small quantity of the importation, from one in ten of the packages, is usually regarded as sufficient to enable the appraisers to perform their duties according to law. Such samples, when properly prepared, are put into secure wrappers, marked with the number of the manifest, together with the marks of the packages from which they were selected, and other marks to secure their identification. When thus prepared, the samples are placed in a depository designated for the purpose, and there kept until examined by the local appraisers. In case appeal to merchant appraisers is taken, the samples are kept in the same depository until examined by them. Objection in this case was made that the samples were not properly drawn, and also that they were not satisfactorily identified with the sugars in question. The jury gave a verdict for the defendant, subject to questions of law that arose at the trial.

B. F. Hallett, for plaintiffs.

The merchant appraisers cannot delegate any part of their powers and duty of examining one in ten of the packages, or samples of one in ten, to any other person. The importer, on his appeal, is entitled to the judgment of the merchant appraisers, based upon their knowledge of the true value of the merchandise. Bartlett v. Kane, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 263-272; Rankin v. Hoyt, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 335; Tappan v. U. S. [Case No. 13,749]. That the merchant appraisers should give their decision upon the mere exhibition of supposed samples, without it being conclusively known to them that they are genuine and fair samples, is imposing a risk upon the importer, against which the law expressly protects him. 5 Stat. 563, §§ 16, 17, 21; Greely's Adm'r v. Burgess, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 415, 416; 4 Stat. 410; 3 Stat. 375, § 16. If the merchandise be such as is bought and sold by sample, the appraisal may be made by samples, due care being taken that they are fairly selected from the packages, designated on the invoice by the collector, and identified as such. Treas. Reg. 1857, 321. The "due care" applies to the appraisers, who must have the knowledge personally. Greely v. Thompson, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 225. The act of the appraisers was in the nature of a judicial act.

C. L. Woodbury, for defendant.

As to the duty of appraisers. 3 Stat. 735; 5 Stat. 563. Sampler. 4 Stat. 411. And the clerks and all other persons employed in the appraisers' office shall be appointed by the principal appraisers, and the number and compensation fixed by the secretary of the treasury. Treas. Reg. 1857, 277. What examination of goods necessary. Sampson v. Peaslee, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 580; Burgess v. Converse [Case No. 2,154]. The sampler, as clerk, has a substantial duty to perform, and as an officer of the United States his duties are described in his oath. The drawing of samples is a ministerial act, not requiring judicial discretion. Barry v. Arnaud, 2 Perry & D. 646. It is a general principle that a ministerial officer cannot appoint a deputy. Broom, Leg. Max. 666; Cooper v. Coates, 5 Man. & G. 98; Midhurst v. Waite, 3 Burrows, 1260. CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Mere matters of fact, it must be understood, were settled by the verdict, and the finding of the jury will not be revised by the court in a proceeding like the present.

Evidence was introduced by the defendant, showing that the goods constituting the importation were of the class bought and sold by samples, but there was considerable contrariety in the testimony as to the manner in which the samples were usually drawn in such sales. Both parties examined the sampler as to the manner in which the samples in this case were drawn, and he admitted that his recollection of the particular transaction was not very distinct. Taken as a whole, however, his testimony shows, to the satisfaction of the court, that he went to the vessel, or to the place where the vessel was discharged, and drew the samples in the usual and regular way, according to the course of business at the custom-house and the practice of the port. Two samples, at least, were exhibited to the appraisers on the appeal, and, from the marks found upon the wrappers recognized by the sampler, there can be no doubt that they were the identical samples drawn from the sugars in question, and used by the local appraisers. Notice was given by the attorney of the plaintiffs of the time and place designated for the hearing of the appeal, and he testifies that he was present with the merchant appraisers. When the samples were exhibited, he inquired what evidence there was of their identity, or that they had been properly taken, and he states in substance and effect that he received no answer to his inquiries; but he made no objection to an examination by samples, and by his silence acquiesced in the proceedings, remaining at the public store until he ascertained that the goods had been advanced. Certain propositions of fact involving the identity of the samples and the fairness of their selection are also submitted by the plaintiffs, which, in the view taken of the case, need not be further noticed, as they are sufficiently answered by what has already been remarked. Suffice it to say, without entering more into detail, that all those propositions are substantially negated by the jury, and in the view of the court were fully disproved by the evidence. With these remarks we come to the examination of the legal questions presented in the case, which are involved in greater difficulty, and will require more careful consideration. Appraisement by samples is conceded to be lawful where the goods imported are such as by commercial usage are bought and sold in that manner in the market, provided due care be taken that the samples are properly and fairly selected from one in ten of the packages as designated on the invoice, and provided the samples when exhibited to the appraisers and examined by them be fully identified as the ones selected for the purpose. But the plaintiffs deny that the appraisers can lawfully delegate their power and duty to another person to select the samples from packages designated on the invoice by the collector, or, in other words, they insist that to allow the samples to be selected by a sampler, as in this case, is imposing upon the importer a risk and uncertainty wholly unauthorized by law. Collectors are required to designate on the invoice at least one package of every invoice, and one package at least of every ten packages of imported goods, wares, and merchandise, and order the same to the public store to be opened, examined, and appraised. 5 Stat. 565; Treas. Reg. p. 182. Bulky articles, however, are seldom or never sent to the public store; and in respect to such importations the regulations provide that the collector "will direct their examination on the wharf, or other safe and suitable place, to be designated by him for that purpose." Recurring to those regulations, it will be seen that they also provide that, "if the merchandise be such as by commercial usage are bought and sold by samples, or where by such usage the character and quality of the merchandise are so determined, the appraisement may in such case be made by samples, due care being taken that they are properly and fairly selected from the packages designated on the invoice, and identified as such samples." Usage has sanctioned this mode of appraisement as constituting a compliance with the requirements of law, and it is now too late to question its correctness in the cases provided for in the treasury regulations. Those regulations were framed to enable the officers of the customs to perform their duties in the collection of the revenue; and it is difficult to see, where the importation consists of such goods as liquors, sugars, and the like, in what other satisfactory mode the appraisement could be effected. Such considerations undoubtedly induced the department to adopt the regulations, and inasmuch as it comports with a reasonable construction of the act of congress, it may well be sustained. Samplers, it seems, are appointed under the sixth section of the act of the 28th of May, 1830, which, among other things, provides that the clerks and all other persons employed in the appraisers' office shall be appointed by the principal appraiser, and their number and compensation limited and fixed by the secretary of the treasury. 4 Stat. 411. And by the ninth section of the act of the 30th of July, 1846, all clerks employed by the appraiser are required to take and subscribe an oath or affirmation faithfully and diligently to perform their duties, and to use their best endeavors to prevent and detect frauds upon the revenue. 9 Stat. 44. Inspectors in charge of the sample office are required by the regulations of the treasury to make daily reports to the store-keeper, stating what goods have been received and delivered in samples, and what have been transferred to the appraisers' store as merchandise for appraisement; and the regulations also provide that all labor in the receipt and delivery of samples shall be under the charge of the store-keeper at the appraisers' store; and for the faithful and prompt examination of sample packages, the appraisers are required to designate some competent officer connected with their department, to visit the sample office daily to superintend and aid in the examination of the packages. Pursuant to these various regulations, the samples in this case were drawn by the person designated as the sampler in the appraisers' office, and were by him duly marked and delivered to the local appraisers. Examination of the samples was made by them on the 23d of December, 1853; and they having marked up the goods, and the importer having appealed, the samples were placed in the depository in the appraisers' department, and there kept until the meeting of the merchant appraisers, when the samples were again produced by one of the local appraisers.

No objection is made to the proceedings before the local appraisers, and indeed none could be successfully urged, if the action of the merchant appraisers on appeal was correct. Burgess v. Converse [Case No. 2,154]. Some of the remarks of the judge in that case would seem to indicate that samples not drawn by the appraisers themselves could not in any case be allowed, but the conclusion of the opinion entirely negatives that view of the law, because the judge submitted the question to the jury, whether the examination actually made was in substance and effect equivalent to an examination of at least one package in ten of the goods constituting the importation. Examination had been made in that case by samples not selected by the appraisers, and the jury, under that instruction from the court, returned their verdict for the plaintiff, affirming that the examination made was not in substance and effect equivalent to the described examination of the packages. Error was brought by the defendant, but the supreme court approved the charge of the circuit judge. Greeley's Adm'r v. Burgess, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 416. Those cases, however, do not decide that a lawful examination and appraisement may not be made by samples where the samples are properly and fairly selected and fully identified, according to the regulations of the treasury department. On the contrary, the opinions in both cases impliedly admit that the appraisement, under some circumstances, may be made in that way, especially if it appear that the examination made was in substance and effect equivalent to an actual examination of the packages. Exceptions were taken to the examination of the packages in Sampson v. Peaslee, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 571, upon the ground that it was incomplete and insufficient; but the court held that where the examination is such as is usually made in buying and selling the articles, and was satisfactory to the appraisers, it was not open to the importer to show that it was insufficient. Nothing is wanting in this case to give full efficacy to the action of the appraisers, if in any case the examination may be made by samples, except that the samples were selected by the sampler in the appraisers' department, and not by the appraisers themselves, as explained in the statement of the case. But due notice of the time and place appointed for the hearing of the appeal was given to the attorney of the plaintiffs, and the evidence shows that he was present at the examination for the purpose of protecting their interests. Inquiry was made by him what evidence there was of the identity of the samples, or that they had been properly selected, but he did not object upon the ground that the samples had been selected by the official sampler of the appraisers' department, and not by the appraisers; and, under the circumstances, he must be understood as having waived all objections respecting the samples, except such as are impliedly involved in his inquiries. Those inquiries had respect to the identity of the parcels exhibited and to the manner of the selection, and not to the person or persons by whom it was made. Both of those objections, even assuming that they were not subsequently waived, are fully overcome by the evidence. Considering the marks upon the wrappers, all question about the identity of the parcels is wholly removed, and the testimony of the sampler is entirely satisfactory to the point that the samples were selected in the regular and usual way. Giving all due latitude of construction to the inquiries made by the attorney, it is not possible to infer from his conduct that he intended to make any other objections to the samples than those already considered; and if not, then the conclusion under the circumstances must be, that all others within his knowledge were waived. Present as he was with the appraisers, he knew the samples were not taken by them; and, what is more, he was present when the local appraiser produced the samples from the depository in the appraisers' department; and being well acquainted with the course of business in the office, he must have known by whom they were selected, as the evidence shows there was but one sampler in the department. Strong doubts are entertained whether there is any validity in the objection, even if it were open to the plaintiffs, but it is not necessary to decide it in order to dispose of the case. No one suggests that casks of sugars or liquors should be broken by the appraisers; and if not, then, practically speaking, it is clear that the appraisement must be by samples, to be selected for the purpose. Assuming that samples are to be used, it cannot be very material to the importer whether they are actually drawn from the casks by the appraisers themselves or the official sampler of the appraisers' department, provided they are properly and fairly selected and fully identified. Samplers are appointed on account of their peculiar qualifications for the duties incident to the employment, and it is not perceived that they are any more likely to make mistakes than appraisers. In view of the whole case, I am of the opinion that there was no error at the trial, and, according to the agreement of the parties, there must be judgment on the verdict.

Case No. 18,197.

YZNAGA et al. v. REDFIELD.

[4 Blatchf. 469; 1 17 Leg. Int. 357.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 29, 1860.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS—UNDERVALUATION.

1. Where a valuation of molasses in casks, in an invoice, is correct, but the quantity stated in the invoice is less than the actual quantity found on gauging, the case is not one for the imposition of a penalty for undervaluation, under section 8 of the act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 43).

2. Where an invoice of molasses in casks does not specify the number of gallons, the case is one of undervaluation, and the penalty may properly be imposed.

This was an action [by Antonio Yznaga and others] against [Heman J. Redfield] the collector of the port of New York to recover back a penalty of twenty per cent. imposed, for undervaluation, upon a cargo of molasses and sugar, imported from Cuba into that port.

Almon W. Griswold, for plaintiffs.

Benjamin F. Dunning, Asst. Dist. Atty., for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. Upon gauging some of the casks in this case, a greater number of gallons of molasses was found in them than was mentioned in the invoice, so that an excess was reported by the gauger and appraisers. The valuation of the article in the invoice was correct, but the quantity stated in the invoice was less than the quantity found in the casks. The case did not fall within the 8th section of the act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 43). That section is confined to the enhancement by the appraisers of the value of the goods in the foreign market at the time of exportation, to the amount of ten per cent. above the invoice value. The increase of the quantity is otherwise provided for. In this instance, the gauging corrected the error. The application of the penalty must not be extended by a strained construction. I think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover back the $520, with interest from the time it was paid.

As to the other casks, in respect to which the number of gallons contained in them was not specified in the invoice, the penalty was properly imposed. The case was one strictly of undervaluation, not of excess of quantity found by the gauger or appraisers. The general understanding, that a hogshead contains one hundred and ten gallons, when the quantity is not stated, is too indefinite to be relied on to change the result of this construction.

BANKRUPT ACT—ILLEGAL PREFERENCE—PURCHASER UNDER VOIDABLE JUDGMENT.

1. Wilson v. City Bank of St. Paul [17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 473], examined, and held not to cover a case where the debtor does the least act whereby the preference is facilitated: as where the judgment was entered upon his warrant of attorney to confess.

2. A purchaser at sheriff sale, after proceedings commenced in bankruptcy, where the levy was made prior thereto, will acquire a good title notwithstanding that the judgments under which the sale took place are afterwards declared void as in fraud of the act.

3. Judgments whereby a creditor of an insolvent obtains an illegal preference are voidable but not void per se.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Western district of Pennsylvania.]

In 1867, Albert G. Fry, George Duerr, and Wm. Holzner, came from York county, Pa., to Cambria county, for the apparent purpose of manufacturing and selling lumber. Having about fifteen hundred dollars capital, they purchased a small tract of land with a steam saw mill thereon, situate in Susquehanna township, for the sum of three thousand dollars; paid a small part thereon, and gave their obligations for the balance, payable in one, two or three years. They immediately bought teams and the necessary materials, largely upon credit, and commenced the business of manufacturing and selling lumber in the firm name of Fry, Duerr & Co. A. G. Fry, the senior partner, in the spring or summer of 1869 opened a store consisting of a general assortment of merchandise in Ebensburg in his own name, the goods being bought principally, if not altogether, upon credit. In the spring of 1870, they quit manufacturing lumber in Susquehanna township, and commenced to erect a new steam saw mill in Cambria township, about three miles south of Ebensburg, at an expense estimated by the witnesses examined at from five thousand to ten thousand dollars, and which was about completed when they failed on the 18th August, 1870. During the whole time they were in business, they were much embarrassed, and in constant difficulty with their creditors; but especially during the last six months or more prior to the time of their failure, they were generally reputed to be in a failing or insolvent condition. On the 4th of August, 1870, the judgment in favor of respondent Edward Roberts for one thousand and fourteen dollars and nineteen cents was entered; and on the 18th of the same month, judgments were also entered in favor of Edward Roberts, R. L. Johnston, Johnston & Scanlan, Shoemaker & Oatman, W. H. Sechler, John A. Blair, John Wambaugh, Snyder, Harris, Bassett & Co., Samuel A. Fry, for five thousand two hundred and twenty-eight dollars and thirty-three cents, John R. & A. Murdock, James Hill & Co., Samuel A. Fry for one thousand one hundred and seven dollars and seventy-five cents, all upon warrants of attorney, excepting the first one named in favor of Samuel A. Fry, which was entered by the prothonotary upon paper filed, signed by the defendant. The judgment in favor of James Hill & Co. was entered early in the forenoon of the 18th August, 1870, on a warrant of attorney of that date, for one thousand two hundred and ninety-four dollars, and was due the next day. It was publicly reported that an execution would be issued on this judgment as soon as due. The contesting respondents, Samuel A. Fry, Edward Roberts, Johnston & Scanlan, R. L. Johnston, John A. Blair, and John R. & A. Murdock, had actual knowledge or notice of the entry of the judgment in favor of James Hill & Co. on the morning of the 18th August, 1870, either by themselves or through their authorized attorney, as well as of the previously embarrassed condition of Fry, and Fry, Duerr & Co., and in order to obtain priority immediately commenced to enter judgments upon the warrants of attorney held by them, and to issue executions thereon. Other judgments were subsequently entered upon warrants of attorney and executions issued. These executions were levied upon the personal property of A. G. Fry, and Fry, Duerr & Co.; the store closed, mill stopped, and their business entirely suspended and broken up. On the 18th of August, 1870, A. G. Fry assigned to John N. Evans, his clerk in the store, book accounts against persons who had bought goods on credit in the store to the amount of eight hundred and sixty-seven dollars and fifteen cents, for the alleged purpose of paying the salary then due him; and four days afterwards transferred to the respondent, John A. Weiser, all the balance of the accounts in the store, by a transfer under his hand and seal endorsed upon the fly leaf of the ledger, for the purpose of securing the payment of two thousand five hundred dollars, alleged in the transfer to be due said Weiser. John N. Evans collected the accounts assigned to him, and John N. Weiser, by his counsel, Johnston & Scanlan, a part assigned to Weiser, before the appointment of the assignee.

S. Ewart & Co., and other open account creditors filed a petition in bankruptcy against A. G. Fry on the 7th September, 1870, at 11 o'clock a. m., and George Huntley filed a petition against Fry, Duerr & Co., on the same day, at 3 o'clock p. m., on which adjudications in bankruptcy were made, and the complainant subsequently elected assignee.

The complainant filed the present bill in the district court on the 8th August, 1872, for the purpose of setting aside the transfers of the book accounts, and the judgments confessed, and executions issued thereon in the common pleas of Cambria county, in violation of the bankrupt act, to liquidate liens, and to recover the assets of the estate. After the bill was served, all the respondents named in it, compromised, on the 28th of October, 1872, by a decree entered setting aside the preferences obtained in their favor, excepting Samuel A. Fry, John A. Weiser, Edward Roberts, R. L. Johnston, Johnston & Scanlan, John A. Blair, and John R. & A. Murdock, who filed answers, and the case proceeded as to them. The subpoena was not served on Lawrence Smith and John Ludwig, who were not found within the district; and the bill was taken pro confesso against John N. Evans for want of appearance. On the 7th September, 1870, judgment was entered in favor of E. B. Camp, execution issued, and on the 19th of November, 1870, levied upon the steam saw mill in Susquehanna township, including two small pieces of land; the piece with the mill on it was on the 8th of March, 1871, sold to respondent Thomas H. Cresswell, who afterwards moved the mill away, and converted it to his own use; the other piece was sold to respondent Henry Hopple. The judgment and execution of E. B. Camp, on which these sales were made, was also set aside by the decree of the 28th October, 1872. On the 26th September, 1872, the complainant, with leave of the court, filed an amendment making respondents Thomas H. Cresswell, Susan Keith and Henry Hopple parties, alleging that the levy and sale after petitions in bankruptcy filed, were void and conferred no title upon the purchasers. Afterwards the case was compromised as to Henry Hopple, and proceeded as to Thomas H. Cresswell and Susan Keith, who claimed as terre tenant.

The case came on for hearing before the Hon. Wilson McCandless, on the 9th July, 1873, upon bill, amendment, answer, and replication to each, proofs and exhibits; but upon intimation from the respondents' counsel that the case would be taken to the circuit court in any event, his honor remarking that it had better go there at once, dismissed the bill pro forma, as to the respondents, Samuel A. Fry, John A. Weiser, Edward Roberts, R. L. Johnston, Johnston & Scanlan, John A. Blair, John R. & A. Murdock, Thomas H. Cresswell and Susan Keith; from which decree the respondent appealed.

Geo. M. Reade, for complainant.

R. L. Johnson and W. D. Moore, for respondent in the judgments and book accounts.

F. A. Shoemaker, for respondents in amended bill.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. Creditors' petitions were filed in the district court on the 7th September, 1870, against A. G. Fry and Fry, Duerr & Co., who were merchants and traders, and were so proceeded in that they were duly adjudicated bankrupts and the complainant was appointed their assignee. On the 18th August, 1870, judgments were entered in the court of common pleas of Cambria county, on warrant of attorney in favor of the respondents severally, except Weiser, Cresswell, and Keith, executions were issued and levied upon the stock in trade of the bankrupts and their business was stopped.

The bill seeks to avoid these judgments as fraudulent under the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and to obtain a transfer of the fund produced by the executions to the complainant. By the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act any transfer, direct or indirect, of any part of his property, by an insolvent debtor to a creditor who had reasonable cause to believe that he is insolvent, and that such transfer is made in fraud of the provisions of the act, is declared to be void, and the assignee is empowered to recover the property or the value of it, from the persons receiving it or to be benefited by its transfer. Under this section, it was held by this court, after careful consideration, in Hood v. Karper [Case No. 6,664], that the confession of a judgment, the issuing of an execution and a seizure and sale of property under it, constituted an indirect transfer of such property by the debtor. In the same case it was also held that the objectionable transfer and preference were to be considered as made and obtained when the warrant of attorney was executed by the entry of the judgment, irrespective of the date of the warrant; and that when an execution must necessarily stop the debtor's business, the creditor, in general, has reason to believe the debtor to be insolvent, and must be considered as intending what, if not prevented, would be a fraud on the provisions of the act.

The co-existence of these elements of illegality in the judgments complained of, is clearly established by the proofs in the present case. At the time of their entry the bankrupts were insolvent, within any definition of insolvency, the judgments were entered upon warrants of attorney a few days before the institution of the bankruptcy proceedings, executions were contemporaneously issued upon them, which were levied upon all the available assets of the bankrupts, and their business was at once entirely broken up. There is no room for doubt, therefore, that these judgments are impressed with all the attributes of fraudulent preferences as the bankrupt law defines them. Nor, as was urged at the argument, is this conclusion inconsistent with the decision of the supreme court in Wilson v. City Bank of St. Paul [17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 473]. In that case the creditor's judgment was obtained without the aid or co-operation, direct or collusive, of the bankrupt, and so was strictly adverse. The resulting preference lacked the essential element of promotion by the bankrupt to infect it with the taint of fraud. The court, therefore, held that the mere failure of the debtor to file a petition in bankruptcy to prevent the judgment and levy was not sufficient evidence of an intent to give preference, or to defeat the operation of the bankrupt law. But in this case the attitude of the debtors was not passive. The judgments against them were obtained by their own act, because what was done by another by their express authority was done by them, and the preference thereby secured by the creditors is conclusively presumed to have been the intended consequence of that act. There is, then, as broad a distinction between the cases as there is between bona fide passiveness on the part of an insolvent debtor in an adverse proceeding, which is not an element of fraud, and positive promotion of an objectionable preference, which is.

It was insisted, however, that this court cannot take cognizance of the complaint, because the fund produced by the sale of the bankrupt's property under the judgment and executions sought to be avoided is in the custody of a state officer, and is subject to distribution under the direction of the state court. The bankrupt law provides the necessary machinery for its complete administration. Ample jurisdiction in law and equity, is conferred upon the federal courts to fulfill all its exigencies. Indeed, the efficient, successful and uniform operations of the system depends upon the adequacy of the means provided for its execution and their prompt availability, as occasion may require. Certainly it was not made dependent upon the optional exercise, by independent tribunals, of the jurisdiction which it confers. While the state courts may exercise concurrent jurisdiction with the federal courts, in certain cases arising out of proceedings in bankruptcy, they are not bound to do so. The latter alone are the appointed instrumentalities for the execution of the law, and their duty to do it is imperative. A federal court was, therefore, the appropriate tribunal to resort to for the relief sought in the present case. The complainant might have resorted to the state court, but he was not bound to do so. He is necessarily the actor, and until he invoked its cognizance, and thus acquired jurisdiction over the parties and the subject matter of the cause, no rule of comity even is violated by an appeal to the federal tribunal expressly constituted for the adjudication of his complaint.

In the unquestionable and necessary exercise of the power conferred by the bankrupt law, it is the practice of the federal courts to inquire into the validity of the judgments entered in the state court, to restrain their enforcement by execution, and, if adjudged to be fraudulent under the act, to set them aside and decree the transfer of the property seized in execution under them, or the proceeds of its sale to the bankruptcy assignee. Even when such proceeds have been received under the order of a state court, by a creditor obtaining a fraudulent preference, the value of the property sold or appropriated has been adjudged to the assignee. And this is not only expressly authorized by the bankrupt act, but has been decided by the supreme court in Shawhan v. Wherritt, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 627, to be a proper method, under the analogous provisions of the bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440]. In this circuit the equitable remedies to effectuate these results have been allowed only against the beneficiaries of illegal preferences and transfers of the bankrupt's property. Possibly a too fastidious interpretation of the act of congress, forbidding injunctions against proceedings in state courts, has induced the exemption of the executive officers of these courts from these remedies; but in some other circuits, at least, this immunity is not accorded. In the second circuit similar bills to the one in this case are entertained against sheriffs, and in answer to an objection that the authority of the state courts was hereby interfered with, the able judge of that circuit, Mr. Justice Woodruff said: "On behalf of the sheriff it is insisted that he is an officer of the state court and held the property by virtue of their mandate, and that this is an interference with the authority and jurisdiction of the state courts, and therefore the sheriff ought not to be made a party. There is nothing in this. The proceeding no more interferes with him, or with the state courts, than would an action of trover or replevin, where he levies upon and retains property which he has no right to apply to pay an execution. He is made a party for his own protection, and because he holds the subject of controversy. No decree is sought and none should be made affecting him, otherwise than as the custodian of the fund, and to secure the control of the court over it. He has in no other sense any personal interest in the controversy, and ought not to be prejudiced in any manner by the decree." But if only the parties beneficially implicated in the objectionable transfers are to be affected by the decree, there even is less reason for the suggestion that there is any encroachment upon the rightful province of the state courts. There was, however, no question of which the state court has assumed cognizance which this bill seeks to withdraw from it.

Pending the levy under the judgments complained of, proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against the defendants in them. Upon the finding of a jury on an issue demanded by them, they were adjudged bankrupts, and the present suit was thereupon instituted. The property seized by the sheriff was sold, and the proceeds are in his custody without any movement for their distribution, having been made in the state court when this bill was filed. As a distribution of the fund by that court, without the intervention of the complainant, would not affect his right to recover it from those to whom its payment might be decreed, and as he alone could contest the validity of the judgments as fraudulent preferences, the state court had not acquired a jurisdiction of the parties, which would preclude him from resorting to another tribunal invested with full power to decree and enforce the relief to which he might be entitled. There is, therefore, no reason of comity why the complaint should not be entertained. On the contrary, obvious considerations touching the prompt and complete adjustment of the equities of the parties, and the speedy administration of the bankrupt's estate, required that it should be entertained. The transfer of the book accounts to John A. Weiser is clearly unsustainable. It was made after executions had been issued against the bankrupts to a large amount, when their business was stopped and their insolvency manifest, and avowedly to give Weiser a preferential security for his claim against them.

The supplemental bill against Thos. H. Cresswell and Susan Keith stands upon a different footing. Susan Keith is the bona fide alienee of Cresswell of a small piece of land purchased by him at sheriff's sale as the property of the bankrupts, under a judgment entered on the day of, presumable under the proofs, before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. This judgment and the process issued upon it were not void, but only voidable in the bankruptcy court. Although Cresswell had constructive notice of the bankruptcy proceeding, yet the judgment under which he purchased was apparently a valid lien under the state law upon the property, and he had no notice of any infirmity in it. Its subsequent avoidance, as fraudulent preference, by the consent of the plaintiff in it, in a proceeding to which Cresswell was not a party at the time, can have no effect upon his title. He, therefore, occupies the position of a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice of the invalidity of the judgment, and bill against him and Susan Keith must be dismissed.

No actual fraud is imputable to any of the other respondents, and they ought not to be subjected to the harsh penalty of exclusion from participation in the assets of the bankrupts, which would result from a final decree against them. They should be allowed the choice of the only alternative of escape from it. If, therefore, within thirty days the holders of the objectionable judgments, respondents in the bill, cause the fund produced by their executions with any interest which may have accrued from its use, to be turned over to the complainant less the sheriff's commission and costs of sale; if John A. Weiser account for and pay to the complainant the amount of the book accounts collected by or for him, and transfer to complainant all the accounts remaining unpaid, deducting any sum or sums paid by him for collection; and if all these respondents deliver a writing to the complainant surrendering their alleged liens or preferences, and agreeing that the costs of this suit together with a reasonable compensation to the complainants' solicitor, to be fixed by agreement of the parties or the allowance of this court, may be deducted from their dividends of the bankrupt's assets, no final decree will be entered in this case, and they will be allowed to prove their debts before the register.

PATENTS FOR SELF-CLOSING FAUCET—ANTICIPATION.

1. The patent for a self-closing faucet, granted to Nathaniel Jenkins, June 27th, 1865, was not anticipated by the French patent of Chretien Morand, dated November 14th, 1851.

2. Where an anticipating device has been changed, so that by the change the thing which is produced is practically a new structure, the new device, though subsidiary to the former one, is patentable.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity [by Joseph Zane and others] to restrain the defendants [Peck Bros. & Co.] from the infringement of letters patent for a self-closing faucet, which were issued to Nathaniel Jenkins on June 27th, 1865, and which have been duly assigned to the plaintiffs. The defendants admit infringement.

and the sole question is as to the novelty of the alleged invention. The validity of the patent has been sustained by decree of the circuit court for the District of Massachusetts, in a case where other anticipatory devices than those which are here relied upon were set up in defence. The present defendants are the licensees of the defendants in the Massachusetts case.

The invention consisted in opening a self-closing faucet by means of a quick-threaded screw-follower, the threads of which are inclined at so great a pitch that, when the power to turn the screw is removed, the pressure of the water and of a spiral spring under the valve forces the valve to its seat, where it is held by the pressure of the water. The specification says that another part of the invention consists in combining with the valve and screw-follower a swivel, so that the rotary movement of the spindle shall not be imparted to the valve, which shall have only an axial movement, and thus twisting or friction of the valve shall be prevented. This swivel connection of spindle and valve is frequently used in structures where rotation of the valve is not desired. The faucet has gone into extensive use.

The claims of the patent are: "1. The screw-follower H, in combination with the valve of a self-closing faucet, substantially as set forth, and for the purpose described. 2. The combination of the swivel P, screw-follower H, valve K, and spring O, substantially as and for the purpose described." Self-closing faucets opening by means of a lever, and also by means of a quick-threaded screw, have long been known. The invention in this case is the combination of quick-threaded screw, valve and spring, substantially as described in the specification.

In the pre-existing English patent of Moses Poole, dated April 15th, 1845, and in the specification of William Thomas Cheetham, left with the English commissioner of patents, March 14th, 1860, and in the English patent of Thomas Melling, dated October 6th, 1857, no spring was used, and by reason of that omission these devices did not anticipate the Jenkins invention.

The French patent of Chretien Morand, dated November 14th, 1851, is chiefly relied upon by the defendants as anticipatory of the plaintiffs' patent. The Morand device was designed in part to prevent what is called the "water-hammer," or the unpleasant sound which is caused by the reaction of the water when the valve is suddenly closed. The faucet is of two parts, of unequal size; the induction-way is of larger size than the ejection-way. There are two valves, also of unequal size. The outer valve is in rigid connection with and is turned by a quick-threaded screw-spindle. This valve is so connected with the inner one that the inner valve is guided longitudinally, and is forced to its seat by the same rotation of the screw-follower which operates upon the outer valve. The connection of the inner valve with the spindle is not by means of a swivel-joint. Below the inner valve is a spring, which, with the pressure of the water, causes the valves to be closed when the power that turns the screw is removed. The patentee remarks that while he prefers two valves, "it will be understood that in certain cases he can employ but one." The manner in which the faucet will then be constructed is not described. By the use of two valves, the body of water which is between the valves forms a cushion, which checks the force of the sound or of the blow of the water-hammer when the faucet is suddenly closed.

The principal elements which are employed to produce a self-closing faucet—to wit, the screw-follower with a quick-threaded screw, valve and spring—are found in both the Morand and the Jenkins patents; but the double valves of Morand, and the general method in which the mechanism of the inner valve and the spring was arranged, with reference to each other and the water-way, caused his faucet to be cumbersome and lacking in simplicity and economy. It was a contrivance of many parts, and lacked general utility. Jenkins omitted one of the valves, and of course discarded the connection between the two, and made the passage-ways for the entrance and discharge of the water of the same size, and connected the valve and the screw-follower by a swivel, and, generally, materially simplified the construction and arrangement of the valve and spring mechanism. He thus made a simple and economical self-closing faucet, which has gone into general use. He has produced the old result of Morand in a more economical and beneficial manner. The invention of Jenkins is subsidiary to that of Morand; but he has essentially changed the Morand device in such manner that, by the change, the thing which is produced is practically a new structure, and his improved device is, therefore, patentable.

This change was not merely formal, but was, to a certain degree, a structural change and modification of the parts of the Morand faucet, which change required inventive and not merely mechanical skill, and required a sufficient exercise of the inventive faculty to justify the grant of an exclusive right to the use and sale of the article which was produced. It was not simply the "carrying forward or new or more extended application of the original thought," and was not "a change only in form, properties, or degree." Smith v. Nichols, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 112. Let there be a decree for an injunction and an account.

LIEN OF MATERIAL MAN—FOREIGN VESSEL—EFFECT OF GIVING CREDIT.

1. If the subject matter of a contract concern the navigation of the sea, it is a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; although the contract be made on land. Such are the contracts of material men.

[Cited in The Gold Hunter, Case No. 5,513; Leland v. The Medora, Id. 8,237; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 421.]

2. How far the district courts, sitting as instance courts, are to regard the law of the admiralty court of England as to questions of jurisdiction and rules of decision.

[Cited in The Stephen Allen, Case No. 13,361; Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 474.]

3. By the common law, material men have no lien for articles furnished a vessel, whether she be foreign or domestic; and this is the law of the English admiralty. By the civil law they have such a lien in both cases. In the United States they have it only in cases of foreign ships; or ships belonging to one of the states furnished in another.

[Cited in The Boston, Case No. 1,669; U. S. v. New Bedford Bridge, Id. 15,867; Nall v. The Illinois, Id. 10,005; Cox v. Murray, Id. 3,304; The Alida, Id. 199; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 390; The Wexford, 7 Fed. 681.]

4. But if the person furnishing a foreign ship gives credit, the lien is discharged, or does not attach. Water casks furnished to a foreign vessel, are of the nature of materials which create a lien.

[Cited in Maitland v. The Atlantic, Case No. 8,980; Raymond v. The Ellen Stewart, Id. 11,594.]

5. But although the giving of credit may so far discharge the lien as to exclude the material man from bringing a suit in rem to enforce it, or from his being a privileged creditor, still he is entitled upon petition to be paid out of remnants and surplus remaining in the registry.

[Cited in The Santa Anna, Case No. 12,325; The Boston, Id. 1,669; The Lady Franklin, Id. 7,983.]

This was an appeal from the district court, where the appellant filed a petition praying to be paid the sum of $408.10 cents, due to him for a certain number of water casks, and two barrels of vinegar, furnished the brig President, at Baltimore, where she then lay, in October, 1821, as part of her outfits. The brig having performed a voyage from Baltimore, after the above articles were furnished, returned the following year to the port of Philadelphia, where she was libelled for sailors' wages, and sold under a sentence of the district court. The petition is, to be paid out of the surplus of the proceeds of the brig, her tackle, &c. remaining in the registry of that court, after payment of the wages, &c. From the evidence of Dieter, taken in this court, it appears that this was a foreign vessel, owned by persons residing beyond sea, and was commissioned as a letter of marque. That whilst lying in the port of Baltimore, in October, 1821, Zane furnished the brig with the water casks and vinegar, at the instance of Dieter, who acted as the agent of the owners, he being a part owner, and, at that time, master. That no written or specific contract respecting these articles was made, except that the master promised to pay for them upon the return of the brig, or upon his own return. That the casks were calculated only for the brig, and as a part of her equipment, and were not more in number than her necessities demanded. The cost of the articles so furnished amounted to $508.10 cents, of which $100 was paid by Dieter in July, 1822, after the arrival of the brig at the port of Philadelphia.

A pro forma decree of the district court was made, dismissing the petition, from which decree the appeal was taken.

The following objections to the claim of the petitioner were made in this court: (1) That the debt claimed never created a lien on the vessel, inasmuch as the articles furnished were to be paid for on the return of the vessel, or of Dieter; and were therefore furnished on the personal credit of the master and the owners, and not on the security of the vessel. (2) That if there ever existed a lien, it was waived by the omission of the petitioner to enforce it in due season. (3) That the articles furnished are not such as entitle the creditor to a lien on the vessel. (4) That if there be no lien, the creditor can have no claim even against a surplus remaining in the registry of the admiralty. 1 Holt, Shipp. 390, 391; 2 Show. 338; Salk. 34; 2 P. Wms. 367; Abb. WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, (after stating the case as above). That this is a case of maritime contract, of which the admiralty has jurisdiction, is not disputed by the counsel for the appellee. Although it was made at land, infra corpus comitatus, yet the subject matter of it concerned the navigation of the sea, and it is consequently maritime in its nature. This point, if it were not conceded, is conclusively settled by the following cases: The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96; The Jerusalem [Case No. 7, 294]; Gardner v. The New Jersey [Id. 5, 233]; Stevens v. The Sandwich [Id. 13, 409], note; North v. The Eagle [Id. 10, 309]. The question, in short, which this court has to decide, is not of jurisdiction, but of lien, or an equitable claim against the proceeds of the vessel remaining in the registry of the court, and unclaimed by any other persons than the former owners of the vessel. The case of material men being then within the undisputed jurisdiction of the admiralty, it becomes important to inquire by what law their claim is to be decided? If by the civil law, which, with the laws of Oleron and Rhodes, furnish the general rules of decision of the admiralty court, where they are not inconsistent with the municipal laws of the country to which the court belongs, then it is indisputable that those who repair, or fit out a vessel, or who lend money for those purposes, possess a right of payment in preference to other creditors upon the value of the ship, without any express hypothecation, contract, or agreement whatever, to subject the vessel to such a claim. Abb. Shipp. p. 2, c. 3, § 9, who cites the Digest.

The common law courts of England have not adopted this rule of the civil law, but adhere to the strict doctrine of the common law in relation to implied liens, which are recognized only in certain cases where the subject on which the lien is to operate remains in the actual possession of the creditor. Upon this principle it is allowed in the case of the ship builder, who retains such possession, and who is not bound to surrender it until he is paid. But the repairer of a ship, or the tradesman who furnishes her with ropes, sails, or other necessaries, to enable her to navigate the sea, has no lien on the ship, or right of preference over other creditors, although she be a foreign ship, and is so repaired or furnished in England in the course of her voyage. Even the jurisdiction of the admiralty to proceed in rem in these cases is denied, upon the ground that the contracts are made on land, infra corpus comitatus, and this, notwithstanding the maritime nature of the subject-matter of the contract, which, in the case of Minet v. Gibson, 3 Term R. 451, Mr. Justice Butler held to be the criterion of the jurisdiction of that court. But it would seem, from the case of Justin v. Ballam, Salk. 34, 2 Ld. Raym. 805, which was that of a foreign ship, which had been furnished on the Thames with a cable and anchor, which were rendered necessary in consequence of stress of weather at sea; that if the ship had been in her voyage when she became distressed for want of those articles, and at the time of the contract, the implied lien would have been allowed, and that the master might, even in the case before the court, have given a valid hypothecation of the vessel in England for the security of the person who furnished the articles, upon the ground of the vessel being foreign. This then I must consider to be the law of the English court of admiralty, inasmuch as every attempt of that court to introduce the rule of the civil law upon subjects of lien, has been arrested by writs of prohibition from the courts of law.

This view of the subject presents a question of infinite importance, which has never yet been decided in this country, but which it is to be hoped may, ere long, be submitted to the consideration of the supreme court of the United States. How far are the district courts of the United States, sitting as instance courts, to regard the law of the admiralty court of England, as to questions of jurisdiction and rules of decision? It may possibly be answered that this question, so far as the present case is concerned, was settled by the supreme court of the United States in the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438, in which it was decided, that the common law of England being the law of Maryland, where the materials were furnished, material men and mechanics furnishing repairs to a domestic ship, have no particular lien upon the ship itself for the recovery of their demands. But the common law makes no distinction in this respect between domestic and foreign ships, denying the right of lien equally against both, making no distinction between them, so far as I am informed. Yet the supreme court, in the case just alluded to, and also in the case of The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96, decided that where repairs are made, or necessaries are furnished, to a foreign ship, or to a ship in one state which belongs to another state of this Union, the general maritime law gives the party a lien on the ship for his security, and that he may maintain a suit in rem to enforce his right. In the case of The Jerusalem [supra], Mr. Justice Story, after asserting the jurisdiction of the admiralty over all maritime contracts, maintains the doctrine, that a contract for repairs and supplies furnished to a foreign vessel, is governed by the maritime law, and creates a lien which has a preference over a prior bottomry bond. He adds, that the decisions at common law, on the subject of the admiralty jurisdiction, are not binding on us, and he proceeds avowedly upon the ground of the general maritime law, by which every contract of a master for repairs and supplies, is said to import an hypothecation. It does not appear from the report of the case of Stevens v. The Sandwich [supra] whether the ship was foreign or domestic; but the learned judge states, in general terms, that a carpenter, by the maritime law, has lien on the ship for repairs in port; and that he is admitted by the civil law into the class of privileged creditors, without any regard to the place where the services are rendered. The same doctrine, as to a lien for repairs and supplies furnished a foreign ship, is maintained in the case of North v. The Eagle [supra].

But I shall pursue this inquiry no farther, it being sufficient for this part of the case, that for materials furnished to a foreign vessel in a port of the United States, the creditor has a lien on the ship, and may proceed to enforce it by a suit in rem in the admiralty. That is the present case, unless by the giving of credit, the lien was discharged, or never attached. It must be admitted, that by the common law of England, if credit be given in a clear case of lien, had the credit not been allowed, the lien is discharged. This was decided in the case of Raitt v. Mitchell, 4 Camp. 146, and is conformable to more ancient decisions of the common law courts. The same doctrine was maintained by Mr. Justice Story in the case Ex parte Lewis [Case No. 8,310], whose opinion seems, from the cases cited by him, to have proceeded entirely upon the decisions of the common law courts of England, but apparently contrary to the conclusion to which his own judgment had led him.

It is neither my intention, nor wish, to controvert the principle upon which these decisions are founded, or their application to maritime cases in the courts of the United States; inasmuch as the law which is to govern in admiralty cases, is by no means so settled as to leave me at liberty to express an opinion upon the subject, which I could, with any confidence, venture to maintain. Taking, then, the law to be as it is laid down in these cases, I am brought to the consideration of the two last objections urged against this claim. (1) That water casks furnished to a foreign vessel, are not of the nature of materials which entitle the creditor to a lien on the ship; and if they are, still (2) the claims of such creditor against surplus proceeds remaining in the registry of the court, cannot be maintained, in a case where that lien has been waived by an allowance of credit.

As to the first of these objections, I can feel no doubt whatever. I cannot agree with the counsel for the appellee, that the ground of lien for materials furnished is their adherence to the ship; as cables, anchors, ropes, and the like. I think it is more correctly contended on the other side, that the right of lien arises from the fact that the materials are necessary for the use of the vessel, to enable her to navigate the sea, and to pursue her voyage in safety. If this be the correct principle, the objection cannot be well founded, since it is obvious, that no article on board of a ship can be more essential to her conservation, and successful navigation of the sea, than the vessels which contain the water for the sustenance of those who are to navigate her. In the case of The Aurora [supra], which was that of an hypothecation, all that was required of the creditor was, to prove that the supplies furnished were necessary to effectuate the objects of the voyage. And in the case of North v. The Eagle [supra], the material furnished, and for which a lien on the ship was claimed, and decreed by the court, was ship chandlery, which surely cannot be considered more an article of necessity for the use of the ship than the water casks.

2. I am lastly to consider, whether this claim can, under the circumstances which attend it, be maintained against surplus and remnants remaining in the registry of the court? It seems to me that, upon principles of equity, and upon sound reason, independent of the authority of adjudged cases, this claim is well founded. Whatever objections may oppose it when it is asserted against the ship by an original suit, or when it assumes the character of a privileged debt, they lose all their consequences, when they are interposed to prevent its being satisfied out of surplus money, under the power and control of the court. The jurisdiction of the admiralty, in personam, for materials furnished even to a domestic ship, which creates no lien, or in cases where a lien might exist, and be enforced in rem, if it had not been waived, is, I think, indisputable; and if this were such a suit, it would, in my opinion, be the duty of the court to retain the fund, or as much of it as might be necessary, to await the final decision; and this upon ordinary principles of equity. But the owners of this fund are foreigners, and could not be reached by such a suit. They have, however, money in court, being the surplus of the proceeds of the vessel, for the necessities of which the materials in question were furnished. Would it consist with the plain dictates of equity and good conscience to pay out this fund to the owners, and to leave this claimant to pursue his remedy in some foreign tribunal? I think it would not. What are the objections upon the ground of reason which are opposed to this claim? It was said by the counsel that these implied liens are detrimental to commerce whenever they are considered as adhering to the vessel after she has left the port where they were created, by depriving her of the means of raising money abroad for her necessities, from persons who, not having the means of ascertaining by what liens she might be encumbered, would be unwilling to advance money upon her security. I acknowledge the weight of this objection against any original suit in rem against the vessel, and against any claim of preference over other creditors to her proceeds. But the reason on which the objection is founded loses all its weight when the decree is asserted against remnants and surplus.

I beg it to be here understood, that I mean to confine the above course of reasoning to the particular case under consideration. I have merely endeavoured to show that this claim is reasonable, and consonant with the dictates of equity and good conscience. But although it may be all this, it does not follow that it is to be sustained merely on this ground. For I shall endeavour to prove that this claim is supported by the authority of at least one adjudged case, and by the principles laid down in two others.

The first case I have met with applicable to this subject, is that of The Favourite, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 232, which came before the court upon the petition of the mate; who, by the capture of the master at sea, and his detention by the captors, became master ex necessitate; to be paid his wages as mate, and as master out of the proceeds of the ship which had come into the registry under a decree in favour of holders of bottomry bonds. The court allowed the claim for mate's wages for the whole voyage; but as to the additional wages claimed as due to him in his character of master, the court said, that he must go elsewhere to recover them. But Sir William Scott lays down the general doctrine thus—"As to the distinction taken between an original suit, and a permission to be paid out of the proceeds, upon inquiry, no instance has been found in which a master has been permitted to sue against proceeds in the registry, except in cases of mere remnants and surplus, and not even then, if there have been any adverse interests opposing it." The clear inference deducible from the above quotation is, that even a master, particularly where he becomes such by devolution on the loss of the former master, is permitted to sue against a surplus in the registry, if there be no adverse interests in third persons which oppose it. The suit was not sustained in that case, because it was against proceeds which were claimed by other persons to satisfy bottomry bonds, and not against a surplus which would go into the pocket of the former owners of the vessel. And even in the case of a master suing against proceeds for satisfaction of his wages, the judge states, that if the case of Read v. Chapman, 2 Strange, 937, had not stood in his way, he might have been disposed to entertain the suit.

The next case which I shall notice is that of Gardner v. The New Jersey [supra], which was a suit against a surplus by the master, for moneys expended during the voyage for the purchase of necessaries required in the service of the ship, and wages paid to mariners, and also for his wages as master. The physician filed a similar petition, to be paid his demand for his professional services rendered on board of the ship. The claim of the master for moneys advanced for the use of the ship was allowed; but that for wages, and also the petition of the physician, were dismissed. In the opinion delivered by the learned judge, he states his rule to have been, that where a sum is claimed out of the surplus or remnant, it must appear to be either of itself, or in its origin, a lien on the ship, or other thing out of which the moneys were produced.

I understand the rule thus laid down, as embracing, not only claims founded upon continuing liens, but such as in their origin, create a lien, but are discharged, or afterwards waived, as by giving credit, negligence of the creditor in enforcing it, and the like. If cases of discharged liens were not within the view of the court, what could be meant by the expression "in its origin, a lien;" as contradistinguished from "existing liens?" The judge obviously intended to exclude all claims of a mere personal nature in their origin, because the rule was to be applied to the very case before him, which was that of a master suing for his wages, and of a physician for a remuneration for professional services, in neither of which cases was there an original lien. But those are, in my apprehension, very different cases from one where an implied lien is created by operation of law, but which the law, contrary to the intention of the party, considers as being impliedly waived where credit is given: I say contrary to the intention of the party, for it is inconceivable that the creditor would designedly waive the security which the law gives him against the ship. He may, by such a contract, be justly excluded as a privileged creditor, and denied the right of maintaining an original suit against the ship, because of his having, though unintentionally, waived his lien. But to deprive him of the benefit of being paid out of a surplus which no other creditor claims, would seem to be a harsh doctrine, applied to him against reason and without necessity. I take the liberty further to remark upon this case, that the rule there laid down, understood as I think it ought to be, is much more rigid than that which Sir William Scott seems to sanction in the case of The Favourite.

I now come to the case of The John, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 238, which I consider to be decisive in the present case. That was a claim for the price of certain arms and stores furnished to an American ship in the port of London, on a voyage from thence to Venice. After her return from Venice to London, she was libelled and sold for mariners' wages; and the creditor who had furnished those articles, applied to the court by petition, praying to be paid his demand out of the surplus remaining in the registry. The payment was decreed; and in the opinion delivered by the judge, he observes, that he had had all the cases upon the point looked up, and he finds that it has continued to be the practice of that court to allow material men to sue against remaining proceeds on the registry, though prohibitions had been obtained on original suits instituted by them; and he refers particularly to a similar decision of the court as far back as the year 1763.

Here then we have it laid down as the ancient and well established doctrine of the admiralty of England, in the face of the common law courts, that material men, who have originally no lien on the ship, upon the principles of the common law, and who if they had, had waived it by a personal contract on credit, may maintain a suit against remaining proceeds in the registry, although they could not originate a suit against the ship. That was a stronger case than the present, because in this the contract, in its nature, would have created an original lien, if it had not been waived by the giving of credit. No case was cited at the bar, nor do I know of any, which contradicts, or in the slightest degree impairs the authority of the case of The John [supra]. The Levi Dearborne [Case No. 17,988] was the case of an original suit against a domestic ship for materials furnished to her. The case Ex parte Lewis [supra] was a suit by a wharfinger, not against a surplus, but against the whole proceeds, to be paid as a privileged creditor, in preference to the holder of a bottomry bond, whose demand, for aught that appears, left no remnant. The case of Clinton v. The Hannah [id. 2,898] was that of an original suit by a shipwright for his contract wages for building those vessels, and is therefore totally unlike the present.

After the fullest consideration which I have been able to give to this case, I am of opinion, that the claim of the petitioner, except for the two barrels of vinegar, which his counsel gives up, ought to be allowed. I shall therefore reverse the pro forma decree of the district court, and refer it to the clerk of this court to value the two casks of vinegar, unless the value is agreed by the parties or their counsel, and I shall then decree the balance to be paid out of the surplus remaining in the registry of the court.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 478.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1824.

MALICIOUS HOLDING TO BAIL—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—NEW TRIAL—MALICE—WANT OF PROBABLE CAUSE—EVIDENCE—NE EXEAT BOND—EFFECT.

1. In an action for maliciously holding the plaintiff to bail upon a ne exeat, for a larger sum than was due, the court will grant a new trial, if the verdict for the plaintiff is against the weight of evidence.

2. In granting a new trial for the defendant, the court will make it a condition that the verdict shall stand until another shall be rendered.

3. The court will not permit evidence to be given of the private opinion of the witness as to the fraud or fairness of the plaintiff's conduct, derived from facts which appeared before the witness as an arbitrator.

4. The ex parte deposition of a deceased witness, not taken by consent, cannot be read in evidence.

5. In an action for maliciously holding the plaintiff to bail upon a ne exeat, the plaintiff may give evidence that he has suffered in the public estimation in consequence of the process of ne exeat, but not in consequence of reports circulated by the defendant, although such reports may be given in evidence by the plaintiff to show malice in the defendant; nor can he give evidence of special damage not averred in the declaration.

6. The plaintiff, in such an action, must show both malice and the want of probable cause, and that the defendants knew that they had not probable cause.

7. The bill and affidavit and the order of the judge granting the ne exeat, are prima facie evidence of probable cause.

8. A ne exeat bond only binds the sureties to the extent of the final decree of the court, and, if the defendant continually remains in the district, according to the condition of the bond, they will be discharged altogether.

9. The declaration, in such an action, must aver the want of probable cause, and for want of such averment the judgment will be arrested.

This was an action upon the case for maliciously holding the plaintiff [W. P. Zantzinger] to bail, upon a ne exeat, for a much larger sum than was due.

The declaration states that the defendants [R. C. Weightman and others], "maliciously and injuriously" intending to cause the plaintiff "to be unjustly, and without any probable cause, arrested and imprisoned for a large sum of money," and to cause him, "without any just or reasonable cause, to expend divers large sums of money on that occasion," "did falsely, unjustly, and maliciously file a bill of complaint," &c., "whereupon they prayed a certain process called a 'ne exeat,' and an account; and although the plaintiff has never been indebted to the defendants at any time in a larger sum than $3,531.75, yet the defendants, by certain false statements in their said bill, and in the affidavit accompanying it, procured the aforesaid process called a 'ne exeat' to be issued, and an indorsement thereon from one of the judges of the said court requiring the plaintiff to give bond in the sum of $16,000, conditioned," &c., by reason of which said process, so indorsed, he was, "by the unjust and malicious procurement of the defendants arrested and imprisoned," &c., whereas, in truth and in fact, the plaintiff was not at the time of issuing the said process, and at the time of the imprisonment, &c., indebted to the defendants in more than $3,531.75, which fact has been so found by arbitrators, &c.; "nor was his conduct such as to justify or require the extraordinary process of ne exeat; by reason whereof," &c.

At November term, 1821, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with $2,000 damages; but THE COURT (THELUSTON, Circuit Judge, not giving any opinion), upon the defendants' motion granted a new trial, upon payment of costs, and upon condition that this verdict should stand until another should be rendered, agreeably to the practice in the English courts; this court being of opinion that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

The cause came on for trial again at November term, 1822, when THE COURT (THELUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to permit a witness (Mr. Davidson) to state his opinion as to the fraud or fairness of the plaintiff's conduct, derived from the facts which appeared before him, as an arbitrator.

THE COURT also refused to permit H. C. Wilson's deposition to be read (he having died since the last trial), not being satisfied that it was taken by consent; and knowing that it was objected to, at the last trial, on that ground, and that in consequence of that objection Mr. Wilson was then brought into court.

The plaintiff's counsel asked a witness (Mr. Munroe,) whether the character of the plaintiff had suffered in the public estimation in consequence of the process of ne exeat, and the proceedings thereon.

THE COURT permitted the question to be put; but did not permit the witness to be asked whether he had heard injurious reports of the plaintiff's conduct from the defendants, and whether the plaintiff did not suffer in reputation in consequence of such reports; but said that the plaintiff, in order to prove malice, might give evidence of the declarations of the defendants.

THE COURT also refused to permit the plaintiff to give evidence of special damage resulting from the reports in circulation, in consequence of the ne exeat (that is, that the plaintiff was nominated to an office by the president, and that the character of the plaintiff was injured in the opinion of the senators by those reports), the same not having been specially averred in the declaration.

THE COURT gave the same instructions to the jury which they had given at the former trial; which were, in substance, that the plaintiff must show both malice, and the want of probable cause. That the award of the arbitrators is not proof of the want of probable cause. That there must have been, not only the want of probable cause, but the defendants must have known that there was not probable cause. That the bill, and affidavit, and order of the judge, are prima facie evidence of probable cause.

THE COURT, also, by the assent of both parties, instructed the jury that the ne exeat bond would only have bound the sureties to the extent of the final decree of the court, and that if the defendant should have remained in the district, according to the condition of the bond, the sureties would have been discharged altogether.

The jury again found a verdict for the plaintiff, and $2,000 damages.

Mr. Taylor and Mr. Jones, for defendants, moved in arrest of judgment: (1) Because the plaintiff has not alleged, in his declaration, that the writ of ne exeat was, in fact, sued out without probable cause. (2) Because the plaintiff's own declaration shows that there was sufficient probable cause for suing out the said writ. (3) Because the plaintiff does not show by his declaration that the proceedings on the ne exeat were at an end.

First. There is no direct averment, in the declaration, of the want of probable cause. The only part of the declaration in which it is mentioned is in the indictment, where it is said that the defendants, "intending to cause the plaintiff to be unjustly, and without probable cause, to be arrested," &c., "did, falsely, unjustly, and maliciously, file a bill, &c., and procure a ne exeat, &c., which is not an averment that the defendants filed the bill and procured the ne exeat without probable cause." Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 Term R. 544, 784; Reynolds v. Kennedy, 1 Wils. 232. The inducement could not be traversed.

Second. The declaration shows good cause of arrest to the amount of $3,531.75; and that there is no averment of the want of probable cause as to the excess of bail required. "Falsely, unjustly, and maliciously," are not a sufficient substitute for an averment of the want of probable cause. Ellis v. Thilman, 3 Call, 3; Young v. Gregory, Id. 446; Kirtley v. Deck, 2 Munf. 10.

Third. The third objection (that is, that the plaintiff does not show in his declaration, that proceedings upon the ne exeat were at an end,) is fatal upon general demurrer, and equally so in arrest of judgment.

Mr. Jones, on the same side. When the declaration admits a probable cause of holding to bail to a certain amount, and the gravamen is the holding to excessive bail, the excess must be averred to be without probable cause. Lilwell v. Smallman, Selw. N. P. 946, 1056; Savil v. Roberts, 1 Salk. 13; s. c. 1 Ld. Raym. 374; Farmer v. Darling, 4 Burrows, 1971. Malice cannot be inferred, but must be averred and expressly proved. Gibson v. Chaters, 2 Bos. & P. 129; Purcell v. Macnamara, 9 East, 361; Sinclair v. Eldred, 4 Taunt. 7. Upon the third objection, he cited Fisher v. Bristow, 1 Doug. 215; Morgan v. Hughes, 2 Term R. 225.

Mr. Hewitt, contra. The recital may be carried into the substantial averment; as the county named in the margin will supply the want of naming it in the averment. The gist of this action is the procuring an extraordinary process of the court upon false suggestions or statements. As to the third objection, he referred to Young v. Greg- ory, 3 Call, 446. But the declaration does show that proceedings upon the ne exeat were at an end, by averring that the award of the arbitrators was affirmed by the final decree of the court. In the cases cited there was no such argumentative averment of the want of probable cause as there is in this. The averment that the plaintiff's conduct was not such as to justify or require the extraordinary process of ne exeat is tantamount to an averment of the want of probable cause. For the general definition of an action for a malicious prosecution, he referred to Esp. N. P., and Daw v. Swaine, 1 Sid. 424; and, as to what defects are cured by verdict, he referred to 2 Saund. 228; Jackson v. Burleigh, 3 Esp. 34; the statute of jeofails of Virginia (pages 111, 112); and the judiciary act of the United States of 1789, § 32 (1 Stat. 73).

Mr. Swann, on the same side. "Without probable cause" are not technical words, which cannot be supplied by equivalent expressions. Young v. Gregory, 3 Call, 446. "Want of probable cause" is necessary in a suit for vexatious criminal prosecution, but not for a vexatious civil suit. If the whole declaration be taken together, the inference is irresistible that the ne exeat was procured, and the excessive bail required, without probable cause.

Mr. Hewitt cited Read's Pleader's Assistant (page 30), which is the precedent he followed, and which does not aver the want of probable cause. He also cited 1 Chit. 230, 292, 308, as to the distinction between inducement and averment.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), having fully considered the case, arrested the judgment, because there was no averment of any act done by the defendants without probable cause; and because, by the plaintiff's own showing, there was probable cause to a certain extent.

The ZARALLA.

District Court, S. D. New York. May 30, 1862.

CONDEMNATION OF PRIZE—EVIDENCE—SPOILIATION OF PAPERS—DECREE BY DEFAULT.

1. The vessel was destroyed by her captors because unfit to be sent in for adjudication. The cargo was sent in. Held, that the court had judicial cognizance of the capture of the vessel without having her within its territorial jurisdiction.

2. The crew of the vessel were, at their request, put on shore by the captors, and no person on board of her at her capture was sent in for examination. On special leave of the court, witnesses from the capturing vessel were examined.

3. The rule that the testimony for the condemnation of the prize must be obtained directly from documents or witnesses found on board of her at the time of her seizure is always adhered to, unless satisfactory reasons are shown for its non-observance.

4. The court, during the present war, always regards, by force of the standing prize rules, a decree by default, regularly obtained, as equivalent to an admission on the record of the offence charged in the libel.

5. Spoliation of papers not explained by satisfactory proof.

6. Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for a violation of the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured, September 30, 1861, by the United States steamer Huntsville, in Atchafalaya Bay, an outlet of Berwick Bay, Louisiana. The vessel, valued at $1,000, being adjudged by the United States naval officer in command at the capture, unfit to be sent to a Northern port for adjudication, was destroyed by his orders, and the cargo was transmitted to this port, and here arrested by due process of law in this suit. None of the crew of the prize were produced for examination in preparatorio at this port. They were landed on the coast at their request by the captors, and immediately departed from the custody of the captors. On motion of the United States attorney, an order was granted by the court to take the examination of witnesses present at the capture, and who were produced from the capturing vessel. The supposed specialties in the proceedings in this case are, that the vessel prosecuted as prize was not brought into port, nor were any individuals of her crew produced to be examined as witnesses.

This court has judicial cognizance of the capture, without at the time having the prize within its territorial jurisdiction, and without its being brought there during the pendency of the suit. Jecker v. Montgomery, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 498, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 110. Accordingly, no more irregularity or imperfection exists in acting upon the appropriation of the prize by the government, either in destroying it or converting it directly to public use, than if it had been placed bodily under the jurisdiction of the court by process issued against it.

The other informality suggested, of not having testimony for the condemnation of the prize, obtained directly from documents or witnesses found on board of the vessel at the time of her seizure, is a departure from a rule of practice which the prize court always expects will be honestly adhered to, unless satisfactory reasons are shown for its non-observance. The Anna, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 373. It is clear that the rule cannot be absolute and peremptory. The crew of the prize may all of them be killed or escape in the act of capture, or the ship's papers may be destroyed or effectually concealed, in a flagrant attempt to violate a blockade by force, or to commit some other offence subjecting the prize to forfeiture by the law of nations. In like instances the court would be governed by the palpable merits of the case, and not sacrifice clear right to formalities of practice. In the matter of Proceeds of Prizes of War [Case No. 11,440].

The court, during the present war, always regards, by force of the standing prize rules, a decree by default, regularly obtained, as equivalent to an admission, on the record, of the offence charged in the libel. The vessel here was apprehended in the effort to evade a blockade, the existence of which the master knew, as he admitted to the witness, and which he had before violated. The papers found on the vessel show that the vessel and cargo belong to an enemy port; and the master was seen to tear up and throw overboard papers as the capturing vessel approached the prize to seize her. No appearance has been made in the case, nor has any claim been filed against the libel, and the marshal returned to the monition that the prize had been attached; and that due notice has been given to all persons claiming the same. The facts of the destruction or spoliation of papers on board, not explained by satisfactory proof, and also the enemy property of the prize, supply legal causes for its condemnation and forfeiture. Jecker v. Montgomery, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 110; Wheat. Mar. Capt. 101; The Pizarro, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 227; The Adriana, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 313; The Two Brothers, Id. 131. Judgment ordered, condemning the vessel and cargo as enemy property, and also for a violation of the blockade of the port from which the vessel was attempting to escape.

ZAREGA'S CASE.

[1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 40, note; 4 Law Rep. 480.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1842.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—FOREIGN CREDITORS.

[The discharge of a bankrupt in this country bars actions brought against him here by foreign creditors, though it might not be recognized as a bar against foreign creditors in courts of their own country.]

In the case of Augustus Zarega, heard before the United States district court of New York, one of the questions submitted to the court for its decision was whether the certificate of the bankrupt, under the laws of this country, would discharge him from the debts of those creditors who reside abroad? It appeared that several of the petitioner's creditors resided in Antwerp, and some in Rio Janeiro, and it was submitted by the counsel for the creditors that, if the petitioner obtained his certificate, it would be inoperative as to those creditors whose debts were not contracted in this country.

Mr. Joachimssen, for opposing creditor.
J. H. Patten, for petitioner.

BETTS, District Judge. The question is whether the discharge of a bankrupt, under the law of this country, would operate as a bar to the demands of foreign creditors, it being asserted that the United States have no power to destroy a contract entered into without their jurisdiction, and the contract is to be left to the jurisdiction of that country wherein it originated. It is not important, in disposing of this question, to enter into a discussion of the essence of contracts, or their obligations, nor to inquire into the effect of a discharge in this country under the bankrupt law, if set up in a foreign country as a bar to the claims of creditors. In England, as well as in France and Holland, and perhaps throughout Europe generally, the discharge of a bankrupt under the laws of either country operates in all other places whatsoever. So a person having been decreed a bankrupt in France may avail himself of the privileges it confers on him in any part of England, and plead it with the same effect as in his own country. So in England, where they set up that claim in behalf of their own bankrupts in foreign countries, they allow the same privilege to others. But in this country we do not recognize such a doctrine. A discharge as a bankrupt in a foreign country is not deemed here a bar to any action that may be brought. The discharge is considered as local, and, although an assignee of an individual declared a bankrupt in a foreign country would be allowed to sue as such assignee, yet our courts would not recognize the discharge as a bar to debts contracted in this country, or due to citizens of this country. Here the law operates as a bar to any action brought in any of our courts.

It is objected that congress is not competent to pass a law which should destroy debts contracted abroad. The discharge operates as a bar to any suit brought in our courts, and, while the act extinguishes the debt, it declares in the same section that it may be pleaded in bar of any action brought in any court within our jurisdiction.

Taking the questions on the broad ground that the law is not competent to discharge debts contracted abroad, I see no ground for the argument urged. If the petitioner had come here with the intention of availing himself of this law to extinguish debts contracted in another country, that might defeat the proceedings. But if he resides here, and the debts were contracted abroad, I see nothing that should exempt him from the full effects of a discharge given to a bankrupt. Nor is it important to consider how far the discharge here might avail him if set up abroad. His creditors abroad might perhaps proceed against him there, if he should come among them; we have nothing to do with that. The comity of nations recognizes the unity of the bankrupt law. Although this is applicable, as a general rule, in other countries, we do not recognize it as exonerating the person of a foreign bankrupt from arrest, or his property from seizure. Under these views, I see no ground for interrupting the proceedings. The law operates as a bar to all creditors here, and may be pleaded as a bar to any suit brought against him here.

SALVAGE OF DERELICT.

A derelict was found at sea and towed for two days by a fishing schooner, with some difficulty and injury to the schooner, into a port of safety, and was libelled for salvage, and remained unclaimed for nearly a year, and there was evidence that the owner was informed of the proceedings and refused to appear, and the proceeds of sale were only $206. The whole net proceeds were decreed to the salvors.

[Cited in The Carl Schurz, Case No. 2,414; The Cairnsmore, 20 Fed. 524.]

The fishing schooner Pescador, of Gloucester, of ninety-one tons burden, and having a crew of nine men, all told, fell in with this derelict near the edge of George's Banks on the 27th of March, 1864, and undertook to tow her to Gloucester, a distance of about one hundred and eighty miles, abandoning her own voyage. The wind and weather were not favorable, and on the second day, in trying to make the harbor, the Pescador broke her main-boom. The libel was pending nearly a year, and no claimant appearing, was heard ex parte. Besides the facts above recited, it was proved that the proceeds of sale, after deducting the marshal's costs, were $206; and that the owner of the derelict was known, and had been informed of the proceedings, and did not choose to appear.

C. P. Thompson, for libellants.

We ask for as much as the court ever allows. There is a case in which five-sixths of the value was awarded.

LOWELL, District Judge. There is authority for giving the whole net proceeds in a case of this peculiar character. The Rutland Derelict, 3 Ir. Jur. 283; The Castletown, 5 Ir. Jur. 379. It is not only in the Irish courts that we find a precedent for decreeing the whole property as a reward for saving the remainder. It is has been done in England (The William Hamilton, 3 Hagg. Adm. 168, and note); and that case is in fact the leading authority on this point, and is cited without disapproval by many learned authors. I have not met with an American case which goes so far, but neither have I seen one in which there was occasion to rule upon the matter. In England, if no claimant appeared, the question would be between the salvors and the crown; but here there is evidence of a distinct refusal by the owner to claim. If he had appeared, I should not feel at liberty to make the order; yet as the salvors might well ask for remuneration for the actual damage suffered by their schooner, in the name of expenses, there would be very little left to divide; and this, probably, was the motive operating with the owner in refusing to claim. His abandonment must be held to enure to the benefit of the libellants.

BANKRUPTCY—DISSOLUTION OF ATTACHMENT—OFFICER'S FEES—DUTY OF REGISTER—CUSTODY OF BANKRUPT'S PROPERTY—DISSOLUTION OF ATTACHMENT—KEEPER'S FEES.

1. An adjudication in bankruptcy relates to the filing of the petition, and works a dissolution of an attachment before then levied upon the bankrupt's goods from that date.

2. An officer must look to the party, or his attorney, who employed him, for his fees; he has no claim upon the adverse party.

3. Where a debtor is adjudged a bankrupt upon his own petition, it is the duty of the register to take his property into his custody by the intervention of an agent, or other proper means.

4. Where a debtor was adjudged a bankrupt upon his own petition, and prior to the filing thereof a flock of sheep belonging to him had been taken on an attachment and kept by the officer until delivered to the assignee: Held, that such officer is entitled to a compensation from the assignee for keeping such sheep, until claimed and received by the assignee.

[This was an action by Albert Zeiber against Andrew Hill, assignee of Thomas Martin, to recover the balance of an amount alleged to be due him for keeping defendant's sheep.]

E. C. Bronaugh, for plaintiff.
Charles A. Ball, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. On July 12, 1870, the parties to the above entitled cause filed a statement of facts upon which the controversy between them depends, and submitted the same to the determination of this court without action. Code Or. 202.

On August 8, the case was argued by counsel for plaintiff, and submitted without argument for defendant. From the statement it appears that on April 4, 1870, one Croft commenced an action against Thomas Martin, aforesaid in the county court for Multnomah county. On the same day an attachment issued in the action and was received by the plaintiff, then sheriff of the county aforesaid, and levied among other things upon 149 head of sheep and 550 pounds of meat. On April 5, plaintiff sold the meat as perishable property for $24.94, and put the sheep into the custody of a keeper, where they remained twenty-six days, when they were delivered to the defendant as assignee as aforesaid.

On April 5, said Martin filed his petition in this court to be adjudged a bankrupt, and on April 8 was so adjudged by the register. On April 15, Croft obtained judgment in the county court for $405, and on April 19 execution issued thereon against the property of Martin directed to plaintiff. On April 28, plaintiff was restrained by injunction from the court from selling Martin's property on execution, and thereupon plaintiff delivered said property to defendant as aforesaid, and returned the execution unsatisfied.

That the plaintiff paid said keeper for keeping said sheep during the period aforesaid the sum of $2 per day, or $52 in all, which was a reasonable reward for his services; and that the said plaintiff has not received payment for said sum so expended, or any part thereof, except said sum of $24.94, which he still retains.

The adjudication in bankruptcy related back to the filing of the petition of April 5, and dissolved the attachment from that day. An officer must look to the party, or his attorney who employs him, for his fees. He has no claim upon the adverse party for them. Croft obtained nothing by his judgment in the county court, and he must pay the fees earned by the officers at his instance, without having any recourse upon Martin or his property. Upon Martin's being adjudged a bankrupt, the register should have taken his property into his custody by the intervention of an agent and other proper means, and kept it for the assignee when appointed. However, at that time there appears to have been some doubt as to his power to do this, and it was not done. The consequence was, the sheep remained in the plaintiff's custody, and he incurred this expense in keeping them.

I think upon general principles that the plaintiff is entitled to a reasonable reward for keeping these sheep. For this purpose he may be considered as a bailee, and entitled to compensation as any other agister or feeder of cattle. The cases In re Housberger [Case No. 6,734], and In re Williams [Id. 17,705], sustain this conclusion, while the first case goes even farther, and probably too far. I have found no case to the contrary. The plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the statement for the sum expended, after deducting the amount of money in his hands belonging to the estate, to wit, $27.06.

ZELLWEGER v. The ROBERT COOPER.

[N. Y. Times, Dec. 2, 1852.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1852.

SHIPPING — RIGHTS OF PASSENGERS — DELAY IN SAILING.

[Plaintiff engaged passage in a ship from New York to California, paid his passage money, and obtained a receipt therefor. Becoming dissatisfied at the delay in sailing, he complained to the ship's agent, who thereupon added to the receipt the words "Ship to sail 27th October." Before that day plaintiff demanded his passage money back, which was refused, but half of it was tendered to him. This he refused, and on Nov. 7th the ship sailed without him. It was claimed that the delay beyond Oct. 27th was caused solely by storms. Held, that as plaintiff, before that date, had determined not to take passage in the ship, he had no cause of complaint that she did not sail on that day, and that under the circumstances he should have a decree for one-half the money, leaving the rest as indemnity to the ship for expenses in preparation for carrying him on the voyage.]

JUDSON, District Judge. This was a suit to recover back money paid for a passage to San Francisco. On the 20th of September, 1850, the libellant [Charles Zellweger] applied to Edmund Kimball, Jr., ship agent, for a passage from New York to San Francisco, in that ship, and paid for his passage money $250, for which the agent gave his receipt in the following words: "Received, New York, September 26, 1850, from Mr. Charles Zellweger, $250, for passage of himself to San Francisco, California, in the cabin of ship Robert Cooper. E. Kimball, Jr., Agent for Ship." From this day the ship was engaged in taking in her freight, and the libellant was in waiting. On the 21st or 22d of October, 1850, the libellant becoming uneasy by the ship's delay, called on Kimball, and complained of the delay, and after some conversation between the parties, it was arranged that the ship agent should write at the foot of the receipt these words, "The ship to sail 27th October;" and with this remonstrance added to it the receipt was returned to the libellant. It is very evident, therefore, that by this memorandum all previous arrangements as to the time of the sailing of the ship and the previous delay, were waived by the libellant, and both parties expressed their satisfaction in the change of time. Four or five days after the memorandum was added to the receipt, the libellant, accompanied by a witness, called again on the ship's agent, and demanded that the passage money be refunded, in order that he might go over the isthmus. Kimball refused to refund the money, and notified the libellant that he might live on board at the expense of the ship, or board on shore until she sailed. After this interview, Kimball by direction of the master, offered to pay back half the passage money, which was refused, and this suit is brought to recover the whole.

The ship sailed on the 7th of November without the libellant, and the owners retained the money, and claim that, by law and custom of the city, the libellant has forfeited his right to its return. It was testified, that between the 26th October, and the 7th November, the weather was stormy, and unsafe for vessels to proceed to sea upon a long voyage. The vessel was therefore excused from going to sea on that account, and her remaining in port until the 7th of November was no violation of the stipulation contained in the memorandum. But be that as it may, the libellant has no cause of complaint that the ship did not sail on the 27th October, having determined before that day, not to take passage in her, relying upon his right to recover back his money. Under these circumstances, the libellant may have a decree for $125, without interest or costs; the other half of the money to remain in the hands of the ship owners, as an idemnity for the money expended on their part to convey the libellant in their ship to San Francisco. No costs to be taxed to either party.

PROCEEDINGS IN REM AND IN PERSONAM—JOINER IN ONE ACTION—ELECTION OF REMEDIES—CONTRACT OF AFFREIGHTMENT—BREACH BY VESSEL.

1. Where a libel is filed for a cause of action upon which both vessel and master may be together liable, the court will not make an order that the libellant elect between the remedy in rem and that in personam, nor that he submit to have either the arrest of the respondent or the attachment against the vessel vacated.

5. Where both the vessel and the master or owner are conjointly liable upon a contract of affreightment, the personal remedy, and the remedy against the vessel, may be sought in one and the same action.

[Cited in The Director, 26 Fed. 711; The Baracoa, 44 Fed. 103.]

This was a libel filed by Henry J. Carr against the bark Zenobia, in rem, and also in personam against her master, A. R. Cronstadt, to recover damages for the non-performance of a contract of affreightment. The libel stated in substance that the libellant, in November, 1847, at Whampoa, China, engaged passage for himself and family, with their personal baggage, and certain merchandise or freight, on board the Zenobia, for the United States, and thereupon shipped sundry cases of merchandise, among which was a chest of drawers containing twenty-five hundred dollars in specie. The agreement was made with Cronstadt, the master of the bark, to whom libellant paid $150 in advance, being one half the passage-money stipulated. November 28th was the appointed day of sailing, but the vessel sailed two days previous to that time, unknown to libellant, leaving him and his family behind. The libellant followed the Zenobia to this country, and arrived, as it happened, a few days before her. On the arrival of the Zenobia he went on board and claimed the property shipped by him. The master, however, refused to deliver it, or to recognize the libellant as its owner, and moreover refused to make the proper entries upon the ship's manifest, which were necessary to enable the libellant to obtain the property from the custom-house. For a fuller statement of the facts, reference is made to the case upon the final hearing, December, 1847, which is reported, post, in its order of time. The libel, as amended under the direction of the court upon this hearing, and the substance of the answer, are there given. Upon this libel, process was issued against the master, upon which he was arrested and held to bail; and also against the bark, for which the usual stipulations were given on the part of the owners. The master then moved in the cause, "that the libellant be required to elect whether he would proceed in rem against the vessel, or in personam against the master; and that either the arrest of the master or the attachment against the vessel should be vacated."

Francis B. Cutting, in support of the exceptions.

Abner Benedict, opposed.

BETTS, District Judge. The libel being filed for a double cause of action on the shipping contract and for its tortious violation by the master, for which the ship and master may be unitedly liable, the case is not one in which the court will compel the libellant to elect which branch of his remedy he will pursue. He may maintain the suit in personam against the master for wrongfully abandoning the libellant and his family in China, and for abstracting or withholding, in the exercise of his authority over the ship and her lading, the specie and baggage shipped on board, and may therein seek damages against the master beyond the liability of the ship. According to the practice in this district, he may also pursue his claim in a joint action against the ship in rem and the master personally, upon the contract of affreightment, and for the transportation of himself and family (Betts, Adm. Prac. 20); provided he establishes a case within the jurisdiction of the court.

The motion to dismiss the suit, because of incongruity or multifariousness in the demands, is therefore denied.

The owner of the Zenobia, David Carnigie, intervened and filed exceptions to the libel for insufficiency. The objection raised by the first exception was, that the court had no jurisdiction to enforce such a claim as was preferred in the libel against the vessel and owner. The second and third exceptions raised the objection, that at any rate the claim was not one which could be enforced both against the vessel in rem, and against the master in personam, in the same libel. The remaining exceptions related only to the form of the libel, as tested by the rules promulgated by the supreme court, and raised no questions of importance. These exceptions, save one only, were allowed, and the libel ordered to be amended in the particulars to which they related. The opinion of the court relates almost wholly to the questions raised upon the liability of the vessel for the cause of action shown, and upon the propriety of uniting the claim against the vessel and the personal claim against the master in one action.

BETTS, District Judge. The allegations of the libel are deficient in perspicuity and certainty; but I think a reasonable construction of the pleading as a whole, may regard it in effect to represent the master as having wilfully withheld the property shipped by the libellant on board the vessel, and as having put impediments in the libellant's way on ship-board and at the custom-house, and prevented him from receiving its delivery at this port, and as refusing to repay the passage-money advanced to him, or to recognize the libellant as having any right to or interest in the baggage and other goods shipped by him on the vessel.

The first legal point raised against the action is, that the ship is not liable for the undertaking of the master, to bring the libellant and family to this country as passengers. It is unnecessary to consider whether the vessel would be chargeable with a lien upon a naked agreement for the carriage of libellant, for in this case a part of the passage-money was actually paid in advance.

The agreement was plainly within the authority of the master, and the receipt of the money was for the benefit of the ship-owner, and was so much freight paid. In respect to the liability of the ship for contracts of transportation made with the master, the law makes no distinction between passengers and merchandise, each being alike carried for hire, and in the regular course of the vessel's occupation in trade and commerce. Wolf v. Summers, 2 Camp. 631; Mulloy v. Backer, 5 East, 316; Howland v. The Lavinia [Case No. 6,797]; Griggs v. Austin, 3 Pick. 20.

There is no reasonable ground for doubt, that if the libellant had paid in advance the freight of his goods, and the master had designedly left them behind in China, the vessel would be answerable to the amount of freight so received. This would be both because the vessel is bound in specie for the fulfilment of the contract of the master made within the scope of his powers (3 Kent, Comm. 218, note; The Volunteer [Case No. 16,991]; The Phebe [Id. 11,064]; Curt. Merch. Seam. 169), and because the vessel is liable for the repayment of freight not earned by the wilful failure to perform the contract of affreightment (Mashiter v. Buller, 1 Camp. 84; Pitman v. Hooper [Case No. 11,185]; Watson v. Duykinck, 3 Johns. 335; Griggs v. Austin, 3 Pick. 20).

It is equally clear, that the neglect or refusal of the master, without justifiable cause, to deliver the goods at the port of destination, renders the owner, and consequently the ship, responsible upon the contract of affreightment. Abb. Shipp. 156, 275; Curt. Merch. Seam. 198.

These principles, so well established in their application to contracts for the transportation of merchandise, are applicable also to agreements for the carrying of passengers. The ship is therefore liable in specie to refund the passage-money advanced by the libellant, and to pay damages for the non-delivery of the goods shipped by him.

The libellant is entitled to the responsibility of the ship to cover these liabilities of the master, and is not obliged to rely solely upon the personal responsibility of the master or owners. Had application been made to the court to reduce the amount of bonds exacted from the ship, the court would have taken care that the owners were not charged with an unreasonable amount of security, and would have discharged the attachment upon stipulations sufficient to cover the probable recovery and costs. But the exception taken by the claimants to the right of libellant to maintain upon the facts charged an action in rem, cannot be sustained.

The next general point made by the exceptions, is, that this suit cannot be prosecuted conjointly in rem and in personam. This objection is supported by the language of Judge Story, in Citizens' Bank v. Nantucket Steamboat Co. [Case No. 2,730]. In that case, a libel in rem against a steamboat, and in personam, against her master and owners, was filed to recover the value of bank-bills entrusted to the master for transportation, and lost on the passage. The judge remarked, that he knew of no principle or authority in the general jurisprudence of the courts of admiralty which would justify such a joinder of proceedings, so very different in their nature and character and decretal effect. "On the contrary," he says, "in this court, every practice of this sort has been constantly discountenanced as irregular and improper." And again he says, "In cases of collision, the injured party may proceed in rem or in personam, or successively in each way, until he has full satisfaction. But I do not understand how the proceedings can be blended in the libel."

The objection thus suggested to the joinder of the two-remedies was evidently placed upon a supposed incompatibility between the two modes of proceeding, rendering them improper to be combined in one action. It is not because, in the case before him, there was not both a personal remedy and a remedy against the ship, that the learned judge disapproves the practice referred to, but it is upon the ground that the proceeding in personam and the proceeding in rem are "so very different in their nature and character and decretal effect." It is obvious therefore, that the objection, if sound, applies in all cases, irrespective of the nature of the cause of action.

Conceding the view taken by the learned judge to have been a correct exposition of the practice as established in October, 1841, the date of the decision above cited, it must be regarded as untenable since the adoption of the rules of the supreme court, framed pursuant to the act of congress of August 23, 1842 (5 Stat. 518, c. 188, § 6). Those rules make specific provision in respect to the mode of pursuing remedies by libellants in several classes of cases. They authorize libellants in suits for mariners' wages, for pilotage, or for damages by collision, to proceed against the ship, and master, or owner, or against the ship alone, or against the master or owner alone, in personam. Rules 13, 14, 15. In cases of maritime hypothecation by the master, or for salvage, the libellant must elect between the remedy in rem and a personal suit. Rules 17, 19. And in suits for assault and battery he is restricted to a suit in personam alone. Clearly, therefore, it can be no longer contended that a joinder of the two remedies in one action is impracticable, or inconsistent with the theory upon which the court proceeds in awarding relief; or that there is any incompatibility in principle between the two forms of proceeding, either in their nature, character, or decretal effect, which forbids their union in one action, in those cases in which such joinder is calculated to advance the interests of substantial justice.

It is true that the case of a suit for damages for non-fulfilment of a contract of affreightment, or one brought to recover back freight paid in advance but not earned, is unprovided for by either of the supreme court rules. Those rules do not contain any specific authority to unite the two remedies in claims of that character. They do not, however, forbid the joinder. The consequence is, that such cases fall within the scope of rule 46, which prescribes that in all cases not provided for by the foregoing rules, the district and circuit courts are to regulate the practice of those courts respectively, in such manner as they shall deem most expedient for the administration of justice. The practice in respect to the question under consideration is therefore left to be regulated at the discretion of the courts in the various districts.

I perceive no principle demanding a distinction in respect to joining in the same action a personal remedy with one against the ship, between an action founded upon a contract of affreightment, express or implied, and one brought to recover wages or pilotage, or for damages by collision. The considerations of convenience which dictated the permission given by the rules of the supreme court, to combine the actions in the last mentioned cases, seem to apply with equal force to the case now before the court.

The practice in this district, on the instance side of the court, has, moreover, always been different, it is believed, from that pursued in the Massachusetts district, as stated by Judge Story in the case above cited. The party directly liable upon the claim chargeable upon the vessel may, in this court be joined with the ship in one suit, and a decree may be prayed and taken against him in uno flatu with that against the vessel. Or, for want of a prayer to that effect at the initiation of the suit, the libel may be amended by inserting it, even after decree in rem rendered, if that decree proves fruitless to the libellant, and if the party sought to be personally charged has appeared and contested the suit. The expense and delay of two or three actions requiring to be disposed of upon identically the same pleadings and proofs, are thus saved the creditors, and the association of remedies promotes the simplicity and celerity so much sought for and favored in admiralty procedure.

It seems to me, also, that this is the spirit of the English practice, both early and modern, although under that system a somewhat circuitous method was originally employed in effecting the object. Instead of directly arresting the party sought to be made personally responsible, it seems, in actions lying purely in rem against vessels, that when the owner enters an appearance, the court thereupon takes jurisdiction over him individually; because, appearance in the English admiralty being by stipulation, the court thus acquires the power to act against him in personam. 2 Browne, Civ. Law, 398;

Id. 407-409. And his fide jussors are compelled to satisfy the condemnation and costs. Clarke, Praxis, tits. 4, 5, 12.

The practice continues substantially the same in the English admiralty to this day. The St. Johan, 1 Hagg. Adm. 334; The Triune, 3 Hagg. Adm. 114. The case of The St. Johan also shows, that where the remedy is doubtful against the vessel, but is legal and equitable against the owner, the court will avail themselves of his appearance to decree the debt and costs against him personally. This personal appearance is also constrained by the course of the court; for in suits in rem, on his failure to intervene, the property is absolutely condemned to the libellant. 2 Browne, Civ. Law, 400.

I am not aware that any confusion or perplexity need arise in respect to the decree to be pronounced in a case thus prosecuted. If the action be in rem only, a decree is rendered for the sum which the prevailing party is entitled to recover, and the thing is condemned, i. e., ordered to be sold to satisfy the decree. If the suit is in personam, the decree is the same in all essentials, varying only in that it directs execution by fieri facias or by capias ad satisfaciendum, instead of venditioni exponas.

I think that the mode of procedure resorted to in this case is not only justifiable upon authority, but that it is one that ought to be encouraged, as tending to prevent a multiplicity of actions for the same cause, in cases where all the rights and remedies might be equally well secured in a single suit. An action against both the ship and the master may oftentimes be indispensable. Cases not unfrequently occur in which neither remedy is separately adequate to afford complete relief. The court will, however, be cautious so to guard the practice that exorbitant stipulations shall not be exacted, and that double arrests shall not be made in cases of doubtful right or for trivial amounts. Betts, Adm. Prac. 20.

In the present case, the ship and master are separately and conjointly liable for the passage-money advanced by the libellant, and also for the safe delivery of the merchandise and baggage shipped by him. The master may also be individually liable for any wilful misconduct in the transaction, committed by him, but out of the scope of his authority as master, by which the libellant has been prejudiced, although the ship and owner may not be conjointly chargeable therefor. The libel is so drawn as to leave it ambiguous, whether damages are sought to the amount of the value of the merchandise and baggage and specie charged to have been shipped, as not having been delivered at all, or whether it only seeks compensation for the oppressive and tortious conduct of the master, in baffling the libellant in obtaining his rights and property from the ship or master. If the latter is the only object of the action, there certainly can be but slight reason for continuing the suit against both the vessel and the master; and on a proper application, the court will see that the owners are relieved from all unreasonable burdens in that respect.

The first three exceptions, relating to the jurisdiction of the court, are therefore disallowed. The remaining four relate to the formal construction of the libel. As it does not conform to the requirements of rule 23 of the supreme court, those exceptions are allowed, save only exception 5, which is disallowed, the libel being sufficient in the particular to which that exception relates. The libellant must take proper measures to reform his pleading before proceeding with the cause. This order is without costs.

[Subsequently the cause came up for final hearing, when there was a decree for libellant, with costs of suit. Case No. 18,209.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1847.

COMMON CARRIER—INJURY TO GOODS—LIABILITY—NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER—FAILURE TO PRESENT MANIFEST—BREACH OF PASSENGER CONTRACT—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID.

1. Where there is no provision in the contract of affreightment varying the liability of the common carrier, he can only relieve himself from liability for injury to goods intrusted to him, by proving that it was the result of some natural and inevitable necessity superior to all human agency or control, or of a force exerted by a public enemy.

[Cited in Dible v. Morgan, Case No. 3,881.]

2. A delay of the master to present to the custom-house officers at the port of consignment a proper manifest, by which delay the owner of goods shipped on board is unable to pass them through the custom-house, is a neglect of his duty as a master, for which the vessel is responsible.

3. Where libellant contracted with the master in a foreign port for a passage to this country, and paid a part of his passage-money in advance, but the master failed to fulfil his contract, and libellant was obliged in consequence to take passage in another vessel,—Held, that the vessel was responsible for the fulfilment of the agreement; and that the libellant was entitled to recover from her the passage-money paid in advance, the expenses incurred by him in awaiting the sailing of another ship, and the sum paid by him to such second vessel for his passage in her.

The case was brought before the court in July, 1847, upon a motion by the master to require the libellant to elect between the two remedies sought by him, and upon exceptions filed by the owner, as claimant, to the jurisdiction of the court, and to the form of the libel. The decision of the court upon the questions then raised, is reported [in Case No. 18,208]. The cause now came up for final hearing upon the proofs.

As the case was peculiar in its character, and as the libel was required to be reformed in its construction, and when reformed was prosecuted to judgment without further objection to its structure, the libel is now inserted in full.

"The libel of Henry J. Carr, of the city of New York, against the Swedish bark Zenobia, her owners, and Auguste R. Cronstadt, master thereof, in a cause civil and maritime of contract as against said vessel and owners, and of tort or damage against said master, respectfully shows: That for the last six years previous to the month of December last, your libellant has been a resident merchant in Hong Kong, China. That in the month of November last your libellant having determined to return with his family to the United States to reside, your libellant chartered, at Hong Kong, a 'lorchar,' or small schooner, at an expense of $40, being the usual means and rate of travelling in China, and came down to Whampoa, a distance of some ninety miles, to secure a passage for your libellant and his family, consisting of a wife and infant child, to the port and city of New York. That on arriving at Whampoa your libellant found the Swedish bark Zenobia, whereof Auguste R. Cronstadt was master, the first vessel up for the port of New York from Whampoa; and thereupon, on the 14th day of November, 1846, your libellant shipped on board of said bark Zenobia eight cases of merchandise, seven marked L. E. C., Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and one case marked F., No. 8, for which shipment the mate of said bark, H. Brandt, gave your libellant his receipt; also, three other cases of baggage and a chest of drawers, which contained the sum of $2,500, for which cases said mate gave your libellant his receipt in the Swedish language. That after putting on board of said bark the wearing apparel of your libellant and his family, your libellant also paid, on the said November 14, 1846, to the said A. R. Cronstadt, master of said bark, the sum of $150, as one half of the passage-money for your libellant and his family, from Canton to New York, and took from said master his receipt therefor. That the said master thereupon informed your libellant that said bark would not sail from Whampoa before the 1st of December following, and that he would advise your libellant, by letter, of the time of his sailing. That your libellant thereupon returned to Hong Kong for his family; and on the 21st day of November last your libellant received a letter from the said A. R. Cronstadt, dated the 18th of November, stating that he should sail with said bark from Whampoa on the 28th of November; and on the next day, the 22d of November, your libellant received another letter from said A. R. Cronstadt, dated the 19th, stating that he had written a letter on the 18th, but lest it might not have been forwarded properly, he repeated its contents, namely, that he should so sail from Whampoa on the 28th of November. That thereupon your libellant got himself and family in readiness, and on the 24th day of November, left Hong Kong in a lorchar hired for the purpose, at the rate of $60, for Whampoa, and arrived there early on the morning of the 27th of November. That not seeing said bark in the river and your libellant being informed she had sailed the day previous, namely, the 26th of November, your libellant leaving his family on board of the boat which brought them from Hong Kong, immediately hired a small boat, and proceeded to Canton to see Messrs. McLean, Deane & Co., the agents of the owners of said bark, and consignees in Canton. That upon arriving at Canton, your libellant learned from the said house of McLean, Deane & Co., that said bark had sailed from Whampoa, on her voyage to the port of New York, on the 26th day of November, two days previous to the time said master had informed your libellant he should sail. That, as your libellant was informed by said firm, said master, after the 14th of November, informed them there were no passengers to go out in said bark. That at the request of your libellant, the agents and consignees of the owners of said bark, Messrs. McLean, Deane & Co., wrote a letter to the said master by your libellant, directed to him in New York, dated November 30, 1846, in which they say, among other things: 'We have perused your letters to Mr. Carr, at Hong Kong, wherein you informed him that you would not sail from Whampoa for New York until the 28th inst.; and as Mr. Carr kept his time, and was at Whampoa on the day you named, we consider that he has not in any way forfeited his right to a passage for himself and family to New York, as agreed between you and him, as per your receipt.' That in addition thereto, your libellant was also informed at Canton, by Mr. John N. Griswold, that said bark sailed on the 26th of November from Whampoa, and that on the 14th of November the said captain, A. R. Cronstadt was informed that he would be required to sail on the 25th of November.

"And your libellant further shows, that on his return to Whampoa, the only vessel then lying in the river of Whampoa, bound for the port of New York, was the ship Rainbow, which was to leave about the 3d of December following. That said bark Zenobia having on board all the property, money and effects of your libellant, together with the wearing apparel of your libellant and his family, your libellant was left at Whampoa wholly destitute, and was obliged to negotiate bills of exchange at an enormous rate of exchange, in order to raise funds to provide your libellant and his family with proper outfit at that season of the year for a voyage to the United States, which cost your libellant $423, and to pay for his passage on board of said Rainbow, which was, under the circumstances in which your libellant was placed, fixed at $400. That your libellant was therefore obliged to borrow $1,000, at the rate of 50 per cent. upon the bills of exchange of your libellant, at three and four months, payable in the city of New York. That your libellant was obliged to incur an expense of $16 in going to and from Canton to Whampoa, to arrange for the passage of himself and family in the Rainbow; and during which time the detention of the lorchar in the river at Whampoa, on board of which was the family of your libellant, from the said 27th day of November to the 3d day of December, on which day your libellant went on board of said Rainbow, cost your libellant the further sum of $64, there being no hotel or house of entertainment at Whampoa, and he consequently being obliged to remain in the boat in the river, until they could go on board ship. That your libellant arrived in the port, of New York, in the ship Rainbow, on the 1st day of March last, with his family, and finding that said bark Zenobia has not yet arrived, and your libellant being a stranger in the city, and destitute of the means of immediate support, in order to borrow a small sum to supply the current wants of your libellant and his family, your libellant was obliged to effect insurance on his property in said bark Zenobia, at an expense of $61, and to assign the policy to the party loaning your libellant the sum so required.

"And your libellant further shows, that said bark Zenobia arrived in the port of New York on or about the 9th day of May instant; and on or about the 10th instant your libellant saw said A. R. Cronstadt, who appeared surprised, and said to your libellant, 'I thought you were in China yet.' That your libellant thereupon requested the said master of said vessel to return to your libellant the money he had so advanced, and to repay your libellant the money and expenses he was put to in Whampoa by the detention of libellant, in consequence of the violation of said contract and undertaking of said master in relation to the transportation of your libellant and his family to the United States. That said master set your libellant at defiance, and told your libellant to get redress as he best could.

"And your libellant further shows unto your honor, that said master, following up the great injury and damage so as aforesaid done to your libellant, on the arrival of said bark Zenobia in the port of New York, has refused to make the proper entry of the merchandise and effects shipped by your libellant on board of said bark at Whampoa, on the manifest or proper exhibit of the cargo of said bark at the custom-house in the city of New York, thereby preventing your libellant or his consignee from obtaining the property and effects of your libellant from said bark, or the public store, should they be left there; the only entry on said manifest or exhibit in relation thereto, being as follows: '1—8 to order,' meaning packages No. 1 to 8 to order, said master refusing to enter the name of your libellant as shipper; it being customary and requisite to enter on said manifest or exhibit the numbers and marks of the several packages, the name of the person shipping them, and the name of the consignee, if consigned, as was the case with the whole of the cargo of said bark Zenobia on her said voyage, except the property and effects of your libellant; the entry of which, as above stated, was without marks and without the name of any person as shipper or consignee. That said master utterly refused to make any other entry, although informed by the collector of the port of New York, or his agent, that he is liable to a penalty of $500 for not so doing,—the said master, A. R. Cronstadt, at one time pretending that he does not know your libellant and never saw him before,—at another time, as your libellant is informed, alleging that your libellant came to him at Whampoa destitute, and tried to beg a passage for himself and family to the United States, all of which said master knows to be totally untrue. That when the several cases of merchandise were shipped on board said vessel, they were marked as herein stated, and the receipt of the first officer of said bark taken therefor. That at the same time, on the 14th of November, your libellant took blank bills of lading to said master, and requested him to fill them out; he being unwell, your libellant left them on his table, said master saying he would have them made out and hand them to your libellant when he came on board the vessel,—the receipts of said first officer of said bark being the only evidence of such shipment left with your libellant. That the value of said merchandise, wearing apparel, and money so shipped, was at least five thousand dollars.

"And your libellant further shows, that your libellant offered to produce and exhibit to said master in the custom-house, on his pretending he did not know your libellant, his letter to your libellant, written at Whampoa to your libellant at Hong Kong, with the Chinese postmark thereon; also the original receipts of his first officer of said bark, for the cases of merchandise and luggage so shipped, but the said master refused to see them, or pay any attention thereto. All of which actings and doings of said master have been and are oppressive and unjust towards your libellant. That said vessel is a foreign vessel, and is now lying within the jurisdiction of this court, and as your libellant is informed and believes, carried freights on her said voyage which have not yet been paid over to the owners or their agents, to something like eight thousand dollars.

"And thereupon your libellant alleges and articulately propounds as follows: First.

That on or about November 14, 1846, your libellant shipped on board the said bark Zenobia, then lying at Whampoa, (China,) for transportation to the port and city of New York, eight cases of merchandise, duly marked and numbered, and also three other cases of luggage, with a chest of drawers, which contained the sum of $2,500; taking the receipt of the mate of said bark for said last mentioned cases. Second. That on the same day your libellant contracted with the master of said vessel to convey your libellant and his family to the city of New York, and paid the master of said bark $150, as one half of the passage-money therefor. Third. That in coming down from Hong Kong to Whampoa with said merchandise, to ship the same to the United States, your libellant incurred the expense of $40. Fourth. That after shipping said merchandise on board of said bark, and after the payment of said sum of $150 to said master, on account of the passage of your libellant and his family to New York, your libellant returned to Hong Kong for his family, under the assurance of the master of said bark that she would not sail before the first of December; and that he would advise your libellant in time of the day of sailing of said bark from Whampoa. Fifth. That on or about the 22d day of November last, your libellant received a letter from the master of said bark, dated the 19th of said month, stating that he had written a letter on the 18th to your libellant, but lest it might miscarry, he repeated its contents, viz.: that he should sail from Whampoa on the 28th of November. Sixth. That on the 24th of November your libellant and his family left Hong Kong, and arrived at Whampoa on the morning of the 27th of November last, and found said bark had sailed from Whampoa the day previous, to wit, the 26th of November. Seventh. That the expense incurred by your libellant in coming down from Hong Kong to Whampoa with his family to go on board of said bark was $60; and the necessary and additional expense by reason of his detention until the sailing of the next vessel to the United States, the further sum of $64, besides the sum of $16 paid by your libellant in going to Canton to see the agents of said bark. Eighth. That the master of said bark was, on the day of the shipment of said merchandise on board of said bark by your libellant, to wit, the 14th of November last, and some days previous to the date of his letter to your libellant of the 19th of November, duly notified that said bark would sail on the 25th of November; and said master well knew that said bark would sail before the 28th of November last. Ninth. That by the misconduct of said master, your libellant and his family were, on the 26th day of November last, after the shipment of all the merchandise, money, and wearing apparel of your libellant on board of said bark, and the payment of one half their passage-money to the United States, thereby left in Whampoa wholly destitute. Tenth. That your libellant was obliged to raise $1,000, by drawing bills at an enormous rate of exchange, to wit, fifty per cent. premium. Eleventh. That your libellant was, in consequence of being so left destitute as to wearing apparel for himself and family, obliged to expend the sum of $432 for a new outfit. Twelfth. That your libellant, in securing a passage for himself and family by the first vessel from Whampoa to the United States, was obliged to pay $400 therefor. Thirteenth. That upon the arrival of your libellant in the United States in March last, before the arrival of said bark with the effects of your libellant, your libellant was obliged to effect an insurance upon his property at an expense of $61, in order to borrow a small sum for the immediate wants of his family. Fourteenth. That said bark Zenobia arrived in the port of New York on the 9th day of May last; and said master, being called upon by your libellant to refund the passage-money so paid him in Whampoa, with the money and expenses incurred by your libellant in consequence of being left in China, said master wholly refused, and set your libellant at defiance. Fifteenth. That said master, A. R. Cronstadt, after his arrival in New York with said bark, interposed every obstacle in his power, and endeavored to defeat your libellant from obtaining his merchandise and effects so shipped by said vessel, by refusing to enter the same on the manifest of the cargo of said bark with their marks and numbers; and also by refusing to enter the name of your libellant therein as the shipper of said merchandise and effects, to the great damage and injury of your libellant. Sixteenth. That the value of said merchandise, wearing apparel, and money, shipped on board of said bark by your libellant, was at least five thousand dollars.

"And your libellant therefore charges, that said breaches of the undertaking and contract of said bark Zenobia and her master, to and with your libellant, are properly cognizable and relievable in this court of maritime jurisdiction. And your libellant therefore prays the aid of this honorable court, that process maritime may issue against said bark, her tackle and apparel, as well as against her owners and all persons interested therein, pursuant to the practice of courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; and that an attachment in personam may issue against said master, A. R. Cronstadt, and that said bark, her owners, etc., may be by this honorable court decreed to pay to your libellant the money paid to said master on account of said voyage, for the passage of your libellant and his family, together with the damages sustained by your libellant, and the money and expenses necessarily and properly incurred by your libellant in China, by reason of said breach of the contract and undertaking of said master and bark with your libellant, and of all loss and damages sustained by your libellant therefrom, as well also by reason of the refusal of said master to deliver or make the proper entries of the merchandise and effects of your libellant in the custom-house of the port of New York, thereby preventing your libellant from receiving the same; and for such aid and redress against said bark, her owners, or the said A. R. Cronstadt, the master, as the court is competent to give in the premises. And that said bark, tackle and apparel, owners, and all interested in her, may be decreed also to pay to your libellant the costs of this suit. And your libellant will ever pray." (Verification.)

To the libel, as amended, A. R. Cronstadt, the master, and David Carnigie, owner and claimant, interposed separate answers. The answer of Cronstadt, the respondent, denied nearly all of the allegations of the libel, which charged any misconduct upon him. The narrative of the facts given by him was substantially as follows: On November 14, 1846, the libellant came on board the Zenobia, then making ready to sail for New York, and applied to respondent for a passage for himself and family. He stated that he was poor and unable to pay full price, and desired to work his passage in part. He said that he was a Dane, and conversed with respondent, who was also a Dane, in the Danish language, and thus interested the sympathies of respondent in his behalf, as a fellow countryman. The respondent was thus persuaded to agree to give him passage at the reduced price of $300, payable in advance. When, however, the time of payment came, the libellant represented that he had only money enough to pay one-half, and the respondent was then persuaded to accept half the money in cash, and the balance in libellant's note. The libellant thereupon sent on board several cases of merchandise, amongst which was a chest of drawers, as stated in the libel, but respondent had no knowledge of their contents. No bills of lading for this property were given, and the only receipt obtained by libellant was one which he took from the second mate, and was merely for a hat, a compass, and a tea-caddy, which were specially entrusted to the mate. In respect to the time of sailing, the respondent told libellant at the time of his taking passage, that he could not tell when he should sail, but did not expect to sail before the latter part of November, but he recommended libellant to get his family down and on board as soon as possible. The libellant then left to go for his family, but he having been gone a long time, respondent wrote to him, urging him to return without delay, and saying that as near as he knew, the vessel would sail on or about the 28th. The vessel did not actually leave Whampoa till the 27th. The answer also denied having done anything to delay or thwart the libellant in procuring his property to be passed through the custom-house. The answer insisted that the claim of the libellant that he had $2,500 in specie in his chest of drawers, showed that the contract of affreightment was procured through false and fraudulent pretences of poverty, and for this reason respondent contended that libellant was entitled to no remedy upon the contract. He also insisted that the contract was a personal one, and not within the jurisdiction of the court. The answer of the claimant, David Carnigie, set up substantially the same matters of defence with that of Cronstadt. The details of the testimony given at the hearing are omitted,—the interest of the case lying in the points of law ruled by the court.

Francis B. Cutting, for claimant and respondent.

BETTS, District Judge. The libellant seeks to recover, in this action, for several distinct items of damage connected with a breach of a contract of affreightment, entered into between himself and the master of the Zenobia, and which, as he charges, was wilfully violated by the latter. The allegations of damage are, many of them, distinct in their nature, and require to be separately considered.

The libellant shipped on board of the Zenobia, then lying at Whampoa, China, for transportation to this port, sundry cases of merchandise. On the arrival of the vessel here, it was found that the articles contained in a trunk belonging to libellant had become injured by being wet. The other cases passed into the custom-house, and by the neglect of the master to make the proper entries upon the ship's manifest, the libellant was greatly delayed in obtaining their delivery to him. The vessel is undoubtedly responsible to the libellant for the safe carriage and delivery of the goods laden by him on board her, and he is entitled to recover damages for a breach of duty in this respect.

As regards the injury to the articles contained in the trunk, the defence is, that the damage was occasioned by the perils of the sea. But there being no bill of lading in the case, exempting the vessel from liability for losses arising from perils of the sea, it becomes necessary for the claimants to prove that the injury arose from supernatural causes. In other words, the liability of the ship, as a common carrier, can only be discharged by showing that the loss was incurred from perils embraced within the meaning of the phrase, "the act of God." The cases are very numerous in which the attempt has been made to exempt the common carrier from this strict liability for losses occasioned by casualties not absolutely unavoidable; but the rule is uniform, and is sanctioned by authority too strong to be questioned, that to bring a disaster within the scope of the phrase, "the act of God," for the purpose of relieving the common carrier from responsibility, it is necessary to show that it occurred independent of human action or neglect. It is only a natural and inevitable necessity, and one arising wholly above the control of human agencies, which constitutes the peril or disaster contemplated by that phrase. 2 Kent, Comm. 597. In the absence of an exemption to be gathered from the contract of affreightment, the carrier cannot excuse a loss, resulting in any degree from the influence of human means, excepting only a loss from the force exerted by a public enemy. Numerous cases upon this subject are collected and discussed in McArthur v. Sears, 21 Wend. 190. See, also, The Reeside [Case No. 11,657]; 1 Conn. 487; Story, Bailm. §§ 512, 531; Whitesides v. Russel, 8 Watts & S. 44. Any act of omission, neglect, or carelessness on the part of the master or crew, contributing to the loss, takes away the protection of the defence here relied upon.

It is in proof, on the part of the libellant, that the trunk was stored in the long-boat, and that such storage was not proper for freight of that description. The vessel must therefore be held responsible for the injury received by the contents of the trunk.

There is also a demand for damages because of the misconduct of the master in the preparation of his manifest, and in thwarting the libellant in his efforts to obtain the delivery of his goods in this port. How far these particulars if proved with all the aggravations charged in the libel, might afford substantive ground of action, I do not now examine or decide. The testimony does not present a case requiring such decision. But the delay of the master in presenting a proper manifest, so that the libellant could pass his property through the custom-house, is a neglect of his duty as master; and damages naturally incident to any failure of duty towards the shipment on the part of the master, fall properly within the responsibility of the vessel. She is bound for the safe carriage and due delivery of the cargo; and acts of misconduct by the master, which are injurious in either respect to the shipper, will subject her to make adequate recompense to the freighter. The liability of the vessel upon this score is, however, limited to damages for the act or neglect of the master in his capacity as such. For any tortious endeavor on his part to prevent the libellant from recovering possession of his goods, she is not responsible; nor would such acts of the master, committed at this port, and in command of the ship, fall within the jurisdiction of the court, in an action against him personally.

It will be difficult to fix upon a measure of damages in that respect which will meet the particular merits of the case yet rest on principles of general application. The actual damage to the owner of goods may be very great, yet when the damage to a considerable degree is merely consequential, it cannot be charged in its entirety upon the vessel as the immediate and proximate cause of it. If the goods were subject to freight, I should be inclined to regard a loss from the misconduct of the master in withholding their delivery, a proper counter-claim against the freight; but these goods being the personal baggage of libellant and family, and not chargeable with freight, I think some compensation awarded by way of demurrage as it were, will be the appropriate mode of satisfaction. The master made oath before the deputy collector to the manifest, on May 8th, the libellant being then here, seeking the delivery of his property; and did not make the proper baggage entry thereon, so that the goods could be obtained by the libellant until June 15th. This act, although importing wilful misconduct on the part of the master, was yet within the scope of his authority, and accordingly the vessel stands chargeable with its consequences. Abb. Shipp. 152, 158. I regard the delay to the owner in obtaining his goods, and his necessary expense in procuring them from the custom-house, as imposing on him a loss or damage amounting to $2 per day; and without a more satisfactory measure of compensation, I shall adopt that as a reasonable remuneration, and allow him the sum of $74, because of the wrongful non-delivery of his property pursuant to the shipping contract.

The libellant charges that a chest of drawers which was shipped by him amongst the cases of merchandise above referred to, contained the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars in specie, and that this money was missing from the chest when delivered to him in this port. There is no evidence, however, to support either of these averments; and the claimant proves, by the testimony of one of the mates of the vessel, that the libellant himself had access to the chest of drawers while it was yet on board the vessel; that he took a bundle from the furniture previous to its being landed, and that no complaint was then made by him of the loss of any money. He establishes no right to recovery on this part of his claim.

The libel avers that the libellant contracted with the master of the Zenobia to convey him and his family from Whampoa to this port; that he paid the master of the bark in advance $150, being one half of the passage money, and that the vessel sailed without him, previous to the time appointed and without his knowledge. I think the libellant has established this charge, and is entitled to recover against the bark his damages for this breach of contract by the master, to transport him and his family as passengers. This contract was one which it was competent for the master to make in the employment of the ship, and became binding on the vessel. Abb. Shipp. 160; 3 Kent, Comm. 162. The vessel is liable on this contract for the $150 paid the master in advance in China, upon the grounds stated in the former decision of the court in this cause, in July last. [Case No. 18,208.]

The libellant came down from his residence at Hong Kong to Whampoa, in season to embark on the Zenobia on November 28th, which was her appointed day of sailing, but found she had already left. His expenses incurred in coming down to Whampoa are stated at $60, and his further expenses incurred through his detention at Whampoa, at $64, besides $16 paid in going to Canton to confer with the agents of the bark respecting her departure. There is no ground upon which the libellant can claim to recover the cost of his passage from Hong Kong to Whampoa, as he must necessarily have made that voyage, whether he came home in the Zenobia or the Rainbow. But the vessel is chargeable with the expenses of the libellant incurred in waiting at Whampoa, after the Zenobia had left, for the sailing of a vessel in which he might take passage to the United States. The evidence shows that $64 is a moderate allowance for those expenses, and that sum should accordingly be allowed.

It is not necessary to discuss the question of the liability of the vessel or master to the libellant for the disbursements said to have been made at Canton in a premium for the loan alleged in the libel to have been paid, or for the new supply of clothing for himself and family there purchased. No proof is given that the libellant made any such disbursements, and the court cannot presume them from any supposed necessity, arising from the circumstances of the case.

I consider the bark equitably liable because of the violation of the contract to transport the libellant and his family to this port, in damages equal to the cost of his passage to this country in the Rainbow, upon the general grounds upon which I have already placed his right to recover back the advance passage-money. That disbursement is fairly chargeable upon the ship as a portion of the damages recoverable by libellant for the breach of the passage contract. The sum of $400 paid by him is proved to be below the usual and customary rate of charge for such passages, and that sum he is entitled to recover.

A reference must necessarily be had to a commissioner, to ascertain the amount of injury to the clothes contained in the trunk, by wetting, unless the parties can agree to the amount of such damage.

It is proper to remark, in respect to the deposition of Captain Cronstadt, the respondent, which was offered in the cause, that even if it were legally admissible, it would not in my estimation, displace the other evidence in the cause, nor vindicate his conduct. But he stands a party to the suit, being prosecuted in personam, and subject to a decree against himself for all the liabilities of the vessel in this behalf; and the case of Bridges v. Armour, 5 How. [46

U. S.] 91, seems to settle the point that he is an incompetent witness in the cause.

The decree will accordingly be for the libellant, as above, and for full costs of suit.

Case No. 18,210.

The ZEPHYR.

[3 Mason, 341.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1824.

BOTTOMRY BOND—PLEDGE OF FREIGHT—RECOVERY OF EXCHANGE.

1. Where a bottomry bond is given upon vessel and freight, it binds them only, and not the cargo, although in a recital in the bond it is stated, that the master was necessitated to take the sum loaned on the vessel, her cargo, and freight.

2. If the omission were by mistake, and so stated in the libel, it might be reformed.

[Cited in Pope v. Nickerson, Case No. 11,274.]

[Cited in Bell v. Morse, 6 N. H. 209.]

3. Where a bottomry bond was given, payable within five days after the arrival of the vessel at Boston, and a bill of exchange was drawn for the amount loaned, at the same time, payable in London, and the agreement was, that if the bill was paid, the bottomry bond should be void, at the option of the borrower, and the borrower does not elect to pay the bill, the lender cannot, in a suit on the bottomry bond, recover the exchange between Boston and London, but must receive the amount of his bottomry bond.

[Cited in Greely v. Smith, Case No. 5,750.]

4. When freight is pledged in a bottomry bond, it means the freight of the whole voyage, and not the freight for that part of the voyage unperformed at the time of giving the bottomry bond.

[Cited in Brett v. Van Praag, 157 Mass. 142, 31 N. E. 763.]

This was a libel, upon a bottomry bond, against the schooner Zephyr, her cargo, and freight. The schooner was bound on a voyage from Messina in Sicily to Boston, with a cargo consisting principally of fruit, and being greatly injured by the perils of the sea during her voyage was compelled to put into the port of Lisbon for repairs and refitment. A survey was here called, and the cargo was unladen for the purpose of repairs, and the latter being completed, the undamaged part of the cargo was reladen, and the libellants also shipped on board about 50 casks of wine for the Boston market. The libellants advanced the money necessary for the repairs, amounting to £856. 7s. sterling, for which the master of the Zephyr drew a bill on his owner's agents, in London, and the libellants also took, as they assert, as collateral security, the bottomry bond now in controversy, upon a premium of £15 per cent. The bond recites, that the master "was necessitated for the prosecution of his voyage from the port of Lisbon to the port of Boston, to take upon the said schooner her cargo and freight for the said voyage," the sum stated in the bond. It then states a covenant on the part of the master to proceed to Boston and finish his voyage, and he binds "the said schooner Zephyr, her freight for the said voyage" (omitting any mention of the cargo), "with her appurtenances, for the payment of the sum lent, and the bottomry interest, viz. £984. 16s. sterling, within five days after the ship's arrival at Boston, or at any other port of discharge." He then covenants, "that the said schooner Zephyr, her freight for the said voyage, together with her tackle &c. after her next safe arrival at Boston or any other port of discharge, shall be liable and chargeable at all times" for the amount of the bond. Then follows a clause, "that in case the schooner Zephyr shall be lost, taken, burnt, or cast away before her next safe arrival at Boston or any other port of discharge, or that a bill of exchange dated this day, signed &c. for the said sum £856. 7s. payable in London at 60 days' date to order of Charles Higgs on Messrs. N. H. C. & Company, shall be duly accepted and paid, then and in either of the two cases aforesaid the said payment of £984. 16s. sterling shall not be demanded or recoverable," &c. The schooner duly arrived in Boston, and the bottomry bond not having been paid, the present suit was commenced in October, 1822, and from various causes, was delayed upon the appeal until the hearing at the present term.

Mr. Hubbard, for libellants.
Mr. Peabody, for respondents.

STORY, Circuit Justice (after reciting the facts). It is unnecessary to state any other points presented by the case, except those which have been suggested for argument in this court. The first is, whether the cargo is bound by the terms of the bond, that cargo having been shipped partly on freight, and partly on account of the owners of the ship. It appears to me that the cargo is not, upon the true construction of the terms of the bond, bound by the hypothecation. It is true, that in the preliminary recital it is stated, that the master was necessitated to take upon the schooner, her cargo, and freight, the sum loaned; but the subsequent clauses containing the actual hypothecation confine it in terms to the schooner and her freight for the voyage. If the cargo had been omitted by mistake, and that was made clear by the evidence, it might have furnished another ground to reform the contract. But the libel does not address itself to any such state of facts; and the court is therefore relieved from any further inquiry as to the true import of the terms of the bond. Upon this I have no more to say, than that as they speak a positive and clear language, putting only the vessel and freight under hypothecation, I see no reason to extend the obvious meaning from the more large, but not very definite intention, indicated by the recital.

The next point is, whether the libellants are not entitled to an allowance, upon the sum due by the bond, of the rate of exchange between London and Boston. The argument is, that the bill of exchange was payable in London; and therefore the court ought to give the party the same benefit, as if it were actually paid there. But the present is not a suit upon the bill of exchange, to recover the simple amount thereof with damages. It is a suit in rem upon the bottomry bond, in which the libellants seek to recover the whole bottomry loan and premium, which by the terms of the bond is payable within five days after the arrival of the vessel in Boston. The money therefore was clearly payable here; and the party cannot entitle himself to the rate of exchange, since the undertaking was not to pay it in London. As to the bill of exchange, recited in the bond, there is no pretence to say, that there was an absolute undertaking by the owners of the schooner to pay it. There is an option given to them by the bond to pay it in lieu of the bottomry premium; and if they do not choose to avail themselves of the alternative inserted in the bond for their benefit, the only effect is, that the hypothecation becomes absolute, and may now be rigorously enforced against the ship and freight.

The remaining point requires more consideration. The district judge decreed to the libellants an allowance of the freight of the whole cargo from Lisbon to Boston, excluding what may be considered a pro rata freight from Messina to Lisbon. The question is, whether the bottomry bond was not intended to cover the whole freight earned in the voyage from Messina. If this were to be decided upon the general principles of maritime law, independently of the particular circumstances of this case, I should have great difficulty in confining the hypothecation to the freight earned on the voyage from Lisbon to Boston. Where the freight is pledged generally, it seems to me, that it includes the freight for the whole voyage, which the ship is in the course of earning; and it would be unjust and inconsistent with the intention of the parties, to restrict it to freight subsequently earned, as upon a new contract. Upon any other construction, where the vessel is repaired at an intermediate port, without any change of her cargo, no freight at all would be hypothecated; for no distinct freight would grow due for the voyage from the port of repairs. The freight ultimately paid would not be divisible; it would be the entire freight for the fulfilment of the original contract for the whole voyage, and not a pro rata freight, as upon a receipt and delivery at the intermediate port. When the parties pledge freight, it must, in the absence of all other counter proofs, be presumed, that they mean the freight to be earned by the ship in the course of the voyage, which has been interrupted by the disaster. By the maritime law of France, indeed, freight, which is to be earned, is not the subject of hypothecation, though Valin and Emerigon admit, that freight actually earned may be. 2 Valin, Comm. lib. 3, tit. 5, art. 4; 2 Emerig. c. 5, § 2, p. 479. Whether this is the law of other continental nations, it is unnecessary to inquire, for our law is certainly different, and by that alone the present suit is to be determined. Unless, then, some language is used in the instrument now before the court, which calls upon it to narrow the general interpretation of hypothecations of freight, the freight, which was earned upon the whole voyage from Messina, must be brought into court, and subjected to the claim of the bottomry holders. Various clauses are relied upon for this purpose, in which the expression is used, that the hypothecation is of "the schooner and her freight for the said voyage;" but all these expressions, by necessary reference, reflect back upon the antecedent recital, in which the voyage is mentioned, and therefore the whole case resolves itself into the true interpretation of the words of that recital. I have already had occasion to quote the words. There is nothing in them, that points to the commencement of a new voyage. The vessel is stated to be riding at anchor within the port of Lisbon, and bound for Boston, and the money loaned is for the prosecution of the voyage from Lisbon to Boston, and the money is said to be "taken upon the schooner, her cargo, and freight for the said voyage." This is certainly true in point of fact, for her voyage was at that time from Lisbon to Boston; but that is not inconsistent with its being a part of the larger voyage in prosecution from Messina to Boston. If the cargo had been directly hypothecated, it would scarcely be pretended, that it included only the new cargo taken in at Lisbon, for this belonged exclusively to the libellants. As little reason is there to suppose that the freight of this new cargo only was actually hypothecated, for the libellants might have arrived at their object in that view by a shorter way. The freight, in contemplation of the parties, must have been the freight which would be earned by the prosecution of the voyage from Lisbon to Boston; and that freight was what the owners of the ship earned, as well upon the shipment at Messina, as that at Lisbon. I see nothing in the words used in the bond that prevents the court from giving them this reasonable construction. Instruments of this sort are rarely drawn with technical accuracy, and it is the duty of the court to give them a liberal interpretation. The parties have imperfectly expressed their meaning; they have referred to a voyage then intended to be prosecuted farther, which had been partly accomplished, and they take up the voyage at that point of time only at which the bottomry risk was to commence, and describe so much of it as fixed the beginning and termination of that risk. The whole earnings of the vessels were intended to be pledged; and the whole depended upon the successful termination of the remaining part of the voyage. I have no doubt, therefore, that the bottomry holders are entitled to have an account and allowance of the whole freight for the whole voyage from Messina, and I shall decree it to be paid them accordingly.

LIABILITY OF SHIP-OWNER—INJURY TO CARGO.

[Ship-owners are not liable for damage to iron shipped under a bill of lading exempting the ship from accountability for rust, unless the rust was received on board, and through want of proper stowage and care.]

Suit by Augustus Zarega and others against Edward A. Gee and others for freight on bill of lading from Liverpool to this port. A lot of iron was delivered to respondents by the libellants in this port, in a very rusty condition, produced by water or soda ash stains. The bill of lading had a reservation written on it, "Ship not accountable for rust," and the libellants proved that the cargo was put on board at Liverpool badly rusted. The proof was that the iron was properly stowed in the ship, and that barrels of soda ash, laden on board, were also properly and securely stowed in the sides of the ship, and in the usual manner in relation to the stowage of iron with it.

Held (BETTS, District Judge): That the ship owners were not liable for the damage to the iron without proof that the rust was received on board, and for want of proper stowage and care.

Decree for the full freight, with leave, however, on application of the respondents, to open the case for further proofs to the want of due care and attention by the master to the cargo, or in stowing the iron or soda ash on board.

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. April Term, 1873.

ATTACHMENT PROCEEDING—BREACH OF CONTRACT—UNLIQUIDATED DAMAGES—JURISDICTION OF COUNTY COURT—INJUNCTION AGAINST JUDGMENT.

1. Under the local law of Georgia, no attachment lies for the recovery of unliquidated damages consequent upon the breach of a contract.

2. And when from the answer of the garnishees, it appears that there are no debts due the defendants in attachment in the county where the proceedings are commenced, and none of their property is seized in the county, the county court has no jurisdiction to proceed further in the case.

3. A judgment in attachment will be enjoined in equity if the defendant had no actual notice, and had a good defense, and his failure to make defense was owing not to any fault or negligence on his part, but to the fault of the plaintiff.

This was a cause in equity which was submitted for final decree on the pleadings and evidence.

Arthur Hood, for complainants.

Herbert Fielder, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. This cause was commenced in the superior court of Randolph county, and was removed thence to this court by complainants, who are citizens of the state of New York. The object of the bill is to set aside a judgment of the county court of Richmond county, rendered in a proceeding in attachment at the August term, 1867, in favor of McDonald, the defendant in this cause, and against the firm of Scott Zerega & Co., of which complainants [Zerega and Scott] are surviving partners, for $1,600. The alleged facts, upon which said judgment was predicated, are these: McDonald had consigned thirty-three bales of cotton to complainants, in the city of New York, to be sold by them, not before the lapse of a specific time. The complainants sold the cotton without authority before the time fixed by McDonald for the sale, whereby he claimed to have suffered a loss of $1,600. McDonald swore out an attachment against Scott, Zerega & Co., in the county court of Randolph county, Georgia, on the ground that they were nonresidents of the state, and garnishee process was served on several citizens of Randolph county, and upon Nutting, Powell & Co., of Bibb county, Georgia. All the persons served in Randolph county answered under oath, that they had no effects of, and were not indebted to the defendants in attachment. Nutting, Powell & Co., of Bibb county, made no answer. No property was anywhere seized by virtue of the attachment. Notwithstanding these facts, the plaintiff in attachment proceeded with his cause, submitted the same to a jury which rendered a verdict in his favor for $1,600, and Nutting, Powell & Co., having failed to answer, judgment was rendered against them in Bibb county for the amount of the demand of McDonald. The complainants aver, that they had no notice or knowledge of these proceedings in attachment; that they were not in any manner indebted to McDonald; that he had no claim upon them for damages; that they had a good defense to the said action, and that the county court of Richmond county had no jurisdiction to render said judgment.

We think this judgment should be set aside, on several grounds:

1. The Code of Georgia authorizes proceedings in attachment in cases of debt, and requires that the party seeking this remedy make oath of the amount of the debt claimed to be due. It was held by the supreme court of this state in Mills v. Findlay, 14 Ga. 230, that "under the laws of this state no attachment lies for the recovery of unliquidated damages consequent upon the breach of a covenant." The attachment in that case appeared to have been taken out for breach of covenant, in this, that the defendant had sold to the plaintiff the patent right for Bibb county to "Woodworth's Planing Machine," whereas, the plaintiff was not the owner of said patent, and had no right to sell the same. It is true that this decision was made in 1853, before the present Code of Georgia was in force, but the law then in force required the plaintiff in attachment to make affidavit of the amount of "the debt or demand which he believed to be due" (1 Cobb's Dig. p. 77), and this was held not to embrace unliquidated damages. This decision is contrary to the current authority in other states (Lenox v. Howland, 3 Caines, 323; Wilson v. Wilson, 8 Gill, 192; Peter v. Butler, 1 Leigh, 285; Weaver v. Puryear, 11 Ala. 941); but it is the construction put upon the local law by the supreme court of this state, and must be considered as a part of the statute (Massingill v. Downs, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 767; Nesmith v. Sheldon, Id. 812; Webster v. Cooper, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 504).

2. When, from the returns of the garnishees in Richmond county, it appeared that there were no debts due said Scott, Zerega & Co., in that county, and there being no property of complainants seized in that county, the county court had no jurisdiction to proceed further in the case.

3. I am satisfied from the evidence in this case that the complainants have a good defense against the claim of McDonald. As the judgment was taken against them without notice, it ought to be set aside. A judgment in attachment will be enjoined, if the defendant had no actual notice and had a good defense to the suit, and his failure to make defense was owing not to any fault or negligence on his part, but to the fault of plaintiff. Farmers' & Exchange Bank v. Ruse, Patten & Co., 27 Ga. 391. A decree will be entered setting aside the verdict and judgment rendered in the county court of Randolph county against Scott, Zerega & Co., as in the opinion of this court, the county court of Randolph had no jurisdiction of the case.

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1849.

BILL OF LADING—CONTRADICTION BY PAROL—INSUFFICIENT PACKING.

1. Under a bill of lading which acknowledges the receipt of goods for transportation in good order, the carrier may, notwithstanding, show, in case of injury to the goods, and as against the owner of them, that it was occasioned by insufficiency in the cask, case, &c., in which they were packed, and not by any negligence or misfeasance upon his part.

[Compare, also, on the right to explain a bill of lading, Manchester v. Milne, Case No. 9,006; Goodrich v. Norris, Id. 5,545; Baxter v. Leland, Id. 1,124.]

2. But the law presumes that the goods were delivered to the carrier in the condition specified in the bill of lading; and the burden of proof lies upon the carrier to rebut this presumption.

3. It is not sufficient, in case of damage to goods received under such a bill, for the carrier to show that the goods were delivered to him in insufficient packages, and that the defect was not discoverable by him. He must also show that the loss actually resulted from such insufficiency, and from no fault of his.

[Cited in Kennedy v. Dodge, Case No. 7,701.]

This was a libel in personam, by Augustus Zerega, Thomas Andrews, and Isaiah C. Whitmore, owners of the ship James H. Shepherd, against Edward Poppe and Theodore Poppe, to recover the freight of thirty-two casks of linseed oil, shipped on board the James H. Shepherd, at Antwerp, and consigned to the defendants at this port. The goods were shipped under a bill of lading, in French, of which the following is a translation: "I, J. Ainsworth, captain of the American ship James H. Shepherd, at present at Antwerp, bound for New York, acknowledge to have received on board my said ship, in good order, from Messrs. F. & J. Badart Frères, thirty-two casks of linseed oil, containing together twenty thousand and sixty-three litres, which I bind myself to deliver at the said place, well-conditioned, excepting the perils of the sea, to order, they paying me for freight two American cents per gallon, and no more; for the accomplishment of which I bind myself, my property, and my said ship, freight and equipment, and have signed four receipts of the same tenor and of one effect. Done at Antwerp, March 10, 1848. Contents unknown—not accountable for leakage. James Ainsworth."

Thirty-one of these casks of oil were safely delivered to the respondents, the consignees, in New York. The other cask was found, on unloading, to have been broken, and its contents had escaped. The consignees, considering that the value of the oil lost, including duties paid upon the lost oil, as a part of the invoice, exceeded the amount due for freight, and that the carriers were liable for the loss, refused to pay the charges for freight, and this suit was accordingly brought by the ship-owners, to recover it. The amount claimed was $89.20. Other facts appear in the opinion.

Mortimer Porter, for libellants.

Edgar Logan, for respondents.

BETTS, District Judge. This action is by the owners of the ship James H. Shepherd, to recover the freight of thirty-two casks of linseed oil from Antwerp to New York. Thirty-one of these casks were delivered to the defendants, as consignees. One cask, of the capacity of two hundred and six gallons, was found, on discharging the vessel, to be broken, and its contents had leaked entirely out. The value of the oil lost, including sixteen dollars duties paid upon it by the consignees, exceeds, it is contended, the amount of freight stipulated for the transportation of the thirty-one casks. And the question between the parties is, upon which this loss shall fall.

The liability of the ship-owners is fixed prima facie by the bill of lading, as between the parties to it; and considering the defendants to have no other rights than those of the owners of the goods shipped, the burden is on the respondents to show an adequate excuse for not delivering the entire cargo, conformably with the terms of the bill of lading. Abb. Shipp. 323; Curt. Merch. Seam. 169. The acknowledgment by the bill of lading that the cargo was received in good condition is prima facie evidence that, so far as indicated by the external appearance of the casks, it was in good order when laden on the ship. It is not, indeed, conclusive upon the libellants. They are at liberty to show that the loss resulted from inherent insufficiency or concealed defects in the cask, or other facts constituting an adequate cause for its breakage, without fault or negligence on their part. It, however, devolves upon them to supply satisfactory proof that the admission made in the bill of lading is inaccurate, and that this cask was not received by the ship in good condition.

The exculpation set up is, that the cask, when sent to the ship, was rotten and insufficient to bear the weight of oil in it, and the handling necessary for lading and unloading it. Such defects of the cask, not discernible to the carrier on an ordinary examination, will undoubtedly relieve him of responsibility in case of the loss of its contents in the course of transportation. Story, Bailm. § 492. But this insufficiency of the package, and the fact that it was the cause of the loss, must be proved. It is not to be presumed from the circumstances that the goods were not safely delivered. The libellants have undertaken to establish the fact, by proving the broken cask was in appearance old, decayed, and rotten; and from that condition of infirmity, they contend the leakage was owing to the insufficient state of the cask, and not to any negligence or improper act of the master or crew.

It is not necessary to consider the pertinency and weight of those suppositions and inferences, for the libellants have not succeeded in showing that the injury to the cask did actually arise from its insufficiency to sustain the ordinary treatment of lading and stowage on board. Several respectable and intelligent witnesses have been examined, who express the opinion, that from the present state and appearance of the broken stave, it would not have borne rolling over a stone or other hard substance, in getting it to the ship, or being let down heavily on dunnage of wood in the course of stowage. The stave was crushed inwardly near the bilge. The fracture was manifestly caused by the cask encountering a sudden shock or pressure. The ligaments of the stave are severed by being driven inwardly in a splintered state, but held in contact without being actually broken short off. Some of the witnesses inferred this appearance of the fracture was caused by prying the cask with a lever of iron or other hard material, in endeavoring to lift it or move it in stowing; but all agree that the break could not result merely from the resting of the cask on its bed and supporters, in the manner the evidence shows it was dunnaged on board. This testimony displaces all ground of presumption that the breakage arose from any inherent defect of the cask. The opinion of all the witnesses and the exhibition of the stave, demonstrates that the fracture must have been produced by considerable external violence, and could not result from the working of the cask in its place on board.

Admitting, then, that the shippers were bound to supply casks of strength sufficient to bear the ordinary usage in stowing, it is incumbent upon the libellants to prove that this one came to the ship in a broken state, or in such condition that the loss befel it without any act of carelessness on their part. The call upon them to make this proof is pertinent and the more stringent, as it appears that, before the cargo was exposed to sea-perils, the pumps threw up oil from the hold, and on examination of the stowage at the time, this cask was found empty. The strong presumption upon the evidence is, that the injury happened in lading the cask on board, while it was under the responsibility of the respondents.

It is to be remarked, that the opinions of witnesses respecting the inherent defectiveness of the cask are strongly contradictory, and the indirect evidence from that source must be received with great caution. Many coopers and others, experienced in this business, pronounce the cask a sound and sufficient one for the transportation of oil. Some consider its long use as a whale-oil cask tended to strengthen it, and that it was at that time as sufficient to carry linseed oil as when new, whilst others considered its long service had softened and enfeebled the stave so as to destroy its tenacity. Those who carefully inspected the stave, and picked the fibres of wood in presence of the court, disagree in their opinions whether there was any decay or want of strength in it. The weight of evidence in point of numbers is, in that respect, with the respondents.

I think the libellants have failed to prove that the loss of the oil in this case was owing to the defectiveness and insufficiency of the cask, and the respondents, on their part, have proved no more than that it was carefully and safely stowed, and that the fracture cannot reasonably be ascribed to improper stowage; that, however, does not satisfy the bill of lading, nor excuse them from delivering the entire cargo.

The decree must accordingly be, that the value of the oil be deducted and allowed the respondents against the demand of the libellants for freight. If the parties do not agree between themselves in the adjustment of the amount, let a reference be taken to a commissioner to state it. If the loss equal in amount the freight, a decree will be entered dismissing the libel, with costs; if a balance remains payable to the libellants, they will take a decree for the amount, with costs.

ZINKEISEN v. HUFSCHMIDT.

[1 Cent. Law J. 144.]¹

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. March, 1874.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—AMOUNT IN DISPUTE.

[Where a suit is commenced by summons, and no complaint is filed showing the amount in dispute, defendant may, in a proper case, in his petition for removal, show that the amount in controversy exceeds $500, and thereby obtain a removal to the federal court; and, the jurisdiction of the latter court having attached, plaintiff cannot acquire a right to have the case returned to the state court by afterwards filing a complaint, stating the amount in dispute at less than $500.]

This action was brought in the state court to recover the value of a quantity of wheat. Upon the defendant's application, an order of removal to the circuit court of the United States was granted by Judge Small, of the state court. At the time he made the order, no pleading or writ was on file showing the amount in dispute, except the petition of the defendant, asking for the removal. After the order was granted, Zinkeisen & Co. filed a complaint in the state court, alleging the cause of action and claiming damages in a stated sum. In that complaint they obtained an order from Judge Small to show cause why the order made by him, removing the cause into the federal court, should not be vacated and set aside. On hearing the order to show cause, Judge Small refused to vacate the order of removal. On the first day of the session of the United States circuit court after the order of removal, Hufschmidt brought into the court a certified copy of the papers filed in the state court, including the complaint filed after the order of removal was granted, and asked that said papers might be filed and the cause docketed in that court. The motion was argued before one of the judges of the United States district court, who denied it, holding that the complaint filed after the order of removal was conclusive as to the amount in dispute. A motion was then made before DRUMMOND, District Judge, to vacate and set aside the order made by the district judge, and that the cause be docketed, and after argument the order was set aside and the plaintiffs required to file a declaration. This settles a question of practice which has perplexed the profession in the state, and also settles that when the plaintiff chooses to commence suit by summons, and not file either his summons or complaint, the defendant, in a proper case for removal, may enter an appearance and show by petition that a suit has been commenced, and the amount claimed exceeds $500, and tender a proper bond, and thus secure a removal of his cause into a federal court; and when he has done this, it is not in the power of the plaintiff to destroy that right by filing a complaint in the state court reducing his damages below $500; and that, when a cause is once properly in a federal court, the plaintiff cannot then file a declaration laying his damages at less than $500, and cut off the jurisdiction. In other words, when the jurisdiction of the federal court has once attached, it cannot be taken away by any act of the plaintiff.

BANKRUPTCY—APPOINTMENT OF TRUSTEE—RELATIONSHIP TO PERSONS INTERESTED.

The mere fact of relationship on the part of a proposed trustee, under the 43d section of the bankruptcy act [14 Stat. 538], to the bankrupt or to a creditor, or to a proposed member of the committee of creditors, or on the part of a proposed member of such committee to a creditor or to the bankrupt, cannot be regarded as a disqualification.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In this case, at the first meeting of creditors, eight creditors, who had proved their claims, and whose claims amounted, in the aggregate, to $332,712 68, and to three fourths in value of the aggregate amount of all the claims proved, subscribed, under section 43 of the act, a resolution that it was for the interest of the general body of the creditors of the bankrupts, that the estate of the bankrupts should be wound up and settled, and distribution made among the creditors, by trustees, under the inspection and direction of a committee of the creditors, and nominating John H. Wyman as trustee, and Samuel Wyman, Junior, Henry Almy and George C. T. Seaman as the committee. Among the eight creditors are Herman D. Aldrich, to the amount of $188,866 88, who signs by the said Samuel Wyman, Junior, as his attorney; the said Samuel Wyman, Junior, to the amount of $14,985 36; the said George C. T. Seaman, to the amount of $64,942 45; and the firm of which the said Henry Almy is a member, to the amount of $4,500. The said Herman D. Aldrich is the uncle of two of the bankrupts. The wife of the said Herman D. Aldrich is the cousin of the said John H. Wyman, and the sister of the said Samuel Wyman, Junior. The said Herman D. Aldrich is now in a lunatic asylum, as a patient for his health, but has not been adjudged a lunatic by any legal proceedings, nor has any committee of his person or estate been appointed. The said Samuel Wyman, Junior, acted as the attorney for the said Herman D. Aldrich, in proving the said claim of the said Herman D. Aldrich, and in voting for said resolution, in pursuance of a power of attorney executed by said Herman D. Aldrich, in January, 1870, when he was of sound mind.

John H. Wyman, the proposed trustee, is, therefore, related, by consanguinity and affinity in the fifth degree, to Herman D. Aldrich, and in the ninth degree to the two bankrupts, who are the nephews of Herman D. Aldrich. Samuel Wyman, Jr., is related by consanguinity and affinity in the third degree, to Herman D. Aldrich, and in the seventh degree to the two bankrupts, who are the nephews of Herman D. Aldrich, and in the fourth degree to John H. Wyman.

A creditor who has proved his debt, and who did not vote for or sign the resolution, objects to its confirmation by the court, on the ground of the relationships and the other facts thus stated.

The mere fact of relationship in the ninth degree, or a less degree, on the part of a proposed trustee, to a bankrupt, or to a creditor, even the largest in amount, of a bankrupt, or to a proposed member of the committee, or on the part of a proposed member of the committee, to such creditor, or to the bankrupt, cannot be regarded as a disqualification. Other facts, indeed, may concur with such relationships, to make a confirmation improper. But, in the present case, there are no such facts. The three persons named as the members of the committee are all of them creditors, the aggregate of their claims being more than $84,000. Samuel Wyman, Junior, is the attorney of the largest single creditor. The theory of the provisions of the 43d section are, that three fourths in value of the creditors who have proved their debts shall designate the trustee and the committee. The persons designated in the present case are gentlemen of high character and standing, free from all reproach. Nothing appears to indicate that they will act in the interest of the bankrupts, at the expense of the creditors. John H. Wyman and Samuel Wyman, Junior, are more nearly related to the principal creditor than they are to the bankrupts. The trustee is required, by the 43d section, to wind up and settle the estate for the equal benefit of all the creditors, and is at all times subject to the direction of the court in executing his trust. There is nothing to warrant the suggestion, that the bankrupts procured the creditors to make these appointments, or that they are made in the interest of the bankrupts, as against the creditors.

Mr. Seaman, although a resident of New Jersey, has a place of business in the city of New York, which he frequents daily.

The questions raised in regard to the power of attorney from Herman D. Aldrich to Samuel Wyman, Junior, and to the insanity of Herman D. Aldrich, I do not consider, for the reason, that, if the claim of Herman D. Aldrich be stricken out from the signatures to the resolution, it must likewise be stricken out from the debts proved, and there would thus still be signatures to the resolution, of creditors to three fourths in value of the debts proved. Notwithstanding the appointment of a trustee and the assignment of the estate to him, the claim of any creditor may be investigated under section 22, and the bankrupt and other persons may be examined under section 26.

The resolution passed by the creditors will be confirmed when the register shall have signed the proper certificate under form No. 63.

ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY—QUALIFICATIONS.

The election of a near relative of the bankrupt as assignee is not proper. In such case, the appointment by the register of a regular assignee (according to the rules of the district) will be confirmed.

By JOHN FITCH, Register:

The above entitled matter is now pending before me, at chambers of this court, and is a voluntary proceeding under the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]. A warrant was issued to the U. S. marshal as messenger, duly served and published, and returned in due form. The petitioners have been duly adjudged bankrupts upon their own petition as a firm and individually. The whole number of creditors named in the warrant, including those of the firm and the individual creditors, are about sixty (60). That on or previous to the day of the first meeting of creditors, eighteen claims had been proven. At the first meeting of creditors eight creditors signed a paper in the words and figures following, to wit, and to which John H. Bradley was sworn (form No. 63), which is herewith returned. [In conformity to the decisions (In re Bliss [Case No. 1,543]; In re Scheiffer [Id. 12,445]), I state the reasons which compel me to withhold my approval of the choice of trustee.]²

It is represented to me by creditors who have proved their claims, that John H. Wyman, of the city of New York, Samuel Wyman, Jr., H. D. Aldrich, and the bankrupts, or some of the bankrupts, are related to each other, and that the bankrupt, Herman D. Aldrich, Jr., is a nephew of Herman D. Aldrich, who is one of the creditors of the estate of said bankrupts, making a claim by Samuel Wyman, Jr., his attorney, in the sum of one hundred and eighty-eight thousand eight hundred and sixty-six dollars and eighty-eight cents. It is also represented to me that said Herman D. Aldrich is now insane, and is in the insane asylum. Said Samuel Wyman, Jr., exhibited but did not place on file a power of attorney, but not a power of attorney in these proceedings in bankruptcy. It appears that George C. T. Seaman, one of the committee of creditors, is a resident of the city of Elizabeth, in the state of New Jersey, and not a resident of the Southern district of New York; and the decisions in the cases (In re Harris [Case No. 6,112]; Anon. [Id. 461]), would render him ineligible, [as the court in the Case of Havens [Id. 6,231], say that an assignee must reside in the judicial district in which the proceedings are pending.]² It has been uniformly held by the courts, that they will not affirm the appointment or election of an assignee who is a relative of the bankrupt. It is also held that it is an objection to the trustee that he is a relative of the bankrupt. In re Stillwell [Id. 13,447];² [In re Powell [Id. 11,354]; In re Bogert [Id. 1,600]. And if an assignee has been chosen by the particular friends of the bankrupt, the court will not affirm such choice. In re Bliss [supra]; In re Mallory [Case No. 8,990].² As such a large amount of the debts proved are owned by H. D. Aldrich, who is said to be insane, and by Samuel

Wyman, Jr., attorney for H. D. Aldrich, and by George C. T. Seaman, and the claims of many of the other creditors being small, the larger claims so overbalance them that they had but little or no voice in the proceedings. Their rights must therefore be more carefully protected by the court than if they appeared by counsel. Mr. John H. Wyman and George C. T. Seaman are both men of good character and standing in the community.

After examining the authorities applicable to this case, and particularly the decision of Judge Hall, in Re Stillwell [supra], I cannot legally sign the certificate attached to form No. 63 without the direction of the court. I hold, as a matter of law, that the proceedings had by the creditors on the return day of the warrant were void, and not a compliance with the rule and practice of this court. That an assignee was chosen or voted for, and that John H. Wyman is ineligible as trustee on account of relationship, [and that all notes given for a near relation of the bankrupt are void,—similar to the clause in the constitution of this state (1847), declaring all votes cast for a justice of the supreme court during his continuance in office void except for the court of appeals. A similar provision is contained in the constitution of the state of Michigan.]² And that George C. T. Seaman is ineligible as one of the committee on account of his not being a resident of the Southern district of New York; that under the bankrupt act, and by the rules of this court, to appoint John Sedgwick assignee, in order that, should your honor concur in the opinion of Judge Hall, in re Stillwell, the case may proceed regularly. Should I not do so, an alias warrant would have to issue delaying the proceedings unnecessarily. I also send a blank form, No. 63, in order, should your honor decide adversely to the decision of Judge Hall, I can sign the certificate thereto nunc pro tunc. In doing so, the court gets entire possession of the case, and can dispose of it on the hearing. Mr. Cummings, counsel for some of the creditors, desires to be heard orally by the court, and also requests the certificate to form No. 63. Augustus C. Fransioli, attorney for creditors, also desires to be heard orally by the court.

The proof of the claim of H. D. Aldrich, by Samuel Wyman, Jr., attorney, in the sum of one hundred and eighty-eight thousand eight hundred and sixty-six dollars and eighty-eight cents, is hereunto annexed, and the papers in the case not on file in the clerk's office submitted, and also the papers and protest of the creditors represented by F. C. Fransioli, attorney. Should any question arise as to the relationship of the parties, a reference can be had to ascertain the facts. It is exceedingly desirable that the court should lay down a rule as to relatives of bankrupts, etc., serving as trustees on committees, in order that it may be followed in all cases. That the application of creditors for the examination of the bankrupts and witnesses is hereto annexed, and the register desires directions from the court as to the course he should pursue in regard to the same.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. Under section 43, the bankrupts and such creditors as may desire to be heard will be heard, on notice, as to whether the resolution appended to the certificate of the register was duly passed, and whether the interests of the creditors will be promoted thereby, and whether it ought to be confirmed by the court. Meantime the appointment of Mr. Sedgwick as assignee is approved, and he will take such steps as shall seem proper in view of the facts set forth in the certificate of the register and in the papers annexed to it.

The ZODIAC.

[9 Ben. 171.]¹

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1877.

COLLISION—OPPOSITE COURSES—LIGHTS—REMISS LOOKOUTS—STEAMER AND SCHOONER—STEAMER'S DUTY.

1. A collision took place at night off Cape May, between the steamship Z. and the schooner W. W. The schooner was heading S. W. by S., and going about 7 knots, with a fresh breeze from S. E. The steamer was heading N. E. by N., when a red light ahead was seen, soon after changing to red and green, and then to green. The steamer then starboarded one point, changing her course to N. N. E., when the schooner changed her course and showed her red light alone. It was not till after this change that the schooner noticed the steamer. The steamer immediately put her helm hard-a-port, whistled, slowed, stopped and backed, but struck the port side of the schooner, sinking her. In extremis, the schooner ported hard. The schooner averred that the steamer had a bright light visible, but no red or green light. The testimony of the lookout and of the wheelsman of the schooner was not taken: Held, that it was a fault on the part of the schooner for her lookout not to have sooner seen the white light of the steamer.

2. There can be no doubt that the steamer's green and red lights were burning.

3. The steamer was in fault in not starboard-ing enough when the schooner showed her green light. Damage apportioned.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libellants, as owners of the schooner William Wallace, bring this libel against the steamship Zodiac, to recover the damages sustained by them in consequence of the total loss of the schooner through a collision, which took place between her and the steamer, about midnight on the 6th of October, 1872, in the Atlantic Ocean, off Cape May. The schooner was bound from Boston to Philadelphia, in ballast. The steamship was bound from North Carolina to the city of New York. She struck the schooner about amidship, on the port side of the schooner.

The libel alleges that the schooner was heading about southwest by south; that the wind was about southeast; that she had all sails set except the jib topsail; that she had her green and red lights properly set, and they were burning brightly, and were seen in due time by those navigating the steamer; that she had a competent lookout properly stationed and faithfully attending to his duties, and kept her course; that the collision was caused solely by the carelessness and improper manner in which the steamer was equipped and navigated; that she was heading in the usual course for such a voyage, which was about northeast; that she had no lookout properly stationed, attending to his duty; and that she had only a bright light at the masthead, and did not carry at the time either a red or green light. The libel gives no intelligent account of how the collision could have happened, or came to happen. It alleges that the schooner headed southwest by south, and the steamer northeast; and yet, that the steamer struck a square blow on the port side of the schooner, and the schooner kept her course. This would require that the steamer should have changed her course nine points, and have come to be heading north-west by west, at the time of the collision. The libel does not allege how the steamer came to perform so strange a manœuvre in the presence of the visible lights of the schooner, which lights it alleges were seen in due time by those navigating the steamer.

The answer alleges, that, on the steamer, a red light ahead was reported and seen, the course of the steamer being north-east by north; that soon thereafter a red and green light appeared, and immediately the red light was shut out; that thereupon the order was given to heave the wheel to starboard, which order was promptly executed, thus presenting the green light of the steamer to the green light of the schooner, which was for a considerable time plainly visible from the starboard of the steamer; that the steamer was then on a course about north north-east, when, suddenly, the schooner changed her course, shutting in her green light and again opening her red light; that immediately the wheel of the steamer was hove to port and the signal given to stop and back her, but she struck the port side of the schooner; that the steamer had a competent lookout who faithfully performed his duty, and her bright mast-head light and her green and red side lights were good, clear lights and burning brightly; that the red light of the schooner was seen at a considerable distance, and, after her first change of course, her green light was plainly in view for a considerable time, and the green light of the steamer was, during that time, plainly visible to those upon the schooner; and that the collision was wholly due to the change in the course of the schooner and to the unskilful navigation of those on board of her.

That the schooner had her green and red lights set and properly burning is clear. The only witnesses from the schooner whose testimony has been given, are two in number—Ireland, the master, and Jackson, the mate. There were three other persons on board, part of her crew—a steward and two seamen. One of the seamen was stationed forward as a lookout and another seaman was at the wheel. Those two seamen, with the master and the mate, were the only persons on deck. The steward was a negro. All reasonable effort seems to have been made by the libellants to secure the testimony of the two seamen who were on deck. It is admitted, that, before this suit was commenced, the counsel for the libellants took down in writing their statements, and that, on such statements, their testimony was of importance for the libellants. Although the absence of their testimony cannot be attributed to any fault on the part of the libellants, yet the lack of their testimony is a misfortune for the libellants and for their case. When the question in issue is as to whether a vessel sailing by compass changed her course, the testimony of the man whose hands moved her helm and whose eyes were on her compass, is very necessary, and, generally, indispensable. When the question in issue is as to whether a lookout saw as soon as he ought to have seen them, the lights of an approaching vessel, his testimony on the subject is very desirable.

On the schooner, it was the master's watch on deck. The man at the wheel and the man forward were in the master's watch. The master's watch on deck had commenced, and the mate's watch on deck had terminated, shortly before, but the mate still remained on deck. The master's story is, that he was standing by the after companion-way on the port side, which was the weather side, when the lookout forward reported that he saw some kind of a light on the port bow; that he, the master, then walked forward thirty or forty feet, and when he reached there saw a very dim white light bearing about south south-west, (his course being south-west by south, and the light thus being about a point on his port bow), and about 300 yards distant; that he saw no other lights on the vessel, and could not at that time see her hull or her sails; and that, when the vessel came nearer he saw her hull and started to go aft, and was knocked down by the collision. He also says, that the wind was about south-east, a good fresh breeze, and the schooner was making about seven knots; that, with her sheets flat, she could sail five points from the wind; that, when his watch began, she was heading south south-west, (which was six points from the wind), and he changed her course to south-west by south, which was one point further away; that she at no time had her sails shaking in the wind; that, in the alarm and just before the vessels collided, the wheel of the schooner was put hard-a-port; and that the steamer struck the schooner just forward of the main rigging of the schooner, glancing a little aft, on the port side of the schooner.

The testimony of the mate of the schooner is to the same effect as that of the master. He says that he saw the white light of the steamer, after it was reported, about a point and a half on the port bow of the schooner, and about 300 yards off; that the light continued to preserve the same bearing; that, when the steamer was half her length, or a little more, away, the master gave the order to hard up; and that the sails of the schooner did not at any time shake in the wind.

The change of course on the part of the schooner of which the steamer complains is, that after the schooner had changed her light from red to green, and the steamer had starboarded, the schooner shut in her green light and again opened her red light. It is alleged that the green light of the schooner was in view for a considerable time from the steamer, over her starboard, after the steamer had starboarded, and that after that the schooner changed so as to show her red light. When the white light of the steamer was seen a point and a half over the port bow of the schooner, the schooner must have presented her red light to the view of the steamer. As it was then for the first time that the steamer's light was seen by the schooner, I conclude that the schooner first saw that light a considerable time after the steamer had seen the schooner's lights. The steamer's white light had been taken down and trimmed and replaced, and it was after it had been replaced that all the changes of the schooner's lights which are detailed in the answer were seen from the steamer. The steamer noticed all those changes in the schooner's lights, whereas it was not till after the last change in the schooner from green to red that the schooner noticed the steamer's white light.

What bearing does this tardy observation of the steamer's light have upon the case? It has this bearing. Till the steamer's light was observed, her presence was not known. Where there is nothing to arrest the attention, and exact care and vigilance, the attention is apt to flag and care is apt to be relaxed. The special importance of keeping his course, because there was an approaching steamer ahead, was not presented to the mind of the master of the schooner. Hence, before he saw over his port bow the white light of the steamer, at which time he was presenting his red light to the steamer, and after which time he made no change except the porting in extremis, he had no especial motive to keep his particular course strictly, or to observe by his compass whether such course was strictly kept. Undoubtedly he kept his general course; but, with such a wind, in direction and force, the schooner sailing seven points off the wind, would tend to make lee way, and the impulse and effort of the man at the wheel would constantly be to keep her from falling off before the wind. Moreover, with a compass course south-west by south, it is shown that she could lie at least one point nearer to the wind with her sails trimmed as they were, and not have them shake. So that, consistently with the testimony of the master and the mate, the schooner may very well have presented to the view of the steamer the appearances and changes of her lights, to which those on board of the steamer testify, and which will be considered hereafter. I think it was a fault on the part of the schooner for her lookout not to have sooner seen the white light of the steamer. That light had been trimmed and put in place again, and was burning well at the time the first light on the schooner was first seen by the steamer. It must have been visible at a greater distance than the colored lights on the schooner. Yet it was not observed by the lookout on the schooner until a considerable time after the steamer saw the first time the red light of the schooner, or, if he did see it, he failed to report it. He was remiss in the one respect or the other. If he had not been thus remiss, the master of the schooner would have had earlier knowledge of the approach of the steamer, and would have been careful to keep his course strictly, and not present vacillating lights to the view of the steamer. The vessels were approaching each other nearly end on, and it was of the utmost importance that the steamer, after determining, from the appearance of the schooner's lights, on which side she would pass the schooner, should be left free to carry out that determination. Such fault on the part of the schooner contributed to the collision.

The steamer had her green and red lights burning. The master and the mate of the schooner did not at any time see them, but, on the evidence, there can be no doubt they were burning. The red light of the schooner was seen nearly ahead by those on the steamer, and, almost immediately after that, such red light disappeared, and the green light of the schooner came into view. Thereupon the steamer starboarded one point and went upon a north north-east course. Sabiston, the second mate of the steamer, who was in the pilot-house with the master and the man at the wheel, and whose watch it was at the time, used his glass to look at the red light, and judged it to be two or three miles off, and, while still using his glass, saw the green light appear, so that red and green were visible together, and then saw the red disappear, leaving the green in view. There can be no mistake about such testimony. It is distinct, and shows a change of course on the part of the schooner. Such change was notice to the steamer to starboard, and she did starboard. Sabiston says that the starboarding threw the steamer's head to port probably a little more than a point; that thereafter the green light of the schooner remained in view on the starboard bow of the steamer; and that, after the steamer had so fallen off a point or more, she was steadied on her new course. After that the schooner shut in her green light and showed her red, and the steamer immediately put her helm hard-a-port and blew her steam whistle, and slowed and stopped and backed, but the vessels collided.

Sabiston testifies, that when the wheel of the steamer was steadied after starboarding, the green light of the schooner bore a point or a little more on the starboard bow of the steamer; that she was then the best of a mile off; and that, when she showed her red light again, she was two points on the starboard bow of the steamer, and from 200 to 500 yards off. He also says, that if the schooner had not changed her course after the steamer had starboarded, the steamer would have cleared the schooner by from 300 to 400 yards. It is evident that the steamer did not give the schooner a very wide berth. She had turned to the leeward of the schooner, and, as before remarked, the schooner could not fail to make leeway. The steamer did not shake off the schooner to any safe degree. The steamer had seen the schooner change from red to green, and such a change in the broad ocean, at the place where the vessels were, and with the wind as it was and the steamer's white light burning so as to be visible to the schooner, because her colored lights were visible to the steamer, ought to have induced the steamer to believe that the schooner did not see the steamer's light (as was the fact), and to give the schooner more of a berth. With the schooner's green light in view a little on the starboard bow of the steamer, it was proper for the steamer to starboard, but she ought not to have steadied as soon as she did. She ought to have starboarded more than a point. It was her duty to avoid the schooner as much after the schooner showed her green light as before, and even to be more cautious to do so, because of the previous erratic change of the schooner from red to green. The steamer had plenty of time and opportunity to make a change of more than one point to port. I do not regard it as by any means clear, on the evidence, that the steamer would have cleared the schooner, even if the schooner had continued to show her green light.

As both vessels were in fault, there must be a decree for an apportionment of the damages which shall be shown to have been sustained by the libellants.

District Court, S. D. Mississippi. Jan. Term, 1876.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—MATERIALS FURNISHED AT HOME PORTS—C. O. D. BILLS—LIENS AND MORTGAGES—PRIORITIES.

1. The admiralty jurisdiction of the United States courts in no way depends on the residence, or citizenship of the parties.

2. It is only when liens are given by state laws for materials supplied at home ports that they can be enforced in the admiralty courts.

3. When goods are delivered to the master of a vessel to transport to consignees and collect and return the money therefor, the consignor has a lien against the vessel for the money so collected, since the whole contract is one of affreightment.

[Disapproved in The Illinois, Case No. 7,005.]

4. The master and clerk of a vessel are not entitled to liens for their wages.

5. Maritime liens have priority over mortgages.

In admiralty.

HILL, District Judge. The questions now presented for decision, arise upon the exceptions of the intervenor, Samuel Bazinsky, mortgagee of said steamboat, to the libel and interventions here, and upon exceptions filed by libellant and other intervenors to the claims propounded by John King, master, and J. B. Denny, clerk, Bazinsky & Hirsch, supply-men, and by Forbes & Fitzpatrick, on contract of affreightments.

The exceptions filed by H. H. Miller and Porter, proctors for Samuel Bazinsky, are in substance as follows: (1) That there is no lien for any of the claims propounded, because the Emma was engaged in navigation between two ports of the same state. (2) That there is no averment that the boat is of more than twenty tons burden. (3) That contracts to deliver goods to consignees and return money collected from said consignees, on what are commonly called C. O. D. bills, are not maritime contracts. (4) That there is no jurisdiction in the court, because all of the libellants and owners of the boat are residents and citizens of the state of Mississippi.

The first question is as to the admiralty jurisdiction over vessels plying upon the navigable waters, entirely within the body of the state. On this subject, I do not deem it necessary to review the history of judicial decisions in this country, further than to say that since the case of The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 457, it has been the settied doctrine, that the ebb and flow of the tide is not the line limiting the admiralty jurisdiction but that it extends to all navigable rivers and waters of the United States. Subsequently in the case of The Magnolia,² it was held that the admiralty jurisdiction extended to collisions occurring upon navigable waters entirely within the body of a state. But the case of The Belfast, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 624, which has never been overruled, conclusively settles the principle that the admiralty courts have jurisdiction over all maritime contracts, to be performed by, or all torts committed by vessels navigating the navigable rivers and waters of the United States, whether the same be wholly within one state or passing through several states. It is urged by learned counsel for the mortgagee that opinion of the court in that case does not go so far, or that if it does, it has since been overruled in the case of The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 588.

The careful examination of these cases and attentive consideration of the arguments of counsel, have failed to convince me of the correctness of the view taken by counsel. That the rule stated in The Belfast case was intended to fix and settle the admiralty jurisdiction upon all navigable waters of the United States irrespective of state boundaries I have no doubt, and an examination of The Lottawanna will show that this rule has not therein been questioned or disturbed. The sole question in that case, was whether supplies, material and repairs furnished a vessel at her home port, created a lien upon the vessel which could be enforced by a proceeding in rem against the vessel. No question of this sort was raised in The Belfast case [supra]. By the general admiralty law, as enforced in continental Europe, material and supply-men, whether in the home port or a foreign port, have a lien upon the vessel, and a right to proceed in rem. The war made upon the admiralty courts of England, by the law courts, armed with writs of prohibition, restricted this jurisdiction so as to exclude the lien at a home port. The supreme court of the United States, in the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438, adopted the English rule, which the court reaffirms in The Lottawanna case. A modification of the twelfth rule in admiralty was adopted in 1872, and it was thought by several of the courts, and by many of the bar, that its language indicated an intention, upon the part of the court, to overrule former decisions, and hold that there was a lien for supplies and materials furnished at the home port. The court in The Lottawanna case, corrects this view and construes the rule to extend no further than to permit the courts of admiralty to enforce liens given by state laws upon vessels for supplies and materials furnished at the home port. I am satisfied, therefore, that exception is not well taken, and must be overruled.

As to the exception that it is not averred that the vessel is of twenty tons burden, that is also overruled as it was unnecessary to state it, and if necessary, the defect would have been cured by allegations in exceptor's intervention that she was of more than one hundred tons burden.

The next exception is a jurisdictional one, based upon the residence of the parties. It is sufficient to say that admiralty jurisdiction in no way depends upon the residence or citizenship of the parties. Therefore this exception is overruled.

The other exceptions relate to the character of the several claims set up in the libels and interventions, and may be considered together. A portion of these claims are for seamen's wages, and the jurisdiction of the court having been maintained, there can be no question as to mariner's wages being the first lien upon the boat. The next class of claims is for supplies and materials furnished at the home port. Their character has already been discussed, and counsel representing such claims admit in argument that they can not be sustained as liens unless a lien is given them by the laws of Mississippi. The act of the legislature of Mississippi, March 4, 1874, provides for an attachment against a vessel for supplies and material furnished, and it is evident that this act intended to give an implied lien for such supplies and materials, but I do not think such implied lien can be maintained, and if intended to give a remedy in rem against the vessel enforceable in the state courts, it would be an infringement upon the exclusive admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, and void under the decision of the supreme court in The Belfast case. I hold, therefore, that these claims constitute no lien.

The next and last exception offered by the mortgagee is as to the liability of the vessel in rem, upon what are styled C. O. D. bills, that is where the master of the vessel contracted to deliver goods to the consignees to whom they had been sold, and collect and bring back the price thereof to the shipper. There can be no doubt of the liability of the vessel for the safe transportation and delivery of the goods upon these contracts. The more difficult question is as to the liability of the vessel for the failure of the master to return the money received to the shipper. It is, I believe a settled rule, that where a cargo of goods delivered to a vessel upon a contract that the master shall convey them to some market, and there sell them for account of owner, until he makes a sale and delivers the goods he is acting as the master of the vessel, and not as the agent of the shipper; but that after he sells and receives the money he is agent of the shipper, and consequently that for any breach of contract of affreightment the vessel is liable, but for any default in payment of the money to the shipper the master is personally liable only. But there is a marked distinction between such a case and one in which the consignor has already sold the goods to the consignee upon an agreement that money is to be paid upon delivery of the goods. In such case, the contract is entirely one of affreightment. The master contracts for a certain sum to be paid as freight to transport the goods to the consignee and transport the money delivered to him by the consignee back to the consignor, or if the money is not placed upon the vessel by the consignee to re-transport the goods themselves to the shipper. The duties assumed are entirely those of a common carrier and a common carrier is as much liable for a failure to transport and deliver money received by him for transportation as he is for a failure to deliver any other character of freight. The immense commercial business now transacted in this way can only be protected by this rule, which can be applied without infringing upon any established principle of admiralty, and is fully sustained in the case of The Hardy [Case No. 6,056], decided by Judge Nelson. The claims so far as proved must therefore be allowed as liens upon the vessel.

I will next consider the exceptions offered by Pittman & Pittman and Gilland & Birchett, for libellant, and intervenors to other claims and interventions filed and set up by the counsel who represents the mortgagee. The first is that of John King, master of the vessel, for his wages as such. The rule that such a claim is not a lien upon the vessel, enforceable in rem, is too well settled to require either reason or authority to sustain it. His contract is with the owner, and only recoverable against him personally. The exception to this claim must be sustained and claim disallowed. The claim of J. B. Denny, first clerk, is also a claim for wages as such, which I am satisfied must be disposed of in the same way. The first clerk of a steamboat is the chief financial agent of the owner, employed by him and accountable to him and not to the master. He receives and disburses all moneys for the boat, pays the wages of the crew, and practically pays the master of the vessel himself his wages, and, having the money of the boat in his own hands, pays his own salary. The reason a lien is given to mariners for their wages is because they are employed by the master of the vessel, on the credit of the vessel, and would in most cases be practically without remedy if they were compelled to hunt up and sue unknown owners. The first clerk does not occupy any such position; he is the financial agent of the owner, and can at all times pay himself out of moneys in his hands, which he receives for freight and passage. I believe the office of first clerk is one unknown to the general admiralty law, according to which the master is the sole representative and agent of the owner. The same principles which exclude the master from the privileges of a mariner's lien, would also be applicable to the first clerk, and upon principle and reason in the absence of adjudicated cases, I am satisfied that first clerks of steamboats are not entitled to a lien for their wages. So the claim must be disallowed. The claim of Bazinsky & Hirsch is for money advanced in the home port, and does not rank any higher than supplies and materials, and must be disallowed. The claim of Forbes & Fitzpatrick is disallowed, because they have obtained judgment against the owner in a state court, and levied upon goods sufficient to pay the debt.

This leaves but one question to settle—the claim of the mortgagee, Bazinsky. It is insisted by his counsel, that his mortgage is a prior and higher than all others. I am satisfied that this position is not maintainable. It is not a maritime lien, but only a lien upon the vessel, subject to all maritime liens. The mortgagee is only allowed to come into court of admiralty as claimant, and occupies exactly the same position that the owner would. His mortgage, from the date of its record, gives him a lien for his mortgage debt, good against all subsequent vendees and incumbrancers, except those holding maritime liens, which are liens in rem, and without regard to the ownership of the mortgage. A vessel is only a conditional sale, and, as an absolute sale or transfer of the title cannot effect maritime liens, a conditional one cannot. To hold otherwise would destroy the credit of vessels, and hamper commerce, beyond reason, for every employé and every shipper and every passenger would have to examine the customhouse records of the home port of the vessel, before he could safely risk his services, his property, or his person upon a boat. This position is fully sustained by all the authorities. Hence the mortgagee can only claim any surplus that may remain after satisfying all of the maritime liens against the vessel.

The ZONE.

[22 Law Rep. 725; 2 Spr. 19.]¹

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1860.

LIBEL AGAINST VESSEL—DAMAGE TO CARGO.

1. The French Code de Commerce does not differ from the general maritime law, in respect to liens on the ship for damage to the cargo.

2. On trial of a libel against a ship, to recover damage to cargo proved to have been shipped sound, and delivered damaged, the burden of accounting for such damage is on the claimants.

¹ [2 Spr. 19, contains only a partial report.]

This was a libel in rem to recover damage to a quantity of almonds shipped under a French bill of lading, of which the following is a translation. "Marseilles, February 6, 1858. Shipped in the name of God and of good luck, at the port and harbor of this city, by Rabaud Bros. & Co., for account of whom it concerns, in the American ship called the Zone, commanded by Captain Wells, to be conveyed and transported (God assisting) to New Orleans, and delivered to order, or to whomsoever the below-mentioned merchandise shall be for; marked as follows, viz.: 'G. H.' Four hundred and six bags almonds in the shell, weighing in the whole twenty thousand three hundred kilogrammes, K. 20,300,—making thirty one tons $230/1000$. And on receipt thereof, well-conditioned and free from wet or damage, freight shall be paid, six dollars, with ten per cent. primage per ton. Weight, contents unknown to (Signed) John C. Wells." The testimony of sixty-eight witnesses was put into the case, the trial of which lasted six days.

² [The libellants, who are residents of Barcelona, in Spain, by their agents at Marseilles, shipped on board the Zone about thirty tons of soft-shelled almonds to be delivered at New Orleans. The almonds had been purchased at Alicante, and carried thence, by water, to Marseilles. The persons who packed the almonds at Alicante, the master of the steamer that carried them to Marseilles, and the persons employed in transshipping them at Marseilles, severally, testified that they were in good condition when they passed through their hands. The bills of lading signed by the master were not in the ordinary form. They did not contain any admission that the almonds were in good condition when received, nor any undertaking to deliver them in good order; nor did they contain the usual exception of the perils of the seas; but they provided that, upon the delivery of the almonds in sound condition at New Orleans, the stipulated freight should be paid. The master and mate of the Zone testified that the almonds, so far as they knew or saw, were in good condition when received at Marseilles. They saw them, however, only in the imperfect light of the hold of the vessel, and neither of them was acquainted with the article; and they both testified that when taken out of the vessel at New Orleans they were in as good order as when received, except about a dozen bags, which had been rat-eaten, and the bagging of a part of the rat-eaten bags, which had fallen down against the ballast, was rotten from humidity. On the voyage, the vessel encountered strong gales and a "short heavy sea," and carried away some of her lighter sails and spars. She was, however, very tight, the water never rising in her more than eleven inches, and never coming up within several inches of her ceiling. On ar-

iving at New Orleans, the almonds were taken out of the ship, and about half of them were sent to the store of a merchant who had bought them to arrive; he then refused to receive any more, alleging that they were damaged. The consignees thereupon took the remainder into their own store, and had them all examined by two port-wardens, who reported that they found them generally stained and mouldy, and thereby rendered unmerchantable, and ordered them to be sold at public auction. They were sold accordingly, and bought in by the merchant who had before bought them to arrive, for about half the price he had agreed to pay for them. The master of the vessel was not notified to be present at the examination by the port-wardens, though he was notified afterwards of the intended sale. The testimony as to the actual condition of the almonds, when they came out of the vessel at New Orleans, was very conflicting. The merchant who had bought them to arrive, and the consignee, both testified that many of them were actually wet, and that more than half of them showed signs of having been wet or were actually wet. The marine inspector, who was also agent of the insurance company that insured them, saw part of them in store, part in the hold of the vessel. He said he found them "stained, mouldy, and diseased, and musty; that they had been wet, and part of them were still damp." Two of the employees of the consignees testified that they were wet, and "the greater part of them perfectly black." Other employees of the consignees testified that they were not then wet, but appeared to have been wet, and were then damp. The two port-wardens, who examined them after they had been taken out of the vessel, and who ordered them to be sold, testified that they found them "generally stained and mouldy." Some of them appeared to be damaged by salt water and by dampness and humidity. One of them spoke of finding stained almonds in bags that showed no external appearance of damage. One of them spoke of the bags as appearing "rusty." One employee of the consignees testified that he opened three or four bags, and found them wet and mouldy. A dealer in almonds, who attended the auction sale, and saw these almonds there, said they were "stained and black, and appeared to have been wet." Another said, they "evidently had been damaged by salt water." The libellants also called three stevedores, two Italians and one Spaniard, who testified that almonds should not be stowed in the hold of a double-decked vessel, and, if so stowed, there should be under them at least two feet of ballast, and twenty inches of dunnage on top of that. Several of the libellants' witnesses attributed the damage to bad stowage and insufficient dunnage. Two of them thought the damage had been caused by blowing. One or two suggested the steam of the hold as the cause, and there was no other cause of damage than the above suggested by any witness. The almonds were in fact stowed in the lower hold of the ship, a part between the fore and main mast, and the remainder between the main and mizzen mast; other cargo being stowed forward and aft of and between the piles of almonds. The vessel was ballasted with shingle ballast, thirty inches in depth at least, and coming above the top of the rider keelson, and on top of this was dunnage of wood.

[There was some controversy as to the thickness of the dunnage, but no witness made it less than three or four inches. On behalf of the claimant many witnesses were called of large experience, port-wardens, ship-masters, and merchants, all of whom testified that the place where the almonds were stowed was the best place in the ship to stow cargo liable to be damaged by seawater, and that the dunnage under this cargo was ample; that a single board over this ballast, and on the sides of the ship, with four or five inches in the bilge, was, in their opinion, sufficient dunnage, and all that usage required. The claimant also proved that the ship was rated A 1; that she delivered her outward cargo at Gibraltar, in perfect order; that she brought to New Orleans other almonds, in bales, stowed alongside in part, and in part on top of these said to be damaged, which were delivered in perfect order, except only a slight staining on the bagging of a few bales; that, at New Orleans, immediately after taking out the cargo, a cargo of cotton was taken in, and stowed directly upon the ballast, which had not been moved or changed, and came out in Boston dry and unstained. The discharging clerk, who was present nearly all the time the ship was unloading, testified that the almonds came out in good order, except that a few bags, not over twelve in all, were rat-eaten, and the bagging of five of these, that had fallen down upon the ballast or against the sides of the vessel, was stained and rotten by "humidity." A port-warden who was present when the hatches were taken off, and two or three times afterwards, on account of the damage above named, testified that he saw no other damage to the almonds than that above stated; that he saw no appearance of seawater having touched any part of the cargo; and that he found the ship an unusually dry ship. The stevedore who unloaded the ship in New Orleans, his foreman, and two or three assistants, testified that they saw no appearance of wet on the almonds. The stevedore further said, he found some bags of almonds with dry stains on them, mixed indiscriminately among the bright bags. Two persons in the employ of the consignees were in the hold of the vessel before the almonds were taken out. One of them drew samples from the almonds while in the vessel, and neither of them discovered any damage until the almonds were taken out of the vessel. The claimant put in the testimony of three Boston dealers in almonds, to the effect that salt water always rots the bags and discolors the meat of the nut as well as the shell, while fresh water affects only the shell. It was not contended that these bags were rotten, except the few above named; and several of the witnesses for the libellants testified that they found the shell of these almonds discolored, while the meat was white and sweet, and they gave this as their reason for the belief that the almonds were injured on the voyage. The claimant further proved that, for two weeks immediately preceding the shipping of these almonds, the weather was rainy with high winds, and that another cargo of almonds, shipped from Marseilles to Boston about the same time, was mouldy and discolored, while the bags showed no appearance of damage.

[The claimants contended: 1st. That the contract, having been made in France, was to be governed by the law of France, and that by the law of France the ship is not liable for damage to cargo unless the damage is occasioned by the fault of the master or crew. 2d. That the fair result of the foregoing evidence was that the almonds did not come out of the vessel wet; that the only external signs of damage were stains on the bags; that the stains were not so dark in color as to attract the attention of persons not acquainted with the usual appearance of bags of almonds; that the testimony demonstrated that every usual and necessary precaution had been taken for the preservation of the almonds; that the fact proved by the libellants' witnesses, that some bags which appeared bright on the outside contained stained almonds, the position in which the stained bags were placed in reference to the bright bags, the fact that the bags were not rotten, the nature of the damage to the nuts, the dryness of the vessel and her ballast after her cargo was taken out, the fact that the ship made no water on the voyage, and the fact that other almonds stowed with these came out sound, proved, conclusively, that the damage had not been done on board the ship, or, at all events, not by any of the causes for which the ship is responsible under the general maritime law; that the evidence that the cargo came on board in good condition was by no means satisfactory; that the master of the steamer that carried the almonds from Alicante to Marseilles had not opportunity to know what he testified to be true, and the persons who saw them at Marseilles had no duty to do which would lead them to examine carefully; that the clear result of the whole evidence was, that either the almonds came on board in bad condition or not in condition to bear the voyage, or, if injured on the voyage, it was by "perils of the sea." 3d. That, as matter of law, damage to cargo by blowing or steaming, the only means of damage suggested by the libellants' witnesses, in a vessel well stowed and dunnaged, is damage by perils of the sea.

[The libellants contended: 1st. That the contract was to be governed by the laws of the United States; because its performance was to be completed there, and, if not so, that the law of France did not differ from the law of the United States, as to the extent of the lien upon a vessel for damage to cargo. 2d. That it was proved that the almonds came on board in good condition, and came out damaged; that the burden of proof was upon the claimants to account for this damage, and to show that it was occasioned by a peril of the sea, or by some other cause for which the ship was not responsible; and that, in the conflict of testimony in this case, the claimants had not sustained the burden of proof; that damage by blowing could not be considered damage by peril of the sea, under the facts and circumstances of this voyage. The trial lasted six days, and the testimony of sixty-eight witnesses was taken orally, or by depositions.]²

B. R. Curtis and C. P. Curtis, Jr., for libellants.

John C. Dodge, for claimants.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The libellants claim as owners and shippers of the almonds mentioned in the bill of lading, for damage to their property. The claimants have made two objections to the maintenance of this suit in the name of the libellants; first, that the property belonged to the consignees, Messrs. Cusack & Co. of New Orleans; and second, that the suit was commenced without authority from the libellants; but I am satisfied upon the evidence that the libellants were the owners of the property, and that the suit was rightfully brought, and is rightfully prosecuted by them.

The first question to be decided is whether the rights of the parties are to be settled by the French Code de Commerce, or by the general maritime law. It is argued, on behalf of the claimants, that as the contract of shipment was made in Marseilles, the law of France controls it, and establishes their duties and liabilities. And they allege that by the French Code (section 191), no lien on the ship is given, for damage to cargo, unless caused by the fault of the master or crew. I do not find it necessary to decide this question, for the reason that I do not think I am authorized to infer from the French Code, that it differs, in respect of liens for damage to cargo, from the general maritime law. I think, in the first place, that it is fairly to be presumed that a commercial code of so commercial a nation as France, would not differ from the general maritime maxim, "that the ship is bound to the goods, and the goods to the ship." The Code is the only evidence of the law offered. No testimony of French jurists is in the case, and I am left to form my own judgment of the law from the Code itself. The section (191) insisted upon by the claimants does not profess to create liens, but only to marshal certain liens elsewhere declared to exist. We must look elsewhere for the creation of liens on ships for damage to cargo.³ Under the chapter of the Code treating of charter-parties, contracts of affreightment, and freightings ("Des chartres-parties, affretemens ou nolissemens"), this subject is treated. The 280th section is as follows: "The ship, her tackle and apparel, the freight and the cargo, are respectively bound to the performance of the agreements of parties." The claimants insist that this section is limited to charter-parties, or to contracts for the hiring of a specific portion of the ship. It would be very extraordinary if it were so limited, and would interfere very materially with the powers of the captain to load his ship in such a manner as to render her seaworthy. Some goods require to be put at the bottom, and others at the top of the cargo. Too much dead weight on the bottom will make the ship labor. Too little will make her crank. Now, if the hirer of a portion of a ship should have the right to insist upon having that portion established by metes and bounds, either perpendicularly or horizontally, it would follow that he would have the right to stow his cargo as he chose, and in such proportions as he preferred. And in case there were several such partial hirers, the control of the stowage would be altogether taken away from the master. But it is said that there is a special chapter of the Code, treating of bills of lading, in which no mention is made of any lien. A bill of lading is not inconsistent with there being also a charter-party, or a contract of affreightment. A bill of lading is evidence of a contract, but it does not necessarily constitute the whole contract. If section 191 is the only one giving a lien for damage to cargo, then it would follow that there is no lien on the ship for damage arising from the fault of the owner. The ship might be unseaworthy, and the owner know it, and yet no lien for the damage caused thereby. This is not to be supposed, and I should not adopt the construction of the claimants' counsel, without further proof that such is the meaning of the French Code. Believing that the French law does give a lien on the ship in accordance with the general maritime law, it does not become necessary for me to decide by which of the two this contract is governed.

Is the ship liable? In the first place, were the goods damaged when delivered in New Orleans? In regard to twelve bags, damaged by rats and rotten from humidity, there is no controversy. As to the residue, the depositions of the consignees, of the person to whom they had been sold to arrive, and who rejected them as damaged, of the portwardens and marine inspector who examined them, and of others who saw them,—all show that they were damaged. Notice was given to the captain and to the consignees of the ship in New Orleans, and in the newspapers, that the almonds would be sold at auction, and they were so sold for half the value of sound ones. The captain was notified of the damage, and there was an examination of the almonds in his presence. He was requested to extend a protest, to enable the consignees to recover of the underwriters; but he declined to do so, on the ground that he had had no bad weather on his voyage. On the evidence, I cannot doubt that the almonds were damaged very much beyond the extent admitted by the claimants. The almonds having been shown to be damaged when delivered, and the master having signed a bill of lading implying that they were in apparent good condition when shipped, the burden of proof is on the claimants to show why they did not arrive in good condition. In this bill of lading, it is true that there is no express admission of their reception in good condition; but it is therein provided, that "on their delivery in New Orleans without wet or damage freight shall be paid;" and this imports that they were without "wet or damage" when shipped. It is conceded by the libellants, that although the bill of lading does not in terms except the dangers of the seas, this exception is implied.

It is contended that the almonds must have been wet or damaged before going on board in Marseilles. To meet this, the libellants have produced the testimony of the persons in Spain who purchased the almonds, dried them in a granary, put them into bags, put them on board the steamer for Marseilles, and of the captain of the steamer himself. They have also produced the testimony of the shippers in Marseilles; of their clerks, draymen, and lighterman, by whom the almonds were examined and put on board the ship; and by this complete chain of testimony, exhausting the sources of evidence, it is shown that they were handled only in fair weather, and were in a sound and dry state when put aboard. Furthermore, the mate testifies that the weather was fine the day they came aboard; that he received and saw them, and reported them in good order to the captain for him to sign the bill of lading. He superintended the stowage, and it was his duty to see and report whether they were wet or not.

In reply to this direct evidence, the claimants say that the almonds must have been damaged before coming on board, because the injury could not have arisen on board the vessel. They show that the vessel was properly dunnaged according to usage in Boston; that the ballast was some two feet deep, and that there was sufficient dunnage to protect the cargo from water from the bottom, and that there was but little water in the hold. But there is evidence that these bags, or the greater part of them, were wet when taken out; that there was wet then in the vessel and that some of them lying against the side of the vessel were rotten from humidity. Have the claimants shown how this damage was caused? Was it by "blowing?" This may happen where there is but little water in the hold, but from the evidence it would seem that the bags were too generally damaged to have been wet from this cause, which would be more likely to wet only the outer tiers of bags. Was it from a leak in the deck? The mate says the upper deck was tight; but in fact the lower deck was not tight. It cannot be that the goods came on board dry, were delivered wet, and were not damaged while in the ship. Some one of these three propositions must be untrue.

Now, the evidence shows satisfactorily that the goods were wet and damaged when delivered at New Orleans, and the bill of lading admits that the sacks appeared externally to be in good order when taken on board in Marseilles. The burden of proof is then on the claimants to show what caused the damage. Theories may be formed as to the cause of damage, and one theory which is no more improbable than another is, that water may have got in between decks during the voyage. It must be borne in mind, that one of the reasons for casting the burden of proof of the cause of damage (after the damage itself has been shown) upon the ship-owner is, that as to what takes place during the voyage no one except his agents can testify. This burden of proof does not allow of a conclusive inference that the damage must have arisen before shipment, because the ship was tight and well dunnaged and that the ship-owner will be relieved of his liability by such inference. The burden of proof requires that the owner should go farther, and satisfy the court that the damage arose from one of the causes excepted,—anything short of this will not relieve him of his responsibility. I cannot say that the claimants have done this, because my mind is left in a state of uncertainty as to the cause of the damage, and I therefore must order a decree to be entered for the libellants. In regard to the amount of the decree, the auction sale must have great weight in determining the value of the almonds in New Orleans, as it appears to have been a fair public sale, of which the captain and the consignees of the ship were notified, and which was abundantly advertised. There were several dealers and bidders present, and there is no evidence of any unfairness.

If the parties do not agree as to the amount of damages, the case may be sent to an assessor.

Case No. 18,221.

The ZOUAVE.

[Brown, Adm. 110.]¹

District Court, E. D. Michigan. March, 1864.

COLLISION—DUTIES OF TUGS AND TOWS.

1. The contract of towage implies knowledge of the channel and safe pilotage.

2. Good seamanship requires that vessels of heavy draft should be placed behind those of lighter draft.

[Followed in The Sweepstakes, Case No. 13,687. Cited in Orhanovich v. The America, 4 Fed. 340.]

3. An improper order given in a moment of imminent peril is no fault.

[Cited in The Coleman, Case No. 2,981.]

Libel by John Kilderhouse, owner of the schooner Arnold, against the tug Zouave and the schooner Rich.

Alfred Russell, for libellant.

J. S. Newberry and W. A. Moore, for the Zouave.

A. W. Buel, for the Rich.

WILKINS, District Judge. This was a collision on the St. Clair Flats, caused by the grounding of libellant's vessel by the tug Zouave, in consequence of which the Rich, which was second in tow, ran into her, occasioning considerable damage.

At the close of the evidence, I entertained no doubt as to the Rich, but deemed it best, as well as courteous to the counsel, to reserve an opinion until the entire case should be heard. The Zouave had taken the Rich first in tow at the head of the river, when, subsequently, the Arnold, of greater draught, appeared, and by direction of the master of the tug, the position of the Rich was changed, and the Arnold was placed first and the Rich second. It is clear, that had the Rich been kept in her original position, there would have been no collision—she would not have been forced into the Arnold, and, therefore, the stranding of the latter, however it might have affected the other vessels in line, would not have occasioned the collision by the Rich. Having contracted for safe towage, the Rich was under the control and government of the tug, and her duty was simply to follow her lead, obey her direction, and faithfully submit to her guidance.

The contract of towage comprehends safe pilotage, especially through the perilous passage of the St. Clair Flats, where the channel is narrow and requires the greatest precaution. The contract embraces more than mere progress against adverse wind, or the supply of speed, when there is no wind. The tug is presumed in the undertaking she makes, to know the channel and all its perils, and engages to take her tow line safely through. It comprehends knowledge, caution, skill and attention. The proofs show that the Rich was of less draught than the Arnold, and had her position in line remained unchanged, she would not have stranded, whether or not the Zouave was in the channel. Placing her in the rear of the Arnold, was the act of the Zouave, with the presumed knowledge of the risk to be incurred, and not the act of the Rich.

But the court holds further: That there was no fault in the Rich as to the order given, even if, under the excitement of the moment, that order was improper. The peril was sudden and imminent. She was in great danger both in front and rear, with little, scarcely a moment's, time for consideration; and, as was strenuously urged and admitted in the case of The White Cloud, an improper order given under such circumstances, is not to be considered a fault. She had a full complement of men, and every man was at his post. The tow line was going at the rate of five miles an hour. The danger was immediately perceived by the lookout of the Rich, immediately reported, and the order as immediately given. Neither is it so very clear that this order was not the best under all the existing circumstances. The Penfield was coming upon her, within 110 feet, and affording but a few seconds to her captain to determine how his vessel should escape from the danger in which she was placed by the stranding of the Arnold.

The expert testimony differs as to the proper order under such circumstances, yet the testimony of the officers and crew, also experts, under whose personal observation the facts occurred, is much more satisfactory and reliable on this question than that of others, however learned in the theory and practice of navigation, who were not present at the time, and could not see all the incidents as they actually occurred at the crisis. Hypothetical proof, though drawn from experience, is not as satisfactory in cases of this kind as the observation of experience on the spot and at the time. But, be the order given strictly right or wrong, it was necessarily given on the instant, under great peril, and for self-safety, and, therefore, was no fault. It would be gross injustice to punish the Rich in damages, when the propelling power of the Zouave, the force of the current, and the stranding of the Arnold, placed her, unwillingly, in the great peril to which she was so suddenly exposed, and under which an order, at least of only doubtful propriety, was given. At best, it was scarcely possible for her, under the speed and space that has been established by the proofs, to escape being run into by the Penfield, running ashore, or colliding with the Arnold. Self-safety was with her the paramount law.

The case of The Morton [Case No. 9,864], has been cited. Though somewhat similar, it is not exactly this case. There was proof that the collision could have been avoided in that case by the proper management of the stranded vessel, and the court then held, and now holds, that vessels in tow have duties to perform, the neglect of which, if causing a collision, would release the tug. They must exercise the proper care for self-preservation, obey the directions of the pilot, in emergency give proper orders, and are certainly not discharged by their contract from all duty. The Rich, as the proofs demonstrate in this case, was vigilant, prompt, careful, and obedient, and the mere probability of her escaping a collision by a different order than that given, does not place her in fault. There must be a reasonable certainty to convict. Releasing the Rich from the allegations of the libel, the Zouave must be held responsible, unless the collision was an inevitable accident, for I do not deem the Arnold in fault. Her crew was competent, she obeyed the orders of the pilot, followed her lead, practiced no deception as to her draught, and, when taken in tow, was open to the inspection of the master of the Zouave, who, knowing the channel and its depth, made his contract accordingly. Unavoidable accident is an event unexpected by human experience, not the act of man or man's agency, as a sudden storm of wind, or a stroke of lightning. Unforeseen peril, that which cannot be calculated by human science or experience, can only make a collision on lake or river an unavoidable accident. Such, certainly, was not the case here.

It is established by the proofs that the Arnold was the vessel of the greatest draught in the whole line, and therefore more apt, in shallow water, to run aground. Placing her first imperiled the rest as well as herself. She ought to have been placed last. This good seamanship required. The master of the Zouave so testifies, but he omitted this very obvious duty so essential in order to secure the Arnold's safety. The collision occurred from her running aground, and had she been last instead of first, it certainly would not have occurred. This arrangement of the tow line was a primary fault in the tug, and independent of the other circumstances in the case, renders her liable.

In the contract of towage, the tug master is bound to arrange his vessels in tow, with the view of securing the safety of all with whom he contracts, and no reckless and unsanctioned usage on the part of tug masters will be allowed to modify such a salutary rule for the protection of life and property. Furthermore, the court is satisfied from the proofs, that the Zouave was not in the proper channel when the Arnold stranded. She was too far to the eastward. The Naomi and the Two Fannies, of equal, if not greater draught, passed the Arnold to the westward, while she lay aground. She was pulled off to the westward when extricated, found water sufficient, and her mate states substantially that he ported his wheel shortly before the stranding, unquestionably with the view to keep in the channel, as she evidently was not then in the middle of the channel, but kept so close to its eastern border, if not outside, as to lose the depth of water necessary for the Arnold. This was not the skillful navigation for which she contracted. And, if before the collision, she was in the channel, there was no sufficient excuse for varying her course from the obscuration of the ranges. The wind was down the river, and if the ranges were obscured at all it was but for a short time that the obscuration existed. The master and the mate of the Rich state that the ranges were obscured but a few moments, and the tow carried no canvas. An unusual obscuration might excuse and make the collision unavoidable, but such a difficulty should always be anticipated and provided against by skillful tug masters, who should then slacken speed and proceed with greater caution. Decree for libellant.

The case of The Morton [Case No. 9,864], cited in this opinion, was reversed on appeal.

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Sept. 22, 1877.

BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDINGS—ASCERTAINING CHARACTER OF ASSETS—PARTNERSHIP REAL ESTATE—APPEAL TO CIRCUIT COURT.

1. The bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] does not prescribe any rule or furnish any method for ascertaining the character of distributable assets. That is a subject of preliminary judicial inquiry, to be determined by legal principles of recognized controlling applicability.

2. As to questions touching the tenure of real estate, the federal courts are to be governed by the laws and decisions of local tribunals of the country where such real estate is situated.

3. Where real estate has been held by partners as tenants in common, the classification thereof as partnership assets, in the schedule filed by them, will not change the nature of the title to the prejudice of the rights of separate creditors.

4. An appeal to the circuit court is allowed only upon final decrees of the district court in a suit in equity by or against an assignee where the sum in controversy exceeds five hundred dollars.

Bill to review order of the district court distributing proceeds of sale of bankrupts' real estate.

MCKENNAN, Circuit Judge. This controversy arises out of the distribution of the proceeds of sale of certain real estate of the

bankrupts, which are claimed, on one hand, by the partnership creditors, and on the other by the creditors of the individual members of the firm. This real estate was the product of partnership assets, was conveyed to Christian Zug, one of the partners, individually, and was used in carrying on the firm business, and while being so used, Christian Zug conveyed to the remaining partner, Charles H. Zug, his heirs and assigns, one-fifth part of it. Both deeds were duly recorded, so that apparently C. Zug and C. H. Zug were tenants in common of the property in the proportion of four-fifths and one-fifth respectively. To which class of creditors is the fund produced by the sale of this real estate to be applied? The bankrupt law provides for the primary payment of the firm debts out of the partnership assets, and of individual debts out of the separate estate of each partner, but it does not prescribe any rule or furnish any method for ascertaining the character of distributable assets. That is a subject of preliminary judicial inquiry, the result of which must be determined by legal principles of recognized controlling applicability. The methods of acquiring and transferring title to real estate are peculiarly matters of local jurisprudence and regulation. "It is an acknowledged principle of law, that the title and disposition of real property is exclusively subject to the laws of the country where it is situated, which alone can prescribe the mode by which a title to it can pass from one person to another." McGormick v. Sullivan, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 192. See, also, U. S. v. Crosby, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 116; Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 565; Clark v. Graham, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 577; Darby v. Mayer, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 465. Whatever rules, then, are established, either by statutory enactments or the decisions of local tribunals, touching the tenure of estate within their territorial jurisdiction, must be accepted as the law by which the federal courts, when they are called on to pass upon such questions, are to be governed. So the highest federal courts have repeatedly decided. In Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 162, says Mr. Justice Thompson, "The inquiry is very much narrowed by applying the rule which has uniformly governed this court, that where any principle of law establishing a rule of real property has been settled in the state courts, the same rule will be applied by this court that would be applied by the state tribunals. This is a principle so obviously just, and so indispensably necessary, under our system of government, that it cannot be lost sight of." So also said Mr. Justice Baldwin, in McQuesney v. Hiester, 9 Casey [33 Pa. St.] 444, note: "We must administer the jurisprudence of the state in this court as it bears on the rights of the parties, and decide them precisely as the courts of the state might." And again in Beauregard v. City of New Orleans, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 502, the court says,

"The constitution of this court requires it to follow the laws of the several states as rules of decision wherever they properly apply. And the habit of the court has been to defer to the decisions of their judicial tribunals upon questions arising out of the common law of the state, especially when applied to the title of lands. No other course could be adopted with any regard to propriety. Upon cases like the present the relation of the courts of the United States to a state is the same as that of its own tribunals. They administer the laws of the state, and to fulfill that duty, they must find them as they exist in the habits of the people, and in the exposition of their constituted authorities. Without this, the peculiar organization of the judicial tribunals of the state and the Union would be productive of the greatest mischief and confusion. Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 153."

These cases—and they have been consistently followed by numerous others—sufficiently show how firmly established in the federal courts is the rule of conformity to the decisions of the state tribunals in questions touching the title to real estate. By whatever tenure, then, the courts of this state would adjudge the real estate, represented by the fund in controversy, to have been held, so we must decide. And upon this subject the law of the state seems to be as well settled, by a series of long-adhered to decisions of its highest court, as is the rule which makes it our guide. From McDermot v. Laurence, 7 Serg. & R. 438, through a long train of decisions to Ebbert's Appeal, 20 P. F. Smith [70 Pa. St.] 79, the supreme court of the state has held, with unshaken constancy, that a recorded conveyance of title to real estate to the members of a partnership, as tenants in common, could not be charged, as to purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors, by parol evidence that it was purchased with partnership assets, and was used for partnership purposes, but that such a result could only be effected by an appropriate written instrument. In Hale v. Henrie, 2 Watts, 145, Mr. Justice Sargeant says: "No averment of any right by parol, or by what is still less, the nature of the fund which pays, or the uses or purposes the property is applied to, can be allowed to stamp a character on the title inconsistent with that appearing on the deed and record, to the prejudice of third persons. . . . In conformity, therefore, with the suggestion of Tilghman, C. J., in McDermot v. Laurence, after a review of the American and English cases on the subject (and, I think, in accordance with the course of legislation in Pennsylvania, on the modes of acquiring title to real estate), where partners intend to bring real estate into the partnership stock, we think that intention must be manifested by deed or writing, placed on record, that purchasers and creditors may not be deceived." This doctrine is reaffirmed in Ridgway, Budd &

Co.'s Appeal, 3 Harris [15 Pa. St.] 177; Kramer v. Arthurs, 7 Barr [7 Pa. St.] 170; Lancaster Bank v. Myley, 1 Harris [13 Pa. St.] 544; Cummings' Appeal, 1 Casey [25 Pa. St.] 263; Erwin's Appeal, 3 Wright [39 Pa. St.] 535; Lefevre's Appeal, 19 P. F. Smith [69 Pa. St.] 125; and Ebbert's Appeal, 20 P. F. Smith [70 Pa. St.] 79. In Lefevre's Appeal, Mr. Justice Sharswood reviews most of the cases on this subject, and demonstrates that the doctrine of Hale v. Henrie rests upon such a foundation of repeated authoritative recognition, that it must be regarded as the settled law of the state. After stating the principle upon which some of the cases apparently in conflict with Hale v. Henrie were decided, that the purchase of property by one partner in his own name, by the use of partnership assets, raised a resulting trust in favor of the firm, and that the equities of joint creditors could only be worked out through the equities of the respective partners, he says: "When the partners during the continuance of the firm, have all agreed to the appropriation of the funds to the purchase or improvement of real estate in the private name or names of one or more of the partners, no one of them has any equity to have such property applied to the joint debts; and it follows that the joint creditors have no such equity." This has peculiar applicability to the present contention. For although the title originally acquired by Christopher Zug was paid for with partnership assets, he subsequently conveyed to his copartner, Charles H. Zug, a share of it in exact proportion to his interest in the partnership stock. They thereby became tenants in common of the property, in relative proportions corresponding to their original equities, viz., partners, the trust, if there was any, ceased to exist, and no subsequent use of the property could change the character thus impressed upon the title. Neither of the partners, under these circumstances, would have any equity against the other to insist upon the application of the property, in the first instance, to the payment of firm debts, and so the joint creditors could not have any. Under the law of the state, it is clear, then, that down to the time of the bankruptcy, the real estate in question was not partnership property, but the separate property of Christopher and Charles H. Zug. It was agreed, however, that the classification of this real estate as partnership assets in the schedule filed by the bankrupts, had the effect of changing the nature of the title, and of converting what was before the separate property of the individual partners, into property of the firm. Independently of the reason upon which the rule of law before adverted to mainly rests, viz., the protection of strangers, purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors, and of the due registration of the instrument by which it might be sought to effect such a change, the argument is answered by the operation of the bankrupt law itself. By the terms of the act, the title of the trustees to all the bankrupt's property relates back to the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy proceeding. They took it impressed with the character with which it was invested at that time. They cannot change that character to the prejudice of any one's rights, much less can this be done by the bankrupts, after they have parted with all control over it, and it has passed in gremio legis for the benefit of creditors.

This court is therefore of opinion that the district court rightly adjudged the fund in controversy to be assets of the individual members of the firm of C. Zug & Co., and ordered its distribution accordingly; and that the bill of review must be dismissed at the cost of the complainants. An appeal was also taken from the order of the district court, which it is moved to quash. An appeal is allowed only upon final decrees of the court, in a suit in equity instituted by or against an assignee in bankruptcy where the sum in controversy exceeds five hundred dollars. As the record does not show that the order complained of was of that character or was made in any such suit, no appeal lies from it, and the motion to quash is, therefore, allowed.

Appeal from Independence circuit court.

[Suit by Samuel Allen against Elizabeth Allen for divorce. From a decree of the circuit court, plaintiff appeals.]

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, and TRIMBLE, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Independence county, pronounced in the suit in chancery for a divorce, in which the appellant was plaintiff, and the appellee, defendant. Various reasons have been assigned by the appellant for reversing the decree of the court below. Conceiving, however, that the first point relied upon, is decisive in favor of the appellant, we shall confine our remarks to that point alone. The point is, that the circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer.

The plaintiff below filed his bill, praying for a divorce from bed and board, and the bonds of matrimony. The defendant instead of answering this bill, filed her cross-bill praying a divorce from bed and board, and for alimony. This was clearly irregular. The bill should have been answered, and the allegations therein contained contested before the cross-bill could be properly filed. 1 Har. Ch. 35; 3 Bl. Comm. 444-448. In the case of Lewis v. Lewis, 3 Johns. Ch. 519, the chancellor refused to grant alimony to the wife before she answered, because it did not appear whether she intended to defend herself against the charges in the bill. We feel no difficulty in reversing the decree of the court below. Decree reversed.

ABATEMENT—FORM OF PLEA—EVIDENCE.

1. Pleas in abatement, not being received with favor, require the greatest accuracy and precision in their form, and must be certain to every intent, and are not amendable; they must not be double.
2. If bad, the plaintiff need not demur, but may treat them as nullities and sign judgment.
3. If on the whole record the judgment of the inferior court is correct, it will not be reversed because improper evidence was admitted.

PER CURIAM. Pleas in abatement require the greatest accuracy and precision in their form; they must be certain to every intent; they are never received with favor (1 Chit. Pl. 491); they are dilatory, not reaching the merits of the action, and are not amendable; the plaintiff need not demur thereto when bad, but may treat them as nullities and sign judgment. 1 Tidd, Prac. 588. Tested by these rules, a plea in abatement which avers the suing out a former writ for the same cause, that it is still remaining in the clerk's office, that the defendant was arrested on such writ and surrendered to a person who represented himself to be deputy sheriff, that the suit is still pending, as defendant believes, and concluding with a verification, is destitute of requisite precision and formal accuracy, and does not tender a certain issue. What issue is tendered? Is it the suing out of the writ; its existence in the clerk's office; the arrest or surrender of the defendant, or the fact that T. was deputy sheriff, or that he represented himself to be such; that the suit is still pending, or that the defendant believes it to be pending? Such a plea is clearly insufficient, and may be treated as a nullity. Where it appears to the appellate court that improper evidence has been admitted on the trial of an issue in the inferior court, yet if upon the whole record the judgment is right, it will be affirmed.

ARCHER v. MOREHOUSE.

[Hempst. 184.]¹

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. July, 1832.

TRIAL OF ISSUES—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT—PLEA OF PAYMENT—INTEREST.

1. Where a case is submitted to the court, all questions of law and fact involved, are necessarily passed on, and the result is embodied in the judgment.
2. In such case no formal and technical finding of the issue is necessary.
3. A general finding for the plaintiff or defendant by a jury is good, and disposes of all the issues.
4. A plea of payment admits all the allegations in the plaintiff's declaration, essential to support the action, and it is unnecessary for the plaintiff to prove them.
5. Judgment may be given for interest from the maturity of the note, or in damages. Either mode is regular.

Error to Chicot circuit court.
Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, and CROSS, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was an action of debt, brought by Alanson Morehouse against George W. Archer, in the circuit court of Chicot county, and comes to this court by writ of error. Issues were joined on the pleas of payment at the day, and payment after the day, and neither party requiring a jury, the cause was submitted to the court, and a judgment was rendered in favor of Morehouse, for the sum of eight hundred dollars, to bear ten per cent. interest from the 17th day of November, 1831. Seven grounds are assigned for reversing the judgment of the circuit court, most of which were very properly abandoned in argument, and it will only be necessary to give an opinion on three, relied on in the assignment of errors.

The first ground, and that on which most stress was laid by counsel in argument, is that the circuit court did not, in the judgment which it rendered, make any disposition of the issues of fact joined in the cause; but proceeded to render judgment without saying anything of such issues. The practice of submitting a cause to the decision of the court is peculiar to the laws of this territory, and was altogether unknown to the common law. The court, when a cause is thus submitted to its decision, performs the office of the jury, in addition to its ordinary duty of deciding the law. The whole cause, whether of law or fact, is before the court; and it passes upon it accordingly. Why is it that the jury, when a cause is tried by them, find a verdict upon the issues joined? It is to enable the court to pronounce a judgment of law upon the facts as ascertained by the jury in their verdict. But even in a cause tried by a jury, a general finding for plaintiff or defendant, according to the practice of this court, is considered good. In this case, the court acting in the double capacity of jury and court, it would seem to be an act of supererogation to spread upon the record a formal finding of the issues. It appears from the judgment of the circuit court, that "issues being joined upon the pleas of payment at the day, and payment after the day, and neither party requiring a jury, the matters and things were submitted to the court. It was adjudged by the court that the plaintiff have, and recover, etc." Can any doubt exist as to the intention of the court? Is there any uncertainty in the judgment? Why, then, incur the record with a formal and technical finding of the issues? The judgment, as rendered, relates not only to the issues but to all the matters and things in the cause.

The second point which we deem it material to give an opinion upon, calls in question the correctness of the decision, on the subject of the testimony in the cause. The court, it appears from the bill of exceptions, decided that when the plea of payment is relied on by the defendant, it devolves upon him to support such plea by evidence, before the plaintiff will be required to adduce any evidence on his part. There can be no doubt, but that this decision was correct. The plea of payment is an affirmative plea, and the burden of proof is imposed on the defendant. The plea of payment admits all the allegations in the plaintiff's declaration. What do the pleas of payment admit in the case before the court? Why, that the notes declared upon were executed by the defendant, and that the amount of money named in the notes was due from the defendant to the plaintiff at the time of the execution of the notes. All the allegations, therefore, contained in the plaintiff's declaration, essential to the support of his action, being admitted by the defendant in his pleas of payment, it was wholly unnecessary for the plaintiff to produce any evidence on his part.

The third and last point on which we propose to give an opinion calls in question that part of the judgment of the circuit court which relates to the interest. The judgment is for eight hundred dollars, to bear ten per cent. interest from the 17th day of November, 1831. It is contended that the interest should have been ascertained by the court, and a judgment rendered for it in damages. It is admitted that this is a very common way of giving judgment; but on the other hand, the mode adopted by the circuit court, is sanctioned by the practice of several of the states, especially by the practice in Kentucky, and we cannot conceive that one mode has any particular advantage over the other, each being equally calculated to promote the ends of justice. Judgment affirmed.

ARMSTRONG v. JOHNSON et al.

[2 Hayw. & H. 13.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. 5, 1850.

ORPHANS' COURT—DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—JURISDICTION.

Where an issue from the orphans' court is pending in the circuit court, as to whether a paper is the last will and testament of the deceased or not, and the question to be decided as to which of two papers is the last will and testament of said deceased, the orphans' court has no jurisdiction to pass upon the question as to whether another paper is the last will of the deceased, as the orphans' court had divested itself of the jurisdiction of that question. [Dunlop, Circuit Judge, dissenting.]

Appeal from orphans' court.

[Proceeding by Kosciusko Armstrong against Lewis Johnson, administrator de bonis non of Thadeus Kosciusko, and others, heirs of Thadeus Kosciusko.]

This was a petition of Hyppoletus Estko and others, against admitting the following will to probate:

"This is my will: I, the undersigned, Thadeus Kosciusko, residing at Buville, in the township of Geneviage, department of Seine and Marm, being at present at Solena, in Switzerland. Not wishing to be overtaken by death before having made known my last disposal, I have made this my will and declaration of my last intentions, written entirely with my own hand as follows:—Desiring to give to Misses Zeltner, daughters of Mr. Peter Josephus Andrew Louis Zeltner, proprietor, residing at said Buville township of Geneviage, near Fountainbleau, and of the late Mrs. Angeliue Charlette Adelaide Durgn de Vandeil de Lanys, proof of the friendship which I have for them, and acknowledge toward them the sense of my esteem for the friendly attention which I received from them and from their father and mother during 15 years of my living with them, and to secure for said young ladies suitable settlements. I give and bequeath to Miss Thadea Emilie Wilehmine Zeltner, my god-daughter, aged nearly 16 years, born at Paris the 20th Mipider, in the 8th year, corresponding with the 9th day of July, 1800, the sum of 60,000 francs, to be paid at once in the standard currency and value of France. I give and bequeath to Miss Moin Charlotte Julie Magaueritte Zeltner, eldest daughter of said Mr. and Mrs. Zeltner, born at Solena, in Switzerland, on the 26th day of May, 1796, the sum of 35,000 francs, likewise to be paid at once in the same standard currency and value. Which two sums making together 95,000 francs, shall bear interest at legal rate from the day of my death, without it being necessary to demand the same judicially, and shall be taken as well as the interests aforesaid out of the most unincumbered real and personal property belonging to me on the day of my death, particularly and by preference out of the money funds of my estate, which may be found in France, either in the hands of Mr. Hottinger, my banker at Paris, or in the hands of my other bankers, debtors or holders of money or effects belonging to me; which sums shall be recovered and collected after my death by my testamentary executor herein named, and by him remitted to said Misses Zeltner, when they be married, but if they are not married, I direct him to invest the sums aforesaid in the hands of one or several persons in the manner which to him shall seem to be the safest and the most profitable, the interest or proceeds arising from the same so invested, shall be collected annually by my said testamentary executor upon his receipts, and by him remitted to each of said Misses Zeltner, in the amount due to each of them for their maintainance until their marriage. I wish and intend that the said Misses Zeltner shall not receive nor dispose neither of the whole nor of a part of the sums above bequeathed as long as they shall be single, but once married, each of them shall have the free disposal of the sum bequeathed to her; and my testamentary executor shall be discharged from the duty of receiving and remitting to them the annual interest, which they may then collect themselves directly. I appoint Mr. Bompach Pin, notary at Merch, department of Seine and Marm, executor of this, my will, begging him to be so kind as to take that trouble and to accept as token and pledge of my friendship the sum of 5,000 francs, which I give and bequeath to him by this present, which sum shall likewise be taken out of my most unincumbered estate, and particularly out of any money fund which may be found in the hands of Mr. Hottinger, or elsewhere as aforesaid, and: I revoke all the wills and codicils which I may have made previous to the present, to which alone I confine myself as containing my last wishes: Done at Solena, at Switzerland, on the 4th day of June, 1816. Thadie Kosciusko."

Opinion of William F. Purcell, judge of the orphans' court:

"The within cause having been set for hearing on the 5th of January, 1849, last, as ordered by Judge Causin, the former judge of this court, and since continued from time to time by counsel. This court after having minutely examined the wills within referred to of Thadeus Kosciusko, deceased, it is the opinion of this court that the will, executed by said Kosciusko on the 4th day of June, 1816, and recorded in the court in 1847, revokes the wills of the 28th of June, 1806, and of the 5th of February, 1798, of said Kosciusko, deceased, and the probates of the same are hereby revoked this 6th February, 1849."

From which order and decision Richard S. Coxe, Esq., counsel for Kosciusko Armstrong takes an appeal, which is by the court granted February 9th, 1849.

R. S. Coxe, for appellant.

H. M. Morfit, for appellees.

[Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL and DUNLOP, Circuit Judges.]

CRANCH, Chief Judge. This is an appeal from the order of the orphans' court, of the District of Columbia, of the 6th of February, 1849, revoking the probate of the will of General Thadeus Kosciusko, of the 5th of May, 1798, and 28th of June, 1806, by which last mentioned will a legacy of $3704 was bequeathed to the appellant Kosciusko Armstrong. The proceeding was by petition to the orphans' court of the District of Columbia, filed on the ——— day of ———, by Hyppoletus Estko and others, next of kin of General Kosciusko, stating that in December, 1845, the then petitioners filed a petition in the orphans' court, praying: 1st. That the validity of a certain paper writing, dated 28th of June, 1806, which at the instance of a certain Kosciusko Armstrong, was, on the 19th of November, 1828, proved as, and for the last will of the said Thadeus Kosciusko, might be allowed to contest the same, and that probate thereof might be revoked; and 2nd. That George Bomford, administrator de bonis non, with the will of the 5th of May, 1798, annexed, might be ordered to pay over to the petitioners the fund deposited by General Kosciusko with Mr. Jefferson. The petitioners further state that the orphans' court, acting upon the said former petition on the 17th of February, 1846, ordered the register of wills to make up and transmit to the law side of the circuit court, District of Columbia, to be there tried, an issue, "Whether the writing produced by the said Kosciusko Armstrong, and admitted to probate on the 19th of November, 1828, is the last will and testament of the said Thadeus Kosciusko or not." The petitioners state further that some of the former petitioners died, and S. S. Williams and John F. Ennis have obtained letters of administration of their effects; that Colonel Bomford also died, and Lewis Johnson became administrator de bonis non in his place; that while the issue at law was pending in the circuit court in January, 1847, the will of June 28th, 1806, more fully described in the said former petition, was produced, proved and recorded among the wills of the orphans' court, by which will the testator expressly revoked "all the wills which he might have hitherto made;" that the issue sent to the circuit court is now an issue at law and not of fact, and is cognizable in the orphans' court only: "Upon these grounds, and others which will be more fully set forth during the hearing of the case," they pray that "further proceedings in that court may be resumed, and that citations may be issued: 1st. To the said Kosciusko Armstrong, or his counsel of record, to show cause why the probate of the paper writing, purporting to be a will of General Thadeus Kosciusko of the 28th of June, 1806, should not be revoked and annulled. 2nd. To the said Lewis Johnson, administrator de bonis non of said Kosciusko's estate, to show cause why the paper writing, purporting to be a will of said Thadeus Kosciusko, of the 5th of May, 1798, and the probate thereof, recorded among the wills of this court, should not be stricken out from the records of this court, and declared null and void." This petition is signed by "R. Johnson, Gaspar Tocman, for the Petitioners."

Nothing appears by the records to have been done until the filing of another petition by Roman Estko and others, claiming, with the former petitioners, Hyppoletus Estko and others, to be next of kin of General Kosciusko; which new petition sets forth all the preceding proceedings in the orphans' court, and in the supreme court of the United States; and also circumstances to account for the delay of the petitioners in prosecuting their claim. They also pray "that the validity of the said instrument of writing" (of June 28th, 1806), "may be inquired into; that they may be allowed to contest the same, and that the probate thereof be revoked; and that the said instrument of writing be declared null and void as a testamentary paper." "And they further pray that the said George Bomford, administrator de bonis non as aforesaid, be ordered to pay over and deliver to the petitioners all and every sum and sums of money which he now hath, or for which he is accountable as administrator de bonis non of said Thadeus Kosciusko." This petition is signed by "Joseph H. Bradley, G. Tocman."

Whereupon the following order was made by the judge of the orphans' court, viz.:

"On the petition filed in this court, this 2nd day of December, 1845, of Roman Estko and others, claiming to be next of kin and distributees of Thadeus Kosciusko, praying that the decision of this court heretofore made, admitting to probate a paper writing propounded by Kosciusko Armstrong, as the last will of the said Kosciusko be again examined, and that the matter thereof be again heard by this court. It is this 2nd day of December, 1845, ordered that the said case be again examined and heard, and that notice be given to the said Kosciusko Armstrong to appear in this court on or before the 3rd Tuesday of January next, in person or by solicitor, to show cause why the said probate of the said will shall not be set aside, and the said paper writing therein propounded by him as the last will of the said Thadeus Kosciusko be declared null and void; and provided that a copy of this order be published in the National Intelligencer once a week for three successive weeks previous to the 3rd Tuesday in January, 1846. Nathaniel P. Causin."

No further proceeding appears upon the records of the orphans' court until the 22d of December, 1848, when the judge made the following order, viz.:

"It is ordered that the Register of Wills issue citations. 1st. To Richard S. Coxe, Esq., counsel of Kosciusko Armstrong, to appear in this court on the 5th day of January, 1849, to show cause why the probate of the paper writing, purporting to be a will of General Thadeus Kosciusko, of the 22d of June, 1806, should not be revoked and annulled. 2d. To Lewis Johnson, administrator de bonis non of Kosciusko's estate, to appear on the same day, on the 5th of January, 1849, to show cause why the paper writing, purporting to be a will of Thadeus Kosciusko, of the 5th of May, 1798, and the probate thereof recorded among the wills of this court, should not be stricken out from the records of this court and declared null and void. Nathaniel P. Causin, 22d Dec., 1848."

The citations seem to have been issued and served on the same day, 22d Dec., 1848. On the day appointed (January 5th, 1849), Lewis Johnson, the administrator de bonis non appeared, by Mr. Morfit, his counsel, and objected, "that the orphans' court should not hold or entertain jurisdiction of this cause at this time, or in the present form of this application." 1st. Because an issue is still pending on the law side of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, as to the validity of the respective wills named in the application of the parties to the citations, and that the said issue was taken on a petition before the orphans' court upon the same questions which are now presented; and the effect of the present petition, if sustained, will be to bring back a question before this court which has, by having been put in issue elsewhere, passed beyond its present control. 2d. If the issue should be stricken off the docket of the circuit court, it would be a surprise upon the parties. 3d. That the testator re-establish the will of 1798 by a subsequent will, but of this this respondent has no evidence. 4th. That there is a bill in equity pending in the circuit court, and involving all the matters contained in the proceedings in the orphans' court in this case, &c. 5th. That this respondent is ready to pay over the money to any person authorized to receive it. 6th. That there should not be a decision in any one of the cases until all are brought together.

Upon consideration of this case as it is now brought before this court, I am of the opinion that the orphans' court, by sending an issue to this court, to be tried at law, "whether the writing produced by the said Kosciusko Armstrong, and admitted to probate on the 29th of November, 1828, is the last will and testament of the said Thadeus Kosciusko or not," had divested itself of the jurisdiction of that question, so long as it remains undecided by this court the case was coram non judge, and the sentence of the orphans' court of the 6th of February, 1849, must be reversed.

Upon appeal from the sentence of the orphans' court of the District of Columbia, passed on the 6th of February, 1849, declaring it to be the opinion of that court that the will executed by Thadeus Kosciusko on the 4th of June, 1816, and recorded in that court in 1847, revokes the wills of the 28th of June, 1806, and of the 5th of May, 1798, of the said Kosciusko, deceased, and revoking the probate of the same.

It is considered and adjudged by this circuit court of the District of Columbia, this 5th day of November, 1850, that the said sentence of the said orphans' court be, and the same is hereby reversed with costs; the said sentence having been passed by the said orphans' court, while an issue sent by that court to the circuit court aforesaid to be tried at law, whether the writing produced by the said Kosciusko, and admitted to probate on the 19th of November, 1828, is the last will and testament of the said Thadeus Kosciusko or not, was and is pending undecided in said circuit court.

Error to Phillips circuit court.

[This was a proceeding by Chester Ashley against Easther Maddox, administratrix of Thomas Maddox, deceased.]

Before ESKRIDGE, CROSS, and CLAYTON, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant in error, in the year 1827, obtained several judgments against Samuel K. Green, and in February, 1832, issued a summons from the circuit court of Phillips county against the plaintiffs, under the act passed in November, 1831, entitled "An act to enable judgment creditors to collect their debts with more facility," (Ter. Dig. 346), calling upon the plaintiffs, as garnishees, to state whether they were indebted to Green, or had any effects of his in their hands. Percifull and Ashley did not enter their appearance to the summons, and a jury being impanelled, to ascertain if anything was due to Green from Percifull and Ashley, or either of them, returned a verdict that Percifull was indebted to Green in a sum sufficient to pay the amount due from Green to the defendants, and that the claims were in the hands of Ashley, as an attorney, for collection. Upon this verdict the court rendered a joint judgment against Ashley and Percifull, for two hundred and ninety-six dollars, and ninety-three cents. It is contended that the judgment is erroneous for several reasons, and of this opinion is the court. The act of 1831, under which the proceeding purports to be had, gives this remedy, "in all cases where any plaintiff shall obtain judgment." Its words only comprehend judgments obtained after its passage, and this court cannot, by construction, give it a retrospective effect, and make it embrace judgments previously rendered. It is not for us to speculate on the supposed meaning and intention of the legislature. Where there is no doubt or ambiguity in the words used, there is no room for construction. Upon the finding of the jury, a judgment is rendered which is manifestly wrong. Percifull was indebted to Green, and the claim was in Ashley's hands for collection. It was error to give a double judgment for a single debt. The statute places the judgment creditor, the defendant in this case, in the same situation which Green occupied. If the case were otherwise within the purview of the statute, she might go against Percifull, or might go against Ashley, if he were in default, but could not go against both for a debt due from one only. Judgment reversed.

BALDWIN et al. v. WYLIE.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. 1, 1853.

WILLS — PROBATE — EXECUTORS — POWER OF ATTORNEY — APPEARANCE OF ATTORNEY AS EVIDENCE OF HIS AUTHORITY.

1. In order to make a will effective it must first receive the probate of the proper court.

2. Where the executrix in a will gives a power of attorney to receive and control any fund of the estate in her individual name, as widow, and not as executrix and guardian, such power is without authority.

3. The appearance of an attorney in a cause is received as evidence of his authority, and no additional evidence is required.

Appeal from orphans' court.

This is a petition of Robert Baldwin, Mary Baldwin Davis, John Baldwin, James W. Davis and Amanda B. Davis, his wife, surviving children of Robert Baldwin, deceased, and of the children of James P. Baldwin and Julia A. B. Baird, both deceased; that Samuel Baldwin was also the child of Robert Baldwin, deceased; that at his death he left no father or mother; that the above named children were his brothers and sisters of the whole blood, and as such, with the children of those alleged to be dead, are entitled by law as such and as next of kin to the succession and entire personal estate of which said Samuel Baldwin was possessed at the time of his death. That his domicile was in Pennsylvania. That while he resided in Mexico he suffered from the hands of the officers and citizens of Mexico to such an extent as to cause his premature death. That by the treaty of peace, dated February 2, 1848 [9 Stat. 922], the United States exonerated Mexico from any liability for the payment of claims made by the citizens of the United States, and assumed payment thereof. That a person calling herself Clotilde Pellet Story Baldwin announced the death of said Samuel Baldwin and averred that she is his widow. That the board of commissions created under act of congress, March 3, 1849 [9 Stat. 393], being ready to receive memorials, setting forth the claims of the citizens of the United States, and the said Samuel Baldwin having died as was believed intestate, John Baldwin, brother of said Samuel, petitioned that letters of administration be issued to Andrew Wylie, which petition was granted. That the claim against Mexico was estimated at the nominal value of $500. The administrator gave bond in the sum of $1,000. That the said administrator afterwards estimated the claim at $150,000, and presented an inventory and appraisal of the estate of the deceased. The judge of the orphans' court, upon seeing the document, ordered a rule on said Andrew Wylie, administrator, to show cause why his administration bond should not be increased. That an award had been made in favor of said Wylie, as administrator, of the sum of $75,000. In answer to the rule he alleged that he had paid for fees, &c., $12,575; that the administrator had paid over to a certain Peter Hargons, of New York, and had taken from said Hargons and a person called Peter Goix, of Vera Cruz, in Mexico, a bond in the penalty of $62,000, to indemnify said Andrew Wylie, Jr., for making the payment of $62,425, neither of whom resided within the jurisdiction of the court. That said Clotildo executed a full power of attorney to said Peter Goix; that he, the said Peter Goix, under a power of substitution contained in the power of attorney, to him executed a power of attorney to Messrs. Hargons & Bros., under which last power of attorney the said Wylie paid over to Peter Hargons the sum of $62,425, and took from him the above bond of indemnity; this on the same day on which he made a return to the rule to show cause, &c. Among the papers filed with the return was what purported to be a copy and translation of the entry of marriage of said Samuel Baldwin with said Clotildo Pellet Story, and also what purported to be the last will and testament of said Samuel Baldwin. That if the said will be genuine then the acts of said administrator are null and void, and that a deliberate and substantial fraud has been perpetrated. Citation was issued as prayed against Andrew Wylie. The following answer was made to the citation:

"The above named defendant, Andrew Wylie, represents to the honorable, the judge of the orphans' court, that the parties named in said bill are non-residents of this District, and therefore prays that they be required to give security for costs, or that the bill be dismissed. He further states that he has good reason to believe that this suit has been instituted without authority from some at least of said parties, and therefore prays that said Richard S. Coxe be required to show by what authority he has brought said suit."

The following is the answer of the attorney:

"To the Honorable, the Judge of the Orphans' Court, for the County of Washington. The undersigned has been served with a citation from your honorable court, calling upon him to show by what authority he has filed a certain petition in said court, calling upon Andrew Wylie to do certain things in said petition mentioned. The undersigned, except for the respect he owes to the court, might pass this citation by without notice, as unauthorized by law and without any sanction in the usage and practice of this or any other court. Having appeared and practiced in this court for nearly thirty years, he can say with confidence that no instance can be found of a citation addressed personally to an attorney, calling upon him personally to answer as such, has ever been issued from said court, nor can an instance be found in which an attorney has been required to exhibit any authority from his clients, empowering him to act for them and in their names. Within a brief period this same Wylie made a similar application to the circuit court, to require the same party to exhibit a power of attorney, to authorize him to appear in a case then pending, and received for answer, that no attorney of that court ever has been, or could be, required to exhibit his authority. Indeed, unless on the complaint of a party who alleged that an attorney has, without the sanction of the party for whom he professed to act, appears for him, no such exhibition of a power is ever required. Even in courts where a form of a power of attorney is in use, every member of the profession knows that it is a mere form appended to the pleadings, the want of which is wholly immaterial. The answer therefore which the undersigned makes to this irregular and unprecedented call upon him, is that he is a regularly admitted attorney and counsellor at law, and that this is the authority under and by which he acts, and filed the petition; that it is the same authority under which he has been recognized as empowered to appear and act for his clients in the supreme court, circuit court, and criminal court and orphans' court, and which no one has a right to question or gain-say. Out of respect to your honor, who it is supposed has inadvertently been induced to issue this citation, the undersigned would respectfully call your attention to the language of the supreme court, in the great case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 829, wherewith some appearance of plausibility of similar objections had been started. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court, then says, after speaking of attorneys, in fact: "The case of an attorney at law—an attorney for the purpose of representing another in court and prosecuting or defending a suit in his name—is somewhat different. The power must indeed exist, but its production has not been considered as indispensable. Certain gentlemen, first licensed by government, are admitted by order of court to stand at the bar, with a general capacity to represent all suitors in the court. The appearance of any one of these gentlemen in a case has always been received as evidence of his authority, and no additional evidence, so far as we are informed, has ever been required. This practice, we believe, has existed from the first establishment of our courts, and no departure from it has been made in those of any state, or of the Union." The respondent therefore prays that he be hence dismissed with his costs. Richard S. Coxe."

Ordered that the petition of Andrew Wylie in this case be dismissed with costs.

The answer of the administrator represents that the bill or petition is not sustained by the affidavit of any one of the petitioners, or any other party in their behalf, and prays that he be excused from answering the same until the same is sworn to, as required by law. The petition and prayer of administrator is overruled and dismissed, and he is required to answer. The respondent, Andrew Wylie, Jr., answered and filed the documentary evidence in answer to the allegations in the bill, and denies that a deliberate and substantial fraud has been perpetrated.

The following is the decision and decree of [Wm. F. Purcell] the judge of the orphans' court:

"Andrew Wylie, administrator of Samuel Baldwin, deceased, who died in Mexico, was appointed administrator on the estate of said Samuel Baldwin on the 11th day of August, 1849, at the request of John Baldwin, and gave bond in the sum of $1,000, with the understanding that said bond should be enlarged if the amount to be received from the treasury of the United States require it. It was made known to the court in 1851, on the 19th of April, that said administrator has or was about to receive the sum of $75,000 belonging to the estate of said Samuel Baldwin, and in discharge of its duties a citation was issued and served on said administrator, to show cause why his said bond should not be increased, and in obedience to said citation, on the 24th of May, 1851, he came into court, and filed a paper purporting to be the last will and testament of said Samuel Baldwin, deceased, as well as a power of attorney from Clotilde Pellet Story Baldwin, as widow of Samuel Baldwin; gave to Peter Goix, who subsequently appointed Peter Hargons, of New York, to receive for her. The said will purporting to appoint his wife executrix and guardian of his children; said administrator acknowledged the receipt of $75,000, and filed a bond of said Peter Hargons for $62,000, in which it seems that the said Hargons acknowledged the receipt of the same and agreed to the said charges of said Wylie, &c.; reference is here had to all of said papers. The court, on the said 24th of May, 1851, upon the filing of said papers, there being no objection from any source, discharged said rule and ratified what had been done by said administrator in paying over said money to said Hargons, although the sanction of the court had not been previously asked or obtained. On the 29th of May last past Robert Baldwin and others, claiming to be next of kin of said Samuel Baldwin, filed their petition, which may be called a bill of review, and prayed that the decree rendered on the 24th of May, 1851, be set aside, and such other and further relief be granted as deemed equitable in the premises.

"This court, having had the cause under consideration for several days, as well as the advantage of able counsel on both sides and authorities referred to, doth decree that said decree of the 24th of May, 1851, be set aside. That the will purporting to be the last will and testament of said Samuel Baldwin, executed in Mexico, cannot have the effect of a will to control the money in question until it has received the probate of the proper court in this county and district. See Armstrong v. Lear, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 176. And if the will had been duly proved before this court and recorded, Hargons' power of attorney could not give him authority to receive and control the said fund, because, by a minute inspection of the said power, it is clear that she executed it as widow of Samuel Baldwin, and not as executrix and guardian. She makes no mention in the power to the will. The widow and other parties claiming will be allowed a reasonable time to make perfect their pretensions to said money in question. But the administrator in the meantime must give a bond, with sureties, as the law directs, in the sum of $100,000, to be approved by this court, within eight days from this, to hold said money subject to the future order of this court, it being acknowledged by said administrator that said Hargons has not paid said sum over to said widow."

To which decree the administrator, Andrew Wylie, appealed.

BARGIE v. UNITED STATES.

[2 Hayw. & H. 357.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Jan. 8, 1861.

INDICTMENT FOR FALSE PRETENCES.

1. An indictment under the penitentiary act of March 2, 1831 [4 Stat. 448], need not show whether the prosecutor paid the money on the draft and endorsement or not. The false pretence of the prisoner was complete when he fraudulently obtained the endorsement of the prosecutor; by that endorsement the prosecutor contracted an obligation in writing conditional in its terms to pay the money named in the draft to the bona fide holder of it.

2. In an indictment under the statute it is superfluous to call the offence by its general and uncertain statutory name if the offence is set out in hæc verba, so that the court can see and determine whether the instrument is such a one as comes within the terms of the statute.

Error to criminal court.

[Indictment of Ludam A. Bargie for false pretences.]

There were two counts in the indictment, the substance of which will be found in the opinion of the court. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty.

The prisoner, through his counsel, moved that judgment upon the verdict be arrested for the following reasons, viz: 1st. The paper writing, called a draft for $120, which is a foundation of the alleged false pretence in this indictment, is not fully set out in its legal effects, which is necessary to render the indictment good and sufficient in law. 2nd. It is charged in the indictment that the paper writing, called a draft, upon which the prisoner obtained the money of the prosecutor was not a good and available draft, and the indictment does not allege that the said paper or draft was ever presented to the drawee, nor does he allege a reasonable excuse why it was not presented. 3d. If it is necessary to prove on the trial the presentation of the draft to the drawee, or aver an excuse for not presenting the same, it is necessary to allege these facts in the indictment, which allegation is not contained in the indictment. 4th. It is not averred in the indictment that the prosecutor, Abraham Chambers, was legally liable for the money alleged to have been obtained on a false pretence, which is necessary to be averred to make the indictment good. Motion in arrest of judgment overruled. [Defendant sued out a writ of error.]

Daniel Ratcliff and John E. Norris, for the prisoner.

Robert Ould, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Before DUNLOP, Chief Judge, and MORSELL and MERRICK, Circuit Judges.

DUNLOP, Chief Judge. This is a writ of error to the judgment of the criminal court, upon an indictment against the prisoner for false pretenses charged in two counts, upon which a verdict of guilty was rendered by the jury on both counts. No bill of exceptions was taken on the trial below, and we cannot therefore entertain or consider the argument addressed to us here, and there was no evidence on the trial in that court to maintain the allegation that the prisoner obtained from the prosecutor, Chambers, $120, as charged in the first count of the indictment. The verdict concludes that question, and we must assume here that all the averments and allegations in both counts were proved as laid.

The writ of error brings before us for review only the sufficiency of the indictment. The clause of the act of congress of March 2, 1831 [4 Stat. 448], upon which it is framed is in these words: "Section 12. That every person duly convicted of obtaining by false pretenses any goods or chattels, money, bank note, promissory note or any other instrument in writing for the payment or delivery of money, or other valuable thing," shall suffer imprisonment, &c. It will be observed by the terms of the statute that the obtaining by false pretenses, "any instrument in writing for the payment or delivery of money or other valuable thing," is itself an offence, whether the money or other valuable thing be paid or delivered or not by the party charged or bound in the written instrument so to do. In other words, to consummate the crime it is not necessary to aver or prove that the maker of the writing obligatory has paid or delivered the money or valuable thing stipulated in the writing. It is enough that he is charged and liable so to pay or deliver. The gist of the 1st count is that the prisoner on the 2d of August, 1830, at the county of Washington, in this district, with intent to cheat and defraud one Benjamin Chambers of his moneys, did falsely pretend to said Chambers that he was authorized by one Wm. Francis McLean to draw upon him for about the sum of $120, and did then produce to said Chambers a certain paper writing, purporting to be a sight draft upon Wm. Francis McLean, for the payment, through the Citizens' Bank of New Orleans, to the order of Benjamin Chambers, of the sum of $120, with the word "accepted" written upon the back of said draft, and that the same was then and there a good, genuine and available draft for the payment of $120. The 1st count then negatives these pretenses, with others set forth in it, avers them to be false, and so well known to be false by the prisoner and are found to be false by the verdict. The count concludes by averring that by colour and means of said false pretenses the prisoner did then and there unlawfully, knowingly and designedly obtain from said Benjamin Chambers the sum of $120 of the moneys and effects of the said Benjamin, with the intent to cheat and defraud the said Benjamin Chambers. There can be no doubt this is a good count and charges an offence under the statute, if the false pretenses are set forth in it with sufficient certainty. The money of Chambers was obtained on a fraudulent draft, which the prisoner was not authorized, and which it is found by the verdict he knew he was not authorized to draw on McLean. Rex v. Jackson, 3 Camp. 370; Attorney General v. Morgan, 2 Russ. 307.

It is objected that the count does not allege that the draft was delivered to Chambers or was endorsed by him, and that it is not set forth according to its tenor, that is to say in hæc verba. The count avers that the paper writing, purporting to be the draft, was "then and there produced by the said Ludam A. Bargie to the said Chambers." This averment is in the usual and approved form. See Whart. Prec. 540. It was not needed to aver the endorsement by Chambers; the prisoner is not charged in this count with fraudulently obtaining the endorsement of Chambers; the charge is that by the fraudulent draft the prisoner fraudulently obtained $120 of the money of Chambers. To constitute the offence it was wholly immaterial whether Chambers endorsed the draft or not. It was not necessary to set out the draft in hæc verba. "If the pretence be in writing it is not necessary to set it out in hæc verba, unless some question turn on the form of the instrument; it is sufficient to state the pretence in substance as it appears in writing." Archb. Cr. Prac. & Pl. 604. It was not necessary that the indictment should show how the pretence operated in the mind of the party or in what way it was calculated to effect the obtaining the money, it is merely matter of evidence. Hamilton v. Reg., 9 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 277, per Lord Semmans. See, also, Whart. Cr. Law, 729.

It is also suggested in the reasons, in arrest of judgment, that the count ought to have averred presentment of the draft to the drawer for acceptance, and notice of its dishonor to the prisoner, but it is settled law that a drawer without funds in the hands of the drawee, and who is not authorized to draw, has no right to require of the holder presentment to the drawee for acceptance or payment, or notice to him the drawer of refusal or dishonor. The prisoner in this case having fraudulently drawn the bill, without funds in the drawee's hands, or authority to draw from the drawee, could not claim its acceptance or payment, or expect it to be honored or paid. As he fraudulently drew the bill, he could not claim the right of a bona fide drawer in any proceedings against him civil or criminal, no averment of the facts suggested, therefore need have been made in the count or proved on the trial. We think the pleader has in this count substantially set forth the draft, and that the 1st count is a good count to sustain the judgment of the criminal court.

The gist of the 2d count is that the prisoner, with intent to defraud the said Chambers, on the 2d of August, 1859, at the county aforesaid, upon like false pretenses, in substance as charged in the 1st count, and upon the further false pretense that said Chambers would thereby incur no personal pecuniary liability or responsibility, did request and solicit said Chambers to sign his name upon the back of a certain draft or bill of exchange, drawn by said Bargie, on one Wm. Francis McLean, for the sum of $120, dated Washington, D. C., August 2, 1859, and payable at sight to the order of said Benjamin Chambers, which said false pretenses are negatived and averred to be false, and known to the prisoner to be false and fraudulent, by means of which false pretenses the prisoner did, then and there unlawfully, with intent to cheat and defraud said Benjamin Chambers, procure and obtain the signature of said Chambers from said Chambers, to and upon said draft or bill of exchange, for the sum of $120, by the writing of the name of the said Benjamin Chambers, by the name of B. Chambers on the back of the said draft or bill of exchange, and beneath the word "Accepted;" it then proceeds to set out in hæc verba the draft and endorsement. "$120.00. Washington, D. C., August 2, 1859. William Francis McLean pay to the order of Benjamin Chambers, at sight, through the 'Citizens' Bank of New Orleans, La., one hundred and twenty dollars. L. A. Bargie." And on the back of which said draft or bill of exchange is endorsed and written the words following, that is to say, "Accepted, B. Chambers." The draft and signature so set out for inspection of the court, and the signature so averred to be obtained and procured by the prisoner from Chambers on the back of a negotiable draft, is in law an endorsement. It is a contract in writing by the endorser Chambers, for the payment to the holder of the $120 named in the draft. It is, in the language of the statute, "An instrument in writing for the payment of money." That the contract of the endorser is conditional and not absolute, does not, in our judgment, vary the offence charged against the prisoner. It is a valuable security, proper to be, and we think meant to be protected by the legislature. The contract of endorsement, though conditional, is still, we think, an instrument in writing for the payment of money within the true intent of the 12th section of the penitentiary act. If this be the true construction of that act, then, as we have before said, it is immaterial whether Chambers paid the money on the draft and endorsement or not. The offence of the prisoner was complete when he fraudulently obtained the endorsement of Chambers. By that endorsement Chambers contracted an obligation in writing, conditional in its terms, to pay the money named in the draft to the bona fide holder of it.

The second count, in the conclusion of it, avers that afterwards, to wit: on the 1st of November, in the year aforesaid, Chambers, by reason of his signature, was obliged to pay and did pay the said sum of $120 in cash, to his great damage and against the statute. If we are right in the construction we have given of the statute, the pleader has performed a work of supererogation in making the last averment. Supposing the averment, however, to be necessary, it is assailed for its generality and want of precision. It is objected that the count nowhere charged that the prisoner negotiated the draft after endorsement, and received the money for it; that the liability and obligation of Chambers, the endorser, to pay, ought to have been set out with the same precision as in a declaration in a civil suit against him as endorser to charge him in that capacity; that is to say that presentment on a day certain, and notice of non-acceptance or non-payment on a day certain, should have been averred, so as to show this court that Chambers was bound and liable in law to pay the money on the draft, and that it ought to have charged to whom, and when Chambers paid the money. All these objections are met and answered by the supreme court of New York in the case of People v. Stone, 9 Wend. 183, 184, 189, 190. The first and second counts in the indictment in that case were held good by that court, although they were substantially as general as the second count in the indictment before us.

Lastly, it is objected that the prisoner has not been charged in this second count for fraudulently procuring the endorsement of Chambers in the terms and language of the statute; that is to say, if we understand the objection, he ought to have been charged with fraudulently obtaining from Chambers "an instrument in writing for the payment of money." It is true that we have held that an offence under the grade of felony, created by statute, where the offence so created was unknown to the common law, it was sufficient as a general rule to follow the terms of the statute creating the offence. But this, even in such cases, is not a rule of universal application, and false pretences is one of the exceptions laid down in the books. Where the language of the statute is so general and vague, as in the case now before us, to give no notice to the accused of any specific instrument in writing for the payment of money, and to what amount, it would be most unjust to him to call him to answer when he could not know against what to defend himself, and when it would be impossible in any subsequent criminal proceeding for the same offence, to plead in bar a former acquittal or conviction. In all such cases reasonable legal certainty must be used in the indictment. But we have never said, where the language of the statute is even reasonably certain in defining the offence, that the pleader cannot use other language more specific and more certain to define the same offense, which the language of the statute imparts in more general terms.

In the case now before us, in the second count, "the instrument in writing for the payment of money" alleged to have been fraudulently obtained by the prisoner from Chambers, is set out by the pleader with all the particularity of which it was capable; it is set out in hæc verba, so that the court can see and determine whether it is such an instrument as comes within the terms of the statute. Having shown us the thing named with perfect certainty in all its particulars, it is surely superfluous also to call it by its general and uncertain statutory name. Upon the whole, we think the second count also good, and we affirm the judgment of the criminal court.

JUDGMENT—EXTRA TERRITORIAL EFFECT—GUARDIANSHIP—JURISDICTION OF ORPHANS' COURT—CHANCERY.

1. A personal judgment or decree obtained in any state over a non-resident, who has not been served with process within the state, has no extra territorial validity and does not come within the operation of the 4th article of the constitution, declaring the effect within one state of judicial proceedings in another state.

2. The will of the maternal grandfather, which declares that his estate should be held by trustees, in trust for his daughter and heirs, free from the control or disposal of any husband she might have and exempt from his debts, contracts or engagements, does not affect the right of the husband to the guardianship of his infant children.

3. Whenever our statutes use the term "guardian," the father, although in one sense the natural guardian, is never to be included, unless there be something more which imperatively demands that it should be embraced by the expression.

4. The orphans' court has no jurisdiction to inquire whether a father be a fit person to be intrusted with the personal custody and education of his children; its jurisdiction as to him extends only to the due care and management of the infant's estate.

5. Where, for any reason, a father becomes incompetent or unfit to act as the natural guardian of his children, the remedy is in a court of chancery.

ASSIGNMENT OF CLAIM FOR INDEMNITY—PROOF OF

The convention created for the settlement of claims between Brazil and the United States, held in the case of the American brig Caspien, condemned and sold as a prize of war at Montevideo, that the proof of an assignment of a claim for indemnity for the loss of personal property by the pilot of the brig, which had been mislaid or lost, could not be supplied by parol proof or by a copy of the same, but required the original to be produced, in order to establish the claim in the assignee.

In equity. [Bill for an injunction.]

The bill in substance states that the American brig Caspian was sold with her cargo in Montevideo, in South America, on the 20th of September, 1827, to sundry persons, one of whom, Stephen J. Lewis, late of New York, but now deceased, acquired an interest of $5,000, or one-fifth part thereof. That the said brig, with her cargo, while pursuing her voyage, was illegally captured on the 2nd of October, 1827, in the river La Platte, by the Brazilian squadron, carried into Montevideo, and condemned as prize of war. That Lewis, who was on board as her pilot, had his baggage robbed by the captors of monies and effects to the amount of $4020; that demand was thereafter steadily made by the United States government on behalf of Lewis, against the government of Brazil, for indemnity for the loss of his interest in said brig and cargo, and of his monies and effects of which he had been robbed, until his claims were included in the convention of January 27th, 1849, between the two governments. That on the 6th of November, 1828, Lewis being indebted to Isaac Bell, of New York, in the sum of $12,500, and having no property of his own in possession, assigned his claim against the Brazilian government for indemnity, as aforesaid, to Isaac Bell, his executors, administrators or assigns, with full power to collect the same, and never thereafter asserted any right to the said claims, which were afterwards urged upon the United States government by Isaac Bell. That Lewis died on the 31st of July, 1844, intestate and without any property, never having paid any part of his indebtedness to Isaac Bell, except so far as his claims against Brazil for indemnity, so assigned to Isaac Bell, might be realized, discharged the same. That Lewis' claims for indemnity against Brazil were prosecuted by Isaac Bell, his assignee, before the commissioners appointed to carry into effect the convention of January 27th, 1849, upon a duly proved copy of the assignment, the original of which was believed to have been lost, but the commissioner would not admit this evidence of the assignment, and on the 30th of June, 1852, awarded to Mary Lewis, administratrix of Lewis, the sum of $11,551.24, which he found to be due on account of Lewis' claims. That subsequently to the making of this award Isaac Bell assigned all his right, title and interest as Lewis' assignee, to and in Lewis' claim to Isaac Bell, Junior, of Mobile, in Alabama, who afterwards assigned the same to Edward R. Bell, of New York, who now claims by virtue of said assignments to be the actual bona fide owner of the whole of the award, so as aforesaid, made to Mary Lewis. That the original assignment from Lewis to Isaac Bell, believed to have been lost, has since the date of the said award been found. That Isaac Bell, Junior, and Edward R. Bell, assignee as aforesaid, having complied in all respects with the act of congress of July 3, 1852 [10 Stat. 11], in the premises, Edward R. Bell has filed his bill of complaint against Mary Lewis for relief, praying that Mary Lewis, the defendant, be enjoined from asking and receiving from the secretary of the treasury, and the secretary of the treasury from paying to her the whole or any part of the award.

The defendant answers that she knows nothing of her father having assigned at any time the claim; that if any assignment was ever made, she insists that it will be found to have been a mere nominal assignment, creating a mere temporary trust or bailment for the use of said Lewis, the occasion for which has long ceased to exist, and with it the trust or bailment.

That such a trust is not the subject of assignment, and that it was not in the power of said Isaac Bell, Sr., to make a voluntary assignment to his son Isaac, Jr., and by consequence that the assignment to plaintiff alleged in the bill is a nullity, cannot be recognized in a court of equity, and the plaintiff cannot in virtue thereof prosecute this suit.

That the assignments from father to son and from brother to brother, and for the purpose declared in the bill, are champertous and against public policy, illegal, the result of improper combination and confederate, voluntary, void, and will not be enforced, by a court of equity especially.

That the transactions out of which supposed assignment arose, if it ever had existence, are stale; that the alleged debt upon which it rests, if any debt ever had existence, is a stale demand, barred by the statute of New York for the limitations of actions; and such debt, if it ever existed, was contracted, which is preferred against the estate of dead men, under circumstances of suspicion, is sought by parole proof alone to be sustained; proof touching matters of near twenty-five years standing, if they ever had an existence at all, and upon all these grounds not entitled to the aid of a court of equity.

G. Suthen, for complainant.

Chitten & Ratcliffe, for defendants.

The following is the decree:

This cause having been regularly set for hearing, and coming on to be heard on the bill, answer, the exhibits and proofs taken and filed in the same (the complainant having refused to read in evidence the depositions of Isaac Bell, Senior, which have been taken by said complainant, and the defendant's counsel having thereupon read the same) and the court having heard, read and considered the same and the arguments of counsel thereon:

It is this 8th day of November, 1853, by the court ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the several assignments set up in the said bill have been fully proved to the satisfaction of this court to have been duly made, on sufficient consideration by the said Stephen J. Lewis, in his lifetime, and by said Isaac Bell, Senior, and Isaac Bell, Junior, respectively; and thereby the whole claim passed to and has become vested in said Edward R. Bell, and the said sum of money of right belongs to said Edward R. Bell.

And this court doth further order, adjudge and decree, that the sum awarded by George P. Fisher, Esq., commissioner, &c., to said Mary Lewis, administratrix of Stephen J. Lewis, and now remaining in the treasury of the United States, be paid by the said secretary of the treasury to the said Edward R. Bell.

Decree affirmed. See 17 How. [58 U. S.] 616.

[Hempst. 218.]¹

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Jan., 1833.

INJUNCTION—SUIT ON BOND WHILE PENDING.

Where an injunction has been dissolved, and afterwards reinstated, and is still pending, no suit can be maintained on the injunction bond, as for a breach of it.

Appeal from Conway circuit court.

[This was an action of debt by George Bentley against Samuel B. Joslin and others. From a judgment against plaintiff for costs, he appeals.]

Before ESKRIDGE, CROSS and CLAYTON, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was an action of debt brought in the Conway circuit court by the appellant against the appellees, upon an injunction bond. The defendants craved oyer of the bond, set out the condition, and pleaded that after injunction for which the bond was given had been dissolved, and before the institution of the suit, they paid the damages decreed against them by the order dissolving the injunction, and that upon an amended bill filed the injunction had been reinstated, was still pending, and a new bond given. To this plea a general demurrer was filed by the plaintiff. The court overruled the demurrer, and gave judgment against the plaintiff for the costs, from which an appeal was taken to this court.

The reinstating of the injunction placed the cause in the court of chancery, in the same situation in which it stood previous to the dissolution of the injunction. It is a matter of daily occurrence to reinstate an injunction upon the filing of an amended bill. It does not thereby become a new cause, but in our opinion is the continuation of the same cause. The injunction bond is not broken so long as the injunction remains in force. The demurrer admits the injunction in this cause to be still in existence. To permit the party to go on and collect the amount of the bond, before it is ascertained whether the injunction will be dissolved or perpetuated, is too obviously contrary to justice to be consistent with law. Judgment affirmed.

BENTLEY v. SEVIER et al.

[Hempst. 249.]¹

SCIRE FACIAS—EXECUTION.

A scire facias is an action to which a party may plead, and it may be executed in the same manner as a summons.

[Scire facias by Eli Bentley, executor of the will of George Bentley, against Ambrose H. Sevier and others.]

Before CROSS and LACY, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a motion by the defendants to quash the return of a scire facias executed in the same manner as a summons. It is contended that the statute does not embrace this writ, and that it cannot be executed as an ordinary summons, but must be served agreeably to the common law. Geyer's Dig. p. 245, § 10, declares that "the original process in all actions of slander, trespass, assault and battery, actions on the case for trover or other wrongs, and personal actions," shall be a writ of summons. It further provides that service of a summons shall be by reading the writ, declaration, petition, or statement, to the defendant, or by delivering him a copy thereof, or leaving such copy at his usual place of abode, with some person of the family above the age of fifteen years, and informing such person of the contents thereof; such service to be at least fifteen days before the return day of the writ. There is also a statute among the territorial acts (Acts 1818, p. 35), which, without naming any particular action, provides generally that notice on all suits then pending, or thereafter to be commenced, might be served by leaving a copy as above indicated. The service of the scire facias under consideration is agreeable to the direction of this statute, and the question is whether it is sufficient.

There can be no doubt it was the object and intention of the legislature, by using general language respecting suits, to include this writ, and treat it as an action. A scire facias is declared to be a judicial writ founded on some matter of record, such as a recognition or judgment. 2 Tidd, Prac. 982. It is said by Lord Coke (3 Co. Litt. 290b, 524): "Although it be a judicial writ, yet in law it has ever been held to be an action to which a party could plead, and a release of all actions includes a scire facias." Skin. 682; 10 Mod. 258; 2 Term R. 46; 1 Term R. 267; 4 Bac. Abr. tit. "Scire Facias," 409; 2 Ld. Raym. 1048; 2 Wils. 251. It will be perceived, upon examination, that many of these cases are somewhat conflicting, and most of them apply to suits brought upon recognizances, or to repeal letters patent, or on like subjects, when it is declared to be either an original, or in the nature of an original writ. 2 Tidd, Prac. 983-1035. And the courts appear to have frequently determined that it was a judicial, or in the nature of an original, writ, as best suited their rules of practice, and consequently no satisfactory test is given whereby the distinction can always be exactly ascertained. And without attempting to reconcile these differences, we say that in this instance, if it can be considered as process intended to notify a party of an action pending, agreeable to the statute cited, as we think it may, the service is good, and we overrule the motion.

Motion overruled.

It appears that all the executors named in the will of Thos. H. Benton had renounced or failed to qualify and give bonds when summoned.

BIBBS v. DAVIS.

[2 Hayw. & H. 364.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Feb. 16, 1861.

MARRIED WOMEN — RENEWING CONTRACT AFTER COVERTURE CEASES.

Where a woman during coverture makes a contract in reference to her separate estate, and subsequently after the death of her husband promises to pay the same, she is liable.

At law. This was a suit brought by [R. A. Davis, to the use of Thomas Waters, against Mary R. Bibbs] on the following instrument in writing: "September 9, 1858. Balance due on settlement with Mr. R. A. Davis, by me, 34 dollars. Mary R. Bibbs." Judgment was rendered against the appellant for the amount, with interest, from September 9, 1858, and costs, by William A. King, a justice of the peace. On appeal the judgment was affirmed. The appellant, through her attorney, moved a new trial for the following reasons: It having been proven upon the trial in this case that the appellant, while a married woman, executed and delivered to the appellee, in consideration of work and labor done and performed upon her farm, the paper writing herewith filed, and that after the death of her said husband (to wit, after the service of the writ) she promised to pay to the defendant the amount therein specified. The said appellant moved the court to instruct the jury in substance as follows, to wit: If they believe from the whole evidence aforesaid that the said appellant, during coverture, executed and delivered to the said appellee the said paper writing, and after coverture promised to pay the same, it is null and void, and they must find for the appellant.

This instruction the court refused to grant, and instead, instructed the jury that if they believe the said evidence to find for the appellee. The refusal of the instructions prayed and the instruction granted, are respectfully assigned as error, and the grounds for a new trial for the following reasons: First. The contract of a feme-covert is null and void and not voidable, and a judgment cannot be rendered at law against her person or property thereupon. Second. The promise of a feme-covert being null and void, and her subsequent promise when sole, without a new consideration is also void. Third. In equity the agreement of a feme-covert made upon the faith of her separate estate is not an obligatory contract, for as a femecovert she is incapable of contracting, but is rather an appointment out of her separate estate. The power of appointment is incident to the power of enjoyment, and every security thereon executed by her is deemed an appointment, pro tanto, of the separate estate. A feme-covert can bind her separate estate only according to the terms of the instrument creating the same. Courts of equity never decree in personam but in rem. All of which we respectfully submit to the consideration of the court.

Robert G. Thrift, for appellant.
Mr. Mathews, for appellee.

Upon full argument by counsel, THE COURT held that where a lady during marriage makes a contract in reference to her separate estate, and subsequently after the death of her husband, promises to pay the same, she is liable thereupon at law. Motion overruled and judgment on the verdict.

[2 Hayw. & H. 193.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May 18, 1855.

CIRCUIT COURT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA — APPEAL FROM COURTS MARTIAL—HABEAS CORPUS.

1. It is not in the power of the circuit court of the District of Columbia to revise or correct the error of a court martial if any exists. The appeal must be to the president who confirmed the sentence.

2. The circuit court can not look beyond the record of the court martial; it has no power or jurisdiction to examine the proceedings under a writ of error; it cannot therefore usurp power or jurisdiction by a writ of habeas corpus.

[On a writ of habeas corpus.]

Four United States sailors named Richard Biddle, Sam'l Kays, David Hazard, and John McKenny. The first and second were tried by a court martial at Norfolk, Va.; the others, by a court martial at New York City, and convicted and sentenced to service at hard labor in the penitentiary of this District. They pray that writs of habeas corpus may issue to bring them before the court, not having, they say, been convicted of any offence punishable with imprisonment at hard labor under the laws of the United States or District of Columbia, and if it shall be found that their confinement is illegal and contrary to law, they may be discharged from imprisonment.

Charles L. Jones, for petitioners.
P. B. Key, against petitioners.

DUNLOP, Circuit Judge, referred to the petition of Richard Biddle, who enlisted as a sailor in the naval service in October, 1852, for the period of three years. He was tried by a general court martial at Norfolk for "mutinous conduct and language" on the 23d February, 1854; convicted and sentenced to ten years imprisonment at labor in the District penitentiary. The proceeding, judgment and sentence of the court martial were submitted to the president of the United States, and approved by him.

The jurisdiction of the court martial, the court said, is not denied, but it is insisted that the court martial exceeded its authority by passing the sentence. He read the law of congress of 1800 [2 Stat. 45] for the government of the navy, which prescribes the punishment for the several offences known to the naval service, to be determined by a court martial, the finding to be submitted to the president for his approval.

It was not therefore in the power of the circuit court to revise or correct the error of the court martial, if any exists; the appeal must lie to the president who confirmed the sentence of the court martial.

The circuit court could not look beyond the record; it had no power to examine the proceedings under a writ of error, as the law had placed such jurisdiction beyond its power; it cannot usurp power by a writ of habeas corpus.

There is no doubt the court martial had power to punish Biddle for the crime of which he was charged. The court was satisfied that Biddle must be remanded, and the same principle applies to the other three cases.

BILLINGSLEY v. BELL.

[Hempst. 24.]¹

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Oct., 1824.

APPEALS—NOTICE.

If the appeal is prayed on the day of trial, notice is unnecessary, and the appeal bond may be given at any time within ten days.

Appeal from Crawford circuit court.

[Suit by Robert Bell against James Billingsley.]

Before JOHNSON, SCOTT, and TRIMBLE, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was a suit originally brought by Bell against Billingsley, before a justice of the peace, who rendered judgment for Bell, and from which Billingsley, on the day of trial, prayed an appeal to the Crawford circuit court, which was granted; and a transcript of the proceedings sent up to that court. Upon the calling of the cause, Bell moved to dismiss the appeal, and this motion was sustained.

From the bill of exceptions, it is apparent that the court acted under a misapprehension of the fact that an appeal had been prayed by Billingsley on the day of trial. Such being the fact, the court erred, for the law is express that notice to the opposite party need only be given where the appeal is not prayed on the day of trial. Geyer's Dig. 391. It has been said that, as the appeal bond was not entered into on the day of trial, the appellant could give bond within ten days. This is true, and as the bond in this instance was executed in that time, it is sufficient. Geyer's Dig. 390. Reversed.

BLAGDEN v. BROADRUP.

[2 Hayw. & H. 278.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May 5, 1857.

CERTIORARI—REMEDY FOR WRIT IMPROPERLY ISSUED.

Where a case has been improperly taken out of the hands of a magistrate through a writ of certiorari, on a motion presented to the court by way of a writ of error cum nobis, the court will issue a writ of procedendo.

This was a case of certiorari issued to two justices of the peace, J. D. Clark and Z. K. Offutt, to bring up the proceedings then before them in a case of forcible entry and detainer [by Thomas Blagden against George Broadrup]. After the case was thus brought up before the circuit court an improper rule to declare was laid by the plaintiff in the certiorari, and by virtue of said rule the case went off the docket as non-prossed at the last term of the court. A motion was made by the defendant's counsel to have the case restored to the docket, with a view to having the writ of certiorari quashed. The court refused the motion.

Mr. Jones moved the court to issue a writ of procedendo to the magistrates to proceed with the case where it was left off at the hearing of the certiorari, contending that as the case had been improperly taken out of the hands of the magistrates at a stage of the proceedings when it was exclusively within their jurisdiction, it ought to go back to them by the same authority by which it was taken from them, and a writ of procedendo was the only appropriate remedy in such a case, insisted that the defendant had an indefeasible right to such writ.

W. S. Cox, for petitioner.
Charles Lee Jones, for defendant.

The following cases were cited by the counsel for the petitioner: U. S. v. Smith

The court will set aside a judgment on putting the plaintiff in as good a condition. Strange, 823.

THE COURT decided that the case had been improperly taken out of the hands of the magistrates, and that they would issue the procedendo, but requested the motion might be presented to them by way of a writ of error cum nobis.

BLAKELEY v. BISCOE.

[Hempst. 114.]¹

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Jan., 1831.

EQUITY JURISDICTION—REMEDY AT LAW.

Where there is a plain and adequate remedy at law, a court of chancery has no jurisdiction.

[Bill in chancery by William Blakeley against Henry L. Biscoe for an accounting. Defendant demurred to the bill, and the demurrer was sustained.]

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, CROSS, and BATES, Judges.

JOHNSON, J. This is a bill in chancery, filed by Blakeley against Biscoe, to which the defendant has filed a general demurrer. Blakeley, in his bill, alleges that in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, administration of the estate of Moses Graham was duly granted to him in the county of Clark; that he proceeded to sell the personal estate of Graham according to law, taking notes or bonds of the purchasers amounting to six hundred and fifty-three dollars; that shortly after the sale he employed the defendant Biscoe, to act as his agent in all things pertaining to the administration of the estate, and that Biscoe undertook and faithfully promised to do and perform every duty required of the complainant in relation to his administration, and finally to settle the same as required by law, and to pay over the balance of the assets, if any, after the settlement, to the complainant, and as a consideration for his services, Biscoe was to retain six per centum out of the amount of the estate; that Biscoe agreed and bound himself to keep a just and true account of all money received by him, as agent, stating when it was received and how appropriated, and to exhibit the account to the complainant whenever requested; that the complainant, in pursuance of the agreement, delivered the notes taken at the sale before mentioned, amounting to $653, to the defendant Biscoe, who received and collected the amount of the notes. The bill further alleges, that the defendant Biscoe failed and still refuses to make the settlement of the administration, refuses to account for and pay over the money in his hands unexpended, and also refuses to exhibit a just and true account of all moneys received, of whom received, to whom paid, and for what purpose. The prayer of the bill is, that the defendant may be compelled to state and set forth a just and true account of his agency, pay over the money remaining in his hands, and for general relief.

Upon the case just stated the question arises whether a court of chancery can entertain jurisdiction. Where there is a plain and adequate remedy at law, a court of chancery will not grant relief. This principle has become a maxim in the code of equity, and is sustained by innumerable authorities. 1 Bibb, 212; 2 Bibb, 273. Is there a plain and adequate remedy at law for the case stated in the present bill? The case stated and set out in the bill is nothing more nor less than a contract between the plaintiff and defendant, by which the latter agrees to act as the agent of the former in collecting certain bonds or notes, and of attending to the settlement of an intestate's estate, and to pay the balance over. For the breach of this contract the law surely affords an adequate remedy without a resort to equity. An action on the case, either in contract or in tort, is the appropriate action in which the plaintiff may recover all the damages to which he is entitled. If he seeks a recovery only of the money remaining in the hands of the defendant as in the present bill, the action of assumpsit is the appropriate remedy. If he also claims damages, as he would seem to do in the present bill, a special count for the non-feasance or misfeasance, will afford redress. It is manifest, then, that there can be no necessity to resort to a court of equity to obtain relief. It is not a case for an account, as has been contended. A bill for an account will lie only when there are mutual demands forming the ground of a series of accounts on one hand, and a series of payments on the other, and not merely one payment and one receipt. 1 Madd. Ch. 570; 6 Ves. 136; 9 Ves. 473. Nor does the bill allege the necessity of coming into chancery for a discovery. There is no allegation that the plaintiff is unable to prove the contract and the delivery of the notes to the defendant. Upon the whole we think it a clear case for an action at law, which is competent to afford ample redress, and consequently the chancellor will not take jurisdiction. Demurrer sustained.

[At law. Action on the case by William Blakely against David Fish. From an order overruling a demurrer to the declaration, defendant appeals.]

Before JOHNSON, SCOTT, and SELDEN, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action on the case brought by the appellee against the appellant. The appellant in the court below demurred to the declaration, which demurrer was overruled, and he excepted and prayed an appeal to this court, which seems to have been granted. It does not appear from the record that the court proceeded to give final judgment in favor of either party. We are clearly of opinion, that an appeal will not lie except from the final decision or judgment of the court; and here there being no final judgment, this court has no jurisdiction. Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Aug., 1822.

CONVERSION—TROVER—DEMAND—APPEAL—PRESUMPTION AS TO INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The fact that a party came lawfully into possession of property is not the criterion to determine whether a demand and refusal are necessary in an action of trover.

2. If A. lends his horse to B., and B. sells him, the plaintiff need make no demand of B. to maintain an action of trover against him, because this is strong evidence of conversion.

3. Demand and refusal are not the only evidence of a conversion.

4. Instructions will be presumed to be correct where the evidence is not spread upon the record by exception or otherwise.

[Cited in Wiley v. Robinson, Case No. 17, 656a.]

[At law. Action of trover by William Blakely, administrator of Moses Graham, against Abraham Ruddell. There was a verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.]

Before JOHNSON, SCOTT, and SELDEN, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The only ground relied on for the reversal of the judgment in this action of trover is that the court erred in instructions to the jury. Upon the trial, on the motion of the defendant, the court instructed the jury that "the plaintiff had not sustained his action by proving a demand and refusal before the commencement of the suit, the defendant having become lawfully possessed of the property." There are cases where the plaintiff cannot recover unless he proves a demand and refusal, and it is equally clear that there are cases where a demand and refusal are unnecessary, although the defendant may have come lawfully into possession; as where A. lends his horse to B., and B. sells him. This would be as strong evidence of conversion as could be adduced, and no demand would be necessary to enable the plaintiff to recover. 1 Chit. Pl. 177, 178; 5 East, 407; 6 East, 538; 1 Johns. Cas. 407. But, in the case before the court, the evidence of the plaintiff, if he adduced any, is not contained in the bill of exceptions, nor spread upon the record in any other manner; and, as the court might have been justified in giving the instruction, we are bound to presume in favor of the court in that respect. If, indeed, the plaintiff on the trial adduced evidence of a conversion other than that of a demand and refusal, the court no doubt committed an error in giving the opinion contained in the bill of exceptions; but, as no such evidence is shown to have been introduced, we cannot presume it, and consequently the judgment must be affirmed. Shaler & Stanton and G. G. Sickles, for plaintiff.

Dunlop & Loomis, for defendants.

GRIER, Circuit Justice (charging jury). As has been stated by the counsel for the plaintiff, the issues in this case were ordered by me, sitting on the equity side of the court, to ascertain—First. Was William Woodworth the original inventor of the machine patented by him on the 27th of December, 1828? Second. Is the reissued patent of July 8, 1845, for the same invention, intended to have been patented by the patent of December 27, 1828? This patent has been before me so often and for so long a time that it has become stereotyped. In a recent case tried by me at Philadelphia, under the apprehension that the jury might not agree, I gave them a month to consider, but they decided the case by rendering the verdict in a day. If the same question should again arise, I would not make a like order, because I am now perfectly satisfied. The first question you will ask will be, what did Woodworth invent? You know that, to entitle an inventor to a patent, his machine must be both new and useful. The intellectual production must differ from all others; it must have a distinctive character. It is plain, and the fact is admitted, that Woodworth did not invent circular cutters, rollers, nor cog work,—that is, the star gearing which has been spoken of,—nor an endless chain; nor did he invent pressure by a spring or by levers. Did Woodworth invent the machine patented to him on the 27th of December, 1828, as it is in combination? If he did, then he is entitled to the patent,—to the monopoly as a reward for his discovery. He was entitled to fourteen years, and in this case there have been two extensions of the patent, each for seven years, making, in the whole, twenty-eight years. Much is frequently said about the word "principle" in the trial of patent actions. It may be considered as the foundation of every invention. It is, however, a slippery word, meaning the modus operandi, or mode of operation. Have we any account of a patent or means to effect the same object—to do the same work—as is effected by the machine of Woodworth? A hundred trials have been had, including almost, if not quite, every circuit, but the patent has never been successfully assailed. There is no pretense that Woodworth was the inventor of the mechanical means detailed; but his claims cover a combination of tools which do the work. All the numerous attempts for a like purpose moved with the board or plank, and failed to do the work. Many persons came near being successful, but not one succeeded until the time of Woodworth. The art of printing was not discovered until very recently,—it was nearly perfected, but it was not successful until the fifteenth century. The art of printing calico preceded it, with the desire of intelligence exhibited by each generation. It may be considered remarkable. It is the same with many other inventions which have since been added to the arts. People may be found who will swear that they know all about it, although no person can be found to corroborate such testimony. It is proper, perhaps, for counsel to do all that can be done, but such evidence cannot avail against the fact of an invention and the issue of a patent. In the trials which have been had in other circuits, resort has been made to the inventions of Bentham, Bramah, Muir, and also Uri Emmons. In the issues the counsel have abandoned the repetition and claims of the persons named. The cheat of Emmons is palpable. He cheated Woodworth out of one-half of his patent. The counsel have abandoned urging that objection.

The French patents were the only matters that I desired to hear about. They are, however, defunct things, dug out of the archives of a foreign office. Neither of them contain the elements of the Woodworth patent. The learned Prof. Locke has explained to you the several devices contained in the French patents, and the difference between the Woodworth cut and the cut of the French inventors. He has explained the matter fully. Woodworth invented, as I have already said, a combination of cutters and pressure rollers to effect an object. It accomplished the purpose. No man can appropriate the machine without authority. The pressure rollers, in his machine, may be graduated as may be desirable. The essence is to combine the whole to produce a beneficial result. The Frenchmen have been trying, but they are like Bentham and Bramah and Muir,—they have done nothing. The next question is, is the reissued patent of July 8, 1845, for the same invention, intended to have been patented by the patent of December 27, 1828? If the patents were alike, it would have been useless to have made the surrender. My Brother Story examined the old patent, and he informed the counsel for the patent that the ingenuity of the opponents of the patent would defeat it, if not amended. In consequence of that suggestion it was surrendered, and a new and amended patent applied for and granted. The court has examined the old patent, and find it to be imperfect. You will ask, what machine did Woodworth send to Pittsburgh in 1830? Was it a vertical machine, like the Dry Dock machine, which was at work in 1828, and all the world were running to look at? or was it a horizontal machine of the same kind? The tools in the first machine were the same as at present used. They were not quite so perfect as the tools which were put into the horizontal machine. Every mechanic would see the want of such tools. The Washington witnesses, whose depositions have been read, have supposed that the two patents must be alike. They have misapprehended the subject. Surely, if the first patent was imperfect, he had a right to surrender it. The question, therefore, is, what kind of a machine did Woodworth invent? Did the specification attached to the patent correspond with the machine? If not, he had a right to correct it. I have very little doubt about the question, and I think that you should not. If you agree in the affirmative, you will say so by adding "Yes" to the first question. The case, however, is with you.

Jury affirmed both questions.

COLLISION—FERRYBOAT WITH SCOW—CHANGE OF COURSE.

[Where a ferryboat laden with passengers changed her course to avoid being run into by a sloop which had missed stays, and, in consequence of such change, collided with a scow, held, that she was free from fault, it appearing that she reversed as soon as it was perceived that the change of course involved risk of striking the scow, and that a collision with the sloop would probably have been disastrous.]

[This was a libel by John A. Bouker against the steam ferryboat Delaware to recover damages resulting from a collision with libellant's scow.]

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for libellant.

Shipman, Barlow, Larocque & McFarland, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I am of opinion that the Delaware has freed herself from the charge of fault in this case. The collision took place on the 4th of September, 1873. The statute in force at that time contained, in the shape of a formulated rule, what was before recognized as a principle of navigation and of decision, namely, that, in obeying and construing rules and regulations for preventing collisions on the water, due regard must be had "to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case" rendering a departure from such rules "necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." Act April 29, 1864, art. 19; 13 Stat. 61. The faults alleged against the Delaware are that she changed her course and ran against the scow, and that she did not stop and reverse in time to avoid a collision. The evidence shows that the Delaware changed her course to avoid being run into by a sloop which had missed stays, and under the impending danger of a collision with the sloop, which would probably have been disastrous to the Delaware, laden as she was with passengers; that she stopped and reversed immediately as soon as it appeared that such necessary change of her course would cause her to approach towards the scow; that she had reason to believe her headway would be stopped before she would reach the scow, inasmuch as the scow was moving away from her; that her change of course to avoid the sloop was necessary in order to avoid immediate danger; and that she was not guilty of anything which can be imputed to her as a fault under the special circumstances of the case.

I do not think the facts of this case bring it within the principle of Sherman v. Mott [Case No. 12,767]. The act of the Delaware, in endeavoring to avoid the sloop, was a lawful and proper act, she had no intention of striking the scow, the situation did not indicate serious risk of collision with the scow, and she exercised reasonable care and caution and nautical skill. The case is very much like that of The Thornley, 7 Jur. 659. The Thornley was forging with the wind and the tide over the Nore Sand, and was approaching the Mentor, which was at anchor on the other side. She went over the Sand, and fouled the Mentor. It was claimed that she should have anchored either before she reached the Sand, or on the Sand, or after she had crossed it. It was shown that it would have been perilous for the Thornley to anchor on the Sand. Dr. Lushington stated the question to be whether the Thornley could have anchored so as to avoid the collision "without imminent risk to herself in doing so." The decision was that the collision was accidental, because the Thornley could not anchor until clear of the Sand, and because, if she had anchored immediately on being clear, the collision would still have occurred. The libel is dismissed, with costs.

COLLISION — LIABILITY — CHANGE OF COURSE BY STEAMER.

[A steamer is liable for a collision with a scow caused by the steamer suddenly changing her course to avoid being run into by a sailing vessel, unless it is proved that the steamer was without fault in getting into a position which made the change of course necessary.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.

[This was a libel by John A. Bouker against the steam ferry boat Delaware. From a judgment dismissing the libel (Case No. 18,243), libelant appeals.]

Facts Found by the Court.

(1) On the 4th of September, 1873, between 10 and 11 o'clock in the forenoon, the steam ferryboat Delaware was proceeding on one of her regular trips from Pavonia, N. J., across the Hudson river, to her slip at the foot of Chambers street, in the city of New York. (2) At the same time the scow or float "N-8," owned by the libelant, in tow of the steam tug Adriatic, was passing down the river, from the foot of Gansevoort street, New York, towards the Battery, with a heavy deck load of artificial stone. Her course was about parallel with the heads of the piers on the New York side, and from four to six hundred feet distant. The scow or float was lashed to the starboard side of the Adriatic, and their speed with the tide was about four miles an hour. There was only one man on the scow, and there was no railing or guard on her deck aft of the bow. (3) The wind was a moderate breeze from the southward and westward and the tide ebb. (4) At the same time, also, a schooner and sloop were beating down the river, and running out their starboard tacks towards the New York shore. (5) While the Delaware was approaching her slip, the Adriatic, with the scow in tow, was passing down the river in such a way as to enable the Delaware, if she held her course, to get by astern in safety. The schooner went about on her port tack, and passed the Delaware port to port and astern. In this state of things, the Delaware discovered that the sloop was not coming around upon her port tack, and that, if she kept on her starboard tack, it would be impossible to pass her bows without a collision which might endanger the lives of passengers. The Delaware, thereupon, ported her wheel, and stopped and reversed her engines to keep out of the way of the sloop; but in so doing, before her headway could be stopped, her port guard ran against and shifted the cargo of the scow in such a way that, when the boats were separated, the scow upset and the cargo was lost overboard.

Conclusion of Law.

(1) The Delaware was at fault in not slackening her speed or changing her course in time to keep out of the way of the sloop without coming into collision with the scow. (2) The libelants are entitled to recover.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for appellant.
Shipman, Barlow, Larocque & McFarland, for appellee.

WAITE, Circuit Justice. The principal defense relied on by the claimant is that a sloop beating down the river, and running out her starboard tack toward New York, while attempting to come about on her port tack, missed stays, "and suddenly and unexpectedly her bow fell off to leeward and filled away toward the New York shore, causing her to head down the river and directly in the course of the Delaware." It is then alleged that on this course the sloop would have run into the Delaware, and endangered the lives of the passengers on board. For this reason, and to avoid such a collision, the Delaware, without any fault of her own, was compelled to change her course, and in so doing ran against the scow and her loading. This defense has not, I think, been made out by the testimony. When a steamer, bound to keep out of the way of another, attempts to excuse herself for a collision on the ground of an unexpected peril into which she was brought by the fault of some other vessel, she must free herself from all blame for getting into her place of danger. The burden of proof is on her, and, unless she shows that she was in no way responsible for the original fault, her excuse must fail. The witness chiefly relied on by the claimant is the pilot of the Delaware. He says: "I first observed the scow when I was about one-half way across the river. Scow was above Chambers street slip, headed down, between two hundred and three hundred feet out in the stream. * * * We would have passed under her stern. When I first discovered scow there were two sailing vessels beating down. They were some way above, on starboard tack, standing toward New York. According to ordinary course, they would have gone about one or two piers above my slip, and I would have gone across bows of both of them, and they would have gone about and passed on my port side. The other, I think a sloop, missed stays, and filled away again on starboard tack, heading toward New York. When she missed stays, if Delaware had held course, the sloop would have gone into the ladies' cabin of Delaware. When I discovered that scow had missed stays, stern of scow was about opposite lower side of ferry slip. When I saw sloop had missed stays, I hove my wheel to port, and tried to turn my boat away from sloop. * * * When I ported * * * scow was probably 150 or 200 feet away. * * * If sloop had not missed stays, she would have gone clear of Delaware." This is the entire testimony of this witness, so far as it bears upon the point now under consideration. The other pilot of the Delaware, who was standing on the north bridge of the Chambers street slip, waiting to relieve the pilot on board when he came in, saw the Delaware sheer off and collide, but did not notice either the schooner or the sloop. A clerk of the steamer Naragansett, sitting on the forward deck of his steamer, as she lay, with her bow out alongside of the pier next above the ferry slip, saw the occurrence, and says: "I observed sailing vessel to north of Delaware. When I first saw sailing vessel, she was heading towards Jersey City." Then, again, on cross-examination: "When I first saw sloop, she was heading towards New York, so was the Delaware. Then I heard signal, and after that, and after collision, I saw sloop heading towards Jersey City, may be, and down stream, and a little shaky." This closed the testimony for the claimant. The libelants then called the pilot of the steam tug Whipple, in the employ of the claimant. He was on his tug lying at the pier next above the ferry slip, and within twenty feet of the end of the pier. He saw the Delaware when she was some where about the middle of the river heading about for the pier next above her slip, and on her regular course with the wind and tide as they were. He says: "Saw a sloop and schooner; small sloop. I noticed schooner going about when I first saw ferryboat,—going in stays. She stood off to windward. She bore at that time about north by west from Delaware. I should think schooner went within one hundred feet of Delaware. She went under stern of ferryboat. I saw sloop at the same time. She was between me and schooner. I did not see her go about. I think her jib was shaking when schooner went about. At that time sloop was within sixty or seventy yards of the Delaware, on port hand of Delaware, bearing northeast from Delaware. Sloop and Delaware were at that time a little nearer the New York shore than half way of the river. After that I noticed nothing till noise of collision. As I looked they were 150 to 200 yards out in the river. The Delaware was heading about southeast by south. * * * The sloop was half way from them to New York, and four hundred feet from sloop to Delaware." The libelant himself testified that he saw the sloop somewhat above the Delaware on the New York shore, heading for upper side of the ferry slip, or perhaps above. The schooner was then off in the river heading towards the ferry shore, astern of the Delaware, and the sloop was three hundred yards from the Delaware. Such is the testimony and all of it relating to the sloop. I am satisfied, from the evidence, that the collision must have occurred not much less than six hundred feet out in the river from the ends of the piers. The Delaware had not then got straightened down the river after changing her course, and, as she hit the scow on the starboard side with her port guard, it is evident that when she changed her course she was even further out. She was going ahead all the time, and was not finally stopped until the collision. Taking everything into consideration, I am entirely satisfied that the collision was caused, not by the sloop's "missing stays," but by her not attempting to go in stays and put herself on her port tack as soon as the pilot of the Delaware expected she would. Seeing the schooner go about and pass under his stern, he seems to have taken it for granted that the sloop would do the same thing, and kept on until it was too late to correct his mistake without running on to the scow. The pilot stands alone in saying that the sloop "missed stays," and even his testimony leaves a decided impression that what he calls "missing stays" was, after all, nothing more than "not going in stays." At any rate, he carefully avoids all details of her movements, which, as his case depended entirely upon his establishing this one important fact, is, to say the least, suspicious. I find nothing to show that the sloop ought to have gone about sooner than she did. It is true the pilot says that according to course they (the schooner and the sloop) would have gone about one or two piers above his slip, but there is nothing to show that the sloop had reached that point when he found it necessary to change his course, or that she had got so near the New York shore as to make it proper for her to go about. She had the right, as against the Delaware, to keep her course until prudence required her to take the other tack. If the Delaware misjudged as to her movements, that furnishes no justification for the collision which followed or the consequence. I cannot but think that is the position which the Delaware occupies.

The libelants are entitled to a decree fixing the liability of the Delaware, and directing a reference to ascertain the amount of damages. An entry may be prepared to this effect.

CALDWELL v. WINDER.

[2 Hayw. & H. 24.]¹

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 17, 1850.²

MECHANICS' LIENS — EXTRA WORK — APPLICATION OF PAYMENTS.

1. Under the lien law no extra work not completed within three months preceding the filing of the claim in the clerk's office is covered by the lien.

2. Under the rule that payments made by a debtor should be applied to the debt least secured, general payments by a debtor not directed by him to be applied to the contract specifically may be applied to the extra work, whether completed within the three months or not, provided such extra work was completed and the money due for it.

[At law. Scire facias under lien law.]

This action, under the act of March 2, 1833, was commenced by serving on the defendant the following writ: "District of Columbia, the United States of America, to wit—To the Marshal of the D. C., Greeting: Whereas, a certain Andrew D. Caldwell did, on the 9th day of March, A. D. 1849, file in the clerk's office of the circuit court of the D. C., for the county of Washington, his certain account or claim against a certain William H. Winder, amounting to the sum of $14,586.39, for lumber and other material furnished at his request, and used by him in and about the construction and erection of a certain building or house erected by him on lots 1, 2, 3, the east half of lot 4, and the north half of lot 22, in square 169, according to the original plan, and being lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 17, 18 and 19, according to Davidson's sub-division of said square in the city of Washington, in the District aforesaid; in pursuance of the act of congress of the United States, entitled 'An act to secure to mechanics and others payment for labor done and material furnished in the erection of buildings in the D. C.' [4 Stat. 659], which said account has been enrolled among the records of said court, by the record thereof in the office of the clerk of the said court, remaining manifestly appears, and the said Andrew D. Caldwell alleges that the said sum of $14,586.39 is still due and unpaid, and that judgment remains to be rendered upon the account and record aforesaid. Therefore you are hereby commanded that you make known unto the said William H. Winder, according to the act of congress aforesaid, that he be and appear before the circuit court of the D. C., to be held for the county aforesaid at the city of Washington, on the fourth day of March, inst., to show cause, if any he hath, why the said court ought not to render judgment for the sum of $14,586.39 aforesaid, according to the force and effect of the said act of congress; and further to do what the said court shall then and there consider concerning him in this behalf, and have you then and there this writ, and make return of the manner in which you shall have executed the same. Hereof fail not, as you will answer the contrary at your peril. Witness the Hon. Wm. Cranch, chief judge of our said court, at the city of Washington, the 20th day of March, A. D. 1849. Issued this 20th day of March, 1849. John A. Smith, Clerk."

The following was filed by the counsel of the defendant: "Take notice that the above named defendant, not admitting the existence of any claim against him of the above named plaintiff, or a due performance of any part of the contract filed by the said plaintiff in the clerk's office, will give in evidence and insist that the said plaintiff did not perform and furnish certain work and material called for by the said contract, whereby the benefits stipulated for by the said defendant was not received; that among other things, the said plaintiff did not perform the work or furnish the material for the items mentioned in the annexed account, and that the said defendant will set off and allow so much of the amount of the said account against any demand of the said plaintiff to be proved at the said trial, as will be sufficient to satisfy and discount said demand, according to the statute in such case made and provided. And further take notice, that the said defendant will give in evidence and insist that there were defects in the said work and materials and delay in the execution and furnishing of the same, as called for by the said contract; that said delay was for a period of not less than one month, and that the sum of twenty-five dollars per day therefore ought to be deducted from any demand of the plaintiff, to be proved at the said trial. Dated 20th day of November, 1850." Notice of plea set off.

Whereupon the said defendant, by his counsel, filed in court here a paper purporting to be a notice of set off, which is in the words and manner following, to wit: "Take notice that the above named defendant, on the trial of this cause, will give in evidence, and insist that the above named plaintiff, before and at the time of the commencement of this suit was, and still is, indebted to the said defendant in the sum of $9,000, for money by the defendant before that time paid, laid out and expended for the plaintiff by the defendant, on account of and on behalf of the said plaintiff, under his contract as aforesaid and at his special instance and request; and further, that certain portions of the work required by said contract and specifications and plans, to the amount of $—— had been, by the direction of said plaintiff, and of his benefit, dispensed with in the progress of the building; wherefore he, said defendant, claimed the right to rebate the same from the contract price for the said building, and that the said defendant will set off against the said plaintiff, on said trial, so much of the said $9,000, and of the value of the work so rebated against, any demand of the said plaintiff, to be proved on the said trial, as well as be sufficient to satisfy and discharge such demand, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. March 20, 1850."

Bradley & Smith, for plaintiff.

Walter D. Davidge, for defendant.

THE COURT'S instructions:

When a debtor owes on two accounts and makes a payment, he has a right to direct to which debt it shall be applied, and when so directed the application must be so made; when no such direction is made the creditor may apply it to which debt he thinks proper; if neither does so, before suit brought, the court and jury may apply it, and the rule then is to apply it to the debt which is the least secure. If however one only of the two debts is due, the application must be made to such debt. The court instructed the jury that no extra work not completed within three months preceding the filing of the claim in the clerk office was covered by the lien then. Can the jury apply any payment made by the defendant in the case to the payment of the claim for extra work not completed within three months as specified above? We think the jury can apply any of the general payments made by the defendant, not directed by him to be applied to the contract specifically, to the credit of any of the extra work, whether completed within the three months referred to or not, provided the jury shall be satisfied by the evidence that such extra work was executed, and the money due for it at the time such payments were made.

The following instructions were excepted to by the plaintiff: On the trial of this cause, the plaintiff, to maintain the issue on his part, joined, offered and read in evidence, without objection, the contract and specifications signed by the parties respectively, and gave evidence tending to show that said contract and specifications referred to certain plans of the building therein referred to, which had been prepared by Mr. Walters for the defendant, and upon which defendant had invited bids for the said buildings; and afterwards certain other plans, in addition to and in some respects modifying the said plans of said Walters, had been prepared by the direction of the defendant, under which modified plans, with certain alterations required by the defendant, the plaintiff did the work specified in said contract, and defendant took possession of said building before the said contract was fully completed, and rented out a portion of it, and hath continued to hold it to this time. He further gave in evidence to show that he did at the time request, and for the use and benefit of the defendant, furnish the material and do the work on said building, particularly set out in the account for extra work filed in said cause, and the value thereof; that the principal part of said contract work and of said extra work was done about and before the 1st of October, 1848, but the completion thereof was delayed to accommodate the defendant, and the contract work and part of the other said extra work was finished in February, 1849; and the claim for his lien on said building was filed by the said plaintiff in March, 1849, and rested. And thereupon the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury as follows: If the jury shall believe, from the evidence aforesaid, that the work and material mentioned in the open account filed by the plaintiff in the clerk's of-rice, and offered in evidence by him as extra work and material, were not done and furnished in part, or any part thereof was not done and furnished within three months before the filing of the claim in the clerk's office, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action for such work and materials claimed as extra work, or such part thereof.

The defendant then offered to give in evidence tending to show that certain portions of the work required by said contract and specifications and plans had been for his benefit and by his direction dispensed with in the progress of the said building, and claimed the right to rebate the same from the contract price for the said building, for the purpose of showing what work was actually done and what materials were actually furnished, so as to ascertain the extent of the plaintiff's lien on the building, and the plaintiff by his counsel objected thereto, and the court admitted the same. And thereupon the defendant offered to give in evidence, by Mr. Gilpin, who was the architect of the building, that after the said contract and specifications had been signed by the said parties, the said plaintiff admitted that he was, by that contract, bound to do the carpenter's work for flat ceilings in all the rooms of said building. The witness stated that the plaintiff, at the invitation of said defendant, made a bid in writing for the carpenter's work of said building, including all the material parts thereof, and afterwards defendant stated to witness that Mr. Downer had also bid in writing for said work, but he was higher than Mr. Caldwell and had given the contract to Mr. Caldwell. That there was a good deal of conversation and negotiation between them before the contract was signed, but he could not recollect any distinct or specific alteration from said bid. He did not know that the written bid of said Caldwell had been accepted by the defendant or became a part of the contract. There was, after the bids were made, much negotiation between the parties. It was also admitted that neither the contract nor the specifications refer to the plans, nor do the plans exhibit any such flat ceiling. And the plaintiff objected to the admissibility of said evidence, but the court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence.

The following instructions were accepted to by the defendant: And thereupon the defendant, to support the issue joined on his part, gave in evidence to prove that the said contract and specifications referred to a set of plans prepared by Mr. Gilpin, at the instance of the defendant. The defendant further gave evidence to prove that said plans were prepared by said Gilpin, at a time when the plaintiff was constantly with him; that they were fully explained to and understood by the plaintiff, and recognized by him as a part of said contract. The defendant further gave evidence to prove that portions of the work and material mentioned in the account or claim filed in the clerk's office as extra were not such, but were called for and required by the said contract and specifications and plans, and that the prices for said work and materials claimed as extra were unreasonable and extravagantly high. The defendant further gave evidence to show that during the progress of the building certain portions of the work and materials called for by the said contract and specifications and plans were dispensed with at his instance, and with the assent and acquiescence of the plaintiff, and that certain other portions of said work and materials were not done and furnished, or procured to be done and furnished by the plaintiff according to the said contract, specifications and plans, and that to the omission thereof the plaintiff never at any time objected. The defendant further gave evidence to prove that sundry large sums of money, exceeding in amount $9,000, had been paid to the plaintiff for the work and material done and furnished under the said contract, specifications and plans, and then offered to show by competent witnesses that there was delay on the part of the plaintiff in the performance of his said contract; that said delay was not caused by or in any manner attributable to the defendant, and that in consequence of the plaintiff not being ready to put up his work according to said contract, delay was occasioned by him in the construction of said building of not less than three weeks, to the admission of which evidence so offered the plaintiff by his counsel objected, which objection the court sustained, and refused to allow the said offered evidence to be given to the jury.

At the further trial of this cause, and in addition to the evidence contained in the foregoing, which is made part hereof, the defendant gave evidence to prove that the plaintiff before, at and since the date of the said contract was, and has been a resident of the city of Philadelphia, and by occupation a contractor or undertaker for the construction of houses, and that the plaintiff performed no manual work upon or for the building against which the claim was filed, or in the erecting or constructing of the same, but that said work and labor were done and performed by mechanics and laborers employed by him and acting under the superintendence and directions of the plaintiff and his agent. The defendant further gave evidence to prove that a large portion of the materials found and provided for said building was not furnished for the same by the plaintiff, but by persons employed by him to find and provide the same for the said building. The defendant further gave evidence to prove that, with the exception of the work and material dispensed with and omitted as aforesaid, and of a portion of the work and materials claimed as extra, and admitted as such by the defendant, the work and materials done, found and provided for the said building were so furnished under and in pursuance of the contract, specifications and plans. The defendant further gave evidence to show that the work done and materials found and provided for the said building, under said contract, specifications and plans were with the exception of the flooring of the balcony attached to said building done, found and provided before the 1st of October, 1848, and were then three months before the claim of the plaintiff's was filed in the clerk's office, and that the work and materials mentioned in said claim as extra or as additional were also, with the exception of the last item thereof, done, found and provided before the said 1st of October. And thereafter offered to prove, by competent testimony, that the work and materials done, found and provided upon and for the said building were defective in quality and character and far inferior in value to what said contract and specifications called for, to the admissibility of which offered evidence, or any part thereof, the plaintiff, by his counsel, objected, which objection the court sustained, and refused to allow the same, or any part thereof, to be given to the jury. At the further trial of this cause the defendant, in addition to the evidence contained in the foregoing, which is made part hereof, gave evidence to prove that the work and material before, and for the balance aforesaid, might have been completed but for the neglect and delay of the plaintiff, and finished as required by the said contract, specifications and plans in the month of November, 1849, and that all the work and material found and provided under the said contract, specifications and plans might have been fully performed and furnished, and the said agreement fully executed by the plaintiff, anterior to the 1st of December, 1849, but for the delay and neglect of the plaintiff. And therefore the defendant, by his counsel, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they shall believe from the evidence aforesaid that there was made and entered into between the plaintiff and defendant on the 8th of July, 1847, a special agreement, and that under and in pursuance of said agreement certain work and materials were done, found and provided by the plaintiff for the said building, then for such work and materials the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action. Which instructions the court refused to give, and to such refusal this defendant by his counsel excepts. And thereupon the defendant, by his counsel, prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence aforesaid that the price agreed to be paid by the special agreement, offered in evidence by the plaintiff, was partly in consideration of the skill or superintendence of the plaintiff, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action the said contract price, or any part thereof, which instruction the court refused to give, and to such refusal the defendant, by his counsel, excepts. And thereupon the defendant, by his counsel, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they shall believe, from the evidence aforesaid, that the work and materials furnished under the special agreement aforesaid, and in addition thereto, and mentioned in the account filed by the plaintiff in the clerk's office or any part of said work and materials were, or was found, done or provided by third parties upon the personal credit of the plaintiff, and not upon the credit of the building against which the said account was filed, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action for such work and materials, or such part thereof, although the jury should further believe that the said work and materials, or such part thereof, were performed and furnished upon, and for the said building. Which instruction the court refused to give, and to such refusal the defendant, by his counsel, excepts. And thereupon the defendant, by his counsel, prays the court to instruct the jury, that if they shall believe, from the evidence aforesaid, that the claim of the plaintiff was filed in the office of the clerk of this court on the 9th of March, 1849, and that a portion of the work and material done, found and provided under the said special agreement, or as additional thereto, was not performed and furnished within the space of three months before the filing of the said claim, then for such portion the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action. Which instructions the court refused to give, and to such refusal the defendant, by his counsel, excepts. And thereupon the defendant, by his counsel, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they shall believe, from the evidence aforesaid, that a portion of the materials found and provided for said building were not found and provided for the same by the plaintiff, but by persons employed by him to find and provide the same for the said building, then for such portion the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action. Which instruction the court refused to give, and to such refusal the defendant, by his counsel, excepts. And thereupon the defendant, by his counsel, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they believe from the evidence aforesaid, that the plaintiff did, and performed himself no work or labor upon or for the said building, or in the erecting or constructing of the same, but that said work or labor was done and performed by mechanics and laborers employed and hired by him for the purpose, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover for such work and labor in this action. Which instruction the court refused to give, and to such refusal the defendant, by his counsel, excepts. And thereupon the defendant, by his counsel, prayed the court to instruct the jury that if, upon the evidence aforesaid, they shall believe the same, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover for the work and materials, or any part thereof done, found and provided under the said special agreement. Which instruction the court refused to give, and to such refusal the defendant, by his counsel, excepts. That if the jury believe, from the evidence aforesaid, that the plaintiff has not fully executed and performed the said agreement entered into between him and the defendant, and so far as the same was not dispensed with by mutual consent, or by the direction of the defendant, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action the said contract price, or any part thereof. Which instruction the court refused to give, and to which refusal the defendant, by his counsel, excepts.

And after the plaintiff and defendant respectively had given the evidence set out in the foregoing bills of exceptions, and thereupon made part hereof, and by leave of the court, and by way of rebutting evidence, the plaintiff gave evidence tending to show what the said plans of said Walter, copies whereof are hereto annexed, and the specifications hereinbefore set out were the only plans and specifications in existence, and were the only ones shown to plaintiff at the time he entered into his said contract; but it was understood by plaintiff that Mr. Gilpin was to make the plans for the execution of the work, and the said plans of said Gilpin were intended to carry out that understanding. He further gave evidence to show that he is a practical carpenter and house builder, and did actually, with his own hands, labor upon the said building in the progress thereof; that all the materials furnished and provided by him, and all the labor done in and about the said carpenter's work on said building were done and provided by him or on his credit, and under his direction and superintendence. Verdict for the plaintiff for $4,740, with interest, from March 9, 1849. Motions for a new trial and arrest of judgment. Motion for a new trial. Reasons: (1) Because of error or mistake of the jury in finding the said verdict without evidence. (2) Because of error or mistake of the jury in finding the said verdict against evidence.

Both motions overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict.

Case No. 18,246.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[5 Blatchf. 558.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Nov. 12, 1867.

VIOLATION OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS—FRAUD AND EMBEZZLEMENT BY BANK OFFICERS AND DIRECTORS—NECESSITY FOR PUNISHMENT—DUTY OF GRAND JURY.

SHIPMAN, District Judge (charging grand jury). You are assembled, in pursuance of law, to enquire into the truth of any charges that may be submitted to you against individuals, for crimes committed in this district, or on the high seas, in violation of acts of congress. You are aware that the courts of the United States have no common law jurisdiction. They can punish no offences except such as are prohibited by some specific acts of the national legislature. These are comparatively few in number. The great body of offences against society pertain exclusively to the jurisdiction of the state courts, and can be punished by them alone. You are also aware, that no man can be put on trial before a federal court, until he has first been indicted by a grand jury. The law is different in the tribunals of our own state. There, in all cases when the punishment is neither death nor imprisonment for life, the state attorney can file his information and bring the offenders directly to trial. But, in this court, before any trial can be had, a grand jury of the district must present the accusation, and upon that accusation all the subsequent proceedings are founded.

It will be your duty, at the present term of this court, to investigate charges against several alleged offenders. The district attorney will see that you are supplied with such evidence as can be obtained, and he will prepare and furnish you with bills covering the offences that you may find proved by the requisite evidence. In order to find a true bill against any person, the proof should be such as, in your judgment, would warrant a petit jury in pronouncing the accused guilty. You proceed upon the evidence furnished you by the government, leaving the alleged offender to meet the charge, before the petit jury, by such proof as he may command. Sixteen of your number should always be present whenever you are engaged in the work before you, and twelve at least must concur in order to find a true bill.

It is not my purpose, at the present time, to dwell upon many of the particular crimes with which you may have to deal, but there is one class to which I invite your particular attention. By the fifty-fifth section of the act approved June 3, 1864 (13 Stat. 116), entitled, "An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof" it is provided, "that every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk or agent of any association, who shall embezzle, abstract, or willfully misapply any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association, or shall, without authority from the directors, issue or put in circulation any of the notes of the association, or shall, without such authority, issue or put forth any certificate of deposit, draw any order or bill of exchange, make any acceptance, assign any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment or decree, or shall make any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the association, with intent, in either case, to injure or defraud the association, or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of the association, or any agent appointed to examine the affairs of any such association, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment not less than five nor more than ten years." It is hardly necessary to remark, that the word "association," in the section, refers to what are commonly termed "national banks." Now, I am informed, gentlemen, that in two instances, at least, officers of such banks, located in this district, and organized under the provisions of this statute, have committed one or more of the offences prohibited by the section which I have read. It will be your duty, therefore, to inquire into the facts, and, if you ascertain that such crimes have been committed, and who are the guilty parties, to present indictments against them. To this end the district attorney will see that you are supplied with such evidence as can be obtained. He will cause the necessary witnesses to be summoned, and the books that may throw light on your inquiries to be produced before you. You will have the statute before you, and will carefully discriminate between embezzlement and false entries, and mere loose transactions done under the express or implied authority of the directors. Let your investigation be thorough and complete, and if, after full inquiry and deliberation, you find, upon adequate proof, that any person has, within this district, committed any offence of the character specified in this statute, you will find a bill against him. The faithful execution of this law is of the utmost importance. The business of banking has, in a great measure, been withdrawn from the oversight and supervision of the local state authorities, and these duties have been committed to officers far removed from the communities which are most interested in the safe and prudent management of these institutions. It is, therefore, of great moment that the provisions of the law enacted for the protection of the stockholders and the public should be strictly enforced.

It is not my habit to indulge in lengthy addresses to grand juries, but I feel constrained to say, that offenses of this character are alarmingly frequent in this country, and the omission to bring the offenders to justice is followed by the worst consequences. Vast interests are committed to the hands of officers of banks. They occupy places of trust and confidence, conferred upon them for their intelligence and supposed integrity. They are men of good social standing, are raised, by their salaries, above want, and are removed from many of the temptations which assail those in the obscurer and humbler walks of life. To fail to punish them when they deliberately violate their trusts and plunder those who have relied on their integrity, while, at the same time, the more ignorant and degraded offenders against law are visited with its penalties, shocks the moral sense, and is a bitter mockery of justice. It renders property insecure, encourages fraud, and removes those wholesome checks which should guard and warn others from treading in the path of crime. The position of the active officers of a bank, who are daily employed in conducting its affairs, is one of peculiar responsibility. They are not only entrusted with the property of the opulent, who are able to bear losses, and who have usually a potent voice in selecting these officers, but they control the interests of the small stockholders, of widows and orphans, whose sole means of support are often the small savings of a life of industry and self-denial, carefully invested by those who have passed away, as a security against want, for friends who have shared their affections and been dependent on their care. No more delicate or sacred earthly trusts than these can be committed to men. And yet they are often shamefully violated, and the public and the victims are told that the high position of the culprits, their attractive and many qualities, their past unblemished reputation, or their eminent piety, or all combined, are such, that those who have the earliest and freest access to the evidence of guilt do not desire their punishment, and cannot find it in their hearts to aid in bringing them to justice. If the moral sense of those most immediately interested in the management of these institutions is reduced to this sickly condition, it is quite time that a law was enacted declaring every officer, director, or stockholder of a bank who has knowledge that a fraud has been committed upon it, and fails to make immediate complaint to the officers of the law, an accessory after the fact, punishable by fine and imprisonment. If the miserable vendor of counterfeit currency passes a spurious note at a bank, and is detected, he is at once handed over to the officers of the law. If the bolder robber seizes a package of bills from its counter or messenger, he is immediately arrested, if possible, and brought to justice. Shall it be said that an officer of a bank, who commits, with coolness and deliberation, a long series of crimes, the smallest of which is more flagrant than counterfeiting or ordinary theft, may, when he can no longer pursue his guilty vocation with secrecy and success, assemble his partial friends, make his confession and apology, and then leisurely depart with none to hinder or molest him? Are laws made only for the comparatively weak, ignorant, and helpless? Is the whole force of society, operating through the expensive machinery of criminal justice, to be expended upon its obscure and worthless members, while the more conspicuous ones are screened from punishment and treated as mere victims of misfortune, entitled to sympathizing regrets and to every facility for concealment and flight? The practical answer which the community shall give to these questions, concerns every citizen. Courts and marshals and sheriffs are not omnipresent, and their efficiency in detecting and punishing crime must always, and in a great degree, depend upon the temper and conduct of the community whose laws they are appointed to execute. If those who are more immediately affected by unlawful acts, and who necessarily are the first to discover them, are to remain silent and connive at the escape of the perpetrators, it will soon be difficult to punish any except the friendless. If high social position, or reputation for moral worth in the offender, is to shield him from prosecution, and release the members of the community from all obligation to uphold the enforcement of the law, courts of justice will soon be powerless to punish for any crime where a breach of trust is involved. For, only the respectable and the intelligent are honored with great pecuniary trusts. It is to such men that the vast and varied interests of corporations are committed, and to exempt them from all penalties for embezzlement, is to license the crime, without even the poor return of a revenue derived from those who practise it. It is to proclaim to the thousands of young men who are now employed in these institutions, that they can appropriate the money of others without fear of any worse consequences than the loss of their places, and perhaps a short voluntary exile from the state or country. So demoralizing has the sentiment of the community on this subject become, that offenders of the more respectable class begin to demand, as a right, exemption from punishment. Not long since, a man of education and prominence, notoriously guilty of repeated and extensive forgeries, while temporarily confined, or, rather, lodged in the jail in this county, had the effrontery to denounce every one of his victims who hesitated to unite with him in suppressing the evidence of his guilt. He finally overcame all their scruples, and is now engaged in enlightening other communities on their moral duties, and enjoying the patronage and favor of society. But mark the contrast. About the same time, in the same city, an obscure, uneducated day laborer forged a single small check, presented it at the bank, was detected, and was speedily consigned to the state prison at Wethersfield for a term of years. Nothing but a sense of duty has constrained me to state these humiliating facts, and, were they the only ones of the kind which have occurred in this community, I might still have remained silent.

The punishment of men for crime is always a painful duty, but, to every right-minded person, one of the saddest features of this duty comes, when the heavy hand of the law must be laid on the outcasts of society who have grown up in vice and ignorance, whereby they have been deprived of many of those restraining motives, the power of which, persons of intelligence and social repute are supposed to feel. If we look at the palliating suggestions which are so often offered to excuse men of former good name who violate the law, we see upon what delusive notions they rest. When such men are guilty of embezzlement and forgery, it is often said that they did not intend to injure any one. They appropriated the money, or simulated the signature, of another, with no design to ultimately defraud, but with the full purpose of restoring the funds, or meeting the note when due. Their failure to do so is attributed to the result of unfortunate speculations, and the turpitude of their offenses is softened down by the excuse that they were not animated by a purpose to injure others. This mode of reasoning would palliate nearly every crime against property. The burglar and the thief are not often prompted by malice or a desire to injure others. Their ruling motive is to supply themselves. They are willing that others should lose if they can gain. Those who embezzle with the hope to restore, or forge with intent to protect the paper, are willing that others should bear the risk of loss, and, if the worst comes, actual loss, provided they can enrich themselves. The essence of the crime, in both classes, consists in a lawless disregard of the rights of others, but it is greatly aggravated where the offence involves a breach of trust as well as a breach of law. I am justified in dwelling on this subject, by the magnitude of the evil; for, more money is lost to the rightful owner, and more families are ruined, by embezzlement and forgery, than by all other forms of private robbery. These crimes plough the furrows of sorrow deep in the hearts of innocent relatives, and plant the seeds of misery which death alone can eradicate. When committed on a large scale, they are usually the work of men who occupy at the time places of responsibility and trust, and who are too often shielded from punishment by the leniency of the public or the connivance and partiality of friends. This evil is rapidly increasing in every direction where men are employed to handle the money of others, and we see the fruits of this indulgent public sentiment in the plunder of the revenue of the government, in the repeated sale of official connivance and favor, in crippled or broken corporations, in families reduced from affluence to poverty, in relatives plunged into grief and shame, and in the boldness and impunity with which pecuniary fraud is so often perpetrated. With the increase of wealth, and especially with the eagerness of our people to speedily become rich, and their growing fondness for extravagance and display, this evil will rot away every security against commercial dishonesty and infuse its poison through the whole frame of society, unless the community adopt a higher standard of judgment and action, in dealing with those who forfeit their integrity in places of trust. The man who takes the money of another by indictable fraud must be treated the same as the one who takes it by force. The man who robs a bank from behind the counter must stand upon the same level with the one who does it in front. At all events, the fact that, by a false pretence of honesty, he has obtained the confidence of others only to betray them, should not entitle him to occupy higher and safer ground than ordinary offenders. I am aware that there are deeper themes of inquiry which belong to this subject—the feverish and artificial state which has characterized the finances and the business of the country, engendering aversion to the slow processes of regular industry; and habits of speculation which border on gambling, and are as barren of substantial and permanent benefits as the practice of that vice; and the hot haste for riches, generating a moral atmosphere in which the solid virtues of moderation, sobriety and probity often yield and melt away. But the discussion of these is no part of my judicial duty.

You will retire to your room, gentlemen, and first dispose of the current business which the district-attorney may lay before you. You will then proceed to investigate the frauds upon the two banks to which I have referred, and submit the result to the court. You will take all the time necessary to perform this work thoroughly. The court will be kept open until your labors are completed. As I have already remarked, if you ascertain that any of the crimes enumerated in the act to which I have called your attention have been committed within this district, and find out who the guilty parties are, you will present bills against them. Whether or not they have fled beyond the limits of this district, or out of the country, will make no difference in your action. If you should find that any offender has compromised with those he has defrauded, this fact will not deter you from indicting him. Compounding crimes is not yet a bar to their prosecution. If any person refuses to testify to facts within his knowledge, or to produce books or papers within his reach, you will notify the court. If any one shall corruptly, or by threats, attempt to influence or impede any witness in the discharge of his duty, and if it shall come to your knowledge, you will find a statute applicable to his case. Act March 2, 1831 (4 Stat. 488, § 2). The district-attorney will provide you with a copy of the acts, and the marshal will furnish you with a room, and such conveniences as you may require.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[6 Blatchf. 555.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 10, 1869.

FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE.

1. Description of the manner in which frauds on the revenue are perpetrated, in obtaining from the government the payment of moneys on drawbacks, on the exportation of goods which have paid internal revenue taxes.
2. Frauds in the warehouse department, commented upon.
3. The subject of giving and taking gratuities for the performance of official duties, referred to.
4. The duties of a grand jury, enforced.

BENEDICT, District Judge (charging grand jury). It is proper for me, on this occasion, to explain to you the nature of the duty you are called upon to perform, to show you the importance, at the present time, of a careful and conscientious discharge of that duty, and to direct your attention to some provisions of law and some questions of fact which you will be required to consider. The character of the duty devolving on a grand jury in a court of the United States, many of you doubtless understand. It is that of declaring what persons shall be held to answer in court for violations of the laws of the United States. Your services are made necessary by reason of that provision of the federal constitution which declares, that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury. This provision, while it affords citizens protection against arbitrary power, carries with it a great responsibility; for, under this provision, it rests with the people, as represented by a grand jury, drawn from the mass of citizens by lot, to say who shall and who shall not be accused of crime in the courts of the United States. You, therefore, represent the important community dwelling in the Southern district of New York, and, in behalf of that community, you are called on to say what laws of the United States have been disobeyed within the district; to inquire as to what frauds upon the revenue of the United States have been committed therein; to ascertain what violations of the laws of the United States which provide for the currency, which protect the post office, which guard the soldier and the sailor from imposition, which forbid smuggling, which punish bribery, perjury or conspiracy to defraud the government, have been committed; to say whether any and what officers of the United States, having sworn to execute and enforce the laws of the United States, have themselves assisted or connived at the evasion of them. The importance of this duty, which is obvious from a statement of it, will be more fully appreciated, if you consider the circumstances under which it is now to be discharged.

The war, which decided the question whether a government framed like ours had the ability to quell by force of arms a great rebellion, raised another question, which is now in process of solution, namely, whether such a government can surely provide for the payment of the interest upon a great debt. The interest upon the public debt must be obtained by taxation, and this taxation, under the most favorable circumstances, must be heavy. It will become odious and intolerable, if it is to be borne by the honest and well-disposed classes alone, and avoided by those willing to grow rich at the expense of their fellow citizens, through fraudulent evasions of the law. This latter class, numerous and powerful, both socially and politically, has, from the beginning, confronted the government in its effort to collect the revenue. At first, the government attempted to compel their obedience by seizure of their property, and large quantities of merchandise detected in the act of escaping taxation were forfeited and sold. But the attempt was a failure, the frauds increased both in number and in magnitude, and the government was compelled to turn to its last resort—the criminal jurisdiction of its courts. It is now, therefore, here and elsewhere engaged in the effort to check these frauds by means of criminal prosecutions—the indictment, trial, conviction and imprisonment of defrauders of the revenue. Inasmuch, then, as no man can be tried until accused by a grand jury, the government and the community, of which the government is but the representative, now turns to the grand juries of the land, and asks the indictment of every man, whether high or low, rich or poor, who is found to be engaged in fraudulent evasions of legal taxes. Time would fail me to describe to you the various forms which these frauds assume, but it is my duty to put you in possession of what I have understood to be the facts in regard to some transactions which must come before you, and to allude in general terms to others which your own inquiries will expose.

I begin with what have been designated the drawback cases. These cases have been the subject of examination in the adjoining district, and are transferred to this district because most of the transactions took place here. They are frauds perpetrated under cover of the provisions of a law which enables a person who has paid taxes upon manufactures which he afterwards exports, to receive back the taxes he has paid, upon proving the actual exportation of the goods. To obtain this drawback, a set of papers is necessary in every case, consisting first of an internal revenue collector's certificate, that the tax on the goods has been paid; second, a certificate of the collector of customs, that such goods appear on a ship's manifest, on file in the custom-house, as actually exported; third, an affidavit by the shipper as to the identity of the goods upon the manifest and the goods upon the tax receipt; fourth, a certificate of an internal revenue collector, that a proper bond to secure the government against any relanding of the goods has been filed with him. These papers must be certified to at the custom-house and then go to the department at Washington, to be examined there. If found correct, a check for the amount of tax, drawn to the order of the shipper, upon the treasury, is returned. Numerous sets of such papers, representing sums of from $300 to $7,000 each, all false, no such goods having been exported, there being no such shipper and no such manifest on file, the bonds being fraudulent, the signatures forgeries, and the affidavits perjuries, have, within a space of six months' time, passed through the custom-house here and been certified, have then passed through the department at Washington and been there approved, and corresponding checks have been drawn and paid, every one, or nearly every one, upon a forged endorsement, until the total probably exceeds the sum of $700,000. The fraud which I am thus enabled to describe, because it has already been the subject of examination in the adjoining district, is not disputed, and the money is gone. It will be your duty to say who shall be accused before this court as criminally responsible for the transaction. Some of the parties supposed to have been engaged in this affair are already under bail. One has been brought from Florida, for the arm of the government is long. Others have escaped beyond the seas. It will be your duty, however, to indict all who appear to have been connected in the design, whether present or absent. In your examination of this case, you will have occasion to see with what looseness the public business is sometimes conducted, for it will appear that great numbers of bonds required by law have been accepted as good, without any identification of signatures or of persons, and without any inquiry as to the sufficiency or even existence of the sureties, the greater part being, in fact, executed in fictitious names or by persons entirely worthless. It will also appear that the genuine seal of an internal revenue collector can constantly appear upon certificates now claimed to be forged, and that part of the files of the collector's office, being bonds required by law, can be removed and taken to a neighboring city, by persons having no connection whatever with the government, there be dealt with as unknown parties may desire, and then be returned without objection or remark. I have explained the features of this case to you fully, because you will be called on to act in regard to it, and not because it is to any very great extent exceptional.

If you extend your inquiries into other departments of the custom-house, you will find that similar frauds have been there committed. You will find that, in the warehouse department, it has been possible for certain parties to withdraw dutiable goods without payment of any duty, until the loss from a single warehouse has equaled $400,000, according to the estimate of an official. The parties who committed this fraud walk the streets to-day, well known, but unprosecuted and unpunished, unless the repayment of a part of their great gains is to be called punishment. Nor is the case to which I am now alluding, and which you will find fully disclosed upon the files of this court, the only one of this class which has occurred, and with a similar result, if I am correctly informed. You may think proper to inquire into them all. Frauds like these are, of course, not to be accomplished without the connivance on the part of officials; and you will have occasion, no doubt, to consider what persons shall be accused before this court, for giving or accepting bribes.

There is also an abuse at the custom-house, proper to be spoken of in this connection, which, I notice by the public prints, is now attracting some attention, and of the evil effects of which the drawback cases will give you painful proof. I refer to the custom of giving and taking gratuities for the performance of official duties. Strengthen the hands of the collector, gentlemen, in any effort to stop this steady flow. The law lies at your hands, and it reads thus (Act March 3, 1863, § 4; 12 Stat. 739): "If any officer of the revenue * * * shall knowingly accept, from any person engaged in the importation of goods, wares or merchandise into the United States, or interested, as principal, clerk, or agent, in any such importation, or in the entry of any goods, wares or merchandise, any fee, gratuity or emolument whatsoever, such officer shall, on conviction thereof, be removed from office and shall be fined in any sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the court." The 6th section of the same act is as follows: "If any person who shall be engaged in the importation of goods, wares or merchandise into the United States, or who shall be interested, as principal, clerk, or agent, in the entry of any goods, wares or merchandise, shall at any time make, or offer to make, to any officer of the revenue, any gratuity or present of any money or other thing of value, such person shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the court."

The market price of whiskey is still less than the first cost of manufacture, with the taxes added. From the tobacco trade honest dealers are fast being driven out. Much of the income tax goes uncollected. The fraudulent bond-maker still plies his busy trade. Men known to have grown rich by illegal means have escaped even the accusation of fraud, and flaunt their wealth before the public eye. Honest officials have been compelled to leave the service for want of due support in the performance of their duty, while other officers of the revenue who have remained and dared to endeavor to protect the government have found the very government they sought to serve turned against them and used with effect to accomplish their destruction and disgrace. In view of a demoralization such as these facts disclose, do you wonder that some men query whether the proper enforcement of revenue laws is possible for such a government as ours, with such a civil service as it has hitherto had? These remarks will have failed of their intended effect, if they have not served to deepen your sense of the responsibility which rests upon you, and to strengthen your determination to discharge yourselves of that responsibility in such a manner as to satisfy the proper demands of the community in which you live. To enable you to do this, great powers are given you. No matter within the jurisdiction of the court is exempt from your scrutiny. No man, of whatever degree, can refuse to obey your summons or decline to answer your proper interrogatories. No compromise of a department can have effect to stay your hand. Within your extended sphere you are supreme. Use, then, these great powers freely, examine diligently and inquire widely, but accuse with all due care, mindful always, that the mere examination of a transaction in open court, is often of great public benefit, but, also, mindful that such an examination is often, of itself, a great punishment. It is not your province to try the cases which you may consider. That duty devolves upon the petit jury and the court; but you are diligently to inquire and true presentment make of every offence arising under the laws of the United States which shall be made to appear by reasonable prima facie proof. This duty I charge you to perform, and if to its performance you shall bring that patience, that intelligence and that good courage which the occasion demands, you will render an important service to your fellow-citizens as well as to the government which protects you and under which it is your good fortune to live.

Case No. 18,248.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[Chase, 263.]¹

Circuit Court, D. West Virginia. Aug., 1868.

AUTHORITY AND DUTY OF GRAND JURIES—EXAMINATION OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

[A grand jury of the United States should not be satisfied by acting upon such cases only as may be brought before them by the district attorney. They have authority, and it is their duty, to summon before them officers of the government, and others who, they have reason to believe, possess information proper for their action. Officers connected with the collection of internal revenue—collectors and assessors, and their subordinates—may with special propriety be thus examined.]

CHASE, Circuit Justice (charging grand jury). You have been selected among your fellow-citizens for your intelligence, your impartiality, and your integrity, to inquire concerning offenses against the United States within the district of West Virginia. Your general duties are sufficiently defined by your oath, which binds you under the most solemn obligations to present no one from envy, hatred, or ill-will, and to leave no one unrepresented from fear, favor, and affection. The same oath binds you to diligent inquiry as well as true presentment.

You will not acquit yourselves of these obligations by slight or careless investigation. You must not be satisfied by acting upon such cases only as may be brought before you by the district attorney, or by members of your body to whom knowledge of particular offenses may have come. Your authority and your duty go much further. You may, and you should, summon before you officers of the government, and others whom you may have reason to believe possess information proper for your action, and examine them fully. Officers connected with the collection of internal revenue—collectors and assessors and their subordinates—may with special propriety be thus examined.

In respect to the mode and extent of your inquiries, your own good sense will be your best guide. The district attorney will always be ready to aid you with information on matters of law; and the court also will take pleasure in responding to any inquiries you may see fit to make.

There are three subjects, and, so far as we are at present advised, only three subjects, to which it is necessary to direct your particular attention.

The first of these is the faithful execution of the internal revenue laws. The war in which the nation has been recently engaged for the preservation of the national union and government endangered by rebellion, made the contracting of a large debt inevitable. This debt is the price of our national existence, and binds irrevocably the good faith of the people. Its inviolable obligation has been recognized by a solemn act of the nation in adopting the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States, which declares that "the validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for the payment of bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion shall not be questioned." There are differences of opinion as to the mode of payment required by the contracts of the American people made through their government, but nobody questions openly, if anybody questions at all, that the debt contracted must be paid, and paid in perfect good faith. The law of the amendment that the validity of the national debt shall not be questioned, was already written upon the hearts of the people before they made it part of the constitution. To provide for the reduction and final payment of this debt and for the annual expenses of the government, taxes are necessarily imposed. In other words, the equal proportion to be contributed by each citizen is ascertained by law. He who withholds his just proportion deprives the rest of the people of exactly the amount withheld. His fraud operates as theft.

The sum total necessary to meet the obligations of the nation must be raised. Fraud upon the revenue does not reduce that sum, it merely shifts the burdens evaded by the fraudulent upon others who pay their full proportion besides. All honest men, therefore, have a common cause against the dishonest.

You, gentlemen, represent the honest men, and it is your duty to see that no defrauder of the revenue who can be brought to justice escapes merited punishment. The higher in office and the higher in social position the delinquent may be, the more unremitting and searching should be your diligence in inquiry and presentment.

Some of the observations just made might be properly enough repeated upon the next topic to which I must invite your attention. I refer to counterfeiting. It is to be regretted that the currency of the country now consists wholly, or almost wholly, of paper; but it is not the less important on that account that the people should be protected as far as possible against counterfeiting. Whatever the currency of the country may be, payments must be made in it, and exchanges effected through it. It is practically the common measure of values. Whoever imposes a counterfeit dollar on the public, robs successively all who take it in payment. Counterfeiting is continuous robbery, and it robs chiefly those who are least able to bear the loss. Occasionally men are defrauded by counterfeit money in large transactions, but the principal sufferers are laboring men, whom it is the peculiar duty of government to protect from wrong. You will be vigilant, gentlemen, in your investigations concerning this class of crimes.

What remains to be said concerns offenses against the post-office laws. Under our benignant system of government, the means of cheap and frequent intercourse between the most distant parts of the republic are provided; relatives and friends separated by the breadth of the continent correspond freely with each other. Correspondence is nearly as cheap as talk. And not only do the mails convey messages of affection, science, and business, but they are also the agents of immense pecuniary transactions, by remittances of bills of exchange and small government money orders. You see at once how important it is that the laws which regulate this vast interchange should be faithfully executed, and we are confident that nothing more is needed to insure your best endeavors to detect and bring to justice all those whose crimes and offenses deprive the people of the great benefits which those laws are intended to secure.

There seems to be no necessity at this time for further observations from the court. You will retire to your room, gentlemen, carrying with you, we doubt not, in your retirement, a profound sense of the serious obligations you have taken upon yourselves, to your country and to your God.

Case No. 18,249.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. 15, 1853.

SEAMEN—FLOGGING—ACT ABOLISHING—SHIPPING —VESSELS OF COMMERCE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—WHALE FISHERIES.

[1. Whale fishing is a branch of the commerce of the United States, and is therefore under the exclusive control of congress by virtue of its constitutional right to regulate commerce.]

[2. Congress, by act of September 28, 1850 (9 Stat. 515), in a clause thereof enacted: "Provided that flogging in the navy, and on board vessels of commerce, be, and the same hereby is, abolished." Held, that "vessels of commerce" include vessels engaged in whale and other fisheries.]

[3. "Flogging," as practiced in the navy and merchant marine, has acquired a certain recognized meaning, viz., punishment by stripes inflicted by a cat o' nine tails or other instrument capable of inflicting the same kind of punishment. Therefore the abolition "of flogging" does not prohibit corporal punishment of a different kind administered by officers of vessels to compel obedience to lawful commands or to preserve the discipline and good order of the ship.]

Extract from the charge of Mr. Justice CURTIS to the grand jury, concerning the law of corporal punishment in the merchant service.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice (charging grand jury). The regulation of the rights and duties of merchant seamen is an important subject of the criminal laws of the United States. The power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the general states, conferred by the constitution on congress, includes the power to prescribe rules for the government of persons engaged in such commerce. And from a very early period in the history of the government, congress has passed criminal laws on this subject. One of those laws, which, more frequently perhaps than any other criminal law, comes under the notice of the courts of the United States, is an act passed on the third day of March, 1835 [4 Stat. 775], which is in the following words: "If any master or other officer of any American ship or vessel, on the high seas, or on any other waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, shall, from malice, hatred, or revenge, and without justifiable cause, beat, wound, or imprison any one or more of the crew of such ship or vessel, or withhold from them suitable food and nourishment, or inflict upon them any cruel or unusual punishment, every such person, so offending, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine, not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment, not exceeding five years, or by both, according to the nature and aggravation of the offence." By a series of adjudications, and by frequent practice, this law has acquired a settled meaning. And I should not deem it necessary to give you any special instructions concerning it, if more recent legislation by congress had not given rise to grave doubts and difficulties concerning its present effect. To convey to your minds what these doubts and difficulties are, and to supply a solution of them, it is necessary for me to begin by explaining what is the effect of this act standing by itself.

You will observe, then, that three things are required to constitute an offence under this law: (1) That the master, or other officer of a vessel of the United States, should beat, wound, or imprison one of the crew, or withhold from him suitable food and nourishment, or inflict on him some cruel or unusual punishment. (2) That either of these should be done without justifiable cause. (3) That the motive of such act of the master or officer should be malice, hatred, or revenge.

At the time this law was enacted, the master of an American vessel was intrusted by the law with the power to inflict punishment on the crew, and to use force to compel obedience to his lawful commands; and to preserve the discipline and good order of the ship. This law, the terms of which I have repeated to you, was not intended to restrain the proper exercise of that authority, but merely to prevent its abuse. And, therefore, it requires the government to prove, not only that punishment was inflicted, but that it was without justifiable cause. That is, that there was no offence calling for punishment, or no occasion to use force, or that the force used, or the punishment inflicted, was immoderate and disproportioned to the offence. And it also required that the act should be the product, not of mistake or erroneous judgment, but of malice; that is, of an evil intention. In other words, that it should be an intentional departure from a known duty. Under this law, therefore, when it had been proved that the master had inflicted corporal punishment on one of the crew, inasmuch as in some circumstances he had the right so to punish, the government was obliged to show, not only that the circumstances of the particular case were such that the right did not exist, but that they were such that the master must be taken to have known that it did not exist, and acted in disregard of what he knew to be his duty.

In September, 1850 (9 Stat. 515), there was inserted in an appropriate bill, passed by congress, this clause: "Provided that flogging in the navy, and on board vessels of commerce, be, and the same hereby is, abolished, from and after the passage of this act." It is to be regretted that what we are bound to presume were the necessities of the case, did not permit congress, in dealing with a subject of so much practical importance, to be more explicit in declaring its intention; and that, consequently, the powers and rights of masters and seamen, engaged in the merchant service, are involved in doubts which can be finally removed only by further legislation, or at the expense of much time and money, and no small suffering by many persons. To remove some of those doubts, so far as may be in my power, by an exposition of what I deem to be the legal effect of this clause, is my present purpose. In the first place, then, what is meant by the words "vessels of commerce." So far as I am aware, these words are here used for the first time to describe a class of vessels. The phrases found in other laws are, "any American ship or vessel," "any vessel belonging in whole or in part to any citizens or citizen of the United States," or other equivalent terms. And the argument which may be derived from this departure from the use of these usual words is, that if congress had intended to embrace every vessel belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States, or every American vessel, the act would have said so; and that, instead of doing so, it restricts the operation of the law to one kind of vessels only, that is to say, vessels of commerce; and that vessels employed only in the fisheries, are not vessels of commerce; that they are recognized by the legislation of congress as engaged in a distinct business, viz. in the capture of whales and the taking of fish, and are under restrictions and requirements, and are entitled to privileges, which are not attached to other vessels, whose business it is to carry on the intercourse and traffic of the commercial world.

It must be admitted that this argument is entitled to no small weight; and I believe the opinion that vessels engaged in the fisheries are not within this law, is entertained by some, though I do not know that it has been yet announced in any judicial decision. The great and increasing number of persons employed on board vessels engaged in the whale fishery, the length of many of their voyages, the large proportion of green hands, unaccustomed to the necessary subordination of the service, its frequent emergencies, and great hazards, the terms of the contract, by which all participate in the disappointments as well as the successes of the voyage, and in some places, there is too much reason to believe, the unfair practices which have been used to obtain men,—all combine to render it extremely important that the lawful powers of the master to inflict punishment on the crew of such a vessel, should be clearly defined. I believe it is within the experience of all who are accustomed to administer the criminal laws of the United States, in the districts constituting this circuit, from whence mainly, this fishery is prosecuted, that there is no class of vessels, in respect to which it is so necessary that the relative rights and duties of officers and seamen should be settled and known; or in respect to which doubts upon important points would work so much mischief. I have therefore given to this question the consideration which it demands, and my opinion is, that by this law it was intended by congress to embrace vessels engaged in the whale and other fisheries, under the words "vessels of commerce;" and I will state briefly the reasons which have brought me to this conclusion. In the first place, I do not perceive any sufficient reasons why masters of fishing vessels should continue to possess the power to inflict the punishment of flogging, when it is taken away from all others. If, as we are bound to presume, there was a mischief to be remedied, I cannot find any firm ground upon which it can be asserted, that fishing vessels were not within that mischief. There are differences, undoubtedly, between the ordinary merchant service and the persons engaged in it, and the fisheries and those who carry them on. But if those differences are such as to render this power more necessary in whaling than in merchant voyages, they clearly render its existence less necessary in the other fisheries, in which, from the character of those employed, and the nature and terms of their enterprises, an occasion to inflict such punishment is, happily, extremely rare. And if we consider the purpose of the law to have been, to abolish this mode of punishment, because of its effects upon those subjected to it, those engaged in the fisheries, so far as I can see, have an equal claim to be protected from these effects. And, therefore, if the words, "vessels of commerce," can be fairly interpreted so as to include vessels engaged in the whale and other fisheries, I feel it to be my duty so to interpret them.

From a very early period in the history of the government, congress has regulated the vessels and the persons employed in the fisheries. Their national importance was well understood when the constitution was adopted. Their rights and privileges had formed a prominent subject of the negotiations for peace with Great Britain, and hold an important place in the treaty of 1783 [8 Stat. 80]. And they have at all times been treated as a subject of legislation within the constitutional powers of congress. Yet there is no clause of the constitution, conferring that power on congress, except this: Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states." It is clear, then, that unless the fisheries were a branch of the commerce of the United States, congress would not have power to regulate them; a power which, so far as I know, has never been questioned, and certainly has been exercised so long, and in so many forms, that it must now be deemed to be beyond dispute. Nor does there seem to be any real difficulty in considering the fisheries as one branch of commerce. It has been said, by high authority, that the term commerce, though it includes traffic, is not limited to the buying and selling of commodities. It includes also intercourse; and therefore, a vessel which merely transports passengers from one country to another, is engaged in commerce, and is under the regulating power of congress. So it includes the mere transportation of commodities; and a vessel which carries commodities for hire, though the master or owners neither buy nor sell any thing, is engaged in commerce. Now, though whaleships are engaged in capturing whales, and in manufacturing their oil, they are also engaged in transporting that commodity across the ocean, for sale on its arrival here. They not only transport from without the United States, one of the commodities of commerce, but that commodity is brought into the United States, and is sold for the account of those employed in the voyage and owning the vessel. In the strictest sense, therefore, such vessels are engaged in commerce, and may be called, though it is in legislation a new phrase, vessels of commerce. In this sense, I consider congress used the words; intending to embrace in them all vessels within the commercial power of congress.

The next inquiry is, what is meant by the word "flogging?" It is applied to the navy and to vessels of commerce. The words are "flogging in the navy and in vessels of commerce." They plainly refer to, and are intended to identify fy, some one known mode of punishment theretofore lawfully practised, and which was thereafter to be prohibited. And inasmuch as it is the duty of the court to construe the statute, and inform the jury what it means, when it speaks of the punishment of flogging, I must be able to find, somewhere in the law, written or unwritten, a definition of the punishment of flogging, theretofore lawful and by this law prohibited. Otherwise it would be wholly out of my power to give any interpretation to these words. Now, the punishment of flogging in the navy was a known and lawful mode of punishment, when this law was enacted. The instrument by which it was inflicted, and the number of blows which could be ordered without a court-martial, are described in the rules and articles for the government of the navy, enacted by congress. It may be added, that it was the only lawful mode of inflicting corporal chastisement recognized by those rules and articles. It was corporal punishment, by stripes, with what is called in the articles, a cat o' nine tails. This is the only mode of punishment prohibited in terms by the law of 1850. But it must be taken to have prohibited it, not in this precise form only, but in substance and effect. Its prohibition is directed not against a particular form of punishment merely, but against any punishment which in substance and effect is the same as that mentioned. The form of the instrument may be varied, while substantially the same effects are produced. And here, I think, the prohibition stops. I see no safe ground upon which it can be carried further. The law does not abolish all corporal punishment. It is plainly restricted to one particular mode of inflicting corporal punishment, described in this law, as the punishment of flogging in the navy and in vessels of commerce, and defined in the act of congress for the government of the navy. And consequently, whenever a case arises, in which corporal punishment has been inflicted, the first inquiry must be, was it the punishment of flogging within the meaning of this law? in other words, was it, in substance and effect, punishment by stripes inflicted with a cat o' nine tails, or other instrument capable of inflicting the same kind of punishment? If not, the case is to be determined irrespective of this law. I am fully aware of the distressing uncertainty in which this subject is thus left. But it is an uncertainty which can be removed only by legislation. Having put upon the law the only interpretation which its language seems to me to admit of, if it is found to have left open much debatable ground, in a matter where plain and clear rules are especially necessary, it belongs to the power which makes, and not to that which administers the law, to prescribe these rules. One practical effect of this uncertainty is worthy of your especial notice, as it bears on the performance of your duties. I have already informed you that, in proceeding against a master under the law of 1835, the government must not only prove a beating or wounding, but want of justifiable cause, and malice. Now, if a case should arise, and certainly such cases are likely to arise, in which the beating was, in your judgment, in substance and effect the punishment of flogging, then you must find there was not justifiable cause, however atrocious the conduct of the seaman may have been; while, at the same time, you may be of opinion, that the master honestly thought it was not the punishment of flogging, but some other corporal punishment within his lawful power to inflict, and so did not act in disregard of a known duty, and therefore did not commit the offence described in the statute.

Before I leave this subject, I think it proper to call your attention to an important distinction, between punishment and the use of force to compel obedience to a lawful order. The necessities of the service require of the crew prompt obedience to the orders of the master, or other commanding officer. These necessities are such, that it is often inconsistent with the general safety to permit delay or hesitation. In all such cases, the master, or other officer in command has the right to compel obedience by the use of the necessary force. He also has the right, and it is his duty, to interpose to quell all affrays between the officers and men, and especially all forcible resistance to his lawful commands. And he may and should use that degree of force in doing so, which the occasion renders apparently necessary. I say apparently necessary, because all that can reasonably be required of the master so interposing is, that he should act with as much coolness and judgment as are ordinarily possessed by masters of vessels, and should honestly endeavor to do his duty. Such occasions do not permit the degree of force necessary to be used, to be very exactly measured, or the necessity itself to be estimated with the same precision which those judging after the event, with time for deliberation, and a more full knowledge of the facts, might find possible. This law, abolishing the punishment of flogging, does not affect either of these last mentioned powers of the master. They exist now, and are to be governed by the same rules as before that law was passed.

I have only to add, in conclusion, on this topic, that the act of 1850 is not a penal law. It may, as I have explained to you, have an important effect upon the questions of justifiable cause and malice, on the trial of indictments under the act of 1835, and also in civil suits for damages; but it describes no offence, and enacts no penalty; and therefore is not one of the criminal laws of the United States, and no indictment can be framed upon it.

Case No. 18,250.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[2 Curt. 637.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. June 7, 1854.

OBSTRUCTING PROCESS—FEDERAL AND STATE LAWS —PRINCIPAL AND ACCESSORY.

[1. The criminal laws of the United States are to be enforced by the federal judiciary, including grand juries summoned by the federal courts, without any regard to the criminal laws of the state in which the court is sitting, or the nature of the crime under the state laws.]

[2. The act of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 112), making it a misdemeanor to willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose an officer of the United States in serving or executing any process or warrant, embraces every legal process whatsoever, whether issued by a court in session or by a judge or magistrate, or commissioner acting in the due administration of any law of the United States.]

[3. To constitute the offense of obstructing the service of process under this statute, it is not necessary that the accused shall have used or even threatened active violence. Any obstruction to the free action of the officer or his lawful assistants, willfully placed in his or their way, is sufficient. If a multitude of persons should assemble, even in a public highway, with the design to stand together and thus prevent the officer from passing freely along the way in the execution of his precept, and he should thus be hindered or obstructed, this would, of itself, and without any active violence, be an obstruction, within the meaning of the law.]

[4. In cases of misdemeanor, not only those who are present, participating in the act, but those who, though absent when the offense was committed, did procure, counsel, command, or abet others to commit it, are indictable as principals.]

[5. Language addressed to persons who immediately afterwards commit an offense, if actually intended by the speaker to incite those addressed to commit it, and adapted thus to incite them, is such a counseling or advising to the crime as the law contemplates, and the person so inciting is liable to indictment as a principal.]

CURTIS, Circuit Justice (charging grand jury). The preceding part of the charge related to certain offences under the acts of congress against the slave-trade; the court being informed by the district-attorney that a complaint on that subject was to be laid before the grand-jury. The court was also informed by that officer that it was his intention to lay before the grand-jury, which had then been summoned for the May term, recent occurrences which had resulted in an attack made on the marshal of the United States, for this district, while holding in his custody an alleged fugitive from service, and the homicide of one of the assistants of the marshal. In reference to these occurrences, the following part of the charge was given. No indictment growing out of them was returned at the May term. When the grand-jury for the next term, (October, 1854,) had been summoned and impanelled, the district-attorney again informed the court that it was his intention to lay these occurrences before them. And, after giving them instructions on other subjects, the court informed the jury that its views concerning the law of the United States against the obstruction of legal process, having theretofore been fully expressed; and the district-attorney, who was their legal adviser, having, as the court understood, a copy of those remarks, it was not deemed needful to say any thing further on the subject; but that if the jury should desire any instruction concerning any point of law which might arise in the course of their duties, such instruction would be given, at any time, on their application. Indictments for misdemeanors in obstructing legal process, were returned by the grand-jury. The disposition thereof will appear, by reference to the case of U. S. v. Stowell [Case No. 16,409].

There is another criminal law of the United States to which I must call your attention, and give you in charge. It was enacted on the 30th of April, 1790 (1 Stat. 117), and in the following words: "If any person shall knowingly or wilfully obstruct, resist, or oppose any officer of the United States in serving, or attempting to serve or execute any mesne process, or warrant, or any rule or order of any of the courts of the United States, or any other legal or judicial writ or process whatever, or shall assault, beat, or wound any officer, or other person, duly authorized in serving or executing any writ, rule, order, process, or warrant aforesaid, every person so knowingly and wilfully offending in the premises shall, on conviction, be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months, and fined not exceeding three hundred dollars." You will observe, gentlemen, that this law makes no provision for a case where an officer, or other person duly authorized, is killed by those unlawfully resisting him. That is the case of murder, and is left to be tried and punished under the laws of the state within whose jurisdiction the offence is committed. Over that offence against the laws of the state of Massachusetts we have here no jurisdiction. It is to be presumed that the duly constituted authorities of the state will, in any such case, do their duty, and if the crime of murder has been committed, will prosecute and punish all who are guilty.

Our duty is limited to administering the laws of the United States; and by one of those laws, which I have read to you; to obstruct, resist, or oppose, or beat, or wound any officer of the United States, or other person duly authorized, in serving or executing any legal process whatsoever, is an offence against the laws of the United States, and is one of the subjects concerning which you are bound to inquire. It is not material that the same act is an offence both against the laws of the United States and of a particular state. Under our system of government, the United States and the several states are distinct sovereignties, each having its own system of criminal law, which it administers in its own tribunals; and the criminal laws of a state can in no way affect those of the United States. The offence, therefore, of obstructing legal process of the United States is to be inquired of and treated by you as a misdemeanor, under the act of congress which I have quoted, without any regard to the criminal laws of the state, or the nature of the crime under those laws. This act of congress is carefully worded, and its meaning is plain. Nevertheless, there are some terms in it, and some rules of law connected with it, which should be explained for your guidance. And first, as to the process, the execution of which is not to be obstructed. The language of the act is very broad. It embraces every legal process whatsoever, whether issued by a court in session, or by a judge, or magistrate, or commissioner, acting in the due administration of any law of the United States. You will probably experience no difficulty in understanding and applying this part of the law. As to what constitutes an obstruction—it was, many years ago decided by Mr. Justice Washington, that, to support an indictment under this law, it was not necessary to prove that the accused used, or even threatened active violence. Any obstruction to the free action of the officer, or his lawful assistants, wilfully placed in his or their way, for the purpose of thus obstructing him, or them, is sufficient. And it is clear, that, if a multitude of persons should assemble, even in a public highway, with the design to stand together and thus prevent the officer from passing freely along the way, in the execution of his precept, and the officer should thus be hindered or obstructed, this would, of itself, and without any active violence, be such an obstruction as is contemplated by this law. If to this be added, use of any active violence, then the officer is not only obstructed, but he is resisted and opposed, and of course the offence is complete, for either of them is sufficient to constitute it.

If you should be satisfied that an offence against this law has been perpetrated, you will then inquire by whom? and this renders it necessary for me to instruct you concerning the kind and amount of participation which brings individuals within the compass of this law.

And first, all who are present and actually obstruct, resist, or oppose, are of course guilty. So are all who are present, leagued in the common design, and so situated as to be able, in case of need, to afford assistance to those actually engaged, though they do not actually obstruct, resist, or oppose. If they are present for the purpose of affording assistance in obstructing, resisting, or opposing the officers, and are so situated as to be able, in any event which may occur, actually to aid in the common design, though no overt act is done by them, they are still guilty under this law. The offence defined by this act is a misdemeanor; and it is a rule of law, that whatever participation in a case of felony, would render a person guilty, either as a principal in the second degree, or as an accessory before the fact, does, in a case of misdemeanor, render him guilty as a principal; in misdemeanors all are principals. And therefore, in pursuance of the same rule, not only those who are present, but those who, though absent when the offence was committed, did procure, counsel, command, or abet others to commit the offence, are indictable as principals. Such is the law, and it would seem that no just mind could doubt its propriety. If persons having influence over others, use that influence to induce the commission of crime, while they themselves remain at a safe distance, that must be deemed a very imperfect system of law which allows them to escape with impunity. Such is not our law. It treats such advice as criminal, and subjects the giver of it to punishment, according to the nature of the offence to which his pernicious counsel has led. If it be a case of felony, he is by the common law an accessory before the fact, and by the laws of the United States and of this state is punishable to the same extent as the principal felon. If it be a case of misdemeanor, the adviser is himself a principal offender and is to be indicted and punished as if he himself had done the criminal act. It may be important for you to know, what in point of law, amounts to such an advising or counselling another as will be sufficient to constitute this legal element in the offence. It is laid down by high authority that though a mere tacit acquiescence, or words, which amount to a bare permission, will not be sufficient, yet such a procurement may be, either by direct means, as by hire, counsel, or command, or indirect, by evincing an express liking, approbation, or assent to another's criminal design. From the nature of the case the law can prescribe only general rules on this subject. My instruction to you is, that language addressed to persons who immediately afterwards commit an offence, actually intended by the speaker to incite those addressed to commit it, and adapted thus to incite them, is such a counselling or advising to the crime as the law contemplates, and the person so inciting others is liable to be indicted as a principal.

In the case of Com. v. Bowen, 13 Mass. 359, which was an indictment for counselling another to commit suicide, tried in 1816, Chief Justice Parker, instructing the jury, and speaking for the supreme court of Massachusetts, said: "The government is not bound to prove that Jewett would not have hung himself, had Bowen's counsel never reached his ear. The very act of advising to the commission of a crime is of itself unlawful. The presumption of law is that advice has the influence and effect intended by the adviser, unless it is shown to have been otherwise; as that the counsel was received with scoff, or was manifestly rejected and ridiculed at the time it was given. It was said in the argument, that Jewett's abandoned and depraved character furnishes ground to believe that he would have committed the act without such advice from Bowen. Without doubt he was a hardened and depraved wretch; but it is in man's nature to revolt at self-destruction. When a person is predetermined upon the commission of this crime, the reasonable admonitions of a discreet and respected friend would probably tend to overthrow his determination. On the other hand, the counsel of an unprincipled wretch, stating the heroism and courage the self-murderer displays, might induce, encourage, and fix the intention, and ultimately procure the perpetration of the dreadful deed; and if other men would be influenced by such advice, the presumption is that Jewett was so influenced. He might have been influenced by many powerful motives to destroy himself. Still the inducements might have been insufficient to procure the actual commission of the act, and one word of additional advice might have turned the scale."

When applied, as this ruling seems to have been here applied, to a case in which the advice was nearly connected in point of time, with the criminal act, it is, in my opinion, correct. If the advice was intended by the giver, to stir or incite to a crime, if it was of such a nature as to be adapted to have this effect, and the persons incited immediately afterwards committed that crime, it is a just presumption that they were influenced by the advice or incitement to commit it. The circumstances or direct proof may, or may not, be sufficient to control this presumption; and whether they are so, can duly be determined in each case, upon all its evidence.

One other rule of law on this subject is necessary to be borne in mind. The substantive offence to which the advice or incitement applied must have been committed; and it is for that alone the adviser or procurer is legally accountable. Thus if one should counsel another to rescue one prisoner, and he should rescue another, unless by mistake; or if the incitement was to rescue a prisoner, and he commit a larceny, the inciter is not responsible. But it need not appear that the precise time, or place, or means advised, were used. Thus if one incite A. to murder B., but advise him to wait until B. shall be at a certain place at noon, and A. murders B. at a different place in the morning, the adviser is guilty. So if the incitement be to poison, and the murderer shoots, or stabs. So if the counsel be to beat another, and he is beaten to death, the adviser is a murderer; for having incited another to commit an unlawful act, he is responsible for all that ensues upon its execution. These illustrations are drawn from cases of felonies, because they are the most common in the books and the most striking in themselves; but the principles on which they depend are equally applicable to cases of misdemeanor. In all such cases, the real question is, whether the accused did procure, counsel, command, or abet the substantive offence committed. If he did, it is of no importance that his advice or directions were departed from in respect to the time, or place, or precise mode or means of committing it.

Gentlemen,—the events which have recently occurred in this city, have rendered it my duty to call your attention to these rules of law, and to direct you to inquire whether in point of fact the offence of obstructing process of the United States has been committed; if it has, you will present for trial, all such persons as have so participated therein as to be guilty of that offence. And you will allow me to say to you that if you or I were to begin to make discriminations between one law and another, and say this we will enforce and that we will not enforce, we should not only violate our oaths, but so far as in us lies, we should destroy the liberties of our country, which rest for their basis upon the great principle that our country is governed by laws constitutionally enacted, and not by men. In one part of our country the extradition of fugitives from labor is odious; in another, if we may judge from some transactions, the law concerning the extradition of fugitives from justice has been deemed not binding; in another still, the tariff laws of the United States were considered oppressive, and not fit to be enforced. Who can fail to see that the government would cease to be a government if it were to yield obedience to these local opinions? While it stands, all its laws must be faithfully executed, or it becomes the mere tool of the strongest faction of the place and the hour. If forcible resistance to one law should be permitted practically to repeal it, the power of the mob would inevitably become one of the constituted authorities of the state, to be used against any law or any man obnoxious to the interests and passions of the worst or most excited part of the community; and the peaceful and the weak would be at the mercy of the violent. It is the imperative duty of all of us concerned in the administration of the laws, to see to it that they are firmly, impartially, and certainly applied to every offence, whether a particular law be by us individually approved or disapproved. And it becomes all to remember, that forcible and concerted resistance to any law is civil war, which can make no progress but through bloodshed, and can have no termination but the destruction of the government of our country, or the ruin of those engaged in such resistance. It is not my province to comment on events which have recently happened. They are matters of fact, which, so far as they are connected with the criminal laws of the United States, are for your consideration. I feel no doubt that, as good citizens and lovers of our country, and as conscientious men, you will well and truly observe and keep the oath you have taken, diligently to inquire and true presentment make of all crimes and offences against the laws of the United States given you in charge.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[1 Deady, 657.]

District Court, D. Oregon. March 1, 1869.

FRAUDS UPON THE REVENUE—COUNTERFEITING THE CURRENCY—VIOLATIONS OF POSTAL LAWS—CORRUPTION AND INTIMIDATION OF JURIES.

DEADY, District Judge (charging grand jury). You have been selected from among the body of your fellow citizens to inquire concerning the commission of crimes against the United States, within the district of Oregon. A more delicate and important trust you could not be called upon to fill. Upon the proper discharge of your duties depends the stability of government and the purity of its administration. Your official oath is a sufficient direction as to your general duties. By this you have become bound under the most solemn obligations to present no one from hatred, envy or ill-will, and to leave no one unpresented through fear, favor or affection. This oath binds you to make diligent inquiry, as well as to present truly. You cannot acquit yourself of this obligation by slight or careless investigation. It is not enough that you dispose of the cases laid before you by the district attorney, or one of your own number. Your power and duty authorize and require of you to make special inquiry for yourselves as to the violations of law throughout the district. Except by the consent of twelve of your members, no person can be put upon trial in this court on a criminal charge. You are a shield to protect the weak and innocent from false and unjust charges, and a power able to accuse the guilty, be they ever so great or popular.

In respect to the manner and extent of your inquiries, your own good sense will be your best guide. You ought only to act upon legal evidence, or what satisfies you that the legal evidence exists. The party accused, or concerning whom an inquiry is made, has no right to be heard before you, and you should not allow him in the jury room, or to be examined as a witness in his own behalf. The district attorney will be ready to assist you in your inquiries, and give you information upon matters of law. You may also at any time come into court, and propound such inquiries concerning the business before you as you see proper. If you have any reason to believe that any officers of the government possess information proper for your action, you should summon them before you, and examine them thoroughly. Officers connected with the assessment and collection of internal revenue may with special propriety be thus examined.

Upon the three subjects of internal revenue, counterfeiting and the postoffice, I will give you in charge the following, from the charge delivered by Chief Justice Chase, to the United States grand jury for West Virginia, in August last: "The first of these is the faithful execution of the internal revenue laws. The war in which the nation has been recently engaged for the preservation of the national Union and government endangered by rebellion, made the contracting of a large debt inevitable. This debt is the price of our national existence, and binds irrevocably the good faith of the people. Its inviolable obligation has been recognized by a solemn act of the nation in adopting the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States, which declares that the 'validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for the payment of bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned.' There are differences of opinion as to the mode of payment required by the contracts of the American people made through their government; but nobody questions openly, if anybody questions at all, that the debt contracted must be paid, and paid in perfect good faith. The law of the amendment that the validity of the national debt shall not be questioned was already written upon the hearts of the people before they made it part of the constitution. To provide for the reduction and final payment of this debt, and for the annual expenses of the government, taxes are necessarily imposed. In other words, the equal proportion to be contributed by each citizen is ascertained by law. He who withholds his just proportion deprives the rest of the people of exactly the amount withheld. His fraud operates as theft. The sum total necessary to meet the obligations of the nation must be raised. Fraud upon the revenue does not reduce that sum; it merely shifts the burdens evaded by the fraudulent, upon others, who pay their full proportion besides. All honest men, therefore, have a common cause against the dishonest. You, gentlemen, represent the honest men, and it is your duty to see that no defrauder of the revenue who can be brought to justice escapes merited punishment. The higher in office and the higher in social position the delinquent may be, the more unremitting and searching should be your diligence in inquiry and presentment. Some of the observations just made might be properly enough repeated upon the next topic to which I must invite your attention. I refer to counterfeiting. It is to be regretted that the currency of the country now consists wholly, or almost wholly, of paper; but it is not the less important on that account that the people should be protected, as far as possible, against counterfeiting. Whatever the currency of the country may be, payments must be made in it, and exchanges effected through it. It is practically the common measure of values. Whoever imposes a counterfeit dollar on the public, robs successively all who take it in payment. Counterfeiting is continuous robbery, and it robs chiefly those who are the least able to bear the loss. Occasionally men are defrauded by counterfeit money in large transactions; but the principal sufferers are laboring men, whom it is the peculiar duty of government to protect from wrong. You will be vigilant, gentlemen, in your investigations concerning this class of crimes. What remains to be said concerns offences against the postoffice laws. Under our benignant system of government, the means of cheap and frequent intercourse between the most distant parts of the republic are provided; relatives and friends separated by the breadth of the continent correspond freely with each other. Correspondence is nearly as cheap as talk. And not only do the mails convey messages of affection, science, and business, but they are also the agents of immense pecuniary transactions, by remittances of bills of exchange and small government money orders. You see at once how important it is that the laws which regulate this vast interchange should be faithfully executed; and we are confident that nothing more is needed to insure your best endeavors to detect and bring to justice all those whose crimes and offences deprive the people of the great benefits which those laws are intended to secure." [Case No. 18,249.]

Before closing, I feel bound to call your attention to some supposed offences against public justice in this district, which, if true, should not go unpunished. By the second section of the act of March 2, 1831 (4 Stat. 483), it is enacted that: "If any person or persons shall corruptly, or by threats or force, endeavor to influence, intimidate, or impede any juror * * * in any court of the United States, in the discharge of his duty, or shall corruptly, or by threats or force, obstruct or impede the due administration of justice therein, every person or persons so offending shall be liable to prosecution therefor, by indictment, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine, not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding three months, or both, according to the nature and aggravation of the offence." To endeavor to corruptly influence a juror in the discharge of his duty, is a crime which strikes at the very foundation of civil society. A verdict which is produced or prevented by any other means than the proper and natural effect of the law and evidence given in court, is a falsehood and a wrong, the evil consequences of which are enduring and not limited to the parties immediately interested. With honest and fearless juries, protected from the corrupting influences and misleading misrepresentations of unscrupulous and interested parties, all other forms of crime against society and individuals may be successfully combated and repressed. But so soon as it is understood in the community that jurors or juries may be tampered with by outside parties with impunity, then there is an end of an honest administration of the law, by jury trial, and the country will speedily drift into anarchy or despotism. Any improper attempt to influence a juror is forbidden by this statute. Of course it is improper to offer a juror any valuable thing or consideration to obtain a verdict, or prevent one being found, or to influence his opinion or action in any particular. It is also improper and criminal to endeavor to influence a juror by conveying or imparting information to him out of the jury box, for the purpose of affecting his conduct or judgment, or to endeavor to persuade him by arguments or appeals of any kind, except those addressed to him by counsel in open court.

It has been bruited abroad, that such practices have been resorted to for the purpose of influencing the action of jurors in this court, in a criminal case of great importance, lately tried herein. It is your duty to investigate the matter thoroughly, and if you find cause, present the offending parties for trial. I also deem it proper in this connection to warn you against hasty and inconsiderate action in the premises. At the same time, I repeat, that it is your bounden duty, to probe this matter to the bottom, and present the offending parties, if any, for trial. If such evil practices are tolerated by the grand jury, unscrupulous men will engage in the manipulation of juries as a trade, and then whether a party accused of a crime is convicted or acquitted, will depend more than anything else upon the skill and influence of the "jury-broker," whom he may chance to retain to manage the case on the outside for him. We often boast of our high civilization and not infrequently deplore the ignorance and barbarism of our ancestors. But as a means of determining the guilt or innocence of the accused, the ancient wager of battle was quite as trustworthy as such a jury trial, and much less demoralizing to the community at large.

Case No. 18,252.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[2 Hughes, 518.]¹

Circuit Court, D. West Virginia. Aug., 1870.

ELECTIONS AND VOTERS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 1870.

[1. The act of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 140), to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states of the Union, which provides, in section 1, that "all citizens of the United States, who are otherwise qualified to vote by the laws of the states in which they live, shall be entitled to and allowed to vote at all elections, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," is not unconstitutional on the ground of discriminating between different classes of citizens. The words, "without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," are general terms, descriptive in character, and are not restricted, and do not limit the preceding words, which apply to all citizens otherwise qualified to vote.]

[2. Under section 2 of that act, which relates to registration of voters, any officer having charge of the registration of voters under the state laws, who "refuses or knowingly omits to give full effect to the law," by placing the name of any citizen on the list of voters, who applies for registration, and who is entitled under the state constitution and laws to be registered as a voter, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and is liable to a criminal prosecution, as well as to a civil action by the party aggrieved.]

JACKSON, District Judge (charging grand jury). Congress at its last session passed an act, the title of which is "to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states of this Union, and for other purposes." Under the ninth section of the law, the circuit courts of the United States, "with a view to afford reasonable protection to all persons in their constitutional right to vote, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," and for "the prompt discharge of the duties of this act," are required "from time to time to increase the number of commissioners, so as to afford a speedy and convenient means for the arrest and examination of persons charged with a violation of this (the) act." During the late term of the circuit court, upon application made to it, some additional commissioners were appointed under the act for the purposes specified in it. Information has reached this court that, under and by virtue of its provisions, several persons have been arrested charged with a violation of it, and, after examination by the commissioners, have been held to answer indictments to be preferred against them at this term of the court. It therefore becomes your duty to investigate the charges preferred against the parties who are recognized to answer, and at the same time it is my duty to expound the law under which you are to act. This act, from its supposed political importance, has, as I am aware, been the subject of considerable discussion, and, as is usual under such circumstances, various interpretations have been placed upon it. It is to be regretted that a public law which was so likely to receive judicial construction and interpretation as the one under consideration, should become the subject of heated partisan discussion before it had received the calm and deliberate consideration of the judicial mind, to which we must always look for the proper legal interpretation and construction of the law. It has been suggested that some of the sections of this law are unconstitutional, for the reason, as it is supposed, that they make a discrimination in favor of one class of our citizens, affording protection to them alone. In the view that I take of this act, I think no such discrimination has been made in favor of any class, and I am inclined, without entering upon a full discussion of the objections raised to some of its provisions at this time, to maintain its validity, and shall therefore proceed to give you the views of the court in relation to it.

It is a general principle quite familiar to the legal profession that, in giving construction to a public statute, it is the duty of the court to ascertain the meaning and intention of its framers from the words employed and the matter to which it relates, and so to construe and interpret it as to give effect to all the words used when not inconsistent with the object expressed. And while this principle of law is unquestioned, it is equally true that, when the intent of a statute is plain, nothing is left to construction, and it is the duty of the court to interpret it according to its positive and explicit provisions. Testing this act of congress by the principles just stated, let us ascertain, if possible, what was the design and intention of congress in its adoption. From an examination of its various sections, it is evident that its framers had primarily three objects in view: First, to promote the public good by preserving the rights of the citizens, in requiring all citizens, whether officers of the law or not, to respect the rights of each and every person in the enjoyment and exercise of the right of suffrage, "without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Second, to prevent evil-disposed persons from unlawfully interfering or intimidating the officers of the law in the discharge of their official duties in protecting the integrity and purity of elections. Third, to prevent any one from holding office under the government who is disqualified by reason of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution. That the act was framed for more than one purpose is evident from the title itself, which is to "enforce the right of citizens to vote," as well as "for other purposes."

At this time it is only necessary to consider the act so far as applicable to the first two objects named. And here it becomes a pertinent inquiry to ascertain who is entitled under this act to exercise the right of suffrage, or, in the language of the act, who is "qualified by law to vote at any election by the people in this state?" An answer to this question necessarily involves the consideration of the first section, and, as preliminary to it, I assume that all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to its jurisdiction, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside, whether white or colored. The first section declares in plain terms "that all citizens of the United States, who are otherwise qualified to vote by the laws of the state in which they live, shall be entitled to and allowed to vote at all elections, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." This section provides who shall exercise the right of suffrage, imposing no limitation upon the laws of the state, except that no citizen shall be disfranchised on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The words, "without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," are general terms, descriptive in their character, and are not restrictive, and do not limit the preceding words, "all citizens of the United States who are or shall be otherwise qualified to vote in any election by the people in any state." The language employed is plain, and affirms "that all citizens otherwise qualified to vote" shall not be denied the right for the reason just assigned. Whilst the primary object of this section seems to be intended to destroy all distinction between white and colored citizens, so far as the ballot is concerned, by placing them on the same equality in the exercise of the right of suffrage, yet it also in substance declares that "all citizens," who are by the laws of the state qualified to vote, shall exercise that right, but that none of them shall be prevented from the exercise of it by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It follows, therefore, that "all citizens" who are entitled to vote under the constitution and laws of the state are "protected in the exercise of the right of suffrage under this section of the law." Whilst the first section declares who shall use the ballot, the second is intended to protect the voter in the exercise of that right, by securing to "all citizens," whether white or colored, who, by the terms of the first section, are entitled to vote, a fair and impartial registration, when registration is a "prerequisite or qualification for voting." It declares that where "any act is or shall be required to be done as a prerequisite or qualification for voting by the constitution and laws of any state," the persons or officers who are charged with the performance of (such) duties in furnishing to citizens "an opportunity to perform such prerequisite or to become qualified to vote," shall give to "all citizens of the United States" the same and equal opportunity to perform such prerequisite, and to become qualified to vote, and that no citizen shall be denied "the same and equal opportunity to perform such prerequisite, and to become qualified to vote" because "of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The language here employed is positive and explicit, and I see no occasion to resort to any legal rules to aid the court in giving the interpretation of or construction to this section. The object of this section is evident, and clearly means that any officer having charge of the registration of voters under the laws of the state, who "refuses or knowingly omits to give full effect to the law," by placing the name of any citizen on the list of voters who applies for registration, and is entitled under the constitution and laws of the state to be registered as a voter, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and is liable to a criminal prosecution as well as to a civil action to the party aggrieved. The last clause of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States provides that no one shall be denied the equal protection of the law. In framing this act congress must have had this provision of the constitution in view. It cannot be supposed that it would escape their attention. It must therefore be conceded that all citizens are under the fundamental law of the land entitled to equal privileges, and the equal protection of the law. The latter right is embraced by the very words of the amendment. It is incredible to suppose that congress intended by the passage of this act to do so vain a thing as to enact a law purely for the benefit of one class of citizens, to the manifest neglect and prejudice of another, thus attempting by legislation to deprive them of the equal privileges and the equal protection of the law, as guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment. If such is its true construction, it would be clearly in conflict with this amendment to the constitution of the United States.

If I am right in the view I have just presented, it follows that no doubt can exist in the minds of any one as to the proper construction of the first and second sections, and that they were not intended, and do not discriminate in favor of any class of citizens. No right protected by our common constitution is held more sacred and dear to the citizen than the right of suffrage, and it cannot be supposed that congress, in enacting a law for the protection of the rights of those who were enfranchised by the fifteenth amendment, would at the same time so frame the law as to secure protection alone to that class of citizens, leaving nine-tenths of the population of the entire country unprotected by its provisions. The third section makes provision for the exercise of the right of suffrage where any citizen has by reason of the wrongful act or omission of the persons or officers charged with the duty of receiving or permitting the performance or the offer to perform any act, which by the laws of the state is required to be done as a prerequisite to qualify or entitle such citizen to vote, by declaring that "the offer of any citizen to perform the act required to be done by the constitution and laws of the state as a prerequisite to qualify or entitle him to vote, being otherwise qualified to vote, shall be deemed and held in law as a performance of such act, and entitle him to vote in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had in fact performed such act, by requiring the officer holding the election to receive and give effect to the vote of such citizen upon the presentation by him of his affidavit, stating the time and place of the offer to perform the required act, and the name of the officer who wrongfully prevented him from performing the necessary prerequisite to vote." It will be perceived that the object of this section is not only to give relief to the voter who is wrongfully deprived of his right to register, when registration is a prerequisite and a qualification to voting, by providing a mode of voting in such cases, but to furnish a remedy against the exercise of arbitrary power upon the part of the persons and officers who have charge of and conduct the elections. Under this section it is clearly the duty of all persons and officers who have charge of the registration of voters, to permit every person who can comply with the laws of the state, where they propose to vote, to register, and if they omit or refuse any citizen who applies for registration, and can comply with the laws of the state regulating the same, then it is the duty of the officer holding the election, upon such citizen presenting himself at the polls with an affidavit of the facts, to receive his vote. This section, unlike the two preceding sections, which inhibit a discrimination against the colored citizen on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, makes no exception or qualification whatever. It must, however, be construed in connection with them, "in pari materia," and by this means we ascertain beyond all question what is the meaning of the preceding sections, and when so ascertained it must govern the construction of them. Adopting this rule of construction, the third section clearly qualifies the two first sections, and indicates their meaning by declaring "that all persons who offer to perform or do perform the necessary prerequisite to qualify or entitle them to exercise the right of suffrage shall vote, upon presenting themselves with the affidavit required by the law." Its provisions are mandatory, constituting those who offer to vote under it the sole judge of their right to do so, leaving the officers, who are ministerial, and in no wise judicial, the exercise of no discretion whatever. Being comprehensive in its terms, it embraces all classes of citizens, preserving alike the rights of all and furnishing a like remedy for all in assertion of their rights, by imposing severe penalties for an omission or refusal to comply with its provisions. The fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sections are in harmony with the preceding sections, furnishing additional safeguards and remedies to the citizen by punishing all "who oppose by any unlawful means his registration, or the exercise of the right of suffrage, or who band or conspire against him to prevent him from the exercise of all his rights and privileges granted or secured to him by the constitution and laws of the United States." I deem it unnecessary to call your attention at this time to any other provisions of this act, except to the nineteenth and twentieth sections, which have for their object, as I have heretofore indicated, the preservation of the integrity and purity of elections and the punishment of all unlawful interference with them, by securing a proper registration of voters as well as protecting the voter in freely exercising the right of suffrage at any election for representatives or delegates to the congress of the United States, which by the laws are to take place at the ensuing election. The nineteenth section secures to any qualified voter of the state the free exercise of the right of suffrage, and inhibits the commission of a number of offences, amongst which is illegal voting and the interference in any manner with any officer of said elections in the discharge of his duties. The twentieth section seems to be somewhat confused. I think, by some means, some two or three lines in relation to voting have been interpolated into it unnoticed, and which I do not regard as germane to its leading object. It is evident that the whole scope of this section was intended to be confined to the subject of registration. It provides for the punishment of any person who "shall knowingly personate and register or attempt to register in the name of another person, or who shall fraudulently register or attempt to register, or do any unlawful act to secure the same for himself or another person, or who shall prevent any person, by any unlawful means, from duly exercising the right of registration, or who shall induce any officer of registration, by any unlawful means, knowingly and wilfully to register one not entitled to it, or knowingly and wilfully to refuse to register one entitled to it, or shall aid, counsel, or advise any voter or officer to do or omit any act," the commission or omission of which is inhibited by this section. A careful examination of the nineteenth section must satisfy every one that its main object is to protect every qualified voter in the exercise of the right of suffrage, whilst it is just as clear that the chief purpose of the twentieth section is to secure to all qualified voters the right of registration, as well as to punish fraudulent registration. It also secures protection to all officers of registration in the legal discharge of their duties by punishing all persons who unlawfully interfere in any manner with them. It is obvious that congress, by the passage of this act, intended to enter the states for the purpose of maintaining as near as possible the purity of elections, in securing to every qualified voter under the law of the state the right to register, when the same is a qualification to voting, as also the free exercise of the right of suffrage. This act does not repeal or interfere with the laws as they exist in the states, unless they are in conflict with its plain provisions, and then only so far as such conflict exists. It is remedial in its character, and is supposed to be in harmony with the laws of the state, intended, however, to furnish full and adequate protection to all qualified voters when the state laws are inadequate, by enforcing their right to vote. It is, therefore, the duty of all officers under it to enforce its provisions firmly, exercising, however, the greatest caution and prudence, inasmuch as they may be called on to deal with officers executing laws under the authority of the state.

They should be fully satisfied that the case of an applicant is meritorious, and not frivolous. Upon the hearing of any case, if they have any doubt as to the commission of an offence under the law, they should discharge the party. At the same time the state officers should remember that the constitution and laws of the United States are the supreme and paramount laws of the land, and they must be governed by them in the discharge of their duties, under the laws of the state, whenever a conflict exists between them. I presume that most of the difficulties that have occurred with "registrars" acting under the laws of the state, arise from the fact that they suppose they are invested with the exercise of a discretion in the execution of them. It is not important to determine whether they are so invested with the exercise of such discretion, as the third section of this act, if such discretion exists under the state law, qualifies the state law by taking away from the officer acting under it all discretion affecting the rights of citizens in the exercise of the right of suffrage. It imposes severe penalties against any officer of election "whose duty it is to receive, correct, certify, register, report, or give effect to the vote of any citizen," for refusing or omitting to perform any one of the duties thus enumerated, if the citizen who proposes to exercise the right of suffrage shall have complied with the requirements of the law. In the discharge of my official duty to you on this occasion, I have directed your attention to the leading features of the law. In the examination and investigation of the cases that have been referred to you by the United States commissioners for your action, it is your imperative duty under the law to find presentments against all persons who have violated any of its provisions. Whilst it is your duty on the one hand to afford protection to every citizen in the free exercise of the right of suffrage, a right which American citizens hold so dear, and next to the protection of their lives and liberty they prize and value so highly, by enforcing the law against all persons who violate their rights under it, on the other hand it is equally your duty to protect all officers in the lawful discharge and performance of their duties under the law, from any unlawful interference with them. Commissioners of the United States who are acting under this law in the proper discharge of their duties are entitled by the law to the fullest protection. They are invested with powers of a most plenary character. But whilst this is true, this court will expect them to confine themselves in their action under the law to its letter and spirit, and under no circumstance to exceed it, as it will be both its duty and pleasure to remove any commissioner for improper conduct in the discharge of his official duties.

Case No. 18,253.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[1 Newb. 323.]

District Court, E. D. Louisiana, Nov., 1846.

SHIPPING—PUBLIC REGULATIONS—NEGLIGENCE IN RESPECT TO STEAM VESSELS.

[The twelfth section of the act of 1838 (5 Stat. 304), which declares that every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on board of any steam vessel, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to duty the lives of any persons on board may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, makes the negligence, etc., in question a crime, when followed by the consequences named, without regard to the question of motive or intent on the part of the persons charged.]

McCALEB, District Judge (charging grand jury). I deem it my duty to call your serious attention to the provisions of the act of congress of 1838, relating to "the better security of lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam." To give you a clear understanding of your duty under that act of congress it will be necessary for me to notice briefly its requirements, and to direct your attention particularly to the offences which come within the criminal jurisdiction of this court, and towards which, therefore, your inquiries are to be solemnly directed. The first section of the act requiring a new enrollment and license, it is not necessary at this time to consider. The second section declares that it shall not be lawful for the owner, master or captain of any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, to transport any merchandise or passengers upon the navigable waters of the United States, after the 1st of October, 1838, without having first obtained from the proper officer, a license under the existing laws, and without having complied with the conditions imposed by this act; and for every violation of this section, the owner of the vessel shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of five hundred dollars, one-half for the use of the informer; and for this sum the steamboat or vessel so engaged shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily, by way of libel, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offence. The third section of this act makes it the duty of the district judge of the United States, within whose district any ports of entry or delivery may be on the navigable waters, bays, lakes and rivers of the United States, upon the application of the master or owner of any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, to appoint from time to time, one or more persons skilled and competent to make inspections of such boats and vessels, and of the boilers and machinery employed in the same, who shall not be interested in the manufacture of steam engines, steamboat boilers or other machinery belonging to steam vessels, whose duty it shall be to make such inspection when called upon for that purpose, and to give to the owner or master of such boat or vessel duplicate certificates of such inspection; such persons before entering upon the duties enjoined by this act, are to take an oath well, faithfully and impartially to execute and perform the services herein required of them. The fourth section provides that the person or persons called upon to inspect the hull of a steamboat under the provisions of this act, shall after a thorough examination, give to the owner or master, a certificate in which shall be stated the age of the boat, when and where originally built, and the length of time the same had been running. The inspectors must also state whether in their opinion the boat is sound, and in all respects seaworthy, and fit to be used for the transportation of freight or passengers. The fifth section requires the inspectors to state in the certificate, after a thorough examination of the boilers and machinery, whether the same be sound and fit for use, and also the age of the boilers. Duplicates of these certificates are to be granted, one of which is to be posted up in some conspicuous part of the boat for the information of the public. The sixth section makes it the duty of the owners and masters of steamboats to cause the inspection provided under the fourth section, that is to say the inspection of the hulls of steamboats, to be made at least once in every twelve months; and the examination required by the fifth section, that is to say the examination of the boilers and the machinery, to be made at least once in every six months. And they are to deliver to the collector or surveyor of the port where their boats have been enrolled or licensed, the certificate of such inspection; and on failure thereof they are to forfeit the licenses and be subject to the same penalty as though they had run their boat without a license, to be recovered in like manner. And it is moreover the duty of owners and masters of steamboats licensed in pursuance of this act, to employ on board their respective boats a competent number of experienced and skillful engineers, and in case of neglect to do so they shall be held responsible for all damages to the property of any passenger of any boat, occasioned by an explosion of the boiler or any derangement of the engine or machinery of any boat. The seventh section declares that whenever the master of any steamboat, or person charged with navigating said boat, shall stop the motion or headway of said boat, or when she shall be stopped for the purpose of discharging or taking in cargo, fuel or passengers, he shall open the safety valve, so as to keep the steam down in the boiler as near as practicable to what it is when the boat is under headway, under the penalty of two hundred dollars for each and every offence. I pass over the eighth and ninth sections, which relate more immediately to the navigation of the northern lakes or the high seas. The tenth section makes it the duty of the master and owner of every steamboat running between sunset and sunrise, to carry one or more signal lights, that may be seen by other boats navigating the same waters, under the penalty of two hundred dollars. The eleventh section provides that the penalties imposed by this act, may be recovered in the name of the United States, in the district or circuit court of such district or circuit where the offence shall have been committed, or in which the owner or master of said vessel may reside, one-half to the use of the informer, and the other to the use of the United States; or the said penalties may be prosecuted for by indictment in either of the said courts. This last clause in the section, then, shows plainly the duty that devolves upon you as the grand inquest of this district. You are diligently to inquire and true presentment make of all such captains or owners of steamboats who may be found acting in defiance of the requirements of the law.

But it is to the twelfth section of this act that I desire to direct your most serious and solemn attention on the present occasion. It provides that every captain, engineer, pilot or other person employed on board of any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, by whose misconduct, negligence or inattention to his or their respective duties, the life or lives of any person or persons on board said vessel may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and, upon conviction thereof before any circuit court in the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labor for a period of not more than ten years. The frequent loss of human life in consequence of explosions of the boilers of steamboats, of collisions and the burning of steamboats on our western waters, and especially on the Mississippi river, imposes upon you the solemn duty of diligently inquiring into every case that may be brought before you or that may come under your cognizance. The strong arm of the law must be interposed to put an end if possible to these terrible disasters. The frightful loss of life and property annually sustained by our community from such causes, demands the utmost vigilance on the part of all who have any agency in the administration of criminal justice before this tribunal. The legislation of congress calls for prompt and energetic action. That legislation is wise and salutary. You have seen from the details through which we have gone, the solicitude exhibited by congress to prescribe every rule and regulation that was best calculated to insure security to life and property. This legislation was dictated by humanity, and it is to be hoped that no mawkish sensibility, no false notions of clemency may be interposed to screen those who may be shown to have been guilty of a violation of the law. There is a disposition in the public mind to take any representation having the semblance of plausibility as sufficient to exculpate an offender. There is a disposition to inquire whether wicked motives may have prompted the commission of the act, and in the absence of all supposed malice to conclude that there can be no guilt. The law, however, looks to the consequences of the act, and is utterly regardless of the purpose that may have prompted its commission. I wish you, gentlemen, to bear in mind that the twelfth section of the act of congress has nothing to do with the motives. It was designed to punish the captains, engineers and pilots of steamboats for their negligence or inattention. Whether there be malice or not, is a question which cannot be a subject of inquiry under the law. We may admit what doubtless generally is the fact, that when a boiler explodes or a collision takes place, there was no malice on the part of the officer of the boat, through whose negligence or inattention it occurred; still, if there be evidence to show that negligence or inattention, the officer is guilty in the eye of the law. We are not driven to the English common law to find out what constitutes manslaughter. The statute itself contains the definition of the crime, and it is unnecessary to look beyond it. That statute virtually says to the officers of steamboats who assume the solemn responsibility of transporting persons and property from one port to another: You shall attend strictly to the duty which you have, for a valuable consideration, assumed to perform. You shall observe abundant caution; you shall take all proper care that no disaster occurs which may result in the loss of life. It imposes upon the owners of steamboats the duty of employing intelligent and prudent captains. It imposes upon captains the duty of employing skillful, sober, prudent and attentive pilots and engineers. There is too much reason to believe that there has hitherto been a shameful remissness on the part of both owners and captains generally, in the performance of this duty; and those who from parsimonious motives have failed in their duty to the public, should be promptly made to feel the consequences of their criminal cupidity and their indifference to the rights of others. The only manner pointed out by the law by which owners can be made to suffer is by civil action for damages, as set forth in the last section of the act.

Gentlemen of the grand jury, it is in vain that the prosecuting officer of the government discharges his duty if you be not fully alive to the responsibility imposed upon you. Vigilance on your part will create a corresponding vigilance on the part of those against whose negligence and inattention the penalties of the law have been denounced. Let us hope that a salutary influence will be exerted by prompt and energetic action. Let us hope that the time will speedily come when there will be in the navigation of the Mississippi and her tributaries the same security to life and property which is enjoyed in other parts of the world. Let us hope that the time may soon come when we shall cease to have occasion to regard the stupendous invention of our great countryman Fulton, which has created such important revolutions in the commerce of the world, in any other light than as a blessing to mankind. To bring about this happy realization of our hopes, the officers of the law must be vigilant, the courts must be vigilant, the juries must do their duty firmly, fearlessly, regardless of all consequences. In a word, the wise, humane and salutary enactments of congress must be respected and enforced without fear or favor.

Case No. 18,254.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[2 Sawy. 663.]

District Court, D. Oregon. Nov. 4, 1873.

VIOLATION OF ELECTION LAWS—ACT OF MAY 30, 1870, ANALYZED AND EXPLAINED.

DEADY, District Judge (charging grand jury). An election has lately been held in this district for a representative in congress. It is publicly charged that numbers of persons voted at such election, illegally, and that others aided, counseled, procured or advised such votes to be so given. This being an election for an officer of the national government, congress has the power to make such laws to secure a fair and honest vote as may be necessary and convenient. Const. U. S. art. 1, § 4. In pursuance of this power, congress enacted section nineteen of the act of May 30, 1870. 16 Stat. 144.

By this section it is provided: "That if at any election for representative or delegate in the congress of the United States, any person shall knowingly: (1) Personate and vote, or attempt to vote in the name of any other person, whether living, dead, or fictitious; (2) vote more than once at the same election for any candidate for the same office; (3) vote at a place where he may not be lawfully entitled to vote; (4) vote without having a lawful right to vote; (5) do any unlawful act to secure a right or an opportunity to vote for himself or any other person; (6) by force, threat, menace, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer, or promise thereof, or otherwise unlawfully prevent any qualified voter of any state of the United States of America, or any territory thereof, from freely exercising the right of suffrage, or by any such means induce any voter to refuse to exercise such right; (7) compel or induce by any such means (see clause sixth) or otherwise, any officer of any election in any such state or territory to receive a vote from any person not legally qualified or entitled to vote; (8) interfere in any manner with any officer of said elections in the discharge of his duties; (9) by any of such means (see clause sixth) or other unlawful means, induce any officer of an election, or officer whose duty it is to ascertain, announce, or declare the result of any such election, or give or make any certificate, document, or evidence in relation thereto, to violate or refuse to comply with his duty, or any law regulating the same; (10) knowingly and willfully receive the vote of any person not entitled to vote, or refuse to receive the vote of any person entitled to vote; (11) aid, counsel, procure, or advise any such voter, person, or officer, to any act hereby made a crime, or to omit or do any duty the omission of which is hereby made a crime, or attempt to do so,—every such person shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and shall for such crime be liable to prosecution in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, and on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or both, in the discretion of the court, and shall pay the costs of the prosecution.”

By section twenty-one of the same act to vote or offer to vote a ballot at any election where a representative in congress is to be chosen, is prima facie evidence that the person voted, or attempted to vote for such representative. In this case, such would be the reasonable inference, in the absence of any such presumption of law, from the fact that no votes were authorized to be given or received for any other person than a candidate for representative.

The success of a government based upon universal suffrage and frequent elections, presupposes that the elector will give his vote upon considerations of public policy, and the fitness of the candidate for the office to be filled, and not otherwise.

When this condition of things ceases to be the rule, and votes are given or withheld by reason of “force, threat, menace, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer or promise thereof,” the days of the republic are numbered, and it will not be long ere it dies in its own stench.

A representative government, selected and sustained by the free and unpurchased votes of honest and intelligent citizens, is probably the most desirable state of civil society known to man; while on the other hand, such a government, resting upon and reflecting the result of corrupt and dishonest elections, is an organized anarchy, more intolerable and unjust than any other. It is the triumph of vice over virtue—the means by which “evil men bear sway.”

To preserve the purity of elections and thereby secure the integrity of congress, this law has been enacted. You have been chosen and sworn to enquire, among other things, if there has been any violation of it in this district. You cannot keep your oaths and neglect or overlook this duty. If you find that any one has voted more than once, or in the name of another, or at a place where he was not entitled to or anywhere without having a lawful right to do so, it is your duty to present him for trial. And further, if you find that any one has aided, counseled, procured or advised any one to do any of these unlawful acts, it is your duty to present such person for trial. The persons who procure or aid others to vote illegally are generally the worse of the two, and always the most dangerous to society.

To bring a case within the eleventh clause of this section as I have subdivided it, it is not necessary that the party should have hired or bribed another to vote illegally. It is equally a crime to counsel or advise the commission of such an act, or in any way to procure or aid it to be done.

But illegal votes are seldom given intentionally without a money consideration, or its equivalent, being at the bottom of the transaction.

The use of money in elections, particularly in the large towns and cities, is fast becoming a dangerous evil. If not prevented, our elections will in effect soon become what the election for an emperor was in the decline of Rome—a sale of the empire by the mercenaries of the Pretorian Guard to the highest bidder.

The use of money in elections, besides being in nine cases out of ten radically wrong and corrupt, imposes in the end a heavy and unjust tax upon the property and industry of the country.

By one indirection or another, through the acts and influence of those who are elected by this money, the public are compelled to return it with interest—often an hundred fold—to the persons who furnished it.

It may be said that this evil is confined to a few great cities, where ignorance, poverty and vice are used and abused for political purposes by rapacious and unscrupulous wealth.

But, judging from the statements of the press, and the common speech of men, there is ground to believe that for some years past the elections in portions of this state, and particularly in this city, have been materially influenced, if not actually controlled, by the use of money, expended to promote and produce illegal and dishonest voting. So late as the last session of the legislature, a distinguished member of that body was reported as saying on the floor of the house, that elections in Portland were controlled by the purchased votes of a rabble, who could be bought at $5 per head.

You, gentlemen, are supposed to represent the honest, law-abiding portion of the community, who only desire that our elections should be what the founders of the commonwealth intended—an authorized process of ascertaining the unbiased and honest opinion of the voters in relation to public men and measures.

To this end this law has been enacted by congress, and you have been called here to aid in its enforcement by presenting all persons for trial whom you may find to have violated it.

Present no persons through envy, hatred or malice. Weigh well the evidence produced before you. Do not allow yourselves to be made the means of accusing the innocent, or setting on foot a public prosecution in aid of one side or the other of a mere political or personal controversy.

Neither should you leave any person unprotected through fear, favor or affection. You should be vigilant and patient in your enquiries, and let no man escape a trial who is shown to have voted illegally, or counseled, or procured another to do so. Do justly—let the consequences be what they may, and you have discharged your duty.

Case No. 18,255.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[2 Sawy. 667.]¹

Circuit Court, D. California. Aug. 22, 1872.

FUNCTIONS AND POWERS OF GRAND JURY—LIMITATION ON POWER OF INVESTIGATION—PRESENTMENT AND INDICTMENT—OBLIGATION OF SECRECY.

[1. To justify the finding of an indictment, the grand jury must believe that the accused is guilty. They should be convinced that the evidence before them, unexplained and uncontradicted, would warrant a conviction by a petit jury.]

[2. A grand jury of the United States sitting in California has no such general authority to inspect the books of officers of the United States as is exercised by the grand juries of the state in relation to the books of the state officers.]

[3. A grand jury of the United States is limited, as to the scope of its investigations, (1) to such matters as may be called to its attention by the court; or (2) may be submitted by the district attorney; or (3) may come to the knowledge of the grand jurors in the course of their investigations of the matters thus brought before them, or from their own observations; or (4) may come to their knowledge from the disclosures of their associates on the grand jury. They should not allow private prosecutors to intrude themselves into their presence and present accusations.]

[4. Since the passage of the act of 1872 (17 Stat. 153), to prevent and punish the obstruction of the administration of justice in the federal courts, it is the duty of a federal grand jury to present any person who, in violation of this law, and for the purpose of influencing their action, sends to them any letter or communication relating to any matter pending before them, or pertaining to their duties, without a previous order of the court.]

[Cited in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 556, 4 Sup. Ct. 301; Ex parte Bain, 121 U. S. 10, 7 Sup. Ct. 786.]

[5. It is the duty of the grand jurors to keep their deliberations secret. They are not at liberty to state even that they have had a particular matter under consideration. They should allow no one to question them as to their own individual actions or the actions of their associates on the grand jury.]

[6. A presentment differs from an indictment in that it wants technical form, and is usually found by the grand jurors upon their own knowledge, or upon evidence before them, without having any bill from the public prosecutor. It is an informal accusation, to be regarded in the light of instructions upon which an indictment may be framed. This form of accusation has, however, fallen into disuse since the practice has prevailed for the prosecuting officer to attend the grand jury and advise them in their investigations.]

[7. The district attorney has a right to be present before the federal grand jury at the taking of testimony, for the purpose of giving information or advice, and may interrogate the witnesses; but he has no right to be present during the deliberations of the grand jury.]

At a term of the circuit court of the United States for the district of California, held at San Francisco on the 26th of August, 1872, a grand jury was empaneled, and to its foreman the following oath was administered: "You, as foreman of this inquest for the body of the district of California, do swear that you will diligently inquire, and true presentment make, of such articles, matters and things as shall be given you in charge, or otherwise come to your knowledge, touching the present service. The government's counsel, your fellows', and your own you shall keep secret; you shall present no one for envy, hatred or malice; neither shall you leave any one unpresented for fear, favor, affection, hope of reward or gain, but shall present all things truly as they come to your knowledge, according to the best of your understanding. So help you God!" Then to the rest of the grand jurors the following oath was administered: "The same oath which your foreman has taken on his part, you, and every one of you, shall well and truly observe on your part. So help you God!"

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and SAWYER, Circuit Judge.

FIELD, Circuit Justice, then charged the grand jury as follows:

You are summoned as grand jurors of the circuit court of the United States for the district of California, and the duties with which you are charged are of the highest importance to the due administration of justice. By the constitution of the United States, no person can be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger. No steps, therefore, can be taken, with the exceptions mentioned, for the prosecution of any crime of an infamous character—and under that designation the whole series of felonies is classed—beyond the arrest, examination and commitment of the party accused, until the grand jury have deliberated and acted upon the accusation. Your functions are, therefore, not only as already stated, important; they are indispensable to the administration of criminal justice.

The institution of the grand jury is of very ancient origin in the history of England; it goes back many centuries. For a long period its powers were not clearly defined; and it would seem, from the accounts of commentators on the laws of that country, that it was at first a body, which not only accused, but which also tried public offenders. However this may have been in its origin, it was, at the time of the settlement of this country, an informing and accusing tribunal only, without whose previous action no person charged with a felony could, except in certain special cases, be put upon his trial.² And in the struggles which at times arose in England between the powers of the king and the rights of the subject, it often stood as a barrier against persecution in his name; until, at length, it came to be regarded as an institution by which the subject was rendered secure against oppression from unfounded prosecutions of the crown.

In this country, from the popular character of our institutions, there has seldom been any contest between the government and the citizen, which required the existence of the grand jury as a protection against oppressive action of the government. Yet the institution was adopted in this country, and is continued from considerations similar to those which give to it its chief value in England, and is designed as a means, not only of bringing to trial persons accused of public offenses upon just grounds, but also as a means of protecting the citizen against unfounded accusation, whether it come from government or be prompted by partisan passion or private enmity. No person shall be required, according to the fundamental law of the country, except in the cases mentioned, to answer for any of the higher crimes, unless this body, consisting of not less than sixteen, nor more than twenty-three, good and lawful men, selected from the body of the district, shall declare, upon careful deliberation, under the solemnity of an oath, that there is good reason for his accusation and trial.

From these observations, it will be seen, gentlemen, that there is a double duty cast upon you as grand jurors of this district; one a duty to the government, or more properly speaking, to society, to see that parties against whom there is just ground to charge the commission of crime, shall be held to answer the charge; and on the other hand, a duty to the citizen to see that he is not subjected to prosecution upon accusations having no better foundation than public clamor or private malice.

The government has appointed the district attorney to represent its interest in the prosecution of parties charged with the commission of public offenses against the laws of the United States. He will, therefore, appear before you, and present the accusations which the government may desire to have considered by you. He will point out to you the laws which the government deems to have been violated; and will subpoena for your examination such witnesses as he may consider important, and also such other witnesses as you may direct.

In your investigations you will receive only legal evidence, to the exclusion of mere reports, suspicions and hearsay evidence. Subject to this qualification, you will receive all the evidence presented which may throw light upon the matter under consideration, whether it tend to establish the innocence or the guilt of the accused. And more: if, in the course of your inquiries, you have reason to believe that there is other evidence, not presented to you, within your reach, which would qualify or explain away the charge under investigation, it will be your duty to order such evidence to be produced. Formerly, it was held that an indictment might be found if evidence were produced sufficient to render the truth of the charge probable. But a different and a more just and merciful rule now prevails. To justify the finding of an indictment, you must be convinced, so far as the evidence before you goes, that the accused is guilty—in other words, you ought not to find an indictment unless, in your judgment, the evidence before you, unexplained and uncontradicted, would warrant a conviction by a petit jury.

² There were a few exceptional cases in England in which a party could be arraigned and tried for a felony without the previous action of a grand jury. Thus, in a case of death, a party could be arraigned upon the inquisition of a coroner's inquest. And where the verdict of a jury in a civil case necessarily involved a finding that the defendant was guilty of a public offense, he might sometimes be called upon to answer. Thus, in an action for taking away goods, if the jury found that they were taken feloniously, the verdict might be used as an indictment. So in an action of slander, in which the plaintiff was charged with a criminal offense, and the defendant justified, if the jury found that the justification was true, the plaintiff might be immediately put upon his trial for the crime alleged against him without the action of the grand jury. See 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 165.

How far you should proceed to inquire into other matters than such as are brought to your consideration by the government, through its prosecuting officer, the district attorney, has been a matter of much conflict of opinion among different judges.

Before giving our views upon this subject, it is proper to state that there is a wide difference between the powers and duties of grand juries of the state courts of California and of grand juries of the national courts.

By a statute of the state, grand juries of the state courts possess very great inquisitorial powers. They are required to inquire into the official misconduct of public officers of every description in their county, and are entitled to the examination of all its public records. They are bound by their oath to inquire into and presentment make of all public offenses against the laws of the state committed or triable in their county, of which they have, or "can obtain" legal evidence. In order to ascertain whether or not there has been any official misconduct in any public officer, they have, under the statute, authority to inspect all his books and records, and to subject him to a searching examination.

No such general authority to inspect the books of the officers of the United States, and to subject the officers themselves to examination in respect to the entries in those books, is possessed by the grand juries of the national courts. The exercise of such authority might prove of serious detriment to the public service, for it might interfere with the established system by which the accountability of the local officers of the United States to the executive departments at Washington is secured. You will readily perceive that an inspection by the grand jury, for instance, of the books of the collector of customs at this port, and requiring that officer to explain his entries and his conduct, often directed by private and confidential communications from those departments, might seriously embarrass the government in its action. So, too, embarrassment might follow from a similar inspection of the records and examination of other officers of the United States.

The examination of the books and accounts of the officers of the general government is provided for by law or by regulations of the executive departments. When on such examination the accounts are found to be unsatisfactory, and defects and delinquencies are discovered which render the officers liable to prosecution, civil or criminal, the proper instructions are given to the district attorney of the United States, and the matter is brought by him to the attention of the court or of the grand jury.

We return now to the inquiry as to what matters you can direct your investigation beyond those which are brought to your notice by the district attorney. Your oath requires you to diligently inquire, and true presentment make, "of such articles, matters and things as shall be given you in charge, or otherwise come to your knowledge touching the present service."

The first designation of subjects of inquiry are those which shall be given you in charge; this means those matters which shall be called to your attention by the court, or submitted to your consideration by the district attorney. The second designation of subjects of inquiry are those which shall "otherwise come to your knowledge touching the present service;" this means those matters within the sphere of and relating to your duties which shall come to your knowledge, other than those to which your attention has been called by the court or submitted to your consideration by the district attorney.

But how come to your knowledge?

Not by rumors and reports, but by knowledge acquired from the evidence before you, or from your own observations. Whilst you are inquiring as to one offense, another and a different offense may be proved, or witnesses before you may, in testifying, commit the crime of perjury.

Some of you, also, may have personal knowledge of the commission of a public offense against the laws of the United States, or of facts which tend to show that such an offense has been committed, or possibly attempts may be made to influence corruptly or improperly your action as grand jurors. If you are personally possessed of such knowledge, you should disclose it to your associates; and if any attempts to influence your action corruptly or improperly are made, you should inform them of it also, and they will act upon the information thus communicated as if presented to them in the first instance by the district attorney.

But unless knowledge is acquired in one of these ways, it cannot be considered as the basis for any action on your part.

We, therefore, instruct you that your investigations are to be limited: First, to such matters as may be called to your attention by the court; or, second, may be submitted to your consideration by the district attorney; or, third, may come to your knowledge in the course of your investigations into the matters brought before you, or from your own observations; or, fourth, may come to your knowledge from the disclosures of your associates.

You will not allow private prosecutors to intrude themselves into your presence, and present accusations. Generally such parties are actuated by private enmity, and seek merely the gratification of their personal malice.

If they possess any information justifying the accusation of the person against whom they complain, they should impart it to the district attorney, who will seldom fail to act in a proper case. But if the district attorney should refuse to act, they can make their complaint to a committing magistrate, before whom the matter can be investigated, and if sufficient evidence be produced of the commission of a public offense by the accused, he can be held to bail to answer to the action of the grand jury.

When the court does not deem the matter of sufficient importance to call your attention to it, and the district attorney does not think it expedient to submit the matter to your consideration, and the private prosecutor neglects to proceed before the committing magistrate, we think it may be safely inferred that public justice will not suffer, if the matter is not considered by you.

A preliminary examination of the accused before a magistrate, where he can meet his prosecutor face to face, and cross-examine him, and the witnesses produced by him, and have the benefit of counsel, is the usual mode of initiating proceedings in criminal cases, and is the one which presents to the citizen the greatest security against false accusations from any quarter. And this mode ought not to be departed from, except in those cases where the attention of the jury is directed to the consideration of particular offenses by the court, or by the district attorney, or the matter is brought to their knowledge in the course of their investigations, or from their own observations, or from disclosures made by some of their number.

We have been led, gentlemen, to give these instructions upon the nature of your duties and the limits to the sphere of your investigations, because an impression widely prevails that the institution of the grand jury has outlived its usefulness, an impression which has been created from a disregard of those limits, and the facility with which it has, unfortunately, often been used as an instrument for the gratification of private malice.

There has hardly been a session of the grand jury of this court for years, at which instances have not occurred of personal solicitation to some of its members to obtain or prevent the presentment or indictment of parties. And communications to that end have frequently been addressed to the grand jury filled with malignant and scandalous imputations upon the conduct and acts of those against whom the writers entertained hostility, and against the conduct and acts of former and present officers of this court, and of previous grand juries of this district.

All such communications are calculated to prevent and obstruct the due administration of justice, and to bring the proceedings of the grand jury into contempt. "Let any reflecting man," says a distinguished judge, "be he layman or lawyer, consider the consequences which would follow, if every individual could at his pleasure throw his malice or his prejudice into the grand jury room, and he will of necessity conclude that the rule of law which forbids all communications with grand juries, engaged in criminal investigations, except through the public instructions of courts, and the testimony of sworn witnesses, is a rule of safety to the community. What value could be attached to the doings of a tribunal so to be approached and influenced? How long would a body, so exposed to be misled and abused, be recognized by freemen as among the chosen ministers of liberty and security? The recognition of such a mode of reaching grand juries would introduce a flood of evils, disastrous to the purity of the administration of criminal justice, and subversive of all public confidence in the action of these bodies." Judge King, of Philadelphia, in Com. v. Crans [2 Clark, 172].

At its last session congress passed a stringent act to prevent the continuance of this pernicious practice, as well as to prevent any attempt to influence the administration of justice corruptly or by the intimidation of jurors. It is entitled "An act to prevent and punish the obstruction of the administration of justice in the courts of the United States." It enacts "that if any person or persons shall corruptly, or by threats or force, or by threatening letters, or any threatening communications, endeavor to influence, intimidate, or impede any grand or petit jury or juror of any court of the United States in the discharge of his or their duty, or shall corruptly or by threats or force, or by threatening letters, or any threatening communications, influence, obstruct or impede, or endeavor to influence, obstruct or impede the due administration of justice therein, such person or persons so offending shall be liable to prosecution therefor by indictment, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, according to the aggravation of the offense." And it also enacts, that "if any person or persons shall attempt to influence the action or decision of any grand or petit juror upon any issue or matter pending before such juror, or before the jury of which he is a member, or pertaining to his or their duties, by writing or sending to him any letter or letters, or any communication in print or in writing in relation to such issue or matter, without the order previously obtained of the court before which the said juror is summoned, such person or persons so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to prosecution therefor by indictment or information, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, according to the aggravation of the offense."

You thus perceive that congress intends that in the investigation of public offenses you shall be secure from intimidation or personal influence of every kind.

The distinguished judge whom I have already quoted observes that, "into every quarter of the globe in which the Anglo Saxon race have formed settlements, they have carried with them this time-honored institution, ever regarding it with the deepest veneration, and connecting its perpetuity with that of civil liberty." And congress has designed by the act in question, that this high character of your body shall not be lessened. If, therefore, in violation of this law, to influence your action or decision, any letter or communication in print or writing relating to any issue or matter pending before you, or pertaining to your duties is sent to you without the previous order of the court, a case will arise coming to your knowledge, within the principle already stated, and it will be your duty, upon that knowledge to indict or present the offending party. It will, also, be your duty to preserve and deliver to the district attorney the letter or other communication sent to you, to be used as evidence in the prosecution of the party.³

The oath which you have taken indicates the impartial spirit with which your duties should be discharged. You are to present no one from envy, hatred or malice; nor shall you leave any one unrepresented for fear, favor, affection, hope of reward or gain; but shall present all things truly as they come to your knowledge according to the best of your understanding.

You are also to keep your own deliberations secret; you are not at liberty even to state that you have had a matter under consideration. Great injustice and injury might be done to the good name and standing of a citizen if it were known that there had ever been before you for deliberation the question of his guilt or innocence of a public offense. You will allow no one to question you as to your own action or the action of your associates on the grand jury.

To authorize you to find an indictment or presentment there must be a concurrence of at least twelve of your number; a mere majority will not suffice.

The constitution, as you have observed, speaks of a presentment or indictment by a grand jury. The latter—the indictment—is a formal accusation made by the grand jury charging a party with the commission of a public offense. Formerly it was the practice in all courts having jurisdiction to inquire by the intervention of a grand jury of public offenses, amounting to the grade of felonies—and such is the practice now in many courts—for the public prosecutor to hand to the grand jury an instrument of this character—that is, a bill of an indictment in form, with a list of the witnesses to establish the offense charged. If in such case the jury found that the evidence produced justified the finding of an indictment they indorsed on the instrument "A True Bill," otherwise, "Not Found," or, "Not a True Bill," or the word "Ignoramus"—we know nothing of it—from the use of which latter word the bill was sometimes said to be ignored.

³ In a case which arose in Philadelphia in 1845, Judge King considered at length, in an elaborate and very able opinion, the duties of grand juries in criminal cases; and his views agree substantially with those expressed in the charge. "Our system of criminal administration," said the judge, "is not subject to the reproach that there exists in it an irresponsible body with unlimited jurisdiction. On the contrary, the duties of a grand jury in direct criminal accusations, are confined to the investigation of matters given them in charge by the attorney-general; and of those which are sufficiently within their own knowledge and observation to authorize an official presentment; and they cannot, on the application of any one, originate proceedings against citizens, which is a duty imposed by law on other public agents. This limitation of authority we regard as alike fortunate for the citizen and the grand jury. It protects the citizen from the persecution and annoyance which private malice, or personal animosity, introduced into the grand jury room, might subject him to. And it concerns the dignity of the grand jury and the veneration with which they ought always to be regarded by the people, by making them umpire between the accuser and accused, instead of assuming the office of the former." Communication of Grand Jury, 5 Pa. Law J. 63, 64.

A presentment differs from an indictment in that it wants technical form, and is usually found by the grand jury upon their own knowledge, or upon the evidence before them, without having any bill from the public prosecutor. It is an informal accusation, which is generally regarded in the light of instructions upon which an indictment can be framed.

This form of accusation has fallen in disuse since the practice has prevailed—and the practice now obtains generally—for the prosecuting officer to attend the grand jury and advise them in their investigations.

The government now seldom delivers bills of indictment to the grand jury in advance of their action, but generally awaits their judgment upon the matters laid before them. The district attorney has the right to be present at the taking of testimony before you for the purpose of giving information or advice touching any matter cognizable by you, and may interrogate witnesses before you, but he has no right to be present pending your deliberations on the evidence. When your vote is taken upon the question whether an indictment shall be found or a presentment made, no person besides yourselves should be present.

These, gentlemen, are all the general instructions which we have thought important to give you at this time. There are some few observations, however, which we would add respecting the execution of the revenue laws; and these we will take from a charge of the present chief justice of the United States, delivered to a grand jury in West Virginia. "The war," says that great judge, "in which the nation has been recently engaged for the preservation of the national union and government, endangered by rebellion, made the contracting of a large debt inevitable. This debt is the price of our national existence, and binds irrevocably the good faith of the people. Its inviolable obligation has been recognized by a solemn act of the nation in adopting the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, which declares that 'the validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for the payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned.'"

"There are differences of opinion as to the mode of payment required by the contracts of the American people, made through their government; but nobody questions openly, if anybody questions at all, that the debt contracted must be paid, and paid in perfect good faith. The law of the amendment that the validity of the national debt shall not be questioned, was already written on the hearts of the people before they made it part of the constitution. To provide for the reduction and final payment of this debt and the annual expenses of the government, taxes are necessarily imposed. In other words, the equal proportion to be contributed by each citizen is ascertained by law. He who withholds his just proportion, deprives the rest of the people of exactly the same amount withheld. His fraud operates as theft. The sum total necessary to meet the obligations of the nation must be raised. Fraud upon the revenue does not reduce that sum; it merely shifts the burdens evaded by the fraudulent, upon others who pay their full proportion besides. All honest men, therefore, have a common cause against the dishonest."

You, gentlemen, represent the honest men, and it is your duty to see that no defrauder of the revenue who can be brought to justice, escapes merited punishment. The higher in office, and the higher in social position the delinquent may be, the more unremitting and searching should be your diligence in inquiry and presentment.

To these observations of the chief justice, it may not be out of place to add here, that great as is the debt forced upon the nation by the recent Rebellion, the results to the country which have followed from the war, to which that Rebellion led, should make us feel that the burden of the debt is light.

That war has done away forever with the miserable notion, which extensively prevailed at the time of the outbreak of the Rebellion, that the general government, because it was formed by the people of the several states, sovereign in some of their powers, should not exert any coercion to enforce its laws. No one is now willing to run a tilt against common sense by adducing any argument in support of this absurd position; and the war has demonstrated that the general government possesses all the power necessary to enforce obedience to its laws throughout the limits of the republic.

That war has also led to the great constitutional amendments; the amendment which declares that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, of which the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction;" and the amendment which declares that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

These amendments constitute the great, the crowning glory of the country, for they make freedom, when not forfeited by crime, the legal condition of every human being within the jurisdiction of the United States, and equality before the law his constitutional right.

We had intended, gentlemen, to say something respecting the treatment which Chinese and other Asiatics have sometimes received in this district. But the district attorney informs us that there are no cases pending which would require a consideration of this matter by you. We will therefore only observe that although there may be reasonable differences of opinion with respect to the wisdom and policy of encouraging the immigration to this country of persons, between whom and our people there is such marked dissimilarity in constitution, habits and manners; yet so long as our country seeks to enlarge her commerce by treaties with Asiatic countries, and to secure protection to her own citizens in those countries by pledging protection to their citizens in this country, it is the duty of the government to exert its power, its entire power if necessary, to enforce its obligations in this respect.

And more than this—independently of all such considerations of duty or interest, it is base and cowardly to maltreat these people whilst they are within the jurisdiction of our government. If public policy requires that they should be excluded from our shores, let the general government so provide and declare, but until it does so provide and declare, they have a perfect right to immigrate to this country; and whilst here they are entitled, equally with all others, to the full protection of our laws. It is unchristian and inhuman to maltreat them, as has been sometimes done by disorderly persons, we are sorry to say, in this district.

We are not aware, gentlemen, that any matter will be presented to you requiring any other special directions than those already given. Should any such arise, the court will again call you before it and give such instructions as the matter may require. You are at liberty at any time to ask the advice of the court upon any questions of law relating to matters under investigation before you, although you will probably find the advice of the district attorney upon those matters sufficient to guide your action.

[2 Spr. 279.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May 15, 1861.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—POWER OF CONGRESS TO PROTECT COMMERCE—PENAL ENACTMENTS—INSURRECTION—BELLIGERENT RIGHTS—FUNCTIONS OF JUDICIARY.

[1. The clause in the constitution which gives to congress the power to define and punish piracy is not the only provision conferring authority to protect the commerce of the United States by penal enactments. The power given to regulate commerce, and to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying that power into effect, invests congress with authority to give full protection to commerce by its criminal jurisprudence.]

[2. Statutes passed by congress in pursuance of this power are of paramount authority, and cannot be invalidated or impaired by the action of any state or states. Any law, ordinance, or constitution made by them for that purpose is wholly nugatory, and can afford no legal protection to those who may act under it.]

[3. In case of an attempted revolution to overthrow the authority of the United States, where a number of states combine for that purpose, it is the province of the political department of the government to determine whether belligerent rights shall be accorded to them. Until belligerent rights are so accorded, the judiciary cannot recognize any right in the insurgents to carry on legitimate war, but must regard them as rebels and lawless aggressors upon the citizens of the United States, and apply to them the penal laws which make their acts punishable as crimes.]

SPRAGUE, District Judge (charging grand jury). At the last term of the district court, I gave some instructions to the grand jury upon the subject of treason, and other offences tending to subvert the government or prevent the execution of its laws. [Case No. 18,273.] That charge having been published will be in the hands of the district attorney, and a printed copy may be laid before you.

I do not deem it necessary, therefore, now to repeat it. I would invite your attention to that part of the Criminal Code which is intended for the protection of the commerce of the United States, and the suppression of general piracy, but more particularly the former:

By St. 1790, c. 9, § 8 (1 Stat. 113), it is enacted "that if any person or persons shall commit upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery, or any other offence which is committed within the body of a county, would by the laws of the United States be punishable with death; or if any captain or mariner of any ship or other vessel, shall piratically and feloniously run away with such ship or vessel, or any goods or merchandise to the value of fifty dollars, or yield up such ship or vessel voluntarily to any pirate; * * * every such offender shall be deemed, taken and adjudged to be a pirate and felon and, being thereof convicted, shall suffer death."

By section 9, it is enacted "that if any citizen shall commit any piracy or robbery aforesaid, or any act of hostility against the United States, or any citizen thereof, upon the high sea, under color of any commission from any foreign prince or state, or on pretence of authority from any person, such offender shall, notwithstanding the pretence of any such authority, be deemed, adjudged and taken to be a pirate, felon, and robber, and on being thereof convicted shall suffer death."

The tenth section extends the punishment of death to accessories before the fact. They are those who aid, assist, procure, command, counsel, or advise any person to commit any such robbery, murder, or other piracy.

The eleventh section punishes accessories after the fact. They are those who, "after any murder, felony, robbery, or other piracy whatsoever aforesaid," shall have been committed, shall furnish aid to those by whom the crime has been perpetrated.

By section 12, "if any seaman or other person shall * * * confederate, or attempt or endeavor to corrupt any commander, master, officer, or mariner, to yield up or to run away with any ship or vessel, or with any goods, wares, or merchandise, or to turn pirate, or to go over to or confederate with pirates, or in any wise trade with any pirate knowing him to be such, or shall furnish such pirate with any ammunition, stores or provisions of any kind, or shall fit out any vessel knowingly and with a design to trade with or supply or correspond with any pirate or robber upon the seas; or if any person or persons shall any ways consult, combine, confederate or correspond with any pirate or robber on the seas, knowing him to be guilty of any such piracy or robbery; * * * such person or persons so offending, and being thereof convicted," shall be subject to fine and imprisonment.

By St. 1820, c. 113, § 3 (3 Stat. 600), "if any person shall, upon the high seas, or in any open roadstead, or in any haven, basin, or bay, or in any river where the sea ebbs and flows, commit the crime of robbery, in or upon any ship or vessel, or upon any of the ship's company of any ship or vessel, or the lading thereof, such person shall be adjudged to be a pirate;" and, on conviction, shall suffer death.

"And if any person engaged in any piratical cruise or enterprise, or being of the crew or ship's company of any piratical ship or vessel, shall land from such ship or vessel, and, on shore, shall commit robbery, such person shall be adjudged a pirate;" and, on conviction, shall suffer death.

By St. 1825, c. 65, § 6 (4 Stat. 116), "if any person or persons upon the high seas, or in any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, basin, or bay, within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall, by surprise, or by open force or violence, maliciously attack, or set upon, any ship or vessel belonging in whole or part, to the United States, or to any citizen or citizens thereof, or to any other person whatsoever, with an intent unlawfully to plunder the same ship or vessel, or to despoil any owner or owners thereof of any moneys, goods, or merchandise, laden on board thereof, every person so offending, his or her counsellors, aiders, or abettors, shall be deemed guilty of felony," and subject to fine and imprisonment.

By section 7, "if any person or persons upon the high seas, or in any other of the places aforesaid, with intent to kill, rob, steal, * * * or to do or perpetrate any other felony, shall break or enter any ship or vessel," he shall be liable to fine and imprisonment.

By St. 1846, c. 98, § 5 (9 Stat. 73), "if any captain or other officer or mariner, of a ship or vessel, on the high seas, or any other waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, shall piratically or feloniously run away with such ship or vessel, * * * or yield up such ship or vessel voluntarily to any pirate," he shall be subject to fine and imprisonment.

By St. 1847, c. 51, § 1 (9 Stat. 175), "any subject or citizen of any foreign state, who shall be found and taken on the sea, making war upon the United States, or cruising against the vessels and property thereof, or of the citizens of the same, contrary to the provisions of any treaty existing between the United States and the state of which such person is a citizen or subject, when by such treaty such acts of such persons are declared to be piracy," may be tried, convicted, and punished in the same manner as other persons charged with piracy.

So far as the foregoing enactments are intended to punish aggressions upon the vessels of foreign nations by pirates who are regarded as the enemies of mankind, hostes humani generis, they are founded upon the first article of the constitution, which gives to congress the power to define and punish piracy. But that is by no means the only clause in the constitution that gives authority to protect the commerce of the United States by penal enactments. Congress is, in express terms, vested with the power to regulate commerce, and to make all laws necessary and proper to carry that power into effect; and there can be no doubt that the legislature is thus authorized to give full protection to the commerce of the United States by its criminal jurisprudence. This power has been exercised ever since the organization of our government, and has been affirmed by the supreme court. U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 72. It is, then, the province of those who have the power of legislation to determine what penalties shall be inflicted upon such as commit aggressions or depredations upon our commerce; and it is the province of the judiciary to ascertain and follow the legislative will.

These statutes being enacted pursuant to the constitution are of paramount authority, and cannot be invalidated or impaired by the action of any state or states; and every law, ordinance, and constitution made by them for that purpose, whatever its name or form, is wholly nugatory, and can afford no legal protection to those who may act under it. But suppose that a number of states undertake by revolution to throw off the government of the United States and erect themselves into an independent nation, and assume in that character to issue commissions authorizing the capture of vessels of the United States, will such commissions afford any protection to those acting under them against any penal laws of the United States? Cases have heretofore arisen where a portion of a foreign empire—a colony—has undertaken to throw off the dominion of the mother country, and assumed the attitude and claimed the rights of an independent nation; and in such cases it has been held that the relation which the United States should hold to those who thus attempt and claim to institute a new government is a political rather than a legal question; that, if those departments of our government which have a right to give the law, and which regulate our foreign intercourse and determine the relation in which we shall stand to other nations, recognize such new and self-constituted government as having the rights of a belligerent in a war between them and their former rulers, and the United States hold a neutral position in such war, then the judiciary, following the other departments, will to the same extent recognize the new nation.

But if the legislative and executive departments of the government utterly refuse to recognize such new government, or to acknowledge it as having any belligerent or national rights, and, instead of taking a neutral attitude, endeavor by force to suppress depredations on commerce by such assumed government, as violating the rights and infringing the laws of the United States, then the judiciary will hold that such depredations are not to be considered as belligerent, and entitled to the immunities of lawful war, but as robbery or other lawless depredations, subject to the penalties denounced by our laws against such offences. U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 618, 634, 635; U. S. v. Klintock, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 144, 149; U. S. v. Smith, Id. 153, 155, 161, 162; U. S. v. Pirates, Id. 193, 194, 197. See, also, The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 16; The Marianna Flora, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 40; U. S. v. The Malek Adhel, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 232. The judiciary certainly cannot adopt a more indulgent rule toward those who are in open rebellion against the authority of the United States, or toward aliens co-operating with and acting under the assumed authority of such rebels. While the other departments of the government and the nation refuse to regard any state, or association of states, as having the rights of a belligerent, or as carrying on legitimate war, and are exerting not only moral but physical force against them as rebels, and lawless aggressors upon the United States and its citizens, the courts also must so regard them, and cannot admit that any legislation or assumption of power by such state or states can authorize acts in violation of the laws of the United States, or change the character of offences under them.

There is another view. Mere rebellion absolves no man from his allegiance. Citizens of the United States, therefore, may not only be subject to the penalties of treason; but if they commit hostilities upon the commerce of the United States, under a commission from any foreign nation, even the oldest and best established,—such as England or France, for example,—they may be dealt with as pirates by the express enactments in the ninth section of the statute of 1790, which has already been referred to. And aliens who are subjects or citizens of any foreign state, with whom we have a treaty,—such as is described in the statute of 1847 (chapter 51), which has already been quoted,—if, in violation of such treaty, they make war upon the United States, or cruise against our vessels or property under a commission from any foreign government, however long acknowledged, may, by the clear provisions of that statute, be dealt with as pirates.

If aliens, subjects of a nation with whom we have no such treaty, commit acts of hostility upon our commerce, under the alleged authority or commission of a new and self-created government claiming to be independent, it may be material to inquire whether such government is to be regarded as having the immunities of a belligerent, or whether such aliens may be treated as robbers on the seas; and this inquiry will be governed by the principles which I have already stated.

Besides the laws to which I have called your attention, there are others designed for the protection of persons and property upon the ocean, by prescribing the duties and liabilities of the officers and marines on board American vessels; but these do not seem to require any particular attention at the present time.

Case No. 18,257.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[Taney, 615.]¹

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April, 1836.

GRAND JURIES—EVIDENCE TO JUSTIFY PRESENTMENT.

[Grand jurors should present no one, unless, in their deliberate judgment, the evidence before them is sufficient, in the absence of any other proof, to justify the conviction of the party accused.]

TANEY, Circuit Justice (charging grand jury). It has been usual for this court, at the opening of the term, to deliver a charge to the grand jury; and you will probably expect one from me, in conformity with this practice. As I doubt much the necessity of continuing the custom, and may not hereafter adhere to it, my address to you will be a brief one, and its chief object to explain why I am disposed to depart from the former practice.

There was a time, without doubt, in the days that have gone by, when precise and detailed instructions from the court, to the grand jury, were necessary for the purposes of justice. But in the present enlightened state of the public mind, when education and useful information are not confined to a few, but diffused generally throughout the community, every citizen summoned as a juror, has a general knowledge of the duties he is called there to perform, and of the manner in which it is incumbent on him to discharge them; and in all cases demanding more precise and particular knowledge, you will have the aid of the district attorney, whose duty it is to counsel you in matters of law, whenever you may think proper to require it. It cannot, therefore, be necessary, in a charge from the bench, to enumerate and define, with legal precision, the various offences against the United States, which are punishable by indictment in this court. But few, I trust, if any, infractions of the law are likely to come before you, and it would be a waste of time in the court to engage itself in discussing principles, and enlarging upon topics which are not to lead us to some practical result; nor can any useful purpose be answered by calling upon you to follow the court through the wide field of criminal jurisprudence, when it is well known that your labors will be confined to a very small portion of it. It is my earnest desire, that we should proceed at once, with industry and energy, to execute the duties for which we are assembled, and while we give to every subject brought before us, the most ample time for full examination and elaborate judgment, not a moment should be wasted in unnecessary forms.

The court must, however, impress upon you the propriety of being diligent in your inquiries, and careful and elaborate in your conclusions. In a country like ours, blessed with free institutions, the safety of the community depends upon the vigilant and firm execution of the law; every one must be made to understand, and constantly to feel, that its supremacy will be steadily enforced by the constituted tribunals, and that liberty cannot exist under a feeble, relaxed or indolent administration of its power, where crime goes unpunished and the law is contemned. With a criminal code so mild and forbearing as ours, there can be no just cause for sympathy with any party who voluntarily, under any pretext, incurs its penalties; and negligence or carelessness in your inquiries would tend to multiply the number of offences, and would deprive society and the individual citizen of the protection and security to which they are entitled.

But in our desire to bring the guilty to punishment, we must still take care to guard the innocent from injury; and every one is deemed to be innocent, until the contrary appears by sufficient legal proof. You will, therefore, in every case that may come before you, carefully weigh the testimony, and present no one, unless, in your deliberate judgment, the evidence before you is sufficient, in the absence of any other proof, to justify the conviction of the party accused. And this rule is the more proper, because he is not permitted to summon witnesses or adduce testimony to the grand jury, and your decision must be made without hearing his defence. Gentlemen, you may retire to your room.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT.

[1 Hughes, 541.]¹

Circuit Court, W. D. North Carolina. April, 1875.

CIVIL RIGHTS BILL—EFFECT.

1. In North Carolina, the equal rights, in inns and public conveyances, of all persons without distinction of class, are fully protected by state statutes, and existed as to inns at common law; and the act of congress commonly called the "Civil Rights Bill," was unnecessary in the state; and its only effect is to give jurisdiction of wrongs committed against citizens on account of class to the federal courts.

2. These laws, state and national, were intended to secure political and legal equality of rights to all citizens, but were not intended to establish social equality, or to enforce social intercourse between different classes of citizens.

3. Quære, whether the civil rights acts of congress are constitutional in so far as they legislate upon the rights which appertain to men in their character as citizens of the states as distinguished from those which belong to them as citizens of the United States?

The following opinion was given in response to inquiries from the grand jury, in regard to their duties under the act of congress just then passed, commonly called the "Civil Rights Bill." See Acts 1874-75 [18 Stat.] c. 114, p. 335.

DICK, District Judge (charging grand jury). I will consider the subject in the following order: (1) What was the existing law before the passage of the act? (2) The provisions and purposes of the act. (3) Had congress the constitutional authority to pass the act?

Under the constitution and laws of the United States, and the constitution and laws of this state, the colored man is a free citizen, and entitled to the legal rights of all other citizens.

We propose, in the first place, to inquire what were the rights of persons at common law, before the passage of the civil rights bill, as to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances by land or water, theatres, and other places of public amusement. We will confine our attention chiefly to inns, as the principles of law in such cases are applicable to common carriers, and other public undertakings and employments. By referring to standard works which treat of this subject at common law, we will find the following principles established by frequent adjudication: A person who makes it his business to entertain travellers and passengers and provide lodgings and necessaries for them and their horses and attendants, is a common innkeeper; and it is no way material whether he have any sign before his door or not. 3 Bac. Abr. 660. The duty of innkeepers extends chiefly to entertaining and harboring travellers, finding them victuals and lodgings, and securing the goods and effects of their guests; and, therefore, if any one who keeps a common inn refuses either to receive a traveller as a guest into his house, or to find him victuals and lodging, upon his tendering him a reasonable price for the same, he is not only liable to render damages for the injury, in an action on the case, at the suit of the party grieved, but may also be indicted and fined at the suit of the king. For he who takes upon himself a public employment must serve the public as far as his employment goes. Id. 662. Also it is said that an innkeeper may be compelled by the constable of the town to receive and entertain a person as his guest. Id. 664. An inn has been judicially defined to be "a house where the traveller is furnished with everything which he has occasion for whilst on his way." But a mere coffee-house, or eating-room or boarding-house, is not an inn. 1 Pars. 623. One who entertains strangers occasionally, although he receives compensation for it, is not an innkeeper. Mathews' Case, 2 Dev. & B. 424. An innkeeper may refuse to receive a disorderly guest, or require him to leave his house. He is not bound to examine into the reasonableness of the guest's requirements. And while travellers are entitled to proper accommodations, they have no right to select a particular apartment, or to use it for purposes other than those for which it was designed. 1 Pars. 523.

The law only obliges an innkeeper to furnish proper and convenient accommodations for his guests, and in doing this, he may arrange his business to suit his own advantage, while he complies with the reasonable requirements of his guests. This state and other states of the Union, have statute regulations upon the subject of inns. In every prosperous and commercial country there are laws upon this subject, as travellers and men of business must have places of entertainment where their reasonable wants of lodging and subsistence can be conveniently obtained. We find in ancient Rome, that the pretors established many wise regulations for the accommodation of travellers, which are very similar to the principles of the common law and our state statutes.

In this state we find a statute originally passed in 1798, which provides, that every person wishing to keep a common inn, tavern or ordinary for the entertainment of travellers and others, shall apply to the board of county commissioners for a license to do so, "and the applicant must give bond in the sum of one thousand dollars, payable to the state of North Carolina," and conditioned for finding and providing good and wholesome diet and lodgings for his guests, and stable and provender for their horses; and also to safely keep for his guests all such articles and property as may come to his care and charge as an innkeeper; and on breach of any condition thereof, any person injured may put the same in suit. Bat. Revisal, c. 51. This is a statute remedy in addition to the remedies at common law, and is secured by bond with sufficient sureties. This statute asserts the rights provided for in the civil rights bill, and secures them more effectually than the act of congress. The penalty in the act of congress is five hundred dollars without any security; but any damages incurred are secured in the state statutes by a thousand dollar bond with sureties. In both instances, if the statute remedy is pursued by the party injured, the common law remedies are waived. It is thus apparent that all the rights to the full and equal enjoyment of the advantages, accommodations, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances, etc., are derived from the common law and state statutes, and fully existed before the passage of the civil rights bill. By the common law and statutes of this state, no discrimination is made against colored men as a class, or against non-resident citizens. The civil rights bill was, therefore, it would seem, unnecessary, so far as this state is concerned; and being unnecessary, the question arises whether congress, under any provision of the constitution, had the authority to legislate upon domestic and local subjects, which are properly under the control of state action. We will consider this question in a subsequent part of this charge.

Both the national and state governments have conferred upon the colored man all the legal rights of citizenship, and both governments would be untrue to themselves if those rights were not properly protected and enforced by suitable legislation. In political circles it may be said that the rights of citizenship ought not to have been conferred upon the colored man by the general government, and the Southern states acted under an unwarranted compulsion when they recognized and established those rights in their new state constitutions. Those states entered into a rebellion against the general government, to protect and secure the institution of slavery, and the Rebellion was suppressed by force of arms, and the government imposed upon those states certain fundamental conditions as prerequisites to their readmission into the Union. These fundamental conditions were accepted by the insurrectionary states, and were incorporated into their constitutions. The full rights of citizenship were thus conferred upon colored men by the amendments of the national and state constitutions, and directly resulted from the Rebellion, and were not created by the civil rights bill. If these rights were unjustly and improperly conferred the wrong is attributable to the Rebellion which brought on such consequences. These amendments to the national and state constitutions have been approved and adopted by the people in the manner provided by our fundamental law and are now a part of the law of the land, which courts of justice are bound to administer.

We will now consider what are the provisions and purposes of the civil rights bill. The first section enacts that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theatres, and other places of public amusement; subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law and applicable alike to the citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude. The second section provides that any person who shall violate the first section, shall be liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars, and also to an indictment for misdemeanor: the penalty to be recovered by suit of the party injured, and the indictment to be prosecuted in the federal courts. The third section gives to the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction of the suit and indictment mentioned in section 2, and makes it the duty of district attorneys, marshals, deputy marshals, and United States commissioners, to see that all offences under section 2 are properly prosecuted. Section 4 provides that no citizen shall be excluded from jury service in the national or state courts on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Section 5 provides that all cases arising under this act in the federal courts, may be reviewed by the supreme court without regard to the sum in controversy. In this act we find all the usual safeguards which are adopted in the enactment of laws to prevent oppression and secure the rights of individual citizens. The purposes of the bill are fully expressed in the preamble: "Whereas, we recognize the equality of all men before the law, and hold that it is the duty of the government in its dealings with the people to mete out equal and exact justice to all of whatever nativity, race, color or persuasion, religious or political."

From the preamble and all the provisions of the act, it is obvious that the civil rights bill neither directly nor indirectly confers, nor was intended to confer any rights or privileges of social equality among men. Neither have the recent amendments of national or state constitutions any such purposes or effect. Every man has a natural and inherent right of selecting his own associates, and this natural right cannot be properly regulated by legislative action, but must always be under the control of individual taste and inclination. There have always been different circles in society, and this condition of things will ever remain among men. This natural right and inclination of selecting associates exists among the animals of every species. Even in free and enlightened Athens we find among the citizens of the republic well-defined social distinctions which could not be regulated by public law. The Athenians would not associate on terms of social equality with the most learned and distinguished foreigners, who were regarded as barbarians. They once put a citizen to death for interpreting into the language of his country the message of a Persian king. The iron laws of Sparta placed the citizens upon terms of social equality, and made them a nation of savage warriors and ignorant barbarians. The founders of Rome were a band of robbers and outlaws and mingled in free and equal social intercourse; but when Romulus selected the centum patres, the social distinction of patricians and plebeians was established, which for seven hundred years disturbed the peace of the kingdom and commonwealth, and led to the establishment of the empire. In England political and social distinctions have always existed, and cannot be broken down without the complete subversion of the government. The hope and expectation that there will ever be a nation on earth in which all men will associate upon terms of social equality is a wild dream of fanaticism, which can never be realized. It certainly cannot be a matter of surprise that among the white people of the Southern states, there should be strong opposition to according equal social privileges to the colored race. The colored men were formerly slaves, and the condition of servitude rendered them greatly wanting in education, refinement and social culture. White men often came in contact with colored men, but the association was that of superiors with inferiors. Before the war, white men who associated with colored men on terms of social equality became degraded in the eyes of the community. These social prejudices naturally resulted from the condition of things and are too deeply implanted to be eradicated by any legislation. Any law which would impose upon the white race the imperative obligation of mingling with the colored race on terms of social equality would be repulsive to natural feeling and long established prejudices, and would be justly odious. There is no principle of law, human or divine, that requires all men to be thrown into social hotchpot in order that their equality of civil rights may be secured and enforced. The civil rights bill neither imposes nor was intended to impose any such social obligation. It only proposes to provide for the enforcement of legal rights guaranteed to all citizens by the laws of the land, and leaves social rights and privileges to be regulated, as they have ever been, by the customs and usages of society. I will briefly restate the principles of law which we have been considering as they exist in this state, independent of the civil rights bill. The law only requires innkeepers, common carriers, etc., to furnish accommodations to colored men, equal to those provided for white men, when the same price is paid. Innkeepers may have separate rooms and accommodations for colored men, but they must be equal in quality and convenience to those furnished white men. Railroad companies may have first class coaches for colored men, and first class coaches for white men. If white men are protected from the intrusion of colored men, colored men must likewise be protected from the intrusion of white men, as the legal rights of both classes are the same. Both races are alike entitled to receive convenient and comfortable accommodations in inns and public conveyances, and neither a white man nor a colored man has a right to say that the innkeeper shall put them in the same room without their mutual consent. If a traveller gets inn accommodations and comfortable transportation according to the price paid, he has no just cause of complaint, and the innkeeper and common carrier discharge the obligations imposed upon them by law. If the innkeeper tenders such accommodations, and the guest refuses them, he may compel the guest to quit the inn, and seek for accommodation elsewhere. Fell v. Knight, 8 Mees. & W. 276.

I have thus stated the conditions and limitations established by the common law and statute law of North Carolina, regulating the relative rights and responsibilities of innkeepers and their guests. If any person within the jurisdiction of this state is denied his legal rights by an innkeeper, the party injured has the following remedies under the state laws: (1) By civil action and indictment at common law, prosecuted in the superior court. (2) By civil action on innkeeper's bond, as provided by statute.

If these legal rights cannot be properly enforced by a colored man in the state courts, then he may remove his suit in the state courts to the federal court, under the civil rights bill of the 9th of April, 1866 [14 Stat. 27]. Thus, it would seem that under existing laws in this state, the colored man has all the rights and remedies of any other citizen, in relation to the subjects embraced in the civil rights bill. I am not aware that there is any law in North Carolina which in express terms makes any discrimination against the colored race, except the statute regulating the domestic institution of marriage, and this subject is and must ever remain under the exclusive control of local state government. It has been alleged that a few municipal charters granted by the present legislature, in effect deprive colored citizens of some elective franchises which are enjoyed by white citizens. This subject is not embraced in the civil rights bill, and calls for no expression of opinion in this charge.

We will now proceed to consider the important question as to what extent congress has the constitutional authority to establish and regulate the civil rights of citizens of the United States in the several states. This question has recently been elaborately considered by the supreme court of the United States, in the Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 36, and also by the supreme courts of Ohio and Indiana in the cases of State v. McCann [21 Ohio St. 198] and Cory v. Carter [48 Ind. 327]. In these cases the following principles of law may be regarded as established. We only refer to the salient points pertinent to our discussion. Previous to the adoption of the recent amendments to the constitution of the United States, with the exception of a few express prohibitions and restrictions in the federal constitution, "the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the states lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the states, and without that of the federal government." The states, with the restrictions and prohibitions referred to, could establish and regulate the civil rights of their own citizens. But when those rights are established by state laws, the constitution declares to the states that those rights, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of the citizens of other states within their jurisdiction. And quoting from the language of Chief Justice Taney in another case, it is said, "that for all the great purposes for which the federal government was established, we are one people, with one common country, we are all citizens of the United States," and it is as such citizens that their rights are supported by the United States courts. The recent amendments to the constitution were intended to secure freedom and the benefits of citizenship to colored men, and protect their civil rights against hostile state legislation. All state laws which discriminate against colored men as a race, and deny them equal civil rights with other citizens, are now prohibited by the constitution, and may be declared unconstitutional by the courts; and congress may also enforce the civil rights thus denied, by suitable legislation.

A state has the constitutional and legislative power to change or modify the common law, and by statute establish and regulate the rights of its citizens to the enjoyment and benefit of inns, public conveyances, etc., but cannot deny to any citizen of the United States, within its jurisdiction, the equal protection of the laws. In the Slaughterhouse Cases [supra] it is said: "The clause which forbids a state to deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, was clearly intended to prevent the hostile discrimination against the negro race, so familiar in the states where he had been a slave, and for this purpose the clause confers ample power upon congress to secure their rights and equality before the law. We doubt very much whether any action by a state, not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision." As no such contingency had arisen in this state, as is contemplated by the fourteenth amendment, it may well be considered as a matter of grave doubt whether congress had the constitutional authority to legislate upon matters properly belonging to the local and domestic government of the state, when the state had in no way denied to persons within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

In a charge to a grand jury I will not pretend fully to discuss and decide upon the constitutionality of the civil rights bill, as this is an exceedingly delicate and important question, and one that has induced much public consideration and excitement.

Judge Cooley, in his learned and valuable treatise on Constitutional Limitations, at page 159 says: "It must be evident to any one that the power to declare a legislative enactment void, is one which the judge, conscious of the fallibility of the human judgment, will shrink from exercising in any case where he can conscientiously do so, and with due regard to duty and official oath, decline the responsibility. Neither will a court, as a general rule, pass upon a constitutional question and decide a statute to be invalid, unless a decision upon that very point becomes necessary to the determination of the cause. While the court cannot shun the discussion of constitutional questions, when fairly presented, they will not go out of their way to find such topics. They will not seek to draw in such weighty matters collaterally, nor on trivial occasions. It is both more proper and more respectful to a co-ordinate department to discuss constitutional questions only when that is the very lis mota. Thus presented and determined, the decision carries a weight with it to which no extrajudicial disquisition is entitled."

The constitutionality of the civil rights bill has been asserted by the deliberate action of congress, composed of many able lawyers and wise and enlightened statesmen, and it would be very presumptuous in me, collaterally, and without argument, to decide differently upon a question which that body carefully considered and acted upon under the solemn sanction of official obligation. "It is a solemn act in any case to declare that that body to whom the people have committed the solemn function of making the laws of the commonwealth, have deliberately disregarded the limitations imposed upon their delegated authority, and usurped power which the people have been careful to withhold." Cooley, Const. Lim. 160. This question will doubtless soon be decided by the supreme court of the United States, and when determined by that august tribunal, I feel confident that the decision will be acquiesced in by all the American people disposed to observe the law of the land. Although the constitutionality of the civil rights bill may be questioned, the act cannot properly be regarded as an oppressive exercise of legislative power. It only re-enacts the law already in force in this state, and furnishes new remedies not more stringent than those existing at common law and under our state statutes. It provides that those remedies shall be enforced in the federal courts, where all cases are tried by juries composed of just, impartial and enlightened citizens of the state, selected as state juries are selected; and the legal rights of parties are under the final control of the supreme court of the United States, consisting of learned and just judges, whose opinions are regarded as high authority in all the courts of this country and England. In the civil rights bill the legislative will of the nation has been solemnly expressed by the chosen representatives of the sovereign people; and it is to be hoped that all good citizens will yield obedience to the law, feeling well assured that the vexed and difficult constitutional questions which it involves, will be properly determined, and the rights of all citizens be justly administered by the judicial department of the government. This course of conduct will be in conformity to the true theory and spirit of our federal and state governments, and manifest the patriotic loyalty of our people.

If, therefore, any bill of indictment founded upon the civil rights bill is presented by the district attorney for your action, it is your duty to pass upon such bill as you pass upon all other bills, and leave the constitutionality of the act to be determined by the court upon mature consideration, after being aided and enlightened by the careful investigations and able and learned arguments of counsel.

Case No. 18,259.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—CIVIL RIGHTS ACT.

[3 Hughes, 576.]¹

Circuit Court, W. D. Virginia. March, 1878.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF MARCH 1, 1875.

A state officer, empowered by law to select jurors to serve in the courts of the state in the trial of civil and criminal cases, who for a series of years selects only white jurors, and fails to select colored jurors, is amenable to indictment in a court of the United States, under section 4 of the act of congress approved March 1, 1875 [18 Stat. 335], entitled "An act to protect all citizens in their civil rights."

The laws of Virginia intrust the whole duty of selecting jurors to serve in the state courts to the judges of the county courts. An act of the general assembly of the state, passed in 1870, provides that "all male citizens, twenty-one years old and not over sixty, who are entitled to vote and hold office under the constitution and laws of the state, shall be liable to serve as jurors." It is alleged as a fact that in many counties of the state colored men have never been put upon the juries. The act of congress of March 1, 1875, for the protection of the civil rights of all citizens, provides that: "Sec. 2. No citizen, possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any state, on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude, and any officer or other person charged with the duty in the selection or summoning of jurors, who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than five thousand dollars." At the March term of the circuit court of the United States for the Western district of Virginia, held at Lynchburg, the grand jury made presentment by indictment of several of the judges of the county courts of counties in the district for violation of the second section of the said act of congress just quoted. The indictments were found in pursuance of a charge of the judge of the court, which was as follows:

RIVES, District Judge (charging grand jury). I am required by act of congress to provide for your selection, as nearly as practicable, in conformity with the state law, such is the deference properly paid by congress to the laws and practice of the states. Hence, in the rule of court I have prescribed for the purpose, the lists are returned by the marshal from the various counties appurtenant to this court without discrimination as to race and without reference to politics. The only injunction is to have duly-qualified jurors, of sound judgment, and liable to no suspicion of any disaffection to the government or of any disinclination to execute the laws. From these lists you are then drawn by lot, so as to remove all possibility and repel any imputation of your being impaneled for any sinister purpose or for the accomplishment of private ends. With these precautions the court is assured of your impartiality and your ability to assert and vindicate the laws. You have no sooner taken your oaths, and your seats in the panel, than you are set aside and consecrated to a special and responsible duty, that of inquiring into offenses of every description against the laws of the United States. You cannot, then, be approached by any one on the subject of your inquiries, either by verbal or written communications, unless with my leave, and any attempt at such tampering should be promptly reported to the court for its action. The witnesses you may need are fully protected from all intimidation and hindrance, and the officers who are to execute your process are encouraged and shielded by similar guards. All this displays the anxiety of the laws to insure you the most ample opportunities of prosecuting your inquiries free from all external pressure, and with exclusive reference to your own sense of duty. Outside opinions and outside influences are not to invade the sacred precincts of your deliberations. Fidelity to the laws and intrepid fidelity to your oaths is the motto that should be emblazoned over the door through which you retire, and where none can follow save the district attorney, on whom you can at all times call for the laws, and the witnesses who are to give you the facts. In order to preserve the due sanctity of your deliberations, you must be cautious to abstain from all disclosure of your proceedings, and in every respect to observe that secrecy to which you are sworn for obvious ends of justice and dignity.

As to the scope of your inquiries, they are coextensive with the jurisdiction of this court. They cannot go beyond. You are restricted to the statutes of the United States. The warrant for your finding must be found in them. This results from the nature of our governments, state and federal. Congress ordains laws to define and protect the operations of the government of the United States within the states. To this end it establishes courts of its own, and intrusts to them the due assertion and enforcement of its laws. Every question arising under the constitution, the laws, and the treaties of the United States are either primarily or mediately referable to the federal courts. Hence, if these respective tribunals, state and federal, keep within their prescribed orbits, and discharge their whole duty to the laws of both, there will scarcely be room or occasion for conflict of jurisdiction. But the moment a law of congress is disobeyed in any judicial quarter the danger of this collision becomes imminent, and it becomes the duty of all having power to guard against it to take every possible precaution to prevent it.

Under this persuasion and with this view I deem it my duty to call your special attention to a law of congress designed to secure to all persons "the equal protection of the laws," the denial of which, in a late case in this district, has brought the circuit court of the district in conflict with a state court, apparently to the disquietude of the public. I allude to an act of congress forbidding, under penalties, any discrimination on account of race or color to be made by those charged with the duty of returning jury lists.

Before citing it, however, I would beg leave to recall to you the requirements of your state laws and constitution, not that you have to deal with them on this occasion, but to show you that in the execution of this act of congress you are not asked to do anything contrary to them, but only what is strictly conformable to them. By the laws of the state no discrimination is made on account of race or color in the liability of its citizens to jury service. All male citizens, twenty-one years of age, not over sixty, who are entitled to vote and hold office under the constitution and laws of this state, shall be liable to serve as jurors, etc. Code Va. p. 1058, c. 157, § 1. This could not be otherwise, under the state constitution or the fourteenth amendment of the United States constitution. The former was adopted prior to the ratification of the latter, and it will be seen that the guarantees of the bill of rights are quite as strong as the language of this amendment. It is declared as follows (chapter 20): "That all citizens of the state are hereby declared to possess equal civil and political rights and public privileges." Chapter 21: "The declaration of the political rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this state are hereby declared to be a part of the constitution of this commonwealth and shall not be violated on any pretence whatever." This, then, is a fundamental provision of your own state constitution. It was adopted by an overwhelming majority on the 6th of July, 1869. Following this, on the 8th of October, of the same year, was the formal ratification of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the nation. It is in these words: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." By the concluding clause of this amendment congress has power to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. In the exercise of this power congress has passed sundry laws to maintain this equality of rights, and to redress their violations. Prominent among these acts is the one I now desire to give you in charge. It is the act of March 1, 1875. It assures to all, without discrimination of race or color, the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations and privileges of inns, public conveyances, theatres, and other places of amusement, and provides exemplary redress for the denial thereof. But it does not stop here. These are the lesser matters of the law, which, indeed, it scrupulously guards and protects; but it goes farther, and embraces the great monument of life and liberty in preserving "the trial by an impartial jury," and conforming to the grand "rescript" that "no man shall be deprived of his liberty except by the laws of the land or the judgment of his peers." This act, therefore, secures by its fourth clause to the lately enfranchised race the inestimable privilege of having their rights and privileges tried by jurors not subject to the traditional influences and spirit of caste. This is a great practical good, which this law seeks to secure, and, as such, deserves your earnest attention in the inquest with which I now charge you. But it must be admitted its scope is broader. It is well for you to consider its language. It is in these words: "That no citizen, possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined not more than five thousand dollars."

It so happens that under the state laws the duty of making out and returning jury lists is devolved upon the judges of the county and corporation courts. Code Va. § 3, ch. 157, p. 1059. The act in question has, therefore, to deal with these officers. It is at this point congress intervenes, and constrains them by penalties to observe these provisions, which have naturally grown out of the fourteenth amendment. The offense thus denounced consists in the exclusion by these officers from their jury lists of qualified citizens because of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The motive makes and constitutes the misdemeanor. It may be difficult to prove. It is not given to you to know what passes in the mind of another; but, like all unlawful intents, the evidence of it may be found in presumptions of fact. When this intent has been declared, or where a demand of a lawful jury without this discrimination has been refused, the offense would be clearly made out, provided you believe the witness to the declaration or denial. But such indubitable proof may not often be expected. You must look to the surrounding circumstances of the case and the overt acts of the parties to fix the intention of the latter in this exclusion. If it should appear to you that such officer has, by a long and unvarying course, refused to put on his lists the names of colored persons duly qualified, you would be compelled to accept this conduct as evidence of his guilt, indict him for the offense, and give him the opportunity to repel these strong presumptions of fact against him. If, on the contrary, it shall appear that these persons have sometimes listed, or offered to summon when asked, juries without this discrimination of race, you would scarcely be justified to impute this unlawful intent to such occasional omission. It is, in my view, the habitual neglect or the special denial in civil or criminal suits involving the antipathies of race that is aimed at by this act of congress. I trust it will be sufficient for the ends of public justice that attention should be attracted to this law by your findings. I cannot and do not suspect these officers of obstinate or determined disobedience to law. That may be determined by the future. It is the observance of the law, and not punishment for the violation, that is sought. But you and I must obey the laws we are sworn to administer. We cannot be deterred from it by clamors and threats, however industriously raised against us. I feel confident you are duly impressed with the sense of your responsibility, and that you cannot and will not shrink from doing your whole duty.

This inquisition has already taken place in the counties pertaining to the courts at Danville. It remains for you now to prosecute it in counties represented on your panel, leaving the grand juries of the other courts to resume it on their respective parts. If it should be found here, as at Danville, that some obey and others disobey the law, you must needs choose between them. Both cannot be right. If you excuse the disobedient, you reflect on the obedient. It is your duty to enforce a uniform obedience, and exact a universal respect for the laws. If this shall be faithfully and fearlessly done throughout my whole district, it will arrest future resort to the federal courts for a denial in this respect of "the equal protection of the laws," and leave the state courts in the full and free exercise of their appropriate jurisdiction. But if this be not done, and a plain duty is evaded under artfully devised and misplaced scruples as to the law, you will be fomenting further disorders and conflicts. I am at loss to conceive of any motive on the part of honorable and intelligent citizens to undertake in any way to obstruct the great organic measures to which your faith, as a people, is pledged in the most solemn manner, or to thwart the mission of the general government, in all its departments to give the equal protection of the laws to all its citizens without distinction.

Before the Rebellion it must be conceded that the general government was felt by our people only in the blessings it dispensed; in the maintenance of commerce and peace with all nations; the encouragement of our industries, productions, and manufactures; in a sound, convertible currency; and in admirable postal facilities for all the varied demands of intercourse and business. This was necessarily and in a great measure changed by the war of the Rebellion. A heavy debt was incurred in its suppression by arms. That debt fell upon the people of all the states alike, and had to be raised by direct excises. But happily these direct taxes are not, like those following the war of 1812, a burden upon property. They now rest upon articles of luxury, and arise from consumption. Those who do not use tobacco or whisky, nor deal in them, go free of this impost. Nevertheless the necessities of its collection and the protection of these revenues from illicit traffic brings within the states the collector for the sale of stamps to legitimate the traffic, and his deputies to supervise and suppress the violation of these laws. But they do not come among us without ample protection by law against their venality, extortion, or corruption. You will therefore scrutinize this as well as every other branch of the federal service in your midst, with the view of detecting and exposing any and every malversation in office. But, at the same time, you will see to it that these officers are duly protected in their rightful functions. It is not to be tolerated that they should be met and resisted by arms, and exposed to dastardly assassination by bands of defiant offenders. Not only has this resistance gone thus far elsewhere, but the state courts have arrayed themselves against these officers by indicting them for acts of resistance to these marauders, and refusing them a trial in the federal courts, as ordained by act of congress. This state of things is insufferable, and subversive of government and law. I trust it can never exist in this district. I look to you to denounce all such lawlessness, and to spare no pains to search out these contempters of law and civilization, and bring them to this bar for trial and punishment.

In calling your attention thus emphatically to the foregoing offenses, I would not have you forget that you have to pass under review, however cursory, all the criminal statutes of the United States. You will find them compiled under title 70 of the Revised Statutes, and are classified under heads respectively of crimes against the existence of the government; against public justice; against official misconduct; and finally against the elective franchise and the civil rights of citizens.

From this title you will see that there is no form of official wrong or corruption that has not been foreseen and provided for by congress. It is therefore largely in your power to maintain the purity and integrity of the federal service by denouncing all infractions of these laws. Hence, I especially solicit your scrutiny into the conduct of all the federal agencies within your district, pertaining to the courts, the revenue service, the national banks, and the postoffices. They are all closely allied to the interests of the people, and all reposing trust in you would like to be certified by you that all these departments are satisfactorily and purely administered. It does not fall to your lot, as much as elsewhere, to take cognizance of illicit distilling. It is, for the most part, restricted to the mountain fastnesses of the district, where it is more apt to escape detection and secure impunity. I am sorry to say that this offense has not decreased, as I hoped it would from the number of convictions had and the exemplary punishment inflicted. There seems to be a strange sort of fascination about it, proof against all the pains and penalties of the law. Nevertheless we are bound to pursue it. The law is too plain; the mischief too manifest; the evil example of impunity too flagrant. We must persevere to the end. The law must not be borne down by continuous violations and persistent defiance.

In conclusion, you need scarcely be assured that the court is ready to exert all its authority to maintain the dignity and promote the success of your deliberations. Its process and its officers are at your call, to enable you to extend your researches; but at the same time I must urge you to all convenient dispatch, and the utmost practicable economy of time and money.

NOTE [from original report]. By the resolution of the general assembly of Virginia the attorney-general of the state was instructed to take proper steps to bring the subject of arrest of the county judges indicted under this charge for review by that court. That court had not passed on this subject when this volume was published.

Case No. 18,260.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—CIVIL RIGHTS ACT.

[21 Int. Rev. Rec. 173.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. March, 1875.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CIVIL RIGHTS OF COLORED PEOPLE—THIRTEENTH AND FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

[1. The thirteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States simply abolished slavery. It gave the freedman no right of protection from the federal government superior to that of his white fellow citizens, and no exemption from the power of state control which might be exercised against others. It gave congress no more authority to enact that he should have the right to vote, to testify, to make contracts, to hold real estate, exercise trade, attend public school, or any other matter within the limits of a state, than it does to enact the same thing in reference to white men.]

[2. The provision of the fourteenth amendment, that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," prohibits the action of the state alone; it gave congress no power to legislate against the wrongs and personal violence of citizens.]

[3. The privileges and immunities which this clause forbids the states to abridge are only that limited class which depend immediately upon the constitution of the United States, such as the right to pass from state to state and to the national capital, to protection upon the high seas and in foreign countries, and the like.]

[4. Congress has no authority, under the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments, or otherwise, to declare it a crime for any individuals to deny to negroes the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of the theaters and inns of a state.]

EMMONS, Circuit Judge (charging grand jury). It is to be regretted that a question of such exceptional importance, and one which is producing so much excitement, should come before the court in this form. At an early day, however, and during the term, we are compelled by law to decide the matter you lay before us. The severe penalties imposed by this law upon prosecuting attorneys and other officials will, we are advised, be attempted to be enforced should the grand jury fail to indict, in the assumption that their action will be controlled by such officers unless the court acts. Every consideration makes it a duty to answer your question at once. You ask whether it is a crime for which you have a right to find an indictment that a negro has been denied "the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of the theaters and inns" of the state. Such a denial is not an offense over which congress can give this court jurisdiction. Those are matters which the state government alone controls. The parties who think themselves aggrieved can bring civil action in this court at once. Any decision we may then make can be reviewed by the supreme court. In ordinary circumstances, this brief reply is all which we should make. It is all which, as a very general rule, the proprieties of such occasions authorize. But such are the exceptional conditions which attend these complaints before you, and such the excited condition of those classes whom the law was intended to affect, that after much hesitation we have yielded to an earnest request to state, in a simple and untechnical form, the reason upon which our advice rests. To do this successfully, in haste and without preparation, is still more difficult for a judge than to treat the matter technically, when addressing the judicial and professional mind.

Until the three recent amendments to the national constitution, which abolished slavery and attempted to protect the civil and political rights of the freedmen, all parties conceded that the federal government had no power whatever to restrain such an offense as this. The punishment of murder, arson, assaults and batteries, trespasses, frauds, injuries to reputation, of obstructions to the right of attending church, public schools, theaters, and forcing the right of being accommodated in inns, and by common carriers within the state, were matters not only not granted to the general government, but in the constitution itself expressly reserved to the states. The vast mass of civil and political rights included in the commendous phrase, the right of "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," rested entirely under state protection. To this familiar and unquestioned truism, there was universal assent then and is now. The only question presented for judicial determination is, have these amendments completely revolutionized the whole character of our government? Because it is entirely evident that, if congress has the power of regulating the theater and "other places of amusement" in Memphis and other cities of the Union, this necessarily involves the power of protecting the more sacred and important rights of the colored citizen.

The thirteenth amendment abolished slavery only; it did no more. It gave the freedman no right of protection from the federal government superior to that of his white fellow citizens, and no exemption from the power of state control which might be exercised against others. The right of legislation secured to congress in the amendment was that only of creating penalties for a violation of its provisions, and providing securities against the re-establishment of slavery, either generally or in particular instances. It accords no more authority to enact that he should have the right to vote, to testify, to make contracts, to hold real estate, exercise trade, attend public schools, or any other matter or thing within the limits of a state, than it does to enact the same thing in reference to white men. The utmost effect of this great provision in our constitution was to make the colored man a citizen, equal before the laws with the race which had enslaved him. For this purpose the fourteenth amendment was by no means necessary. So far as the control of congress is concerned, the states were still free to legislate in reference to what persons should attend theaters, be accommodated at inns, or be transported by common carriers within the states. As an illustration of unquestioned local state power anterior to this amendment, we suggest a fact in the history of the state of Michigan. By the voice of the people, it three times denied the colored race, though taxed, the right of voting. The supreme court of that state sustained as lawful the action of a steamboat master excluding a colored person from the steamer's cabin, compelling him to take passage on the deck. These judges were high-toned gentlemen, of far more than ordinary legal culture and ability, and elected to their places by a then strongly predominant antislavery party in the state. They sustained the action of the carrier, as a wholesome police regulation, calculated, in view of our American education and prejudices, to secure peace and harmony in that department of commerce and business under his control. It was deemed injudicious that the law should interfere with his action. The state legislature, also overwhelmingly antislavery in sentiment, might have changed this rule, but refused to do so. Against this action, political and judicial, a large and influential portion of the people earnestly struggled and protested. But all understood, from the numerous rulings of the supreme court, there was no power in congress to interfere with the decision of the judges and the people of the state. Like conditions, in a greater or less degree, characterized nearly every free state in the Union. A nearly similar judgment, arising upon facts since the amendment, has recently been pronounced by the learned judge of the superior court of Cleveland, Ohio, in which he ruled that the manager of a theater might lawfully exclude from the dress-circle a colored person of ever so much respectability. It would seem to be clear that the abolition of slavery placed the negro in the former slave states just where he had before stood in the free states. What congress could not do in reference to a free negro in a Northern state, where slavery never existed, before the abolition of slavery, it could not afterwards do in regard to one living in the South. We conclude with confidence that the thirteenth amendment did not authorize congress to interfere with the private and internal regulations of theater managers, hotel keepers, or common carriers within the state, in reference to colored persons, any more than it did in regard to their white fellow citizens.

It will simplify the subject, before considering the fourteenth amendment, to say that the clauses forbidding the "states to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, or deny to any person the equal protection of the laws," have no application to this subject. They are intended solely to prevent the arbitrary transfer of property from citizen to citizen without legal adjudication or process, and to prevent the establishment of tribunals for one class of persons varying from those which determine the rights of all. These inhibitions, too, beyond all controversy, are aimed at the action of the state only, and have no reference to individuals. The only provision of the fourteenth amendment which affects this question is that which provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States." It would be as useless as it would be improper, in view of the authoritative judgment of the court of last resort, to do more than to explain just what it announces. In what are known as the Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 394, two points were established: First, that this clause prohibited the action of the state alone, and gave congress no power to legislate against the wrongs and personal violence of the citizen; second, that the privileges and immunities which a state could not abridge were only that limited class which depended immediately upon the constitution of the United States. They are few in number, and of little importance to the great mass of the colored race in their present condition. The right to pass from state to state and to the national capital, to protection upon the high seas and in foreign countries, and a few others, were stated as illustrations. The great body of our civil and political rights, that of acquiring and enjoying property, real and personal, to exercise trades, attend schools and churches, to be protected against personal violence, and enjoy the freedom of opinion, were declared to rest entirely under state protection, and were not included in this amendment.

In reference to the first proposition, that the power of congress was not called into action under this clause until the state, through its political power, had violated its provisions by passing or attempting to enforce some law, obtained the unanimous consent of every member of the court. We do not understand that this is anywhere questioned. This legislation, therefore, when no such exigency has occurred, is without authority, and it is our duty, for this reason, to advise you not to find an indictment for a violation of its provisions.

The second proposition, affirmed by a majority of the court, just as conclusively establishes the invalidity of this law. The character of the wrong done—that of excluding a citizen from an hotel and a theater—is not such as congress has any right to punish. They, say the supreme court, are violations of such rights as attach to citizens of a state, and do not belong to those which he enjoys as a citizen of the United States. It is this latter limited class of rights only which the fourteenth amendment protects. Within this judgment, therefore, there is no power of federal legislation to provide penalties for the violation of any privilege save the few which are enjoyed peculiarly under the federal constitution. The right to go from state to state, to visit the capital, and other national privileges, congress may protect. All others, among which are the rights claimed to have been infringed in the present instance, are beyond its control. For this additional reason the law which attempts to protect them is void for the want of power in the body which passed it. The Slaughterhouse Cases [supra] were well calculated to have elicited a different judgment, if the court had not felt constrained upon principle to decide it as it did. A state law had substantially interfered with the trade and calling of a large class of citizens. Every butcher and dealer in meats over a widespread territory was compelled to pay an onerous tribute to a single corporation. But their right to carry on a trade, to acquire and dispose of property, was held not to come within the protection of the fourteenth amendment. There was no middle ground for the court. They must hold either that it completely revolutionized the whole theory of our government, and transferred to federal control all those rights hitherto alone protected by state laws, or hold, upon the other hand, that it referred only to the few privileges secured by the national constitution. That court in the same volume applied the same principle where a woman in Illinois was rejected as an applicant for admission to the bar. It again decided that such right was not one of the immunities protected by the amendment. In [Bartemeyer v. Iowa] 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 129, a state law having deprived a citizen of the right to sell what he owned and possessed, it held that the selling of property was a privilege and immunity protected by state laws and constitutions only, and was not protected by this clause. With the fact that this interpretation was equivalent to expunging it from the amendments altogether we have nothing to do. It is true, unquestionably, that any violation of any privilege or immunity protected by the federal constitution, by the state, could be punished and redressed by congressional law before the adoption of this amendment. As now judicially read by the court of last resort, it leaves the organic law in this regard precisely where it was before. It is one of those constructions, often resorted to, to prevent consequences serious and revolutionary, which courts believe were not contemplated by legislatures who pass laws, and by the people who adopt constitutions.

We do not deem it indelicate to express our sympathy with that large and respectable class of our fellow citizens, including beyond question a majority of the more conservative Christian gentlemen of the South, who regret that there exists nowhere, in either government, state or national, the power of punishing those mean and cowardly murders which are so frequently disgracing our civilization before the world. Although we have carried the doctrine of local government in township and county organizations to a great extreme, we find in all its ordinary administrations most beneficial effects. To its universal application, however, most statesmen now agree there should be some exceptions. In no country but our own is the discreditable fact true that where murder, and cruel and shocking outrages, are perpetrated by a dominant party in a narrow region of country, there is no power of punishment, save through the impracticable instrumentality of those who have either committed or sympathized with the crime. When conspiracies and combinations against the property, well-being, and life of classes of persons in the small divisions of our country include large portions of the constabulary, the magistracy, and the jurors, grand and traverse, the inevitable consequence must be that the offenses they commit, or with which they sympathize, will be perpetrated with impunity. Unless our statesmen, state or national, create some jurisdiction of wider scope, and which will authorize indictments and trial beyond the narrow limits a majority of whose citizens abet the crime to be punished, the nation must still submit to the disgrace of yearly additions of mean and courage-wanting murders of the innocent and the helpless, without the slightest infliction of any legal penalty upon the offenders. It has been our painful duty in repeated instances to charge juries that the federal court had no cognizance of offenses where crimes so cruel and shocking have been proved that court, jury, and audience could scarcely refrain from tears of sympathy, and where the elegantly dressed, socially well-connected, and shameless murderers had, in the communities where they had shed innocent blood, not only confessed but boasted of their crimes, and who had either not been indicted at all, or, when tried, had been acquitted by juries, their coadjutors in crime, amid the acclamations of their co-conspirators. In a very recent case it was proved that a young man of wealth, education, and most estimable moral character was shot to death at midday in his own house by a band of ruffians, for no other reason than that he had acted as the chairman of a committee to wait upon the governor of his state to solicit his action for the protection of the negroes of his county who were being driven from their homes, their houses burned, and themselves murdered by the lawless conspirators by whom he was killed. The mock trial by which these infamous offenders were triumphantly acquitted was a still greater stain upon our civilization than the monstrous crime it affected to try. It is believed by many of our best citizens that there should be here, as in every other government on earth, some power to bring such wicked men to justice, outside of, and uncontrolled by, the wills and hands which have united in their atrocities. As it does not now exist, and as no attempt at alteration is made by the state powers, it is natural that all those whose hearts are not of flint, and hope to be blessed and prosper as they do unto others so they would that others should do unto them, should strive to the uttermost to find the source of protection in the federal constitution. In the present condition of public opinion the remedy should, perhaps, be sought through the political action of the state only. I have but small sympathy with the right of the negro to see the immodest and vulgar display in the ballet dance, which in modern times so universally disgraces the best theatrical presentations. I would have selected some more precious and beneficent privilege for protection, if the power had existed. We turn from this almost grotesque exercise of national authority, and express our regret only that it cannot be exerted to protect from pillage and murder the humble homes of those peaceful toilers who quietly and inoffensively labor to support their wives and little ones, and who do not officiously and distastefully thrust themselves in the face of those lighter and less reflective portions of society so frequently found among theatrical audiences. We believe the actual history of this unhappy question demonstrates that, where no legal force or constraint is used, the lady and gentleman of solid position and real cultivation are least annoyed by his presence when he is really worthy and cultivated; that, when left unstimulated by foreign and wicked influences, his own good sense, guided by public opinion, keeps him in his proper position as uniformly as all other classes of society.

A recent judgment of one of the learned justices of the supreme court, after enjoying the benefits of the elaborate arguments, and participating in the dissenting opinions in the Slaughterhouse Cases, still affirms that violence upon the negro, simply because he is such, finding its sole animus in his race and color, may be made penal by congressional enactment. This utterance suggests, what otherwise we should have deemed impossible, that the supreme court may still find in the thirteenth amendment, which abolishes slavery, or the first clause in the fourteenth, which creates citizenship, so much incidental power to protect what they create, as will sustain a national law punishing the crime, where life, liberty, and property are violently taken, solely on account of the race and color of the party injured. Our sympathies are in that direction. Could we see a plausible path, leading to such ground, after what that court has said, we would gladly stand upon it. But so demonstrative appears to us the arguments, in view of the judgments of the supreme court already rendered, that a crime perpetrated by one citizen of Tennessee upon another, when it consists in the violation of some right which is enjoyed solely as the citizen of the state, and depends in no degree upon the national constitution, that we feel at liberty to give no different advice.

Case No. 18,261.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

[1 Blatchf. 635.]¹

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April, 1851.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

1. Considerations stated, which led to the enactment of the law of September 18, 1850 (9 Stat. 462), commonly called "The Fugitive Slave Law."
2. The several provisions of that law examined.
3. The prior act of February 12, 1793 (1 Stat. 302), was constitutional.
4. In regard to the power conferred by the act of 1850 upon those appointed to administer it judicially, it simply substitutes commissioners in place of the state magistrates to whom the act of 1793 confided the power.
5. The power to execute the act of 1850 is exclusive in the federal courts and officers named in it.
6. State tribunals and officers cannot, by the writ of habeas corpus, interfere with the federal authorities when they are acting upon cases arising under that act.
7. Nor can the state tribunals, under that writ, enquire into the constitutionality of the law or the jurisdiction of the federal court or officer.
8. The writ may be issued by the state authority, and it is the duty of the federal officer to make a return to it; but, when it appears that the detainer is by virtue of process issued under the act of 1850, any further proceeding under the writ is void.
9. In such case the federal officer must not give the party up, but must maintain his process with all the power conferred upon him.
10. The last clause of section 6 of the act of 1850 includes, among other process, the state writ of habeas corpus; but it does not embrace that writ when issued by the federal judiciary.
11. The constitutionality of the provisions of the act of 1850, which confer on commissioners the power to act under it, and which provide for a summary hearing and decision, was settled by the case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539.
12. The "judicial power" mentioned in the constitution and vested in the "courts," means the power conferred upon "courts" in the strict sense of that term—courts that compose one of the three great departments of the government; and not power judicial in its nature, or quasi judicial, invested from time to time in individuals, separately or collectively, for a particular purpose and limited time.
13. The proceeding contemplated by the clause of the constitution in regard to the delivery of fugitives from service or labor, is not a suit at common law, within the meaning of the seventh amendment to the constitution.

14. So far as state laws conflict with the act of 1850, or tend to obstruct and embarrass its execution, they are utterly void.

At the commencement of the term, NELSON, Circuit Justice, in charging the grand jury, after instructing them upon the law applicable to the several cases that were to come before them, proceeded as follows:

Besides these instructions in respect to the cases on the calendar of the district attorney furnished to the court, I desire to call your attention, with some particularity, to a recent act of congress, commonly called "The Fugitive Slave Law," passed September 18, 1850.

This act has been the subject of much comment since its passage, and of various and conflicting opinions, both as concerns the constitutional principle involved, and the matters in detail embodied in its several provisions. It is a law, open resistance to the execution of which, as unconstitutional, has been recommended in some quarters; and in others, whether constitutional or not. As all persons concerned directly or indirectly in this resistance, or in any obstruction to its due execution, are guilty of an offence, and subjected to heavy punishment criminally, and also by civil damages to the aggrieved party, it is proper that the law should be understood, so that those, if any there be, who have made up their minds to disobey it may be fully apprised of the consequences.

The act, as you are aware, was passed for the purpose of carrying more effectually into execution a provision of the constitution of the United States; namely, a part of the second section of the fourth article. That provision is as follows: "No person held to service or labor in one state under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

At the time of the adoption of the constitution by the convention, on the 17th of September, 1787, slavery existed, I believe, to an extent more or less in each of the states then composing the Confederacy. About one-fifteenth of the population of New York were slaves; the proportion in the New England states and Pennsylvania was much less; and in New Jersey about the same as in New York. All the original states, therefore, were interested, more or less, in the adoption of this provision into the constitution, but more especially the Southern states, where, speaking generally and without strict accuracy, about half the population consisted of this class. It was, however, anticipated that, in the progress of time, slavery, while it would increase in the South, would diminish and finally become extinguished in the North.

So just was this provision regarded at the time by the members of the convention, and so necessary for the security of this species of labor, and the existence of friendly relations between the different members of the Union, that it was adopted without opposition, and by a unanimous vote. It was of the deepest interest to the Southern states, as, without the provision, every non-slaveholding state in the Union would have been at liberty, according to the general law of nations, to have declared free all runaway slaves coming within its limits, and to have given them harbor and protection against the claims of their masters. I need not say at this day, that such a state of things would have led inevitably to the bitterest animosities, especially between border states, and have been the source of perpetual strife, and of the fiercest passions, between the Northern and Southern portions of the Union. The evil was felt at the time by the Southern portion, as the articles of confederation contained no such provision; and it was to guard against that evil, and to lay a foundation that would afford future security, and preserve the friendly relations and intercourse of the states, that the provision was incorporated into the fundamental law. No one conversant with the history of the convention, and particularly with the difficulties that surrounded this subject in almost every stage of its proceedings, can doubt for a moment, that without this, or some equivalent provision, the constitution would never have been formed. It was of the last importance to the Southern portion of the Union, and could not have been surrendered without endangering their whole interest in this species of property. It is not surprising, therefore, that it is still adhered to with unyielding resolution, and is made the groundwork of a question upon which the continued existence of a Union thus formed is made to depend.

The clause in the constitution is general, and simply declares that the slave escaping into another state shall not thereby be discharged, by any law or regulation of the state to which he has fled; but shall be delivered up on claim of the person to whom the service is due.

The mode of delivering up to the claimant is not prescribed, and, until regulated by law, continued to be the source of embarrassment to the master, and of disturbance and disquietude among the states. This led to the first act of congress, passed February 12, 1793, during the sitting of the second session held under the constitution. It was enacted by a body of men, several of whom had been distinguished members of the convention, and is framed, in its leading features, in the spirit of the provision of the constitution which it was designed to carry into effect. It is signed by Jonathan Trumbull, of Connecticut, as speaker of the house of representatives, and John Adams, as vice president and president of the senate, and approved by George Washington, president of the United States, and was passed on the urgent recommendations of the governors of Pennsylvania and Virginia, between which states a difficulty had arisen in the surrender of fugitives.

The first section on the subject declares, that when any person held to labor in any of the United States, or in either of the territories, under the laws thereof, shall escape into any other state or territory, the person to whom such labor may be due, shall be authorized to seize or arrest such fugitive, and take him or her before any judge of the circuit or district courts of the United States, residing or being within the state, or before any magistrate of a county, city or town corporate, wherein such arrest shall be made, and upon proof to the satisfaction of the judge or magistrate, either by oral testimony or affidavit, that the person so arrested owes service to the person claiming him or her, it shall be the duty of the judge or magistrate to give a certificate thereof to such claimant, which shall be a sufficient warrant for his or her removal to the state or territory from which he or she fled. The remaining section inflicts a penalty upon any person who shall knowingly obstruct or hinder the claimant from arresting the fugitive, or rescue the same from him, or harbor or conceal the fugitive after notice.

This act has been on the statute book and in operation for more than fifty-seven years. Its constitutionality has been recognized and affirmed by the courts of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and New York, and by the supreme court of the United States in Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539, and has never been denied by any court, with the qualification that will be presently noticed. The case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania, in the courts of that state, is no exception to these remarks, as the jury found a special verdict, and the judgment was entered pro forma by agreement of counsel, for the purpose of carrying the question before the supreme court.

Doubts had been expressed, and, in some instances, decided opinions given by state judges, that it was not competent for congress to confer upon state magistrates the power to carry into execution a law of congress, inasmuch as the judicial power of the federal government was vested by the constitution in a supreme court, and in such inferior courts as congress might ordain and establish. It was also argued with much force, that if congress possessed this power, it might burden the state judiciary and magistrates with duties that would be incompatible with, or embarrass the faithful discharge of those which concerned the state.

Influenced by these views, or some others, the legislatures of some of the states passed laws forbidding their own magistrates from acting under the law in the surrender of fugitives, and enforced the prohibition with heavy penalties. It is not doubted that it was entirely competent for the states to prohibit their own magistrates from assuming the duty of executing the law; but it was held in Prigg v. Pennsylvania, to be clear, that if not so forbidden, it was competent for them to act, and that the exercise of the authority under the law would be valid and binding upon all the parties concerned. This interference of the state legislatures greatly paralyzed the execution of the law; and, indeed, had the effect, for the time being, to abrogate virtually the provision of the constitution. It left but one, or at most two officers in a state, competent to execute it, as the power was thereby restricted to the circuit and district judges of the United States. Our own state, as early as 1830, forbade her magistrates from acting, under the penalty of fine and imprisonment. 2 Rev. St. p. 561, § 14. These, and other more direct interferences by legislative acts of the states with the execution of the law of 1793, together with the open resistance with which its execution was met in some instances, by combinations against law, led, necessarily, to the recent supplementary act: and to which I wish now particularly to call your attention.

This act is designed, first, to substitute officers of the federal government in the place of these state magistrates; and second, to arm the officers with sufficient power and authority to enable them to execute the law against any resistance actual or threatened, and in whatever form it may be presented. The act has grown out of the exigencies and necessities to which I have referred, and was forced upon the attention of congress, mainly by the legislative interference of the states. Had not the law of 1793 been thus crippled it would, probably, have afforded all the means necessary to the execution of the constitutional provision.

This supplementary act is obviously framed with great skill and care; and bears upon its face the deep conviction of the body that enacted it, that the constitutional provision had not only been disregarded, but, that a settled purpose, a fixed determination, existed in some portions of the country, to set its obligations at naught. The act meets this condition of things, real or supposed, and clothes the public authorities with powers adequate to the exigency.

It confers authority upon commissioners appointed by the circuit courts of the United States, in addition to the judges, to carry into execution its several provisions, and makes it the duty of the marshals and deputy marshals to execute all warrants and precepts issued by the judges or commissioners under the act, subjecting them to a fine of $1,000, to the use of the claimant, in case of refusal; and, after the arrest, and while the fugitive is in their custody, if he or she is allowed to escape with or without their assent, the marshal is made liable upon his official bond, to be prosecuted for the benefit of the claimant, for the full value of the slave. The commissioners are also empowered, within the counties in which they respectively reside, to appoint, in writing, one or more suitable persons, from time to time, to execute all warrants and other process issued by them in the performance of their duties, with authority to the commissioners, or the persons thus appointed, to summon and call to their aid the by-standers or posse comitatus of the county, when necessary to insure the due execution of the law; and it is made the duty of the citizens thus called to the aid of the officers, to assist in the execution of the process whenever their services are required.

The act further provides, that the claimant may pursue and reclaim the fugitive, either by procuring a warrant from the court, judge or commissioner of the proper circuit, district, or county, for his apprehension, or by arresting him, or her, where it may be practicable, without warrant, and by taking or causing the fugitive to be taken forthwith before the proper officer, whose duty it is made to hear and determine the case in a summary manner; and, upon satisfactory proof, either oral or by deposition, properly taken and certified, that the person so arrested owes service and labor to the claimant, in the state or territory whence he or she fled, and that he or she had escaped from such service, to grant a certificate to the claimant, setting forth substantially the facts of the case. This certificate is made conclusive evidence of the right of the claimant to remove the fugitive back to the state or territory whence he or she escaped, and is declared to be sufficient authority to prevent all molestation of the claimant by any process issued by any court, magistrate, or other person whomsoever.

The act subjects to fine and imprisonment, and also to civil damages to the party aggrieved, any and every person who shall knowingly obstruct, hinder or prevent the claimant or his agent from arresting the fugitive, either with or without process, or who shall rescue or attempt to rescue the same from the custody of the claimant or his agent, or who shall aid or assist, directly or indirectly, in the escape of the fugitive, or who shall harbor or conceal the same, so as to prevent the discovery and arrest, after notice that such person is a fugitive from service.

The act further provides, that if the claimant or his agent shall make affidavit, after the certificate is granted, that he has reason to apprehend a rescue by force, before the fugitive can be taken beyond the limits of the state in which the arrest is made, it shall be the duty of the marshal or officer making the arrest, to retain the fugitive in his custody, and to remove the same to the state whence he or she had escaped, and there to deliver him or her to the claimant or his agent; and to employ as many persons as he may deem necessary to overcome such force; and to retain them in his service so long as, in his judgment, the circumstances may require.

These, together with some regulations as to the mode of proof before the judge or commissioner, embrace substantially every material provision of the act. And it will excite, I think, some surprise, after the determined opposition to its passage, and even threatened, and, in some instances, actual resistance to its execution in certain quarters, when it is seen, that there is not a power conferred upon those appointed to administer it judicially, that was not conferred upon the judges and other state magistrates under the act of 1793—a law approved by Washington and Adams, and enacted by the fathers and founders of the republic. It is simply, in this respect, a substitution of the commissioners in the place of the state magistrates, who were disabled and prevented from discharging the duty by the state authorities. Full confidence was reposed in them by the federal government, so long as they were permitted to act. When thus disabled, other officers were selected, of necessity, to supply their places. This is the only difference, as it regards the judicial authority conferred by the act. Neither is there any power conferred by it on the claimant, his attorney, or agent, that is not found in the act of 1793. All the additional powers are conferred upon the ministerial officers, the marshals and deputy marshals, who are required to execute the warrants and other process issued in pursuance of its provisions, and which warrants and process are the same as those provided for in the previous act, and none others. Every ground of opposition to this recent act, distinguishable from opposition to the former, is exclusively referable to the powers with which the marshal and his deputies are armed with a view to its execution—powers essential to enforce obedience to the mandates of the officers, and to put down, with a strong hand, if necessary, all disaffection, disorder, insubordination, or resistance, in whatever form presented. The apprehension that any new or extraordinary powers have been vested in the judges or commissioners is entirely groundless; there is not even a pretext for any such apprehension. The only apprehension for which there is the slightest foundation is, that the powers which have been possessed by the judges and state magistrates, since the act of 1793, and are now given to the commissioners in their places, may be effectually executed; that the law is made stronger than the combinations and treasonable influences arrayed against it; and that the provision of the constitution may be enforced and executed in the faith and spirit in which it was adopted.

Another subject arising out of the provisions of this law, and which has a material bearing upon its execution, it is proper should be noticed. By the second section of the third article of the constitution it is declared, that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." The power, therefore, it will be seen, to execute this act of congress belongs to the tribunals and authorities of the federal government; and, in respect to these, can be executed only by such courts or officers as are especially designated in the act for the purpose. The power, therefore, is exclusive in these courts or officers, both as it respects the tribunals of the state, and others of the federal government. Neither can act or interfere in the execution of the law; and, in case of any attempt by either to interfere or exercise the authority, its acts would be coram non iudice and void. These propositions are elementary, and so obvious as to require no further comment.

It seems to be supposed, however, in some quarters, that the state power exercised by its tribunals under the writ of habeas corpus, forms an exception to this generally admitted doctrine; and that, through the agency of this writ, the fugitive may be taken out of the hands of the federal officers, and the authority or propriety of the arrest or detainer be inquired into, and the person be discharged or remanded, according to the judgment of the state magistrate. This is the exception claimed to the exclusive power of the federal officers designated in the act.

It is apparent, if this exception can be maintained, that there is an end to the complete execution of the law; or, indeed, of any law of the general government by which the party is subject to an arrest. It is not claimed that the state magistrate can, under this writ, administer the act and enforce its provisions, as that authority, as we have seen, is confined to the tribunals appointed by the act for the purpose. The fugitive must therefore be taken, if taken at all, out of the hands of the federal officers by force of some other law; and the question whether he or she shall be discharged or remanded, will depend upon the application of that law to the particular case. What that law is, or may be, must necessarily depend upon on state regulation; and the rights of the claimant under the constitution and laws of the Union will thus be determined by a law of the state.

The effectual abrogation of the act by the interposition of this writ, if admitted, will be still more apparent, when we reflect that the power exercised under it is such as the state legislatures may choose to prescribe; and that the state tribunals are not only invested with that power, but, if they act at all, are bound to act in obedience to and in conformity with it. There is no limit, therefore, to the extent of the powers that may be exercised under this proceeding, in respect to the arrest and detainer of the fugitive, but the discretion of the state legislatures. They may confer jurisdiction upon their magistrates to re-examine and revise the acts and decisions of the federal tribunals out of whose hands the fugitive is taken, and the state magistrate would be bound to execute the power accordingly. It is manifest that it would be impossible to uphold the due execution of the law with the admission of any such authority.

Conceding, however, the soundness of this general view, and the inability of the state tribunals to interfere with the federal authorities when they are acting upon cases arising under the constitution, laws of congress, or treaties, still, it is argued that they possess the power, under this writ, to inquire into the legality of the authority under which the prisoner is held, and which may involve the constitutionality of the law and the jurisdiction of the court or officer. But, it is obvious that the existence of either power, on the part of the state tribunals, would be fatal to the authority of the constitution, laws, and treaties of the general government. No government could maintain the administration or the execution of its laws, civil or criminal, if their constitutionality, or the jurisdiction of its judicial tribunals, were subject to the determination of another. I need not stop, however, to discuss this question, as it arose and was settled in the case of U. S. v. Peters, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 115, more familiarly known as Olmstead's Case. The legislature of Pennsylvania had passed an act declaring that the jurisdiction claimed by the district court of the United States was unconstitutional, and empowered the governor to resist the execution of its judgment. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, observed, that "if the legislatures of the several states may, at will, annul the judgments of the courts of the United States, and destroy the rights acquired under those judgments, the constitution itself becomes a solemn mockery; and the nation is deprived of the means of enforcing its laws by the instrumentality of its own tribunals." He further remarked that "if the ultimate right to determine the jurisdiction of the courts of the Union is placed by the constitution in the several state legislatures, then this act concludes the subject; but, if that power necessarily resides in the supreme judicial tribunal of the nation, then the jurisdiction of the district court of Pennsylvania over the case in which that jurisdiction was exercised, ought to be most deliberately examined; and the act of Pennsylvania, with whatever respect it may be considered, cannot be permitted to prejudice the question." I need not add that the judgment was regularly enforced, notwithstanding the state act.

There have been different opinions entertained by the judges of the states as to their power, under this writ, to decide upon the validity of a commitment or detainer by the authority of the United States. But those who have been inclined to entertain this jurisdiction, admit that it cannot be upheld, where it appears from the return that the proceeding belonged exclusively to the cognizance of the general government. This necessarily results from the vesting of the judicial power of the Union in the federal courts and officers; and from the fourth article of the constitution, which declares, that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." If the exclusive power to execute the act is in the federal judiciary, and the act is to be regarded as the supreme law of the land, and to be obeyed as such, it is difficult to see by what right or authority its execution can be interfered with, through the agency of this writ, by state authorities. Any such interference would seem to be a direct infraction of the constitution.

It is proper to say, in order to guard against misconception, that I do not claim that the mere fact of the commitment or detainer of a prisoner by an officer of the federal government, bars the issuing of this writ, or the exercise of power under it. Far from that. Those officers may be guilty of illegal restraints of the liberty of the citizen, the same as others. The right of the state authorities to enquire into such restraints is not doubted; and it is the duty of the officer to obey the authority, by making a return. All that is claimed or contended for is, that when it is shown that the commitment or detainer is under the constitution, or a law of the United States, or a treaty, the power of the state authority is at an end; and any further proceeding under the writ is coram non iudice, and void. In such a case, that is, when the prisoner is in fact held under process issued from a federal tribunal under the constitution, or a law of the United States, or a treaty, it is the duty of the officer not to give him up, or allow him to pass from his hands in any stage of the proceedings. He should stand upon his process and authority, and, if resisted, maintain them with all the powers conferred upon him for that purpose. I certainly do not anticipate any such exigency. Far from it. The habitual respect of the judiciary, state and national, for the law of the land, and legal authority, forbid it. But it is proper that the officers should know their rights and their duties, if, unfortunately, by possibility, any such exigency should arise.

These views of the paramount authority of the laws of the federal government in no way endanger the liberty of the citizen. The writ of habeas corpus secured to him under that government, affords the appropriate and effectual remedy for any illegality in the process or want of jurisdiction in the court, or for any unconstitutionality of the law. The remedy is as prompt and summary, as when administered by the state judiciary: and, in this way, by conceding to each government the free and unobstructed execution of its own laws and exercise of its own authority, harmony is maintained and perpetuated in the working of our most complex system of government.

The views I have presented will explain a provision in this act of 1850, which is somewhat obscure. I allude to the last clause of the sixth section, which declares, that the certificate granted to the claimant to remove the fugitive "shall prevent all molestation of such person or persons by any process issued by any court, judge, magistrate, or other person whomsoever." This clause doubtless includes, among other process, the state writ of habeas corpus. It could not have been intended, or at least ought not to be construed as intending to embrace that writ when issued by the federal judiciary, as congress did not possess the power to suspend it. As it respects the state writ, we have seen, from the views expressed, that it is but declaratory of the existing law, and not the introduction of any new principle. Without this clause, the paramount authority of the certificate would have been the same, so far as that process was concerned.

It has been made a question upon this act, whether or not it was competent for congress to confer the power upon the United States commissioners to carry it into execution. As the judicial power of the Union is, by the constitution, vested in the supreme court, and in such inferior courts as congress may from time to time establish, the judges of which shall hold their offices during good behavior, it has been supposed that the power to execute the law must be conferred upon these courts, or upon judges possessing this tenure. It is a sufficient answer to this suggestion, that the same power was conferred upon the state magistrates by the act of 1793; and which, in the case of Frigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539, was held to be constitutional by the only tribunal competent, under the constitution, to decide that question. No doubt was entertained by any of the judges in that case, that these magistrates had power to act, if not forbidden by the state authorities.

The judicial power mentioned in the constitution, and vested in the courts, means the power conferred upon courts ordained and established by and under the constitution, in the strict and appropriate sense of that term—courts that compose one of the three great departments of the government prescribed by the fundamental law, the same as the other two, the legislative and the executive. But, besides this mass of judicial power belonging to the established courts of a government, there is no inconsiderable portion of power, in its nature judicial—quasi judicial—invested, from time to time, by legislative authority, in individuals, separately, or collectively, for a particular purpose and limited time. This distinction, in respect to judicial power, will be found running through the administration of all governments, and has been acted upon in this, since its foundation. A familiar case occurs in the institution of commissions for settling land claims and other claims against the government. 2 Stat. 324, 440. A strong illustration will be found in this state, under the old constitution of 1777. By that, justices of the peace were appointed by the council of appointment, and held their offices during the pleasure of that body. Yet, the powers possessed by these magistrates were conferred by acts of the legislature upon the aldermen of cities, who were elected by the people. But I need not pursue the subject, as the question must be regarded as settled by the case referred to.

The same answer may be given, also, to the objection founded upon the seventh amendment to the constitution, which provides that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." The summary mode of hearing and deciding upon the claim to the service of the fugitive, prescribed by the recent act, is the same as that prescribed by the act of 1793, which the court, in the case already referred to, held to be clearly constitutional in all its leading provisions. The proceeding contemplated by the clause of the constitution in question, is not a suit at common law, within the meaning of that amendment. It settles conclusively no right of the claimant to the service of the fugitive, except for the purpose of the removal to the state from which he or she fled—no more than the proceeding, in the case of a fugitive from justice, for the purpose of removal, settles his guilt. The question of right to the service in the one case, and of guilt in the other, is open to a final hearing and trial in the states whence the fugitives escaped. After their arrival there, the certificate is no longer of any authority, or evidence of any right. Indeed, so obviously does the constitution contemplate a summary hearing and decision in the matter, that the counsel for the state of Pennsylvania, in the case referred to, did not make it a point or call it seriously in question on the argument.

I have now gone over the several provisions of this law, and some of the more material questions arising out of it; and, if I am not greatly mistaken, have shown that all the leading features of it, all the principles involved, have been either confirmed by the only tribunal competent to pass upon them, or are so obvious that no lawyer can entertain a well grounded doubt upon them; and that congress has but obeyed an imperative constitutional obligation in its enactment. It is a law, therefore, which every citizen is bound to obey, and the public authorities to enforce, with all the powers conferred upon them by the government.

The legislatures of some of the states have passed laws bearing directly upon this provision of the constitution, and upon its execution in the mode prescribed by congress. So far as these laws are in conflict with the provisions of the one in question, or tend to obstruct and embarrass its execution, they are unconstitutional, and utterly void; and can afford no protection against its penalties. The law of congress is paramount, and must be obeyed.

Opinions were expressed in the case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania, that the power of congress to provide the mode of surrendering up the fugitive under the constitution was exclusive, and that the states were disabled from acting at all on the subject; others, that the power was concurrent, and, although the states could pass no law in conflict with the act of congress, it was competent for them to pass laws in aid of it, and in furtherance of the execution of the constitutional provision. It is not important here to express any opinion upon these different views; for, whether the one or the other shall finally prevail, the result is the same. In either view, a law in conflict with the act of congress is void, and of no effect.

It is not to be disguised, that the legislation of most if not all of the Northern states, tending to embarrass, and, in some instances, to annul the provisions of the act of 1793, has strongly impressed our Southern brethren with the conviction, that these states have resolved to throw off this constitutional obligation. They take it for granted, and it is difficult to deny the inference, that the acts reflect the general sentiment of the people on the subject; and that that must have become deep and abiding, to be sufficiently powerful to mould the legislation of the states. It is this legislation, more than occasional riotous assemblies in resistance of the law, that has forced them to the question, whether the Union, with this provision of the fundamental law rejected and condemned—a provision vital to the rights and interests of that portion, and without which the Union would never have been formed—is to them a blessing or a curse. A question raised, not by disaffected and tumultuous assemblies, often very equivocal evidence of the real sentiment of the public mind, but by the people of the states, through their organized governments; a question examined and discussed in the mode and through the agencies that examined and discussed that of entering into the Union at the adoption of the constitution.

This question has been raised by fifteen states of the Confederacy, six of whom were original parties to the compact. It has been examined and considered over and over again, by the governors in their public messages, by the representatives in their legislative halls, by the people in their primary assemblies, and by the press; and they have come to the resolution, one and all, that if this hostile legislation is carried into effect, and the constitutional obligation is no longer adhered to by their Northern brethren, but thrown off, disregarded, and condemned, the Union is no longer a blessing, and should be dissolved—that the abrogation of one material provision of the fundamental law is destructive of the compact—and that the portion of the Union for whose benefit it was adopted, and whose rights and interests are thereby endangered, is absolved from its allegiance. This I believe to be the settled conviction and sentiment of fifteen states of this Union, and it presents an issue of the gravest aspect, and one that can neither be evaded nor suppressed. It is an issue which the Northern states must determine for themselves. That laws exist on the statute books of most, if not all of them, in conflict with the act of congress, and repugnant to this provision of the constitution, is matter of history. That the enforcement of these laws would be a virtual abrogation of the provision, is not to be denied. It remains for these states to determine whether any attempt shall be made to enforce them—whether they are to remain on the statute book a dead letter, or be repealed. These are questions of transcendent import; for the determination of them, in my humble judgment, involves the perpetuity of the Union.

I am aware that opinions are entertained, and doubtless honestly entertained, that the Union has not been at any time in danger, and is not now. I wish these opinions were well founded. My deep conviction and belief are, that it depends, at this moment, upon the confidence inspired by the late proceedings in congress, and by the indications of public sentiment in the free states that this constitutional obligation will be hereafter executed in the faith and spirit with which it was entered into; that the friends of the Union in the slaveholding states now maintain their ascendancy, and the allegiance of their states, by the confidence thus inspired; and that in case of any action on the part of the Northern states, destructive of that confidence, and of all hope of the execution of the obligation, it would not be in their power to maintain their position—and, I may add, they would not, if they could.

If any one supposes that this Union can be preserved, after a material provision of the fundamental law upon which it rests is broken and thrown to the wind by one section of it—a provision in which nearly one-half of the states composing it are deeply and seriously interested—he is laboring under a delusion which the sooner he gets rid of the better. If it is preserved, which I do not doubt, it will be by a stern adherence to this fundamental law, and to every part and parcel of it; neither section can throw off the obligation of a part in which it has no interest, and expect to preserve the Union. The very supposition implies degradation and dishonor, broken faith on the one side, and abject submission on the other.

Neither can the motive for breaking the compact afford any apology or justification. If one article may be set aside by one portion, because it is repugnant to their sense of right and justice, another may be by another, because it is against their interest. That “no state shall, without the consent of the congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports,” is an article of this fundamental law. Suppose New York, deeming this article prejudicial to her interests by crippling too much her resources and revenue, should levy duties upon the immense trade and exchange now existing between the Great West and our Eastern brethren; or upon the vast coal trade with our neighboring sister, Pennsylvania, for which we afford so extensive a market; would the motive afford any excuse for the infraction of the constitution? And yet, looking at the compact, and to the constitutional duties and obligations arising out of it and binding all, this motive is just as available as any other to excuse or justify the infraction. The example of breaking the compact upon any motive is dangerous. With what face can one state rebuke another for want of allegiance, when she has thrown it off herself? Her rebuke would be “laughed to scorn.”

This Union must be preserved, if at all, by that stern, old-fashioned honesty and principle which inculcates the fulfilment of the whole of our constitutional duties and obligations, and of every part of them. It was this spirit that formed the compact, and has thus far preserved it through all its trials and assaults; and it is this spirit that must and will, I trust, carry it safely hereafter through whatever perils and misfortunes it may be destined to encounter. As men possessing these sturdy and manly virtues have thus far been found in the republic, equal to every trial and exigency, so, I do not doubt, such men will be found hereafter. And they will have their reward—the blessing of all good men of the times in which they live, and of unborn millions, who will be indebted to them, under the favor of heaven, for the rich heritage they enjoy.

Case No. 18,262.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

[2 Blatchf. 559.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct., 1851.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

1. So far as it respects an obstruction to the execution of legal process, or a forcible rescue of a fugitive from service, under the act of September 18, 1850 (9 Stat. 462), commonly called "The Fugitive Slave Law," the provisions of that act probably supersede those of the act of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 112), with one exception.
2. The provision in the 22d section of the act of 1790, for the case of assaulting, beating or wounding any federal officer, or other person duly authorized, while engaged in serving or executing any process, may apply as well to the execution of process under the act of 1850 as under any other act, the case not being specifically provided for in the act of 1850, and there being no necessary repugnancy between the two acts in this respect.
3. There is some doubt whether a circuit court has jurisdiction of the offences named in the 7th section of the act of 1850, as that act in terms limits cognizance of those offences to the district courts.
4. It may be a question whether the provision of the 11th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 78), conferring on the circuit court concurrent jurisdiction with the district court of all crimes and offences cognizable therein, applies to jurisdiction subsequently conferred on the district court in as specific terms as that conferred by the act of 1850.
5. The provision of the 2d section of the act of August 8, 1846 (9 Stat. 72), by which the district court is authorized to remit to the circuit court any indictment pending in the district court, no doubt embraces the cases specified in the 7th section of the act of 1850.
6. The consequences of forcible resistance and obstruction to the execution of the act of 1850, considered.

At the commencement of the term, NELSON, Circuit Justice, in charging the grand jury, after instructing them upon the law applicable to the several cases that were to come before them, proceeded as follows:

The district attorney has called my attention to a crime recently committed in one of the most populous towns in the western part of this state—the case of the seizure and rescue of a fugitive slave out of the hands of a federal officer, by an unlawful assemblage of people, more or less armed, pending an examination before a magistrate in pursuance of an act of congress passed September 18, 1850 (9 Stat. 462). The crime, as alleged, was committed in the edge of the evening, in the midst of the local police and municipal authorities of a city of intelligence and character; and this, after threats and other unmistakable evidences of an intended rescue and crime had been given out. The marshal, and all the authorities associated with him, and other persons coming to his aid and assistance, were overborne by the violence of the mob, and law and legal authority were trampled under foot. The case is one calling for grave and serious inquiry on the part of the public authorities. Neither time nor expense should be regarded in the investigation of the crime, and in bringing the guilty offenders to justice. In a case so serious, striking at the very foundation of a government of laws, and substituting in its place brute force and anarchy, the whole power of the government should be put into requisition to suppress the spirit of disorder and punish the guilty. No government is worth preserving that does not or cannot enforce obedience to its laws.

The 7th section of the act of 1850 makes it a misdemeanor, subject to fine and imprisonment—the fine not to exceed $1,000, and the imprisonment not to exceed six months—for any person knowingly to obstruct the arrest of a fugitive from service, or for any person to rescue or attempt to rescue the fugitive after the arrest is made, or to aid or abet or assist, directly or indirectly, in an escape or rescue. The punishment, according to this act, is by indictment and conviction before the district court of the United States for the district within which the offence is committed.

The 22d section of the act of congress passed April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 117), also provides for the case of the obstruction of legal process in the hands of an officer of the federal government. The offence is punishable by a fine not exceeding $300, and imprisonment not exceeding twelve months. So far as it respects an obstruction to the execution of legal process, or a forcible rescue of the prisoner, under the fugitive slave act, the provisions of that act probably supersede those of the act of 1790, with one exception. The act of 1790 provides for the case of assaulting, beating or wounding any federal officer or other person duly authorized, while engaged in serving or executing any process. This case is not specifically provided for in the act of 1850, and may apply as well to an execution of process under that act as under any other act, there being no necessary repugnancy between the acts in this respect.

There is some doubt as to whether the circuit court of the United States has jurisdiction of an offence committed under this act of 1850, as the act in terms limits the cognizance of the offence to the district court. I have, therefore, advised the district attorney to present the cases before that court. The 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 78) confers on the circuit court concurrent jurisdiction with the district court of all crimes and offences cognizable therein. But it may be a question whether this provision applies to jurisdiction subsequently conferred on the district court as specifically as that conferred by the act of 1850. There is a provision in a recent act of congress, by which the district court is authorized to adjourn or continue criminal cases pending therein to the circuit court, which, no doubt, embraces the cases in question. Act Aug. 8, 1846 (9 Stat. 72, § 2).

The forcible resistance to and obstruction of the law to which I have referred, involve something more than the simple defeat of the execution of an act of congress. The act of 1850 was passed to carry into effect an important provision of the constitution of the United States, which declares that "no person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

The state of New York, in full convention assembled, ratified and adopted the constitution of which this provision is a part, on the 26th of July, 1788, when she entered into the Union, and thereby pledged the faith and honor of the people of the state to the observance and fulfillment of all its provisions and injunctions, and of all laws enacted by congress in pursuance thereof. The faith and honor of the state are involved, therefore, in the discharge of these duties and obligations, and, while these virtues are acknowledged by the people of the state, the constitution will be revered and obeyed, and, so far as she is concerned, the Union will be cherished and preserved. It is not to be believed that, in the comparatively short period, in the being of a nation, of sixty-three years, her sons have so far degenerated as to become recreant to the obligations of the government formed by their fathers and cemented by their blood, and under which they have enjoyed a degree of freedom and prosperity, and a share of all the social blessings flowing therefrom, that never before fell to the lot of the human race. Nor is it to be doubted that, when it is seen that there is a sentiment of treasonable opposition, in some parts of the state, against the government, organized and breaking out into open acts of resistance to the constitution and laws, they will awake to the danger, and put down, with a strong hand, this spirit of disunion, and vindicate the faith and honor of their fathers and the character of their state.

The question, whether this provision of the constitution is to be carried into execution in the spirit in which it was adopted, is not one that concerns New York alone. If that were all, the question could be settled among ourselves. But other states have an interest—fifteen of them, a deep and abiding interest—in its observance. The compact has been made with them and with their people, and, until they consent to release us from it, we are bound by it, by every faith and tie that can give sanction to an obligation. It is true, New York may possess the physical power to disregard her obligation, and set the constitution at naught, and abide the consequences. There are, I am sorry to say, acts upon her statute-books which, if carried out into practical effect, would have already accomplished it. But they have not been carried into effect, and I trust never will be. They are, fortunately, a dead letter. Before the people of New York, or of any other Northern state, make up their minds to disregard and disobey this provision of the constitution, they will, I doubt not, look well to the consequences. Common sense, as well as common prudence and wisdom, would dictate this.

As I have already said, the provision in question is a material part of the constitution—the fundamental law of the Union, framed by our fathers, and under which we live—so material and important, that any one conversant with the history of that instrument knows that without it the Union would never have been formed. Let any one or more of the Northern states, therefore, annul or utterly disregard it, setting the fundamental law, in this respect, at defiance, and be successful in maintaining such disregard and abandonment of duty, against the whole force and power of the general government, and a disruption of the Union is already accomplished. One or more members of the confederacy cannot annul a material part of the compact which they have entered into with the other states, because they have no interest in it, or even if it be against their interest, and, at the same time, claim an observance of the compact by others. There can be no such obligation on those others, legal or moral. It requires but common sense, and common honesty, to settle this. That other state or those other states, interested in the rejected and repudiated part, after an unavailing effort by the constituted authorities of the Union to enforce obedience, would have a right to regard the compact as at an end, and to withdraw from a confederacy of faithless associates. There are two sides to the compact, and both must be observed, or neither.

These principles are fundamental. They lie at the foundation of all contracts and compacts entered into by parties, whether for government or any other purpose; and they exact nothing more than common honesty and good faith, in the observance of the duties and obligations of each.

Seeing, therefore, and properly appreciating these consequences, as the inevitable tendency and result of breaking and setting at naught a material part of the constitution, with what concern should every good citizen contemplate the act, and with what alacrity and spirit should he come up to its support and maintenance! What vast and momentous interests may depend upon his active and patriotic devotion in defence of the constitution and laws of his country!

No one need for a moment harbor the supposition or belief that the Northern states will not be held to a strict fulfillment of their constitutional obligations arising out of this clause of the compact. The people of fifteen states of the Union are deeply interested in its execution, and demand its observance. They have already determined that it must no longer be disregarded, and have appealed to their Northern brethren to come up to their constitutional duties and obligations and save the Union. Many of them have confidence that they will, and are at this moment, upon the strength of that confidence, maintaining a vigorous and manful struggle with their less confident brethren, in behalf of the Union. It requires but an honest and faithful discharge of these duties and obligations by the North, to cheer them on and crown their patriotic efforts with success. Let the great state of New York, therefore, not falter in her duty, nor prove recreant to her obligations, at this time and in this struggle. No state has a greater stake in the preservation of the Union; nor is there any one whose voice, for good or for evil, will be more powerfully felt throughout its limits.

Disorderly and turbulent men—the common disturbers of society—are found in every government; and occasional outbreaks against law and legal authority must be expected. They scarcely compromise the character of a people, when the violence is speedily suppressed and the guilty offenders are sternly punished. New York may thus redeem herself from the odium of suffering the constitution and laws of the Union to be trampled under foot, and from a just responsibility to the other members of the confederacy. She will thus vindicate herself from the bad example of having broken the compact; and other states will not, so far as her action is concerned, be released from their obligations. But, should she falter in this duty, and in redeeming her own plighted faith to the constitution, how can she expect to preserve the Union, or, that other states, deeply concerned in the observance of her obligations, will remain with her in the confederacy? It would be vain to expect it; and her conduct, in the case supposed, will have rendered her powerless in any attempt to coerce the association. Having broken the compact herself, and cast off her constitutional obligations, she will have rendered herself morally impotent to exact fidelity from others.

Any one conversant with the history of the times, and with the great issue now agitating the country, and in which the perpetuity of this Union is involved, cannot fail to have seen that the result is in the hands of the people of the Northern states. They must determine it, and the responsibility rests upon them. If they abide by the constitution—the whole and every part of it—all will be well. If they expect the Union to be saved, and to enjoy the blessings flowing from it, short of this, they will find themselves mistaken when it is too late.

Case No. 18,263.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—FUGITIVE
SLAVE LAW.[1 Spr. 593.]¹District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1851.TREASON AGAINST THE UNITED STATES—RESISTANCE TO THE EXECUTION OF A LAW.

[1. A mere treasonable conspiracy, whether for the purpose of entirely overthrowing the government, or to prevent the execution of any of its laws, is not sufficient to constitute the crime of treason, as defined by the constitution of the United States. In addition to the conspiracy, there must be an actual assemblage of men for the purpose of carrying the conspiracy into effect by force.]

[2. A conspiracy to prevent, by force, the execution of any one law of the United States in all cases, is a treasonable conspiracy; and if there be an actual assemblage of men for the purpose of carrying this intention into effect,—that is, of acting together, and preventing by force the execution of the law generally,—this constitutes a levying of war, and involves the crime of treason.]

[3. The sudden outbreak of a mob, or the assembling of men, in order, by force, to prevent the execution of a law in a particular instance, and then to disperse, without any intention of continuing together or reassembling for defeating the law generally and in all cases, is not a levying of war such as constitutes treason.]

The fugitive slave law, passed in September, 1850 [9 Stat. 462], was received, in Massachusetts, with almost universal regret and disapprobation. With not a few, it produced great excitement and exasperation. Some openly avowed a determination to resist it by violence, declaring that it was a matter of conscience not to permit it to be executed. In the following February, a negro, by the name of Shadrach, was arrested in Boston, as a fugitive slave, and carried into the United States' court rooms for examination before a commissioner. A mob broke into the room, took him by force from the officers of the law, and effected a rescue. At the opening of the next regular term of the district court, in March, SPRAGUE, District Judge, delivered the following charge to the grand jury:

The office you now hold demonstrates that the constitution has established, not a mere confederacy of states, but a government acting directly upon individuals, with a legislature to enact laws, a judiciary to expound them, and an executive to enforce them. Under this government, the people of the United States have enjoyed a greater degree of liberty, prosperity, and happiness, than have been enjoyed by any other people in the history of the world. To preserve this government, it is necessary that its laws should be faithfully executed, and you are now called upon, under the highest sanction, to aid in this indispensable work.

I think it proper, at this time, to call your attention particularly to that part of the Criminal Code, which prohibits and punishes forcible resistance to the laws. Government is so great a blessing, that the highest crime which can be committed, is treason. This is defined by the constitution itself in the following words: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." [Const. art. 3, § 3.] What amounts to levying war? This question arose soon after the adoption of the constitution, in the several trials of Mitchell, Vigol, and Fries, for being engaged in the Pennsylvania insurrection, against the law imposing a duty upon distilled spirits, under the administration of Washington, and subsequently, in the trial of Aaron Burr, in the year 1807, and in the case of U.

S. v. Hoxie [Case No. 15,407], in the year 1808. These were all trials in the circuit court. The only case which has come before the supreme court, was that of Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 125. In this case it was decided that, "if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose," this is levying war. What is a treasonable purpose? If the object be entirely to overthrow the government, at any one place, by force, as at New Orleans, which is the case mentioned by the supreme court, that is a treasonable purpose. But a conspiracy to do this, and actually enlisting men who never assemble, is not sufficient to constitute the crime of treason. There must be an actual assemblage of men, for the purpose of carrying the conspiracy into effect by force. So also, it is a treasonable purpose, if the object be to prevent, by force, the execution of any one law of the United States, in all cases;—for it is entirely to overthrow the government as to one of its laws. And if there be an actual assemblage of men, for the purpose of carrying such an intention into effect, that is, of acting together, and preventing, by force, the execution of the law generally,—in all cases it will constitute a levying of war. But the sudden outbreak of a mob, or the assembling of men in order by force to defeat the execution of the law, in a particular instance, and then to disperse, without the intention to continue together, or to re-assemble for the purpose of defeating the law generally, in all cases, is not levying war. If war be actually levied, persons may be guilty, although not present with the force actually assembled. "All those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors."

There are minor offences created and defined by acts of congress alone. By St. April 30, 1790, c. 9, § 22 [1 Stat. 117], it is enacted: "That, if any person or persons shall knowingly and wilfully obstruct, resist, or oppose any officer of the United States, in serving or attempting to serve or execute any mesne process, or warrant, or any rule or order, of any of the courts of the United States, or any other legal or judicial writ or process whatsoever, or shall assault, beat or wound any officer or other person, duly authorized in serving or executing any writ, rule, order, process, or warrant aforesaid, every person so knowingly and wilfully offending in the premises, shall, on conviction thereof," be punished by fine and imprisonment.

Thus you perceive, that, for more than sixty years, indeed, from the foundation of the government, it has been a criminal offence to resist, or oppose, or obstruct the marshal in the execution of a warrant or other legal process; and so plain is the utility and necessity of this provision, that, during all that time, no voice has been raised against it. So far from impairing the energy with which the laws are to be executed, the people, by their legislation, have added new sanctions. Thus by St. March 2, 1831, c. 99, § 2 [4 Stat. 488], it is enacted: "That, if any person or persons shall corruptly, or by threats or force, endeavor to influence, intimidate, or impede any juror, witness, or officer, in any court of the United States, in the discharge of his duty, or shall corruptly, or by threats or force, obstruct or impede, or endeavor to obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice therein, every person or persons so offending, shall be liable to prosecution therefor, by indictment."

This salutary enactment to secure the free course of law has been in force for nearly twenty years without objection. But we have recently heard that not only should the courts be impeded in administering the law, but that the marshal should be obstructed, and even resisted by force, in the execution of legal process, because of a recent statute providing for the arrest and delivering up of fugitives from labor. It is to be observed that this statute subjects no person to arrest, who was not before liable to be seized and carried out of the state; for, ever since the adoption of the constitution, these same persons have been liable to be taken and carried away, by those from whose service they had escaped. For a pre-existing right created by the constitution and affirmed by the supreme court of the United States, congress has provided a new remedy, by legal process to be executed by a public officer, and has added penal sanctions more effectually to ensure the execution of the law. If it have not all the safeguards we could wish, so neither had the statute of 1793 [1 Stat. 302] passed by the fathers of the constitution, with the approbation of Washington, and sustained by the people for more than half a century.

The constitution commands that fugitives from labor shall be delivered up. The supreme court has decided that it belongs to congress to provide the means. Congress has enacted this law. It is imperative, and will be enforced. Let no man mistake the mildness and forbearance with which the Criminal Code is habitually administered, for weakness or timidity. Resistance must make it sternly inflexible.

Discussion is free. Men of all classes and of every shade of opinion may, by argument or even declamation addressed to the reason or the passions, endeavor to impress new views upon the public mind. But if, in their opposition to the expressed will of society, they pass from words to deeds, and embody mischievous doctrines into criminal acts of resistance to law, whoever they may be, and whatever may be their position or their ultimate purposes, they must sooner or later find that the law is irresistible and overwhelming. The people have been so long accustomed to absolute repose and security under the quiet administration of law, that they are not easily brought to believe that it can be obstructed, much less to contemplate the consequences of its overthrow. But let them be startled by acts of violence and systematic resistance, let it be brought home to them as a practical question, whether they will live under law, administered by responsible public agents, or under the dominion of a mob, impelled by passion, guided by no rule, and subject to no restraint, and they will rush to the support of the constituted authorities, and indignantly repress the spirit of anarchy.

The statute of 1850, c. 60 [9 Stat. 462], after providing that the claimant of a fugitive from labor may have a warrant for his arrest, or seize him without process, proceeds, in the seventh section, to enact, "That any person, who shall knowingly and willingly obstruct, hinder or prevent such claimant, his agent or attorney, or any person or persons lawfully assisting him, her or them, from arresting such a fugitive from service or labor, either with or without process as aforesaid, or shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, such fugitive from service or labor, from the custody of such claimant, his or her agent or attorney, or other person or persons lawfully assisting as aforesaid, when so arrested, pursuant to the authority herein given and declared; or shall aid, abet, or assist such person so owing service or labor as aforesaid, directly or indirectly, to escape from such claimant, his agent or attorney, or other person or persons legally authorized as aforesaid; or shall harbor or conceal such fugitive, so as to prevent the discovery and arrest of such person, after notice or knowledge of the fact that such person was a fugitive from service or labor as aforesaid, shall for either of said offences be subject to" fine and imprisonment.

I have thus, as I proposed, called your attention to certain acts of congress and provisions of the constitution. They are the law of the land, and it is our most solemn duty faithfully to execute them. In the words of the oath which you have just taken, you are to do this, "without fear, or favor, affection, or hope of reward," presenting "things truly as they come to your knowledge, according to the best of your understanding."

Here I might close; but, as great efforts have been made to convince the public that the recent law cannot be enforced with a good conscience, but may be conscientiously resisted; and an impression may have been made on some of your number, thus presenting an obstacle to the discharge of a plain legal duty, I deem it proper to advert briefly to the moral aspects of the subject.

In this part of the country, the convictions of our understanding, our moral sentiments, and our religious opinions, are adverse to the institution of slavery. Hence some are ready to conclude, in the first place, that the provision of the constitution for delivering up fugitive slaves must be morally wrong; and, in the next place, that laws made to carry it into effect are to be disobeyed and resisted. Neither of these propositions legitimately follows from the premises.

As to the first. The states, without the constitution, would be to each other foreign nations. The first duty of every nation is the preservation and protection of its own citizens. It is for this, primarily, that political societies are formed and their restraints submitted to. If, then, any nation finds that hospitality to foreign fugitives is inconsistent with its own peace and safety, it has a right to refuse such hospitality, and to say, to all such foreigners, we cannot receive you amongst us, and if you come, we must deliver you up to the dominion of your own government; and it may rightfully make a compact with such government for such delivery. Whether the peace and safety of the nation do, in fact, require or authorize such compact, it is for the nation itself to decide, and its decision is to be submitted to and its engagements faithfully performed. Those, therefore, who have the strongest convictions of the immorality of the institution of slavery are not thereby authorized to conclude that the provision for delivering up fugitives slaves is morally wrong, or that our fathers in Massachusetts did not act wisely, justly, humanely, in acceding to the compacts of the constitution.

But, secondly, even those who go to the extreme of condemning the constitution and the laws made under it, as unjust and immoral, cannot, even upon such an assumption, justify resistance. In their views, such laws are inconsistent with the justice and benevolence, and against the will, of the Supreme Law-Giver, and they emphatically ask, which shall we obey, the law of man, or the will of God? I answer, obey both. The incompatibility, which the question assumes, does not exist. Unjust and oppressive laws may, indeed, be passed by human governments. But if Infinite and Inscrutable Wisdom permit political society having the power of human legislation to establish such laws, may not the same Infinite and Inscrutable Wisdom permit and require the individual, who has no such power, to obey them? Can you say that it is His will that we shall rise up in forcible resistance, overthrow the power of the government, and, instead of the peace and security of organized society, introduce the dominion of anarchy and violence? Are such the appointed means for their abrogation? Unjust laws have always existed. Until a recent period, poor and honest debtors were, even here, oppressively imprisoned; and, in England, stealing, to the value of more than a shilling, was punishable with death, and the Code numbered more than one hundred and fifty capital offences. The wise and the good saw that these laws were cruel and unnecessary. They did not rush to arms, or counsel disobedience. But, by the diffusion of knowledge, by reason and persuasion, they changed the public mind, and the laws were peaceably ameliorated. The fruits of justice and benevolence, like the fruits of the natural world, are to be matured by mild and genial influences. The punishment of death is still inflicted by our laws. Many good men firmly believe that society has no right to take the life of one of its members. With them capital punishment is the highest injustice and the greatest wrong that can be inflicted. But they do not counsel resistance, to convulse society and overthrow the government, but quietly and conscientiously submit to the peaceful execution of the laws.

But we are told by some, that, the law being morally wrong, conscience tells them to resist it. Conscience, indeed, is to be revered and obeyed, but still we must remember that it is fallible, especially where the rights of others are concerned, and may lead us to do great injustice. Some have an impression that it is the divinity within them, an unerring and infallible guide. Hence they cannot believe, or conceive, that opposition to their views can be conscientious. It is this lurking fallacy, this tacit assumption of personal infallibility, that makes them intolerant toward others, and inaccessible to argument.

I speak not of those who believe that they have special inspiration from above; that a miracle has been wrought for their guidance. Such are beyond the scope of human reason, and fit subjects either of consecration, or a mad-house, according as their belief is founded on reality or delusion. But, with those who are under the dominion of the established laws of the moral and intellectual world, conscience is fallible. The annals of the world abound with enormities committed by a narrow and darkened conscience. A man may incur great moral guilt, not indeed by following his conscience, but by neglecting the means of rectifying and enlightening it. Its dictates are varied, not only according to moral constitution, but the intellectual power and extent of information of the individual. The purer the motive, the more extensive the knowledge, and the greater the mental ability, the more enlightened will be the conscience, and the more correct its decisions.

The moral faculty or moral judgment being thus fallible, there may be a conflict of consciences. Let me present an illustration. A ship arrives with sick passengers. One class of men insist that the disease is contagious, and that they shall not be permitted to land and spread a general pestilence. Another class insist that it is not contagious, and that it would be cruelty to compel them to remain on ship-board, aggravating their sufferings and their danger. With both it is a question of humanity—of conscience. Again, certain strangers seek an asylum amongst us. One class of our citizens see in them only fugitives from oppression, whom we can easily and securely receive and protect. Another class believe that they bring with them, not physical but moral contagion, that their presence will endanger the public peace and individual safety, that it may embroil us with other states, and bring upon us the sufferings and horrors of external and internal war and convulsions. The one class urge the obligations of hospitality and benevolence, the other the obligations of self-preservation, and the sacred duty of preserving those whom nature and society have committed to their protection. Both are equally sincere, conscientious, and resolute. Which shall yield? Is there no appeal but to force? I answer, yes. And the arbiter must be society,—organized society,—pronouncing its decision through its regularly constituted agents. This is the moral judgment, the embodied conscience, of the political community. To this not only is each individual bound to submit, but it is a new and controlling element in forming his own moral judgment. An act, which before may have been innocent, is now criminal, and its commission not only opposed to the will, but subversive of the order, peace, existence of the political society.

Submission is a moral duty. This is as certain as that the Creator made man a social being, and designed that he should live, not in perpetual anarchy, but in peace and security; for human government is the only means which Infinite Goodness has provided, for preserving us from unceasing conflict and violence. To submit to the law of the land is, then, to obey the will of God.

It may be asked, is resistance never justifiable? Is there no exception? I answer, yes! When oppression present and prospective is so great as to justify a resort to the ultimate right of revolution. But this is not to be done from impulse or feeling, but from the calm and careful consideration of the dangers and difficulties of the proposed remedy. A wise man will reflect that evils, great evils, must exist under every human government; that a perfect fabric cannot be made of imperfect materials, and that, whatever he may attempt, he must still work by and with fallible man, with all his blindness, weakness and passion. If, after a deliberate contemplation of the convulsions and miseries attending the overthrow of the existing government, and the hazards and uncertainties of establishing a better on its ruins, he firmly believes the permanent happiness of the community requires the attempt, he may conscientiously make it. Under a despotism, such a case may occur not unfrequently, but we can hardly suppose it to exist in a republic, where the laws are made by the people themselves, through agents freely appointed for short periods, by frequent elections.

In our own country, if there be any, who, contemplating the infirmities of our nature, the history of our race, what has been accomplished in all ages that have passed, and what is now the condition of mankind under all other political institutions, and looking at our own government, its history and its hopes, its past performance and future promise, can then desire its destruction, in the vain and desperate hope of establishing a better in its stead, they must be inaccessible to reason or remonstrance, and of that unfortunate class in whose minds judgment is dethroned, and monomania hold usurped dominion.

Case No. 18,264.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—NEUTRALITY LAWS.

[5 Blatchf. 556.]¹

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June 20, 1866.

THE LAW OF NEUTRALITY.

1. The 6th section of the act of April 20, 1818 (3 Stat. 449), forbidding military expeditions by individuals against countries with which the United States are at peace, commented on.

2. The duties of neutrality, enforced.

SHIPMAN, District Judge (charging grand jury). I intimated to you yesterday, at the close of my brief remarks on the general business of the term that would come before you, that I would this morning submit a few observations to you on a single subject. The district attorney has informed me that he intends to lay before you charges against certain individuals alleged to have been engaged in a military expedition against the provinces of Canada, in violation of the neutrality laws of the United States. The particular section of the statute upon which he intends to found the indictments is as follows: "If any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for, any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $3,000, and imprisoned not more than three years." This is the sixth section of an act of congress approved April 20, 1818 (3 Stat. 449), and forms part of a series of provisions enacted for the very purpose of preventing hostile incursions from our own territory into that of governments with which we are at peace, as well as the fitting out or arming vessels to operate by sea. This act is founded upon the highest considerations of justice, peace, and safety, and every person within the limits of the United States is bound to yield obedience to its provisions. It applies not only to citizens of the United States, but to all persons within their territory or jurisdiction, whether permanently or temporarily residing therein. It was the duty of the national legislature to enact this law, and it is the duty of every magistrate and every juror to whom any jurisdiction over the subject matter is committed, to give his aid, under proper legal rules, to the enforcement of its obligations. The duty of a government to restrain its own citizens, and all others within its territorial limits, from engaging in military expeditions against powers with which such government is at peace, arises out of the law of nations, and its faithful observance is of the very highest importance to the peace of the world, the stability and good order of society, and the welfare of mankind. Were individuals, however numerous or respectable, by whatever motives actuated, permitted, upon their own motion, to organize warlike enterprises in their native or adopted country, and engage in incursions into the territory of neighboring friendly nations, governments would no longer have control of the momentous questions of war and peace. A comparatively small portion of the population of a country could effectually embroil it with other nations, and all the calamities of war be precipitated upon a people, at any moment, however unfavorable, without the sanction of their constituted authorities, and against the will of a majority of the people themselves. A country which should permit such a flagrant violation of its national obligations, would soon become a theatre from which hostile expeditions would issue, both by sea and by land. It would inevitably be brought into collision with every respectable government on the globe, whose disaffected citizens might seek its shore, in order to securely prepare and send forth the means of retaliation, revolution, or conquest. The honor and dignity of the United States, the reciprocal duties which rest upon it as one of the nations of the earth, and the welfare of its citizens, both native and adopted, all demand that this act of congress shall be obeyed, or, if violated, that the offender shall be promptly punished. If, therefore, evidence shall be presented to you proving that parties have, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begun or set on foot, or provided or prepared the means for, a military expedition against Canada, it will be your duty to present them to the court for trial. You deal with the fact. You will be governed by the evidence.

I hardly need remind you that many considerations which find a place in appeals to popular feeling are hardly proper for your deliberations. We are at peace with Great Britain. Whether, in the judgment of individuals, the people of England or of Canada have, during our late civil war, said or done things distasteful to us or not, is a matter entirely foreign from our duty to enforce our own laws. I have said that we are at peace with Great Britain. That is a question of law for the court to determine, and one over which the grand jury have no just control. The only question, therefore, for you to determine is, whether or not the accused parties have, in any invasion, or attempted invasion, of Canada, broken the law which I have read to you; and, in determining that question, you should consider the acts done on both sides of the boundary line, as giving character to those acts which were done exclusively on our own soil. You will say whether, if an expedition started from this country, and actually made war in a neighboring province, the acts done here were not a beginning or setting on foot, within the United States, of a military expedition or enterprise, having for its object that which it actually accomplished.

Neither can the grand jury properly consider any supposed grievances which the offending party may have suffered at the hands of the government against which this military crusade was leveled. With the merits of that question we have nothing to do here. Our laws must be enforced. If men of one nationality, who have sought homes among us, can violate our neutral obligations, men of every other nationality can do likewise; and thus the foreign relations of a great country may be taken out of the hands of its government, and the issues of war and peace be committed to as many irresponsible parties as we have classes of adopted citizens or resident foreigners among us. I need but allude to such an absurd idea, to satisfy you that considerations affected by sympathy with one or another class of adopted citizens, can have no proper place in the inquiry upon which you are about to enter. We live under a government of laws, and, when we cease to administer those laws, and to submit to their requirements, we may prove ourselves unworthy of that safety and dignity which they are designed to secure. You will, gentlemen, retire to your room, and, if you find that the offences to which I have alluded have been committed, you will present the offenders for trial.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—NEUTRALITY LAWS.

[2 McLean, 1.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec., 1838.

VIOLATIONS OF NEUTRALITY LAWS — ACCEPTING COMMISSION AND SETTING ON FOOT MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST FRIENDLY POWER.

[1. To constitute the offense of accepting and exercising a commission to serve against a foreign prince, state, etc., with whom the United States are at peace, under the first section of the act of congress, some overt act under the commission must be done, such as raising men for the enterprise, collecting provisions, munitions of war, or any other act which shows an exercise of the authority which the commission was supposed to confer.]

[2. To constitute the offense of beginning or setting on foot a military expedition against a friendly power within the 6th section of the statute, it is not necessary that the expedition shall be actually set on foot; it is sufficient if such preparations are made for it as show an intent to set it on foot.]

[3. To "provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise," within the meaning of section 6, such preparation must be made as shall aid the expedition. The contribution of money, clothing for the troops, provisions, arms, or any other contribution which shall tend to forward the expedition, or add to the comfort or maintenance of those engaged in it, is a violation of this provision.]

[4. A government is justly held responsible for the acts of its citizens; and, if the government of the United States be unable or unwilling to restrain our citizens from acts of hostility against a friendly power, such power may hold this nation answerable, and declare war against it.]

In regard to aiding or favoring unlawful military combinations, by our citizens, against any foreign government, or people, with whom we are at peace.

McLEOD, Circuit Judge (charging grand jury). Your particular and most serious attention is requested to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to punish certain offences against the United States" [3 Stat. 447]. By the first section of this act, it is declared, "that if any citizen of the United States shall, within the territory or jurisdiction thereof, accept and exercise a commission to serve a foreign prince, state, colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, he shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and be fined not more than two thousand dollars, and imprisoned not exceeding three years." And in the sixth section, it is provided, "that if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin to set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for, any military expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence, against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, every person, so offending, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding three thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than three years." There are many other acts prohibited by this law, which relate to foreign powers, and which may be presented for your examination; but the above sections are considered the most important. The offence in the first section consists in "accepting and exercising a commission," to carry on war against any people or state with whom we are at peace. The commission may be conferred by any district of country, or association of people, whose right to confer it shall be recognized by the person appointed. And it is immaterial whether the commission has been conferred by the popular voice, or by the representatives of such district, or association of people. It must have been accepted and exercised, to come within your jurisdiction, within this state, by a citizen of the United States. Some overt act, under the commission, must be done; such as raising men for the enterprise; collecting provisions, munitions of war, or any other act which shows an exercise of the authority which the commission is supposed to confer. Under the ninth section, the offence consists in beginning to set on foot, or providing or preparing the means for any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from the United States, against the territory or dominions of a foreign people or state. To "begin to set on foot a military expedition," is not actually setting on foot such expedition; but it is making such preparation for it, as shall show the intent to set it on foot. To "provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise," within the law, such preparation must be made as shall aid the expedition. The contribution of money, clothing for the troops, provisions, arms, or any other contribution which shall tend to forward the expedition, or add to the comfort or maintenance of those who are engaged in it, is considered to be in violation of the law. These acts must all be done under such circumstances as to show the criminal intent, unless such intent shall be avowed. And it is hardly to be expected, that when an individual is about to violate the laws of his country, he will openly declare his intention to do so. Where the act and the attendant circumstances show the criminal intent, no subterfuges or motives avowed, should screen the citizen from the consequences of such an act.

To come within your cognizance, every violation of this law must have been committed within this state; and by a citizen of the United States. These provisions are highly important, and they should be faithfully executed against all who violate them. Great excitement is known to exist, at this time, in Canada, from certain hostile movements contemplated by citizens of this country, in conjunction with the disaffected subjects of that country. It is said, on high authority, that associations of citizens of the United States have been formed, along the whole extent of our northern boundary, with the view, at a fixed time, to make a descent upon Canada. That these associations embrace an immense number of individuals, who are known to each other by certain signs and passwords. That they are actively engaged in collecting the materials of war, and raising men. That their military officers are appointed; and that, in anticipation of success, they have appointed civil officers.

I cannot but think these accounts have been greatly exaggerated, and that they may have caused an unnecessary degree of alarm. But that there is ground for apprehension of danger, no one can doubt. During the past winter, many of our citizens were engaged in this lawless enterprise. This is proved by the records of our own courts, and the courts of Canada, and by well authenticated accounts which have been published. Indeed, it is notorious that organized bodies of men, though, perhaps, not bearing arms, were marched through the northern part of this and other states, on our northern boundary, with the known intention of invading Canada, who were permitted to pass without molestation. And, it is believed that, in some instances, they were encouraged in their enterprise by contributions of money, provisions, and other necessaries. This state of things is deeply to be lamented. When our citizens, generally, shall cease to respect the laws, and the high duties they owe to their own government, there is but a slender ground of hope that our institutions can be long maintained.

An obedience to the laws is the first duty of every citizen. It lays at the foundation of our noble political structure; and when this great principle shall be departed from, with the public sanction, the moral influence of our government must terminate. If there be any one line of policy in which all political parties agree, it is, that we should keep aloof from the agitations of other governments. That we shall not intermingle our national concerns with theirs. And much more, that our citizens shall abstain from acts which lead the subjects of other governments to violence and bloodshed. We have a striking instance of the wisdom of this policy in the early history of our government. During the administration of our first president the French Revolution burst forth, and astonished the civilized world. All Europe combined in arms against republican France. That France which had mingled her arms and her blood with ours in our struggle for independence. That this country should deeply sympathize with so noble, brave and generous an ally, in such a struggle, was natural. Bursts of enthusiasm were witnessed in her behalf, in almost every part of our country, and an ardent desire was evinced to make common cause with her in favor of liberty. And this was claimed of our country as a debt of gratitude, and on the ground of treaty stipulations. Had this tide of popular feeling, which threatened to bear down every thing in its course, not been checked, our destinies would have been united with those of France. We might have participated in her military glory, and in the renown of her heroes. And the struggles, in which we would have been involved, might have given birth to a race of heroes in our own country, whose deeds of chivalry would have been celebrated in history. But our country would have been wasted by war and rapine; and the pen of the historian, which recorded the deeds of our heroes, would, also, have told, in all probability, that our country, like France, was driven to take refuge from the turbulence of party factions, under a splendid military despotism. Fortunately for the country Washington lived, and the veneration in which his name was held, and the authority he exercised, mainly contributed to check the excitement, and preserve the peace and lasting prosperity of the country. The struggles of the people of South America, against the oppressions of their own government, again awakened the sympathies of our country, and produced a strong desire with many to unite our fortune with theirs. But this feeling was controlled, and the neutrality and peace of our country were preserved.

A government is justly held responsible for the acts of its citizens. And if this government be unable or unwilling to restrain our citizens from acts of hostility against a friendly power, such power may hold this nation answerable, and declare war against it. Every citizen is, therefore, bound by the regard he has for his country, by his reverence for its laws, and by the calamitous consequences of war, to exert his influence in suppressing the unlawful enterprises of our citizens against any foreign and friendly power. History affords no example of a nation or people, that uniformly took part in the internal commotions of other governments, which did not bring down ruin upon themselves. These pregnant examples should guard us against a similar policy, which must lead to a similar result. In every community will be found a floating mass of adventurers, ready to embrace any cause, and to hazard any consequences, which shall be likely to make their condition better. And, it is believed, that a large portion of our citizens, who have been engaged in military enterprises against Canada, are of this description. That many patriotic and honorable men were at first induced, by their sympathies, to countenance the movement, if not to aid it, is probable. But when these individuals found that this course was forbidden by the laws of their country, and by its highest interests, they retraced their steps. But, it is believed, that there are many who persevere in their course, in defiance of the law and the interests of their country. Such individuals might be induced to turn their arms against their own government, under circumstances favorable to their success. These violators of the law should not escape with impunity. The aid of every good citizen will be given to arrest them in their progress, and bring them to justice. They show themselves to be enemies of their country, by trampling under foot its laws, compromising its honor, and involving it in the most serious embarrassment with a foreign and friendly nation. It is, indeed, lamentable to reflect, that such men, under such circumstances, may hazard the peace of the country. If they were to come out in array against their own government, the consequences to it would be far less serious. In such an effort, they could not involve it in much bloodshed, or in a heavy expenditure; nor would its commerce and general business be materially injured. But a war with a powerful nation, with whom we have the most extensive relations, commercial and social, would bring down upon our country the heaviest calamity. It would dry up the sources of its prosperity, and deluge it in blood.

The great principles of our republican institutions cannot be propagated by the sword. This can be done by moral force, and not physical. If we desire the political regeneration of oppressed nations, we must show them the simplicity, the grandeur, and the freedom of our own government. We must recommend it to the intelligence and virtue of other nations, by its elevated and enlightened action, its purity, its justice, and the protection it affords to all its citizens, and the liberty they enjoy. And if, in this respect, we shall be faithful to the high bequests of our fathers, to ourselves, and to posterity, we shall do more to liberalize other governments, and emancipate their subjects, than could be accomplished by millions of bayonets. This moral power is what tyrants have most cause to dread. It addresses itself to the thoughts and the judgments of men. No physical force can arrest its progress. Its approaches are unseen, but its consequences are deeply felt. It enters garrisons most strongly fortified, and operates in the palaces of kings and emperors. We should cherish this power as essential to the preservation of our own government; and as the most efficient means of ameliorating the political condition of our race. And this can only be done by a reverence for the laws, and by the exercise of an elevated patriotism. But if we trample under our feet the laws of our country; if we disregard the faith of treaties, and our citizens engage without restraint in military enterprises, against the peace of other governments, we shall be considered and treated, and justly too, as a nation of pirates.

Punishments, under the law, can only be inflicted through the instrumentality of the judicial department of the government. The federal executive has shown a zeal, worthy of the highest commendation, in his endeavor to check the career of these enemies of social order. He has very properly employed a part of the military force of the country in this service; and he has solemnly warned and admonished these deluded citizens, who seem ready to carry devastation into the neighboring province of a foreign and friendly power. These efforts of the president are in aid of the civil power, which, I trust, will not be found wanting on this, or any other emergency, in the discharge of the great duties which have been devolved upon it by the constitution and laws. But in vain will the civil authority be exerted, unless it shall be aided by the moral force of the country. If the hands of the ministers of justice were not strengthened by public sentiment, how ineffectually would they be raised for the suppression of crime. If the open violator of the law be cherished by society, he may, with impunity, set at defiance the organs of the law. The statute book which contains the catalogue of offences, would then become a dead letter, and would be a standing monument of deeply seated corruption in the public.

I invoke, in behalf of the tribunals of justice, the moral power of society. I ask it to aid them in suppressing a combination of deluded or abandoned citizens, which imminently threatens the peace and prosperity of the country. And I have no fears, that when public attention shall be roused on this deeply important subject; when the laws are understood, and the duties of the government; and when the danger is seen, and properly appreciated, there will be an expression so potent, from an enlightened and patriotic people, as to suppress all combinations in violation of the laws, and which threaten the peace of the country.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—NEUTRALITY LAWS.

[5 McLean, 249.]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May, 1851.

VIOLATION OF NEUTRALITY LAWS—SETTING ON FOOT MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST FRIENDLY POWER.

[Under the provision of the sixth section of the act of 1818 (3 Stat. 449), making it a misdemeanor to "begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for, any military expedition or enterprise," the overt act is not an invasion of a foreign country, but taking the incipient steps in the enterprise, such as providing the means for the expedition, furnishing munitions of war or money, enlisting men, and in short doing anything and everything that is necessary to the commencement and prosecution of the enterprise.]

Extract from the charge to the grand jury of the United States circuit court:

HUNTINGTON, District Judge (charging grand jury). After adverting to various offenses within the jurisdiction of the grand jury, and which it would be called to investigate, the judge referred to the contemplated invasion of the island of Cuba as a subject of national concern. He observed, the newspaper rumors, and the proclamation lately issued by the president, authorize, if they do not require, the subject to be brought before the grand jury. It seems this nefarious plan is not of recent origin. The late chief magistrate, as well as the present, not only issued a proclamation, but found it necessary to put in requisition a part of the army and navy, to preserve the peace and honor of the country. Doubts have been suggested whether the judicial power had been sufficiently active in bringing to punishment these marauders, who, under the pretence of liberating the oppressed, stand ready to engage in a career of plunder and murder. Whatever motives they may avow, this would be the result of their successful action. Such individuals, with the prospect of success, could easily be induced to turn their arms against their own country. They are reckless of consequences. By the laws of nations, they are justly held to be outlaws and pirates. The act of congress of the 20th of April, 1818, entitled, "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," etc., applies to these individuals. The first section provides: "If within the jurisdiction of the United States, any citizen shall accept and exercise a commission to serve a foreign prince, state, colony, district, or people, in war, by land or by sea, against any prince, state, colony, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, shall, on conviction, be punished," etc. The sixth section provides "that if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide, or prepare, the means for any military expedition, or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, every person so offending, shall be punished," etc.

You will observe, gentlemen of the jury, that if any one "shall begin or set on foot, or prepare the means for such enterprise," he is within the statute. The overt act is not an invasion of the country, but taking the incipient steps in the enterprise. To provide the means for the expedition, as the enlistment of men, the munitions of war, money, in short, any thing and every thing that is necessary to the commencement and prosecution of the enterprise. In the ages of barbarism, private war was tolerated. Physical power was then the arbiter of right, and a dexterous use of the instruments of death, was the prevailing logic. But this has been long since exploded among civilized nations. The Christian system has engrafted on the laws of nations a better logic—a logic addressed to the mind and conscience, and which conforms more to the principles of humanity. Every government is responsible for the acts of its citizens. They must be restrained from violating the rights of other nations; and any government which has not the power or disposition to do this, subjects itself to a declaration of war by the injured party.

Our physical resources, gentlemen, are in a rapid course of development. In this respect our country has surpassed the most ardent anticipation of its friends. But I wish to impress upon your minds, that this is not the most satisfactory evidence of our national prosperity. How have we made this wonderful advance? Is it not mainly attributable to that great and fundamental law which made us a nation, and to an observance of the laws, state and federal? These laws emanate from the people, through their representatives, and bear the impress of their will. A perseverance in this course will lead us on to a still higher and nobler destiny. But, gentlemen, no free government can be maintained without moral power. If this be broken down, physical power must be substituted in its place. As in France, we may still have a republic in name, but it will be a republic sustained by bayonets. A government of laws, sanctioned and sustained by the people, is the only guaranty for public and private rights. Whenever the law shall be trampled under foot and contemned, with impunity, there is no hope in the future. And may I not ask the question, whether there is not in the general aspect of our affairs enough to excite a deep solicitude on this subject? We see associations of lawless individuals in different parts of the Union, in contempt of the law, and the honor and peace of the country, ready to embark in a piratical war against a people, with whose government we are at peace. Other combinations have been formed to subvert the government, and others to resist, in an unconstitutional manner, enactments made by the highest authority. These indications are ominous. At an earlier period in the history of our government, an individual of the highest talent, and who had held the second office in the government, was overwhelmed with infamy, and was criminally prosecuted, on the ground that he had set on foot a treasonable conspiracy against the government, by an attempt to divide the Union, and erect an independent western republic. But what do we now see? How painful is the contrast. Is this state of our affairs a matter of indifference to any one? What must be its effect on foreign nations? Will it not shake their confidence in the permanency of our institutions, and weaken the moral force of our government at home and abroad? Who does not feel proud of the high position occupied by our nation, among the nations of the earth? And who does not desire to increase the glory of his country? This can be done only by a devotion to the constitution and laws of our country—laws enacted by the people, through their representatives; and which may be modified at their will. Every good citizen will throw his influence in this direction. It will discourage all unlawful combinations, and restore to this glorious government that harmony and moral power, which shall distinguish it among other nations. Make this government what, in its formation, it was intended to be, a government of the people, and maintain sacredly the great principles on which it was founded, and its blessings will be perpetual.

Case No. 18,267.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—NEUTRALITY LAWS.

[5 McLean, 306.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Oct., 1851.

VIOLATION OF NEUTRALITY LAWS—SETTING ON FOOT MILITARY EXPEDITION—INTERNATIONAL LAW.

[1. The acts enumerated in section 6 of the neutrality law of April 20, 1818 (3 Stat. 449), are all in the disjunctive. The offense is consummated by any overt act which shall be a commencement of an expedition, though it should not be prosecuted. Any combination of individuals to carry on an expedition is "setting it on foot," within the meaning of the statute, and the contribution of money or anything else which shall induce such combination may be a beginning of the enterprise.]

[2. A person may be convicted of "providing the means" for such an enterprise, if he furnish munitions of war, provisions, transportation, clothing, or any other necessities to men engaged in the expedition.]

[3. Citizens of the United States, who organize an expedition and invade a province or colony which is part of the dominions of a power with which the United States are at peace, thereby place themselves beyond the pale of civilization, and become pirates and outlaws.]

[4. If citizens of one nation commit depredations against another, and are not punished by their own government or given up to the injured government for punishment, the nation to whom they owe allegiance becomes a party to their wrong, under the principles of international law.]

After presenting to the grand jury certain violations of the laws of congress, which ordinarily come under the consideration of the grand jury, McLEBAN, Circuit Justice, remarked:

A sense of duty requires me to call your special and serious attention to an act of congress of the 20th of April, 1818, which is entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes." The first section of that act provides "that if any citizen of the United States shall, within the territory and jurisdiction thereof, accept and exercise a commission to serve a foreign prince, state, colony, district, or people, in war, by land or by sea, against any prince, state, colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be fined not more than two thousand dollars, and imprisoned not exceeding three years." The second section declares "that if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlist or enter himself, or hire, or retain another person to enlist or enter himself, or go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States, with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of any foreign prince, state, colony, district, or people, as a soldier, &c., shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisoned not exceeding three years." Sec. 6. "That if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for, any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding three thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than three years." To this section your attention is specially solicited. You will observe that the enumerated acts which constitute the offense are all in the disjunctive. To "begin" the military expedition spoken of, is an offense within the statute. To begin it, is, to do the first act, which may lead to the enterprise. The offense is consummated by any overt act which shall be a commencement of the expedition, though it should not be prosecuted. Or if an individual shall "set the expedition on foot," which is scarcely distinguishable from beginning it. To set it on foot may imply some progress beyond that of beginning it. Any combination of individuals to carry on the expedition is "setting it on foot," and the contribution of money or anything else which shall induce such combination, may be a beginning of the enterprise. "To provide the means for such an enterprise," is within the statute. To constitute this offense, the individual need not engage personally in the expedition. If he furnish the munitions of war, provisions, transportation, clothing, or any other necessities, to men engaged in the expedition, he is guilty, for he provides the means to carry on the expedition. It must be against a nation or people with whom we are at peace. In passing the above law, congress has performed a high national duty. A nation, by the laws of nations, is considered a moral being, and the principle which imposes moral restraints on the conduct of an individual, applies with greater force to the actions of a nation. "Justice," says Vattel, "is the basis of society, the sure bond of all commerce. Human society, far from being an intercourse of assistance and good offices, would be no longer anything but a vast scene of robbery, if there were no respect to this virtue, which secures to every one his own." "It is still more necessary between nations than between individuals, because injustice produces more dreadful consequences in the quarrels of these powerful bodies politic, and it is still more difficult to obtain redress."

These remarks are made, and the law cited, in reference to the late military expedition against the island of Cuba. That expedition was organized in this country, and was composed, principally, of our own citizens. Its object was to subvert the government of Cuba—a part of the Spanish dominions. With the government of Spain we have a treaty of peace and amity. A foreigner was at the head of the expedition. He seems to have been a credulous and weak man. He was impetuous, but was wanting in sagacity and judgment. His melancholy fate may excite our sympathy, but his memory is loaded with the execrations of thousands. He was instrumental in corrupting the minds, and withdrawing from their allegiance, many of our youth, who have paid the penalty of their temerity and recklessness. Their conduct admits of no other mitigation than that they were misled by falsehoods. They were induced to believe that a considerable portion of the people of Cuba were in arms, with the determination to overthrow their government. Those who were instrumental in creating this delusion have an awful account to render to their country and their God. The invading force, instead of meeting friends, met determined enemies with arms in their hands. At every step the invaders were opposed, and it is not known that a single Cuban joined the enemy. As might have been anticipated, the career of the invaders was short and extremely disastrous. Their sufferings were almost without a parallel; and, with two or three exceptions, those of them who were not taken prisoners and executed, were sentenced to an ignominious imprisonment in Spain. This second expedition terminated more disastrously than the first one. That was fitted out by the same leader, and the force was also raised and organized in our country, in defiance of its laws. The leaders and men were alike guilty in each, but as in the first expedition but few were killed, it created less sensation in the country than the late one. These unlawful enterprises cast a shade upon our national character, in the opinion of the civilized world. They unjustly, more or less, connect our government with the outrage, and they ascribe it to a lust for power and national aggrandizement. The chief executive, by proclamation, from time to time, warned the country of the unlawfulness of the enterprise, and of the punishment to which those engaged in it would be exposed. The executive and ministerial officers of the government were exhorted to be on the alert, to check and defeat the nefarious design. And a part of the navy was charged with the same service. But these efforts were ineffectual; in their madness and folly those who were embodied, trampled upon the laws of their country, and rushed upon their own destruction. To suppose that they could, under such circumstances, have been impelled by any justifiable motive in their own views, is to suppose them to have been laboring under a most extraordinary mental aberration. The duty of giving effect to law devolves upon the judiciary, and you, gentlemen, for the time being, constitute an important part of that branch of the government. And now that the excitement growing out of the late expedition has subsided, and its fatal results are fully known, it becomes us, from the position we occupy, to take a calm, a considerate, and legal view of the circumstances which led to it, and of the acts of our own citizens. In this respect, your inquiries will be limited to the district of Ohio.

Our own history may show in what light our government has considered those opposed to us, who placed themselves beyond the limits of civilized warfare. Gen. Jackson, while engaged in the subjugation of savages in the South, captured two white persons who were banded with them, and in a great measure controlled their depredations. Arbuthnot and Ambrister were British subjects, who having been taken in arms, fighting on the side of the Indians against our armies, and within our territory, were summarily tried and summarily executed, and the commanding general was sustained by his government. Great Britain was too well acquainted with the laws of nations, and with the justice of the punishment, to make it a subject of serious reprobation. Compare the acts of these unfortunate men with the invaders of Cuba. Arbuthnot and Ambrister united themselves with the weaker party, and took part in the war. They were associated with savages, but savages who, to some extent, were allowed to possess the attributes of a nation. Treaties were made with them, and they had always exercised the right of carrying on war against the whites. These men identified themselves with this people in the war, and in doing so, did not, it is believed, violate any express law of their own country. They incurred the hazards of such a war, were taken, and justly condemned. Our citizens, in the invasion of Cuba, put at equal defiance the laws of their own country, and the laws of nations. They were covered by no flag; protected by no public opinion, governed by no general law. They placed themselves beyond the pale of civilization, and in doing so, became pirates and outlaws. They invaded a nation who were protected from outrage and injustice by the solemn guaranty of a treaty—a treaty in which our national honor was deeply concerned. No nation could be bound by a more solemn or higher obligation than our government is bound to maintain the most friendly relations with Spain. And the expedition was directed against an unoffending people. A people who were content with their government, and not desirous of a change. Neither in the landing of the invading army, nor in its progress through the country, was there found a traitor to the Cuban government. This is a most extraordinary fact. It could scarcely be realized by the invasion of any other country under similar circumstances. The liberating army found no one willing to be liberated. They were everywhere received as enemies. It is not known that any cruelties were perpetrated by the invaders on individuals. It is believed there were none. But their way was marked with blood—blood shed in skirmishes and in more general engagements. There never was an invasion among civilized nations, more atrocious and less excusable.

Let us suppose a similar invasion of our own country. And here it may be premised that if complaints against our government and a determination to overthrow it, in a certain quarter, afford any excuse for the combination of a foreign force against us, a strong case could be made out. But suppose an armed force, acknowledging allegiance to no government or people, should invade any part of our country with an avowed intention of overturning the government, how speedily would it meet destruction. Such an indignity and outrage would cause the blood to thrill through the veins of every American. Gentlemen, our government must be just to ourselves, and just to other nations. A government is responsible for the acts of its citizens. Not, it is true, in the first instance, where they commit depredations upon a friendly nation. But if such citizens are not punished or given up to the injured government for punishment, the nation to whom they owe allegiance becomes a party to the wrong. This is an acknowledged principle in the law of nations. But the duty we owe to ourselves is of the highest obligation. No free government can be sustained, which does not enforce its laws. A deep and abiding respect for the laws, has heretofore been the glory of our country. In that consists our strength. Those who are unacquainted with the principles of our government, seem naturally to conclude it is wanting in energy and power. But they do not comprehend the secret of its strength. The majesty of the law pervades every part of the nation, and operates unseen; but its effects are visible. It has, heretofore, required no military display of men at arms to carry it into effect. But I am concerned to say that our late history, in this respect, will not compare with the past. There is, I fear, a growing indifference to the laws. When Aaron Burr was suspected of being engaged in an enterprise against the adjacent provinces of Spain, connected, as was apprehended, with a dissolution of the Union, the country was greatly excited, and he was pursued, arrested, and indicted for treason. Does the same deep feeling for the Union and its laws now pervade our country?

If it shall appear from the evidence that shall be given, that any of our citizens have violated the above law, it will be your duty to indict them. Laws that remain upon our statute book should be operative, or they should be repealed. The national standard is lowered, and licentiousness is increased, by a failure to enforce the penalties of the law. Our institutions can be sustained only on a moral basis. This is wanting in France, and they cannot maintain a free government. They may have the form, but the substance will be wanting. At this moment the republic of France, as it is called, is restrained and governed by physical power. And if our government, in our external and internal affairs, shall be so managed as to destroy its moral basis, we may as well attempt to build a structure in the air, as to sustain it. I fear this great fact may not be properly appreciated. On it depends, not only the prosperity of our free institutions, but their existence.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—NEUTRALITY LAWS.

[4 Wkly. Law Gaz. 214.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Oct. 20, 1859.

VIOLATION OF NEUTRALITY LAWS—PREPARING MILITARY EXPEDITION.

["To provide or prepare the means for" any military expedition or enterprise, within the meaning of the neutrality laws, such preparation must be made as shall aid the expedition. The contribution of money, clothing for the troops, provisions, arms, or any other contributions, which shall tend to forward the expedition or add to the comfort or maintenance of those engaged in it, is a violation of the law. These acts must all be done under such circumstances as to show the criminal intent, unless such intent shall be avowed. Following Case No. 18,265.]

McCALEB, District Judge (charging grand jury). The general terms providing or preparing means were clearly intended by congress to refer to the usual means for a military expedition. Such expedition cannot be carried on without men and arms and other munitions of war. To transport these men and arms and other munitions of war, to render them available for the expedition against a foreign territory situated like Nicaragua, there must be provided or prepared vessels propelled by wind or steam or both. This view seems to me to be consistent with reason and common sense, and consonant with the evident design of congress. It is for this reason, gentlemen, that I shall cite to you the opinion of Mr. Justice McLean. What is the language of the judge? "To provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise within the law, such preparation must be made as shall aid the expedition. The contribution of money, clothing for the troops, provisions, arms, or any other contribution which shall tend to forward the expedition, or add to the comfort or maintenance of those who are engaged in it, is considered in violation of the law. These acts must all be done under such circumstances as to show the criminal intent, unless such intent shall be avowed. And it is hardly to be expected that, when an individual is about to violate the laws of his country, he will openly declare his intention to do so. Where the act and the attendant circumstances show the criminal intent, no subterfuges or motives avowed should screen the citizen from the consequences of such an act." [Case No. 18,265.]

We know, gentlemen of the grand jury, that peaceful relations exist between this country and Nicaragua, and that neither government has given any indications of a disposition to have those relations interrupted. What, then, the government of the United States is unwilling to do, it ill becomes small detachments of its citizens, acting independently and upon their own responsibility, to accomplish. Such a course must inevitably produce what the eminent jurist to whom we have already alluded has denominated that "monstrous anomaly in the history of the world, of a nation at peace, while its citizens are at war." And, surely, it is unnecessary for me to depict the calamities attendant upon war, even when waged in its mildest forms. An invasion by an army of an adequate force carries desolation in its path. The unoffending inhabitants of the invaded country endure, without the power of resistance, every species of outrage and suffering. The quartering of troops in their dwellings without their consent; the subsistence of those troops upon provisions which they have accumulated by honest toil; the pillage and plunder to which their farms and plantations are subjected without the hope of compensation for the losses they may sustain,—are but a few of the evils and calamities to which they must submit. And let it ever be remembered that innocent women and children are at all times the sharers in the sufferings which these military invasions never fail to produce in their desolatory progress. If, on the other hand, an invasion is attempted by an inadequate force, the sufferings and dangers of the invaders themselves must be in proportion to their inability to encounter them. Whether or not it be the duty of the government to interfere to avert the dangers to which a portion of its citizens may choose thus to expose themselves is a question which we need not decide. But surely it may be urged as an argument, to show the humanity of the law, that its faithful and rigid enforcement, whether by the government or the courts, may be instrumental in saving deluded persons from the perils into which they would blindly rush under the guidance of their leaders, and under the influence of promises which may never be realized.

With these remarks, gentlemen, I now commit the whole subject to your consideration, confident that you will discharge with fidelity the important duty which now devolves upon you.

Case No. 18,269.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY—NEUTRALITY LAWS AND TREASON.

[2 Curt. 630.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. 15, 1851.

NEUTRALITY LAWS—CONSTRUCTION AND EFFECT—TREASON AGAINST THE UNITED STATES—OPPOSING EXECUTION OF A LAW.

[1. The neutrality law of March 5, 1794 (1 Stat. 381), and the subsequent legislation upon the same subject, rest upon the principle that, until our country has made war, we are at peace with all, by the law of nations, and without any treaty to that effect; and that for the citizens of the United States to combine to kill and rob those with whom they are at peace, and on whom they have no right to make any aggression, is as essentially criminal as to combine to murder and rob our own citizens.]

[2. The duties of impartiality, kindness, and peaceful treatment of other nations, being plainly incumbent on the government of the United States, it is its duty to see that all those subject to its authority do nothing in contravention of these duties. What it may not do in these particulars it may not permit to be done; and, for its own peace and welfare, it cannot suffer individuals, by mingling themselves in the belligerent operations of other nations, or by making war on their own authority, to run the hazard of counteracting the policy, or embroiling the relations of their own government.]

[3. The words "levying war," as used in the constitutional definition of "treason," include not only the act of making war for the purpose of entirely overturning the government, but also any combination forcibly to oppose the execution of any public law of the United States, with intent to prevent its enforcement in all cases, if accompanied or followed by an act of forcible opposition to such law in pursuance of such combination.]

[4. If a body of men be actually assembled to effect by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered guilty of treason.]

Extract from a charge delivered to the grand jury in Boston, October 15, 1851, concerning the neutrality laws and the law of treason:

CURTIS, Circuit Justice (charging grand jury). You are aware that the foreign relations of our country are under the exclusive care and control of the government of the United States. To make peace and war, to enter into treaties of amity and commerce, to protect the rights and redress the injuries of our citizens from foreign aggression, are powers confided by the constitution to the general government alone. It is essential to the due exercise and maintenance of these powers, and to the welfare of the whole people, for whose benefit they exist, that they should not be in any way embarrassed or interfered with, by the irregular and irresponsible action of individuals. The public faith, pledged by treaties, could not be kept, if individual citizens were at liberty to act, in contravention of such treaties, as their private interest or passions might dictate. The public peace could not be preserved, if men might be armed and embodied on our soil, to make attacks on a foreign people or government. To permit this, would be to allow the interests or passions of a few, to control the deliberate and organized action of the whole, and to place the peace and welfare of our country at the mercy of strangers, or of needy, or desperate, or enthusiastic men. To guard against this evil, congress has made it a high misdemeanor, within the jurisdiction or territory of the United States, to begin to set on foot, or provide, or prepare the means for, any military expedition, or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace; and has also made specific, and highly penal enactments, to prevent the enlistment of men, or the fitting out, or arming of any vessel, for any such purpose, by any person within our jurisdiction.

It cannot be doubted that these laws are in conformity with the settled policy of our government. Very early in our history as a nation, this policy was adopted by President Washington, with the concurrence of the wise and eminent advisers by whom he was then assisted. On the 22d day of April, 1793, he issued a proclamation, in which he asserts it to be both the duty and interest of the United States, with sincerity and good faith, to pursue a conduct friendly and impartial towards the foreign powers therein mentioned, exhorting and warning the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts inconsistent with such friendly and impartial conduct, and declaring that whoever should do otherwise, would not receive the protection of the United States. At this time, congress had not legislated on this subject. And in the following December, the president made known to both houses certain facts connected with the then state of public affairs abroad and at home, and after expressing his own opinion, that where individuals shall, within the United States, enter upon military expeditions and enterprises, the offence cannot receive too early or close an attention, he distinctly recommends to congress the extension of the statute law of the country to such cases, which, he says, though depending on principles already recognized, seemed to him to demand some further provisions of positive law. And, accordingly, on the 5th of June, 1794 (1 Stat. 381), an act was passed, one section of which was similar to the law whose substance I have already stated to you. And since that time, by legislation, as well as by the official action of the executive, this duty and policy of our country have been recognized and declared in the clearest terms, and under a great variety of circumstances. The principles on which these laws rest are, that until our country has made war, we are at peace with all, by the law of nature, and without any treaty to that effect; that for the citizens of the United States to combine to kill and rob those with whom they are at peace, and on whom they have no right to make any aggression, is as essentially criminal, as to combine to murder and rob our own citizens; that individual citizens have no prerogative to judge and condemn, and then proceed to execute others, or inflict on them any injury as a consequence of what may be assumed to be their misconduct; that the duties of impartiality, kindness, and peaceful treatment of other nations being plainly incumbent on the government of the United States, it is as plainly its duty to take care that all those subject to its authority, do nothing in contravention of those duties; what it may not do, in these particulars, it may not permit to be done; and that, for its own peace and welfare, and from its own sense of what is due to others, it cannot suffer individuals, by mingling themselves in the belligerent operations of other nations, or making war on their own authority, to run the hazard of counteracting the policy, or embroiling the relations of their government.

It may be added, that the United States was the first of all civilized nations to embody these principles in their municipal law, and enforce them by penal enactments. Having so legislated, it has become the clear duty of the courts of the United States to take cognizance of these offences, and it is to be expected that they will discharge with fidelity and firmness a duty so important to their country and to the peace of the world.

Under the laws of the United States, the highest of all crimes is treason. It must be so in every civilized state; not only because the first duty of a state is self-preservation, but because this crime naturally leads to and involves many other, destructive of the safety of individuals and of the peace and welfare of society. This crime is defined by the constitution itself, and its magnitude, as well as the importance of a fit and rigid definition of it, may be inferred from the fact that it is the only offence defined by that instrument. It is there made to consist in levying war against the United States, or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. This language is borrowed from an ancient English statute, enacted in the year 1352 (25 Edw. III.), mainly for the purpose of restraining the power of the crown to oppress the subject by arbitrary constructions of the law of treason. At the time of the introduction of this language into our constitution, it had acquired a settled meaning, and that meaning has been adopted by the courts of the United States when they have had occasion, as unfortunately they have had occasion, to interpret these words. This settled interpretation is, that the words "levying war," include not only the act of making war for the purpose of entirely overturning the government, but also any combination forcibly to oppose the execution of any public law of the United States, if accompanied or followed by an act of forcible opposition to such law in pursuance of such combination. The following elements, therefore, constitute this offence: (1) A combination, or conspiracy, by which different individuals are united in one common purpose. (2) This purpose being to prevent the execution of some public law of the United States by force. (3) The actual use of force, by such combination, to prevent the execution of that law.

These elements require some further explanation, to prevent their true nature from being misunderstood. It is not enough that the purpose of the combination is to oppose the execution of a law in some particular case, and in that only. If a person against whom process has issued from a court of the United States, should assemble and arm his friends forcibly to prevent an arrest, and in pursuance of such design, resistance should be made by those thus assembled, they would be guilty of a very high crime, but it would not be treason, if their combination had reference solely to that case. But if process of arrest issue under a law of the United States, and individuals assemble, forcibly to prevent an arrest under such process, pursuant to a design to prevent any person from being arrested under that law, and with such intent, force is used by them for that purpose, they are guilty of treason. The law does not distinguish between a purpose to prevent the execution of one, or several, or all laws. Indeed, such a distinction would be found impracticable, if it were attempted. If this crime could not be committed by forcibly resisting one law, how many laws should be thus resisted to constitute it? Should it be two, or three, or what particular number short of all? And if all, how easy would it be for the worst of treasons to escape punishment, simply by excepting out of the treasonable design, some one law. So that a combination formed to oppose the execution of a law by force, with the design of acting in any case which may occur, and be within the reach of such combination, is a treasonable conspiracy, and constitutes one of the elements of this crime. Such a conspiracy may be formed before the individuals assemble to act, and they may come together to act pursuant to it; or it may be formed when they have assembled, and immediately before they act. The time is not essential. All that is necessary is, that being assembled, they should act in forcible opposition to a law of the United States, pursuant to a common design to prevent the execution of that law, in any case within their reach. Actual force must be used. But what amounts to the use of force, depends much upon the nature of the enterprise, and the circumstances of the case. It is not necessary that there should be any military array, or weapons, nor that any personal injury should be inflicted on the officers of the law. If a hostile army should surround a body of troops of the United States, and the latter should lay down their arms and submit, it cannot be doubted that it would constitute an overt act of levying war, though no shot was fired or blow struck. The presence of numbers who manifest an intent to use force, if found requisite to obtain their demands, may compel submission to that force, which is present and ready to inflict injury, and which may thus be effectually used to oppose the execution of the law. But, unfortunately, it will not often be necessary to apply this principle, since actual violence, and even murder, are the natural and almost inseparable attendants of this great crime. It should be known also, that treason may be committed by those not personally present at the immediate scene of violence. If a body of men be actually assembled to effect by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered guilty of treason.

Influential persons cannot form associations to resist the law by violence, excite the passions of ignorant and unreflecting, or desperate men, incite them to action, supply them with weapons, and then retire and await in safety the result of the violence which they themselves have caused. To permit this, would not only be inconsistent with sound policy, but with a due regard to the just responsibilities of men. The law does not permit it. They who have the wickedness to plan and incite and aid, and who perform any part however minute, are justly deemed guilty of this offence, though they are not present at the immediate scene of violence.

The court deeply regrets that it should ever be necessary in this country, and under this government, to instruct a grand-jury concerning the law of treason. But unfortunately, recent events have shown, too clearly, that there is a great misapprehension in some minds concerning this subject, and that it has already become necessary elsewhere, to institute inquiries and make presentments of this offence. With the temper of any portion of the public mind, so far as it manifests itself in discussion of any question, or the formation of opinions, or so far as it affects the political affairs of the country, this tribunal has no concern. But, when it connects itself with the criminal law of the United States, when discussion passes into direct and urgent incitement to crime, when ignorant men are stirred up to form combinations to resist the law by violence, it becomes the duty of this court to apprise you of the true character of these combinations, and the acts which grow out of them, and the responsibility which the law attaches thereto.

I hardly need inform you that it is not material what law of the United States is thus resisted. We can know no distinction between one law of the United States and another. If it were permitted to you, or to me, to be influenced by our own wishes, in determining what laws should be executed, and what might be resisted with impunity, we should live no longer under a government of laws, but under a government of men; the transitory opinions and feelings of men, being substituted for a known and stable rule of action, operating at all times, and operating equally on all; and the citizen would be held innocent or guilty, not according to his wilful violation of a known rule, but according to the caprice of his judges. This is not the nature of the government under which we live. No such government could long exist in this country, or ought to exist in any country.

Case No. 18,269a.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

[3 Phila. 527.]

Circuit Court, District of Georgia. Nov., 1850.

SLAVE TRADE—STATUTES—INTERPRETATION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

[1. A vessel becomes liable to forfeiture because built or equipped in the United States for use in transporting slaves from one foreign country to another (Act Cong. March 22, 1794; 1 Stat. 347) as soon as any preparation of it for such purpose is made, a completion of the equipment not being necessary.]

[2. A vessel is "employed in the transportation of slaves from one foreign country to another" (Act Cong. May 10, 1800; Rev. St. U. S. § 5556), so as to be liable to forfeiture, when it is on a voyage to procure slaves for that purpose, though no slaves have as yet been taken on board.]

[3. Service on a voyage known to be for the purpose of procuring slaves for transportation from one foreign country to another is a violation of Act Cong. May 10, 1800 (Rev. St. § 5331), forbidding citizens and residents of the United States to serve on a vessel used in such transportation.]

[4. Under the power to define and punish piracies (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, subd. 10), congress may declare to be piracy the service of a citizen or resident of the United States on a vessel used in kidnapping the inhabitants of a foreign country for the purpose of making them slaves, or the use of a vessel owned in the United States in such kidnapping.]

[5. Congress has power to prohibit citizens and residents of the United States from engaging in the slave trade with or between foreign countries, both under the power to regulate commerce (Const. art. 1, § 8, subd. 3), and because such traffic concerns the relations between citizens of the United States and those of foreign countries.]

WAYNE, Circuit Justice (charging the grand jury).

A circumstance has recently occurred in this city which impresses the larger portion of its people, I may say all, with few exceptions, that the same vessel has been positively taken from this port to be engaged again in the same unlawful trade. This incident, with some exceptions that you may be called upon to act upon it, and upon bills for violation for the slave trade acts, induces me, for the information of yourselves and our people at large, to charge you upon the legislation of congress upon that subject, and to give its history. I shall assert nothing without the documentary annals of our country to sustain what I shall say, with such references to them as will enable any one and every one who hears me to verify or to disaffirm the conclusion of my investigation, if the latter can be done.

I proceed now to give the legislation of congress for the prohibition of the slave trade. It shall be chronological and minute, for instruction generally, and as a warning to such persons who at any time may be seduced by a corrupt avarice to engage in that inhuman trade. These enactments are in conformity with the constitution, and with that clause of it which declares that the "migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person." The clause has its place in the enumerated powers of congress.

The first act was passed on the 22d March, 1794 [1 Stat. 347], when General Washington was president. It was intended to prevent any citizen or resident of the United States, from equipping vessels within the United States to carry on trade or traffic in slaves to any foreign country. The Tryphenia v. Harrison [Case No. 14,209]. That is, though slaves might be brought into the United States until the year 1808, in vessels fitted out in our ports for that purpose, they could not be carried by our citizens or residents in the United States in such vessels into any foreign country. The forfeiture of the vessel which has been fitted out, attached when the original voyage was begun in the United States, notwithstanding a pretended transfer of her in a foreign port, and the commencement of a new voyage from such port. The Plattsburg, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 133. This act is still in force. The forfeiture attaches, though the equipments of the voyage may not have been completed, it being sufficient that any preparations were made for the unlawful purpose. The act also imposes a penalty of $2,000 upon any person fitting out such vessel, or aiding or abetting to do so. And as a prevention of such a traffic was the object to be attained, the act was applied to foreign vessels in this particular, that if one of them in our port shall be suspected to be intended for the slave trade, her owner, master, or factor, each and all of them, upon the oath of a citizen of the United States to that intent, may be required to give bonds to the treasurer of the United States, that none of the natives of Africa or negroes of any foreign country, should be taken on board of her, to be sold as slaves in any foreign port whatever, within nine months afterwards. In addition, a citizen of the United States is liable to forfeiture of $200 for every person he may receive on board of such vessel for the purpose of selling them as slaves. This statute accomplished its purpose for a time. But when it was found that some of our citizens and foreigners residing in the United States, who had been accustomed to traffic in slaves, misused their privilege to bring slaves into the United States, by engaging their vessel for taking slaves from one country to another, congress passed the act of May 10, 1800 [2 Stat. 70]. It subjected to forfeiture any right or property in a vessel so employed, and the owners to pay a sum of money equal to double the value of their interest in her.

The judicial interpretation of this act, is that a vessel caught in such a trade, though it be before she has taken slaves on board, is liable to forfeiture. That a forfeiture was also incurred if slaves were carried as freight from a foreign port to another in the same kingdom; or from one foreign port to another in any other country. The act, too, declares that it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States or for any person residing in them to serve on board of any vessel of the United States employed in the transportation of slaves from one foreign country to another; and that for doing so they should be indicted and be subjected to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars and imprisonment not exceeding two years. That he shall also be liable to the same fine and imprisonment for being voluntarily employed on board of a foreign vessel for the same purpose. The judicial interpretation of this act is, that actual transportation of slaves is not necessary to incur its penalties. It is enough that the vessel was bound to the coast of Africa with the intent to take slaves on board, and that the person charged with violating the act, knew that, and voluntarily served on board of her. U. S. v. Morris, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 464. It is not necessary to do more than to mention that there are other sections of this act providing for the capture of vessels engaged in such a trade: also for their forfeiture for the benefit of the captors, and precluding all persons interested in such vessel, her enterprise or voyage, from all rights to claim any slave on board of her, and denying to them any damages or retribution on account of her capture. This act further directs the commander of the ship, making the seizure of such a vessel, to take her officers and crew, and any person found on board of her, into custody, and to convey them to the civil authority of the United States, in some of the judicial districts, for prosecution. It had been early found that some of those persons most concerned in violating the laws, (just as it has been recently attempted,) claimed to be exempt from its penalties, on the ground of being passengers on board of the vessel seized. Congress met the artifice by declaring that all persons making such a declaration should nevertheless be taken into custody for prosecution, and any commander who shall seize such a vessel, with such a person on board of her, and who attempts to exercise his judgment in respect to the validity of such an excuse breaks the law. It was early afterwards decided, by Judge Bee, of South Carolina, that any person might make a seizure of such vessel for condemnation under the act. His ruling was affirmed by the supreme court of the United States in the case of The Josefa Segunda, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 331. The act also gives to the president of the United States the naval forces to be employed in enforcing it. It provides for the punishment of the master of the vessel seized, subjecting him to a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars and imprisonment of not less than two and not more than four years.

The next act of congress was passed on the 2d March, 1807 [2 Stat. 426], when Mr. Jefferson was president. I will hereafter show that it was done upon his official suggestion; and I only do so now from unwillingness to divert your minds into another train of thought from the legislation itself. The act of 1807 begins by subjecting any vessel to forfeiture which shall be found in any river, bay, or harbor, or on the high seas within the jurisdiction or limits of the United States, or which may be hovering on the coast, having on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color for the purpose of selling them as slaves, or with the intent to land them in any port or place within the United States.

The act of 1818 [3 Stat. 450] prohibits the importation of negroes altogether into the United States from any foreign kingdom, place or country, without excluding the return to it of such slaves as might leave the United States as servants of their owners, comprehending such as have been employed as seamen on a foreign voyage. U. S. v. The Garonne, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 73. The ship in which they are brought is forfeited. It also forfeits any vessel built or equipped for the purpose of bringing slaves into the United States, or for the purpose of transporting them to any foreign country, and any preparation which clearly manifests an intent to prosecute a slave voyage, constitutes a fitting out under the act.

This offence being by the act a misdemeanor, all concerned in it are principals. U. S. v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 460. The penalty under the act for fitting out vessels for the slave trade, and all persons in any way concerned, is a fine not less than $1,000 nor more than $4,000, and imprisonment which may be extended from three to seven years. It also inflicts other and severe penalties upon citizens of the United States, and other persons residing therein, for being concerned in the slave trade, either on shore or at sea, and it provides, as previous acts did, against carrying slaves from one port to another in a foreign country. The Merino, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 391. It takes from the importer of slaves, and from any other person claiming them under him, or who may have bought from his agent, any right, title or interest whatever in the service or labor of any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, so acquired. The purchaser of such slaves may be punished. Those also who may have aided or abetted the importation of such slaves, and all persons are punishable who now hold, sell, or otherwise dispose of any negro, with intent to make him a slave, who shall know that he was introduced into the United States contrary to law. And in the eighth section of the act it is declared that in all prosecutions under it, the defendant shall be held to prove that the negro, mulatto, or person of color, which he shall be charged with having brought into the United States, or with having purchased, or with having held or sold, or otherwise having disposed of, was brought into the United States five years before the commencement of the prosecution, or that he was not brought into it contrary to the provisions of the act. On failure of neither being done by the person charged, he shall be adjudged guilty of the offence with which he may stand charged under the act. By which understanding that after the prosecuting officer has made out a prima facie case, that a negro or mulatto is in possession of the accused, who has been brought into the United States contrary to law, that the burden of proof is cast upon the holder of the negro to exempt himself from the penalties of the law.

The act of 1819 [3 Stat. 532] authorizes the president in a more particular manner than has been done before, to use the naval force for the prevention of the slave trade, points out the circumstances and the localities in which seizures of vessels may be made, directs the distribution of the proceeds of them after condemnation, requires that negroes found on board of them shall be delivered to the marshal, what that officer's duty then is, and again commands that the officer making the seizure shall take into his custody every person found on board, being of the crew or officers of the vessel seized, and that they are to be turned over to the civil authority for prosecution. A bounty of twenty-five dollars is to be given for the detection of every negro, &c., &c., brought into the United States contrary to law, which the secretary of the treasury is authorized to pay to the informer. The government is also authorized to pay a specific sum to any person who shall lodge information with the district attorney of any state or territory into which negroes have been introduced, contrary to the provisions of this act. It is then made that officer's duty to commence a prosecution, by information, to ascertain the fact of the unlawful introduction, and process is issued against the person charged with holding any such negro. If upon the return of the process executed it shall be ascertained by the verdict of a jury that the negro has been brought into the United States as the informer had alleged, he is entitled to receive fifty dollars for each negro delivered to the marshal or of whom that officer may get the possession. I have been more particular in reciting what should be the proceedings, on account of it not having been pursued, when a number of Africans supposed to be of the Wanderer cargo were in the possession of an officer from whom they were taken, by the intervention of a state officer's warrant, without there being the slightest authority for doing so. I suggest, as the release of the Africans alluded to was a nullity, that proceedings against the persons concerned in it may still be instituted in vindication of the violation of the laws of the United States, and that new proceedings may be brought upon the proper affidavit of any one that any other person was or is in possession of any of the negroes brought in by the Wanderer, for carrying out the United States law to its conclusion, for the benefit of whoever was or may become the informer.

This brings us to the last act upon the subject,—that of the 15th May, 1820 [3 Stat. 600]. It denounces any citizen of the United States as a pirate, and that he shall suffer death who shall become one of the crew of a ship's company of any foreign ship; and that any person whatever becomes a pirate and shall suffer death, who shall become one of the crew or ship's company of any vessel owned in the whole or in parts, or which shall be navigated for or in behalf of any citizen of the United States, or who shall land from such vessel on any foreign shore and shall seize any negro or mulatto not held to service or labor by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or who shall decoy or forcibly bring or carry or who shall receive on board of such ship any negro or mulatto with intent to make him a slave. The fifth section of the act declares that, if either of the same class of persons in the same classes of vessels shall forcibly confine or detain, or abet or aid, to do so, any negro or mulatto on either of such ships, not held to service or labor by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make them slaves, or who shall on board any such ships offer or attempt to sell as a slave any negro or mulatto not held to service by the laws of any of the states or territories of the United States with intent to make such persons slaves; or who shall on the high seas or any where on tide-water transfer over to any other ships or vessels, such persons intending to make them slaves; or shall land or deliver such persons with the same intent, or having already sold them, that such persons shall be adjudged pirates, and on conviction, shall suffer death. It was necessary to be minute in the recital of this act, or you could not have had a correct idea of it.

Such, gentlemen, has been the legislation of congress to prohibit and to punish the introduction of slaves into the United States from abroad by our own citizens or by foreigners. It will be found in the history which I shall give of that legislation, that it is the result of an early and continued disapproval by the people of the United States, both north and south, of the African slave trade. In all of which, from the very beginning of our nationality, the distinguished men of both sections took an active part, none of them more decisively than southern statesmen, in every act that has been passed, including the last. There has never been any manifestation of popular or sectional discontent against them on account of their opinions concerning the African slave trade, or their legislation to repress it. The acts for that purpose have never been complained of but by those who had subjected themselves to their penalties, or who feared that they might be so, or by a few gentlemen, the sincerity of whose convictions cannot be doubted, but have not as yet in their speeches or publications commanded much attention for their knowledge of the history of our legislation, or for their expositions of constitutional laws upon the subject. No serious attempt has been made to repeal any one of those acts, and no one in a condition to do so has been found to propose it with an earnest and zealous effort to accomplish that. They have been acquiesced in, and had a popular approval from the first act that was passed to the last, inclusive. The judicial infliction of the penalties of those acts, which has been frequently done, has always been considered the legal and just consequence of the constitutional provision which gives to congress the power to prohibit the importation of slaves into the United States after the year 1807.

The acts of 1818, 1819, 1820, severe as they may seem to be, particularly the last, had the active and marked support of the most distinguished representatives in congress from the state of South Carolina, and that of the ablest representatives of every other state in the Union. There was but one opinion in the senate and house of representatives that the treaty engagement of the United States with Great Britain, the times and the circumstances of it, called for such acts in favor of humanity. They were necessary to vindicate our national sincerity from almost an imputation of connivance at the violations on our coast of our acts for the suppression of the slave trade. What those circumstances were will be shown by the narrative I shall now give you. At no time has modern commerce been assailed by more extensive or more brutal piracies and murders than it was in the year 1815, and for thirty years afterward.

The general pacification in Europe in 1814, and that of the United States with Great Britain, threw out of employment numbers of men who had been accustomed to the violence of war and to the hazards and gains of privateering. They were unfitted for any quiet social conditions, were without daily occurring or expected causes of excitement, and had not those virtues suited to the pursuits of peace. Their vessels had been built, and equipped and manned for pursuit and for flight, and were unfit for the carrying trade of commerce. Many of them were soon employed in a force trade, and in smuggling on every shore of the Atlantic. The transition to piracy soon followed. I believe (for I speak from the history of that day and from public documents) that there was no nation in Europe some of whose vessels were not so used, and many of those of the United States were navigated by our citizens and by foreigners for the same purpose. In the latter part of the year 1816, and during the following year, vessels of that class were on the coasts of this continent from Cape Horn to the Gulf of Florida. At first they were pirates without combinations, but afterwards became associated and had places of depot for the sale and division of their spoil. Those places were on the uninhabited Atlantic coast of America, and those localities are now known. At length an adventurer, daring and knowing, conceived an idea and executed it, to make the Island of Fernandina their rendezvous. He seized it, declaring it to be no longer a dependence of Spain, and organized a government there, in conjunction with citizens of the United States who were men of broken fortunes at home. They claimed for themselves the privileges of nationality, invited an accession of numbers from every part of the world, recruited them as soldiers, and employed them on board of cruisers which had commissions of their own, with simulated documentary papers of the United States and the nations of Europe. Spain could not dislodge them. Our negotiations were then going on for the purchase of Florida. In a short time the little island (now probably to become a city of note) was filled with the stolen products of commerce. The plan was to smuggle them into the adjoining districts of the United States, overland by the way of Florida, and from points on the St. Mary's river into the interior. Our citizens from the north and the south did not resist the temptation; men from the utmost east of the United States and the nearer south to the locality were there for unlawful purposes, just as they had been a few years before, during the war of the United States and England, to smuggle our cotton into Fernandina on English account, and in return, to smuggle into the United States the fabrics of her manufacturers. In a short time this assumed government opened the island as a depot for slaves from Africa. Two cargoes of them arrived there in the year 1818, in such a condition of misery from long confinement, starvation and scourging, that the representation of it caused all over the United States a deep and indignant sympathy. Those, and there were but few of them who survived, were bought by a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania, and by a resident merchant of Savannah, and were successfully introduced into the United States. A third cargo arrived under like circumstances and with the same results. It was known that others would follow, and with a proper regard for humanity, and the political interest of the nation, Mr. Monroe, then president, determined to take possession of the island. It was done by a military force. The late Gen. Bankhead commanded the expedition. Aury's government and forces, after a show of resistance, surrendered. Himself and his officers fled, and thus an end was put to their combination for smuggling and piracy. It must not be supposed, however, that a gush of sympathy from such a cause led to the enactments of the act of 1820. It had a deeper and a wider foundation, as you will presently see, in the long standing conviction of the American people, that the African slave trade was wrong in itself.

Your attention will now be called to the history of the legislation of congress to prohibit the African slave trade, with especial reference to the religious, moral, and political considerations on which it rests, and to the constitutionality of the act of 1820, making the trade piracy, punishable with death. The colonial history of the states, in my judicial circuit, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, exhibits the existence of a profound impression among the people that the slave trade was not a legitimate commerce, but that it involved the perpetration of enormous crimes. The same feeling, belief, and opinion had been frequently expressed in Virginia, and Maryland manifested the same sentiments and disposition to abolish it; all of them suggested measures for its discouragement. This sentiment, common indeed to all the colonists, was expressed by the first constitutional congress of 1774, in its adoption, unanimously, by all the colonies, of the non-importation, non-consumption, and non-exportation agreement, and with more emphasis by the congress of 1776. That congress resolved that the importation of African slaves should be abandoned, and for a time there was no state in which the trade was tolerated. The provisions of the federal constitution were settled with much deliberation and care. They were reported by a committee formed by a member from each state, and their report, with amendments, was adopted as the complete and final adjustment of our constitutional arrangement of that subject. This adjustment contemplated that either of the states, "then existing," should retain its power to admit slaves until the year eighteen hundred and eight, and that after the year eighteen hundred and seven, congress should have plenary authority to regulate or prohibit it. Mr. Madison expressed the sense of the federal convention, when he said, in the Virginia convention, "it appeared to him that the general government would not intermeddle with that property for twenty years, but to lay a tax on every slave imported, not exceeding ten dollars, and that after the expiration of that period, they might prohibit the traffic altogether." But the reservation of the power to "the United States" to admit Africans to be held as slaves, was opposed with much earnestness in the federal convention that passed it, and was regarded as a serious objection in many of the conventions assembled in the different states to ratify the constitution. The limitation of the powers of the United States to legislate upon the subject, did not extend to the trade with foreign nations or to the territories.

In the years 1794 and 1800, during the administrations of General Washington and Mr. Adams, American ships and American seamen were prohibited from engaging in or carrying on the slave trade among foreign nations, under heavy penalties. In 1798 and in 1804, the trade was prohibited in the Mississippi and Louisiana territories, comprising, then, all the slaveholding territories of the United States. In the year 1806, President Jefferson congratulated congress upon the approach of that period when its power became plenary, and invited it to pass suitable laws for the final suppression of the trade. The prohibitory sections of the act of 1807 were adopted with unusual harmony of sentiment by congress, and were the result of Mr. Jefferson's recommendations. It was said in the debate that took place upon that bill, that the sentiment was general for the abolition of the slave trade, and that the only inquiry was, how it could be most effectually done.

In the treaty of peace concluded at Ghent between the United States and Great Britain, the trade was pronounced to be "irreconcilable with humanity and justice," and the contracting parties engaged to use their best endeavors for its abolition. In 1818, 1819, and 1820 the laws of the United States upon the subject were revised, and additional severity given to the enactments. Thus it is seen that during the administrations of the first five presidents, all of whom were concerned in settling the foundations of the government, a series of laws, based upon a common principle, and having a common end, have been adopted by the united and concurring views of the states and the people for the suppression of the African slave trade. The power of congress to suppress the slave trade, by passing all laws necessary and proper for that purpose, is not questioned by any one at all conversant with the constitution and constitutional history of the United States. As a matter of commerce, the power of congress to regulate the foreign slave trade is plenary and conclusive. As it affects navigation and the police of the ocean and seas, the power given to define and punish piracies and felonies on the high seas is without limitation. And in so far as it affects intercourse with the inhabitants of another continent, and the relation which shall exist between our citizens and those inhabitants, the power of congress to determine upon that intercourse, and to control the citizens of the United States in regard to it, is absolute and unconditional.

The acts of congress relating to the slave trade divide the offenders into three classes, and apportion various degrees of punishment among them. I shall speak of but one of them. The class treated as the most criminal, upon whom the denunciation of punishment falls most severely, comprises the crew of the ship's company of the vessel, who are immediately employed in carrying on the trade. The act of congress of May, 1820 [3 Stat. 600] describes this class as the crew or ship's company of any American vessel, or the citizens of the United States employed in any foreign vessel engaged in the slave trade. The supreme court of the United States have said in reference to a similar enactment: "As to our citizens, there is no reason why they should be exempted from the operation of the law of the country, even though in foreign service. Their subjection to those laws follows them every where." The crimes described in this act have been already mentioned in almost the language of it, but in the connection the repetition with greater brevity will be allowable. Those crimes may be committed by landing from any such vessel, and on any foreign shore seizing a negro or mulatto not a slave under any state or territorial law of the United States with intent to make of him a slave; or by forcibly or fraudulently decoying or abducting such a person to such ship or vessel, or forcibly confining or detaining him on board with such an intent, or selling or attempting to sell him as a slave on the high seas, or landing him from the vessel, with such intent. The person transgressing in either of the particulars mentioned is to be adjudged a pirate, and the penalty is death. The crime of kidnapping the inhabitant of another country by a citizen of the United States, or by the employment of an American vessel, is as plainly within the power of congress to define and punish and denominate it piracy as it would be for congress to punish for piracy the crew of any vessel who might land upon the shore of the United States with the intent to kidnap, or who should kidnap, the citizens of the United States, or the negro slaves on plantations situated on the coast of the United States. In either case it belongs to congress to affix the punishment for the offence, upon
